In Hunter the Court reviewed the permanent disenfranchisement of two Alabama men convicted of writing bad checks. The state considered that to be a crime of "moral turpitude" and therefore subject to loss of voting rights under section 182 of the Alabama Constitution of 1901. Alabama's 1875 constitution had barred from voting those convicted of any crime punishable by incarceration, but the 1901 constitution replaced that provision with a list of specific infractions. Moreover, any offense betraying "moral turpitude"—even if not punishable by jail time—would bring about disenfranchisement. The Court found explicitly discriminatory purposes behind that phrase.

After Reconstruction (1865–1877), the post–Civil War program that was intended to rebuild the South and bring it back into the Union, southern whites used a variety of schemes to prevent blacks from voting—grandfather clauses, literacy tests, poll taxes, white primaries—effectively circumventing the Fifteenth Amendment that prohibited voting discrimination on the basis of race. This obstructionist list is familiar to many Americans. What is less well known is that changes to laws disenfranchising criminals were also prominent features of the post-Reconstruction backlash, as new constitutions targeted infractions that whites believed blacks were more likely to commit. Previous suffrage laws excluding all felons, for example, were sometimes narrowed to disenfranchise only those convicted of specified crimes such as vagrancy and bigamy—offenses made more common among blacks because of the dislocations of slavery.

The Court found that in Alabama, legislators had made their goals clear. "What is it we want to do? Why it is within the limits imposed by the Federal Constitution, to establish white supremacy in this State," said John B. Knox, president of the 1901 Alabama constitutional convention. The "moral turpitude" clause, the Court held, was adopted intentionally to disenfranchise blacks, would not have been included without that discriminatory purpose, and had achieved its intended effect. Indeed, a historian later hired by Alabama state registrars found that by January 1903, the revised constitution had disenfranchised about ten times as many blacks as whites.

A decade earlier, in Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 24 (1974), the Court had held that laws barring convicts from voting were constitutional, and the Hunter Court explicitly declined to reconsider Richardson. Moreover, by striking down only that narrow portion of the Alabama law traceable to explicit racist intent, the Court allowed more broadly written provisions to stand, despite evidence that the sanction continued to have disproportionate impact on blacks in many states. Therefore, although Hunter did invalidate part of Alabama's disenfranchisement law, the ruling overall may further strengthen the policy against constitutional challenges. Nevertheless, Hunter held disenfranchisement law to the standards of the Equal Protection Clause—which the Richardson majority had conspicuously refused to do—and ruled that at least some forms of criminal disenfranchisement do violate the Constitution.

Alec C. Ewald

See also: Right to Vote.

FURTHER READING

Shapiro, Andrew. "Challenging Criminal Disenfranchisement Under the Voting Rights Act: A New Strategy." Yale Law Journal 103 (1993): 537.

Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc. (1995)

In Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515 U.S. 557 (1995), the U.S. Supreme Court grappled with a public-accommodations statute that, as applied by a court, pitted the right of free speech protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution against the right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment.

John Hurley and the South Boston Allied War Veterans Council (Council) appealed the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts ruling that their city-permitted Saint Patrick's Day Parade had no expressive purpose sufficient to justify a First Amendment exclusion of the Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group (GLBG) members from marching to express their Irish heritage in pride as being openly gay, lesbian, or bisexual. At issue was the state supreme court's application of the state's public-accommodations law. The court order required private citizens who organized a parade to include among the marchers a group imparting a message that the organizers did not wish to impart. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled unanimously to reverse the state supreme court.

Justice David H. Souter wrote the Court's opinion. He explained that as a general matter the state law itself did not violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The state law prohibited "any distinction, discrimination or restriction on account of . . . sexual orientation . . . relative to the admission of any person to, or treatment in any place of public accommodation, resort or amusement." The Council claimed it did not intend to discriminate against homosexuals per se, but it opposed being coerced to include GLBG as a parade unit carrying a banner announcing gay pride as its message. The state supreme court applied the public-accommodations law in a peculiar way. It had the effect of declaring the organizers' speech itself to be the public accommodation, forcing them to alter the parade's expressive content and thereby violating the First Amendment rule that a speaker has the autonomy to choose the content of the message and decide what not to say.

Hurley is intriguing because no other gay-rights claim decided on its merits by the Court was unanimous. In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000), the justices cast a five–four vote in reversing a similar public-accommodations law applied by the New Jersey Supreme Court to prohibit the Boy Scouts from excluding a gay Eagle Scout. The dissenting opinion written by Justice John Paul Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen G. Breyer, explained that Hurley was distinguishable from Dale, since the Boy Scouts conceded they were excluding James Dale, who had been a Scout since he was eight, because of his gay sexual orientation, and Dale was not seeking to express himself in the Scouts as gay-identified per se.

Hurley was the first gay-rights case the Court decided after Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986). In Hardwick—a decision subsequently reversed in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)—the Court held five–four that a federal right of privacy did not void Georgia's felony ban on sodomy as applied against consenting adult homosexual partners in the home. The Court composition had changed significantly by the time it decided Hurley. The three holdovers were Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Stevens and Sandra Day O'Connor. The newcomers were Justices Souter, Ginsburg, Breyer, Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, and Antonin Scalia.

Sharon G. Whitney

See also: Bowers v. Hardwick; Boy Scouts of America v. Dale; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Zaleskas, Kristine M. "Pride, Prejudice, or Political Correctness? An Analysis of Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston." Columbia Journal of Law and Social Problems 29 (1996): 507–49.

Hurtado v. California (1884)

In Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), the U.S. Supreme Court dealt with the issue of whether indictment by a grand jury, as provided in the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, was a provision that should be applied to the states as well as the federal government. Some states adopted alternative measures for bringing criminal charges against individuals. In Hurtado, California had a procedure under which the prosecutor brought charges by means of an "information."

Joseph Hurtado and wife Susie lived in Sacramento, California. Susie and Jose Estuardo began an affair that Joseph quickly discovered. Hurtado acted to end the affair, but Estuardo persisted in his pursuit of Susie. In light of this, Hurtado approached Estuardo in the street and shot him three times at close range. Hurtado was charged with murder. It was common practice in several states at the time to use a grand jury hearing before the accused was sent to trial, but under the California constitution of 1879, Hurtado's trial was initiated via an "information" (a document issued by a prosecutor that officially charges an individual with a crime).

Based on the information document, Hurtado was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. He appealed to the California Supreme Court, which affirmed his sentence. Hurtado's counsel later argued that either the Due Process Clause or the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment should be interpreted so as to apply (incorporate) to the states the Fifth Amendment protection of a grand jury hearing. Upon losing this argument at California's high court, he appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

At the Supreme Court, Hurtado's counsel abandoned the argument for incorporation through the Privileges or Immunities Clause, because it was established precedent that this clause failed to apply the Bill of Rights to the states, as the Court had held in the Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873). In Hurtado, decided March 3, 1884, the Court continued its refusal to nationalize the Bill of Rights via the Fourteenth Amendment. In an opinion penned by Justice Stanley Matthews, the Court argued that the two Due Process Clauses in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments had the same meaning. This precluded the possibility that the Fourteenth Amendment clause could include the right to indictment by a grand jury. Moreover, the Supreme Court held that the Constitution could not be understood to freeze all traditional common law procedures (including the right to trial by jury) and force the states to adopt these traditions. However, the Court did recognize that certain rights could be so fundamental to a democracy that they should be placed beyond incursion by the states.

The setback for incorporation of the Bill of Rights should not be understated. The Court's decision in Hurtado seemed to sound the death knell for incorporation of the Bill of Rights via the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, just as the Slaughterhouse Cases had terminated the viability of the Privileges or Immunities Clause. Indeed, it took the Court another thirteen years to incorporate any of the Bill of Rights to the states, when the Court in Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226 (1897), applied against the states the Fifth Amendment protection of compensation for taking of private property. Moreover, it was not until 1925 that any traditional civil liberties, such as freedom of speech and press, were incorporated to apply to the states.

Perhaps the most important protection of civil liberties to stem from Hurtado was Justice John Marshall Harlan's assertion that all of the rights protected in the first eight amendments should have been incorporated via the Due Process Clause. This doctrine, which became known as "total incorporation," was prescient in that most of the Bill of Rights subsequently was incorporated to apply to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause.

Tobias T. Gibson

See also: Grand Jury; Incorporation Doctrine; Selective Incorporation; Slaughterhouse Cases.

FURTHER READINGS

Cortner, Richard C. The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Nationalization of Civil Liberties. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 4th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell (1988)

Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), arose after Hustler magazine ran an advertising parody that featured the likeness of the Reverend Jerry Falwell, although the U.S. Supreme Court ultimately ruled such a parody was protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. At issue in the case were free speech rights as provided in that amendment.

A typical Hustler issue featured provocative photographs of nude women as well as adult-oriented jokes, articles, and stories. Falwell was a nationally known and politically active conservative. A frequent political commentator, he founded the Moral Majority, a political action committee. The advertising parody imitated an ad campaign of Campari, an Italian apertif. The genuine Campari ad campaign featured celebrities discussing their "first time" in a double-entendre-filled interview, with the "first time" ultimately revealed as being their first drink of Campari. The parody was a mock interview of Falwell in which he disclosed he lost his virginity to his mother in an outhouse while both were drunk on Campari and that he always got drunk before he preached.

Falwell sued both the Hustler magazine corporation and its publisher, Larry Flynt, for $45 million in federal district court, alleging libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Using an edited version of the ad, Falwell solicited and received over $700,000 for his legal fund. Interestingly, Falwell hired as his attorney Norman Ray Grutman, who was most well known at the time for his representation of Penthouse magazine and its publisher, Bob Guccione. The jury held against Falwell on the libel charge, finding the ad could not be reasonably believed as describing actual events, but found for Falwell on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Falwell was awarded $200,000 evenly split between compensatory and punitive damages.

The federal appellate court affirmed the trial court's judgment, rejecting the contention of Hustler and Flynt that Falwell would have to meet the "actual malice" standard of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), before he could recover for emotional distress. The appellate court also discounted as irrelevant the argument that because the jury determined the ad did not describe actual events, it was an opinion protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

At oral arguments, the U.S. Supreme Court had only eight sitting justices, as Anthony M. Kennedy was still in the confirmation process. Allan Isaacman, the attorney for Hustler and Flynt, stressed to the Court that there was a public interest in allowing the parody of public figures. Isaacman argued that politicians in the United States, from George Washington forward, had always been subjected to vigorous satire, ridicule, and parody. The eight-member Court ruled unanimously that the ad parody could not be the basis of an award for damages arising out of emotional distress. The Court grounded its decision in the First Amendment to the Constitution as incorporated to apply to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. In essence, the Court determined that whatever interest the state had in protecting public figures from emotional distress was not sufficient to deny the protection of freedom of expression even when the expression was intended to cause distress. Since nothing in the ad parody reasonably could be construed as true, or even possibly true, it could not be the basis for an award of damages.

Charles Anthony Smith

See also: First Amendment; Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Smolla, Rodney A. Jerry Falwell v. Larry Flynt: The First Amendment on Trial. Chicago: University Press of Illinois, 1990.

Yalof, David Alistair, and Kenneth Dautrich. The First Amendment and the Media in the Court of Public Opinion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

I

Illinois v. Gates (1983)

The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution requires that no search or arrest warrants be issued without "probable cause"—anything causing a reasonable and prudent person to believe a criminal act has been, is being, or is about to be committed. Ordinarily, two persons are required to verify probable cause, a law enforcement officer and a neutral, detached magistrate who will issue the warrants. When officers gain information visually or directly from an informant, probable cause is much easier to establish. An anonymous tip, however, must meet the two-pronged test under Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964), as further developed in Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969), which requires that the tip provide an adequate basis for the tipster's knowledge and either the truthfulness of the tipster or the reliability of the information provided by the informant. The U.S. Supreme Court further developed the issue of anonymity in Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983).

Illinois v. Gates began when Bloomington, Illinois, police received an anonymous letter containing detailed information about the interstate drug trafficking enterprise of Susan and Lance Gates. The letter stated that a one-way ticket was purchased between Chicago and West Palm Beach, Florida. One spouse would be met by the other, drugs loaded, and the contraband driven to Bloomington for resale. Anonymity made it impossible to fulfill either prong of the Aguilar-Spinelli test.

Officers received corroborating information, however, from a security guard at O'Hare airport that Lance Gates had booked a one-way flight to West Palm Beach. Furthermore, O'Hare security informed the officers that Gates did board the flight, and federal officers in Florida confirmed that Gates had been seen deplaning in West Palm Beach and taking a taxi to a motel, where a room was registered in the name of Susan Gates. The next morning, Lance and Susan Gates left in a vehicle bearing Illinois plates assigned to another vehicle, driving north on the route typically used by travelers to the Chicago area. Based upon this information, the Bloomington police obtained search warrants for the couple's house and vehicle. When the couple arrived, they were served with the warrants; officers searched the car and house and recovered large quantities of contraband from each.

The U.S. Supreme Court agreed with the Illinois Supreme Court's ruling that the anonymous letter alone provided no basis for a magistrate to find probable cause. However, when the veracity and reliability of the information contained in the tip were corroborated by the observing security officer at O'Hare and the federal officers in Florida, the totality of the circumstances made the warrants valid, thereby making the contraband fully admissible as evidence. The court stated, "[T]he deficiency in one prong may be offset by a stronger than usual set of information in the other prong, thereby meeting the Fourth Amendment requirements."

Gates created an exception to the Aguilar-Spinelli test when anonymous tips are involved and when a magistrate uses common sense in reviewing the application and accompanying affidavits prior to issuing the warrant. If the magistrate can determine that the officers acted upon a sound factual basis, then it is prudent to allow the totality of the circumstances to establish probable cause.

Sam W. McKinstry

See also: Aguilar v. Texas; Search Warrants; Totality-of-Circumstances Test.

FURTHER READING

Grudberg, David Thomas. "Note: Criminal Procedure—Illinois v. Gates: A New Test For Informers' Tips." North Carolina Law Review 62 (June 1984): 1024.
U.S. Constitution, Fourth Amendment.

Immigration Law

Immigration law refers to the rules that determine who may enter the United States, when and under what conditions, and for what purposes, such as to visit, to work, or to become a citizen. Immigration law has a significant impact upon the individual rights of aliens (resident noncitizens in the United States).

The United States is a nation of immigrants. Except for native American Indians, people in the United States can trace their ancestry to immigrants who left another country to come to America. Like every other country in the world, the United States does not simply let people cross its borders. Rather, the federal government establishes rules regarding who may enter, when, and for what purposes. These same rules also determine under what circumstances individuals may become citizens, and generally what rights immigrants have in the United States prior to gaining citizenship status.

The Constitution reserves immigration policy solely to the province of Congress and the federal government. Throughout history, Congress has adopted a variety of rules regarding who could enter the country. Early laws denied entrance to criminals, prostitutes, those with infectious diseases, and some poor individuals. Later, the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 discriminated against people from China, making it difficult for them to gain entry. The Immigration Act of 1924 created a permanent quota system that aimed to reduce immigration to the United States by placing limits on the number of people from each country who could enter. Quotas remained a central feature of U.S. immigration policy until the mid-1960s.

The 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), as amended in 1965, abolished the national-origin provisions and quota system, replacing it with a worldwide quota system intended to be "blind" to the national origin of the applicant. Yet tensions and anti-immigrant sentiments in the 1970s and 1980s led Congress to enact the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA). The IRCA strengthened sanctions for employers of those who entered the United States illegally (thus the name "illegal aliens"). Subsequent to IRCA, additional legislation in 1986, 1990, 2000, and after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, sought to restrict or refine who may enter the country.

In general, individuals who wish to visit the United States but not emigrate or permanently move to the country need only to obtain a visa from a U.S. embassy. There are eighteen classes of nonimmigrant visas, such as for students, the media, and ambassadors. In contrast, obtaining immigration visas is more difficult and a lengthier process, years in some cases. Individuals seeking immigration visas and entry into the United States may be accepted if they have relatives in the country or, more narrowly, if they wish to secure employment. Finally, there is a classification that grants people the right to move to the United States for humanitarian reasons. War refugees, or those seeking political asylum because of a well-founded fear of political persecution, may also be granted visas and the right to emigrate to the United States.

Immigrants who arrive in the United States do not become citizens immediately. Thus, they do not enjoy the full spectrum of constitutional rights that benefit citizens, and they are subject to a host of restrictions regarding employment and other activities. For example, although they are not required to do so, most communities deny voting rights to those who are not yet citizens. In addition, immigrants who violate the terms of their visa are subject to deportation.

Immigrants are often persecuted or discriminated against for numerous reasons. During the 1930s and 1940s, immigrants suspected of being Communists either were prevented from entering the country or were persecuted if they were already in the United States. For example, Charlie Chaplin, the great silent-movie star who was an immigrant, was subject to investigation by the House Un-American Activities Committee during the 1930s because he was suspected of being a Communist sympathizer. When he left the United States temporarily, he was subsequently denied a reentry visa. During World War II, Japanese Americans were suspected of being disloyal to the nation, and over 125,000 of them were forcibly relocated to detention camps around the country. This practice was upheld in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), although many scholars contend that such a practice would not be considered constitutional if done today.

In some cases, immigrants or aliens are also easy to exploit, especially if they do not know their rights, do not speak English, or are in the United States illegally. For example, in Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Texas law that denied public education for children of illegal or undocumented aliens. The Court ruled that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment extended its protections to any person and not only to citizens. In Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), the Court also extended habeas corpus review (petition for unlawful confinement) to individuals being held in custody awaiting deportation from the United States. Cases such as Plyler and Zadvydas indicate that even though immigrants are not full citizens, they are entitled to most of the protections of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights that citizens enjoy.

Dale Mineshima and David Schultz

See also: Rights of Aliens; United States Constitution; Zadvydas v. Davis.

FURTHER READING

Glade, M. E., and J. R. Giese. Immigration: Pluralism and National Identity. Public Issues Series. Boulder, CO: Social Science Education Consortium, 1989.

Lamm, Richard D., and Alan Simpson, eds. Blueprints for an Ideal Legal Immigration Policy. Washington, DC: Center for Immigration Studies, 2001.

Immunity

The right of immunity exempts a U.S. citizen from liability imposed by criminal or civil law. Immunity is most often cited as a Fifth Amendment protection against being compelled to be a witness against oneself in a criminal case. In addition, Article IV of the Constitution provides that each state's citizens are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," and the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits states from abridging the "privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

In some criminal proceedings, plea bargains may be negotiated between a defendant and the prosecution in return for the defendant's testimony; indeed, defendants who are immunized and still refuse to testify can be found in contempt of court. The prosecution may grant either "transactional" immunity or "use" immunity. The first is broader and is sometimes called "complete immunity." If transactional immunity is awarded, the defendant cannot be prosecuted for any aspect of the claimed criminal act. By contrast, when use immunity is invoked in return for the testimony of the defendant or a witness, that testimony cannot be used against that individual or any accomplice for a criminal act that was unknown to the prosecutor prior to immunity being granted.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

In Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547 (1892), the U.S. Supreme Court insisted that the privilege against self-incrimination must be interpreted broadly. Accordingly, no immunity statute could survive a constitutional challenge unless the government guaranteed the witness a blanket immunity from prosecution concerning the entire transaction. In requiring this transactional immunity, the Court said: "It is quite clear that legislation cannot abridge a constitutional privilege, and that it cannot replace or supply one, at least unless it is so broad as to have the same extent in scope and effect."

In the 1960s Congress adopted a new immunity statute (U.S. Code, Vol. 18, sec. 6003) that allowed the government to grant use immunity without forgoing all future prosecutions against immunized witnesses. In Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. gave approval to the more limited use immunity. Arguing that the protection against prosecution should be commensurate with but no greater than the privilege against self-incrimination, he ruled that an individual "is not constitutionally entitled to protection from prosecution for everything arising from the illegal transactions which his testimony concerns." Some states, however, continue to insist on the older, higher standard of transactional immunity.

In addition to the right of immunity available to citizens, immunity may also be extended to individuals because of their official status. Protection of government officials from lawsuits is known as "sovereign immunity." The concept was originally based on the claim that kings were immune to legal action. Thus, government officials and others in important positions should also be immune. U.S. senators and representatives enjoy the right of immunity during their attendance at legislative sessions. Legislators are immune from criminal arrest as well as from civil liability for statements made during legislative speeches and debate. Similarly, presiding judges cannot be charged with civil or criminal libel for judgments rendered in court cases. Finally, officials of other governments are extended immunity for their actions in the United States under a doctrine known as "diplomatic immunity."

Many people strongly oppose the right of sovereign immunity, believing that it shifts the responsibility for unlawful actions from government officials or special groups to ordinary citizens and taxpayers and thus constitutes a direct violation of their civil liberties. Government officials refute this idea by claiming that whenever a taxpayer sues a government official, it is actually the general taxpayers who are being sued. Among special groups, the gun lobby in the United States has tried to obtain legal immunity from civil liability for the firearms industry, including gun makers and gun dealers. Many legislators, however, believe that gun manufacturers and sellers must be liable for their actions in order to protect the liberties of the innocent victims of firearms abuse.

Alvin K. Benson and David T. Harold

See also: Contempt Powers; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Fundamental Rights; Plea Bargaining; Trial by Jury; Victims' Rights.

FURTHER READING

American Bar Association. Law and the Courts: A Handbook About United States Law and Court Procedures, with a Glossary of Legal Terms. Chicago: American Bar Association, Division for Public Education, 1995.

Garner, Bryan A. Black's Law Dictionary. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Gifis, Steven H. Dictionary of Legal Terms: A Simplified Guide to the Language of Law. 3d ed. Hauppauge, NY: Barron's Educational Series, 1998.

Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Implied Powers

In addition to express powers, the federal government has implied powers that provide it with the potential to intrude upon individual civil liberties. This system stems from the Constitution, which created a federal government designed to be strong enough to govern as necessary, something the Articles of Confederation could not do, but to have limited powers so that it would be no stronger than necessary. By separating powers into three distinct branches of government and providing for checks and balances among them, the framers of the Constitution thus limited the government's power in order to prevent tyranny from developing. Although the Constitution was limiting in nature, it also expressly granted the federal government powers. Those specified in the Constitution are known as "enumerated" powers, because they are an express conferral of power to the government. Powers neither explicitly delegated nor precluded by the Constitution fall within the government's "implied" powers.

Whether the federal government should have implied powers continues to be debated. For instance, in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist stated for the majority that "We start with first principles. The Constitution creates a government of enumerated powers." Notwithstanding, it seems that the framers intended the government to have more than only the powers enumerated in the Constitution. In Federalist No. 44, James Madison was explicit that the federal government had implied powers, since the 1787 Constitutional Convention specifically excluded the provision from the Articles of Confederation that prohibited the exercise of federal power not expressly granted. "[T]here can be no doubt that all the particular powers, requisite as means of executing the general powers . . . resulted to the government by unavoidable implication." Chief Justice John Marshall upheld the idea that Congress had the implied power to establish a national bank in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819). He ruled that the bank was a "necessary and proper" means to the implementation of other designated governmental powers.

The issue of implied powers can also be applied to the chief executive's broad authority in foreign affairs. The U.S. Supreme Court observed in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936), that in matters involving international relations, the president has broad discretionary authority, such that his powers are not limited to those enumerated in the Constitution. That is, unless the president is precluded from exercising certain power, he has extensive implied, or inherent, power in foreign affairs.

The seminal Curtiss-Wright decision highlighted that the president's implied powers are particularly forceful when the country is at war, but it is during times of war that protection of civil liberties is most precarious. This became evident during World War II, when President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued an executive order shortly after the 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor that commanded anyone of Japanese ancestry within the United States to enter what have been variously referred to as "relocation camps," "exclusion camps," or "concentration camps" (hereafter, the "camps"). Consequently, all individuals of Japanese lineage, including U.S. citizens, were forced to abandon their homes to be confined in one of the camps. Interestingly, the president did not issue a similar order against people of German and Italian ancestry, although the United States also had declared war against their countries of origin. Thus, if the president had authority to deny citizens their liberty and property because the United States was at war with the nation of their forebears, if such authority existed it necessarily had to derive from his implied powers, because no such enumerated power exists.

The constitutionality of President Roosevelt's executive order also excluding Japanese Americans from certain designated zones was tested in the Supreme Court's infamous decision in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944). Fred Korematsu, a U.S. citizen of Japanese ancestry, was convicted for not complying with the directive excluding him from the area of California where he lived. He argued that the presidential order was unconstitutional as being beyond the implied powers of the office, but the Court held that it was within the legitimate power of the president during times of war. Thus, any imposition on civil liberties was part of the hardships of war and the burden of citizenship. Justice Hugo L. Black's decision further asserted this was "nothing but an exclusion order" that had nothing to do with racial prejudice, even though he acknowledged that the order infringed the individual rights of one particular racial group.

The Supreme Court's decision in Korematsu came under criticism on both legal and moral grounds. As Justice Frank Murphy stated in dissent: "Such exclusion goes over 'the very brink of constitutional power' and falls into the ugly abyss of racism." The U.S. Supreme Court has refused to review, and has thus left in place, lower-court rulings that the decision in Korematsu was based on bad evidence, and Congress adopted legislation during President Ronald Reagan's administration compensating Japanese American victims of the incarceration order.

Like the powers of the president, any implied powers of Congress are limited by explicit constitutional prohibitions. Congress may still have broad authority to pass legislation that potentially limits individual liberties. That potential infringement was amply demonstrated by its passage of the Patriot Act shortly after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., and the failed attempt in Pennsylvania. Whether the experiences of Japanese Americans during World War II will be repeated for Muslims or Arab Americans during the war on terrorism remains to be determined.

Mark S. Hurwitz

See also: Congress and Civil Liberties; Korematsu v. United States; President and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Fisher, Louis. Presidential War Power. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1995.

Gross, Emanuel. "Human Rights, Terrorism, and the Problem of Administrative Detention in Israel: Does a Democracy Have the Right to Hold Terrorists as Bargaining Chips?" Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law 18 (2001): 721.

Irons, Peter H. Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Madison, James. Federalist No. 44. New York: Bantam Classic, 1982.

Omori, Emiko, Chizaho Omori, et al. Rabbit in the Moon. Video. San Francisco, CA: Wabi-Sabi Productions, 1999.

In Forma Pauperis Petition

In forma pauperis is literally translated as "in the manner of a pauper." An in forma pauperis petition is used by indigent persons to bypass usual court protocol and fees, allowing them to appear in court, with or without an attorney, without having to pay court fees. The procedure and requirements for the petition are governed by federal (and in some cases state) statute (the pertinent federal law is U.S. Code, vol. 28, sec. 1915a). Currently, persons who have no tangible assets and have an income at or less than 125 percent of the poverty level are eligible to proceed in forma pauperis.

The basis for in forma pauperis proceedings is the idea of equality before the law. Because legal proceedings are a formal, complex, and highly specialized endeavor, legal representation is a great advantage when a person is involved in a case. In many ways, execution of a case is impossible without a lawyer. The disadvantage of being financially incapable of hiring a lawyer is therefore considered to be too great to overcome. The Sixth Amendment requires that defendants have a right to legal counsel and, in combination with the Fourteenth Amendment (which provides equal protection to all persons), provides the constitutional basis for ensuring that indigent individuals have access to a lawyer regardless of their ability to pay for representation. Congress and the courts have always supported this interpretation, though questions have arisen over the legal cases to which it applies.

In forma pauperis petitions are governed by U.S. Supreme Court Rule 53. This rule allows an impoverished person to file just one copy of the appeal. It instructs court staff to make allowances for minor errors as long as the substance of the appeal complies with court rules. In most cases, in forma pauperis petitions may also be handwritten.

Supreme Court Rule 53 and in forma pauperis petitions are almost always associated with the case of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963). Clarence Earl Gideon not only managed a successful appeal to the Supreme Court through an in forma pauperis petition, but also changed the very definition of the term, greatly expanding the instances in which a person could proceed in such fashion and extending the procedure to all felony trials.

Today, legal assistance is extended in many civil cases as well as for serious criminal charges. Although federal funding for legal assistance is under tight budgetary constraints, the right to proceed in forma pauperis is not questioned.

Tim Hundsdorfer

See also: Gideon v. Wainwright; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Lewis, Anthony. Gideon's Trumpet. New York: Random House, 1964.

In God We Trust

Does use of "In God we trust" as the official motto of the United States violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution? Under that clause, the government cannot engage in any action that would constitute establishment of religion. Yet the reference to "God" in the motto raises issues of whether government is edging toward a religion-oriented credo.

The original national motto, "E pluribus unum" (From many one), was clearly secular. An act of Congress in 1837 had specified that the mottoes be placed on U.S. coins. In the 1860s, however, eleven Protestant denominations under the umbrella of the National Reform Association (NRA) mounted a campaign to add references to God to the U.S. Constitution and other federal documents. Secretary of Treasury Salmon P. Chase was contacted. Former Pennsylvania governor James Pollock, one of the NRA leaders, was Chase's director of the Mint. Pollock made wording suggestions to Chase, who decided on "In God we trust." Congress in 1864 authorized this new motto for coins.

President Theodore Roosevelt disapproved of having the motto "In God we trust" on coins and similar displays. He felt it was irreverent and came dangerously close to sacrilege. (National Archives)

President Theodore Roosevelt disapproved of having such a motto on coins and similar displays. He felt it was irreverent and came dangerously close to sacrilege. His efforts to remove the motto from coins resulted in arousing the religious community, however, and Congress passed another resolution in 1908.

During the Cold War era of the 1950s, the federal government's references to God multiplied. "So help me God" was added to the oaths of federal judges, and the phrase "under God" was added to the Pledge of Allegiance. Senator Lyndon B. Johnson (D-TX) authored a 1955 bill to put "In God we trust" on all U.S. currency. Congress enacted the proposal in 1956, and it was put on all money starting in 1957.

Periodically there were constitutional challenges, but the courts found that the motto did not endorse religion. A federal court in Aronow v. United States, 432 F.2d 243 (1970), said it was of a patriotic or ceremonial character (part of a civic religion). In O'Hair v. Blumenthal, 588 F.2nd 1144 (1979), a court ruled that the motto had a ceremonial purpose in the secular function of providing a medium of exchange. A 1994 lawsuit brought by the Freedom from Religion Foundation was dismissed without trial on the grounds that "In God we trust" was not a religious phrase.

The reasoning in these cases was not always consistent. After all, Justice William O. Douglas in Zorach

[PUBLIC LAW 851]
[CHAPTER 795]

H. J. Res. 396

Eighty-fourth Congress of the United States of America

AT THE SECOND SESSION

Begun and held at the City of Washington on Tuesday, the third day of January, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-six

RECEIVED THE WHITE HOUSE JUL 26 1956

RECEIVED JUL 30 1956

Joint Resolution

To establish a national motto of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the national motto of the United States is hereby declared to be "In God we trust."

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

APPROVED
JUL 30 1956

The Joint Resolution passed in July 1956, Public Law 84–851, which established the national motto of the United States to be "In God we trust." (National Archives)

v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952), had stated that "We are a religious people, whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being." Sessions of the Supreme Court started "God save the United States and this honorable court." The Star Spangled Banner intoned "and this be our motto, in God is our trust." The Pledge and oaths for officeholders were also examples. (A 2002 federal court of appeals ruling that barred students from including the phrase "One nation under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance was dismissed for lack of standing in Elk Grove v. Newdow.

In 1999 some atheists crossed out the motto from paper money or used rubber stamps to insert "Keep church and state separate." This recalled the controversy over New Hampshire's placing its motto, "Live free or die," on license plates. A Jehovah's Witness couple taped over the motto on their plates and were charged with defacing state property. George Maynard was convicted and jailed. Afterward he sought and received a federal court injunction against further state prosecution. New Hampshire appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which in Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977), backed the Maynards by a six–three vote.

In 2002 the American Family Association, taking advantage of the post–September 11 climate, launched a national campaign to place a copy of the motto "In God we trust" in every school classroom and public building in America.

Martin Gruberg

See also: Establishment Clause; Flag Salute.

FURTHER READING

Brown, Robert McAfee. Saying Yes and Saying No: On Rendering to God and Caesar. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.

Cousins, Norman, ed. "In God We Trust": The Religious Beliefs and Ideas of the American Founding Fathers. New York: Harper and Row, 1958.

Fellman, David. Religion in American Public Law. Boston: Boston University Press, 1974.

Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

O'Hair, Madalyn. Freedom Under Siege. Los Angeles, CA: J. P. Tarcher, 1974.

Incorporation Doctrine

When the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution) was originally ratified in 1791, it protected citizens only against actions by the federal government. Absent limitations within their own constitutions, state governments were free to pass or retain laws that would be clearly unconstitutional if enacted by Congress. Only after passage of the Fourteenth Amendment did the U.S. Supreme Court apply the limitations of the Bill of Rights to state and local units of government. This application of the Bill of Rights to all levels of nonfederal government was called incorporation, because the fundamental liberties protected by the Bill of Rights were deemed to have been incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment.

In 1833, before the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery, or the Fourteenth, which forbade states to deny their citizens the "privileges or immunities" or the "due process" rights of citizenship, the Supreme Court had determined that the Bill of Rights was not applicable to the states. Barron v. City of Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833), raised the issue of whether a state government was bound by the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause, which required the government to compensate a property owner whose property was taken for public use. The Court in Barron held that the Bill of Rights applied only to the federal government and thus offered no remedy to citizens whose arguments were with their states. The case caused much debate, and there was substantial disagreement with the Court's conclusion. In 1866, when the Fourteenth Amendment was drafted, it specifically addressed the issue with the following language: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Congressman John Bingham, who authored the language, later explained that it was intended to be a direct repudiation of the decision in Barron.

Before the House voted on the amendment, Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania, a strong voice for abolition, explained the intent of the language: "[T]he Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This Amendment supplies that defect." In the Senate, Jacob Howard made a similar speech, noting that the objective of the Fourteenth Amendment was to "restrain the power of the States and compel them at all times to respect these great fundamental guarantees."

Despite the evident intent of at least some of those who drafted and subsequently proposed and ratified the amendment, the Supreme Court did not immediately apply the Bill of Rights to state governments. Instead, over a period of years, beginning chiefly with Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), it selectively applied to the states those elements of the first eight Amendments it determined to be "essential to ordered liberty" and "fundamental." The proper approach to incorporation was the subject of significant disagreement among justices of the Court, with Justice Hugo L. Black (1886–1971) arguing for total incorporation and Justices Felix Frankfurter (1882–1965) and William J. Brennan Jr. (1906–1997) urging the selective approach that ultimately prevailed.

Thus far, only four constitutional provisions in the Bill of Rights remain unincorporated: the right to keep and bear arms; the prohibition against quartering soldiers in private homes; and the dual rights to grand and civil juries.

Sheila Suess Kennedy

See also: Adamson v. California; Barron v. City of Baltimore; Bill of Rights; Duncan v. Louisiana; Hurtado v. California; Palko v. Connecticut; Selective Incorporation.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

Independent Expenditures

Political parties, advocacy groups, corporations, unions, and individuals spend large sums of money to communicate their views on candidates and policies to the electorate. Such expenditures are "independent" when they occur without prior consultation or coordination with the candidate. The constitutionality of regulating these independent expenditures implicates a classic conflict in U.S. politics between civil liberties and governmental interests. Although independent expenditures enable the free speech rights protected under the First Amendment to the Constitution, they may also undermine the public's faith in American democracy.

Limits on independent expenditures are generally unconstitutional. In the landmark campaign finance case, Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a $1,000 limit on independent expenditures. In 1976 the cost of placing just one advertisement in a major metropolitan newspaper was seven times greater than the independent-expenditure ceiling. Thus, the challenged limit would have excluded the speech of these outside groups and individuals from political campaigns. The Court also held that the independent-expenditure limit did not serve the government's interest in preventing corruption. The absence of contact between the spender and the candidate eliminated the threat of quid pro quo corruption and minimized the value of the expenditure to the candidate.

But the Court has not rejected all regulations on independent expenditures. First, the government can require the disclosure of the amount and source of the independent expenditure, regardless of the speaker's identity. Second, in Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990), the Supreme Court upheld a ban on independent expenditures by corporations. In contrast to independent expenditures by groups and individuals, corporate independent expenditures pose a risk of corruption because of "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas."

There is yet another complication in the Supreme Court's independent-expenditure doctrine. Currently, only independent expenditures containing express words of advocacy, such as "vote for," "vote against," "elect," or "defeat," can be constitutionally regulated. The Court fears that broader regulations would create significant uncertainty for spenders and would chill speech about public policy issues and pending legislation. Thus, so long as a spender avoids using the magic words of express advocacy, the expenditure is not subject to disclosure laws, and even corporations and unions are free to spend unlimited amounts. Corporations and unions, as well as groups and individuals hoping to stay hidden from public scrutiny, increasingly exploit this loophole for issue advocacy—not to discuss issues but to influence candidate elections.

To address this loophole, Congress in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (the McCain-Feingold law) redrew the line between regulated political advocacy and constitutionally protected issue advocacy. The Supreme Court upheld this law in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 124 S. Ct. 619 (2003). Congress and the Court will continue their struggle to balance the civil liberties of those who wish to engage in genuine issue advocacy with the public's interest in regulating independent expenditures that impact public elections.

Grant Davis-Denny

See also: First Amendment; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission.

FURTHER READING

Corrado, Anthony, et al. Campaign Finance Reform: Beyond the Basics. New York: Century Foundation, 2000.

Magleby, David B., ed. The Other Campaign: Soft Money and Issue Advocacy in the 2000 Congressional Elections. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Indian Appropriations Act of 1871

In 1871 Congress, in an obscure rider attached to the Indian Appropriations Act, unilaterally brought to an end the practice of treating any group of indigenous peoples "as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty." The U.S. government, reversing more than 260 years of precedent, no longer recognized American Indian sovereignty. Native Americans were now to become subject to acts of Congress, presidential orders, and the general umbrella of U.S. law. Sovereignty would give way to federal guardianship. Treaties would become "agreements." Congressional acts of "extraconstitutionality," such as the Major Crimes Act of 1885, further brought traditional tribal autonomy under the jurisdiction of U.S. courts.

PRIOR STATUS OF AMERICAN INDIANS

American Indians have always had an ambiguous and tenuous status in U.S. constitutional law. The Constitution, for example, treated them as "tribes" or "Indians not taxed," despite their long history of being treated as sovereign nations. During America's colonial period, approximately 1607–1776, Great Britain and the colonies negotiated some 175 formal treaties with native groups. These treaties recognized tribal entities as sovereign powers, a paradigm continued by the new republic.

The significance of the Indian Appropriations Act can be measured by the fact that by 1868, the U.S. government had made some 370 treaties with American Indians, all in accordance with Article I, Section 8, and Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution. Approximately two-thirds (245) of these treaties involved land transfer. For about twenty cents an acre and other considerations, the United States acquired 450 million acres of land. Often these "other considerations," usually promises to supply protection or provisions or services, were not honored. Contrary to common belief, European governments, such as France during the time of the $15 million Louisiana Purchase, did not sell or convey real estate to the United States. Rather, they conveyed only the right to govern and the power to tax a region of land. Since Native American "ownership-by-use" was acknowledged, only conquest or purchase could unequivocally convey clear land title. Treaties with the native peoples became the mechanism by which most of the U.S. land mass was purchased.

The recognition of an American Indian entity as a sovereign power had been motivated by self-interest, not altruism. Colonial-period treaties secured strategic military alliances with strong native leagues or tribes. Later, as the white population expanded exponentially, the Native Americans' position was dramatically weakened. Land treaties were negotiated by vastly unequal sovereign powers. The Indian Appropriations Act did nothing to alter the transfers of land the United States had obtained from the native peoples, but it gave the tribes less sovereignty than they had previously exercised over what was left. The effects of this were magnified by adoption of the General Allotment Act of 1887.

GENERAL ALLOTMENT ACT OF 1887

Congress adopted this law, often known as the Dawes Act, with the purpose of making farmers out of subsistence hunters and gatherers, changing a land system based on communal use to that of individual ownership, and further of assimilating natives into white society. Under this act, the United States would grant citizenship to those natives who, as the law specified, "adopted the habits of civilized life."

Although motivated by sincere and earnest humanitarian concern for the plight of a people overwhelmed by the unchecked and ruthless expansion of an alien society, these two policies were made with no reference to Native American wishes, and they contributed to the dissolution of native culture and identity. Total assimilation to "Americanness" was the answer to the "Indian problem." This meant altering the American Indians' understanding of property, allowing them to become citizens protected by U.S. laws, and educating them in English and Christian-American values—a policy detailed in the 1899 Supplemental Report on Indian Education. These efforts all came, however, at the price of tribal sovereignty.

CRITIQUE AND REVERSAL

Some forty years after the General Allotment Act, The Merriam Report of 1928, an exhaustive study of American Indian social and economic conditions requested by the secretary of the Interior Department, cited this legislation as the principle cause of the failure of U.S. Indian policy. The report's recommendation became a blueprint for redressing the dangerous condition of Native Americans. Finally, in 1934, the Wheeler-Howard Act reversed the policy of allotment, provided some funds for economic recovery, sanctioned tribal ownership of land, and promoted self-government.

Kevin Collins

See also: United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Otis, D. S. The Dawes Act and the Allotment of Indian Lands. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.
Prucha, Francis Paul. The Great Father, the United States Government, and the American Indians. 2 vols. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1984.
———, ed. Documents of United States Indian Policy. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1975.
Utter, Jack. American Indians: Answers to Today's Questions. Lake Ann, MI: National Woodlands, 1993.

Inffective Assistance of Counsel

The U.S. Supreme Court has long acknowledged that the Sixth Amendment right to an attorney in criminal cases, which the landmark decision in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), afforded to state as well as federal defendants, subsumes the right to effective assistance, whether the attorney be hired or assigned by the court. The mere presence of someone with a law degree next to the defendant does not suffice: As early as Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), the Court stated that the accused must have "the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him." Sadly, however, the promise of cases like Powell and Gideon has often been honored in the breach.

It is important to distinguish between two lines of precedent in this area. The first deals with situations in which government interferes with counsel in some respect, such as when a judge forbids attorney-client consultation during an overnight recess at trial or prevents the attorney from making a closing argument. In these cases, the Court has reversed convictions automatically, without forcing defendants to prove that the state's action caused them harm. The second group of decisions involves claimed ineffective assistance of counsel in the absence of governmental obstruction; a subset of these decisions concern attorneys laboring under a conflict of interest. The Court has been much less indulgent with defendants who attack their lawyers, not the state—and has made relief much harder to obtain. Notably, this has been true even when the client has received a sentence of death.

For a long time, prevailing doctrine dictated that an accused could not obtain redress unless the individual was able to show that the trial had been rendered a farce or mockery of justice because of mistakes or omissions made by counsel. In the 1970s, a majority of the federal courts of appeal replaced this embarrassingly toothless standard with a test that looked to whether counsel had demonstrated "reasonable," "normal," or "customary" competence. But the Court, of course, would have the last word on the matter, and it did not speak for another decade.

In 1984, in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, a capital case in which the defendant pleaded guilty to murder and agreed to be sentenced by the trial judge without a jury, the justices issued the long-sought pronouncement. Although predictably approving the "reasonableness" measure of attorney performance, in other respects they gravely disappointed the defense community by making clear that only in the most egregious instances would a conviction be reversed on the ground of ineffective assistance.

For one thing, Strickland imposed no specific duties on counsel. In addition, it instructed the lower courts to review the quality of the representations with a high degree of deference: It mandated "a strong presumption" that counsel had acted on the basis of "sound trial strategy," even if that plan misfired.

But yet more onerous was Strickland's requirement that the defendant demonstrate more than just the lawyer's deficient performance. In order to prevail, a defendant also needed to show "a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different," thereby undermining confidence in the outcome of the trial. The Court had already announced a somewhat less burdensome prejudice standard in matters involving conflict of interest: In Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335 (1980), the Court held that except where the trial court forces counsel, over objection, to continue despite a potential conflict, a defendant cannot obtain relief unless it is established after the fact that an actual conflict "adversely affected his lawyer's performance."

The Strickland Court made clear that the newly stated test governed capital as well as regular proceedings. Applying it to the facts at hand, the majority rebuffed the defendant's challenge to his death sentence notwithstanding counsel's almost total failure to do investigation for the penalty trial or to adduce mitigating evidence that might lessen the sentence. Indeed, it was not until 2000 that the justices vacated a capital sentence on the basis of inadequate assistance in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362 (2000). State courts and lower federal courts have not displayed much more generosity toward prisoners claiming ineffectiveness of counsel.

Critics believe the present state of affairs is unconscionable, given the shockingly high incidence of major derelictions by lawyers—especially those representing the indigent, who comprise about 80 percent of defendants. Whereas some attorneys commit blatant acts of misconduct, such as appearing drunk or falling asleep in court, or simply do not prepare properly, like the lawyer in Strickland, others fall prey to "no-fault" ineffectiveness caused by insufficient funding (for defense experts and investigators as well as counsel), lack of good training, or unmanageable caseloads.

The situation is especially dire in capital cases, which demand the utmost effort and knowledge from counsel but often receive the worst lawyering. To illustrate: One study conducted in four states showed that nearly a third of death-row inmates were defended by counsel who were later disbarred, suspended from practice, or convicted of crimes.

Three decades after Gideon, the U.S. justice system arguably has a long way to go if it truly intends to realize the lofty ideal of counsel's role.

Vivian Berger

See also: Gideon v. Wainwright; Powell v. Alabama; Right to Counsel.

FURTHER READING

Berger, Vivian. "The Supreme Court and Defense Counsel: Old Roads, New Paths—a Dead End?" Columbia Law Review 86, 1 (January 1986): 9–116.

———. "The Chiropractor as Brain Surgeon: Defense Lawyering in Capital Cases." New York University Review of Law and Social Change 18, 2 (1990–1991): 245–54.

Cole, David. No Equal Justice. New York: New Press, 1999.

Inevitable-Discovery Doctrine

The doctrine of "inevitable discovery" is one of several exceptions to the exclusionary rule, a broader doctrine providing that evidence obtained in violation of a defendant's constitutional rights is inadmissible at trial. For example, if after an arrest the suspect requests a lawyer, but the police nonetheless continue questioning, the officers violate the suspect's constitutional right to an attorney under the Sixth Amendment. If the suspect confesses to the crime during that questioning, that direct evidence is inadmissible. Additionally, if in confessing the suspect also directs the police to the location of other evidence, such as the gun used in the crime, that indirect evidence (called "fruits of the poisonous tree") is also considered tainted by the officers' unconstitutional actions and is inadmissible based on the exclusionary rule.

Over time, the U.S. Supreme Court has adopted several exceptions to the exclusionary rule. These exceptions allow evidence obtained in violation of a defendant's constitutional rights nonetheless to be admissible in court. The Supreme Court defined one such exception, the inevitable-discovery doctrine, in Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984). In that case, a jury convicted the defendant, Robert Williams, of the first-degree murder of ten-year-old Pamela Powers. Williams challenged his conviction, arguing that the state trial court erred in admitting evidence concerning the location and condition of Pamela's body because the police found the body only after illegally questioning Williams. The Supreme Court held that because the police were already searching the area in which Pamela's body was found, they would have inevitably discovered her body. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the evidence was admissible and upheld Williams's conviction.

From Williams, then, flows the inevitable-discovery doctrine: "If the prosecution can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the information ultimately or inevitably would have been discovered by lawful means," the evidence will be admissible. On its face this rule seems clear enough, but since Williams, lower courts have struggled to define the scope of the inevitable-discovery doctrine. Some lower courts have held that this doctrine allows only for the admissibility of direct evidence (the confession in the example at the beginning of this discussion), and that indirect evidence (the gun in the example) obtained in violation of the defendant's constitutional rights is still barred by the exclusionary rule. Other courts have held that this exception applies only if the police were already actively pursuing the evidence in an alternative way at the time of the violation. The Supreme Court has yet to weigh in on these various issues, and until it does, the exact meaning and scope of the inevitable discovery doctrine remain unclear.

Margot O'Brien

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fruits of the Poisonous Tree; Right to Counsel.

FURTHER READING

Golden, Troy E. "The Inevitable Discovery Doctrine Today: The Demands of the Fourth Amendment, Nix and Murray, and the Disagreement Among the Federal Circuits." Brigham Young University Journal of Public Law 13 (1998): 97.

Hall, John Wesley. Search and Seizure. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 2000.

Hendrix, Robert K. "The Inevitable Discovery Exception to the Exclusionary Rule: Nix v. Williams, 104 S. Ct. 2501 (1984)." University of Cincinnati Law Review 54 (1986): 1087.

Initiatives and Referenda

Initiatives and referenda are mechanisms that allow voters to decide governmental policies directly rather than to depend solely on their elected state and local officials to act. Advocates of these mechanisms hail them as facilitating direct participatory democracy, but critics fear that such mechanisms can suppress minority rights. State and local governments have employed sixteen different types of referenda, but the statutory, advisory, and constitutional referenda are most common. Available in twenty-four states, a statutory referendum allows voters to reject a law passed by the state legislature before it takes effect, whereas the advisory referendum allows the legislature to refer proposed legislation to voters to obtain their views on the measure. Still other states have the constitutional referendum, which permits voters to approve of or reject amendments to their state constitutions.

Most referenda are not initiated by voters, and most occur at the local level of government rather than statewide. Some questions appear automatically on the ballot at regular, specified intervals, such as the mechanism in fourteen states calling for a state constitutional convention to redress any problems the electorate might have with the constitution. Bond referenda are among the most common. Many states require that voters approve full-faith-and-credit bonds (bonds guaranteed by the government issuer) before they can be issued. Similarly, many states require that voters be allowed to vote on proposed tax increases. Another subset of states, through statutes or state constitutions, allow the electorate to decide issues such as opening gambling casinos, sponsoring lotteries, regulating sale of liquor, and determining Sunday sales policies.

The initiative generally allows voters to petition to place issues on the ballot. Through the statutory initiative, voters in twenty-one states may propose legislation; with the constitutional initiative, voters in seventeen states may propose state constitutional amendments. Both types are created through a petition of registered voters. In total, twenty-four states have some type of initiative process. The local initiative is used by thousands of counties, cities, and towns across the United States and is by far more prevalent than the referendum. To put forward a proposition through initiative, voters must engage in petition drives. These drives usually require 5–15 percent of registered voters as signatories, with greater numbers of signatures needed to propose a state constitutional amendment. Usually the number of signatures required to place an issue—often called a "proposition"—on the ballot is based on a percentage of votes cast at the most recent general election or a percentage of votes cast to elect the state governor. Besides statutory and constitutional initiatives, another distinction can be drawn between direct and indirect initiatives. The direct initiative allows the people to vote on a ballot issue that qualifies through the petition process, whereas the indirect initiative provides that the proposal, upon being filed, will be sent to the legislature; if the legislature disapproves of the proposal, the issue is subject to a ballot vote and goes before the voters. Like referenda, initiatives may be advisory, as when voters circulate petitions and place nonbinding measures on the ballot to pressure the legislature to address a specific problem or enact a particular law.

Historically, referenda and initiatives have existed in some form in the United States since the 1600s. As early as 1775, Thomas Jefferson suggested that voters approve the Virginia state constitution before it took effect. The first state to hold a statewide legislative referendum was Massachusetts in 1792. As of 2004, every state but Delaware required that voters approve amendments to their constitutions. In 1897, Nebraska became the first state to allow cities to use initiatives and popular referenda; close behind in 1898, South Dakota was the first state to adopt statewide initiatives and referenda. Now, almost half of all states have the referendum, the initiative, or both.

A landmark use of the initiative occurred in California in 1978 with the passage of Proposition 13, which resulted in a property tax cut from 2.5 percent to 1.0 percent. At the end of a two-year period, forty-three other states put forward and implemented this type of measure, and fifteen states lowered their income tax rates. The National Taxpayers Union, which advocated Proposition 13 in the 1970s, said it could not have gotten the tax revolt off the ground without the initiative. In recent years, the initiative process, in particular, has become an extremely important device for influencing and changing public policy at all levels of government. From 1992 through 2002 alone, it was used to address affirmative action, tax reform, campaign finance reform, environmental issues, gay rights, school choice, congressional and state legislative term limits, mail-in voting for the 2000 elections, use of blanket primaries, use of marijuana for medicinal purposes, and efforts to end bilingual education.

These direct-democracy devices have enhanced the ability of citizens to become involved in public policymaking. Historically, referenda and initiatives have been viewed as a means of checking and controlling the government. Arguments for referenda and initiatives generally hold that the ultimate source of governmental power is the people, and the people should have ultimate authority to determine public policy outcomes. The referendum prevents the government from ignoring the will of the people and allows them to express their displeasure with certain governmental policies. Furthermore, supporters of referenda argue that they make lawmakers more responsible and lead to more informed public debate and discussion. On the other hand, opponents of referenda argue that the citizens' veto undermines representative government and innovative leadership and results in legislative buck-passing, allowing the electorate to make the tough decisions for legislators through referenda. Critics also believe that ordinary citizens may not be sophisticated enough to analyze highly complex issues, such as tax reform, and may be swayed easily by demagoguery. Relying on referenda may result in unnecessary delays in lawmaking, and because of small voter turnout, the result would not necessarily be more democratic.

Initiatives also have generated many supporters and detractors. Supporters of initiatives argue that this process has been used to facilitate important reforms, that it improves governmental responsiveness, and that it encourages citizen participation, especially when the proposition is highly controversial. Initiative supporters also believe that campaigns waged for and against initiative proposals result in a more educated citizenry. Furthermore, they argue that the initiative provides a way to enact reforms when the legislature is unwilling or unable to do so. Critics of initiatives claim that citizen-drafted legislation is often poorly written and creates more problems than it solves. Like opponents of referenda, they argue that issues frequently are oversimplified or that misleading campaigns are waged to sway unknowledgeable or unsuspecting voters. Ballot clutter occurs as numerous propositions are placed on the ballot, requiring an intensive time investment on the part of voters who read the propositions and attempt to understand their implications. Too many ballot issues produce voter fatigue, contributing to low voter turnout and greater apathy and frustration. Initiatives can both promote and threaten civil liberties, as demonstrated by some state ballot issues aimed at denying or curbing the rights of minorities such as homosexuals and African Americans. Not surprisingly, after they are passed, many propositions are challenged in court and create yet another unintended consequence—court congestion.

Although fraught with advantages and disadvantages, initiatives and referendums will continue as part of an effort to provide for more citizen involvement in public policy-making. More open and ethical governmental leaders and institutions could reduce the demand for use of these devices.

Ruth Ann Strickland

See also: Democracy and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Waters, M. Dane, ed. The Battle over Citizen Lawmaking: A Collection of Essays. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2001.

Zimmerman, Joseph F. The Referendum: The People Decide Public Policy. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.

Interest Groups

At the most basic level, interest groups are nothing more than organizations that seek to influence government. Despite the sometimes negative connotation, especially when the term "special" is used to preface certain interest groups, group politics has historically been a useful means by which to extol the virtues of the U.S. system of government. In Federalist No. 10, James Madison argued that a large republic, such as was being established by the U.S. Constitution, would embrace many groups (what he called "factions"), thus making it less likely that any single faction could dominate. Alexis de Tocqueville, who visited the United States in the 1830s and authored Democracy in America, observed that citizens had a high sense of political efficacy and that they exhibited such power by forming groups to advance their views on matters as diverse as religion, issues of public policy, issues related to particular occupations, and the like.

Early scholars presumed that the best outcomes were the result of pluralism or were produced through group conflict during which ideas and policies were debated and decided. Free and active groups became one of the foundations for a working representative democracy. Yet even at its height, this approach was at best descriptive, and at worst more normative and idealistic than representative of American politics.

The notion that all interests are represented by groups is misleading and inaccurate. It has become increasingly difficult to argue that there is balanced competition among small groups when large and powerful interests can, and do, occupy the entire universe of an issue. There is a cost to enter into this "pressure system," and many interests are without the price of admission. Put more succinctly, "The flaw in the pluralist heaven is that the heavenly chorus sings with a strong upper-class accent."

Contrary to the pluralistic notion, empirical research illustrates that Americans are not joiners by nature. In The Logic of Collective Action, Mancur Olson rejected the pluralistic model and formulation that presumed people gravitate to interest groups based on human nature. Using an economic model, Olson proposed that rational people will not expend the costs to participate in groups that produce public benefits, since individuals will benefit from the group's activities whether they participate or not. Instead, rational people will be motivated to "free ride"—to let others bear the costs of membership.

Other scholars expanded Olson's notions to explain the considerable increase in the size and influence of interest groups, as in the case of Common Cause—a public interest group seeking collective benefits for society—which grew to 230,000 members in one year. Robert Salisbury argued for an "exchange theory" and asserted that groups are formed through the actions of group entrepreneurs who create the groups for their personal (economic) benefit—often a staff job. Terry Moe noted that many people feel their contribution is more significant than an objective view might illustrate, and this leads to economic models overestimating the free-rider phenomenon. Additionally, Moe contended that the benefits from group membership include those derived from solidarity (friendship, status) and purpose (ideology, morality).

The power of these groups to influence the development of civil rights is mixed. Although groups can certainly influence the elected branches of government, their effectiveness before the judicial branch is debatable at best. Gerald Rosenberg effectively argued that even the U.S. Supreme Court is largely ineffective in forcing social change without additional support from Congress or the president. Alternately, Charles Epp argued that the success of rights litigation is largely the product of structures such as interest groups that allow advocates to develop the resources necessary to make use of the judicial system, which largely was once the province of moneyed interests such as big business.

Nonetheless, the direct evidence on the role of interest groups before the U.S. Supreme Court suggests their impact is limited. Research indicates that a larger resource base is not a predictor of success before the Court, nor are interest groups more likely than nongroups to win in federal district courts. Interest groups cannot be dismissed, but their formation and maintenance as well as their larger role in civil rights and the judicial forum still are being debated and studied.

Kevin M. Wagner

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Berry, Jeffrey M. The Interest Group Society. New York: Longman, 1997.

Epp, Charles R. The Rights Revolution: Lawyers, Activists, and Supreme Courts in a Comparative Perspective. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Epstein, Lee, and C. K. Rowland. "Debunking the Myth of Interest Group Invincibility in the Courts." American Political Science Review 85, 1 (1991): 205–17.

Leech, Beth L., and Frank R. Baumgartner. Basic Interests: The Importance of Groups in Politics and Political Science. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.

Moe, Terry M. "Toward a Broader View of Interest Groups." Journal of Politics 43, 2 (1981): 531–43.

Olson, Mancur. The Logic of Collective Action. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1965.

Rosenberg, Gerald N. Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Salisbury, Robert H. "An Exchange Theory of Interest Groups." American Journal of Political Science 13 (1968): 1–32.

Schattschneider, E. E. The Semisovereign People: A Realist View of Democracy in America. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1960.

Sheehan, Reginald S., William Mishler, and Donald R.

Songer. "Ideology, Status, and Differential Success of Direct Parties Before the Supreme Court." American Political Science Review 86, 2 (1992): 464–71.

Intermediate-Level Scrutiny

The U.S. Supreme Court has used an intermediate level of scrutiny to determine when state laws that make gender distinctions, such as a male-only draft, violate constitutional protections and are therefore invalid. By requiring that "no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution forces courts to determine when state (including local) laws that distinguish between classes of people violate the rights of individuals. This constitutional amendment states that all people are equal in the eyes of the law, and it has been interpreted to mean that such characteristics as race, gender, age, or wealth can rarely enter into the determinations of the law. Yet laws do not and cannot treat people identically; consequently, certain types of classifications are considered legal under the Equal Protection Clause. For example, trucks often must observe a lower speed limit because trucks are heavier and need longer stopping distances than cars. However, because trucks are not protected by the Constitution, states can easily make this legal distinction.

Over the years, the Supreme Court has developed three different standards to help determine the constitutionality of state laws under the Equal Protection Clause. The highest standard is called "strict scrutiny" and applies to laws that violate fundamental freedoms (such as religion, speech, and press) or that pertain to "suspect" classifications, such as racial distinctions. This standard requires the state to demonstrate to the Court that the classification is necessary to achieve a compelling state objective and that the law is narrowly tailored to that end. Although gender fits many of the attributes inherent to suspect classification—immutable characteristics and a history of "invidious" discrimination or an emotionally based antagonism toward a group—the Supreme Court has not held that gender meets the criteria required for suspect classification.

The lowest standard, "minimal rationality," applies to most other forms of classification, for example, age or sexual preference. To meet this standard of ordinary scrutiny, the state must simply demonstrate that there is a rational basis for the discriminatory law. If the state can show that there is a rational relationship between the distinction of groups under the contested law and a legitimate objective of the state, the law is not deemed to be in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. If the state is unable to demonstrate such a relationship, then the Court will strike the law down as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.

Historically, gender fell under ordinary scrutiny. The last Court decision applying ordinary scrutiny to a gender-based law was Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961), in which the Court had upheld a Florida statute requiring only women to register specifically for jury service, finding it constitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. Not until Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71 (1971), a case in which a male was automatically preferred over a female in the administration of an estate, would gender discrimination be found unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause. During the 1970s, the Court, still using the label of "ordinary scrutiny" and guided by the briefs of American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) attorney Ruth Bader Ginsburg (later a Court justice), began creating a new test for gender. This stricter standard asked if the questioned classification was "really reasonable"—did it serve an important governmental objective and was it substantially related to those ends? Despite this new standard, not until five years later, in Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976), invalidating a state law that provided for differing drinking ages for males and females, did the Court recognize it had been using this new standard of "semistrict" classification—an intermediate level of scrutiny—since Reed v. Reed.

In Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973), in which the Court invalidated different standards used by the military in determining dependency for males and females, the Court implied that gender could be considered a suspect classification if the states ratified the proposed Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution. Section one of the ERA stated, "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." Because the ERA was not ratified, the Supreme Court continued developing a semisuspect approach, and by 1976 the Court in Craig strengthened the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of gender without making it as rigorous as suspect classification.

Although the Supreme Court has never applied strict scrutiny to a gender discrimination case, the Court has been slowly heightening the intermediate standard of scrutiny. In United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515 (1996), the Court examined the male-only admissions policy of the Virginia Military Institute (VMI). In her majority opinion, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg argued that the state must show "exceedingly persuasive justification" for differential treatment, in this case the exclusion of women from VMI, which the Court invalidated. This is a higher requirement for the state than originally articulated in Craig and gives stronger constitutional protection against gender discrimination.

Michelle Donaldson Deardorff

See also: Compelling Governmental Interest; Rational-Basis Test; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Douglas, Elizabeth A. "Note: United States v. Virginia: Gender Scrutiny Under an 'Exceedingly Persuasive Justification' Standard." Capital University Law Review 26 (1997): 173.

Goldstein, Leslie Friedman. The Constitutional Rights of Women: Cases in Law and Social Change. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989.

Udell, Collin O'Connor. "Signaling A New Direction in Gender Classification Scrutiny: United States v. Virginia." Connecticut Law Review 29 (Fall 1996): 521.

Internal Revenue Service

The Internal Revenue Service is a federal agency assigned the duty to collect taxes and enforce the U.S. Tax Code.

The roots of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) date to 1862 when President Abraham Lincoln and the U.S. Congress established the position of Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the authority to collect an income tax to help cover Civil War expenses. A fundamental question since that time has been whether income taxes constitute a violation of the fundamental rights and civil liberties of the American people. The original income tax expired in 1872. Congress reenacted the income tax in 1894, but it was declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court in Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co., 158 U.S. 601 (1895). The states ratified the Sixteenth Amendment in 1913, giving Congress the official right to levy a federal income tax. In 1943 the "pay-as-you-go" system was instituted, and payroll withholding of income taxes began. The IRS was officially established in 1953 when the Department of Treasury reorganized the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The primary functions of the IRS are to collect income tax payments, check federal income tax returns, and issue tax refunds.

A variety of individuals and organizations still claim that the collection of income taxes by the IRS is an abuse of the civil liberties of Americans. They argue the federal income tax system is unconstitutional, stating that it had an unlawful origin, that powers given only to Congress were unlawfully delegated to the executive branch and the IRS, and that graduated income taxes based on amount of income favor the rich, discriminate against the poor, and violate the uniformity clauses of the U.S. Constitution found in Article 1, Section 8, clause 1. Another argument is that income taxes force human beings to work part of their time for free, which is a form of involuntary servitude or slavery, putting the IRS in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment.

To better serve taxpayers and protect their constitutional rights, Congress has frequently restructured income tax laws since 1953. The Tax Reform Act of 1969 was designed to help stop corporations and the very rich from avoiding the payment of income taxes. The Tax Reform Act of 1986 reduced the number and level of tax rates, and the Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997 produced more than 800 changes to the existing income tax code. In 1998, Congress passed the IRS Restructuring and Reform Act, which significantly expanded the rights of taxpayers. It created the Taxpayer

People filling out tax forms in Internal Revenue office, circa 1920. Presidents at times have been accused of using the IRS to harass political enemies. (Library of Congress)

Advocate Service within the IRS to protect the rights and civil liberties of taxpayers. Any problems or violations of rights that are not resolved through normal channels within the IRS are handled by the Taxpayer Advocate Service.

When required, each income earner in the United States is responsible for filing an income tax return and for determining and paying the correct amount of tax. The vast majority of Americans comply with this responsibility. To protect the voluntary tax compliance system and the American economy, the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigation was established under the direction of the IRS to investigate any taxpayers who willfully and intentionally violate their known legal responsibility to comply with established income tax laws.

Alvin K. Benson

See also: Fundamental Rights; President and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Starczewski, Lisa Marie. IRS National Office Procedures. Washington, DC: Tax Management, 2002.

Taylor, Jack. Internal Revenue Service. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.

Wiley-Webb, Yvonne. IRS: A View from the Inside. Huntington, NY: Kroshka Books, 2000.

Internal Security Act of 1950

See McCarran Act

International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee (1992)

The U.S. Supreme Court in International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672 (1992), held that publicly owned airport terminals were not free speech forums under the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In the case, a not-for-profit religious group called the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) wanted to distribute leaflets and solicit monetary donations inside several major public airports within the New York City area. The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owned the airports, adopted a regulation forbidding these actions. ISKCON eventually appealed this ban to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Court first determined that publicly owned airport terminals were unlike traditional government-owned forums, such as parks, streets, and sidewalks, historically used for public gatherings and discussions. In those more traditional public forums, government must show a strong justification for limiting free speech activities. However, because airport terminals were not traditional public forums, government could enact greater restrictions on speech as long as those restrictions were reasonable. The Court concluded that a ban on solicitation of money was reasonable. Stopping people and asking them for money would delay not only them but also other people trying to avoid the solicitation or whose paths were blocked by the pedestrian congestion caused by stopping people. In addition, there would be the possibility that the people asking for money would be lying about the reasons the money was needed. Busy airport customers, however, were unlikely to take the time to report this fraud. For these reasons, the Court concluded a complete ban on the solicitation of money inside a publicly owned airport terminal was reasonable.

In a companion case, Lee v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness, 505 U.S. 830 (1992), the Court held that although public airport terminals were not public forums, individuals had a right to distribute leaflets inside them. This was because the distribution of leaflets would be less disruptive to the functioning of an airport, particularly pedestrian traffic flow, than was the solicitation of money. Therefore, a complete ban on leafleting inside a public airport terminal was unreasonable and violated the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment.

Rick A. Swanson

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Sullivan, Kathleen, and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 14th ed. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Volokh, Eugene. The First Amendment: Problems, Cases, and Policy Arguments. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Internet and the World Wide Web

The use of the Internet or the World Wide Web for communication, research, and commercial sales implicates several important questions for civil liberties. Most specifically, the use of the Web raises free speech issues under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, especially with respect to the display of pornographic and obscene images, the use of intellectual property, and government efforts to regulate these images as well as other information available through the Web.

The Internet originally began as a Department of Defense project that was to serve as a communications tool for the military. By the mid-1990s, however, the Internet became subject to civilian control, and with the passage of the Telecommunications Act of 1996, the use of the Web dramatically expanded. Many different vendors, both commercial and government, began hosting access to it. In addition, since the mid-1990s, the Web has become increasingly popular as a source for information, research, communication, and for the transaction of business, otherwise known as e-commerce.

One of the first issues regarding the Web is to ask what type of communications tool it is. Specifically, does it serve more as radio and television or more as a newspaper? The answer raises significant questions about the scope of government regulation regarding the content of the Web.

The Communications Act of 1934 declared radio and subsequently television air frequencies to be owned by the public, subject to government regulation. This means that the government can subject television and radio to some restrictions. This regulatory authority was given to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). For example, in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the fairness doctrine, a rule requiring broadcasters to provide equal time to competing candidates or political positions. In contrast, in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), the Court rejected on First Amendment grounds a claim that a newspaper had an obligation to print rebuttals or letters in opposition to its editorials. Moreover, in Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the Court upheld a ruling that prevented the airing of George Carlin's "Seven Dirty Words," a satire on words the FCC had deemed inappropriate for broadcast.

The point is that the Supreme Court has upheld restrictions on what can be broadcast on the airwaves, whereas it has not similarly supported limitations for other forms of communication, seeing these limits instead as a form of censorship. Thus, if the Web is likened to a radio or television broadcast rather than to a newspaper, it will be subject to more restrictions. Although generally the Court seems to be willing to give broad First Amendment protection to the Web, there are limits.

The information available over the Web has made it an important research tool that is used in libraries alongside more conventional ways to gather information, such as from hardbound encyclopedias and books. However, notwithstanding all the valuable information found on the Web, information objectionable to many people is also available there. It includes material that is considered sexually explicit, pornographic, or obscene.

To regulate this material, Congress passed the Communications Decency Act in 1996, which tried to limit the distribution of obscene and pornographic images on the Web that can be accessed by minors. However, in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), the Supreme Court struck down the law as unconstitutionally vague. Congress then tried to address the Court's concerns in 1998 with the Child Online Protection Act (COPA). COPA narrowed the definition of obscenity to that found in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973). In Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564 (2002), the Court upheld the new law to the extent that it complied with the definition of obscenity found in Miller. Yet the Court remanded the case for the lower courts to determine whether the law was the least restrictive means by which the government could prevent minors from accessing harmful materials from the Internet. Then in Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564 (2004), the Court ruled for a third time, holding that COPA likely violated the First Amendment by burdening the ability of adults to access some protected speech.

Regardless of whether COPA ultimately would be upheld, many people were still concerned about children accessing or seeing this material, especially in libraries. First, children may be able to access this material on library terminals; second, adult patrons may wish to view such material there and this viewing could be visible to minors. In an effort to prevent minors from accessing sexually explicit material on the Web in libraries, Congress passed in 1999 the Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA), which barred libraries from receiving federal money unless they installed filters on their computer terminals that blocked obscenity or child pornography. Several libraries objected to CIPA, arguing that it was a form of censorship, and a three-judge district court ruled the filtering requirement unconstitutional in that it was a content-based restriction of the First Amendment.

In United States v. American Library Association, Inc., 539 U.S. 194 (2003), the Supreme Court upheld CIPA, rejecting arguments that requiring libraries to install the filters was a form of censorship and a violation of the First Amendment free speech clause. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist acknowledged the important role libraries played in American society in facilitating learning and sharing knowledge. He described libraries as a traditional public forum, meaning that they enjoyed broad First Amendment protection. Rehnquist argued, however, that the Internet was not a traditional public forum but merely an extension of libraries' more traditional resources. Libraries may decide to permit patrons the use of computer terminals and the Internet much in the way they determine through the books they purchase which books patrons can use. Thus, in not buying certain books, the library is not violating the First Amendment rights of its patrons; likewise, in not allowing access to certain Web sites, it is similarly not infringing on the rights of its users.

In dissent, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg contended that CIPA did violate the First Amendment. They saw the law as compromising the traditional role of libraries in providing public access to information and ideas that are constitutionally protected. Thus, the law was overbroad and content-specific in its application.

As a result of these decisions, it appears that the Supreme Court is willing to give Congress some authority to regulate the content of the Web, especially when it comes to protecting children.

A second issue of concern for free speech advocates is the use of Web-accessed intellectual property or items that are copyrighted. Here the question involves what control artists, writers, and others have over works of theirs that are posted on the Web. For many, the most famous example has involved Web sites such as Napster that made it possible for individuals to download and swap music over the Web. Some critics argue that information posted on the Web should be subject to different rules from those that apply elsewhere in society, thereby making dissemination easier. Despite these appeals, there is no indication that the courts are willing to grant less protection to intellectual property displayed on the Internet than to property appearing in another forum.

Overall, the Web challenges the First Amendment and free speech in many ways. To determine what is considered obscene, courts use the test in Miller v. California, which applies local community standards. For the Web, however, an issue is whether the applicable standards are those where the site broadcasts from or those where it is viewed. Second, how far can the government go to limit children from seeing obscene or offensive images? Third, when can the government monitor the Web for possible illegal activities, and does it need a warrant to do that? Can the government force Internet providers to provide unscramblers that would allow the government to read encrypted messages? Finally, what rules regarding libel and slander apply to the Web, especially in regard to blogs (private Web pages that provide news and commentary) or e-mail messages? These are just some of the legal issues yet to be sorted out about the Web.

David Schultz

See also: Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union; Censorship; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; First Amendment; Miller v. California; Music Censorship; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union.

FURTHER READING

Kalven, Harry, Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.

Krause, Jason. "Can Anyone Stop Internet Porn?" American Bar Association Journal (September 2002): 58.

IRS

See Internal Revenue Service

J

Jackson, Robert H. (1892–1954)

Robert H. Jackson served as an associate justice on the U.S. Supreme Court from 1941 until his death in late 1954. After working his way up through President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration to become solicitor general and then attorney general, Jackson became the seventh of Roosevelt's eight appointees to the Court. During his Court tenure, Jackson also stepped onto the international stage by leading the prosecution in the Nuremberg war crimes trials in post–World War II Germany.

Jackson completed only a year at New York's Albany Law School, and he was the last justice appointed to the Court with no law degree. Prior to joining the Roosevelt administration, Jackson worked in private law practice in upstate New York.

Jackson's judicial philosophy is difficult to categorize as liberal or conservative, as activist or as a voice of restraint. Scholars have labeled him " 'pragmatic,' " " 'middle-of-the-road,' " and even " 'erratic.' " With respect to civil liberties, he showed the idiosyncratic nature of his judicial philosophy in his support for the cautious approach of a selective incorporation of the Bill of Rights protections against the states.

Although Justice Jackson's singular pattern of decision-making placed him in the shadow of colleagues Justices Hugo L. Black and Felix Frankfurter and likely limited his influence on the development of constitutional interpretation, scholars take special note of the literary style of Jackson's opinions. His majority opinion in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), is one of his most celebrated. In striking down the compulsory flag salute in public schools, Jackson wrote, "Those who begin coercive elimination of dissent soon find themselves exterminating dissenters. . . . If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

Justice Jackson's proudest achievement, though his most controversial, was his service as the lead prosecutor at the war crimes trials in Nuremberg, Germany. At Nuremberg, Jackson hoped to put his stamp on international law: Nuremberg was to be the first time that surviving leaders of a defeated aggressive nation would be held legally responsible for their actions. He hoped to develop international legal precedent for outlawing aggressive war-making.

Yet criticisms of the tribunal, and of Jackson, abounded. Some critics opposed the concept of trying military leaders for decisions made by political leaders. Others opposed the ex post facto nature of the charges against the defendants: The Nazis had committed atrocities, but they were not, in technical terms, in violation of laws then in effect. Still other critics preferred to pass over trials completely and simply summarily execute the defendants. Jackson worked to ensure that the defendants received some measure of due process, stating his desire for just punishment rather than simple revenge.

Associate Justice Robert H. Jackson became the seventh of President Franklin Roosevelt's eight appointees to the Supreme Court. During his Court tenure, Jackson also stepped onto the international stage by leading the prosecution in the Nuremberg war crimes trials in post–World War II Germany. (Library of Congress)

Jackson may have paid a personal price for his work at Nuremberg. His controversial work there and his lengthy absence from the Court, which left his frustrated colleagues deadlocked in several cases, likely cost him any ambitions he harbored for either the presidency or the chief justiceship.

Scholars have debated the extent to which Jackson's experiences at the war crimes trials pushed him toward greater conservatism in both economic and civil liberties cases upon his return to the Court in 1947. He came to criticize harshly such civil libertarians as Justices Hugo L. Black and William O. Douglas, perhaps out of a belief that an excess of liberty had contributed to the rise of fascism in Nazi Germany. The justice who in 1943 in Barnette wrote, "The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials," would later caution in his dissent in Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), that the Court should "temper its doctrinaire logic with a little practical wisdom" to keep the Court from "convert[ing] the constitutional Bill of Rights into a suicide pact."

Justice Jackson's record remains one of contradictions, and his legacy will long be a subject of some disagreement among Court observers.

Staci L. Beavers

See also: Black, Hugo L.; Douglas, William O.; Frankfurter, Felix.

FURTHER READING

Hockett, Jeffrey D. New Deal Justice: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Hugo L. Black, Felix Frankfurter, and Robert H. Jackson. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

Jacobson v. United States (1992)

In Jacobson v. United States, 503 U.S. 540 (1992), the U.S. Supreme Court voted five–four that the federal government failed to prove Keith Jacobson was predisposed to violate the Child Protection Act. The Court therefore overturned his conviction, finding that the government had entrapped Jacobson. As highlighted in Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's dissent, the Court's decision may have fundamentally altered the course of criminal entrapment law.

In 1984, Keith Jacobson purchased copies of Bare Boys I and II, magazines depicting young teenage boys in nude poses. Later that same year, after Congress passed the Child Protection Act of 1984 making it illegal to knowingly receive child pornography through the mail, federal postal inspectors began investigating Jacobson. After two and a half years of investigation, he was arrested when he finally responded to the sixth governmental appeal through fake magazines, newsletters, and a pen pal, ordering a copy of the magazine Boys Who Love Boys.

A jury found Jacobson guilty of violating the federal law. He appealed unsuccessfully to the appellate court, then took his case to the U.S. Supreme Court, which heard arguments in the case in November 1991.

After its first decision regarding entrapment law in Sorrells v. United States, 287 U.S. 435 (1932), the Court continued to reaffirm its use of a subjective test to determine culpability. Under this test, the Court focused on the mental state of the defendant and asked whether the defendant was predisposed to commit the crime, and whether the crime was induced by the government's actions. In narrow five–four decisions in Sherman v. United States, 356 U.S. 369 (1958), and United States v. Russell, 411 U.S. 423 (1973), the four dissenters made similar findings as the majority but advocated an objective approach, focusing on the government's actions and whether those actions violated public policy.

Against this background, Justice Byron R. White's majority opinion in Jacobson focused on Jacobson's predisposition. Justice White ruled that although the government may have proved that Jacobson was predisposed to enjoy preteen sexuality, the government failed to prove that he was predisposed to break the law. He also strongly admonished the government against misbehavior.

Led by Justice O'Connor, the dissenters accused the majority of abandoning precedent, which had required the Court to review a defendant's predisposition at the time of the government's conduct rather than, as Justice O'Connor believed the majority was advocating, before initiation of the government's investigation. The dissenters further argued within the context of the subjective standard that a jury could have found Jacobson was predisposed to commit the crime.

Among the Court's entrapment cases that address only the defendant's predisposition to commit the crime, this was the first case in which both the five-member majority and the four-member dissent purported to use the subjective standard of review for predisposition claims. Some critics believe, however, that despite the majority's claims, the Court actually moved closer to the objective test because of the strong views it expressed against the government's conduct. The implications of this case remain to be worked out in subsequent decisions.

Virginia L. Vile

See also: Child Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Child Protection Act of 1984. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, sec. 2251.

Gardbaum, Stephen A. " 'The Government Made Me Do It': A Proposed Approach to Entrapment Under Jacobson v. United States." Cornell Law Review 79 (May 1994): 995.

Marcus, Paul. The Entrapment Defense. 2d ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1995.

Temple, Ronald. "Entrapped! Jacobson v. United States: When the Quest to Convict Child Pornographers Goes Too Far." South Dakota Law Review 38 (1993): 147.

Jefferson, Thomas (1743–1826)

Thomas Jefferson, the third president of the United States, primary author of the Declaration of Independence, and the founder of the Democratic-Republican Party (the precursor to today's Democratic Party), was a staunch defender of civil liberties. Jefferson believed that democracy could not survive, much less thrive, without freedom of belief, conscience, and expression. To Jefferson, this freedom was protected in large part through the First Amendment to the United States Constitution, which stated: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble." The wording of the First Amendment owed a good deal to Jefferson's proposal to the Virginia legislature in 1779, which prohibited government interference in the basic tenets of individual thought and expression.

Although some scholars have identified Jefferson as an Antifederalist, he was not opposed to the Constitution. He did, however, believe that without a Bill of Rights the document was flawed. "Government," Jefferson wrote to James Madison (1751–1836) on December 20, 1789, should not be allowed to infringe on the people's right to "freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restriction of monopolies, the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by juries." It was in large part due to Jefferson's urging that Madison introduced twelve amendments during the first Congress, ten of which became the Bill of Rights to the Constitution.

Freedom of religion, in Jefferson's view, was the foundation on which all expressive liberty stood. "The constitutional freedom of religion," Jefferson told the Virginia Board of Visitors in 1819, was "the most sacred of all human rights." He argued that it was the right of all individuals to worship according to the dictates of their individual conscience. Jefferson, very much a product of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment, contended that no religion had a right to force its doctrines on others or to mandate attendance at any church. Jefferson believed that the only way to protect this absolute freedom of belief and conscience was to build a "wall of separation" between the church and state. In a letter to the Danbury Baptist Church written in 1802, Jefferson explained his position by maintaining that "religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legislative powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions." Jefferson's hostility was never aimed at religious thought. His hostility was always directed at what he saw as the tyranny of some religions over the freedom of belief and conscience of others.

Thomas Jefferson was the primary author of the Declaration of Independence, advocate of the Bill of Rights, and third president of the United States. (National Archives)

In theory, Jefferson's wall of separation, articulated through the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses of the First Amendment, has meant that no one religion has been given preference over another and that the U.S. government was prohibited from establishing a state religion as England had done. Along with Adam Smith (1723–1790), Jefferson maintained that when a government tried to enforce uniformity of religious beliefs, the result was "intolerance" and "oppression." In historical practice, the wall of separation has been interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court as banning everything from the posting of the Ten Commandments in schools and government buildings to government support of parochial schools to permission for Jewish soldiers to wear yarmulkes while in dress uniform.

Throughout most of the Court's history, the justices have accepted Jefferson's wall of separation. However, when Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist first joined the Court in 1972 as an associate justice, he rejected the wall of separation, arguing that government should be allowed to support religion under limited circumstances. For instance, in his dissent to Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), in which the Court overturned Alabama's "moment of silent prayer," Rehnquist told his colleagues: "It is impossible to build sound constitutional doctrine upon a mistaken understanding of constitutional history, but unfortunately the Establishment Clause has been expressly freighted with Jefferson's misleading metaphor for nearly 40 years."

Speech, in Jefferson's view, was simply an extension of what an individual thought. Therefore, government had no right to limit this expression: "I have sworn upon the altar of God, eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man." When the Federalist-dominated Congress passed the Sedition Act of 1798 with the approval of President John Adams (1735–1826), Jefferson (then serving as vice president) was appalled. This law was one of the most serious restrictions on the freedoms of speech and press in the history of the United States. The Sedition Act established severe penalties for "false, scandalous, or malicious" statements about the president, Congress, or the U.S. government in general out of fear that such statements would encourage people to overthrow the government or stir up enmity among foreign governments. Adams felt the United States was particularly vulnerable to sedition because of the large numbers of immigrants who made America their home. Of the twenty-five people arrested under the Sedition Act, only ten were convicted. Jefferson pardoned all of them after he became president in 1801.

To Jefferson, the printed word was of extreme value on both a personal and political level. In a letter to John Adams in 1815, Jefferson wrote, "I cannot live without books." If the authors of those cherished books were stifled, freedom was sure to suffer. In 1814, Jefferson ordered a scientific book about the creation of the world written by Frenchman M. de Beaucourt, only to be told that the book had been banned. He wrote the bookseller that he was "mortified to be told that, in the United States of America, a science book can become a subject . . . of criminal inquiry." Jefferson later received the book directly from the author. According to Jefferson, a free press served to protect democracy, and he believed that if the right to a free press was limited, democracy would cease to exist. Jefferson argued that it was better to have newspapers without government than to have government without newspapers.

Before his death, Thomas Jefferson wrote the epitaph that appears on his tombstone in the family burial ground at Monticello, identifying what he believed was his legacy to the state of Virginia and to the United States: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and founder of the University of Virginia." The tombstone includes no reference to his eight years as president of the United States (1801–1809).

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Alien and Sedition Acts; Declaration of Independence; First Amendment; Madison, James; Separation of Church and State; Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom.

FURTHER READING

Avalon Project at Yale Law School. "The Papers of Thomas Jefferson," 1996–2003. http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/presiden/jeffpap.htm.

Grossman, Joel B., and Richard S. Wells. Constitutional Law and Judicial Policy Making. New York and London: Longman, 1988.

Ravitch, Diane. The American Reader: Words That Moved a Nation. New York: HarperCollins, 1990.

Simon, James F. The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Stone, Geoffrey R., Richard A. Epstein, and Cass R. Sunstein. The Bill of Rights in the Modern State. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Witt, Elder. The Supreme Court and Individual Rights. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1988.

Jehovah's Witnesses

Jehovah's Witnesses are an anti-Trinitarian, separatist, apocalyptic, indigenous religious sect whose members have been parties in many civil liberties cases. The most common issue around which the cases turn involves the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, under which individuals are free to exercise their religious belief in keeping with their faith.

Jehovah's Witnesses accept the virgin birth of Jesus Christ but deny that he has two natures (divine and human), declaring instead that he is the first creation. They also teach that the Holy Spirit is not a third person of the Trinity but no more than the power of God at work. They reject creeds and claim to base all faith and practice on the Bible. However, their guidance from the Bible is supplemented by the teachings of their leaders.

Jehovah's Witnesses believe the end of history is near. They meet in kingdom halls, not only expecting the Second Advent of Jesus but also predicting it on a number of occasions.

Jehovah's Witnesses were organized by Charles Taze Russell. He was deeply influenced by the Adventist movement begun by William Miller, and in 1884 Russell incorporated the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society. The organization has been variously known as Russellites, Millennial Dawnists, Rutherfordites (after "Judge" Joseph Franklin Rutherford, the successor to Russell), and International Bible Students. Since 1931 the official name has been Jehovah's Witnesses.

Jehovah's Witnesses have separated themselves into what they believe is the only group that has the truth necessary for salvation. They reject the term "church." They teach that big business, the churches, and civil government are part of the kingdom of Satan.

Based on their belief that the civil government is under the control of Satan, Jehovah's Witnesses refuse to engage in patriotic acts of civil worship. They claim that reciting the Pledge of Allegiance to the flag and saluting the flag are acts of idolatry forbidden by conscience. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a

Jehovah's Witnesses at the Eight-Day World Assembly, Yankee Stadium, New York City, 1963. Jehovah's Witnesses are a religious organization whose members have been parties to many civil liberties cases involving freedom of religion and speech, as well as conscientious objection to military service and refusals to accept blood transfusions. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Pennsylvania law requiring the salute, but in the middle of World War II reversed that decision in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), holding that the Free Exercise Clause prohibited compelling Jehovah's Witnesses to salute the flag.

In other cases the courts have held that children in public school who are Jehovah's Witnesses may not be compelled to stand for the Pledge to the flag or to participate in other patriotic observances, such as marching in patriotic parades or singing patriotic or school songs, or to engage in school politics. Jehovah's Witnesses schoolchildren can refuse to observe holidays (national, religious, or local), celebrate birthdays, or participate in extracurricular activities—including sports, cheerleading, and homecoming activities. Nor may they be forced to participate in martial arts (boxing and wrestling), lotteries, games of chance or gambling, school clubs, or school plays.

This renunciation of patriotic expression on religious grounds has been extended to automobile license plates. In Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977), the Court held that New Hampshire could not require individuals to display a statement on an automobile license plate—the state's motto, "Live free or die"—that violated religious beliefs.

Jehovah's Witnesses believe they have a religious duty to "witness." To aid them in their proselytizing work, they produce prodigious amounts of literature, some of which is used in door-to-door ministries. In Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), the Supreme Court ruled that religiously neutral laws requiring prior approval to solicit funds could not burden the free exercise of religion. Also, in Murdock

v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943), the Court held invalid laws levying license taxes on peddlers of religious tracts, as it did laws prohibiting door-to-door distribution of religious handbills in Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 14 (1943).

The Jehovah's Witnesses have been given protection for public preaching without official approval in public parks, as the Court held in Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951). Prior approval is not required even if the streets become littered with literature or participants use unlicensed sound trucks or insult other religions.

On the other hand, in Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941), the Court held the Jehovah's Witnesses could not hold a parade without permission, and it ruled in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), they could not create a breach of peace in the course of a public meeting. Nor may they use religion as a reason to violate state child welfare laws by allowing a young child to sell magazines on a street corner late at night, as the Court held in Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944).

Jehovah's Witnesses are not pacifists, but they do reject military service. They could participate in a holy war (a war commanded by God), but they do not believe God has commanded any such war since Old Testament times. In a number of cases, the Court has rejected claims that all Jehovah's Witnesses are ministers and therefore exempt from military service. Continued refusal in some cases has meant imprisonment for disobeying the military service laws.

Conscientious objection to engaging in arms production has been the subject of court action. In Thomas v. Review Board, Indiana Employment Security Division, 450 U.S. 707 (1981), the Supreme Court ruled that a Jehovah's Witness who left his job at an armaments plant because of conscientious belief could not be denied unemployment benefits.

Jehovah's Witnesses reject blood transfusions even when the patient will die without receiving one. They base this ethic upon Leviticus 17:10 and Acts 15:20, which they interpret to require abstention from receiving blood in any fashion. In some instances when minors are involved, the courts have ruled that a blood transfusion should be given despite the parents' refusal to authorize it.

The many cases involving Jehovah's Witnesses have allowed the courts to consider the scope and limitations of the free exercise of religion. In general, unless the activity seriously counters reasonable protection of the public welfare, the Court has allowed it.

A.J.L. Waskey

See also: First Amendment; Flag Salute; Free Exercise Clause.

FURTHER READING

Beckford, James A. The Trumpet of Prophecy: A Sociological Study of Jehovah's Witnesses. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1975.

Martin, Walter, and Norman H. Klann. Jehovah of the Watchtower. Minneapolis, MN: Bethany House, 1981.

Newton, Merlin Owen. Armed with the Constitution: Jehovah's Witnesses in Alabama and the U.S. Supreme Court, 1929–1946. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1995.

Penton, M. J. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985.

Russell, Charles Taze. Studies in the Scriptures. Allegheny, PA: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1907.

Jim Crow Laws

See Civil Rights Cases

Johnson v. Louisiana (1972)

In Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it was not mandatory for a jury verdict to be unanimous. The Sixth Amendment to the Constitution guarantees an impartial jury and, following English tradition, the framers intended juries should reach unanimous verdicts or none at all. For the sake of efficient justice, however, some states altered the unanimity rule for twelve-person juries, requiring instead the agreement of either nine or ten of the twelve. Louisiana was one such state that authorized a verdict by nine of twelve jurors in criminal cases in which the punishment was hard labor. The issue for the Court in Johnson and its companion case, Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972), was whether the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment required states to observe jury unanimity in criminal cases as required in the federal courts.

The defendant was convicted of robbery by a nine–three jury verdict in the Criminal District Court of the Parish of Orleans. The Louisiana Supreme Court upheld the conviction, and the defendant appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. He argued that a unanimous jury verdict was required under the Due Process Clause in order to give substance to the reasonable-doubt standard of proof.

Justice Byron R. White, in the five-four majority opinion, wrote that it was an unsupported assumption that the jury majority would not weigh carefully the arguments of dissenting jurors. The state had satisfied its burden of proving guilt beyond any reasonable doubt by obtaining nine votes to convict versus three votes to acquit. Johnson contended that the less-than-unanimous verdict was also a violation of the Equal Protection Clause because Louisiana required a unanimous verdict in capital cases and by five-person juries in other serious crimes. White's opinion held it was a reasonable legislative judgment to require the number of jurors who must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt to increase with the seriousness of the crime and the severity of the punishment.

The dissenters argued that a unanimous jury was a constitutional standard in criminal cases, basic to the accusatorial system. They further argued that the requirements of a unanimous jury verdict and of proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt were so important that they should be changed only by constitutional amendment.

Mark Alcorn

See also: Beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Jury Unanimity; Trial by Jury.

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 3d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1998.

Johnson, Frank M., Jr. (1918–1999)

Although U.S. Supreme Court justices typically garner far more attention, lower federal and state judges, who also exercise the power of judicial review (the power to invalidate unconstitutional legislation), also play important roles in shaping American jurisprudence. Few such judges in the twentieth century played a more important or visible role than Alabama's Frank M. Johnson Jr.

Born in Alabama in 1918, Johnson graduated first in his class at the University of Alabama Law School. A Republican in a predominantly Democratic state, Johnson made friends with Herbert Brownell, who became President Dwight D. Eisenhower's attorney general. After Eisenhower's election in 1952, Johnson was named as a U.S. attorney for the Middle District of Alabama. Eisenhower subsequently appointed him to a U.S. District Court judgeship in 1955, at which time Johnson, at thirty-seven, was the youngest such federal judge in the nation.

Johnson's appointment came on the heels of the U.S. Supreme Court's historic decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), which declared an end to the doctrine of "separate but equal" and to the Jim Crow segregation laws by which this doctrine had been enforced. Johnson played an important role in enforcing this decision in Alabama, joining two other federal district judges, whom he would join in other cases, in Browder v. Gayle, 142 F. Supp. 707 (M.D. Ala. 1956), striking down state and municipal laws requiring segregation in Montgomery's public transportation system.

As one-time fellow law student George C. Wallace rose to prominence as Alabama's race-baiting governor, Johnson had numerous clashes with him. Wallace often derided Johnson in public, calling him on one occasion an "integrating, scalawaging, carpet-bagging, race-mixing, bald-faced liar" who was destroying Alabama, and once saying that Johnson needed a "barbed-wire enema." As occurred for other federal judges of the period, Johnson's former friends and neighbors often ostracized him. Johnson nonetheless fearlessly continued to uphold civil rights and liberties, issuing an injunction in Williams v. Wallace, 240 F. Supp. 100 (M.D. Ala. 1965), that permitted the historic civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama.

Johnson managed the Montgomery school system for over a decade in carrying out desegregation in Carr v. Montgomery County Board of Education, 289 F. Supp. 647 (M.D. Ala. 1968), work that Justice Hugo L. Black, also of Alabama, later specifically commended in a Supreme Court decision. Johnson subsequently issued orders requiring reform of the state's mental health facilities, highway patrol, prisons, and other institutions. His detailed orders and continuing oversight of these institutions pushed traditional understandings of the role of judges to their limits.

In 1979, President Jimmy Carter elevated Johnson to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit. In this position, Johnson issued opinions that were often more liberal than those of the U.S. Supreme Court. Most notably, in Hardwick v. Bowers, 760 F.2d 1202 (1985), Johnson favored striking down the Georgia state sodomy law that the U.S. Supreme Court later upheld in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)—a decision that it later overturned in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

Johnson retired from the federal bench in 1996 and died in 1999. Although praised and criticized as a proponent of judicial activism, Johnson regarded his decisions as simply fulfilling his constitutional obligations.

John R. Vile

See also: Judicial Review.

FURTHER READING

Gerhardt, Michael J. "Johnson, Frank M., Jr." In Great American Judges: An Encyclopedia, ed. John R. Vile, 415–23, vol. 1 (of 2 vols.). Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

Kennedy, Robert F., Jr. Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr.: A Biography. New York: Putnam, 1978.

Yarbrough, Tinsley E. Judge Frank Johnson and Human Rights in Alabama. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1981.

Johnson, Lyndon Baines (1908–1973)

Lyndon Baines Johnson was president of the United States from the death of John F. Kennedy in 1963 until the inauguration of Richard M. Nixon in 1969. It is ironic that the president most responsible for civil rights and social welfare legislation was a southerner and onetime segregationist who initially rose to power as the choice of the southern wing of the Democratic Party. But Johnson had also been a follower of Franklin D. Roosevelt and wanted to be remembered as the president responsible for the continuation of Roosevelt's New Deal policies. Instead, Johnson is most remembered for the Vietnam War. Tragically, Johnson wanted to focus on important domestic policies, but he felt trapped by the need to respond to communism in Southeast Asia. In the midst of the Cold War, Johnson saw no way out of a war that ultimately was his downfall.

Before the presidency, Johnson had been elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from the Austin, Texas, area in 1937. A pro-Roosevelt candidate, he was elected in 1948 to the U.S. Senate from Texas and shifted to the right. In 1953, backed by key southern segregationist senators such as Richard Russell of Georgia, he was elected Senate minority leader, and in 1954 he became majority leader. Johnson proved to be one of the most able and successful Senate leaders in history.

This individual who can legitimately be characterized as larger than life was described by one biographer as "rude, intelligent, shrewd, charming, compassionate, vindictive, maudlin, selfish, passionate, volcanic and cold, vicious, and generous." He was an ideal Senate insider who could compromise, persuade, and cajole other senators so effectively that his legislative efforts evoked considerable awe. Johnson had higher ambitions than the Senate, however; he wanted to be president.

In 1957 he was largely responsible for the passage of a relatively weak civil rights act, but it was the first such legislation that had been passed since the end of Reconstruction. Passage of the 1957 act also positioned Johnson as more than simply a southern politician but as a serious prospect for the White House. Running for president in 1960, Johnson had to content himself with the vice presidential nomination on the Democratic ticket with John F. Kennedy. With Kennedy's assassination in 1963, Johnson was thrust into the presidency and immediately moved to pass civil rights and social welfare legislation. Johnson's efforts led to the passage of the War on Poverty, Medicare, and the Civil Rights Acts of 1964, 1965, and 1968. The 1964 act contained a number of important provisions: Three of the most important provided for desegregation of places of public accommodation, denial of federal funds to schools that did not desegregate, and prohibition on many forms of employment discrimination. The 1965 act proved remarkably effective in ending the exclusion of blacks from voting in the South. The 1968 act was a fair housing law passed in the wake of Martin Luther King's assassination. But at the same time Johnson was achieving domestic policy successes that had not been seen since the early days of the New Deal, the conflict in Vietnam was becoming more heated. Although Johnson won an overwhelming victory in the 1964 election by portraying himself as the "peace candidate" against Republican Barry Goldwater, it was not long until the Vietnam conflict underwent significant escalation. As it did, the cities and universities of America rioted over poverty, racism, and rising frustrations about the war.

President Lyndon B. Johnson, seated and surrounded by members of Congress, signs the 1968 Civil Rights Act prohibiting discrimination in the sale and rental of housing. (Library of Congress)

Johnson was labeled a "warmonger" and "baby killer," and he was incapable of effectively convincing much of America of the need for continued escalation of the war. His remarkable political skills as a Senate insider did not translate into success in communicating with and in persuading the American public. Instead of convincing, he was perceived as secretive and deceitful. The most successful president in achieving his domestic policy goals since Roosevelt was increasingly isolated, maligned, and ineffectual. Minorities and students—the very groups who had benefited most from his civil rights and education programs—were his harshest critics. The result was that Johnson chose not to run for reelection in 1968, although he had sufficient control over Democratic Party machinery to obtain the Democratic nomination for his vice president, Hubert H. Humphrey. A tumultuous Democratic convention, however, helped ensure the election of Richard Nixon in 1968.

In the summer of 1968, Johnson was given one last opportunity to influence domestic policy. Chief Justice Earl Warren met with Johnson and announced his retirement plans. Johnson immediately knew he would nominate his old lawyer and ally, Abe Fortas, as Warren's replacement. Johnson had named only two justices to the Court—Abe Fortas and Thurgood Marshall. Both were certain votes in favor of civil rights and civil liberties claims. Fortas, in particular, was very close to Johnson and had remained an adviser to him even while on the Court. Johnson nominated Fortas for the chief justiceship and Homer Thornberry—a court of appeals judge, former Texas congressman, and Johnson political crony—to replace Fortas as associate justice. It was too late, however. Republicans were smelling victory in November and wanted the chief justice to be named by Nixon. Johnson was politically weak by that point. Fortas was attacked for his liberalism, for his close relationship with Johnson, and for perceived conflicts of interest. Thus, Johnson failed in his last major chance to influence the future of domestic policy and civil rights and liberties in America.

Johnson retired to his Texas ranch a broken man. One of the century's most effective presidents in achieving domestic policy goals and the strongest and most effective president in support of civil rights legislation, Johnson failed in foreign policy, proving unable to hold the country together in the face of an unpopular war.

Anthony Champagne

See also: Nixon, Richard M.; Warren, Earl.

FURTHER READING

Caro, Robert A. The Master of the Senate. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2002.

Dallek, Robert. Lone Star Rising: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1908–1960. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Dugger, Ronnie. The Politician: The Life and Times of Lyndon Johnson. New York: W. W. Norton, 1982.

Miller, Merle. Lyndon: An Oral Biography. New York: G. P. Putnam, 1980.

Judicial Review

Judicial review occurs whenever a court considers the compatibility of, most typically, a legislative or executive action with the provisions of a constitution. Judicial review is an essential feature of U.S. constitutional government, under which fundamental principles limit the scope of public authorities. In the U.S. judicial system, courts of various descriptions exercise the power of judicial review. Many courts at the municipal, county, state, and federal levels have authority to determine the constitutionality of the actions of coordinate branches of government. For example, a municipal court may decide that an ordinance passed by a city council is inconsistent with the terms of the state's constitution. Similarly, a state court of last resort, such as a state supreme court, might declare an action taken by the state's governor to be a violation of the state or federal constitution. Regardless of the setting, instances of judicial review signal a government of limited powers and the presence of the rule of law.

Although exercised by courts at various levels of government, the subject of judicial review arises most often in discussions about the behavior of the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court first exercised the power of judicial review in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803). In his famous opinion in Marbury, Chief Justice John Marshall announced that an act of Congress—specifically, a provision of the Judiciary Act of 1789—violated the principles embodied in Article III of the U.S. Constitution. As a result, Marshall explained, the statute passed by Congress was void. The effect of this decision was to establish that the justices of the Supreme Court possessed the authority to consider the constitutionality of actions taken by the national legislature. Perhaps most important, the decision in this case affirmed the idea that the Court was uniquely situated to serve as final arbiter of the meaning of constitutional language and federal laws. On this matter, Marshall's intentions were especially clear: "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is."

It is important to note that the practice of judicial review was known to American jurists long before Chief Justice Marshall issued his famous opinion in Marbury. The 1610 decision in Bonham's Case, 8 Coke's Reports 114, commonly regarded as the first recorded reference to judicial review in the Anglo-American legal tradition, is a common starting point for examinations of judicial power. In this decision, British Chief Justice Edward Coke stated, "When an Act of Parliament is against common right and reason, the common law will control it and adjudge such Act to be void." Furthermore, eighteenth-century court records from the American colonies, as well as those compiled during the Constitutional Convention of 1787, reveal a general awareness and endorsement of the legitimacy of judicial review.

However fundamental to the practice of limited government, judicial review is not universally regarded as consistent with legislative authority and the basic theory of representative democracy. Arguably the best known of nineteenth-century opponents of judicial review, Judge John B. Gibson of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania issued what is commonly regarded as the classic "usurpation" argument critical of the exercise of judicial review. Judge Gibson, in his 1825 opinion in Eakin v. Raub, 12 Sergeant and Rawle 330 (Pa. 1825), indicated that for a court to nullify an act of a legislature was tantamount to a judicial usurpation—an extralegal assumption—of the legislature's constitutional authority.

In 1788, immediately before ratification of the Constitution, Judge Robert Yates argued that the practice of judicial review was, in its essence, antidemocratic. Judge Yates, a member of the New York Supreme Court and disaffected former delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1787, published the earliest statement of what is often labeled the "democratic incompatibility" argument against the U.S. Supreme Court's exercise of judicial review. Yates observed that if the unelected justices of the Court were to serve as the final arbiter of the constitutionality of congressional acts, they were, in effect, serving as an unchecked superlegislature. In short, Yates argued that the act of legislating was one properly reserved to the people and their elected representatives. Judicial review, he insisted, was inconsistent with the tenets of representative democracy.

In recent years, several scholars have suggested that modern justices have badly misunderstood Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in Marbury. For example, one observer presented evidence consistent with the view that justices during the early to mid-nineteenth century interpreted Marshall's opinion to mean that the only legislative acts subject to Supreme Court review were those directly implicating the power of the federal judiciary. Among the support for this proposition was the fact that after the 1803 decision in Marbury, a case directly implicating the powers of the judiciary, the Supreme Court did not refer to that case as precedent for the exercise of judicial review until the late 1800s. In this view, most twentieth-century instances of judicial activism, by which the justices struck down legislative and executive actions of many descriptions, would be deemed inconsistent with the earliest interpretations of the Court's powers outlined in Article III of the Constitution. In short, scholarly examinations of judicial review inevitably generate questions regarding the proper scope of judicial authority vis-à-vis the other branches of government in the U.S. constitutional system.

Discussions about the powers of judicial review as exercised by the U.S. Supreme Court are equally discussions about the appropriate divisions of power between state and federal authorities. Issues regarding the scope of federal authority in the early nineteenth century were resolved primarily in the context of Supreme Court decisions on the power of judicial review. Beginning with Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. 87 (1810), the justices established that it was within the province of the Court to review the constitutionality of the actions of state legislatures. Furthermore, Peck set the stage for what is historically regarded as the Court's most important statement on the matter of federalism—the 1819 decision in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316, in which the Court struck down a Maryland state law that placed a tax on the notes of the Bank of the United States. In effect, Chief Justice John Marshall's opinion announced that Congress enjoyed vast legislative authorities granted under Article I of the Constitution and that the Supremacy Clause in Article VI prohibited states from legislatively hindering federal initiatives.

Questions concerning the power of the Court to review the decisions of state judiciaries were answered in two early landmark decisions. In Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304 (1816), and Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264 (1921), Chief Justice Marshall announced that the Constitution granted the Court authority to review state-court decisions in both civil and criminal cases, respectively, that implicated provisions of federal law. As in instances where the Supreme Court strikes down an act of a state legislature, the power to overturn the decisions of state courts of last resort derives from Article VI of the U.S. Constitution.

Today, most judicial scholars accept the practice of judicial review as a legitimate extension of the power conferred on the Supreme Court by Article III of the Constitution. In addition, justices of all ideological descriptions demonstrate a willingness to strike down legislative and administrative actions found to be inconsistent with constitutional principles. Most important, in recent decades the justices have dedicated increasing proportions of the Court's plenary docket to constitutional decision-making. In sum, the expanse of U.S. Supreme Court history reflects the importance of judicial review as both a principal vehicle for judicial policy-making and a guarantor of bounded government authority.

Bradley J. Best

See also: Marshall, John; United States Constitution; United States Supreme Court.

FURTHER READING

Clinton, Robert Lowry. Marbury v. Madison and Judicial Review. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1989.

Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.

Melone, Albert P., and George Mace. Judicial Review and American Democracy. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1988.

Seidman, Louis M. Our Unsettled Constitution: A New Defense of Constitutionalism and Judicial Review. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Jury Nullification

Jury nullification occurs when jurors, based on their own sense of justice, fairness, or prejudice, refuse to uphold the law as explained to them by a judge and acquit defendants who are obviously guilty of violating the law. In short, jurors nullify that law. In a 1670 English trial, the jury issued a verdict inconsistent with the law in the renowned Bushell's Case, 1 State Trials 869 (1670). The defendants, Quakers William Penn and William Mead, were charged with unlawful assembly and disturbing the peace. Despite the evidence supporting these charges, the jurors acquitted. Much later in colonial America, a jury nullified the seditious libel law when a newspaper publisher, John Peter Zenger, was charged with publishing remarks critical of a British-appointed governor.

Jurors appear to nullify the law more often in cases involving (1) defendants facing sentences that jurors believe are too harsh, (2) laws that jurors feel should not be applied to a particular defendant, (3) racially charged cases in which jurors feel racial sympathy or animus toward particular defendants, (4) victims whom jurors view unsympathetically and as undeserving of the state's protection, and (5) instances of governmental intervention in a public policy or realm that jurors view as illegitimate, unjustified, or trivial.

Jurors may have both good and bad motives for nullifying or ignoring laws. Whatever their reasons, nullification makes the administration of justice highly subjective. One example of jury nullification occurred when Michigan juries refused to convict Dr. Jack Kevorkian four times despite the fact that he had clearly engaged and admitted to engaging in unlawful doctor-assisted suicides. Infamous examples of jury nullification involved southern juries in the 1950s and 1960s refusing to convict Ku Klux Klan defendants of harassing and murdering African Americans. Juries have often refused to convict defendants charged with drug offenses, believing that the mandatory sentences are too harsh. Jurors may think the government is wasting their time by sending them cases that are trivial or involve less serious offenses; to send a message, they may nullify the law. Other jurors view nullification as a form of civil disobedience, as a means of expressing outrage at a law they believe is morally wrong, such as when various northern juries refused to uphold the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793. The federal courts and state appellate courts, however, in case after case, have maintained unanimously that judges may not inform jurors about their power to nullify the law.

In 1989 a group called the Fully Informed Jury Association (FIJA) strongly began advocating that judges should inform juries of an inherent right to place their conscience above the law and, in essence, give juries the power to nullify the law. Advocates for jury-nullification instructions argue that juries in a democratic society serve as the conscience of the community and provide a mechanism for checking the power of governmental officials. Juries through nullification may make the administration of justice more fair and may compel legislatures to enact laws that are more in line with societal values.

Traditionally, judges and legal scholars have opposed the concept of jury nullification. They see jury nullification as undemocratic, claiming that juries are not always representatives of the community, are ridden with local biases, and subvert the legislative process. Critics further claim that juries are not sufficiently well informed to make policy decisions, and because they are not elected, they should not be policy-makers. When laws are not applied to particular defendants, racial or ethnic bias may be a factor. In addition, when some juries uphold the law and others do not, the result is uneven enforcement of the law. Whether jury nullification is truly a democratic or an antidemocratic practice will be subject to debate for years to come.

Ruth Ann Strickland

See also: Zenger, John Peter.

FURTHER READING

Conrad, Clay S. Jury Nullification: The Evolution of a Doctrine. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1998.

Haynie, Erick J. "Populism, Free Speech, and the Rule of Law: The 'Fully Informed' Jury Movement and Its Implications." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 88 (Fall 1997): 343–79.

Jonakait, Randolph N. The American Jury System. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003.

Marder, Nancy S. "The Myth of the Nullifying Jury." Northwestern University Law Review 93 (Spring 1999): 877–959.

Schijanovich, Ran Zev. "Note: The Second Circuit's Attack on Jury Nullification in United States v. Thomas: In Disregard of the Law and the Evidence." Cardozo Law Review 20 (March 1999): 1275–1324.

Jury Size

The U.S. Constitution safeguards the right to a jury trial in three separate provisions. Article III and the Sixth Amendment guarantee the right to a jury trial in criminal cases, and the Seventh Amendment guarantees the same right in civil cases. None of these provisions, however, specifies how many members the jury must have. Although the twelve-member jury is so familiar as to seem universal, the number of jurors necessary for a "trial by jury" has been the subject of several Supreme Court rulings and much debate.

In Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343 (1898), the Court ruled that in a federal criminal case, the Sixth Amendment required a twelve-member jury. The decision was based largely on historical tradition; the twelve-member jury had been a feature of the British and American legal systems for hundreds of years. This decision remains the rule governing federal criminal cases. In Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), however, the Court refused to apply the same requirement to trials in state courts and upheld a six-person jury for criminal trials in noncapital cases. Writing for the majority, Justice Byron R. White said that "[t]he fact that the jury at common law was composed of precisely twelve is a historical accident, unnecessary to effect the purposes of the jury system and wholly without significance." The Court argued that essential functions of the jury—accurately finding facts, deliberating the guilt of the accused, and fairly representing the community—could be performed as effectively by six citizens as by twelve.

Advocates of smaller juries also argue that they save time and money. Fewer citizens need to be called to serve, and less time is needed to select and seat smaller juries. Cases can be decided more quickly by a smaller group, since fewer people are involved in the discussion.

Group portrait including two officials and the twelve-person jury selected for the income tax evasion trial of Al Capone, 1931. The jury is an important element in the U.S. justice system. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Opponents of smaller juries argue they are less likely to include a wide variety of viewpoints and less likely to contain members of minority groups. Thus, they are less likely to fairly represent the community and are potentially biased against minority defendants. Because larger groups are more likely to engage in longer, more thorough discussions of the facts, and because they also have more people available to remember crucial facts from the trial, they are more likely to reach accurate verdicts. In Ballew v. Georgia, 135 U.S. 223 (1978), the Supreme Court acknowledged some of these arguments, holding that a five-member jury was too small to foster effective group deliberation and violated the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Many of the same arguments apply to civil as well as criminal trials. The Supreme Court held in Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149 (1973), that a six-person jury was allowed under the Seventh Amendment, and Rule 48 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits juries of between six and twelve in federal cases. Because the Supreme Court has never ruled that the Seventh Amendment is applicable to the states, the Battin decision does not apply to state civil trials, where a jury trial can be denied entirely unless required by state law. Currently, only ten states require unanimous, twelve-member civil juries.

Thomas A. Schmeling

See also: Jury Unanimity; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties; Seventh Amendment; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Hans, Valerie. "The Power of Twelve: The Impact of Jury Size and Unanimity on Civil Jury Decision Making." Delaware Law Review 4 (2001): 1–32.

———, and Neil Vidmar. Judging the Jury. New York: Plenum, 1986.

Kalven, Harry, and Hans Zeisel. The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown, 1966.

Jury Unanimity

Most people assume that a person cannot be convicted of a crime except by a unanimous jury. Although federal courts and most states do require unanimity in criminal cases, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the Sixth Amendment guarantee of trial by jury allows convictions by less than a unanimous vote in state courts. The Court has also ruled that the Seventh Amendment allows nonunanimous verdicts in civil cases.

HISTORY AND SUPREME COURT RULINGS

The unanimous verdict was a feature of the English common law and was widely accepted in North America at the time of the framing of the Constitution. In writing the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of trial by jury, James Madison included a requirement of unanimous verdicts, but this provision was deleted before the amendment was sent to the states for ratification. The tradition of unanimous verdicts inherited from England was strong enough, though, that the Supreme Court has consistently held that the Sixth Amendment guarantee of trial by jury requires that a verdict of guilt be unanimous in cases tried in federal courts. On the other hand, the Court held in Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972), and Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), that unanimity was not required for trials in state courts. In Apodaca, the Court upheld a conviction reached by a vote of ten–two, and in Johnson the Court sustained a conviction based on a nine–three vote. In considering the question with regard to state courts, the Supreme Court did not base its decision on history. Rather, the court engaged in a "functional analysis" of the purpose and essential characteristics of the criminal jury.

MAJORITY VERDICTS: PRO AND CON

Proponents of majority verdicts argue for them largely on grounds of efficiency. Without the requirement of unanimity, juries reach verdicts more quickly, saving time for both the jurors and the court. Because they allow a guilty verdict to be reached even if a few jurors hold out, nonunanimous verdicts also reduce the number of hung or deadlocked juries, thus lowering the number of costly retrials.

Research on juries supports the argument that unanimous-verdict requirements do increase both the time it takes the jury to reach a decision and the frequency of hung juries. Kalven and Zeisel found that under a unanimity rule, juries hung at rates of 5–6 percent, but if nonunanimous verdicts were allowed, the rate of hung juries was just over 3 percent. Thus, requiring unanimity nearly doubled the rate of hung juries.

Critics of nonunanimous verdicts argue that since hung juries are very rare to begin with, any savings from eliminating the unanimity requirement would be very small. More important, the savings in retrials would come at significant costs to justice. If two of twelve jurors cannot support a guilty verdict, there would appear to have been some doubts as to guilt. To ignore these doubts threatens the defendant's right, implicitly protected under the Fifth Amendment, to be convicted only after proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In the famous film Twelve Angry Men, Henry Fonda's character holds out for the innocence of the defendant until he is able to convince all of the other jurors that he is correct. Under a majority-verdict rule, the other eleven jurors could simply ignore him and convict the defendant. Critics of nonunanimous verdicts argue that they increase the chances of falsely convicting the innocent, and research on juries seems to support this argument: Kalven and Zeisel found that when juries hung by one or two votes, it was most often the case that the holdouts favored acquittal.

Finally, although research does show that juries in nonunanimous cases do reach verdicts more quickly than do unanimous juries, the danger is that jurors who can simply ignore dissenters will rush to judgment and not fully deliberate the defendant's guilt. This also implicates the function of the jury in representing the community. If minority viewpoints can be ignored by a majority of the jury, the result is the same as if the minority members had been excluded from the jury altogether.

Possibly because of these arguments, the movement for nonunanimous verdicts in criminal cases has not been very successful to date. First, the Supreme Court refused to allow a nonunanimous verdict (five–one) in a criminal case involving a jury of six in Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. 130 (1979), holding that it violated the Sixth Amendment. Second, Oregon and Louisiana remain the only two states that allow nonunanimous verdicts in serious criminal cases, and as noted previously, unanimity is still required in federal criminal cases. On the other hand, more than thirty states allow nonunanimous verdicts in civil cases.

Thomas A. Schmeling

See also: Beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Johnson v. Louisiana; Jury Size; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties; Seventh Amendment; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Abramson, Jeffrey. We, the Jury. New York: Basic Books, 1994.

Hans, Valerie, and Neil Vidmar. Judging the Jury. New York: Plenum, 1986.

Hastie, Reid, Steven Penrod, and Nancy Pennington. Inside the Jury. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.

Kalven, Harry, and Hans Zeisel. The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown, 1966.

Just Compensation

The Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution requires payment of just (fair) compensation when private property is taken for a public purpose. That requirement, called the Takings Clause, has been applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Therefore, in the United States, whenever the national government or the government of a state exercises its power of eminent domain to take private property for a public purpose, the owner of the property has the constitutional right to payment of just compensation. This requirement applies when the owner's entire interest in the property is taken, when only a partial interest is taken, or when the taking is temporary.

The goal of the just-compensation clause is to ensure that the taking of the property does not financially harm the owner of the property. The U.S. Supreme Court decided in Kirby Forest Industries, Inc. v. United States, 467 U.S. 1 (1984), that the Constitution required that the owner be paid fair market value for the property taken. That amount is based on the value of the property at the time it is taken by the government. The time of the taking is determined by the date on which the government gives the owner formal notice of the taking. Fair market value is what a willing buyer would pay a willing seller in a free market transaction. If the taking is only temporary, this amount will be based on what the property owner could have gotten for rent of the property for the period of the taking. The government taking the property makes an offer of what it has determined to be just compensation based on the evidence available. If the owner of the property rejects that offer and contests the taking, the case goes to court. The determination of fair market value is an issue of fact usually decided by a jury. Both parties to the case present expert testimony on the value of the property based on evidence from the sale of similar pieces of property in the area in recent times.

The U.S. Supreme Court has elaborated on the concept of fair market value to explain what factors may be considered in its determination. The definition of fair market value does not take into account the unique value placed on the property by the current owner who may have individual reasons for placing greater value on the property than what would be seen by another person in a free market transaction. It also does not take into account the impact of the taking on the value of the property. Therefore, if the property has a higher market value as private property before the taking than it has as public property after the taking, the property owner would be paid the higher value based on market value before the taking.

Furthermore, fair market value does not have to be based solely on the current use of the property if that property could have other uses. The assessment of fair market value can take into account other available uses for the property. However, the owner will not be compensated for future uses that the court considers only speculative. Also, in United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369 (1943), the Court decided that if the government takes a portion of a larger piece of property and the taking of the portion reduces the value of the land retained by the owner, the calculation of just compensation will include what is called "severance damage," an amount reflecting the loss of value to the owner's remaining property. Similarly, if the government's taking of a portion of the property increases the value of the property the owner retains, that value will be deducted from the amount owed by the government for the portion taken.

In recent years, the issues of whether property has been "taken" by government and whether it has been taken for "public use" are much more controversial than the issues surrounding determination of fair market value for the property taken. This is partly due to the fact that the determination of fair market value is considered an issue of fact for a jury. If the case is appealed, the appellate court usually defers to the jury's decisions on issues of fact unless the trial-court judge made a legal error in instructing the jury.

Pinky S. Wassenberg

See also: Property Rights; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Skouras, George. Takings Law and the Supreme Court: Judicial Oversight of the Regulation, Acquisition, Use, and Control of Private Property. New York: P. Lang, 1998.

Juvenile Curfews

Many U.S. communities have enacted local ordinances making it illegal for minors to be outdoors during specified hours, a trend that increased markedly during the early 1990s. Proponents of juvenile curfews believe these measures reduce youth crime, protect juveniles from victimization, and help parents assert control over difficult children. Opponents claim there is no evidence that curfews provide any of the promised benefits, and that even if there were, the benefits are outweighed by the curfew's infringements on liberty. The U.S. Supreme Court has never ruled on the legality of juvenile curfews, and lower courts are divided on their constitutionality.

The legal challenges most often raised against juvenile curfew ordinances are that they violate minors' right to freedom of movement; that they are overbroad; that they are unconstitutionally vague; and that they violate the right of parents to direct the upbringing of their children.

MINORS' FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

The right to move about is not enumerated in the Constitution, but a right to travel and to movement has been recognized as arising as a corollary of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, or Fourteenth Amendments. As the Supreme Court said when striking down a vagrancy statute in Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156 (1972), the right to walk, stroll, loiter, and loaf as one pleases is "historically part of the amenities of life as we have known them," and denial of this right would result in communities marked by "hushed, suffocating silence." A permanent, nonemergency curfew would therefore violate the constitutional freedom of adults, even if it were shown that the curfew reduced adult crime or prevented victimization of vulnerable adults. Courts have differed over whether the right applies with equal force to minors.

Courts and commentators considering the equal protection aspects of the different treatment of adults and minors have wrestled over whether laws impacting juveniles should be examined under the strict scrutiny given to laws based on race, the intermediate scrutiny given to laws based on sex, or the rational-basis scrutiny given to other classifications. None of these approaches fits classifications based on youth, because age is not an immutable characteristic like race or sex; all minors who live long enough will become adults. Instead, laws applying solely to minors should be viewed with an eye toward the factors identified in Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979), which struck down a parental-consent law for minors seeking abortions. Under Bellotti, activity that is lawful for adults may be restricted for children only when doing so is justified by the particular vulnerability of children, their inability to make crucial decisions by themselves, or the need for state assistance to parents in child rearing.

OVERBREADTH

Even if a law permissibly regulates some area of wrongful conduct, it will be struck down as overbroad if it is so sweeping that it impinges upon a real and substantial amount of constitutionally protected activity. Some courts have relied upon the overbreadth doctrine to invalidate juvenile curfews that fail to allow necessary exceptions for participating in activities protected by the First Amendment, such as attending after-hours meetings or rallies. In response to overbreadth concerns, drafters of curfew ordinances that have survived judicial scrutiny have included exceptions for various situations. The most typical exceptions allow minors to be outdoors while in the presence of an adult escort; while engaged in activity protected by the federal Constitution such as First Amendment expression or interstate travel; while commuting to and from work or an activity sponsored by a school, church, or other adult community group; in response to emergency or necessity; or on streets immediately surrounding the home.

Opponents of curfews argue that they are overbroad in another sense, namely that they require all minors to remain indoors against their will based only on evidence that some subset of minors have in the past violated the law or were victimized while outdoors at night.

VAGUENESS

The need for various exceptions to a blanket curfew generates the related problem of vagueness. A law violates due process if it is drafted in terms so vague that it does not give adequate notice of what conduct is prohibited, or if it gives excessive discretion to police to enforce it at will. The latter concern is most important in curfew litigation, since opponents point to patterns of selective or arbitrary enforcement of curfew laws, frequently based on race or socioeconomic status. The power a vague ordinance gives to police to roust the usual suspects was the basis for striking down a "gang loitering" law in City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999), a case that also spoke about the right of persons who are otherwise breaking no laws to be present in a public place. Curfew ordinances that fail to give adequate guidance to police about when a person has "remained," "loitered," or "stayed" in a location for too long have been invalidated as unconstitutionally vague.

RIGHTS OF PARENTS

Although some parents appreciate the added authority of the government in setting curfews for their children, others resent the loss of their right as parents to establish family rules. A line of cases catalogued in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), highlighted the right of parents to control family life with a minimum of governmental interference. To date, no court has relied on the parental-rights theory to invalidate a curfew law, but legal analysts have begun to explore the theory in the context of curfew laws containing "parental responsibility" provisions that allow police to ticket parents whose children violate curfew.

Aaron H. Caplan

See also: Overbreadth Doctrine; Right to Travel; Rights of Minors; Vagueness.

FURTHER READING

Center on Juvenile and Criminal Justice. The Impact of Juvenile Curfew Laws in California, 1998. http://www.cjcj.org/pubs/curfew/curfew.html.

Males, Mike A. The Scapegoat Generation: America's War on Adolescents. Monroe, ME: Common Courage, 1996.

Sadler, A. E., and Scott Barbour, eds. Juvenile Crime: Opposing Viewpoints. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven, 1997.

U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. Curfew: An Answer to Juvenile

Delinquency and Victimization? April 1996. http://www.ncjrs.org/pdffiles/curfew.pdf

Juvenile Death Penalty

The juvenile death penalty is the imposition of capital punishment upon offenders who were under age eighteen when they committed the crime. Whether youths should be treated the same as adults for purposes of punishment by death is a very controversial issue. Juveniles have been treated differently from adults since the early common law period. The law early on recognized that juveniles were not as mentally or emotionally developed as adults and thus should be judged differently. This led to the development of the parens patriae doctrine, in which the state was seen as a quasi-parent charged with protecting children as well as holding them accountable for their actions. It also led to the development of the infancy defense, which held that youths under age fourteen were presumed incompetent and thus not criminally liable for their misdeeds. This differential treatment of juveniles and the focus on their rehabilitation rather than punishment reached its zenith with the creation of the juvenile court system in the early part of the twentieth century.

Notwithstanding the consistent effort over time to recognize the reduced liability of juveniles, there has been a steady effort to hold the most serious juvenile offenders accountable in a meaningful fashion. This call for accountability has taken several forms, including allowing juveniles charged with serious crimes to be transferred or waived to adult criminal court. Another form has been the imposition of the death penalty. One of the first executions in the colonies was of a juvenile, in 1642. Approximately 365 juvenile offenders have been executed in the 360 years since. Twenty-one juvenile offenders have been executed since the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the death penalty in 1976. Of the forty states that currently allow the death penalty, eighteen have a minimum age of eighteen, five have a minimum age of seventeen, and seventeen have a minimum age of sixteen.

The Supreme Court has determined that some (but not all) juveniles may be given the death penalty. In Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988), the Court held that it was unconstitutional to execute juveniles who committed their crime at age fifteen or younger. The Court applied the "evolving standards of decency" test to a state death penalty statute that authorized the execution of fifteen-year-old offenders and determined the statute was unconstitutional. The Court noted that a national review of state legislation showed "complete or near unanimity among all 50 states . . . in treating a person under 16 as a minor" and that this showed that "the normal 15-year-old is not prepared to assume the full responsibilities of an adult."

The following year, in Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361 (1989), the Supreme Court held that the evolving-standards-of-decency test did not bar the execution of juveniles who were sixteen or seventeen when they committed their crime. The Court noted that a majority of states that allowed the imposition of the death penalty allowed sixteen-year-olds to be executed. This demonstrated to the Court that there was no national consensus against executing sixteen-year-olds, unlike the consensus that existed against executing fifteen-year-olds.

The rate at which juvenile death sentences have been handed out has remained constant at about 2 percent of all death penalty sentences. This rate has remained constant in the face of both increases and decreases in juvenile violence and homicide rates, which suggests its imposition is not related to the incidence of homicide. More than two-thirds of the juveniles executed have been African American. This suggests race may play a factor in the sentencing decision, a charge frequently leveled at the death penalty in adult criminal cases as well. Of the 139 juvenile death sentences that have been resolved since 1976 (either by reversal or execution), 118, or 85 percent, have been reversed on appeal. This suggests the juvenile death penalty is often improperly imposed. All these issues raise serious questions about the constitutionality of the juvenile death penalty.

There now exists a clear demarcation regarding who may be executed (sixteen and older at the time of the crime), but the debate over the appropriateness of executing young offenders rages on. Opponents of the death penalty for juveniles continue to argue that younger offenders are both less culpable and more amenable to rehabilitation, thus making them poor candidates for capital punishment. Supporters of the death penalty for juveniles stress the importance of providing a punishment that "fits the crime" and note the supposed deterrent effect of capital punishment. In Patterson v. Texas, 536 U.S. 984 (2002), three Supreme Court justices took the relatively unusual step of dissenting from a denial of certiorari (refusal to hear the appeal) in a case involving an application for a stay of execution of a juvenile death sentence. The justices argued the Court should reconsider its ruling in Stanford v. Kentucky in light of its recent ruling in Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002), in which the high court applied the evolving-standards-of-decency test and held it was unconstitutional to execute the mentally retarded. Applying this same standard of review to the juvenile death penalty, the dissenters argued, might lead to a similar ruling with regard to it. Although this argument was unsuccessful in the Supreme Court, it highlights the growing trend toward abolition or at least restriction of the juvenile death penalty at the state level. Several state legislatures have recently raised the minimum age for death penalty eligibility to eighteen, and several state courts have interpreted their own constitutions to limit the applicability of the death penalty to persons under eighteen. It remains to be seen whether a societal consensus in favor of abolishing the juvenile death penalty will develop.

Craig Hemmens

See also: Atkins v. Virginia; Capital Punishment; Evolving Standards of Decency; Juvenile Justice System.

FURTHER READING

Bureau of Justice Statistics. Capital Punishment 1999. Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics, 2001.

Fritsch, Eric J., and Craig Hemmens. "Juvenile Waiver in the United States, 1979–1995: A Comparison and Analysis of State Waiver Statutes." Juvenile and Family Court Journal 46, 3 (1995): 17–36.

Gardner, Martin R. Understanding Juvenile Law. New York: Matthew Bender, 1997.

Streib, Victor. Death Penalty in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Juvenile Justice System

The system of justice for juvenile offenders in the United States differs from the system for adult offenders. The juvenile justice system was created to deal with delinquency outside of the adult justice system. Its primary focus is to turn juvenile offenders into productive citizens through treatment and rehabilitation rather than punishment.

Prior to 1900, juveniles were treated much like adults. The court system did not generally use either age or the ability to commit a crime to distinguish punishment. Children as young as seven years old could be tried and sentenced in adult court. Of course, society was also very different. Many children did not attend school, and those that did usually continued only until they finished elementary school. Child labor was also common, both in factories and on family farms. Over time, the government began to view its role toward children differently. Government programs aimed at protecting children began to be implemented.

As society's view toward children began to change, the justice system followed suit. Juvenile courts and the juvenile justice system were products of the progressive movement of the early twentieth century. Progressives were reformers who were concerned with growing urbanization and the children of poor immigrants. These reformers wanted to save children from a life of crime and founded a justice system that was meant to be more flexible than the normal justice system. The hope was that this system would be able to deal with the particular problems brought by youthful offenders.

By 1925 nearly all states had separate juvenile justice systems in place. As a consequence of the progressives' original emphasis on saving children from a life of crime, the juvenile justice system was based on prevention and rehabilitation rather than punishment. The courts in the juvenile justice system treated juveniles differently from adults. This distinction was based on the philosophy of parens patriae, or the state as parent. Essentially, juvenile courts were to be more personal and were to treat juveniles as children who had erred rather than as hardened criminals.

Juvenile offenders work with severely disabled children at the El Camino School in Los Angeles, California, as part of their jail time and rehabilitation program, April 1994. (© Tony Savino/The Image Works)

Originally, however, treating juveniles differently did not always mean treating them better. Between 1900 and 1960, children were rarely given the procedural protections that adults received. For example, the right to counsel during a criminal proceeding was not originally extended to children, nor was the right against self-incrimination. In addition, juvenile criminal cases were often evaluated using the preponderance-of-evidence standard rather than the guilty-beyond-reasonable-doubt standard used in the adult system.

The Supreme Court at first held that the extended benefits juveniles received from the juvenile justice system compensated them for the loss of some due process rights. Because juvenile courts considered extralegal factors in making decisions and often dealt with juvenile cases outside of the judicial system, the Court reasoned that juveniles occupied a special place in the justice system and did not necessarily warrant the same due process protections found in the adult system.

Between 1960 and 1980, the juvenile justice system both improved and began to deteriorate. Rehabilitation of juveniles came under fire as studies began to show that the juvenile justice system was failing to prevent delinquency. At the same time, due process protections were introduced into the juvenile justice system, and children began to enjoy the same procedural protections as adults.

In In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), the Supreme Court held that children were to be given the same rights as adults. The Court held that "under our Constitution the condition of being a boy does not justify a kangaroo court." In Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541 (1966), the Court questioned the notion of parens patriae, holding that juveniles might be getting the worst of both worlds and receiving "neither the protection accorded to adults nor the solicitous care and regenerative treatment postulated for children." In a series of cases, the Court extended to children the right to an attorney, the right to notice of the charges against them, the right to confront witnesses, and the privilege against self-incrimination.

As a result of the perceived failure of the rehabilitation philosophy and the introduction of due process rights, the juvenile system of today often closely resembles its counterpart for adults rather than the more flexible system of its origins. Nevertheless, it is important to understand that the United States has no one juvenile justice system but rather multiple systems. Although all states have juvenile courts, each state's juvenile justice system differs somewhat.

Since each state varies in the purpose of its juvenile justice system, state procedures for trying and punishing juveniles also differ. Some states put an emphasis on rehabilitation and having the court give a child the care of a parent; others focus on deterrence and punishment. The setup of the court system also varies by state. Some states have juvenile courts that are entirely separate from the other court system. Other states have juvenile courts that are attached to the general court system with rotating judges. Other states have combinations of these two approaches.

Although the juvenile justice system somewhat mirrors the adult justice system, it uses different terminology. What would be called a "crime" in the adult system is a "delinquent act" in the juvenile system. A "trial" is generally called an "adjudication hearing." A juvenile found "delinquent" after the hearing equates to an adult being found "guilty." "Detention" in the juvenile system is basically the same as "jail" in the adult system.

One feature most juvenile justice systems have in common is that they are bound by age. States vary as to who is considered a "juvenile." Some states deem anyone past age fifteen an adult. Other states put the age limit between sixteen and eighteen. But even age is not a definite indication that a minor will be handled in juvenile court rather than the regular court system.

All states allow juvenile offenders to be tried as adults under some circumstances. Many states have statutes that exclude certain serious, violent crimes from the juvenile court system. These states define certain crimes as adult and further consider anyone who commits these crimes to be an adult. Other states give sole discretion to the prosecutor to decide whether to file a case in juvenile or adult court for serious crimes. Still other states allow the court to determine whether a defendant should be tried in adult or juvenile court.

Although it is usually the violence associated with a crime that moves a minor from the juvenile justice system into the adult system, some states authorize adult criminal prosecution for nonviolent offenses. These offenses include drug activity, treason, escape, arson, and burglary. The current trend in the states has been to allow more and more juveniles to be tried as adults.

In general, juvenile offenders can be brought into the juvenile justice system for two reasons—delinquency or status offenses. Delinquency is a violation of criminal law. In other words, if an adult had committed the violation, it would be considered a crime. Status offenses are acts that are illegal only for juveniles, such as possession of alcohol, truancy, or curfew violations.

First, the prosecutor and law enforcement must decide whether to send the matter into the formal juvenile justice system or to divert the case into an alternative program or court. Some cases may also be sent out of juvenile court into adult court. In cases that are referred to juvenile court, children found guilty may be placed on probation or sent to a juvenile institution.

When determining a sentence, juvenile court judges often must consider competing standards. They must look at the best interests of the child, the best interests of the community, and what is fair to the victim. These judges often have more discretion than their adult-court counterparts. In addition, probation officers help judges make sentencing decisions by writing detailed reports about the child's background and the availability of support systems and programs. Judges may order psychological counseling, drug testing, drug counseling, detention, community restitution, victim restitution, or community counseling.

This discretion is motivated by the state's desire to allow the judge to determine what actions are most likely to rehabilitate the child. Sensitivity to a child's age can also be seen in state statutes that provide for the expungement of juvenile records once the child reaches a certain age. This policy, however, is changing as well to track the adult system more closely. Many states now make available formerly confidential juvenile court records.

Joy A. Willis

See also: Gault, In re; Juvenile Death Penalty; Rights of Minors.

FURTHER READING

National Center for Juvenile Justice. http://www.ncjj.org.

Neubauer, David W. Judicial Process: Law, Courts, and Politics in the United States. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt, Brace, 1997.

Platt, Anthony. The Child Savers: The Invention of Delinquency. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.

K

Katz v. United States (1967)

In Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the U.S. Supreme Court voted seven–one (Justice Thurgood Marshall not participating) that an illegal search existed under the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures when law enforcement agents placed a wiretap without first obtaining a search warrant.

The Katz decision marked a move away from Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), in which the Court held that placing a warrantless tap on telephone wires and eavesdropping on defendant's conversations did not constitute a search in the absence of a physical trespass or intrusion. Katz also expanded on Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961), in which the Court held that a search existed when law enforcement unreasonably intruded into a defendant's home, with the Katz Court modifying Silverman and establishing the reasonable-expectation-of-privacy test.

The petitioner in Katz was convicted of transmitting wagering information by telephone from Los Angeles to Miami and Boston. Over his objection, the government introduced evidence of his conversations recorded by FBI agents who had attached listening devices to the outside of a public telephone booth from which the petitioner placed the calls. The federal appellate court affirmed the conviction, finding no Fourth Amendment violation, since there was "no physical entrance into the area [the petitioner] occupied."

The Supreme Court reversed. Justice John M. Harlan's concurring opinion, which encapsulated the meaning of Katz, held that "(a) an enclosed telephone booth is an area where, like a home, a person has a constitutionally protected reasonable expectation of privacy; (b) that electronic as well as physical intrusion into a place that is in this sense private may constitute a violation of the Fourth Amendment; and (c) that the invasion of a constitutionally protected area by federal authorities is, as the Court has long held, presumptively unreasonable in the absence of a search warrant." Harlan added "that there is a twofold requirement, first that a person have exhibited an actual (subjective) expectation of privacy and, second, that the expectation be one that society is prepared to recognize as 'reasonable.' " Harlan thus established a two-part test to determine when an individual has a "reasonable expectation of privacy." One, has government action violated an individual's subjective expectation of privacy? Two, was that expectation of privacy reasonable (an objective test)?

Justice Harlan's pronouncement in Katz, though valuable to Fourth Amendment case law and right-to-privacy cases before the Court, has not been followed as strictly as many legal scholars might have wished. The Court under both Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist has not interpreted Katz in the same manner as Harlan or the others in the Katz majority. In Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979), the Court, citing Katz, addressed the issue of whether it was a permissible search if police, with the assistance of the phone company, tracked the telephone numbers dialed from a person's home. The Court affirmed the decisions by the court of appeals, which held that "there is no constitutionally protected reasonable expectation of privacy in the numbers dialed into a telephone system and hence no search within the Fourth Amendment is implicated by the use of a pen register installed at the central offices of the telephone company. Because there was no 'search,' . . . no warrant was needed." The crux is that the Court apparently has moved away from what Court observers would recognize as "reasonable." It seems the Court disregarded Justice Thurgood Marshall's dissent in Smith that "[p]rivacy is not a discrete commodity, possessed absolutely or not at all."

Aaron R. S. Lorenz

See also: Olmstead v. United States; Search; Wiretapping.

FURTHER READING

Diffie, Whitfield. Privacy on the Line: The Politics of Wiretapping and Encryption. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1998.

Regan, Priscilla M. Legislating Privacy: Technology, Social Values, and Public Policy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Katzenbach v. Morgan (1966)

In Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641 (1966), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the power of Congress to forbid state English-language literacy tests for voting. In Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 360 U.S. 45 (1959), in contrast, the Court had held that a fairly applied literacy test did not violate the Constitution. In the Voting Rights Act of 1965, however, Congress banned literacy and related voter tests in states and counties with a history of voting discrimination, based on ample evidence that such requirements had often been used for discriminatory purposes rather than to assure a literate electorate. Section 4(e) of the legislation, added to the statute during congressional floor debate, further provided that persons who had successfully completed the sixth grade in a Puerto Rican public or accredited private school in which the language of instruction was not English could not be denied the right to vote because of their inability to read and write English.

Registered voters in New York City, which had a large Puerto Rican population, brought suit challenging section 4(e), and a federal district court declared the statute an unconstitutional usurpation of powers reserved to the states under the Tenth Amendment. By a seven–two vote in Katzenbach v. Morgan, the Supreme Court reversed.

Writing for the majority, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. emphasized the broad scope of congressional authority under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to enforce its provisions, including its equal protection guarantee, through "appropriate legislation." Citing Lassiter, New York's attorney general had contended Congress had no power to prevent state action, such as a literacy requirement for voting, that the courts had held to be consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment. Rejecting this argument, Justice Brennan held for the Court that Congress was not limited to enforcing judicial constructions of the Fourteenth Amendment, but instead possessed independent power to enact whatever laws were rationally related to enforcement of its provisions. Congress, he observed, could have reasonably concluded that increased voting power would improve the chances of Puerto Rican citizens to gain nondiscriminatory access to public services. In view of the many exceptions allowed under New York's English-literacy requirement, as well as some evidence indicating that prejudice played a prominent role in its enactment, Congress might also have questioned whether the test was actually designed to serve legitimate state interests. Finally, Congress might well have concluded that fluency in Spanish was as effective in helping to assure an informed electorate as an ability to read and write English, given the availability in New York of Spanish-language publications and broadcasts.

Justice John Marshall Harlan, joined by Justice Potter Stewart, dissented. Justice Harlan had joined the Court in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966), upholding other provisions of the Voting Rights Act. He also agreed that congressional judgments regarding constitutional meaning were entitled to great respect in the courts. He contended, however, that under Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), the substantive meaning of constitutional provisions lay ultimately with the judiciary, not Congress, which had authority only to "enforce," not determine, the Fourteenth Amendment's meaning. Section 4(e), unlike provisions of the Voting Rights Act upheld in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, had been added to the legislation during congressional floor debate. It thus rested on no extensive congressional findings of fact but only on assumptions regarding the discriminatory uses to which an English-only literacy requirement might be put. Section 4(e), unlike the statute's other provisions, thus exceeded the enforcement powers of Congress.

Tinsley E. Yarbrough

See also: Congress and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Bickel, Alexander M. "The Voting Rights Cases." In Supreme Court Review 1966, ed. Philip B. Kurland, 79–102. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

Carter, Stephen L. "The Morgan 'Power' and the Forced Reconsideration of Constitutional Decisions." University of Chicago Law Review 53 (1986): 819–63.

Choper, Jesse H. "Congressional Power to Expand Judicial Definitions of the Substantive Terms of the Civil War Amendments." Minnesota Law Review 67 (1982): 299–341.

Kennedy, Anthony M. (b. 1936)

Anthony M. Kennedy has been a pivotal yet overlooked justice since replacing Lewis F. Powell Jr. on the U.S. Supreme Court in 1988. Like Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Kennedy has assumed a powerful role at the middle of a sharply divided Court under Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Although Justice Kennedy has been a fairly consistent conservative in areas of criminal law and federalism, he has written important opinions in significant cases involving civil rights and civil liberties that have displeased originalists (advocates of interpreting the Constitution in accord with the framers' "original intent"). Notwithstanding his conservative leanings, he has voted to invalidate laws that he considers to strike at the heart of personal liberty.

Justice Kennedy has been a key vote in the areas of religion and abortion. In cases involving the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution, he has in general upheld government funding of religious groups, as in Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988), and Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995); and governmental recognition of religion, as in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989); but he voted to strike attempts at government-endorsed prayer in public schools as being coercive in Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992). He has engaged in what he considers a "careful, reasoned balance" regarding the constitutionality of abortion legislation. He upheld some state restrictions early in his career, as shown by his vote in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), and in his opinions in Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417 (1990), and Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 497 U.S. 502 (1990). Still, he cast the deciding vote in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), to reaffirm the "central holding" of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), yet he subsequently attempted to limit the reach of Casey in his dissent in Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000).

In cases involving equal protection, Justice Kennedy has also been a pivotal justice. He has joined a majority of the Court in requiring race-neutrality in cases involving affirmative action and majority-minority legislative districts; pertinent cases are City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469 (1989), Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 497 U.S. 547 (1990), and Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952 (1996). But he has broken with these justices by expanding those principles of neutrality to strike peremptory challenges based on race, as in Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991), Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991), and Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392 (1998). In addition, he extended those principles of neutral individualism to government policies that classify citizens by sex in J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994); by religion in Board of Education v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687 (1994); and by sexual orientation in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996). He also joined the per curiam opinion in Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000), that found the 2000 presidential election recount ordered by the Florida Supreme Court to be inconsistent with equal protection and due process.

Regarded as the justice most likely to vote to accept claims based on freedom of speech, Kennedy characteristically struck government policies that restricted political protest, as shown in his concurring opinion on flag burning in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), and his dissent in Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000), involving abortion protests. He also supported the expansion of the public-forum doctrine (granting greater speech rights on public property) in International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672 (1992), and United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720 (1990). Further, he has used a categorical approach against government restrictions on speech based on the content or viewpoint expressed or on the identity of the speaker. Under this approach, he upheld under free speech claims the rights of religious groups, as in Rosenberger; of sexually oriented speakers, as in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002), and his concurring opinion in Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564

(2002); of commercial groups, as in United States Department of Agriculture v. United Foods, Inc., 533 U.S. 405 (2001); and of political groups, as in Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission, 518 U.S. 604 (1996), and his dissent in Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U.S. 377 (2000).

Kennedy has assumed the balance on the current Court because he has rejected the originalist jurisprudence of text and specific tradition advocated by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas and by Robert Bork, who was President Ronald Reagan's first choice to replace Powell. Instead, Justice Kennedy is willing to use judicial power to enforce his individualistic conception of the full and necessary meaning of liberty.

Frank J. Colucci

See also: O'Connor, Sandra Day; Rehnquist, William Hubbs.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. "Justice Kennedy and the Ideal of Equality." Pacific Law Journal 28 (1997): 515–32.

Colucci, Frank. "The Jurisprudence of Anthony Kennedy." Ph.D. diss., University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, 2003.

Smith, Christopher E. "Supreme Court Surprise: Justice Anthony Kennedy's Move Toward Moderation." Oklahoma Law Review 45 (1992): 459–76.

Volokh, Eugene. "How the Justices Ruled in Free Speech Cases 1994–2000." UCLA Law Review 48 (2001): 1191–1292.

Kevorkian, Jack (b. 1928)

During the 1990s, some civil rights activists enlarged the issue of bodily autonomy from the right-to-die issues raised in In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), and Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990), to question whether the right to die also encompassed affirmative actions to shorten life by means other than natural death. Jack Kevorkian, the former Michigan pathologist and self-styled "Dr. Death," essentially created the concept and phrase "physician-assisted suicide" during the 1990s.

Euthanasia has been debated throughout the ages, but Dr. Kevorkian initiated the controversy regarding the new-age, new-wave idea of physician-assisted suicide. This, in turn, raised the question of whether there were civil rights ensuring the right of individuals (usually terminally or chronically ill ones) to determine the time and manner of their death. In Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a Washington state law banning assisted suicide. Michigan adopted such a law in 1998, after which Kevorkian assisted in the death of Tom Youk, who had Lou Gehrig's disease, an event that was broadcast on the television newsmagazine 60 Minutes. Kevorkian was convicted of illegal use of a controlled substance and of second-degree murder and began serving an indeterminate sentence of ten to twenty-five years. The Court of Appeals of Michigan in People v. Kevorkian, 248 Mich. App. 373, 639 N.W.2d 291 (Mich. App. 2001), affirmed Dr. Kevorkian's conviction for providing such assistance. The Michigan Supreme Court declined to review the case, thus signaling silent assent to the holding, and Kevorkian remained in prison.

Jack Kevorkian is believed to have been involved in "assisting" in the deaths of over 130 individuals. Depending upon one's viewpoint, he engaged in either a highly methodically performed service, at the request of those who died, or he was a highly organized serial killer. In either event, Kevorkian and his former attorney, Geoffrey Feiger (they parted in the Youk case), called press conferences, precipitated legislation regarding assisted death (both pro and con), affected ballot initiatives in other states with regard to whether there should be a right to assisted suicide by the terminally and/or chronically ill, and engaged in conduct that in any other realm would have been deemed unlawful.

The Court of Appeals of Michigan, in affirming the sole case in which Kevorkian was convicted (four previous trials had resulted in acquittals or mistrials), wryly observed that without the euthanasia issue at the heart of the case and Kevorkian's mission regarding assisted suicide and euthanasia, there would not have been much to discuss. The court further noted that there would have been little attention given to the death of Tom Youk in 1998 but for the euthanasia issue. Kevorkian sought to have the court reverse his conviction on constitutional grounds and to rule that euthanasia was legal. The court refused to do so.

Kevorkian made two distinct, though perhaps related, claims. First, he claimed that the Ninth Amendment (and the relevant Michigan counterpart) protected his and his patient's unenumerated rights insofar as individuals had a right to be free from unbearable pain, suffering, and distress. Kevorkian also claimed that the Fourteenth Amendment (and again, the relevant Michigan state constitutional counterpart) should prohibit the state from depriving him of his liberty without due process of law, as per the constitutional rights relating to privacy or as relating to the concept that people should not be forced to live with unbearable suffering. Kevorkian's arguments that he was assisting Tom Youk in asserting his (that is, Youk's own) constitutional rights to be free from intolerable pain and suffering did not impress the Michigan courts (nor did they impress the U.S. Supreme Court, which by refusing to grant a writ of certiorari October 7, 2002, allowed the state-court decision to stand).

The remaining issues were, to use the words of the Michigan Court of Appeals, "more mundane." That said, there were claims of constitutional violations common to many trials. Kevorkian contended that he was denied his constitutional right to effective representation by his trial attorney, David Gorosh (Kevorkian was acquitted in each case of physician-assisted suicide and homicide while represented by Geoffrey Feiger). However, Kevorkian acted as his own attorney for much of the Youk trial (repeatedly, vigorously, and knowingly waiving the right to an attorney), with Gorosh merely as a stand-by lawyer.

Kevorkian also claimed that his right to remain silent was violated by the prosecutor's reference to his decision not to testify, thereby violating his rights against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment. However, the Court of Appeals determined that the prosecutor's comments were in response to Kevorkian's repeated attempts during his summation to place facts in evidence (rather than testifying to them, and then having them available to comment upon in the summation or closing remarks to the jury). Because the court concluded the prosecutor's remarks were not direct references to Kevorkian's failure to testify, the court determined they were not statements amounting to prosecutorial misconduct abridging Kevorkian's Fifth Amendment rights.

Ironically, Jack Kevorkian spent much of the 1990s raising the legal, medical, cultural, and popular awareness of euthanasia and physician-assisted suicide as issues of civil rights and liberties, but his own case was a simple two-day trial of basic facts and strategies that did not raise constitutional issues much battled over in Kevorkian's name and as a result of his actions. Nonetheless, he did raise the level of the debate about the issue of assisted death, and he brought a new vocabulary into homes across America and around the world and along with it a struggle to define civil rights and liberties that crossed from one millennium into the next.

Demetra M. Pappas

See also: Physician-Assisted Suicide; Right to Die; Washington v. Glucksberg.

FURTHER READING

Brovins, Joan, and Thomas Oehmke. Dr. Death: Dr. Jack Kevorkian's Rx: Death: The Inside Story of America's Most Outspoken Advocate and Practitioner of Physician-Assisted Suicide. Hollywood, FL: Lifetime Books, 1993.

Pappas, Demetra. "Recent Historical Perspectives Regarding Medical Euthanasia and Physician-Assisted Suicide." British Medical Bulletin 52, 2 (1996): 386–92.

Kimel v. Board of Regents (2000)

In Kimel v. Board of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000), the U.S. Supreme Court made it extremely difficult for individuals who have been the subject of age discrimination at the hands of a state to seek redress by suing for monetary damages. The Court considered the constitutionality of the 1974 amendments to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA). The original ADEA that Congress passed in 1967 made it illegal for private employers to discriminate against an individual in hiring or firing decisions based on the person's age. Congress had the authority to pass that legislation pursuant to its Article I Commerce Clause powers, based upon the Supreme Court's reasoning in its decisions upholding the Civil Rights Act of 1964 banning private race discrimination, as, for example, in Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964). The 1974 amendments extended the ADEA's reach to preclude age discrimination when the employer was the state. The issue in Kimel was whether Congress had the authority under the Commerce Clause or the Fourteenth Amendment to subject states to suits for monetary damages by private parties. The Supreme Court held that Congress exceeded its constitutional power by bringing the states under federal jurisdiction; thus the Court held the 1974 ADEA amendments unconstitutional.

This case arose when several individuals claimed they were discriminated against by their state employers. The petitioners separately sued in federal court, each alleging age discrimination based on the ADEA. In each case, the state employer claimed that the Eleventh Amendment's protection of sovereign immunity precluded such suits. The Eleventh Amendment specifically provides that federal courts do not have jurisdiction over suits in which a citizen of one state sues another state. That is, a state cannot be sued in federal court by citizens of different states unless it waives its sovereign immunity. Yet these federal suits were brought by citizens suing their own states. Why should the Eleventh Amendment preclude this type of suit? As Justice Sandra Day O'Connor broadly stated for the majority: "Although today's cases concern suits brought by citizens against their own States, this Court has long understood the Eleventh Amendment to stand not so much for what it says, but for the presupposition . . . that the Constitution does not provide for federal jurisdiction over suits against nonconsenting States."

Because the Supreme Court refused to construe the Eleventh Amendment strictly, if a state does not consent to being sued by private parties for monetary damages by waiving its sovereign immunity, the Eleventh Amendment precludes such suits, even those brought by a state's own citizens. This was true even though Congress specifically intended to subject states to the jurisdiction of federal courts and thus abrogate (revoke) state immunity when it passed the ADEA amendments. Accordingly, Congress lacked the constitutional authority to subject states to suits for monetary damages by private parties.

The Kimel case is typical of Supreme Court decisions during this time period regarding issues of federalism, in which a five–four majority (including Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices O'Connor, Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy, and Clarence Thomas) generally have held that the federal government could not usurp the states' authority. The Court's current majority has contended that the Constitution requires a clear distinction between national and local control under the system of dual sovereignty in the United States, which is diametrically opposed to the more protective stance generally taken after the Supreme Court's New Deal transition. The consequence of the Supreme Court's current approach to federalism is that Congress is less able to protect individual rights and liberties, since the Court seems intent on limiting federal power over the states, as represented by the Kimel decision.

Mark S. Hurwitz

See also: Federalism.

FURTHER READING

Brennan, William J., Jr. "The Bill of Rights and the States." New York University Law Review 36 (1961): 761.

Corwin, Edward S. The Commerce Power Versus States' Rights. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1936.

Kramer, Larry D. "Putting the Politics Back into the Political Safeguards of Federalism." Columbia Law Review 100 (2000): 215.

Segal, Jeffery A., and Harold J. Spaeth. The Supreme Court and the Attitudinal Model Revisited. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. dedicated his life to seeking equality and civil rights for African Americans and the poor of all races.

Historically, the lack of civil rights for black Americans is well documented. Beginning with slavery, blacks were viewed as property. Even following emancipation in 1865, blacks were subject to many discriminatory practices and demeaning laws, including disenfranchisement, unfair employment practices, and forced segregation (Jim Crow laws). The doctrine of "separate but equal" affirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), legitimized racial segregation in the United States and created a substandard quality of life for black Americans. Signs throughout various establishments stating "for whites only" were legal until 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), ruled school segregation illegal. However, the quest for full civil rights for black Americans had only just begun, and Dr. King spearheaded the effort.

At a press conference on June 5, 1961, Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. asks that President John F. Kennedy declare all forms of racial segregation illegal. (Library of Congress)

BACKGROUND

Martin Luther King Jr., one of his parents' three children, was born to Martin Sr. and Alberta King in Atlanta, Georgia, on January 15, 1929. His father was the pastor of a church in Atlanta, and his mother worked as a schoolteacher. King received a bachelor's degree from Morehouse College (Atlanta) in 1948, graduated from Crozer Theological Seminary (Pennsylvania) in 1951, and later earned a Ph.D. in theology from Boston University in 1955. After marrying Coretta Scott in 1953, he became the pastor of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. He and his wife had four children: Yolanda, Martin III, Dexter, and Bernice.

King learned about racial discrimination early in life. With his religious training in Christian doctrine and his attraction to Henry David Thoreau's theory of civil disobedience and the teachings of India's Mahatma Mohandas K. Gandhi, King forged a powerful strategy to fight against discrimination—nonviolent direct action. King used such action in the form of planned civil disobedience to confront conventional practices of racial discrimination. For his efforts he won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

Until 1956, black bus passengers in Montgomery, Alabama, were required to pay their fare to the driver, get off the bus, and then reenter through the back doors to sit in the "colored" section. In addition, the law required them to give their seats to white passengers. But Rosa Parks's refusal to give her seat to a white passenger led to the Montgomery bus boycott in 1955 under Dr. King's leadership. Subsequently, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down all bus segregation laws in 1956.

Following the success of the Montgomery bus boycott, Dr. King founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) in 1957. It was Dr. King's vision that the struggle for civil rights could be effectively waged by peaceful demonstrations. The SCLC brought this strategy of nonviolent civil disobedience to the civil rights movement.

One of the most famous speeches made by Dr. King, "I Have a Dream," was delivered during the civil rights march on Washington, D.C., on August 28, 1963, at the Lincoln Memorial. Although federal civil rights legislation guaranteeing equal access to housing and education was enacted in 1957, those who resisted black equality created many obstacles and loopholes. The federal government needed to enhance federal protections. The 1964 Civil Rights Act, which passed one year after the march on Washington, banned racially segregated public accommodations and also addressed employment discrimination due to race or gender by establishing the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC).

Dr. King was greatly disturbed by the level of poverty experienced not only by blacks in northern ghettos but by all poor people in America. To call attention to their plight, he organized the Poor People's Campaign, which was planned at the nation's capital in 1968. Prior to this march, Dr. King journeyed to Memphis, Tennessee, to support striking sanitation workers. While there he gave another powerful though prophetic speech on April 3, 1968, in which he said, "I've been to the mountaintop and seen the Promised Land." James Earl Ray assassinated Dr. King the very next day while King was standing on the balcony of the Lorraine Motel. Dr. Ralph Abernathy later led the Poor People's Campaign.

KING'S LEGACY

Dr. King was pivotal to the civil rights movement. His work contributed to the dismantling of unfair laws and practices enabling black equality to become a greater reality. He authored numerous papers and monographs, including Stride Toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story (1958); Strength to Love (1963); Why We Can't Wait (1964); and Where Do We Go from Here: Chaos or Community? (1967). In honor of the great civil rights leader, President Ronald Reagan signed into law the federal holiday of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Day, first celebrated January 20, 1986.

Carolyn Turpin-Petrosino

See also: Boycott; Civil Disobedience.

FURTHER READING

Blaustein, Albert P., and Robert L. Zangrando, eds. Civil Rights and the American Negro: A Documentary History. New York: Washington Square, 1968.

Carson, Clayborne, ed. The Papers of Martin Luther King Jr.: Called to Serve. Vol. 1. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1997.

Dennis, Denise. Black History for Beginners. New York: Writers and Readers Publishing, 1984.

Patterson, Lillie. Martin Luther King Jr. and the Freedom Movement. New York: Facts on File, 1989.

Washington, James M. A Testament of Hope: The Essential Writings of Martin Luther King Jr. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1986.

Klopfer v. North Carolina (1967)

In Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967), the U.S. Supreme Court considered whether the indefinite suspension of state prosecutorial proceedings, without justification, against a defendant resulted in a violation of the defendant's right to a speedy trial under the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Court ruled in Klopfer that it did.

The petitioner was charged with misdemeanor criminal trespass for refusing to leave private property after being so ordered. At a trial by jury in March 1964, the trial court called a mistrial after the jury could not reach a verdict in the case. The prosecutor set the case for retrial at the April 1965 session of court. Several weeks before then, the prosecutor informed the defendant that he was going to file a motion for nolle prosequi (abandonment of prosecution) with leave (the right to refile at any time). At the April session, the defendant opposed entry of such an order, contending that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 abated the trespass charge. Despite the defendant's argument, the court indicated it would approve the prosecutor's request for a nolle prosequi with leave. The prosecutor made no such motion, however, instead moving to continue the case for another term, which was granted. The August 1965 calendar did not list the defendant's case. The defendant then filed a motion asking that the court either dismiss the charges against him or have the case tried immediately, contending that having the criminal charge indefinitely pending was hindering his professional activities as a Duke University professor. On August 9, 1965, the prosecutor, stating no justification for such an action, moved the court to allow the state to take a nolle prosequi with leave. This motion was granted, though the trial court made no supporting findings of fact or conclusions of law.

On appeal the Supreme Court of North Carolina held that the defendant did indeed have a right to a speedy trial, but that he could not compel the state to prosecute him if the prosecutor, "in his discretion and with the court's approval," took a nolle prosequi. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, pointed out that every state that had addressed the contention that the right to a speedy trial did not afford affirmative protection against unjustified postponement had rejected it. The Court also noted that the only other states that permitted dropping a case with leave to reinstate at an indefinite later date did so in cases in which the defendant could not be located for trial. The Court found that the right to a speedy trial in the Sixth Amendment was a fundamental right, with its roots dating back to the Magna Carta, and should therefore be applied to the states via the Fourteenth Amendment. In overturning the North Carolina court, the Supreme Court held that the indefinite postponement of proceedings, without justification, was a clear violation of the defendant's fundamental right to a speedy trial.

John L. Roberts

See also: Sixth Amendment; Speedy Trial, Right to.

FURTHER READING

Freedman, Warren. The Constitutional Right to a Speedy and Fair Criminal Trial. New York: Quorum Books, 1989.

Korematsu v. United States (1944)

In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the federal government's decision to exclude 110,000 U.S. citizens and aliens of Japanese descent from the West Coast of the United States during World War II. On December 7, 1941, Japanese forces executed a surprise attack on U.S. forces in Hawaii, disabling or destroying much of the Pacific fleet and leading to fears of a West Coast invasion. On February 19, 1942, acting under the advice of Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued Executive Order 9066 authorizing military commanders to exclude from the areas of their command any and all persons they deemed necessary to prevent sabotage or espionage. On March 21, Congress passed a statute making violations of such military orders a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail.

Acting under this authority, Lieutenant General John L. Dewitt, the military commander of the Western Defense Command, which encompassed the West Coast and inland mountain states, issued a series of orders in spring 1942 first prohibiting all citizens and aliens of Japanese descent living on the West Coast from departing the area and then, in May 1942, ordering their exclusion. Initially there had been no plan to detain loyal Japanese; however, acting under pressure from governors of the inland mountain states who did not want ethnic Japanese resettling in their states, the government decided to detain the 110,000 West Coast Japanese in "relocation centers"—internment camps surrounded by barbed wired and guarded by armed military police. Although some 30,000 persons of Japanese descent were eventually released for military service, for work in the interior, and to attend college, the majority remained interned until December 1944.

On June 12, 1942, Fred Korematsu, a native-born U.S. citizen of Japanese descent, was charged with violation of federal law for refusing to leave his home in San Leandro, California, pursuant to military order. Following his conviction and an unsuccessful appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, Korematsu brought his case to the Supreme Court, arguing, among other things, that the exclusion order violated his rights of due process and equal protection under the Constitution. Writing for a six-member majority, Justice Hugo L. Black began his opinion by noting that "all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect" and must be subjected to "the most rigid scrutiny." These two concepts, "strict scrutiny" and membership in a "suspect class," articulated for the first time in Korematsu, would prove instrumental in the development of the Court's future civil liberties and civil rights jurisprudence.

Nonetheless, in Korematsu Justice Black asserted that the deference accorded to the president and Congress in a time of war did not permit the Court to second-guess the decision to exclude Korematsu and others like him. Black based his opinion in part on the Court's earlier decision in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943), which had upheld a curfew imposed on persons of Japanese descent. In his short concurrence in Korematsu, Justice Felix Frankfurter noted that the Constitution lodged in Congress and the president the power to make war. If their decisions made during wartime were flawed, according to Frankfurter, "[t]hat is their business, not ours."

Justices Owen J. Roberts, Robert H. Jackson, and Frank Murphy filed separate dissents. Justice Roberts criticized the majority for focusing solely on the exclusion order rather than recognizing the reality of the situation facing Korematsu: He could not leave San Leandro, nor could he remain there; his only legal alternative was to submit himself to an assembly center for internment without any finding of disloyalty—a clear constitutional violation, according to Roberts. Justice Murphy, though recognizing the deference due to the military in time of war, asserted that the justifications for the mass exclusions were based on little more than racial animus, and thus he dissented from the majority's "legalization of racism." Justice Jackson refused to question the expedience of General Dewitt's exclusion orders or the decision to detain. But he objected to the Court's placing its seal of constitutional approval on them after the fact. Military commanders might not be expected to comply with constitutional niceties during wartime, according to Justice Jackson, but the Court's approval wrote such discrimination into the "doctrine of the Constitution" where it "lies about like a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need."

The same day the Court upheld the constitutionality of the exclusion orders, it decided in Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283 (1944), that neither the president's executive orders nor the act of March 21, 1942, authorized the government to hold admittedly loyal Japanese Americans in internment camps solely to protect them from community violence. The camps were emptied shortly thereafter.

Historians have identified several explanations for the unprecedented racially based mass exclusion and detention of U.S. citizens and legal aliens. These include the panic following the attack on Pearl Harbor, a long history of racial hatred directed toward the Japanese that was reinforced by legal restrictions against them at the state and federal level, and pressure from local, state, and federal officials. Evidence that the overwhelming majority of ethnic Japanese were loyal, that none had participated in espionage, and that there was no chance of a Japanese invasion of the West Coast was discounted or ignored by officials at all levels up to and including President Roosevelt.

The forced internments cost the victims hundreds of millions of dollars in lost property and were an enormous insult to the dignity of loyal Americans. Recognizing this, in 1988 Congress passed and President Ronald Reagan signed into law an act officially apologizing to the internees on behalf of the American people and authorizing payments of $20,000 to each internee. In Korematsu v. United States, 584 F. Supp. 1406 (N.D. Cal. 1984), a U.S. District Court reversed Fred Korematsu's 1942 conviction on grounds of prosecutorial misconduct. In 1998 he was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom by President William Clinton. To date, the Korematsu precedent upholding the constitutionality of the racial exclusion orders has never been explicitly overruled.

Hal Goldman

See also: Black, Hugo L.; President and Civil Liberties; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Civil Liberties Act of 1988. U.S. Code. Vol. 50 app., sec. 1989–1989b-9 (1988).

Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Personal Justice Denied: Report of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1997.

Robinson, Greg. By Order of the President: FDR and the Internment of Japanese Americans. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Kunstler, William (1919–1995)

William Kunstler was known as "America's radical lawyer" and the "most hated lawyer in America," but these titles could not have pleased him more. He dedicated his entire legal career to fighting for the civil rights and civil liberties of the American people, no matter if these rights and liberties were unpopular at the time. As he stated, "You do not need me to remind you that the struggle to attain and maintain liberty and to resist oppression and tyranny is the perennial obligation of all who understand its necessity."

William Moses Kunstler was born July 7, 1919, in New York City. He was active in both academics and athletics; in fact, he spent summers in upstate New York as a camp counselor. While an undergraduate at Yale, he took an avid interest in journalism and literature, graduating Phi Beta Kappa. After college, he served in the Pacific Theater during World War II, rising to the rank of major and receiving the Bronze Star. Upon his return home, Kunstler attended Columbia Law School and became a lawyer in New York City. But it was a telephone call asking him to help defend "freedom riders" (individuals riding through the South to challenge racial segregation laws) during the 1960s civil rights protests that would help shape his legal career.

Kunstler had always been an advocate for civil rights and civil liberties; in fact, he assisted a city program in summer 1954 by hosting a visitor from the inner city. The negative reaction of his Westchester County neighbors was an awakening. But when he had a chance to see the rampant racism in the South firsthand, his future legal career became clear. His advocacy for civil rights and civil liberties never waned.

Fame, however, would not come to Kunstler until the late 1960s. The war in Vietnam had never been popular, but the political climate by 1967 was becoming particularly antiwar, especially among the young. Many young men were being sent to fight in a war they did not believe in, and a movement grew in the counterculture to take actions to frustrate the U.S. war effort. Two such activists were Catholic priests, the Berrigan brothers, Daniel and Philip, who in 1968 with a group of others entered the Customs House in Baltimore, Maryland, and stole and burned over 400 draft records. The Berrigans were quickly arrested. Their choice of Kunstler as their lawyer, however, was a masterstroke, because their trial became the first "antiestablishment" trial, and it set the tone for later such trials. Kunstler put the Vietnam War itself on trial. The priests gave impassioned speeches as to why the war was wrong and what they did, though legally improper, was the morally correct thing to do. The judge was sympathetic, but he stated that the propriety of the war was not on trial. The jury convicted the Berrigans, and Kunstler appealed. He argued for the concept of jury nullification (asking a jury to reject a legally correct verdict and substitute a moral holding), but his argument fell on deaf ears.

The Berrigans, however, were just the start of this type of advocacy for Kunstler. The 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago turned into a melee as counterculture leaders battled Chicago police over control of a park near the political convention. The violent clashes led to the trial of the "Chicago Seven," seven well-known activists charged with crossing state lines to incite a riot. The judge in that trial, however, was not sympathetic to the antiwar cause, and he even had one of the defendants, Bobby Seale, bound and gagged in the courtroom. Amid the constant media attention, Kunstler realized that this was his greatest opportunity to try his case before the American public. His witness list read like a veritable "who's-who" of the counterculture. Psychedelic guru Timothy Leary testified, as did folk singer Arlo Guthrie. The beat poet Allen Ginsburg even recited his poetry on the stand to the astonishment of the judge and others. The testimony from the defendants was likewise sensational, especially that of Abbie Hoffman. Although convictions were garnered for five of the seven, Kunstler had put the Vietnam War on trial and showed the country the feelings of many in its younger generation. Interestingly, the judge also found Kunstler in contempt and sentenced him to prison, which was overturned on appeal.

After the Chicago Seven trial, Kunstler represented many other counterculture figures who were prosecuted, in part, for what the establishment deemed aberrant political beliefs. The Black Panthers and others looked to him for help. For example, when an uprising erupted at Attica prison in New York, the inmates requested only one lawyer to argue for their cause—

William Kunstler. The standoff ended with bloodshed, although Kunstler worked tirelessly to try to gain a peaceful solution. The deaths at Attica and the actions that led to the uprising brought heightened public awareness of the state of America's prisons and inmates' living conditions. Kunstler was at the forefront of prison reforms that expanded the civil rights and civil liberties of countless numbers of inmates.

By this time, Kunstler had become a much sought-after speaker as well. He spoke primarily at college campuses about the need to become active in defending the rights and liberties that all Americans should enjoy. He also highlighted what he saw as governmental abuses, especially of African Americans. His 1962 book The Case for Courage, which had profiled leading legal figures who fought for justice, remained popular, as did many of his other works. His speaking and writing brought him into contact with many famous activists (especially from Hollywood) who assisted him in his efforts, including the fight for Native American rights.

During the early 1970s, Kunstler became involved with defending members of the American Indian Movement (AIM). He was a key figure in the trials that arose after the second siege at Wounded Knee in South Dakota, a violent confrontation in which two federal agents died. Three Native Americans were put on trial for the deaths, and Kunstler gained acquittals for the two men he represented. The third man, Leonard Peltier, was convicted; Kunstler worked on his appeals but to no avail. For his actions, he received many awards from Native American groups as well as from the National Lawyers Guild, which celebrated his lifelong commitment to civil rights and civil liberties.

Kunstler remained active in defending those who had unpopular political beliefs during the 1980s and 1990s and sustained a busy criminal defense practice as well. As a defense attorney, he was one of the first to gain an acquittal with the "black rage" defense (seeking to mitigate criminal activity by African Americans by explaining it as a response to racism). As a constitutional lawyer, he took Gregory Johnson's case to the U.S. Supreme Court and persuaded it to recognize the constitutionality of burning the flag as a method of political protest protected by the First Amendment. Finally, he continued to speak to audiences across the nation, bringing his message of protecting and expanding people's civil rights and civil liberties to a new audience of young adults. By the time he died September 4, 1995, his reputation as a fierce trial and appellate advocate and his commitment to social justice were well-known features of his legacy.

David T. Harold

See also: Prisoners' Rights; Texas v. Johnson; Vietnam War.

FURTHER READING

Kunstler, William M. My Life as a Radical Lawyer. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1994.

Langum, David J. William M. Kunstler: The Most Hated Lawyer in America. New York: New York University Press, 1999.

Kyllo v. United States (2001)

In Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the use from the street of a heat-seeking device to search the interior of a private residence for illegal drugs without first obtaining a search warrant was a violation of the prohibition on illegal searches and seizures as set forth in the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Government agents suspected Danny Kyllo of growing marijuana in his apartment. To substantiate this suspicion, the federal agents obtained a thermal-scanning device that would detect large amounts of heat emanating from the triplex where Kyllo lived. Large concentrations of heat emanating from his apartment could be indicative of the use of high-intensity lamps, often employed for the growing of marijuana. When the agents scanned his apartment from the street, his apartment and garage registered hotter than other units in the building. The agents used this information to obtain a warrant to search Kyllo's home, where they found marijuana growing.

At a suppression hearing, Kyllo sought to have this evidence thrown out, but eventually the district court and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the admission of the evidence. The Ninth Circuit claimed that because the thermal imaging showed only heat emanating from the external walls and did not reveal any details regarding the activities taking place within the house, no warrant was needed to do this search.

In a surprising reversal, the Supreme Court held five–four that the agents needed a warrant before conducting the thermal imaging. Justice Antonin Scalia issued the Court's opinion, joined by Justices David H. Souter, Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Clarence Thomas. Oddly, Justice John Paul Stevens, often considered the most liberal justice on the Court during the tenure of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, dissented along with him and Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy. In arguing that the use of the thermal-imaging device was a search necessitating a warrant, Justice Scalia contended that the core of the Fourth Amendment resided in the protection for "the right of a man to retreat into his own home and there be free from unreasonable governmental intrusion." In determining what constituted an unreasonable search, Scalia also stated that new technologies created the potential for new intrusions into one's private life, but that the Fourth Amendment had to be cognizant of these changes.

Drawing upon Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), in which the Court developed a two-part test to determine whether an individual had a privacy interest in a certain location or activity, Scalia found that individuals retained an expectation of privacy in their home, even if a search or inspection did not physically invade one's residence. Disagreeing with the dissenters who argued that new technologies could be used to conduct warrantless searches if they did not create the same physical presence as in an actual search, the majority in Kyllo held that the Fourth Amendment drew "a firm line at the entrance to the house." When the police used a device not generally available to the general public to search the interior of a home, the use of that device necessitated that the government first obtain a warrant.

Kyllo is an important search and seizure case. It stands for the proposition that police and the government cannot generally search the interior of a person's residence without a warrant. More significant, the case is an important defense of the Fourth Amendment, stating that as new information technologies are developed, the Court will continue to protect the privacy of homes against these new intrusions.

David Schultz

See also: Electronic Eavesdropping; Katz v. United States; Search; Search Warrants; Wiretapping.

FURTHER READING

Lasson, Nelson B. The History and Development of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution. New York: Da Capo, 1970.

L

Labor Union Rights

The term "union rights" refers to the ability of workers to organize and engage in bargaining with employers. Often, these negotiations involve controversies over working conditions, benefits, and compensation. Workers in the United States acquired these rights only after a long struggle with businesses that were reluctant to negotiate with employees on such matters.

As an agrarian nation until the latter half of the nineteenth century, the United States lagged behind other nations in the development of effective labor unions. A primary explanation for this state of affairs is that the United States, with its emphasis on an agricultural economy combined with a relative absence of aristocracy, never developed an awareness of the differences between workers and the affluent. Whereas labor unions developed more rapidly in Europe and even formed their own political parties, American unions faced hostility from politicians and business leaders. Military force was frequently employed against strikers by both Republican and Democratic administrations. President Grover Cleveland, a nineteenth-century Democrat, called out federal troops to crush a strike by railway employees in 1894 that affected trains from Chicago to the West Coast.

In 1926, Congress passed the Railway Labor Act. Because it established work rules, the law had the intended effect of reducing the impact of damaging railroad strikes in the United States. Some of the work rules were restrictive, but the law was unique in that it predated the prolabor legislation of the New Deal years of the 1930s. The legislation gave railway employees the right to strike, a result of the strength of the rail union movement, which in the early 1920s supported nationalization of the rail industry. For most American workers, however, the right to union representation did not appear until Congress passed the Wagner Act of 1936 under President Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal.

Until the passage of the Wagner Act, American workers did not have a right to organize and engage in collective bargaining with their employers. Regarded as the most prolabor legislation enacted by a U.S. Congress, the Wagner Act not only recognized the right of workers to collective bargaining, but also established an oversight board, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), to manage relations between labor and management in the United States. The Wagner Act was an important element of President Roosevelt's New Deal programs of the 1930s.

Although passage of the Wagner Act was a clear victory for the trade union movement, it by no means ended the conflicts between business and unions. Nevertheless, America's entry into World War II helped ensure greater labor-management cooperation in turning out equipment and materials for the war effort. Despite this, the underlying tensions remained in place, and after the war, the stage was set for a new round of conflicts between the two sides. This continuing tension would lead to the enactment of new labor legislation limiting the ability of trade unions to use the right to strike against employers.

During 1945 and 1946, a series of labor disruptions caused harm to the U.S. economy, then in the process of adjusting to peacetime conditions. In November 1946 the United Mine Workers union announced a nationwide strike that threatened the ability of the nation to meet its energy needs during the winter months. The administration of President Harry Truman dealt successfully with the mine workers, but the labor movement's tactics created a backlash in U.S. politics. After the November 1946 congressional elections, President Truman, a Democrat, faced a Republican-controlled House of Representatives and Senate. Congress was determined to deal with the issue of labor rights in a manner that would weaken the U.S. trade union movement.

In April 1947 the House of Representatives passed legislation sponsored by Fred Hartley Jr. (R-NJ) that threatened key rights of labor. Among its provisions were bans on strikes against an entire industry, strikes for fringe benefits, and picketing. Meanwhile, the Senate adopted a more moderate bill named after the influential Ohio senator and Republican presidential aspirant Robert A. Taft. The Taft legislation formed the basis for a compromise reached in summer 1947. The resulting Taft-Hartley Act banned union contributions to campaigns, required annual financial disclosure statements from unions, and provided for the president to call for an eighty-day "cooling off" period via a court injunction; during this time, labor and management would work to avert a strike. Indicative of the beginning years of the Cold War, Taft-Hartley mandated that labor union leaders had to indicate annually their anticommunism; otherwise union rights would be taken away. Although President Truman vetoed the legislation, the Republican-controlled Congress decided to override his veto. The Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 and the Wagner Act of 1936 remain important markers of labor union rights in the United States.

A meeting of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, circa 1940–1950. (Library of Congress)

The labor battles of the immediate post–World War II period continued throughout much of Truman's presidency. At one point during the Korean War, a threatened strike by the steelworkers prompted the president to seize the industry. Other industries had given their employees pay increases, but U.S. steel producers had not. Although industry profits were up substantially, the major steel companies were unwilling to reach an agreement with their unions. When the Truman administration seized the industry, the secretary of commerce became the manager of the nation's steel mills. Naturally, the steel companies filed suit against the president, alleging an abuse of power.

A U.S. District Court judge and later the U.S. Supreme Court agreed in Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952), that the president had overstepped his powers in taking the action. The steelworkers went on strike in summer 1952 for several weeks, a stoppage that did have a deleterious effect on steel production for the war effort. Ironically, the eventual settlement was the same as had been offered to the steel companies before the presidential seizure of control and the steelworkers' strike. That the plan was not accepted originally is indicative of the unwillingness of U.S. business to acknowledge the legitimacy of the trade union movement in the United States.

The rise of labor corresponds to the dominance of the Democratic Party in U.S. politics following the New Deal. The Democratic Party has been more supportive of labor union issues than has the Republican Party. The National Labor Relations Board still exists, and during times of Democratic control of the White House, its decisions tend to be more favorable to labor. However, U.S. unions have been losing members for several decades, and with the decline of labor has come a weakening of the political base of the Democratic Party.

Michael E. Meagher

See also: Strikes and Arbitration.

FURTHER READING

Hamlett, Patrick W. Understanding Technological Politics: A Decision-Making Approach. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1992.

Lipset, Seymour Martin. The First New Nation: The United States in Historical and Comparative Perspective. New York and London: W. W. Norton, 1979.

McCoy, Donald R. The Presidency of Harry S Truman. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1984.

McCulloch, David. Truman. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992.

Lady Chatterley's Lover

Although D. H. Lawrence completed the third manuscript of Lady Chatterley's Lover in the hills of Tuscany, Italy, in 1928, readers had to wait until 1960 for distribution of the uncensored version. The third manuscript version, known as the "Orioli edition," quickly became one of the most controversial works of English fiction ever published and was banned as pornography in the United States and England. The book shocked the world with its vivid and open portrayal of the sensual extramarital affair of Connie, a lonely woman married to a crippled husband, with her husband's gamekeeper. In the United States it joined other noted works of literature involved in obscenity cases, including Tropic of Cancer by Henry Miller and Fanny Hill by John Cleland. Over a fifteen-year period beginning in 1957, as the U.S. Supreme Court heard these First Amendment cases, it struck down many obscenity statutes and formed more relaxed standards on obscenity as judged under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The ban on the distribution of the text version of Lady Chatterley and the refusal to grant a license for distribution of the film adaptation brought to the fore the controversy over cultural censorship in the United States. "Obscene" material has historically been excluded from First Amendment protection. U.S. Supreme Court consideration of obscenity began in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), in which Justice William J. Brennan Jr. settled that the First Amendment did not protect every utterance, and that obscenity was outside the protection intended for speech and press.

The trials of Lady Chatterley began in 1959 when Grove Press, often at the forefront of publishing contentious or avant-garde literature in America, published the third manuscript in its uncensored form, which was, at the time, banned in the United States. The edition had never before been legally published, although it had been frequently pirated, and Knopf had published an abridged edition in 1930. Before World War I, vigilante attacks against obscene literature led to the expansion of the U.S. Post Office ban on the shipment of obscene literature and art under the Comstock Act of 1873, but after World War I, public controversy over censorship escalated even more. Until the Tariff Act was amended in 1930, many literary classics were denied entry into the United States on grounds of obscenity. U.S. postal authorities stopped shipment of copies of Lady Chat- terley sold via the Readers Subscription Book Club under the nineteenth-century Comstock Act as amended in 1958.

Lawyer Charles Rembar, the attorney revered for successfully altering a century of court-approved censorship, defended the publisher of Lady Chatterley's Lover. He argued that the artistic merit of the book outweighed any possible obscenity and should be protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. By the time of the suit, the book was already a classic. After arguing their case within the Post Office's own judiciary system—and losing—Rembar and Grove filed a suit against Robert Christenberry, the New York City postmaster. The New York courts found in favor of Grove Press, and an appeal brought by the federal government affirmed the decision.

The appellate court relied on the recent Supreme Court review of the banning of the movie Lady Chatterley on the ground that it dealt too sympathetically with adultery. In Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959), the Court considered the impact of New York's motion picture licensing law upon First Amendment liberties, which are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment from infringement by the states. The New York law required a license from the education department and provided that a license would not be issued for obscene material. The U.S. Supreme Court decided that the New York Education Law under which the movie was denied a license was invalid.

Citing the Supreme Court's ruling in a footnote, the appeals court considered the artistic worth of the novel in Grove Press, Inc. v. Christenberry, 276 F.2d 433 (1960). The court decided that "examined with care and 'considered as a whole,' the predominant appeal of Lady Chatterley's Lover . . . is demonstrably not to 'prurient interest,' as thus defined." In discussing the thesis of the book, the court stated that the book was "a polemic against three things which Lawrence hated: the crass industrialization of the English Midlands, the British caste system, and the inhibited sex relations between man and woman." The court added that "once our agelong inhibitions against sex revelations in print have passed," the book would prove a powerful, tender, and compelling depiction of the heroine's achievement of fulfillment and naturalness in her life. In England, Penguin Books followed Grove's lead and, in 1960, successfully defended Lady Chatterley's Lover in one of Britain's most celebrated court cases.

Galya Benarieh Ruffer

See also: Miller v. California; Obscenity; Roth Test.

FURTHER READING

Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of Lady Chatterley, Tropic of Cancer, and Fanny Hill. New York: Random House, 1968.

Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District (1993)

In Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993), the U.S. Supreme Court was presented with a case involving a New York state law that banned the use of public school facilities for any religious purpose, even during after-school hours. The case raised issues not only of free speech but also of government establishment of religion, both of which were applicable under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The decision ultimately turned on free speech rights.

Lamb's Chapel, a nondenominational evangelical church, sued the school district in 1990 after the district refused to grant two requests to allow the church to use school facilities to show a six-part film series produced by Christian psychologist Dr. James Dobson of Focus on the Family, a conservative, Christian, grassroots organization that sponsored radio broadcasts dealing with Christianity and family issues. The film series presented topics on family life and child rearing from a Christian perspective. The district refused to allow the church access to show the films even though other community groups were permitted to use school facilities after school hours. After a federal district court ruled in favor of the school district, the appellate court affirmed that ruling, stating that the New York law drew a constitutional boundary between religious and nonreligious uses of public property.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the lower courts in a unanimous decision. Writing for the Court, Justice Byron R. White said that the district's refusal to grant the church access to school facilities violated its free speech rights under the First Amendment. Other nonreligious groups were allowed to present programs on family life and child rearing on school property after school hours. Justice White wrote that the district could not deny Lamb's Chapel a public forum solely because the church addressed the topics from a religious viewpoint. As long as New York school districts allowed groups to discuss topics from a nonreligious point of view, groups also had to be permitted to present the same topics from a religious perspective.

The Court avoided directly addressing the question of whether school districts must allow religious worship on school property. Justice White's opinion reviewed the Court's precedents on the separation of church and state. Joined by five justices, White determined that Lamb's Chapel's use of school facilities to show the films did not violate the three-prong test developed in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), the Court's pronouncement on when government action was prohibited under the Establishment Clause because it constituted "establishment of religion." Justice Antonin Scalia did not sign the majority opinion in Lamb's Chapel because of the application of the Lemon test. Joined by Justice Clarence Thomas, Scalia wrote a concurring opinion in which he criticized the Lemon test: "Like some ghoul in a late-night horror movie that repeatedly sits up in its grave . . . after being repeatedly killed or buried, Lemon stalks our Establishment Clause jurisprudence once again, frightening little children and school attorneys." Justice Anthony M. Kennedy also wrote a brief concurring opinion.

John David Rausch Jr.

See also: Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman; Scalia, Antonin G.; Separation of Church and State.

FURTHER READING

Greenhouse, Linda. "Justices Allow Religious Groups After-Hours Use of Public Schools." New York Times, June 8, 1993.

Lawton, Kim A. "Trio of Rulings Clarifies Religious-Liberty Rights." Christianity Today, July 19, 1993, p. 56.

Land Use

The term "land use" implies the notion that land is an inherently productive commodity, as it can grow crops, serve as the site for a home or business, and provide valuable natural resources such as oil, lumber, or coal, among numerous other uses. Governmental control of land use has evolved since America's founding, although the basic rule that has persisted is that land's productive capacities should be freely expended so long as the costs of the particular use to society are minimal and the use does not run against the will of the majority. There are many examples of governmental control over land use at the federal level, including the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Coastal Zone Management Act, and the Endangered Species Act, and at the local level in the form of building codes and zoning ordinances.

PRIVATE PROPERTY AND COMMON LAW

The roots of land use in the United States lie in the notion of property. Arguably, all land-use conflicts that arise in U.S. law can be framed within the larger question of where the limits of property rights should be drawn. America inherited from Britain a strong sense of property rights, as embodied by the English philosopher John Locke (1632–1704), who argued that clearly defined property rights not only were socially efficient but were part of natural law. This was the founding notion of capitalist society—namely, that individuals were entitled to the just rewards of their work, which were best realized through the ownership of land. A primary role of law was to ensure these rights were safeguarded, which, in the American context, paved the way for the ensuing commercialization of land.

America also inherited from the English the common law concepts that protect property. Common law is a centuries-old judge-made law that is constantly evolving with each new case. It is primarily focused on protecting property rights between individuals through the adjudication of disputes. The common law notion of "nuisance" is such a form of protection of property. A nuisance arises when one person's actions adversely affect the enjoyment of someone else's property. Judges must balance the societal good from the activity against its harm based on precedent and the case at hand. It was generally believed initially that property owners could use their land in any way so long as it did not constitute a nuisance. If a land use went too far in causing a nuisance to someone else, the harmed party would have his day in court. Adversely, if it did not go too far, it was assumed valid and permissible. This black-and-white picture has since become gray as the various levels of government have introduced additional restrictions on top of common law, the better to balance outright use with societal efficiency and well-being.

THE POLICE POWER AND LAND-USE REGULATION

The police power grants to local and state governments the ability to pass regulations protecting public health, safety, welfare, and morals. It was with these protections in mind that cities and towns began to enact zoning regulations, by which different land uses were separated into distinct zones (such as, in general, residential, and industrial). Whereas nuisance law settled land-use disputes after harms had occurred, zoning instead aimed to prevent such situations from happening in the first place by separating incompatible land uses.

The landmark case of Euclid v. Amber Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926), concerned the widespread practice of zoning, whereby different land uses were separated into distinct zones. The Euclid case upheld zoning as a valid exercise of the police power negating compensation. Justice George Sutherland penned, "[A] nuisance may be merely the right thing in the wrong place, like a pig in the parlor instead of the barnyard." Euclid in turn provided the legal foundation for preemptive zoning. Municipalities and states could constitutionally take proactive steps to ensure that certain incompatible land uses were separated under the police power. This decision established zoning as "the broadest of land use control techniques, applying to virtually any private use of land and many public uses within zoned jurisdictions."

The Takings Doctrine

The property owner has many rights in the American system, but the government maintains some key rights of its own, including taxation and the taking of land for public use. The founding fathers added a key property protection to the Constitution, not one concerning disputes between citizens but rather one limiting the government's power. Under the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." This Takings Clause was later incorporated in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and applied to the states. Government can take private land for public use through eminent domain, an inherent power. The Takings Clause requires that the government must provide just [fair] compensation, typically defined as fair market value, to the owner of the property.

The Supreme Court in Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26 (1954), considered an urban renewal measure undertaken by Washington, D.C., whereby the city condemned land and resold it to private developers in order to revitalize degraded areas of the inner city. The Court upheld the statute, effectively broadening the notion of "public use" to mean public purpose, since the government would in no way be making "use" of the land. In Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229 (1984), the Court further ruled that the state of Hawaii could use eminent domain to condemn privately owned land on behalf of land tenants so that these tenants could purchase the land. Furthering Berman, the Court ruled that this was a valid governmental purpose, even though the land would immediately be turned over to private parties, further ensuring that actual public use was not a limit on the takings power.

The use of the police power to regulate land use gave rise to the concept of "regulatory taking," meaning that a regulation was so burdensome to land use that it effectively constituted a taking of private property. In Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393 (1922), Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. set out the notion of a regulatory taking: "[W]hile property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far, it will be recognized as a taking." At the same time, he argued that nearly everything the government did in some way affected the financial value of property; should compensation be required for practically all governmental actions, "[g]overnment could hardly go on." What had been squarely the right of regulators now became a matter of degree. Courts would use a balancing test, weighing the social good being protected by a regulation against the ensuing harm done to property owners, potentially limiting the purview of permissible regulation.

Government's regulatory role subsequently was limited. First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304 (1987), set forth that government was liable to pay just compensation for a "temporary taking," meaning that even if the government withdrew the statute that constituted a taking, it would still have to compensate property owners for value lost in the interim. This added a new financial risk, because social planners enact regulations that might later be judged unconstitutional takings.

Next, in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, 483 U.S. 825 (1987), Justice Antonin Scalia argued for the Court that there had to be an "essential nexus" between the public interest the government sought to protect and the actions it took to achieve those ends. In Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003 (1992), Justice Scalia ruled that the state's Beachfront Management Act was not a regulatory taking since it furthered the state's "background principles of nuisance and property law," although he set forth that when a regulation effectively constituted a "total taking" of the value of an individual's property, it would merit compensation by the government.

In Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374 (1994), the Court tightened further the "essential nexus" standard set forth in Nollan. There would have to be "rough proportionality" between the benefit to the public and the burden on the property owner. Justice John Paul Stevens argued in dissent that this decision reversed the long-standing "presumption of validity" of regulatory actions and instead placed the burden of proof on regulators.

Property rights are ultimately subject to the greater good of society. Regulations, such as zoning, can shape land use to foster greater societal benefits, although there are constitutional limits to such actions. The ensuing debate represents the constant redefinition of boundaries to ensure that land-use regulations best meet the needs of society but minimize the detriment to property rights, which are a founding principle upon which America's economy is built.

James F. Van Orden

See also: Berman v. Parker; Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff; Locke, John; Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council; Property Rights; Takings Clause; Zoning.

FURTHER READING

Andrews, Richard N. L. Managing the Environment, Managing Ourselves. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.

Ely, James W., Jr. The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Locke, John. Of Civil Government: Two Treatises. London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 1924.

Platt, Rutherford H. Land Use and Society: Geography, Law, and Public Policy. Washington, DC: Island Press, 1996.

Lawn Signs

Signs posted on residential property (lawn signs) are a form of expression protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. This fundamental right also has been incorporated in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and made applicable to the states. The right to post lawn signs is not absolute, however, and municipalities often pass ordinances regulating their display. Courts generally determine the constitutionality of a sign ordinance by balancing a municipal interest in controlling the physical impact of signs on a community, on the one hand, with the constitutional interest in ensuring that lawn signs remain available as an effective medium of expression, on the other.

Only two U.S. Supreme Court decisions, Lindmark Associates, Inc. v. Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977), and City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43 (1994), have directly ruled on the municipal regulation of residential signs. Lower courts, therefore, have not had a great deal of specific guidance on how to resolve sign issues. Still, the Lindmark and Gilleo decisions, along with Supreme Court decisions discussing other types of sign regulations, reveal four general principles.

First, lawn signs may be subject to "time, place, and manner" regulations. This type of regulation attempts to mitigate problems caused by the posting of signs of a particular design, the posting of signs in a certain place, or the posting of signs during a certain time period. Municipalities often cite a concern for preserving the aesthetic character of a neighborhood, or for promoting traffic safety, in regulating sign design and placement, as the Court recognized in Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984). Time, place, and manner regulations are "content-neutral": They attempt to solve a problem unrelated to the substance of the sign's message or image. If a time, place, or manner ordinance is not unnecessarily or excessively restrictive, it stands a fair chance of being held constitutional.

Second, ordinances that restrict or ban signs based on subject matter (allowing religious but not politically oriented signs, for example) or the particular viewpoint taken in a sign (for example, allowing prowar but not antiwar sentiments) are more constitutionally suspect. With exceptions, regulations that are content-based or viewpoint-based are presumptively unconstitutional in modern law regarding free expression, as the Court ruled in a flag-burning case in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), and this is true for sign ordinances as well.

Third, signs that convey a "commercial" (advertising) message are, all other things being equal, given less constitutional protection than "noncommercial" signs. Ordinances regulating commercially oriented lawn signs are subject to a "midlevel" form of review, something between presumptive constitutionality and presumptive unconstitutionality, an analysis the Court made in Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 557 (1980). Ordinances that restrict or ban commercial lawn signs as a means of depressing consumer demand for a product, however, are unconstitutional. For example, the unconstitutional sign ordinance in Lindmark prohibited the posting of "For Sale" or "Sold" signs on residential property in order to preserve the character and stability of racially integrated neighborhoods. The Court struck down the ordinance because it prevented residents from conveying truthful information about their property.

Fourth, the Supreme Court in Gilleo implied that the right to post a sign on one's own property is stronger than the right to post signs elsewhere, especially if the sign's message is political in nature. In addition, the Gilleo Court held that lawn signs have unique value in public discourse; no medium of expression serves as an adequate substitute for them. Therefore, an ordinance that effectively bans the posting of politically oriented lawn signs, even a content-neutral time, place, or manner regulation, is unconstitutional.

The Court in Gilleo described the unique value of lawn signs as a form of expression. Signs placed on a person's lawn tie the sign's message to the resident, and vice versa, in a way that an anonymous sign posted off-property cannot. For this reason, a lawn sign concretely communicates local public opinion and may be the most effective and even provocative way to convey a message to one's neighbors. In addition, the identity of the speaker often adds to, or detracts from, the credibility of the message conveyed. Signs are also convenient and inexpensive to design, post, and maintain. Alternative methods of expression, such as newspaper advertisements, handheld signs, or phone calls, often require more effort and expense.

A contemporary issue involves municipal ordinances that mandate time limits for the posting of election-campaign signs on private property. Campaign-sign regulations are content-based (regulating signs with a particular subject matter), yet they are regulated not because of their subject but because their proliferation creates time, place, and manner problems. Lower courts examining these time-limit ordinances have upheld some of these ordinances and struck down others.

James Daniel Fisher

See also: City of Ladue v. Gilleo; First Amendment; Land Use; Time, Place, and Manner Restrictions.

FURTHER READING

Gerard, Jules B. "Election Signs and Time Limits." Washington University Journal of Law and Policy 3 (2000): 379–96.

Mandelker, Daniel R. Land Use Law. 4th ed. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis, 1997.

———, and Rebecca L. Rubin, eds. Protecting Free Speech and Expression: The First Amendment and Land Use Law. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2002.

Lawrence v. Texas (2003)

In Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), a gay-rights case, the U.S. Supreme Court overruled Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986). The Court reversed convictions based on laws making private same-sex sodomy illegal, holding that such laws violated the rights and liberties protected by the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy wrote the Court's majority opinion. Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Steven G. Breyer joined it. The majority concluded that applying antisodomy statutes to consenting adults on private premises violated the liberty and privacy rights protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor voted with the majority against Texas, but said in her concurring opinion it was unnecessary to overrule Bowers and that it was sufficient to overrule statutes that targeted homosexuals as a class because the laws violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice Antonin Scalia wrote a dissenting opinion, joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Clarence Thomas.

Lawrence arose from these facts: Houston police responded to a reported weapons disturbance in John Lawrence's apartment but instead found Lawrence and his homosexual partner engaged in sodomy, a misdemeanor, and arrested them. The two men pleaded no contest to their prosecution but alleged the statute violated their Fourteenth Amendment rights guaranteed by the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses and infringed a similar equal protection provision of the Texas constitution. They lost their case in the Texas court system, and the Supreme Court accepted review.

The Court considered three questions: (1) whether the Texas statute violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; (2) whether the criminal convictions based on the statute violated the liberty and privacy protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; and (3) whether Bowers should be overruled.

Justice Kennedy's first paragraph set a broad libertarian theme:

> Liberty protects the person from unwarranted government intrusions into a dwelling or other private places. In our tradition the State is not omnipresent in the home. And there are other spheres of our lives and existence, outside the home, where the State should not be a dominant presence. Freedom extends beyond spatial bounds. Liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of thought, belief, expression, and certain intimate conduct. The instant case involves liberty of the person both in its spatial and more transcendent dimensions.

He applied this extended scope of liberty to the inquiry over Bowers and found adherence to Bowers lacking sufficient logic. In his analysis of Bowers, Justice Kennedy admitted the moral/religious tradition of disapproval against homosexuality, but asserted a person's privacy was more fundamental and complex in the traditional legal culture of Western civilization and the United States than what the Bowers Court acknowledged. He relied on two kinds of evidence available in 1986 not acknowledged in Bowers. Most unusual was his citation as legal authority of a 1981 decision by the European Court of Human Rights granting a right of privacy for a gay person against Northern Ireland, a decision that also bound all member nations of the Council of Europe through the European Convention on Human Rights (twenty-one nations at the time, forty-five today). Less controversial was his observation that early American statutes banned all nonprocreative sex, even between married individuals. Such laws apparently were enforced against rapists and pedophiles and to punish bestiality and the like. True, in 1986, about half of the states had antisodomy statutes, but it was not until the 1970s that states began specifically to discriminate against homosexual sodomy.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

Justice Kennedy's second-prong invalidation of Bowers considered the weight of liberty over morality in the post-Bowers era. He cited Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), which reaffirmed Roe, quoting a line from Justice O'Connor's Casey opinion for the Court: "Our obligation is to define the liberty of all, not to mandate our own moral code." In addition, in the post-Bowers era, the number of states to criminalize sodomy dropped; in 2003, only thirteen states did, of which only four targeted same-sex sodomy. Last, he cited Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), in which the Court used the Equal Protection Clause to invalidate Colorado's Amendment 2, which was directed against homosexuals as a class. Justice Kennedy wrote that six–three majority opinion, joined by the same five justices to vote against Texas in Lawrence.

He admitted Justice O'Connor's equal protection logic had merit against Texas and the other three states that criminalized homosexual sodomy. He concluded it might be too narrow to stop more states from criminalizing partner-neutral sodomy. O'Connor claimed that was not a practical conclusion; it was more practical to conclude that a movement in the states would invalidate all partner-neutral antisodomy bans.

Justice Scalia wrote an angry dissent supporting the precedent of Bowers and castigating the majority opinion as the "product of a law-profession culture that has largely signed on to the so-called homosexual agenda." He further argued that the Court had "taken sides in the culture war" and that states should be able to criminalize activities that a majority of their citizens deemed immoral. He made three main points. First, if societal changes were positive for overruling Bowers, then increased opposition to legalized abortion meant the Court should overrule Roe. Second, if the majority decision were correct, then other criminal statutes, such as those against bigamy, were unconstitutional, since they also had a public-morality rational-basis purpose in discriminating against the individual who was the partner. Third, the door would be open to legalizing same-sex marriage, since public morality was the rational basis that defined marriage as a union between one man and one woman. Justice Scalia further observed that the majority decision was inconsistent with Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000), which invalidated, on First Amendment grounds, a New Jersey statute prohibiting sexual orientation discrimination as applied to the Boy Scouts.

Justice Thomas's separate dissent said such statutes were an unworthy way to expend valuable enforcement resources. If he were a legislator, he would vote to repeal them because they were "uncommonly silly," but he did not think the U.S. Constitution contained a general right to privacy.

Sharon G. Whitney and Martin Dupuis

See also: Bowers v. Hardwick; Boy Scouts of America v. Dale; Right to Privacy; Romer v. Evans.

FURTHER READING

Copelon, Rhonda. "Beyond the Liberal Idea of Privacy: Toward a Positive Right of Autonomy." In Judging the Constitution, ed. Michael M. McCann and Gerald L. Houseman. Glenview, IL: Scott, Foresman, 1989.

Goldstein, Anne B. "History, Homosexuality, and Political Values: Searching for the Hidden Determinants of Bowers v. Hardwick." Yale Law Journal 97 (May 1988): 1073–1103.

Rubenfeld, Jeb. "The Right to Privacy." Harvard Law Review 102 (February 1989): 737–807.

Rubenstein, William B., ed. Lesbians, Gay Men, and the Law. New York: New Press, 1993.

Thomas, Kendall. "Beyond the Privacy Principle." Columbia Law Review 92 (October 1992): 1431–1516.

Lawyer Advertising

Lawyer advertising raises important issues under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. As a form of commercial speech, such advertising enjoys limited constitutional protection. On the one hand, lawyer advertising serves the public by educating accident victims, who are often unaware of their legal rights and vulnerable to pressure from insurance adjusters. It allows lawyers without long-standing community ties to enter the market, and it exerts downward pressure on the cost of legal services. On the other hand, many lawyers wince at the undignified pitches that undercut the image of the law as a learned profession. Furthermore, lawyer advertising increases the volume of claims, lawsuits, and settlements. Consequently, insurance companies, often portrayed as villainous in the ads and usually responsible for paying damage awards, have seen their costs rise and their profits diminish. They have lobbied for limits on lawyer advertising.

Before 1977 every state barred lawyer advertising. In that year the U.S. Supreme Court decided Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, the first case holding that the First Amendment protected a lawyer's right to advertise—in that case, fees for routine legal services.

Subsequently, a series of cases clarified the parameters of permissible advertising. In Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association, 436 U.S. 447 (1978), the Court approved a prohibition on in-person solicitations of accident victims. Soon thereafter, the Court limited the ban on such solicitation to the hospital itself. In Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626 (1985), the Court struck down a rule against use of newspaper ads to solicit clients who had been injured by the Dalkon Shield, an intrauterine birth control device. Neither the state's interest in preventing undue influence on vulnerable clients nor its concern that the ads might be offensive was enough to overcome the presumption of constitutionality. In Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association, 486 U.S. 466 (1988), the Court declared that targeted mailings were acceptable—though in a 1995 case, Florida State Bar v. Went For It, 515 U.S. 618, the Court deferred to a state's interest in shielding accident victims from such letters for thirty days.

The Court has given strong constitutional backing to lawyers who solicit clients to promote political or ideological goals. In In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412 (1978), the Court supported a volunteer American Civil Liberties Union lawyer who had written to a woman asking her to become a plaintiff in a lawsuit against a doctor. The doctor had sterilized her as a condition of the continuation of Medicare benefits. The Court found that the attorney's letter was core First Amendment speech.

Since those Court decisions that broke new First Amendment ground, lawyers now have multiple options for communicating. They advertise in telephone books and newspapers, on television, billboards, and the Internet, through mass mailings, and even on T-shirts, matchbook covers, and condom packages.

Each state promulgates its own code of professional responsibility—a set of rules governing members of its bar. Typically, states regulate three aspects of advertising—its substance, its format, and the media through which information is communicated.

Each state prohibits false or misleading advertising content, including material misrepresentations of facts or of the law, omissions of pertinent information, the creation of unjustified expectations about what a lawyer can do, and unsubstantiated comparisons with the competence of other lawyers. If an advertisement implies that a lawyer can exercise improper influence over a government agency, the lawyer has violated the standard. Ads must be truthful. For example, if a firm always settles cases rather than taking them to trial, that firm may not run an ad portraying lawyers in a courtroom. Likewise, most states consider it misleading to run a commercial in which a professional actor is not identified as such. And a firm that describes its work as "the best" must be prepared to support its claim.

In terms of format, many states require the insertion of simple disclaimers, such as statements that recovery cannot be guaranteed or that what is portrayed on the screen is a dramatization. Other states require that spokespersons for a firm must be members of the firm. Some states prohibit the broadcast of jingles or dramatic music. Because the Supreme Court has been narrowing states' discretion in regulating advertising format, most of these rules are vulnerable to constitutional challenges.

Lawyer advertising appears in most mass media, although the Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991 prohibits the uninvited transmission of "junk faxes." Lawyer advertising on the Internet, which reaches potential clients beyond a state's borders, has become a matter of concern to state officials.

Because of the growth of constitutional barriers to mandatory standards for ads, some states have begun to develop voluntary guidelines. For example, although appeals to fear, greed, and the desire for revenge probably cannot be prohibited without running afoul of the First Amendment, such ads are less common in states that adopt and publicize aspirational standards.

The American Bar Association has been influential in promoting national standards for lawyers. It has proposed a model rule to govern lawyer advertising. The rule leaves questions of taste up to the individual lawyer and prohibits only communications that are false or misleading. Similarly, the bar associations of individual states often have advertising guidelines.

In sum, lawyer advertising enjoys a good deal of constitutional protection, though not as much as "pure" (noncommercial) speech. It performs a public service by helping people who otherwise would silently suffer a wrong to become aware of legal remedies. It reaches people without a network of family, friends, or business associates who could refer them to an attorney. Advertising also serves to break up informal cartels of legal providers. Nevertheless, lawyer advertising is controversial because it cheapens the image of the legal profession and increases the costs of doing business for insurance companies and for professionals, such as physicians, who may become targets for lawsuits.

As the Supreme Court has moved toward giving advertising the kind of constitutional protection afforded to literary, artistic, political, and scientific speech, the permissible range of state regulation has narrowed. In the future, many states are likely to adopt aspirational standards in lieu of mandatory rules.

William H. Coogan

See also: Bates v. State Bar of Arizona; Commercial Speech; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

American Bar Association Center for Professional Responsibility. "Information on Professionalism and Ethics in Lawyer Advertising and Marketing." http://www.abanet.org/cpr/clt-dev/home.html

Hornsby, William E., Jr. Marketing and Legal Ethics: The Boundaries of Promoting Legal Services. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2000.

Lawyers Defending Civil Liberties

The use of law, courts, and attorneys to defend and expand civil liberties has sometimes been referred to as "cause" lawyering. The practice itself has been questioned for both its effectiveness and for the implications of using the legal system as a means to force social or political change.

Much of the dispute is dependent upon an underlying view of the role of the judiciary in the conflict over civil liberties. Judicial scholars have two alternate views of the judiciary in the United States based on its role in government. A limited view of the role of the courts is based on understanding that a combination of factors—the bounded nature of constitutional rights, the lack of judicial independence, the dearth of enforcement mechanisms—makes the courts ineffective policy-makers. This view is drawn from Alexander Hamilton's assertion that the judiciary is the least dangerous, or weakest, branch because it lacks both the power of the purse and the power of the sword. Further, courts exercise their authority through the issuance of opinions that often are vague or difficult to implement, even when the authority of a particular court, such as the U.S. Supreme Court, is prominent.

One scholar effectively demonstrated this position through a careful examination of some of the U.S.

Thurgood Marshall (right) and Spottswood W. Robinson III met in 1955 in Washington, D.C., to ask the Supreme Court to end school segregation promptly. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Supreme Court's more prominent decisions on civil liberties. In reviewing the Court's decision in the landmark civil rights case Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), he demonstrated that the Court was not as effective in forcing desegregation as many observers had believed. The effect of Congress and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 proved to be more significant in his data.

Alternatively, some scholars hold a view less limited than is shown in the measurement of individual decisions. One individual argues that despite a movement's mixed results in court, legal mobilization has supplied resources and helped shape the political landscape upon which the rights conflicts are conducted. A legal strategy can provide an increased level of activism for participants and, despite a short-term loss, may still provide for long-term victory by undermining the status quo. This strategy can be effective at mobilizing support and providing momentum for the movement to be successful over time. Further, a movement's support structure may be effective in changing the nature of a court's docket.

Individually, lawyers can, and do, contribute both resources and skills to the advancement of civil liberties and other causes. The ability of attorneys to see the limitations of the litigation strategy allows them to be cautious and sophisticated in the use of the law and results in a more balanced strategy of which the law and litigation may be only a small part. The leveraging ability of the law can be an important strategic tool, especially for movements that have less political clout than high-profile causes. The use of a legal strategy is context-specific, and, as a result, its impact is often difficult to measure in more limited empirical studies. Lawyers themselves are only a portion of the movement, and they can advocate for legal strategies when they are appropriate or argue against them when the situation calls for a different approach.

Beyond their effectiveness, the placement of lawyers in the role of advocates for particular social interests presents a professional dilemma. Cause lawyering raises a moral and professional quagmire for lawyers in that it allows them to contribute to society, but it damages the underlying logic of the system in which lawyers are seen as neutral and the law as unbiased. Cause lawyering brings legitimacy to the profession by demonstrating that its contribution is more than the technical, hired-gun imagery that often defines the profession in the modern media. Nonetheless, the process threatens the attorney/client relationship, since the representation of a cause can be in conflict with the interests of the client or even in competition with the client.

This is not a conflict that will quickly fade. Many social or political conflicts are increasingly being decided in judicial forums. As courts become more involved in the mediation of rights disputes, the role of lawyers in this process is certain to increase. Practitioners will be forced to balance professional responsibilities with personal or ideological ones.

Kevin M. Wagner

See also: American Civil Liberties Union; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties; Public Defenders.

FURTHER READING

Bickel, Alexander. The Least Dangerous Branch. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1962.

Dahl, Robert. “Decision-Making in a Democracy: The Supreme Court as a National Policy Maker.” Journal of Public Law 62, 1 (1957): 1–33.

Epp, Charles R. The Rights Revolution: Lawyers, Activists, and Supreme Courts in a Comparative Perspective. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Hamilton, Alexander, James Madison, and John Jay. The Federalist Papers. New York: Penguin Books, 1987.

McCann, Michael W. Rights at Work: Pay Equity Reform and the Politics of Legal Mobilization. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

———, and H. Silverstein. “Rethinking Law’s Allurements: A Relational Analysis of Social Movement Lawyers in the United States.” In Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities, ed. Austin Sarat and Stuart A. Scheingold, 261–92. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Rosenberg, Gerald N. Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Sarat, Austin, and Stuart A. Scheingold. “Cause Lawyering and the Reproduction of Professional Authority: An Introduction.” In Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities, ed. Sarat and Scheingold. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Shamir, Ronen, and Sara Chinski. “Destruction of Houses and Construction of a Cause.” In Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities, ed. Austin Sarat and Stuart A. Scheingold. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Spriggs, James F. “The Supreme Court and Federal Administrative Agencies: A Resource-Based Theory and Analysis of Judicial Impact.” American Journal of Political Science 40, 4 (1996): 1122–51.

Tate, C. Neal, and Torbjön Vallinder. The Global Expansion of Judicial Power. New York: New York University Press, 1995.

Least-Restrictive-Means Test

The least-restrictive-means (or least-drastic-means) test is a standard developed by the courts to determine whether legislation violates fundamental rights, especially freedom of speech and press, as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and as applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The employment of the least-restrictive-means test is an attempt to respect the imposition of valid governmental interests but to prevent undue intrusion on individual liberties. The test assesses the manner in which restrictions on expression are fashioned. It addresses whether the government's application of a law goes further than necessary to assert the government's interest. If the government seeks to limit a fundamental constitutional right, it must do so in the least drastic manner available. If less drastic alternatives exist, the government must employ them. The test is an important component of the attempt to strike a balance between individual liberties and society's interest in regulating the harm that might arise from exercise of those liberties. The U.S. Supreme Court typically attaches this prong to its tests designed to balance individual rights with the government's need to protect society.

The least-restrictive-means test is closely related to the void-for-vagueness test and the overbreadth doctrine, the latter in particular. All three were developed to deal with the question of whether legislation unnecessarily impinges on constitutional rights. The overbreadth doctrine and least-restrictive-means test seek to ensure that regulations come as close as possible to meeting government's objectives while exerting the minimum impact on the constitutional right in question. Overbreadth, least restrictive means, and void for vagueness are concepts that the Court began to apply to civil liberties cases, particularly those involving freedom of speech, in the wake of the preferred-position doctrine suggested in footnote four of United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). Each of these tests is designed to further constitutional protections for expression by requiring that statutes be clearly and narrowly constructed. The least-restrictive-means test has been applied primarily to First Amendment–related concerns, but the Court has used it in assessing regulations that might impinge on interstate commerce as well.

Many of the tests the Supreme Court has devised to strike a balance between individual rights and the state's authority have a least-restrictive-means prong. The judicial test for symbolic speech, created in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), and the test for commercial speech, created in Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980), require the government to demonstrate that its restrictions are the least restrictive—the least drastic—means possible. Judicial decisions limiting time, place, and manner restrictions are also designed to ensure that such regulations are narrowly tailored.

An early application of the test to civil liberties (although it was more implied than explicit) came in Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939), in which the Court ruled that prevention of littering was not a sufficiently important governmental interest to merit restraints on expression. There were less drastic means of preventing littering. Similarly, in Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960), an Arkansas statute designed to assess teacher competence required teachers to list the organizations they had joined and how much money they had contributed to those organizations. The Court recognized that ensuring teacher competence was a significant state interest, but ruled that this requirement went well beyond the legitimate purpose and was not the least restrictive means of ensuring teacher competence.

Critics argue that the least-restrictive-means test is highly subjective and open to an arbitrary, unstructured imposition of personal values. The test was adopted as a means of limiting the government's ability to restrict expression, but justices so inclined can circumvent the least-restrictive prong without much difficulty. There has also been concern that the Supreme Court has been inconsistent in enforcing the requirements attendant to the least-restrictive-means test. Critics have charged that the Court has not been rigorous in applying the test, arguing that the Court under Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist has been too willing to consult legislative history and too deferential to the legislature's declaration that the statute in question represents the least restrictive means of handling a particular issue.

Richard L. Pacelle Jr.

See also: First Amendment; Lawn Signs; Overbreadth Doctrine; Preferred-Freedoms Doctrine; Time, Place, and Manner Restrictions; United States v. O'Brien; Vagueness.

FURTHER READING

Lieberman, Jethro K. The Evolving Constitution: How the Supreme Court Has Ruled on Issues from Abortion to Zoning. New York: Random House, 1992.

Lee v. Weisman (1992)

Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), is one of a long line of cases in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that state-sponsored prayer violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Under that clause, government is prohibited from engaging in activity that would constitute establishment of religion. Weisman reaffirmed the principle first established in Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), in which the Court emphasized that allowing students in public schools to be excused from school prayers at their request did not render such prayers noncoercive.

At issue in Weisman was the constitutionality of a Rhode Island graduation ceremony that included invocation and benediction prayers by a member of the clergy who was invited by school officials. A student, Deborah Weisman, challenged this practice. The Court agreed with her challenge, holding that the prayers constituted an organization of religious activities by state officials at an event that was essentially mandatory, even though students were not required to attend in order to receive their diplomas.

The Court emphasized that the school principal was primarily responsible for deciding to hold prayers and then selecting and inviting a member of the clergy in any given year to give them. The school official would instruct the member of the clergy that the prayers should be nonsectarian. Although the school argued that this attempt to make prayers as nonsectarian as possible was an attempt not to offend those with different beliefs, the Court questioned the school's right to direct such prayers at all, since the school (and, by extension, the state) was in charge of organizing every aspect of prayers at an event that students were essentially required to attend. This violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, under which the government "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." To the nonbeliever, the Court wrote, the prayers would signify "an attempt to employ the machinery of the State to enforce a religious orthodoxy." The public and peer pressure felt by these nonreligious students would be equivalent to direct coercion.

Justice Antonin Scalia dissented, joined in his opinion by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Byron R. White and Clarence Thomas. Justice Scalia highlighted the religious tradition in the United States of engaging in public nonsectarian prayer, as was the case in Congress. He did not believe the prayer in question was coercive, since students could turn their heads away or even choose not to attend graduation ceremonies when public prayer was scheduled.

Lee v. Weisman continues to be important in U.S. constitutional law. In Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), the Supreme Court struck down a school policy that allowed students to vote on whether they wanted prayer at football games and to lead the prayers themselves if a majority of students wanted them. Although the students had voted on the question of whether to hold prayers and chose who would recite them, the Court decided that this practice still violated the Establishment Clause, because the majority had no right to endorse practices that violated First Amendment principles. Additionally, the Court found a coercive element, since certain students (players and cheerleaders) were required to attend games, but others might be compelled to choose whether to attend or not based on whether such prayers violated their religious beliefs and views antagonistic to traditional Judeo-Christian religions or to religion itself.

Ronald Kahn

See also: Abington School District v. Schempp; Engel v. Vitale; Establishment Clause; Prayer in Schools; Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe.

FURTHER READING

Conkle, Daniel O. Constitutional Law: The Religion Clauses. New York: Foundation, 2003.

Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Kahn, Ronald. "God Save Us from the Coercion Test: Constitutive Decision-Making, Polity Principles, and Religious Freedom." In "Symposium: Religion and the Public Schools After Lee v. Weisman." Case-Western Reserve Law Review 43 (Spring 1993): 983–1020.

Legal Basis of Public Health

The powers associated with the public health system in the United States are broadly based on the concept of "police powers," a term coined in 1824 by Chief Justice John Marshall of the U.S. Supreme Court. This regulation of health, welfare, and safety has wide impact in many aspects of citizens' lives, including requirements for the registration of births, for food and water safety, and for control of disease.

These police powers fall in direct opposition to privacy rights and personal liberties because the former necessarily encroach on the latter. In order to combat the spread of sexually transmitted diseases, for example, states inquire about all sexual contacts, discuss high-risk behaviors, and contact other individuals exposed. Federal statutes (U.S. Code, Title 42) allow for inspections and destruction of contaminated animals or property and permit the apprehension and detention of a person to prevent the spread of disease.

The issues of public health can have a significant impact on a population. In 1854, Doctor John Snow was confronted with a cholera epidemic in London. His epidemiological investigation of two water companies demonstrated that many sick individuals were getting drinking water from a specific pump located on Broad Street. The doctor removed the pump handle and halted the epidemic, but as a consequence some of the population was forced to seek water elsewhere.

The application of police power in the guise of public health statutes and regulations must be a balance between protecting the public good and minimizing intrusion on personal liberty. Although currently smallpox is of concern only as a possible biological weapon, a century ago the disease was a real threat in the United States. In 1902 a smallpox outbreak occurred in Cambridge, Massachusetts. The city's board of health implemented a regulation for the vaccination of all persons. Henning Jacobson, a citizen of that city, refused to be vaccinated, and charges were brought against him. In 1905, Jacobson v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which held Jacobson could not enjoy the benefits of society without being vaccinated, and the state's obligation to the general welfare of the population provided grounds for the enforcement power. Jacobson could not enjoy the protection from disease offered by virtue of his vaccinated neighbors without taking the risk of vaccination himself.

Today smallpox is only a potential problem, and small numbers of public health workers, researchers, and military personnel are being vaccinated voluntarily. In the event of an intentional epidemic, this "balance" would have to shift to protect the population in general at the expense of some individuals. This shift from a request for volunteers to be vaccinated to mandated vaccination would be a clear example of public health application of police power.

The public health may be protected via police powers in another manner. California health and safety codes were challenged in 1966 when tuberculosis patient Eric Halko was restricted to a secured side of Mira Loma Hospital. Halko had left the hospital in spite of his disease communicability. He was arrested, returned to the hospital, and isolated there by successive orders of the county public health officer. The restriction of personal liberty was upheld by the District Court of Appeal of California in In re Halko, 246 Cal. App. 2d 553 (1966).

The effects of public health regulations typically go unnoticed by most people. Society enjoys the benefits of restaurant and water inspections, and officials have power to regulate restaurant workers and conditions if a worker develops hepatitis or shigella. Public health is first and foremost a matter of protecting the population.

The courts have differentiated the relative value of these police powers over time. In Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972), the Supreme Court established a boundary where religious practice outweighed the safety and welfare laws of a state, at least when compulsory education beyond eighth grade was in conflict. On the other hand, when religious practice places an individual in potential danger, the religious practice can be curtailed. The state's power to regulate child labor was upheld in Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944), restricting a child's right to distribute religious materials.

Privacy rights have accounted for police power challenges that have had the greatest impact on public health issues in recent years. In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), the Supreme Court determined that a Connecticut law prohibiting the prescription use of contraceptives was unconstitutional. Griswold prepared the legal landscape for limitation of state interference in the private lives of individuals. Still, privacy rights did not prevail over a New York law requiring the identification of patients receiving controlled medications (for example, morphine); the Supreme Court upheld the law in Whalen, Commissioner of Health of New York v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977).

The boundaries of the state's police powers will be challenged in a variety of circumstances. Current public health mandates allow for the direct reporting of certain diseases, including the private information of the patient, for contact and surveillance purposes. Other statutes specify the behavior of certain businesses that could have an impact on the health and safety of the public. These statutes are often supported by inspection and subpoena powers.

In Virginia, there are seventy-six diseases or classes of disease that must be reported to the state health department by health care providers or laboratories, each with different control measures based on communicability, morbidity, and mortality. Although chickenpox is reported, the young patients stay home to be cared for by family members, and only good hygiene is required. In contrast, a patient with a viral hemorrhagic fever such as Ebola or Lassa would be restricted to the hospital in full isolation. Cancers are also reportable diseases in Virginia, and cancer patients are tracked by the state's cancer registry for at least five years after treatment.

The current environment of concern over terrorism and world politics has resulted in the increase in both funding and power for public health programs. Potentially, a biological assault on a free society could be more devastating than a nuclear weapon. To recognize a bioterror incident, public health practitioners review hospital-visit records for trend analyses, interview patients to clarify the illness and path of exposure, and interview contacts. These invasions of privacy would serve the greater good if they could limit a communicable disease to a small area and a few patients.

All citizens have the expectation of safe food and water, the containment of disease, and the desire for a safe environment—instances of use of the police power—as well as the desire for protected civil liberties. In circumstances when public health is at risk, however, the individual's liberties must give way for the public good.

Kevin G. Pearce

See also: Griswold v. Connecticut; Jacobson v. United States; Police Power; Quarantines.

FURTHER READING

Brewer, Garry D., and Peter DeLeon. The Foundations of Policy Analysis. Pacific Grove, CA: Brooks/Cole, 1983.

Heineman, Robert A., William T. Bluhm, Steven A. Peterson, and Edward N. Kearny. The World of the Policy Analyst: Rationality, Values, and Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1990.

Neuberger, Babette, and Tom Christoffel. "The Legal Basis of Public Health: An Individual or Group Study Course in Ten Modules," 1999. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (Atlanta). http://www.phppo-cdc.govt/phtn/legal-basis/mainmenu.asp.

Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez (2001)

In Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a 1996 law restricting the Legal Services Corporation from representing clients seeking to change existing welfare laws, even if this meant their attorneys had to terminate cases already in progress when the law was adopted. The Court primarily focused on the right to free speech protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Congress had created the Legal Services Corporation (LSC) as a nonprofit corporation in 1974 "for the purpose of providing financial support for legal assistance in noncriminal proceedings or matters to persons financially unable to afford legal assistance." One of the primary functions of the LSC, which the 1996 law seemed to call into question, was to help indigent clients obtain welfare benefits.

Lawyers funded by the LSC brought suit challenging the law, known as the 1996 Omnibus Consolidated Rescissions and Appropriations Act. The district court denied a preliminary injunction, but the appellate court ruled in their clients' favor. The case went to the Supreme Court, which faced the question of whether the funding restriction on LSC attorneys attempting to represent clients challenging the validity of a law or statute violated the First Amendment right to free speech. In a five–four decision written by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the Court ruled that it did.

In Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), the Court ruled that physicians in federally funded health clinics could not advise their clients about abortion options. In that case, the Court explained that the physicians were speaking for the government, and the government therefore had the right to control the speech that went out under its name. By contrast, in the LSC's case, Justice Kennedy argued, attorneys were engaging in private speech that was merely funded by the government. The government was speaking through the state and federal attorneys defending the laws. Although Congress was perfectly within its limits to regulate the latter group, they could not regulate the former. The government could not restrict private speech merely because the government was funding it.

The majority also sought to protect the role of the judiciary in assessing the constitutionality of laws and statutes. "An informed, independent judiciary presumes an informed, independent bar," Justice Kennedy noted, and the restrictions placed on the LSC threatened the ability of the bar to perform its function. Congress cannot insulate its laws from judicial scrutiny, and the Court explained that this ruling was intended to protect the separation of powers so that each branch could function effectively. If these restrictions held, LSC attorneys—often the only ones available to indigent clients—would be limited not only in the cases they could bring but also in the arguments they could make, which could cast doubt upon the entire legal process.

The dissent, written by Justice Antonin Scalia and joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Clarence Thomas, argued that the 1996 legislation "does not directly regulate speech, and it neither establishes a public forum nor discriminates on the basis of viewpoint."

Brian J. Glenn

See also: First Amendment; Rust v. Sullivan.

FURTHER READING

Dooley, John A., and Alan W. Houseman. Legal Services History. Washington, DC: Center for Law and Social Policy, 1984.

Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association (1991)

Michigan's "agency shop" law required nonunion employees working for a unionized public entity to pay a "service fee" to the union for benefits received from collective bargaining. Some employees objected that the union used some of the fees for activities other than administration. In this respect, these nonunion employees were being forced to support positions on which they did not agree, and this infringed on their rights of free speech under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution as applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Ferris Faculty Association (FFA) was the exclusive bargaining agent representing Michigan's Ferris State College faculty members and was affiliated with the Michigan Education Association (MEA) and the National Education Association (NEA). In a series of earlier cases, the U.S. Supreme Court had decided that there were some limits on compelled association in the workplace. The Supreme Court's decision about freedom of association in Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), however, had not completely clarified which payments to such groups could be compelled and which ones could not.

That was the issue the Court addressed in Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association, 500 U.S. 507 (1991). James P. Lehnert, a Ferris State College faculty member who did not subscribe to certain political views, sued along with others as the plaintiffs, alleging certain violations of their civil rights because the fees they paid were being used for activities other than collective bargaining. They also sought a review of parts of the lower courts' decisions concerning payments to the MEA for collective bargaining costs. One portion of the complaint was that the service fees were assessed at the same figure as union dues.

Specifically, the lawsuit contended that these activities violated their rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, claiming that union actions attacked the plaintiffs' rights to free speech. They argued that because their service fees were used to support positions with which they did not agree, they were forced into "compelled speech." The trial court awarded some damages for the service fees but not other requested relief. The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court's ruling.

The Supreme Court, in its opinion by Justice Harry A. Blackmun, ruled that employees could be charged a pro rata share of costs associated with activities of state and national union affiliates even if those activities did not directly benefit the objecting employees' bargaining unit. However, the union could not charge objecting employees for expenses of lobbying, costs for publicity of union activities, and other costs unrelated to collective bargaining.

The Court's ruling was based on the Abood holding that established that compulsory membership in an organization did not violate the First Amendment rights of nonmembers. However, public employees cannot be required to make payment to promote causes they do not believe in or they oppose. The main thrust of the Court's opinion, which was decided by a plurality, was that the agency-shop rules could be justified only if they discouraged "free riders" (those who accept benefits without making payment) and if the coercion was "not a significant burden on free speech."

Citing a previous case, the Court pointed out that if the union were allowed to use the dissenters' money to gain support for its purposes, "the union would use each dissenter as 'an instrument for fostering public adherence to an ideological point of view he finds unacceptable.' " The First Amendment protects the individual's rights from this type of invasion.

Stanley Morris

See also: First Amendment; Labor Union Rights.

FURTHER READING

American Jurisprudence 2d. Vol. 48, secs. 16, 17, 20.
Gall, Gilbert J. The Politics of Right to Work: The Labor Federations as Special Interests, 1943–1979. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.

Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)

Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), is a case that grew in stature through the years, far more than its facts would have predicted. It is one case in a string of challenges to government funding of religious education, but it set a precedent and laid out a rule, a three-pronged "test," that has endured through the years as the measure to determine whether government aid to religious schools is constitutional. The issue stems from the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, in particular the Establishment Clause, which mandates that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion" and which has been applied to the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The facts are easily summarized. The U.S. Supreme Court actually combined a second case in its Lemon decision, Earley v. DiCenso. The Lemon case involved a challenge of a Pennsylvania law that authorized the state superintendent of schools to purchase secular services and materials for use within nonpublic schools. Provided the schools separated their secular and religious teaching and kept separate records, the state would reimburse the schools for some of their secular teaching, including some teacher salaries and books. The DiCenso case, from Rhode Island, was about a salary supplement program. Teachers of secular subjects in private elementary schools could get supplements of up to 15 percent of their salaries if they agreed in writing not to teach religious subjects, provided their supplemented salaries did not exceed those of public school teachers. A variety of groups alleging that such tax-supported programs in religious schools violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment challenged both programs.

Why were state legislators willing to direct tax-raised funds to religious schools? It was not simply that Pennsylvania legislators were predominantly Catholic; they were not. Nor did all Catholics favor tax support of religious schools. For many legislators such aid was a way to keep taxes lower than they would otherwise have been. At the time of Lemon, approximately 500,000 Pennsylvania students were in parochial schools (95 percent of which were Catholic). When the Supreme Court heard the case, the state was spending $5 million annually on the program and had reimbursed expenses at 1,181 schools. Many of these schools were having financial difficulties and were in danger of closing, after which many of their students would then attend public schools. In 1971 the average cost of educating a student in the public schools was approximately $3,000. If only 20 percent of students, or 100,000, switched from parochial to public schools, the cost to the state would have been an additional $300 million. Given that possibility, the $5 million for secular educational expenses represented an excellent bargain to state legislators, no matter what their religious affiliation. The Supreme Court does not exist to make economic or public policy decisions, however, but to determine the constitutionality of state and federal laws.

Writing for a unanimous eight-member Court in Lemon (Justice Thurgood Marshall did not participate in Lemon, and the vote was eight–one in DiCenso, with Justice Byron R. White dissenting), Chief Justice Warren E. Burger began by stating that the language of the religion clauses was opaque and therefore must be interpreted in light of the three main evils the authors of the First Amendment were trying to prevent: sponsorship of religion by the state, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity. In pulling together rules from previous cases, and especially from Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), which had dealt with the constitutionality of prayer and Bible reading in public schools, the chief justice articulated a rule that was to endure for more than thirty years: "First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; finally, the statute must not foster 'an excessive entanglement with religion.' " This became known as the three-pronged "Lemon test." The Court invalidated both statutes on the basis that the oversight required to ensure the first and second prongs of the test were met inevitably led to excessive entanglement between church and state.

Any state or federal law designed to aid religious schools has to pass muster on all three counts. A law could be declared unconstitutional if it did not satisfy any one of the prongs. Although the Lemon test has been used consistently since 1971, the results have been anything but consistent. In fact, in the same session in which the Court struck down aid to religious primary and secondary schools, it upheld aid to religious colleges and universities in Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1971); the Court, by a five–four vote, found that funding building programs on college campuses was constitutional. Plausible explanations for this different result could have been that college students were less susceptible to religious indoctrination, and therefore assistance in building college facilities would be less likely to result in proselytizing them, or possibly there were many more Protestant and Jewish colleges and universities than elementary and secondary schools, and therefore aid would be more evenly distributed among religious groups. In any event, the Court never adequately explained the differences.

Numerous attempts have been made to supplement or supplant the Lemon test through the years. An effort to add a fourth prong, "political divisiveness," failed to gain support on the Court, although it was strenuously pushed in two 1973 cases, Levitt v. Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty, 413 U.S. 472, and Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756. The justices objected that opponents of aid could sue and then claim their own lawsuits proved that aid caused divisiveness.

Justice William H. Rehnquist would have replaced the Lemon test with a standard called "nonpreferentialism," meaning that government could aid religions as long as it did not single out one denomination over others, as he explained in his dissent in Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985). Justice Anthony M. Kennedy would have supplemented the Lemon test with a "no coercion" test, as he outlined in his concurring and dissenting opinion in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989). Justice Sandra Day O'Connor would have added a "no endorsement or disapproval" test, as she noted also in Allegheny. None of these alternatives has swayed a majority of the Court. Nevertheless, in the Court's 2002 decision in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, Justice O'Connor emphasized both nonendorsement and private choice as critical to upholding the constitutionality of an Ohio law providing tax-funded vouchers that parents could use to send their children to religious schools.

Although the Lemon test survives as the primary precedent in Establishment Clause cases, there are occasions when the Court ignores the test to focus largely on historical precedent. For example, in Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983), the Court upheld the practice of the Nebraska state legislature to pay a chaplain to deliver prayers. It remains to be seen whether Lemon will be supplanted in future cases by a test based on nonendorsement and private choice.

Paul J. Weber

See also: County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union; Establishment Clause; Wallace v. Jaffree.

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 4th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Noonan, John T. The Lustre of Our Country: The American Experience of Religious Freedom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

———, and Edward McGlynn Gaffney. Religious Freedom: History, Cases, and Other Materials on the Interaction of Religion and Government. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Lemon Test

See Lemon v. Kurtzman

Libel

Libel consists of false statements, in written or broadcast form, made about an individual to a third party that harm the individual's personal or business reputation and go beyond being offensive, objectionable, or insulting. Libel is not a protected form of speech, but the task of identifying it and defining it raises a number of questions under the First Amendment to the Constitution. For example, Larry Flynt, owner of Hustler magazine, depicted Reverend Jerry Falwell in a parody of an advertisement for Campari liqueur as experiencing sex for the first time with his mother in an outhouse. Falwell sued for libel, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The U.S. Supreme Court in Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), ruled against Falwell on the libel claim, holding that the cartoon was a parody that was not reasonably believable and that public officials could not claim libel based purely on outrage.

Another standard for libel cases deals with libelous statements made about the dead. Only living persons can be libeled. As a result, almost anything can be written or broadcast about a dead person provided the statements do not involve a living person. For example, a statement about the dead that could lead to defamation of the living, such as that a descendant of the deceased was born out of wedlock, could lead to a libel suit.

Although the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides for the right of free speech and a free press, it does not guarantee the right of people to say anything they please or for newspapers and broadcast media to publish or broadcast anything they wish. The landmark case of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), clearly defines libelous statements.

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and subsequent case law established two different standards of proof in a libel suit—one for ordinary "private citizens" and another for "public figures," such as government officials, well-known athletes, celebrities, and others voluntarily involved in widely discussed public disputes. In both instances—public figures and private citizens—one must offer clear and convincing evidence for proving libel. This is a more stringent burden of proof than the typical "preponderance of the evidence" (or slight majority of the evidence) rule employed in civil cases.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

For a private individual, the false statements must be defamatory, causing actual harm to the plaintiff's reputation, and the plaintiff must show that the defendant was negligent or did not act with sufficient due care in making the statements. To win a libel suit in the case of a media defendant, ordinary citizens must not only show negligence but also demonstrate that the statements issued were false. Under these circumstances, an ordinary citizen can recover damages in a civil action only for actual harm suffered and are not eligible for punitive damages. For private individuals, the standard for proving libel is less stringent. Unlike public figures, ordinary citizens have a greater expectation of privacy. For example, Richard Jewell, whose name was leaked by the press as a suspect in the bombing in Atlanta's Centennial Olympic Park in 1996 and whose character would later come under close public scrutiny, charged NBC Nightly News with libel. NBC later settled, claiming the network wanted to protect confidential sources. If Jewell had been classified as a public figure, however, his chances for a settlement or a court victory would have been less likely given the standard of proof for libelous statements that must be met by public figures.

In seventeenth-century England, seditious libel was used to prevent criticism of the king and his ministers. Criminal in nature, these libel prosecutions perpetrated by the government were generally used to suppress discussion of public issues. In the United States, libel is a civil action, and public officials are held to a higher standard of proof (clear and convincing evidence) when trying to bring a suit for libel. A public figure includes anyone who (1) has or appears to have substantial responsibility for or control of public policy-making or a government function, (2) holds a position of importance such that the person's qualifications and performance are of general interest to the public, or (3) holds a position that invites public scrutiny. There are two types of public figures—those who occupy positions of power and have a pervasive involvement in public affairs and those who have engaged voluntarily in a public controversy in an effort to influence public outcomes. Under democratic theory, citizens and the media must be allowed to critically appraise people in the public eye without being suppressed or subjected to a libel suit.

To prove libel, public-figure plaintiffs must show that the statements were false and defamatory. In addition, they must demonstrate that the statements were made with "actual malice," meaning the defendant either knew the statements were false at the time they were made or had serious doubts about the truth of the statements and recklessly disregarded the truth. Actual malice is not demonstrated simply by asserting that the publisher or reporter had ill intent or disliked the plaintiff. When the media are sued, courts must balance the individual's right against harm to reputation versus the First Amendment right of a free press.

State libel laws and standards of proof differ. Libel suits are expensive because defendants must pay all their own legal fees whether they win or lose. Most libel awards consist of compensatory awards for emotional distress, humiliation, grief, and so on. Because no uniform guidelines exist to set parameters on these awards, they vary widely, but may exceed $1 million. Still, libel defendants tend to win more often than they lose.

The Internet and the ability to broadcast libelous statements in a worldwide forum present the latest challenges in libel law. In 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear a Minnesota Internet libel case filed by Katherine Griffis of Alabama who claimed she was defamed by an Internet Egyptology news group that had made light of her academic credentials. As of yet, no guidelines exist on how to address libel on the Internet in terms of which courts have jurisdiction over the World Wide Web and the standards that might be applied to it.

Ruth Ann Strickland

See also: First Amendment; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; Slander.

FURTHER READING

Jasper, Margaret C. The Law of Libel and Slander. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1996.

Rosini, Neil J. The Practical Guide to Libel Law. New York: Praeger, 1991.

Zeleny, John D. Communications Law: Liberties, Restraints, and the Modern Media. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/ Thomson, 2001.

Liberalism

Liberalism is neither a coherent ideology nor a systematic doctrine. Rather, it best resembles a constellation of ideals and values, not always consistent and often conflicting, anchored in a commitment to the protection of individuality and equality for all. These values are also enshrined in the institutions and procedures of government. Thus the term “liberal” may also describe the governments or institutions that embody these values. The development of liberalism has its own complex history and evolution, made all the more complicated by the fact that the ideas change as the institutions do.

It was not until the beginning of the nineteenth century that the word “liberal” was used to refer to a political viewpoint, as opposed to the virtue of generosity. Nevertheless, the origins of liberalism can be discerned throughout Western Europe in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Several historical events are key to understanding these origins. First, liberalism arose as a reaction against the violence caused by religious intolerance, especially between Protestants and Catholics, during the Reformation (beginning c. 1517). Liberal theory arose to protect the free exercise of religion and the limitation of civil liabilities attached to one’s faith. Second, liberalism challenged the social, political, and legal inequalities that the European aristocracy had established for its benefit. Most aristocrats had legal privileges and social opportunities closed off to others. Liberals fought for political equality and the spread of citizenship. This conflict between liberalism and aristocracy reached its apex in the French Revolution of 1789. Third, the development of a commercial system, based in free contract and exchange, transformed more than the economic landscape. It changed the way in which individuals viewed their relationship with each other, reorienting them toward formal equality, free movement, and social hierarchies based in wealth rather than birth. Out of these three historically varied contexts are three identifiable sets of concern that serve to mark the core set of liberal values: (1) equality under law; (2) liberty of the individual; and (3) commitment to limited government.

The origins of the liberal ideal of legal equality are found in the theories of natural law that view all human beings as equal in the eyes of God. This theological root was given a political slant in the social-contract theory of such early liberals as John Locke and Immanuel Kant. The social-contract ideal is that a just political regime, and the only type of regime to which individuals would give their consent, is one that treats each individual as having the same political and social rights. Within the U.S. Constitution, subsequent amendments have served to make the structure of government more egalitarian than it was when it was first drafted in 1787. These include the Reconstruction-era amendments (the Thirteenth through Fifteenth) and the lifting of gender barriers to the right to vote. At the heart of modern constitutional law lies the Fourteenth Amendment, which grants citizenship to individuals born or naturalized in the United States and protects the right of due process and equal protection of the laws to all persons, whether or not they are citizens.

The dimensions of individual liberty that concern liberals revolve around the degree to which liberty is best understood as a negative right to be left alone,

The origins of the liberal ideal of legal equality are found in natural-law theories that view all individuals as equal in the eyes of God. This theological root was given a political slant in the social-contract theory of such early liberals as Immanuel Kant (pictured). (Library of Congress) or whether society has any positive obligations for establishing some material preconditions that allow people to realize their potential liberty and individuality. The heart of this debate is found in John Stuart Mill's On Liberty (1859). In this work he announced the "harm principle," stating that everyone should possess as much liberty as possible to the extent of not injuring the freedom of others. Mill warned that the pressures of social conformity could be as threatening as government censure.

Many within the libertarian wing of liberalism take Mill's argument to mean that individual liberty requires that persons be "left alone," free to make their own way to the best of their abilities, with neither help nor interference from government. These libertarian positions remain key faiths of liberalism, but they have often conflicted with the arguments that the government and social groups have responsibilities to others that go beyond leaving them alone.

Limited government, enshrined in the structure of the Constitution, arises from a fear of an overly powerful and intrusive state. There are a number of devices by which the powers of political institutions are checked. Formal devices, such as the separation of powers and federalism, are designed to pit the self-interest of one part of government against the others, so that political power will be more widely distributed and thus weaker. These ideas gained popularity through Charles-Louis Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws (1748), a work that was highly influential on the Constitution's framers. Individual rights and liberties also put limits on how the government can treat individuals. This is an important constraint, not just on strong governments, but it also limits the majority's treatment of minorities. These rights and liberties are found in the British Bill of Rights, the American Declaration of Independence, and the bills of rights found in the federal and state constitutions.

These three principles are often mutually reinforcing, but in practice they often clash with each other. Many of the conflicts that are commonly described as liberal-versus-conservative are better understood as arguments internal to the philosophy of liberalism itself. For example, some liberals have argued that the principle of limited government and the protection of individual property are challenged by the growth of state regulation of the economy and the proliferation of social aid programs. Other liberals have countered that these programs, such as those developed during Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal in the 1930s and Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society of the 1960s, are necessary to ensure that political equality is more than just a hollow shell, and to allow citizens to participate as equals in the political process.

As liberalism continues to develop, newer debates have emerged. Two important new questions concern the strength of liberal communities and the relationship between liberalism and personal virtues. Do liberal societies require individuals to be committed to certain virtues and values? Some scholars have argued that liberal societies presume that a person's behavior is self-interested, and that the values of liberalism are represented by the rules of liberal institutions, such as due process and equality of law, but are not embodied by individuals themselves. Others argue that liberal societies are marked by personal commitments to concrete values, such as toleration, cosmopolitanism, and fairness. Similarly, some communitarians argue that liberalism cannot form a community of shared values and may be threatened by nationalist and religious movements that value the group over the individual.

Douglas C. Dow

See also: Declaration of Independence; Locke, John; Mill, John Stuart; Natural Law; Natural Rights.

FURTHER READING

Arblaster, Anthony. The Rise and Decline of Western Liberalism. New York: Basil Blackwell, 1984.
Bellamy, Richard. Liberalism and Modern Society. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992.
Rawls, John. Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.

Libertarianism

Libertarianism is a political philosophy that advocates maximum individual rights and minimum government. Libertarians believe that all people have the right to live their lives as they choose, to own and exchange property, and to be free from governmental interference in their decisions and actions as long as they respect the equal rights of all other people. More simply stated, libertarians believe that all people have equal rights to life, property, and liberty. Libertarians accept constitutional restraints as means to limit popular democratic will.

To libertarians, the right to life means that each person has the absolute right to govern his or her mind, body, and actions. Murray Rothbard and David Boaz described the right to life as the right to "self-ownership." All people are free to consider the options available, make choices, learn from experiences, and put individual knowledge to use in the pursuit of survival and prosperity. For example, all people are free to choose any vocation, practice any religion, or adopt any set of values to govern their actions. Thus, the right to life means all people are free to define their own existence rather than have this existence defined for them. But this freedom does not come without obligations. All individuals must accept responsibility for their actions and extend mutual respect for the equal rights of other people to self-ownership.

To libertarians, the right to property means each person has the right to acquire, possess, use, exchange, give away, or dispose of property. Property includes everything that can be owned, including land, objects, animals, and plants. Property also includes services that can be performed and the products of labor. The right to own and exchange property enables people to buy and sell things and work to earn wages. All persons should be free to use, exchange, or dispose of their property as they decide best serves their interests. The right to property is the right to engage in economic activity in a free market.

To libertarians, the right to liberty means that all persons can define their existence and own property free of interference from other people or the government. As described by Boaz, liberty is "a condition in which the individual's self-ownership right and property right are not invaded or aggressed against." The right to liberty is the vehicle through which people shape their individual identity, whether personal, professional, spiritual, or otherwise. It includes the right to freedom of speech and expression, the right to associate freely with other people, the right to freedom of personal behavior, and the right to privacy. It is, in essence, the right to be free. It is the right of every person to engage in any activity that does not violate the rights of other people, even if some people consider the activity irresponsible or immoral.

Perhaps the most fundamental principle of libertarianism is the nonaggression axiom. To libertarians, the right to life, property, and liberty ensures the right of all persons to act freely as long as their actions do not violate the equal rights of other people. The nonaggression axiom dictates that "no one has the right to initiate aggression against the person or property of anyone else." Thus, the right to liberty does not include the right to commit criminal offenses, such as murder, assault, rape, robbery, theft, kidnapping, or fraud, because those actions involve aggression against the victim's right to life and right to property. However, the use of force in response to aggression initiated by another person is permissible. The right to life, property, and liberty includes the right of all individuals to protect their person and their property.

Libertarianism is a political philosophy in which each person has the right to live life in any manner chosen, as long as the equal rights of other people are respected, without interference from the government. The only role for government is to protect the equal rights of all people to define their own existence, to own and exchange property, and to pursue their aspirations. Libertarians believe the government's role is limited to protecting its citizens and their property through the adoption and enforcement of criminal laws and the establishment of civil remedies to enforce contracts and recover damages for injuries. But in doing so, the government should intervene only to the extent that a person's right to life, property, or liberty has been violated.

Mark A. Fulks

See also: Property Rights.

FURTHER READING

Boaz, David. Libertarianism: A Primer. New York: Free Press, 1997.

Hayek, Friedrich A. The Constitution of Liberty. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.

Murray, Charles. What It Means to Be a Libertarian: A Personal Interpretation. New York: Broadway Books, 1997.

Rothbard, Murray N. For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto. San Francisco: Fox and Wilkes, 1994.

Liberty Versus License

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Americans commonly distinguished "liberty" from its wilder twin, "license." Whereas license suggested an unlimited ability to act as one pleased, for good or ill, liberty suggested the ability to act as one pleased only within the boundaries of propriety or moral law. By the twentieth century, this distinction had begun to dim, as theorists of modern liberalism increasingly called into question the validity of "natural" laws of morality, arguing instead that all forms of restraint, even when justified, were contrary to liberty.

The classical distinction between liberty and license emerges from both of the major intellectual sources of Western culture: Greek philosophy and biblical monotheism. Plato and Aristotle appealed to this distinction in separating anarchic from lawlike states in both the political and psychological senses. For the Greeks, neither a disordered mind nor a lawless city could be described as truly "free" because both were enslaved to chaotic passions beyond individual or civic control. Similarly, the Judaic or Old Testament tradition found liberty in adherence to Mosaic law. Although Paul challenged this association of liberty and law in his letter to the Galatians, he nonetheless circumscribed liberty by faith or love, denying that liberty meant licentiousness.

Drawing on these traditions, early modern Europeans and Americans claimed that liberty had natural boundaries that were inherent to its very conception, although those boundaries could be variously defined depending upon what restraints were seen as necessary or good. Colonial and founding-era Americans viewed restraint through two alternative frameworks—the puritanical and the liberal-republican—which often overlapped in practice. The puritanical view, expressed by leaders of the Massachusetts Bay Colony such as Governor John Winthrop and John Cotton, the prominent divine, posed a stark contrast between liberty and license. In his " 'Little Speech' on Liberty" (1645), Winthrop called license (or "natural liberty") "that great enemy of truth and peace, which all the ordinances of God are bent against, to restrain and subdue it." In contrast, "civil" (or "moral") liberty was "liberty to [do] that only which is good, just, and honest. . . . This liberty is maintained and exercised in a way of subjection to authority; it is of the same kind of liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free." In this view, any action taken contrary to Christian morality could be defined as inconsistent with freedom, whereas submission to authority in various forms, such as "sumptuary laws" (regulations on commerce, sexuality, alcoholic consumption, or religious observance), could force one to be free.

The liberal-republican view of liberty, articulated by many of the European writers most influential for colonial Americans, including jurist William Blackstone, pamphleteer Algernon Sidney, and philosophers James Harrington, John Locke, and Charles-Louis Montesquieu, offered a more moderate and secular view of the restraints necessary to avoid license. Although they often attributed the limits on liberty to natural or divine laws, they claimed to derive these laws primarily from human reason rather than biblical revelation. Locke, for example, in his Second Treatise of Government described the "state of nature" prior to the creation of government as one of perfect freedom: "though this be a state of liberty, yet it is not a state of license; though man in that state have an uncontrollable liberty to dispose of his person or possessions, yet he has not liberty to destroy himself, or so much as any creature in his possession, but where some nobler use than its bare preservation calls for it." Liberty must be reasonable, and killing oneself or others without just cause fails such a test. For writers of the liberal-republican tradition, liberty was the opposite of "slavery" rather than of restraint per se; freedom meant an absence of external domination and not simply the lack of all external impediments. Tyrants deprived citizens of liberty by exercising power arbitrarily, but fair and well-considered laws crafted by representative bodies did not—in fact, they augmented liberty by minimizing oppression.

Unlike the puritanical view of liberty, the liberal-republican view, reflecting the sensibilities of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment, was inherently skeptical of authority and optimistic about the possibilities of rational self-governance. Furthermore, personal liberty depended upon "political liberty," the proper arrangement of political institutions to avoid arbitrary domination, including equal representation, separation of powers, and guarantees of due process. As Montesquieu stated in The Spirit of the Laws, "Political liberty in a citizen is that tranquillity of spirit which comes from the opinion each one has of his security, and in order for him to have this liberty the government must be such that one citizen cannot fear another citizen." It is this view of liberty that fueled the fire of the American revolutionaries in their opposition to British royal authority.

Seventeenth- and eighteenth-century royalists, such as philosophers Thomas Hobbes and Robert Filmer and clergyman Jonathan Boucher, often appealed to a very different notion: that civic restraint and freedom were natural opposites. Since all restraints, even necessary ones, were inimical to liberty, government authority, even when arbitrary, had to be accepted to stave off anarchy. In other words, there are no real differences either between liberty and license or between representative government and royal absolutism—there will always be a conflict between what individuals want to do and what the authorities allow them to do. Hobbes's famous "state of nature" story, which he used to defend absolute monarchy, depicted the parade of horribles that would arise when there was no higher authority to stem the "war of every man against every man."

Ironically, modern liberals, such as political theorists Isaiah Berlin, John Rawls, and Robert Nozick, have usually favored the royalist equation of liberty with license over the classical liberal distinction between them, although they have employed this view to an opposite effect, depicting unrestrained liberty as a desirable end in itself and law as either a convenient means or a necessary evil toward attaining that end. Berlin, for example, argued that "positive" conceptions of liberty—those that entail internal conditions on how liberty may or may not be used, or "freedom to" rather than "freedom from"—were dangerous because they invited power-hungry elites to coerce citizens in the name of their own freedom. Liberty should not be confused with democracy, equality, reason, law, or self-mastery, but is simply the individual's ability to make as many choices as possible free of interference by others.

The resulting "libertarian" prejudice in modern liberalism has created a great deal of controversy. If individual liberty is a primary social good, and government authority is always a limitation upon it, then all social restraints are at least somewhat oppressive and even constitutional forms of government are intrinsically suspect. Some modern theorists of liberalism, such as Quentin Skinner and Philip Pettit, have argued for a return to the liberal-republican view of the contrast between liberty and license. Other writers of a more conservative bent, however, such as social critic Russell Kirk, legal scholar David Lowenthal, and jurist Robert Bork, prefer a definition of liberty more like the puritanical model, which embraces not only the limits of the law but also those of transcendent religious morality. The differences between these positions are not merely academic. As the popular understanding of "liberty" has changed over the past three centuries, so have Americans' conceptions of self and national identity for which the founders' belief in freedom was so central.

Robb A. McDaniel

See also: Christian Roots of Civil Liberties; Liberalism; Locke, John; Natural Law; Natural Rights.

FURTHER READING

Berlin, Isaiah. Four Essays on Liberty. New York: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Hobbes, Thomas. Leviathan. New York: Penguin, 1968.

Locke, John. The Second Treatise of Government, ed. Thomas P. Peardon. New York: Liberal Arts Press, 1952.

Lowenthal, David. No Liberty for License: The Forgotten Logic of the First Amendment. Dallas, TX: Spence, 1997.

Montesquieu, Charles-Louis de Secondat. The Spirit of the Laws, trans. Anne M. Cohler, Basia Carolyn Miller, and Harold Samuel Stone. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Pettit, Philip. Republicanism: A Theory of Freedom and Government. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Reid, John Phillip. The Concept of Liberty in the Age of the American Revolution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Skinner, Quentin. Liberty Before Liberalism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Winthrop, John. " 'Little Speech' on Liberty." In Free Government in the Making: Readings in American Political Thought, ed. Alpheus Thomas Mason and Gordon E. Baker, 62–64. 4th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Lie Detector Tests

Lie detector tests are devices that are used to render diagnostic opinions of the veracity—the truthfulness—of an individual. Such devices include polygraphs, deceptographs, voice stress analyzers, and psychological stress evaluators.

Use of lie detector tests and their results is strictly regulated by federal, state, and local laws, particularly in the courtroom and in the employment arena. The evolution of the law regarding the admissibility of polygraph evidence began with the seminal case of Frye v. United States, 293 F. 1013 (D.C. Cir. 1923).

A thirty-seven-year veteran lie detector operator tests a male subject. (© Bob Daemmrich/The Image Works)

In this case, a defendant appealed his murder conviction on the grounds that the trial court had erroneously excluded defense evidence of a "systolic blood pressure deception test," a precursor of the modern polygraph. The appellate court grappled with the question of when novel scientific evidence moved from the experimental to the established stage and concluded that such evidence must "have gained general acceptance in the particular field in which it belongs." The Frye court held that the systolic blood pressure deception test had not gained sufficient acceptance in the psychological and physiological communities, and it upheld the lower court's inadmissibility ruling.

For seventy years following Frye, the "general acceptance in the scientific community" standard led to a per se rule of inadmissibility for polygraph evidence in a majority of jurisdictions, although some courts allowed the evidence if both parties stipulated to its use, and a very few jurisdictions, most notably New Mexico, rejected the exclusionary trend. However, in 1993, the U.S. Supreme Court altered the standard for evaluating the admissibility of expert scientific testimony. In Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), the Court held that the restrictive Frye test was trumped by the Federal Rules of Evidence, particularly Rule 702 permitting expert testimony if it is based on specialized knowledge and will assist the trier of fact. The mere fact that the opinion of the scientific community may be divided is not an automatic bar to admission; more important factors include the underlying theory or ability to test the technique, the known rate of error, the history of peer review and publication, the level of acceptance in the scientific community, and the existence of standards for determining acceptable use. Nevertheless, in spite of the acknowledgment by some federal courts that a reevaluation of the admissibility of polygraphs was called for, the majority of post-Daubert opinions expressed significant reluctance to change their exclusionary positions, preferring to rely on the fundamental principle that "the jury is the lie detector."

In 1998 the U.S. Supreme Court gave some support to the exclusionary jurisdictions when it upheld a per se ban on polygraph evidence in military courts. In United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303 (1998), a plurality of the Court rejected the argument that the exclusionary position was prohibited by the Sixth Amendment right of the accused to present evidence. However, four justices found the rule "unwise" and indicated that a later case involving different circumstances might compel another result. In the meantime, however, the trend of lower-court decisions has been to exclude polygraph evidence, although lie detector results are frequently used by law enforcement, prosecutors, and other government officials at various decision-making stages, such as determinations of probable cause for arrests.

In contrast to the legal uncertainty of polygraph use in the courtroom, lie detectors have a comparatively clearly defined status in the employment arena due to the 1988 passage of the Employee Polygraph Protection Act (EPPA). The act makes it unlawful for any employer engaged in or affecting interstate commerce to use lie detector tests on employees or prospective employees or to discharge, discipline, or deny employment or promotions based on the results of any such test. However, the exceptions to the prohibitions are critical: The EPPA does not apply to any governmental entity; in fact, government agencies such as the U.S. Department of Defense, the Central Intelligence Agency, and local police departments routinely depend on polygraph testing of employees. Furthermore, private employers are permitted to request an employee to submit to a polygraph as part of an ongoing investigation involving economic loss or injury to the employer's business. Additionally, employers engaged in security services or in the manufacture or distribution of controlled substances may use polygraph tests. However, these private employers may not take adverse action against an employee or prospective employee if the results of the polygraph test are the sole basis for the action. The requirement that there be additional supporting evidence underscores the law's continuing attempts to balance the benefits of polygraphic science against the potential dangers of overdependence.

Virginia Mellema

See also: Due Process of Law.

FURTHER READING

Barovick, Robin D. "Comment: Between a Rock and a Hard Place: Polygraph Prejudice Persists After Scheffer." Buffalo Law Review 47 (Fall 1999): 1533–86.

Employee Polygraph Protection Act of 1988. U.S. Code. Vol. 29, secs. 2001 et seq.

Lilburne, John (1615–1657)

Hailed as "Free-Born John" for his defiance of Britain's Star Chamber court, John Lilburne wrote jeremiads in defense of liberty and became the most celebrated political prisoner of his age. Lilburne's combativeness and contempt for England's established church kept him in almost constant legal peril while also making him into a popular hero. As a leader of the "Leveller" movement (Puritans who favored political and religious equality) during the English civil war (1642–1651), he played a crucial role in the development of modern liberal and democratic ideals, including popular sovereignty, religious tolerance, and the right against self-incrimination.

At a young age, Lilburne leaped into the contentious politics of post-Reformation England. An impassioned if unorthodox Puritan, he first gained attention in 1638 after authorities arrested him for plotting to publish works in Holland critical of the state church and then smuggle them into England. He was interrogated by the Privy Council and handed over to the Star Chamber for trial. Originally a court of equity and appeal for cases beginning in the common-law courts, the Star Chamber by Lilburne's time had been entrusted by the Stuart kings with considerable power: It held secret hearings, acted without threat of appeal, and punished subversion by imprisonment and torture, though not execution.

Lilburne proclaimed his innocence but refused to swear an oath, a common Puritan tactic but one never before used at the Star Chamber. Presiding over the court, Archbishop William Laud was incredulous as Lilburne asserted that the laws of nature, which dictated self-preservation, entailed that no man could be called to testify against himself. The Court found him guilty and sentenced him to prison, a steep fine, and a public whipping behind a slow cart as he was led to the pillory. While in prison, he somehow wrote and published his earliest pamphlets, which detailed his plight and aimed unwavering attacks on the Episcopalian establishment. Throughout his career, Lilburne remained an advocate for the freedoms of speech and religion.

Lilburne earned his freedom when a long-suspended Parliament reconvened in 1640, and Oliver Cromwell made his unjust imprisonment a public cause. In the years that followed, Lilburne fought against the king as an officer in Parliament's New Model Army, suffered capture and additional imprisonments, and became a leading voice for democratic reform. In The Freedman's Freedom (1646), Lilburne argued that absolute sovereignty belonged to God alone and that the human effort to claim such power had been Adam's original sin. Like Adam and Eve, men "were by nature all equal and alike in power, dignity, authority, and majesty—none of them having (by nature) any authority, dominion, or magisterial power, one over or above another," all of which made their "free consent" the only legitimate origin of government. Lilburne, alongside Richard Overton and William Walwyn—the other "Leveller" leaders, a name that Lilburne disavowed—helped radicalize Parliament's new army, pushing its leaders to defend popular sovereignty, parliamentary supremacy, and individual rights against unfair prosecution, including trial by jury, legal due process, and the proportionality of punishment to crime.

The Levellers soon became threatening to their old allies in Parliament, the army, and the Presbyterian Church. In February and March 1649, Lilburne published the two parts of England's New Chains Discovered, warning that the new "republic" was in danger of becoming a dictatorship, with the Council of State acting as an unchecked executive and legislative authority under Cromwell's control. Cromwell moved to suppress the Levellers and had Lilburne and the others arrested. Tried twice for treason, Lilburne won acquittals both times to great public acclaim. Nonetheless, Cromwell kept him imprisoned until his death in 1657, a cruel fate for a man who had committed his life to liberty and whose ideals have inspired liberal legal reforms in both England and the United States.

Robb A. McDaniel

See also: Christian Roots of Civil Liberties; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Putney Debates.

FURTHER READING

Aylmer, G. E., ed. The Levellers in the English Revolution. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1975.

Brailsford, Henry N. The Levellers and the English Revolution, ed. Christopher Hill. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1961.

Gregg, Pauline. Free-Born John: A Biography of John Lilburne. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1961.

Sharp, Andrew, ed. The English Levellers. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Woodhouse, A. S. P., ed. Puritanism and Liberty: Being the Army Debates (1647–9) from the Clarke Manuscripts with Supplementary Documents. London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 1992.

Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865)

The enduring impact of Abraham Lincoln is reflected, in part, by the fact that he is the subject of more books than any other leader of a democracy in world history. Not only do experts consistently rank him as the greatest U.S. president (1861–1865), but they also regard his leadership style as one of the greatest gifts of American democracy to the world. His greatness overshadows his denial of the writ of habeas corpus (a petition for release from unlawful confinement) to more than 10,000 Southern sympathizers during the Civil War or his role in invoking the most extraconstitutional measures in U.S. history up to that time.

HUMBLE ORIGINS

Lincoln's rags-to-riches life epitomizes the self-made person who then used politics as a tool to help the working and emerging middle classes, codifying into law their "right to rise" in society based on individual initiative and merit, just as he had. Born February 12, 1809, in Kentucky, Abraham was the only son of Tom and Nancy Hanks Lincoln who survived infancy. His border-state origins and his frontier upbringing in Indiana and Illinois made him a rural "hick." By New England and aristocratic Southern standards, Lincoln remained a hick, a perception reinforced by his speech, dress, and lack of formal schooling. From a social standpoint, he "married up" when he wed Mary Todd, the daughter of one of the most prominent families in Lexington, Kentucky.

Early on, Lincoln rejected his father's model of working with his back to eke out a frontier living in favor of working with his brain. To accomplish his goal, Abraham Lincoln became America's best-known political autodidact. His self-taught command of the language produced prose that continues not only to shape U.S. political thought but also to impress generations of schoolchildren.

In 1832 he ran for the Illinois statehouse but lost. More important than the outcome of the race was the fact that Lincoln ran for public office long before he became a lawyer—earlier, in fact, than any other lawyer who eventually became president. In politics Lincoln discovered the perfect match for his interests and abilities. He ran for the same statehouse position again in 1834 and won the first of four terms as an Illinois legislator. Lincoln emerged in an extremely short time from the political wilderness to become the Whig floor leader in the Illinois legislature. It was the first of two transforming moments in his political life—the second would come during his presidency.

Between those two periods, Lincoln spent his time seeking or serving in political office, except for a seemingly dormant hiatus between his single term in the U.S. House of Representatives (1846–1848) and the seminal debates he had with Stephen A. Douglas in 1858 that marked Lincoln's active reentry into the political arena.

President Abraham Lincoln signing the Emancipation Proclamation, 1863. (Library of Congress)

Other than his two-year stint in the Congress, Lincoln spent seventeen years in Springfield, Illinois, practicing law and developing his jurisprudence. Lincoln enjoyed a highly active practice, mostly in state circuit courts, arguing hundreds of cases before the Illinois Supreme Court and federal courts. Gradually, he became one of the Prairie State's best-known lawyers.

With the demise of the Whigs, Lincoln became a Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate, representing the antislavery party that he had helped to organize in Illinois. He engaged in the seven famous debates with "the little Giant," Democratic incumbent Senator Stephen A. Douglas, who advocated the amorality of "popular sovereignty." Lincoln countered Douglas's philosophy by opposing the spread of slavery into new territories but upholding protection of the institution of slavery in the South, as guaranteed in the Constitution. Douglas won that battle and retained his Senate seat, but two years later Lincoln emerged as the dark-horse compromise candidate of the unified, antislavery Republican Party and defeated Douglas for the presidency. The Republican ticket won 39.8 percent of the popular vote, a plurality that made Lincoln the sixteenth president of the United States.

A TRANSFORMED PRESIDENT

When the extremist secessionists fired first at Fort Sumter, off the coast of South Carolina, they triggered not only the outbreak of the Civil War but also Lincoln's consummate political potential. Congress was in recess, so Lincoln instinctively transformed into philosopher John Locke's notion of an executive, assuming the "prerogative" power to guide his actions, unlike his more experienced yet befuddled presidential predecessor, James Buchanan. Lincoln insisted on preserving the Union and the climate of opportunity it represented for others to fulfill their innate potential as he had. He also recognized that America's great experiment in self-government represented "the last best hope of mankind." He understood that most autocratic governments in the world expected and hoped that the upstart Americans' democratic experiment would crumble from within and validate their predictions.

During the nation's internal strife, Lincoln was severely criticized then and later for taking extraconstitutional steps to deal with the escalating national crisis. Relying on his oath of office and exercising power he considered inherent to the commander-in-chief, he blocked Southern ports, doubled the armed forces, spent treasury funds, and suspended the writ of habeas corpus. But viewed in perspective against measures Jefferson Davis used in his reactionary Confederacy, Lincoln exercised restraint. Lincoln appreciated that the Congress had the right to pass judgment on his actions. More important was that Lincoln did not aspire to become an absolute monarch. Scrutiny of Lincoln's private and political behavior reveals that he was almost devoid of autocratic tendencies. The record is clear that he had little interest in monetary gain or personal power as ends unto themselves. To the contrary, even when he fully expected to lose the 1864 reelection, he insisted that the electoral tradition be sustained in the midst of the Civil War. He upheld democratic values even though he was frustrated by incompetent military commanders, still grieved the loss of his favorite son, and expected to lose.

As the Civil War ground on, Lincoln modified his earlier conservative stance of endorsing the South's constitutional right to slavery. The Emancipation Proclamation was used as a war measure. Lincoln worked for passage of the Thirteenth Amendment to use constitutional means to rid the nation of slavery, even if it meant political defeat. As he struggled to develop postwar plans to reconcile national factionalism, the Great Emancipator became the Great Reconciler by advocating a Reconstruction policy "with malice toward none," a virtually unprecedented display of magnanimity in history. Even as he focused on winning the Civil War to preserve the Union, he worked with a Republican-controlled Congress to enact legislation that encouraged "the right to rise" in society for all Americans.

That legacy was perpetuated in important legislation passed in 1862: the Land Grant College Act, the first significant piece of social legislation in U.S. history; the Homestead Act; and the Pacific Railroad Act, which provided for building the transcontinental railroad that would modernize the country in 1869 as it linked the East and West coasts for the first time.

Lincoln's presidential performance was so deft that it often was misunderstood while he was in office. His eloquence endured long past any one speech. Indeed, schoolchildren can be heard even today reciting Lincoln's simple but profound "Gettysburg Address," which defined self-government at home and abroad for all time. It took an assassin's bullet to turn the often vilified Lincoln into an icon. The nation had never before experienced the assassination of its president, and its response was passionate. Yet conferring sainthood on Lincoln just because he was assassinated in office would mask his real greatness that came during his life, because he understood and practiced democratic leadership during a major civil war.

William D. Pederson

See also: Civil War and Civil Liberties; Emancipation Proclamation; Habeas Corpus; President and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Fletcher, George P. Our Secret Constitution: How Lincoln Redefined American Democracy. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Neely, Mark E., Jr. The Fate of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln and Civil Liberties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

———. Southern Rights: Political Prisoners and the Myth of Confederate Constitutionalism. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1999.

Williams, Frank J., and William D. Pederson, eds. Abraham Lincoln, Contemporary: An American Legacy: A Collection of Essays. Campbell, CA: Savas Woodbury, 1996.

Williams, Frank J., William D. Pederson, and Vincent J. Marsala, eds. Abraham Lincoln: Source and Style of Leadership. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1994.

Living Will

See Right to Die

Lochner v. New York (1905)

In Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional a state law limiting bakers' work hours. For several generations of legal observers, Lochner symbolized the dangers of an activist Supreme Court. To progressives and New Dealers, it epitomized a laissez-faire Court's apparent desire to void economic regulations that did not comport with its members' ideological inclinations. Before Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), it was a lightning rod for critics who saw the Court's reliance on rights not explicitly included in the Constitution as the height of judicial activism. It was not the only case in which the Court invalidated an economic regulation on substantive (versus procedural) due process grounds, but it was probably the most famous.

Lochner presented a challenge to a New York law, passed in 1895 with unanimous support in both chambers of the legislature, limiting bakers to ten-hour days and sixty-hour weeks. Movement for reform was sparked by a journalistic exposé documenting unsanitary conditions and harsh work environments in New York's cellar bakeries, and it received necessary political backing from social reformers and some segments of organized labor. The resulting legislation included regulations directly concerning sanitary conditions of bakeries, but it was the maximum-hour provisions that were challenged in court by Joseph Lochner, an owner of a small bakery in Utica, New York. Lochner had been convicted of coercing or allowing one of his employees to work more than sixty hours in one week.

The Supreme Court had upheld maximum work-hour laws affecting miners in Holden v. Hardy, 169 U.S. 366 (1898), and employees of the government or of contractors working on public projects in Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U.S. 207 (1903); reformers hoped these precedents would guide the Court in Lochner. These hopes, however, were dashed, as the Court voted five–four that the New York law violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it infringed upon "liberty of contract," which the Court had established in Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U.S. 578 (1897). This right is not specified in the Constitution, but a majority on the Court held it to be implicit within the concept of due process. Maximum-hour laws, said Justice Rufus Peckham, were not a legitimate exercise of the state's police powers because they infringed upon the right of both employers and employees to contract freely with respect to the terms and conditions of employment. In the Court's view, the New York law was not a health and safety regulation of the type that the Court had upheld in earlier decisions, because baking was not an inherently unhealthy profession, and its employees were adults who could look after their own interests. Instead, the statute was "a labor law, pure and simple."

The dissenting opinions took different approaches in critiquing the majority position. Justice John Marshall Harlan implicitly accepted the majority's position that the state's police power was limited to regulation for the public's health and safety, but he also accepted the state's claim that its maximum-hour law was actually motivated by health and safety considerations. He observed, "Whether or not this be wise legislation, it is not the province of the court to inquire." Similarly, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. argued that the majority had misused the Due Process Clause to promote its laissez-faire ideology, then often known as "social Darwinism." In a famous reference to the philosophy of a contemporary sociologist, Justice Holmes observed that "[t]he Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics." Like Justice Harlan, he believed that questions regarding wisdom of the policy should be left to legislatures.

Lochner ultimately left a huge imprint on the country's political and legal terrain, despite the minimal reaction that initially followed the ruling. Reformers faced an uphill battle against a Supreme Court that had greatly circumscribed the permissible uses of the state's police power. The case also provided a prominent foil for progressive and New Deal legal scholars wishing to supplant the more formalistic approach exemplified by Lochner. To this day, Lochner, in the eyes of many legal observers, has remained synonymous with the Court's application of the idea of substantive due process and with judicial overreaching to achieve a politically desired result.

Jeremy Buchman and Steven A. Peterson

See also: Contract, Freedom of; Police Power; Substantive Due Process.

FURTHER READING

Gillman, Howard. The Constitution Besieged: The Rise and Demise of Lochner-Era Police Powers Jurisprudence. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1993.

Kens, Paul. Lochner v. New York: Economic Regulation on Trial. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.

Locke, John (1632–1704)

John Locke was an English physician whose philosophy greatly influenced democratic thought and promoted civil liberties, especially in the United States. Born in Wrington in Somerset, England, on August 29, 1632, he attended Oxford University and in 1666 met Anthony Ashley Cooper, the future First Earl of Shaftsbury. Locke soon became Lord Ashley's personal physician and friend.

After Lord Ashley and others engaged in plotting against the king, Locke found it prudent in 1683 to leave England. He returned in 1689 and published his Treatises on Civil Government to justify the "Glorious ("Bloodless") Revolution." Locke's famous book on epistemology, An Essay on Human Understanding, appeared in 1690. From then until his death in 1704, Locke continued to write on freedom of the press and religious toleration.

Locke's political philosophy is found principally in Two Treatises on Civil Government (1689) and Letter on Toleration (1689). The First Treatise destroyed Sir Robert Filmer's claim (in Patriarchia) that the king ruled by divine right. In the Second Treatise Locke taught that governments originated from a primal social contract. Each person gives up certain rights (for example, vengeance) in order to better protect his or her more fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property. A government's first duty is to protect these fundamental individual rights. In his Letter on Toleration, Locke outlined the case for religious liberty.

Locke's thinking explicitly influenced America's Declaration of Independence. Its author, Thomas Jefferson, concurred with Locke's view that people were born with natural rights, including the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Moreover, governments should exist to protect the rights of individuals. If the government failed to protect the liberties Fraser.

TWO TREATISES
OF Government:
In the former,
The false Principles, and Foundation
OF
Sir ROBERT FILMER,
And his FOLLOWERS, ARE Detected and Overthrown.
The latter is an ESSAY CONCERNING THE True Original, Extent, and End
OF Civil Government.

LONDON,
Printed for Awnsham Churchill, at the Black Swan in Ave-Mary-Lane, by Amen-Corner, 1690.

Title page of John Locke's Two Treatises of Government (London, 1690). (Library of Congress)

or rights of the people, there was not only a right to revolution but even a duty to change the government.

Locke's influence on the Constitution of the United States was also enormous. Constitutionalism, the idea that governments are to be limited by a written document that assigns limited powers, appeared clearly in the document. Furthermore, in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, Locke was quoted directly in clauses declaring that no person shall be deprived of "life, liberty, or property" without due process of law.

For Locke, property was a natural right. In his chapter on property in the Second Treatise, Locke discussed property in terms of the labor theory of value. The theory posited that property was created when individuals mingled their human energy as labor with materials. Stealing a person's property stole the person's "sweat equity," violating the person's rights.

In many state constitutions, the state's bill of rights is the first article of the constitution. Succeeding parts of the constitution specify that government is created to defend life, liberty, and property, thus demonstrating that a limited government derived from a social contract exists to protect the civil liberties and rights of the people. Locke's philosophy permeates these statements of the purpose of government.

A.J.L. Waskey

See also: Declaration of Independence; Liberalism; Natural Rights; Property Rights.

FURTHER READING

Cranston, Maurice W. John Locke: A Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Locke, John. Two Treatises of Government, ed. Peter Laslett. London: Cambridge University Press, 1967.

Locke v. Davey (2004)

In recent years, the Supreme Court has indicated in a number of decisions that governments cannot discriminate against adherents of religious faiths in denying them services that are available to others, such as sign-language translators and tuition vouchers. In Locke v. Davey, 124 S. Ct. 1307 (2004), however, the Court indicated that the state of Washington was not obligated to extend its Promise Scholarship Program to enable Joshua Davey, who had since completed his studies and enrolled at Harvard Law School, to study theology at Northwest College, a school affiliated with the Assemblies of God denomination.

Although it permitted money to be used at accredited religious colleges, the Washington scholarship program specifically prohibited aid to students pursuing degrees in "devotional theology." In Davey's case, he hoped to become a minister but was denied state aid on the basis that the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and a similar provision in the state constitution permitted states to prohibit scholarship funds from being used specifically to train individuals to become preachers.

Although the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had overturned a U.S. district court decision invalidating the Washington state law on grounds that it lacked a compelling state interest, the U.S. Supreme Court in a seven–two decision written by Chief Justice

William H. Rehnquist said the Ninth Circuit had not recognized "there is room for play in the joints" between the Establishment Clause and Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. He did not believe that either the compelling-state-interest level of scrutiny or the Ninth Circuit decision striking down the state law had been mandated by Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)—a case in which a Florida city had adopted legislation directed at animal sacrifice that was aimed specifically at religion—because the Washington law involved "neither criminal nor civil sanctions" and did not impinge on the right of ministers to participate in religious activities. Moreover, the scholarship did not create "a forum for speech," such as that found to be at issue in whether university student fees were accessible to religious entities in Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995). Legislation had long been directed (although not necessarily required) under the Establishment Clause at prohibiting the use of tax funds to support the ministry, and the Free Exercise Clause did not require otherwise.

In dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia argued that the Washington law impermissibly burdened religious believers by denying them general welfare benefits. He distinguished between the hostility of the Constitution's framers to funding the salaries of clergy members and denying them general benefits. In his view, the Washington law was not neutral but rather discriminatory. He therefore concluded, "This case is about discrimination against a religious minority."

Justice Clarence Thomas wrote a brief dissent distinguishing the mere study of theology from religious devotion but otherwise agreeing with Justice Scalia.

John R. Vile

See also: Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah; Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Rosenberger v. University of Virginia.

FURTHER READING

"Ban on Funding Religious Study Upheld," February 25, 2004. CNN.com. http://www/cnn.com/2004/LAW/02/25/scotus.religious.scholarship/index.html.

Greenhouse, Linda. "States Allowed to Avoid Subsidy of Divinity Study." New York Times, February 26, 2004, A1, A18.

Loving v. Virginia (1967)

In Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), a landmark decision, the U.S. Supreme Court held that state prohibitions of interracial marriages were unconstitutional under the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

In June 1958, Mildred Jeter, an African American, and Richard Loving, a Caucasian, lawfully married in the District of Columbia. After their marriage, the Lovings returned home to live in Caroline County, Virginia. The Lovings were charged with violating a Virginia law that banned interracial marriages. In 1959 the Lovings were sentenced to one year in jail, but the court said it would suspend the sentence for twenty-five years if the couple agreed to leave the state for the same period of time. Based on the state-court precedent of Naim v. Naim, 197 Va. 80, 87 S.E.2d 749 (1955), the state appellate courts upheld the Lovings' convictions, reasoning that Virginia had a right to maintain the racial integrity of its citizenry and that the Tenth Amendment left the regulation of marriage exclusively to the states. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the Lovings contended that the state law banning interracial marriages violated their fundamental liberty to marry and their rights to equal protection of the law. For its part, Virginia argued that regulating the qualifications for marriage was a right that belonged to the states.

Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote for the Court that Virginia's statute banning interracial marriages violated the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the Court, the Lovings' equal protection rights were jeopardized because the prohibition of interracial marriages emerged as a consequence of slavery and had been pervasive in Virginia since the colonial period. The Court also recognized that the law allowed Caucasians to marry only other Caucasians, whereas all other races could intermarry. This, according to the Court, led to Virginia's policy of attempting to create a pure-white bloodline. The Court, moreover, rejected Virginia's claim that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment did not intend to include interracial marriages as part of the Equal Protection Clause. The Court instead stated that the clause should be read with a broader and more organic interpretation.

Chief Justice Warren reasoned that the Virginia law also violated the Due Process Clause, because marriage was a basic civil right of man and one of the essential personal rights to the pursuit of happiness. The state can regulate marriages, but, the Court stated, it could not violate any of the commands of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In concurrence, Justice Potter Stewart believed that a state law that punished individuals based on their race should be unconstitutional under any circumstance. Although he agreed with the Court's core holding, he believed the Court should have made a stronger pronouncement of protecting against any state-based racial discrimination.

With the Loving decision, the Court effectively struck down fifteen other similar state laws. The decision was important because it pronounced marriage a fundamental liberty under the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), ended racial segregation in public schools, and Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948), precluded state-court enforcement of private racial discrimination under the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause. It was Loving v. Virginia, however, that ensured that states could not regulate the fundamental right of marriage—one of the most intimate, important, and sacred liberties—based on race.

John R. Hermann

See also: Family Rights; Marriage, Right to.

FURTHER READING

Moran, Rachel F. Interracial Intimacy: The Regulation of Race and Romance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

Sickels, Robert J. Race, Marriage, and the Law. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1972.

Washington, Joseph R. Marriage in Black and White. Boston: Beacon, 1971.

Loyalty Oaths

Loyalty oaths are sworn statements rejecting or forswearing belief or membership in particular ideologies or groups. In times of crisis or uncertainty over the course of the nation's history, the United States has made it necessary for public employees to take loyalty oaths. Because citizens are accustomed to reciting the Pledge of Allegiance as schoolchildren and are aware of presidents taking oaths of office (to "uphold and protect" the Constitution), these statements may not seem very important, but as Sandford Levinson stated, "Oaths are no small matters." Significant constitutional issues are at stake when the government requires such oaths, including free expression and assembly rights of the First Amendment to the Constitution, due process concerns under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, and the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

The history of loyalty oaths dates to the 1600s, when colonists had to swear an oath to support the colonial government. During the Revolutionary War, the new Americans required oaths to separate patriots from those loyal to the crown. Both the Union and the Confederacy required loyalty oaths during the Civil War. With the Union victorious, the Fourteenth Amendment was added to the Constitution, including the provision denying the right to serve in public office to anyone who had violated an oath to support the Constitution but had abrogated that oath, either by entering into rebellion or supporting it. This measure was designed to disqualify those who participated in the Civil War and violated their previous oath to support the U.S. Constitution.

In the twentieth century, loyalty oaths emerged during the "red scare" of the 1920s and later during the Cold War, which ushered in an extended period of uncertainty. Growing suspicion of Communists lurking in the hallways of government, the "loss" of China to communism, and the Soviet Union's development of a nuclear program created an atmosphere of distrust and suspicion. In 1947 the Truman administration responded to these perceived threats by instituting a loyalty-security program under Executive Order No. 9835 (Federal Employee Loyalty Program). Oaths were required of current and prospective public employees to refute any belief in the overthrow of the government by violent means, or membership in any group that advocated such beliefs. "Reasonable grounds" for belief in disloyalty were necessary for termination of an employee, but by 1951 the standard had been reduced to "reasonable doubt." The burden of proof to show otherwise was on the accused, not the government. Those under inquiry who were charged with disloyalty were immediately suspended without pay. The process was conducted secretly, without the accused being given a chance to refute evidence or confront accusers, violating due process and fair hearing. During the Truman administration alone, approximately 1,200 employees were dismissed, and another 6,000 resigned. Similar oaths were required of state employees, and many colleges and universities followed suit, worried that professors might spread the Communist doctrine to students.

Intended to root out subversives, the oath requirement is instead better viewed as "a simple means of imposing restrictions and disabilities upon persons regarded as undesirable." There are serious means-ends problems with loyalty programs. First, one must wonder about the effectiveness of oath-taking: Wouldn't subversives, who find America's system abhorrent, have little problem dishonestly taking oaths? Second, in trying to secure loyalty, the government violates the very Constitution it seeks to uphold. Oaths tend to be vague in wording, leading to "self-execution," or forcing individuals to interpret what the oath requires and if they are complying. Additionally, failure to take an oath indicates guilt—reversing the presumption of innocence. Last, there is the guilt-by-association issue: Whether an individual belongs or belonged to a proscribed group should not automatically be equated with acting on subversive impulses.

Challenges to loyalty oath programs during the 1950s largely were decided in favor of the government. A review of cases before the U.S. Supreme Court shows it was unwilling to address the First Amendment issues raised by federal loyalty oath requirements. In Garner v. Board of Public Works, 341 U.S. 716 (1951), the Court ruled that loyalty oaths were not inconsistent with the Constitution. Other decisions upheld oaths based upon the "conditioned privilege" doctrine: There was no right to public employment, and in balancing First Amendment rights against the need to eliminate the Communist threat, a condition of public employment could permissibly include oaths. In Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952), the Supreme Court thus upheld a New York law prohibiting the employment of public school teachers belonging to "subversive organizations." Similarly, in American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950), the Court upheld a provision of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 requiring union officers to sign oaths that they were not Communists as a legitimate exercise of congressional control over interstate commerce. By 1956, the Court had softened its stance a bit, ruling in Cole v. Young, 351 U.S. 536 (1956), that only those in "sensitive positions" could be discharged from duty for violating the loyalty-security program.

By the 1960s the Court had changed its position, striking down state loyalty oaths. Chief among these decisions was Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11 (1966), in which oaths promising not to join the Communist Party were found to be unconstitutional, as failure to comply constituted guilt by association. The following year, in Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967), the Court overturned a New York state law requiring loyalty oaths that allowed for dismissal of public employees who participated in or believed in advocating the overthrow of the government. The law violated First Amendment rights of speech and association and was considered overly vague. Furthermore, the Court rejected the conditioned-privilege doctrine, declaring that the government could not condition employment on the surrender of constitutional rights.

The current status of loyalty oaths is mixed. On the one hand, in 1970, loyalty oaths were eliminated by the U.S. Civil Service Commission, and the end of similar oaths necessary to obtain federal aid soon followed. But in 1972 the Supreme Court ruled in Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. 676 (1972), that a required state oath forswearing violent overthrow of the government was constitutional. Thus, if narrowly written, certain types of loyalty oaths are constitutionally valid.

Sharon A. Manna

See also: Communists; First Amendment; Red Scare.

FURTHER READING

Emerson, Thomas I. The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Vintage, 1970.

Greenberg, Milton. "Loyalty Oaths: An Appraisal of the Legal Issues." Journal of Politics 20, 3 (1958): 487–514.

Hyman, Harold M. To Try Men's Souls: Loyalty Tests in American History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.

Kutler, Stanley I. The American Inquisition. New York: Hill and Wang, 1982.

Levinson, Sandford. Constitutional Faith. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council (1992)

Under the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the federal government must compensate property owners when it seizes their property for public use. This Takings Clause also applies to state and local government, because the U.S. Supreme Court has incorporated it in the Fourteenth Amendment to extend the "just-compensation" protection. Takings law includes both regulatory and physical takings. A "regulatory taking" refers to government regulation of private property that reduces or eliminates the value of that property. Under some circumstances government may be required to compensate the owner for the property. In Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003 (1992), the Supreme Court considered whether a land-use regulation that eliminated the total value of a parcel of property was a taking that required compensation.

In 1986 David Lucas purchased beachfront property in South Carolina for $900,000. In 1988 the South Carolina legislature prohibited new development on such property unless the owner obtained a waiver from the South Carolina Coastal Council. Lucas was denied a building permit for constructing two houses. He sued the council, claiming that the refusal to grant him a permit rendered his property worthless and hence constituted a taking of his property without compensation. The South Carolina Supreme Court upheld the law, stating that it banned the noxious use of property, which did not require any state compensation for the property.

Lucas appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, and in June 1992, in a five–four decision, the Court agreed with Lucas, ordering the state to compensate him for the original value of his property. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Antonin Scalia noted that in order for a law not to constitute a taking, it had to advance a state interest and it could not eliminate all value in a property. According to Justice Scalia, South Carolina had the power to ban new construction on beachfront property in order to prevent erosion and environmental problems. At the same time, the justice noted the state had not shown that Lucas's construction of two houses on his property was noxious or would cause any environmental problems. By banning construction on the property, the state had made Lucas's $900,000 property worthless. Without proving that the houses were noxious, the state had engaged in a taking of private property for public use. Under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, the Court ruled, the state would have to compensate Lucas for his land.

The Court's decision in Lucas created an entirely new field in Takings Clause law and presented opportunities for landowners to challenge environmental regulations in court. Prior to Lucas, the state only had to show a substantial interest in regulating property and could eliminate the value of property. Under the Lucas decision, government had to compensate landowners for a total loss of property value regardless of the reasons offered for the regulation.

Douglas Clouatre

See also: Land Use; Property Rights; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Callies, David. "Regulatory Takings and the Supreme Court." Stetson Law Review 28 (1999): 523.

Epstein, Richard. Takings: Private Property, and the Power of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.

Olivetti, Alfred. This Land Is Your Land, This Land Is My Land: The Property Rights Movement and Regulatory Takings. New York: LFB Scholarly, 2003.

Skouras, George. Takings Law and the Supreme Court: Judicial Oversight of the Regulatory State's Acquisition, Use, and Control of Private Property. New York: P. Lang, 1998.

Lynch v. Donnelly (1984)

In Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the issue of what type of government-sponsored Christmas display would be permissible under the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. That clause states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." The Establishment Clause is also applied to state and local government through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Christmas displays have posed Establishment Clause difficulty because of their religious overtones, and the Court's decisions have often turned on minor factual differences from case to case.

The display at issue in Lynch was typical of what many communities traditionally engaged in at Christmas. In association with the downtown retail merchants association, the city of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, had, for more than forty years, included a crèche (nativity scene) in its Christmas display. All items in the display were purchased at taxpayer expense and were installed by city workers. A nonprofit association owned the park where the crèche was displayed, and yearly lighting costs for the crèche were estimated at $20.

The American Civil Liberties Union and local residents sought an injunction against the inclusion of the crèche. The legal issue was whether the inclusion of a crèche in the display, which also included a banner reading "Season's Greetings," a sleigh, reindeer, a Christmas tree, candy-striped poles, Santa's house, and other traditional Christmas items, violated the Establishment Clause by endorsing religion. The district court held that inclusion of the crèche did violate the Establishment Clause, and the First Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.

In Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), a previous Court decision on the Establishment Clause, the Supreme Court explicitly stated that the clause was designed to maintain the separation of church and state. In this same case, the Court recognized that total separation was impossible, and governments and religious organizations must sometimes interact.

In supporting the display involved in Lynch, the city contended that the purpose of the entire display was exclusively secular (nonreligious). Chief Justice Warren E. Burger's five–four majority opinion reversing the First Circuit noted that in modern times Christmas had taken on nonsecular elements, and that the other items in the display were purely secular. The majority also recognized that the crèche symbolized the historical roots of the Christmas holiday. The Court held that the inclusion of the crèche did not endorse religion and that any benefit to religion by such presence of the crèche was indirect and incidental.

Concurring justices led by Sandra Day O'Connor set out a test for determining whether a government-sponsored display endorsed religion: What would "viewers fairly understand to be the purpose of the display?" This test considered the display as a whole and asked what meaning a fair person viewing the display would give to it. Viewed alone, a crèche is entirely religious in nature. However, Justice O'Connor found that when a crèche is displayed alongside purely secular Christmas symbols, the setting "changes what viewers may fairly understand to be the purpose of the display," and that such a setting serves to negate any endorsement of religion. The concurrence concluded that because the crèche itself was a traditional Christmas ornament and the display included other traditional Christmas ornaments, it did not violate the Establishment Clause.

The dissenting justices led by Justice William J. Brennan Jr. agreed that the overall display could be construed as being secular, but argued the secular items did not negate the fact that the inclusion of the crèche connoted endorsement of Christianity or the threat of excessive entanglement of church and state.

John L. Roberts

See also: County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union; Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman; Religious Symbols and Displays.

FURTHER READING

Swanson, Wayne R. The Christ Child Goes to Court. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.

Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988)

In Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988), the U.S. Supreme Court considered whether government construction activity on land used by certain Indian tribes for religious purposes constituted such interference with their religious practices as to be a violation of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Under that clause, government "shall make no law . . . prohibiting the free exercise" of religion.

In 1982, the U.S. Forest Service completed the administrative process that would allow the construction of a paved road through the Chimney Rock area of the Six Rivers National Forest in California. It also provided for timber harvesting in the same area. In doing so, the Forest Service rejected a study it had commissioned. The study recommended against construction of the road because it would cause irreparable damage to land held sacred by certain American Indians who had historically used the land for religious ceremonies that required privacy, silence, and an undisturbed natural setting. The Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, together with individual Indians, environmental organizations, and the state of California, filed suit in federal district court challenging both the road construction and the logging. The court held for the plaintiffs, finding the government's activity interfered with the free exercise of religion, and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.

In a five–three decision (Justice Anthony M. Kennedy did not participate), the Supreme Court reversed the lower courts, ruling that the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment did not prohibit the Forest Service from building the proposed road and permitting logging in the area used by the Indians for religious purposes. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the majority, accepted the assertion that the Indians' beliefs were sincere and that the Forest Service's actions would have a devastating effect on the practice of their religion. Justice O'Connor noted, however, that these projects would not "prohibit" the Indians' religious practices. The majority opinion emphasized the difficulties inherent in requiring the government to accommodate every citizen's religious beliefs and activities, because of the multiplicity and broad range of the government's activities: "Incidental effects of government programs, which may interfere with the practice of certain religions, but which have no tendency to coerce individuals into acting contrary to their religious beliefs, do not require government to bring forward a compelling justification for its otherwise lawful actions." Thus, the majority found that the Free Exercise Clause could not be interpreted in a way that would give citizens a veto over public programs unless the activity overtly prohibited the free exercise of their religion. The majority also emphasized the government's "right to use what is, after all, its land."

Justice William J. Brennan Jr., writing for the dissenters, discussed the fact that Indian religious beliefs and understandings were fundamentally different from those of the Judeo-Christian tradition. In particular, he emphasized that a "pervasive feature" of the Indian lifestyle was "the individual's relationship with the natural world." The site-specific nature of Indian religious activities arose from a perception that the land was "a sacred living being." Rejecting the majority's contention that the government's prerogative as a landowner should trump well-founded claims of Free Exercise Clause protection, he asserted that the decision in this case would have a "cruelly surreal result: governmental action that will virtually destroy a religion is nevertheless deemed not to 'burden' that religion."

Carol Barner-Barry

See also: City of Boerne v. Flores; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith; Free Exercise Clause; Sherbert v. Verner.

FURTHER READING

Griffin, Rayanne J. "Sacred Site Protection Against a Background of Religious Intolerance." University of Tulsa Law Journal 31 (Winter 1995): 393–419.

Winslow, Anastasia. "Sacred Standards: Honoring the Establishment Clause in Protecting Native American Sacred Sites." Arizona Law Review 38 (Winter 1996): 1291–1343.

M

Madison, James (1751–1836)

James Madison is one of the most significant figures in advancing and protecting civil liberties in the history of the United States. Madison served as a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, a delegate to the Continental Congress and Confederation Congress, a member of the House of Representatives, and secretary of state. Madison held office as the fourth president of the United States 1809–1817, succeeding his friend Thomas Jefferson. Although Madison served tirelessly in elected and appointed office, he also helped frame the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the Constitution.

Madison was a member of the Constitutional Committee that helped draft the Virginia Constitution of 1776. He was a leading advocate within the state for religious freedom. Madison's concerns with the developing revolutionary government in America date to the end of the Revolutionary War. During General Charles Cornwallis's campaign through the Carolinas, Madison was frustrated by the failure of the states, as organized under the Articles of Confederation, to support the South against the British. Not only was coordination lacking among the states, but the government could not compel states to fulfill their obligations to one another. Although Madison wanted to safeguard the sovereignty of the states, particularly his home state of Virginia, he recognized that a new structure of government was necessary. The key was to balance state sovereignty against the advantages of a more centralized government.

The need for adjustments in the government became evident after several events, including Shays's Rebellion in 1786, in which New Englanders rose up in demanding property and debt reforms. Stimulated by a call from the Annapolis Convention in which Madison had played a role, leaders of twelve of the thirteen states (all but Rhode Island) met in 1787 at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia for the purpose of reforming the government. On May 29, 1787, the Virginia delegation presented the Virginia plan, which called for a more organized national government that still respected state sovereignty. Although attribution of authorship is uncertain, most historians credit Madison with a significant influence on this plan that set the agenda for the convention's initial sessions and strongly influenced the resulting Constitution that the convention delegates drafted. Madison was one of the central figures at the Constitutional Convention, and his papers are still the most important records of what occurred there.

Madison's influential role in shaping the Constitution continued far beyond the convention. During the ratification battles for the new Constitution, Madison joined Alexander Hamilton and John Jay to write a series of letters that New York newspapers published as The Federalist Papers under the pseudonym "Publius."

Madison's most salient contribution, often also regarded as one of his most significant writings, was Federalist No. 10, in which he discussed the evils of faction. His gravest concern with any democratically based government was the formation of factions along lines of interest. When those who shared several interests banded together, a tyrannical majority could impose its will upon weaker minorities. It was too easy, Madison argued, for "a predominant party to trample on the rules of justice." Madison argued that a representative system, containing a larger array of people and interests, could check the power of factions. This fear of a tyranny of the majority and the desire to protect minority interests against an overreaching majority formed the basis for the constitutional protection of civil liberties.

In Virginia, Madison led the proratification forces against staunch opposition, which included such notable figures as Patrick Henry and George Mason. Over the course of a twenty-three-day battle, Madison labored to convince his fellow delegates of the soundness of the Constitution and the protections it afforded to both the citizens and government of Virginia. He argued for ratifying the document and then making any needed amendments rather than ratifying the document conditionally or calling for a second constitutional convention. Virginia's ratifying convention ultimately chose to ratify the Constitution by a vote of eighty-nine to seventy-nine.

The fourth president of the United States, James Madison was one of the most important participants in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and the primary author of the Bill of Rights. (National Archives)

Despite state ratification of the Constitution, Antifederalists, as well as Madison's friend Jefferson, had raised grave concerns that the newly established federal government would use its powers to the detriment of the states and their citizens. Critics demanded establishing a mechanism to safeguard basic freedoms and prevent the federal government from overstepping its authority. When the new federal government convened in 1789, Madison again played a central role by drafting and proposing nine amendments in the U.S. House of Representatives that became the backbone of the twelve amendments on which the House and Senate eventually agreed. Madison did not succeed in gaining approval for a provision that would have limited the ability of states to "violate the equal rights of conscience, or the freedom of the press, or the trial by jury in criminal cases." The states did approve the ten amendments that compose the Bill of Rights, with yet another proposal preventing Congress from increasing its compensation before an intervening election adopted in 1992 as the Twenty-seventh Amendment.

The Bill of Rights continues to protect basic civil rights and civil liberties. It contains protections for free speech, free exercise of religion, the right to assemble, freedom of the press, protection from unreasonable searches and seizures, the right to counsel, protections for those accused of crimes, and protection from cruel and unusual punishments. Although the Bill of Rights was enacted to limit the powers of the federal government, courts have expanded the effect of most of the first ten amendments to apply to state governments and actors via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

As a leader with Thomas Jefferson of the Democratic-Republican Party, Madison continued to express opposition to arbitrary power, whether it involved what he considered to be undue executive influence over foreign policy in the administration of George Washington or opposition to governmental restrictions on freedom of speech and press under President John Adams. Madison and Jefferson authored the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions opposing the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. As president, Madison helped reestablish the national bank that he had once battled, arguing that governmental need and practice had to be taken into account in interpreting the U.S. Constitution. He was solicitous of civil liberties during the War of 1812.

Keith Wesolowski

See also: Alien and Sedition Acts; Articles of Confederation; Bill of Rights; Jefferson, Thomas; Tyranny of the Majority; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Banning, Lance. The Sacred Fire of Liberty: James Madison and the Founding of the Federal Republic. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1995.

Burns, Edward McNall. James Madison: Philosopher of the Constitution. New York: Octagon Books, 1973.

McCoy, Drew R. The Last of the Fathers: James Madison and the Republican Legacy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Rossiter, Clinton, ed. The Federalist Papers. New York: Mentor, 1961.
Rutland, Robert Allen. The Presidency of James Madison. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1990.
Wiltshire, Susan Ford. Greece, Rome, and the Bill of Rights. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

Magna Carta

The Magna Carta (Great Charter) is perhaps the best-known and earliest guarantee of the rights of English people. Although its authors were clearly responding to issues specific to their time, the document's main provisions proved to have lasting meaning far beyond what the authors could possibly have imagined. The Magna Carta serves as a cornerstone of civil liberties not only in England but also in America.

The charter was the product of a dispute between the barons of England and King John. The sixty years that preceded its passage in 1215 witnessed the steady encroachment of centralized royal authority at the expense of local baronial power. John's father, Henry II, had replaced baronial courts and local laws with royal courts and a uniform law, a process that not only extended his authority and weakened that of the barons, but also ensured that royal revenues increased at the barons' expense. Henry's son and John's brother, Richard I, further increased royal revenues, using the income to fund a crusade and to ransom himself from captivity under the Holy Roman Emperor. When John embarked on a series of expensive but unsuccessful campaigns on the Continent, the barons grew increasingly unhappy. John further enraged them by becoming a vassal of the pope and making England a papal fief. By Easter 1215, the barons had had enough. They presented John with a list of demands; when he delayed responding, they renounced their allegiance to him and began establishing military control over the country. The two sides met at Runnymede, near Windsor, where on June 15 John agreed to the barons' demands, including a provision that granted them immunity for their rebellion; the Magna Carta was drafted and John's seal attached on June 19, 1215.

John then appealed to the pope, who immediately annulled it, despite the fact that his legate in England had willingly signed it. Both the pope and John died the next year; John's heir was his young son Henry III, whose advisers immediately reissued the Magna Carta with the clauses relating to specific, temporary issues removed. The next year, the charter was again reissued (with clauses relating to the use of forests removed). Henry reissued this third version yet again in 1225; this version became statute in 1297. In 1368 a statute of Edward III ordered that any law that was contrary to the Magna Carta was invalid. By the end of the Middle Ages, the document had been confirmed by various monarchs a total of thirty-eight times.

King John being forced to sign the Magna Carta, 1215.
(© North Wind Picture Archives)

Many of the charter's clauses were intended to ensure the proper functioning of the feudal system by codifying the kinds and amount of fees vassals were required to pay their lords and protecting the property and rights of orphans and widows. Many of these clauses were motivated by John's abuse of his position; some even mentioned certain of John's followers by name and required that they be stripped of their positions. Clause fifty-two promised to return castles and lands that Henry II, Richard I, and John had seized. A similar provision declared that John would restore illegally levied fines.

The most enduring clauses of the Magna Carta concerned the principles governing the justice system. Clause thirty-nine ensured due process: A free man could not be jailed or punished "except by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the law of the land." Though this clause applied only to free men, by the fifteenth century virtually all Englishmen fell into that category. Furthermore, men were not to be put on trial in the first place unless "credible witnesses" could be found to support the accusation. According to clause forty, justice was to be free, prompt, and available to all. In reality, this clause was often ignored, but the principle remained and endures. Clauses twenty through twenty-two stated that, in effect, the punishment should fit the crime, and penalties were to be levied only upon "the oath of honest men of the neighborhood." The Magna Carta also introduced the concept of just compensation for goods or lands appropriated by the government, a principle that survives in the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The charter also stipulated that local issues be tried locally, while at the same time establishing a permanent home for central courts rather than having them follow the royal court as it moved from place to place.

In order to prevent future abuses, two key clauses were included in the charter. Clause twelve promised that no taxes would be levied unless approved by "common counsel." Clause fourteen specified who was to be summoned to give their permission. Starting in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, it came to be understood that "common counsel" meant Parliament, which was then in its infancy. In the seventeenth century, Charles I's efforts to raise taxes outside of Parliament was a significant cause of England's civil war, and his opponents frequently cited the charter as evidence that such taxes were illegal.

The Magna Carta also included a lengthy provision intended to ensure that John and his successors adhered to the charter's provisions. It established a committee of twenty-five barons who were to see that the terms were upheld. If and when they detected any transgressions of the charter, the barons were to notify the king (or his chief justice), who then had forty days to correct the matter. Failing that, the barons were freed from their allegiance to the king and charged with the duty to "distrain and distress [the king] . . . by all possible means" until the situation was corrected; ordinary people were supposed to support the barons in their actions until the king had been brought back into compliance.

Historians and legal scholars have long debated the Magna Carta's significance. Although roughly two-thirds of the charter's clauses were specific to the time and place, the remainder have proved more enduring and have formed the basis for civil liberties over the centuries. Not the least significant is the concept that government must abide by the rule of law and that the people are entitled to redress when that government violates their rights.

Carol Loar

See also: Due Process of Law; English Bill of Rights; English Roots of Civil Liberties; Petition of Right; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Barlow, Frank. The Feudal Kingdom of England, 1042–1216. 5th ed. London and New York: Longman, 1999.

Clanchy, M. T. England and Its Rulers, 1066–1272. 2d ed. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1998.

Howard, A. E. Dick. Magna Carta: Text and Commentary. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1964.

Warren, W. L. King John. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1978.

Maher v. Roe (1977)

In the aftermath of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), that legalized abortion, a number of states tried to impose various restrictions limiting access to the procedure. One such effort was a regulation passed by the Connecticut Welfare Department that provided that no state Medicaid money could be used for a first-trimester abortion unless a physician certified that the abortion was medically necessary (physically or psychologically). The regulation was challenged by two indigent women, one (designated Susan Roe) who was unable to obtain the certification necessary to have an abortion, and another (Mary Poe) who was left with the hospital bill for her abortion when the state refused to pay. They argued that Connecticut's regulation violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by treating one group of pregnant women differently from another and interfering with their right to obtain an abortion. A three-judge U.S. District Court upheld their claim.

In Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), the Supreme Court reversed the lower court and sustained the Connecticut regulation. Writing for the Court's six–three majority, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. said that "financial need alone does not identify a suspect class for the purpose of equal protection analysis," and therefore a state was not required to fund abortion even if it paid for childbirth. Indeed, the fact that a state chose to fund childbirth and not nontherapeutic abortions was a value judgment and a legitimate policy choice, which the state had every right to make. The Court ruled that the state's policy did not represent an impermissible positive barrier to a woman's right to abortion:

> The Connecticut regulation places no obstacles—absolute or otherwise—in the pregnant woman's path to abortion. An indigent woman desiring an abortion is not disadvantaged by Connecticut's decision to fund childbirth; she continues as before to be dependent on private abortion services. . . . The indigency that may make it difficult—and in some cases, perhaps, impossible—for some women to have abortions is neither created nor in any way affected by the Connecticut regulation.

The dissenters argued that the state's refusal to fund abortions for Medicaid patients was a serious interference with the right to abortion, since a right without the resources to exercise it was meaningless. Justice William J. Brennan Jr. noted that the Court had previously ruled—in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), a case invalidating the denial of unemployment benefits to an employee who lost a job for refusing to work on her Sabbath—that the state could not use financial pressures to force individuals to waive their constitutional rights. Brennan accused the Court of now condoning such pressure by ignoring the realities of life for the poor.

The Maher decision allowed states to choose whether or not to fund nontherapeutic abortions. Most chose not to do so. As a result, access to abortion became seriously restricted for indigent women. Maher also represented the first of several limitations on abortion rights accepted by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, the Court upheld (among others) informed-consent rules, waiting periods, reporting requirements, conditional parental notification, and a congressional ban on using Medicaid money for abortion (the Hyde Amendment).

Stephen L. Robertson

See also: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Craig, Barbara Hinkson, and David M. O'Brien. Abortion and American Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1993.

Mandatory Student Activity Fees

A student activity fee (SAF) is a mandatory, nonrefundable charge levied on college or university students beyond the cost of tuition. Over 70 percent of public colleges and universities impose mandatory student fees to help fund programs and activities that benefit the students. SAF dollars are used for a number of purposes, including funding extracurricular activities such as intramural sports and supporting the many student organizations that are a part of the life of any institution of higher learning. This disbursement of funds has led to a number of concerns involving the Free Speech Clause and the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. The first clause protects the right of free speech; the second prohibits government from engaging in establishment of religion. In the context of SAF money, the two clauses have been in tension in several cases.

Student activity fees fall under a type of First Amendment analysis called the "public-forum doctrine." The Supreme Court has recognized three types of public forums: traditional, nonpublic, and limited or designated forums. Each forum permits different levels of expression, and the Court applies different tests to government restrictions on speech depending on the forum and nature of the regulation. The limited or designated public forum includes public property opened up by the state for expressive activity. Mandatory SAF schemes fall into this category.

The U.S. Supreme Court first addressed the issue of mandatory student activity fees in Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995). A student at the university sought financing from the SAF fund for publication of a Christian magazine by Wide Awake Productions. The university argued that the magazine was a religious activity and that it had a compelling interest in denying funding in order to comply with the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which prohibits government from engaging in activity that would constitute "establishment" of religion.

In Rosenberger, a divided Supreme Court held that the denial of funds for the religious publication was unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's majority opinion emphasized free speech rights over Establishment Clause concerns. He concluded that the SAF fund constituted a limited public forum and that the student publication was denied funding because of its religious viewpoint. Kennedy said that funding the publication would not advance religion and that the government program was neutral toward religion.

In a dissenting opinion, Justice David H. Souter argued that the magazine was a sectarian religious publication and the university's refusal to fund the publication was compelled by the Establishment Clause. Souter was concerned that the decision could open the door to greater government entanglement with religion. As a consequence of the Rosenberger decision, the University of Virginia established a policy that granted a refund to any students who objected to how their activities fees were being spent.

In another SAF case, in 1996 three students attending the University of Wisconsin Law School at Madison sued the Board of Regents and the state university system. The students, self-described religious conservatives, claimed that the allocable fee system violated their rights against "compelled" speech. Some of the organizations whose advocacy the students strongly opposed included the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Campus Center; the International Socialist Organization; and Amnesty International. More than four decades previously, in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), the Supreme Court had recognized a right against compelled speech by holding that the First Amendment prohibited government from requiring a citizen to support ideas that the citizen found objectionable.

The funds at the University of Wisconsin were distributed in three ways: (1) The Associated Students of Madison appropriated funds for registered student groups for general operations, travel, and special events; (2) funds were distributed by a committee of the student government in the form of grants to student organizations, university departments, and community-based service organizations; (3) any registered student group could seek funding through a student-body referendum vote.

In defending the fee distribution system, the university argued that no student was required to join an organization, nor were students required to attend programs or events that were offensive to them. Objecting students could form their own organizations and seek funding. School officials also claimed that individual students had no more right to object to the student fee system than they could object to what courses were being taught or to the content of courses given by professors with whom they might disagree.

A unanimous Supreme Court upheld the university's student fee system in Board of Regents v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000). The Court argued that the university had a legitimate educational policy of encouraging a marketplace of ideas among students. A mandatory fee was a reasonable way to promote this goal. The Court emphasized, however, that such programs had to be administered in a viewpoint-neutral fashion, and the Wisconsin program, except for the voting procedure, satisfied this requirement.

The Rosenberger holding expanded the protection for student religious speech, and the Southworth decision rejected a compelled-speech challenge to a mandatory SAF system. Both decisions reaffirmed the use of a mandatory student activity fee system by public universities and colleges to promote a diverse marketplace of ideas.

John Fliter and James F. Van Orden

See also: Board of Regents v. Southworth; Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Rosenberger v. University of Virginia; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette.

FURTHER READING

Calvert, Clay. "Where the Right Went Wrong in Southworth: Underestimating the Power of the Martketplace." University of Maine Law Review 53 (2001): 53.

Theroux, Christine. "Assessing the Constitutionality of Mandatory Student Activity Fee Systems: All Students Benefit." Connecticut Law Review 33 (Winter 2001): 691–723.

Thoe, Kari. "A Learning Experience: Discovering the Balance Between Fees-Funded Public Fora and Compelled-Speech Rights at American Universities." Minnesota Law Review 82 (May 1998): 1425–63.

Mann Act

Also known as the "White Slave Traffic Act," the Mann Act of 1910 prohibited transportation of women and girls across state lines for prostitution; it was ultimately expanded by federal prosecutors to include noncoercive sexual relationships pursued through interstate travel. The act originated from highly publicized (and perhaps exaggerated) allegations of forcible prostitution and made it a federal felony to take women or girls, or aid in their taking, between states or in foreign commerce for this purpose, "debauchery," or "any other immoral purpose." The Mann Act thus raised the issue of whether it was within the federal government's responsibilities and powers to restrict certain freedoms to protect citizens' morality and safety, or whether state and local authorities had exclusive control over the police power. Recent decades of jurisprudence have often favored the federal government, but the Mann Act was written and upheld at a time when this question was much more controversial.

Although the Commerce Clause in Article I, Section 8 of the U.S. Constitution gives Congress the power to "regulate commerce . . . among the several states," the U.S. Supreme Court has long been at the center of debate over what exactly "commerce" entails. Such discussions may seem academic and relatively minor, but the larger question involves how much power the national government should have over activities traditionally considered within the realm of local and state regulatory and police powers, including sexual activity. Early cases concerning Congress's legislative powers, such as McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819), and Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1 (1824), established broad precedents for national powers concerning basic interstate economic activities, but it took over a hundred more years for the Supreme Court to give the federal government consistent support for reaching into a wider variety of local affairs.

When the Supreme Court upheld the Mann Act in Hoke v. United States, 227 U.S. 308 (1913), precedents were still divided and somewhat inconsistent regarding what should be considered interstate commerce. In the late nineteenth century, the Court started to become open to congressional regulations of interstate transportation if related to local health and morality, but it kept to a minimum the federal power to regulate more purely economic local activities.

Immediate precedents for Hoke included Champion v. Ames, 188 U.S. 321 (1903), also known as "the lottery case," in which a divided Court upheld the conviction of a man accused of shipping foreign lottery tickets between states in violation of the 1895 Federal Lottery Act. In that case, Justice Harlan wrote "[A] State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the 'widespread pestilence of lotteries' and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another." In dissent, Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller, joined by three other justices, was more protective of state powers: "To hold that Congress has general police power would be to hold that it may accomplish objects not entrusted to the General Government, and to defeat the operation of the 10th Amendment."

Chuck Berry playing guitar, 1957. In 1959 he was convicted under the Mann Act for transporting a woman across state lines for immoral purposes and served a two-year sentence. (Library of Congress)

Despite this argument for restricting Congress's powers to regulate local activity, the majority's holding in the lottery case gave progressives in Congress hope that the federal government could be used to regulate a variety of local activities. Within a decade of the Champion case, Congress passed new meat inspection laws, the Pure Food and Drugs Act, and the Mann Act, all of which were upheld in later cases.

In Hoke, Justice Joseph McKenna, writing for the unanimous Court, specifically cited the Champion case as well as the small group of other precedents supporting congressional regulation of certain types of interstate commerce:

> [I]f the facility of interstate transportation can be taken away from the demoralization of lotteries, the debasement of obscene literature, the contagion of diseased cattle or persons, the impurity of food and drugs, the like facility can be taken away from the systematic enticement to and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women, and more insistently, of girls. . . . Congress has power over transportation 'among the several States'; that the power is complete in itself, > and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulation.

In 1917 the Supreme Court expanded upon the Mann Act to permit additional federal prosecution of noncommercial, noncoercive interstate "debauchery" in Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470 (1917). The federal government later relied on this precedent to investigate high-profile individuals, such as actor Charlie Chaplin, for sexual activity unrelated to prostitution.

But the Court was not set completely on a new course for federal interference in local health and safety concerns. In Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918), the Court declared unconstitutional a 1916 federal law prohibiting items in interstate commerce made by children of certain ages working certain hours. In the majority opinion by Justice William R. Day, the Court differentiated federal regulation of child labor from other kinds of activity that might be used as precedent, such as the Mann Act, and said "in each of these instances the use of interstate transportation was necessary to the accomplishment of harmful results. . . . This element is wanting in the present case. . . . The goods shipped are of themselves harmless." Although the logic of Hammer and Hoke may seem inconsistent, it is important to remember that the Mann Act did not outlaw local prostitution, only its interstate traffic, whereas the child labor law essentially tried to create minimum age and hour standards for children, at the time a completely local issue. Today, prosecution under the Mann Act has become quite rare, but child labor is heavily regulated by the federal government and has been since 1941.

Jasmine Farrier

See also: Congress and Civil Liberties; Police Power.

FURTHER READING

Langum, David J. Crossing over the Line: Legislating Morality and the Mann Act. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

Mapp v. Ohio (1961)

In the landmark decision of Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), the U.S. Supreme Court held that all evidence obtained by searches and seizures in violation of the federal Constitution would be deemed inadmissible in a criminal trial in a state court. In doing so, the Court reversed in part its holding in Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), and significantly altered the landscape of criminal law and police practices in the United States. The Court widened the parameters of protection against illegal police conduct by specifying that the federal exclusionary rule—a rule of evidence disallowing admission at trial of evidence obtained by law enforcement in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution—applied to the states as well.

The case arose in spring 1957 when Cleveland police officers made a warrantless search of the home of Dollree Mapp and her daughter. Based on an anonymous tip they had received, the Cleveland police went to the Mapp home in search of an individual connected to a recent bombing who was believed to be hiding out in the home. Mapp phoned her attorney and refused to let the police enter the premises after the officers failed to produce a search warrant. The stalemate lasted for three hours when more officers arrived on the scene and the police entered the home by forcing open at least one door. When the police entered the home, Mapp demanded to see the search warrant, and one of the officers held up a piece of paper that was claimed to be a warrant. Mapp grabbed the paper and a struggle ensued in which the officers recovered the paper and handcuffed Mapp for being belligerent.

The officers then searched the premises, including Mapp's room, her daughter's bedroom, the kitchen, dinette, living room, and basement. In the basement the police located a trunk containing books and pictures said to be lewd and lascivious; as a result, Mapp was arrested on charges of violating the Ohio law prohibiting the possession of obscene materials. She was subsequently convicted and sentenced to one to seven years in prison based on the evidence found in the trunk, despite the fact that the prosecution produced no search warrant at trial.

The central legal issue in Mapp was the application of the federal exclusionary rule to the states. Under this legal doctrine, evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment—by means of an unreasonable search or seizure—must be excluded in a trial proceeding in a federal court. The Supreme Court first articulated the doctrine in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), noting the underlying premise that using evidence obtained by unreasonable searches and seizures was akin to compulsory self-incrimination and therefore the evidence must be excluded. The rule became the subject of significant legal argument. Before joining the Supreme Court, Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo summarized the criticism of the exclusionary rule when he wrote in People v. Defore, 242 N.Y. 13, 150 N.E. 585 (1926), "The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered." Nonetheless, the Court repeatedly reaffirmed applicability of the rule in federal court, such as in Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920).

Despite the federal doctrine, states were not compelled to implement the exclusionary rule, because the Fourth Amendment, though clearly applicable to the federal government, was not necessarily applicable to the actions of state authorities. The Supreme Court specifically addressed the issue in Wolf and concluded that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment did incorporate the Fourth Amendment and make it applicable to the states, but specifically held that this incorporation did not forbid in state courts the admission of evidence obtained by unreasonable searches and seizures. In the majority opinion in Wolf, Justice Felix Frankfurter contended the exclusionary rule was only one remedy for illegal searches and seizures and left it to the states to implement their own remedies. The result was that state courts were not prohibited under the federal Constitution from using evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

Twelve years later, the Supreme Court in Mapp reversed the Wolf holding by which states could avoid applying the exclusionary rule. Writing for the majority, Justice Tom C. Clark noted that states were required to comply with the Fourth Amendment and that the exclusionary rule was the only effective means to protect the Fourth Amendment rights of U.S. citizens. Justice Clark made a pointed criticism of the existing system that allowed states to avoid the federal sanction for illegally obtained evidence: "The ignoble shortcut to conviction left open to the State tends to destroy the entire system of constitutional restraints on which the liberties of the people rest."

The implications of Mapp continued to be significant and even were popularized through television and movies. Nonetheless, even years after the decision, some justices continued to argue against the broad application of the exclusionary rule in the United States. Justice Warren E. Burger, dissenting in Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), concluded the rule was "conceptually sterile" and "practically ineffective." Although Mapp continues to be the controlling law, the Court has modified the decision by recognizing exceptions to the application of the exclusionary rule, including finding and expanding a good faith exception for law enforcement officers in cases such as United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), and Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984).

Kevin M. Wagner

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Good Faith Exception.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure: First Principles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Marcuse, Herbert (1898–1979)

After emigrating from Germany to the United States in 1934, Herbert Marcuse gradually established himself as America's most prominent academic advocate of leftist revolution. Combining philosophical elements of Georg W. F. Hegel, Karl Marx, and Sigmund Freud into his social criticism, Marcuse argued that twentieth-century capitalism had become a "totalitarian" machine that crushed dissent and obstructed the cause of human liberation. In assimilating Freudian psychoanalysis into a Marxist account of human history, Marcuse sought to expand the boundaries of freedom beyond the quest for economic equality to the elimination of sexual repression. As a result, he emerged as a primary inspiration for the student protests of the 1960s and the politics of cultural liberation that followed.

Marcuse studied philosophy under Martin Heidegger, embraced Marxist social analysis, and wrote his doctoral thesis on Georg W. F. Hegel. Marcuse saw Hegel as the key to understanding Marx and thought the idealism of Hegel's philosophy provided a corrective to the mechanistic materialism of Marx. In Reason and Revolution (1941), Marcuse described Hegel's work as a meditation on how human freedom advances through history, culminating in the "liberty, equality, and fraternity" of the French Revolution. Although Marcuse remained committed to a Marxist account of historical class struggle and the need for economic equality to liberate man from domination, he was also troubled by the failure of Marx's predictions of global revolution. Hegel's humanism suggested to him, against Marx, that the development of ideas could significantly affect the realization of the human needs to be free and happy.

In Eros and Civilization (1955), Marcuse argued that Freud could help explain how a repressive social system manipulated human needs and prevented their fulfillment. Freud had described "repression" as the foundation of civilization itself, a necessary and universal psychological process of delayed gratification by which instinctual sexual energy, or "libido," is redirected to productive tasks. Adding a historical dimension, Marcuse held that repression is variable: Although some minimal level of repression is necessary, most qualifies as "surplus repression," existing only to maintain the dominance of oppressive social classes by diverting the dangerous instinctual energies of subordinate groups. Because civilization had succeeded fully in producing material abundance, the historical purpose served by repression has become obsolete, and all that remains is the class domination. The oppressed must revolt for both justice and pleasure.

Marcuse had become pessimistic a decade later in One-Dimensional Man (1964), generally considered his most significant work. Instead of collapsing, Western capitalism appeared stronger than ever; even worse, it seemed to be making people happy. Rather than rethinking his Marxist assumptions, Marcuse took this as a sign that capitalism had become a "totalitarian" system much like its Cold War adversary, the Soviet Union. To maintain their monopoly on power, capitalists had learned to market technological comfort and sexual gratification, assimilating the avenues of revolt into a culture of bourgeois conformity. Even civil liberties were tools of domination insofar as consumer choice offered the illusion of autonomy and free election the illusion of influence. In a system of market rationality and manufactured needs, revolution was impossible.

Marcuse developed these ideas in "Repressive Tolerance" (1965) and An Essay on Liberation (1969). In the former, he argued that the liberal defense of "tolerance" maintains the conservative status quo by undermining the revolutionary commitment to "truth." Tolerance should thus be denied to right-wing movements but extended to left-wing movements, even when violent. In the latter, Marcuse speculated on the possibility of revolution from unexpected quarters. The decline of the blue-collar workforce suggests, contrary to Marx, that students, the unemployed, and radicalized urban minorities might serve as a vanguard for systematic social change. Marcuse's mix of sex and social theory proved well adapted to his era, but its ultimate coherence as a system of thought and guide to social policy remains in question.

Robb A. McDaniel

See also: Liberalism.

FURTHER READING

Brienes, Paul, ed. Critical Interruptions: New Left Perspectives on Herbert Marcuse. New York: Herder and Herder, 1970.

Kellner, Douglas. Herbert Marcuse and the Crisis of Marxism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.

MacIntyre, Alasdair. Herbert Marcuse: An Exposition and Polemic. New York: Viking, 1970.

Marcuse, Herbert. Reason and Revolution: Hegel and the Rise of Social Theory. Boston: Beacon, 1941.

———. Eros and Civilization: A Philosophical Inquiry into Freud. Boston: Beacon, 1955.

———. One-Dimensional Man: Studies in the Ideology of Advanced Industrial Society. Boston: Beacon, 1964.
———. "Repressive Tolerance." In A Critique of Pure Tolerance, ed. Robert Paul Wolff, Barrington Moore Jr., and Herbert Marcuse. Boston: Beacon, 1965.
———. An Essay on Liberation. Boston: Beacon, 1969.
Schoolman, Morton. The Imaginary Witness: The Critical Theory of Herbert Marcuse. New York: Free Press, 1980.

Marketplace of Ideas

The "marketplace of ideas" refers to the belief that the free circulation of ideas is the best way to determine truth. It is an important concept fundamental to the exercise of free expression as provided by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and has been deemed indispensable to the functioning of a democracy such as the United States. The concept was first articulated by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. in Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919), in which he dissented from the majority decision upholding the convictions of five individuals for violating the Espionage Act of 1917 by distributing leaflets urging opposition to World War I:

> [T]he ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which [the people's] wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. Every year if not every day we have to wager our salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge. While that experiment is part of our system I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country.

Some scholars have viewed Justice Holmes's statements as suggesting that freedom of expression is the best means of advancing knowledge and discovering truth: "[A]n individual who seeks knowledge and truth must hear all sides of the question. . . . He must consider all alternatives, test his judgment by exposing it to opposition, make full use of different minds to sift the true from the false. . . . [S]uppression of information, discussion, or the clash of opinion prevents one from reaching the most rational judgment, blocks the generation of new ideas, and tends to perpetuate error."

Despite the simplicity and apparent logic of the marketplace concept, few commentators believe that a free and open marketplace of ideas will necessarily or inevitably lead to the "truth." There have been many instances of "market failure" when the populace has failed to use the marketplace to make good or wise choices—for example, the election of Adolf Hitler and the rise of Nazi Germany in the late 1930s. Indeed, many critics doubt that truth is objective and question whether it is even possible to ascertain the truth. Some have argued that "knowledge depends on how people's interests, needs, and experiences" lead them to evaluate information and data. In addition, many psychological traits (for example, repressions, phobias, desires) "influence people's assimilation of messages" and their "understanding of perspectives." These psychological traits can lead to market failure and can "eviscerate . . . faith in the ability of the marketplace of ideas to lead to the 'best' truths or understandings."

Even though the assumptions that underlie the marketplace-of-ideas theory have been largely repudiated, the concept survives for a variety of reasons. First, the alternative to a free and open marketplace of ideas (governmental decrees of truth and repression of ideas the government regards as untrue) is repugnant to the concept of a free society. As one commentator stated, "The only justification for suppressing an opinion is that those who seek to suppress it are infallible in their judgment of the truth. But no individual or group can be infallible, particularly in a constantly changing world." Second, the United States functions as a representative democracy, which necessarily assumes that people should be allowed to choose their representatives. In order to exercise that right effectively, the people must be able to debate the issues of the day freely and openly and reach political consensus (at the ballot box) regarding those issues. This process necessarily assumes the existence of an open marketplace or forum of ideas and the ability to foster change through persuasion. The U.S. Supreme Court retained the marketplace concept in Nike, Inc. v. Kasky, 123 S. Ct. 2554 (2003): "The First Amendment's protections of speech and press were 'fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes.' "

Russell L. Weaver

See also: Abrams v. United States; First Amendment; Gitlow v. New York; Schenck v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Baker, C. Edwin. "Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech." University of California at Los Angeles Law Review 25 (1978): 964.

Bork, Robert H. "Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems." Indiana Law Journal 47 (1971): 1.

Emerson, Thomas I. "Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment." Yale Law Journal 72 (1963): 877.

Meiklejohn, Alexander. "The First Amendment Is an Absolute." Supreme Court Review (1961): 245.

Redish, Martin H. Freedom of Expression: A Critical Analysis. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 1984.

Scanlon, Thomas A. "A Theory of Freedom of Expression." Philosophy and Public Affairs 1 (1972): 204.

This Certifies That
of
State of
AND
of
State of
WERE UNITED IN HOLY MATRIMONY
According to the Ordinance of GOD and the Laws of the STATE of at on the day of in the year of Our Lord
One Thousand Eight Hundred and Witnesses

Marriage certificate, circa 1877. The marriage of a U.S. citizen receives legal recognition and thus can be a basis for claims, immunities, privileges, or entitlements. Although the right to marry is not mentioned in the Constitution, it has evolved into a fundamental right and has been left primarily to the states to regulate under the Tenth Amendment. (Library of Congress)

Marriage, Right to

The "right to marriage" means that the marriage of a U.S. citizen receives legal recognition and thus can be a basis for claims, immunities, privileges, or entitlements. Although the right to marry is not mentioned in the U.S. Constitution, it has evolved into a fundamental right and has been left to the states to regulate under the Tenth Amendment, though within limits that have slowly changed alongside the evolution in the institution of marriage itself. Regulation of the marital relation by the state has emerged out of a history wherein marriage was overdetermined by religious authorities, and common law marriage in the face of illegal unmarried cohabitation was the norm.

The importance of marriage was stressed in Maynard v. Hill, 125 U.S. 190 (1888): "Marriage, as creating the most important relation in life, as having more to do with the morals and civilization of a people than any other institution, has always been subject to the control of the legislature. . . . It is not so much the result of private agreement, as of public ordination. . . . It is a great public institution, giving character to our whole civil polity." Maynard notwithstanding, freedom of choice has fostered increasingly broad personal rights as regards marriage as well as divorce, and these rights challenge the social and legal status and restrictions surrounding the "traditional marriage."

The right to marry was given as one of the basic civil rights of mankind, linked to procreation, as the U.S. Supreme Court recognized in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942). The right to marry was first recognized as a liberty protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632 (1974). In Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978), the Court determined marriage was a fundamental liberty interest falling under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as well as its Equal Protection Clause. Identification of the marital relationship as an individual's fundamental right with constitutional protection was recognized in a series of privacy cases starting with Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), in which the Court stated that marriage was a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights and covered a married couple's use of contraception. In Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), the Court affirmed an individual's right to marry the person of his or her choice regardless of that person's race, thus finally striking down antimiscegenation laws in those six states that still maintained them.

Marriage is a civil contract that denotes a civil status. It is civil because it specifies a legal relationship subject to the control of the state, though marriages may be solemnized by acceptable religious authorities as well as by the state's agent, such as a justice of the peace. It is a contract because this relationship requires the consent of the two individuals party to it, whose personal, voluntary decision to get married is a prerequisite to license by the state. Marriage cannot be discarded at will but requires legal dissolution.

Many American citizens might subscribe to the romantic notion that their most personal relations of affection are for the most part undisturbed by the state, but this depends crucially on the identity of the claimant for the right to marry. The right to marry has until recently been denied to same-sex couples. In Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, 14 Mass. L. Rep. 591 (2003), however, the Massachusetts Supreme Court decided that the Massachusetts ban on same-sex marriage violated the state's commitment under its constitution to equal protection. In a follow-up decision with the same name, 440 Mass. 309 (2004), the court ruled that recognition of "civil unions" was not equivalent to marriage. Mayors in other cities in the United States have also issued marriage licenses to same-sex couples. The Defense of Marriage Act, signed into law by President William Clinton in 1996, defines marriage as exclusively between one man and one woman, calling into question the status of such relationships, especially in other states. President George W. Bush subsequently called for a constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage throughout the United States. The much older restriction on the right to marry regarding a maximum of one spouse at a time remains in force across the fifty states, following the first unsuccessful challenge to the rule of monogamous marriage by members of the Mormon Church in Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879). Although certain limitations on the right to marry, such as age and degrees of relationship or kinship, may endure, others may emerge or return to the courts because of the increasingly pluralist nature of American society (for example, immigrants from some Muslim and Hindu countries where plural marriage is practiced) and changes in the law in nations similar to the United States (such as acceptance of same-sex marriage in some European Union states).

Gordon A. Babst

See also: Family Rights; Griswold v. Connecticut; Loving v. Virginia; Parental Rights; Polygamy; Reynolds v. United States; Transgender Legal Issues in the United States; Zablocki v. Redhail.

FURTHER READING

Babst, Gordon A. Liberal Constitutionalism, Marriage, and Sexual Orientation: A Contemporary Case for Disestablishment. New York: Peter Lang, 2002.

Hartog, Hendrik. Man and Wife in America: A History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Marshall, John (1755–1835)

John Marshall, the longest-serving chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, is considered the most important jurist in American history. He was responsible for, in essence, creating America's common law through his numerous opinions, and he authored several that concerned new civil rights and civil liberties created under the U.S. Constitution. As he stated in one prominent decision, Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803): "The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of government is to afford that protection. [The] government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men."

John Marshall was born September 24, 1755, into a family that had intimate ties to the Virginia gentry through his mother, who was related to the prominent Randolph family. One of his cousins was Thomas Jefferson, with whom Marshall would have many political conflicts later in life. Jefferson, however, was not the only famous founding father young Marshall knew; he attended the Westmoreland County Academy in Virginia with James Monroe. Later, Marshall took up arms with the Culpeper Minute Men to fight for American independence, and he became friends with Alexander Hamilton while both were camped at Valley Forge under the command of George Washington. (The feelings Marshall garnered then for Washington's leadership later led him to write a five-volume biography of the first president during his tenure as chief justice.)

After the Revolutionary War, Marshall resumed his studies. He chose to attend the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, Virginia, where he became one of the earliest members of Phi Beta Kappa. Also at that time, he studied law under George Wythe, America's first law professor, and entered the Virginia bar. He gained wide fame as a young lawyer and became active in Virginia politics, serving in the legislature and at the state convention to ratify the United States Constitution. He later served as a diplomat during John Adams's presidency (1797–1801) and ultimately became secretary of state.

In fact, John Adams served as the major catalyst for Marshall's judicial career. As his presidential term was nearing its end, Adams nominated Marshall, whom he knew to be a loyal Federalist, to be chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court in 1801. Marshall would serve in that capacity until his death in 1835. However, the position Adams appointed Marshall to was not the position of power it is today. When Marshall assumed the position of chief justice, the Supreme Court was not a truly coequal branch of government; rather, it was quite powerless to curb the actions of the executive or legislative branches. This would all change under Marshall's leadership.

Marshall's decision in Marbury v. Madison was significant because it created the concept of judicial review, the right of the judiciary to determine the constitutionality of the enactments and actions of the federal government. This concept would become an important tool in ensuring the civil rights and civil liberties guaranteed by the Constitution, because it enabled the Court to protect those freedoms through its judicial decisions. Later, Marshall's decision in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264 (1821), extended judicial review to actions taken by state legislatures and executives as well. Indeed, the Court would use judicial review over a century later to initiate integration in the South.

Marshall's most direct influence on civil rights and civil liberties, however, involved individual property rights, which he defended in two important cases by applying the Contracts Clause of the Constitution. Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. 87 (1810) and Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. 518 (1819), would shape precedent for many years.

Fletcher v. Peck resulted from land grants issued by the Georgia legislature, which at that time was riddled with corruption. In the mid-1790s, the Georgia legislature issued land grants for the western part of its territory (now the states of Alabama and Mississippi). Those fraudulent grants, however, were later rescinded by the Georgia legislature after the corrupt legislators were defeated at the polls. The new legislature also terminated the rights of subsequent repurchasers. Fletcher, a repurchaser who had bought land from one of these grants, sued for breach of warranty of title. Marshall ruled that the Georgia legislature had acted unconstitutionally because it had violated the Contracts Clause of the Constitution. He stated that "in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot divest those rights." In other words, once a right was given to the citizenry by the legislature, that right could not be revoked summarily, because the Constitution prohibits such an action.

Almost a decade later, Marshall was faced with a similar question in Dartmouth College. In that case, the New Hampshire legislature changed the 1769 royal charter that established Dartmouth College. Specifically, the legislature ousted the current trustees, changed the appointment process to involve the political process, and instituted external public oversight of the university. The former trustees sued under the Contracts Clause; their lawyer was Daniel Webster. Marshall agreed that the New Hampshire legislature acted in an unconstitutional manner, and he extended the protections of the Contracts Clause to corporate charters. Of major importance, he determined Dartmouth was a private, not public, institution, thus placing it beyond the New Hampshire legislature's purview. He further ruled that the royal charter was a contract and therefore was covered by the Contracts Clause. Because the university was private and the Contracts Clause applied, the New Hampshire legislature could not impinge on the college's property rights. Thus, Marshall again held property rights inviolate and found private entities exempt from state regulation.

Later, toward the end of his tenure as chief justice, Marshall employed the Commerce Clause to recognize property rights resulting from treaties made with Native Americans in Georgia. Although he initially held in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U.S. 1 (1831), that the Cherokee Nation could not be heard by the Court because its tribes were "domestic dependent nations" and in "a state of pupilage" to the United States, Marshall changed course in Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. 515 (1832), finding unconstitutional the laws passed by the Georgia legislature that did not recognize Cherokee sovereignty: "From the commencement of our Government, Congress has passed acts to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians, which treat them as nations, respect their rights, and manifest a firm purpose to afford that protection which treaties stipulate." He also stressed that all dealings with Native American nations were the exclusive province of the federal government pursuant to the Commerce Clause. The Georgia legislature, therefore, acted unconstitutionally when it tried to negate Native American property rights. President Andrew Jackson, however, would not enforce Marshall's decision, which resulted in the removal of the Cherokees from Georgia, an event called the "trail of tears."

If only one of Marshall's decisions had to be selected for its influence on civil rights and civil liberties, Barron v. City of Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833), would be the case. John Barron owned a wharf in Baltimore, and he argued that the city's diversion of streams by his wharf violated his Fifth Amendment rights, because the city took part of his property without paying "just compensation." Marshall disagreed, however, and ruled that the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) did not apply to the states but rather constrained only the actions of the federal government. He ruled that civil and political liberties had to be guaranteed by state constitutions for an individual to recover:

> The [federal] [C]onstitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States for themselves, for their own government and not for the government of the individual States. Each State established a constitution for itself, and in that constitution, provided such limitations and restrictions on the powers of its particular government as its judgment dictated. . . . Had the people of the several States, or any of them, required changes in their constitutions; had they required additional safeguards to liberty from the apprehended encroachments of their particular governments; the remedy was in their own hands, and would have been applied by themselves.

This philosophy held sway in U.S. jurisprudence until the early decades of the twentieth century, when the Court retreated from this position and started selectively to incorporate provisions of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment and apply them to the states through its Due Process Clause.

It is easy to read Barron as an indicator that Marshall's opinion was a negative influence on civil rights and civil liberties, but this sentiment ignores the decisions Marshall issued that established the fundamental individual property rights of the citizenry, especially in protecting those rights against interference by state legislatures. Through a number of very important decisions during the early days of the republic, Marshall shaped precedent that was relied on for years. He never saw the far-reaching effect of these cases because he died while still serving as chief justice July 6, 1835, but his influence on the law is still felt to this day.

David T. Harold

See also: Barron v. City of Baltimore; Fletcher v. Peck; Judicial Review; Property Rights; Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Leonard. John Marshall: A Life in the Law. New York: Macmillan, 1974.
Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
Hobson, Charles F. The Great Chief Justice: John Marshall and the Rule of Law. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1996.
Johnson, Herbert A. The Chief Justiceship of John Marshall, 1801–1835. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
Newmyer, R. Kent. John Marshall and the Heroic Age of the Supreme Court. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001.
Smith, Jean Edward. John Marshall: Definer of a Nation. New York: Henry Holt, 1996.

Marshall, Thurgood (1908–1993)

One of the best-known legal figures of the twentieth century, Thurgood Marshall was a crusader for civil rights and liberties as an attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), solicitor general of the United States, judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals, and associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court (1967–1991). Marshall believed in a "living Constitution," liberally interpreted to meet modern societal needs, and the rule of law. These were his chosen vehicles in a sixty-year legal career devoted to achieving not only civil rights for African Americans but also equality for women, the poor, and other underrepresented and disadvantaged people.

Marshall was born in Baltimore, Maryland, on July 2, 1908, the grandson of a slave. His father, William Marshall, worked as a Pullman car waiter and later as headwaiter at the Gibson Country Club. His mother, Norma Williams Marshall, taught elementary school and made tremendous sacrifices, such as pawning her wedding ring, in order to help pay for Thurgood's schooling. As a young man, Marshall attended local elementary and secondary schools for "colored" children. His experiences growing up in a segregated city had a lasting effect and influenced the career decisions he made later in life. After completing high school in Baltimore in 1925, he followed his brother William Aubrey Marshall and attended the historically African American Lincoln University in Chester, Pennsylvania, graduating with a bachelor's degree in 1929. After the University of Maryland Law School denied him admission because he was African American, he enrolled at Howard University Law School. At Howard he met the school's dean, Charles Hamilton Houston, the first African American lawyer to win a case before the U.S. Supreme Court. After graduating first in his class from Howard in 1933, Marshall passed the Maryland bar exam and went into private practice in his hometown of Baltimore. At the same time, he lent his legal talents to the local NAACP. Ironically, in one of his first legal victories, he forced the University of Maryland Law School to admit its first African American law student in 1935.

Marshall soon followed his law school mentor, Charles Houston, to New York and in 1938 was named the NAACP's chief legal officer, succeeding Houston. In 1940, Marshall helped to establish the organization's newly created Legal Defense and Education Fund (LDF). Marshall's tenure as head of the LDF, from 1940 to 1961, was a crucial time for the group that sought to overturn racial discrimination in American society. Marshall was joined in this effort by a host of brilliant young attorneys, including Charles Houston, William Hastie, William Coleman, Jack Greenberg, Lou Pollak, and others. Together, they implemented a long-term legal strategy to end racial segregation in housing, voting, and public education. As lead counsel, Marshall piled up a number of impressive victories before the Supreme Court. For example, in Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944), he successfully argued that a southern state's exclusion of African American voters from primary elections was unconstitutional. In Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948), he convinced the Court to rule that state judicial enforcement of racial "restrictive covenants" in housing was unconstitutional. In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950), he persuaded the justices that the new law school Texas created for African Americans was not equal to the existing law school at the University of Texas Law School at Austin.

Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, talking to reporters in New York City after the Supreme Court ordered school desegregation to take place "with all deliberate speed," 1955. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Each of these victories helped lay the foundation for Marshall's most important case, Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). Marshall argued that placing African American children in segregated schools harmed them. He coupled legal arguments with social science studies to illustrate the damaging effect. In a unanimous opinion, the Supreme Court abandoned the doctrine of "separate but equal" and declared segregation of public schools unconstitutional. Although significant desegregation of public schools took decades to achieve, Brown was an important legal and moral victory for the civil rights movement. In all, Marshall won twenty-nine of the thirty-two civil rights cases he argued before the Court.

President John F. Kennedy appointed Marshall to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in 1961, despite concerted opposition by a group of southern senators who held up his confirmation for months. Marshall served on the Second Circuit through 1965 and wrote nearly one hundred majority opinions, with none ever overturned by the Supreme Court. Many of his opinions focused on civil liberties issues, such as the rights of immigrants, limiting government intrusion in cases involving illegal search and seizure, double jeopardy, and right to privacy.

In 1965, President Lyndon Johnson appointed Marshall to the post of solicitor general of the United States, the government's chief lawyer before the Supreme Court. During his two-year tenure as solicitor, he won fourteen of the nineteen cases he argued before the Court, including a successful defense of the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

In 1967, Johnson appointed Marshall to the Supreme Court, making him the first African American ever to serve on that body. Marshall's twenty-four-year tenure on the Court was marked by a number of important victories in the area of civil rights and liberties. He challenged racism, bigotry, sexism, sexual preference, and prejudice in both his pointed questions during oral argument and his numerous opinions. He often joined his longtime ally Justice William J. Brennan Jr. and the other liberal members of the Court in such landmark cases as Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), which espoused the modern doctrine of protected speech; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which held that the death penalty as then administered was unconstitutional; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), which said that women had a constitutional right to privacy that included abortion; and Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978), which allowed the use of affirmative action programs in higher education.

Toward the end of Marshall's years on the bench, the Supreme Court grew more conservative with the appointments of a number of Republican justices by Presidents Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, and George H. W. Bush. As a result, Marshall increasingly found himself on the losing end of important cases. His dissents were often personal, written from the perspective of someone who had experienced disadvantages firsthand. For example, in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1

(1973), he criticized the majority's holding that the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection was not violated by the property tax scheme used in Texas and most other states to finance public education. In dissent, Marshall derided the majority opinion's "unsupportable acquiescence in a system which deprives children in their earliest years of the chance to reach their full potential as citizens." In City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469 (1989), the majority struck down the set-aside program used by Richmond, Virginia, for minority contractors. Disagreeing, Marshall wrote, "It is a welcome symbol of racial progress when the former capital of the Confederacy acts forthrightly to confront the effects of racial discrimination in its midst. . . . The battle against pernicious racial discrimination or its effects is nowhere near won. I must dissent."

Marshall was opposed to retiring during the administration of a Republican president. Because he did not want his replacement to be a conservative jurist, Marshall hung on to his seat through the administration of Ronald Reagan. But in the third year of George H. W. Bush's presidency, Marshall finally relented—unable adequately to perform his judicial duties. He officially retired at the end of the Court's term on June 27, 1991, at the age of eighty-two; George H. W. Bush nominated another African American, Clarence Thomas, with much different political leanings, in Marshall's stead. Marshall died a year and a half later on January 24, 1993.

Artemus Ward

See also: Brandenburg v. Ohio; Brennan, William J., Jr.; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Roe v. Wade; Solicitor General; Thomas, Clarence.

FURTHER READING

Rowan, Carl T. Dreammakers and Dreambreakers: The World of Justice Thurgood Marshall. Boston, MA: Little, Brown, 1993.

Tushnet, Mark V. Making Civil Rights Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1935–1961. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Williams, Juan. Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary. New York: Times Books, 2000.

Martial Law

The term "martial law" is used to describe two different but related events. The most common application refers to the displacement of civilian rule in a country by its own military authorities. Martial law also has been used to describe the military government of another nation's territories occupied by a victorious invader as the result of military conflict. U.S. history provides examples of both types of martial law and the conflicts that arise between the imposition of martial law and the preservation of civil liberties. Conflict arises from the differences between military procedures designed to maximize operational effectiveness and security in an area, on the one hand, and constitutional guarantees of due process designed to minimize government intrusion into civilian life, on the other.

The first sense of martial law describes a government responding to a threatening situation perceived as beyond the capacity of the regular civilian government to address. This perceived threat is used to justify the use of military authority to enhance government control in an area. The civil authorities may be only partially displaced, with the military assuming limited supplemental authority, or they may be totally supplanted with the military replacing the civilian government entirely.

In the United States, both national and state governments have imposed martial law. In court challenges to the use of military government of U.S. civilian populations, petitioners have argued that constitutional guarantees of civil liberties place strict limitations on this practice. During the War of 1812, General Andrew Jackson declared martial law in New Orleans. He imposed curfews on the civilian population and ordered the trial of civilians by military commission when he deemed their conduct contrary to the maintenance of order. A federal district court judge condemned Jackson's orders and declared them unconstitutional. The war ended before the case went beyond the district-court level.

During the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln issued a proclamation September 24, 1862, declaring a limited state of martial law throughout the country and placing under the jurisdiction of military authorities "all rebels and insurgents, their aiders and abettors, within the United States." This proclamation of martial law authorized the trial of civilians by military commissions and suspended the writ of habeas corpus (a petition for release from unlawful confinement). President Lincoln's proclamation was challenged in the landmark U.S. Supreme Court case of Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866). Lambdin Milligan, a civilian in Indiana, had been tried and sentenced by a military court under the president's declaration of martial law. His attorneys presented a lengthy list of precedents from British, French, and U.S. history supporting their argument that extension of martial law to a nation's own civilians violated the civilians' basic rights unless the regular civil authorities were not able to govern a jurisdiction. In contrast, the government supported its position by arguing that the rights of the civilians were superseded by necessity in times of military conflict and the government had the inherent right to do what was necessary to preserve the Union.

Martial law on the Colorado border stops migratory laborers, 1936. (Library of Congress)

The Court was persuaded by the defense's argument and held that martial law could not be extended to civilians in the United States outside the area of insurrection if the civilian courts were still operating. The Supreme Court reaffirmed this precedent in Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946), when it held unconstitutional the trial of civilians by military courts under a declaration of martial law in Hawaii following the 1941 Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii.

State governors have declared martial law in response to both natural disasters and incidents of civil unrest. Declarations of martial law in response to labor unrest have been controversial. Union members have alleged that state authorities use the pretext of civil unrest to deploy troops to favor management interests in the labor dispute. Such allegations were made against California Governor Frank Merriam for using the California National Guard during the San Francisco general strike of 1934 and against Governor James Peabody for using the Colorado National Guard in response to the Cripple Creek miners' strike of 1903–1904.

The second sense of the term "martial law" refers to the military government of occupied territory in time of war. The Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 governs modern practice and defines the obligations of occupying military powers during and after military conflict. The standards set forth in those treaties can be traced to the example set by U.S. General Winfield Scott's orders for his troops governing occupied territory in Mexico in 1846 and 1847. In his General Orders No. 20, General Scott used his troops to maintain law and order and perform the functions of traditional civilian courts.

General Scott's martial law administration provided guidance to Francis Lieber when he wrote General Orders No. 100, Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, published in 1863 and issued as a manual to federal troops during the Civil War. This manual specified the obligations of military forces to provide law and order and the essential functions of civil government in occupied areas. Lieber's manual became the model for the modern international conventions that require an invading force to ensure that law and order are maintained and the traditional functions of civil government are performed in occupied territories. Military and civilian leaders of occupying governments have been tried and convicted by international tribunals for violating these conventions.

Pinky S. Wassenberg

See also: Lincoln, Abraham; President and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Carnahan, Burrus M. "Lincoln, Lieber, and the Laws of War: The Origin and Limits of the Principle of Military Necessity." American Journal of International Law 92, 2 (April 1998): 213–31.

Gabriel, Ralph H. "American Experience with Military Government." American Historical Review 49, 4 (July 1944): 630–43.

Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. August 12, 1949. 6 United States Treaties 3516; 75 United Nations Treaty Series 287.

Hudson, James J. "The Role of the California National Guard During the San Francisco General Strike of 1934." Military Affairs 46, 2 (April 1982): 76–83.

MacDonnell, Timothy C. "Military Commissions and Courts-Martial: A Brief Discussion of the Constitutional and Jurisdictional Distinctions Between the Two Courts." Army Lawyer 19 (2002): 27–28.

Marcus, Maxine. "Humanitarian Intervention Without Borders: Belligerent Occupation or Colonization." Houston Journal of International Law 25 (Fall 2002): 99–139.

Osur, Alan M. 1982. "The Role of the Colorado National Guard in Civil Disturbances." Military Affairs 46, 1 (February 1982): 19–24.

Massachusetts Body of Liberties

Thought to be the world's first modern bill of rights, the Massachusetts Body of Liberties was drafted in 1641 in response to both the practical necessity of codifying the laws of the young Massachusetts Bay Colony, as well as a popular desire to guard against the capricious actions of the Puritan governor and his magistrates. In form, the document was an extensive list of rights, procedures, and powers compiled by Nathaniel Ward, a preacher from nearby Ipswich, Massachusetts. Totaling ninety-eight numbered entries, the Body of Liberties addressed in detail the rights of the colonists in such matters as criminal proceedings, conscription, and even jury duty. Remarkably, seven of the twenty-six distinct rights spelled out in the Bill of Rights had their origin in this document, a number equal to the combined contributions of the Magna Carta, the English Petition of Right, and the English Bill of Rights.

Ward's document built on prior efforts by the colony to compile the existing laws of the towns that made up the Massachusetts Bay Colony, as well as to suggest appropriate measures in those areas where the laws were silent. Although owing much to English common law, the Body of Liberties was nevertheless striking in its appeal to Old Testament biblical law. Indeed, torn from its historical context, the document could be dismissed as simply a reactionary and oppressive instrument. Certainly, the evidence was there: The purchase of slaves was expressly allowed, and capital punishment was prescribed for such offenses as blasphemy.

Yet to embrace this view would be to miss the importance of the document in continuing and expanding for some in the New World the liberties first advanced in the Magna Carta; likewise overlooked would be the Body of Liberties' genesis, in part, as a bulwark protecting colonists from the threat of arbitrary government action; finally, also neglected would be the unique tension it reflected: The colony's Puritans were convinced that daily life was a struggle between serving out the higher purposes of God and resisting the temptations of the temporal world's surfeit of power, riches, and pleasures. Called on a mission to create a "city on a hill," a biblical commonwealth that would be the example for all other communities to follow, the Puritans raised the stakes of failure. The presence, then, of Old Testament passages in a document that limited the action of government through an enumeration of liberties should not be surprising, as it reflected the Puritans' attempt both to ground the law in the higher world of godly authority yet to recognize that governments were composed of fellow fallible persons against which individuals needed some measure of defense.

As an artifact of its era, the Body of Liberties reflects the Puritans' struggle to reconcile faith with the realities of worldly disorder. Yet it remains compelling in that it contains the seeds not only of America's greatest achievement in civil liberties—the Bill of Rights—but also, in the embrace of slavery, of its most egregious error.

Patrick Campbell

See also: Bill of Rights; Christian Roots of Civil Liberties; Magna Carta.

FURTHER READING

Lutz, Donald S. Colonial Origins of the American Revolution. Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund, 1998.

Miller, Perry. The New England Mind in the Seventeenth Century. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1954.

Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917)

Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 244 F. 535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917), held that for speech to be stifled there must be a showing that the speech, written or oral, would lead the reader or hearer to participate in immediate unlawful action. It was the first prominent case to address the issue of incitement, and its rationale is still used by courts today in cases involving free speech rights under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

In some quarters, war has never been a popular thing. That was true in 1863, as it was in 1968, as it was in the days leading up to U.S. entrance into World War I. Catering to this segment of the population was the Masses Publishing Company. It produced a monthly radical publication called The Masses. The postmaster of New York City, T. G. Patten, however, was not fond of this publication, and he barred its dissemination after consulting with the postmaster general of the United States. The rationale for his action was that The Masses violated the Espionage Act.

The Espionage Act of 1917 made it illegal to "willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or promote the success of its enemies." The Masses did this, the postmaster argued, through four cartoons and four articles in its August 1917 issue. Examples of this subversiveness were found in a poetic tribute to Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, who were in prison for conspiracy to oppose the draft; an article praising those two individuals for opposing the draft; and a cartoon that showed the Liberty Bell broken into fragments. Masses Publishing moved for a preliminary injunction to prevent the postmaster from keeping The Masses out of circulation. The case was assigned to Learned Hand, a district court judge for the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

As it would turn out, Hand's opinion in Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten was the first major decision to address the concept of "incitement" as it related to the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment. In fact, Masses was an influence on Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. when he penned the concept of "clear and present danger" in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919). Ultimately, the U.S. Supreme Court in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), adopted Hand's rationale in Masses to guarantee the rights of those who chose to espouse beliefs that were not shared by the general public.

So what did Hand write that was so noteworthy? He created the concept that for speech to be suppressed, whether it be in written or spoken form, it must incite the reader or hearer to participate in immediate unlawful action. In other words, "[t]o counsel or advise a man to an act is to urge upon him either that it is his interest or his duty to do it." The Masses did not contain such "incitement," Judge Hand found.

He made it a point to show that it was important to review both the manner of the words used as well as the content before free speech rights could be infringed: "Words are not only the keys of persuasion, but the triggers of action, and those which have no purport but to counsel the violation of law cannot by any latitude of interpretation be a part of that public opinion which is the final source of government in a democratic state." Violence was not to be tolerated; free speech was.

For Hand, there was a fine line to be walked between prosecuting those who actively counseled the overthrow of government and those who held beliefs adverse to the government's aims. He ruled that "to assimilate agitation, legitimate as such, with direct incitement to violent resistance, is to disregard the tolerance of all methods of political agitation which in normal times is a safeguard of free government. The distinction is not a scholastic subterfuge, but a hard-bought acquisition in the fight for freedom, and the purpose to disregard it must be evident when the power exists. If one stops short of urging upon others that it is their duty or their interest to resist the law, it seems to me one should not be held to have attempted to cause its violation." This approach, however, was not endorsed by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which reversed his opinion outright in Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 246 F. 24 (2d Cir. 1917).

But Hand believed—and rightly so, as history suggests—that this standard should be employed whenever incitement was an issue. In fact, he participated in heated letter writing with Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., who was a close friend, as to whether "clear and present danger" or his test from Masses was the proper analysis for a court to conduct before ruling on an incitement case. Two years after his decision, as a tribute to Hand's opinion in Masses, noted constitutional scholar Zechariah Chafee dedicated his book Freedom of Speech to Hand. Ultimately, the power of the Masses decision is its longevity and its clear reasoning that courts follow to this day.

David T. Harold

See also: Brandenburg v. Ohio; Clear and Present Danger; First Amendment; Hand, Learned; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Schenck v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Griffith, Kathryn. Judge Learned Hand and the Role of the Federal Judiciary. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.

Gunther, Gerald. Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.

Schick, Marvin. Learned Hand's Court. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970.

Shanks, Herschel. The Art and Craft of Judging: The Decisions of Judge Learned Hand. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

Mayflower Compact

In September 1620, a party of English Separatists, dissenters from the alleged "Romanism" of the Church of England, left Britain to establish a semi-autonomous community in North America. On November 11, sheltered within Cape Cod Bay and prior to going ashore, the settlers drafted and signed the Mayflower Compact, an agreement that established lines of political authority and allegiance, and in time was interpreted as the seed of American constitutionalism, in both its form (a compact) and its content (the securing of civil rights).

According to William Bradford, the Compact's first signatory and the colony's future governor, the Separatists wanted the "churches of God [to] revert to their ancient purity and recover their primitive order, liberty and beauty." Seeking freedom to worship, they obtained a charter from the Virginia Company to settle in North America.

The origins of the Mayflower Compact are traceable to the Virginia Company's charter. The Pilgrims landed in Massachusetts, missing their authorized settlement in Virginia by several hundred miles and taking them to a place outside the jurisdiction of the Virginia Company. The charter granted by the Virginia Company had established the foundations of political authority in the future colony, but the failure to land at the point specified appeared to nullify the agreement and create a vacuum of authority. The Pilgrims' agreement within the charter to remain in communion with the Church of England, to obey the king, and to recognize the ultimate ecclesiastical authority of the crown was undermined.

Bradford explained how the Compact developed: "Occasioned partly by the discontented and mutinous speeches that some of the strangers amongst them had let fall from them in the ship: That when they came ashore they would use their own liberty, for none had power to command them, the patent they had being for Virginia and not for New England, which belonged to another government, with which the Virginia Company had nothing to do."

The continuities between the Mayflower Compact and the constitutionalism of the Declaration of Independence and Constitution are complex. The contractual form of the agreement, as well as the Pilgrims' embryonic concern for religious liberty and civil rights, mark the Compact as an obvious precursor to America's later process of developing a constitution. Yet the Compact also reveals a decidedly preliberal understanding of political authority and the purposes of government.

The Pilgrims signing the compact on board the Mayflower, November 11, 1620. (Library of Congress)

For example, it would become clear from their own intolerance toward dissent that the Pilgrims sought religious freedom as a group, not as individuals. Furthermore, the ends of government articulated in the Compact were different from those later advanced in the American Revolution and secured by the state and national constitutions. According to the Declaration of Independence, government exists to secure rights. Yet the Compact describes the Pilgrims' voyage as "undertaken, for the glory of God and advancement of the Christian faith and honour of our king and country." Only to attain those goals did they "covenant and combine . . . into a civil body politic."

The relationship between America's Puritan origins and its later liberal revolution is complex. As recognized by French statesman and author of Democracy in America Alexis de Tocqueville (1805–1859), seventh U.S. president John Quincy Adams (1767–1848), and numerous constitutional interpreters, the Mayflower Compact is at least a part of America's civil religion, and it points the way toward a more sophisticated constitutionalism that would result in a richer protection of personal liberty.

Brendan Dunn

See also: Constitutionalism; Declaration of Independence; English Roots of Civil Liberties; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Bradford, William. Of Plymouth Plantation: 1620–1647. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1952.

Kendall, Willmoore, and George Carey. The Basic Symbols of the American Political Tradition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1970.
Zuckert, Michael. The Natural Rights Republic. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996.

McCardle, Ex parte (1868)

In Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. 506 (1868), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a law removing its authority to review a case concerning an individual whose right to a writ of habeas corpus was taken away. This case is important for the role it played in the battle among the three branches of the federal government over post–Civil War Reconstruction policies and in the development of case law on the limitations of the powers of the U.S. Supreme Court. One issue in play was whether the Court had power to protect individuals' civil liberties that were being restricted by the legislative branch.

William McCardle, editor of a Vicksburg, Mississippi, newspaper, was to be tried before a military commission on charges of inciting insurrection and publishing libelous materials in violation of the statutes Congress had passed to govern the defeated Confederate states. McCardle petitioned the U.S. Circuit Court for a writ of habeas corpus. (A "writ of habeas corpus" orders the government official confining an individual to produce the individual in court so the court can ascertain the legality of the individual's confinement.) McCardle argued that the recently decided U.S. Supreme Court case of Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866), prohibited the trial of civilians by military commission when the regular civilian courts were operating. After his petition was denied, McCardle appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The statutory basis of McCardle's appeal is important to understanding the significance of the McCardle decision. The U.S. Constitution does not specify the scope of the federal courts' power to use the writ of habeas corpus. The Judiciary Act of 1789 recognized the power of the federal courts to issue the writ in cases of individuals held by federal authorities. In 1867, Congress amended the Judiciary Act extending the federal courts' power to issue the writs to include cases involving individuals held by state authorities as well. That 1867 statute also specifically authorized the appeal of habeas corpus cases to the U.S. Supreme Court. After McCardle's appeal had been argued before the Supreme Court, but before the Court had issued its decision, Congress passed another statute. This 1868 statute repealed the portion of the 1867 statute that had authorized McCardle's appeal to the Supreme Court. Championing the repeal statute were Republican senators who feared the Court would use McCardle's case to declare unconstitutional the statutory structure of Reconstruction government in the southern states.

In response to the passage of the repeal statute, the Supreme Court asked the parties to the McCardle case to appear again before the Court and argue the jurisdiction issue. The Court issued its unanimous decision in December in an opinion written by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase holding that Article III of the U.S. Constitution gave Congress the power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction and that Congress had done so in the 1868 statute. The Court did not have the power to question the motives Congress had in passing the statute and, lacking jurisdiction, the Court only had the authority to dismiss the appeal.

Critics of McCardle accuse the Court of failing to exercise its constitutional authority to protect civil liberties from attack by the legislative branch. However, later in the 1868 term, in Ex parte Yerger, 75 U.S. 85 (1868), the Supreme Court reasserted its authority to hear appeals of habeas corpus petitions by holding that power was authorized by the original 1789 Judiciary Act. The 1868 repeal statute was interpreted to apply only to the extension of the Court's power granted by the 1867 amendment to the original statute.

The McCardle case is cited in contemporary legal literature as establishing the principle that the Supreme Court reads Article III of the U.S. Constitution as giving Congress the authority to limit, for any reason, the Court's appellate jurisdiction. The Court will not examine those motivations. As historical precedent, the case shows that Congress can be vulnerable to the temptation to use this power over the Court's appellate jurisdiction to block the Court from protecting civil liberties in times of national emergency. However, as the Court showed in Yerger, the obstacle to appellate review created by Congress is vulnerable to a creative reading of legislative history presented by a defendant's attorney who is able to show the justices a way to get at the merits of a civil liberties case without disturbing the Article III principle.

Pinky S. Wassenberg

See also: Civil War and Civil Liberties; Habeas Corpus.

FURTHER READING

Kutler, Stanley I. "Ex parte McCardle: Judicial Impotency? The Supreme Court and Reconstruction Reconsidered." American Historical Review 72, 3 (April 1967): 835–51.

Wiecek, William M. "The Great Writ and Reconstruction: The Habeas Corpus Act of 1867." Journal of Southern History 36, 4 (November 1970): 530–48.

McCarran Act

The McCarran Act, officially known as the Internal Security Act of 1950, was the major attempt by Congress to move from criminalizing the activities of the Communist Party to regulating those activities. The statute created a policy of compulsory registration of Communists and communist organizations while decriminalizing membership on the theory that public exposure of Communists would also expose their secret activities. Because of the U.S. Constitution's Fifth Amendment provision against self-incrimination, compulsory registration had not been possible so long as membership remained a crime. The act also provided the federal government with the authority to round up registered subversives and transport them to internment camps in cases of national emergency. The legislation raised problems pertaining to the right of free association protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The legislation required that "Communist-action organizations" register with the Subversive Activities Control Board (SACB), providing the names and addresses of their officers and members and persons who actively participated in their activities. Communist-action organizations were defined by how closely their political positions followed those espoused by international communism, their dependence on financial support from foreign governments, and whether members were perceived as disloyal to the United States. Organizations did not have to advocate the violent overthrow of the government or commit any form of violence, sabotage, or espionage to be listed. In 1954 the McCarran Act was amended to include a new category, "Communist-infiltrated" organizations, organizations that were not allied with the Communist Party but had a number of party members in leadership positions. SACB became bogged down in a long series of legal challenges to its proceedings, however, and many of its findings were invalidated after it used perjured testimony in its conclusions.

Registered organizations were denied the tax benefits generally extended to nonprofit groups; any mail an organization sent was required to be stamped as being disseminated by a "Communist-action" organization; and members could not hold a variety of jobs with the government or with private businesses performing work for the government considered sensitive. Organization members were prohibited from using or attempting to use a passport or even applying for one. Under the second part of the act, members could be interned, much as Japanese Americans were during World War II, as a preventive measure if federal authorities believed that a communistic invasion or revolution was imminent.

The McCarran Act was reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 351 U.S. 115 (1956), but the Court avoided the issue of compulsory registration by focusing on SACB's use of allegedly perjured testimony in its hearings. Five years later, the Supreme Court upheld the registration requirement for organizations in Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (1961), by arguing that registration with SACB was little different from the registration required of many commercial organizations by the government under the securities laws. The Court's opinion avoided the question of how the disclosure of members' and sympathizers' names would affect those individuals. That issue was decided four years later in Albertson v. Subversive Activities

Control Board, 382 U.S. 70 (1965), when the Court found that mere association with the Communist Party was enough to provoke reasonable fears of prosecution among members, thus infringing on their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. In Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964), the Supreme Court had already struck down the denial of passports to members of the Communist Party because the prohibition violated the constitutionally protected right to travel.

The McCarran Act was effectively invalidated by the courts during the mid-1960s after fear of communism had faded. Although SACB had issued several orders to register, organizations continued to resist the orders, a strategy that was validated when the Supreme Court voided the board's remaining orders. The Court found that the record on which the orders were based was too antiquated to be used in determining whether the organizations were currently Communist-controlled in American Committee for Protection of the Foreign-Born v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 380 U.S. 503 (1965), and Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 380 U.S. 513 (1965). Two years later, the McCarran Act became completely moot following United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258 (1967), when the Supreme Court found that the legislation "quite literally establishes guilt by association alone," violating the First Amendment right of association.

Daniel A. Levin

See also: Communists; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Harper, Alan D. The Politics of Loyalty. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1969.

McCarthy, Joseph (1908–1957)

Joseph McCarthy was a Republican senator from Wisconsin who, from 1950 to 1954, launched a series of investigations into alleged Communist infiltration in the United States. His investigations led to the suppression of the rights of many individuals.

McCarthy began his career as a senator when he defeated Senator Robert La Follette Jr., son of the famous Republican senator, in the 1946 Wisconsin election. His early career was uneventful until a speech he made in 1950 in Wheeling, West Virginia, in which he announced he had the names of dozens of known Communists in the Department of State. His claim followed the discovery of a series of spy rings at the top levels of government that included Alger Hiss, Lawrence Duggan, and Harry Dexter White. McCarthy had run on an anticommunism agenda during his Senate campaign and made speeches against communism on the Senate floor, but after the West Virginia speech he became the driving force in Congress for anticommunism. His speech likely was the opening blast in his reelection campaign for 1952, but it soon spun out of control.

Using his position as chairman of the Senate Government Operations Committee, McCarthy began hearings and investigations about what he said were examples of Communist infiltration of the government and society in general. Over the period 1950–1954, McCarthy used the committee's subpoena power to call witnesses, bully and threaten them, and Senator Joseph McCarthy grins boldly during a recess of his subcommittee's hearing at Albany, New York, February 1954. He is holding up a reprint of an advertisement reading "McCarthyism is treason to America" that was paid for by the independent United Electrical Workers Union.

(© Topham/The Image Works)

damage the cause of anticommunism in the United States.

McCarthy and his committee were unrelenting, attacking those with Communist ties and smearing those who were not Communists. His questioning of the beliefs and motives of witnesses was seen by some as an attack on the individual right of free association. McCarthy exhibited an overbearing demeanor and reckless conduct during the hearings, and he seemed less directed at rooting out Communists than garnering attention for his own purposes. His refusal to abide by the moderate tone found in the nation's political and legal discourse made him an easy target for those who despised anticommunism. Hearings have been described as the "greatest disaster in the history of American anticommunism." McCarthy smeared the witnesses before his committee, but he and the entire anticommunism movement were smeared by his opponents.

McCarthy's downfall was inevitable, as his attacks became more strident. He accused the administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower of deliberately protecting Communists within the executive branch and took aim at one of the most respected institutions in American society, the U.S. military. In the Army-McCarthy hearings, the senator made wild accusations against the military and was met by a withering denial from military officials. The hearings were broadcast on television, giving American citizens their first view of McCarthy's style of questioning. They did not like what they saw, and his support in the polls plummeted. The Senate took action in December 1954, formally censuring McCarthy and ending his committee's hearings. McCarthy continued serving as senator until his death in 1957.

Douglas Clouatre

See also: Blacklisting; Communists; Dennis v. United States; McCarthyism; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Herman, Arthur. Joseph McCarthy. New York: Free Press, 2000.

Powers, Richard Gid. Not Without Honor. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

Reeves, Thomas. The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy. Lanham, MD: Madison Books, 1997.

McCarthyism

McCarthyism refers to the political practice of falsely accusing political opponents of being disloyal to the United States. The tactic often is used to suppress political opponents and therefore it works to threaten political dissent and disagreement. For those committed to free speech rights as guaranteed under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, McCarthyism is a major threat to civil liberties.

McCarthyism is named after Senator Joseph McCarthy (1908–1957) (R-WI) who from 1950 through 1954 used Senate hearings and speeches to root out alleged Communist influence or infiltration in the State Department, the military, and Hollywood. McCarthyism is thus often also referred to as "red baiting," or the practice of seeking to discredit political opponents, usually those on the liberal or political left, by labeling them as Communists and disloyal to the United States.

When the czar's government fell to the Bolsheviks in 1917, many U.S. observers feared that Russian spies were seeking to infiltrate America and orchestrate its overthrow. In the 1930s and during the Great Depression, the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) grew rapidly, heightening that concern. During the 1930s and 1940s, several laws, such as the Smith Act, were passed by Congress in an effort to make Communist advocacy illegal, and the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) was formed in 1938 to investigate Communist influence in the United States. As a member of HUAC, Rep. Richard M. Nixon (R-CA) held hearings into supposed Communist activity in the country.

After World War II, fear that the Soviet Union would steal U.S. secrets about nuclear weapons, the North Korean invasion of South Korea in 1950, and the arrest of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in 1950 for allegedly spying for the Soviets exacerbated Communist hysteria. Within this context, McCarthyism emerged.

In February 1950, in a speech in West Virginia,

Senator McCarthy claimed to have a list of fifty-seven known Communist spies who were working in the State Department. He did not name names or offer proof, and in speeches and subsequent Senate hearings, the numbers of supposed Communists changed and their identity was occasionally revealed. The best evidence indicates that the vast majority of these individuals were not Communists but were instead political liberals or other persons who were labeled as such for a variety of personal and political motives.

From 1950 until 1954, Senator McCarthy, along with his assistant Roy Cohn, held numerous hearings into alleged Communist influence in the United States. These hearings often involved the use of subpoenas to compel witnesses, often with little notice, to appear before Senator McCarthy's committee where they were asked about their alleged Communist activities and also directed to name others who were Communists. Witnesses were badgered and threatened when they refused to answer questions by pleading or invoking their Fifth Amendment right to remain silent. Through these hearings and speeches, many individuals, including General George Marshall, were accused of being disloyal, and fellow senators and other individuals who criticized Senator McCarthy and his tactics were accused of being Communist sympathizers.

As a result of the hearings, many individuals lost their jobs in and outside of government. In Hollywood, in part as a result of director Elia Kazan's testimony naming Communists in the motion picture industry, a blacklist was created that prevented supposed Communists from working in the movies. Dozens of individuals lost their jobs. Beyond the State Department and Hollywood, Communist hysteria led to the requirement that individuals sign loyalty oaths; in general, red baiting was used across the country to brand many people as unpatriotic. Organizations suspected of being Communist fronts were placed on the Attorney General's List of Subversive Organizations, with membership in these groups often used as proof of a person's political disloyalty.

The legacy of McCarthyism in America has been enormous. Many people were questioned by McCarthy about their political views, with the senator often asking people, "Are you now or have you been a member of the Communist Party?" Individuals were often demeaned by being described as "card-carrying members of the Community Party." These phrases became part of American popular culture.

Some scholars argue that McCarthyism began with Senator McCarthy and the threat of communism, but others see it as rooted in various aspects of U.S. political and social psychology. Arthur Miller's The Crucible, written in the 1950s, is a play about the 1692 Salem, Massachusetts, witch-hunts that resulted in the deaths of twenty-four people—nineteen were hanged, four died in prison, and one was crushed to death—because they were accused of being witches. Miller and others contend that the Salem witch-hunts were an early precursor of McCarthyism, in that lies and fear were used to attack individuals who were unpopular. In this conceptualization of McCarthyism, its real roots rest in fear and prejudice against foreigners and unpopular individuals, and thus there are other examples to cite, such as the 1798 Alien and Sedition Acts and, after the 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor, the forcible relocation of and internment of over 125,000 loyal Japanese Americans into concentration camps.

McCarthyism did not end with the 1950s. Since then, the tactic of equating political criticism with disloyalty has persisted. For example, J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation scrutinized Martin Luther King Jr. and the civil rights movement during the 1950s and 1960s, and those who participated in these activities and demonstrations were labeled Communists. During the 1988 presidential race, some observers saw McCarthyism at work when Republican presidential candidate George H. W. Bush attacked Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis as being a "card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union." In addition, after the terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001, Congress passed the Patriot Act to make it easier for government to investigate terrorist activity in the country. Some critics have contended that President George W. Bush and U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft have used McCarthyite tactics to attack their political critics. In sum, McCarthyism as a means of questioning political loyalty has been a potent tactic to attack opponents and suppress dissent.

David Schultz

See also: Blacklisting; McCarthy, Joseph; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties; Red Baiting; Red Scare.

FURTHER READING

Morgan, Ted. Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Random House, 2003.

McCleskey v. Kemp (1987)

In McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987), the U.S. Supreme Court rejected a challenge to capital punishment rooted in statistical findings of racial bias in sentencing. In so doing, it closed off what opponents of the death penalty had viewed as a promising line of attack. Attorneys for Warren McCleskey, an African American man convicted in Georgia of murdering a white police officer, sought to challenge his death sentence on the grounds that it reflected a racial bias that permeated Georgia's system of capital punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition on cruel and unusual punishments and of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The equal protection argument had been unsuccessful when presented by earlier advocates of abolishing the death penalty, but McCleskey's counsel had reason to believe that it would fare better by the mid-1980s because new research substantiated claims that race played a significant role in Georgia's capital sentencing. More specifically, a team of researchers, led by David Baldus, examined almost 2,500 murder and nonnegligent homicide cases in Georgia during the 1970s and performed a multivariate analysis of factors potentially related to the decision to impose a death sentence. The Baldus study found that the decision to impose death sentences was weakly correlated with the race of the perpetrator and more strongly correlated with the race of the victim. In other words, an African American murderer was likelier to receive a death sentence than a white murderer, and one who killed a white person was likelier to receive a death sentence than one who killed an African American person.

When it agreed to hear McCleskey, the Supreme Court was embroiled in conflict over capital punishment. Conservatives argued that the death penalty's effectiveness was undermined by the lengthy capital appeals process, whereas liberals claimed that a capital sentence was inherently cruel and unusual punishment. These divisions within the Court were evident in its five–four decision rejecting McCleskey's equal protection claim. Led by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., the majority refused to assess the validity of the Baldus study's methodology and results. Instead, the Court assumed the study's validity but held that its findings were insufficient to sustain a claim of racial bias in capital sentencing. It would not be enough to show that a jurisdiction's capital sentencing decisions, taken in the aggregate, reflected an intent to discriminate; an appellant would have to demonstrate that racial bias had permeated his or her specific proceedings. The majority acknowledged that the Court had accepted similar uses of statistical findings when considering discrimination in the contexts of employment and jury selection, but held that capital sentencing decisions required consideration of factors unique to each defendant and criminal offense, such that courts could not draw inferences about particular sentencing decisions from general statistical patterns.

McCleskey, then, represented a crucial setback for anti-death-penalty activists. Had the Court relied on the Baldus study in overturning McCleskey's death sentence, it would have acknowledged that capital sentencing was administered arbitrarily in Georgia, contrary to the Court's dictates in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972). The constitutionality of capital punishment would then have been called into question whenever statistical evidence of racial discrimination in capital sentencing could be demonstrated. Instead, the Court raised the bar for claimants such as McCleskey.

Jeremy Buchman

See also: Capital Punishment; Furman v. Georgia; Gregg v. Georgia.

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Lee, and Joseph F. Kobylka. The Supreme Court and Legal Change: Abortion and the Death Penalty. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
Lazarus, Edward. Closed Chambers: The First Eyewitness Ac- count of the Epic Struggles Inside the Supreme Court. New York: Times Books, 1998.

Russell, Gregory D. The Death Penalty and Racial Bias: Overturning Supreme Court Assumptions. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1994.

McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003)

In McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 124 S. Ct. 619 (2003), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the Bipartisan Campaign Finance Reform Act of 2002, popularly known as the McCain-Feingold Act. This law imposed new limits on how money may be used by individuals and some groups to influence elections. Campaign finance in elections has generated multiple issues involving rights to free speech and association under the First Amendment to the Constitution.

The regulation of money in politics is historically a cycle of regulation, loophole discovery, and exploitation. By 2002 the system put in place by the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974—and modified by the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)—hung in tatters: Both political parties evaded restrictions on political contributions to individuals by raising millions of dollars in unregulated "soft money"—cash purportedly earmarked for "party-building activities" such as voter registration drives but routinely redirected for carefully worded television advertisements. Consequently, the process swung into the legislation phase, resulting in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA).

The brainchild of Senators John McCain (R-AZ) and Russell Feingold (D-WI) and Representatives Christopher Shays (R-CT) and Martin Meehan (D-MA), the BCRA closed the soft-money loophole, forcing the political parties to raise only money that could be tracked by statutory limits. It also banned interest groups, corporations, and unions from using general treasury funds to run television commercials that referred to a particular candidate within thirty days of a primary election or within sixty days of a general election (discarded was the old "magic words" doctrine banning only the urging of a candidate's election or defeat). Groups could now only run commercials referring to specific candidates close to election day if they had been paid for by money raised specifically for advertising purposes through a political action committee. Other provisions included an increase in the overall contribution limits, which had remained static since the passage of the FECA, and a structure in which candidates facing independently wealthy opponents would have their contribution limits trebled if deep-pocketed opponents dipped into their personal assets to fund their campaigns.

Within days of its passage in March 2002, the BCRA was challenged in several lawsuits, including one filed by its main congressional antagonist, Senator Mitch McConnell (R-KY). McConnell eventually secured his name atop the consolidated litigation, which featured a list of eighty-four plaintiffs representing diverse political viewpoints, including the National Rifle Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, the AFL-CIO, and the National Right to Work Committee. These odd alliances were a tradition in the fight over campaign finance reform; in the original Buckley lawsuit, for example, former Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox submitted an amicus (friend of the Court) brief supporting the FECA, thus making himself a legal teammate of the Ford administration's solicitor general, Robert Bork—who had controversially fired Cox in the 1973 "Saturday night massacre" ordered by President Richard Nixon.

Pursuant to an acceleration provision in the statute—included so as to produce a ruling on its constitutionality in time for the 2004 presidential election—the lawsuit went directly before a special panel of three federal judges: District Judges Colleen Kollar-Kotelly and Richard Leon and D.C. Circuit Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson. The hoped-for expedited review took significantly longer than anticipated, however, and when the panel at last announced its ruling five months after oral argument, the reason for the delay was clear. The three judges had been comprehensively unable to find common ground on the case, and in an orgy of acrimony and contradiction, the panel produced a monstrous 1,638-page ruling that was so spectacularly incomprehensible that it required a four-page spreadsheet merely to summarize each judge's separate findings on each issue.

Finally, in December 2003, mere weeks before the first 2004 presidential primaries, the U.S. Supreme Court stunned observers by narrowly upholding the BCRA. The five–four opinion was jointly authored by Justices John Paul Stevens, for years an outspoken and caustic critic of the Court's campaign finance jurisprudence, and Sandra Day O'Connor, who had written very little on the subject during her two decades on the Court despite being the only justice even to have run for elective office.

After Buckley, the Court had consistently adhered to two basic principles in its campaign finance cases. The first was that the only constitutionally acceptable rationale for campaign finance regulation was to combat the appearance of corruption; purposes advanced for restricting political money included to level the playing field between rich and poor candidates or to hold down the cost of running for office, but these were repeatedly rejected as unworthy reasons to encroach upon the First Amendment. The second was that the only kind of corruption the Court feared was the quid pro quo exchange of a campaign contribution for a cooperative vote on legislation; a broad view of corruption signaling that the political system was generally "for sale" was insufficient to justify campaign finance rules. Although neither of these principles was abandoned in McConnell, the majority effectuated a subtle attitude adjustment that enabled it to preserve the law—and that could have far-ranging implications for future regulatory schemes.

The adjustment was a fine-tuning of the Court's understanding of quid pro quo corruption. The specter of a quid pro quo remained a prerequisite for campaign finance regulation, but the Court for the first time interpreted access to the process as a thing of value that could be offered in exchange for a campaign contribution, thus bringing the anticorruption rationale into play. Prior to McConnell, the Court had insisted that only the tangible result of the legislative process—a vote in favor of friendly legislation, a regulatory exemption, or a pork-barrel project, for example—triggered the possibility of corruption. In McConnell, the fact that the lawmaker's door was being held open for contributors was now itself regarded as a commodity, and the Court was especially cognizant of the brazenness with which this commodity was being sold by political parties and legislators. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's dissenting complaint that the Court should adhere to a system that monitored only "actual corrupt, vote-buying exchanges, as opposed to interactions that possessed quid pro quo potential" was tartly dismissed by the majority, which labeled this perspective "a crabbed view of corruption."

The language of McConnell bears the hallmarks of Justice Stevens's twenty-seven years of frustration over the Court's campaign finance decisions. But the result of McConnell is classic Justice O'Connor—a pragmatism that emphasizes the political realities that result from the Court's work, and a studious avoidance of broad statements of principle in favor of crafted compromise.

Steven B. Lichtman

See also: Buckley v. Valeo; First Amendment; Independent Expenditures.

FURTHER READING

Corrado, Anthony, Thomas E. Mann, Dan Ortiz, Trevor Potter, and Frank Sorauf, eds. Inside the Campaign Finance Battle. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2003.

Malbin, Michael, ed. Life After Reform: When the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act Meets Politics. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

McCain, John. Worth the Fighting For. New York: Random House, 2002.

McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission (1995)

In McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 514 U.S. 334 (1995), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that an Ohio law banning the distribution of anonymous political campaign literature violated the right of free speech protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. The issue was whether anonymity of the communication deprived the speech of First Amendment protection.

Margaret McIntyre opposed her local school district's request for a tax levy. She expressed her opposition by preparing and distributing flyers to persons attending a public meeting concerning the levy. Some of the flyers identified her as the author, but others were signed "Concerned Parents and Tax Payers." None of the information on the flyers was false, misleading, or libelous. An assistant school superintendent informed McIntyre that some of the flyers did not conform to Ohio's election laws because they did not identify the author. McIntyre handed out more flyers at a second public meeting. The tax levy was defeated in two public votes before being approved in a third election. Five months after the levy was approved, the assistant school superintendent filed a complaint with the Ohio Elections Commission, charging McIntyre with illegal distribution of anonymous flyers. The commission found that her actions were unlawful and fined her $100, a decision reversed by a local trial court. The Ohio Court of Appeals reversed the local court and reinstated the fine, a decision affirmed by the Ohio Supreme Court.

In a seven–two decision, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed, holding that McIntyre's right to distribute anonymous campaign literature was protected by the constitutional guarantee of free speech. In its ruling, the Court overturned Ohio's law and similar laws on the books in nearly every other state. In his opinion for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens surveyed the history of anonymous speech in the United States, pointing out such important works as The Federalist Papers, written by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay under the name "Publius," and the writings of Samuel Clemens, written under the pen name "Mark Twain." Stevens wrote, "No form of speech is entitled to greater constitutional protection than Mrs. McIntyre's." Anonymous speech about important public issues was "core political speech," and any attempt by a state to regulate this speech must be "narrowly tailored" to achieve the state's legitimate interest in prohibiting unknown authors from providing the electorate with fraudulent and libelous information. The Court found that the Ohio prohibition was not narrowly tailored because it punished all unknown authors, not only those who attempted to publish false and misleading information. Justice Stevens limited the reach of the ruling by indicating that the Court was addressing only written communications. He also stated that the Court was not overturning laws requiring the disclosure of the identities of campaign contributors.

The breadth of Justice Stevens's opinion concerned Justice Antonin Scalia, who, joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, stated in dissent, "[I]t may take decades to work out the shape of this newly expanded right-to-speak-incognito."

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg filed an opinion concurring with the majority's holding but stressing the narrow nature of the ruling. She also signed the majority opinion. Justice Clarence Thomas did not sign the majority opinion; instead, he offered a concurring opinion with his own survey of anonymous writing in the United States. Using a stricter interpretation of the Constitution, he concluded that "anonymous political leafleting" was part of the framers' original intent of freedom of speech and the press.

Margaret McIntyre died of cancer one year before the Supreme Court issued the ruling in her case.

John David Rausch Jr.

See also: Anonymous Political Speech; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Bezanson, Randall P. Speech Stories: How Free Can Speech Be? New York: New York University Press, 1998.

Greenhouse, Linda. "Justices Allow Unsigned Political Fliers." New York Times, April 20, 1995.

Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent (1984)

In Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that a municipal ordinance prohibiting the posting of signs on public property did not unconstitutionally burden free speech rights protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. Taxpayers for Vincent (TFV), a group supporting Roland Vincent for the Los Angeles City Council, contracted with a political sign service company to construct and post signs supporting his candidacy. The company designed the cardboard signs to be draped over the cross-wires supporting utility poles and then stapled at the bottom. In accordance with the ordinance, city workers removed Vincent's signs, and the TFV group brought suit, alleging an unconstitutional abridgment of its First Amendment speech rights.

The TFV organization argued that the ordinance was both facially unconstitutional (because of its overbreadth) and unconstitutional as applied to the group's particular situation. In the course of a political campaign, many candidates, parties, and interests must employ the most efficient, influential, and economical methods for communicating their message to the public. Categorically prohibiting the posting of signs on public property deprived many potential speakers and advocates of an important medium. Yet, the city contended, to provide unrestricted access to public property for these purposes would cause visual clutter and blight, diminish property values, increase public expenses, and constitute a safety hazard for those municipal workers charged with removing the signs. States and localities have a legitimate interest in preserving the aesthetic appeal of their communities, and viewpoint-neutral regulations of this sort serve such interests.

Writing for the Court, Justice John Paul Stevens found that the statute was not unconstitutional, facially or as applied, but rather was a reasonable "time, place, and manner" regulation. Reaffirming the Court's holding in other cases involving undesired exposure to certain forms of expression, Justice Stevens reasoned that the ordinance was a content-neutral effort to minimize the visual assault launched upon drivers and passersby. Moreover, although First Amendment rights were certainly implicated, the Court was confident that the TFV group had alternative methods for communicating its message. Or did it?

Writing for the dissent, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. criticized the majority for relying on an imprecise and inherently subjective standard like "aesthetic appeal" and for failing to consider that a dissident group, or a position or proposal lacking broad appeal, might not have access to an alternative forum. (Those advocating an increase in property taxes, for example, would likely have trouble persuading private property owners to post signs supporting such a position.) The medium and method chosen by TFV entailed relatively small expense and allowed it to reach a wide audience; to foreclose such options, the dissenters argued, subordinated speech to subjective assessments and unfounded suppositions.

To what degree should government be able to restrict First Amendment rights in the interest of aesthetics—or in an effort to preserve the appeal or ambience of public spaces or property? At what point does a collection of ideas, voices, or propositions become a clutter? Taxpayers for Vincent offered important insight into the Court's balancing of individual and community interests: When the burden on expression is presumed to be minimal and legitimate municipal concerns may be demonstrated, states and localities may impose reasonable, content-neutral restrictions on speech in its various forms.

Brian K. Pinaire

See also: First Amendment; Lawn Signs; Overbreadth Doctrine; Police Power; Time, Place, and Manner Restrictions.

FURTHER READING

Costonis, John. "Law and Aesthetics: A Critique and a Reformation of the Dilemmas." Michigan Law Review 80 (1982): 355.

Quadres, Harold. "Content-Neutral Public Forum Regulations: The Rise of the Aesthetic State Interest, the Fall of Judicial Scrutiny." Hastings Law Journal 37 (January 1986): 439–97.

Stone, Geoffrey. "Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places." Supreme Court Review (1974): 233.

Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1990)

In Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 497 U.S. 547 (1990), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld affirmative action initiatives by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) that were aimed at promoting greater diversity and responsiveness to the American public by giving preference to minority licensing applicants within the broadcast industry. Rather than adhering to the strict-scrutiny doctrine usually required of all classifications based on race, the Court opted for the less stringent intermediate-scrutiny doctrine, arguing that the racial classifications created under the FCC plans were essentially "benign" but not specifically defining what that term meant. Citing the Communications Act of 1934 that mandated diversification within the broadcast industry, the FCC had established minority preferences when granting new or transferring existing radio and television licenses. Metro Broadcasting Company argued that the preferential granting of a television license to Rainbow Broadcasting under this affirmative action plan was a violation of Metro's equal protection rights guaranteed under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution because the FCC unfairly favored the minority-owned Rainbow over Metro when awarding the license.

In the five–four majority opinion, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. argued that the FCC affirmative action plan in no way violated the U.S. Constitution, rejecting Metro's claim that the provisions violated the right to equal protection of the laws. On the contrary, Brennan wrote that "[B]enign federal racial classifications are not 'remedial' in the sense of being designed to compensate victims of past governmental or social discrimination." Furthermore, the Court argued in Metro that the Constitution placed no barriers when benign racial classifications served "important governmental objectives" that were "substantially related to achievement of those objectives" of obtaining diversity within the broadcast industry. The majority argued that the FCC initiative was given significant legitimacy by the fact that "minority ownership programs have been specifically approved—indeed mandated—by Congress."

As late as the previous year, in City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469 (1989), the Court had reiterated its dependence on the strict-scrutiny doctrine when it overturned a Richmond, Virginia, affirmative action program that mandated minority preference when awarding federal construction contracts, insisting that "the need for remedial action in particular cases would seem to be simply administrative convenience, which, standing alone, cannot justify the use of a suspect classification under equal protection strict scrutiny," In Metro, the Supreme Court also backtracked from its traditional position that both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments were directed toward protecting the rights of persons rather than the rights of groups. The Metro decision considered the rights not only of minorities as a group but also the rights of the broader group of the listening audience, reiterating the Court's belief that "broadcasting may be regulated in light of the rights of the viewing and listening audience, and that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the public welfare."

In her dissent to Metro, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor expressed doubt that the FCC's affirmative action plan was capable of promoting the diversity advocated by the agency. She stopped short of rejecting affirmative action entirely, however, arguing that "Congress may identify and redress the effects of society-wide discrimination" without making "specific findings of discrimination to engage in race-conscious relief." Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy joined O'Connor's dissent, insisting that the FCC's affirmative action plan was unconstitutional because it did indeed violate the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. The minority also rejected the concept of "benign" racial classifications and stood by the strict-scrutiny requirement, contending that the FCC had failed to meet this requirement because there was no compelling state interest in implementing such a plan.

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Fourteenth Amendment; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Abernathy, M. Glenn, and Barbara A. Perry. Civil Liberties Under the Constitution. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. 8th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Meyer v. Nebraska (1923)

In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), the U.S. Supreme Court decided that a state law infringed on the "liberty" interest guaranteed under the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and protected against state infringement. The law affected the right of teachers to engage in education of certain students by teaching them modern languages other than English. Such laws were not uncommon in the post–World War I xenophobic atmosphere that existed in the United States. Many states after the war adopted laws that reflected a strong dislike of anything foreign.

Representative of such legislation was a Nebraska law enacted in 1919, which forbade teaching anyone who had not completed the eighth grade any subject in a language other than English. The law applied to all schools within the state and imposed a fine or jail term of up to thirty days for noncompliance. Robert T. Meyer, a parochial school teacher, used Bible stories written in German to teach reading to his ten-year-old students. Meyer was charged and convicted in a Nebraska trial court. The Nebraska Supreme Court upheld his conviction, concluding that the law was intended to establish English as the "mother tongue" of all children reared in Nebraska and represented a legitimate use of the state's police power.

The U.S. Supreme Court in Meyer applied the doctrine of substantive due process, an approach the Court under Chief Justice William H. Taft in the 1920s was more inclined to use to protect property rights than to expand constitutional protection of civil liberties. By contrast, the Meyer case presented the Court with an issue in which property rights and state censorship were intertwined. The Court concluded that the term "liberty" in the Fourteenth Amendment covered the right of individuals to engage in the "common occupations of life" and the acquisition of "useful knowledge," and struck down the Nebraska statute on a seven–two vote (Justices Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. and George Sutherland dissenting). Justice James C. McReynolds, writing for the majority, said that government could not interfere with such liberty in the name of protecting the public interest. He suggested that the objective of the Nebraska law was to "foster a homogenous people with American ideals." As well-meaning as Nebraska's objective may have been, the Court concluded that the state had attempted "materially to interfere with the calling of modern language teachers, with the opportunities of pupils to acquire knowledge, and with the power of parents to control the education of their own." A state cannot use coercive methods that conflict with the Constitution—even a "desirable end cannot be promoted by prohibited means." The Court was also troubled by the selective character of Nebraska's policy—the statute targeted only instruction in a modern foreign language and exempted all other content.

The Court set aside Meyer's conviction, concluding that the due process language of the Fourteenth Amendment protected teachers' rights to teach and parents' rights to hire them to do so—economic liberties that had long been constitutionally protected. Although not condemning the end sought by Nebraska, the Court found that the chosen means to attain these ends were too extreme. The Meyer ruling had the short-term consequence of limiting the state's capacity to control private school curricula, but the more important, long-term effect was not evident for several decades: Justice McReynolds's opinion helped provide the foundation for the Court's recognition of a constitutional right to privacy in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S 479 (1965).

Peter G. Renstrom

See also: Griswold v. Connecticut; Pierce v. Society of Sisters; Substantive Due Process; Taft, William Howard.

FURTHER READING

Parrish, Michael E. Anxious Decades: America in Prosperity and Depression, 1920–1941. New York: W. W. Norton, 1992.

Renstrom, Peter G. The Taft Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

Ross, William G. Forging New Freedoms: Nativism, Education, and the Constitution, 1917–1927. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974)

In Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), the U.S. Supreme Court considered whether government could force the print media to publish specific editorial content without infringing the right to a free press under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Union leader Patrick Tornillo thought so, and he sought to force a newspaper to publish his response to editorials critical of him. He was understandably angry about two Miami Herald editorials slamming his 1972 campaign for a Florida legislative seat, calling him the "boss of the Classroom Teachers Association," accusing him of "shakedown statesmanship," and telling voters it would be "inexcusable" to elect him. The newspaper cited his key role in a Dade County teachers' strike in 1968, when such strikes were illegal.

Citing Florida's 1913 right-of-reply law, Tornillo demanded that the Herald print his replies verbatim. The statute mandated that newspapers publish responses of candidates whose "personal character" or official record had been attacked, without charge and in a place and type size as conspicuous as the original criticism. Violators could face misdemeanor prosecution.

The Herald refused and Tornillo sued. He convinced the Florida Supreme Court that the compulsory right of reply enhanced rather than abridged the First Amendment and furthered the free flow of information to the public.

The U.S. Supreme Court was unpersuaded. The justices unanimously held that enforced-access laws trespassed on newspapers' editorial discretion, observing that "A newspaper is more than a passive receptacle or conduit for news, comment, and advertising." Florida's law, they ruled, unconstitutionally imposed a penalty based on content. That penalty: additional printing costs and the use of space that a newspaper could otherwise devote to material it would prefer to print. To force publication of an aggrieved candidate's response also would force the newspaper to omit something else. Such governmental coercion violated the First Amendment and, in effect, was no different from a law forbidding newspapers to print specific information.

The Court acknowledged Tornillo's argument that contemporary newspapers often are monopolies, owned by large chains with vast power to shape public opinion. Even so, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger said, "A responsible press is an undoubtedly desirable goal, but press responsibility is not mandated by the Constitution and like many other virtues it cannot be legislated." In other words, newspapers must decide for themselves how to act responsibly.

The Court warned that right-of-reply laws could chill political coverage because newspapers might decide that the safer course would be to avoid rather than report on controversy. For example, election and political coverage might be "blunted or reduced," impeding public debate.

At the same time, the Court distinguished between right-of-reply laws, which are unconstitutional, and the government's right to regulate newspaper advertising, such as gender-specific help-wanted ads, which are considered pure commercial speech. In contrast, U.S. courts have upheld public access requirements for radio and television, because broadcasters—unlike newspapers—are licensed and regulated by the Federal Communications Commission, and for cable companies operating under municipal franchises.

From a newspaper's perspective, though, it may prove strategically wise voluntarily to publish replies, which may help to avert libel suits or to minimize potential damages if a libel claim proves successful. The difference, of course, is that the decision on what to print would then be left up to the newspaper, not to the complainant.

Eric Freedman

See also: Fairness Doctrine; First Amendment; Reply, Right to.

FURTHER READING

Choper, Jesse H. "Consequences of Supreme Court Decisions Upholding Individual Constitutional Rights." Michigan Law Review 83 (October 1984): 1.

Michael H. v. Gerald D. (1989)

In Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989), the U.S. Supreme Court grappled with a difficult fact pattern that struck at the heart of any individual's civil liberties: parental rights. At issue was whether there was a "substantive" due process right—that is, a right not enumerated in the Constitution but nevertheless protected—for the unmarried father of a child by a married woman to have visitation rights with respect to the child.

The petitioner, Michael, had an adulterous affair with his married neighbor, Carol, an international model. Carol gave birth to a baby and shortly thereafter informed Michael that the baby was his and not her husband's. Michael wanted a parental relationship with his daughter, but neither Carol nor her current husband, Gerald, wanted Michael to play any role in the child's life. A California court denied Michael's request for parental visitation rights by looking to a California statute, which established the presumption that a child conceived during marriage was presumed to be the offspring of that marriage. The presumption could be rebutted only via blood evidence within two years of the child's date of birth. Furthermore, the only individuals who could present such evidence were the mother or father of the child and not a third party such as Michael.

Gerald and Carol failed to make a motion rebutting the presumption within the allotted time frame, and Michael brought suit, claiming that this statute, by effectively denying him a relationship with his child, was a violation of both his procedural and substantive due process rights and his equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Despite precedent in Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972), indicating that a father who was actively participating in the life of his child did have the right to such a relationship, the plurality nevertheless held that it was not unconstitutional for the California statute to enforce a presumption of paternity against a challenge by a putative father who was not the husband of the mother. Consequently, neither due process nor equal protection was violated in this case.

Michael H. v. Gerald D. was pivotal for several reasons. First, it laid out the various schools of thought among the justices on how the Court should recognize unenumerated but fundamental substantive due process rights. According to the holding, the Court should protect rights under the Due Process Clause only if there were a tradition, stated at the most specific level of abstraction, for safeguarding the liberty. The general tradition of protecting unmarried fathers' rights was found to be irrelevant in Michael H. because no specific tradition existed when the child was conceived as a result of adultery. Second, the case addressed the question of who had a constitutionally protected interest in a relationship with a child: Biological fathers could not have an unconditional liberty interest in a relationship with their children because no tradition protected that right. In this case, there was no such tradition because the mother was married to someone else at the time of conception.

It is difficult to distinguish Michael H. from Stanley, in which the Court struck down the irrebuttable presumption of an Illinois statute that automatically made children of deceased mothers wards of the state if their parents were not married, on the grounds that in these circumstances the father was unfit. Moreover, the decision in Michael H. arguably contradicts the broad holding in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), in which the Court found that an Oregon statute allowing third parties state-court review of decisions made by parents regarding the visitation rights of others interfered impermissibly with a parent's fundamental right to control her child's upbringing. The implicit holding in Troxel was that there can be no interference with the rights of fit parents. However, if the Michael H. reasoning were applied to the Troxel facts, the "fitness" criteria would be irrelevant. An open question, then, is how the Court would rule when presented with the facts of Michael H. but the person claiming the right is female instead of male. Unquestionably, the Court would not be able to deny the fact of biology, especially when so much of the Court's reasoning about gender issues has been grounded in the heuristic assumption that a woman's "biology is destiny."

Gia Elise Barboza

See also: Parental Rights; Right to Privacy; Substantive Due Process.

FURTHER READING

Sussman, Alan. Rights of Parents. New York: Avon, 1980.

Military Commissions

Under its Article I constitutional powers to define and punish "offenses against the laws of nations" and to make rules for the governance of the armed forces, Congress can authorize U.S. military forces to create military commissions. Unlike courts-martial, which exist to try members of the armed forces for violations of military law, military commissions exist to try civilians or enemy belligerents. These individuals can be subjected to military authority because they are in some area controlled by military government, such as occupied hostile territory. Or they can be civilians accused of offenses against the laws of nations, such as sabotage and spying, if Congress has made them punishable in this way.

Commissions were used during the American Revolution and in some early Indian campaigns. They were extensively used during the Civil War to maintain order in parts of the country occupied by the military, including areas in which no hostilities occurred. As late as the end of World War II, military commissions tried more than 2,500 persons, some U.S. citizens, for ordinary crimes in occupied territories that had no functioning civilian courts. The U.S. Supreme Court noted the authority of commissions in Madsen v. Kinsella, 323 U.S. 341 (1952): "Since our earliest days, such commissions have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities relating to war. They have been called our common-law war courts." At present, the authority to create military commissions is explicitly provided to the armed services as part of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Although the military has occasionally employed civilian judges, military commissions are more commonly made up of panels of officers with no specialized legal training. Unlike civilian courts, military commissions can take into account military expediency and such constraints as the need to protect intelligence sources. These variables can affect the kinds of forums provided and the degree to which civil liberties are protected. Procedures are traditionally streamlined, with no elaborate indictment procedures or rules of evidence. Commissions during the Civil War operated in secret, were not required to presume innocence, and did not allow defense counsel or juries. Verbatim records were usually not kept. Convictions were subject to review and veto by military commanders. But because the Supreme Court held in Ex parte Vallandigham, 68 U.S. 243 (1864), that the panels were not "courts of the United States" under then-existing jurisdictional rules, their decisions could not be reviewed through civilian appellate channels.

The rules of March 2002, under which the Pentagon proposed to try people accused of "unlawful belligerence" after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., would provide military courts much more respectful of civil liberties than those of the past. The proposed procedures require a presumption of innocence. Defendants will be represented by military counsel, may provide civilian counsel at their own expense, and will be given time to prepare and present material in their defense. They will receive a copy of the charges, will have access to prosecution evidence and reasonable access to military resources to help them prepare this defense, will be able to cross-examine witnesses, and will not be required to testify. Conviction is to be based only on proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and double jeopardy is forbidden. Though the proceedings may be closed if required by "military expediency," the Pentagon will encourage "reasonable openness."

The Pentagon has become more concerned with civil liberties since its 2002 proposals because of U.S. public opinion and also because of treaty responsibilities. Military commissions must comply with requirements of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and 1977, other relevant treaties, and all relevant principles of international law. These were designed to protect civilians caught up in hostilities and to guarantee humane treatment of captured legal combatants; it is not clear whether they protect illegal combatants. Still, they can be read to require some protection of at least some civil liberties, and they were considered when the 2002 proposals were written. But even those more protective rules would not create courts with civilian judges, juries of the defendants' peers, the requirement of unanimity for conviction (instead of the proposed two-thirds vote of the panel), legal education for critical personnel, rules of evidence comparable to those used in civilian courts, guaranteed openness, and independence from command channels. Nor is there provision for civilian appellate review, either by creating regular appeals channels or by allowing habeas corpus petitions.

Mock military tribunal being held in the School of Military Government at the University of Virginia, 1943.
(Library of Congress)

Because military commissions do not provide trials substantially in accordance with the Bill of Rights, the principal legal question has always been whether U.S. civilian citizens could be subjected to them. In the critical case of Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866), the Supreme Court decided that the answer was generally no but allowed certain exceptions. One exception, decided in Milligan and reaffirmed in Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946), is for civilians accused of crimes in areas so disordered by war or natural disaster that ordinary courts are incapable of functioning. The second exception is for citizens who have joined the enemy and become unlawful combatants, who come secretly through the lines, without uniforms, and who intend to commit hostile acts during wartime.

Paul Lermack

See also: Due Process of Law; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

American Bar Association Task Force on Terrorism and the Law. "Report and Recommendations on Military Commissions," January 4, 2002. www.abanet.org/leadership/military.pdf.

Taylor, Telford. Nuremberg and Vietnam: An American Tragedy. New York: Quadrangle, 1970.
Uniform Code of Military Justice. U.S. Code. Vol. 10, sec. 801 et seq. (1950).
U.S. Department of Defense. "Military Commission Order Number 1," March 21, 2002. www.cdt.org/security/usapatriot/020321militaryregs.pdf.
Weisenmiller, Mark. "Military Tribunals in the United States." History Today 52, 4 (April 2002): 28.

Military Surveillance of Civilians

The role of the military in the surveillance of civilians has ebbed and flowed from the very beginning of American history. Traditionally the realm of domestic police agencies, in several times of national crisis the military has taken an increased role in monitoring civilian activities. Both the U.S. Supreme Court and Congress have addressed military involvement in the handling of domestic security issues, with widely varying results. As the technological capacity to scrutinize the population increases and the definition of "national security" evolves, the function of the military in the internal monitoring of citizens will continue to be a significant issue in U.S. politics.

Although delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in Philadelphia considered adding a specific provision formally separating the military and civilian realms, the delegates considered that separation was sufficiently secured by other clauses. However, the division between military and civilian intelligence was never enacted into law, except for the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878 forbidding the use of the military to enforce the law. Nonetheless, the military largely shied away from assuming a policing role until the twentieth century.

The first significant instance of sweeping military surveillance of civilians came with the passage of the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Sedition Act of 1918 during the period leading up to U.S. involvement in World War I. These acts made it illegal to interfere with the recruiting of troops, to disclose information dealing with national defense, or to criticize the government or the Constitution. The government created a national network of military informers primarily to monitor and arrest members of the Communist Party and opponents of World War I. After the war ended, that network was allowed to dissolve.

Although the president is authorized by statute to use the National Guard and other U.S. military forces to suppress domestic violence, until the 1960s this right was exercised very rarely. During the civil unrest caused by the civil rights movement and opposition to the Vietnam War in the 1960s, the military was called upon with increasing frequency to keep the peace. Under pressure from the Justice Department and the White House, the U.S. Army began to obtain and keep records on individuals and groups associated with the civil rights and peace movements.

According to later testimony in the Senate, Army intelligence agents undertook massive efforts to penetrate protest demonstrations. In addition, political dissent was routinely investigated and reported on in many parts of the United States. These reports were then circulated to law enforcement agencies at all levels of government. In all, an estimated 100,000 individuals were the subjects of Army surveillance. At the same time, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) was involved with "Operation Chaos," which kept track of more than 7,000 people involved in the peace movement, in direct violation of the agency's mandate to coordinate only foreign intelligence operations. At the request of other government agencies, the National Security Agency (NSA) began intercepting and disseminating the communications of thousands of people on its "watch list."

By the 1970s when these surveillance activities came to light, public outrage led to legal challenges on a number of levels. In 1971, during the course of a hearing before Senator Sam Ervin's (D-NC) Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, the Defense Department announced the drastic reduction of its domestic surveillance program, restricting it to only "military" targets. Beginning in 1975, the Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, also known as the Church Committee after its chairman, Senator Frank Church (D-ID), began a widespread investigation into intelligence activities in the United States. Among the fourteen reports issued in 1975 and 1976 were detailed accounts of military surveillance of civilians, often in violation of their rights. This sparked a major national debate on the role of secrecy in a democracy.

In 1972, the Supreme Court ruled in Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, that the military was constitutionally permitted to conduct surveillance, and that the existence of surveillance itself was not an infringement of the First Amendment. In his dissenting opinion, Justice William O. Douglas called the military surveillance of civilians a "cancer on the body politic." The same year in United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297 (1972), the Court ruled that even in cases involving national security, a court order was required to permit electronic surveillance. The sum of these rulings was that although the military is permitted to engage in domestic surveillance in limited circumstances involving threats to national security, it must follow the same rules required of domestic police agencies.

The results of the Church Committee hearings as well as the Watergate scandal (the bungled 1972 burglary of Democratic National Headquarters in the Watergate apartments by individuals with connections to President Richard Nixon) led to a series of legislation and executive orders, including the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which limited the power of any group to conduct surveillance domestically. However, the majority of the reforms came in the form of changes to internal agency regulations, leading many critics to believe that the limitations were only temporary and could be easily reversed.

Since that time, many allegations have been made of vast government surveillance networks at work eavesdropping on citizens, but very little has been proved. Most of the substantive allegations now center around the NSA. In coordination with U.S. allies, the NSA can intercept and interpret vast numbers of electronic communications globally. Although the NSA is regulated by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and overseen by Congress, many critics, including the American Civil Liberties Union, allege that such oversight is weak at best.

In the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, attacks, Congress adopted the USA Patriot Act, granting broader authority to government agencies to monitor citizens in cases of prospective national security risk. This act lowers many of the requirements for surveillance and increases the scope of surveillance permitted once court permission is secured. Perhaps most worrying to critics, national security need be only a "significant" reason for permitting military surveillance rather than the sole reason.

The question of what level of privacy must be exchanged for security is as old as America itself. Changes in technology and the rise of electronic communication have made it possible for the government to intrude into the lives of citizens on an unprecedented level, restricted only by the laws put in place to stop these tactics. In an age of global terrorism, the line between privacy and security is increasingly blurred.

Ben Reno-Weber

See also: First Amendment; Fourth Amendment; Patriot Act; Posse Comitatus; Search; Seizure.

FURTHER READING

Doyle, Charles. "The USA Patriot Act: A Legal Analysis." Order Code RL31377, Congressional Research Service, 2002.

Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities of the United States Senate. 94th Congress, 2d session. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1976.

Jenson, Joan M. Army Surveillance in America. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1991.

Mill, John Stuart (1806–1873)

John Stuart Mill is best known for his defense of the liberty of the individual—for making fundamental the liberty in the individual, as opposed to some theory of social rights, which he referred to as "monstrous" and "dangerous" in his most famous work, Essay on Liberty (1859). Mill's concern was to unite social progress with republicanism through the device of freeing up the individual person to the greatest extent reasonably possible. Released from common superstitions, specious arguments, and theological drivel, society in Mill's libertarian state would be able to benefit from the untapped potential of all its inhabitants.

In his youth, Mill was an ardent utilitarian, a follower of Jeremy Bentham, much like his father James Mill, who raised John with severity though educated him well in the classics. In his twenties, the younger Mill experienced a nervous breakdown, which he attributed to an overemphasis on developing his intellect at the expense of his sentiments. Mill emerged from this period to challenge the utilitarian notions that happiness can be directly sought as an end itself rather than a state that emerges as a by-product of an overall flourishing life, and that happiness can be measured quantitatively and interpersonally. Mill was a progressive, forward-looking thinker, who advocated for a humane sensibility based in reason regarding personal freedoms and the legitimate purview of the state that is as congenial to many contemporary Americans as it is threatening to others.

John Stuart Mill is best known for his defense of the liberty of the individual. (Library of Congress)

Mill was the first major male thinker in the Western tradition to champion the rights of women, and to argue in word and deed for the equality of the sexes, especially in his essay On the Subjection of Women (1869): "That the principle which regulates the existing social relations between the two sexes—the legal subordination of one sex to the other—is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement; and that it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality, admitting no power or privilege on the one side, nor disability on the other." Mill referred to the "hot-house and stove cultivation" of women in his society, and the resulting apparent differences in natural endowment between them and their male counterparts, as part of his argument that were women to have the same education, they undoubtedly would succeed to the same degree as men were allowed and encouraged to do. Furthermore, Mill argued that the unjust discriminations against women were rooted not in reasoned analysis and reflection on evidence, but rather in widespread feelings formed in the despotic bosom of the traditional family—not in knowledge, but in prejudice. Hence, "women cannot be expected to devote themselves to the emancipation of women, until men in considerable number are prepared to join with them in the undertaking."

Mill's advocacy of the rights of women and presentation of the obstacles to be overcome, as well as his critique of the social and legal context of women's subordination, follow from Essay on Liberty. In that earlier essay he sought to distinguish the legitimate purview of the state from the legitimate realm of the individual person. He early on qualified his stand on the utilitarianism of his upbringing: "I regard utility as the ultimate appeal on all ethical questions; but it must be utility in the largest sense, grounded on the permanent interests of man as a progressive being." In Utilitarianism (1863), he further clarified this distinction: "Human beings have faculties more elevated than the animal appetites, and when once made conscious of them, do not regard anything as happiness which does not include their gratification. . . . It is better to be a human being dissatisfied than a pig satisfied; better to be Socrates dissatisfied than a fool satisfied." The nature of the state appropriate to human beings thusly considered would include a representative form of government restrained from interfering with the liberty of the people except to prevent harm to others, which Mill thought was fairly easy to discern. In Essay on Liberty he argued that the state was prohibited from coercing in favor of received custom, tradition, or certain preferred types of individuals, or to impose the majority's view of the good life on them, for this would be to treat citizens as children and to stultify the development of their mental and moral powers. A person's liberty was not to be infringed when there was no showing of physical, palpable injury to another person or his legitimate interests, such as in property.

Mill placed an emphasis on the centrality of free expression to forming one's own opinions and maintaining a healthy, critical engagement with them, so that the ideas one holds have vitality in one's life and are not taken on faith or regarded as beyond question, such as dogma. Neither the government nor public opinion shall have the power to suppress dissenting points of view, no matter how few subscribers there may be, or to assume a paternal pose so as to deny individuals the right to live their lives from the inside, embarking on whatever "experiments of living" are original with them.

Mill asks a lot of the individual, expecting people not only to acknowledge their fallibility and the utility of exposure to contrary, even offensive points of view, but also to welcome them as the conditions that best make for social progress given the nature of the human as a social and moral being. Mill, however, seemed to have a blind eye for the pluralism of the world's peoples, in that he considered progress possible only for peoples in the civilized world, who can treat peoples in "barbaric" lands with a heavy hand, much as one would treat a child. He also favored the cultivation of taste and erudition, as would be expected from members of the British upper class, casting some doubt on whether his liberal philosophy was driven by utilitarian considerations or, instead, was based in a not so thinly veiled perfectionist principle of ideal human flourishing, applied both to individuals and to societies.

Gordon A. Babst

See also: First Amendment; Liberalism; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Donner, Wendy. The Liberal Self: John Stuart Mill's Moral and Political Philosophy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1991.

Eisenach, Eldon J., ed. Mill and the Moral Character of Liberalism. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1998.

Gray, John. Mill on Liberty: A Defence. 2d ed. London: Routledge, 1996.

———, ed. John Stuart Mill on Liberty and Other Essays. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Justman, Stuart. The Hidden Text of Mill's Liberty. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1991.

Spitz, David. The Real World of Liberalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.

Miller Test

The Miller test was formulated by the U.S. Supreme Court in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), as a means of evaluating whether written or visual material is obscene. The Court has long held that obscenity does not merit First Amendment protection, but the problem is to determine what makes a work obscene. The Court over the years devised a variety of tests to make that determination. The Miller test was a reaction to the test that had been evolving since 1957 when the Court decided Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), and refined it more in what became known as the Fanny Hill case, officially listed as A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966).

The key parts of the Fanny Hill test were that the material in question would be judged by a fixed national standard and be found obscene only if it was utterly without redeeming social value. That test was very forgiving because it was virtually impossible for anything to be considered obscene. The Court under Earl Warren (chief justice 1953–1969) was roundly criticized for its policies in the obscenity area. The Warren E. Burger Court (1969–1986) sought to change the standard, and the Miller case provided the first opportunity to tackle the issue.

The components of the Miller test hold that the standard for the trier of fact would be if the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find the work, taken as a whole, appeals to a prurient interest in sex; the material depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by applicable state law; and the material lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.

The significance of the test is reflected in two parts. First, the Miller test changed the focus from the forgiving national standard to a local community standard. This would allow communities to tailor their standards to the population. Having a national standard had prohibited local communities from establishing their own standards. More important, the standard for the value of the material changed such that it had to have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value (the so-called SLAPS test) to merit First Amendment protection. Under the Fanny Hill test, any slight value would save the material in question. Under the later Miller test, the overall value of the material as a whole had to be clear.

Miller is a much more restrictive test than the Court used in Fanny Hill, but it has not had the sweeping effects that were predicted. The Miller test made it much easier for local communities to regulate sexually explicit materials than under the previous standard. Indeed, states and local communities responded by passing a variety of laws to reflect their local standards. Miller clearly led to significant variation in First Amendment protection across different communities. Under the Roth test, the justices had to review much of the material, and they hoped the Miller test would permit them to end their supervision of obscenity cases and turn responsibility over to local communities and lower courts. But the Court was not totally successful. For the next few years, the justices had to accept a variety of cases, on occasion to chide a lower court for applications that were too restrictive. The Court under Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist has expanded the definition of the "average person" and broadened community standards, thus making the Miller test slightly less restrictive.

Richard L. Pacelle Jr.

See also: Miller v. California; Obscenity; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Greenawalt, Kent. Speech, Crime, and the Uses of Language. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Miller v. California (1973)

Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), was one of a group of cases the U.S. Supreme Court reviewed in a reexamination of standards enunciated in earlier cases defining obscenity, which the Court had long held was not entitled to protection under the right to free speech as outlined in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and as also applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The difficult issue in these cases has been how to judge whether certain expression is obscene.

The petitioning defendant was a commercial vendor convicted of mailing unsolicited brochures containing pictures of sexually explicit activities in violation of a California statute. The California statute was based loosely on the Supreme Court's previous holding in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), in which the Court ruled that implicit in the history of the First Amendment was the rejection of constitutional protection for obscenity as its being utterly without redeeming social importance. Roth identified certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which never were thought to raise any constitutional problem, including the lewd and obscene. The Roth test for obscenity was "whether, to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appealed to the prurient [lustful] interest."

After the Roth decision but prior to Miller, no majority of the Court was able to agree on a standard to determine what constituted obscene, pornographic material subject to regulation under the states' police power. The justices disagreed over many elements of the test, including what constituted a "prurient interest," what was the appropriate "community standard," and whether a work must be "utterly without redeeming social quality" to be regulated.

In Miller, the Court clarified its position on obscene material and established a new test for identifying obscenity. The Miller test was somewhat more restrictive than Roth, since the Court rejected the requirement that a work be "utterly without redeeming social value," under which it was next to impossible to label material as obscene. In its place, Miller established that a work may be subject to state regulation if (1) the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (2) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (3) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. The Court defined "community" as a local or state community rather than a national community. The Court still follows Miller and usually focuses on the third prong of the test pertaining to lack of "serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." When considering obscenity depicting, or directed to, juveniles, however, the Court has used more restrictive standards.

James Barger

See also: First Amendment; Miller Test; Obscenity; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Greenawalt, Kent. Speech, Crime, and the Uses of Language. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Milligan, Ex parte (1866)

In Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that so long as the courts were open and operative, a civilian could not be tried in a military tribunal. The importance of Milligan is that it placed important limits upon the power of the president's military authority over civilians in times of emergency.

In 1864, President Abraham Lincoln issued a proclamation ordering that individuals sympathetic to the Confederacy be tried in military instead of civilian courts. Lambdin Milligan, a civilian, and several others in Indiana were charged with conspiracy to seize munitions and to attempt to free Confederate solders from the North's prison camps. Milligan was convicted by a military tribunal in 1864 and ordered to be hanged, although at the time, the federal court in the area was open and functioning. Milligan sought habeas corpus relief in a local U.S. circuit court, and when the two judges split in their opinion of whether to grant review of his case, it went to the Supreme Court for review.

Writing for the Court, Justice David Davis ruled in favor of habeas review for Milligan. According to Davis, the Constitution was not in operation only during times of peace. Instead, the Constitution "is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances." The president did not have special powers in times of war and other emergencies to suspend the Constitution and order civilians to be tried in military courts so long as the civilian courts were able to meet.

Ex parte Milligan has come to be recognized as a major landmark case in U.S. constitutional law. It is an important case drawing limits upon presidential war powers, especially when it comes to civilians arrested in the United States, and it is also an affirmative defense of the federal courts as having primary jurisdiction over individuals who are charged with crimes or who wish to contest the grounds of their detainment. For example, Milligan was cited by the Supreme Court in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 124 S. Ct. 2633 (2004), in ruling that a U.S. citizen could not be held indefinitely on American soil without a right to habeas review; and in Rasul v. Bush, 124 S. Ct. 2686 (2004), in which the Court held that aliens being held in confinement at the U.S. military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, were entitled to have a federal court hear challenges to their detention under the federal habeas corpus statute. In the wake of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States, these two cases placed significant limits upon President George W. Bush's ability to use presidential powers to limit the civil liberties of individuals suspected of being terrorists.

David Schultz

See also: Civil War and Civil Liberties; Habeas Corpus; Hamdi v. Rumsfeld; President and Civil Liberties; Quirin, Ex parte; Rasul v. Bush.

FURTHER READING

Adler, David Gray, and Robert George, eds. The Constitution and the Conduct of American Foreign Policy. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.

Henkin, Louis. Constitutionalism, Democracy, and Foreign Affairs. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

———. Foreign Affairs and the United States Constitution. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.

Milton, John (1608–1674)

John Milton, one of the great English poets, also became well known for his 1644 essay "Areopagitica: A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing to the Parliament of England." It is a classic document of Western civilization and an intellectual foundation for freedom of the press as later articulated in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Milton was a humanist, a firm believer in the value of scientific inquiry, and a devoutly religious man who lived during a time of religious and political turmoil.

Milton was born in London, England, December 9, 1608. He received an excellent education and the finest moral and religious training available. He loved to read and as a child developed the habit of reading far into the night, by candlelight. This may have contributed to his total loss of sight in 1651. He attended St. Paul's School in London and also received private tutoring. In 1625 he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, where he received a bachelor of arts degree in 1629 and a master's in 1632. After he graduated, he lived with his family for six years and continued to educate himself. He traveled abroad in 1638, and when he returned he rented a house in London and tutored two of his nephews.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Puritanism developed as a movement to reform the Church of England. The Puritans in England gained political power between 1640 and 1660 as a result of the English civil war (1642–1648). Also known as the Puritan Revolution, it was a conflict between King Charles I of England and the members of Parliament, most of whom were Puritans. The war ended with the defeat and execution of Charles I and the establishment of a republican commonwealth. The two major religious and political factions during the civil war were the Presbyterians and the Independents. Milton initially supported the Presbyterian faction and its attempt to reform the Church of England. However, when the Presbyterians started enacting laws granting Parliament the power to suppress publications of their political and religious opponents, he turned his allegiance to the Independents. In 1648, when the commonwealth was established, Milton worked in Oliver Cromwell's government as Latin secretary for foreign affairs.

Milton was married three times. He married his first wife, Mary Powell, in 1642, the same year the war began. His new bride left him after only a few weeks of marriage. This impelled him to write three essays advocating divorce. Shocked, his contemporaries condemned them. The essays provided some of the fuel for Parliament's crackdown on publishing the following year. But Milton did not divorce his wife. In fact she returned to him in 1645, and the couple had several children. She died in 1652, and in 1656 Milton married Catharine Woodcock. Catharine died in 1658, and Milton married Elizabeth Minshull, who outlived him.

In 1643, Parliament reestablished the practice of licensing, which required authors to submit their work for approval by an official licenser before it was allowed to be published. This was a form of "prior restraint" because it gave the government control over what works would be published. Milton responded by writing "Areopagitica," in which he advocated freedom of conscience and civil liberty against both ecclesiastical and political tyranny. He believed that the search for truth required free and open discussion. He had no quarrel with copyright, the power of Parliament to suppress offensive publications after they were published, or the power of Parliament to prevent publication of scandalous, seditious, and libelous material. His opposition was limited to the practice of licensing, a form of prior restraint that Milton thought hindered the search for truth and therefore lessened knowledge.

"Areopagitica" went largely unnoticed during Milton's lifetime, and his life's work centered on his poetry, not politics. Yet the essay inspired later philosophers, such as John Stuart Mill, and those who fought for freedom of conscience around the time of the American Revolution. It is frequently cited as one of the most compelling arguments for freedom of the press.

Judith Haydel

See also: Censorship; English Roots of Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Danielson, Dennis, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Milton. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
Hall, Christopher. Milton and the English Revolution. New York: Viking, 1977.
Labriola, Albert C. "John Milton." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 131: Seventeenth-Century British Nondramatic Poets, 3d series, ed. M. Thomas Hester, 153–89. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.
Parker, William Riley. Milton: A Biography. 2 vols. Oxford: Clarendon, 1968.

Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940)

Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), was the first flag-salute case to reach the U.S. Supreme Court and was of particular interest to legal scholars because of the Court's supposedly liberal tilt (several justices had been appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt). The case required the Court to interpret the two religion clauses of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the Establishment Clause (prohibiting government activity that would constitute establishment of religion) and the Free Exercise Clause (prohibiting government interference with an individual's free exercise of religion). The Court held that the flag salute was a constitutionally permissible part of a public school day and mandatory allegiance was not a violation of the First Amendment, although this holding would be reversed a mere three years later.

Gobitis involved two children of a Jehovah's Witness who were expelled from public school for refusing to participate in the required daily ceremony of saluting the American flag and reciting the Pledge of Allegiance. The children had been raised to believe that saluting and pledging allegiance to the flag was forbidden by command of scripture and that the Bible, as the Word of God, was the supreme authority. The local board of education required all teachers and students to participate in the ceremony.

The Court was faced with deciding whether the requirement of participation in the ceremony, forced upon the Gobitis children who refused based on sincere religious grounds, infringed on their First Amendment right to free exercise of religion, which had been made applicable to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice Felix Frankfurter, in an eight–one decision for the Court, stated:

> The mere possession of religious convictions which contradict the relevant concerns of a political society does not relieve the citizen from the discharge of political responsibilities . . . [I]n all these cases the general laws in question, upheld in their application to those who refused obedience from religious conviction, were manifestations of specific powers of government deemed by the legislature essential to secure and maintain that orderly, tranquil, and free society without which religious toleration itself is unattainable. Nor does the freedom of speech assured by Due Process move in a more absolute circle of immunity than that enjoyed by religious freedom.

Justice Frankfurter noted that the flag was a symbol, and that people lived by symbols. To salute it was a constitutionally allowable part of school and could be made mandatory. Furthermore, he argued that the courtroom was not the place to debate issues of educational policy. For that, the majority felt the legislature should embrace its role.

The sole dissenter, Justice Harlan F. Stone, argued that Gobitis rested on liberties guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. He claimed that the children were expelled solely because of their religious convictions and that neither their actions nor statements of opinion exhibited any disloyalty to the government of the United States. Stone wrote:

> The very essence of the liberty which [the First and Fourteenth Amendments] guarantee is the freedom of the individual from compulsion as to what he shall think and what he shall say, at least where the compulsion is to bear false witness to his religion. If these guarantees are to have any meaning they must, I think, be deemed to with> hold from the state any authority to compel belief or the expression of it where that expression violates religious convictions, whatever may be the legislative view of the desirability of such compulsion.

Children reciting the Pledge of Allegiance in a public school in Norfolk, Virginia, 1941. Minersville v. Gobitis (1940) was the first flag-salute case argued before the Supreme Court, which upheld the mandatory salute. In 1943, the Court overruled this decision in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette. (Library of Congress)

Justice Stone's stirring dissent served to support the Court's 1943 reversal of Gobitis in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943). The six–three majority opinion in Barnette, still the controlling precedent in flag-salute cases, disapproved of the mandatory element of such policies. Since then, state and local officials have tried to draft policies that would reinstate the salute and Pledge in schools but not as a required activity.

Aaron R. S. Lorenz

See also: Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause.

FURTHER READING

Schultz, David. "Church-State Relations and the First Amendment." In Law and Politics: Unanswered Questions, ed. David A. Schultz, 235–66. New York: P. Lang, 1994.

Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993)

In Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993), the U.S. Supreme Court was asked to decide whether there was a "plain feel" or "plain touch" exception to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In reviewing this issue, the Court was presented with an opportunity to address the scope of protection granted to individuals under the Fourth Amendment when the government seeks to seize property.

The case began when two police officers saw Timothy Dickerson leave a Minneapolis, Minnesota, apartment building known for illegal drug activity. Dickerson walked toward the officers, then turned around suddenly and fled into a nearby alley. The officers chased Dickerson into the alley, where they stopped him and searched him for weapons. One of the officers patted down the outside of Dickerson's clothes in search of weapons. The officer discovered no weapons, but he felt a lump in Dickerson's jacket pocket. The officer inspected the lump closely by moving it around with his fingers. The size and shape of the lump led the officer to suspect it was a rock of crack cocaine. The officer removed the lump from Dickerson's pocket and confirmed his suspicion. Dickerson was arrested and later convicted for possession of illegal drugs.

The Supreme Court accepted the case to consider whether illegal objects and substances felt during a stop-and-frisk pat-down search for weapons may be legally seized under an exception to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment. The Court concluded that a law enforcement officer could seize contraband in such circumstances, noting the search would not extend beyond the limits already authorized by the stop-and-frisk doctrine announced in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). Therefore, no violation of the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement would occur in those circumstances. However, the contraband's identity must be immediately apparent, and no more than a pat-down may be used to examine the object. The Court thus invalidated the seizure of Dickerson's cocaine on this basis. The officer determined that Dickerson was not carrying any weapons and then identified the contraband through significant manipulation of the contents of Dickerson's pocket. This additional handling of the object went beyond the scope of the search allowed under the stop-and-frisk doctrine because it was done after the officer determined that Dickerson was unarmed and because it involved more than a simple pat-down with the officer's hand. Thus, the contraband was illegally seized and was not admissible in Dickerson's trial under the exclusionary rule. As a result, the court overturned Dickerson's conviction.

In Dickerson, the Supreme Court decided that an officer could legally seize contraband detected through the sense of touch when the officer was legally in position to feel the object. Thus, the Court applied to a new situation the principle that an officer who detects contraband from a lawful vantage point may seize the contraband. In this case, the officer was not operating from a lawful vantage point when the cocaine was identified.

Mark A. Fulks

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Search Warrants; Stop-and-Frisk.

FURTHER READING

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 3d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1996.

Minor Political Parties

The emergence of smaller political parties in the United States has been an early indicator of political change. Parties championing antislavery, temperance, women's suffrage, antiwar efforts, environmental protection, and pro-working-class policies are examples. Aside from better-known Green, Libertarian, and Natural Law Parties, two hundred other ideologically diverse local, regional, and national minor political parties were active in 2003. They ranged from the Working Families Party of New York and the Legal Marijuana Party of New Jersey to the Peace and Freedom Party of California and Aloha Aina (Love of the Land) and Free Energy Parties in Hawaii. In national, state, and local elections, half of these were on the ballot in state elections during the 1990s. If majority electoral support is the criterion for inclusion as a "minor party" (third party), no historically consistent quantitative cutoff qualifies. For example, every U.S. president has been elected by less than 50 percent of voting-age adults. As of 2000, ten U.S. presidents had been elected with only a minority of the popular vote; of those ten, four became president with less than a plurality.

Throughout the twentieth century, only Republicans and Democrats were successful in presidential elections. To marginalize other parties, the major-party spokespersons began labeling them as "minor." Persistent subordination of the smaller parties in state and national politics is a window into a duopoly, that is, two-party electoral predominance. The long-term marginalization of other political parties challenges democratic theory. For example, how effectively can active supporters of smaller political parties participate and contest for power? Does structural marginalization deprive them of full citizenship?

No minor party has won the White House since 1860. That year, Abraham Lincoln received 39.8 percent of the popular vote and 59.4 of the electoral votes in an election with four strong candidates. More than 130 years later, Reform Party supporters in fifty states and the District of Columbia cast 19,741,065 popular votes for H. Ross Perot (almost 20 percent) in 1992. Their 20 percent share of the national vote (half that of Lincoln's) did not capture a single state's electoral votes. Nonetheless, the Reform Party share topped all national third-party candidates since the Bull Moose Party ran former U.S. President Theodore Roosevelt in 1912 and received 4,119,207 popular votes (29.6 percent) and eighty-eight electoral votes (16 percent). In contrast, Ralph Nader's 2000 guest candidacy on the Green Party ticket in forty-three states and the District of Columbia won 3.5 percent of the popular vote and zero electoral votes. Electoral college dynamics reinforce two-party predominance at the state level because national Republicans and Democrats need strong state parties to energize a plurality or majority of the popular vote and because forty-eight states apportion their electoral votes on a winner-takes-all basis.

Margaret Lewis campaigns for Congress on the environmentally oriented Green Party ticket at Waryas Park in Poughkeepsie, New York, September 2002.
(© Kathy McLaughlin/The Image Works)

Members of one of the two major parties usually became state governors during the twentieth century. Jesse Ventura (Minnesota, 1998–2002) was an exception to the pattern. Occasionally, Republicans and Democrats ran and were elected as "nonpartisan" or "independent" governors. Less often, candidates of smaller parties sometimes were elected to Congress.

Although the United States is a presidentialist system, institutional constraints on effective participation and contestation are not inherent in presidentialism. For example, by the 1980s, the Philippines and South Korea demonstrated that non-U.S. presidential systems reserve seats in their national legislatures for candidates elected nationally from party lists who otherwise might not be able to win in individual districts.

Fusion is another alternative participatory tactic. Fusion lets supporters of parties other than the two major ones vote for their party's candidate when their party endorses the candidate of another party, but they vote on their own party's ballot line. Anticipating that scenario, fusion also lets supporters of the smaller party promote their agenda in candidate selection by the larger party. If the fusion candidate prevails, fusion lets supporters of smaller parties document their impact on the victory. Fusion flourished in some regions until the early decades of the twentieth century. However, by 2003, fusion was outlawed almost everywhere outside New York state.

Winner-takes-all single-member-district (SMD) elections are the rule for Congress and are typical for members of a majority of the state legislatures. SMD elections disadvantage the smaller political parties more so than would be the case if multimember-electoral-district (MMD) elections were the rule for elections to Congress and state legislatures. If fusion ballot lines were combined with MMD elections for Congress, a runoff requirement when no majority winner emerges would further diminish the smaller parties' disadvantage. In use by several representative democracies, the single nontransferable vote is also likely to benefit electorally sophisticated minor parties.

In addition to these legal restrictions, managers of television stations and leaders of national civic groups disadvantage small parties by using a "viability" criterion to minimize and exclude media exposure of minor political parties in media coverage of candidates' debates. Whereas numerous Republican and Democratic candidates appear on televised talk shows and debates during the run-up to primary elections in national and state elections, free media coverage is less often afforded to candidates of other political parties.

The prevailing wisdom of the "wasted-vote" axiom deserves closer scrutiny. Arguably, single-member-district/first-past-the-post elections lead voters leaning toward support of minor parties to feel constrained to vote for candidates with whom they have major differences rather than throw away their vote for a candidate and party with whom they really agree. However, a perception of a potentially "wasted vote" has two other effects: It leads potential voters to withhold their votes from all Republican and Democratic candidates by withdrawing altogether from voting. And it leads yet other voters and would-be voters to value nonelectoral political activity more highly.

In 1998 bicameral legislatures in thirteen (27 percent) of the forty-nine bicameral states had single-member-district elections for members of at least one house. Like the other thirty-six bicameral states and like one house in most of the remaining thirteen, voters in unicameral Nebraska also elect their legislature in first-past-the post SMD elections.

The Green Party and other smaller parties are sometimes more successful at the polls in municipal elections where ostensibly nonpartisan elections are common. Indeed, MMDs at the municipal level may be a quiet protest against two-party dominance.

Several amendments to the U.S. Constitution expanded the franchise (Amendments Fourteen, Fifteen, Seventeen, Nineteen, Twenty-three, Twenty-four, and Twenty-six), as did the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and successor statutes. Yet the tendency to dismiss issues of fair representation and civil liberties issues embedded in the contest for ballot access and inclusion in televised debates disenfranchises a substantial plurality of U.S. citizens. Dismantling those barriers is the next frontier of citizen empowerment.

Vincent Kelly Pollard

See also: Democracy and Civil Liberties; First Amendment; Political Parties; Presidential Debates; Tyranny of the Majority.

FURTHER READING

"Comparative Democratization Project," 2002–2003. Stanford University, Institute of International Studies. http://democracy.stanford.edu.

Disch, Lisa Jane. The Tyranny of the Two-Party System: Power, Conflict, and Democracy. American Politics into the Twenty-first Century series. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Karl, Terry, Larry Diamond, Donald K. Emmerson, Michael McFaul, and Gail Lapidus.

Keman, Hans, ed. Comparative Democratic Politics: A Guide to Contemporary Theory and Research. London: Sage, 2002.

LeDuc, Lawrence, Richard G. Niemi, and Pippa Norris, eds. Comparing Democracies 2: New Challenges in the Study of Elections and Voting. 2d ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2002.

Morehouse, Sarah McCally, and Malcolm E. Jewell. State Politics, Parties, and Policy. 2d ed. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Sachs, Daniel Finegold. "D.C.'s Political Report: Minor Parties Links," 1998–2003. http://www.dcpoliticalreport.com/PartyLink.htm.

Miranda v. Arizona (1966)

Whether they realize it or not, most Americans are familiar with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). Many crime dramas on television and in the movies incorporate the Miranda warnings in dialogue when a character is being arrested: "You have the right to remain silent. If you give up that right, anything you say can and will be used against you. You have the right to an attorney. If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be provided for you. Do you understand these rights?" At minimum, average Americans hearing these familiar words on television have become at least somewhat more aware of the constitutional rights afforded criminal defendants. Although civil libertarians applauded the Miranda decision, its protections have been limited by subsequent Court decisions. When the case was first decided, it was highly controversial because many law enforcement officials feared it would put convicts back on the streets. Those fears have been largely unfounded.

Police officer reads Miranda rights to suspect.
(© Bob Daemmrich/The Image Works)

The U.S. Supreme Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren was considered very liberal and was known for its protection of civil liberties. The Miranda decision forced all states to read suspects the aforementioned warnings before questioning them to avoid forced self-incrimination. The case dealt with an indigent Mexican male with mental problems who was not informed of his Fifth Amendment protections before incriminating himself. The Court held that his incriminating testimony was given under a so-called badge of intimidation, and the Court directed that the warnings must be read in the future to all persons under "custodial interrogation"—persons who were not free to leave a police interview. A precursor to this ruling was Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), which had also liberalized protections for custodial interrogations.

The Court under the more conservative leadership of Chief Justices Warren E. Burger and William H. Rehnquist, however, created exceptions to the Miranda warnings. For example, the Burger Court developed a "public-safety" exception to Miranda in New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984), that allowed the police to ask questions of a suspect, such as "Where's the gun?" without providing Miranda warnings if the safety of the public was in jeopardy. Another ruling by the Burger Court in Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984), created the "inevitable-discovery" exception that upheld a conviction without Miranda warnings because police would have found the incriminating evidence anyway.

Furthermore, the Rehnquist Court added a third limit to the self-incrimination protection. Prior to this Court's decision in Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991), the justices had held that any coerced confession automatically violated the Fifth Amendment. The Court created the harmless-error standard for coerced confessions in Fulminante, however. Although the Court overturned the conviction in this particular case, the broader application of the harmless-error standard is that if an individual would have been convicted even without a coerced confession, admitting the confession into evidence is deemed merely a "harmless error" and is not grounds for reversing a conviction.

Lori M. Maxwell

See also: Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Harmless Error; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Calvi, James V., and Susan Coleman. American Law and Legal Systems. 2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1992.

Marcus, Paul, and Charles H. Whitebread. Gilbert Law Summaries: Criminal Procedure. 14th ed. Chicago: Harcourt Brace Legal, 1996.

Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan (1982)

Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718 (1982), established a new judicial standard for assessing discrimination against women. The case raised issues of gender discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and resulted in a special balancing test to be applied to cases involving classification by gender.

Joe Hogan, a registered nurse, was a nursing supervisor in a Columbus, Mississippi, medical center. He had never obtained a baccalaureate degree in nursing and wanted to work toward one at the state-supported Mississippi University for Women (MUW) School of Nursing, which was the only nursing school in the area. He could not matriculate there, university officials told him, because only women were admitted, but he could audit courses. Hogan sued in federal court, charging that excluding him on the basis of his sex violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that "No state shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The MUW School of Nursing argued that single-sex education afforded unique benefits to students and that maintaining a women-only policy was in keeping with the state's interest in providing female students with the greatest possible range of public educational opportunities, compensating them for past discrimination. When the case reached the U.S. Supreme Court in 1983, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the five–four majority, rejected that claim. The women-only rule did not compensate anyone for past discrimination, she wrote. Women who chose to become nurses had not been discriminated against; on the contrary, 94 percent of those holding nursing degrees in Mississippi and almost 98 percent of nurses nationwide were women. What MUW's policy did, Justice O'Connor said, was "perpetuate the stereotyped view of nursing as an exclusively woman's job." The school's argument that having men in its classrooms would interfere with women students' learning made no sense, since MUW allowed men to audit courses.

The importance of the case, however, lay in the constitutional test articulated by Justice O'Connor. In cases that involved classification of people on the basis of gender, she wrote, the state "must carry the burden of showing an 'exceedingly persuasive justification.' " That meant the government had to prove that the gender classification served "important governmental objectives" and that the means employed were "substantially related to the achievement of those objectives." Additionally, the classification could not reflect "fixed notions concerning the roles and abilities of males and females" or "archaic and stereotypic notions."

Much of the path-breaking gender-equality litigation of the 1970s had revolved around the constitutional test to be used in deciding such cases. Women's rights advocates argued that classification on the basis of gender, like that on the basis of race, should be labeled "suspect" by the courts, and the burden should be on the government to prove that classification was necessary for a constitutionally legitimate purpose. Governmental entities replied that a "rational-relation" (or rational-basis) test was all that was necessary: If the classification was rationally related to a legitimate governmental goal, it was constitutional. Justice O'Connor and the majority of the Court chose an intermediate test in Hogan, in effect holding that gender classification by publicly supported institutions was not automatically suspect but had to be defended under the stringent criteria she articulated—and, by inference, that perpetuating stereotypical notions about gender roles did not meet those criteria.

Philippa Strum

See also: Balancing Test; Intermediate-Level Scrutiny; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Atwell, Mary Wekek. Equal Protection of the Law: Gender and Justice in the United States, ch. 2. New York: P. Lang, 2002.

Cushman, Clare, ed. Supreme Court Decisions and Women's Rights: Milestones to Equality, pp. 86–93. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Montesquieu, Baron of (1689–1755)

Charles-Louis de Secondat, who would become known as Baron de Montesquieu, was a French writer and intellectual who played an important role in the creation of the U.S. Constitution. Montesquieu was regarded as one of the most influential political theorists of the eighteenth century.

Montesquieu was born to an important French family in 1689. He was extensively educated at the Baron de Montesquieu advocated tolerance and political openness. (Library of Congress)

College de Juilly and studied law at the University of Bordeaux and Paris. In 1713, upon his father's death, Montesquieu became head of the family estates in Bordeaux. The next year he became a member of the parliament of Bordeaux. In 1716 he inherited the barony of Montesquieu when his uncle died.

Montesquieu followed a conventional pattern for a member of the nobility. His Bordeaux parliamentary duties were primarily judicial. Montesquieu presided over the Tournelle (criminal division) during his time of active participation. He oversaw prisons and torture and doled out punishments that included executions and deportations.

In 1721 Montesquieu anonymously published The Persian Letters, a fictional account of two travelers from Persia who encounter mysterious and comical customs on a trip to Paris. In 1728 he was elected to the French Academy and began three years of traveling in Europe and England. In 1748 Montesquieu published The Spirit of the Laws, by far his most important book. He became an outspoken reformer and published in Denis Diderot's Encyclopedia before his death in 1755.

Montesquieu's work focused on a rational and liberal reform of governmental power. He advocated tolerance and political openness. His years spent in England gave him the ideas for much of his political philosophy. Montesquieu called for a separation of powers and an independent judiciary to safeguard personal liberty. He also advocated reform in the criminal law that recognized differences of opinion and religion. In his Encyclopedia entry on political liberty, Montesquieu wrote, "It is the triumph of liberty when criminal laws draw each penalty from the particular nature of the crime. All arbitrariness ends; the penalty does not ensue from the legislator's capriciousness but from the nature of the thing, and man does not do violence to man." Montesquieu's examples included withdrawing the benefits of religion from someone convicted of sacrilege and withholding the benefits of society from someone who had violated public mores.

Montesquieu had a major influence on the framers of the U.S. Constitution. He was liberally quoted by federalists such as Alexander Hamilton and James Madison to defend their formation of a three-part government. Antifederalists also quoted Montesquieu's belief that a republic should be small in size. Both sides of the constitutional debate used Montesquieu as a source of wisdom, quoting him more often than they did John Locke.

Montesquieu's writings tried to bring enlightened humanism into practice. Although he was acknowledged as a great intellectual in his own time and became more famous with the next generation of American and French politicians, he is less known today than are many others who played lesser roles in influencing the new nation's Constitution.

Charles C. Howard

See also: Constitutionalism; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Cohler, Anne, Basia Miller, and Harold Stone, eds. The Spirit of the Laws by Montesquieu. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Shklar, Judith. Montesquieu. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Moore v. City of East Cleveland (1977)

In Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977), the U.S. Supreme Court was brought face-to-face with the changing nature of the typical American family. This new family was composed of Inez Moore, a resident of East Cleveland, Ohio, who shared her home with her son Dale and her two grandsons. One of her grandsons, John Jr., who was the child of her other son, John, had returned to live with Inez Moore after his own mother died. This living arrangement proceeded unhindered for nine years.

In the meantime, East Cleveland passed an ordinance that limited occupancy of each dwelling unit to members of a single family, with "family" defined essentially as the nuclear family of parents and their children. Moore, who was then sixty-three years old, subsequently received a notice from the city informing her that she was in violation of the housing ordinance and directing her to remove John Jr. from her home. When she refused to expel her ten-year-old grandson, Moore was fined and sentenced to five days in jail. She appealed, arguing that the city ordinance violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution by making a crime out of a grandmother's choice to live with her grandson.

Before the Court could resolve this issue, it had to find within the text of the Constitution a right of the individual to define and preserve family living arrangements. Only three years earlier, in Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974), the Court had determined that unrelated individuals did not possess a fundamental right to live together. Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., writing a plurality opinion on behalf of the Court in Moore, distinguished Belle Terre, stating that "the Constitution protects the sanctity of the family precisely because the institution of the family is deeply rooted in this nation's history and tradition. It is through the family that we inculcate and pass down many of our most cherished values, moral and cultural." The Court then held that because the ordinance infringed on the liberty interest people possess in defining their family living arrangements, the Court must examine carefully the importance of the governmental interests advanced. The Court noted that those interests—preventing overcrowding, minimizing traffic and parking congestion, and avoiding financial burdens on the school district—were legitimate but were advanced only marginally by the ordinance. Therefore, Justice Powell concluded, the ordinance infringed on Moore's substantive due process rights. In his concurrence, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. noted that the pattern of the nuclear family was one found largely in white suburbia, and that African American families, which more commonly depended on extended family living arrangements, would be disproportionately impacted by ordinances like the one propounded by East Cleveland.

The Court had an opportunity to revisit the sanctity of the family nearly a quarter century later in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), and again noted the "fundamental right of parents to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children." That the Court will continue to revisit this issue should not be surprising, considering the increasing trend away from the traditional nuclear family. For example, in 1998, as the Court noted in Troxel, approximately 4 million children—or 5.6 percent of all children under age eighteen—lived in their grandparents' household. The Court has acknowledged that states have primary responsibility for creating a legal system that promotes the interests of families, but it has not shied away from protecting family interests in the past, and it will likely maintain this position in the future.

Andrew Braniff

See also: Family Rights; First Amendment; Right of Unmarried People to Live Together; Right to Privacy; Substantive Due Process; Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas.

FURTHER READING

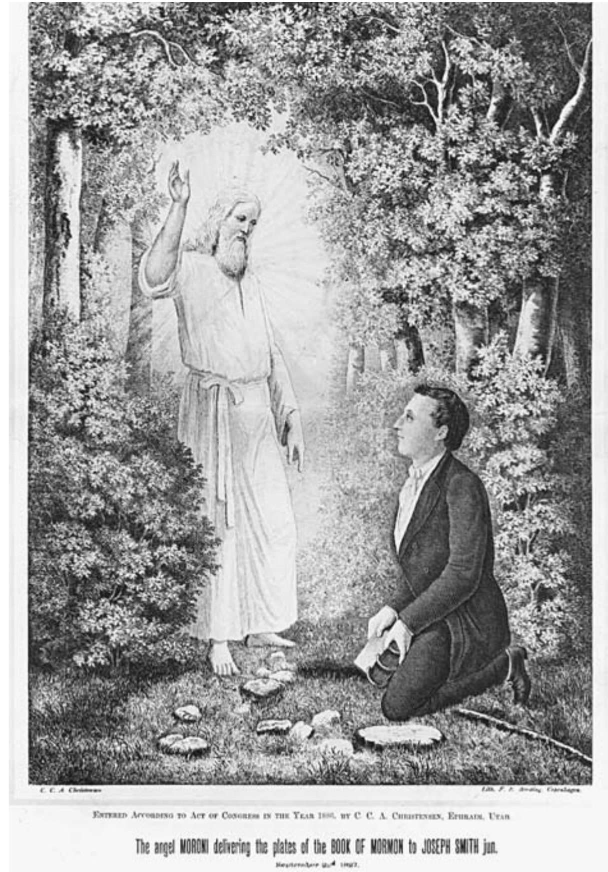
Kmiec, Douglas, and Stephen B. Presser. Individual Rights and the American Constitution, 811–30. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 1999.

Meyer, David D. "The Paradox of Family Privacy." Vanderbilt Law Review 53 (2000): 527.

Mormons

The term "Mormon" is a nickname ascribed to members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Church members typically refer to themselves either as Latter-day Saints or simply as Saints. The term "Mormon" comes from the Book of Mormon, which Latter-day Saints accept, along with the Bible, as scripture. Church members believe the Book of Mormon is a record of a branch of the tribes of Israel that left Jerusalem around 600 B.C.E., shortly before Jerusalem was captured by Babylon. This group came to the Americas and established a civilization that lasted approximately a thousand years before collapsing due to internal divisions and wars. The Book of Mormon contains an account of a visit by Jesus Christ to the Americas after his crucifixion and resurrection, and Latter-day Saints regard the book, according to its subtitle, as "Another Testament of Jesus Christ." Church founder Joseph Smith claimed to translate the book by the power of God from an ancient record written on gold plates that were buried in a hill named Cumorah, near Palmyra, New York.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has been among the most persecuted religious groups in the United States. The church was formally organized in April 1830 in New York, but shortly thereafter established Kirtland, Ohio, and Jackson County, Missouri, as gathering places for members. Conflicts soon arose with the old settlers of Jackson County as a result of cultural, religious, and political differences. Most of the Saints had migrated to Missouri from New England and valued Sabbath worship, education, and refinements, in contrast to the prevailing frontier atmosphere of Jackson County. The Latter-day Saints disapproved of slavery and were friendly with Indians. Many Missourians regarded the Mormons' beliefs in the Book of Mormon, as revelation, and modern-day prophets as unorthodox. The growth of the church also threatened the old settlers' political control of the county. By 1833, 1,200 Latter-day Saints had moved into Jackson County, and the local residents demanded that they leave. When the Latter-day Saints refused, a mob destroyed their printing press, looted the church store, and tarred and feathered church leaders. After continued violence, the Latter-day



A depiction of the angel Moroni delivering the plates of the Book of Mormon to Joseph Smith. (Library of Congress)

Saints were exiled to Clay County and later to Caldwell County.

Similar developments took place in Kirtland, Ohio. By 1838 about 2,000 Latter-day Saints lived in Kirtland, contributing to a tripling of the town's population in just seven years. In 1837, Latter-day Saints won all but one of the elected township offices and shifted voting patterns from Whig to Democratic. Kirtland became the only Democratic-voting township in a Whig-controlled county, and opposition grew from threats to mob action. In 1838 most of the Latter-day Saints in Kirtland left to join the Saints in Caldwell County, but the additional influx only increased animosities against the Saints in Missouri. Violence erupted again when Latter-day Saints in neighboring Davies County were prevented from voting on election day. Church leaders petitioned Missouri Governor Lilburn W. Boggs for protection. Governor Boggs told them to provide for their own protection, so church leaders in the town of Far West organized their own state-authorized militia after mob action resulted in a number of deaths.

The violence escalated into open warfare. The Far West militia met a renegade group of Missouri militia in the Battle of Crooked River, which left one dead on each side. Rumors of Mormon aggression spread as a result of the battle, and Governor Boggs issued the "extermination order" on October 27, 1838, authorizing the Missouri militia to drive the Mormons from the state or exterminate them. The state militia attacked a Latter-day Saints settlement at Haun's Mill, killing seventeen, and then laid siege to the main body of the Saints at Far West. They arrested Joseph Smith, disarmed the Far West militia, and drove about 12,000 Latter-day Saints from Missouri into eastern Iowa and western Illinois. Joseph Smith was held for five months before guards allowed him to escape.

Governor Boggs issued the extermination order in the form of a military order in his capacity as commander-in-chief of the Missouri militia. The Missouri legislature debated the legality of the order during its 1839 session but did not come to a determination on the issue. The extermination order was not rescinded until Governor Christopher S. Bond did so in 1976.

In 1839, Joseph Smith traveled to Washington, D.C., to present affidavits to the federal government detailing the Saints' losses in Missouri and petition for redress. In February 1840 he met with President Martin Van Buren who replied, "Gentlemen, your cause is just, but I can do nothing for you." Technically, President Van Buren was correct, because the constitutional guarantees contained in the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states until after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, the response also was indicative of the unwillingness of federal authorities to exercise their political influence to end religious persecution of the Mormons.

Church members fleeing Missouri's mobs and militia were welcomed in Illinois. The legislature granted Joseph Smith a charter for the city of Nauvoo on the banks of the Mississippi River. Nauvoo grew rapidly as converts arrived from the eastern United States, Canada, and the British Isles. At its peak, Nauvoo's population reached 15,000 to rival Chicago in size. However, opposition to the Mormons began to grow in Illinois. In 1844, Joseph Smith was arrested and then shot and killed by a mob while in the Carthage jail awaiting a hearing. The following year mob arson and violence drove many Latter-day Saints from their farms, and the legislature revoked the Nauvoo charter. Under the leadership of Brigham Young, the church began preparations to leave Illinois. When the mobs began stealing wagons needed for the journey and Illinois Governor Thomas Ford sent troops to Nauvoo to arrest church leaders, the Latter-day Saints were forced to begin their exodus in February, driving their wagons across the frozen Mississippi River. To escape persecution, the Saints settled in the Salt Lake Valley (in present-day Utah) outside the territorial boundaries of United States, though the United States shortly thereafter acquired the territory from Mexico in the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Concern over the Mormon practice of polygamy delayed statehood for Utah until 1896 after church leaders officially renounced this doctrine.

Despite early persecution, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has grown to become the sixth-largest church in the United States, with over 11 million members worldwide. Though perhaps still not considered mainstream, the church is respected for promoting self-reliance, abstinence from alcohol and tobacco, genealogy, and strong families.

Owen Abbe

See also: First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Polygamy; Reynolds v. United States.

FURTHER READING

LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987.

Ludlow, Daniel H., ed. The Encyclopedia of Mormonism. New York: Macmillan, 1992.

Smith, Joseph, trans. The Book of Mormon. Salt Lake City, UT: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1986.

Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties

Moviemakers produce movies primarily to entertain audiences and to make money, but, like books on which they are sometimes based, movies also can help educate and sway viewers about political matters. Despite the famous remark by Hollywood mogul Samuel Goldwyn that "messages are for Western Union," movies have always dealt with weighty political and legal topics—including issues related to civil liberties. The criminal justice system, the rights of persons accused of crimes, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the Hollywood blacklist, and the right of privacy have all been addressed by Hollywood films. Shows dealing with crime and punishment, with criminal investigations and lawyers and judges, are also a staple of television.

Crime and the legal system have long been popular film topics. Numerous movies stress the need for an effective system of criminal justice. The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (1962) and The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean (1972) considered the lawlessness of the early American West, and Mad Max (1979) and its sequels looked at the same problem in a post-apocalyptic future. Fury (1936) and The Ox-Bow Incident (1943) highlighted the evils of mob justice. Gangster movies from the 1930s to the present, including Little Caesar (1931), The Godfather (1972), and Goodfellas (1990), explored the world of illegal activities and thereby spotlighted the need to combat crime.

Criminal trials have been frequently featured in movies, including Anatomy of a Murder (1959), To Kill a Mockingbird (1962), . . . And Justice for All (1979), The Verdict (1982), Jagged Edge (1985), and Presumed Innocent (1990). These films addressed issues such as the fairness of the judicial system and the importance of the individual lawyers and judges who worked in it. Twelve Angry Men (1957) looked at the jury system and the responsibilities of citizens who served on juries. The television movie Gideon's Trumpet (1980) told the story of the Supreme Court case that mandated that states provide defense counsel for indigent defendants. The issue of punishment arose in A Clockwork Orange (1971), in which mind control was used to try to reform criminals, and in I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang (1932), The Shawshank Redemption (1994), and American History X (1998), which looked at the prison system and its effects. The death penalty was explored in Dead Man Walking (1995), an even-handed look at the volatile issue, as well as in The Chamber (1996), The Green Mile (1999), and The Life of David Gale (2003).

The constitutional protections given to persons charged with crimes have often generated public opposition, a feeling that intensified as the Supreme Court expanded the rights of the accused in the 1960s. Several Hollywood movies reflected a frustration with those rights, seeing them as loopholes through which criminals escaped punishment. Dirty Harry (1971) and its sequels featured a San Francisco detective who sometimes ignored constitutional protections and instead sought justice by taking the law into his own hands. Death Wish (1974) and its sequels and The Boondock Saints (1999) celebrated vigilante action by private citizens as a way to compensate for the limitations of the legal system. In The Star Chamber (1983), judges, frustrated with the loopholes in the legal system, formed a secret organization to dispense justice as they saw fit. RoboCop (1987) and its sequels involved a cyborg designed to bring immediate justice in Detroit in the near future.

Another basic civil liberty, free speech, has been the subject of several films. The People v. Larry Flynt (1996) told the story of how an otherwise unadmirable pornographer became a champion of free speech. Talk Radio (1988) portrayed an abrasive radio host exercising his right to express his opinions. The related issue of freedom of the press arose in a variety of films. All the President's Men (1976) recounted how two reporters for the Washington Post, despite opposition from the president's administration, helped to expose the Watergate scandal. Absence of Malice (1981) presented a less glorified view of the power of the press when a newspaper got a story wrong and ruined lives in the process.

From 1947 to 1962, the film industry blacklisted, or refused to hire, persons suspected of having had Communist sympathies. This episode, prompted by the Cold War and America's strong fear of communism, was a key event in the history of the movie industry and had significant civil liberties implications. The blacklist plunged Hollywood into turmoil, as did the related question of whether people working in the industry should cooperate with the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), the congressional panel investigating the influence of Communists in the movies. Those opposing cooperation argued that their constitutional rights under the Fifth Amendment should enable them to refuse to answer questions.

Hollywood has examined the blacklist era in numerous movies. Films such as The Way We Were (1973), The Front (1976), Guilty by Suspicion (1991), Rock the Cradle (1999), and The Majestic (2001) dealt with the issue directly, whereas other films looked at the subject more allegorically. High Noon (1952) told the story of a Western marshal deserted by his townspeople at a key moment, much as those who refused to cooperate with HUAC were deserted by their colleagues. On the Waterfront (1954) sought to justify cooperation with the committee through a story of man who assisted a government investigation of a labor union even though it made him highly unpopular.

The Supreme Court added to the list of Americans' civil liberties when it enunciated, beginning in the 1960s, a right to privacy. One of the most controversial privacy issues has been abortion, a topic examined in several films, including Citizen Ruth (1996) and the television movies Roe v. Wade (1989) and If These Walls Could Talk (1996). Other films have considered the dangers to citizens' privacy posed by government, particularly when well-equipped with technology. In Conspiracy Theory (1997), the seemingly far-fetched fears of a New York City cabdriver about an out-of-control government proved to be true. A lawyer's privacy was grossly violated by the government's National Security Agency (NSA) in 1998's Enemy of the State. In Minority Report (2002), futurist police officers read the thoughts of citizens to predict when they planned to commit murder.

Mark E. Byrnes

See also: Blacklisting; Capital Punishment; Due Process of Law; First Amendment; Right to Privacy; Trial by Jury.

FURTHER READING

Bergman, Paul, and Michael Asimow. Reel Justice: The Courtroom Goes to the Movies. Kansas City, MO: Andrews and McMeel, 1996.

Gianos, Phillip L. Politics and Politicians in American Film. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1998.

Giglio, Ernest. Here's Looking at You: Hollywood, Film, and Politics. New York: P. Lang, 2000.

Muller v. Oregon (1908)

In Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908), the U.S. Supreme Court faced the issue of whether the police power of a state to protect the public health, safety, and welfare of its citizens could be used to limit the liberty of contract for working women. Only three years earlier, in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), the Supreme Court had struck down a New York regulation that prohibited bakers (a profession that was exclusively male) from working more than ten hours a day or sixty hours a week as a violation of the liberty of contract, which was protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Muller, however, the Court unanimously ruled that an Oregon statute prohibiting women from working more than ten hours per day in factories or laundries was constitutional. In doing so, the Court placed limits on the liberty-of-contract doctrine and the requirement of due process protections for economic liberties as applied to women because of their special status as mothers. As Justice David J. Brewer's opinion noted, the state could legitimately use its police power to regulate the working hours of women because "as healthy mothers are essential to vigorous offspring, the physical well-being of women becomes an object of public interest and care in order to preserve the strength and vigor of the race."

Justice Brewer's opinion in Muller also made note of a nontraditional brief filed in support of the state by Louis D. Brandeis, a prominent Boston attorney who would later become a Supreme Court justice. Eschewing the traditional format of lengthy legal arguments and citations to precedents, Brandeis filed a brief containing only two pages of precedent and over one hundred pages of sociological, economic, physiological, and medical data purporting to show the deleterious effects of long working hours on women's health. The Court's acceptance of this "Brandeis brief" successfully opened the door for judges across the country to consider nonlegal materials, especially social science data, in making their decisions, a practice that has now become commonplace. Moreover, the justices' comments about the brief reflected a broader recognition that judges should consider the relevant social context—and not solely legal precedents—when making their decisions, and they also gave implicit approval to the "sociological jurisprudence" movement (which was based on the idea that the law ought to reflect the reality and needs of society), of which Brandeis was a leading advocate.

Although the Court acknowledged Brandeis's arguments about the genuinely negative effects of long working hours on women, its actual decision in Muller reflected the generally held paternalistic view of working women at the time. Furthermore, the holding in Muller was confined solely to regulations that limited women's working hours. By contrast, in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923), the Court struck down a minimum-wage law for women as a violation of the liberty of contract. Thus, although the Muller decision was a victory for progressive reformers, it did not overturn the Supreme Court's general support of substantive due process protections of economic liberties during this time.

James McHenry

See also: Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Contract, Freedom of; Lochner v. New York; Substantive Due Process.

FURTHER READING

Gillman, Howard. The Constitution Besieged: The Rise and Demise of Lochner*-Era Police Powers Jurisprudence.* Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1993.

Strum, Philippa. Brandeis: Beyond Progressivism. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993.

Woloch, Nancy. Muller v. Oregon: A Brief History with Documents. New York: St. Martin's, 1996.

Murphy, Frank (1890–1949)

Frank Murphy was President Franklin Roosevelt's fifth Supreme Court nominee. Murphy was born in Sand Beach, Michigan, on April 13, 1890, to a devoutly Catholic and politically active family. He received his law degree from the University of Michigan in 1914 and joined a Detroit law firm until his military service in World War I. After his discharge, he was appointed an assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan. He briefly undertook private practice, but returned to public life with his election as judge of Detroit's Recorder's Court in 1923. He demonstrated unusual sensitivity to the interests of racial minorities and the economically disadvantaged. He was elected mayor of Detroit in 1930 and responded to the hardships resulting from the Great Depression by developing a public assistance program in Detroit.

Murphy was instrumental in Franklin Roosevelt's election to the presidency in 1932. Soon after Roosevelt's inauguration, Murphy was appointed governor general of the Philippines, returning to be elected governor of Michigan in 1936. Politically damaged by his intervention in an automobile workers' strike, Murphy lost his bid for reelection. He moved to Washington, D.C., and Roosevelt appointed him U.S. attorney general, a position he used in aggressively seeking to protect the interests of organized labor and racial minorities. These priorities created some friction inside the administration, which prompted Roosevelt to nominate him for the Supreme Court.

Murphy served on the Supreme Court for about a decade (1940–1949) and has been characterized as the most liberal justice ever. He was ends-driven and viewed law as a means to advance freedom and justice. One writer suggested that Murphy subscribed to a "visceral" jurisprudence and that his opinions "swept aside technical 'niceties' in a quest for justice and 'human dignity.' " Murphy doubted his capacity to function as a justice, but this did not prevent him from having a judicial philosophy, which featured the primacy of constitutional rights over all other constitutional provisions. This "preferred freedoms" view was given effect by subjecting any law that impinged on a protected right to exacting judicial scrutiny. Murphy embraced this value in Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940), in which he concluded that the First Amendment protected peaceful picketing.

World War II occasionally led Murphy to take the government's side against individual rights claims, such as in the first flag-salute case, Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940). He "corrected" his Gobitis vote in West Virginia Board of Ed- ucation v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), and said a justice has "no loftier duty or responsibility than to uphold . . . spiritual freedom to its farthest reaches." He voted with the Court in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943), as it upheld the curfew provisions of Roosevelt's executive order during World War II directed at those of Japanese ancestry. Murphy later became an outspoken critic of relocating the Japanese, concluding that it "legaliz[ed] racism." Many regard his dissent in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), as his most powerful opinion.

Murphy was adamant that procedural guarantees of the Constitution extended to all persons. The protections afforded by the Bill of Rights must "survive any popular passion or frenzy of the moment. No court or legislature or executive, not even the mightiest army in the world, can ever destroy them." One scholar suggested that no Court justice "was so consistent and passionate a judicial crusader for civil liberties for everyone; for Nazi spies and for Japanese generals, in peacetime and in wartime, as Murphy." Many of the positions Murphy took presaged the liberal decisions of the Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren during the 1950s and 1960s. As early as 1942, Murphy began to experience health problems, and during his last three years on the Court, he was hospitalized several times. He suffered a fatal heart attack and died July 19, 1949.

Peter G. Renstrom

See also: Korematsu v. United States; Preferred-Freedoms Doctrine.

FURTHER READING

Fine, Sidney. Frank Murphy: The Washington Years. Vol. 3. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1984.

Howard, J. Woodford. Mr. Justice Murphy: A Political Biography. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.

Renstrom, Peter G. The Stone Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2001.

Rodell, Fred. Nine Men. New York: Random House, 1955.

Urofsky, Melvin I. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court Under Stone and Vinson, 1941–53. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Music Censorship

Music is a way for people to explain their feelings, whether those emotions are love, anger, joy, dismay, disapproval, or myriad others. Because music is open to interpretation and because people enjoy or dislike music according to their own individual tastes, ages, and lifestyles, music censorship has been present since advances in technology provided a means of bringing music in its many forms to listening audiences. Music has long been considered a way for young people to express themselves and to declare independence from their parents and other adults in positions of authority. Because of this, successive generations of parents have responded to new styles of music by viewing them as threats to their control over their children and as detrimental to society as a whole. In retrospect, the censorship of certain kinds of music or artists assumes a certain ludicrousness. Young adults who were reared on MTV may find it hard to believe that saxophone music was called the "devil's flute" in the 1920s, that singing cowboy Gene Autry was banned in the 1930s, that Cole Porter and Billie Holiday were considered "obscene" in the 1940s, that a gyrating Elvis Presley was filmed only from the waist up in the 1950s, or that the Beatles were considered "dangerous" to mainstream morality in the 1960s. Of course, the mere notion of censorship of music cuts to the heart of the right to free expression protected under the First Amendment to the Constitution. Nonetheless, there have been occasional successful efforts to ban particular types of music or individual songs.

Rock and roll has been banned more than any other kind of music in history for a variety of reasons. In 1954 the House of Representatives considered a bill that would have made it a federal crime to mail "dirty" music, punishable by a $50,000 fine. In 1955 one Chicago radio station received 15,000 calls in a single week from adults complaining about the "evils" of rock and roll, which was thought to promote juvenile delinquency. A deejay in Portland, Oregon, was fired in December 1957 for playing Elvis Presley's version of "White Christmas" because the arrangement was in "poor taste." In 1960 a number of radio stations banned Ray Peterson's "Tell Laura I Love Her" about a teenager who died, dubbing it "the death disk." Chubby Checker's "The Twist" was called "un-Christian." Bob Dylan was banned in El Paso, Texas, because his lyrics were hard to understand and "might" be obscene.

In the early days of rock and roll, black music, or rhythm and blues, was seen as "lewd and lascivious" and as a threat to the decency of white middle-class teenagers. In April 1956 the White Citizens Council of Birmingham, Alabama, banned all rock-and-roll music because the members believed it had been created by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In 1958 several Middle Eastern nations banned the entire rock-and-roll genre because an Iranian doctor insisted that teenagers were injuring their hips from the "extreme gyrations." In 1965, after a number of rock stations in the United States banned the Rolling Stones' "Satisfaction" for being too "suggestive," the song shot to number one on charts around the world.

As protests against the Vietnam War spread in the 1970s, radio stations banned large numbers of musicians for being "anti-American." Other 1970s songs, such as Peter, Paul, and Mary's "Puff the Magic Dragon" and the Beatles' "Yellow Submarine" were thought to promote the drug culture. The Reverend Jesse Jackson announced that all dance music contributed to promiscuity and drug use. Beginning in the late 1970s and continuing into the early 1980s, the United States experienced a period in which record burnings were held throughout the country. Rumors were spread that rock music contained satanic messages if played backward. A California legislator introduced a bill to ban "back masking," which he insisted could "manipulate our behavior without our knowledge or consent and turn us into disciples of the anti-Christ."

Over a period of several decades, parents, politicians, and radio stations have discussed the idea of a standardized labeling system for recorded music and music videos. No individual has been more closely associated with the music-labeling system than Tipper Gore, wife of former Vice President Al Gore. Tipper Gore helped to found Parents Music Resource Center (PMRC) in 1985 with a $5,000 start-up grant from Mike Love of the Beach Boys. PMRC lobbied Congress and the music industry for labels on any music that contained sexually explicit and/or vulgar language, harangued against women, or advocated inflicting pain or committing suicide. PMRC insisted it was not advocating censorship but simply asking that parents be warned about the content of questionable music before it was placed in the hands of their children.

In 1990, Congress considered but did not pass a resolution that would have urged the music industry to adopt a uniform warning label for all recorded music and music videos identified as violent or obscene. In that same year, the rap group 2 Live Crew became a household name after members were arrested on obscenity charges for graphically simulating sex at a concert in Hollywood, Florida. In Greenville, South Carolina, seven record-shop owners were arrested for selling the group's album "As Nasty As They Wanna Be." Throughout the 1990s, censuring rock musicians such as Guns 'n' Roses, Nirvana, Madonna, and Ice-T was common practice. Censors also objected to some country music. Both Garth Brooks's "The Thunder Rolls" and Martina McBride's "Independence Day" were banned because they referenced domestic violence. As the twenty-first century began, music censors were still at work. Four private school students were suspended for listening to the Backstreet Boys who were considered "indecent" and "inappropriate." The New York Police Department (NYPD) boycotted Bruce Springsteen's "American Skin," which told the story of unarmed immigrant Amadou Diallo killed by the NYPD when he reached for his wallet.

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Censorship; First Amendment; Internet and the World Wide Web; Obscenity; Parents Music Resource Center; "Seven Dirty Words."

FURTHER READING

Du Noyer, Paul. The Story of Rock and Roll: The Year-by-Year Illustrated Chronicle. New York: Carlton, 1995.

Gore, Tipper. Raising PG Kids in an X-Rated Society. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1987.

Jones, E. Michael. Dionysos Rising: The Birth of Cultural Revolution out of the Spirit of Music. San Francisco: Ignatius, 1994.

Jones, Steve. Pop Music and the Press. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2002.

Nuzum, Eric D. Parental Advisory: Music Censorship in America. New York: Perennial, 2001.

N

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson (1958)

In the mid-1950s, several southern states began efforts to hamper the ability of civil rights organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to organize and operate openly. These efforts raised issues involving the freedom to associate and assemble as provided in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. One such attempt was the 1956 lawsuit by John Patterson, the attorney general of Alabama, to enjoin (stop) the NAACP from doing business in Alabama without registering as a "foreign" corporation. Business corporations organized in one state are "foreign" in another state and may only do business in another state after such registration. At the time, Alabama had generally neglected to require nonprofit organizations to undertake such registration. The NAACP was a nonprofit group.

As part of the lawsuit, the attorney general obtained a court order requiring the NAACP to produce records including the names and addresses of all its members in Alabama. Fearing that its members would face harassment and danger if their names were made public, the NAACP refused to produce the records. The trial court held the NAACP in contempt of court and assessed a fine of $100,000. The Supreme Court of Alabama refused to review the fine, after holding that the NAACP should have sought appellate review before it disobeyed the order to produce the records.

On appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously held in National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), that the Alabama Supreme Court had erred in refusing to review the order to produce records and the fine. The Supreme Court held that compelling an association to reveal the names of those who are its members may violate the First Amendment right to freedom of association, "particularly where a group espouses dissident beliefs." Since the NAACP had shown, as the Court said, > that on past occasions revelation of the identity of its rank-and-file members has exposed these members to economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion, and other manifestations of public hostility[,] . . . compelled disclosure of [the NAACP's] Alabama membership is likely to affect adversely the ability of [the NAACP] and its members to pursue their collective effort to foster beliefs which they admittedly have a right to advocate.

Despite the Supreme Court's ruling, it took two more appeals by the NAACP to that Court before the state of Alabama's efforts at banning the organization ended in 1964. In National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers, 377 U.S. 288 (1964), the Supreme Court held that even if the NAACP was required to register with the Alabama secretary of state before "conducting business" in the state, its failure to do so did not constitute grounds for permanently barring it from the state. Alabama also sought to bar the NAACP on the grounds that it had encouraged the 1955–1956 Montgomery bus boycott and had made false charges against state officials in 1956 in a case to desegregate the University of Alabama. The Supreme Court held these charges "furnish no basis for the restriction of the right of the [NAACP's] members to associate in Alabama."

Courts have cited these cases numerous times in denying government attempts to force unpopular organizations and minor political parties to disclose their membership lists.

Edward Still

See also: First Amendment; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.

Gray, Fred. Bus Ride to Justice. Montgomery, AL: Black Belt Press, 1995.

National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998)

In National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998), the U.S. Supreme Court held that decency and respect standards may be imposed on works of art receiving funding from the federal government without interfering with First Amendment rights to free expression.

Two late 1980s photography exhibitions caused such a furor with a portion of the public that a congressional group called for the abolishment of the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA)—which had partially funded the exhibits—and a group of twenty-two senators sent the NEA a letter demanding that the agency decline to fund this type of work.

One exhibit—sponsored by a North Carolina contemporary arts group—included Andres Serrano's photograph depicting a crucifix immersed in a jar of urine, entitled "Piss Christ." The other, sponsored by the University of Pennsylvania's Institute of Art, consisted of photographs by Robert Mapplethorpe of which a few (out of 150 photographs) caused controversy due to their depiction of homoerotic and sadomasochistic themes among biracial couples.

After significant debate in Congress, an amendment offered by Senator Jesse Helms (R-NC) passed requiring that NEA funds not be used to promote, disseminate, or produce materials that in the judgment of the NEA might be considered obscene. Congress also adopted the Williams-Coleman Amendment—a bipartisan effort to save the NEA—establishing that the NEA chairperson should ensure that artistic excellence and artistic merit were the criteria by which applications were judged, taking into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public. Furthermore, the legislation stated that obscenity was without artistic merit, was not protected speech, and should not be funded.

Previously, four performance artists—Karen Finley, John Fleck, Holly Hughes, and Tim Miller—had applied for and gained initial advisory panel approval for their grants, but the NEA denied them upon recommendation of the National Council of the Arts. These artists filed suit claiming that the NEA violated their First Amendment rights, first by denying their applications on political grounds and on the basis of their past artistic work rather than on the criteria set forth in the statute, and second, by violating procedural safeguards that required the council's decisions to be made by the group as a whole. After Congress imposed the decency clause on NEA funding requirements, the plaintiffs amended their complaint to include a facial challenge (that is, the law at issue always operates unconstitutionally) to the decency clause on First and Fifth Amendment grounds.

The U.S. District Court for the Central District of California examined the facial challenge and found the decency clause unconstitutionally "broad" (it prohibited too much protected speech) in violation of the First Amendment right to free expression and unconstitutionally "vague" (it was unclear as to what was prohibited) in violation of the Fifth Amendment right to due process. Four years later, a divided panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court's decision.

The Supreme Court in an eight–one decision, with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor writing the majority opinion, held that the federal government could deny grants to artists if the NEA determined the work indecent. Justice O'Connor held that applying a "decency and respect" standard to NEA grants neither inherently interfered with First Amendment rights nor did it violate constitutional vagueness principles.

In sum, applying a standard that can have many interpretations—as "decency and respect" certainly does—presents a threat to free speech. In the NEA context, however, artists who challenge social norms through works deemed indecent or disrespectful may face obstacles, at least in obtaining federal funding.

Mark Alcorn

See also: First Amendment; Miller v. California; Obscenity.

FURTHER READING

Bloom, Lackland H., Jr. "NEA v. Finley: A Decision in Search of a Rationale." Washington University Law Quarterly 77 (Spring 1999): 1–51.

Choi, Alice M. "National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley:

A Dispute over the 'Decency and Respect' Provision." Akron Law Review 32 (1999): 327–50.

National Firearms Act of 1934

The National Firearms Act of 1934 (NFA) was the nation's first major federal gun control law. Passed in response to public concerns about the use of "gangster weapons" in violent organized crime, the act applied to certain categories of firearms, including Thompson submachine guns ("tommy guns"), sawed-off shotguns, silencers, and a variety of other weapons. Congress passed the NFA as part of the tax code to avoid constitutional issues related to federal gun control. Originally proposed as a much more comprehensive gun control law, the final version of the act required anyone manufacturing, selling, buying, and owning the specified gangster weapons to register with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) and to register and pay heavy taxes for transferring ownership of the weapons. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (BATF) was charged with administering the act. The NFA has changed little over the years and, together with the often revised Gun Control Act of 1968, remains at the core of federal gun control legislation.

Prohibition and the Great Depression spawned widespread violence. The Valentine's Day massacre in Chicago, Illinois, in 1929, in which seven gangsters were killed, and an attempted assassination of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933 were just two of many violent episodes that contributed to public fear and outrage and led to calls for firearms regulation. The demand for federal action to curtail violence coincided with Roosevelt's becoming president in 1933 and the inception of the New Deal with its emphasis on federal activism. As governor of New York, Roosevelt had supported gun control. U.S. Attorney General Homer Cummings favored firearms control and registration of all weapons, except sporting rifles and shotguns, declaring in 1937, "Show me the man who does not want his gun registered and I will show you a man who should not have a gun."

The Justice Department's first version of the NFA (House Resolution 9066) required registering and taxing of most firearms, including pistols and revolvers. Cummings, however, had underestimated opposition to handgun control measures. A coalition of small-arms manufacturers, hunting groups, gun enthusiasts, and especially the National Rifle Association (NRA) mobilized against the more comprehensive version of the bill, which became widely known as the "machine gun bill." This pressure led to two significant changes in the final version of the act (House Resolution 9741). Most important, it omitted the provisions for handgun registration. Congress also changed the definition of a machine gun from semiautomatic to fully automatic weapons.

To avoid questions of the constitutionality of a federal gun control law, Congress modeled the NFA after the Narcotics Drug Act of 1914, the Harrison Act, which used the government's taxing power to control drugs and had already survived a constitutional challenge. The intent of the NFA was clearly to eliminate gangster weapons by establishing prohibitively expensive taxes on them. The transfer tax on machine guns, sawed-off shotguns, and silencers was $200, with a tax of $5 on other types of weapons. All weapons covered by the NFA had to be registered, and transferring ownership of such a weapon involved a formal application.

The importance of the NFA transcends its specific provisions. It is significant for its omissions and for its unintended consequences. The omission of handgun registration from the final version of the act was an important lost opportunity. In addition, the NFA and the debate over it galvanized the pro-gun-rights political movement, especially the NRA, which became more closely involved in the legislative process. The NRA and other groups went on to play an even more important role in passage of the federal Firearms Act of 1938, which was significantly weaker than the NFA.

Walter F. Carroll

See also: Second Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Kennett, Lee, and James La Verne Anderson. The Gun in America: The Origins of a National Dilemma. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1975.

Spitzer, Robert J. The Politics of Gun Control. 2d ed. New York: Chatham House, 1998.
Vizzard, William J. Shots in the Dark: The Policy, Politics, and Symbolism of Gun Control. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.

National League of Cities v. Usery (1976)

National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976), was the first case since the New Deal era in which the U.S. Supreme Court declared unconstitutional congressional exercise of the Commerce Clause power. At issue in the case was the permissible scope of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act, which had been amended in 1974 to include employment standards for state and local government workers. The Court's majority opinion, by then-Justice William H. Rehnquist, spelled out a vision of federalism much at odds with the post–New Deal consensus on the Court. In that regard it was a precursor to the federalism controversies that preoccupied the Court in the late 1990s and beyond—albeit the case only remained good law for less than a decade.

Justice Rehnquist's opinion centered on the concept of state sovereignty and how best to protect it through the Constitution and the courts. Rehnquist acknowledged that the commerce power was wide ranging, subject only to the limits prescribed by the Constitution. He further accepted that those limits were generally understood to be the guarantees of individual rights provided by the Constitution. Rehnquist's innovation was to interpret the federal nature of the Constitution as a comparable restraint upon congressional action. He argued that the sovereignty of the states acted as an affirmative limit on the scope of the Commerce Clause.

The majority claimed that in much the same way as the right to a fair trial or the right to due process limited the applicability of the commerce power on individuals or corporations, state sovereignty should limit the scope of the commerce power as it applied to the states. Justice Rehnquist did not provide a great deal of evidence to suggest that the Constitution's authors explicitly sought to protect state sovereignty. He relied instead upon the tradition of the Court to respect state sovereignty in the past. This was particularly true when Congress had attempted to regulate the states as states.

Much of the Commerce Clause expansion that typified the post–New Deal certainly offended what might be labeled state sovereignty, but did so generally by means of preempting or overruling what was traditionally state jurisdiction. Commerce Clause regulation by Congress frequently filled in areas and activities previously undertaken by the states or presumed to be within the ambit of the states. The commerce power had much less frequently been used by Congress to regulate the states in the conduct of their own activities. By trying to set wage and overtime rates for local government employees, Congress was setting out to regulate the states as employers. The federal government argued that its regulation of states and local governments as employers was no more abusive of state jurisdiction than the preemption of state authority more typical of Commerce Clause expansion.

Given that state employees represented a high proportion of the workforce, efforts to control prices and wages would be stymied if they did not apply to state employees as well as those in the private sector. Rehnquist rejected this argument, claiming that the Court had "repeatedly recognized that there are attributes of sovereignty attaching to every state government which may not be impaired by Congress, not because Congress may lack an affirmative grant of legislative authority to reach the matter, but because the Constitution prohibits it from exercising the authority in that manner." In other words, the commerce power might very well allow Congress to make laws regulating employment, but it did not permit Congress to tell the states how to conduct their own affairs.

What qualified as the undeniable attributes of state sovereignty was left somewhat vague by the majority. Rehnquist did suggest that "traditional state functions" needed to be left untouched by Congress. At a minimum, Rehnquist believed that the hiring and remuneration of state employees was an "undoubted attribute of state sovereignty."

National League of Cities was a stunning victory for advocates of states' rights. The Court had not overruled an attempt at commerce regulation by Congress in nearly forty years, and the case firmly cemented Rehnquist's credentials as an advocate of state autonomy. Rehnquist's doctrinal innovation, however, would prove to be short-lived. Limitiations on Congress based on state sovereignty perhaps challenged conventional wisdom, but they did not in turn become conventional wisdom. After an attempt to flesh out a standard of "traditional state functions" in Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining and Reclamation Association, 452 U.S. 264 (1981), the Court overturned National League of Cities in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985), nine years later.

Gerald Baier

See also: Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority.

FURTHER READING

Powell, Jeff. "The Compleat Jeffersonian: Justice Rehnquist and Federalism." Yale Law Journal 91 (1982): 1317–70.

National Organization for Women v. Scheidler (1994)

In National Organization for Women v. Scheidler, 510 U.S. 249 (1994), the U.S. Supreme Court found that the National Organization for Women (NOW) could sue protest groups who blocked access to abortion facilities, on grounds that they engaged in racketeering and extortion in violation of federal statutes. A decade later, in Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, 537 U.S. 393 (2003), the Court held that the antiabortion protest groups did not violate racketeering laws unless they "obtained" property.

This landmark litigation, concerning both the right of the protest and the right to conduct business, developed over a period of seventeen years and reached the Supreme Court twice. In 1986, NOW brought charges against a coalition of antiabortion groups involved in antiabortion activity, alleging that they were part of a conspiracy to shut down abortion facilities through racketeering and extortion. One such group was the Pro-Life Action Network (PLAN), whose president was Joseph Scheidler. NOW accused PLAN and the other groups under the federal antiextortion law (Hobbs Act) of being in violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) chapter of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970.

NOW brought a class action suit representing all women and abortion providers who were denied access to abortion facilities due to protests and blockades created by members of PLAN. The prosecution claimed PLAN conspired to employ threatened or actual force, fear, and violence to prevent patients from accessing services and to prevent doctors and employees from working at the facilities. The U.S. District Court and the federal Court of Appeals dismissed the case, finding that RICO did not apply because the defendants did not have an economic or profit-generating motive. In 1994 the U.S. Supreme Court overruled and found that RICO did not require an economic motive to classify an activity as racketeering or extortion as long as the activity negatively affected business. Thus, NOW did have standing to bring the claim on behalf of the affected women and health providers.

The case was returned to the lower courts for further proceedings, and in 1998, Joseph Scheidler, PLAN, Operation Rescue, and other named defendants were found guilty of racketeering under RICO. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the decision, and the defendants appealed to the Supreme Court.

Because the defendants' appeal caused party names to be reversed at the Supreme Court level, the case became Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, and in the opinion, at 537 U.S. 393 (2003), Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist ruled for the antiabortion petitioners. Rehnquist argued that the petitioners did not violate the Hobbs Act because they did not "obtain" property from the defendants. The Court argued that although PLAN and others did disrupt business, in order for the Hobbs Act to apply, both a deprivation and acquisition of property must occur. Thus, there was no violation of the Hobbs Act or RICO.

This decision not only was important in abortion debate, but it also affected all individuals and groups concerned with the right to protest. If the Court had found PLAN guilty under RICO, all future protests could have been in danger. A protesting activist found guilty of a single charge of racketeering and extortion could face enormous penalties, and political groups engaged in protest could be treated as a form of organized crime. For this reason, diverse groups such as People for Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) filed amicus curiae (friend of the court) briefs in support of PLAN.

Lynne Chandler Garcia

See also: First Amendment; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Mitchell, Don. The Right to the City: Social Justice and the Fight for Public Space. New York: Guilford, 2003.

Solinger, Rickie, Marie Bass, and Patricia Anderson. Abortion Wars: Half a Century of Struggle, 1950–2000. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Natural Law

Proponents of natural law believe there is a fundamental and unchanging law common to all human beings and accessible through reason. Natural-law theory is usually contrasted to positive-law theory, which maintains that law is based upon the will of the sovereign and is manifested in human laws or constitutions. Natural-law theorists recognize positive, or human, law but do not end the inquiry there. Thus, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. argued that laws requiring racial segregation, even when enacted according to legal norms, were wrong.

For most natural-law theorists, natural law is founded in the eternal law of God. Scholars believe the ancient Greeks originated this theory. Roman orator and lawyer Marcus Tullius Cicero, in De Republica, observed that "[t]rue law is right reason in agreement with nature; it is of universal application, unchanging, and everlasting. . . . And there will not be different laws at Rome and at Athens, or different laws now and in the future, but one eternal and unchangeable law will be valid for all nations and all times, and there will be one master and ruler, that is, God, over us all, for he is the author of this law, its promulgator, and its enforcing judge."

In Treatise on Law, written in the thirteenth century, Catholic theologian Saint Thomas Aquinas divided laws into four types: eternal, natural, human, and divine. He defined natural law as the rational creature's participation in the eternal law. William Blackstone, the eminent English law historian, wrote in his Commentaries on the Law of England that "when he [God] created man, and imbued him with free will to conduct himself in all parts of life, he laid down certain immutable laws of human nature, whereby that free will is in some degree regulated and restrained, and gave him also the faculty of reason to discover the purport of those laws." Hugo Grotius, the early seventeenth-century Dutch legal theorist and father of international law, stated that "natural law is the dictate of right reason indicating that any act is forbidden or commanded by God, the Author of nature." Nevertheless, Grotius maintained that natural law exists "even if we were to suppose . . . that God does not exist or is not concerned with human affairs." Later natural-law theorists, such as Thomas Hobbes and John Locke, sought more explicitly to separate natural-law, or natural-right, principles from God's law.

Many American constitutional scholars maintain that American law is rooted in natural law and that the founders indicated this in the Declaration of Independence when referring to "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God," to "self-evident" truths, and to the belief that people are "endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights." In some of its early constitutional decisions, the U.S. Supreme Court relied upon natural law. For example, Justice Samuel Chase in Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798), stated that "[a]n act of the Legislature (for I cannot call it a law) contrary to the great first principles of the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority." However, Justice James Iredell, in his opinion in the same case, pointed to the difficulty of determining the conclusions to be drawn from natural-law principles: The "ideas of natural justice are regulated by no fixed standard: the ablest and the purest of men have differed upon the subject; and all that the Court could properly say, in such an event, would be that the Legislature (possessed of an equal right of opinion) had passed an act which, in the opinion of the judges, was inconsistent with the abstract principles of natural justice."

Hugo Grotius, the early seventeenth-century Dutch legal theorist and father of international law, stated that "natural law is the dictate of right reason indicating that any act is forbidden or commanded by God, the Author of nature." (Library of Congress)

In the nineteenth century, natural-law theory was attacked by the emerging legal-positivist school, whose advocates contended that law is simply what the sovereign says it is. This intellectual debate found its way into American federal courts. Thus, in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U.S. 1 (1842), the Supreme Court held that in deciding cases based on diversity jurisdiction (that is, for federal courts to have jurisdiction to hear a case, the opposing parties must be citizens of different states, or "diverse"), federal courts were not bound by state common law but were instead free to apply their own interpretation of the proper common law. Thus, federal judges in ascertaining the appropriate common law, guided by their reason, would in essence be applying "natural law." State-court judges, guided by the interpretation of the common law by federal judges, would eventually alter state law accordingly. In Swift, Justice Joseph Story quoted Cicero's famous statement noted previously for the proposition that there could not be two versions of the law—not one version in Rome and another in Athens. Similarly, there could not be two versions of the common law in each state—one binding in state courts and another in federal courts.

After Swift, however, the states continued to adhere to their own interpretation of the common law, and by the 1930s, there were in fact two bodies of common law in every state. Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., perhaps the most famous American positivist, criticized Justice Story's approach in Swift and characterized the natural law as a "brooding omnipresence in the sky." In Erie Rail Road Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938), the Supreme Court overruled Swift and held that the federal court must apply the substantive law of the state in which it sat. Many legal scholars claimed that the Erie decision represented the victory of legal positivism over natural-law jurisprudence. Other scholars maintained that Erie simply placed authority over state law properly in the hands of state judges, who could then rely upon natural-law principles in their decision-making process if they chose to do so.

The debate over the existence and content of natural law continues. Part of the controversy over the 1991 nomination of Justice Clarence Thomas to the Court involved Thomas's alleged adherence to natural-law philosophy. Likewise, the increasingly politicized debates over constitutional interpretation regarding abortion and homosexuality raise the question of whether natural law should play a greater role in modern American jurisprudence.

Elizabeth M. Rhea

See also: Christian Roots of Civil Liberties; Constitutional Interpretation and Civil Liberties; Natural Rights.

FURTHER READING

Aquinas, St. Thomas. The Treatise on Law: Summa Theologiae, questions 91, 94. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.

Finnis, John. Natural Law and Natural Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Kmiec, Douglas W. "Natural Law Originalism—Or Why Justice Scalia Is (Almost) Right." Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 21 (1998): 1.

Maritain, Jacques. Natural Law Reflections: Theory and Practice. South Bend, IN: St. Augustine Press, 2001.

Rice, Charles E. Fifty Questions on the Natural Law. Fort Collins, CO: Ignatius Press, 1999.

Zuckert, Michael P. The Natural Rights Republic. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996.

Natural Rights

Natural-rights theories hold that individuals have certain universal and eternal rights, grounded in human nature, that exist apart from the "positive" or conventional laws adopted by governments at particular moments in time. Thus, for a believer in natural rights, the mere fact that a law is in force does not necessarily mean that it is morally binding. Theories of natural rights exerted a strong influence on the founding of the United States and on debates over the protection of civil liberties. Throughout U.S. history, individuals and groups have criticized public officials and policies, staged protest rallies, and engaged in civil disobedience to protest laws believed to be unjust. The concept of natural rights historically has played an important role in establishing a basis for evaluating the justice of existing laws and the actions of those in power.

Natural-rights thought has deep roots in the ancient natural-law tradition, which emphasized that even the most powerful rulers were subject to certain higher, fundamental commands. The modern philosophy of natural rights placed individual rights at the starting point of analysis. From this perspective, human beings had certain basic rights even in a state of nature, outside any organized political society. Probably the natural-rights theorist who had the greatest influence on the framers of the nation's founding documents was seventeenth-century English philosopher John Locke. For Locke, individuals in a hypothetical, prepolitical state of nature held the rights to self-preservation and to property in the fruits of their labor. In this state of nature, however, people would find that they were unable fully to enjoy these rights in the absence of adequate security and order. Thus, when people entered into a social contract, they agreed to give up some of their rights and to be governed by a common political authority. Since government was instituted to protect natural rights, individuals retained the right to rebel against an illegitimate government that failed to protect the most basic liberties. Thus, unlike the earlier English natural-rights philosopher Thomas Hobbes, who advocated a sovereign with absolute power to maintain order, legitimate government for Locke was necessarily one with only limited powers.

The Declaration of Independence reflected the influence of natural rights and Lockean philosophy, proclaiming as self-evident truths "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; . . . that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men." The Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution), along with certain individual rights set forth in the original Constitution, gave concrete expression to the general proposition that government must be limited and directed to protecting the rights of the governed. Although the notion of a higher law restraining government was familiar in Europe, the innovation of American constitutionalism was to give effect to this higher law in the form of legally enforceable individual rights.

Judges in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries sometimes referred to natural law or natural rights to justify their decisions, but explicit mentions waned in the decades preceding the Civil War. In the late nineteenth century, however, the influence of natural rights on constitutional jurisprudence became highly visible and controversial, especially in an area of constitutional law known as "substantive due process." The Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit government from depriving persons of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The clauses were always understood as providing procedural protections, but courts began relying on them to invalidate certain governmental regulations on the grounds that they arbitrarily interfered with certain basic liberties. This line of reasoning was controversial because these basic liberties were not explicitly set forth in the Constitution. In one of the most famous examples, the Supreme Court in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), struck down a New York law setting a maximum number of hours that bakers could work in a given day or week. According to the justices, the law violated the right to the freedom of contract, which they viewed as part of the "liberty" protected by the Due Process Clauses.

Although the Supreme Court pronounced in the 1930s and 1940s that it would henceforth accord great deference to legislatures in the area of economic regulations, the debate over whether the Constitution protected certain basic rights not explicitly identified in the Constitution shifted to other areas. Most notably, the Supreme Court held in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), that the right of a woman to choose whether to terminate a pregnancy fell within the "liberty" protected by the Due Process Clause. More recently, in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the Court determined that this liberty also included the right of consenting adults to engage in private homosexual conduct.

Theories of natural rights have played a crucial role not only in the debate over which civil liberties deserve protection from governmental intrusion but also in the debate over the proper role of the Supreme Court in protecting civil liberties. At the core of the controversy is a basic tension: Some rights identified as part of the liberty to which a free people are entitled are not specifically identified in the Constitution. Should unenumerated rights enjoy constitutional protection, and, if so, is the judiciary the proper institution to enforce them? As public attention continues to focus on a wide range of difficult issues regarding the meaning of civil liberties, the debate over these questions will likely remain at the heart of the controversy.

Stephen A. Simon

See also: Bill of Rights; Civil Disobedience; Declaration of Independence; Lawrence v. Texas; Locke, John; Natural Law; Right to Privacy; Roe v. Wade; Substantive Due Process.

FURTHER READING

Corwin, Edward S. The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutionalism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1955.

Strauss, Leo. Natural Right and History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953.

Zuckert, Michael P. The Natural Rights Republic. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996.

Naturalization

Naturalization is an important mode through which an individual acquires citizenship, which confers on that individual the civil liberties and other rights enjoyed by a country's native-born citizens. However, the process of naturalization and the rights of naturalized citizens raise several civil liberties issues. Unlike place of birth, naturalization requires choice both on the part of prospective new citizens and on the part of nation-states conferring it. The criteria and procedures for naturalization reflect choices the nation has made regarding the desired character of new citizens, their terms of allegiance, and the future shape of their populations. The motives of individuals seeking to naturalize may be economic, ideological, pragmatic, or deeply patriotic, but whatever the reasons, these individuals have made a choice that binds them to the most privileged form of shared belonging that liberal-democratic polities bestow. Because so much is at stake in such choices, naturalization policies are often subject to considerable controversy by affected groups and interests.

The rules governing naturalization vary widely among nations, but all recognize these rules as important tools of inclusion and exclusion. All three of the so-called classic lands of immigration—Australia, Canada, and the United States—have similar requirements. Prospective new citizens must be lawful permanent residents for several years prior to applying, possess good moral character (for example, have no major criminal convictions), demonstrate an adequate knowledge of their new country's history and civics, and have a basic command of the language. All three countries also require an oath of loyalty. In the United States, new citizens taking the oath must swear exclusive loyalty to the United States and explicitly renounce all former loyalties to other sovereigns. Canada and Australia demand a much less exclusive expression of allegiance. Their pledges do not require a renunciation of other loyalties or a profession of sole loyalty to the country.

Department of Labor naturalization class, between 1912 and 1932. (Library of Congress)

Article I, Section 8, clause 4 of the Constitution of 1787 gave Congress the power to establish a "uniform rule of naturalization." The institutional structure of naturalization has been centralized over time. Congress enacted the first federal nationality and citizenship law in 1790 and continued to revise the conditions of naturalization. Before the national rules of naturalization were established, states had authority over the grant of citizenship. Even after the substantive requirements of naturalization became federalized, the procedures remained inconsistent throughout thousands of naturalization courts nationwide, most of which were local courts in the various states. The enactment of the basic Naturalization Act of June 29, 1906, created for the first time a centralized federal agency charged with the responsibility of enforcing the naturalization statutes. Under this statute the courts retained ultimate authority to grant or deny citizenship, but administrative supervision over naturalization was vested in a federal agency (originally the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization in the Department of Commerce and Labor) that later became the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS).

In 1940 a revised Nationality Act codified existing nationality laws, following a comprehensive study and report of a committee appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt and consisting of the U.S. secretary of state, the attorney general, and the secretary of labor. In 1952 the multiple laws that governed immigration and naturalization were brought into one comprehensive statute. In the Immigration Act of 1990, Congress significantly amended the 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act to bring an end to the blanket role of courts in the naturalization process, making naturalization almost entirely an administrative procedure under the authority of the attorney general. The recent reorganization of the Immigration and Naturalization Service into the Department of Homeland Security shifted authority over the grant of citizenship to a new agency structure but retained the basic requirements and procedures for naturalization.

The debates regarding the substantive criteria of naturalization weighed the benefits that new citizens could offer against the fears that new immigrants might undermine the republican institutions upon which the nation was founded. Under English law prior to 1776, naturalization required the alien to be a Protestant, to have lived in the colony for seven years, and to take an oath of allegiance to the British king. After the American Revolution, the newly independent country eliminated the oath to the king and allowed anyone professing a belief in the Christian religion to become a naturalized citizen. Gradually, the main criteria focused on length of residency, good moral character, and allegiance to the Constitution. The first federal naturalization act in 1790 was fairly broad, providing for citizenship of any "free white person" who resided in the United States for two years. The early years brought a political struggle between the Federalists and emerging Jeffersonian Republicans to lengthen the number of years a person must reside in the territory before an application for citizenship could be made and, thereby, to block political participation of new immigrants. In the Alien Act of 1798, the Federalists lengthened the required residency to fourteen years, but once Thomas Jefferson took office he reduced the requirement to five years, a period that has remained unchanged since the Naturalization Act of 1802.

Along with naturalization, denaturalization became a component through the creation in the Naturalization Act of 1906 of a procedure to take away citizenship if a later judicial proceeding determined that the naturalization was illegally or fraudulently acquired. This procedure has changed little since that time. Denaturalization proceedings may be brought only by U.S. attorneys, not by private parties, and only when based on an affidavit of good cause, which is ordinarily prepared by immigration officials.

Even though the promise of U.S. citizenship has lured scores of migrants to U.S. shores, many long-term residents eligible for naturalization still chose to remain permanent residents. Others eventually have become U.S. citizens, but plainly found little reason to hurry to change their nationality. Although patterns vary considerably by country of origin, the median number of years of residence before naturalization has held quite steady at eight. Naturalization rates have lowered in part because many rights traditionally reserved to citizens have been extended to aliens. As rights have come to be predicated on residency, the perception has been that fewer people seek naturalization.

The Supreme Court has been of two minds on the issue. The Court has generally extended the rights and protections of the Constitution to long-term permanent residents as integrated members of the population. At the same time, the Court has spoken of the importance of citizenship and has made it more difficult to deprive a person of citizenship once it has been acquired. In an important line of equal protection cases beginning with Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365 (1971), the Court stated that the very distinction between citizen and alien amounted to a "suspect classification," and states could treat aliens differently from citizens only if they demonstrated compelling reasons for doing so. Not too many years before that, however, the same Court, after a decade of sharp division, concluded in Afroyim v. Rusk, 387

U.S. 253 (1967), that a person could not be involuntarily deprived of U.S. citizenship. In that case, and in preceding cases that laid the groundwork for such a holding, several justices wrote at length about the preciousness of citizenship status. In Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958), the Court stated that the deprivation of citizenship "is a form of punishment more primitive than torture, for it destroys for the individual the political existence that was centuries in the development." In Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1963), the Court stated that "American citizenship . . . is 'one of the most valuable rights in the world today.' "

Galya Benarieh Ruffer

See also: Citizenship; Immigration Law.

FURTHER READING

Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, David Martin, and Hiroshi Motomura, eds. Immigration Process and Policy. 3d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1995.

Neuman, Gerald. "Justifying U.S. Naturalization Policies." Immigration and Nationality Law Review 16 (1994–1995): 83.

———. Strangers to the Constitution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Pickus, Noah, ed. Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-first Century. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.

Schuck, Peter, and Rogers Smith. Citizenship Without Consent: Illegal Aliens in the American Polity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.

Smith, Rogers. Civic Ideals. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Spiro, Peter. "Questioning Barriers to Naturalization." Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 13 (Summer 1999): 479.

Near v. Minnesota (1931)

In Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), the U.S. Supreme Court held that "prior restraint" of printed materials violated the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees freedom of the press. The phrase "prior restraint" refers to prohibiting publication, as opposed to punishing material after the fact of publication. Near v. Minnesota—considered the most important pre–World War II case dealing with freedom of the press—arose out of a 1925 Minnesota statute that made certain speech a public nuisance. Specifically, it allowed for the abatement of any "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory newspaper, magazine or other periodical." This statute quickly became known as the "Minnesota gag law" because it was passed primarily to curtail the then-prevalent practice of yellow journalism, a style given to sensationalized, highly opinionated, and often untruthful or scurrilous writing.

J. M. Near, who could best be described as an "unsavory character," owned and published a newspaper called the Saturday Press. The purpose of this paper was to advance Near's beliefs, which were "anti-Catholic, anti-Semitic, anti-black, and anti-union." Additionally, the Saturday Press printed articles unfavorable to individuals who were active in Minneapolis politics. In fact, "the articles charged, in substance, that a Jewish gangster was in control of gambling, bootlegging, and racketeering in Minneapolis, and that law enforcing officers and agencies were not energetically performing their duties." The paper specifically attacked the chief of police, the county attorney, and the mayor for their willing participation in this illegal activity.

As a result, charges were levied against Near and the Saturday Press. Near acknowledged he was the paper's owner and the articles in question appeared in it, but he rejected the notion that they were "malicious, scandalous, or defamatory." He argued, therefore, that the Minnesota gag law did not apply to him. The district court in Minnesota disagreed and determined the Saturday Press to be a public nuisance. It then "perpetually enjoined"—prohibited forever—the further printing of such articles in the future. Near unsuccessfully appealed this judgment to the Minnesota Supreme Court, then took his case to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In a narrow five–four holding, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the prior restraint of the Saturday Press. In the majority was Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, just then new to the Court, and four of the court's associate justices: Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr.,

Louis D. Brandeis, Harlan Fiske Stone, and Owen J. Roberts. In dissent were the justices who had earned the derisive moniker of the "Four Horsemen": Pierce Butler, Willis Van DeVanter, James C. McReynolds, and George Sutherland. In fact, historians have argued that the result would have been wholly different had former president William Howard Taft still been on the Court as chief justice. The case had arrived at the Court during Taft's tenure; however, it languished there and was not argued until Charles Evan Hughes had replaced the terminally ill Taft.

The Near decision, considered to be one of Hughes's best opinions, ruled that the Minnesota gag law constituted a prior restraint under the First Amendment's provision for freedom of the press and was therefore unconstitutional. A prior restraint "is any scheme which gives public officials the power to deny use of a forum in advance of its actual expression." In other words, it was improper for Minnesota to prohibit the publication of material it was assumed would be libelous before it was, in fact, published. Hughes argued that the Minnesota statute was "the essence of censorship." He drew examples from such legal luminaries as William Blackstone, Joseph Story, and James Madison to show that it did not matter if the future speech was false or true; the right to its being published was sacrosanct. "The fact that liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct. Subsequent punishment for such abuses as may exist is the appropriate remedy, consistent with constitutional privilege."

Justice Butler, in his dissent, was alarmed that the Court was incorporating yet another clause of the Bill of Rights to apply to the states. He stated that "[i]t is of the greatest importance that the states shall be untrammeled and free to employ all just and appropriate measures to prevent abuses of the liberty of the press." Butler concluded that the current state of libel law was not sufficient to curtail such pernicious publications, but his views did not carry the day. The Near decision would serve as the first of many cases in which the Court defended freedom of the press.

David T. Harold

See also: First Amendment; Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; New York Times Co. v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Friendly, F. W. Minnesota Rag. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1981.

Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart (1976)

In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously overturned a gag order issued by a Nebraska district court judge that prohibited the publication or broadcast of pretrial courtroom proceedings regarding a criminal case. A gag order is a form of "prior restraint" that refers to prohibiting publication or broadcast, as opposed to punishing material after the fact of publication. As such, a gag order raises issues of freedom of the press as provided under the First Amendment to the Constitution.

The town of Sutherland, Nebraska, became a scene of tragedy when local police found six family members murdered in their home. The crime and subsequent apprehension of a suspect attracted widespread media attention to the small western Nebraska town. Concerned that the heavy publicity surrounding the event would make it impossible to impanel an impartial jury in the sparsely populated area, attorneys from both sides in the case asked the judge to issue an order preventing those in attendance at the court's hearings from reporting on its proceedings. The judge agreed to the request and issued an order prohibiting the publication of information concerning the testimony and evidence introduced in the courtroom until a jury was impaneled. The Nebraska Press Association filed suit claiming the actions of the judge amounted to prior restraint of the press, thereby violating the First Amendment.

The Court's unanimous decision declared the judge's gag order unconstitutional. The Court's opinion, delivered by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, recognized the conflict between the First Amendment, which guarantees a free press, and the Sixth Amendment, which provides the accused with the right to an unbiased jury. Citing the founding fathers, the Court refused to give priority to the interests protected by either Amendment, although Justice Burger's opinion clearly placed the burden on the Nebraska judge to prove that the potential damage done by unrestrained reporting of the court's hearings jeopardized the defendant's right to a fair trial. The Court found that the circumstances surrounding the criminal case did not meet the high requirements necessary to issue a gag order. First, although the judge was justified in his concern about pretrial publicity, the effect it might have on potential jurors was only speculative. Second, the judge presented no evidence that other steps short of a gag order could also have been used to achieve the same outcome. Third, it seemed unlikely the gag order would have helped secure a fair trial, especially considering the court's limited territorial jurisdiction, the difficulty of determining what information would sway a juror, and the small-town setting where information traveled rapidly by word of mouth. Finally, the gag order violated a long-standing principle that courtroom events were public events open to the press for scrutiny.

A concurring opinion by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. emphasized the high standards that must be met before prior restraint of the press can be issued. Another concurring opinion by Justice Byron R. White called into question the constitutionality of any instance of prior restraint. Finally, a concurring opinion by Justice William J. Brennan Jr. argued that prior restraint should never be used to guarantee the freedoms of the Sixth Amendment.

Jason Stonerook

See also: First Amendment; Near v. Minnesota; New York Times Co. v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Bunker, Matthew D. Justice and the Media. Reconciling Fair Trials and a Free Press. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1997.

Negative and Positive Liberties

Negative liberty is the right to be free of state coercion. The First Amendment right "to petition the government for a redress of grievances," for example, is a negative liberty. Positive liberty, by contrast, is the right of private citizens to have the government affirmatively provide something to them. The right to basic police protection that the state usually provides is an example of a positive liberty. In the United States, negative and positive liberties derive from both constitutional and statutory law.

The liberties delineated in the U.S. Constitution are mostly negative. As Judge Richard Posner expressed the point in Hilton v. City of Wheeling, 209 F.3d 1005 (7th Cir. 2000), the Constitution "creates areas in which the government has to let people alone; it does not entitle them to demand services, such as police protection." The concept of positive liberty has, not surprisingly, fared poorly in modern constitutional jurisprudence. Its nadir was probably reached in DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services, 489 U.S. 189 (1989), in which Justice Antonin Scalia wrote for a majority of the Supreme Court that "the Due Process Clauses generally confer no affirmative right to governmental aid" and therefore held that "a state's failure to protect an individual against private violence simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause."

This understanding of the distinction between positive and negative liberties was not inevitable. Writing for the three dissenting justices in DeShaney, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. surveyed the Court's precedent and found himself "unable to see . . . a neat and decisive divide between action and inaction." The dissenters criticized the majority's "initial fixation on the general principle that the Constitution does not establish positive rights" and argued that "this principle does not hold true in all circumstances." To this day, many legal scholars share the dissenters' enthusiasm for enshrining positive liberties into constitutional law. Unless the Court revisits the issue and adopts Justice Brennan's openness to the notion of positive liberty, however, the prospects of positive liberty within U.S. constitutional law will remain dim.

In DeShaney, Justice Scalia reasoned that the framers of the Constitution left the creation of positive liberty "to the democratic political process" and, indeed, ordinary legislation has proved a fertile ground for positive liberty. The federal government, for instance, has created numerous rights that the individual may demand from the government. Prominent examples include disability benefits under Social Security, medical insurance for the poor, and the right to be free of invidious discrimination from other private citizens. In the view of those who support the creation of these types of positive liberties, such legislation has succeeded in creating a more just society. One scholar has explained in detail why the entitlement programs created during President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society initiative of the 1960s have been successful (Edelman 1993). Edelman's view is not unpopular. At least since the New Deal, government has created myriad positive liberties through ordinary legislation, many of which have since become embedded in the nation's social fabric. Thus, although positive liberties have proved less hardy than their negative counterparts as a matter of constitutional law, they have flourished through the democratic process.

There is, however, a danger in the promulgation of positive, as opposed to negative, liberties: Positive liberties are often a zero-sum proposition in which one citizen's gain is necessarily another's loss. As another scholar noted, the "confusion of liberty as power with liberty in its original [negative] meaning inevitably leads to the identification of liberty with wealth; and this makes it possible to exploit all the appeal which the word 'liberty' carries in the support for the demand of the redistribution of wealth." To the extent that this warning is correct, the delineation of positive liberties will be an issue of public controversy, as the victims and beneficiaries of proposed positive rights vie for legislative success. Unless DeShaney were to be overturned, however, such struggles will take place in the legislature, not in the federal courts.

Matthew J. Hank

See also: Bill of Rights; DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Berlin, Isaiah. Four Essays on Liberty. New York: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Edelman, Peter B. "Toward a Comprehensive Antipoverty Strategy: Getting Beyond the Silver Bullet." Georgia Law Journal 81 (1993): 1697.

Hayek, Friedrich A. The Constitution of Liberty. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.

Hernshkoff, Helen. "Positive Rights and State Constitutions: The Limits of Federal Rationality Review." Harvard Law Review 112 (1999): 1131.

New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985)

In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), the U.S. Supreme Court held that public school children do have a right to some degree of Fourth Amendment protection when they are at school, but that the Constitution does not require school officials to obtain a warrant based upon probable cause prior to searching students' belongings. This case established a set of guidelines under which searches performed by school officials would be tested. The Supreme Court held that students do have a right to privacy and a right to the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures conferred by the Fourth Amendment. Whereas an adult's right to freedom from unreasonable searches is protected by the requirement that the search be based upon probable cause and that a warrant is required for state officials to engage in the search, such is not the case in public schools. On these two critical issues, the Court departed from its Fourth Amendment jurisprudence to create an exception for school officials. The Court in T.L.O. held that students may be searched by a school official based upon reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing, and that the school official need not obtain a warrant prior to the search. These searches may be conducted based on the violation of a school rule or suspicion of illegal conduct on the part of a student.

In T.L.O., a fourteen-year-old girl (identified only as T.L.O. to afford her some anonymity) in a public school was caught smoking in the women's bathroom with a friend. The teacher who caught T.L.O. took her to the principal's office to meet with the vice principal on duty at the time. T.L.O. told the vice principal she did not have any cigarettes and had not smoked at all. He asked her for her purse and opened it, revealing cigarettes. In addition to the cigarettes, he saw a package of rolling papers, which he knew to be associated with the use of marijuana. He continued to search her purse and found marijuana, a substantial sum of money, pipes, plastic bags, and an index card with the names of people owing T.L.O. money. T.L.O. sought to suppress this evidence (that is, to prevent the prosecutor from using the evidence) from her juvenile delinquency proceedings, arguing that it must be excluded based on the invalid search of her purse. The Court disagreed with T.L.O. and held that the search was reasonable in light of the evidence of her smoking in violation of school rules. Thus, the "probable cause" standard was lowered to require only "reasonable suspicion," and the Court approved the warrantless search of T.L.O.'s belongings.

The school's interest in maintaining order and in ensuring that an environment exists where learning can take place was central to the Court's reasoning in T.L.O. The Court sought to achieve the delicate balance between a student's right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures and the state's legitimate interest in maintaining educational order. Since the T.L.O. decision in 1985, schools have experienced an increase in violent student conduct that arguably has precipitated further curtailment of students' individual rights. School officials have employed metal detectors and full-time school security guards and police officers in an effort to ensure safer schools, the effect of which has been the diminishing of students' privacy rights.

Laurie M. Kubicek

See also: Fourth Amendment; Gault, In re; Rights of Minors; Search; Search of Student Lockers.

FURTHER READING

Faberman, Stephen. "Note: The Lessons of DeShaney: Special Relationships, Schools, and the Fifth Circuit." Boston College Law Review 35 (December 1993): 97–139.

Garcia, Crystal A., and Sheila Suess Kennedy. "Back to School: Technology, School Safety, and the Disappearing Fourth Amendment." Kansas Journal of Law and Public Policy 12 (Winter 2003): 273–85.

Hartman, Rhonda Gay. "Adolescent Autonomy: Clarifying an Ageless Conundrum." Hastings Law Journal 51 (August 2000): 1265–1362.

Wren, Jonathan. "Alternative Schools for Disruptive Youths": A Cure for What Ails School Districts Plagued by Violence?" Virginia Journal of Social Policy and the Law 2 (Spring 1995): 307–61.

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964)

In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the U.S. Supreme Court first articulated how the rights of free speech and press as protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution are applied to the issue of libel. In this case the New York Times ran an advertisement, placed by a civil rights organization, that contained certain false or exaggerated statements about police and police actions in Montgomery, Alabama. Although the ad did not refer to him by name, the plaintiff contended that the ad referred to him since he was the city's commissioner of public affairs, and he brought a civil suit under Alabama's libel law against those who had placed the ad. After a jury trial, the commissioner was awarded $500,000, and the Alabama Supreme Court upheld that award. The newspaper appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

At the outset, the Court ruled it had jurisdiction to hear the case because appellants were raising the claim that Alabama's libel law impermissibly restricted the First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and press, which are applied to the states through incorporation into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. As another preliminary matter, the Court determined the speech in question was protected by the First Amendment even though such speech was contained in a paid advertisement. In distinguishing this civil rights ad from "purely commercial advertising," the Court focused on the fact that the content of the ad conveyed a noncommercial message rather than on the fact that the newspaper had been paid to publish it.

The Court also stressed that the falsity of some information in the ad did not remove the ad from the protections of the First Amendment. Rather, the nature of the ad as political expression ensured that it was covered by the Constitution's free speech and press guarantees. As for the central issue, the Court decided Alabama's libel law impermissibly restricted rights of free speech and free press. Further, the Court set a new standard in order for libel laws not to run afoul of the First Amendment when applied to "public officials." According to this standard, public officials cannot recover damages for false statements in regard to their official conduct unless they can prove such statements were made with "actual malice." The Court defined "actual malice" as either knowledge that the statements were false or reckless disregard about whether the statements were truthful, and it required a plaintiff to provide "clear and convincing" proof of such malice.

The Supreme Court's opinion in New York Times made clear the high value of the free exchange of ideas in American society. The Court emphasized that the value of public debate trumps a public official's interest in preventing criticisms even if untrue, as long as the statements were not purposely untrue or published without regard to their truth. This opinion ensured that the free exchange of ideas would not be needlessly dampened by the fear that such exchange might result in a lawsuit or otherwise have a "chilling effect."

Martha M. Lafferty

See also: Actual Malice; Chilling Effect; First Amendment; Libel; Slander.

FURTHER READING

Labunski, Richard. Libel and the First Amendment. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 1987.

Smolla, Rodney A. Suing the Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

New York Times Co. v. United States (1971)

In New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), (sometimes referred to as the Pentagon Papers case), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution prohibited government from engaging in prior censorship of speech, and the Court refused to enjoin newspapers from publishing a purloined Defense Department document. For intrigue and drama, few Supreme Court cases can match the Pentagon Papers case. Set against the backdrop of growing political unrest about U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War, the case required the Court to convene a rare emergency session to decide whether the federal government could prevent the publication of portions of a 7,000-page classified study entitled "History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Viet Nam Policy" (the Pentagon Papers) that had been leaked to the press by a government employee, Daniel Ellsberg.

The legal question presented was whether the government's claim that publication would endanger national security could justify prohibiting in advance (prior restraint) the publication of the Pentagon Papers. The government's claim was at odds with the core meaning of the First Amendment that the government may not suppress speech before it is released, even if the speech could later be punished. The government claimed that when national security was at issue, the president had inherent powers to act to protect national security even if that meant instituting prior restraints on speech.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

The Court issued a short per curiam decision in which it reiterated that under the First Amendment, prior restraints are presumed invalid, and it held that the government had not shown extraordinary circumstances that would justify suppressing publication. In addition, four justices wrote concurring opinions and two authored dissenting opinions that further elaborated their views.

Justice Hugo L. Black in a concurring opinion, joined by Justice William O. Douglas, argued that to give the executive the inherent power to engage in prior restraints would be to "wipe out the First Amendment and destroy the fundamental liberty and security of the very people the Government hopes to make 'secure.' " Justice William J. Brennan Jr., in a concurring opinion, emphasized the high standard the government must meet before it may engage in a prior restraint. Brennan wrote that mere surmise and conjecture of harm were not sufficient; rather, the government must prove that publication would inevitably and directly cause harm equivalent to revealing troop locations during a time of war.

Interestingly, none of the justices argued that no harm would come from the publication of the Pentagon Papers. Indeed, a concurring opinion by Justice Byron R. White, joined by Justice Potter Stewart, noted their belief that publication would be detrimental to the public interest, but that the harm did not rise to the level needed to justify a prior restraint.

By contrast, dissenters Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and John Marshall Harlan thought that the New York Times had been irresponsible in not consulting with the government prior to publication. They also thought the Court should give greater deference to presidential actions involving foreign affairs.

J. C. Salyer

See also: First Amendment; Nixon, Richard M.; President and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Rudenstine, David. The Day the Presses Stopped: A History of the Pentagon Papers Case. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

New York v. Ferber (1982)

In New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a state could prohibit the dissemination of material showing children engaged in sexual conduct, regardless of whether the material was obscene, without violating the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The case involved a bookstore owner who had been convicted under a New York child pornography statute of promoting the sexual performance of a child under the age of sixteen. On appeal, he argued that the New York statute was unconstitutionally overbroad because it did not contain a requirement that the child's performance was obscene. The New York Court of Appeals agreed and reversed his conviction, because it found that the statute would prohibit the promotion of materials traditionally entitled to protection as free expression under the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Justice Byron R. White, writing for a unanimous Court, reversed the New York court's decision. The state had a compelling interest in regulating child pornography in order to protect the physical and psychological well-being of minors. The statute was also an appropriate means to promote the state's interest, because the value of permitting children to appear in pornographic films was exceedingly minimal. In these circumstances, where the evil to be restricted so substantially outweighed any First Amendment interests at stake, Justice White concluded that a restriction on the content of speech was permissible. He rejected the obscenity test of Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), in these circumstances, because it focused on the harm the material posed to society, not on the psychological harm inflicted on the child. Since Miller was inapplicable, Justice White crafted a four-part child pornography test: (1) adequate definition of the offensive sexual conduct, (2) visual depiction, (3) the minority of the subject, and (4) the knowledge of the defendant. The New York statute satisfied all four elements of this test.

Justice White also dismissed the claim that the New York statute was unconstitutionally overbroad because it prohibited the distribution of medical and educational materials that portrayed adolescent sex in a nonobscene manner. Where conduct and not speech is involved, he said, the Court in Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), had held that "the overbreadth of a statute must be real and substantial as judged by the statute's legitimate objective." Applying Broadrick, Justice White found that the New York statute was not substantially overbroad, because its "legitimate reach dwarfed any impermissible applications." Even if the statute might forbid the distribution of material with serious literary, scientific, or educational value, he found that the statute would still not be substantially overbroad, because this material would be no more than a fraction of the material prohibited by the statute.

In sum, New York v. Ferber upheld state child pornography statutes that dispense with the obscenity requirement for the promotion and distribution of visual child pornography as long as these statutes comply with the Court's four-part test and are not substantially overbroad. Ferber later was extended to even the private possession of child pornography with the Court's decision in Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990). All other obscene sexual representations of children in books, magazines, pamphlets, and oral recordings are governed by Miller v. California.

William Crawford Green

See also: Child Pornography; First Amendment; Miller v. California; Overbreadth Doctrine; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Hixon, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Jasper, Margaret. Law of Obscenity and Pornography. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1996.

Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC (2000)

In Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U.S. 377 (2000), the U.S. Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a $1,075 limit on campaign contributions to statewide candidates for political office. Previous Supreme Court decisions had uniformly upheld contribution limits, and Nixon proved to be no exception. Nixon is important to the development of civil liberties in the United States not because it radically changed Supreme Court doctrine, but because it demonstrated the Court's difficulty in balancing the individual's First Amendment right to free speech and association with the government's interest in eliminating potential corruption in elections.

In its landmark campaign finance case, Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), the Supreme Court upheld a $1,000 limit on contributions to candidates for federal office. Twenty years after Buckley, Missouri enacted a $1,000 contribution limit for statewide races (adjusted for inflation, the limit was $1,075). Shrink Missouri Government PAC, a political action committee, contributed $1,075 to the state auditor campaign of Zev David Fredman. The Shrink Missouri PAC alleged that it would have contributed more without the limit in place, and Fredman asserted that he was unable to run an effective campaign because of the contribution limit. After the Eighth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals struck down the Missouri contribution limit, the Supreme Court agreed to review the case.

Although neither party urged the Court to overrule Buckley, some legal observers believed the Court would take the opportunity to revisit its much-criticized decision. Fredman and the PAC limited their argument to Missouri's failure to present sufficient evidence that contributions above $1,075 posed a true risk of corruption. But a majority of the Court disagreed. Although it refused to specify exactly how much evidence was required, the Court found adequate proof in an affidavit from a Missouri state legislator, in newspaper stories from which inferences of impropriety could be drawn, and in voter support for contribution limits. Holding that Buckley was controlling precedent for state contribution limits, the Court ruled that Missouri's $1,075 limit was constitutional.

Although the Court did not overrule Buckley, the concurring and dissenting opinions in Nixon expressed profound skepticism about Buckley's reasoning. Justice John Paul Stevens, concurring in the majority opinion, challenged the fundamental assumption of Buckley when he wrote, "Money is property; it is not speech." Justices Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, in a concurring opinion, stated that Buckley would have to be reexamined if it did not afford legislatures sufficient leeway to protect the fairness of elections. Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia, writing in dissent, also supported overruling Buckley. But unlike Justices Stevens, Breyer, and Ginsburg, who would permit greater regulation of campaign fundraising, the dissenters would have struck down all limits on contributions and expenditures. Finally, in a confusing dissent, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy indicated that he might someday agree with Justice Thomas's position, but for the time being would overrule Buckley and permit legislatures to impose contribution and expenditure limits.

Nixon revealed that six of nine justices were prepared in 2000 to abandon Buckley, but it also demonstrated that the justices held no shared position on how Buckley should be overruled. The Court has not yet written the final chapter on the constitutionality of regulating campaign contributions and expenditures.

Grant Davis-Denny

See also: Buckley v. Valeo; Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971; Independent Expenditures; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission.

FURTHER READING

Hasen, Richard L. "Shrink Missouri, Campaign Finance, and 'The Thing That Wouldn't Leave.' " Constitutional Commentary 17, 3 (Winter 2000): 483–509.

Lowenstein, Daniel Hays, and Richard L. Hasen. Election Law: Cases and Materials. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2001.

Nixon, Richard M. (1913–1994)

Richard Milhous Nixon challenged civil liberties in several ways during his long career in public office, which ended with his resignation as the thirty-seventh president of the United States (1969–1974). Nixon was implicated in the burglary and wiretapping of the Democratic National Party headquarters, an event known as Watergate, and for obstructing the ensuing Senate investigation. Watergate became synonymous with illicit and secretive use of high office to rig elections or block investigations. Watergate marked a time of broad challenge to political, social, and cultural authority, but aspects of Nixon's transgressions of civil liberties were evident throughout his career.

Richard M. Nixon signing the last bill of the 92d Congress, the 1973 Appropriations Act, H.R. 17064, on October 31, 1972. (National Archives)

The Watergate scandal symbolized a loss of trust in government and demonstrated how individuals in power could usurp basic understandings of fair electoral competition and free speech. The Senate investigation occurred within the wider context of military setbacks in Vietnam (Saigon fell in 1975) and of the Middle Eastern oil embargo (1973), which triggered a recessionary economy. These epochal changes were felt throughout the nation.

Watergate also epitomized the fact that the president did not always exercise noble leadership qualities.

The general trend of questioning authority, by students in particular, gained increased credence simultaneously with Watergate. Immanuel Wallerstein was among the scholars who viewed the early to mid-1970s as a threshold in which the liberal reformist state of "by the people for the people," with its broad benefits in education and health care, began to erode. Nixon's role was often enigmatic. For example, he supported increased access to fair housing, affirmative action, and women's rights, but at the same time he appealed to southern racial fears and nominated conservative southerners to the U.S. Supreme Court.

His presidency was not the first time Nixon conjured political "witches" to rally votes before and during elections. In the early years of the Cold War, Nixon rose to prominence in the U.S. House of Representatives (1946–1950) when he pressed the House Un-American Activities Committee to prosecute Alger Hiss (1948). Hiss was accused of supplying the Soviets with classified information from the State Department. In the wake of his tough stance on communism, Nixon ran successfully for the Senate in 1950. He also targeted his opponent, Helen Douglas, as naive about the Communist threat. As a vice presidential candidate running with Dwight D. Eisenhower (1952), Nixon was accused of overseeing a "slush fund" to promote Republican causes. In response, he contended that he accrued no financial gain, and that his family lived modestly. In a televised melodramatic rebuttal, Nixon refused to return the dog (Checkers) given to his two daughters and thereby perpetuated an image that later fit in well with family values.

Nixon lost a hard-fought and close campaign for the presidency to John F. Kennedy in 1960 when his sallow appearance in a series of televised debates suffered by comparison to JFK's robust good looks and poise before the camera. After defeat in a California gubernatorial race in 1962, Nixon said he would never run for public office again, but he staged a remarkable comeback in 1968 by defeating Hubert Humphrey. Nixon's victory came amid concerns of an ever-escalating war in Vietnam and was furthered by a law-and-order platform keyed to public concerns over increased dissent and perceived lawlessness. He won a second term in a landslide victory over George McGovern in 1972 by portraying his opponent as inexperienced in foreign affairs and militarily weak. Speaking as a Cold War warrior, Nixon warned that if communism were not contained in Southeast Asia, countries across the globe would fall to that ideology like "dominoes." Ironically, Nixon would later renew U.S. relations with the People's Republic of China on the mainland.

Nixon castigated political opponents as "straw men/women," as he did Douglas early on and McGovern later. And he portrayed those who held different views, such as Hiss or the anti-Vietnam protesters, as insurgents against the state. After the United States invaded Cambodia and college campuses across the country erupted in protest, Nixon approved expanded domestic surveillance by federal agencies (July 1970).

As the election in November 1972 drew near, Nixon apparently reasoned that publication of The Pentagon Papers in June 1971 would expose the underside of how the increasingly unpopular Vietnam War had been initiated and pursued and thus negatively impact his reelection (1972). To stop the "leaks" of potentially embarrassing information, a small team from the White House was formed and burglarized (September 1971) the files of Daniel Ellsberg, who had covertly released the papers. In New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), the U.S. rebuffed Nixon's effort to enjoin publication of The Pentagon Papers. In June 1972, five men, some with ties to the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), were arrested for burglarizing the Democratic National Committee headquarters at the Watergate apartments. The burglars were apparently acting on orders from the Committee to Reelect the President (CREEP), directed by former Attorney General John Mitchell, who controlled a secret fund to disrupt ("dirty tricks") the campaign of the Democrats.

Ten days after Nixon was inaugurated in 1973, Nixon aides G. Gordon Liddy and James McCord were convicted of burglary and wiretapping in the Watergate episode. Three months later, the members of Nixon's innermost circle resigned—Bob Haldeman, John Ehrlichman, and Attorney General Richard Kleindienst. Two weeks into the hearings by the Senate Watergate committee, former White House counsel John Dean testified that he had briefed the president no fewer than thirty-five times on Watergate—a beleaguered Nixon was obviously closely monitoring the investigation. Two months into the hearings, Senate investigators learned that all conversations and telephone calls in Nixon's offices were electronically recorded. Nixon refused to turn over the tapes of specified conversations in the Oval Office to Special Prosecutor Archibald Cox. Nixon summarily fired Cox, and Attorney General Elliot Richardson resigned. In December 1973 a gap appeared in one subpoenaed tape, which gave momentum to the movement to impeach Nixon. In July the Supreme Court ruled unanimously in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), that Nixon must turn over the tape recordings to the new special prosecutor, Leon Jaworski, and thereby rejected his claim of executive privilege. The tapes indicated that Nixon had participated in a cover-up of the Watergate break-in.

Three days later the House passed three articles of impeachment. One article asserted that Nixon obstructed justice during the investigation. The second alleged that he abused the powers of the office of the president and violated the constitutional rights of American citizens, and the third, that he illegally suppressed evidence and ignored the subpoena power of the House Judiciary Committee. When it became clear that he was likely to be impeached and convicted, on August 9, 1974, Richard M. Nixon became the first president in U.S. history to resign.

Nixon's legacy continued to be felt after his resignation. In 1975 the Committee on Un-American Activities (then renamed the Committee on Internal Security) disbanded. Congress adopted campaign reform legislation in response to Nixon's maintenance of secret funds to undermine political opponents; legislation now limits the amounts individuals can give to candidates and requires detailed accounting of donations. The landmark Watergate hearings established that President Nixon was implicated in burglary, wiretapping, direction of federal government employees to discredit political adversaries, and obstruction of justice. Most of the White House operatives involved in Watergate were convicted or pleaded guilty in court and were imprisoned.

Gerald Ford, President Nixon's successor, pardoned Nixon for all offenses committed while in office. A number of state legislatures subsequently

GRANTING PARDON TO RICHARD NIXON

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

A PROCLAMATION

Richard Nixon became the thirty-seventh President of the United States on January 20, 1969 and was reelected in 1972 for a second term by the electors of forty-nine of the fifty states. His term in office continued until his resignation on August 9, 1974.

Pursuant to resolutions of the House of Representatives, its Committee on the Judiciary conducted an inquiry and investigation on the impeachment of the President extending over more than eight months. The hearings of the Committee and its deliberations, which received wide national publicity over television, radio, and in printed media, resulted in votes adverse to Richard Nixon on recommended Articles of Impeachment.

As a result of certain acts or omissions occurring before his resignation from the Office of President, Richard Nixon has become liable to possible indictment and trial for offenses against the United States. Whether or not he shall be so prosecuted depends on findings of the appropriate grand jury and on the discretion of the authorized prosecutor. Should an indictment ensue, the accused shall then be entitled to a fair trial by an impartial jury, as guaranteed to every individual by the Constitution.

It is believed that a trial of Richard Nixon, if it became necessary, could not fairly begin until a year or more has elapsed. In the meantime, the tranquility to which this nation has been restored by the events of recent weeks could be irreparably lost by the prospects of bringing to trial a former President of the United States. The prospects of such trial will cause prolonged and divisive debate over the propriety of exposing to further punishment and degradation a man who has already paid the unprecedented penalty of relinquishing the highest elective office of the United States.

2

NOW, THEREFORE, I, Gerald R. Ford, President of the United States, pursuant to the pardon power conferred upon me by Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution, have granted and by these presents do grant a full, free, and absolute pardon unto Richard Nixon for all offenses against the United States which he, Richard Nixon, has committed or may have committed or taken part in during the period from January 20, 1969 through August 9, 1974.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and ninety-ninth.

Presidential Proclamation 4311 of September 8, 1974, by President Gerald R. Ford granting a pardon to Richard M. Nixon. (National Archives) passed codes of ethics in an attempt to rebuild trust in the actions of elected officials.

John W. Fox

See also: Burger, Warren Earl; Fourth Amendment; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Ambrose, Stephen E. Nixon: The Triumph of a Politician, 1962–1972. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.
Kutler, Stanley I., ed. Abuse of Power: The New Nixon Tapes. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.
Reeves, Richard. President Nixon: Alone in the White House. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2001.

Noise, Freedom from

Unwanted noise and freedom from it have been the subject of discussion and regulation at all levels of government, posing issues of whether noise is within the government's police power to control and even of whether the volume of speech could pose free speech issues under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. High noise levels, such as loud, continuous, or frequent sound, can be the cause of frustration and annoyance. Natural sounds are less intrusive and less likely to be regulated. Prolonged exposure to certain types of noise can interfere with hearing, sleep, work performance, and general well-being. The regulation of noise and noise control lies primarily with the state and local government. Noise sources in interstate commerce, such as noise from airplanes, are regulated by the federal government.

NOISE AND THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

As early as 1970 the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) established guidelines for noise in the workplace, proscribing noise levels that may be harmful to workers. In 1972 the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) announced that a study of airport noise and motor carriers prompted the development of formal noise standards outside of the workplace. EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus defined this problem as an environmental issue affecting millions of people. President Richard M. Nixon signed into law an environmental package authorizing the EPA to regulate and set standards for any product or class of products that were identified as major sources of noise. The categories of equipment covered by this legislation included construction, transportation, motors or engines, and electrical and electronic items. The EPA was also granted the authority to label products as to their noise-generating characteristics or their noise-reducing effectiveness. OSHA and the EPA created the primary guidelines for tolerable noise levels at work and in the airline and transportation industry.

An Environmental Protection Agency–supported study on noise and its effects, March 1973. (National Archives)

STATE AND LOCAL REGULATION

Noise levels are measured in decibels, and penalties are established for violation of permitted decibel levels. Protection from unwanted noise generally follows a complaint procedure outlined in the laws or regulations by jurisdiction. Noise and noise abatement laws have emerged throughout the United States to address sounds that are not primarily regulated by the federal government. Some cities have enacted laws to eliminate the use of specific machinery, such as leaf blowers. Others have attempted to regulate the ambient noise levels in order to preserve, protect, and promote the public health, safety, welfare, and peace and quiet.

Unreasonable noise levels have often been declared a nuisance. Minimizing this nuisance is the general basis for state and local law. Loud, prolonged, or frequent noise levels are defined under zoning or nuisance abatement codes. Permissible and prohibited noise levels by neighborhood category are often contained in these regulations. Permissive noise, such as sirens on emergency vehicles, are generally defined and exempted from regulation. Noise sounds from activities such as festivals, trash haulers, or lawn care usually require a permit or are restricted to specific hours of operation. Some states have passed specific laws that require danger signs warning of amplified sound (Massachusetts), that create penalties for excessive horn honking (New York), and that regulate loud car stereo equipment (Oklahoma). Local laws often define noise as a nuisance and penalize excessive dog barking, loud boom boxes, car stereos, and outdoor parties. Some states have installed barriers to mitigate sound between highways and residential areas.

Finally, in some cases individuals have tried to argue that noise is a protected First Amendment right. In Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949), the Supreme Court upheld a city law that made it illegal to use sound amplifying devices that created loud noises. The owner of a sound truck who was arrested for violating that law challenged it, claiming it was a violation of his First Amendment free speech rights. The Court rejected the argument, holding that the regulation of noise was a legitimate abatement of a nuisance.

Darlene Evans McCoy

See also: First Amendment; Police Power.

FURTHER READING

Noise Pollution Clearinghouse. http://www.nonnoise.org.
Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970. U.S. Code. Vol. 42, secs. 4905, 4907.

No-Knock Warrant

No-knock warrants authorize police to conduct searches or arrests by forcibly entering homes without prior announcement. Under current law, a no-knock entry of a home or business is permissible if an officer has reasonable suspicion to believe that knocking on the door would be dangerous or would hamper a criminal investigation by giving suspects time to destroy incriminating evidence or escape. No-knock warrants represent an important exception to the normal Fourth Amendment rule that police must recognize the sanctity of the home and avoid the use of force by giving suspects a chance to comply with a warrant.

Federal law (since 1917) and the law in many states require law enforcement officials to knock on a suspect's door and announce their intentions and identity before entering and executing arrest or search warrants. But federal and state lawmakers and courts have also authorized no-knock warrants in circumstances where a normal "knock-and-announce" policy might compromise the safety of the police or others at the scene, threaten evidence, or give a suspect time to flee. No-knock warrants, similar to regular warrants, are issued after an officer makes a sworn statement or affidavit before a judge or magistrate that evidence or a suspect can be secured only by dispensing with traditional knock-and-announce procedures.

No-knock warrants became popular and received increased scrutiny throughout the war on drugs in the 1980s and 1990s. Given the ease with which narcotics could be destroyed or hidden, and the linkage of the drug trade with violence, the police looked to no-knock searches as a way to preserve law enforcement investigations and personnel.

The Supreme Court attempted to clarify the constitutional rules surrounding no-knock procedures in Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927 (1995). Among other issues, the Court considered whether the Con-stitution's Fourth Amendment protections against "unreasonable searches and seizures" required police to adhere to a knock-and-announce rule prior to entering a dwelling. In Wilson, police identified themselves and entered an unlocked residence pursuant to a search warrant for illegal drugs. They found drugs, drug paraphernalia, and the suspect, Sharlene Wilson, flushing marijuana down a toilet. Wilson challenged her conviction on state drug charges, asserting that the Constitution required police to knock before serving a warrant in order to give the accused an opportunity to cooperate.

The Supreme Court's unanimous opinion held that officers' adherence to the standard knock-and-announce rule was only one of the factors judges should consider in assessing the constitutional reasonableness of a search or seizure. In some cases, the Court conceded, "an officer's unannounced entry into a home might be unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment." At the same time, the Court emphasized that it was not creating a "rigid" rule that every forcible entry "be preceded by an announcement." The Fourth Amendment's requirement of reasonableness would have to be balanced against "countervailing law enforcement interests." The Court declined to provide a "comprehensive catalog" of the factors that might establish the reasonableness of no-knock warrants, but it favorably cited concerns about safety and evidence preservation and authorized lower courts to develop a more comprehensive list.

State lawmakers and judges took up the implicit invitation in Wilson to experiment with no-knock procedures. Several states, for example, adopted a categorical or "blanket" approach, authorizing no-knock warrants whenever officers faced certain classes of crime, such as felony drug cases. But in Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385 (1997), the Court rejected this broad approach, emphasizing the importance of establishing case-specific circumstances that would allow police to deviate from the standard knock-and-announce rule. Law enforcement officials must have "reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing their presence, under the particular circumstances, would be dangerous or futile, or that it would inhibit the effective investigation of the crime."

Although Richards reined in some of the more expansive authorizations of no-knock warrants, it also affirmed their basic legitimacy. Indeed, the ruling held that even if judges or magistrates declined to authorize a no-knock warrant in advance, officers might independently decide that exigent circumstances at the scene validated forcible, unannounced entry.

Critics of no-knock warrants contend that the Court's emphasis on case-by-case, context-specific examinations of the reasonableness of no-knock searches and seizures places too much discretion in the hands of the police and marginalizes the role of the supposed guardians of individual liberties, the judges. These skeptics point to cases in which officers' misjudgments have led to injuries and even deaths, sometimes of clearly innocent people. Proponents of no-knock searches and seizures defend these practices as effective, pragmatic, and safe law enforcement techniques vital for prosecuting certain kinds of crime.

Bruce Peabody

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio.

FURTHER READING

Hall, John Wesley. Search and Seizure. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 2000.

United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65 (1998).

Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987)

In Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, 483 U.S. 825 (1987), the U.S. Supreme Court defined some of the limits of the Takings Clause—the last clause of the Fifth Amendment that prohibits the government's taking of private property for a public use without paying the owner just (fair) compensation. The case addressed whether the government can require a landowner to grant an easement that gives the public access over the landowner's land as a condition for approving a building permit.

The Nollan family owned a beachfront lot that was a quarter-mile south of an oceanside public park and 1,800 feet north of another public beach. A concrete seawall separated the beach portion of the Nollans' property from the rest of their property. The Nollans wanted to demolish a small bungalow on the property and replace it with a three-bedroom house. To do so, they were required under California law to obtain a coastal development permit from the California Coastal Commission (CCC). The CCC granted the Nollans' rebuilding permit subject to the condition that the Nollans grant the public a permanent easement to pass across the portion of their property between the mean high tide line and their seawall. The CCC justified the condition by stating that the public-access easement would protect the public's ability to see the beach, assist the public in overcoming a perceived psychological barrier to using the beach, prevent beach congestion, and was part of a comprehensive program to provide beach access arising from prior coastal permit decisions. The Nollans sued the commission, claiming that the permit condition violated the Takings Clause.

In a five–four ruling, the U.S. Supreme Court found that although the outright taking of a permanent, public-access easement by a local or regional government would violate the Takings Clause, conditioning a building permit on an easement would be lawful if there was a nexus, or connection, between the easement and the action requested by the landowner. The Court ruled that the government's power to forbid particular land uses in order to advance a legitimate governmental purpose included the power to condition the land use on some concession by the landowner. This concession can include the transfer of property rights, such as the right to exclude the public.

When the Court examined the CCC's easement condition, it ruled the condition was not a valid exercise of the commission's land-use regulation power because there was no nexus between the condition and a legitimate government purpose. The Court rejected the commission's justifications for the permit condition and ruled that although the commission could advance its comprehensive program by purchasing easements, it could not compel coastal residents to contribute to it.

Nollan defined when government-required concessions violate the Takings Clause, but it was not the Court's final ruling on the issue. Seven years later, in Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374 (1994), the Court again revisited the Takings Clause limits, holding that concessions constituted a taking unless the government could show a substantial nexus between the permitted activity and the concession. Since Dolan, the Court has frequently struggled over the difference between mere regulation versus a taking of property.

Robert W. Malmsheimer

See also: Dolan v. City of Tigard; Property Rights; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Schultz, David A. Property, Power, and American Democracy. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 1992.

Northwest Ordinance

The Northwest Ordinance was enacted by the Congress of the United States in 1787 when the country was governed by the Articles of Confederation, the precursor to the Constitution. This important law was an effort to provide some form of government to westward-moving settlers; it created a three-step process by which an area could progress from wilderness to statehood. Before an area became a state, its citizens would have limited rights of self-government; in addition, a bill of rights guaranteeing basic civil liberties was written into the statute. Significantly, the law prohibited slavery in the region to which it applied.

During the American Revolutionary War, settlers began moving to the lands between the Appalachian Mountains and the Mississippi River. Although several American colonies had claims to that region, it was controlled by the British; at the conclusion of the war, however, it became part of the United States. Soon, the new American states relinquished their claims to these frontier lands, allowing the U.S. government to organize them. The Northwest Ordinance created the "Northwest Territory" out of that part of the frontier that was north of the Ohio River.

The law provided for the U.S. government to appoint five key officials to control the new territory—a governor, a secretary, and three judges. The people who lived in the territory would have no voice in its administration. When any part of the Northwest Territory attained a population of 5,000 adult males, it could break away and become a separate territory. The men would elect a legislature to share power with the appointed officials and a delegate to represent them in Congress. When a territory's population totaled 60,000, the territory could petition Congress to make it a state.

In 1789—when the U.S. Constitution went into effect—no states had yet been carved out of the Northwest Territory, so Congress reenacted the Northwest Ordinance to continue it in force. The system established by the law was used often in the creation of new territories and states as the frontier moved across the continent to the Pacific Ocean.

By passing the Northwest Ordinance, the U.S. government had indicated early in its existence that slavery was an undesirable system that ought to be limited. As it created new territories, Congress sometimes (but not always) outlawed slavery in them. In 1820 the Missouri Compromise prohibited slavery in the northern portions of the Louisiana Purchase. When a proslavery majority of the U.S. Supreme Court declared the Missouri Compromise unconstitutional in Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857), the ruling was immediately ridiculed by many Americans as being based upon political beliefs rather than sound constitutional analysis. One reason for this reaction was that Congress had been outlawing slavery in some territories for the seventy years since the passage of the Northwest Ordinance.

Roger D. Hardaway

See also: Fundamental Rights.

FURTHER READING

Eblen, Jack Ericson. The First and Second United States Empires. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1968.

Horsman, Reginald. The Frontier in the Formative Years, 1783–1815. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1970.

Rohrbough, Malcolm J. The Trans-Appalachian Frontier: People, Society, and Institutions, 1775–1850. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Nude Dancing

Since the early 1980s, nightclubs that offer various kinds of nude dancing or striptease acts have become increasingly popular. Many forms of striptease or burlesque have been around since the 1930s, but the contemporary "gentleman's club" offers an atmosphere of provocative dancing, alcohol, and music that bears little resemblance to the more conventional striptease style of earlier years.

Although some communities have tolerated the growing gentleman's club industry as a benefit for tourism and convention business, many others have attempted to eliminate the establishments through a series of law and regulations. Many of these restrictions have been challenged as violations of the First Amendment because they infringe on the individual's right to freedom of expression.

In a series of U.S. Supreme Court decisions, nude dancing, especially in clubs or cabarets, has been declared a form of symbolic expression. However, the Court also has given local communities wide latitude in regulating this form of expression through a variety of measures, including zoning, liquor licensing, and outright bans.

In California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109 (1972), the Supreme Court upheld a state law that denied liquor licenses to establishments that offered nude dancing in bars. The Court's ruling, however, focused on the Twenty-first Amendment (which repealed prohibition) rather than on First Amendment considerations. In other cases during the 1970s and 1980s, the Court hinted that nude dancing could be protected by the First Amendment but did not explicitly state the boundaries.

In Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991), the Court ruled that nude dancing was expressive. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, in the majority opinion of the narrow five–four holding, stated that nude dancing was "within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment, although only marginally so." Still, the majority upheld an Indiana regulation providing that the intent of the law was not aimed at the erotic message but was a general prohibition against public indecency. The Court's close ruling with a fractured majority left many people confused as to the state of the law. Justice David H. Souter, in a concurring opinion, suggested that the secondary effects of crime and sexual assaults that might accompany nude dancing should justify its regulation. Justice Byron R. White and three other dissenters argued that the Indiana statute was prohibiting expressive conduct and that nudity was essentially related to the message of the dance; the dissenters would have held the regulation unconstitutional.

In City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000), the Court reaffirmed that nude dancing had symbolic meaning but this time ruled that laws banning nude dancing entirely could be upheld because of the negative "secondary effects" that accrue to areas with adult entertainment establishments; among such effects were crime, prostitution, and drug use. The Court did not require cities to prove that these effects were present or that they were lessened by restrictions on nude dancing. This decision was again split and hotly contested, with two concurring opinions within the seven-person majority. Justice Souter again concurred, saying he wanted more proof on whether the ban affected the secondary effects. Justice John Paul Stevens dissented, arguing that the total ban was overly broad and that zoning laws were a less restrictive means to achieve the same results.

Charles C. Howard

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Manuto, Ron, and Sean Patrick O'Rourke. "Dances with Wolves: Nudity, Morality and the Speech/Conduct Doctrine." Free Speech Yearbook 43 (1994): 86–109.

O

Oaths of Office

The "oath" taken by U.S. government officials has its origins in the English legal tradition that forms the foundation of American jurisprudence. Since the early Anglo-Saxon period, English kings had taken specific oaths as a part of their coronations. These oaths defined the legitimacy of the monarchy and the duties of governance and served as models for the pledges later applied to lords, ministers, and members of Parliament, as well as to sheriffs, coroners, constables, and other officials. From the English tradition came the use of constitutional oaths in the United States.

All federal officials must take an "oath of office," which typically includes a person's sworn allegiance to uphold the Constitution. The Constitution specifies an oath of office only for the president, but Article VI states that other officials, including members of Congress, "shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this constitution." Permitting officials either to swear or to affirm indicates that even prior to the 1791 adoption of the First Amendment, the framers of the Constitution were sensitive to the concerns of religious minorities such as Quakers, who opposed swearing. The presidential oath of office is detailed in Article II, Section 1, of the Constitution: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States." Presidents have also traditionally added, "So help me God" afterward, a tradition established by George Washington when he took the first oath April 30, 1789.

Lyndon Baines Johnson takes the presidential oath of office aboard Air Force One after the assassination of John F. Kennedy, November 22, 1963. (Cecil Stoughton, White House/John Fitzgerald Kennedy Library, Boston)

The president's term of office was changed in 1933 by the Twentieth Amendment, which provides that the term begins at noon January 20 of the year following the election. The Chief Justice of the United States traditionally administers the oath, as the president-elect places a hand on the Bible, raises a right hand, and recites the wording.

Members of the legislative branch also take an oath of office at the start of each new Congress. The words "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States" constituted the original oath. After the Civil War, this oath was revised to ensure loyalty to the union. It currently specifies: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

Cases as early as the seminal Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), addressed the constitutional importance of oaths. Chief Justice John Marshall stated that judges and legislators take oaths as recognition that the Constitution provides a rule of government for them.

President Abraham Lincoln justified his conduct during the Civil War by the oath of office. Lincoln believed that his oath bound him to support continuation of the Union against Southern plans for secession.

In contemporary cases, courts have dated the beginning of an official's prescribed duties to the taking of an oath. Upon taking the oath, an official must act in a manner consistent with the oath. In Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000), the U.S. Supreme Court used the oath of office as a legal standard of fiduciary principles. As Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg said in dissent, "There is no cause here to believe that the members of Florida's high court have done less than 'their mortal best to discharge their oath of office,' " citing Sumner v. Mata, 449 U.S. 539 (1981).

Michael W. Hail and J. Gregory Frye

See also: Lincoln, Abraham; President and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Bracton, Henry de. De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae [On the Laws and Customs of England], trans. Samuel E. Thorne. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1968.

Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to The Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Johnson, Herbert A. American Legal and Constitutional History. San Francisco: Austin and Winfield, 1994.

Library of Congress. "American Memory Collection." May 2002. Washington, DC. National Archives and Records Administration. "Our Documents: A National Initiative on American History, Civics, and Service." Washington, DC: National Archives and Records Administration, 2002.

Richardson, H. G. "The English Coronation Oath." Speculum 24 (1949): 44–75.

Obscenity

Just as laws forbidding "obscene" expression have been around for centuries, so too has been the extremely difficult task of defining this elusive term. In fact, defining obscenity has dominated the U.S. Supreme Court's jurisprudence concerning how it comports with First Amendment rights to freedom of expression. Even at common law and in the early days of the republic, definitions of obscene expression were vague at best, and they are no less so today. As Leo Alpert put it, "There is no definition of the term. There is no basis of identification. There is no unity in describing what is obscene literature, or in prosecuting it. There is little more than the ability to smell it."

An early and influential definition was the one formulated by Lord Cockburn, lord chief justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the 1868 case Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 3 Q.B. 360, in which he declared that the test is "whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall." The Hicklin standard was applied to isolated excerpts upon susceptible persons.

Although some courts adopted the Hicklin test, its influence gave way to a test that judged the effect of obscenity on the "average" person. In fact, as early as 1896 the U.S. Supreme Court in Dunlop v. United States, 165 U.S. 486, approved a jury instruction that required a finding that the alleged obscene expression "must be calculated with the ordinary reader to deprave him, deprave his morals, or lead to impure purposes." Perhaps the best-known signal of a change in the definition of obscenity was the notable decision by U.S. District Judge John M. Woolsey in United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses," 5 F. Supp. 182 (S.D.N.Y. 1933), in which Woolsey declared that obscenity must be tested by "its effects on a person with average sex instincts" only after "reading 'Ulysses' in its entirety, as a book must be read on such a test as this."

Defining the boundary of obscene expression began in earnest in 1957 when the U.S. Supreme Court explicitly rejected the Hicklin test as unconstitutionally restrictive in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957). Justice William J. Brennan Jr., speaking for the Court in Roth, approved the following definition: The question is "whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest."

Sensitive to the charge raised by Justice John M. Harlan in a concurring opinion in Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959), that the Supreme Court "should shun considering the particularities of individual cases in this difficult field lest the Court become a final 'board of censorship,' " the Supreme Court restricted the boundary of obscenity in what became known as the Fanny Hill case, formally listed as A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966). The Fanny Hill test required three essential elements: (1) The dominant theme of the material taken as a whole must appeal to a prurient interest in sex; (2) the material must be patently offensive by affronting contemporary community standards in its description or representation of sexual matters; and (3) the material must be utterly without redeeming social value.

Seven years after the Fanny Hill case, in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), the Supreme Court, in the words of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, reexamined the "standards enunciated in earlier cases involving what Mr. Justice Harlan called 'the intractable obscenity problem.' " Seeking to "formulate standards more concrete than those in the past," Chief Justice Burger stated the revised test as follows: "The trier of fact must determine (1) whether 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient [lustful] interest; (2) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (3) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. If so, the expression is obscene With this test, the Court was "satisfied that these specific prerequisites will provide fair notice to a dealer in such materials that his public and commercial activities may bring prosecution."

Despite the Miller Court's optimism, many civil liberties advocates agreed with Justice Brennan's dissent in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973), that the Court > failed to formulate a standard that sharply distinguishes protected from unprotected speech, and out of necessity, we have resorted to the Redrup approach (the approach taken in Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967), by making per curiam reversals of convictions for the dissemination of materials that at least five members of the Court, applying their separate tests, deemed not to be obscene), which resolves cases as between the parties, but offers only the most obscure guidance to > legislation, adjudication by other courts, and primary conduct. By disposing of cases through summary reversal or denial of certiorari we have deliberately and effectively obscured the rationale underlying the decisions. It comes as no surprise that judicial attempts to follow our lead conscientiously have often ended in hopeless confusion.

In short, when all is said and done, the most viable approach to defining obscenity may be Justice Potter Stewart's lament in Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964):

> It is possible to read the Court's opinion in Roth v. United States and Alberts v. California, 354 U.S. 476, in a variety of ways. In saying this, I imply no criticism of the Court, which in those cases was faced with the task of trying to define what may be indefinable. I have reached the conclusion, which I think is confirmed at least by negative implication in the Court's decisions since Roth and Alberts, that under the First and Fourteenth Amendments criminal laws in this area are constitutionally limited to hard-core pornography. I shall not today attempt further to define the kinds of material I understand to be embraced within that shorthand description; and perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly doing so. But I know it when I see it.

Clyde E. Willis

See also: Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; First Amendment; Lady Chatterley's Lover; Miller v. California; Pornography; Roth Test.

FURTHER READING

Alpert, Leo. "Judicial Censorship of Obscene Literature." Harvard Law Review 52 (1938): 40.

Jasper, Margaret C. The Law of Obscenity and Pornography. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1996.

Pease, Allison. Modernism, Mass Culture, and the Aesthetics of Obscenity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

O'Connor, Sandra Day (b. 1930)

Sandra Day O'Connor took her oath of office as a justice on the U.S. Supreme Court on September 25, 1981, under the administration of President Ronald Reagan. She was the first woman on the Court.

Born Sandra Day in El Paso, Texas, on March 26, 1930, she was the eldest of three siblings, the others a brother and a sister. They grew up on a cattle ranch, the Lazy B, located on the high desert south of the Gila River and sectioned by the Arizona–New Mexico border, that her paternal grandfather started in the 1880s. Especially during the dry heat of long summer days, family and cowboys shared in the constant work, which included breaking wild horses and training them for roundup for use in branding or cutting cattle for sale. Although her family no longer owns the ranch, she described in her Lazy B autobiography the lessons that lifetime ingrained in her as she learned from her folks and the resident cowboys and from nature itself: "What counted was competence and the ability to do whatever was required to maintain the ranch operation in good working order—the livestock, the equipment, the buildings, wells, fences, and vehicles. Verbal skills were less important than the ability to know and understand how things work in the physical world. Personal qualities of honesty, dependability, competence, and good humor were valued most."

Sandra Day went to school in El Paso, living with her maternal grandmother, attending first the private Radford School for Girls, then public high school. At the age of sixteen, she entered Stanford University as a freshman, majoring in economics. She learned John Maynard Keynes's theory of public finance, a theory inconsistent with her dad's "pay-as-you-go" style of ranching. In her third year, she took an undergraduate class taught by one of the university's law school professors and fell in love with the study of law. In the following two summers, she worked as a secretary and receptionist for a general practice attorney in Lordsburg, Arizona. One colorful criminal law client was a bar owner accused of permitting illegal gambling and prostitution at his business.

In her fourth year as an undergraduate, she entered law school and received her bachelor's degree with honors. In law school, while serving as editor of the Stanford Law Review, she met John O'Connor. They had a coassignment to check legal citations for an article, and John suggested they finish the project by having a beer at a local pub. That led to a series of dates for the next forty nights in a row. None of that stopped her from graduating third in her class of 102 law school students in 1952. She and John held their wedding at the ranch on December 20, 1952.

Photograph of President Ronald Reagan and his Supreme Court Justice nominee Sandra Day O'Connor at the White House, July 1981. (National Archives)

While O'Connor's husband was busy finishing law school, she studied for the California bar exam. She also worked as a deputy county attorney in San Mateo rather than accept the only job that any private firm offered to her: a legal secretary. When her husband graduated in June 1953, he joined the Army and served as a lawyer in the Judge Advocate General's Corps in West Germany; she was then a civilian lawyer for the Army's Quartermaster Corps.

After Army duty, the couple settled in Phoenix, Arizona. She began her own law firm when she could not find a private law firm that offered a sufficiently flexible schedule to enable the couple to have a family. They have three sons. Before the boys entered elementary school, she took a break from her professional career. In the meantime, she joined community volunteer organizations doing charity work and became active in local and state Republican Party politics, supporting Senator Barry Goldwater. When she reentered her profession full-time, she accepted a position as assistant attorney general for Arizona. In 1969 her political contacts landed her an appointment to the state senate. Voters reelected her to two more terms. She became majority leader in 1973, another first achievement for women in the nation.

O'Connor next served as a trial judge in Maricopa County, Arizona, also an elected position. People wanted her to run for governor against the Democratic Party incumbent, Bruce Babbitt, but she declined. In 1979, Governor Babbitt appointed her to the Arizona Court of Appeals. He also sponsored her nomination to the Supreme Court before the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee.

Justice O'Connor is not a radical feminist. She favors policy-making that overcomes gender stereotypes. She believes history proves that there is value in a critical mass of women working together. She has written about the historical and current role of women making public policy through an organized social movement, legislation, and on the courts: "Dramatic change can occur only when members of a large group surmount their individual differences and unite in pursuit of a concrete goal." This describes the women's suffrage movement, which culminated with ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920 that granted women the national legal right to vote. It also describes the movement in the 1960s and 1970s to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment, of which she was an early supporter, but it did not receive ratification. Need for such an amendment lessened as the Supreme Court began to broaden the rights set forth in the Fourteenth Amendment, such as equal protection of the laws, to be applicable to women when governmental policies were involved.

She urged that more women enter professional occupations: "It matters a great deal to me to have a second woman on the Supreme Court," she said in reference to Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, "a woman who has advanced directly in so many ways the progress of women." Justice O'Connor finds convincing empirical data from sociological studies that women attorneys whose mothers were themselves professionals use their mothers as role models more frequently than they do if their mothers did not work. However, she consistently discounts commentary that her jurisprudence is more "feminine" or empathetic than that of her male colleagues. She finds such analysis close to stereotyping and paternalistic: "There is simply no empirical evidence that gender differences lead to discernible differences in rendering judgments."

Some find Justice O'Connor's stand on abortion policy controversial. The Court decided Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), eight years before she was appointed to it. President Reagan and his more conservative supporters might have expected her to vote to overrule Roe. Instead, she has decided that governmental restrictions on abortion must not impose any "undue burden" on the right of privacy, a test she applied for the Court majority in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992). Since then the Court has dealt only with governmental restrictions on so-called partial-birth abortion cases, and in those cases her vote joins a holding necessitating exceptions for when a woman's health is at stake.

O'Connor applauds judicial independence. Until about the middle of the twentieth century, a norm of judicial consensus existed, which Chief Justices John Marshall and William H. Taft encouraged. Most justices adhered to a past decision, even when an individual justice had a contrary public policy preference. This jurisprudence style deserves respect, according to Justice O'Connor, because it laid the foundation of credibility for the Court and fostered a historical-institutional evolution that enabled each justice to have a freer, more independent style of case-by-case analysis and voting.

Political scientists discount any claim that the Court's justices decide a case purely by canons of legal reasoning, including adherence to precedent (called stare decisis, pronounced STAR-ry de-SI-sis, meaning to follow previous Court decisions). In this context, scholars might classify Justice O'Connor as predictably motivated to vote ideologically in a moderate conservative way, which means her vote sometimes swings to accommodate a more liberal public policy preference. She has played this pivotal role in many landmark decisions, including cases involving rights for women and minorities, the public values of religion, criminal justice, and states' rights. For example, she has not been consistently conservative about gay rights. In Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), she voted to affirm Colorado courts in striking down a voter-approved Amendment 2 to the state constitution because its language targeted people of a homosexual or bisexual orientation and denied them legal rights that local elected public officials granted.

Similarly, in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), she voted to strike down a Texas statute banning same-sex sodomy as being a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Sharon G. Whitney

See also: Ginsburg, Ruth Bader; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey; Rehnquist, William Hubbs; Roe v. Wade; Romer v. Evans.

FURTHER READING

Maveety, Nancy. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor: Strategist on the Supreme Court. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

O'Connor, Sandra Day. Lazy B: Growing up on a Cattle Ranch in the American Southwest. New York: Random House, 2002.

———. The Majesty of the Law: Reflections of a Supreme Court Justice. New York: Random House, 2003.

Oklahoma City Bombing

Until September 11, 2001, the destruction of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Office Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, was the single largest domestic terrorist attack in U.S. history. The September 11 attacks on New York City's World Trade Center and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., further proved that the United States had enemies abroad as well as at home.

The target of the April 1995 attack in Oklahoma City was a nine-story office building housing a variety of federal government agencies. Some of the agencies had federal law enforcement and military recruiting responsibilities, but the majority of employees worked in offices of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Social Security Administration, and the General Services Administration. Other building tenants included a federal employees credit union and a child day care center.

The explosion came from the detonation of a 4,800-pound ammonium nitrate fuel bomb hidden in a rental truck. The truck had been parked on a street immediately in front of the Murrah Building. The explosion caused the collapse of most of the north face of the structure. The explosion killed 168 people, with most of the deaths occurring in the Murrah Building. The explosion also injured hundreds of others and caused tens of millions of dollars of property damage in the area.

Timothy McVeigh, age twenty-seven, under arrest April 21, 1995, two days after the terrorist bombing of the Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, which left 168 men, women, and children dead. (© Allan Tannenbaum/The Image Works)

A primary suspect was arrested north of Oklahoma City within two hours of the explosion. This suspect was later identified as Timothy McVeigh, a decorated former soldier in the U.S. Army and a veteran of the 1991 Gulf War. Following his discharge from the Army, McVeigh had made substantial contacts with militias and other private organizations challenging the legitimacy and authority of the U.S. government.

McVeigh and one close companion, Terry Nichols, were charged with the deaths of eight federal law enforcement officers and employees of federal law enforcement agencies. Because of pretrial publicity, conduct of the federal trial was assigned to U.S. District Court Judge Richard P. Matsch in Denver, Colorado. Evidence presented at trial showed McVeigh and Nichols gathered bomb-making materials near Nichols's home in Kansas. The prosecution's key witness was Michael Fortier, who pleaded guilty to assisting McVeigh in identifying a suitable bombing target.

McVeigh was convicted of murder and conspiracy in the deaths of the federal law enforcement officers and employees and sentenced to die for his crimes. He was executed June 11, 2001, at a federal penitentiary in Indiana. His execution was the first by the federal government in more than thirty-eight years. Nichols was convicted of involuntary manslaughter and conspiring with McVeigh and sentenced to life imprisonment. Fortier was sentenced to a term of imprisonment for his guilty plea.

Despite the arrest, prosecution, and conviction of McVeigh, Nichols, and Fortier, the Oklahoma City bombing remains controversial. Some critics are unconvinced that McVeigh and Nichols could have acted alone in this venture without further financial or moral support. Others have questioned law enforcement errors, including some that occurred in the early hours of the bombing investigation. Some conspiracy theories have charged that the federal government had a role in the destruction of its own property. There is, furthermore, a continuing debate over the decision of Oklahoma state authorities to prosecute Nichols in Oklahoma state court for the murder of the remaining 160 victims, those who were not the subject of the federal prosecution.

The Murrah Federal Office Building site and the immediately surrounding area are today a unit of the National Park Service. The historical site includes the Oklahoma City National Memorial, an outdoor symbolic marker of 168 empty chairs (one for each victim) dedicated to the bombing victims, and a Memorial Center that opened February 19, 2001. The Memorial Center includes an institute devoted to the study of terrorism.

Jerry E. Stephens

See also: Patriot Act.

FURTHER READING

Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building Bombing, April 19, 1995: Final Report. Oklahoma City, OK: City of Oklahoma City, 1996.

Hoffman, David. The Oklahoma City Bombing and the Politics of Terror. Los Angeles: Feral House, 1998.

Linenthal, Edward Tabor. The Unfinished Bombing: Oklahoma City in American Memory. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Michel, Lou, and Dan Herbeck. American Terrorist: Timothy McVeigh and the Oklahoma City Bombing. New York: HarperCollins, 2001.

Oklahoma City National Memorial. 2003. http://www.oklahomacitynationalmemorial.org.

Oklahoma City, Seven Years Later: Lessons for Other Communities. Oklahoma City, OK: Oklahoma City National Memorial Institute for the Prevention of Terrorism, 2002.

Olmstead v. United States (1928)

Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), was a momentous U.S. Supreme Court decision in which the Court held five–four that private telephone conversations could be wiretapped by law enforcement officials without violating the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Chief Justice William Howard Taft wrote the majority opinion in this decision that would stand for almost four decades. However, Olmstead is memorable largely due to the eloquent, insightful, and prophetic dissenting opinion of Justice Louis D. Brandeis.

The federal government was investigating the illegal possession, transportation, and importing of alcohol in violation of the National Prohibition Act. As part of their case against Roy Olmstead and others, prohibition officers intercepted telephone conversations through wiretaps placed on the phone lines without any literal, physical trespass of Olmstead's residence and business. These wiretapped conversations came to consist of 775 typewritten pages of damning evidence used to convict Olmstead and others in federal court; the convictions were upheld by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and affirmed by the Supreme Court.

According to Chief Justice Taft and his "no trespass" doctrine, neither the Fourth nor the Fifth Amendment was violated because no actual, physical intrusion into Olmstead's home or place of business took place. In addition, Taft argued that telephone conversations were not tangible property and thus could not be seized. There was, Taft ruled, no search or seizure as prohibited by the Fourth Amendment, nor was there any "compulsory production of a man's private papers" as covered by the Fifth Amendment. Focusing overwhelmingly on the Fourth Amendment, Taft contended, "There was no searching. There was no seizure. The evidence was secured by the use of the sense of hearing and that only."

Justice Brandeis's dissent was classic. He argued that because stated and implied powers had grown since the nation's founding in the late eighteenth century, constitutional protections against "specific abuses of power must have a similar capacity of adaptation to a changing world." Brandeis reasoned that since the government had no power to search a sealed envelope to read an individual's letter, it lacked legitimate authority to invade the privacy of a telephone conversation. Brandeis cautioned strongly against a cramped and literal reading of the language of the Fourth Amendment; according to Brandeis, the essential purpose of the Fourth Amendment lay behind its literal verbiage:

> The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. . . . They knew that only a part of the pain, pleasure and satisfactions of life are to be found in material things. . . . They conferred, as against the government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

In 1967, in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the Court overruled Olmstead, essentially turning Brandeis's dissent into the controlling precedent in U.S. constitutional law.

Stephen K. Shaw

FURTHER READING

Allen, Francis. The Habits of Legality: Criminal Justice and the Rule of Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

LaFave, Wayne. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 3d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1996.

Open-Fields Exception

U.S. courts generally have interpreted the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution as requiring officials to obtain warrants to conduct governmental searches. However, courts have recognized certain occasions and exigent circumstances under which individuals do not have a "reasonable expectation of privacy"; in these cases, warrants are not required. One such exception to the warrant requirement is the "open-fields" exception. Courts have determined that individuals do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in areas that are open to public view, such as open fields. By contrast, areas within the "curtilage"—the enclosed spaces immediately surrounding a dwelling, such as garages or toolsheds—are generally presumed to be covered by the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement.

Several factors are considered in determining whether an area is part of a dwelling's curtilage. These include the proximity of the area to a home; whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home; the type of use to which the area is put; and whether the owners have taken steps to protect the area from observations by passersby.

The open-fields doctrine came into its own as part of an expanded government effort to conduct the war on drugs during the 1970s and 1980s. In one of the early cases, Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court established that there was no expectation of privacy in open fields, where police had discovered marijuana growing.

A major innovation in the open-fields doctrine occurred when the Court ruled in California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986), that police did not need a warrant to conduct air surveillance of a person's backyard from an altitude of 1,000 feet, even though the backyard was fenced. In United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987), the Court further stated that open fields need be neither "open" nor a "field" as these concepts are commonly used. Thus, even thickly wooded areas may be considered an open field if the person in control of such area has no reasonable expectation of privacy within that location. In Maughn v. Bibb County, 160 F.3d 658 (11th Cir. 1998), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit ruled that uninhab-ited property was an open field and subject to search without a warrant. The Court also maintained that a state may provide greater search and seizure protection than is available under the Fourth Amendment, the latter being merely a threshold minimum protection that states must observe.

Sam W. McKinstry

See also: Fourth Amendment; Right to Privacy; Search Warrants.

FURTHER READING

American Jurisprudence 2d. Vol. 67, p. 489. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Original Intent

See Constitutional Interpretation and Civil Liberties

Original Jurisdiction

The term "original jurisdiction," an important legal concept, refers to the types of cases that may be argued initially before the U.S. Supreme Court without being first taken to a lower court (state or federal). Original jurisdiction is important because it affects the ability of certain individuals or parties to bring cases to the federal courts to protect their individual rights.

Article III, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution specifies two types of jurisdiction (the authority of a court to hear a case) granted to the Supreme Court. Appellate jurisdiction, the first type, refers to cases that originate in and are initially decided by other courts and that are then brought to the Supreme Court for review. The Constitution gives Congress broad authority to define or amend the Court's appellate jurisdiction. For example, the Judiciary Act of 1789 declared that the Supreme Court could take cases on appeal from the highest court in a state if a "federal question" was involved—that is, a case presented an issue under the federal Constitution or federal statutes. Conversely, in Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414 (1944), and in Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. 506 (1868), the Court accepted limitations on its appellate jurisdiction. In Yakus, the Court upheld the ability of Congress to limit the Court's appellate jurisdiction to review price controls during World War II. In McCardle, the Court upheld a congressional law removing its appellate jurisdiction to hear federal habeas corpus petitions (petition for release from unlawful confinement), even though this law was passed after the Court had already heard oral arguments in a pending case of this sort.

The Court's second type of jurisdiction is called original jurisdiction. These are cases that can be filed initially with the Supreme Court. Under Article III, Section 2 of the Constitution, all cases involving ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls and those in which states are the parties can originate in the Supreme Court. In Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), perhaps the most famous case in American law, the Supreme Court ruled that Congress could not alter this original jurisdiction. In ruling that Congress lacked the authority under the Judiciary Act of 1789 to give the Court original jurisdiction to hear requests for mandamus (orders to compel the government to do some act), Chief Justice John Marshall stated that Congress could not add to or subtract from the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction. In reaching that ruling, the Court not only rejected a request to order Secretary of State James Madison to deliver a judicial commission to William Marbury, but it also used that case to declare for itself that it had the power of judicial review (the authority to declare laws unconstitutional).

In addition to the constitutional provision, federal statute clarifies how the Supreme Court may employ original jurisdiction to hear cases involving ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls. Since 1789, however, the Court has heard only three such cases.

Second, the Court may invoke original jurisdiction when a case involves a dispute between the federal government and a state, although lower federal courts also may hear the case (called concurrent jurisdiction). Generally, the Supreme Court defers to the lower court to hear the case first and then takes it on appeal. Third, the Court may hear cases involving states and citizens of another state or those in which one state is suing another state. For the most part, cases of the former type are also first heard in lower court, whereas cases involving two states are usually heard as original jurisdiction. Most state-versus-state cases, however, involve boundary disputes between the parties. In these cases, the Supreme Court generally appoints a special master to gather the facts of the case before the justices decide the issue. Often the special masters are former or current federal judges.

More than 99 percent of all cases heard by the Supreme Court occur through its appellate jurisdiction. The image of lawyers engaging in lengthy arguments for hours or days before the Court is not a reality. Most cases it hears under its appellate power are given no more than one hour to argue, and the few original-jurisdiction cases that have been brought effectively have involved very little argument being presented to the Court by the litigants. Individuals who believe their civil liberties have been violated will find it virtually impossible to bring a case directly before the Supreme Court. If the case reaches the Court at all, it will come in under its appellate jurisdiction. Yet if Yakus and McCardle are valid interpretations of the power of Congress to alter the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, the legislative branch conceivably could remove the bulk of the Court's work, making it harder for the Court to protect civil liberties.

David Schultz

See also: McCardle, Ex parte; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Federal Jurisdiction. New York: Little, Brown, 1994.

Orwell, George (1903–1950)

George Orwell was the twentieth century's greatest propagandist for liberty. In books and essays from the 1930s and 1940s, he created the preeminent vocabulary of resistance—in both Europe and the United States—to the totalitarian movements of his age. A despiser of fascism and an advocate of democratic socialism, Orwell was one of the first prominent intellectuals of the European Left to decry the menace of Soviet communism, which he saw as a sadistic betrayal of genuine revolution.

Orwell was born Eric Arthur Blair on June 25, 1903, in Motihari, India, into a family that he described as part of the English "lower-upper-middle class." Educated at Eton, Orwell chose imperial service over university schooling and became a policeman for the British in Burma, a subject he later wrote about in Burmese Days (1934). His role in imperialism repelled him, and after five years he returned to England where he spent several years as a semiemployed tramp and aspiring writer. His first published work, Down and Out in Paris and London (1933), chronicled lives of the pre-Depression urban poor and garnered him some attention as a writer with a social conscience.

Orwell later put this concern to more powerful effect in The Road to Wigan Pier (1937), an account of underclass conditions in the mining regions of northern England and his first book of nonfiction reportage. Divided into two halves, Wigan Pier expresses the two sides of Orwell's conscience. The first half details the degradations of the poor and the environmental and aesthetic costs of industrial capitalism; the second half explains why socialism, despite its justice, had become unattractive to the middle class and was losing ground to fascism. Decrying socialism's "machine-worship," its pacifism and lack of patriotism, and "the stupid cult of Russia," Orwell alienated himself from many on the Left, including his publishers at the Left Book Club, who ran an apologetic preface accusing him of shortsightedness and "snobbery."

Soon after, Orwell took up arms to defend the Spanish republic against Francisco Franco's fascists. Affiliated with the Party of Marxist Unification (PUM) militia, an anti-Stalinist leftist group, Orwell witnessed firsthand the brutality and misinformation of the communists who, backed by Russia, aggressively suppressed all rival factions. He reported this experience in what many critics consider his finest book, Homage to Catalonia (1938). As he later explained in "Why I Write" (1946), "The Spanish war and other events in 1936–37 turned the scale and thereafter I knew where I stood . . . against totalitarianism and for democratic socialism."

Orwell's writings of the 1940s, especially Animal Farm and 1984, made him famous. Rejected for military service due to poor health, he joined the Home Guard in London, wrote for several journals, and did radio propaganda for the BBC. This period honed his critical edge, developed his sense of apocalyptic pessimism, and gave him a first-person perspective on bureaucratic power. In Animal Farm (1946), Orwell delivered a brutal satire of the Russian Revolution in the form of a children's fable at a moment when Britain and the United States were trying to minimize conflicts with their Soviet allies. He depicts farm animals espousing equality and rebelling against their human masters. Matters go awry when violent factions develop and the new rulers proclaim that "All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others." Many publishers rejected the book, at least one for Orwell's impolitic portrayal of the Bolsheviks as "pigs."

Student reading George Orwell's 1984 in the 1960s.
(© Topham/The Image Works)

In 1984 (1949), Orwell upped the ante. Here, more than anywhere else, he savaged the totalitarian mind and forged a language of resistance. As literature, 1984 has many flaws: stilted dialogue, an awkward romance, and a dramatic structure that peaks when the lead character, Winston Smith, sits in a room and reads a dry book of fictive political theory called The Theory and Practice of Oligarchical Collectivism. As political writing, however, 1984 is a masterpiece, a reverse agitprop that has etched indelible images upon the minds of generations of readers. Orwell presents Winston as the last rebel in a totalitarian world—modeled less on an imagined future than on the dark side of the present—in which "Big Brother is watching you" holds sway through massive telescreens planted in every room and on every street. Like Aldous Huxley, one of his teachers at Eton, Orwell was sensitive to ways that modern technology could imperil freedom. The 1984 dystopia presages both television, which exposes a mass culture to repetitive propaganda, and the Internet, which makes every keystroke a matter of public record.

Orwell saw how totalitarian regimes could manipulate popular perceptions by altering historical memory and politicizing language, a practice he termed "Newspeak." Winston sits in a cubicle in the Ministry of Truth and changes old newspaper articles, turning enemies of the party into "unpersons," while a comrade named Syme labors at "destroying words. . . . In the end we shall make thoughtcrime literally impossible, because there will be no words in which to express it." Party members practice doublethink: "the power of holding two contradictory beliefs in one's mind simultaneously and accepting both of them." The power of the totalitarian system is the power of illogic, the strength of the repeated lie over the truth, and Winston's final submission comes when he accepts the lesson of his torturer, O'Brien, that 2 + 2 = 5. Ideology is a mask for power exercised for its own sake. The government redirects subversive energies by engaging in constant warfare with enemies that change imperceptibly (is it Eastasia or Eurasia?), giving truth to the dicta that "War is peace" and "Freedom is slavery." Orwell presented the counterfactual to J. S. Mill's historical optimism about liberty and truth and contradicted the nineteenth-century liberal faith with twentieth-century cynicism.

Orwell saw himself as a "pamphleteer," claiming in "Why I Write" that his best work began from "a feeling of partisanship." Although it would be comforting to read him as a relic of his age and its politics, the threats to liberty against which he warned remain. His communists were not utopians but power-adoring fascists in disguise; the government of Oceana was one of oligarchical—not egalitarian—collectivism, thus implicating much of the contemporary "free world." Like any smart informer, Orwell was good at spotting his enemies and even better at fingering his friends.

Robb A. McDaniel

See also: Censorship; First Amendment; Movie Treatments of Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Bloom, Harold, ed. George Orwell: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.

Meyers, Jeffrey. Orwell: Wintry Conscience of a Generation. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Orwell, George. Animal Farm. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1946.

———. 1984. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1949.

———. Homage to Catalonia. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace, 1952.

———. The Road to Wigan Pier. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace, 1958.

———. Essays. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.

Rorty, Richard. "The Last Intellectual in Europe: Orwell on Cruelty." In Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Zwerdling, Alex. Orwell and the Left. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1974.

Overbreadth Doctrine

The overbreadth doctrine permits a litigant whose own speech is unprotected by the First Amendment to challenge a law's constitutionality based on the free speech rights of persons who are not party to the lawsuit. The doctrine illustrates two subtle points about the law of civil liberties in America. First, it exemplifies an ongoing battle between liberals and conservatives over the proper role for the federal courts in protecting civil liberties. Second, because the doctrine applies exclusively to restraints on free speech, it strongly indicates that this right occupies a paramount position in the hierarchy of civil liberties protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The overbreadth doctrine is most commonly characterized as an exception to the rule against "third-party standing." Under that rule, litigants typically cannot challenge a law by raising the constitutional rights of others—that is, the litigants have no "standing" to bring a claim. To illustrate this prohibition, imagine that California passes a law authorizing all searches and seizures, not just ones that are reasonable. Because the Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures, the California law can be both constitutionally applied (when the police conduct a reasonable search and seizure) and unconstitutionally applied (when the police conduct an unreasonable search and seizure). Assume Mr. Smith is arrested after a reasonable search of his apartment uncovers evidence of a crime. Mr. Smith could argue that the California law, as applied in his case, violated his constitutional rights, but he would lose because the search of his apartment was reasonable. Mr. Smith might also want to argue that the law should not be enforced because it could violate the Fourth Amendment rights of persons who were subjected to unreasonable searches and seizures. But under the rule against third-party standing, the court will not consider this argument. Mr. Smith has no standing to bring this claim. The court will examine only whether the law was constitutionally applied ("as-applied") in Mr. Smith's case, and Mr. Smith will lose his constitutional challenge.

This traditional prohibition on third-party standing is consistent with a conservative, restrained view of the federal courts' role in protecting civil liberties. The rule is justified on the grounds that a defendant whose conduct is unprotected by the Constitution should not avoid punishment merely because the law might be unconstitutionally applied to others. Moreover, conservatives argue, courts are supposed to decide concrete cases, not hypothetical invasions of a third party's rights. Under this view, courts operate best when they are presented with real, factual situations.

As an exception to this rule, the overbreadth doctrine requires courts to consider the rights of third parties who are not before the court. For example, assume Arizona passes a law banning all speech that advocates lawless action. Like the California law, this speech restriction can be either constitutionally or unconstitutionally applied. Under current Supreme Court precedents, the law is constitutional when it is applied to speech that is likely to produce imminent lawless action, but is unconstitutional when applied to speech that advocates lawless action at some undetermined future point in time. Assume Ms. Jones, at a rally advocating the legalization of drugs, orders members of her organization to immediately commence smoking marijuana to protest the drug laws. The Arizona law could be constitutionally applied to Ms. Jones's speech because it advocates immediate lawless action and is likely to cause such action. But Ms. Jones has an advantage over Mr. Smith. Under the overbreadth doctrine, Ms. Jones can avoid punishment by arguing that the law could be applied to speech that is constitutionally protected—specifically, advocacy of lawless action at some point in the distant future. Thus, an overbroad speech restriction is unenforceable even against parties whose speech is unprotected.

The overbreadth doctrine's primary justification is that permitting only as-applied challenges to speech restrictions would chill the exercise of protected free speech. Arizona's speech restriction, for example, might deter a philosophy professor from discussing the merits of civil disobedience. The philosopher might justly fear criminal prosecution or even wonder whether the courts would protect his speech. Not only would the philosopher's speech be chilled, but his challenge to the law also would not reach the courts. By permitting litigants to raise the free speech rights of others, courts can more quickly determine that a law contains unconstitutional speech restrictions. Thus, the overbreadth doctrine is a tool for those who favor a broader role for federal courts in protecting civil liberties.

The overbreadth doctrine is usually traced to Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940), in which the Supreme Court permitted a facial challenge (a law challenged as unconstitutional on its face) of an antipicketing statute. But it was the Earl Warren Court that most actively employed the doctrine to strike down speech-restrictive laws. In Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972), for example, the Warren Court held that a Georgia law's restraint on the use of offensive words was unenforceable because of the law's overbreadth. An antiwar demonstrator had said to an officer, "You son of a bitch, I'll choke you to death." The demonstrator's speech was clearly unprotected by the First Amendment because, under the Supreme Court's "fighting words" doctrine, words "which by their very utterance . . . tend to incite an immediate breach of peace" may be criminally punished. But the Georgia statute was not limited to fighting words. Rather, the statute was overbroad because it punished the utterance of all "opprobrious words" or "abusive language" that at some unspecified future point could "cause a breach of peace." Even though the defendant's speech was unprotected by the First Amendment, he avoided punishment because the law was overbroad.

In contrast with the Warren Court, the Court under Chief Justices Warren E. Burger and William H. Rehnquist has viewed the overbreadth doctrine as "strong medicine" because it renders statutes unenforceable and alters traditional rules of standing. The Supreme Court has placed three limitations on the doctrine. First, the overbreadth must be "substantial." In Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), the Court explained that the overbreadth of a law must "not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Second, the courts will narrowly construe a statute, if possible, to avoid finding substantial overbreadth. Consider Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), in which the Supreme Court created the fighting-words doctrine: The New Hampshire law applied to "any offensive, derisive, or annoying word" and lacked any requirement that the language cause a breach of peace. Arguably, the New Hampshire state statute upheld in Chaplinsky was more overbroad than the law struck down in Gooding. But because the Supreme Court of New Hampshire had limited the statute's application to fighting words, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the overbreadth challenge. Third, the overbreadth doctrine does not apply to commercial speech. In Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), the Court explained that commercial speech is less likely to be chilled than other types of protected speech because it promotes the speaker's economic well-being.

Grant Davis-Denny

See also: Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Barron, Jerome A., and C. Thomas Dienes. First Amendment Law in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Fallon, Richard H. "Making Sense of Overbreadth." Yale Law Journal 100, 4 (January 1991): 853–908.

Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. First Amendment Law. New York: Foundation, 1999.

Overturning Supreme Court Decisions

According to tradition long upheld in Anglo-American courtrooms, judges follow the principle of stare decisis (pronounced STAR-ry de-SI-sis), which is the rule that justices are expected to follow prior decisions, or precedents. This helps ensure that case law is consistent, fair, and predictable, so that citizens know how a law is likely to be interpreted in the future and can make decisions based on this knowledge. For example, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), that women had the right of abortion choice in the first six months of pregnancy, citizens could expect that subsequent Court decisions would follow this precedent and that legal abortion would be available.

It was partially this expectation of stare decisis that caused the Court to uphold Roe v. Wade in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992). In Casey, the majority wrote that in order for the Court to overrule precedent, it should have "special justification" over and above a belief that the precedent was incorrectly decided. Although some of the majority justices personally did not like the right of abortion choice, they chose not to overturn Roe; they felt such a decision would have threatened the Court's legitimacy because the ruling would have seemed overly political. Moreover, they said the right of privacy on which the right of abortion choice was based had expanded since Roe, and women had a settled expectation that the right of abortion choice would continue in the future. Thus, following precedent leads to stability in constitutional principles and results in the Court's not arbitrarily changing such principles as it faces each new case.

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court sometimes overrules its prior decisions. Often, a past decision may have been based upon historical facts or beliefs that are no longer true. If the social, political, and economic situation has fundamentally changed, the Court may decide that case law should evolve accordingly. This helps to ensure that the Court's decisions will evolve with a constantly changing country and society.

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), is one of the most famous instances when the Court ruled to overturn precedent. This case struck down the 1896 ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, which permitted racial segregation on the grounds that "separate but equal" facilities were constitutional. In Brown, the Court acknowledged that the role of public education in U.S. political, social, and economic life had changed with the times and that segregation in public schools was no longer constitutional under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The justices in Casey compared the two segregation cases and wrote that Brown did have the special justification needed to overturn a precedent that Casey lacked—in Brown, circumstances had significantly changed in such a way that the basis for the Plessy decision no longer was valid.

Scholars vary widely in their views as to whether and why the Supreme Court should overturn prior decisions. Most scholars fall into the group that emphasizes that justices are bound by institutional norms, such as the need to support a rule of law over individual facts, to follow precedent and not overrule past landmark decisions. They argue that landmark cases should not be overruled unless principles in cases decided since the landmark case have changed significantly and external forces in society—such as history, economics, politics, and the role of individuals and institutions in society—require the Supreme Court to reverse prior decisions.

Some scholars follow the attitudinal model, arguing that "justices overwhelmingly overturn decisions because of their ideology." The attitudinal model emphasizes that justices vote for purely political reasons and follow their personal agendas and are rarely bound by precedent. Other observers emphasize that in cases of constitutional interpretation (versus interpretation of statutes), the Court is more willing to reexamine and sometimes reverse precedent. In fact, the three most recent Courts (under Chief Justices Earl Warren, Warren E. Burger, and William H. Rehnquist) have overturned constitutional precedents twice as often as nonconstitutional precedents. Justices may consider constitutional precedent to be less subject to stare decisis because the Constitution is rarely amended and yet decisions must still remain relevant to the modern world. There is no way for a legislature to correct mistakes or problems in the Constitution by simply voting for a new law; the amending process is lengthy and difficult, and it would therefore be difficult to correct a problem in interpretation through this process. Therefore, if changes are to be made, the Court is the most likely institution to make them.

A third group of scholars, called originalists, argue that justices must interpret the words of the Constitution as the framers of the Constitution and its amendments would have interpreted them (original intent), and not change such interpretations as society changes. The Court should overturn landmark decisions only if they were wrongly decided originally. If the people want to overturn Court decisions, they can do so through constitutional amendments. For example, the Sixteenth Amendment, which provided for a federal income tax, overturned Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co., 158 U.S. 601 (1895), which had declared such a tax unconstitutional.

Ronald Kahn

See also: Constitutional Amending Process.

FURTHER READING

Brenner, Saul, and Harold J. Spaeth. Stare Indecisis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Gerhardt, Michael J. "The Role of Precedent in Constitutional Decision-Making and Theory." George Washington Law Review 60, 1 (November 1991): 68–159.

———. "The Pressure of Precedent: A Critique of the Conservative Approaches to Stare Decisis in Abortion Cases." Constitutional Commentary 10 (1993): 67–86.

Kahn, Ronald. "Institutional Norms and Supreme Court Decision-Making: The Rehnquist Court on Privacy and Religion." In Supreme Court Decision-Making: New Institutionalist Approaches, ed. Cornell W. Clayton and Howard Gillman, 175–98. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.

Segal, Jeffrey A., and Harold J. Spaeth. The Supreme Court and the Attitudinalist Model Revisited. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

P

Palko v. Connecticut (1937)

Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), was an eight–one decision (Justice Pierce Butler dissented without a written opinion) that became one of the landmark cases involving the application of provisions of the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) to the states. Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo's decision for the U.S. Supreme Court was a classic exposition of the doctrine of "selective incorporation," the "double standard" by which the Court has justified applying some, but not all, of the provisions of the Bill of Rights to the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Frank Palko had been tried for murder in the first degree but convicted by a jury of second-degree murder, for which he was sentenced to life in prison. Citing various errors in the trial, the Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial. At this new trial, Palko was sentenced to death, a decision affirmed by the Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors. Had this case been initiated by the national government, the sentence in the second case would have been invalid as a violation of the double jeopardy provision in the Fifth Amendment.

Palko argued that the guarantee against double jeopardy in the Fifth Amendment (like other provisions of the Bill of Rights) should limit the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment just as it did the national government. Justice Cardozo denied that there was such a general rule. In examining previous cases, Cardozo observed that the Supreme Court had incorporated some provisions of the Bill of Rights against the states and failed to incorporate others. Thus, it had ruled that the Fifth Amendment provision for a grand jury indictment and the Sixth and Seventh Amendment requirements for trial by jury did not apply to the states. By contrast, the Court had incorporated against the states the constitutional protections for freedom of speech, freedom of the press, free exercise of religion, right of peaceable assembly, and right to counsel in capital cases.

Acknowledging that "the line of division may seem to be wavering and broken if there is a hasty catalogue of the cases on the one side and the other," Cardozo found "a rationalizing principle which gives to discrete instances a proper order and coherence." He argued that this line of division centered on distinguishing rights, such as "freedom of thought, and speech," that were "fundamental," or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," from guarantees that, though important, were not so fundamental and without which justice would not perish.

Cardozo decided that the provision against double jeopardy was not fundamental, especially in a case such as Palko's in which the government was not using a second trial to wear down a defendant but simply to redress errors in the first trial. He therefore denied the appellant's claim. Palko was subsequently electrocuted.

Over the course of the twentieth century, the Supreme Court acknowledged an increasing number of Bill of Rights provisions to be fundamental and thus subject to the doctrine of selective incorporation. The Court ultimately applied the double jeopardy provision to the states in Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969).

John R. Vile

See also: Bill of Rights; Incorporation Doctrine; Selective Incorporation.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J., and Barbara A. Perry. Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States. 8th ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Palmer Raids

The Communist takeover of Russia in 1917 sparked fear in many people in the United States that a similar revolution could happen in their country. One official manifestation of this concern was a series of mass arrests conducted by U.S. Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer against real and suspected opponents of U.S.-style democracy. The Palmer raids blatantly and brazenly denied many Americans the basic civil liberties guaranteed them by the U.S. Constitution.

The late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries brought the establishment of several third parties in the United States, founded by those who viewed the Democrats and Republicans as more interested in politics than in solving problems of ordinary people. Several of these parties demanded that the government curb the power of wealthy corporations and individuals while adopting policies to benefit working people. Political movements that enjoyed some electoral success during this period included the Greenback Labor, Socialist, People's (or Populist), and Progressive parties. Additionally, many labor organizations sought to put pressure on employers to pay their employees better wages and to improve working hours and conditions.

World War I caused many Americans to view more negatively than before those who challenged the democracy and capitalism that had made the United States a militarily powerful and economically important country. To be sure, many people in the United States had always opposed labor unions and small political parties; after World War I, however, many who had tolerated these entities before now saw them as posing real threats to the "American way of life." This harsh reaction, heightened by the fear resulting from the ascent of communism in Russia, became known in U.S. history as the "red scare" (a scare to be repeated in the 1940s and 1950s).

A. Mitchell Palmer, a former Democratic congressman from Pennsylvania, became President Woodrow Wilson's attorney general in 1919, shortly after the end of World War I (the Great War) in Europe. He decided to seek the Democratic nomination for president in 1920, and he hoped to capitalize on Americans' fear of communism. The raids he conducted against supposed "radical" political and labor groups and individuals, therefore, were at least partially the result of his political ambitions. Assisted by a young J. Edgar Hoover, Palmer's agents arrested several thousand people suspected of plotting a Communist revolution in the United States. Several hundred resident aliens were summarily deported as alleged security risks.

Public opinion, however, soon turned against Palmer's conduct. The majority of Americans found the actions of the Department of Justice to be too aggressive in arresting and harassing many people who were guilty only of espousing unpopular opinions and beliefs. Instead of enhancing Palmer's political career, the raids ruined it. The Democrats refused to nominate him for president in 1920, and he retired from public life when the Wilson administration ended in 1921.

Roger D. Hardaway

See also: Democratic Party; Department of Justice; Hoover, J. Edgar; Red Scare.

FURTHER READING

Coben, Stanley. A. Mitchell Palmer: Politician. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.

Levin, Murray B. Political Hysteria in America: The Democratic Capacity for Repression. New York: Basic Books, 1971.

Murray, Robert K. Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919–1920. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1955.

Parental Rights

In a number of cases, the U.S. Supreme Court has had occasion to address whether the right of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children without interference by the state is protected by the U.S. Constitution.

The Court's first significant case regarding parental rights was Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), in which the Court considered whether a Nebraska statute that prohibited the teaching of foreign modern languages to children who had not passed the eighth grade violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held that it did, reasoning that the liberties protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment included the freedom "to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children." Accordingly, the Court concluded that the Nebraska statute violated the teacher's "right to teach and the right of parents to engage him so to instruct their children," a right protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Two years later, in Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), the Supreme Court once again addressed the scope of constitutionally protected parental rights. In Pierce, the Court reviewed an Oregon compulsory attendance law that required all children age eight to sixteen to attend public school. One of the appellees, the Society of Sisters, a corporate entity devoted to Catholic education, objected to the law, contending that its enrollments had significantly declined. The Hill Military Academy, a private secular institution, similarly objected to the statute. In holding that the statute violated the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court relied upon Meyer and reasoned that the statute "unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control. . . . The child is not the mere creature of the State; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations."

The Supreme Court later delineated the boundaries of parental rights in Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944). In that case, a nine-year-old child's guardian was arrested for permitting the child to sell magazines on the street in violation of a Massachusetts statute. The guardian argued that the statute violated her right to freedom of religion under the First Amendment (because the magazine sales related to the Jehovah's Witness religion) and her parental rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court concluded, however, that "neither rights of religion nor rights of parenthood are beyond limitation." The Court also noted that "the state has a wide range of power for limiting parental freedom and authority in things affecting the child's welfare; and that this includes, to some extent, matters of conscience and religious conviction." Finding the Massachusetts child labor law in question to be within the state's power, the Court therefore affirmed the guardian's conviction.

In Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972), the Supreme Court reviewed the conviction of members of the Amish and Mennonite churches for violating Wisconsin's compulsory attendance laws by refusing to send their children to any school (public or private) after the eighth grade. Because the Amish's objection to formal schooling was intertwined so closely with their religious beliefs, they challenged the Wisconsin law based on both the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of parental rights. Acknowledging that the state has a strong interest in the education of children, the Court noted that the state's interest "is not totally free from a balancing process when it impinges on fundamental rights and interests." On the facts of the case before it, and based on the combined rights asserted under the First and Fourteenth Amendments, the Court concluded that the Amish had presented enough evidence to overcome the state's interest in requiring a formal high school education.

Finally, the Supreme Court recently addressed the constitutional scope of protected parental rights in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). At issue was a grandparents' petition for greater rights to visit their grandchildren than their mother wanted to permit. The trial court entered a visitation order for the grandparents. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the visitation order was an unconstitutional infringement on the mother's parental rights, relying on Meyer and its progeny. Because the Washington statute in question permitted a court to disregard any decision by a fit parent concerning third-party visitation, the Court concluded the statute exceeded the bounds of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In conclusion, it seems clearly established in the constitutional jurisprudence of the past century that parents have a significant constitutionally protected interest in the rearing of their children. As the Supreme Court noted in Yoder, however, "the power of the parent . . . may be subject to limitation . . . if it appears that parental decisions will jeopardize the health or safety of the child, or have a potential for significant social burdens."

Elizabeth M. Rhea

See also: Pierce v. Society of Sisters; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Sussman, Alan. Rights of Parents. New York: Avon, 1980.

Parents Music Resource Center

Formed in the mid-1980s, the Parents Music Resource Center (PMRC) sparked a maelstrom of debate regarding music, censorship, and the role of government in regulating the limits of artistic expression. The debate raised important issues about the protection afforded by the First Amendment for freedom of expression. Congressional hearings involving testimony by senators and several recording artists in the summer of 1985 delved deeply into the influence of music on American children and the role of the government and record companies in helping parents to make informed decisions about what music their children were hearing. The PMRC eventually succeeded in getting warning labels put on potentially offensive music, although the group failed in some of its more ambitious goals.

In December 1984, Tipper Gore, wife of then-Senator Al Gore, purchased the soundtrack to the movie Purple Rain. When she listened to it with her teenage daughter, Tipper Gore was shocked by the explicit references to sex and masturbation. Within weeks, she, Susan Baker, and the wives of eight other influential Washingtonians had formed the PMRC. The group argued that rock music was a contributing factor in increased levels of rape, drug use, sex, and suicide among those age sixteen to twenty-four. In support of this claim, the PMRC cited explicit lyrics in songs such as Prince's "Darling Nikki," Van Halen's "Too Hot for Teacher," Ozzie Osbourne's "Suicide Solutions," and AC/DC's "Shoot to Thrill."

The PMRC's first step was to write a letter to the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA), signed by the wives of twenty influential Washington politicians, urging that the RIAA develop a voluntary rating system similar to that used for movies. At the time, the proposed Home Recording Act, which would prohibit home recording of music and music videos, was in congressional committee. The RIAA believed that the industry was losing millions of dollars a year in pirated products because of home recording, and it was particularly interested in the views of PMRC members, four of whom had husbands on committees hearing the proposed legislation.

The PMRC had six goals in 1985: to print lyrics on album covers, keep explicit covers under the counter, establish a ratings system for records similar to that for films, establish a ratings system for concerts, reassess the contracts of performers who engage in violence and explicit sexual behavior onstage, and establish a citizen and record-company media watch that would pressure broadcasters not to air "questionable talent."

Within five months of the group's founding, more than 150 newspapers and several television programs had taken up the discussion. Large retailers such as Wal-Mart, J.C. Penney, and Sears, fearing controversy, started pulling rock music and rock magazines off their shelves.

In September 1985, the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation opened hearings involving testimony from recording artists such as John Denver and Frank Zappa, record company executives, PMRC members, and a variety of senators. On November 1, 1985, PMRC and RIAA announced the creation of the "Parental Advisory: Explicit Lyrics" label. This label, in black and white measuring 1" x ⅝," would be placed on albums with lyrics that reflected "explicit sex, violence, or substance abuse." Twenty-two participating RIAA record companies agreed to apply the label to their music. Although the sticker itself was not considered censorship, many stores refused to carry music that had the warning label.

After this initial success, the PMRC's influence waned. PMRC press releases in 1986 and 1988–1990 reporting that record companies were adequately applying labels were largely ignored, although the PMRC succeeded in convincing the RIAA to develop more detailed criteria about when to use the Parental Advisory label. Since then, the PMRC has changed its goals and serves as a resource center to educate and promote public awareness of the positive long-term effects of music on health, analytical and creative thinking, and self-esteem.

Ben Reno-Weber

See also: Censorship; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Susan, and Mary Tipper Gore. "Record Industry Misunderstands PMRG." Billboard 5 (April 1993).

Davidson, Sandra, and Betty Houchin Winfield. Bleep! Censoring Rock and Rap Music. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1999.

Gore, Tipper. Raising PG Kids in an X-Rated Society. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1987.

Nuzum, Eric D. Parental Advisory: Music Censorship in America. New York: Perennial, 2001.

Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973)

In Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a Georgia Supreme Court decision that declared two movies shown at the Paris Adult Theatre in Atlanta "obscene." The same day, the Court also issued its landmark decision in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), in which it attempted to develop a working definition of "obscenity" that could be used to measure the obscenity standards of various states. The obscenity controversy had raged throughout the country for years, and there was little consensus on the extent to which the rights to free expression protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution were applicable.

The Paris Adult Theatre in Atlanta, Georgia, had shown It All Comes Out in the End and Magic Mirror, both of which had been explicitly labeled as "adult" with large warnings outside the theater that stated "Adult theater—You must be 21 and able to prove it. If viewing the nude body offends, Please Do Not Enter."

After being notified that the Paris Theatre was showing films that were "obscene" if not "hard-core pornography," Fulton County dispatched two undercover investigators to view the two films in December 1970. County officials then declared both films obscene and found them to be in direct violation of a Georgia statute that defined obscenity as a work, which taken as a whole, violated contemporary standards by appealing to a prurient in sex, nudity, and excretion and that was without any redeeming social value whatsoever. The state of Georgia then requested an injunction to prevent subsequent showings of the "obscene" movies. The theater owners challenged the ruling, arguing that since the films were shown only to adults who chose to see them, they were protected by the First Amendment.

Paris Adult Theatre dealt with four separate but interrelated issues. First, the Court needed to determine whether different definitions of "obscenity" existed for consenting adults and for the rest of the population. Second, the Court had to determine whether the burden of proof lay with the prosecutor to show that the films were obscene or with the Paris Theatre to show that they were not. The third issue was whether evidence was needed to substantiate the harmful effects of an "obscene" item on society as a whole. Finally, the Court was being asked to deal with definitions of "obscenity" that varied from state to state and that might conflict with its own definitions of "obscenity" as articulated in Miller.

The Court found for the city of Atlanta, contending that the films were obscene according to "applicable state law" as defined in Miller and, therefore, did not come under the protection of the First Amendment. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger stated: "We categorically disapprove the theory . . . that obscene, pornographic films acquire constitutional immunity from state regulation simply because they are exhibited for consenting adults only." Burger concluded that Georgia did not have to show that the material was obscene, since it met the standards of obscenity under local law. Georgia had exercised a legitimate interest in "regulating the exposure of obscene materials to juveniles and unconsenting adults," since all states had the authority to stem "the tide of commercialized obscenity" according to the dictates of its own laws. According to the Court, it was the responsibility of the states to protect "the quality of life and the total community environment, the tone of commerce in the great city centers, and, possibly, the public safety itself." Miller allowed some variations in state definitions of obscenity, but no state definition could be more restrictive than allowed by Miller.

Dissenting with great force, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. reiterated his belief that "obscenity" was, indeed, protected by the First Amendment because "[a]rt and literature reflect tastes; and tastes, like musical appreciation, are hardly reducible to precise definitions." Powell argued that tastes were "too personal to define and too emotional and vague to apply." In a separate dissent, joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall and Potter Stewart, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. called for greater freedom of expression rather than the restrictions the Court applied in Paris Theatre. Brennan contended that extended freedom would "introduce a large measure of clarity to this troubled area [and] would reduce the institutional pressure on this Court and the rest of the State and Federal Judiciary."

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Miller v. California; Obscenity; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Abernathy, M. Glenn, and Barbara A. Perry. Civil Liberties Under the Constitution. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Tedford, Thomas L. Freedom of Speech in the United States. New York: Random House, 1985.

Patents

See Copyright, Patent, and Trademark

Patriot Act

The USA Patriot Act is a broad, far-reaching act that provides law enforcement many new tools, presumptively for use in fighting terrorism. It was enacted on October 26, 2001, only forty-five days after the September 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. It was passed overwhelmingly by the U.S. Congress and signed into law by President George W. Bush the same day, after only one day of debate and with almost no public awareness. Its official title is "Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism (USA Patriot Act) Act of 2001."

Many organizations and individuals, conservative and liberal, agree it is the most far-reaching modern act of its kind ever passed in the United States, on a par with the Alien and Sedition Acts of the late eighteenth century. Those acts were fueled by fear of the violence of the French Revolution and led to the closing down of publishers suspected of unpatriotic views. They were born of fear, a fear similar to the fear that spawned the Patriot Act.

By late 2003, the Patriot Act had become more controversial as its provisions became more widely understood. Even so, less than 10 percent of registered voters in the United States were aware of the law's potential for encroachment on their civil liberties.

The Patriot Act grants to law enforcement new investigative tools that violate or circumvent the Constitution in numerous ways. The Patriot Act infringes on at least six of the original Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution), specifically the First, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Amendments. Many constitutional scholars also would include the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. To illustrate, following are a few actions the federal government can undertake since passage of the Patriot Act that it previously could not do:

The FBI can enter private homes, search through personal effects, and confiscate personal property, without previously informing the residents, and sometimes informing them only several months after the fact. This so-called "sneak and peek" provision proved so controversial that the House of Representatives voted to repeal it in August 2003.

The FBI can visit anyone's place of employment to demand personal records about them. Agents can question coworkers and supervisors about individuals without explaining why the information is being sought. Those asked about coworkers will be warned not to tell them or anyone else, under penalty of being prosecuted themselves.

On designation by the U.S. attorney general, anyone can be detained and questioned, without the government having to show Fourth Amendment probable cause that the person has committed any illegal act.

Hundreds of people gathered in Boston, Massachusetts, on September 9, 2003, to protest Attorney General John Ashcroft, who spoke exclusively to law enforcement personnel to promote and defend the USA Patriot Act. Protesters contend that Ashcroft's plan has eroded civil liberties under the guise of improving public safety. (© 2003 Marilyn Humphries/The Image Works)

By informing a U.S. magistrate judge that an individual is part of an ongoing terrorist or intelligence investigation, the government can obtain an ex parte (unilateral) warrant giving it access to the person's personal records, including medical and banking records. Magistrates are required to sign the order.

The president, in cooperation with the attorney general, can designate a U.S. citizen an "enemy combatant." The person then can be incarcerated indefinitely, without charges, without the right to an attorney, and without family or friends knowing where the individual is being held.

The Patriot Act redefines terrorism very broadly to include a new range of activities that may be considered acts of "domestic terrorism." Many nonterrorist political protest activities, such as those of Greenpeace, Operation Rescue, animal rights actions, protest marches, and demonstrations now can be considered acts of domestic terrorism.

Grand jury testimony, long considered inviolable and not subject to subpoena, now can be obtained by law enforcement on a claim it may be useful in a terrorist investigation.

The government can investigate the use of the Internet by anyone, and intercept the person's e-mail, on an allegation by the government of a connection to terrorist activity. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) supposedly cannot read the contents of the e-mail, only the sites visited.

Records of books or magazines checked out from a library, or information about purchases from private booksellers, can be obtained about anyone on an allegation that the information is sought for an intelligence investigation.

The scope and power of a secret court, originally created in 1978 to hear matters pertaining to foreign intelligence, have been expanded to include domestic investigations the government claims are related to possible terrorist activities, including domestic terrorism.

Since passage of the Patriot Act, the president, the Justice Department, and law enforcement have engaged in these actions:

Secretly arrested and incarcerated more than 1,200 persons, mainly immigrants of Arab descent, in connection with the investigation of the events of September 11, 2001. Subsequently, the Justice Department refused to disclose the names of those being held in jail, despite a U.S. District Court order and congressional demands to do so.

Conducted more than 600 secret deportation hearings based on the attorney general's assertion that open hearings might compromise national security.

Declared two U.S. citizens to be "enemy combatants," José Padilla and Yaser Hamdi. This enabled the government to keep both men in military prisons indefinitely, without charges, without access to a lawyer, and without contact with friends and family.

Made secret visits to hundreds of U.S. universities seeking information about untold numbers of individuals.

Began instituting an airline passenger data collection and personal information system in cooperation with national airlines. The system will track credit card and banking records and other personal information about passengers and cross-check them against a list of names on a government "watch list." The watch list, compiled by undisclosed profiling techniques, would then be used to assign each passenger a terrorist-threat level of red, yellow, or green.

Mandated that some 6,000 U.S. universities assist the government in maintaining surveillance of foreign students, under penalty of no longer being able to enroll foreign students if the school fails to comply.

Sent two FBI agents to investigate and question a nineteen-year-old college freshman in North Carolina who had put on her bedroom wall a poster critical of George W. Bush for his position on capital punishment when he was governor of Texas. The agents, while there, asked if she had any pro-Taliban materials.

Used the Patriot Act to press charges against a young, lovesick woman who posted threatening notes aboard a cruise ship because she thought it would cause the ship to return to port and her boyfriend. She was sentenced to two years in federal prison.

Permitted security guards at the Crossgates Mall in Albany, New York, to refuse to allow a lawyer and his son to enter the mall at Christmas wearing T-shirts that read "Peace on Earth" and "Give Peace a Chance." When the attorney refused to leave, he was arrested for trespass.

Used the Patriot Act to seek prosecution of an animal rights group that attacked the residence of a restaurateur who served paté de fois gras in his restaurant, calling it an act of domestic terrorism.

There are increasing indications the American people and some federal lawmakers are becoming concerned about the government's use of the Patriot Act to violate traditional civil liberties. As of fall 2003, some 200 local governments in thirty-four states, including Chicago, Illinois, and Sarasota, Florida, and three states had passed resolutions condemning the legislation.

The House of Representatives passed legislation to restrict the use of FBI break-ins and searches of individual homes. Other members of Congress are proposing to restrict the use of law enforcement's powers under the act to obtain medical, financial, and reading-habits records about citizens for whom no probable cause can be shown that they have engaged in or are about to engage in any terrorist act.

Many civil rights organizations are conducting intensive campaigns to publicize the Patriot Act and the many threats it potentially represents to the civil liberties of U.S. citizens and U.S. residents. Scores of teach-ins and public assemblies have been conducted in every state in the United States. Two major civil rights organizations filed lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the act.

During World War II, the U.S. Supreme Court accepted for review a case in which Fred Toyosabura Korematsu, a U.S. citizen of Japanese ancestry, was convicted for failing to comply with an extraordinary military order that compelled him to leave his home in San Leandro, California, and report to an assembly center for internment in a camp. In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), the Court upheld Korematsu's conviction and found the government's actions pursuant to the war powers clause to be constitutional because of the alleged threat of a Japanese invasion. That case bears resemblance to the climate of fear in the United States spawned by the events of September 11, 2001. U.S. residents of Arab ancestry were arrested, questioned, and interred, primarily because they were of Arab ancestry.

The Justice Department in 2003 began seeking even more expansive powers via a proposed new, stronger Patriot Act II. Among other provisions, it would permit law enforcement officials to sign search warrants themselves, bypassing the judicial system entirely, and would broaden the range of activities in which the death penalty could be applied. Members of the Bush administration, the Justice Department, and law enforcement officials contend no abuses of the civil rights of U.S. residents are being committed under the act. Yet other members of the Justice Department admit the law is being used to investigate ordinary garden-variety crime that has nothing to do with terrorism. FBI agents have infiltrated anti–Patriot Act protest groups, and already their members are being accused of having Communist ties.

There have been other times in U.S. history when the government suspended or violated the civil liberties of thousands of Americans because official actions were fueled by fear and overzealous patriotism. Examples include the previously noted Sedition Acts of the late eighteenth century; President Abraham Lincoln's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus (petition for release from illegal confinement) during the Civil War; the passage of the Espionage Act of 1918 that sent many pacifists and activists to prison; the forced internment of U.S. citizens of Japanese, German, and Italian ancestry during World War II; the Communist witch-hunts during the late 1940s and 1950s, illustrated by Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961) (criminal conviction for membership in the Communist Party); and violent law enforcement reactions in the late 1960s to anti–Vietnam War protesters.

James V. Cornehls

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Milligan, Ex parte; Olmstead v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Chang, Nancy. Silencing Political Dissent: How Post–September 11 Anti-Terrorism Measures Threaten Our Civil Liberties. New York: Seven Stories, 2002.

Lacayo, Richard. "The War Comes Back Home: Can Attorney General John Ashcroft Fight Terrorism on Our Shores Without Injuring Our Freedoms?" Time, May 4, 2003.

Lewis, Charles, and Adam Mayle. "Justice Department Drafts Sweeping Expansion of Anti-Terrorism Act." Center for Public Integrity (Washington, DC), February 7, 2003.

Michaels, C. William. No Greater Threat: America After September 11 and the Rise of a National Security State. E-book. New York: Algora, 2002.

Payne v. Tennessee (1991)

The petitioner in Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991), brutally stabbed to death a neighbor and her two-year-old daughter and seriously wounded her three-year-old son. Payne asked the Supreme Court to set aside his capital sentence on the ground that victim-impact evidence had been received at his penalty trial, in violation of Booth v. Maryland, 482 U.S.

496 (1987). In Booth, the Court had banned such evidence from capital proceedings because it created a serious risk that the ultimate punishment would be imposed, contrary to the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishments, for arbitrary reasons "wholly unrelated to the blameworthiness of a particular defendant."

By a six–three margin among the justices, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the petitioner's argument and Booth itself. In so doing, the justices took the very unusual step of overruling one of their decisions a scant four years after its pronouncement. Indeed, in South Carolina v. Gathers, 490 U.S. 805 (1989), the Court had even extended Booth to bar prosecutorial argument dwelling on the victim's characteristics. These facts led two of the dissenters in Payne who had formed part of the slim, five-justice majority in Booth to comment cynically in Payne that power, not reason, informed the approach of the new majority. In the words of Justice Thurgood Marshall, nothing had changed since the earlier precedent except "the personnel of this Court."

Ordinarily, victim-impact evidence consists of testimony from family and friends, presented in person or in writing, about the pain inflicted on them by the loss of their loved one; it may also include descriptions of the deceased's personal traits, such as kindness or spirituality, as well as a call (explicit or veiled) for the jury to sentence the killer to death. In Booth, which involved the robbery-murder of a cherished and admired elderly couple, the trial court admitted a powerful victim-impact statement based on interviews with several of the victims' close relatives. It was extremely emotionally charged and contained all of these kinds of evidence.

In Payne, by contrast, a lone witness, the grandmother of the sole survivor of the knife attack, testified briefly that her grandson cried for his mother and baby sister. Arguably, the justices could have avoided overturning Booth by distinguishing Payne upon its facts. Yet the prosecutor's closing remarks developed the victim-impact theme and also suggested that the jurors' verdict would answer the boy's eventual question about "what type of justice was done." Perhaps more important, the Court, which had lost two members of the Booth majority, signaled its intentions before the case was even heard by directing the litigants to brief the issue of whether Booth should be overruled.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's opinion for the Court, embracing the reasoning of Booth's dissenters, held that victim-impact evidence was properly designed to show the jury "the specific harm caused by the crime" and "each victim's uniqueness as an individual human being." It also relied on the supposed unfairness of allowing the killer to offer virtually unlimited evidence in mitigation, while denying the prosecution the right to personalize the killer's victim. A dissent written by Justice John Paul Stevens predictably echoed the Booth majority. Among other things, he stated that victim-impact evidence "sheds no light on the defendant's guilt or moral culpability" and serves only to encourage juries to opt for death on emotional rather than rational grounds.

As of 2004, thirty-three out of thirty-eight death penalty states, the federal government, and the military permit the use of victim-impact evidence and argument.

Vivian Berger

See also: Capital Punishment; Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996; Victim-Impact Statement.

FURTHER READING

Berger, Vivian. "Payne and Suffering—A Personal Reflection and a Victim-Centered Critique." Florida State University Law Review 20, 1 (Summer 1992): 21–65.

Editors of Cornell Law Review. Symposium. "Victims and the Death Penalty: Inside and Outside the Courtroom." Cornell Law Review 88, 2 (January 2003): 257–581.

Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York (1978)

When the U.S. Supreme Court delivered its landmark decision in Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York, 438 U.S. 104 (1978), it ended a half century of relative stability in jurisprudence involving the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, which mandates that government cannot take private property for public use without providing the owner "just compensation." During that period of stability, courts were guided by a rather amorphous standard for a compensable regulatory taking established in Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393 (1922). Pursuant to Pennsylvania Coal, courts were required to examine whether a regulation went "too far" and thus overburdened a property owner. Only then could a property owner receive compensation under the Fifth Amendment, as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Penn Central, however, the Court was given a prime opportunity to reexamine what constituted a compensable taking of private property. The Court was asked whether the application of New York's Landmark Preservation Law to the parcel of land occupied by the Beaux Arts Grand Central Terminal was a taking in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Grand Central Terminal was recognized as a "landmark" under the law, thus requiring the Landmark Preservation Commission to approve any exterior changes to the building, even if the changes were consistent with applicable zoning regulations. This law was especially burdensome to Penn Central Transportation Company, the owners of the terminal, because it had entered into an agreement with a third party to construct a multistory office building on top of the terminal. Penn Central sought approval of two plans to build the high-rise additions, both of which met zoning requirements, but the commission rejected both plans. To add insult to injury, it rejected the plans on the grounds that an addition would aesthetically denigrate the landmark. This reasoning, in effect, eliminated any opportunity that Penn Central would have to expand the terminal upward into its airspace. With no other options, Penn Central challenged the application of the law as a taking.

In reaching its decision, the Court abandoned the "too far" analysis and instead settled on what the Court itself described as an "ad hoc" balancing test consisting of three factors: (1) "the character of the governmental action"; (2) "the economic impact on the property owner resulting from a loss of all reasonable use or value in the entirety of the property"; and (3) "the regulation's interference with the property owner's investment-backed expectations." Applying the new test, the Court ruled that the application of the Landmarks Preservation Law to the terminal did not constitute a compensable taking. The Court reasoned that even though Penn Central was essentially prevented from ever constructing an office building over the terminal, the law did not "interfere with what must be regarded as Penn Central's primary expectation concerning the use of the parcel"—that is, a train terminal. Also inherent in the Court's decision was a sense that takings jurisprudence should not ignore the social benefits of these public acts. In writing the majority opinion, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. noted that the plaintiff bore a heavy burden when "interference arises from some public program adjusting the benefits and burdens of economic life to promote the common good." It was with this point that the dissent drew its sharpest disagreement with the majority, with Justice William H. Rehnquist stating in a note to his dissent that the Court had given local governments "an authority for invasion of private right under the pretext of public good, which had no warrant in the laws or practices of our ancestors."

In the years since the Penn Central ruling, there has been a marked increase in takings claims addressed by the Supreme Court. However, despite many challenges and the creation of several exceptions, the "ad hoc" balancing test still remains central to the Court's takings analysis. As long as the Penn Central test remains the law, courts must consider not only the economic impact of regulations on private property but also the societal impetus behind those regulations.

Andrew Braniff

See also: Eminent Domain; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Richard A. Takings, Private Property, and the Power of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.

Hubbard, F. Patrick. "Palazzolo, Lucas, and Penn Central: The Need for Pragmatism, Symbolism, and Ad Hoc Balancing." Nebraska Law Review 80 (2001): 465–479.

Kmiec, Douglas, and Stephen B. Presser. Individual Rights and the American Constitution, 213–55. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 1999.

Penn, William (1644–1718)

William Penn is best known as the founder of Pennsylvania. Throughout his life, he struggled to ensure what he saw as the basic freedoms to which all people were entitled: life, liberty, and property. Most famously, he argued that true liberty included freedom of religion, a belief that prompted the founding of Pennsylvania.

William Penn was born in London, England, on October 14, 1644, the son of Admiral William Penn. Raised in an orthodox, if not particularly devout, Anglican household, Penn underwent his first intense religious experience when he was only eleven years old. While studying at Christ Church, Oxford, he attended the sermons of a well-known Dissenter (as British Nonconformists were called), and was dismissed from Oxford for nonconformity in 1661. In an attempt to wean him from Dissent, his father sent him to Europe. Upon his return in 1664, Penn began studying law at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1666 he went to Ireland to manage the family's estates. After helping to put down an Irish mutiny, he briefly considered a military career, but in 1667, after hearing the famous Quaker preacher Thomas Low, he converted, an act that was to change the course of his life.

Penn quickly became involved in efforts to end persecution of Quakers, and in 1670 he was arrested for preaching at an illegal gathering. He pleaded not guilty and was acquitted, though the jury was immediately arrested for returning a false verdict. The jurors appealed: This became known as Bushell's Case, 1 State Trials 869 (1670, Great Britain), and established the precedent that juries were free to rule as they saw fit, without fear of reprisal or punishment.

William Penn's treaty with the Indians, when he founded the province of Pennsylvania in North America, 1681.
(Library of Congress)

Despite repeated arrests, Penn continued to publish tracts calling for the establishment of what he believed were natural and ancient rights. Because the Whigs supported religious toleration, Penn became active in Whig politics. In 1680, however, Penn turned his attention toward establishing a colony where Quakers and others could live without persecution. He petitioned Charles II for a grant of land in America on which to establish his colony; Charles granted the charter March 4, 1681.

Penn arrived in America in 1682 and immediately went to work to establish for Pennsylvania a government that would protect those basic freedoms he valued so highly. Unlike England, Pennsylvania was to be governed by a popularly elected bicameral legislature; residents were guaranteed trial by jury, with proceedings conducted in English and open to all; defendants could plead their own cases and challenge jurors; and defendants were entitled to bail except in capital cases, which were limited to treason and murder. Above all, the charter granted freedom of religion to all, though officeholders had to be Christians.

Penn's devotion to the cause of religious toleration led not only to the founding of Pennsylvania but also to his continued efforts in that regard in England. Unfortunately, his willingness to trust James II to secure toleration meant that Penn was on the wrong side of the 1688 Glorious Revolution; he was arrested several times on suspicion of treason and cleared only in 1693. Although Pennsylvania lost its charter in 1691, it was restored in 1694 and retained the basic liberties that Penn had envisioned. Penn died in England in 1718, having spent only four years in the colony he founded.

Carol Loar

See also: First Amendment; Quakers.

FURTHER READING

Dunn, Mary Maples. William Penn: Politics and Conscience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1967.

Wildes, Harry Emerson. William Penn. New York: Macmillan, 1974.

Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon (1922)

Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393 (1922), was the principal U.S. Supreme Court case to establish what was required for governmental regulation to be classified as a "taking." Under the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, the owner of property taken by the government for public use is entitled to "just compensation."

In the early part of the twentieth century, U.S. industry was growing rapidly, and business interests wielded significant power. Industry was driven by energy, and the primary energy source of the times was coal. Pennsylvania was underlain by vast coal deposits. Mining coal in Pennsylvania was problematic, however, because removal of it caused subsidence of the surface area. Significant parts of Pennsylvania were sinking. The state, justifiably concerned about the problem, passed the Kohler Act, which prevented the mining of coal when it would result in subsidence.

The coal companies conventionally sold the surface rights to land while retaining the mineral rights. In Mahon, the owners of surface rights sued Pennsylvania Coal to prevent the company from exercising its option to remove the coal from beneath their property because it would cause subsidence, requiring them to vacate their home.

In what was to become one of the most important landmark cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. wrote for the Court in a decision that favored the coal company. Although not denying the right of the government to regulate under the police power, Justice Holmes opined that "The general rule at least is, that while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking." He concluded that Pennsylvania had gone "too far" and unconstitutionally deprived the coal company of a property right protected by the Fifth Amendment. The opinion began a long history of cases resulting in what commonly is referred to as the takings doctrine.

The standard established by the Court, which did not define how far was "too far," left the determination of a taking to be made almost on a case-by-case basis. This standard, although amplified by subsequent Court decisions, still remains a guiding principle used by courts in determining if and when an unconstitutional taking of property has occurred that requires compensation to the owner.

Pennsylvania Coal was decided on the basis of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The Fourteenth Amendment, enacted by Congress and ratified after the Civil War, was intended to protect newly freed African Americans from laws enacted by individual states that violated their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States. Within fifteen years of its passage, however, the Supreme Court had eviscerated the amendment as it applied to African Americans.

Ironically, the Fourteenth Amendment was to become a bedrock for business interests, which successfully sought to have declared unconstitutional government regulations that adversely affected the uses and value of their property, by extending to the states the Fifth Amendment's prohibition of the taking of private property without due process and just compensation.

James V. Cornehls

See also: Eminent Domain; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Property Rights; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Brauneis, Robert. "The Foundation of Our 'Regulatory Takings' Jurisprudence: The Myth and Meaning of Justice Holmes' Opinion in Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon." *Yale Law Journal*106 (1996): 613.

DiMento, Joseph. "Mining the Archives of Pennsylvania Coal: Heaps of Constitutional Mischief." Journal of Legal History 11 (1990): 349.

Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977)

In Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a police officer who lawfully stops the driver of an automobile for a traffic violation may constitutionally order the driver to step out of the automobile. The decision is consistent with the Court's long-standing tradition of allowing the police greater authority than normal to control suspects physically and to conduct searches and seizures around and within automobiles. Such behavior does not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment's protections against unreasonable search and seizure, protections that also are applied against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.

Two Philadelphia police officers stopped Harry Mimms's car in order to cite him for driving a car with an expired license plate. One of the officers asked Mimms to step out of his car. This officer ordered drivers out of their cars "as a matter of course"; he had no particular suspicion that Mimms had committed any other crime, and he had no particular concern for his safety. When Mimms stepped out of the car, the officer saw a large bulge under his jacket, whereupon the officer frisked Mimms and found an unlicensed gun. Mimms was convicted of carrying a firearm without a license.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court held that ordering Mimms from the car absent any suspicion of criminal activity or physical threat to the police officer was an unconstitutional "seizure" of Mimms in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed.

The constitutionality of police behavior under the Fourth Amendment is determined, according to the Court, by balancing the government's interest in a particular police practice with an individual's right to be free of arbitrary government intrusion into his or her personal liberty. The Court accepted as "legitimate and weighty" Pennsylvania's assertion that because a driver's body is partially hidden by a car, an automobile driver may more easily make "unobserved movements" to assault an officer. Danger to the officer is reduced, therefore, by allowing officers to order drivers out of their cars. At the same time, the Court concluded that the "incremental intrusion" of forcing drivers to exit their cars after a lawful stop was a "mere inconvenience." The Court concluded that ordering a driver out of a car on a lawful traffic stop was a constitutional method of ensuring officer safety.

The constitutionality of the officer's "pat-down" search of Mimms was resolved through a straightforward application of the rules of Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), and its progeny. The pat-down search of Mimms, which occurred after he was constitutionally ordered out of his car, was permissible because the officer in the case reasonably suspected that Mimms possessed a weapon. The Mimms holding does not, therefore, grant police blanket authority to search people pulled over for traffic violations; there must be "reasonable suspicion" to conduct a search, and this principle was confirmed by the Court in Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113 (1998).

In Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408 (1997), the Court affirmed and extended the Mimms decision, holding that the police may order not only the driver but also the passengers of a car to exit the car incident to stopping the car for a traffic violation.

James Daniel Fisher

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Racial Profiling; Search; Seizure; Terry v. Ohio.

FURTHER READING

Heumann, Milton, and Lance Cassak. Good Cop, Bad Cop: Racial Profiling and Competing Views of Justice. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956)

Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 350 U.S. 497 (1956), was a civil liberties case that also had legal significance for constitutional questions involving federalism, including whether the states retained power to regulate matters that already were governed by federal law.

Steve Nelson was a Communist Party officer in western Pennsylvania who had been found guilty of violating Pennsylvania's antisedition law. That law criminalized speech, or membership in an organization, that advocated the overthrow of the federal government or of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and it therefore criminalized much the same behavior covered by the federal Smith Act. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court reversed Nelson's conviction because it found that the Smith Act preempted the state act when applied to speech advocating the overthrow of the federal government; it also found that Nelson was not accused of attempting to overthrow the government of Pennsylvania. The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed that decision in an opinion authored by Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Justice Warren focused on the issue of whether the Smith Act had "occupied the field," a shorthand way of saying that Congress intended its legislation to be first, foremost, and solely the law, with no power of the state to regulate the subject. This principle has come to be known as the "preemption doctrine."

In Nelson, Justice Warren found that other federal regulatory regimes had provided for a complementary state role, but Congress had not provided for a state role within the extensive body of federal law covering subversion. Although Congress had not explicitly preempted state legislation, Warren argued that this omission constituted an implicit preemption of state law. Warren also found that federal legislation treated "seditious conduct as a matter of vital national concern, [that] it is in no sense a local enforcement problem," and that state prosecutions could interfere with federal enforcement of federal antisedition laws.

In dissent, Justice Stanley F. Reed, joined by Justices Harold H. Burton and Sherman Minton, argued that because Congress had never explicitly preempted the field, the states retained their inherent police powers, including the power to punish crimes against the state. Reed further asserted that the federal laws regarding sedition were not so pervasive as to exclude a state role.

Pennsylvania v. Nelson was arguably one of the most pivotal cases to cause the states to abandon criminal actions against the Communist Party and its members. When the Court issued its decision in Nelson, forty-two states and the then-territories of Alaska and Hawaii had state laws prohibiting sedition, criminal anarchy, or syndicalism, all aimed primarily at preventing the overthrow of the federal government. The Court's decision in Nelson provided the Court's critics in the South, already enraged by Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), only two years prior that mandated school desegregation, with allies among northern anti-Communists. Nelson fit particularly well into the southern argument that the Court did not sufficiently respect states' rights, in this case, Pennsylvania's ability to protect its citizens against communism. Legislation was introduced in Congress to reverse Nelson, but that legislation foundered when it was made part of larger legislation that would have ended the larger doctrine of implied preemption and thus would have threatened many federal regulatory regimes in other areas.

Daniel A. Levin

See also: Communists; Preemption; Smith Act Cases.

FURTHER READING

Van Alstyne, William. First Amendment. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 1991.

Personhood

"Constitutional personhood" refers to the status of an entity who is a "person" or part of "the people" within the meaning of the U.S. Constitution. Only constitutional persons are entitled to the rights and privileges conferred by the Constitution. Who is or is not a constitutional person, therefore, is a fundamental question for determining the scope of civil liberties in the United States. It is principally the role of the U.S. Supreme Court, as the final interpreter of the Constitution, to determine formally who is or is not a constitutional person, and the Court has examined the issue of personhood explicitly in several decisions.

Who gets to share in the political power and liberties of a constitutional democracy such as the United States? The quick and easy answer is "everyone." In the U.S. constitutional system, having a share of political power appears at first blush to be predicated simply on "humanity"; being human qualifies one to be part of "We the People."

There are three major problems with this answer. First, the question of what entities are or are not "human" is complex and contentious. Are fetuses, for example, "human" such that they deserve a share of political power? The Court declined to grant such status in the famous decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). What about those species of animals, such as chimpanzees, who are human-like cognitively and emotionally (Wise 2002)?

Second, even in the most inclusive democracy, not every human being is entitled to a share of political power. In the American system, for example, noncitizens (aliens) who are not in U.S. territory are not entitled to constitutional protections and certainly may not vote, as the Court specified in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990). Even if fetuses are recognized as full-blown human beings, they still may not be entitled to constitutional protections. American citizens, on American soil, who act as "illegal" or "enemy combatants" appear to lose (or severely compromise) their status as a constitutional "person," as suggested in Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942). In other words, how does a political system decide which human beings are entitled to political privileges?

Third, political systems may not limit the distribution of political power to human beings alone. American constitutional doctrine, for example, holds that corporations are "people" entitled to (limited) constitutional protections, as the Court held in First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978). In short, what appears at first an obvious and natural feature of the U.S. constitutional system, that "humans" are constitutional "persons" entitled to constitutional rights and privileges, is in fact a complex political construction.

Despite the potential complexity of constitutional personhood issues and its status as a prerequisite for receiving any civil liberties protection, the Supreme Court has not examined the issue all that often. The litigants in a civil liberties case and the justices of the Supreme Court tend to assume the personhood of the parties at issue; the Court, for example, does not reaffirm the personhood of white male adult American citizens in every civil liberties case. The Court explicitly addresses personhood issues when there is some interpretive play regarding an entity's personhood, when assumptions of American culture regarding questions of humanity and politics are challenged by traits associated with a class of entities, such that a minimally plausible argument over an entity's personhood status may be made.

For example, the precise nature of personhood for aliens is open for reevaluation because alien personhood is based on a concept, presence on American soil, that is variable and subject to multiple interpretations. What does it mean to say that someone is present on American soil? The Court has not definitively stated whether the physical presence of a human being on American soil alone is sufficient to make one a constitutional person, or whether more (such as being on U.S. soil voluntarily, being legally present, and/or establishing some connection to a community) is required. The fact that corporations are not human beings spurs unsuccessful attempts, from time to time, to assert that granting corporations personhood was a mistake.

When the Court explicitly examines a personhood issue, the justices typically use a form of constitutional interpretation generally known as "originalism." In other words, the Court determines whether an entity is a constitutional person by asking whether the authors of the Constitution or its amendments originally intended a particular entity to be a "person," or whether the original understanding of the populace at the time the Constitution was ratified in 1788 would have been that the entity at issue was a constitutional person. For example, in the first major personhood case, Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857), the Supreme Court held that people of African descent, slave or free, were never intended to be constitutional people by the authors of the Constitution; in Roe v. Wade, the Court held that the unborn, though human, were never intended or understood to be constitutional people and therefore did not have any sort of constitutional right against being aborted.

As a practical matter, originalism is an attractive method of interpretation for answering personhood questions. In the Constitution, the terms "person," "persons," and "people" have varying meanings depending on the location of the words and the context in which they are used. In addition, there is no single set of unchanging traits that entities possess that always make them constitutional people. For example, American citizens may go abroad and still have constitutional protections, as the Court held in Reid v. Covert, 351 U.S. 487 (1956), whereas aliens who are "people" while in the United States lose that privilege when they leave American soil. Some humans are not constitutional "people" (such as aliens not on American soil), whereas some nonhumans are (corporations, for example). These difficulties, therefore, make originalism attractive because the Supreme Court can avoid attempting to craft a single definition of personhood and instead simply ask whom the overall class of American constitutional "persons" was intended or understood to include.

Originalism is also attractive because it allows the Court to avoid openly engaging tricky scientific, philosophical, theological, and political issues raised by some personhood questions. For example, rather than tackling questions about the philosophical and moral status of the fetus, the Court in Roe v. Wade simply noted that fetuses were not originally intended or understood to be people; it was not the Court's responsibility or role to examine such issues.

In practice, issues of politics, religion, and the like probably do influence the Court's decision making on personhood issues, but the Court is somewhat better able to preserve its reputation as a neutral interpreter of the law by not openly engaging issues for which the justices have no greater expertise than anyone else has. A major implication of interpreting the Constitution in this way, for better or for worse, is that the overall class of constitutional persons is essentially closed; only those entities originally intended or understood to be persons or people have personhood.

In the future, the Court might encounter new personhood issues as scientific and technological developments, for example, push back the boundaries of life and death, raising new issues of who is sufficiently "born" to be a person and who is sufficiently "dead" such that they are no longer a person. Some issues are currently resolved—the "unborn" are not people per Roe v. Wade, and the Court, for example, assumes that people in a permanent vegetative state are still people per Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)—but the Court may be tempted to revisit them. Scientific advances in genetics might create new species of semihumans or mixed-species creatures; two biotechnology activists have applied to patent a genetic human-mouse combination. Animal rights activists argue that the more scientists learn about animals, the more "human" they seem. Although the Supreme Court as final interpreter of the Constitution is primarily responsible for resolving issues of constitutional personhood, it may be the least qualified U.S. political institution to address these issues as they implicate ever more difficult questions of science, philosophy, religion, and politics.

James Daniel Fisher

See also: Cloning of Human Beings; Rights of Aliens; Roe v. Wade; Transgender Legal Issues in the United States.

FURTHER READING

Mayer, Carl J. "Personalizing the Impersonal: Corporations and the Bill of Rights." Hastings Law Journal 41 (1990): 577–667.

Rivard, Michael. "Toward a General Theory of Constitutional Personhood: A Theory of Constitutional Personhood for Transgenic Humanoid Species." UCLA Law Review 39 (1992): 1425–1509.

Slater, Dashka. "huMouseTM." Legal Affairs 1, 4 (November/December 2002): 20–8.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. Vol. 1. 3d ed. New York: Foundation, 2000.

Wise, Stephen. Drawing the Line: Science and the Case for Animal Rights. Boulder, CO: Perseus, 2002.

Petition of Right

The Petition of Right, the product of the British Parliament's efforts to control the power of Charles I, was part of a larger controversy about the rights of the people and the limits of the king's prerogative. Although it is a brief document, it nevertheless stands as a key step in the development of civil rights in England. Its provisions—banning arbitrary and discretionary imprisonment, nonparliamentary taxes, martial law and the quartering of troops, in addition to its emphasis on due process—also appear in the Constitution of the United States.

Charles I came to the throne in 1625, and from the outset his relations with Parliament were strained. Desperate for money and unsuccessful in persuading Parliament to grant him the necessary taxes, Charles resorted to nonparliamentary means, requiring his subjects to "lend" him the money he required. This forced loan provoked immediate resistance, and five gentlemen—the Five Knights, as they came to be known—refused to pay what they saw as an illegal tax. Charles had them arrested and imprisoned in November 1627; when they applied for writs of habeas corpus (petitions asking to be released from unlawful imprisonment), Charles's privy council ordered that the writs be returned declaring that the knights were held "by his majesty's special commandment." The Court of King's Bench ruled that Charles was not then required to state what had prompted the arrests in the first place, a ruling that allowed him to continue to detain the knights. The court's decision kept the knights in prison but was not intended to resolve the deeper question of whether (or when) the crown had to file charges. Charles's attorney general, acting on Charles's orders, then tried to alter the legal record to show that the judges' ruling established a precedent that the king had the right of discretionary imprisonment.

Parliament met in March 1628 and immediately took up the matter. The House of Commons, led by the famous lawyers John Selden and Sir Edward Coke, passed a series of resolutions in early April declaring that the king had abused his powers and violated the law. These resolutions became the basis for the petition that they would later write. In response to the resolutions, Charles promised that he would allow Parliament to pass legislation that would clarify the law and prevent future problems. Both houses of Parliament then debated the issue; the Commons were adamant that a new, binding bill be passed, whereas the Lords were divided over whether such a bill would infringe on the king's prerogative. By May 1, however, the situation had changed. Despite his earlier promise to accept a statute, Charles now insisted the Parliament accept his word that he would never again violate his subjects' civil rights. Given his previous actions and his attempt to alter the legal record, Parliament remained unconvinced. Furthermore, Charles made it plain that he now would not accept any bill that went beyond confirming Magna Carta and several other medieval statutes.

Sir Edward Coke then proposed that the Commons draft a petition; this was a practice that had not been used since the fifteenth century, but if both houses of Parliament passed it and if Charles accepted it, the petition would gain the legal status of a statute. After much debate in both houses and several conferences between them, both chambers passed the measure in late May, though the House of Lords insisted that it be delivered to Charles with a verbal promise that the Lords did not intend to limit his prerogative. Charles's initial response on June 2 was equivocal: Even as he stated his wish that his subjects' rights be respected, he also jealously guarded his prerogative. Thus it appeared that there was no resolution to the issue; Charles's invocation of his prerogative is what he had argued allowed him to keep the Five Knights in prison in the first place.

The Petition of Right, the product of Parliament's efforts to control the power of King Charles I of Great Britain, was part of a larger controversy about the rights of the people and the limits of the king's prerogative.
(Library of Congress)

The House of Commons was furious but held a trump card: Charles still needed money. Accordingly, he capitulated and on June 7, 1628, issued the standard response to a petition: "Let right be done as is requested." With this reply, the Petition of Right was duly recorded and became, in effect, part of the law of the land. With Charles's permission, the Petition of Right had been included in the official records of Parliament, and a copy of it, including Charles's second response, was printed. As soon as he adjourned Parliament, however, Charles ordered the printing rescinded and replaced it with a version in which he once again asserted his prerogative.

Charles also wasted no time in collecting tonnage and poundage, taxes that he claimed were his by right, though traditionally Parliament granted them to monarchs. In clear violation of the Petition of Right, Charles began collecting these taxes, and his officers began confiscating the goods of those who refused to pay a nonparliamentary tax. When Parliament reassembled in spring 1629, it once again took up the issue. When the Speaker of the House of Commons tried to adjourn the Commons without any debate, several members held him in his chair while another read three resolutions, two of which—a condemnation of tonnage and poundage (which still had not been granted to Charles) and a statement announcing that anyone who voluntarily paid these taxes would be "a betrayer of the liberties of England and an enemy to the same"—were direct responses to the king's flouting of the petition. Parliament was then dissolved, and Charles resolved to rule without it. He did not summon another Parliament until 1640; in the meantime, he continued to violate the Petition of Right. If relations between the king and Parliament were poor in 1628, by 1640 they had deteriorated completely; civil war between the two broke out in 1641.

Though Charles routinely and willingly violated the terms of the Petition of Right, the document nevertheless stands as a key guarantor of civil liberties. By law, the king could not imprison people or seize their property without due cause, could not levy taxes without consent of the legislature, could not quarter the military on civilians, and could not impose martial law on civilians. Charles's flouting of these laws turned Parliament against him in 1641; had he abided by the terms and spirit of the Petition of Right, it is entirely possible that civil war could have been avoided.

Carol Loar

See also: Bill of Rights; Blackstone, William; English Bill of Rights.

FURTHER READING

Guy, J. A. "The Origins of the Petition of Right Reconsidered." Historical Journal 25, 2 (1982): 289–312.

Lockyer, Roger. The Early Stuarts: A Political History of England, 1603–1642. 2d ed. London and New York: Longman, 1999.

Reeve, L. J. "The Legal Status of the Petition of Right." Historical Journal 29, 2 (1986): 257–77.

Physician-Assisted Suicide

As technology has advanced, it has posed new problems that have forced reexamination of issues involving both the beginning of life and its end. Matters involving cloning and U.S. Supreme Court decisions such as Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), dealing with abortion, have focused on the beginning of life. The issue of euthanasia, or the purposeful termination of life to relieve physical suffering, focuses on life's end. Proponents of euthanasia see the procedure as a way not only to alleviate suffering but also to empower individuals to have control over their own death. By contrast, opponents see euthanasia as eroding the traditional concern of doctors with providing life-sustaining care. They further fear that legalizing euthanasia might create a slippery slope that pressures vulnerable people (for example, elderly persons who fear burdening their families or want to pass on inheritances) or vulnerable populations (racial minorities or the disabled) to consent to such assistance.

BACKGROUND

Reflecting common law precedents, state laws in America have generally reflected intolerance for all forms of physician-assisted suicide, but such laws have been questioned in recent years. In 1991, the citizens of Washington state petitioned for a referendum on Initiative 119, which proposed that a mentally competent, terminally ill, adult patient could request "aid-in-dying" and that a willing physician could then act to end the patient's life as humanely as possible. The voters defeated this initiative by 56 to 46 percent. California voters subsequently rejected a similar proposition the following year, whereas in 1994 Oregon voters approved Measure 16 by a narrow margin. This measure allowed for physician-assisted suicide, on condition that physicians only could provide drugs for this purpose, but patients must be able to administer the dose. The measure further required that the patient must have been diagnosed with a terminal illness and reached the decision to terminate life rationally and voluntarily. Courts have somewhat refined the application of this law, which still remains in effect, notwithstanding efforts by federal officials to curtail it. In May 2004, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals said the U.S. attorney general could not prosecute doctors operating under the Oregon law.

Precedents related to euthanasia have been laid in several cases involving termination of care. The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled in In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), that parents had the right to turn off life support for a daughter who remained in a persistent coma after a traffic accident. In Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990), the U.S. Supreme Court also acknowledged that an individual had the constitutional right to refuse medical treatment, but it held in this case that Nancy Beth Cruzan's guardians did not have the right under Missouri law to terminate life support for a comatose daughter absent clear evidence that their daughter would have so desired it—a decision that stimulated interest in "living wills" directing physicians as to what kind of care to give in such situations.

Another precedent of sorts was established with the conviction in Michigan courts of Dr. Jack Kevorkian, the self-styled "Dr. Death" who had engaged in over 130 assisted suicides. Unlike others who would assert the right to assist patients, Dr. Kevorkian did not have long-standing doctor-patient relationships with those whom he helped to commit suicide. He was tried and sentenced after his highly publicized assisted suicide of Thomas Youk, a man with end-stage Lou Gehrig's disease (ALS, or amyotrophic lateral sclerosis), which was broadcast on the television show 60 Minutes.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

The U.S. Supreme Court has heard two companion cases on the issue of physician-assisted suicide—Wash- ington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997), and Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997). The first case addressed a Washington state law that prohibited aiding a suicide. It was successfully challenged in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on the basis that it violated a liberty interest guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment in allowing a mentally competent, terminally ill adult to opt for physician-assisted suicide as a matter of choice. Although the Supreme Court lauded the fact that Americans were debating the morality, legality, and practicality of physician-assisted suicide, it overturned the circuit court decision and upheld the state law, declining to interpret the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment so as to require recognition of physician-assisted suicide.

The outcome was similar in Vacco v. Quill. The Court again upheld the constitutionality of a pertinent law, in this case a New York law stating that a person who intentionally caused or aided another person to attempt or commit suicide was guilty of a felony. Overturning a decision by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, the justices concluded that the law did not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by distinguishing between physician-assisted suicide and refusal of life-saving medical treatment. Although there were numerous opinions in the case, the Court was unanimous in its holding, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist authoring the lead opinion. In a concurring opinion, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor observed that there was no legal barrier to palliative care (directed solely to relieving suffering), even when it might hasten death. Similarly, the Supreme Court decisions appear to indicate that although the Constitution does not mandate such laws, the justices are willing to uphold state laws permitting euthanasia.

Sam W. McKinstry and Demetra M. Pappas

See also: Cloning Human Beings; Right to Die; Roe v. Wade; Washington v. Glucksberg.

FURTHER READING

Buhaniak, Susan M., and Arthur V. Svenson. Physician-Assisted Suicide. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Hillyard, Daniel, and John Dombrink. Dying Right: The Death with Dignity Movement. New York: Routledge, 2001.

McStay, Rob. "Terminal Sedation: Palliative Care for Intractable Pain, Post Glucksberg and Quill." American Journal of Law and Medicine 29, 45 (2003).

Trafford, Abigail. "National Opinion—At Last: An Alternative to Painful Death." Washington Post, October 10, 2000, Z08.

Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925)

In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated an Oregon statute requiring children to attend public schools, because the law violated the due process liberty rights of parents to send their children to a school of their choice.

In November 1922, voters in Oregon approved the Compulsory Education Act, a citizen initiative that required every child age eight to sixteen to attend "a public school for the period of time a school shall be held during the current year." The law made it a misdemeanor for parents to send their children to a secular or religious private school. The initiative passed largely through the public efforts of the Ku Klux Klan and the Oregon Scottish Rite Masons. These organizations argued that separating students into different schools based on religious belief would create dissension in the state. Campaign rhetoric also was tinged with fears about Bolshevism and the large number of immigrants as well as some anti-Catholicism.

The Society of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, an operator of Catholic schools, and the Hill Military Academy believed the new law to be unconstitutional. Together they sued Governor Walter Pierce and state and county district attorneys seeking to block implementation of the law. Using an economic argument, the three-judge district court that heard the case ruled in favor of the plaintiff private school operators, stating, "The law had the effect of depriving them of their property without due process of law." Oregon appealed the case to the U.S. Supreme Court. At the time, seventeen other states were in the process of adopting laws modeled on Oregon's.

In a unanimous decision, the Supreme Court ruled against the state of Oregon, writing that a state government cannot require all children to attend public schools. In his opinion for the Court, Justice James C. McReynolds avoided a discussion of freedom of religion and the First Amendment, instead grounding the ruling in the law of property rights. He wrote,

> The law conflicts with the right of parents to choose schools where their children will receive appropriate mental and religious training, the right of the child to influence the parents' choice of a school, the right of schools and teachers therein to engage in a useful business or profession, and is accordingly repugnant to the Constitution and void. And, further, that unless enforcement of the measure is enjoined the corporation's business and property will suffer irreparable injury.

The Court further recognized that a state had the power to require students to attend some school and to provide regulation to assure that the schools were doing a good job at education.

Pierce influenced the development of civil liberties jurisprudence in the twentieth century. The ruling was especially important in developing the right to privacy identified in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), and applied to abortion in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). Supporters of school choice at the end of the twentieth century adopted a line from the decision, "The child is not the mere creature of the State," to support their movement for greater educational freedom.

John David Rausch Jr.

See also: Due Process of Law; Education; Family Rights; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Holsinger, M. Paul. "The Oregon School Bill Controversy, 1922–1925." Pacific Historical Review 37, 3 (August 1968): 327–41.

Kommers, Donald P., and Michael J. Wahoske, eds. Freedom and Education: Pierce v. Society of Sisters Reconsidered. Notre Dame, IN: Center for Civil Rights, University of Notre Dame Law School, 1978.

Tyack, David B. "The Perils of Pluralism: The Background of the Pierce Case." American Historical Review 74, 1 (October 1968): 74–98.

Plain-Sight Doctrine

The plain-sight, or plain-view, doctrine is a line of reasoning that carves out an exception to the warrant requirement for searches and seizures under the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution. The Fourth Amendment protects the rights of individuals "in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures" by generally mandating that authorities get a warrant before conducting a search. To obtain a warrant, authorities must have sufficient grounds, in the form of probable cause. The warrant process is designed to balance the individual's right of privacy with the valid governmental interest in maintaining social order and the rule of law through the investigation and prosecution of criminal acts.

Out of this context, the Supreme Court has repeatedly asserted a "plain-view" exception to the First Amendment warrant requirements. Under this exception, if police officers see a piece of incriminating evidence in plain sight during the routine course of police work, they may seize it without a warrant. This doctrine was formed because it would be logistically impossible for officers to leave the evidence in question while they obtained a warrant, since doing so could threaten the officers, the investigation at hand, and the evidence seen in plain view. The plain-view doctrine also allows police conducting a warrant search to seize contraband or other evidence of criminal activity lying in the open even though those items have not been specifically listed in the warrant.

Two prohibition-era cases drew on this doctrine. In Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924), the Court ruled that a bottle of "moonshine whiskey" that Samuel Hester had disposed of during a chase in "an open field" was not subject to the same Fourth Amendment warrant procedures as was the adjacent farmhouse. United States v. Lee, 274 U.S. 559 (1927), arose out of the sighting of seventy-one cases of grain alcohol on a boat near Boston. The Court reasoned that because the liquor was in plain view and was discovered before Coast Guard officials even had boarded the motorboat, the admission of the alcohol was constitutionally permissible and the Coast Guard did not need a warrant to seize the liquor. Similarly, the Court allowed the seizure of drugs in Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23 (1963). Justice Tom C. Clark wrote, "[T]he discovery of the brick of marijuana did not constitute a search, since the officer merely saw what was placed before him in full view."

More recent cases have further clarified the plain-sight doctrine. Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971), established that the plain-sight doctrine "applies to the situation in which a police officer has a prior justification for an intrusion in the course of which he comes inadvertently across a piece of evidence incriminating the accused . . . and permits the warrantless seizure." This extended the status of admissibility to items found "inadvertently" whether or not they were in plain view. In short, an item in plain view and found inadvertently was admissible, as was an item that was not in plain view but was found inadvertently during the normal course of a warranted search. Further, if the police have a predetermined reason to believe they will find something, they cannot rely on its being in plain view as justification for a search; rather, they should obtain a warrant. To forgo the warrant requirement in those instances would "fly in the face of the basic rule that no amount of probable cause can justify a warrantless seizure." Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983), upheld Brown's conviction for drug possession because the officer saw this evidence by looking into his pulled-over vehicle.

The Coolidge and Brown cases established that for the plain-view doctrine to apply, officers must meet three requirements. First, the officers needed a legally valid reason to be in position to see the piece of evidence. This could be due to a warrant for other evidence or because of other valid exceptions to the warrant requirement, such as being in "hot pursuit" (police trying to apprehend a fleeing suspect). Second, the discovery must be inadvertent. Third, it must be immediately evident that the item in plain sight is actually evidence.

The last of these standards was further articulated in Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987), in which an officer investigating a shooting (a valid reason to be in Hicks's apartment) noticed stereo equipment that he suspected was stolen and turned this equipment over to read serial numbers. The Court overturned the defendant's conviction on the basis that the policeman had only a "reasonable suspicion," not probable cause. Justice Antonin Scalia reasoned that since the policeman had turned over the equipment absent probable cause, the search went beyond what was allowed under the plain-sight doctrine. In short, the police did not properly know that the stereo equipment was actually evidence since they did not have probable cause. Justice Scalia wrote, "[T]here is nothing new in the realization that the Constitution sometimes insulates the criminality of a few in order to protect the privacy of us all." Thus, Arizona v. Hicks elucidated the power of the Fourth Amendment to protect privacy, although the core plain-view principle remains intact, along with its original goal of promoting efficient and safe police work.

James F. Van Orden

See also: Arizona v. Evans; Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Search; Seizure.

FURTHER READING

Romero, Elsie. "Fourth Amendment: Requiring Probable Cause for Searches and Seizures Under the Plain View Doctrine." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 78 (Winter 1998): 763–91.

Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992)

In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), the U.S. Supreme Court limited but did not negate the constitutional right to abortion that it had articulated nearly two decades earlier in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

During the 1960s, some states in the United States began liberalizing their laws banning or restricting abortions. The U.S. Supreme Court's enunciation of the constitutional right to reproductive freedom in Roe v. Wade, however, led abortion rights opponents to mobilize, as the right applied across the nation. The Court nonetheless initially maintained its insistence on a right defined rather broadly and struck down most state-imposed limitations other than requirements that abortions be performed in state-approved facilities, as the Court held in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983), and that minors obtain parental or judicial consent, the holding in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986). As protest mounted, some politicians, including President Ronald Reagan, made repeal of Roe v. Wade a centerpiece of their platforms. Coincidentally, some of the justices who supported abortion rights retired. The result was the issuance of Court decisions more restrictive of the right; for example, the Court in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), upheld a ban on the use of public money to fund abortions.

The Casey case, which reached the Court twenty years after Roe, therefore arrived at a time when the justices seemed to be withdrawing from their articulation of reproductive rights. In it, abortion providers challenged a 1982 Pennsylvania statute that required a woman to wait at least twenty-four hours after having given her consent for an abortion, to obtain either parental or judicial consent if she was a minor, and to inform her husband if she was married.

The Court was too divided to fashion a majority opinion. Some of the justices who favored restricting abortion rights were nonetheless concerned about the impact on public opinion if the Court appeared to give in to popular pressure by reversing itself and striking down Roe. The plurality opinion of the Court, written by Justices Sandra Day O'Connor, Anthony Kennedy, and David Souter, affirmed Roe's holding that the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of liberty protects the right of women "to have an abortion before [fetal] viability and to obtain it without undue interference from the State." The three justices recognized both that there was societal disagreement "about the profound moral and spiritual implications of terminating a pregnancy" and that the right to abortion had become part of the national fabric. "Liberty finds no refuge in a jurisprudence of doubt," the opinion said. The citizenry had come to count on the availability of abortion during "two decades of economic and social developments," and "the ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives."

Noting that the Court's legitimacy was "grounded truly in principle, not . . . compromises with social and political pressures," the plurality stated that "to overrule [an earlier decision] under fire in the absence of the most compelling reason to reexamine a watershed decision" would subvert that credibility. The three justices reiterated their belief that "choices central to personal dignity and autonomy are central to the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment," and contended that it was "imperative" for the Court "to adhere to the essence of Roe's original decision."

Two other justices agreed with enough of the plurality opinion to make it a five–four majority. Although the Court therefore affirmed what it described as the core of Roe, it also criticized that decision for giving too little consideration to the state's "substantial interest in potential life." It rejected Roe's trimester standard and held that states could take unspecified "steps" to ensure that a decision to terminate pregnancy, even in the earliest stages, "is thoughtful and informed." Regulations of abortion rights, the Court declared, were to be overturned only if they constituted an "undue burden" on the right to abort a nonviable fetus.

Applying that criterion to the Pennsylvania statute, the Court upheld the twenty-four-hour and parental consent provisions but struck down the spousal notification requirement. It did so in a lengthy section describing the extent of domestic violence in the nation and the undue burden caused by placing a battered woman in the position of choosing between an unwanted pregnancy or additional physical abuse by her husband.

Casey thus confirmed the constitutional right to abortion but gave the states greater leeway to regulate it than they had under Roe. The new standard was fact-based and would require a showing that a regulation was unduly burdensome if it was to be invalidated. The burden of proof would fall on women to prove not only that a burden existed but also that it was "undue" or excessive. The four dissenters declared that they would have upheld the Pennsylvania statute in its entirety and that Roe should be overruled. Whether that will be the result of future changes in Court personnel remains to be seen.

Philippa Strum

See also: Griswold v. Connecticut; Right to Privacy; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Atwell, Mary Wekek. Equal Protection of the Law: Gender and Justice in the United States, ch. 7. New York: P. Lang, 2002.

Craig, Barbara Hinkson, and David M. O'Brien. Abortion and American Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1993.

Plea Bargaining

One of the most common yet controversial aspects of the U.S. criminal justice system is the process of plea bargaining. Plea bargaining is the process through which defendants plead guilty to a criminal charge with the expectation that they will receive some form of leniency from the state. The procedure implicates multiple constitutional issues, including a defendant's rights to due process of law, to a fair trial, to adequate assistance of counsel, and against self-incrimination.

The media and popular culture are largely responsible for dramatizing and overemphasizing the role of the trial in the judicial system. In reality, very few criminal cases are filtered through the adversary process with full-blown trials. The criminal justice system is designed to screen out weak cases early in the process. In fact, almost 90 percent of criminal cases are resolved by plea bargaining.

Although it has received much attention in recent years, plea bargaining dates back more than a century. During the mid-nineteenth century, plea-bargained cases were commonplace, and by the 1920s the practice was an established feature of the judicial system. In federal courts, the massive number of liquor prosecutions stemming from prohibition led to the formal practice of plea bargaining during the 1920s.

THE BARGAINING PROCESS

A plea agreement is worked out between lawyers. Defense attorneys typically initiate plea negotiations, which suggests that most defendants who reach this stage are either guilty of criminal violations or have a good chance of being found guilty at trial. The personal and professional familiarity among defense lawyers, prosecutors, and judges, known as the courtroom "work group," encourages plea negotiations. Past cases often help establish future parameters of pleas for a particular offense.

Plea agreements must be approved by the judge. Judges rarely reject a plea agreement, however, believing that the bargain adequately protects the community and defendant. Pleas must be voluntary, and defendants must understand they are waiving their right to a trial. The judge will question the defendant to make sure the plea was devoid of threats, there was no misrepresentation, and no bribes were offered.

There are several types of plea bargains. One type involves a reduction of the seriousness of the charges. For example, a charge may be reduced from armed robbery to robbery. Another involves the deletion of some charges, or counts. This is known as "count bargaining." Finally, a plea agreement many involve a guilty plea given in exchange for the prosecutor recommending a lenient sentence; the defendant usually receives less than the maximum. All of these types of bargains are designed to reduce the sentence in some way in exchange for the guilty plea.

The incentives for defendants to bargain are rather obvious. If the evidence against them is strong, they may want to plead guilty in order to receive a less severe punishment. A prosecutor also may have several reasons to bargain with a defendant. If there is a heavy caseload and few resources, plea bargaining offers an efficient way to manage the caseload. Another reason the state may bargain is to get the conviction. There are too many uncertainties during a trial, and a guilty plea avoids a potential loss in the trial court. Cases in which the evidence is weak and/or the crime is not serious may be good candidates for a plea bargain.

The U.S. Supreme Court has sanctioned the practice of plea bargaining. In Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970), the Court recognized the positive aspects of plea bargaining by pointing out that the practice benefits both sides in the adversary system. In Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971), the Court acknowledged that plea bargaining had become "an essential component of the administration of justice" and emphasized that bargaining was an efficient way for the state to dispose of criminal cases. The Court stated that as long as it was properly administered, plea bargaining was to be encouraged.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

CRITICISMS OF PLEA BARGAINING

Plea bargaining has been criticized from both the left and right sides of the political spectrum. Those concerned about due process and the rights of criminal defendants question whether the defendant is making a voluntary choice. The choice is usually between a lesser known punishment and a greater unknown punishment. Rather than risk trial, defendants may plead guilty even if they are innocent. Statistics show that those who opt for a full trial and are convicted usually are sentenced to more severe punishments. This is known as the "jury trial penalty." The Supreme Court sanctioned this practice in Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978).

Some critics point out that plea bargaining affects poor defendants in particular. Defendants in jail because they could not afford bail have the greatest incentive to plead. The desire to get out of jail may pressure such defendants to plead guilty to a charge. Other opponents of plea bargaining are concerned about the danger of overcharging. Prosecutors may bring a severe charge or may add multiple charges in order to give the state leverage in negotiating a plea. "Vertical overcharging" is charging a single offense at a higher level than the facts of the case support. "Horizontal overcharging" is charging the defendant with every conceivable crime related to the incident. Finally, critics of plea bargaining argue that it can become routine. When defendants do insist on trial, they may be viewed as a nuisance. Efficiency, rather than justice, becomes the goal of the criminal court system.

Those who favor a tough approach to crime often complain that plea bargaining allows guilty defendants to get off with lighter sentences and as a result they do not receive the punishment they deserve. Others concerned about victims' rights argue that plea bargaining does not encourage participation by the victim and protection of victims' interests.

PROPOSALS TO REFORM OR ABOLISH PLEA BARGAINING

A number of states and local jurisdictions have implemented reforms of plea bargaining. For example, in Wayne County, Michigan, plea bargains in felonies are not accepted if the defendant used a gun during the felony. Some jurisdictions limit the types of charges that can be plea bargained. Other jurisdictions have imposed a ban on plea bargaining after felony indictment or have enacted a complete ban on all forms of plea bargaining. Alaska banned plea bargaining altogether from 1975 to 1980, although studies suggest that some form of implicit bargaining still occurred.

The persistence and prevalence of plea bargaining derive from the fact that it offers benefits to all members of the courtroom work group—prosecutors, defense lawyers, and judges—as well as defendants. These benefits provide strong incentives to negotiate a plea, and they ensure that plea bargaining will continue to be an important feature of the criminal justice system.

John Fliter

See also: Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Guidorizzi, Douglas D. "Should We Really Ban Plea Bargaining? The Core Concerns of Plea Bargaining Critics." Emory Law Journal 47 (1998): 753.

Police Brutality

Police brutality is the excessive use of force by police or law enforcement officials against civilians or individuals suspected of committing a crime. This brutality may occur outside on the street, inside police headquarters, or in jail or prison. Police brutality invokes several possible violations of individual rights under the Constitution.

In the vast majority of interactions between police and civilians or between police and criminal suspects, little or no use of force or incident is involved. Yet images of police using excessive force often appear in news reports. These images include the police assaulting demonstrators in Chicago during the 1968 Democratic National Convention; the 1991 videotaped beating of Rodney King by police officers in Los Angeles; the storming of the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas, by federal Alcohol, Firearms, and Tobacco agents in 1993; and the New York City police shooting of Amadou Diallo in 1999. These high-profile cases and other acts of abuse by police officers raise critical issues about whether any individual rights have been violated and what can be done to limit the excessive use of force by the police.

Victims of alleged police brutality who wish to take legal action against police have two ways to proceed. The first is to file tort actions against police in state court; the other approach is to raise claims of federal constitutional deprivations. In terms of tort liability, individuals may sue police officers under state law alleging a variety of torts. For example, intentional torts such as assault, battery, false arrest, or false imprisonment may be filed against police who use excessive physical force or illegally detain individuals. In addition, police may be sued under state law for a variety of negligence actions if it can be shown that the police breached a specific duty to an individual that resulted in some injury or damages. These types of torts are more often used in cases when the police fail to exercise their power properly, such as in the negligent operation of a vehicle during a high-speed chase, than in cases that address specific instances of excessive force or brutality.

Moreover, because many individuals who are the victims of police brutality often are convicted of crimes, they do not make the most sympathetic plaintiffs, and therefore state tort actions usually are not adequate remedies to protect against excessive force.

A far more common approach for addressing police brutality problems since the 1970s has been to file what is called a "section 1983" claim. This type of claim is based on the Civil Rights Act of 1871 as amended—specifically, section 1983 (U.S. Code, Vol. 42, sec. 1983). To prevail under a section 1983 claim, the plaintiff must show three things: (1) The person alleging the claim is a person meant to be protected under the statute; (2) the defendant, usually law enforcement, was acting under the "color of the law"; and (3) the alleged violation was of some constitutional right and the resulting damage reached a constitutional level. To prevail in a section 1983 case, victims must show that the police acted with deliberate indifference to their rights. In addition, the U.S. Supreme Court in Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992), stated that any use of force imposed in a malicious and sadistic fashion was actionable as being excessive.

Plaintiffs can bring a section 1983 claim for any violation of constitutional rights, such as those in the Fourteenth Amendment, against a state, and plaintiffs can bring what is often called a Bivens action—so named after Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)—against the federal government. Similarly, in Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), the Supreme Court held that section 1983 actions could also be brought against local governments. Overall, claims arising under section 1983 are the way individuals can challenge police brutality cases in court to claim excessive use of force or treatment violated their constitutional rights.

The U.S. Supreme Court has established a variety of tests to determine police liability, depending on the type of force involved. For example, in Tennessee v. Gardner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), the Court stated that in cases involving use of deadly force, the appropriate inquiry is to balance the victim's interests in not being subjected to a Fourth Amendment violation versus the government's interest in seeking to justify the intrusion against this right. In Garner, a police officer shot and killed a fifteen-year-old boy who was fleeing arrest. In clarifying when police officers may use deadly force to apprehend a fleeing suspect, the Court said such action was appropriate only when the person posed a threat of serious harm to the officer or others, or when the suspect had already used or threatened force against others. Thus, under Gardner, police are not barred from shooting a fleeing suspect, but they may not do it except under vary narrow circumstances.

Claims that police have used nondeadly but excessive force require somewhat different analysis. Examples might be when the police beat a suspect or otherwise use more force than is necessary to apprehend, detain, question, or punish. In Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), the Court said that such cases are analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. To determine whether excessive force has been used, four factors must be considered: (1) whether the suspect posed an immediate threat to the officer or others; (2) the severity of the crime; (3) whether the suspect actively resisted arrest; and (4) whether the person was seeking to escape custody. Again, these factors do not resolve all uses of force by police but instead offer guidelines indicating that force may be reasonable or not depending on the circumstances.

The Court has imposed section 1983 in a variety of contexts, including prison conditions, negligent operation of emergency vehicles, and abandonment of citizens in dangerous places or situations.

Overall, although most police officers are restrained in their dealings with the public, allegations of brutality are not infrequent. From 1987 to 1991, New York City paid out over $44 million to settle police brutality claims, and since the late 1960s, claims of excessive force have dramatically increased.

David Schultz

See also: Bivens and Section 1983 Actions; Fourth Amendment; Police, Restrictions on.

FURTHER READING

Kappeler, Victor. Critical Issues in Police Civil Liability. Prospect Heights, IL: Waveland, 2001.

Police Power

The police power may be one of the most important and yet least understood of the powers of government. American scholar Ernst Freund included it in his list of fundamental government powers, along with the military power, the taxing power, and the power of eminent domain. Although by necessity vague, the definition of police power is the broad discretionary power of a state government to decide how best to regulate the general welfare of its citizens. The police power is also sometimes called the "regulatory power." As the most open-ended of the fundamental government powers, the police power is the main source of state authority to regulate people, places, and things. These police power regulations involve issues as diverse as zoning, land use, building safety, gambling, discrimination, parking, crime, licensing of professionals, liquor, motor vehicles, education, and sanitation.

THE POLICE POWER IN THE UNITED STATES

Very few principles are taken for granted in law, but one of them is that all sovereign states and nations inherently have the police power. The police power is thus one of the powers reserved for the states under the Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. When the original thirteen states ratified the Constitution and formed the United States, they did not surrender the police power to the federal government. Under the "equal footing" doctrine, new states that joined the union also retained the police power in their constitutions.

Under the U.S. system of federalism, the federal government is limited to those powers granted or implied by the Constitution. Therefore, only the states can regulate under the police power. In turn, however, the states' exercise of those police powers may be limited by prohibitions in the Constitution of the United States.

CHECKS ON THE POLICE POWER

The police power is wide and expansive, and thus its scope is sometimes difficult to define, but it is not an unlimited power. Regulations made under the police power may be challenged with a general claim that the regulation is arbitrary and unreasonable and hence beyond the scope of the power; on grounds that the regulation violates the state or federal constitution, such as the Due Process or Takings Clauses of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution; on grounds that the regulation has a technical legislative defect; or on other enumerated grounds.

The first of these limitations, reasonableness, is the requirement that the regulation the legislature is imposing be rationally related to the evil the regulation is aimed at suppressing. Second, the police power is also subject to the due process requirements found in all state constitutions and in the federal Constitution. Due process is first a requirement that appropriate procedures must be followed when the state moves to regulate something. Second, in more limited cases, if the regulation is severe enough and the regulation poorly constructed so that it tends to be arbitrary and yield widely disparate results, it might violate the substantive aspect of due process.

Third, restrictive government regulations may constitute a "taking." A "taking" exists when the government takes private property for public use without just compensation. Depending on the circumstances, if government takes property from a private citizen through the operation of a regulation, the government may have to pay for it. Takings do not prohibit regulations but may make them so expensive that government policy-makers may think twice about imposing them.

Finally, most states have other constitutional restrictions that require legislation to be generally applicable to the public at large or to a well-defined segment. Regulations that are too specific and were clearly written to regulate just one person instead of a group of people tend to run into problems with state prohibitions against specific rather than general legislation. It is important to note that not all states have the same requirements about what makes a law valid, and there is a wide range among the states.

DELEGATION DOCTRINE

A state government may delegate its police powers to local government units within its borders. This grant of the police power, however, can be withdrawn at any time by the state. How this delegation works out in a particular state requires construing that state's constitutional law and any relevant statutes. Therefore, the precise scope of the delegation doctrine varies from state to state, though its basic principle does not change.

In the 1750s, English jurist Sir William Blackstone wrote about the police power in his Commentaries, calling it "the due regulation and domestic order of the Kingdom, whereby the individuals of the state, like members of a well-governed family, are bound to conform their general behavior to the rules of propriety, good neighborhood and good manners, and to be decent, industrious, and inoffensive in their respective stations." In sum, if everyone in society is able to get along like a family, there is little need for regulation, but if friction arises, regulations are in place to smooth things out.

Kenneth Salzberg

See also: Due Process of Law; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Blackstone, William. Blackstone's Commentaries. Buffalo, NY: W. S. Hein, 1992.

Freund, Ernst. The Police Power. New York: Arno, 1976.

Tiedeman, Christopher G. A Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States. Union, NJ: Lawbook Exchange, 2001.

Police, Restrictions on

The early American settlers did not employ an independent police force, because during colonial times, law enforcement was the individual duty of every citizen. Eventually, through growth and expansion, the colonists applied Adam Smith's principles of economic specialization from his 1776 Wealth of Nations and created a mandate for a dedicated occupational group to ensure public order. The development of police forces as an integral part of the American justice system traces its roots to English tradition, dating to the Norman conquest in 1066. Under that feudal land system, the king implemented a tax system and delegated control of law and order through local subdivisions that were administratively managed by dukes, barons, soldiers, shire reeves (sheriffs), and constables, who performed clerical court duties and were ultimately responsible for housing prisoners awaiting trial. In 1829, after a decade of experimentation and political debate, the first modern formal English "metropolitan" police force was created under the auspices of Sir Robert Peel, the British Home Secretary.

Soon thereafter in America, the Boston police force was created in 1838 with nine officers; New York City followed in 1844 with a police force of 800 officers. The evolution and growth of police organizations were a direct function of the interaction of local political influence, corruption, neighborhood enforcement styles, and varying tolerance levels for deviance among friends and acquaintances. Eventually, government officials realized that effective and efficient law enforcement required reform that included organized systems of managed departments with professional codes of conduct, specialized training, and personnel standards, guidelines, and restrictions.

Police functions include law enforcement, maintenance of order, and services, ranging from traffic accident investigation, transporting injured civilians to medical facilities, providing first aid to crime or accident victims, to finding missing persons. In maintaining order, police settle small disputes, disperse crowds, and move traffic, whereas law enforcement activities include detecting and apprehending criminal offenders, responding to alarms and citizen complaints of crime, investigating suspicious persons and circumstances, and arresting suspected offenders. The role of the police has evolved and expanded to include many public services that are not provided by other government agencies. Citizens' expectations regarding the expanded role of the police to provide a diversified range of services to the community has created the need to give these officers, employees, and agents broad discretion to perform these functions and duties. Constitutional protections, departmental policies and procedures, and new recruit training serve as boundaries on police behavior.

CONSTITUTIONAL REGULATION OF POLICE PRACTICES

In the law enforcement aspect of the police process, police are clothed with wide latitude, face a range of choices, and make sequential discretionary decisions in the process of crime detection, investigation, and arrest. To limit the potential for abuse in the criminal justice system while protecting the freedoms and rights enumerated in the U.S. Constitution, various restrictions are placed upon police officers to regulate the quantity and quality of discretionary behavior. In the detection and investigation stages, for example, police searches are restricted by the exclusionary rule, under which illegally or improperly obtained evidence cannot be used in a trial to persuade the jury as to guilt, even if the evidence is conclusive of guilt. Except for certain categories of events and circumstances, a warrant (a signed court order), granting permission to conduct a search generally in a private place, must be obtained before the search may be conducted and completed. Certain events obviate the need for a search warrant, such as a "hot pursuit," when police are trying to apprehend a fleeing suspect, as in Warden, Maryland Penitentiary v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967); and the "frisk," or a pat-down search as developed in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

Other warrant exceptions exist for automobile and inventory searches, border searches with consent, searches incident to lawful arrest, and seizure of evidence in "plain view." The "good faith" exception allows police officers to avoid the warrant requirements and permit the inclusion of evidence at trial if the officers' subjective belief that a search was valid (for example, a search based on a defectively prepared warrant) can be independently verified and substantiated. In Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978), the Court expanded the exception to permit warrantless searches in emergency situations or in support of a person needing immediate aid and assistance.

Once a citizen is suspected of wrongdoing and is arrested for questioning, the police must adhere to various rules and regulations during the course of investigation. Just as the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution protects the homes, papers, and possessions of the citizenry from unreasonable search and seizures, the Fifth Amendment protects citizens from overzealous interrogation. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), gave rise to the now-famous warnings that police must recite before questioning a suspect in custody. These Miranda warnings include the right to remain silent and the right to have legal counsel present, and if officers fail to give them, any evidence obtained during the course of that constitutionally defective interrogation must not be heard or seen by the trial jury.

Another investigatory practice subject to careful scrutiny is the police lineup. Eyewitness identification is one of the most critical tools police officials use as a basis for establishing probable cause. The lineup, however, must be free of suggestive techniques, such as photographs containing six females and one male, or six white males and one African American, or five men with a mustache and one cleanly shaven man. Thus, the Supreme Court held in United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967), that an attorney representing the defendant may be present during the lineup or witness identification, at the defendant's request.

In the area of criminalistics and forensic evidence, the police rely on a host of technological and scientific advances, such as human DNA, ballistics examinations of weapon discharges, clothing fibers analyses, hair and dental records and matches, footprints, fingerprints, semen, and blood analysis. The quality of the security protecting that evidence is subject to strict scrutiny. If the "chain of custody" is broken to the point that there is a reasonable possibility of outside intrusion, confiscation, or tampering with the evidence, then another version of the exclusionary rule is applied and the evidence is withheld from the jury.

Undercover investigations, "stings," "crackdowns," and decoys are other tools police use to obtain evidence and apprehend criminals. One of the most famous sting operations was the Federal Bureau of Investigation's ABSCAM operations during the 1980s in which FBI agents posed as wealthy foreign representatives to uncover bribery activity among members of Congress and other governmental officials. The use of this technique is limited by the defense of entrapment—that is, the alleged offender did not have the inclination to commit the crime and would not have committed it absent police enticement. These cases turn on cause and effect: Did the suspected offender intend to participate in illegal activities, which were effectively manipulated by the police, or did the police create the situation that the offender unwillingly and without original intent was lured or stumbled into because of the potential for a quick windfall that was too good to pass up?

One of the most confusing restrictions on police is the legal requirement of having "probable cause" to arrest. In Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89 (1964), the U.S. Supreme Court declared that probable cause exists when the police have facts and circumstances within their knowledge and of which they have reasonably trustworthy information sufficient to lead a "prudent person" to believe that an offense was, or was in the process of being, committed. Thus, the court applied an objective (not a subjective) test, limiting police discretion. Moreover, after arrest, the police must file specific charges (called booking or charging) so as not to hold citizens in custody for an unlimited time period. Under the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution, unnecessary confinement is prevented through the use of bail or pretrial release procedures. To further screen unreasonable police arrest tactics while protecting the fundamental principle that every person accused of a crime is innocent until proved guilty, a preliminary hearing is held to ascertain the propriety of the arrest and the sufficiency of the evidence leading to the arrest.

The tension between crime control and prohibitions on police procedures derives from the due process protections in the U.S. Constitution. When evidence has been illegally seized or obtained and excluded from use at trial, due process serves to protect the guilty, because presumably the evidence would have led to a conviction. This hurdle can be overcome if there is other unrelated, untainted evidence available to present to the jury that will support a guilty verdict. In sum, the rights of the accused outweigh the rights of the people in obtaining a conviction for criminal conduct.

FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS AND GOVERNMENT IMMUNITY

Every police organization, urban or rural, large or small, village, town, city, state, or federal, possesses internal departmental regulations, codes of conduct, and manuals governing practices and procedures. For example, New York City police are governed by the NYPD Patrol Guide, a document that describes recommended police practice in dangerous situations. In a recent case, Lubecki v. City of New York, 758 N.Y.S.2d 610 (2003), sections 104-1 (use of deadly force) and 117-12 (procedures to be used when a hostage is taken or suspect is barricaded) of the guide were admitted into evidence against the City of New York in a tort action. The family of the decedent sued the transit police and the city for failure to follow the Patrol Guide during the pursuit of a bank robber, who had exchanged gunfire with the police.

During the chase, the robber grabbed the decedent in a choke-hold and used her as a shield. A standoff occurred, and the gunfire exchanged between the robber and police officers ultimately killed the hostage as well as the robber. A twenty-three-year police veteran testified that any officer who fired his weapon under circumstances that would endanger innocent life violated the protocols and procedures set forth in the NYPD Patrol Guide. The only issue was whether the $4 million judgment awarded to the family of the decedent could be apportioned between the defendant city and the police. Generally, municipalities are afforded immunity for employees' discretionary conduct, but the court held that such immunity did not extend to situations in which the employee, in this case, the police officer, violated acceptable police practice. Moreover, the court affirmed the use of the Patrol Guide as evidence when the issue is the standard of care to be employed by police officers using deadly force against others during which an innocent bystander is injured or killed. These departmental manuals were held not to impose a higher duty of care than that appropriate for common law negligence. Police procedures relating to hostage situations were not followed. A hostage negotiator was required to be called when a human shield is placed in a dangerous situation with a high risk of death by perpetrators of a crime in progress.

Many police departments possess manuals that provide guidelines to police officers in connection with media interviews and appearances. These guidelines often clash with other freedoms and liberties enjoyed by the average American citizen. In Kessler v. City of Providence, 167 F. Supp. 2d 482 (D.R.I. 2001), a female police officer challenged an internal written guideline that prohibited communication with the press. She had been quoted in the press about internal investigations of her performance in cases involving sexual misconduct. The officer was defending herself against comments made by parents of victims of the assault. She was suspended because she was not given prior permission to speak to the press. The trial court held that the challenged Rhode Island regulation impermissibly infringed on government employee speech. In Gasparinetti v. Kerr, 568 F.2d 311 (3d Cir. 1977), the court recognized a significant government interest in regulating some speech of police officers in order to promote efficiency, foster loyalty and obedience to superior officers, maintain morale, and instill public confidence in the law enforcement institution.

Thus, regulations may be promulgated, but their restrictive effect must be limited to the extent necessary to accomplish a legitimate governmental interest. Anything beyond that requirement must be deemed facially overbroad and a violation of the First Amendment right of free speech.

The right to freedom of expression was further challenged in a case in which the Massachusetts state police academy refused to hire an applicant because he held ownership interests in two adult bookstores. In O'Neill v. Foley, 2002 U.S. Dist. Lexis 3650, the police officer was granted a preliminary injunction because the state failed to prove actual harm, not potential or conjectural harm, that would override the individual's protected First Amendment right. In Wagner v. City of Holyoke, 100 F. Supp. 2d 78 (D. Mass. 2000), the police officer criticized certain supervisors and police practices in an interview with the press. He received a three-day suspension without pay for conduct unbecoming an officer. The officer challenged the police regulations as constitutionally vague because it provided no ascertainable standard of its reach. The court stated that he lacked standing to assert this claim, but he could challenge the language of the rule because he did not have sufficient warning that his conduct would violate the regulation. In contrast, a deputy sheriff was fired for making derogatory remarks about the appellant in Barrett v. Thomas, 649 F.2d 1193 (5th Cir. 1981). The Republican sheriff had demoted those employees who had supported the Democratic incumbent. After the appellant had been terminated for expressing his objections to the press, he filed a class action claiming abridgment of free speech. The Court held that the employees were not confidential policy-makers for whom political allegiance was essential to job performance. The County of Dallas was also joined and held liable, and the appellate court motion filed by the county to intervene in the action was denied because it was never entertained at the trial court level.

However, when police officers are the object of investigation, the disclosure of information about the officers by a New York City Civilian Complaint Review Board carries no qualified immunity. In Pirozzi v. City of New York, 950 F. Supp. 90 (S.D.N.Y. 1996), the plaintiff officers sought civil rights damages. The court held that the mere access by the prosecution to immunized statements by the plaintiff in the judicial records did not violate the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

If police officers plainly violate a citizen's constitutional rights, the legal precedent established in Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), applies to hold municipalities liable for police conduct exercised to carry out unconstitutional or illegal policies, customs, or practices. In addition, the governmental entity (municipality, county, village, township, and so on) may also be held liable for failing to properly supervise and train its employees.

J. David Golub

See also: Due Process of Law; Exclusionary Rule; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Immunity; Miranda v. Arizona; Search; Search Warrants; Seizure; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Pacelle, Richard L., Jr. The Role of The Supreme Court in American Politics: The Least Dangerous Branch? Boulder, CO: Westview, 2002.

Travis, Lawrence F., III. Introduction to Criminal Justice. 3d ed. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 1998.

Political Parties

Political parties are organizations that seek to win political offices and to promote particular viewpoints on political issues. Parties consist of voters who identify with the goals of the group, elected officeholders, and party workers who keep the party operating during periods between elections. In the United States, two major parties, the Democratic and Republican, win most elections. Despite this two-party dominance, minor parties do play a role in American politics, as demonstrated by the activities of the Green Party at the end of the twentieth century and the Socialist Party and Progressive Party in the early twentieth century.

Political parties are subject to regulation by state governments. The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees "freedom of association," but the states are authorized under the Constitution to establish procedures for elections. During the early years of U.S. history, states imposed property requirements for voting. Beginning in the late nineteenth century, states adopted the Australian, or secret, ballot. In the twentieth century, the conduct of primary elections came under the control of state law as well as federal standards. Today, state regulations determine the ways political parties gain access to the political process, how candidates are selected, and whether national party rules take precedence over state and local selection methods.

During the late nineteenth century and until the 1940s, the Democratic Party in the southern states operated in a manner designed to prevent political participation by African American citizens. Claiming that the party was a private organization and could set its own membership standards, southern Democrats asserted that only whites could participate in the party's primary elections. Because the Republican Party lacked any significant support in the South, the only critical election was the Democratic Party's selection of its candidates in its primary. The Democratic nominee was guaranteed victory in the fall general election, as no credible Republican opposition could be mustered.

In 1944, the U.S. Supreme Court declared the white primary to be unconstitutional. In Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944), the Court ruled that the states were involved in the conduct of primary elections. Accordingly, the Democratic Party could not use race as a basis for excluding an entire group of individuals from participation in its primary. Although the Supreme Court ruled against the whites-only primary, several other court actions would be needed to compel some southern states to follow the ruling in Smith v. Allwright.

Maintained by federal and state laws, the two-party system of the United States discourages the formation of viable minor parties. The first-past-the-post (FPP) elections in the United States effectively guarantee that the Republican or Democratic candidate will win most elections. A minor party that secured as much as one-quarter of the vote would not win the election under the FPP system. In contrast, other nation-states use proportional representation (PR) systems that base party strength in the national assembly on the percentage of the vote cast for each party. Moreover, ballot regulations in some states make it more difficult for minor parties to get on the ballot.

The American states determine how political parties select their candidates for public office. The nineteenth-century model that gave party elites the authority for candidate selection persisted into the twentieth century, although the first substantial challenge of it came in the 1900s with the progressive reform movement. Progressive reformers called for opening the major parties' candidate selection process to the voters through primary elections. Although the progressive movement was an early twentieth-century phenomenon, it had substantial impact during the latter half of the century.

Leading the way with reforms in the early 1970s, the Democratic Party opened its presidential selection process to rank-and-file Democrats. In 1964, Mississippi Democrats sent to the Democratic National Convention an all-white delegation selected under procedures that prevented African American political participation. At the convention, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party challenged the credentials of this all-white delegation. Four years later, following the defeat of Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey by Republican Richard M. Nixon for the presidency, the Democratic Party established a commission to study party rules regarding candidate selection. A commission led by Sen. George McGovern (D-SD) and Don Fraser (D-MI) recommended that delegates to the national nominating convention be selected through primaries or other open procedures and that guidelines be established for increased representation of the young, minorities, and women. State legislatures followed the recommendations by enacting legislation to establish primary elections.

The two major parties receive public funding for their presidential campaigns every four years. The financial connection between the two parties and the federal government serves as a poignant reminder that political parties are quasi-public entities. Although the First Amendment guarantees Americans the right to associate with political parties other than the Democratic or Republican, the realities of American politics are that the two major parties are closely linked to the institutions and traditions of American government.

Michael E. Meagher

See also: Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Black, Earl, and Merle Black. Politics and Society in the South. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1987.

Milkis, Sidney M., and Michael Nelson. The American Presidency: Origins and Development, 1776–2002. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2003.

White, John Kenneth, and Daniel M. Shea. New Party Politics: From Jefferson and Hamilton to the Information Age. Boston and New York: Bedford/St. Martin's, 2000.

Political Patronage

William Marcy, secretary of state under President Franklin Pierce (1852–1856), once stated, "To the victors go the spoils," and ever since U.S. politicians have given their supporters government jobs. Political patronage was an accepted method for politicians to build political support for their reelection. But this acceptance changed when the U.S. Supreme Court considered whether patronage appointments violated the First Amendment to the Constitution.

In Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976), the justices ruled that the dismissal of public employees based on their party identification violated their right to free association protected under the First Amendment. The Elrod decision was extended in 1980 by Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980). Aaron Finkel, a Republican lawyer working in the New York public defender's office, was released by the new Democratic public defender. Finkel sued, arguing that his dismissal based on his Republican Party identification violated his right to associate with any political party. The Court agreed.

In his opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens drew a line between what he termed nonpolitical government employees and political employees. Political employees who make policy decisions and have access to confidential information in the office can be removed for political reasons because their politics may prevent them from efficiently performing their job. But employees without access to such information, who simply complete tasks assigned to them, have a First Amendment right to belong to a political party and not be punished for belonging to that party.

The decisions in Elrod and Branti limited the ability of elected officials to replace government employees with their supporters. The power to hire and promote their supporters was limited in Rutan v. Republican Party, 497 U.S. 62 (1990). In response to the Court's rulings on political patronage, the Republican governor of Illinois initiated a hiring freeze, forbidding the hiring or promotion of state employees without the express agreement of the governor and an agency established to oversee state hiring. An employee claimed he was denied promotion because of his Democratic Party support and argued that the hiring freeze was really a political patronage scheme.

The Supreme Court agreed. In Rutan, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. extended the ban on patronage to include promotions based on party support. Brennan stated that promoting people purely because of their party identification violated their freedom of association.

During the 1990s, political patronage cases were affected by the move to privatize local government services. To reduce costs of services, many local governments signed contracts with private companies to perform services such as garbage pickup and vehicle towing. In 1996 the Court extended protection from patronage decisions to private business.

In O'Hare Truck Services v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712 (1996), the Supreme Court extended its patronage rulings to include independent contractors. The city of Northlake, Illinois, had signed contracts with several private towing services to tow cars parked in certain no-parking zones. The owner of O'Hare Truck Services had supported a mayoral candidate who lost the election. The elected mayor immediately ended the company's contract to tow cars in Northlake, and the service sued, claiming it was being denied city work because of the owners' political views.

The Court agreed. In his opinion, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy wrote that the dispensing of public contracts could not be based on the willingness of private business to provide support or contributions to a politician. The O'Hare Trucking owners must be allowed to support whatever candidate they chose and be able to compete with other companies for city business. Terminating the contract violated the free association rights of the owners of the towing company.

The Court backed up this opinion in Board of Commissioners v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996), which involved a trash company that provided trash services to Wabaunsee County in Kansas. When the company owner criticized the board of commissioners and individual members, his contract was not renewed. The owner sued, arguing that the trash contract was not renewed simply because he criticized the government, an action that violated his speech rights under the First Amendment. Once again the Court agreed. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the seven-justice majority, ruled that the government could refuse to renew contracts based solely on economic factors including poor work done by the contractor or in a competitive bid in which a contractor was underbid by another contractor. Refusing to renew a contract based on the contractor's criticism of government punished him for his free speech and violated the First Amendment.

Douglas Clouatre

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Bowman, Cynthia. "The Law of Patronage at a Crossroads." Journal of Law and Politics 12 (1996): 134.

Political-Question Doctrine

The political-question doctrine permits the U.S. Supreme Court to avoid deciding cases that involve political issues more appropriately resolved by the political branches of government. The doctrine originated with Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), in which Chief Justice John Marshall suggested that delicate political matters ought to be considered nonjusticiable and the Court ought not to intervene in presidential decisions.

Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S.1 (1849), extended the doctrine to legislative decisions. Luther arose out of the Rhode Island government's arrest of the leaders of a rebellion of disenfranchised citizens who had formed a more democratic state government. The Court held that there were no judicial standards to decide which government was the lawful state government, and that Congress had been granted the power by the Guarantee Clause (Section 4) in Article IV of the Constitution to decide whether Rhode Island government, challenged by the rebels, was a republican form of government.

The Court reaffirmed the validity of the doctrine in Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), when it refused to decide whether too much time had elapsed to permit further ratification of the proposed Child Labor Amendment, because the Constitution's Article 5 had granted Congress authority over the constitutional ratification process. The Court even extended the doctrine to legislative apportionment in Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946), which involved a challenge to malapportioned Illinois congressional districts. Justice Felix Frankfurter, writing for the Court, held that the judiciary was without power to reapportion congressional districts because the issue was "of a peculiarly political nature and . . . [c]ourts ought not to enter this political thicket."

When the Supreme Court revisited the issue in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), it addressed a claim that the malapportioned Tennessee legislature violated the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. In his opinion for the Court, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. repudiated Colegrove and then defined the political-question doctrine to permit the Court to avoid deciding cases lacking judicial standards and containing separation-of-powers issues but not those involving the judiciary's relationship with the states. Since state legislative apportionment involved neither the Guarantee Clause nor separation-of-powers issues, it did not satisfy the Court's political-question doctrine, because there were "judicially discoverable and manageable [equal protection] standards for resolving it."

Since Baker, the Supreme Court has refused to apply the political-question doctrine to state legislative redistricting. In Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109 (1986), the Court held that a political gerrymander of state legislative districts by Indiana state legislators was subject to adjudication under applicable equal protection criteria. The Court has also ignored the political-question doctrine if there were no judicial standards to resolve a case or it involved the constitutional exercise of congressional and presidential power.

In Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), the House of Representatives had refused to seat Adam Clayton Powell, an African American member reelected by his district, because of his political misbehavior and improper use of congressional funds. The Court held that the political-question doctrine did not bar its review of the House's exercise of its Article 1, Section 5 power to judge the qualifications of its members, because Representative Powell was excluded for reasons other than the Article 1, Section 2 requirements of age, citizenship, and residence.

In two subsequent congressional cases, however, the Court denied review for political-question reasons. In Gilligan v. Morgan, 413 U.S. 1 (1973), it refused to decide whether the training of the Ohio National Guard failed to comply with the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, because Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution had authorized Congress to evaluate military training. In Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224 (1993), the Court held that the Senate's use of a select committee to hear testimony and gather evidence in the impeachment trial of a district court judge did not violate Article 6, Section 3, which provides that [t]he Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments" (clause 6). Unlike in Powell, the Senate had not transgressed any identifiable textual constitutional limit, because the word "try" in Article 6 did not preclude the Senate from delegating these tasks to a committee.

The Supreme Court turned to the exercise of executive power in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), to consider President Richard Nixon's refusal to supply tape recordings requested by the special prosecutor investigating the Watergate scandal. (This incident was the bungled burglary of Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate apartment complex by individuals associated with Nixon's reelection campaign and the subsequent attempted cover-up.) The Court held that Nixon's refusal did not raise a political question, because his action was based on a claim of executive privilege, which was traditionally justiciable. The Court was much more reluctant, however, to intervene in the president's conduct of foreign affairs. In Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996 (1979), it refused to decide whether President Jimmy Carter could unilaterally terminate a treaty with Taiwan. Justice William H. Rehnquist's plurality opinion found that the president's action was a nonreviewable political question because it involved the president's authority to conduct foreign relations, and because the Constitution was silent about the Senate's role in treaty termination, it was a matter to be resolved by the executive and legislative branches.

The political-question doctrine is rooted in prudential concerns and separation-of-powers principles. As one of the Court's self-crafted restrictions on its jurisdiction, the doctrine permits the Supreme Court to avoid political controversies that lack manageable judicial standards and that the Constitution has clearly committed to Congress and the president.

William Crawford Green

See also: Baker v. Carr; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Strum, Philippa. The Supreme Court and Political Questions. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1974.

Tribe, Laurence. American Constitutional Law. 3d ed. Vol. 1. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Polygamy

Polygamy is the popular term for plural marriage. Plural marriage is typically practiced as polygyny, a man marrying more than one woman, rather than polyandry, a woman marrying more than one man. In the United States, polygamy is historically identified with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), sometimes called the Mormon Church. Polygamy was a part of the church's nineteenth-century beliefs and practices, and it engendered constitutional conflicts over freedom of religion and federal regulatory powers when its practice conflicted with federal laws.

According to the LDS understanding of the practice, church founder Joseph Smith was conducting a "retranslation" of the Bible in 1831 and inquired of God why Abraham, Jacob, and other biblical prophets were justified in having many more than one wife. Smith learned that a man may have more than one wife when the Lord commands it, as in the case of Abraham. He also learned that the church would be required to live the law of Abraham at a future time. Smith married his second wife, Fanny Algers, in the mid-1830s, probably in 1835. Plural marriage was introduced as a church doctrine privately to church leaders during the Nauvoo (Illinois) period beginning in 1841, though a few became aware of it at an earlier date.

The practice of polygamy was highly regulated in the church, but the private nature of its initial introduction led to some difficulties. For example, John C.

A group of polygamists in the Utah Penitentiary, 1885. (Library of Congress)

Bennett, mayor of Nauvoo, Illinois, and a close friend of Joseph Smith, capitalized on the rumors and limited information by persuading a number of women to have sexual relations with him, claiming that they had been married "spiritually." Bennett was excommunicated for his actions, and he became a bitter opponent of the church. A man could not volunteer to take multiple wives. Church leaders called men to take additional wives on the basis of their religious devotion and capability of supporting the family, much as they called men to serve missions to proclaim the gospel in distant locations. The wedding ceremony could be performed only by "sealers" who were authorized to perform plural marriages.

Polygamy also caused trouble in the form of religious persecution. The Latter-day Saints had been driven from New York, Ohio, and Missouri, and rumors of polygamy served to intensify persecution in Nauvoo, Illinois, as well. Bennett and a number of other dissenters toured Illinois speaking against the church and began publishing the Nauvoo Expositor, which ran an exposé on polygamy, setting in motion a series of events that resulted in Smith's death.

Polygamy was openly practiced once the Latter-day Saints left Nauvoo, but the doctrine was not publicly announced and explained until 1852, some time after the church had settled in the Salt Lake valley in Utah. Polygamy became an issue in Utah's effort to attain statehood. The territory made its second attempt at statehood in 1856, the same year the Republican Party in its platform described slavery and polygamy as the "twin relics of barbarism" and pledged to end both. The territory's third effort for statehood came in 1862 but was not seriously considered because Congress was in the process of passing the Morrill Act, which outlawed polygamy in the territories of the United States and disincorporated the church. Increasingly punitive antipolygamy laws followed, such as the Poland Act of 1874, the Edmunds Act of 1882, and the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887. Many church leaders and others practicing polygamy went into hiding to avoid prosecution, and some moved to Canada and Mexico.

The church challenged the legislation in court on the basis of the clause in the First Amendment granting free exercise of religion. After the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the laws, most notably in Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879), the church announced in 1890 that it would no longer teach or perform plural marriages. Ambiguity over this manifesto persisted, and subsequently some plural marriages were performed in Mexico and Canada, and even a few in Salt Lake. In 1904 the church issued a second manifesto declaring that anyone who performed or entered into a plural marriage would be excommunicated and anyone who performed or entered into a plural marriage after 1890 would be barred from serving in church callings. That policy has remained in effect to the present day. Even in nations that accept polygamy, LDS church members are not permitted to enter into plural marriages.

Some Latter-day Saints rejected the church's new position and formed a number of small splinter groups composed mostly of excommunicated Mormons. These groups include the United Apostolic Brethren, the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the First Warders, the Kingstonites, and the True and Living Church. There are also other groups in the United States practicing polygamy that have no historical ties to the LDS church. Organizations such as Truth Bearer and Liberated Christians promote plural marriages based on biblical interpretations.

Owen Abbe

See also: Free Exercise Clause; Mormons.

FURTHER READING

Embry, Jessie L. Mormon Polygamous Families: Life in the Principle. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1987.

Foster, Lawrence. Women, Family, and Utopia: Communal Experiments of the Shakers, the Oneida Community, and the Mormons. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1991.

Van Wagoner, Richard S. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 1986.

Pornography

The word "pornography" comes from the Greek words for "prostitute" (porne) and "to write" (grapho), and until the nineteenth century it referred to a description of prostitutes and prostitution as related to public hygiene. The word has a much broader meaning today, including any depiction or portrayal of sexually explicit conduct. Although pornography is a very elusive legal term and is inextricably related to the more familiar yet equally indistinct term "obscenity," its delineation elucidates the general parameters of the pornographic-obscenity syndrome.

Pornographic expression—like other forms of expression—is entitled to protection under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. "Pornography" and "obscenity"—the latter term comes from the Latin obscenus, meaning abominable or ill-omened—are frequently used interchangeably, but the two terms cannot be considered coextensive. To be sure, the U.S. Supreme Court has determined that "obscenity" is not a protected genre under the First Amendment. Nonetheless, just as an expression can be pornographic but not obscene, it can as well be obscene and not pornographic. In fact, there are many literary examples that contain sexually explicit material—thus objectionable to many people—yet are generally considered entitled to First Amendment protection.

Notable and sometimes controversial authors of such works include Anthony Burgess (A Clockwork Orange), Geoffrey Chaucer (The Canterbury Tales), Theodore Dreiser (Sister Carrie), William Faulkner (As I Lay Dying), Nathaniel Hawthorne (The Scarlet Letter), and Ernest Hemingway (The Sun Also Rises). Two famous books that led to litigation are James Joyce's Ulysses, banned by the U.S. Customs Office and the ban lifted in United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses," 5 F. Supp. 182 (S.D.N.Y. 1933), and Fanny Hill, a 1750 work, banned by the Massachusetts Attorney General and the ban lifted in A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966). Although the Supreme Court's definition of obscenity includes elements of prurience and sexual conduct, there are in a nonlegal sense examples of obscenity that are not pornographic—scenes of war or genocidal holocaust, for example.

Pornographic or sexually explicit material loses its First Amendment protection when it crosses a line separating ordinary pornography from the pornographically obscene, or what the courts at times, and often interchangeably, label "hard-core pornography." A precise definition of hard-core pornography is elusive at best. As one judge put it in United States v. Porter, 709 F. Supp. 770 (E.D. Mich. 1989), the effort to define the term involves "an area of law so murky and fraught with difficulty that scholars and courts have struggled for decades to distinguish between permissible pornography and unlawful obscenity." As Justice Potter Stewart stated in Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964), it involves the "task of trying to define what may be indefinable." Perhaps, as suggested by Justice Stewart in Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the best definition of hard-core pornography is that it can be equated with obscenity, which the Supreme Court has struggled at length to define.

In Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), the Court defined obscenity as a work that an average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find, when taken as a whole, appeals to prurient interests, and depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct that the law has defined, and when, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.

The Supreme Court has created other categories of pornography that, like hard-core pornography, are not protected by the First Amendment. In Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), the Court held that providing a more restricted First Amendment right for expression that would reach minor children was constitutionally permissible. Speaking for the Court in Ginsberg, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. stated that governments may adjust the definition of obscenity for minors to include otherwise permissible pornography, "for we have recognized that even where there is an invasion of protected freedoms 'the power of the state to control the conduct of children reaches beyond the scope of its authority over adults,' " quoting Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944). Another category of unprotected expression was created in Rowan v. Post Office Department, 397 U.S. 728 (1970), which upheld a statute that provided a procedure for postal patrons to insulate themselves from advertisements that offered for sale "matter which the addressee in his sole discretion believes to be erotically arousing or sexually provocative."

In 1982, the Supreme Court carved out another significant impermissible category of pornography: child pornography. Agreeing with the proposition that use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is very harmful to both the children and society, the Court in New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982), approved laws proscribing the distribution of depictions and portrayal of sexual activity by juveniles. Child pornography can, of course, involve obscene depiction of children that would otherwise be unlawful under the definition of obscenity, but it also can include nonobscene sexual depictions of minors that would not. Thus, the Ferber Court modified the Miller standard to account for this possibility. The modified test does not consider whether a work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest of the average person, because it has no relationship to whether a child has been physically or psychologically harmed. The requirement that pornographic depictions or portrayals must be patently offensive was also discarded for the same reason. Finally, the modified standard in Ferber considers child pornography to be constitutionally impermissible although it may contain serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when taken as a whole. As Justice Byron R. White stated, "It is irrelevant to the child [whom they have abused] whether or not the material . . . has a literary, artistic, political or social value."

Clyde E. Willis

See also: Child Pornography; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; First Amendment; Lady Chatterley's Lover; Miller v. California; New York v. Ferber; Obscenity.

FURTHER READING

Jasper, Margaret C. The Law of Obscenity and Pornography. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1996.

Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Laws, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico (1986)

Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986), threw into doubt the continued utility and vitality of the test the U.S. Supreme Court had used since 1980 in its First Amendment cases involving commercial speech (advertising). In Central Hudson Gas and Electric Company v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980), the Court established a four-part analysis to determine when commercial speech was protected by the First Amendment and when it could be regulated by the government. First, did the speech concern a lawful activity and was it not misleading? Second, was the asserted governmental interest in regulating this speech a substantial one? Third, did the regulation at issue directly advance this interest? Fourth, was the regulation no more extensive than necessary? In order for government to regulate commercial speech, the answer to the first question must be "no," or the answer to all four questions must be "yes."

Although Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's majority opinion in Posadas used the Central Hudson Gas test, portions of that opinion appeared to weaken the test's commercial speech protections. In this case, Puerto Rico had enacted a ban on advertising of gambling casinos to Puerto Rico residents but allowed such advertisements directed at tourists. By a five–four majority, the Court upheld the ban, finding that the speech was about a legal activity and not misleading, that the government's interest in reducing gambling by its residents was substantial, and that the ban directly advanced that interest and was no more extensive than necessary.

Three portions of Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion raised the concern of supporters of commercial speech protection. First, he wrote that the Court should defer to the legislature when it makes policy choices in matters such as the one presented in Posadas. Second, he observed that such deference was particularly warranted when, as in Posadas, commercial speech regarding a vice product was regulated. Third, he wrote that since Puerto Rico had the "greater power" to prohibit gambling entirely, it surely had the "lesser power" to prohibit its advertisement.

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall and Harry A. Blackmun, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. opined that when the government seeks to suppress truthful commercial speech about a legal product or service, the Court should use a more speech-protective test than Central Hudson Gas. He pressed instead for the use of the strict-scrutiny test used in noncommercial speech cases; that is, the government's interests must be compelling, and the means used to achieve these interests must be both necessary and narrowly tailored. Even using the less protective Central Hudson Gas test, however, these three justices thought the Puerto Rico law violated the First Amendment, as did Justice John Paul Stevens, who wrote a separate dissent.

Ten years later, in 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996), Justice Stevens would write a majority opinion unanimously striking down a ban on alcohol advertising and holding that the three controversial portions of Chief Justice Rehnquist's Posadas opinion were "no longer persuasive."

Michael W. Bowers

See also: Commercial Speech; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Garvey, John H., and Frederick Schauer, eds. The First Amendment: A Reader. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1992.

Posse Comitatus

The first posse comitatus, a Latin phrase translated as "the power or force of the county," was formed during the reign of King Henry II of England. In 1181 he issued the Assize of Arms, orders creating a small group of armed soldiers intended both for domestic peacekeeping and foreign wars. This group was named the Jurata ad Arma.

The use of military personnel in a posse comitatus was a staple of the American western frontier. Known simply as a "posse," soldiers were called upon to enforce civil law in expansive territories of sparse population. Similarly, during Reconstruction efforts to rebuild the South after the Civil War, Union soldiers often were used in a variety of peacekeeping missions, including guarding voting polls. Many in the South perceived this military presence as a coercive force that constituted a threat to the separation of military and civilian authority. The Posse Comitatus Act of 1878 was written two years after a contested presidential election decided by the House of Representatives. As a concession to southern representatives, the act banned the use of the army "as a posse comitatus or otherwise to execute the laws."

Today, the amended Posse Comitatus Act provides for many exceptions. People who favor exceptions cite challenges from foreign and domestic terrorism, change in the nature of war itself and its combatants, and the need for expensive technology and specialized training that states cannot afford. Opponents believe that exceptions threaten the military's war preparedness, grant the military undue influence in civilian matters, and challenge concepts of due process. They also cite conflicting differences in training: The military—more authoritarian, more oriented to deadly force, less constrained by the individual's rights—train for national security. The police—less rigid, taught to diffuse violence, oriented to civil rights, and local in scope—train for peacekeeping. Traditional military training is at dangerous cross-purposes with peacekeeping.

Written originally as a rider to an appropriations bill (20 Stat. 145, 152), the Posse Comitatus Act was expanded after World War II to cover the Air Force. In 1986 the Navy and Marines were also included. The National Guard, organized as a state militia, is not affected by the legislation except when federalized. The Coast Guard's traditional peacekeeping mission, under the authority of the Department of Transportation, also is not affected.

Exceptions to the act are permitted only when expressly authorized by the Constitution or by an act of Congress. Constitutional authorization for exceptions is seen as inherent in the executive powers of the president, his function as commander-in-chief of the military, and the presidential charge to take care that the laws be faithfully executed (Article II, secs. 2, 3). Congress has also authorized several exceptions. Military personnel have been used as strike replacements, on border patrol, in drug interdiction, for civil rights protection, in riot control, for protection of national parks, to execute health laws, and as support personnel at the Olympics.

There have been a number of privately financed paramilitary organizations in recent years that call themselves a "posse comitatus." Historically, only a legal authority can form a posse comitatus, and therefore these groups have no legal standing.

Kevin Collins

See also: Civilian Control of the Military; Police Power.

FURTHER READING

Engdahl, David E. "Soldiers, Riots, and Revolutions: The Law and History of Military Troops in Civil Disorders." Iowa Law Review 57, 1 (October 1971): 1–73.

Hammond, Matthew Carlton. "The Posse Comitatus Act: A Principle in Need of Renewal." Washington University Law Quarterly 75, 2 (Summer 1997): 953–84.

Quillen, Chris. "Posse Comitatus and Nuclear Terrorism." Parameters, U.S. Army War College Quarterly 32, 1 (Spring 2002): 60–74.

Schlichter, Kurt Andrew. "Locked and Loaded: Taking Aim at the Growing Use of the American Military in Civilian Law Enforcement Operations." Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review 26, 4 (June 1993): 1291–1334.

Powell v. Alabama (1932)

In Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), the U.S. Supreme Court issued the first of two rulings in the notorious case of the "Scottsboro boys," nine African American males arrested in Alabama for the rape of two white girls, which was alleged to have taken place on a train. In Powell, the Court strengthened the right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution by overturning an Alabama Supreme Court decision affirming the conviction of seven of the eight defendants; in Norris v. Alabama, 294 U.S. 587 (1935), the Court further overturned the conviction of Clarence Norris, the ninth boy involved, on his showing that African Americans had been systematically excluded from both the grand jury that indicted him and the trial jury that found him guilty.

Although it was an important precedent, Powell was largely limited to the facts of the case. Ozzie Powell and eight other African American boys had been arrested, arraigned, and shortly thereafter tried for rape in an environment dominated by hostility and awash in racism. Eight had been convicted (the jury had been divided on the other). The boys not only were young and indigent but also were acknowledged to be ignorant and illiterate. They were out-of-state residents with no family or friends nearby, and the state sought and obtained sentences of death. At their trial the judge had vaguely appointed all members of the local bar to represent the defendants, but the most prominent individual, a Tennessee lawyer, who stepped forward to help on the day of the trial, acknowledged that he had not had time to do much work on the case.

In issuing the Supreme Court's seven–two ruling, Justice George Sutherland recognized that the English common law had not extended the right to counsel in capital cases, but he argued that American states had almost uniformly rejected this exclusion. Although the Court had ruled in Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), a case dismissing the need for grand jury indictments, that the Fourteenth Amendment had not applied all of the provisions of the Bill of Rights to the states, this decision had been modified by other cases establishing certain rights as so fundamental that they were implicit in the idea of due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the logic of Sutherland's argument arguably encompassed individuals in serious noncapital cases, he limited the application of this precedent to capital cases involving special circumstances like those in Powell. Even so, Justice Pierce Butler argued in dissent that the lower court had made adequate provision of counsel, and Justice James McReynolds concurred.

In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), the Supreme Court subsequently ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment encompassed the Sixth Amendment right to counsel by requiring court appointment of counsel for indigents in noncapital felony cases. It further extended this right to most misdemeanor cases in Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972).

John R. Vile

See also: Argersinger v. Hamlin; Gideon v. Wainwright; Hurtado v. California; Right to Counsel.

FURTHER READING

Carter, Dan T. Scottsboro: A Tragedy of the American South. Rev. ed. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1979.

Prayer in Schools

School prayer is a complicated issue of religious liberty. The First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States protects religious liberty with two clauses, the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause. The Establishment Clause is designed to prevent the government from becoming too involved in religious matters; it constrains government power. The Free Exercise Clause, on the other hand, guarantees all people the right to exercise their religious beliefs within reason. Both of the religion clauses come into play when school prayer is at issue. Whether verbal prayer in public schools should be allowed and in what settings it may be permitted have been controversial political and social issues in the United States that have resulted in a great deal of litigation testing the limits of the religion clauses of the First Amendment.

Of the two clauses, the Establishment Clause has received far more attention in the school prayer cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court. Because public school officials are government employees, their decisions about how to handle student- or teacher-led prayers are considered by the courts to be governmental decisions and thus are subject to constitutional restrictions. It is unconstitutional for teachers to coerce their students to join in a prayer. Doing so violates the right of students to exercise their religion freely and would also amount to governmental endorsement or establishment of the religious beliefs professed in the prayer.

The controversial political and social issue of school prayer in the United States has produced a great deal of litigation that has tested the limits of the two religion clauses of the First Amendment. (© Nancy Richmond/The Image Works)

A decision by school officials in New York to encourage teachers to lead their students in a one-sentence prayer at the beginning of the school day was ruled unconstitutional in Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962). Had the students been forced to participate in the prayer, the case would have been much easier to decide, because such coercion would be unconstitutional. But because the New York students were allowed to opt out of the prayer with their parents' permission, the state argued that it was not forcing anyone to participate in the prayer and was thus not violating the Constitution. In its first major ruling on school prayer, the Supreme Court held in Engel that the Establishment Clause did not require plaintiffs to prove that they had been forced to participate in government-ordered prayers, but only that a government agent, in this case teachers and other school officials, had lent their support to particular religious beliefs. The Supreme Court was sensitive to the fact that students might face ridicule by peers for refusing to participate in the prayers, but such indirect coercion was not necessary to prove an Establishment Clause violation. After Engel, even voluntary prayers led by school officials were deemed unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court revisited this issue one year later in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963). In this case, the plaintiffs challenged the reading of passages from religious texts and teacher-led prayer in Pennsylvania public schools. As in the Engel case, students were allowed to opt out of the exercises by sitting silently or leaving the room. Just as it had in Engel, the Supreme Court ruled in Schempp that proving a violation of the Establishment Clause did not require plaintiffs to show that they had been coerced. Instead, plaintiffs had to show that an act by a government official had the primary purpose or effect of furthering or inhibiting religion. Because the prayers and religious readings were adopted, in the Court's view, to encourage religious beliefs among students, the Supreme Court ruled that the religious exercises were an unconstitutional establishment of religion.

Schempp was a harder case than Engel because students had more opportunities to remove themselves from the religious exercises. There was less coercive pressure from school officials on the students in Pennsylvania than there was in New York. Alabama adopted a less coercive measure. The state amended an earlier law providing for a minute of silence at the beginning of the school day by specifying that this time could be used for silent meditation or prayer. The Supreme Court again ruled that this law was an unconstitutional establishment of religion. The bill's primary sponsor had argued that the reason he supported the bill was to get prayer back into public schools, and Alabama had passed a series of laws with that apparent aim. Since the purpose and primary effect of the law were to promote particular religious beliefs, the Alabama law was ruled unconstitutional in Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985). As the degree of coercion in school prayer laws decreases, whether they are unconstitutional becomes a closer question.

Since Wallace, the Supreme Court has ruled that prayer is unconstitutional at school functions even outside of regular classroom instruction time. In Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), the Court ruled that prayers at graduation exercises were unconstitutional. Eight years later, in Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), the Court held that student-led prayers at high school football games were also unconstitutional. To be sure, no one was forced to attend either the graduation exercises at issue in Lee or the football games in Doe. In addition, it would be difficult if not impossible to determine the cost to the state of the prayers independently from the cost of the event, information that could support a suit by taxpayers who objected to their tax dollars supporting religious activities. The Court ruled, however, that graduation and football games are parts of life in the United States that students are pressured by peers and others to attend. Forcing students with different religious beliefs to choose between surrendering these parts of their lives to avoid hearing the prayers or attending the events and hearing prayers they might find offensive was deemed to be unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court has ruled that forcing or encouraging students to participate in prayers while attending public schools violates the Constitution. The Free Exercise Clause guarantees all students the right to act on their own beliefs free of outside coercion. The Establishment Clause prohibits the government from endorsing or discouraging any religious beliefs. Together, the two clauses work to preserve the religious liberty of students in U.S. public schools.

Matthew D. Cannon

See also: Engel v. Vitale; Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Lee v. Weisman; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette.

FURTHER READING

Alley, Robert S. Without a Prayer: Religious Expression in Public Schools. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.

Ravitch, Frank S. School Prayer and Discrimination: The Civil Rights of Religious Minorities and Dissenters. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1999.

Precedent

Precedents consist of the decisions of previous cases that judges use to help guide them as to how to rule in new cases. Prior cases that are quite close in facts or legal principles to the case before a court are called precedents. Through the process of analogy, or comparison, judges review the principles and fact situations in earlier cases and compare them with the principles at issue and the fact situations in the new case they must decide. Following precedent helps ensure that case law is consistent and fair as well as efficient. The principle of following precedent is also known as stare decisis (pronounced STAR-ry de-SI-sis, meaning to stand by decided cases).

WHEN PRECEDENTS ARE FOLLOWED

The principle of following precedent, long upheld in Anglo-American courtrooms, ensures that rulings are consistent and predictable, so that citizens and institutions know how a law is likely to be interpreted in the future and can make decisions based on such expectations. For example, after the Supreme Court ruled in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), that women had the right to abortion choice in the first six months of pregnancy, women could expect that future case decisions in this area would follow this precedent. Therefore, they could make choices with the expectation that legal abortion would be available to them. In fact, it was partially this expectation that caused the Court to use stare decisis to uphold Roe v. Wade in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992). In Casey, the majority opinion emphasized that in order for the Court to overrule precedent, it should have a special justification over and above a belief that the precedent was incorrectly decided in terms of its policy outcomes. Following precedent adds to the stability of law and legitimacy for the Supreme Court as an institution, because it limits the Court from changing its decisions in an arbitrary manner.

By following the same principles in precedents for different individuals in similar situations, the Court helps to ensure a fair ruling. If the Court did not have to follow precedent, its decisions would not be based on any past principles; stare decisis therefore encourages judicial restraint, so that justices do not decide cases based solely on their personal opinions or prejudices.

Last, the use of precedent is efficient. Judges do not have to start with a blank slate when they begin hearing a case. Instead, they have a basis from which to rule, making sure that they do not waste time on a decision that has already been made. Lower courts are able to coordinate and make uniform decisions efficiently by referring to the precedent of higher courts.

The rule of precedent helps to ensure that lower courts are consistent with higher courts. Because all courts must follow the precedent set by courts above them, when the U.S. Supreme Court makes a decision, whether it be of a part of the Constitution, an interpretation of what a law means, or a decision limiting government from acting in a certain way, this ruling applies to all courts in the United States, not just those persons who are parties in a particular case. This guarantees that there is national uniformity of important case law. Citizens of one state will not be judged differently, because all lower courts must follow the precedents of the Supreme Court.

WHEN PRECEDENTS ARE NOT FOLLOWED

Stare decisis, however, is not followed all the time. At times courts choose not to follow precedent when the social, economic, and political conditions have changed greatly or when different principles have been established in subsequent cases. If the situation has fundamentally changed, the Court may decide that case law should evolve along with it. This helps to ensure that the Court's decisions can grow with a constantly changing nation.

Justices also have some leeway with regard to following precedent because they can view a new case in different ways, as to what principles and precedents are at issue in it. Also, they can argue that the fact situation in a case is so different from that in a prior decision that the earlier decision is not precedent. For example, when the Supreme Court had to decide whether the government could regulate offensive but not obscene speech on the Internet in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), the justices rejected Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), as precedent. In Pacifica, the Supreme Court said that government could require offensive speech on radio to be moved to late at night to protect against children hearing such speech. In Reno, the Supreme Court said that the Internet was so different from radio, with regard to the ability of parents to limit child access, that the precedent in Pacifica allowing such government regulation of offensive speech would not be permitted with regard to the Internet.

Judges, particularly in higher courts such as the Supreme Court, do not automatically follow precedent in every case. By the time cases reach the Supreme Court, there are often conflicting precedents, so simply following a previous decision is not enough. Because a case has gone through lower federal courts first in order to reach the Supreme Court, it usually must address legitimate conflicts in interpretation in the lower courts—otherwise, it would have been settled before it reached that point. Furthermore, the Court elects to hear only certain cases, so those selected are likely to be ones that address difficult issues that cannot be easily solved by simply following previous cases.

Some scholars have noted that particularly in cases of constitutional interpretation, the Court is often willing to reexamine and sometimes reverse precedent. In fact, the three most recent Courts (under Chief Justices Earl Warren, Warren E. Burger, and William H. Rehnquist) have overturned constitutional precedents twice as often as nonconstitutional precedents. Justices may consider constitutional precedent to be less subject to stare decisis because the Constitution is rarely amended and yet decisions must still remain relevant to the modern world. There is no way for a legislature to correct mistakes or problems in the Constitution by simply voting for a new law; the amending process is lengthy and difficult, and it would therefore be difficult to correct a problem in interpretation through this process. Therefore, the Court is the proper institution to make changes if they are to be made.

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), is one of the most famous instances when the Court ruled to overturn precedent in order to protect civil rights and liberties. This case struck down the 1896 ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, that permitted racial segregation on the grounds that "separate but equal" facilities were permissible. In Brown, the Court acknowledged that changing times meant that segregation was no longer constitutional under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The use of precedent does not mean resorting to a mechanical formula. No two cases are precisely alike, and precedent may often conflict when it comes to a particular issue. Therefore, justices use the process of analogy to apply past precedent to modern situations. They compare principles from precedent to the facts in the case and examine the differences and similarities in the situations to determine how much control the precedent should have over the new ruling.

Ronald Kahn

See also: Constitutional Amending Process; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Gerhardt, Michael J. "The Role of Precedent in Constitutional Decision-Making and Theory." George Washington Law Review 60, 1 (November 1991): 68–159.

———. "The Pressure of Precedent: A Critique of the Conservative Approaches to Stare Decisis in Abortion Cases." Constitutional Commentary 10 (1993): 67–86.

Kahn, Ronald. "Institutional Norms and Supreme Court Decision-Making: The Rehnquist Court on Privacy and Religion." In Supreme Court Decision-Making: New Institutionalist Approaches, ed. Cornell W. Clayton and Howard Gillman, 175–98. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.

Segal, Jeffrey A., and Harold J. Spaeth. The Supreme Court and the Attitudinalist Model Revisited. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Preemption

The doctrine of preemption provides that federal law supersedes state law. This doctrine flows from the Supremacy Clause found in Article VI, clause 2 of the U.S. Constitution: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof . . . shall be the supreme law of the land."

The preemption doctrine dates back to 1824 and the landmark case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1 (1824). In Gibbons, the plaintiff, Ogden, had received from the state of New York an exclusive license to operate steamboats on state waterways. Ogden sued Gibbons, claiming that Gibbons violated Ogden's exclusive license by running a steamboat service between New Jersey and New York City. Gibbons, however, had a federal license to operate on the state waterway. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the Supremacy Clause meant that Gibbons's federal right trumped Ogden's state license and accordingly ruled in favor of Gibbons.

Since Gibbons, the Supreme Court has expanded the preemption doctrine. Currently, a federal law preempts state law in one of three ways, through (1) express preemption, (2) conflict preemption, or (3) complete preemption.

Express preemption exists when Congress specifically states that federal law overrides state law. For example, in passing the Medical Device Amendments to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, Congress expressly provided that "No state or political subdivision of a state may establish or continue in effect with respect to a device intended for human use any requirement—(1) which is different from, or in addition to, any requirement applicable under this chapter to the device, and (2) which relates to the safety or effectiveness of the device or to any other matter included in a requirement applicable to the device under this chapter." This statute (U.S. Code, Vol. 21, sec. 360k(a)) thus expressly trumps state laws regulating medical devices. In other words, states may not compete with the federal government in the regulation of medical devices.

Even if Congress does not expressly state that it is trumping state law, state law is nonetheless preempted under the doctrine of conflict preemption when state law conflicts with federal law. In that case, federal law prevails. A conflict may exist because it is physically impossible to comply with both federal and state law, or because the state law conflicts with a federal goal. For example, if a federal law requires cars to have bumpers of one size, it would be impossible to comply if states also had different size requirements for the auto part.

Finally, complete preemption, also called field preemption, exists when Congress has occupied an entire area of the law. Under complete preemption, any state law in that field or area is trumped, regardless of whether the state law conflicts with the federal law. For instance, in passing the Employment Retirement Insurance Security Act, or ERISA, which regulates employee benefit plans, such as health insurance plans, Congress completely preempted the field. Thus, a state cannot in any way regulate employee benefit plans, and any lawsuits brought relating to such plans are considered federal claims under ERISA.

The idea that federal law trumps state law based on the Supremacy Clause is fairly straightforward. However, in practice, it is very difficult to determine when federal law preempts state law, and rulings in this area often appear inconsistent. For instance, one year the Supreme Court held that federal law regulating automobile safety standards preempted state tort lawsuits regarding airbags. But two years later, the Court concluded that federal regulations concerning motorboats did not preempt state tort lawsuits involving boat propeller guards. The Court reached these apparently conflicting outcomes based on the specific language of the federal laws at issue and its interpretation of the federal government's intent in passing those laws. These are complex issues, and the cases demonstrate the uncertainty in this area of law.

Margot O'Brien

See also: United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Starr, Kenneth. The Law of Preemption. Chicago: American Bar Association, 1991.

Zimmerman, Joseph Francis. Federal Preemption: The Silent Revolution. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1991.

Preferred-Freedoms Doctrine

The preferred-freedoms doctrine holds that some constitutionally protected freedoms, particularly those contained in the First Amendment, are so fundamental in a free society that they require greater judicial protection than other constitutional provisions. Supreme Court Justice Harlan Fiske Stone is credited with articulating the preferred-freedoms concept in a footnote (footnote four) in the otherwise obscure case of United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). Henry Abraham and Barbara Perry suggested that the doctrine embraces a judicial "double standard" in applying a higher level of scrutiny to cases in the "cultural/noneconomic/civil rights/civil libertarian category than in the economic proprietarian one." This double standard is a "carefully drawn" distinction developed following World War I and is still applied today.

Justice Stone discounted his own role and suggested that others laid the foundation for the preferred-freedoms doctrine. More than three decades before the Carolene Products decision, for example, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. had noted that judges should defer to legislative judgments except in cases involving civil liberties. Justice Stone also drew from the reasoning in Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), in which Justice Benjamin Cardozo distinguished constitutional rights that were "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty" from others. Justice Cardozo focused on the First Amendment because the freedom of speech was the "matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other freedom," and he contended that First Amendment rights were on a "different plane of social and moral values" than other liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution).

Stone's Carolene Products footnote was prompted not only by his commitment to protect civil liberties but also by his grave concern about spiraling racial and religious intolerance in the 1930s. According to Peter Irons, footnote four "soon became the deadliest weapon in the judicial war against those who deny minorities their rights." Ironically, this powerful weapon emerged from a case that had nothing to do with fundamental freedoms. Rather, Carolene Products dealt with a federal ban on the shipment of "adulterated" milk, skimmed milk compounded with any fat or oil other than milk fat.

The famous footnote four consisted of three paragraphs. The first addressed legislative deference. Justice Stone strongly believed that judges should generally presume that legislative enactments are constitutional, but he said in the footnote that there may be a "narrower scope for the operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears . . . to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments." In other words, whenever a government regulation appears to be in conflict with a Bill of Rights provision, the usual presumption that laws are constitutional should be relaxed or waived altogether.

In the second paragraph of the footnote, Justice Stone noted that the judiciary had a special responsibility to protect the effective functioning of the political process. Although this certainly included expressive rights, he extended heightened judicial vigilance to laws that impaired the capacity of the political process to protect civil liberties. Such undesirable laws must also be "subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment." Reference to the Fourteenth Amendment means that the footnote included considerations of due process and that at least some provisions of the Bill of Rights applied to the states as well as to the federal government. Finally, Justice Stone called for the courts aggressively to protect the rights of minorities and unpopular groups. He warned that laws directed at particular racial, national, or religious minorities should also lose any presumption of constitutionality and should prompt searching inquiry into the reasons they were passed. In his view, such review was needed because laws containing "prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities."

The stringent judicial review required under footnote four of Carolene Products came to be known as the "preferred position" doctrine. That phrase was first used by Justice Stone four years later in his dissent in Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942), a case that upheld a tax on door-to-door salespeople. Jehovah's Witnesses challenged the tax, claiming it burdened the sale of their religious literature. The doctrine was first used as the basis for a majority opinion the following year in Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943), the decision that overturned Jones. Justice Wiley B. Rutledge stated for the Court in Murdock that "freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of religion are in a preferred position."

The fullest elaboration of the preferred-freedoms doctrine came in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945), which involved a state restriction on labor-organizing activities. Justice Rutledge wrote in Thomas that it was the Court's duty to "say where the individual's freedom ends and the State's power begins."

Such line-drawing, he conceded, was "always delicate," especially when the presumption of constitutionality must be "balanced by the preferred place given in our scheme to the great, the indispensable democratic freedoms secured by the First Amendment." Attempts to restrict those liberties "must be justified by clear public interest, threatened not doubtfully or remotely, but by clear and present danger." Justice Rutledge concluded that only the "gravest abuses, endangering paramount interests, give occasion for permissible limitations."

The preferred-freedoms doctrine was not universally accepted. Among its chief critics was Justice Felix Frankfurter who, like Justice Stone, was a vigorous advocate of judicial restraint. In Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949), he characterized the doctrine as a "mischievous phrase, if it carries the thought . . . that any law touching communication is infected with presumptive invalidity." When balancing First Amendment rights, Frankfurter typically put great weight on legislative judgment. Two years later in Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), he wrote that free speech cases were "not an exception to the principle that we are not legislators, that direct policy making is not our province. How best to reconcile competing interests is the business of legislatures, and the balance they strike is a judgment not to be displaced by ours, but to be respected unless outside the pale of fair judgment."

Currently, the phrase "preferred freedom" is infrequently used, but the underlying sentiment remains operative. Even the more conservative, post–Earl Warren Court has considered statutes that limit First Amendment rights as "highly suspect" and often has required a compelling justification to support them. If such scrutiny were not employed, the scope of constitutional rights would be subject to legislative definition, and the Bill of Rights would be ineffective in constraining legislative power. The importance of Justice's Stone footnote goes beyond its obvious declaration of a new standard for evaluating First Amendment claims. In Carolene Products, Justice Stone modified the fundamental role of the Court by assigning it special responsibility for protecting civil rights and civil liberties. His footnote called for the Court to modify its previous emphasis on settling private economic disputes and wrestling with questions of government power. From Carolene Products forward, the Court's civil liberties docket grew dramatically, and the Court rapidly began to evolve into an institution with a primary focus on constitutional rights.

Peter G. Renstrom

See also: Bill of Rights; Carolene Products, Footnote 4; First Amendment; Fundamental Rights; Strict Scrutiny.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J., and Barbara A. Perry. Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States. 7th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Irons, Peter H. A People's History of the Supreme Court. New York: Penguin Books, 1999.

Mason, Alpheus T. Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law. New York: Viking, 1956.

President and Civil Liberties

After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and the unsuccessful attempt in Pennsylvania, the relationship between the nation's president and the people's civil liberties once again rose to the forefront of public discussion in American politics. On the one hand, President George W. Bush, primarily through his attorney general, John Ashcroft, took steps to ensure the security of the United States by providing the federal government with new powers to fight terrorism. On the other hand, critics complained that these new antiterrorist measures were unprecedented in scope and threatened to undermine America's historical commitment to defending individual liberty.

Indeed, although always present, in times of crises the relationship between the president and civil liberties rises in importance. And it is in these times that the power of the presidency has been most threatening to civil liberties in the United States. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. highlighted this distinction in his famous free speech opinion in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919). In upholding Charles T.

Schenck's conviction for violating the Espionage Act of 1917, Justice Holmes emphasized that the temper of the times strengthened the government's ability to stifle Schenck's speech. In another time and place, the Court would likely have considered Schenck's actions in a different light, but to Holmes "the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done." Given America's involvement in World War I, Schenck's production and distribution of 15,000 antiwar leaflets had posed a "clear and present danger" to the government's ability to fight the war.

The Espionage Act of 1917 itself is a fine example of the somewhat paradoxical position times of crisis often present for a president. In an effort to make the world safer for democracy, President Woodrow Wilson had seemingly limited democratic deliberation within America's borders by pushing this legislation through Congress and adding his name to it to make it law. In response to critics of this and other wartime measures, Wilson and his congressional allies emphasized the need for national unity and patriotism rather than acceptance of a full discussion about America's participation in the war. Any other choice, they suggested, might endanger military victory. Although not an overt legislative effort to restrict civil liberty, implementation of the Espionage Act of 1917 clearly allowed the federal government to suppress civil liberties. For example, the legislation prohibited "false statements" that might interfere with the war effort. Passage of the Espionage Act also had a ripple effect in the states, encouraging state and local officials to follow suit. President Wilson and the Congress took another step in restricting liberty in 1918 by amending the Espionage Act with the Sedition Act, which virtually made it illegal to openly criticize the war effort. In Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919), the Court upheld the legislation.

Wilson, of course, was not the first president put in the predicament of seeking to preserve (and perhaps expand) democracy by restricting civil liberty in America. Most famously, President Abraham Lincoln undertook a variety of wartime measures in April 1861, including suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, while Congress was in recess. In Lincoln's view, the prerogative power of the presidency granted him such authority when it was necessary for the public good. As he told Congress, "These measures, whether strictly legal or not, were ventured upon under what appeared to be a popular demand and a public necessity." In other words, with Congress out of session, Lincoln felt that he possessed the authority to act under the Constitution. The Supreme Court eventually rejected Lincoln's authorization of military trial of civilians in Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866), but it did so after the war was over and the president was dead.

Even before Lincoln's actions, President John Adams provoked significant alarm from civil libertarians with his support of the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. Enacted in response to concern about an imminent war with France and the loyalty of some foreigners living in the United States, the acts provoked a great debate about the definition of American freedom in the still-developing nation. The Sedition Act of 1798 in particular outraged Adams's partisan foes, Thomas Jefferson's Democratic-Republicans. Specifically, the Sedition Act authorized the prosecution of virtually anyone who wrote, published, or uttered statements critical of the government. The debate over the appropriateness of the Alien and Sedition Acts had a profound effect on American politics, helping to secure the White House for Thomas Jefferson in the 1800 election.

It would be a mistake, however, for episodes of repression solely to define the relationship between the president and civil liberties. For example, James Madison attempted to secure civil liberties during the War of 1812. In suspending the writ of habeas corpus, Lincoln sought to carry out more effectively a war effort against the Confederacy, an effort that would ultimately lead to freedom for America's slaves. In World War II, Franklin Roosevelt's issuance of an executive order enabling the U.S. military to intern Japanese Americans has also been viewed by history as a tragic episode for civil liberties in America. But Roosevelt's liberty-restricting actions do not tell the whole story of his wartime behavior. Just before America entered the war against Hitler's Germany, Mussolini's Italy, and Hirohito's Japan, President Roosevelt outlined his understanding of the principles of democracy—in essence, a creed for what America would soon be fighting for. To him, there were "four essential human freedoms" to be secured by all governments of the existing world order: "freedom of speech and expression . . . freedom of every person to worship God in his own way . . . freedom from want . . . [and] freedom from fear."

Even during peacetime, international conflict has affected the relationship between the president and civil liberties. For example, just as a wave of anti-German hysteria and heightened patriotism had influenced President Wilson's actions, a new concern inspired more restrictions on civil liberties immediately after World War I. Significantly, 1919 was marked with numerous uprisings throughout the world as Communists seized power in Bavaria and Hungary; Leon Trotsky's Red Army went to war with Polish nationalist forces; and Great Britain's Labour Party proclaimed its program for a postwar socialist order. In the United States, a wave of labor unrest erupted in 1919 as more workers than ever before in the nation's history left their jobs to join a record number of strikes. Given this tension, the Wilson administration acted quickly following a spate of bombings by would-be revolutionaries within America's borders.

In a famous reaction, Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer ushered in a new era of federal involvement with regard to civil liberties as the Justice Department led the effort to end the revolutionary bombings and labor troubles allegedly caused by alien extremists by rounding up large numbers of immigrants and deporting them. Fearing the effects of Russia's 1917 Bolshevik Revolution in the United States, the Justice Department, despite abandoning many of its prosecutions under the Espionage Act at war's end, pursued its campaign against the radical labor union International Workers of the World (IWW). As had occurred during wartime with regard to the general suppression of civil liberties, this repressive approach toward the union reverberated throughout the nation. For instance, after a gunfight erupted between some IWW members and American Legion members celebrating Armistice Day in Centralia, Washington, a mob dragged an arrested IWW leader from jail and castrated and lynched him.

Indeed, the "red scare" of 1919–1920 began what would be a long decade for labor, and it is perhaps the best example of how international conflict affects civil liberties in the United States during times of peace. In limiting the civil liberties of workers, the federal government not only put its force behind industrialists, but also sent the message that restrictions on civil liberties were at times acceptable. This spelled trouble for labor because the success of the struggling labor movement rested implicitly on workers' ability to secure their First Amendment freedoms. Specifically, so long as federal and state governments denied workers their rights of speech, press, and assembly, the right to organize a labor union would be constrained.

In the 1930s, however, as dictators replaced democracies throughout Europe, international politics had a positive effect on the state of civil liberty in America. During this decade, Congress enacted and President Franklin Roosevelt signed the National Labor Relations Act, which protected workers' First Amendment freedoms and empowered them with the right to bargain collectively. Also in this decade, the Supreme Court signaled in United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), that it was significantly altering its attitude with regard to the level of constitutional protection it would grant to civil rights and liberties. President Roosevelt further secured this liberty-extending attitude with his appointment of nine justices to the Court between the years 1937–1943.

These examples display how presidents have shaped the state of civil liberties throughout U.S. history. They also show that the discussion between liberty and security is a continuing one for U.S. citizens—a discussion in which the president's voice carries significant weight, ready to employ the powers of the office either to extend or to restrict individual liberties throughout the nation.

Kevin J. McMahon

See also: Civil War and Civil Liberties; Espionage Act of 1917; McCardle, Ex parte; Patriot Act; World War I.

FURTHER READING

Foner, Eric. The Story of American Freedom. New York: W. W. Norton, 1984.

Murphy, Paul L. World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: W. W. Norton, 1979.

Presidential Debates

In fashion and politics, image matters. Perhaps this is why two media scholars observed that "at no time in the nineteenth century did a presidential candidate debate his opponent." Campaigning was reserved for "surrogate debaters" and party machines. The notable debates in 1858 between Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas, involving core issues of race and democracy, with Lincoln calling for an end to the expansion of slavery and Douglas arguing for popular sovereignty, took place during the Illinois Senate election campaign rather than the presidential campaign that followed two years later.

It was not until 1948, when Republicans Harold Stassen and Thomas Dewey debated on radio, that a national electorate heard presidential candidates debate face-to-face on a constitutional question: the Mundt-Nixon Subversive Activities Control bill—named after Representatives Karl Mundt (D-SD) and Richard Nixon (R-CA)—which required the registration of Communist organizations. After Dewey expressed his belief that the bill violated constitutional civil liberties, such issues and the image of American democracy remained prominent in presidential debates. These topics appeared again in 1960 when during the Kennedy-Nixon debates John F. Kennedy asked whether the world would "exist half slave and half free" and invoked the names of Abraham Lincoln and Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev.

These contrasting images were revived in subsequent presidential debates. During the Reagan-Carter debates of 1976, Ronald Reagan criticized the traditional Democratic vision of Jimmy Carter. In 1988 the Bush-Dukakis debates centered around abortion and the death penalty, with Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis fielding George H. W. Bush's infamous question "Governor, if Kitty Dukakis were raped and murdered, would you favor an irrevocable death penalty for the killer?" Dukakis maintained his anti-death-penalty and prochoice positions, with Bush on opposite sides of both issues. In addressing judicial appointments, Bush stated he would appoint persons who would not "legislate from the bench." In the second 1992 debate among Arkansas Governor William Clinton, independent Ross Perot, and President Bush, the three disagreed on how to ensure freedoms under the Second Amendment. Bush opposed a "national registration of firearms"; Clinton supported the gun control measures in the Brady bill; Perot chastised ineffective policies.

During the first presidential debate of 1996, President Clinton and Robert Dole heartily disagreed on First Amendment freedoms. Whereas Clinton invoked the Religious Freedom Restoration Act and opposed constitutional amendments for voluntary school prayer and protecting the American flag, Dole viewed such amendments as important and alluded to disagreement with the ruling in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), in which the U.S. Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutional a law making it illegal to burn the U.S. flag. In the 2000 debate, Vice President Al Gore and Republican challenger George W. Bush differed on school vouchers, the abortion pill RU-486, and Internet filters to shield children from pornographic material. When asked about judicial appointments, Bush remarked, "I don't believe in liberal activist judges. I believe in strict constructionists." Taking these comments as a direct reference to Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), which granted women abortion rights, and to potential government intrusion into citizens' lives, Gore responded, "Those are code words, and nobody should mistake this."

Because debates affect how citizens interpret candidates' varying positions on civil liberties, rulings by the Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD), created in 1987, have been questioned. Using controversial criteria, it excluded all non-major-party candidates in 1988, 1996, 2000, and 2004, despite a Federal Election Commission (FEC) report concluding that the exclusion violated the law in 1996. Presidential candidates will continue to debate civil liberties; however, CPD decisions may limit the range of participants.

Tyson King-Meadows

See also: Buckley v. Valeo; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Balz, Dan. "Academic Experts Score Debate Commission, Parties for Shutting Out Perot." Washington Post, September 19, 1996.

Commission on Presidential Debates. http://www.debates.org.
Feldman, Linda. "Debate Uproar Shows No Sign of Quieting." Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 1996.
Gersh, Debra. "A Debate About the Debates." Editor and Publisher 126 (July 24, 1993): 18–20.
Hinck, Edward A. Enacting the Presidency: Political Argument, Presidential Debates, and Presidential Character. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993.
Holbrook, Thomas. Do Campaigns Matter? Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 1996.
Jamieson, Kathleen Hall, and David S. Birdsell. Presidential Debates: The Challenge of Creating an Informed Electorate. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
Nelson, Michael. Guide to the Presidency. 3d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2002.
Schroeder, Alan. Presidential Debates: Forty Years of High-Risk TV. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Preventive Detention

Preventive detention refers to a confinement that aims not to punish but rather to protect the community from the detainee's likely harmful act. Although it is in tension with the guarantees of due process and presumption of innocence under the U.S. Constitution, the practice of preventive detention is well entrenched in three areas of U.S. law: criminal procedure, immigration, and executive war powers. With the onset of the "war on terror" after September 11, 2001, its use has grown dramatically—and often under a veil of secrecy.

PRETRIAL DETENTION

The U.S. Constitution, like the Magna Carta before it, severely curbs the ability of government to detain a person without trial, for it is through such extrajudicial detentions that the most severe abuses of rights have traditionally taken place. But the curb is not a ban: Courts are sensitive to the government's need to temper liberty in the name of security, and they have widened the scope of pretrial detention in recent years in response to fears of growing crime rates.

The Bail Reform Act of 1984 was the first federal law to allow pretrial detention aimed at protecting the community from a defendant's future crimes. Until then, defendants could be jailed only if they posed a flight risk, could not afford bail, or would likely obstruct justice. In United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987), the Supreme Court upheld the Bail Reform Act in a five–four decision, saying that preventive detention was a regulatory measure and not a form of punishment under the Constitution. Justice Thurgood Marshall warned in his dissent that the ruling risked creating a system in which "a person innocent of any crime may be jailed indefinitely." The ruling led to an increase in the jail population, but Justice Marshall's dire prediction did not come true.

Laws at the state level also provide for pretrial detention for defendants who pose a flight risk, cannot afford bail, or would likely obstruct justice. The states vary on the use of pretrial detention to protect the community from future acts.

IMMIGRATION LAW

Until creation of the Department of Homeland Security after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) had the power to deport immigrants who did not have legal permission to stay in the United States. Pending deportation, the INS could detain immigrants who posed a flight risk or a danger to the community. The INS also detained some immigrants upon illegal entry pending a decision on their plea for political asylum, and it could detain immigrants charged with an aggravated felony. These powers led to lengthy, open-ended detentions, particularly in cases where the country to which an immigrant would be deported denied admission. In Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), however, the Supreme Court restricted the INS's powers, ruling that it could not detain an immigrant beyond a six-month limit.

Only a few months after Zadvydas, the terrorist attacks dramatically altered the situation of immigrants and U.S. detainees, and INS responsibilities were placed under the new Department of Homeland Security. Hundreds of immigrants, mostly of Arab descent, were detained for alleged violations of immigration laws. Further, the U.S. attorney general issued a directive that the names of detainees not be released and that immigration judges neither deny nor confirm the existence of particular cases, so that only the government would know the names of and charges against the detainees. The Patriot Act, passed in October 2001, further affected the legal status of immigrants: It allows the attorney general to designate certain noncitizens as terrorist threats. In a provision that would seem to clash with at least the spirit of Zadvydas, these immigrants may be held for repeated six-month periods indefinitely without trial or deportation.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

Critics argue that the war on terrorism has stretched immigration laws beyond their proper scope in order to bypass the constitutional guarantees granted to criminal defendants. The government counters that the detentions are both lawful and essential to ensure security from terrorism. What is clear is that immigrants have borne the brunt of the post–September 11, 2001, tip toward permitting detention to further security interests over individual liberty.

WAR POWERS

The terrorist attacks in 2001 were not the first time that a national crisis has led to greater use of preventive detention; indeed, it is an American tradition. The Enemy Alien Act of 1798 gave the president the power to detain foreign nationals of a country with which the United States was at war regardless of an individualized showing of disloyalty or criminal conduct. During the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln greatly expanded the executive's war power by suspending the writ of habeas corpus, which allows judges to review whether a detention is unlawful. In World War II, the government interned 110,000 persons of Japanese ancestry, roughly two-thirds of whom were U.S. citizens.

Perhaps the most dramatic expansion of preventive detention after September 11, 2001, was the detention of over 600 combatants taken during the 2001 war in Afghanistan. The U.S. government took these prisoners to a military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, claiming that the laws of war did not apply and that U.S. courts had no jurisdiction. The prisoners were detained indefinitely on preventive grounds, deemed beyond the reach of legal justice.

Alexandra Huneeus

See also: Bail, Right to; Eighth Amendment; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Habeas Corpus; Immigration Law; Rasul v. Bush.

FURTHER READING

Cole, David. "Enemy Aliens." Stanford Law Review 54 (May 2002): 953–1004.

Frankowski, Stanislaw, and Dinah Shelton. Preventive Detention: A Comparative and International Law Perspective. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1992.

Prison Litigation Reform Act

The Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) was passed in 1996 in an effort to limit the number of "frivolous" lawsuits brought by prisoners against their keepers. Prisoner litigation at the federal level has always been complicated. Even as entire prison systems have been overhauled and reformed, the courts also have had to decide whether prisoners have constitutional rights to amenities such as radios, televisions, and weight benches. In order to limit the latter types of suits, Congress enacted the PLRA. Unable to undermine the underlying case law used by prisoners to bring lawsuits against their keepers, Congress instead attempted to curb inmate litigation through other means.

The first provision of the PLRA requires an inmate to exhaust all administrative remedies before filing in federal court. Previously, if administrative procedures were not completely exhausted, the proceedings were only stayed (halted temporarily), but now the case is dismissed outright. This part of the legislation was originally of little concern to those who deal with inmate lawsuits, but it has proved to be quite effective in stopping them. The district courts formerly could step in and hear a case if they found that administrative procedures were too long or cumbersome, but that is no longer true. Prison administrators have put in place quicker filing deadlines and extra levels of hearings in order to slow potential inmate litigation.

The legislation also requires indigent inmates to pay the $150 filing fee even if they are allowed to proceed in forma pauperis (literally, "in the manner of a pauper"; this status confers reduced fees and other assistance). Such inmates must use funds from their prison accounts to pay the fee or must pay it in installments. Inmates who have had three prior actions dismissed as frivolous or malicious may not proceed in forma pauperis unless they can prove they are in "imminent danger of serious physical injury."

The legislation also set out to streamline the process. The district court must review all inmate complaints either before docketing or as soon as possible thereafter and must dismiss a complaint that is "frivolous, malicious, fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, or seeks monetary relief from a defendant who is immune from such relief." Defendants are no longer required to respond to filings without having nonresponse held against them. Whereas inmates previously were transported to court, judges are now required to hold hearings through some form of telecommunications while the inmate remains in prison.

The litigation also limits damage awards and does not allow them for mental or emotional injury unless there is a prior showing of physical injury. It also requires that any damages awarded first be used to make any outstanding restitution payments, with the prisoner getting what is left over. It also limits attorney's fees, which now cannot exceed 150 percent of the total damage award and the hourly pay cannot exceed 150 percent of the rates authorized for appointed criminal counsel.

One of the most controversial parts of the legislation is that aimed at curbing federal judicial intervention in state prison systems. When a state requests an end to judicial monitoring, a stay of judicial orders is automatically granted after thirty days, and the district court has ninety days to rule on the motion. If the court fails to act during that period, the motion is automatically granted and the supervision is lifted.

One study showed that inmate filings have decreased since the PLRA took effect. Thus, the legislation seems to have hit its mark, although a critic might wonder how many legitimate suits are being quashed in addition to the frivolous ones. The act also brings up separation-of-powers issues, since it seems as if the Congress is trying to act as judge from the legislature, but as of 2004 no part of the PLRA had been overturned in the Supreme Court. As such, the PLRA is another brick in the foundation of the ongoing hands-off approach to prisoners' rights litigation.

Eric Williams

See also: In Forma Pauperis Petition; Prisoners' Rights.

FURTHER READING

Adlerstein, David M. "In Need of Correction: The 'Iron Triangle' of the Prison Litigation Reform Act." Columbia Law Review 101, 7 (November 2001): 1681.

Bennett, Katherine, and Rolando V. Del Carmen. "A Review and Analysis of the Prison Litigation Reform Act." Prison Journal 77, 4 (December 1997): 405.

Branham, Lynn S. The Law of Sentencing, Corrections, and Prisoners' Rights. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

"Development in the Law: The Law of Prisons." Harvard Law Review 115, 7 (May 2002): 1838.

Mushlin, Michael, and Donald Kramer, eds. Rights of Prisoners. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson/West, 2002.

Palmer, John. Constitutional Rights of Prisoners. 7th ed. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 2003.

Pybas, Michael. "An Update on the Prison Litigation Reform Act." Corrections Today 64, 1 (February 2002): 14.

Rapp, Geoffrey Christopher. "Low Riding." Yale Law Journal 110, 6 (April 2001): 1089.

Robertson, James E. "The Jurisprudence of the PLRA." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 91, 1/2 (Fa11 2001/Winter 2002): 187.

Schlanger, Margo. "Inmate Litigation." Harvard Law Review 116, 6 (April 2003): 1557.

Prisoners' Rights

Prisoners do not enjoy the extensive civil liberties that are afforded to individuals not incarcerated. In fact, prisoners' rights were not a particularly large concern to the federal courts throughout most of the nation's history, and the courts took a hands-off approach to prison litigation. This changed in 1964 when in Cooper v. Pate, 378 U.S. 546 (1964), the U.S. Supreme Court found that prisoners could sue their keepers for violations of their rights due to the conditions of their confinement. Starting with Arkansas in Holt v. Sarver, 309 F. Supp. 362 (ED Ark. 1970), entire state systems were found to be in violation of the Eighth Amendment and were put into federal conservatorship. By 1984, 24 percent of the nation's prisons were under some form of court order, including at least one institution in each of forty-three different states. District court judges have overhauled state prison labor practices, medical systems, mental health care systems, and prison facilities that were in a state of general disrepair. The Supreme Court, however, has drawn the line and allowed practices such as double bunking and "supermax" conditions (holding inmates an average twenty-two hours a day in their cells).

After some years of Court holdings granting prisoners greater rights, the Court in the mid-1980s swung back toward its previous hands-off doctrine. For example, in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), the Court held that the needs of the prison administration superseded an individual prisoner's constitutional rights. Thus, any prison regulation reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest probably will be upheld. Another retrenchment was a decrease in issuance of writs of habeas corpus (petitions for release from unlawful confinement) by the Court after William H. Rehnquist became chief justice in 1986. In addition, Congress passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act in 1996.

Prisoner's rights do not begin and end with the Eighth Amendment. Prisoners retain some of their First Amendment rights, such as the right to send and receive mail as well as certain fundamental religious freedoms. Black Muslim inmates won suits against prison officials during the 1960s and 1970s for being denied access to services granted to their Jewish and Christian counterparts. Many of the early victories were pared back after Safley, but the passage of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act in 1993 (later overturned) restored many rights, such as allowing orthodox Jews to grow full beards and eat kosher food.

The image of prisoners being dragged off to the hole for long periods of time may still appear in movies, but inmates now have some due process rights. Corrections officers must write up violation tickets for rule infractions, and prisoners are allowed to defend themselves against charges in administrative hearings.

Prisoners' Fourth Amendment rights are quite limited. All searches must be reasonable, but something as simple as an outside visitor is grounds for a strip search of an inmate. Courts have routinely found that a prisoner has no expectation of privacy in a cell; the cell is therefore open to reasonable searches at any time.

The status of prisoners' rights litigation seems to be swinging back toward the hands-off approach, but a few areas remain unresolved. With longer sentences comes a graying prison population, and treatment of geriatric inmates is becoming more of an issue. Also, the proliferation of private prisons has raised questions of whether the same rules apply as in publicly run institutions. Also yet to be resolved is the extent of rights to grant prisoners and detainees in the wake of recent terrorist activities, including the September 11, 2001, attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C. Even so, unless the Court's makeup changes significantly, prisoners probably can expect more of less in terms of civil liberties for the foreseeable future.

Eric Williams

See also: In Forma Pauperis Petition; Prison Litigation Reform Act.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, James, and Laronistine Dyson. Legal Rights of Prisoners: Cases and Comments. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001.

Branham, Lynn S. The Law of Sentencing, Corrections, and Prisoners' Rights. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Cripe, C. A. Legal Aspects of Corrections Management. New York: Aspen, 1997.

DiIulio, John J., Jr., ed. Courts, Corrections, and the Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Fliter, John, Prisoners' Rights: The Supreme Court and Evolving Standards of Decency. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2001.

Mushlin, Michael, and Donald Kramer, eds. Rights of Prisoners. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson/West, 2002.

Palmer, John. Constitutional Rights of Prisoners. 7th ed. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 2003.

Smith, Christopher E. Law and Contemporary Corrections. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2000.

Probation

Probationary services are somewhat invisible in the U.S. criminal correctional system. Despite the collective size and importance of such services, polls consistently reveal that the public has limited factual knowledge about the probation process. Events stimulating interest in corrections more commonly regard prison costs and overcrowding, or take the form of periodic, sensational cases of prisoner activities while on furlough or parole (for example, Willie Horton in Massachusetts, who was paroled during then-Governor Michael Dukakis's tenure but who committed a heinous murder while on parole; the Horton case became a soft-on-crime albatross for Dukakis during his 1988 presidential campaign against George H. W. Bush). The goal here is to sketch some of the major attributes of probation and to highlight developments that have focused researchers' attention if not always that of the public.

In the United States, probation is a leading dispositional alternative to incarceration. Whereas parole is a decision by an agent (paroling authority) of the executive branch to conditionally release a prisoner who has served a substantial portion of a sentence behind bars, under court-ordered probation the convicted offender might not serve any time in prison provided the conditions of probation are not violated. Probation can provide an essential "last chance" in which offenders gain access to treatment and counseling without being dislodged from important community and family networks. Aside from freedom as an obvious advantage to the offender, taxpayers benefit from lower correctional expenditures. For about the same annual cost of incarcerating one prisoner, nearly fourteen probationers can be supervised for a year.

Arrest of probationer who violated terms of court-ordered probation in Travis County, Texas.
(© Bob Daemmrich/The Image Works)

Perhaps the most striking characteristic of probation is how, in terms of sheer volume, this sentencing option dominates the U.S. correctional landscape. It is true the United States has one of the highest rates of incarceration in the world, but it is also the case that most Americans sentenced to governmental supervision live in communities and not behind bars. In 1999, there were as many adults on probation (approximately 4 million) as there were in the entire correctional system—on probation or parole, in jail or prison—in 1989. Of every ten adults serving a criminal sentence in the United States, nearly six ostensibly were accountable to a probation officer, and just over one was to report to a parole officer; only three in ten were held in the actual, physical custody of a jailer or prison guard. Notably, these figures exclude juvenile courts and their substantial reliance on probationary sentences. This pattern of far more probationers than inmates contrasts sharply with configurations in some other countries (Japan, for example) where courts more frequently impose prison than probationary sentences.

Similar to developments in other types of correctional supervision and in part a response to burgeoning prison populations, the U.S. probation system experienced explosive growth during the 1980s as the number of probationers doubled from 1980 to 1987. Although the pace of expansion later slowed, well over a million more adult Americans were on probation in 2000 than in 1990, and by the late 1990s, probationers again were the fastest growing of the four major correctional populations.

Typically, probationers are those deemed to have committed nonviolent and less serious crimes, though considerable discretion exists in deciding who receives probation. Often, the presentence investigation report prepared by a probation officer carries the most influence in this sentencing calculus. As a member of the judiciary's supporting cast in local, state, and federal trial courts, the probation officer may go unnoticed by court observers. Nevertheless and despite what is technically only an advisory role played by the probation officer at this juncture, judges routinely accept the officer's recommendations in whole or with minor adjustments. The latitude afforded judges and the related importance of the presentence report vary considerably across jurisdictions. Judges in some states enjoy relatively broad sentencing discretion. Elsewhere, as in California, strict sentencing guidelines constrain judges and likely diminish the influence of probation officers' recommendations.

Offenders fortunate to avoid incarceration by receiving a probationary sentence will likely face a number of conditions to be in effect throughout the months or years of probation. In addition to maintaining periodic contact with a probation officer, probationers commonly must agree to restrict certain behaviors. Subsequent criminal activity, of course, violates the terms of probation and, if discovered, usually leads to revocation of the probationary status and incarceration of the offender for the remainder of the original sentence. Employment is typically required of adults, and judges commonly mandate participation in drug treatment and other rehabilitative programs. Courts regularly curb the freedom of association by forbidding many probationers to be in contact with known criminal influences, especially those implicated in the events leading to the probationer's original conviction, and some state laws suspend voting rights during the probationary period. Essentially all probationers are ordered to remain within a given jurisdiction, and many are restricted from frequenting trouble spots such as taverns. In some cities, program conditions seem especially tailored, such as those barring convicted prostitutes from certain downtown street corners associated with the illegal sex trade. Because the alternative is incarceration, few offenders formally challenge the appropriateness of these conditions, at least during the initial stage of probation.

Compared with offenders in prison, the profile of probationers varies slightly on some measures and substantially on others. Though probationers are more likely to have committed a lesser offense, the Bureau of Justice Statistics reports slightly more than half have been convicted of a felony as opposed to a misdemeanor. Certain demographic groups such as whites constitute a larger proportion of the probation than the prison population, though gender provides one of the sharpest contrasts. Whereas women account for only about 6 percent of America's prison population, 22 percent of probationers are women.

Scholars debate the degree to which such differences are attributable to bias, but few refute two major challenges posed by the current probation population. First, because management has not grown to match the influx of probationers, effective supervision is often illusionary. Whereas the optimal target caseload traditionally is pegged at fewer than forty probationers per probation officer, the average officer has the unrealistic task of supervising 175 probationers, with many assigned to well over 200 cases. Increasingly, probationers abscond from supervision and become lost in a system ill designed to track them. Second, not only has the caseload increased, but the average probation case also has become more complicated, potentially more dangerous, and less manageable as the probation sentence increasingly is used as a tool to ameliorate problems associated with surging prison populations. One of the great ironies of the dominant crack-down-on-crime mentality is that the more people the justice system incarcerates, the more offenders are diverted from prisons to offset overcrowding pressures. Many of those flowing through the safety valves of probation and parole likely would not have been deemed appropriate for community supervision in decades past. Moreover, recent public demands to stiffen conditions through intensified or enhanced probation (for example, increased visits with a probation officer, drug testing) encounter considerable practical and political limitations. These programs not only cost more and add to the already burdensome caseload of probation officers, but the heightened scrutiny also can increase the likelihood of detecting infractions, leading to revocation of probation and more prison sentences. For now, the 800-pound gorilla seems destined to grow even as the system's capacity to control it shrinks.

Michael McCall

See also: Prisoners' Rights.

FURTHER READING

Camp, Camille Graham, and George M. Camp. The Corrections Yearbook 1998. Middletown, CT: Criminal Justice Institute, 1999.

Clear, Todd, and Harry Dammer. The Offender in the Community. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2000.

Donziger, Steven R. The Real War on Crime: The Report of the National Criminal Justice Commission. New York: Harper Perennial, 1996.

Henneberg, Maureen. Bureau of Justice Statistics 2000: At a Glance. U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 2000.

Johnson, David R., and Laurie K. Scheuble. "Gender Bias in the Disposition of Juvenile Court Referrals: The Effects of Time and Location." Criminology 29, 4 (1991): 677–99.

Morgan, Kathryn. "Factors Influencing Probation Outcome: A Review of the Literature." Federal Probation 57 (1993): 23–9.

Mumola, Christopher, with the assistance of Thomas P. Bonczar. Substance Abuse and Treatment of Adults on Probation, 1995. U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1998.

Petersilia, Joan. "A Decade of Experimenting with Intermediate Sanctions: What Have We Learned?" Justice Research and Policy 11 (1999): 9–24.

———. "Community Corrections." In Crime: Public Policies for Crime Control, ed. James Q. Wilson and Joan Petersilia, 483–508. San Francisco: Institute for Contemporary Studies, 2002.

Snyder, Howard, and Melissa Sickmund. Juvenile Offenders and Victims: 1999 National Report. Washington, DC: Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 1999.

U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics.

Probation and Parole Statistics: Summary Findings. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 2003.
Zvekic, Ugljesa. "Probation in International Perspective." Overcrowded Times 7 (1996): 2.

Probationer Rights

Probation is a sentencing option under both state and federal law that allows a defendant convicted of a criminal offense to avoid incarceration. Probation allows the probationer to remain in the community but requires the probationer to comply with conditions set by the judge at the time of sentencing. Conditions of probation frequently require that the probationer pay restitution and fines, not commit other offenses, meet periodically with a probation officer, submit to substance-use testing, and maintain regular employment. Failure to comply with those conditions can lead to incarceration or to modification of the probation with the addition of more restrictive conditions. Most litigation over the rights of probationers falls into three categories: the probationer's Fourth Amendment and Fifth Amendment rights; the procedures required under the Due Process Clauses when probation is revoked or modified; and a more recent group of challenges focusing on the question of whether mandatory therapeutic interventions violate probationers' civil liberties.

Probationers sentenced under either federal or state law usually are required, as a condition of their probation, to consent to searches of themselves and their property based only on reasonable suspicion that the probationer has violated a condition of probation or committed a new offense. For an individual not a probationer, such a search would require a showing of probable cause. In United States v. Knights, 534 U.S. 112 (2001), the Court held that probationers who accepted probation with such a condition had a diminished expectation of privacy and could be subject to searches based only on reasonable suspicion.

Orders of probation require probationers to meet regularly with their probation officer and answer all questions fully and truthfully. This requirement has been challenged as a violation of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, which is applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984), that a probationer's fear that invoking the privilege would lead to a revocation of probation did not create an unconstitutionally coercive situation. If the officer asked questions that focused only on compliance with the conditions of probation and could not implicate the probationer in another crime, the probationer did not have a constitutional right to refuse to answer when the only potential penalty was probation revocation.

Clarence Norris, one of the nine young African Americans involved in the "Scottsboro boys" case, walks through the main cell gate at Kilby prison in Montgomery, Alabama, after receiving his parole, 1946. (AP/Wide World Photos)

A probationer's probation may only be modified or revoked after a judicial hearing. In Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. 606 (1985), the Court applied the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to require that the probationer be given written notice of the alleged violation leading to the prosecution's request, be informed of the evidence supporting the request, have an opportunity to present evidence and respond in court, and have assistance of counsel. The standard of proof in probation revocation or modification hearings is lower than the standard for criminal trials. In revocation or modification hearings, the prosecution must prove the violation with merely a preponderance of the evidence; proof beyond a reasonable doubt is not required.

Innovative programs aimed at probationers diagnosed with substance abuse and mental illness have encouraged judges to impose additional conditions of probation directing a probationer to cooperate with substance abuse or mental health treatment. These mandatory therapeutic interventions have generated litigation by probationers alleging that participation in substance abuse treatment programs violated their First Amendment religious freedoms when the only available treatment programs involved acknowledgment of a higher spiritual authority. Probationers also have challenged, with mixed success, participation in treatment programs that required the probationers to state agreement with program goals. These challenges alleged that such program requirements constituted forced speech prohibited by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Pinky S. Wassenberg

See also: Prisoners' Rights.

FURTHER READING

Bieluch, Brian G. "Thirty-first Annual Review of Criminal Procedure: IV. Sentencing: Probation." Georgetown Law Journal 90 (May 2002): 1813–27.

Petersillia, Joan, ed. Community Corrections: Probation, Parole, and Intermediate Sanctions. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Raynor, Peter, and Maurice Vanstone. Understanding Community Penalties: Probation, Policy, and Social Change. Philadelphia: Open University Press, 2002.

Stevens, Duncan N. "Supreme Court Review: Off the Mapp: Parole Revocation Hearings and the Fourth Amendment." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 89 (Spring 1999): 1047–94.

Procedural Due Process

See Due Process of Law

Prohibition

See Volstead Act

Property Rights

James Madison argued that in addition to the people's right to protections for tangible objects, goods, and assets, individuals have a possessory property interest in their opinions, religious beliefs, safety, and liberty. Madison believed that private ownership was essential to the advancement of society, and freedom was superior to authority as the mechanism for serving the public interest. The blueprint for the U.S. Constitution was derived from the property protections embedded in the English Magna Carta, the teachings of philosopher John Locke, and the opinions of famous British jurist Lord Edward Coke, whose commentaries served as the foundation for the English common law system. Coke's ideology incorporated the notion of the supremacy of fundamental laws protecting individuals in the rights of life, liberty, and property, as long as those individuals had not violated the laws of the land.

The Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution), ratified in 1791, applied originally only to the federal government and not to the states. It contained the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause drafted by congressman James Madison, the leading proponent of the separation of powers, who advocated the rejection of absolute rule by majority. His articulated vision of the purpose of government as the institution charged with the responsibility of benefiting the people consisted of the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right of acquiring and using property while pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

In Campbell v. Morris, 3 Harris and McHenry 288 (Md. 1797), a judge applied the Privileges and Immunities Clause in Article IV, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution and held that a citizen's privileges and immunities included the right to acquire and hold real property in any of the states and to "secure and protect personal rights." In 1897, the U.S. Supreme Court in Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause incorporated the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause, thus making it applicable to the states, the first such Bill of Rights guarantee to be so applied.

DUE PROCESS OF LAW AND DEPRIVATION OF PROPERTY

Under the Due Process Clause, no person may be disenfranchised or deprived of any property right except by due process of law or the judgment of his peers. "Due process" is a technical legal term of art, defined as the process and proceedings of the courts of justice, as distinguished from statutory law or an act of the legislature. Even otherwise unencumbered ownership of real property is limited by the superior ownership interest held by the government. The power of eminent domain, for example, gives the government the right to take privately owned land for public use, which is designated as a "taking," but the government must compensate the private party for the fair market value of the property because the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment states "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

U.S. SUPREME COURT ANALYSIS

Under the general rules applied in most jurisprudence involving "fundamental rights" (for example, freedom of speech and association) in the United States, the government has the burden of proving that a law limiting a protected liberty or property interest will either largely or substantially achieve its purpose. A law proscribing liberty should be neither overinclusive nor underinclusive in achieving its objective. Therefore, a land-use regulation subject to judicial scrutiny and review in a judicial forum will fail on constitutional grounds unless it substantially advances a legitimate state interest.

In Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, 483 U.S. 825 (1987), the Supreme Court invalidated a local government requirement that a construction permit would be issued only if the landowner granted a public easement, with the Court holding that the local planning authorities were not advancing a substantial and legitimate state interest. In 1992, the Supreme Court decided Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, which involved a South Carolina regulation that prevented new building on coastal beachfront land likely to erode within forty years. The developer of a section of property on the coast argued that the law was constitutionally equivalent to a "taking" of the property, entitling him to compensation for the lost development value of the land. Justice Antonin Scalia's opinion for the Court created a new category of takings cases labeled the "total taking," defined as the situation when a governmental regulation denies "all economically productive use" or, alternatively, leaves the land entirely valueless. In such cases, the regulations are deemed presumptive takings that require compensation. Moreover, the Court elevated vacant land to a superior position over all other forms of property, using the maxim of property appraisal and valuation known as "highest and best use."

In Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302 (2000), at issue was whether a thirty-two-month moratorium on the development of land constituted a taking. Here the Court ruled no, arguing against a categorical rule that would have declared all delays in development to be a taking. Moreover, the court stated here that the Lucas rule would apply only if the value of property were diminished by 100 percent. Anything short of a complete loss of value of the property would not be deemed a categorical, or per se, taking.

Both special and temporal aspects of real property must be considered if the property interest is to be viewed in its entirety. Hence, a permanent deprivation of the owner's use of the entire area is a taking of "the parcel as a whole," whereas a temporary restriction that merely diminishes its value is not. Logically, an estate cannot be rendered valueless by a temporary prohibition on economic use, because the property will recover value as soon as the prohibition is lifted. Mere fluctuations in value during the process of governmental decision-making, absent extraordinary delay, are incidents of ownership. They cannot be considered a "taking" in the constitutional sense.

"WISE USE" AND THE PROPERTY RIGHTS MOVEMENT

In City of Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes, 526 U.S. 687 (1999), the California city justified its actions of rejecting five applications by the developer of oceanfront property on the grounds that it was protecting various forms of wildlife, such as the blue butterfly. After each rejection, the city denied more use of the property. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the $1.45 million in damages awarded to Del Monte but went further to rule that under the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution and federal statute (U.S. Code, Vol. 42, sec. 1983), the lower-court decision to try the case before a jury was proper. In a case involving an uncompensated taking by regulation, the Court refused to accept the city's argument that a formal condemnation proceeding must go before a judge only.

The creation of individual as distinguished from collective ownership rights is a necessary rather than a sufficient condition for the efficient use of resources. Legal protection of property rights creates incentives to exploit resources efficiently. In the absence of this protection, property users would have neither incentives nor expectations of protected rewards, nor would they invest the necessary labor, materials, and time to produce final products, even if consumers were to offer significant premiums over those costs. The proper incentives are created by parceling out mutually exclusive rights to the use of particular resources among members of society. If every piece of land is claimed by legitimate ownership title, and title holders have the power to exclude others from entry and use, then owners will have the necessary incentives to invest and improve the specific parcel of land in question. This principle applies not only to physical but also to intangible property rights, such as patents, copyrights, trademarks, trade secrets, and licenses.

J. David Golub

See also: Bill of Rights; Due Process of Law; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Fourteenth Amendment; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Echeverria, John, and Raymond B. Eby, eds. Let the People Judge. Washington, DC: Island Press, 1995.

Posner, Richard A. Economic Analysis of Law. New York: Aspen, 1998.

Siegan, Bernard H. Property Rights from Magna Carta to the Fourteenth Amendment. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 2001.

Proportionality of Sentences

The principle of proportionality of sentences, also known as the doctrine of excessiveness, is rooted in the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishments. Proportionality of sentences suggests that criminal penalties should not be excessively harsh or severe, and that the punishment should fit the crime. The principle has been applied to both capital sentencing and punishments involving prison terms.

The language of the Eighth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution can be traced to the English Bill of Rights (1689), which states that "excessive bail ought not be required, nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." The prohibition on cruel and unusual punishments in the English Bill of Rights was meant to prevent the recurrence of the barbaric punishments that had been imposed under English criminal law prior to the seventeenth century, including face branding, nose splitting, crucifixion, public dissection, and burning at the stake.

Because the words of the Eighth Amendment are taken almost verbatim from the English Bill of Rights, the ban on cruel and unusual punishments is, at the very least, designed to prohibit the kind of barbaric and inhumane punishments that were imposed under English law. In addition, however, if the amendment's ban is read in conjunction with the prohibition on excessive fines and bails, the amendment seems to support the principle of proportionality in sentencing. Scholars have long debated whether the framers of the Constitution intended for the Eighth Amendment to require proportionality in punishment, but the U.S. Supreme Court and lower courts have recognized a limited proportionality principle in the application of the death penalty for certain crimes and in cases where prison terms appear to be excessive.

For nearly a century after the Eighth Amendment was passed, the proportionality requirement was found by many courts not to have any relation to the ban on cruel and unusual punishments. During this period, judges at all levels interpreted the clause only to prohibit certain forms of punishment. The Supreme Court first considered the issue of proportionality under the Eighth Amendment in O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U.S. 323 (1892). John O'Neil was convicted on 307 separate counts for selling intoxicating liquor unlawfully. He was fined $20 for each count and had to pay court costs. If he failed to pay the fine, he was to be imprisoned for three days for each dollar owed—a total of 19,914 days, or more than fifty-four years. Although the majority decision rejected the proportionality argument, the case is known more for Justice Stephen J. Field's dissenting opinion, in which he argued that the Eighth Amendment's prohibition was directed against "all punishments which by their excessive length or severity are greatly disproportioned to the offenses charged."

In Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910), the Supreme Court for the first time used the Eighth Amendment to invalidate a punishment. A federal disbursing officer was convicted under Philippine law of falsifying documents. He was sentenced to fifteen years at hard labor in chains, deprived of civil rights, fined 4,000 pesos, and subjected to police surveillance after the completion of his sentence. Finding the punishment unconstitutional, the Court argued that English common law history, as well as the intention of the framers, suggested that excessively severe punishments were restricted by the ban on cruel and unusual punishments.

In capital cases, the Supreme Court has held that a sentence of death is too severe for certain crimes. In Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977), and Eberheart v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 917 (1977), the Court ruled that death was an inherently disproportionate punishment for the rape of an adult woman and for kidnapping, respectively, unless the victim was killed. Also, in Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982), the Court rejected the death penalty for accomplice liability in felony-murder (a death that occurs during the commission of another felony) for someone who neither took a life, attempted to take a life, nor intended to take a life. In Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137 (1987), however, the Court permitted a sentence of death for someone who participated in felony murder and showed reckless indifference to human life.

In Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962), a ninety-day sentence for the status offense of drug addiction was ruled disproportionate because the Court found addiction was an illness, not a crime. In Rummel v. Estelle, 445 U.S. 263 (1980), a very divided Court held that the Eighth Amendment was not violated when a state imposed a mandatory life sentence for someone convicted of three nonviolent felonies. In Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983), however, the Court backed away from the Rummel precedent. Jerry Helm had been convicted of six nonviolent felonies over a period of years when he was charged with another nonviolent offense—writing bad checks. He received a life sentence without the possibility of parole. Writing for the majority in Solem, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. stated that the "principle that a punishment should be proportionate to the crime is deeply rooted and frequently repeated in common-law jurisprudence." He argued that proportionality analysis under the Eighth Amendment should be guided by objective criteria, including the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty, the sentences imposed on other criminals in the same jurisdiction, and the sentences imposed for the same crime in other jurisdictions. Applying these criteria, the Court found that Helm's sentence was significantly disproportionate to the crime.

The Court under Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist severely weakened the proportionality principle in Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991), holding that a mandatory life term without the possibility of parole for possessing over 650 grams of cocaine did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Justice Antonin Scalia's opinion deferred to the authority of the states to set penalties for criminal violations. The proportionality principle was further limited in Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003), and Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63 (2003), in which the Court upheld California's "three strikes" law requiring a sentence of twenty-five years to life for a three-time repeat offender, even if the third conviction was only for petty theft.

The principle of proportionality in sentencing, though not explicit in the language of the Eighth Amendment, has been recognized and applied by the Supreme Court in cases involving both capital punishment and mandatory prison terms. The scope of the principle, however, has divided the justices on the Court, and its recent decisions have given state governments broad authority in determining whether a punishment fits the crime.

John Fliter

See also: Capital Punishment; Cruel and Unusual Punishments; Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996; Eighth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Fliter, John A. "What Is Cruel and Unusual Punishment? Federal Courts and the Proportionality Principle After Harmelin v. Michigan." Justice Professional 15, 3 (2002): 213–26.

Zimring, Frank E., Gordon Hawkins, and Sam Kamin. Punishment and Democracy: Three Strikes and You're Out in California. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Prosecutorial Misconduct

Prosecutorial misconduct is a constitutional violation that occurs when a breach of any of the constitutional provisions, statutes, procedural rules, or ethical rules governing criminal trials deprives a criminal defendant of due process or fundamental fairness, as protected by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The prohibition against prosecutorial misconduct, by distinguishing between proper and improper prosecutorial advocacy, ensures that criminal defendants will receive a fair trial. To establish a claim of prosecutorial misconduct, a defendant must show that misconduct occurred and resulted in prejudice to the defendant's case.

The prosecutor is often involved in every stage of a criminal case, from the initial investigation to the closing arguments at trial. At each stage, laws and ethical rules govern the prosecutor's actions. The violation of any of these may be characterized as misconduct. In Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78 (1935), the U.S. Supreme Court described the prosecutor as a "servant of the law," whose role is to pursue justice by convicting the guilty while protecting the innocent from wrongful conviction. In serving these dual goals, the prosecutor "may strike hard blows, [but] is not at liberty to strike foul ones," because it is as much the prosecutor's duty "to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one."

During the investigation of a crime, the prosecutor may be called upon to decide whom to charge with an offense, what offense to charge, and when to file the charges. In deciding whom to charge and what offense to bring, prosecutors cannot act upon improper motives. For example, the decisions of whom to charge and what to charge cannot be based upon bias or prejudice regarding the defendant's race, religion, gender, or political beliefs. Nor can these decisions be based upon the prosecutor's desire to penalize a defendant for exercising constitutional rights or asserting constitutional privileges. In deciding when to file criminal charges, prosecutors cannot seek to delay a suspect's trial in order to gain tactical advantage. For example, a prosecutor cannot intentionally delay a prosecution until evidence is lost or destroyed or until witnesses become unavailable for trial.

After criminal charges are filed, the prosecutor plays a central role in preparing the case for trial. The trial is designed to be an adversarial process in which the defendant has a fair opportunity to challenge the prosecutor's case. To ensure that the trial is truly adversarial, the prosecutor is required to make the evidence available to the defendant before the trial begins in a process known as "discovery," which is governed by the jurisdiction's rules of criminal procedure. During discovery, the prosecutor must provide the defendant with any evidence that may have a bearing on the defendant's guilt, the defendant's sentence, and the credibility of witnesses. The prosecutor has an affirmative duty to disclose evidence favorable to the defendant.

When the trial begins, the prosecutor largely controls the evidence that is presented to the jury because the prosecutor has the burden of proving the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In pursuing a conviction, the prosecutor cannot use fabricated evidence, present perjured testimony, or advise witnesses to be evasive in answering questions. Similarly, when questioning witnesses, the prosecutor cannot misstate facts, allude to facts that have not been introduced in evidence, or argue with witnesses.

At the conclusion of the trial, the attorneys make closing arguments summarizing the testimony and evidence for the jury. In arguing in favor of the defendant's guilt, the prosecutor must be dignified and temperate. The prosecutor's conclusion must be based upon reasonable inferences from the evidence introduced at trial. The prosecutor cannot make insinuations unsupported by the evidence, nor can the prosecutor make misleading assertions. And, most important, the prosecutor cannot inflame the passions of the jury, demonize the defendant, or suggest any improper reason for conviction.

Prosecutorial misconduct may occur at any stage of a criminal case and may arise from any action of the prosecutor. As Peter Henning observed, an allegation of prosecutorial misconduct "does not describe any particular type of act or category of violation" and may be attached to any prosecutorial action "because the admonition to ensure 'justice' shadows every endeavor of the prosecutor." The prosecutor must be fair and impartial in initiating a prosecution. The prosecutor must ensure adversarial testing of the case by disclosing the evidence to the defendant. The prosecutor must pursue convictions based upon reliable evidence and dignified arguments. Judicial remedies for misconduct may consist of (1) taking action to remedy the prejudice that resulted from the misconduct, such as suppressing evidence; (2) granting a new trial; or (3), in extreme circumstances, dismissing the charges.

Mark A. Fulks

See also: Brady Rule; Due Process of Law; Racial Profiling.

FURTHER READING

Gershman, Bennett L. Prosecutorial Misconduct. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Henning, Peter J. "Prosecutorial Misconduct and Constitutional Remedies." Washington University Law Quarterly 77 (Fall 1999): 713.

Public-Danger Exception

The "public-danger exception" applies in the context of law enforcement officers questioning suspects before reading them their so-called Miranda rights; the exception permits pre–Miranda warning questioning on matters concerning imminent danger to the public. Any statements and physical evidence obtained as a result of such questioning are legally admissible in ensuing prosecution if the danger to public safety warrants making the exception.

Under the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, "no person shall . . . be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." This provision relates closely to the adversarial nature of the U.S. justice system, in that the accused is presumed innocent and the state has the burden of proving guilt. In short, an accused person is constitutionally protected against aiding the state in making its case. In 1966, the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its five–four decision in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, which sought to protect suspects in custody by requiring officers to provide a set of prescribed warnings before they interrogate suspects about alleged crimes. Miranda warnings are generally these: "You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can be used against you in a court of law. You have the right to the presence of an attorney. If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for you prior to questioning."

These warnings are well known and are universally used by the law enforcement community. The Court saw these warnings as a necessary prophylactic measure to ensure that police did not brush aside the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination guarantees as well as the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in the pursuit of criminal justice. Because custodial interrogations opened wide the possibility of coercion, the Court asserted the need for explicit verbal warnings, and for nearly two decades this was unexceptionally the law of the land.

The public-danger exception arose in Quarles v. New York, 467 U.S. 649 (1984). A woman approached two patrolling police officers and told them she had just been raped at gunpoint. She gave a description of her assailant and told the officers the man had just entered a nearby supermarket and was armed. One of the officers entered the store and saw a suspect who matched the woman's description. The officer pursued him with his gun drawn but lost track of him for a short time. Upon regaining sight of the suspect, the officer ordered him to stop and put his hands over his head, frisked him, and discovered he was wearing an empty shoulder holster. After handcuffing him, the officer asked, "Where is the gun?" The suspect gestured toward some empty cartons and responded, "The gun is over there." After the officer retrieved the gun, he read the suspect his Miranda warnings. In the ensuing court case, the defendant argued that the statement made regarding the location of the gun, as well as the gun itself, were inadmissible because police obtained them before administering the Miranda warnings.

The Supreme Court went against precedent and outlined the foundation for a public-danger exception to the dictates of Miranda. Justice Rehnquist concluded, "[U]nder the circumstances involved in this case, overriding considerations of public safety justify the officer's failure to provide Miranda warnings before he asked questions devoted to locating the abandoned weapon." Since the gun was still hidden in the store, it endangered public safety; an accomplice could make use of it, or a customer or employee might later find it. These concerns were significant and merited an exception to Miranda. The Court endorsed as being justified the officer's actions to retrieve the firearm safely, because the benefits of abating public danger outweighed the costs of the non-Miranda interrogation. Since the Miranda warnings might deter the suspect from providing this information in a timely fashion, it would be permissible to forgo the warnings to safeguard the public. The Court also believed that officers could make the calculus of whether public safety was threatened "instantaneously" and would quickly decide the prudent time to read the suspect his rights.

The dissenting opinion, along with the concurrent reasoning of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, sharply criticized the majority's reasoning because it weakened the integrity of Miranda warnings, leading to what Justice O'Connor called "constitutional uncertainty." Whereas Miranda provided certainty in its universality, Quarles left open many questions, and lower courts have had to apply the Court's general holding to separate and distinct fact patterns with little further post-Quarles clarification by the Court.

James F. Van Orden

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Miranda v. Arizona; Search; Seizure.

FURTHER READING

Weller, Jim. "The Legacy of Quarles: A Summary of the Public Safety Exception to Miranda in the Federal Courts." Baylor Law Review 49 (Fall 1997): 1107–28.

Public Defenders

A public defender is a lawyer paid by the government who represents clients unable to afford legal services. The Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution requires that individuals accused of crimes have the assistance of an attorney. Many individuals accused of crimes, however, are unable to afford legal representation. As many as 80 percent of individuals charged with felonies rely on the services of state-paid attorneys. In a series of cases, the U.S. Supreme Court has outlined the circumstances under which an indigent person is entitled to legal representation. As a result of these decisions, the public defender plays an important role in protecting the rights of the accused.

The right to counsel was included in the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) because the British did not allow a person charged with treason or felony to retain counsel, even if the accused could afford one. In the United States, the right to counsel has meant, until recently, that the accused could have an attorney if he could pay for representation. Pursuant to the Sixth Amendment, legislation and court rulings secured that right when an individual was being prosecuted by the federal government. The same requirements were not initially binding on the states.

In Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), the Court held that the circumstances under which counsel was appointed offended the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. A judge appointed all the members of the bar to represent several young black men who were accused of raping two white women. No particular lawyer was appointed until the day of the trial, at which the defendants were convicted and sentenced to death. The Court overturned their convictions and emphasized that the assistance of counsel was fundamental to a fair trial.

Judge Jeanne Meurer gazes intensely at a young defendant during a juvenile-court detention hearing in Austin, Texas. At left is a public defender appointed by the court in cases when a defendant cannot afford legal counsel.
(© Larry Kolvoord/The Image Works)

After this ruling, many states enacted laws providing a right to counsel in cases where the death penalty could be imposed. Other states required counsel in all felony cases regardless of the type of punishment. This variation in state-mandated counsel was eliminated in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), the landmark case that required states to provide the assistance of counsel in all noncapital felony cases. This ruling was later extended to include misdemeanor cases in which there was a possibility of a jail sentence.

After the Gideon ruling, government spending for the purpose of providing legal representation to the indigent dramatically increased. States have, however, created different systems to ensure the assistance of counsel to the indigent. The first type is the public defender system, in which government employees represent defendants. In most states that use this type of system, the public defender is an elected official authorized to hire a staff of attorneys. The second type is the assigned counsel system in which judges appoint private attorneys, often from a list of volunteers, to represent defendants. The majority of states use both systems. Typically, public defender systems are used in urban areas that have a high criminal caseload, whereas rural areas use assigned counsel.

Despite the initial spending for indigent counsel, both of these systems suffer from a lack of adequate funding. In many states, the administration of indigent services and the funding for those services are left to individual counties with little or no state money available to alleviate the financial burden. Another problem stemming from inadequate funding is the low salaries traditionally available for public defenders. With the cost of law school rising, many law students are forced to take out loans to pay for their education. Given that amount of debt, it is increasingly difficult to attract lawyers to indigent representation. Inadequate funding has also raised questions about the quality of representation afforded to the poor.

Another problem often raised with public defenders involves their independence. Public defenders and prosecutors often become well-acquainted with one another over time. Critics argue that this familiarity leads to a system in which the goal is to maximize efficiency rather than to pursue justice. Similarly, critics have alleged that because local jurisdictions both fund and choose public defenders, their independence may be jeopardized through local politics.

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that individuals accused of crimes for which a jail sentence may be imposed are constitutionally entitled to legal representation regardless of their ability to afford such services. There is variation in state methods of providing those services, but public defenders unquestionably play a major role in indigent defense. Public defenders are an important part of the criminal justice system as they attempt to protect the constitutional rights of the poor.

Kara E. Stooksbury

See also: Gideon v. Wainwright; Right to Counsel; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Baum, Lawrence. American Courts: Process and Policy. 5th ed. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.

Hermann, Robert, Eric Single, and John Boston. *Counsel for the Poo*r. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1977.

Scheb, John M., and John M. Scheb II. Criminal Law and Procedure. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1999.

Public Forum

The "public forum" is a concept that involves issues of free speech and assembly; it encompasses public property where citizens are allowed to exercise their rights to speech and assembly with a high degree of freedom from state intervention. The public-forum doctrine refers to the collection of U.S. Supreme Court decisions outlining the limits of the individual's right to use public property for speech and assembly purposes. As such, issues pertaining to the public forum lie at the core of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Advocates of broad protections for speech and assembly in the public forum often emphasize its place in ensuring the proper functioning of a democratic system. Such arguments are built on the idea that democracies rely upon challenges to the status quo and government policies and full, open debate in order to ensure the desirability of such policies. The role of this public forum is to create a place for unpopular opinions to be aired directly to the public in order to create such challenges and debate.

Although arguably essential to a functioning democratic system, the public forum includes certain risks and problems. First, there is a high propensity for order to be threatened and conflicts to occur by allowing groups to assemble in the public forum and unpopular opinions to be aired there. Second, given this likelihood that events in the public forum may threaten order, questions arise about acceptable regulatory limits on speech and assembly within the public forum. Finally, it is often hard to define which public spaces should be included as part of the public forum.

The Supreme Court began the public-forum doctrine in Hague v. Congress of Industrial Organizations, 307 U.S. 496 (1939), and Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939). These cases reversed previous Court opinions that had held the state could prohibit speakers from using public property just as private property owners could prohibit speakers from using their private land for speech and assembly purposes. In Hague and Schneider, the Court declared that the historical right of citizens to use public spaces to discuss and debate public issues limited the state's rights as a property owner. The Court, however, also found that the right to speech and assembly in the public forum was not absolute, and that there still existed a need for state regulation within the public forum.

Just as the public's rights were not absolute, the state's interest in regulating speech and assembly in the public forum was meant by the Court to be limited, and these limits remain a continuing question for courts today. Although the law is in some flux, the guiding principle the Court has followed in resolving questions in this area is that state regulations of speech or assembly in the public forum must be content-neutral. In short, the regulation must not be aimed at, or legitimated in reference to, the content of the speech that is to be regulated. If regulations are not content-neutral, courts view them with suspicion and apply "strict scrutiny" when reviewing them. If the regulations are deemed to be content-neutral, then courts ask only if the regulations are narrowly written in order to further a significant state interest and if alternative means of communication are left open to the speakers being regulated.

Content-neutrality is open to criticism, however, in its use as a category for determining the validity and utility of government regulations. For example, critics claim this approach leaves too much room for the state to create a facade of content-neutrality while actually taking aim at content.

The final contested area of the public-forum doctrine relates to the question of what property is included in the public forum. Although originally thought of exclusively in terms of publicly owned and operated property, there have been attempts to extend the public forum to include privately owned property. Examples of such attempts include incorporating into the public forum company towns, shopping malls, and airports. Along more traditional lines, advocates have sought to include such specific-use public lands as military bases, schools, courthouses, and prison properties in the public forum. Like the movements to include private property, these efforts to bring specific-use public lands within the public-forum doctrine have achieved mixed results. The Supreme Court has shown some willingness to let speakers be banned from these areas and the surrounding property, although the validity of the Court's reasoning has been the subject of debate.

Joshua C. Wilson

See also: Democracy and Civil Liberties; First Amendment; Strict Scrutiny.

FURTHER READING

Kalven, Harry, Jr. The Negro and the First Amendment. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.
Sunstein, Cass. Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: Free Press, 1993.

Publicity Act of 1910

By the end of the nineteenth century, many states had enacted campaign disclosure laws that required candidates for public office and their campaign committees to publicize the sources and amounts of their campaign contributions and expenditures. In the early part of his administration, President Theodore Roosevelt made campaign finance reform a major priority. Congress followed Roosevelt's call for action with the Tillman Act of 1907, which limited the ability of corporations to finance political campaigns. The Publicity Act of 1910 quickly followed to establish the nation's first federal political campaign disclosure system. However, the publicizing of contributors raised free speech concerns under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Publicity Act was directed mainly at political committees, which the act defined as "national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties, and committees, associations, organizations" that shall seek to influence congressional elections in two or more states. The act required political committees to identify contributors of $100 or more and recipients of expenditures of $10 or more. Moreover, the act required those who made independent expenditures of $50 or more in one year to disclose those transactions if they were made "for the purpose of influencing or controlling, in two or more states, the result of" a congressional election. Congress revised the Publicity Act in 1911 to cover prenomination activities conducted in and around political conventions and primary election campaigns.

The Publicity Act of 1910 and its 1911 amendment are noteworthy as examples of early attempts to regulate the role of money in politics and government, but neither was very effective. Although the act required disclosure, it contained no enforcement mechanism. Finally, the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Newberry v. United States, 256 U.S. 232 (1921), effectively nullified the amendment's prenomination coverage by holding that Congress lacked the power under Article I, Section 4 of the U.S. Constitution to regulate a political party's primaries election—a decision that remained effective for two decades until overruled by the Court in United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941). Today, Congress has little authority to regulate primaries.

Clyde E. Willis

See also: Buckley v. Valeo; Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971; Tillman Act of 1907.

FURTHER READING

Anschutz, August V., ed. Campaign Financing in the United States: Issues and Laws. New York: Nova Science, 2002.
Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Pure-Speech Doctrine

"Pure speech" refers to the core expressive freedoms of speech and association protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Protections for pure speech must be inherent in a democracy, for without freedom of thought and expression, tyranny is just a step away. In Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo wrote that free speech was "the matrix, the indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom." Historically, the Supreme Court of the United States has defined pure speech as that which is chiefly expressive, descriptive, or assertive. In this context, most Americans stand by at least the theory that free speech is guaranteed in the First Amendment: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech." However, there are a number of ways to express oneself that many people believe should not be protected. The Supreme Court has tended to analyze First Amendment freedoms under what is known as the preferred-freedoms doctrine, which gives these rights precedence when they come into conflict with others.

At certain periods in U.S. history, the right to free speech was on particularly shaky ground. During the presidency of John Adams, Congress passed the Alien and Sedition Acts, which made "writing, printing, uttering, or publishing any false, scandalous, and malicious writing" against the government a federal crime. Thomas Jefferson called these actions of the Adams administration a "reign of witches." In wartime, the rights of free speech tend to become even more fragile than at other times. For instance, during World War I, Congress basically made it illegal to say that the war was wrong. One man was even arrested for telling a group of women they were wasting their time by knitting socks for the soldiers in the trenches.

At no time was freedom of speech more threatened than under McCarthyism (named for Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin) during the 1940s and 1950s, when Congress engaged in a witch hunt to eradicate any kind of leftist thought in the United States, in the process infringing upon the right of association protected under the First Amendment. During this period, Congress passed the Smith Act of 1940 and the McCarran Internal Security Act of 1950, both of which challenged the foundations of American democracy. During the presidency of Ronald Reagan, free speech was threatened when Reagan handlers made it appear unpatriotic to criticize his conservative administration. During the war on terrorism in the early part of the twenty-first century, patriotism was likewise equated with supporting U.S. intervention in the Middle East.

It is when speech ceases to be "pure" and turns into action, or when speech goes beyond the definition of what is generally acceptable to a person of average intelligence, that the guarantee of total freedom of speech ceases to exist. The classic example of the line between pure speech and action was given by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), in which the Court was asked to decide whether Charles Schenck, who had been charged with conspiracy to violate the Espionage Act of 1917, had a First Amendment right to distribute literature that encouraged World War I draftees to refuse to report for duty. In Schenck, Justice Holmes developed what became known as the "clear-and-present-danger test," which determined that when words were used "in such circumstances . . . as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about . . . substantive evils[,]" they ceased to be protected by the First Amendment.

The Supreme Court has held that certain forms of speech are never "pure," and because of this, they are never protected by the First Amendment. Traditionally, those unprotected forms of speech were identified as slander and libel, "fighting words," obscenity, and sedition. In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Court established a test for determining whether so-called slander (spoken) and libel (written) were protected. Such words were not protected if the user acted with malice aforethought and with total disregard for the truth. In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), the Court determined that "fighting words" were those that "by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace." Obscenity received attention in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), in which the Court established a three-tier test to be used in identifying obscenity that basically allowed states to define what was obscene according to the dictates of their own diverse cultures.

The Supreme Court's position on sedition has varied, partly depending on whether the country has been at war. The Court tried out Justice Holmes's clear-and-present-danger test in Schenck in 1919, deciding that seditious speech must be weighed against the immediate dangers that follow the speech. Several months later, the Court seemed to veer toward the "bad-tendency" doctrine with Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919), when the justices agreed that the intention of the five defendants "was to excite, at the supreme crisis of the war, disaffection, sedition, riots, and, as they hoped, revolution," thereby creating a tendency toward violent and disruptive behavior. The overall rule appeared in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), in which the Court determined that sedition occurred when an individual tried to overthrow the government with the means to bring it about.

Ironically, speech does not have to be truthful in order to be considered "pure." The classic example of this is the rhetoric of political campaigns. For instance, in the presidential campaign of 1988, which was as acrimonious as any other in recent history, Republican George H. W. Bush waged a negative campaign against Governor Michael Dukakis, his Democratic opponent. Vice President Bush called Dukakis's patriotism and loyalty into question when he "charged" him with being a "card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union" and accused him of being "soft on crime."

Whether First Amendment protections extend to what is called "speech-plus" may depend on circumstances. The Court extended free speech protection to symbolic speech in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), which dealt with high school students who wore black armbands to school to protest the Vietnam War, and to commercial speech (advertising) in, for example, 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996). In Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003), the Court backed away from approving speech-plus when the majority upheld a Virginia statute that banned burning a cross on public property or on private property belonging to another person if the purpose of the act was to intimidate a person or group. The Court admitted that "the protections the First Amendment affords speech and expressive conduct are not absolute."

Abortion protests have provided a number of cases in which the courts have been asked to determine the line between pure speech and unprotected action. For example, in Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), the Court upheld a gag rule (promoted by both Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush) that prevented workers in family planning clinics that received Title X funds from even uttering the word "abortion." Dissenting in Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000), in which the Court was again asked to determine the rights of abortion protesters outside family planning clinics, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy acknowledged that words considered pure speech were often "imprecise."

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Democracy and Civil Liberties; First Amendment; Palko v. Connecticut; Whitney v. California.

FURTHER READING

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Levy, Leonard. Freedom of Speech and Press in American History: Legacy of Suppression. New York: Harper and Row, 1963.

Simon, James F. The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Tedford, Thomas L. Freedom of Speech in the United States. 2d ed. New York: Random House, 1995.

Putney Debates

On October 28, 1647, the General Council of England's New Model Army met in the town of Putney to quell insurgency within its ranks, staging a debate between the Army's leaders and "agitators" elected to represent the concerns of the rank and file. Lasting two weeks, the Putney debates revolved around defining the "liberty" of Englishmen, as participants raised issues of parliamentary representation, manhood suffrage, religious tolerance, and limited government. Perhaps at no other time in European history had the ideals of the American Revolution been anticipated so clearly. More striking, however, from a modern vantage point, was that these debates took place within a militia overwhelmed by puritanical religious passions.

The extraordinary events at Putney emerged during the English Civil War. In 1642 conflicts between the House of Commons and King Charles I reached a fevered pitch when Parliament voted to create an army to vie against that of the king. Historically, Parliament had been a weak sister in English government, minimally representative of the people, divided between Houses of Lords and Commons, and existing only when called by the king. Religious disputes added fuel to the fire: To parliamentarians, King Charles I, who proclaimed his "divine right" to rule, seemed to be a closet Catholic in conspiracy with the pope; they, by contrast, had embraced Presbyterianism and other, more radical forms of Puritanism. In short, the Anglican middle ground became less tenable by the day. Charles surrendered after a four-year fight, and between 1646 and 1648 all parties were in negotiation over the new government. Parliament moved to reduce and redeploy the Army, but those who had fought against the king now worried that their interests would be forgotten. Furthermore, Army radicals had joined a movement, headed by John Lilburne, Richard Overton, and William Walwyn, that called for democratic reforms and the abolition of kingship and the House of Lords. At Putney their moderate opponents, notably Henry Ireton, dubbed them "the Levellers" (for the notion of "leveling" the prevailing class and power system).

Shortly before Putney, the Levellers had issued two key statements of purpose: "The Case of the Army Truly Stated" and "Agreement of the People." The former listed the Army's grievances, called for recognition of popular sovereignty and regular parliamentary elections, and demanded tax reform to aid the poor; the latter condensed these concerns into a written contract, dictating equal representation based on geography, parliamentary supremacy, religious tolerance, and the equality of all men before the law. Army leaders, including Lieutenant General Oliver Cromwell and Commissary General Ireton, his son-in-law, feared that such radicalism would tie their hands in negotiations with the king and Parliament. Together, Cromwell and Ireton sought to confuse and convince the Agitators. In the early stages of the Putney debates, they argued that Army unity must be preserved at all costs, and that unity depended upon continued adherence to Ireton's "A Solemn Engagement of the Army," a contract that could not be broken without dire consequences.

The Levellers, led by Thomas Rainborough, John Wildman, and Edward Sexby, countered that the "laws of nature" derived from God, canceling any unjust contract that failed to guarantee individual freedom. Unconvinced, Ireton held that natural law required that covenants be kept, and that tradition, property, and the common law be preserved. Ireton and Cromwell continued to believe that English liberty derived from an "ancient constitution," the age-old balance of king and the two houses of Parliament (Lords and Commons) all sharing in legislative power. Although both sides agreed on some particulars, such as parliamentary reform and expanded liberties, Cromwell and his cohorts pushed for protections of traditional privilege, including property qualifications for voting (the "freehold"), and respect for monarchical authority. Ireton argued that government was designed to guard the "permanent fixed interest" of the community against the property-destroying anarchy that would be unleashed if any man could exercise political power. Rainborough responded that "the poorest he that is in England hath a life to live, as the greatest he," thus making suffrage a "birthright." Against Ireton's specter of lawlessness and leveling, Rainborough asserted that without the active consent of the poor to their government, the rich would be free to steal and oppress.

The debates had mixed outcomes. Cromwell remained a dominant figure, but the Agitators pushed him toward acceptance of popular sovereignty, wider suffrage, and institutional reform. The Leveller movement waned and waxed again before being suppressed, its leaders killed or arrested for treason. At the same time, Parliament was purged of royalists, the House of Lords was abolished, and the king was executed on the way to a brief experiment in English republicanism. For their part, the Putney debates embodied "liberalism" and "democracy," both in theory and in practice, long before those concepts became commonplace, and they continue to demonstrate the vital historical link between radical Protestantism and the modern defense of individual liberty.

Robb A. McDaniel

See also: English Roots of Civil Liberties; Locke, John; Natural Law; Natural Rights.

FURTHER READING

Hill, Christopher. The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas During the English Revolution. New York: Penguin, 1972.

Macpherson, C. B. The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism: Hobbes to Locke. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.

Sharp, Andrew, ed. The English Levellers. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Tuck, Richard. Philosophy and Government, 1572–1651. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Woodhouse, A.S.P., ed. Puritanism and Liberty: Being the Army Debates (1647–9) from the Clarke Manuscripts with Supplementary Documents. London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 1992.

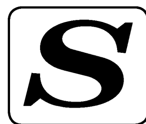
The Encyclopedia of Civil Liberties in America

Volume Three

Editors
David Schultz and John R. Vile



SHARPE REFERENCE
an imprint of M.E. Sharpe, Inc.

Q

Quakers

The involvement of Quakers in civil liberties began with their emergence as a Protestant denomination in England in the 1650s. Forbidden to worship freely, they became advocates for freedom of religion. Over the next three centuries, their concern for civil rights expanded to encompass a much more wide-ranging agenda.

Quakerism developed in England during the English Civil War and Interregnum (1651–1653). With the passage of the Test Act in 1661 and Conventicle Act in 1664, Quakers were denied freedom of religion. They endured imprisonment and heavy fines while continuing to advocate freedom of conscience. In the first few years of Charles II's reign, over 8,500 Quakers were imprisoned for their religious beliefs; later in his reign, Quakers were fined over 48,000 pounds for refusing to obey laws dictating religious conformity.

Quakers began emigrating to the colonies where they found persecution in Massachusetts but a sympathetic government in Rhode Island. With the establishment of a Quaker community in West New Jersey in 1675 and the founding of Pennsylvania in 1682, Quakers were able to establish governments built around the right to religious freedom. Closely linked to religious freedom for the Quakers was their refusal to take oaths. Pennsylvania's constitution guaranteed the right of individuals to affirm rather than to swear.

Just as freedom of religion was part of early Quakerism, so too was pacifism. Quakers' emphasis on peace meant that until the mid-1750s Pennsylvania had no formal militia and paid no taxes to support the British crown's army. In 1755, the Assembly finally established a militia to help defend the colony against attacks by the French and Indians, but legislators included a clause that guaranteed conscientious objectors exemption from service. When the Revolutionary War began, Quakers took great pains to establish their neutrality, even though that neutrality was often interpreted as support for the crown. During the Revolutionary War, Quakers worked to serve those affected by the war, treating the injured on both sides and providing food and shelter where necessary.

The Civil War brought Quaker pacifism into the public eye again. Though Quakers opposed slavery and were active abolitionists, their religious principles forbade them to fight. In both North and South, Quakers' refusal to serve in the army brought them under suspicion. They continued their service activities during the Civil War and included freed slaves in their relief efforts. By the time the United States entered World War I, Quakers had become active in protecting the rights of conscientious objectors, and throughout the twentieth century, the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) provided legal advice and counsel for those seeking conscientious objector status.

Whereas freedom of religion and pacifism were Quaker principles from the beginning, their opposition to slavery developed over the course of the eighteenth century. In 1696, the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting recommended that Quakers refrain from importing slaves but provided no penalties or consequences for those who ignored the recommendation. In 1733, Elihu Coleman published the first officially sanctioned antislavery tract, and in 1743, the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting forbade Quakers to import or buy slaves. In 1754, church officials announced that it was unequivocally wrong to own slaves, but it was not until 1774 that slave-owning Quakers were subject to being disowned by the Yearly Meeting. Meetings in other areas followed a similar pattern, although in North Carolina, state law outlawed the manumission (emancipation) of slaves; there, Quakers resorted to the tactic of declaring the slaves the property of the Yearly Meeting, which allowed them complete freedom, including the right to leave the state and settle elsewhere.

Quakers did not confine themselves to the issue of slaveholding within their own communities, however. As their antislavery stance advanced, they became active in the abolitionist movement; leaders included Benjamin Lundy, John Greenleaf Whittier, and Lucretia Mott. Quakers also became active participants in the Underground Railroad, helping escaping slaves to reach safety in the north and in Canada. From the inception of Quakerism, its practitioners had refused to obey laws that they believed were unjust or violated God's teachings; their participation in the Underground Railroad marked the first time that they secretly broke the law, as it was not their safety or lives that were in jeopardy.

Slavery was only one of the issues that mobilized Quaker activists in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Suffrage also attracted women such as Lucretia Mott (pictured), who helped organize the 1848 Seneca Falls (New York) Conference on women's rights. (Library of Congress)

Slavery was only one of the issues that mobilized Quaker activists in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Women's rights, including suffrage and the right to separate property, attracted women such as Lucretia Mott, who helped organize the 1848 Seneca Falls (New York) Convention on women's rights, and Susan B. Anthony, the well-known suffragette. After World War II, Quakers became active supporters of the civil rights movement. Although the issues changed over time, the Quakers' efforts on behalf of civil liberties did not.

Carol Loar

See also: Christian Roots of Civil Liberties; Civil Disobedience.

FURTHER READING

Barbour, Hugh, and J. William Frost. The Quakers: Denominations in America. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.

Sonderlund, Jean R. Quakers and Slavery: A Divided Spirit. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985.

Quarantines

The government's use of quarantine as a means of containing contagious diseases raises important issues as to the extent to which officials can infringe individual fundamental liberties, such as not being detained without a hearing or having freedom of movement. The practice of quarantine began during the fourteenth century in an effort to protect coastal cities from plague epidemics. Ships arriving in Venice, Italy, from infected ports were required to sit at anchor for forty days before landing.

Yellow-fever epidemics led to the passage of federal quarantine legislation by Congress in 1878 that created a role for the federal government in quarantine activities. In 1892 the law was reinterpreted to give the government more authority in imposing quarantine requirements because of cholera epidemics. Another act of Congress in 1893 further clarified this federal role. Local quarantine stations, where ships and passengers were held in quarantine, were gradually turned over to the government as local authorities came to realize the benefits of federal involvement.

In the 1970s, the Centers for Disease Control of the Public Health Service reduced the size of the quarantine program and changed its focus from routine

Families living in the Temperance Hotel, a shelter for poor people in Seattle, Washington, celebrate the end of a smallpox quarantine of the building in April 1946. Many states had laws that quarantined individuals suspected of having communicable diseases. (© Seattle Post-Intelligencer Collection; Museum of History and Industry/Corbis) inspection to program management and problem intervention. An enhanced surveillance system was developed to monitor the onset of epidemics abroad and the inspection process as international traffic increased.

The Public Health Service Act provides for preventing the introduction, transmission, and spread of communicable diseases from foreign countries into the United States. The Public Health Service's Division of Global Migration and Quarantine is empowered to detain, medically examine, or conditionally release individuals and wildlife suspected of carrying a communicable disease. Diseases that trigger quarantine are listed in a presidential executive order and currently include cholera, diphtheria, infectious tuberculosis, plague, smallpox, yellow fever, and viral hemorrhagic fevers, such as Marburg, Ebola, and Congo-Crimean.

Under the concept of police powers, quarantine laws have been enacted to protect the public health, but they have had an adverse impact on the civil rights of some individuals. In Compagnie Francaise de Navigation a Vapeur v. Board of Health of State of Louisiana, 186 U.S. 380 (1902), the U.S. Supreme Court addressed a potentially discriminatory practice. In 1900, New Orleans, Louisiana, was experiencing an epidemic of smallpox. The numbers of immigrants arriving at New Orleans as a point of entry had increased, the majority of whom were from Italy. The Court upheld the restriction of healthy persons from the epidemic area.

The evolution of personal rights, the development of due process mechanisms in government, and the success of public health efforts have limited the use of police powers in recent decades to adopt isolation rather than quarantine as the means of responding to contagious diseases. Isolation applies to the ill individual. Voluntary isolation is common, as when children stay out of school because of chickenpox, or restaurant workers remain off work while infectious with hepatitis. Quarantine is the restriction of well people who may have been exposed to a disease. This may include exclusion from an area as in the New Orleans case, or it may entail restricted liberty, as dealt with in Crayton v. Larabee, 110 N.E. 355, 220 N.Y. 493 (1917), which involved the restriction of a woman to her home for several weeks after her potential exposure to smallpox in Syracuse, New York. She brought suit against the board of health for wrongful imprisonment, among other allegations, but the appeals court supported the discretionary use of police powers by the board of health.

The evolution in the concept of civil liberties has significant implications for the quarantine procedure. Because there has been no significant use of quarantine in many years, and freedom of movement is an assumed right, the procedure would no doubt result in outrage and legal challenge. The modern threat of emerging diseases, bioterrorism, and rapid international travel have resulted in the use of quarantine in China and Canada to control severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS). In the United States, there is conflict regarding the use of quarantine in any case. The Vaccination Liberation Organization and the Citizens Council on Health Care are among the groups that have challenged the concepts of forced vaccination and quarantine in smallpox planning.

Individual states may have a broad or limited regulatory framework for the use of quarantine. These statutes and regulations may very well be preempted by the Department of Health and Human Services once the scope of an epidemic is recognized. In cases of unidentified disease like SARS, this may take some time. If the disease is quickly identified and well understood, such as smallpox or plague, the Public Health Service may rapidly implement pertinent federal laws that provide for the apprehension, detention, or conditional release of individuals for diseases identified through executive order.

As for civil liberties, public policy and the courts have determined that the restriction of individual liberty is appropriate to combat a public health issue. In quarantine, however, the virulence of the disease, the mechanism of disease transmission, the susceptibility of contacts, and the scope of the epidemic must all be considered, and these varying factors pose the potential for medical, political, and judicial conflict.

Kevin G. Pearce

See also: Bill of Rights; First Amendment; Police Power.

FURTHER READING

Citizens Council on Health Care. http://www.cchc-mn.org/activities/smallpox_vaccine.php3.
Vaccination Liberation Organization (Idaho). http://www.vaclib.org/legal/idahoplan.htm.

Quinlan, In re (1976)

The difficult facts presented in In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), ignited a firestorm of controversy among the public and the medical community about an individual's right to die. Karen Ann Quinlan (1954–1985) collapsed just sixteen days past her twenty-first birthday on April 15, 1975, and slipped into a coma. The exact cause of the collapse was not determined, but she fell into a chronic persistent vegetative state, relying on a respirator to breathe. Her adoptive parents, Joseph and Julia Quinlan, requested in July 1975 that the artificial means of medical technology prolonging Karen's life be ended because the doctors could give them no hope of her recovery. Karen's attending physician refused to do so, and the hospital sustained that denial on the grounds that her parents could not make that decision on her behalf since she was an adult and living on her own prior to her collapse.

Her parents then filed litigation to have Joseph Quinlan appointed as her guardian with an express grant of authority by the court to permit him to discontinue the medical procedures artificially sustaining her life. The judge, following the standard practice in such cases, appointed a guardian to represent Karen's interests. This request was opposed by the treating physicians, the hospital, the county prosecutor, and the attorney general of New Jersey. During the course of the trial, expert testimony was adduced that there was no course of treatment that would lead to an improvement in Karen's condition, but the trial judge denied the Quinlans' petition in November 1975.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

The New Jersey Supreme Court, relying primarily on the constitutional right to privacy first established in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), and on the state constitution, reversed the lower court and granted the Quinlans' request. In a decision generally viewed as activist in character, New Jersey Chief Justice Richard J. Hughes stated, "There comes a point at which the individual's rights overcome the state's interest" in maintaining life and that Karen should not be forced to "endure the unendurable." She was removed from the respirator in May 1976, although she retained a feeding tube. Karen survived another nine years without ever regaining consciousness and died on June 11, 1985.

The Quinlans' situation spawned widespread debate encompassing both the public and the medical profession about whether it was always in the best interest of patients to keep them alive and about the ethical issues inherent in such decisions. Beginning with California, all states enacted laws permitting the execution of living wills (advance directives) or durable powers of attorney for health purposes that would advise physicians and family members of a person's wishes regarding the artificial maintenance of life and authorizing them to take the appropriate steps to meet those wishes.

Susan Coleman

See also: Right to Die; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Lostaglio, Keith L. "Karen Ann Quinlan." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes, vol. 18, 42–3. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Quirin, Ex parte (1942)

In 1942 eight Nazi saboteurs landed on the U.S. East Coast with materiel to destroy war facilities. They buried their German uniforms and equipment and proceeded in civilian clothing across the country. Upon their arrest, President Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered them to be tried before a military commission. The saboteurs, charged with violating both the law of war and the articles of war Congress passed that authorized U.S. entry into World War II, challenged the constitutionality of the president's order and the jurisdictional authority of the commission.

In Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously upheld the military commission's jurisdiction, although stated it would not "define . . . the ultimate boundaries of the jurisdiction of military tribunals." The Court stated that the congressional articles of war provided for trial before military commissions of such offenses. The president exercised "the authority conferred upon him by Congress" and "such authority as the Constitution . . . gives the commander-in-chief." The Court avoided determining to what extent the president had constitutional power to create military commissions without congressional legislation.

The Court drew a distinction between "lawful" and "unlawful" combatants. Both lawful and unlawful combatants were subject to capture and detention. Moreover, enemy combatants who without uniform came secretly through the lines with the purpose of waging war, as the saboteurs had done, were not "entitled to the status of prisoners of war but were offenders against the law of war" subject "to trial and punishment by military tribunals for acts which render their belligerency unlawful." The alleged U.S. citizenship of some of the saboteurs was irrelevant because the law of war may be violated by U.S. citizens as well.

The Court also disposed of Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866), which was invoked to protect the right of civilians to jury trial in areas where civil tribunals operated, as having specific reference to "the facts before it." As for the saboteurs, a jury trial was not procedure in a military tribunal for offenses against the law of war. The constitutional provisions were designed to protect trial by jury as "known and applied" and not to extend to new situations. Finally, the Court held that no claim for habeas corpus (petition for release from unlawful confinement) could be based on the articles of war (although the justices were divided as to the grounds for this aspect of the decision).

Quirin has been widely cited to justify President George W. Bush's military order of November 13, 2001, allowing military commissions to try non-U.S. suspects of terrorism. Some commentators lauded the Supreme Court's decision to hear the Quirin case as an example of "the rule of law at its best," but others spoke of "rush to judgment" and described the Quirin decision as "a ceremonious detour to a predetermined end" in which "the drive for unanimity limited and conditioned what could be said." Advocates and opponents of Bush's military order have emphasized different aspects of the decision.

Nada Mourtada-Sabbah

See also: Milligan, Ex parte; Patriot Act.

FURTHER READING

Cushman, Robert E. "The Case of the Nazi Saboteurs." American Political Science Review 36 (December 1942): 1082.

Danelski, Daniel J. "The Saboteurs' Case." Journal of Supreme Court History 61 (1996): 1.

Mason, Alpheus T. "Inter Arma Silent Leges: Chief Justice Stone's Views." Harvard Law Review 69 (1956): 806.

R

R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992)

In R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), the U.S. Supreme Court examined a Saint Paul, Minnesota, hate-speech ordinance that banned the use of Nazi swastikas, burning crosses, and similar symbols to arouse fear or anger on the basis of race, color, creed, religion, or gender. R.A.V. (initials for the appellant) and other white teenagers in a group had burned a cross on the lawn of a black neighbor and were arrested under the Bias-Motivated Crime Ordinance. The primary issue in the case was whether such forms of expression were constitutionally protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The city argued that the law prohibited the use of fighting words—words used in a specific context that are likely to bring about a breach of peace or disorder and that, traditionally, are not protected by the First Amendment. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the ordinance represented what is called "viewpoint discrimination." In the majority opinion, Justice Antonin Scalia wrote that the ordinance was unconstitutional because it banned the offensive symbols only when used by the proponents of racial (or religious) hatred but not by other groups. Speakers who had other intentions could use the symbols as they pleased. The city prevented the use of these fighting words only by specific groups, therefore making the law an unconstitutional restriction on speech based on its content. Cities and states could not pick and choose which groups could use fighting words on the basis of their viewpoint.

Furthermore, Saint Paul listed only certain sorts of bias that were prohibited. For example, a speaker using a symbol meant to arouse fear on the basis of sexual orientation would not be punished under the ordinance. This distinction also made the ordinance impermissibly content-based.

Although R.A.V. was a unanimous decision, concurring Justices Byron R. White, Harry A. Blackmun, Sandra Day O'Connor, and John Paul Stevens decided the case on vastly different grounds. They saw the city's ordinance as overbroad because it prohibited not only nonprotected fighting words but also speech that, although offensive, did not reach a level of directionality and threat against specific individuals such that it could be considered fighting words.

The Court subsequently dealt with this concern in Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003), in which it held that laws banning cross burning were constitutionally permissible only when the action was carried out with an attempt to intimidate. This decision was consistent with R.A.V. because it ruled specifically on cross burning. The Court noted that this particular act had a long history in the United States and that in circumstances in which there is a direct intent to intimidate specific individuals, burning a cross becomes a truly threatening action rather than being simply speech.

Additionally, the Supreme Court has permitted states to punish criminal acts like assault that are motivated by racial hatred more harshly than others, treating them differently from words that insult. In Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993), the Court upheld the constitutionality of a Wisconsin hate-crime act that allowed for stricter punishments if a criminal act was motivated by bias. Because the law was tied to conduct rather than speech, the Court allowed the Wisconsin law even though the state opted to punish racially motivated crimes while not punishing, for example, crimes motivated by bias against the poor. Just as employers may be punished for discriminatory hiring practices, when a crime is similarly motivated by bias, it has ceased to be speech and therefore loses First Amendment protection.

Ronald Kahn

See also: First Amendment; Hate Crimes; Hate Speech; Texas v. Johnson; Virginia v. Black.

FURTHER READING

Greenawalt, Kent. Fighting Words: Individuals, Communities, and the Liberties of Speech. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.

Racial Profiling

Racial profiling is a law enforcement practice of stopping and interrogating persons, inspecting or searching vehicles driven by such persons, or initiating investigative procedures against such persons, who because of their race or ethnicity share a particular statistical profile with actual and suspected criminal offenders. This practice raises the question of balancing fundamental constitutional protections against the need for public safety, and neither a 2000 presidential debate in New York City's Harlem nor police procedures adopted after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, offered a clear resolution. The controversial practice of racial profiling earned national attention after New Jersey state troopers shot three black and Hispanic men on the New Jersey Turnpike following a traffic stop in 1998. For some individuals, the probability of being profiled—satirically known as either "driving while black" or "flying while Muslim"—intensified with the "war on drugs" and the "war on terrorism."

The war on drugs has been identified particularly as the single most important factor that explains the prevalence of blacks and Latinos among criminal suspects and defendants and police dependence on racial profiling. Because of the supposed disproportionate number of minorities engaged in drug offenses, law enforcement agencies developed a pattern of interdiction premised on finding persons involved with illicit drug activity. As a result of this perception, law enforcement agencies began systematically to target minority groups, believing that such tactics (playing the odds) would yield a higher proportion of criminal drug offenders than alternative report-and-respond tactics. Yet the language and attitudes underlying racial profiling are constitutionally questionable given the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, which protect against unreasonable search and seizure and arrest without probable cause and guarantee individuals the right to due process.

For example, an American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) report (Harris 1999) cited a 1985 Florida police guideline titled "The Common Characteristics of Drug Couriers." In the report troopers were cautioned "to be suspicious of rental cars, 'scrupulous obedience to traffic laws,' and drivers wearing 'lots of gold,' or who do not 'fit the vehicle' and 'ethnic groups associated with the drug trade.' " The ACLU report documented anecdotal and statistical evidence suggesting that minorities were twice as likely to face a traffic stop than were other groups.

Other researchers have compiled data on suspected racial profiling practices by using law enforcement records from across America. In New Jersey, for example, the New York Times reported that internal investigations long before the highly public 1998 incident suggested that then-State Attorney General Peter G. Verniero knew that troopers disproportionately stopped black and Hispanic motorists. A Los Angeles Times article reported that data from traffic stops revealed similar patterns in Los Angeles. A 1999 report titled Crises of the Anti-Drug Effort found that blacks in Maryland were stopped more often than their overall distribution in that state or issuance of driver's licenses should suggest. Civil libertarians found these data disturbing given both the enactment by Congress in 1994 of legislation authorizing the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) to conduct investigations into racial profiling and to bring lawsuits, and a 2001 DOJ report indicating that although minorities were more likely to be stopped, "they were less likely to be in possession of contraband."

Claiming that such statistics have been based on faulty scientific data, critics have cited studies revealing that although blacks constitute only 13 percent of the population, black drug offenders account for almost triple that number for those arrested or sentenced to prison. Other observers have suggested that racial profiling may be more myth than empirical reality, given the preponderance of anecdotal evidence and institutional self-evaluation procedures.

Both this tension between anecdotal evidence and empirical substantiation and questions of institutional accountability have driven class-action suits and group protest, but these decisions have sometimes given sanction to increased governmental power. In a 1975 case involving border patrols, United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Fourth Amendment did not allow Mexican ethnic appearance to be the only factor used by officers to stop a motorist but did allow appearance to be a factor. In a case involving evidence

Activists and students gathered on April 10, 2003, at the JFK Federal Building in Boston, Massachusetts, to protest the "Special Registration Program" developed by the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services of the Department of Homeland Security. Opponents of the program believe it targets Arab, Muslim, and South Asian men. These immigrants must submit to photographing and fingerprinting or face severe legal penalties.
(© 2003 Marilyn Humphries/The Image Works)

of illicit drug activity found during a minor traffic violation, the Court in Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996), dealt a blow to critics of racial profiling. In this unanimous decision, the Court ruled "the temporary detention of a motorist upon probable cause to believe that he has violated the traffic laws does not violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable seizures." For the ACLU and other civil rights groups, the Whren decision enabled police constitutionally to engage in "pretextual stops"—using a minor traffic violation to facilitate stopping a vehicle and its passengers. Civil rights groups deplored the Court's acceptance of pretextual stops, particularly given suspicions that police officers would have the constitutional latitude to use traffic violations as probable cause for racial profiling—a growing concern given treatment of Muslims and Arabs in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., which ushered in a new era of heightened patriotism and stringent security measures.

Citing violation of fundamental rights, civil libertarians and civil rights groups have used Whren and cases involving suspected terrorists to initiate legislation and lawsuits against city and police officials. These groups are also pressuring other states to follow the lead of the nine states—California, Connecticut, Kansas, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Washington—and a plethora of cities that have already either defined racial profiling and prohibited it, taken legislative steps to address it, or adopted legislation requiring police departments to collect data on traffic stops, including the race, gender, and ethnicity of motorists and the nature of the violation. To date, Congress has not passed the End Racial Profiling Act (ERPA), proposed in 2001, authorizing entities to "develop and implement best practice devices and systems to ensure the racially neutral administration of justice" or mandating the collection of data to determine racial profiling. Perhaps Congress has been reluctant to address racial profiling again given passage of the Patriot Act and equally persuasive arguments supporting efforts to ensure homeland security. In March 2003, the Supreme Court refused to intervene in a Patriot Act surveillance case brought by civil rights groups against the Justice Department.

Tyson King-Meadows

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Roadblocks; Search; Seizure; Terry v. Ohio.

FURTHER READING

Buerger, Michael. "Supervisory Challenges Arising from Racial Profiling Legislation." Police Quarterly 5 (June 2, 2002): 380–408.

Cole, David, and John Lamberth. "The Fallacy of Racial Profiling." New York Times, May 13, 2001.

Daunt, Tina, and Jill Leovy. "LAPD Offers First Data on Traffic Stops: Study Finds Blacks and Latinos Were More Likely to Be Searched When Pulled Over by Police." Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2003, A1.

Eggen, Dan. "High Court Won't Rule on Terror Surveillance." Washington Post, March 25, 2003.

Fredrickson, Darin D., and Raymond P. Siljander. Racial Profiling: Eliminating the Confusion Between Racial and Criminal Profiling and Clarifying What Constitutes Unfair Discrimination and Persecution. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 2002.

Goodstein, Laurie. "Directive on Searches." New York Times, November 20, 2001.

Hanley, Robert. "Racial Data on Turnpike Arrests Criticized." New York Times, March 28, 2002.

Harris, David. "Driving While Black: Racial Profiling on Our Nation's Highways," June 1999. American Civil Liberties Union Special Report. http://archive.aclu.org/Profiling/Report/Index.Html.

———. Profiles in Injustice: Why Racial Profiling Cannot Work. New York: New Press, 2002.

Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. "Wrong Then, Wrong Now: Racial Profiling Before and After September 11," 2003. http://www.civilrights.org/publications/reports/racial_profiling.

Mansnerus, Laura. "Verniero Admits Being Lax on Profiling Data." New York Times, March 29, 2001.

Peterson, Iver. "Attorney General Was Alerted to Profiling, Predecessor Says." New York Times, March 22, 2001.

———. "Racial Study of Speeders Is Released in New Jersey." New York Times, March 27, 2002.

Shear, Michael D. "[Virginia] Finds No Proof of Racial Profiling." Washington Post, January 26, 2002.

Random Drug Testing

Courts have been confronted in recent decades with legal challenges to programs designed to subject persons to warrantless and even suspicionless testing for illegal use of drugs. When conducted by a public agency or state actor, testing for drug use through urinalysis or blood tests is a search that raises Fourth Amendment concerns, as the U.S. Supreme Court noted in Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989). Under the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, individuals are protected against unreasonable search and seizure, and drug testing is literally a "search" of the person. The Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination also is at issue, because testing results may reveal evidence of illegal drug use and thus criminal behavior. (When there is no government action, for example, testing is required by private employers, no civil liberties issue arises under the U.S. Constitution, though tort law questions of privacy and state constitutional claims may be implicated.) Notwithstanding Fourth Amendment protections, courts have upheld testing performed on an entire population of individuals (for example, all applicants for a job) or on a randomized basis, reasoning that no individualized stigma attaches to the personal search and that such a program may be constitutional if certain safeguards are met.

In Ferguson v. City of Charleston, 530 U.S. 1295 (2000), the Supreme Court defined the category of constitutionally permissible suspicionless searches by employing a balancing test weighing the intrusion on the individual's privacy interest against the "special needs" that justified the program. The first privacy concern raised by drug testing is the actual procuring of a sample. Blood testing requires a person to sit for a minor medical procedure in which a needle penetrates the body, essentially a per se intrusion on personal privacy. Urinalysis requires some sort of monitoring, at least aural and sometimes visual, of the act of urination, usually considered among the most private of bodily functions.

The second major privacy concern relates to the handling of test results. In particular, courts have been concerned that warrantless, suspicionless testing be done for purposes unrelated to criminal law enforcement, and that results not be routinely made available to criminal authorities. The Court has stressed that the "special need" officials claim as justification for testing must be separate from a general law enforcement interest, and has insisted that there be protection against the dissemination of the results to third parties, particularly law enforcement authorities. The Court also has found testing less offensive when it results in disqualification from eligibility for particular benefits, such as job promotion or extracurricular school programs, rather than in imposition of an affirmative penalty.

The "special needs" designation originated in a concurring opinion by Justice Harry A. Blackmun in New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), which involved a school official's search of a student's purse. Justice Blackmun agreed with the T.L.O. majority that in limited circumstances probable cause was not required if a search was reasonable given the balance of governmental and private interests at stake, but he insisted that such a test should be applied only "in those exceptional circumstances in which special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement, make the warrant and probable-cause requirement impracticable." The reference to "special needs" was ultimately incorporated into the Court's opinions in O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987) (plurality opinion); Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987); and Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646

(1995). The T.L.O. decision also made it clear that public school officials have custodial and tutelary responsibilities not applicable to the general public, and these duties permit much more flexible standards for searches and seizures; thus individualized suspicion often has been ruled unnecessary in the context of testing public school students.

Critics have argued that there is insufficient evidence that random testing in the workplace reduces drug use. They also suggest that testing may even be counterproductive by encouraging drug users to switch from drugs that remain detectable in the body for an extended period, such as marijuana, to drugs that dissipate in the blood in a shorter period, such as alcohol and crack cocaine. Preliminary studies of testing programs for student athletes have found indications that random drug testing does reduce some forms of drug use, though there also is evidence that some students subject to testing may switch from use of illicit drugs to use of alcohol.

With the imprimatur of the courts, drug testing has become widespread in a variety of educational and occupational contexts. This practice has led to the development of not only a burgeoning industry of commercial drug testing providers but also an emerging industry claiming to provide techniques and materials useful in defeating drug testing.

Ronald Steiner

See also: Board of Education v. Earls; Fourth Amendment; Search; Seizure; Vernonia School District v. Acton.

FURTHER READING

DeCew, Judith Wagner. In Pursuit of Privacy: Law, Ethics, and the Rise of Technology. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Goldberg, Linn, et al. "Drug Testing Athletes to Prevent Substance Abuse: Background and Pilot Study Results of the SATURN (Student Athlete Testing Using Random Notification) Study." Journal of Adolescent Health 32, 1 (January 2003): 16.

Zeese, Kevin B. Drug Testing Legal Manual and Practice Aids. 2d ed. Deerfield, IL: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 2002.

Rankin v. McPherson (1987)

In Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the First Amendment protected a public employee from being fired for speech her employer deemed to be offensive. Although the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution broadly provides for a right to free speech, this right is not absolute and is subject to some governmental regulation. As the Supreme Court explained in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), the First Amendment does not protect someone who yells "fire" in a crowded theater, unless of course there really is a fire. Accordingly, what restrictions on free speech are reasonable, such that they do not violate the First Amendment? That was the issue in Rankin, which concerned a public employee whose employment was terminated for a comment that her employer considered offensive. Writing for the five–four majority of the Court, Justice Thurgood Marshall held that the First Amendment protected this public employee's right not to be fired for her speech.

Sometime after the assassination attempt on President Ronald Reagan in 1981, a clerical employee at a Texas county constable's office (which deals in law enforcement) said to a fellow employee, "If they go after him again, I hope they get him." The employee, who was still on her probationary period, was fired for making this comment. The Supreme Court previously had provided in Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968), and Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983), that public employees do not lose their First Amendment rights upon accepting employment with a government entity. However, the employee's rights must be balanced against the employer's interests in fulfilling the obligation to provide efficient public services, and the speech must be of appropriate public concern to be protected.

Applying the standards set out in Pickering and Connick, the Supreme Court in Rankin determined that the comment was a matter of public concern, since it was made during a conversation on President Reagan's policies. In balancing the employee's First Amendment right to make a comment of public concern and the state's interests in promoting effectual public service, the Court held that the government's interests did not outweigh those of the individual, in part because her comment was not a detriment to the efficient functioning of the public agency. Furthermore, because her job was clerical and she was not involved in confidential or policy-making matters, her job and comment had no repercussions for the law enforcement agency. Accordingly, the public employee was improperly fired because of the content of her speech, and as a consequence she was entitled to reinstatement.

Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. concurred in the majority's opinion, stating that the comment was a matter of public concern, but it was made in private by the employee to her boyfriend, with no expectation it would be overheard; thus, the employer could not punish this employee for private speech that is routine in the workplace. On the other hand, writing for the dissenters, Justice Antonin Scalia contended that the comment was not a matter of public concern, and even if it were, the law enforcement agency was justified in not permitting such comments by its employees. Notwithstanding Justice Scalia's arguments, the Supreme Court majority held that in this case the government's interests did not outweigh the First Amendment right of one of its employees to express matters of public concern.

Mark S. Hurwitz

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Graber, Mark A. Transforming Free Speech. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

Shiffrin, Steven H. The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Sunstein, Cass. Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: Free Press, 1993.

Rasul v. Bush (2004)

In Rasul v. Bush, 124 S. Ct. 2686 (2004), and the companion case of Al-Odah v. United States, the U.S. Supreme Court held that aliens being held in confinement at the U.S. military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, were entitled to have a federal court hear challenges to their detention under the federal habeas corpus statute. The decision was significant because it placed limits upon the president's authority to detain indefinitely individuals captured as a result of the "war on terrorism" that President George W. Bush initiated after the attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001.

On September 11, 2001, terrorists associated with Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda network hijacked four commercial airplanes and used them in several attacks against the United States, resulting in over 3,000 deaths. Subsequent to these attacks, Congress passed a joint resolution authorizing the president to use all "necessary and appropriate force" against any persons, organizations, and nations that aided or supported these acts of terrorism. President Bush used this authorization to send U.S. troops to Afghanistan against al-Qaeda and the Taliban regime that had supported the group.

As a result of this military action, approximately 640 non-Americans were captured and relocated to the U.S. military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where they were being held indefinitely and without access to legal counsel and to the federal courts. Among the individuals detained were two Australian and twelve Kuwaiti citizens who claimed they were innocent of any terrorist activity and who wished to be set free. In the latter group were Shafiq Rasul and Fawzi Khallid Abdullah Fahad Al-Odah.

In 2002 relatives of these two individuals filed actions in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia challenging the detentions. First that court and then the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia dismissed the cases, with both courts claiming they lacked jurisdiction to hear the challenges. The U.S. Supreme Court disagreed, ruling six–three that the courts did have jurisdiction and that the detainees were entitled to have their petitions heard.

The petitions filed by the relatives of the detainees were seeking habeas corpus review, the constitutional right of individuals to have a judge review the reasons for their detention and determine if their confinement is illegal. Habeas relief is provided both in the Constitution (Article I, Section 9, clause 2) and by federal statute (U.S. Code, Vol. 28, sec. 2241). The law was well established that U.S. citizens being held in the United States were entitled to habeas corpus review, but there was some uncertainty regarding that right for the noncitizens held in Guantánamo Bay. Several reasons contributed to this lack of certainty.

First was the issue of whether the detainees were being held "in the United States." In 1934, Cuba granted the United States a lease to Guantánamo Bay for as long as the base was being used. The United States continued to recognize Cuba's sovereignty over the area, however, which raised a genuine question regarding whether the place of detention was part of the United States. Second, in cases such as Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950), the Supreme Court had ruled that aliens detained outside the United States were not entitled to habeas review. Thus, the Bush administration argued that it had legal authority to detain aliens at Guantánamo indefinitely without granting them access to the courts to contest their confinement.

In the majority opinion, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, the Court found jurisdiction was proper and held for the detainees. In reaching its opinion, the Court first reviewed the history of federal habeas corpus law, noting how this right had significantly expanded since its original enactment in 1789. In fact, Justice Stevens noted that the Court had permitted habeas review in a wide variety of situations involving presidential detention of individuals, including those who were deemed "enemy combatants." Second, the Court examined the status and extent of U.S. control over Guantánamo Bay, finding that control was so pervasive that although Guantánamo was not sovereign U.S. territory, it was under U.S. jurisdiction, and therefore the ruling in Eisentrager did not apply. Thus, all of the individuals being detained at Guantánamo were entitled to challenge their detention. In dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Justice Clarence Thomas and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, contended that the federal habeas law was limited by Eisentrager because the base in Cuba was not under U.S. sovereignty.

Rasul v. Bush was an important decision. It was issued the same day as Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 124 S. Ct. 2633 (2004), in which the Court ruled that a U.S. citizen could not be held indefinitely on American soil without a right to habeas review. These two cases together not only placed significant limits upon the government's ability to detain individuals suspected of being terrorists, but also represented a major affirmation of the right of citizens and noncitizens alike—even those suspected of terrorism—to challenge their detention. Almost immediately after Rasul was decided, the U.S. government was forced to undertake procedures to permit the Guantánamo detainees to bring habeas challenges to their confinement.

David Schultz

See also: Habeas Corpus; Hamdi v. Rumsfeld; Quirin, Ex parte.

FURTHER READING

Adler, David Gray, and Robert George, eds. The Constitution and the Conduct of American Foreign Policy. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.

Henkin, Louis. Constitutionalism, Democracy, and Foreign Affairs. New York: Columbia UP, 1990.

———. Foreign Affairs and the United States Constitution. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.

Rational-Basis Test

The minimum level of scrutiny the courts apply to governmental regulation on socioeconomic matters is the rational-basis test. This test requires that government rules or regulations be rationally related to some legitimate government interest. Since its inception, the courts have applied the rational-basis test liberally. Because this is a relatively low burden for the government to carry, the vast majority of the legislation to which this test has been applied has been upheld.

In United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the Filled Milk Act, which prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of "filled milk," an artificial fat or oil product made to resemble milk, in an effort to protect public health. The Court held that legislation that regulated the economy should be presumed constitutional and upheld if there was any rational relationship between the legislation and the government's legitimate interest. By contrast, the Court would apply more exacting scrutiny (strict scrutiny) to cases involving provisions in the Bill of Rights or the Fourteenth Amendment, restrictions of the political process, or the treatment of minorities; these involve fundamental personal liberties, such as the right of free speech, protection against unreasonable search and seizure, and the guarantee of due process.

San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973), illustrates the application of the rational-basis test. The case involved legislation that used property tax as the basis for supplementing funding to school districts. The state's interest was to provide extra funding for school districts. The appellees argued that because property values were drastically lower in poorer school districts, the legislation amounted to discrimination based on wealth. In other words, there was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause, and as such the legislation should be subject to strict scrutiny. The trial court agreed.

The Supreme Court overturned the lower court's ruling in that respect and held that, however important, education was not a fundamental right, wealth was not a suspect classification, and the legislation was appropriate so long as it had a rational relationship to some legitimate state purpose. As in Carolene Products, the Supreme Court applied the traditional rational-basis test. However, in recent years that test has evolved.

Until recently, the rational-basis test has not been applied to cases involving a suspect classification (for example, race) or a fundamental right (for example, free speech); rather, legislation on these matters is subject to the strict-scrutiny test. In certain situations, however, in which legislation apparently targets a specific group but that group does not rise to the level of a suspect class, a "heightened" rational-basis test has been applied.

The Supreme Court applied this heightened rational-basis test in three cases beginning in 1982. In Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982), a Texas statute denied free public education to "illegal alien children." The state interest at issue was to save money by refraining from spending money on persons who entered the country illegally. The Court rejected any argument that "illegal alien children" were a suspect class but implied that they were a quasi-suspect class, and, in overturning the Texas statute, the Court applied the lowest level of scrutiny, rational basis. In City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432 (1985), the Cleburne, Texas, zoning board denied a permit for a group home for the "mentally retarded." The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals struck down the board's decision on the grounds that the "mentally retarded" were a quasi-suspect class, and any government discrimination against them must pass heightened scrutiny. Although it upheld the invalidation of the board's decision, the Supreme Court rejected the claim that the "mentally retarded" were a suspect or quasi-suspect class and reduced the level of scrutiny by applying merely rational basis. More recently, in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), the Court struck down an amendment to the Colorado Constitution that prevented state and local agencies from enacting legislation to protect homosexuals from discrimination. The state argued that the amendment was meant to protect the freedom of association of those who have personal or religious objections to homosexuality. However, the Court found that the "status-based" amendment in question would actually result in an entire group of citizens finding it more difficult to seek government aid.

In these three cases, the Court applied a "rational-basis test with bite." What the Court actually did, however, was to apply a balancing test. The Court balanced the individual rights and liberties allegedly being violated against the state interest and took notice of the fact that in each case the legislation was targeted at a specific group of people who, although their group did not rise to the level of a suspect class, were singled out for special treatment. Today, where legislation is specifically targeted at a definable group, the heightened rational-basis test will be applied.

John L. Roberts

See also: Romer v. Evans; San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. Boston: Little, Brown, 1997.

Red Baiting

In the aftermath of World War II, the specter of communism loomed large in the American consciousness. The Cold War with the Soviet Union moved communistic sympathies from a matter of domestic political opinion to an issue with dire implications for national security. This trend led to an aggressive search for Communist influences throughout American society, but particularly in government, the educational system, labor unions, and Hollywood. Those whose Communist leanings were publicly exposed faced significant economic penalties, most often loss of their jobs. In addition, more than 150 people went to prison, and two were executed. The question of how to deal with communism at home and abroad significantly impacted the U.S. political process for the next fifty years and highlighted the vulnerability of civil liberties in times of national tension over left-wing causes.

After the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia in 1917, the fear of communism and communistic influences pervaded American society. The Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) was formed that same year, but the CPUSA did not really get off the ground until the Great Depression of the 1930s appeared to evidence the failure of capitalism. Sympathy for the ideals of equality for all and an end to the domination of rich capitalists had broad appeal particularly among unemployed or underemployed laborers, social liberals, and African Americans.

In 1940, Congress adopted the first peacetime sedition act in U.S. history, the so-called Smith Act (U.S. Code, Vol. 18, sec. 2385). It provided for the prosecution of people who distributed material found to advocate either the violent overthrow of the government or the indoctrination of a group in preparation for violent acts. This law was immediately applied to distribution of Communist materials. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Smith Act in a series of court cases including Dennis v. United States, 341 US. 494 (1951), Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957), and Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961). Laws prohibiting the distribution of pro-Communist materials remained on the books in some states through 2002.

The entry of the United States into World War II and its alliance with the Soviet Union muted the loudest criticism of communism for the duration of the war. Thereafter, Soviet actions abroad in the aftermath of the war led to renewed fervor in the anti-Communist battle at home.

In 1947, several different groups began active anti-Communist campaigns. Senator Joseph McCarthy and the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) began their first examination of Hollywood, investigations that led to the creation of a list of blackballed writers, directors, and performers, who were forbidden employment by any major studio. At the same time, President Harry Truman forbade anyone with Communist Party ties to be employed in the executive branch of the government. The Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 denied the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board to unions that failed to file affidavits avowing that their officers were not Communists, and in 1949–1950 the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) expelled unions that were still perceived to be Communist-dominated. In 1950, Congress passed the Internal Security Act, giving the government a broad range of powers to fight "subversives." President Truman immediately vetoed the law on the grounds that it would "make a mockery of our Bill of Rights," but Congress overrode his veto by an 89 percent majority. Both the Congress and state legislatures passed a series of similar laws intended to curb the power of communism and the Communist Party at the federal and state levels throughout the 1950s.

Significant efforts to root out communism continued through the 1950s and early 1960s, eventually petering out as the nation's attention turned to other matters. Significant damage had been done, however, to the protections against state-sponsored violations of citizens' rights in pursuit of national security, and continued fear of communism was a factor on the U.S. political scene until the end of the Cold War in the late 1990s.

Ben Reno-Weber

See also: Communists; Dennis v. United States; House Un-American Activities Committee; McCarthy, Joseph; McCarthyism; Yates v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Haynes, John Earl. Red Scare or Red Menace? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996.

Schrecker, Ellen. The Age of McCarthyism: A Brief History with Documents. New York: St. Martin's, 1994.

Stepan-Norris, Judith, and Maurice Zeitlin. Left Out: Reds and America's Industrial Unions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1969)

In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the "fairness doctrine," legislation mandating that broadcasters give free airtime to an individual whose political views on public issues were challenged so that the individual had adequate means to reply to the challenge. The doctrine raised fundamental issues involving the right to free speech under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) was charged with enforcing the fairness doctrine.

On November 27, 1964, the WGCB radio station in Pennsylvania broadcast a fifteen-minute "Christian Crusade" segment by Reverend Billy James Hargis. Hargis discussed a book by Fred J. Cook entitled Goldwater—Extremist on the Right, about then-Senator Barry Goldwater (R-AZ). Hargis made comments about Cook's politics and work history that could have been deemed derogatory. When Cook learned of the broadcast, he argued that he had been personally attacked and demanded free reply time. The Red Lion Broadcasting Company, which owned the station, refused, and the FCC sued for violation of the fairness doctrine. The case was argued in April 1969 and decided in June that year, along with its companion case, United States v. Radio Television News Directors Association, (127 U.S. App. D.C. 129, 381 F.2d 908, affirmed; No. 717, 400 F.2d 1002, reversed and remanded).

Under the now-obsolete fairness doctrine, when a licensed broadcast company personally attacked an individual in the course of discussing a controversial public issue, it had to contact that individual and notify him or her of what was said, provide the individual with a tape or transcript of the statement, and then offer that individual the right to reply at the station's expense. When it endorsed a candidate or position, the broadcaster also had to give the other side a right to reply. The Court was asked whether the FCC's fairness doctrine violated the First Amendment's freedom of speech guarantees and ruled unanimously that it did not. (Justice William O. Douglas did not participate, since he had not been present during the hearing.)

The Court's opinion had three components: First, the First Amendment was designed to protect the rights of the viewing and listening public, not the licensed companies that serve them. Second, the purpose of the regulation was to ensure that the "marketplace of ideas" functioned effectively, allowing listeners to be informed citizens. Finally, the FCC acted properly in its ruling in this particular case.

Reviewing the history of radio broadcasting, the Court stated that the FCC was created to handle the "chaos" of stations fighting for limited bandwidth. Broadcasting is not a right but a privilege, and with it comes an obligation to serve the public. The fairness doctrine was created to encourage broadcasters to discuss controversial issues of public importance free from the pressure of supporting one side or the other, as their sponsors might demand. At first glance, the idea of a company being forced to broadcast opinions with which it did not agree appeared to run afoul of the First Amendment. The Court explained, however, that broadcasting companies were licensed to serve the public's interest in learning both sides of politically important issues, which advances the very spirit of the First Amendment. In the two cases at hand, the FCC operated properly in ensuring that the marketplace of ideas was protected by giving an attacked individual the right to reply and to do so at the station's expense.

The FCC abandoned the fairness doctrine in 1987, although it continued to enforce rules on political editorials and personal attacks such as in Red Lion until 2000. Broadcasters complained that their announcers had difficulty determining when the doctrine applied, which caused a chilling effect on airing controversial views. The FCC also concluded that enforcement was no longer necessary in light of emerging technologies that opened up broadcasting to a greater number of outlets, such as cable television.

Brian J. Glenn

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Donahue, Hugh Carter. The Battle to Control Broadcast News: Who Owns the First Amendment? Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1989.

Jung, Donald J. The Federal Communications Commission, the Broadcast Industry, and the Fairness Doctrine, 1981–1987. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1996.

Red Scare (1919–1920)

Hysterical fear of foreigners spawned by the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, formation of the international communist party COMINTERN, and the establishment of the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) in 1919 epitomized the 1919–1920 "red scare" in the United States when wholesale and unconstitutional deportations of aliens occurred. Widespread fear of communism manifested itself principally in ridding the nation of foreign-born radicals. It was a period that Chief Judge James Skelly Wright of the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia—himself a subject of ostracism for his desegregation orders as a U.S. district judge in New Orleans during the late 1950s and early 1960s—described in Faruki v. Rogers, 349 F. Supp. 723 (D.C. Cir. 1972), as "shameful incidents in which the foreign-born—citizen and non-citizen alike—have been subjected to hysterical popular oppression."

Many people in the nation perceived the Communist threat as an attack on American institutions by foreign radicals. Typical targets were avowed anarchists like Russian-born Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, who were involved with various radical activities, including the radical periodical Mother Earth. In April 1917, the United States entered World War I, and although President Woodrow Wilson curbed a Justice Department proposal to try civilians in military tribunals, he signed into law the new Espionage Act of 1917 under which the government arrested, convicted, and later deported Goldman, Berkman, and others. The order was signed by Assistant Secretary of Labor Louis F. Post, who had once represented Goldman and who later canceled more than 1,500 deportation orders during the waning days of the red scare. Finally, Post had to defend himself (successfully, as it turned out) against a resolution of impeachment introduced in the House of Representatives amid accusations that he had become a "friend of enemy aliens" and "had let loose on the country these public enemies."

Congress strengthened the 1917 Espionage Act with the enactment of the Sedition Act of 1918, which made it a crime to "utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language about the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States." Moreover, the act provided "That . . . aliens who are members of or affiliated with any organization that entertains a belief in, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or . . . violence of the government of the United States shall be excluded from admission into the United States." The statute made any such person already in the country subject to deportation.

Although the war ended with the German surrender on November 11, 1918, the distrust of "things foreign" did not abate as an "anarchist bombing campaign" flourished in the early part of 1919. The newly elected Republican Congress responded with the Senate's rejection of U.S. participation in the League of Nations and with increased appropriations for the fight against foreign radicals. By March 5, 1919, President Wilson's appointment of A. Mitchell Palmer, a former Democratic member of the U.S. House of Representatives and unsuccessful candidate for the U.S. Senate from Pennsylvania, as U.S. attorney general fortified the government's arsenal for fighting communism and other forms of foreign-led subversion. On July 19, 1919, at Palmer's request, Congress appropriated, and the president approved, a special fund of $500,000 for the Justice Department to use in the fight against radicalism. On August 1, 1919, the head of Palmer's newly created General Intelligence Division of the Justice Department appointed as his assistant a young man, twenty-four-year-old J. Edgar Hoover, who immediately compiled a list of thousands of names of individuals he believed to be Communists and therefore proper subjects for prosecution and deportation. There followed the notorious "Palmer raids"—a manifestation that the nation was in the "throes of another national seizure of paranoia," as Justice William O. Douglas noted in his concurring opinion in United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297 (1972).

One typical Palmer raid, described in detail in Colyer v. Skeffington, 265 F. 17 (D. Mass. 1920), occurred the evening of January 20, 1920, in as many as twenty New England cities from Holyoke, Massachusetts, through Boston to Lincoln, New Hampshire. In some cities police raided meeting halls, and in most communities they invaded homes to make arrests without warrants. They searched homes in summary fashion, breaking open suitcases, boxes, and drawers and seizing personal effects and papers. Police officers took between 800 and 1,200 people into custody in a way that prompted Judge George W. Anderson to comment in Colyer, the case that effectively halted the Palmer raids, that "a mob is a mob, whether made up of government officials acting under instructions from the Department of Justice, or of criminals, loafers, and the vicious classes."

Judge Anderson also observed in Colyer that some of the people taken into custody were taken before an immigration inspector for examination but without the right to be assisted by counsel "until the inspector, co-operating with or advised by the agent of the Department of Justice, was of the opinion that the hearing had proceeded sufficiently in the development of the facts to protect the government's interests." Judge Anderson concluded that this treatment left many of the aliens "entirely unprotected from the zealous attempts of the Department of Justice agents to get from them some sort of apparent admission of membership in the Communist or Communist Labor Party."

In all, Palmer raids were conducted between July 1919 and June 1920 in more than thirty cities across the nation in which 6,000–10,000 people—most of whom were innocent of any wrongdoing—were arrested, incarcerated, and/or deported. With the Colyer decision that membership in the Communist Party could not subject a person to deportation, combined with Post's cancellation of more than 1,500 deportation orders and the failure of a series of Palmer-predicted terrorist attacks to materialize, the 1919–1920 red scare dissipated.

Clyde E. Willis

See also: Communists; Dennis v. United States; Palmer Raids; Red Baiting.

FURTHER READING

Amnesty International. "Annual Report 2002." http://web.amnesty.org/web/ar2002.nsf/amr/usa!Open.

Chapman, Dan. " 'Palmer Raid' Put Civil Liberties Under Attack." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 30, 2002, 1F.

Christof, Nicholas D. "Security and Freedom." New York Times, September 10, 2002, A-25.

Churchill, Ward, Jim Vander Wall, and John Trudell. The Cointelpro Papers: Documents from the FBI's Secret Wars Against Dissent in the United States. Classics Series, vol. 8, ch. 2. Boston: South End Press, 1988.

Post, Louis F. The Deportations Delirium of Nineteen-Twenty. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1923.

Schmidt, Regin. Red Scare: FBI and the Origins of Anticommunism in the United States, 1919–1943. Copenhagen: Museum Tusculanum Press, University of Copenhagen, 2000.

Rehnquist, William Hubbs (b. 1924)

William H. Rehnquist, the sixteenth chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, was first appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court as an associate justice by President Richard Nixon in 1972 and was elevated to the position of chief justice by President Ronald Reagan in 1986. His service since then in leading the Court has included presiding over President William Clinton's Senate impeachment trial. Chief Justice Rehnquist has brought concern for federalism back into the mainstream of judicial thinking, and he has been an able judicial administrator, both modernizing the Court and facilitating good working relationships among justices with diverse views.

The Court over which Rehnquist has presided has rendered many libertarian decisions relative to freedom of speech and has widened constitutional protections for women (approving laws limiting sexual harassment and overturning the Virginia Military Institute's all-male admissions policy). His career has also been marked by his view that elective bodies are generally more capable of assessing the relative rights and liberties than are judicial bodies, especially when the U.S. Constitution is silent or speaks in broad language.

Rehnquist grew up in a solid Republican household in an upper-middle-class suburb of Milwaukee. From the time he attended law school at Stanford, he was described as brilliant and conservative. His conservative views were evident in the memoranda that he authored as a law clerk to Justice Robert H. Jackson and in views opposing racial desegregation that he took as a private lawyer in Phoenix, Arizona.

In 1969, President Nixon appointed Rehnquist as assistant attorney general of legal counsel in the Department of Justice. Because of his legal expertise and ideological fervor, he became a point man for the administration. He argued that the government could limit the political speech of its employees, and he was a forceful advocate for policies to crack down on crime. For example, in 1971, he encouraged the arrest of 12,000 demonstrators in Washington, D.C. During the period 1969–1972, he also supported wiretapping and surveillance without a prior court order; no-knock entry by the police; preventive detention; the abolition of habeas corpus proceedings after trial; and the abolition of the exclusionary rule. He provided legal encouragement for the U.S. Army's surveillance of private citizens, and he defended the proposed allocation of new powers to the Subversive Activities Control Board.

Although the Senate confirmed Rehnquist's nomination to the Court, it drew strong public opposition from a variety of liberal groups, including the American Civil Liberties Union, which, for the first time in its then-fifty-two-year history, opposed a Supreme Court nomination.

Rehnquist is a consistent proponent of property rights and of federalism. He supports constitutional interpretations based on the original intent of the framers. He believes that the government should have more power to catch and prosecute criminals, and he has consistently voted to support laws that make it illegal to disrespect the flag, as he held in Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974), and Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989). His voting record has also given states more leeway to regulate pornography and nudity.

The core of Rehnquist's philosophy is that the Constitution places a limit on the scope of noneconomic civil liberties that individuals have, especially at the state level. According to Rehnquist, respect for states' rights or federalism means that states have broad discretion in terms of how many noneconomic rights are defined and protected. Like his predecessor, Warren E. Burger, Rehnquist has narrowed some the Earl Warren Court criminal due process rulings, often recognizing exceptions to some of the rights of the defendants. For example, in Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980), he voted to limit defendants' ability to challenge search and seizures. In Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983), he argued that police should have easy access to obtain a search warrant, and in California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991), he maintained that police should have more discretion to conduct searches without a warrant. In California v. Minjares, 444 U.S. 887 (1979), he urged the Court to abolish the exclusionary rule.

Rehnquist has voted, as in Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979), to limit the right to counsel established in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963). In County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991), he allowed police to detain suspects for forty-eight hours without providing a hearing for probable cause. Although he endorsed a number of exceptions to the Miranda rules, Rehnquist agreed in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000), that the warnings were based on constitutional principles.

Rehnquist upheld state powers to apply the death penalty in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972); he voted to allow states to apply the penalty to people who were mentally retarded in Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989), to fifteen-year-olds in Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988), and to rapists in Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977). In Rummel v. Estelle, 445 U.S. 263 (1980), Rehnquist upheld a life sentence for a defendant who passed three bad checks for a total of $229. Rehnquist is reluctant to reopen cases on federal habeas corpus review, sometimes denying appeals even when evidence revealed after the trial pointed to the innocence of the accused.

When interpreting the First Amendment's Establishment Clause prohibiting government from engaging in establishment of religion, Rehnquist has continued the direction set by the later Burger Court, supporting religious accommodation rather than strict separation of church and state. He thus cast votes, many in dissent, permitting a nativity scene on government property in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989); supporting prayer in public school in Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), and Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992); allowing government aid to religious schools in Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000); and supporting state laws requiring the teaching of creationism in public schools in Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987). In addition to allowing government to aid religion, he voted with the majority to apply less stringent standards to state limits on the free exercise of religion in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), and to strike down the federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act in City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997).

Rehnquist's views on the Constitution also have led him to find only a limited right to privacy. He has consistently voted against recognizing abortion as a constitutionally protected right and has called for overturning and limiting Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). In Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), he voted in dissent to deny unmarried people the right to contraceptives. In Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), he voted with the five–four majority to uphold state sodomy laws, and in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), he dissented when a majority of his colleagues ruled that Colorado's constitutional amendment prohibiting laws protecting homosexuals violated the Equal Protection Clause. Rehnquist has sided with the claim that the First Amendment right of private groups to associate sometimes overrides laws designed to provide equal protection to minorities.

Long one of the Court's most conservative members who has voted alone, he is often joined by Justices Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia, and others, and in many areas of the law, Rehnquist has been successful in forging a working majority for many of his views.

Alan M. Fisher

See also: Capital Punishment; Fourteenth Amendment; Prisoners' Rights.

FURTHER READING

Boles, Donald E. Mr. Justice Rehnquist, Judicial Activist. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1987.
Davis, Sue. Justice Rehnquist and the Constitution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.
Dean, John. The Rehnquist Choice. New York: Free Press, 2001.
Schwartz, Herman, ed. The Rehnquist Court: Judicial Activism on the Right. New York: Hill and Wang, 2002.
Yarbrough, Tinsley E. The Rehnquist Court and the Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Release-Time Program

A release-time program is one in which public schools permit their students to use a certain period of the day to leave campus to receive religious instruction. The program is said to have had its origin in a 1914 project by William A. Wirt, a superintendent of education in Gary, Indiana, who enlisted more than six hundred students who attended off-campus religious instruction during the school day. According to a survey by Bestnetwork, a national association of release-time Bible education providers dedicated to establishing release-time programs in public schools, release-time programs were active in twenty-three states by 1922 with 40,000 students in 200 school districts participating, and the programs reached a peak in 1947 with 2 million students and 2,200 school districts. According to surveys cited in Gordon v. Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles, 178 P.2d 488 (1947), by 1947 forty states had authorized some form of release-time program for public school students, and no appellate court in any state had held such programs unconstitutional.

Release-time programs appear to present a classic confrontation between the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause, under which government cannot interfere with the individual's free exercise of religion, and the Establishment Clause, which prohibits government from engaging in establishment of religion. On the one hand, students may claim that going off campus for religious instruction is necessary in order for them to exercise their religion freely; on the other, many people might argue that the government is establishing religion by facilitating religious activities during school hours.

Following the U.S. Supreme Court's 1947 decision in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, which applied the First Amendment's two religion clauses to state government, the Court took a hardening attitude toward violation of the line between religion and government. In the first case to involve "release time," Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948), the Court in an eight–one decision disapproved of a policy enabling teachers to offer religious instruction in the school for an hour a week. McCollum involved a local board of education in Illinois that agreed to permit religious instruction in the schools under a "released time" arrangement that allowed students whose parents had signed "request cards" to attend religious instruction classes conducted during regular school hours in the school building by outside teachers furnished by a religious council representing the various faiths, subject to the approval and supervision of the superintendent of schools. Attendance records were kept and reported to the school authorities in the same way as for other classes, and pupils not attending the religious instruction classes were required to continue their regular secular studies. The Court found that "the use of tax-supported property for religious instruction and the close cooperation between the school authorities and the religious council in promoting religious education" violated the Establishment Clause.

Four years later the Supreme Court took a more liberal turn toward the ability of schools to provide release time to students. In Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952), the Court in a six–three decision validated a New York statute that permitted schools to provide students release time to obtain religious instruction off campus with no costs to the school. Easing the line between separation of religion and government without explicitly overruling McCollum, Justice William O. Douglas, writing for the Court, firmly placed government on the side of religion while maintaining neutrality among different religious faiths:

> We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being. . . . We sponsor an attitude on the part of government that shows no partiality to any one group and that lets each flourish according to the zeal of its adherents and the appeal of its dogma. When the state encourages religious instruction or cooperates with religious authorities by adjusting the schedule of public events to sectarian needs, it follows the best of our traditions. For it then respects the religious nature of our people and accommodates the public service to their spiritual needs. To hold that it may not would be to find in the Constitution a requirement that the government show a callous indifference to religious groups. That would be preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe.

Justice Hugo L. Black dissented in Zorach, asserting that the holding posed a liberty issue under the Establishment Clause; he claimed that a neutrality in which a public school "encourages religious instruction or cooperates with religious authorities . . . is all the more dangerous to liberty because of the Court's legal exaltation of the orthodox and its derogation of unbelievers." Justice Robert H. Jackson, also in dissent, saw a liberty issue as well. He denied neutrality between government and religion, claiming that the school "serves as a temporary jail for a pupil who will not go to Church. It takes more subtlety of mind than I possess to deny that this is governmental constraint in support of religion." Furthermore, Justice Jackson was concerned that "The day that this country ceases to be free for irreligion it will cease to be free for religion—except for the sect that can win political power." However, Justice Douglas rejected the liberty issue, stating that "it takes obtuse reasoning to inject any issue of the 'free exercise' of religion into the present case. No one is forced to go to the religious classroom and no religious exercise or instruction is brought to the classrooms of the public schools."

In any event, since Zorach, public school authorities are free from First Amendment constraints to dismiss students for off-campus religious instruction without dismissing the entire school program, provided they do not encourage or discourage student participation in the release-time program and do not penalize students who for whatever reason do not attend. Release-time programs are popular in many parts of the country.

Clyde E. Willis

See also: Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Prayer in Schools; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette; Zorach v. Clauson.

FURTHER READING

Bestnetwork. "Release Time Bible Education: History," February 9, 2003. http://www.bestnetwork.org/history.htm.

Gale, David. "Released-Time Programs a Staple in Students' Lives," January 29, 2003. Religious News from NewsNet at Brigham Young University. http://newsnet.byu.edu/story.cfm/41820.

Kurland, Philip B., ed. Church and State: The Supreme Court and the First Amendment. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993

Congress enacted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA) in response to the 1990 U.S. Supreme Court decision of Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990). RFRA was intended to set out a high standard of constitutionality for any law that had the effect of "burdening" free exercise of religion, a fundamental freedom found in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

In Smith, two members of a Native American church were terminated from their jobs. The employees were then refused Oregon state unemployment benefits on the grounds that their use of the drug peyote violated the law. The employees contended that peyote was part of their religious ceremonies, and thus their use of it was protected by the First Amendment. They sued to contest the antipeyote law as it applied to their religious use of peyote.

The U.S. Supreme Court found in favor of Oregon and ruled that the antidrug law applied to the terminated employees, despite the fact that they used peyote in a religious manner. The Court wrote that "[t]o make an individual's obligation to obey such a law contingent on that law's coincidence with his religious beliefs . . . contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense." The employees had violated a law against the use of drugs that applied to everyone, whether or not that use was religious in nature. Therefore, the fact that they used peyote in their religious ceremonies was not enough to excuse them from the law.

Smith caused widespread protests on the grounds that religious exercise had long been exempt from generally applicable laws, such as the Oregon antidrug law. As an example, the Amish were often exempt from the obligations of general laws because these laws conflicted with clear Amish religious beliefs. In response to these protests, Congress enacted RFRA.

RFRA reversed the Supreme Court's decision in Smith and provided an exemption to any law that had the effect of substantially burdening religious exercise. RFRA itself did not define what constituted a "substantial burden" on religious exercise. Subsequent court cases defined the term to mean any law that forced people to do something their religion prohibited or that prevented people from doing something central to their religion.

The statute had five parts. The first part criticized the Smith decision and stated that "Congress finds that the compelling interest test . . . is a workable test for striking sensible balances between religious liberty and compelling prior government interests." The "compelling-interest standard" is the highest burden in constitutional law for a statute to meet when it is reviewed in court.

The second part of RFRA set out the elements of the compelling-interest test. Under the compelling-interest test, a law would be unconstitutional unless it did two things: First, the statute must serve the most important governmental interests; second, it must be the least restrictive alternative available to serve those interests. The compelling-interest standard is applied in almost every circumstance involving fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution.

The remaining parts of the statute involved technical matters, including a provision explicitly stating that RFRA did not affect previous judicial decisions interpreting the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. RFRA applied only to the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment.

RFRA was itself subsequently declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court four years after its enactment, in City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997). In Boerne, a local zoning board denied the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of San Antonio a building permit to enlarge a church, finding that the church was of historical value and the planned expansion would ruin that value. The archdiocese sued under RFRA, arguing that the denial of the permit placed a substantial burden on meeting its religious needs.

The Court did not rule on whether the zoning board had violated RFRA. Instead, it found that RFRA itself was unconstitutional. The Court stated that in enacting RFRA, Congress had exceeded the power granted to it under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the statute was therefore unconstitutional. Further, the Court found that the scope of RFRA, which potentially touched every law passed on any subject, was out of proportion to the evidence of interference with religious exercise that Congress considered in enacting RFRA.

Because Boerne was based on the extent of the power of Congress to regulate state law, courts that since have considered the issue have held that RFRA still applies to federal law.

Gerald J. Russello

See also: City of Boerne v. Flores; Compelling Governmental Interest; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith; Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Strict Scrutiny.

FURTHER READING

Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993. U.S. Code. Title 42, secs. 2000bb–2000bb-4.

Tuttle, Robert W. "Religious Institutions and Land Use Control: How Firm a Foundation? Protecting Religious Land Uses After Boerne." George Washington Law Review 68 (2000): 681.

Religious Holidays

As the United States has become increasingly pluralistic, observance of religious holidays has caused conflict about the proper role of government in recognizing religious holidays and about the rights of individuals in the workplace and in public schools to observe religious holidays. These conflicts involve interpretation of the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. Under the Establishment Clause, government cannot engage in the establishment of religion; under the Free Exercise Clause, government cannot interfere with the individual's free exercise of religion. At times the conflicts also manifest the inherent tension between these two clauses. For example, if government must refrain from recognizing religious holidays to avoid establishing religion, does this infringe on the free exercise of individuals who wish to enjoy their religious holidays in public as well as private venues? If government, in order to protect free exercise rights, makes special accommodations for individuals to observe religious holidays, does this amount to favoring their religions over others, or religion over nonreligion, thus violating the neutrality expected under the Establishment Clause?

RELIGIOUS HOLIDAYS AND ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION

Establishment Clause conflicts have centered on public places, such as parks and courthouse lawns, and on public schools.

The first major Supreme Court pronouncement on public places came in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), involving a government-sponsored Christmas display in Pawtucket, Rhode Island. The elaborate display included Santa Claus, reindeer, a Christmas tree, and various whimsical figures. Featured prominently was a nativity scene. Pawtucket officials claimed the purpose of the display was to promote downtown Christmas shopping.

A divided Supreme Court upheld the constitution-ality of the display. The majority of five justices agreed with Pawtucket officials that Christmas was both a secular and a religious holiday and that placement of the manger scene in the midst of secular Christmas symbols essentially secularized it. They also relied on tradition as a justification. They determined that Pawtucket's display passed the "Lemon test," derived from Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), for determining what was allowed under the Establishment Clause. They found no primary religious purpose, effect, or potential for entanglement and divisiveness in the Pawtucket display.

The dissent also applied the Lemon test and found that Pawtucket's nativity scene failed all three parts. They further disputed the majority's assertion that this use of a crèche was part of a long-standing tradition of public observance of Christmas.

Despite jokes about the "plastic reindeer rule," the Court did not address how many secular items are needed to secularize a display otherwise perceived as religious. Their ruling also raised other questions. What about privately owned nativity scenes or other religious objects placed on public property? Which types of public property—public parks as opposed to courthouse lobbies, for example—are appropriate for private displays? What disclaimers are needed to avoid violating the First Amendment?

The courts continue to face these questions. For example, a very divided Supreme Court in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989), held unconstitutional a crèche placed in the Allegheny County courthouse in Pittsburgh by a Roman Catholic organization because its prominent location, religious banner, and absence of secular items implied government endorsement of religion. However, a menorah and Christmas tree outside the city-county building passed the acceptability test because the Christmas tree secularized the menorah and the display was called a "Salute to Liberty."

Government property may through usage become a "public forum"—a public place for free expression that must be equally available for speech and expression by all without content-based restrictions. Groups sometimes place religious symbols in such locations during religious holiday seasons. However, efforts by the Ku Klux Klan to place crosses in public forums at Christmas led even persons otherwise supportive of holiday displays on government property to object because of the racist connotations. One such conflict resulted in the Supreme Court reiterating the "public forum" concept even for unpopular groups. Many civil libertarians have welcomed such decisions, but others take a strict separationist stance, believing that religious conflict is best avoided by keeping all religious holiday displays off public property.

Conflict over religious holiday observances in public schools has given rise to the so-called December dilemma caused by the proximity of Hanukkah to Christmas. Recognition of Christmas but not Hanukkah in schools has drawn criticism, but giving equal billing to both holidays has also been criticized as elevating a lesser Jewish holiday into a major celebration simply because it falls in December.

Supreme Court pronouncements on religion in public schools indicate that Christmas, Hanukkah, and other religious holidays may be observed in their secular forms. Also, teachers may teach objectively about the religious aspects when appropriate as part of secular instruction. Only holidays that have secular as well as religious significance may be celebrated, though instruction is permissible for others.

As public school populations have become more diverse, some efforts have been made to give recognition to holidays of Muslims and other minority religions. Meanwhile, increased sensitivities have brought school observance of such holidays as Valentine's Day and Halloween—largely secular but religious in origin—under greater scrutiny, leading some schools to avoid them or transform them into more inclusive occasions, such as celebrating fall festivals instead of Halloween.

RELIGIOUS HOLIDAYS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Religious holidays also raise issues involving religious liberty. Whereas the Free Exercise Clause protects against government restrictions on religious liberty, federal law protects private-sector employees who wish to be absent from work on their religious holidays. Public- and private-sector employers may accomplish this in such ways as switching employees' schedules or letting employees make up missed days. Employees may not make unreasonable demands on employers.

Similarly, public schools must, within reason, excuse students on religious holidays and allow them to make up work missed.

As the population becomes more diverse, three trends are in evidence. First, those people insistent on holiday displays on public property are testing various combinations of private and public involvement and religious and secular symbols to see what passes judicial scrutiny. Second, others continue to challenge questionable government observance of religious holidays. Finally, governments are becoming more sensitive to potential conflicts and the cost of litigation and are seeking acceptable ways to both reflect and respect community diversity.

Jane G. Rainey

See also: County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union; Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman; Lynch v. Donnelly.

FURTHER READING

Menendez, Albert J. The December Wars: Religious Symbols and Ceremonies in the Public Square. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1993.

Swanson, Wayne R. The Christ Child Goes to Court. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.

Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000

Congress enacted the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) in recognition of "the importance the free exercise of religion plays in our democratic society." It is meant to address the deficiencies the Supreme Court found with its predecessor, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) of 1993. RLUIPA addresses two specific areas: laws that govern land use and laws that impact the religious exercise of persons in prisons, mental hospitals, or similar institutions.

In its deliberations, Congress found that land use is an inextricable part of religious exercise. Religious groups must have a place to gather and worship. The Senate explicitly stated that "[t]he right to build, buy or rent such a space [for religious exercise] is an indispensable adjunct of the core First Amendment right to assemble for religious purposes." Those purposes extend beyond formal religious services to encompass a wide range of outreach, including educational, social, and charitable programs. Institutionalized persons are even more affected in the exercise of their religious beliefs because burdensome regulations govern most aspects of their behavior and their conduct is subject to the discretion of government officials.

In the hearings and other proceedings leading up to enactment of RLUIPA, Congress heard testimony from a wide variety of groups whose religious exercise was threatened or burdened by these two types of laws. Representatives of Catholic, Jewish, Muslim, Mormon, and other religious groups testified about the difficulties their faiths faced in disputes with government officials over land-use decisions and prison regulations.

In general, RLUIPA prohibits any governmental agency from enacting regulations in a manner that treats religious exercise on less than equal terms with nonreligious exercise. It further prohibits government from discriminating against religious exercise in the land-use and institutionalized-person settings. One federal appellate court interpreted RLUIPA as establishing that "a law that simply protects religious organizations from unfair treatment certainly cannot be impermissible as an unconstitutional endorsement of religious activity."

Zoning and other land-use decisions have traditionally been left to the discretion of local government authorities. RLUIPA, however, establishes minimum guidelines for constitutionally permissible treatment of religious land uses. Under RLUIPA, government can neither totally exclude "religious assemblies from a jurisdiction" nor unreasonably limit the "religious assemblies, institutions, or structures" within its jurisdiction. Moreover, the government must allow for some religious uses of land within its jurisdiction. This determination that some religious use of land must be permitted rests upon prior federal and state law that has found residential communities benefit by having religious institutions present.

RLUIPA prohibits any government agency—local, state, or federal—from imposing or implementing "a land use regulation in a manner that imposes a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a person, including a religious assembly or institution." The act applies in three specific sets of circumstances: where the substantial burden (1) "is imposed in a program or activity that receives federal financial assistance, even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability"; (2) "affects, or removal of the substantial burden would affect" interstate commerce or commerce with Native American tribes; or (3) "is imposed in the implementation of a land use regulation or system of land use regulations, under which the government makes . . . individualized assessments of the proposed uses for the property involved." An "individualized assessment" is a determination made by a zoning board or other governmental agency that is based on the particular facts of one unique piece of property. It is not, in other words, a general law applicable to every property in a given area. As almost every zoning plan and land-use approval process involves an individualized assessment, including the proposed use for the property and the character of the area where the property is located, RLUIPA applies in a broad array of circumstances.

The portions of RLUIPA that deal with institutionalized persons track the land-use sections. Any law that imposes a substantial burden on any program receiving federal funding is subject to the statute where those laws affect institutionalized persons. It also applies to any regulations concerning institutionalized persons that affects, or would affect, interstate commerce or Native Americans.

If a law in one of these two areas is challenged under RLUIPA, the government must show both that the imposition of the burden on a complaining party "is in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest" and "is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest." Even if the government can show that the regulation furthers such an interest, it still must show also that the challenged regulation is the least burdensome way to further that goal. This compelling-interest test is the highest level of review in constitutional law.

Instead of meeting this two-part test, the government as an alternative can remove or modify the challenged law or regulation. When such action is taken to remove or modify the challenged ordinance, the standard of review is lessened to the more lenient rational-basis standard. Under that standard, a government need only show that the land-use regulation bears some logical connection with a governmental purpose.

Because RLUIPA was passed recently, the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on its constitutionality. Several lower federal courts, however, have been presented with constitutional challenges to RLUIPA on a wide variety of grounds. Most have ruled that the statute is an appropriate exercise of congressional power and does not suffer from the same flaws as RFRA.

Gerald J. Russello

See also: City of Boerne v. Flores; Free Exercise Clause; Land Use; Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993; Zoning.

FURTHER READING

Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000. U.S. Code. Vol. 42, secs. 2000cc–2000cc-5.

Storzer, Roman P., and Anthony R. Picarello Jr. "The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000: A Constitutional Response to Unconstitutional Zoning Practices." George Mason Law Review 9 (2001): 929.

Religious Symbols and Displays

The public display of religious symbols is a contentious religious liberty issue. The Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibits the government from supporting or hindering religion. How people interpret this prohibition and how they believe it relates to other fundamental freedoms in large part determines how they perceive the issue of public display of religious symbols.

Presently, three main theories of Establishment Clause interpretation exist in U.S. Supreme Court jurisprudence, all of which have been applied to different religious symbol and display cases. One theory holds that it is necessary for individuals to be coerced into exercising or abstaining from exercising their religious beliefs in order to prove an Establishment Clause violation. This theory makes it difficult for plaintiffs to prove that the public display of a religious symbol is unconstitutional, since merely erecting a display does not coerce anyone and can be done at little or no cost to taxpayers. A second theory contends that the Establishment Clause actually prohibits any act that could be perceived as government endorsement of religion. In the context of religious displays, the appropriate constitutional inquiry under this theory is whether a reasonable observer, viewing the display, would believe that the government was endorsing the religious message of the display.

Both of the first two theories of Establishment Clause interpretation claim to derive from the test originally advocated by the Supreme Court in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971). According to the Court in that case, an act violates the Establishment Clause if its primary purpose or effect is the promotion or hindrance of religion or if it excessively entangles the government with religion. Most religious symbol and display cases turn on whether five justices agree that a display violates the endorsement test, since it incorporates much of the Lemon analysis without limiting the Establishment Clause to a prohibition on government coercion.

In Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), the Supreme Court permitted the display of a religious Christmas scene by the city on private property. The Court held that allowing the display was permissible because it was unlikely that anyone viewing it would infer that the government supported the religious message of the display. In creating the display, the city of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, was demonstrating the historically religious significance of the Christmas holiday without necessarily supporting that religious claim. Five years later, in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989), the Supreme Court reached the opposite result. In the Allegheny case, a Christmas scene was placed on the steps of the county's courthouse. A majority of justices held that the placement of the scene on the steps of the courthouse, far from the other holiday decorations that the county had erected around the building, could convey to a reasonable observer that the county endorsed the religious content of the display. These two cases illustrate the contextual nature of the endorsement theory inquiry. The justices determine, on a case-by-case basis, whether a particular display in a particular location could lead a reasonable observer to perceive the government as supporting the religious content of the display. If this is the case, the display is unconstitutional.

Lower federal courts have wrestled with the endorsement theory and the other Establishment Clause theories in resolving the many religious display cases presented to them. One issue has proved to be especially difficult to resolve: Who should have standing (that is, the right) to sue a government to halt a religious display? An individual has standing, or the right to file a lawsuit, in a religious display case if that person has been injured by the display in some way. The injuries do not have to be physical or economic, but they do have to be identifiable. Circuit courts have split on what injuries are sufficient to confer standing. Some courts have argued that merely coming into contact with an offensive religious display by a government is an injury that can support a lawsuit. Other courts have said that contact with a display is not sufficient, but taking action such as driving out of one's way to avoid contact with an offensive display would be sufficient. Still other courts have held that an offensive display must impair the individual's ability to use public resources such as a park or government building in order to confer standing. The Supreme Court has yet to pronounce clear rules for determining who can bring suit in religious display cases.

Another difficult issue for both lower courts and for the Supreme Court has been deciding what to do with religious symbols or displays set up by private citizens on public property. A typical case in this category might deal with whether it is constitutional for a city to allow a private service organization to display a nativity scene in a city park. The city might arguably be supporting a religious message by allowing such a display, but it would be more difficult for an observer to perceive that the government endorsed that message if the display is in a park rather than on the steps of a county courthouse. A sign disclaiming government support for the religious message or private financial support for the display could further insulate the city from an Establishment Clause challenge.

A further complication lies in the tension between the Establishment Clause's prohibition on government support for religious messages and the right of all Americans to speak freely. The First Amendment includes not only the two religion clauses but also the clause protecting free speech, which indicates the high importance of both freedoms. If the park was a public forum, a site designated as accessible for people professing all opinions, the city would be forced to choose between allowing the display and potentially violating the Establishment Clause and prohibiting the display and potentially violating the right of private individuals to express their beliefs in public. The Supreme Court ruled in Capitol Square v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995), that even religious groups should have equal access to public forums. In this case, the Ohio Ku Klux Klan sought to display an unattended cross in the area around the state capitol alongside other holiday displays. The state denied the Klan's request out of concern that allowing the cross might be a violation of the Establishment Clause. The Supreme Court decreed that Ohio was obligated to grant the permit, since the land in question was an officially designated public forum to which all citizens had access.

The chance that a passer-by might misperceive the display as a government endorsement of religion was an inadequate justification for denying the permit. Although the fact that the Ku Klux Klan was displaying the cross raised other issues about its significance, lower courts have held relatively consistently that fears of Establishment Clause violations cannot trump the free speech rights of private citizens in public forums.

The reach of the Establishment Clause has yet to be firmly established in the United States. Depending on which theory of interpretation courts accept, and depending on how courts believe the Establishment Clause should relate to other rights, such as the right to free speech, courts can come to different conclusions about when a religious display is constitutional and when it is not. As courts hand down more case-by-case determinations of whether particular displays violate the Establishment Clause, its reach will become clearer.

Matthew D. Cannon

See also: County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union; Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman.

FURTHER READING

Guliuzza, Frank. Over the Wall: Protecting Religious Expression in the Public Square. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.

Menendez, Albert J. The December Wars: Religious Symbols and Ceremonies in the Public Square. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1993.

Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997)

Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), presented the U.S. Supreme Court with old questions about the reach of the First Amendment to the Constitution in a new context: the Internet. The Court decided that material on the Internet was entitled to full First Amendment protection and that two provisions of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 were unconstitutional because they were too vague.

Two provisions of the act and the First Amendment took center stage in the case. The first provision prohibited the knowing transmission of obscene or indecent messages to any recipient under age eighteen. The second prohibited the knowing sending or displaying of patently offensive messages in a way that made them available to a person under age eighteen. Of course, the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech."

Before the Court could decide the constitutionality of the statutory provisions, it had to decide what level of First Amendment protection to afford Internet material. Not all media receive the same level of protection. The government may regulate television and radio more heavily because of the history of heavy regulation, the scarcity of available frequencies, and the invasive nature of these media to which passive listeners may be exposed. The Internet, the Court concluded, does not share those characteristics: (1) There is no history of regulation; (2) space for expression is not scarce; and (3) content is available only to an active participant.

After deciding that Internet material should receive full speech protection, the Court turned to the constitutionality of the two provisions. Both, the Court decided, were unconstitutionally vague. The first used the term "indecent" without providing a definition. The second used the term "patently offensive" without supplying a solid definition. The Court was particularly troubled by this vagueness because the act imposed content-based restrictions and assessed criminal penalties for their violations. Thus, the prospect of "chilling," or silencing, lawful speech was high. Moreover, vague regulations are particularly susceptible to discriminatory enforcement, an especially worrisome prospect when criminal penalties are involved.

The question of whether the two provisions were constitutional was complicated by the fact that they were aimed at minors. In several decisions the Court has recognized that because the government has a strong interest in protecting children, First Amendment rights are more limited when speech is directed to children versus adults. This principle is limited, however. For example, the government may not limit adults, as it attempted to do in this case, to only that material fit for children. Although the Court struck down most of both statutory provisions, it did not invalidate the oft-repeated view that the First Amendment does not protect obscenity.

Thus, the Court ultimately decided that Internet materials deserve full free speech protection and the bulk of the provisions of the Communications Decency Act were too vague to be enforceable under the First Amendment.

Justin M. Sandberg

See also: Censorship; Chilling Effect; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Nowak, John E., and Ronald D Rotunda. Hornbook Series. Constitutional Law. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Reply, Right to

A "right to reply" means the right of access to the columns of a newspaper or magazine, the airtime of a broadcast station, or the envelopes of a private mailing to respond to a political attack against a person or institution. The notion that the media can be forced in this de facto manner to publish messages they do not sanction raises difficult issues of the right to free speech, which is guaranteed under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that there is no such right to reply in the case of the print media but that there may be a limited right in the case of broadcasters because of the limited number of outlets.

In 1974, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Florida right-of-reply law that applied to newspapers. A candidate for the Florida House of Representatives who was criticized by editorials in the Miami Herald demanded that the Herald print his response verbatim. He pointed to a state law entitling any candidate whose personal character or official record was attacked by a newspaper to have the newspaper print, free of charge, the candidate's unedited reply in "as conspicuous a place and in the same kind of type as the charges which prompted the reply." The Florida Supreme Court upheld the law, asserting that free speech was enhanced, not stifled, by a right to reply, and that the law furthered the "broad societal interest in the free flow of information to the public." The newspaper appealed.

Writing for a unanimous Court in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 421 (1974), Chief Justice Warren E. Burger reversed the Florida court, saying that the right-of-reply law "exacts a penalty on the basis of the content of a newspaper" by forcing the editors to pay the costs "in printing and composing time and materials and in taking up space that could be devoted to other material the newspaper may have preferred to print." Faced with these costs, the editors "might well conclude that the safe course is to avoid controversy" and might therefore be more likely to blunt or reduce the newspaper's political coverage. But at the core of the First Amendment's protection of freedom of speech is the "free discussion of governmental affairs." The Florida law intruded "into the function of editors," by constraining their view of what should be published and where and how it should be placed. "The choice of material to go into a newspaper, and the decisions made as to limitations on the size and content of the paper, and treatment of public issues and public officials—whether fair or unfair—constitute the exercise of editorial control and judgment," all of which are protected by the First Amendment.

In a similar vein, in Pacific Gas and Electric Co. v. Public Utility Commission, 475 U.S. 1 (1986), the Supreme Court voided a public service commission's order to a privately owned utility company that it distribute in an envelope containing its monthly customer newsletter an advocacy group's mailing opposing the utility's position on public issues. The Court held that the public service commission was discriminating on the basis of "viewpoint" because the only groups covered by the order mandating free distribution by the utility company were those that opposed the company's position on rate-making issues.

Although the general rule is the same for broadcast stations—there is no constitutional right to airtime beyond the discretion of the station owners and managers—the Court upheld as constitutional the so-called "fairness doctrine," a form of right to reply that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) originally mandated for broadcasting stations in 1934. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), the Court said that the First Amendment did not bar the FCC from imposing the fairness doctrine on radio and television stations. Under the fairness doctrine, broadcasters had to give free time for replying to personal attacks on the air or to political editorials broadcast by the stations. The fairness doctrine was not a requirement of the First Amendment, however, and the FCC was free to revoke the fairness doctrine at any time, as it later did.

In CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), the Court rejected the claim that the First Amendment required broadcast stations to sell time generally to political parties so that they could air dissenting views on current social and political controversies. By contrast, in CBS v. Federal Communications Commission, 453 U.S. 367 (1981), the Court made an exception to the general rule against mandatory purchase of advertising time. A station had refused to permit a legally qualified candidate for federal office to buy broadcast time to air his views. The FCC threatened to revoke the license of the station because of its refusal, and the Court said the First Amendment would allow the FCC's action under the circumstances. Thus, the FCC may require stations to sell a qualified candidate airtime notwithstanding the general rule that there is no overall right of access to a broadcast outlet.

Jethro K. Lieberman

See also: Fairness Doctrine; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Sajo, Andras, and Monroe E. Price. Rights of Access to the Media. Boston: Kluwer Law International, 1996.
Schmidt, Benno C. Freedom of the Press Versus Public Access. New York: Praeger, 1976.

Republican Party

Founded in 1856 with a commitment to the abolition of slavery, the Republican Party gained national office in 1860 and has remained one of the two major parties in the United States since then. Throughout its history, the Republican Party has addressed many civil liberties issues.

Although a minor party at its founding, it led the United States through the trauma of the Civil War under the presidency of Abraham Lincoln. It was during the Lincoln administration that the party adopted policies with important ramifications for civil liberties. Facing the secession of many Southern states, President Lincoln undertook actions of questionable constitutionality. In several areas of the country, the president suspended the writ of habeas corpus, the basic guarantee that citizens be brought before magistrates and informed of the reasons for being held by authorities.

Equally significant, the Lincoln administration established military courts in several regions, including areas where the Union government had never lost control. These courts derived their authority from the president and were responsible to the executive branch alone. Although the Supreme Court never addressed the constitutionality of the military courts during Lincoln's administration, in 1866, under President Andrew Johnson, the Court ruled that Lincoln had acted improperly in establishing military courts in Indiana, a state that remained loyal to the Union cause. According to the Court, individuals suspected of illegal activities against the government should have been tried in the existing state and federal courts of Indiana, instead of military courts created by the executive branch.

Principles of the Republican Party of the United States of America, circa 1888. (Library of Congress)

Lincoln took other actions that weakened the civil liberties protections of the Constitution. For instance, he ordered the arrest of some Maryland legislators when it was feared the Maryland legislature might vote for secession. This instruction from the president, though far-reaching, was typical of the methods the administration used to preserve the Union. Intimidation of political foes and newspapers was employed as a tactic as well.

Initially, the "Radical" Republicans during Reconstruction supported civil liberties for African Americans by passing the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments. Still, one major decision taken during this time had far-reaching implications for the nation. In return for an agreement with the Democrats giving the Republican nominee, Rutherford B. Hayes, victory in the 1876 presidential election, the Republican Party agreed to end Reconstruction policies in the South. This action restored the old Southern power structure to positions of authority, and by the end of the nineteenth century, restrictions on civil rights and liberties had been enacted throughout the South.

Anticommunism became an important national issue during the twentieth century. Both the Democrats and Republicans responded to this national urgency. During the 1920s, Republican administrations continued the anti-Communist policies of President Woodrow Wilson's attorney general, A. Mitchell Palmer. In the late 1940s and into the 1950s, some members of the Republican Party were associated with the anti-Communist congressional hearings of Senator Joseph McCarthy (R-WI).

Richard M. Nixon won the 1968 presidential election, inheriting the Vietnam War from the Democratic administration of Lyndon B. Johnson. In 1971 the New York Times published the Pentagon Papers, a set of documents detailing the nation's policies in Southeast Asia. These documents were given to Daniel Ellsberg, a former employee of the Department of Defense. Sufficiently concerned about the impact of this action on U.S. foreign policy, the Nixon administration went to the Supreme Court seeking a court order to prevent the newspaper from publishing the materials (prior restraint). In New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), the Court ruled against the administration, and the White House took other extraconstitutional actions.

A special operations team, called the "plumbers," was established by the White House. With the purpose of stopping leaks of information to the press, the plumbers tried to discredit Ellsberg. They broke into the office of his psychiatrist, hoping to uncover incriminating information about him. Later, the plumbers broke into the offices of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, D.C., an event that became known as the Watergate scandal and that led to an attempted cover-up and the downfall of the Nixon administration. As the press began to investigate the Watergate matter, the Nixon White House tried to defend itself by pressuring the owners of the Washington Post. More bluntly, the White House prepared a list of its enemies in an effort to intimidate its political opponents.

Since the 1960s, especially during the 1964 presidential campaign by Barry Goldwater, some have accused the Republican Party of backing away from support for civil liberties issues in order to appeal to some of its more conservative members. Ronald Reagan was accused of not supporting many types of individual rights, such as abortion, for example.

When the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and the World Trade Center in New York City were attacked September 11, 2001, the United States entered a new phase. Since these attacks were launched by a terrorist group rather than a nation-state, the lines between law enforcement, civil liberties, and national security became blurred. In response to these events, the executive and legislative branches approved new powers for the federal government to monitor communications and obtain information. The administration of George W. Bush even declared that certain individuals were not entitled to the due process of law guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution.

The federal reaction to September 11, 2001, should be placed within the historical context of previous crises as well as previous Republican administrations. Presidential power tends to expand at the expense of civil liberties during times of crisis, as evidenced by the Lincoln presidency and the treatment of anticommunism in the mid-twentieth century. Eventually, presidential power over civil liberties shows a pattern of retreating once the threat becomes less ominous or perceived. In contrast to Lincoln and late-nineteenth-century presidents, the presidents of the Cold War operated in conditions of permanent crisis.

Whereas the presidency almost immediately lost its tremendous authority as the Civil War ended, the Cold War presidency continued to exercise and gain power. Its high point was the Nixon administration, when revelations about executive branch misconduct caused the legislative branch to reassert its authority as its nineteenth-century predecessor did after the Civil War. In seeking new powers over civil liberties, the George W. Bush administration is following a long-established pattern in U.S. political history of expanding executive authority in response to a national threat.

Michael E. Meagher

See also: Democratic Party; Minor Political Parties; Political Parties.

FURTHER READING

McDonald, Forrest. The American Presidency: An Intellectual History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.
Milkis, Sidney M., and Michael Nelson. The American Pres- idency: Origins and Development, 1776–1993. 2d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1994.

Riccards, Michael P. The Ferocious Engine of Democracy: A History of the American Presidency. 2 vols. New York: Madison Books, 1995.
Thomas, Benjamin P. Abraham Lincoln. Reprint, New York: Modern Library, 1979.

Republican Party of Minnesota v. White (2002)

In Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765 (2002), the U.S. Supreme Court expanded freedom of speech for state judicial candidates. Although the president appoints all federal judges with the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate, many state judges are elected. In such cases, there is a fundamental conflict between a commitment to an independent judiciary and the belief that well-informed voters can more thoughtfully choose their leaders than ignorant voters can. If candidates can discuss their views on controversial issues, how can they be trusted to be impartial? That is the constitutional tug-of-war over whether would-be judges can talk about topics ranging from abortion to crime control to welfare to capital punishment. This type of content-based gag on political speech lies at the heart of First Amendment freedoms and the public's ability to assess the qualifications of candidates. As it is, fewer voters cast ballots in judicial races than in other contests, partly because they know little about the candidates.

The Supreme Court's answer—the First Amendment is trump—came in the Republican Party case from Minnesota, one of thirty-nine states that elect judges on a partisan or nonpartisan basis. When Gregory Wersal first sought the Republican endorsement for a nonpartisan seat on Minnesota's Supreme Court, he was confronted with the state Code of Judicial Conduct, which prohibited judicial candidates from announcing their views "on disputed legal or political issues." Violators faced professional disciplinary charges. That rule of silence was rooted in the rationale that political views should be irrelevant to a judge's performance, and that allowing such commentary would mislead the public into thinking candidates had prejudged certain types of cases. As University of Wisconsin political scientist Charles H. Franklin observed, "This ethical canon provides cover for judicial candidates to avoid taking positions on issues that are of general public concern, yet it in no way prevents the judge from actually having a position on such issues."

The challenge was backed by the state GOP, which argued that the ban prevented parties from learning candidates' views and deciding whether or not to support their election. Candidate Wersal said, "It's important public policy if you're going to have meaningful elections. My goal is to put power back in the hands of the people, and the final arbiter of whether judges are doing the right thing is the people through a judicial election."

Writing for a five–four majority, Justice Antonin Scalia asserted: "The notion that the special context of electioneering justifies an abridgment of the right to speak out on disputed issues sets our First Amendment jurisprudence on its head. . . . We have never allowed the government to prohibit candidates from communicating relevant information to voters during an election." The Court recognized an important public interest in having an impartial judiciary, but concluded that Minnesota's ban was not narrowly tailored to achieve impartiality or the appearance of it. Neither did such a ban have a "long [or] universal" history in the United States, it noted. Although Vermont elected judges even before it joined the Union in 1791, and although Georgia started judicial elections in 1812, there were no restrictions on what judicial candidates could discuss until 1924. Even before the Court's decision in Republican Party, four states imposed no candidate-speech restrictions.

The dissenting justices argued that there were core differences between campaigns for the bench and for other offices and emphasized the importance of impartiality for judges, who hold special offices of trust.

Eric Freedman

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Burbank, Stephen B., and Barry Friedman. Judicial Independence at the Crossroads: An Interdisciplinary Approach. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2002.

Constitution Project. Uncertain Justice: Politics and America's Courts. New York: Century Foundation, 2000.

Reynolds v. United States (1878)

In 1878 the U.S. Supreme Court rendered its first significant decision regarding the scope of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, holding that a statute passed by Congress prohibiting polygamy did not infringe upon the religious liberty guaranteed by the Free Exercise Clause.

At issue in Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879), was the constitutionality of the statute prohibiting the practice of polygamy. Upon taking a second wife, George Reynolds, a practicing Mormon (a common term used for a member of the Church of Jesus Christ, Latter-day Saints, or LDS), was convicted of violating the antipolygamy statute. Reynolds ultimately sought to have his conviction overturned, arguing that in taking a second wife he was fulfilling a religious obligation imposed upon all believers of his faith. Reynolds maintained that the statute at issue infringed upon his ability to practice his religion freely, thereby offending the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment.

Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite, writing for the Court, concluded that the congressional regulation did not offend the Free Exercise Clause. He differentiated between the degree of constitutional protection afforded religious belief, on the one hand, and religiously inspired conduct, on the other, concluding that "[1]aws are made for the government of actions and while they cannot interfere with mere religious beliefs and opinions, they may with practices." Chief Justice Waite emphasized that polygamy had never received the imprimatur of traditional Western cultures or religions. Congressional prohibition of an unorthodox practice endorsed by a nondominant religion, therefore, was a permissible regulation of behavior perceived to be "subversive of good [societal] order."

Moreover, the Court noted that an individual's motivation for engaging in willful, illicit behavior was immaterial for purposes of assigning criminal responsibility. A person may not assert a religious exemption to justify disobedience of a generally applicable, neutrally constructed statute merely because the law conflicted with that person's religious teaching. Underscoring his point, Chief Justice Waite insisted that an individual's religiously founded belief in human sacrifice, for example, did not undermine government's legitimate authority to prohibit behavior obviously corrosive to societal order. He surmised: "To permit [a religious exemption for the statutory prohibition of polygamy] would be to make the professed doctrines of religious beliefs superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself. Government could exist only in name under such circumstances."

The Court in Reynolds seized an opportunity to rule on the scope of religious liberty guaranteed by the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. Liberty to hold whatever religious beliefs one chooses exceeds the scope of congressional regulation and, therefore, is afforded absolute constitutional protection. Religiously motivated conduct, however, remains susceptible to reasonable governmental regulation crafted to promote societal order. Therefore, an individual may not successfully assert a religious exemption to avoid criminal responsibility for deliberately violating a neutral, generally applicable statute.

Melanie K. Morris

See also: Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause.

FURTHER READING

Schultz, David A. "Church-State Relations and the First Amendment." In Law and Politics: Unanswered Questions, ed. David A. Schultz, 235–66. New York: P. Lang, 1994.

Richardson v. Ramirez (1974)

In Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 24 (1974), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the power of states to bar convicted criminals from voting, whether temporarily or indefinitely. The Court had glanced approvingly at such laws in a few prior cases, but Richardson marked the first time the Court evaluated their constitutionality. The case is unique in the Supreme Court's jurisprudence on voting rights for its emphasis on the obscure second section of the Fourteenth Amendment rather than on the Equal Protection Clause in the first section.

In 1972, three California men who had completed their sentences for felony convictions were turned away from the polls by their respective county clerks. At that time, California law barred from voting those convicted of a felony or any other "infamous crime." The men argued that under the demanding standard the U.S. Supreme Court was then using to judge restrictive suffrage laws, only an extraordinarily important state interest could justify limitation of the franchise, and no such interest existed. California's high court agreed and struck down the law in Ramirez v. Brown, 507 P.2d 1345 (Cal. 1973).

The California ruling did not mention Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment. That was understandable, because Section 2 had been almost entirely ignored by the U.S. Supreme Court in the century since its ratification in 1868. Unwilling simply to ban racial discrimination in voting—as the Fifteenth Amendment would do just two years later—northern Republicans after the Civil War also wanted to prevent resurgent southern whites from disenfranchising newly freed blacks and regaining their old power in the national government. Section 2 solved the problem, as it permitted southern whites to disenfranchise blacks but set up a stiff political penalty should they choose do so: Under Section 2, a state that disenfranchised any number of adult males would face proportionate reduction of its congressional representation. Buried within the explanation of that rule, however, was an exemption: States could disenfranchise a person "for participation in rebellion, or other crime" without suffering diminished representation.

In Richardson, that phrase ended the debate over the constitutionality of laws barring convicts from voting. The majority held that there was no need to ask whether disenfranchisement fulfilled a compelling state interest—as analysis under the Equal Protection Clause would require and as the California Supreme Court had done—because the "express language" of Section 2 permitted states to bar convicts from voting. The majority decided that reference in Section 2 to "crime" effectively insulated the policy from examination under the Equal Protection Clause—an interpretation strongly challenged by critics of the ruling.

Dissenting, Justice Thurgood Marshall insisted that laws disenfranchising criminals should face much stricter scrutiny. As Marshall and others have argued, the fact that the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment apparently accepted a suffrage restriction did not exempt it from skeptical review in the twentieth century. Indeed, long residency requirements for voting were universally accepted in 1868, but the Court subsequently held that such requirements violated the Constitution. Justice Marshall also pointed out that by the majority's logic, disenfranchisement for a jaywalking conviction would be fully constitutional. Moreover, he argued that the "historical purpose" of Section 2—presenting southern states with a choice between allowing blacks to vote and losing large portions of their congressional representation—was "dispositive" of the case. That purpose was narrowly political and partisan, Justice Marshall contended, and it was clear that Section 2 "was not intended and should not be construed to be a limitation on the other sections of the Fourteenth Amendment." Other critics have noted that all of the alleged practical purposes of disenfranchisement laws, such as prevention of fraud, could be better achieved with less restrictive policies. Finally, some Court observers have argued that by resurrecting the dormant Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment—which explicitly endorses limited suffrage—the Court injected serious uncertainty into its voting rights jurisprudence.

A decade after Richardson, the Court held in Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222 (1985), that criminal-disenfranchisement laws enacted with racially discriminatory intent were unconstitutional. But Hunter set a high standard for proving such intent, and in general Richardson remains a serious obstacle to bringing an equal protection challenge to laws barring convicts from voting.

Alec C. Ewald

See also: Felon Disenfranchisement; First Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Issacharoff, Samuel, Pamela S. Karlan, and Richard H. Pildes. The Law of Democracy: Legal Structure of the Political Process. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2002.

Right of Confrontation

The Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution states that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation and to be confronted with the witnesses against him." Thus the Confrontation Clause guarantees that the defendant is permitted to be present when witnesses appear before the "trier of fact" (the judge or jury). The rationale behind this protection is that a witness who is relating a story about the accused is less likely to fabricate or stretch the facts when the defendant is present. Simply put, it is always more difficult to tell a lie about a person "to his face" than behind his back.

PROCEDURE AND PURPOSE

The witness is not required to stare at the accused when the accused is on the stand and testifying before the jury. But the adversarial process functions on the premise that the witness who must appear in court is at least available for observation by the jury and judge as to demeanor and trustworthiness.

Moreover, the availability and implementation of cross-examination by defense counsel provide a way to ferret out and screen the witness's physical response to intense interrogation, including under-oath admissions, physical reaction, and behavioral tendencies; through this process, the impartial jury may make its own evaluation and conclusion about the veracity of the witness's testimony. Thus, the Confrontation Clause guarantees the defendant an opportunity for effective cross-examination to elicit physical infirmities or other impediments about a witness, such as poor eyesight, colorblindness, screened or blocked vision, defective hearing, inadequate memory or recall, lack of care or attentiveness, or the existence of some other physical defect or bad motive that the jury could interpret as calling into question the accuracy, reliability, or veracity of the testimony provided by the witness.

LIMITATIONS ON CONFRONTATION

When a prosecution witness is hailed into court, two issues emerge in the confrontation context. First, when is the defendant denied a face-to-face encounter with that witness; second, to what extent may the cross-examination of the witness be denied? When the witnesses are underage victims, there is some precedent under state laws that permit shielding or preventing these witnesses from appearing before the accused.

In Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional a state law that permitted a large screen to be placed between the defendant and two thirteen-year-old girls who testified that the accused had sexually assaulted them. The majority opinion written by Justice Antonin Scalia, who drew from a wealth of historical and linguistic sources, emphasized that the Confrontation Clause guaranteed the defendant a face-to-face meeting. The minority opinion disagreed and argued that a youthful victim could be overcome with trauma at any time; had the trial court made an individualized finding that a child victim would benefit from special protection, then no constitutional violation would be presumed as long as the victim could be cross-examined.

In Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990), a state statute permitted a one-way television monitor to be implemented as a substitute procedure in circumstances where the judge has evaluated the emotional effect face-to-face confrontation with the defendant potentially would have on the well-being of the child. The Supreme Court upheld this procedure in a five–four decision on the grounds that the defendant was given an acceptable substitute to observe direct and cross-examination of the child over the video hookup. The Supreme Court thus carved out a judicial exception to the Confrontation Clause—namely, if other elements or alternative means of confrontation are present, the traditional "plain meaning" rule regarding the Confrontation Clause would be deemed satisfied. The Court also emphasized that many states in addition to Maryland had enacted similar statutes, and, as a matter of public policy, literal face-to-face confrontation would not be required as long as the reliability of the testimony was deemed genuinely acceptable. In addition, the majority opinion also focused on scientific studies documenting the psychological trauma suffered by child abuse victims; this evidence necessitated the exception for such witnesses.

Various states have created exceptions to the Confrontation Clause, and several of these have reached the Supreme Court. For example, in Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974), another case dealing with underage children, the prosecution sought to exclude information about its witness's prior juvenile record, which included probation on two burglaries. The state argued that the disclosure of this information in the courtroom would stunt or impede the rehabilitation process of the witness and cause him further embarrassment and hardship with present or future employers and associates. The Court, forced to engage in a balancing test of competing rights, reversed the Alaska Supreme Court by adopting the policy argument that the defendant's rights under the Confrontation Clause were superior to any claims by the youth to privacy rights.

In Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129 (1968), a prosecution witness who was also a police informant was allowed to testify in the lower court under an assumed fictitious and concealed identity to protect his value as an informant and to protect him from possible retaliation by the accused. The Supreme Court reversed the conviction on the grounds that the defendant's right to confrontation superseded any prosecutorial claims to protect or safeguard the police informant. The prosecution's argument that the reversal would deter future informants who were associated with criminal activity was overshadowed by the need to have the credibility, weight of the testimony, and reliability of the witness cross-examined before the jury, especially when vendettas and other ulterior vindictive motives could pervade the process.

In Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), the Supreme Court reversed the defendant's murder conviction because the witness, who had confessed to the murder on three prior independent events, was called by the defense as a "hostile" (adverse) witness. Under the state's voucher rule, the judge did not permit cross-examination by the defense because the witness was never called to testify by the prosecution. The Court weighed the prior confessions against the in-court repudiation and concluded that the Confrontation Clause was superior to the state procedural rule. Moreover, under the Federal Rules of Evidence, a judge is empowered under Rule 614 to call witnesses for interrogation before the jury, even if the defense and the prosecution omit the witness from their submitted pretrial witness lists. The purpose of the rule is to lessen the jury's inherent inclination to associate a particular witness with the state or the defendant. However, under no circumstance may the judge become an advocate for a party or favor one party over another. The court abuses its authority when it fails to maintain its neutral position.

Multiple defendants present complex Confrontation Clause issues, as do defense counsel's demands for disclosure of all investigative material uncovered by the prosecution. In capital cases, defendants facing the death penalty are afforded special protection and given the broadest confrontation coverage available. No general rule can be articulated other than to state that the Confrontation Clause guarantees a defendant an opportunity to cross-examine all witnesses. Thus, prior out-of-court statements of "hearsay" (words spoken by person A to person B that person B repeats in court) by witnesses are not subject to exclusion under the constitutional protection as long as the witness is available to appear and be subjected to cross-examination.

The Confrontation Clause is a fundamental constitutional right designed to protect both the innocent and the guilty. It does so by guaranteeing the opportunity to challenge through the art of cross-examination false statements, misrepresentations, or fabrications offered by witnesses. Clearly, it cannot guarantee that every lie or untruth will be exposed.

J. David Golub

See also: Adversarial Versus Inquisitorial Legal Systems; Confrontation Clause; Hearsay.

FURTHER READING

Holtz, Larry E. Contemporary Criminal Procedure. 2d ed. Longwood, FL: Gould, 1992.

Pacelle, Richard L., Jr. The Role of the Supreme Court in American Politics: The Least Dangerous Branch? Boulder, CO: Westview, 2002.

Whitebread, Charles H., and Christopher Slobogin. Criminal Procedure: An Analysis of Cases and Concepts. 4th ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2000.

Young, John H. Federal Rules of Evidence. 6th ed. St. Paul, MN: American Trial Lawyers Association, 2001.

Right of School Boards to Ban Books

Under the U.S. federal political system, states have the primary responsibility for making and administering education policy. Most states accomplish this through locally elected school boards and an appointed school superintendent. School boards evolved around the turn of the twentieth century as part of the municipal reform movement, which was part of the larger progressive movement (some members of which formed the Progressive Party). They were created partly as a result of the desire or perceived need of reformers to remove educational policy-making and administration from partisan politics and political party control. Members of local school boards would be elected on a nonpartisan ballot, and the administration of education policy would be in the hands of a board-appointed professional school superintendent.

School boards often choose from a list of state-approved texts when selecting textbooks for use in public schools as well as books and materials for school libraries. In fact, as agents of the state, school boards have the constitutional authority under the Tenth Amendment to make such decisions to protect the health, safety, welfare, and morals of public school students. The selection of books and materials is influenced by local community values, which can vary widely from community to community. At the same time, public school students have rights under the First Amendment, including the right to receive information. This can create a dilemma. On one hand, local authorities have a duty to instill community values in public school students and to protect them against controversial material, which they may not be mature enough to handle. Yet the First Amendment is an integral part of every public school child's education, and allowing students access to controversial material can foster the intellectual stimulation needed for students to succeed in school and in life.

School officials have some power to restrict expression, but the limits of their power have not been clearly defined by the courts. Hundreds of books in schools and school libraries are challenged as inappropriate by parents, school officials, and interest groups who believe they have the responsibility, the moral obligation, or the right to determine what public school children can and cannot read. To complicate matters, there is a difference between selecting books and materials that will become integral parts of a school curriculum and ordering the removal of books already selected. Although both decisions involve making value judgments, removing books and other materials from schools once they have been accepted as part of the curriculum or as appropriate for the school library poses a distinct problem. In some cases, material is removed before it is objectively and appropriately evaluated.

Challenges to schoolbooks occur in just about every state. Few of these challenges end up in the courts. When they do, courts must determine whether the school board's authority to remove materials overrides students' First Amendment right to read and receive information. Courts have been inconsistent in interpreting students' First Amendment rights regarding local school board authority to remove books and other materials from school curricula and school libraries. The courts generally (but not always) defer to local authorities, on the premise that under the U.S. federal political system, it is the responsibility of local officials and not the courts to determine public school policy.

The U.S. Supreme Court addressed this issue in Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982). The case involved the school board's obligation to inculcate community values in students versus the First Amendment rights of the students. A divided Court ruled that the school board could not deny the students access to ideas with which the board disagreed for political reasons. School boards must be permitted "to establish and apply their curriculum in such a way as to transmit community values," and "there is a legitimate and substantial community interest in promoting respect for authority and traditional values be they social, moral, or political." The First Amendment, however, protects the expressive rights of students, including the right to receive information and ideas. Unfortunately, the Court did not speak with one voice. The five justices in the majority agreed that school boards cannot remove books from public school libraries for political reasons, but they could not agree on why. Another problem with the decision is that it applied only to removing books from public middle and high school libraries. Since the ruling was narrow, its impact is uncertain. The potential for conflict between the power of school boards and the First Amendment rights of students remains.

Judith Haydel

See also: Board of Education v. Pico; Censorship; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Burgess, Lee. Battle of the Books: Library Censorship in the Public Schools, 1950–1985. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1989.

Foerstel, Herbert N. Banned in the U.S.A.: A Reference Guide to Book Censorship in Schools and Public Libraries. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1994.

Right of Unmarried People to Live Together

Government restrictions on the right of unmarried people to live together raise privacy and civil liberties issues. In Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977), the defendant, a grandmother named Inez Moore, lived in her East Cleveland, Ohio, home with her son Dale and two grandsons, Dale Jr. and John, who were first cousins. An East Cleveland housing ordinance limited occupancy of a dwelling unit to members of a single family but defined "family" restrictively to include only nuclear family relationships. In particular, the ordinance's restrictive definition of "family" prevented the plaintiff from having the two grandchildren live with her. Moore was convicted of a criminal violation of the ordinance. Her conviction was upheld on appeal over her claim that the ordinance was unconstitutional, but the U.S. Supreme Court reversed her conviction.

In Moore, the city contended that the ordinance should be sustained under Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974), which upheld an ordinance imposing limits on the types of groups that could occupy a single dwelling unit. In reversing the judgment of the lower court, the Supreme Court held that the ordinance deprived Moore of her liberty in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held that people related to each other had a fundamental unenumerated (that is, not specified in the Constitution) substantive due process right to live together in one household, as either a nuclear or extended family. In holding that extended families were entitled to protection, the Court relied on tradition by considering the role that family life has played in American history. The Court also weighed the government's interest in supporting the statute against the right of an extended family to live together. Accordingly, the Court asserted that U.S. history and tradition required a broader definition of "family" than the conventional one. Many scholars have debated whether the Court applied the "strict-scrutiny test," the standard of analysis for laws governing fundamental rights, or an intermediate standard, as evidenced by use of such terminology as "the importance of the governmental interests," a phrase that gave implicit recognition to the idea that the legislature had some right to regulate family living conditions.

The plurality in Moore distinguished it from Belle Terre, in which a majority of the Court upheld a zoning restriction prohibiting more than two unrelated people from living together. In Belle Terre, a landowner who rented his house to unrelated college students challenged the ordinance. In contrast to Moore, the Belle Terre majority ruled that excluding three or more unrelated persons from living together did not impinge on any fundamental right; specifically, the Court held that the ordinance met the constitutional standard and was valid land use legislation. Reconciling Moore with Belle Terre necessitates realizing that the Court has bestowed the status of "fundamental rights" on family relations, not on the desire of individuals to choose with whom they live. Many courts have since adopted the Court's reasoning in Belle Terre and upheld similar ordinances based on the rational relationship of a law to the permissible goal of laying out zones that enhanced family values and a peaceful environment (the rational-basis test).

The significance of Moore lies in its holding that there is a fundamental unenumerated substantive due process privacy right of blood-related people to live together in one household, as either a nuclear or extended family. In applying substantive due process to statutes that impinge on this right, the Court will use either strict scrutiny or intermediate scrutiny based on a reluctance to uphold infringements of the right.

Despite the Court's rhetoric in Moore that the "Constitution prevents East Cleveland from standardizing its children—and its adults—by forcing all to live in certain narrowly defined family patterns," this case ignores the heterogeneous and pluralistic society the United States has become. If the Court were truly interested in abolishing standardization among individuals, it would preclude the legislature from using zoning ordinances to exclude or limit nontraditional family living arrangements. Although the Court recognized that "family" includes more than the nuclear family, it stopped short of acknowledging nontraditional family living arrangements that may still be prohibited under Moore.

Gia Elise Barboza

See also: Family Rights; Moore v. City of East Cleveland; Right to Privacy; Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas.

FURTHER READING

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 2d ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Right to Appeal

Generally, the losing party in a criminal case or a civil lawsuit has either a statutory or constitutional right to appeal the unfavorable decision (judgment). The process involves requesting a court with appellate jurisdiction to review the trial court's judgment for the purposes of reversing or modifying it. An appeal consists of the formal judicial proceedings or steps required to obtain such a review. The initiation of the process of an appeal is normally permitted only after the completion of trial court proceedings, because it is a request for reexamination and alteration of the final judgment. Most state and federal courts permit a party to ask (by motion) the trial judge to reconsider the trial court decision, whether rendered by judge or jury, but this must be done prior to filing an appellate appeal, which requests other judges in a separate court to review the law and result of the trial.

An intermediate appellate court is one entrusted with the primary function of reviewing the decisions and judgments of trial courts and the decisions rendered by administrative agencies. Higher appellate courts in the state can in turn review such intermediate appellate decisions. Similarly, the U.S. Supreme Court is the highest appellate court in the land, overseeing thirteen intermediate courts of appeal. The procedural rules that govern the process of obtaining an appeal and review differ from state to state. Although there are slight procedural differences, the substantive law governing requirements for filing cases in federal courts are generally uniform. Whether the original plaintiff or defendant, the party who undertakes an appeal is called the appellant, and the other party who must answer the appeal is designated the appellee. In criminal cases, the appellant is usually the defendant who has been convicted of the commission of a crime, and the respondent is the people of the state (or of the United States if it is a federal case), represented by the prosecution.

The major steps in an appeal include the following:

1. The filing of a formal document in the court having appellate jurisdiction;
2. Securing a copy of the record of the original proceedings, often called the trial transcript;
3. The filing of briefs (written legal arguments) in the appellate court by the opposing parties;
4. Oral arguments before the appellate judges; and
5. The appellate court written opinion, which either affirms, reverses, modifies, or alters the lower court decision.

The appellate court judges, after hearing oral arguments, deliberate by reviewing the record of the earlier proceedings, and consider the allegations and arguments as to why the lower court decision contains material nonharmless errors. In most cases, immaterial or harmless error is insufficient grounds to reverse the lower court.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS AND APPEALS AS OF RIGHT

An interlocutory (in the middle of proceedings) appeal is a request from either party at the trial court level

The U.S. Supreme Court (east facade shown) is the highest appellate court in the land, overseeing thirteen federal intermediate courts of appeal and also accepting appeals from the highest court in each state. (Library of Congress) before a judgment or decision has been rendered to have an appellate court exercise jurisdiction to review an order or ruling that may have a substantial effect on the course and duration of the trial. Unlike federal courts, some state courts do not permit an interlocutory appeal unless special, very limited circumstances exist. When the subject matter of the appeal is such that it would likely have a bearing on the outcome of the case, such as the suppression of evidence in a criminal case, then the trial court proceeding may be stayed or temporarily suspended until the determination of the appeal. In the federal forums, examples of appealable interlocutory orders under federal statute (U.S. Code, Vol. 28, sec. 1292(a)) include (1) orders that grant, continue, modify, refuse, or dissolve injunctions, except where a direct appeal may be made to the U.S. Supreme Court; (2) orders that appoint receivers or refuse to appoint receivers to wind up receivership; and (3) admiralty case orders.

In order for a federal appeals court to hear a discretionary interlocutory case, it must involve a controlling question of law, where there is a substantial difference of opinion and an immediate appeal would materially advance the termination of the litigation. In addition, there exists a category of collateral orders that are final and appealable even though they do not end the litigation. Moreover, an order denying a motion for permission to intervene by a nonparty who has a substantial interest relating to the outcome of the action in a pending case is also immediately appealable.

An appeal as of right is one in which the appellate court must review the lower court result at the conclusion of the trial court proceedings. Such reviews are often mandatory in criminal cases. An appeal subject to discretionary review is one in which the court having appellate jurisdiction may exercise discretion to agree or decline to hear the appeal. Procedurally, the party seeking appellate review must first request the trial court for permission to make the appeal (known as leave to appeal), by stating the reasoning and legal basis for appeal. The trial court has discretion to grant or deny the request. Some states permit an automatic appeal, as in capital cases when the defendant has been sentenced to the death penalty. No special filing requirements are needed in this category of cases. In any event, the appellant must elect to appeal or accept the lower court decision irrespective of whether the appeal is as of right or subject to the appellate court discretion.

Under federal practice, the receipt of a final written judgment is a very important procedural prerequisite. An appeal as of right may not be effective unless the clerk of the court enters the written final judgment on the docket sheet. Also, the filing deadlines are governed by the clerk's entry of the judgment into the record. For example, the federal rules strictly require that a notice of appeal must be filed within thirty days of the entry of the order or judgment. The final judgment is a separate written instrument that states only which party was victorious and what relief was granted. It is distinguished from the court's opinion, which states the legal reasoning as applied to the facts of the specific case. Last, only a final judgment is given preclusive effect (barring further action under principles of res judicata and collateral estoppel) in relation to future litigation involving the same subject matter or claims among the same parties. In state courts, practice varies regarding the service of orders and judgments. Many state courts place this burden on the adversarial process by requiring the lawyers to prepare orders to be signed by judges. The adversaries are then responsible for timely serving the signed orders on the other parties.

A well-written opinion stating the facts determined by the trier of fact and the legal reasoning justifying the decision can be just as important as the filing and service of the order. Appellate court judges will admonish lower court judges who fail clearly to articulate the facts and legal reasoning for their opinions. In cases where lower court decisions are deficient, unclear, or inconsistent, appellate courts (generally consisting of three sitting judges) may remand the decisions to the lower courts, returning them for retrial and correction.

SCOPE OF REVIEW

The purpose of appeals is to correct improper decisions by lower courts when it is necessary to protect the losing party. Trial lawyers must be careful to preserve the record with issues and alleged errors that are subject to appellate review. If during trial certain objections have not been entered into the official written record, there is a strong possibility that the issue cannot be presented for appellate review.

The scope and standard of review used by an appellate court depend upon the nature of the alleged error and whether the trial was before a judge or jury. The fullest scope of review involves questions of law, such as an erroneous jury instruction, the admission of improper evidence, conclusions of law, summary judgment motions, and judgments as a matter of law. These reviews are decided on a de novo (anew) basis, meaning that they are analyzed in their entirety from inception. The appellate court can substitute its judgment for that of the lower court. Lower court rulings that were delivered at the discretion of the court are subject to an abuse of discretion standard. Reversal of these decisions will occur only if the trial judge exceeded his discretion and they were clearly erroneous, as when the findings of fact were clearly wrong. Other examples include discovery orders, motions for new trials, and motions for transfers of venue. A review of the fact-finding process in a jury trial must exceed a higher burden before reversal occurs because jury determinations of the sufficiency of the evidence are given more weight and greater deference. Last, the harmless-error rule applies to all appeals. Thus, before an appellate court will reverse the trial court, alleged errors must be shown to have been harmful to the appellant by materially contributing to the adverse part of the judgment.

In all cases, the standard of proof at the trial court will also influence the appellate review process. In a criminal case, the defendant must be found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. In a basic civil case, the preponderance of the evidence must favor one party over the other. In a range of cases, the standard to be satisfied prior to penalty is clear and convincing evidence; that norm lies somewhere between the other two burdens of proof. Last, a winning party cannot expect to accept the lower court award and at the same time file an appeal to expand or increase the award. However, when a winning party has won some of the claims or issues in a case containing multiple claims, an appeal is permissible on the other claims or issues that were denied or ruled on unfavorably.

BRIEFS AND ORAL ARGUMENT

The formal appellate brief in most jurisdictions must conform to special rules of appellate practice and procedure. The purpose of the brief is to summarize the lower court decision and present the facts, legal statutes, case law, and precedent that demonstrate to the appellate court that a substantial error has occurred. Many appellate lawyers are specialists. The purpose of oral argument before the appellate judges is to (1) clarify issues; (2) clarify the record; (3) clarify the scope of claims or defenses; (4) examine the practical impact of claims and defenses; (5) examine the logic of claims and defenses; (6) lobby for or against particular positions; (7) correct or highlight misimpressions of fact or law by judicial officers; and (8) expand or contract the outer boundaries of judicial precedent.

The process of appeals is fundamental to the protection of basic civil rights and liberties in the United States. It provides oversight of trial judges and allows for the imposition of greater uniformity of procedures. Many pathbreaking decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, especially in the area of criminal law, have been made in cases reversing lower court decisions in which individual rights were ignored or inadequately protected.

J. David Golub

See also: Due Process of Law; Harmless Error; United States Supreme Court.

FURTHER READING

Aldisert, Ruggero. Winning on Appeal: Better Briefs and Oral Arguments. Chicago: National Institute for Trial Advocacy, 1996.

O'Connor, Michol. Federal Rules: Civil Trials 2003. Vols. 1 and 2. Houston, TX: Jones and McClure, 2003.

Pacelle, Richard L., Jr. The Role of the Supreme Court in American Politics: The Least Dangerous Branch? Boulder, CO: Westview, 2002.

Woodley, Ann E. Litigating in Federal Court: A Guide to the Rules. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1999.

Right to Counsel

The Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." Historically, state and federal appellate courts interpreted this clause to mean that an accused who could afford to retain counsel should not be deterred from exercising that right. For the accused without funds, the story was much different, since there was no language in the amendment that obligated government to provide counsel to the indigent accused.

TRIAL-COURT RIGHTS

In Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), the decision concerning the "Scottsboro boys," African American youth accused of the rape of two white girls, the U.S. Supreme Court held for the first time that states must provide counsel to defendants who were indigent, ignorant, illiterate, feebleminded, or otherwise unable to provide their own defense in a capital (case involving a possible death sentence) felony case. The ruling did not extend to indigent defendants charged with noncapital offenses in state courts. Unless the state constitution or the state legislature specifically provided for indigents to receive court-appointed counsel, the traditional practice required defendants to defend themselves.

Powell v. Alabama, however, involved a state prosecution. In Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938), the Court maintained that persons accused in federal courts of felonious criminal acts, including noncapital offenses, had a basic right to legal representation regardless of their economic status. For indigents, this meant that counsel would be appointed to represent them.

In Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942), the Court reaffirmed that states were obligated to furnish counsel to indigent defendants only in capital cases or in felony cases posing such special circumstances that assistance of counsel was required in order for a fair trial to occur. This changed in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), in which the Court required states to furnish counsel in noncapital felony cases as well. In Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972), the Court made indigent defendants charged with misdemeanors eligible for court-appointed counsel, saying that judges who failed to appoint counsel for an indigent defendant could not impose any jail time upon a finding of guilt. The Court refined this right in Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979), holding that the right of an indigent defendant to court-appointed counsel applied only when the defendant was in fact incarcerated, not just when incarceration was a possibility.

In addition to mandating counsel in criminal cases, the Court has ruled that defendants are entitled to counsel in certain pretrial procedures. In Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), the Court mandated that individuals who are suspects must be informed of these rights to protect their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination during police interrogations. The right to counsel also applies to preliminary hearings, as held in Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970), and to police lineups, the ruling in United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967).

COUNSEL AT APPELLATE STAGE

Most states provide persons convicted of felonies a first appeal as a matter of right. To accommodate the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963), that states were obligated to furnish indigent defendants counsel when an appeal was given as a matter of right. The Court's rationale was based upon the idea that appeals focusing upon alleged errors of law required the legal acumen of counsel if the appeal was to be meaningful.

Discretionary appeals—cases in which the decision to file an appeal rests with the convicted person and the court to which the appeal is directed has discretion to hear or refuse to hear the case—do not require continued assistance of appointed counsel who served during the trial. In Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974), the Court stated that once an appellate court decided to hear a discretionary appeal, that court would then appoint counsel and thus there was no obligation to continue to furnish the original counsel who served at trial.

OTHER ISSUES

Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975), focused on the issue of whether accused individuals have a constitutionally protected right to serve as their own counsel. The Court emphasized that although it considered assistance of counsel to be the more viable alternative, so long as the judge was able to determine that indigent defendants desiring to serve as their own counsel were capable of "knowing, willingly and intelligently waiving their right to court-appointed counsel," the trial judge was required to allow such an individual to have that choice.

In a related area, the Supreme Court has generally been reluctant to uphold claims based on ineffective assistance of counsel. The Court thus established a relatively high hurdle for such challenges in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), denying that a defendant who had alleged ineffective counsel in a death penalty case had shown that it resulted in a difference in the outcome.

Sam W. McKinstry

See also: Argersinger v. Hamlin; Gideon v. Wainwright; Powell v. Alabama; Sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Adabinsky, Howard. Law and Justice: An Introduction to the American Legal System. 2d ed. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1991.

American Jurisprudence 2d. Vol. 21-A, sec. 1185, "Assistance of Counsel." St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Smith, Christopher E. Courts and the Poor. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1991.

Right to Die

The term "right to die" is used to describe the ability of an individual to determine the time and manner of his or her death. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that the U.S. Constitution provides no such right. The Court has ruled, however, that a mentally competent adult has the right to refuse medical treatment that would unnecessarily prolong life. Ultimately, there is a conflict between state laws prohibiting criminal acts such as suicide and murder and the freedom for individuals to end their life.

Active euthanasia occurs when death results from a positive act such as lethal injection or other types of "mercy killings" and is prohibited by law. Passive euthanasia, conversely, is death that results from either a failure to act to preserve life or from the removal of life-sustaining equipment such as ventilators. With the advent of the right-to-die movement in the 1970s, courts and legislatures began to outline the contours of the right to die.

The right-to-die movement gained notoriety in 1976 because of two noteworthy events. The New Jersey Supreme Court held in In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), that a ventilator could be removed from Karen Ann Quinlan, who was in a persistent vegetative state. Also in 1976, California enacted the first living-will law. A living will, or advance directive, allows an individual in advance of illness to refuse medical treatment and to release health care providers from liability if the individual becomes terminally ill and is unable to communicate the refusal of treatment.

The U.S. Supreme Court first dealt with the right to die in Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990). Nancy Beth Cruzan remained in a persistent vegetative state as a result of an automobile accident. Four years after the accident, her parents undertook legal action to have her removed from life support. The Missouri Supreme Court ruled that due to the lack of "clear and convincing evidence" regarding her wishes, her parents could not withdraw life-sustaining medical treatment. The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed this ruling. The Court reasoned that the precautions were needed to prevent against potential abuses. Although the ruling upheld the Missouri standard, it also recognized that a competent adult was permitted to reject life-saving medical treatment. Unlike Missouri, most states allow guardians to make medical decisions for incompetent patients even if they involve the rejection of life-saving treatment. Two standards are applicable to guardians of incompetent patients: The "substituted judgment" standard allows guardians to use their own judgment in making decisions; the "best interest" standard allows guardians to make decisions based on the best interests of incompetent patients.

The public debate during the 1990s centered on physician-assisted suicide largely due to the actions of Dr. Jack Kevorkian, a Michigan physician also known as Dr. Death. Kevorkian developed a "suicide machine" that caused death to terminally ill patients through carbon monoxide poisoning. Kevorkian was ultimately convicted in 1999 of second-degree murder. In this instance, he went beyond assisting a suicide to actually injecting a patient with lethal drugs. His actions were videotaped and aired on 60 Minutes two months later. Because this was regarded as active euthanasia, the state won the conviction. He was sentenced to ten to twenty-five years in prison and is reportedly responsible for assisting in 130 suicides.

Dr. Timothy Quill, who has assisted in suicides, with a patient at Genesee Hospital in Rochester, New York. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that the Constitution does not grant any such right to die but that a mentally competent adult has the right to refuse medical treatment that would unnecessarily prolong life. (© Bob Mahoney/The Image Works)

The Court has held that state laws forbidding physician-assisted suicide are constitutional. In Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997), and Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997), the Court differentiated between refusal of treatment and assisted suicide. The Court concluded that the state had a legitimate interest in affirming the value of life and emphasized again that there was no right to assisted suicide.

Oregon voters passed the Death with Dignity Act in 1994. Under this law, doctors could provide, but not administer, a lethal prescription if two doctors determined that the patient was competent and had less than six months to live. Attorney General John Ashcroft attempted to undermine this legislation by prosecuting under federal law physicians who prescribed lethal doses of narcotics. In 2002 a judge ruled that the Oregon law should remain in effect. The controversy, however, is far from over.

Although there is no constitutionally protected right to die or to have a physician assist in a suicide of a terminally ill patient, a competent individual is allowed to refuse life-sustaining treatment. Much of the conflict over this issue stems from the tension between the state's responsibility to protect life and the humane treatment of terminally ill patients.

Kara E. Stooksbury

See also: Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health; Right to Privacy; Washington v. Glucksberg.

FURTHER READING

Cantor, Norman L. Advance Directives and the Pursuit of Death with Dignity. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.

Emanuel, Linda L., ed. Regulating How We Die: The Ethical, Medical, and Legal Issues Surrounding Physician-Assisted Suicide. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.

Neeley, G. Steven. The Constitutional Right to Suicide: A Legal and Philosophical Examination. New York: P. Lang, 1996.

Right to Education

Contrary to the assumption held by many Americans, there is no federal right to education in the United States. Education has long been a state affair, and state laws govern most of U.S. education policy. In spite of this, the federal government has been involved in education, specifically education-related rights and liberties, since the beginning of the twentieth century.

What most Americans think of as their "right" to an education is actually provided by the state in which they live. Most state constitutions either explicitly proclaim a right to education or at least guarantee a certain minimum level of schooling for all residents. Similarly, a citizen's obligation to attend school until reaching a certain age is a duty imposed by the state.

This is not to say, however, that the federal government is not involved in education or even that it does not guarantee certain levels of equality within public education. Although neither "education" nor "schooling" (nor anything similar) is mentioned in the Constitution, the U.S. Supreme Court has relied on this document to provide some semblance of a guarantee of access to education, even though it has never explicitly stated that all Americans have a right thereto.

Although the Court had heard education-related cases before the mid-1950s, the most famous and most important decision in this arena was Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). In this case, Thurgood Marshall of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), who later joined the Court, argued that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbade the states to require that black and white children attend separate schools. The states involved argued that because they provided all children with an education at public expense, they were fulfilling their burdens under the amendment. According to the states, the doctrine of "separate but equal," which in 1896 had been upheld in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, permitted them to force children to attend separate schools, as long as all children were provided with an equal education.

In a unanimous decision in Brown, the Court disagreed with the states. In his opinion for the Court, Chief Justice Earl Warren argued that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal." This was based largely on research by sociologist Kenneth Clark, who had argued to the Court that placing black children in separate schools marked them with a badge of inferiority, and that this occurred whether or not black and white schools were otherwise "equal." Thus, according to the Court, it was not possible for schools to be equal when they were racially segregated.

It is easy in reading Brown today to think that the Court established a right to education with this decision, but that is not the case. The Court did not claim that all children have a right to an education. Rather, the justices said that when the state has decided to provide a public service such as education, it must be provided to all citizens equally. There is, however, no federal requirement that the state provide this service at all.

The Court seemed to turn its back on the idea of the right to education in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973). In this case, the Court overruled a lower court finding that school funding, when based on property taxes, was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The lower court had found this to be a violation because areas with greater property wealth were able to raise more money than areas with less property wealth. The Supreme Court disagreed. The justices ruled that because being poor did not place individuals in a "suspect class," only heightened scrutiny—more than the rational-basis test but less than strict scrutiny—of the state law was in order. (Had the differences been based on race, the Court would have invoked strict scrutiny and likely have upheld the decision.) When reviewing the evidence with heightened scrutiny, the Court ruled that the state had the discretion to fund its schools as it saw fit and that differential funding did not necessarily violate the Equal Protection Clause.

Although this case seemed to be a step backward in the provision of equal education, some observers read the decision the opposite way. The Court was careful to note that the students involved were not denied an education. Had the state decided to provide an education to some students but not to others, the decision likely would have been different.

The Court was presented with just this situation in a 1982 case from Texas, Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202. In this case, the Court ruled that the state could not refuse to educate the children of undocumented immigrants. Although the justices acknowledged that the parents of such children had broken the law, they argued that it would be unjust to punish children whose parents had illegally entered the country. Indeed, the Court found education to be of such value that to deny it to undocumented children "imposes a lifetime hardship" on them. Additionally, by not providing these children an education, "we deny them the ability to live within the structure of our civic institutions, and foreclose any realistic possibility that they will contribute in even the smallest way to the progress of our Nation."

This case would seem finally to have established a right to education for all Americans, but the Court did not go quite that far. In spite of this, it is clear that the Supreme Court still believes, as it said in Brown, that education "is the very foundation of good citizenship." It is possible that a future case will present an opportunity for the Court finally to declare that every American has a right to education. Until then, however, people must rely on the states for this right.

Ryane McAuliffe Straus

See also: San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Bitensky, Susan H. "Legal Theory: Theoretical Foundations for a Right to Education Under the U.S. Constitution: A Beginning to the End of the National Education Crisis." Northwestern University Law Review 86 (1992): 550.

Gutmann, Amy. Democratic Education. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987.

Orfield, Gary, Susan Eaton, and the Harvard Project on School Desegregation. Dismantling Desegregation: The Quiet Reversal of Brown v. Board of Education. New York: New Press, 1996.

Right to Petition

The right to petition government for redress of grievances is so ingrained in the U.S. social and political culture that it is easy to take for granted. Yet the First Amendment freedoms of speech, press, religion, and assembly would be diminished were it not for the right to petition. A petition is a formal request to a government authority requesting relief or action on an issue or problem of public concern. Although the methods by which petitions are presented to government vary, there are two general ways for individuals and groups to petition government: either directly or by petition drives aimed at gathering signatures on petitions to present to government.

The right to petition originated in Great Britain. It evolved from the Magna Carta, signed in 1215, and its antecedents and eventually found its way into English common law. From the fifteenth through the seventeenth centuries, the right expanded, and with it the power of the English Parliament. Exercise of the right to petition, however, sometimes met with royal retaliation. For example, in the Trial of the Seven Bishops in 1688, King James II sued the archbishop of Canterbury and six other bishops for seditious libel for requesting to be exempt from a royal decree. The bishops were acquitted. The English Bill of Rights, enacted in 1689, affirmed the right of subjects to petition the king.

The right to petition also has a long history in the United States, and its uses evolved in conjunction with the development of the nation's constitutional democracy. When the English colonies in America were settled, the colonists brought with them the common law practices of Great Britain, including the right to petition. In 1641, Massachusetts became the first colony to affirm the right. Petitions were the principal means for colonists to express their concerns to government. Colonial assemblies accepted and read petitions, not merely from enfranchised white males but also from women, slaves, free blacks, Native Americans, and even children. This is not to say, however, that officials acted upon all petitions. Many were denied, and some were ignored. In fact, one of the grievances in the Declaration of Independence was that King George III ignored the colonists' petitions.

Although the framers did not include it in the Constitution, the right to petition was discussed during the revolutionary era and the period leading up to the 1787 Constitutional Convention. One of the major grievances of the Antifederalists during the ratification debates was that the proposed Constitution lacked protection of specific rights, including the right to petition government for redress of grievances. During the first Congress, James Madison proposed the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution), which included protection of the rights of assembly and petition.

During the first few Congresses, petitioning was the primary means for individuals and groups to relate their needs and demands to Congress. It also allowed members of Congress to keep abreast of developments in their home states. During the early 1800s, however, political, economic, and social changes led to problems with the use of petitions. The expansion of democracy during the two-term presidency of Andrew Jackson (1829–1837), the rise of political parties as intermediaries between citizens and government, and the escalating antislavery movement placed severe strains on the traditional method in which Congress handled petitions. In the 1830s, the American Anti-Slavery Society's organized petition drives flooded the House of Representatives with antislavery petitions, creating a backlog. The House responded by issuing a gag rule on these petitions. In 1844, John Quincy Adams succeeded in getting the gag rule repealed.

Many of the major political movements of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries involved use of petitions, including creation of the Bank of the United States, passage of the Sixteenth, Eighteenth, and Nineteenth Amendments, and adoption of the antitrust movement of the late 1800s. Yet petitioning efforts through mass demonstrations, picketing, and marches on Washington sometimes were met with arrest, imprisonment, and other forms of official retaliation.

Although it is a separate and distinct right in the First Amendment, the right to petition is closely linked to the right of assembly. In United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876), the U.S. Supreme Court formally articulated the connection between the right to petition and the right of assembly. In the 1930s, the Supreme Court's interpretations of the First Amendment rights of assembly and petition broadened their scope, secured their constitutional status within the context of other constitutional rights, and defined the conditions under which assembly and petition could take place. In DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937), the Court declared that the First Amendment right of assembly had an independent significance equal to that of freedom of speech, press, and religion. In Hague v. Congress of Industrial Organizations, 307 U.S. 496 (1939), the Court protected the right of petition from state action through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

During the civil rights, antiwar, and other protest movements of the 1960s, the First Amendment rights of assembly and petition took on new meaning, as civil rights activists used sit-ins and other forms of civil disobedience to draw attention to racial discrimination and other social and political problems. In a long series of cases, the Court sanctioned such activities, declaring them symbolic conduct protected by the First Amendment.

Since then, interest groups have become better organized, and government officials more accommodating to demonstrators. Today individuals and groups across the political spectrum conduct petition drives for a variety of reasons. For example, in 1997 the National Committee to Protect Social Security and Medicare generated over 890,000 petitions urging Congress to kill a balanced-budget amendment that would not protect the Social Security Trust Fund. The same year forty-nine state legislatures petitioned Congress to consider a constitutional amendment to prohibit physical desecration of the flag.

Although these forms of mass participation have constitutional sanction, petitioning government can still result in official retaliation. Particularly troublesome are libel suits filed by government against citizens exercising their First Amendment rights. These lawsuits are called "strategic lawsuits against public participation" (SLAPPs). The acronym is new, but the practice dates at least to the days of King James II and his libel suit against the seven bishops. SLAPPs are prevalent at all levels of government, but local governments use them most frequently to suppress citizen participation in the political process. Some states have enacted anti-SLAPP legislation, and concerned interest groups are fighting SLAPPs in state and federal courts across the country.

Freedom to petition goes hand in hand with other constitutional rights and liberties, for it places them within the context of a democratic society exercising its right to make the United States a "more perfect Union."

Judith Haydel

See also: English Roots of Civil Liberties; First Amendment; Magna Carta.

FURTHER READING

Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution. The Bill of Rights and Beyond: A Resource Guide. Washington, DC: Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution, 1991.

Levy, Leonard W., Kenneth L. Karst, and Dennis Mahoney. Encyclopedia of the American Constitution. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

Pring, George W., and Penelope Canan. SLAPPs: Getting Sued for Speaking Out. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1996.

Sandwith, Henry. Some Observances on the Four Freedoms of the First Amendment. Boston: Boston University Press, 1957.

Schweninger, Loren, ed. The Southern Debate over Slavery, Vol. 1: Petitions to Southern Legislatures, 1778–1864. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2001.

Smith, Don L. "The Right to Petition for Redress of Grievances: Constitutional Development and Interpretations." Ph.D. diss., Texas Tech University, 1971.

Wolfensberger, Donald R. Congress and the People: Deliberative Democracy on Trial. Washington, DC: Woodrow Wilson Center, 2001.

Right to Privacy

The right to privacy is a judicially crafted constitutional right protecting individuals from government interference with important personal choices they make regarding their private lives. The right to privacy includes in many cases protection from unwanted government searches, use of birth control, decisions regarding the termination of a pregnancy, sexual relations, and the right to withhold unwanted medical treatment. Privacy is an important constitutional protection that affords individuals a zone of freedom against government interference.

Neither the Constitution nor the Bill of Rights explicitly mentions or references a right to privacy. Instead, privacy is considered to be an individual right found not expressly but implicitly within several provisions of the Constitution.

The historical legal origins of the concept of a right to privacy are often credited to Samuel Warren and Louis Brandeis's famous 1890 article, "The Right to Privacy." The article grew out the authors' concern that the media had improperly taken pictures of Warren's daughter at her wedding; the authors articulated the view that the "right to be left alone" was the cornerstone of a right to privacy. More broadly, Warren and Brandeis were troubled that the media were improperly circulating unauthorized portraits of private persons, made possible by new technological innovations such as cameras. As a result, they called for a tort action for invasions of privacy. They contended that individuals had the right to be left alone, a right not to have one's personal space or life invaded without consent. This right to be left alone was a right to privacy.

The first two instances of privacy being employed as a legal concept occurred at the federal level in dissents. First, in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), Brandeis, by then a justice on the U.S. Supreme Court, dissented from the majority's holding that use of evidence obtained from an illegal wiretap did not violate the defendant's Fourth Amendment rights. For Brandeis, the Fourth and Fifth Amendments conferred a general right to "privacy rather than mere protection of material things." Second, in Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961), Justice John Marshall Harlan dissented from a majority ruling that examined the constitutionality of a Connecticut law that made it illegal for married couples to use birth control. To him, the state law was "an intolerable and unjustifiable invasion of privacy in the conduct of the most intimate concerns of an individual's personal life."

Both of these dissents laid fertile ground for subsequent incorporation of privacy into the federal Constitution. First, in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), the Court eventually struck down the state law that criminalized the use of birth control by married couples. In the majority opinion, Justice William O. Douglas contended that the penumbras of the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments created a "zone of privacy" that placed certain actions beyond the reach of state laws. Second, in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the Court, in reversing an earlier decision permitting warrantless wiretaps and defining the circumstances under which police would need a warrant to undertake a search, created a two-part test to define what areas were constitutionally protected. The test asked, first, if individuals had an expectation of privacy in that area or activity, and then, whether society recognized that expectation as reasonable. In fashioning this test, Justice Harlan and the majority seemed to recognize that society was the final arbiter of privacy, holding out perhaps the possibility of an evolving conception of privacy as circumstances changed. In taking this approach, the Court followed Warren and Brandeis's original arguments that changing social, political, and economic developments should drive the creation and recognition of new rights such as privacy.

From Griswold and Katz, federal construction of a right to privacy traveled many disparate directions. Privacy now protects the right of unmarried couples to use birth control, Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972); the sale of birth control to minors, Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1977); most abortions, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); the right to die, Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990), albeit not, as yet, the right to physician-assisted suicide, Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997); and the right to view obscenity in one's home, Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969). Although originally holding in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), that privacy did not protect the right to engage in homosexual sodomy, subsequently in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the Supreme Court extended its interpretation of the right to privacy to protect this type of activity. Also recently, in Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001), the Court seemed to say that privacy builds a wall around homes, precluding the police from using thermal heat detectors without a warrant to search the interior.

In addition to the federal courts, state courts have also interpreted their constitutions to address right-to-privacy issues. For example, the New Jersey Supreme Court's In re Quinlan holding, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), broke important ground in using privacy arguments to uphold the right to remove adults from life support. In Ravin v. State, 537 P.2d 494 (Alaska 1975), the Alaska Supreme Court interpreted the state constitution's right-to-privacy clause as protecting the right of adults to possess and use marijuana in their own homes. The Hawaii Supreme Court in State v. Kam, 748 P.2d 372 (Haw. 1988), used the privacy clause of its state constitution to invalidate the state's obscenity statute. In Commonwealth v. Wasson, 842 S.W.2d 487 (Ky. 1993), the Kentucky Supreme Court broke with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Bowers and held that the Kentucky constitution created a zone of privacy that protected consensual homosexual activity. Finally, in State v. Casino Marketing Group, Inc., 491 N.W.2d 882 (Minn. 1992), the Minnesota Supreme Court used privacy arguments to prohibit the use of automatic-dialing announcing devices that did not disconnect, labeling these telephone calls a significant intrusion into the home and applying the state constitution to protect residential privacy.

The right to privacy has been defended as critical to the protection of individual freedom and as important to fostering intellectual growth or protecting free inquiry. Yet as important as the right to privacy is, the legal recognition of the concept has generated significant controversy. Specifically, because privacy is nowhere mentioned in the Constitution, some critics, such as former federal judge Robert Bork, do not believe the courts should have been creating this or any other type of rights; instead, any right to privacy should have been fashioned by Congress or state legislatures. In response, defenders of privacy rights, such as abortion, see judicial creation of privacy and defense of this right as essential to protecting individuals from the tyranny of the majority.

Despite some criticisms of how the right to privacy was created and what exactly it protects, there is no question that such a right is now a constitutional cornerstone of American law and that it has become an important concept protecting individual civil liberties.

David Schultz

See also: Birth Control and Contraception; Bowers v. Hardwick; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Fourth Amendment; Griswold v. Connecticut; Katz v. United States; Lawrence v. Texas; Olmstead v. United States; Right to Die; Roe v. Wade; Wiretapping.

FURTHER READING

Garrow, David J. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. New York: Macmillan, 1994.

Warren, Samuel, and Louis Brandeis. "The Right to Privacy." Harvard Law Review 4 (1890): 193.

Right to Travel

The right to travel is the right to move into, out of, among, and within states, foreign nations, and lesser political and geographic entities. The right to travel has been long recognized in Anglo-American law; it is referred to explicitly in England's Magna Carta and the Articles of Confederation, the document that governed the United States prior to the Constitution. Although the right to travel remains implicit in the U.S. Constitution rather than being explicitly stated there, the founders of the Constitution were very concerned that citizens would be allowed to move freely from state to state.

PRIOR TO THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

For much of U.S. history, issues surrounding the right to travel were linked to the enslavement of African Americans. Before the Civil War, slave owners claimed the right to travel with their slaves to states and territories where slavery was prohibited but still to retain full property rights to their slaves. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld this right in Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857).

The modern right to travel has its roots in the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Commerce Clause of the Constitution in the nineteenth century. In Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. 35 (1868), the Court invalidated a law that taxed owners of for-hire vehicles for each passenger they transported out of state. It ruled that the right to travel from state to state came with national citizenship. The Court noted that the federal government was formed so that those living in the United States could be one people in one common country, thus giving members of this one community the right to pass through every part of it without interference. In the Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873), the right to travel, as a right of national citizenship, was strengthened when the Court brought it under the protection of the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

IMPERMISSIBLE STATE RESIDENCY REQUIREMENTS

In the twentieth century the Supreme Court interpreted the right to travel to apply to important questions of whether newly arrived state citizens could vote and receive welfare and other benefits, without first being residents of states (or the District of Columbia) for a specified period of time. As emphasized in Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55 (1982), at the core of the modern definition of the right to travel was the notion that states could not have classes of citizens made subject to different state benefits based on the time when they became citizens of a state.

In Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941), the Supreme Court used the Commerce Clause to invalidate a California law that prohibited any person from bringing into the state any indigent person who was not a resident of that state; Justice Robert H. Jackson sought in a concurring opinion to tie this right to the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court significantly expanded the right to travel in Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969), viewing it as a fundamental right under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court ruled that the right to travel prohibited a state from setting durational residency requirements that must be met before new arrivals could receive welfare payments. Durational residency requirements required persons to show that in addition to being bona fide residents of a state, they had lived in the location for a specific period of time. The Court reasoned that the nature of the federal union and the guarantee of personal liberty gave each citizen the right to travel throughout the United States without unreasonable restrictions.

In later cases, the Court struck down other durational residency requirements as violations of the fundamental right to travel. In Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250 (1974), the Court invalidated laws requiring new arrivals to meet durational residency requirements before receiving basic medical services. The Court noted that medical services were a basic necessity of life; if they were denied to a new resident when they were available to other residents who were similarly situated, this disparate treatment effectively would penalize a person's right to travel.

In 1999 the Court again affirmed the right to travel in Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999), a holding that invalidated the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Act of 1996, which expressly authorized any state to pay a new arrival welfare benefits based on the amount received in the state from which the new resident came for up to one year. The Court noted that the right to travel embraced three different components: the right to enter and leave another state; the right to be treated as a welcome visitor while temporarily present in another state; and for those residents who elected to become permanent residents, the right to be treated as were other citizens of that state.

Most important in Saenz, the Court returned to the Slaughterhouse Cases to say that the rights of newly arrived citizens were protected by their status as both state and U.S. citizens, as plainly identified in the Fourteenth Amendment's Privileges or Immunities Clause. The Court emphasized that because the right to travel embraced the right of citizens to be treated equally in their new state of residence, a discriminatory classification was itself a penalty.

PERMITTED DURATIONAL RESIDENCY REQUIREMENTS

State durational residency requirements are permitted if a compelling governmental interest exists. In Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330 (1972), the Court found that a long state durational residency requirement for voting was unconstitutional because such requirements interfered with the fundamental right to vote and penalized the right to travel, although shorter time periods were permissible. In Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393 (1975), the Court did not view a one-year residency requirement before a new resident could get a divorce as a denial of the right to travel. The Court noted that unlike the welfare recipients in Shapiro, the voters in Dunn, or the indigent patients in Maricopa, the new arrivals in Sosna were not irretrievably foreclosed from getting a divorce. In the 1990s scholars attempted, without success, to apply the right to travel in challenging tightened airline security, limits on intrastate travel from police enforcement tactics, and restrictions on movement among the states to secure abortions.

INTERNATIONAL TRAVEL

The right to travel is also involved in questions of whether citizens are allowed to travel freely to and from foreign nations. The Court has decided that the right to travel internationally is more limited, and the government may limit an individual's travel for national security reasons. The government may seek to restrict citizens from traveling between the United States and specified foreign nations if the restrictions are not based on the beliefs of the citizens seeking to travel. In Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964), the Court invalidated a section of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 that made it unlawful for any "knowing" member of a communist organization to use a passport.

Ronald Kahn

See also: First Amendment; Shapiro v. Thompson; Slaughterhouse Cases.

FURTHER READING

Cohen, William. "Equal Treatment for Newcomers: The Core Meaning of National and State Citizenship." Constitutional Commentary 1 (1984): 9–19.

Kahn, Ronald. The Supreme Court and Constitutional Theory, 1953–1993. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.

Poppe, Matthew. "Defining the Scope of the Equal Protection Clause with Respect to Welfare Waiting Periods." University of Chicago Law Review 61 (1994): 291–323.

Right to Vote

Although some people might regard the right to vote as virtually inseparable from citizenship, the franchise has been expanded and contracted during American history by a variety of federal and state laws and constitutional provisions. As one of the most important "fundamental rights," the ability to vote freely lies at the heart of civil liberties in the United States.

On the eve of the American Revolution, most of the colonies based suffrage (the right to vote) on wealth, just as England did. Wealth was measured by ownership of a certain number of acres of land, the value of real or personal property, or the rental value of that property. Because of the different opportunities for accumulation of wealth in the mother country and the colonies, the right to suffrage extended to only about 15 percent of English adult males but ranged from 40 percent to 97 percent of free adult males in various colonies. The South and New England tended to have the largest percentage of eligible voters. Many colonies also limited the vote to Protestants.

During the Revolution and through to the end of the eighteenth century, most of the states changed to a requirement that a free adult male who paid a tax of a fixed amount (called a head tax or poll tax) could vote. This had the effect of simplifying and broadening suffrage requirements.

The U.S. Constitution, adopted in 1789, made no mention of who could vote except to provide that the House of Representatives would be elected by the same voters as the most numerous body of each state's legislature. During the first half of the nineteenth century, most states gradually moved toward universal suffrage among white adult males while eliminating or restricting the franchise for free blacks. Most states that had allowed free blacks to vote immediately after the Revolution restricted or eliminated black suffrage before 1820. The constitution of every new state admitted to the Union from 1820 to 1861 provided for universal white adult male suffrage.

The Civil War and the efforts of Reconstruction policy to rehabilitate the South after the war changed the legal framework for suffrage. The Republican-controlled Congress enfranchised blacks in the District of Columbia, federal territories, and each occupied southern state in 1867. In early 1869, Congress adopted the Fifteenth Amendment, which was ratified within fifteen months. Its backers intended that this amendment would permanently enfranchise blacks in both the South and the North (where it was allowed in only a few states).

Suffragists marching, probably in New York City, in 1913. After the Civil War, the women's suffrage movement tried but failed to have Congress adopt suffrage for women, as well as blacks, in the Fifteenth Amendment. The number of states with women's suffrage increased gradually and sporadically until Congress proposed and the states ratified the Nineteenth Amendment in 1919. (Library of Congress)

The women's suffrage movement tried to have Congress adopt suffrage for women, as well as blacks, in the Fifteenth Amendment but was unsuccessful. Women's suffrage groups kept up the fight, both in Congress and the state legislatures, during the next half century. Wyoming adopted women's suffrage as part of its constitution upon being admitted as a state in 1890. The number of states with women's suffrage increased gradually and sporadically until Congress adopted the Nineteenth Amendment in 1919. By August 1920 it was ratified, and women voted in the elections that fall.

Meanwhile, the enfranchisement of blacks proved to be less permanent than the backers of the Fifteenth Amendment had hoped. With the end of Reconstruction, Democrats regained control in the South—often through violence, intimidation, and fraud. Beginning about 1880, southern legislatures adopted laws making it more difficult for blacks to vote. The new laws included registration laws (previously unknown in most places), secret ballots (combined with confusing ballot layouts and restrictions on who could assist the illiterate voter), literacy tests (with exclusions for those who owned a certain amount of property or who had served in the Confederate or U.S. Army), poll taxes (for which no effort was made at collection and which were due several months before candidates even qualified), and restrictions on voting by those convicted of certain crimes (usually chosen for their racial impact). From 1890 to 1910, most of the southern states held constitutional conventions to continue and institutionalize the disfranchisement. The federal government gave tacit approval to these laws by failing to pass legislation to prevent the disenfranchisement of blacks or to reduce southern representation in Congress (a sanction provided in the Fourteenth Amendment).

The Democratic Party in the South did its part to minimize black voting by adopting primaries in place of conventions and restricting voting in those primaries to whites. During the 1930s and 1940s, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) attacked the white primaries and succeeded in finally abolishing them in the 1944 U.S. Supreme Court case of Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944). Nevertheless, southern states still managed to keep most blacks off the voter rolls through a variety of subterfuges and barriers.

As previously noted, poll taxes were used in the early republic to expand the franchise and in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries to restrict it. Over the first two-thirds of the twentieth century, the "poll tax" became synonymous with restriction of the franchise in southern states. Because many whites as well as blacks were poor and lived as sharecroppers with little or no cash money, the poll tax became an economic barrier for both poor blacks and poor whites. Southerners and northerners alike formed organizations to press for its repeal—either by the states or by federal legislation. The movement had a limited success when (from 1942 to 1956) Congress outlawed poll taxes as a condition for voting by members of the armed forces in time of war. After many unsuccessful attempts to pass other federal legislation (while the number of states using the poll tax dwindled), Congress adopted the Twenty-fourth Amendment in 1962. Within seventeen months, it had been ratified. The amendment forbade the imposition of a poll tax only for federal elections but allowed states to collect it for registration for state and local elections. The Supreme Court finally struck down the poll tax in Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966).

About this same time, the movement to lower the voting age to eighteen was reaching its goal. Georgia had been the first to lower the voting age shortly after World War II, and only three states had followed suit over the next two decades: Kentucky, Alaska (age nineteen), and Hawaii (age twenty). Congress amended the Voting Rights Act in 1970 to include an extension of the franchise to eighteen-year-olds in all elections. The Supreme Court quickly held in Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970), that Congress had no authority to extend the franchise for state and local elections but could do so for federal elections. On March 23, 1971, Congress proposed a constitutional amendment to require all states to allow eighteen-year-olds to vote in state and federal elections. By July 5 of that year, enough states had ratified it to make it the Twenty-sixth Amendment.

The passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 resulted in a large increase in the number of blacks registered to vote. The act outlawed certain restrictive practices used by southern states to hinder black registration, sent federal registrars to many southern counties to register blacks and whites without discriminatory practices, and required several states (mostly in the South) to prove any new election laws would not discriminate before they could go into effect.

The National Voter Registration Act of 1993 also advanced the right to vote by requiring states to make voter registration available through public benefits, motor vehicle, and driver licensing offices (thus its popular name the "Motor Voter Act"). The act also required states to accept a simple half-page application form published by the Federal Election Commission. This legislation did not extend the franchise, but as a practical matter it made it easier for people to register to vote.

The most recent federal act to affect voter registration and balloting is the Help America Vote Act of 2002. Under this act, states must establish provisional voting (to allow votes by those who claim to be erroneously omitted from the voter rolls), require improved access to the polls for voters with disabilities, and require some voters to produce identification at the polls. The legislation also encouraged states to adopt electronic voting systems (such as touch screens or optical-scan ballots) by providing funds for their purchase.

The right to vote is now widely available in the United States. The only major groups still remaining disenfranchised are those convicted of a felony and residents of the District of Columbia. Thirty-two states prohibit felons from voting while they are on parole, and fifteen states disenfranchise some or all ex-offenders who have completed their criminal sentence. An estimated 3.9 million Americans, or one in fifty adults, currently have no voting rights as a result of a felony conviction. Residents of the District of Columbia may vote for local officials and the president, but have no member of Congress with full voting rights.

Edward Still

See also: Felon Disenfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; First Amendment; Richardson v. Ramirez; Twenty-sixth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Keyssar, Alexander. The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Kousser, J. Morgan. "Suffrage." In Encyclopedia of American Political History, ed. Jack P. Greene. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1984.

Rights of Aliens

Although the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution, addresses the rights of both citizens and persons, it does not offer an identifiable theory of the rights of aliens. After years of rejecting any status for resident aliens under the Constitution, the courts have gradually extended most constitutional rights and protections to aliens based on their status as "persons." The U.S. Supreme Court has held for more than a century now that aliens within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States are, in principle, covered by the Constitution. The expansion of alien rights has further included aliens who entered U.S. territory illegally or who remain unlawfully present. Human rights and international treaties have also extended the scope of protection for aliens by creating additional judicial forums within which they can pursue and justify their claims. Nevertheless, concern that U.S. citizenship should carry with it some unique rights and privileges has led to a movement recently to restrict the rights of aliens. Recent Supreme Court holdings seem to indicate that as long as restrictions on rights derive from the democratic process and proper legislative enactments, most decisions to limit welfare entitlements and other rights will be upheld as legitimate.

The discussion about alien rights generally concerns the rights of long-term permanent residents to the protections of the U.S. Constitution. Aliens may have other rights through statutory law, common law, human rights, and international treaties and may have moral or natural rights as human beings. Only constitutional rights protect aliens fully within a constitutional democracy such as the United States. An alien, according to the Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1990, is "any person not a citizen or national of the United States." U.S. immigration law further distinguishes between immigrant aliens and resident aliens. Whereas resident aliens have already passed an initial threshold of membership and are expected to proceed to citizenship, nonimmigrant aliens—such as students, tourists, diplomats, and temporary workers—are admitted only for temporary periods and are expected to return to their countries of origin. The discussion of alien rights generally concerns the expansion and contraction of rights of resident aliens.

Alien rights pertain to the residence, employment, and welfare interests of immigrants. This definition of alien rights excludes the right of asylum, the rights of temporary visitors, the right to citizenship, and ethnic minority rights. Aliens outside of U.S. territory have virtually no protection under the Constitution to cover their initial claim of entry. During the twentieth century, rights advocates fought to gain for immigrants many attributes of citizenship status and to remove discrimination on the basis of immigrant status. They sought to apply the guarantees of due process and equal protection of the Fourteenth Amendment to distinctions based on citizenship and nationality. In the United States, therefore, residency and not national citizenship has provided the enjoyment of a comprehensive constitutional status. The only rights held exclusively for citizens have been the core political rights such as suffrage and the holding of certain political offices. There has been little controversy in extending procedural rights and context-specific protections, such as protection of their property in the country, to long-term resident aliens. Substantive rights such as employment and welfare have resulted in some hard-fought battles to preserve these national recourses for citizens.

There are two main viewpoints pertaining to alien rights. The first sees the state and thereby the Constitution as established for the citizenry. Under this "political" view, aliens are not part of the "social contract" and therefore are not entitled to rights. Factors of whether they may or may not enter the country, enjoy a more or less rich status of rights, and eventually become citizens depend on the will of the state and are largely matters of political discretion. The "societal" viewpoint states that the Constitution extends to all those who have become part of the population. Aliens who have established ties, raised families, and exist in the social networks of society ought to be part of and share in the rights and responsibilities that bind citizens. In the United States, permanent resident aliens were traditionally excluded from the core political rights of voting and holding office, although they have been granted access to social and economic rights.

Under the "plenary power" principle, Congress and the president have absolute authority regarding the entry, stay, exclusion, and naturalization of immigrant aliens. Long-term resident aliens, however, have become part of the population and are protected by the Constitution. Over time, the Court has recognized the rights of aliens who have entered the territory to include rights under the Constitution. Applying the logic of race discrimination, the Court has found alienage to be a "suspect classification," which triggers a "strict-scrutiny test" for analyzing the constitutionality of restrictive laws. Through this logic, most rights in the Constitution have been held to apply to resident aliens. Only the rights to vote and hold office have been denied. Commentators have pointed out that if alienage classification is as suspect as race, it should follow that aliens should be allowed to vote to remedy their "political powerlessness."

Although recognizing that nonimmigrant aliens and illegal aliens are even more powerless than resident aliens and in need of constitutional protection, the Court has not been willing to extend citizenship rights to them. The exclusion of resident aliens from constitutional equality may relate to the fact that citizenship has been easily accessible in the United States. Naturalization has been open to almost everyone who fulfills the minimal criteria. The increasing presence of resident aliens who have chosen not to naturalize has brought the issue of alien rights to the fore as a question of community and the continuing relevance of citizenship.

In Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365 (1971), the Supreme Court invoked the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to strike down state statutes that withheld welfare benefits from resident aliens. The Court stated that "aliens, like citizens, pay taxes and may be called into the armed forces. . . . [A]liens may live within a state for many years, work in the state and contribute to the economic growth of the state." The Court has recognized aliens as constituting a "discrete and insular minority" against which government was not allowed to discriminate. Following Graham, the Supreme Court and lower courts struck down most existing state restrictions against resident aliens regarding professional licenses, civil service employment, welfare programs, and scholarships.

In Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634 (1973), the Supreme Court used the "political function exception" to reserve to citizens state jobs that are closely tied to the formulation, execution, or review of broad public policy. Through this doctrine, the courts have upheld state statutes that have made citizenship a condition for being a police officer, a public school teacher, or a deputy probation officer.

Unlike state jobs that ostensibly require a level of attachment to the state that comes only with citizenship, the Court has stated that welfare benefits cannot be denied to noncitizens. In the seminal case Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982), the Court invalidated a Texas statute that withheld a free public school education from the children of illegal immigrants. Plyler is the apogee of constitutionally sanctioned alien rights. After Plyler, fears of uncontrolled illegal immigration became a highly charged public issue. California adopted Proposition 187 in November 1994 that barred illegal aliens from most state-provided services, including nonemergency health care and school education. Although Proposition 187 seemed to challenge both the Court's holding in Plyler and the federal government's absolute power over immigration, a conservative Congress enacted similar legislation through the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996. The act confirmed the restrictive campaign against illegal immigrants and went even further in excluding aliens from virtually all federal cash assistance programs.

The war on terrorism launched in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C. (and the failed effort in Pennsylvania) has called into question the extent to which the U.S. Constitution applies to the rights of aliens in times of crisis. Although the Supreme Court will likely uphold the procedural rights of aliens within U.S. territory, it is less clear whether substantive decisions by the legislature and the executive branch to restrict alien rights will be invalidated or be upheld as legitimate national security measures.

Galya Benarieh Ruffer

See also: Due Process of Law; Immigration Law.

FURTHER READING

Aleinikoff, T. Alexander. "Between Principles and Politics: The Direction of U.S. Citizenship Policy." International Migration Policy Program Series 8. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, New York, 1999.

———, David Martin, and Hiroshi Motomura, eds. Immigration Process and Policy. 3d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1995.

Neuman, Gerald. Strangers to the Constitution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Schuck, Peter, and Rogers Smith. Citizenship Without Consent: Illegal Aliens in the American Polity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.

Rights of Minors

Children under the age of majority—generally, age eighteen—are invested with the same basic constitutional rights as are adults, but those rights are limited and enhanced in many ways to take into consideration youth, immaturity, and inexperience. The nature of childhood requires that adults protect children and act in their best interests, and this obligation translates into special rules and circumstances regarding the constitutional rights enjoyed by minors.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees citizenship to all children born in the United States. Subsequent legislation has given citizenship to children with at least one parent who is a citizen, even if a child is born outside the United States. Citizens of the United States have guaranteed constitutional rights, regardless of age. The Fourteenth Amendment also grants to children, as citizens, equal protection of the laws and the right to due process, although in some states a parent or guardian must exercise these rights on behalf of a minor child.

Like adults, children are guaranteed the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure. The definition of what constitutes an unreasonable search is somewhat different for children, because in many cases a parent can consent to a warrantless search of the child's property on the basis of ownership or parental authority. In State v. Moreno, 556 P.2d 14 (Ariz. App. 1976), a court held that police could search a child's bedroom when a parent gave consent because the room was in the parent's home and owned by the parent. In People v. Daniel, 606 N.E.2d 94 (Ill. App. 1992), a court held that a parent could consent to a search of a child's property as an exercise of parental authority, and that the presence of the child on the scene did not affect this consent. In some states, the parent can even give consent to a search after the child has refused to give consent; however, in other states courts have held that a person cannot give consent to search the personal effects of another, even a minor.

Minors have the same rights as adults when being questioned for a crime. Fifth Amendment rights are protected in the interrogation room by the Miranda warnings, derived from Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). Among the warnings the police must give is that the minor suspect has the right to remain silent and the right to an attorney. Competent adults must specifically and unambiguously request an attorney or refuse to answer questions in order to invoke their Miranda rights. This rule is different for minors. If a child being interrogated asks for a parent, police must construe this as a request for an attorney unless they have good reason to draw a different conclusion. The logic is that a child may not know what to do to secure an attorney, and it is natural to think that a child would ask for one or more parents in such circumstances. On some occasions, however, police may have reason to believe that a request to see a parent is not an invocation of Fifth Amendment rights, such as when the child has specifically denied wanting an attorney.

The minor child has the same right to representation as does the adult, but what happens when the interests of the child are different from those of the parent who presumably acquires legal representation? The court has the duty to ensure that the interests of a child are secured, whether or not the child is represented by counsel. If the parent does not acquire counsel for the child, if the child's interests are not otherwise represented, or if the interests of the child are different from those of the parents, the court must act. The court can appoint legal counsel for the child or can appoint a guardian ad litem to represent the interests of the child in a court proceeding.

The child also has a right to jury trial in criminal proceedings, but this right does not extend to matters heard in juvenile court. In McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971), the U.S. Supreme Court held that it was constitutionally valid to try minors "from the bench" (by the judge) in juvenile court because the aim of juvenile court is not primarily to punish but to rehabilitate minors in order to help them lead productive law-abiding lives as adults. As such, the judge in a juvenile court is presumed to act in the best interests of the child.

Although it might seem that a liberty interest is infringed by requiring a parent to consent to medical care for a child, the requirement is designed to protect children who cannot make informed decisions about their own medical care. In order further to protect children, there are several exceptions to the requirement of parental consent. In life-threatening emergency situations where a parent is unavailable and cannot give consent, or where a child will die without treatment, doctors can perform medical procedures to save the child's life. When a child is a victim of sexual abuse, doctors can treat the child without the consent of a parent, recognizing that a parent or guardian may refuse to consent in order to conceal sexual abuse. Married or pregnant minors are also able to make medical treatment decisions for themselves.

When a parent refuses consent for a medical procedure that a medical professional thinks is in a child's best interest, a court order can be sought to authorize treatment. A court will then decide whether the treatment is in the child's best interests. This is the usual procedure when parents refuse treatment for their child on the basis of religious beliefs. This situation often arises in cases involving a Jehovah's Witness parent who refuses a blood transfusion on behalf of the child. If the blood transfusion would prevent death or serious or permanent disability, courts have ruled that it is the state's duty to protect a child and ensure medical treatment until the child reaches an age at which the child can make such religious decisions.

Minors have the right to decide to bear or beget children (or not to do so), which translates into a right to procure contraceptives. Further, courts have held that contraceptives can be distributed to minors without informing parents or obtaining their consent, thereby preserving a minor's right to privacy. These same reproductive and privacy rights apply to abortion rights. Although most states have a law that requires notification of at least one parent before a minor can receive an abortion, the Supreme Court ruled in Lambert v. Wicklund, 520 U.S. 292 (1997), that such a statute must have a judicial bypass procedure whereby a minor can receive an abortion if she shows the court that it is in her best interest to have one, that she is mature enough to make the decision alone, or that it is not in her best interest for her parents to receive notice of her abortion.

Brandi Snow Bozarth

See also: Gault, In re; Juvenile Justice System; Parental Rights; Search of Student Lockers; Student Rights; Student Searches.

FURTHER READING

Rosato, Jennifer L. "The Ultimate Test of Autonomy: Should Minors Have a Right to Make Decisions Regarding Life-Sustaining Treatment?" Rutgers Law Review 49, 1 (Fall 1996): 3–14.

Uradnik, Kathleen. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on Youth. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Rights of Witnesses

Through the years, witnesses before Congress have raised certain civil liberties issues on constitutional grounds. Some witnesses have cited the First Amendment to justify a refusal to answer, on the theory that the right to speak includes a right to remain silent or, at the very least, to edit the contents of speech. Courts have generally refused to accept this rationale. Witnesses have been more successful in claiming the protection of the Fifth Amendment right against compulsory self-incrimination. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that this right can be invoked during congressional hearings if the purpose is to keep the witness from uttering words that a prosecutor could take down and use later in criminal court proceedings. The words must incriminate the witness, however; there is no right to keep silent to protect some third party from being prosecuted.

If the Fifth Amendment is invoked, Congress may either excuse the witness or offer immunity. In a broad sense, a grant of immunity (which the witness may not refuse) can supplant the Fifth Amendment. The witness must then answer the questions. But in return, if federal prosecutors put the witness on trial, they are forbidden to use the information provided by the witness. Immunity has been described as a practical compromise, giving Congress access to necessary information but for the price of making it more difficult to bring some offenders to justice.

In theory, prosecutors can still prosecute immunized individuals, but it has become extremely difficult for them to do so. Oliver North, a U.S. Marines officer who worked in the White House, had unique information about the Iran-contra scandal, which involved secret weapons deals between U.S. officials and Iran during President Ronald Reagan's presidency, with profits generated being diverted to fund the U.S.-backed contra (rebel) effort in Nicaragua to unseat its Marxist government. When North testified before Congress under a grant of immunity, the prosecutor took elaborate precautions to avoid using the information he provided, even ordering staff members not to watch the televised hearings or read about them in the newspapers. He successfully prosecuted North for felonies arising out of the scandal. But an appellate court reversed, holding that there was no way to be sure that information from North's congressional testimony did not find its way into the prosecutor's files.

Finally, the power of Congress to investigate is limited by certain procedural protections. Witnesses are entitled to be told the questions, to know in at least general terms the purpose of the inquiry, and to have access to counsel. Though hearings are not adversary proceedings and witnesses have no right to question the members of Congress or their staffs, some witnesses have been allowed to make exculpatory statements and even to produce exculpatory or explanatory witnesses of their own. Some congressional committees have recognized such common law rights as attorney-client privilege, but others have not. As is typical of congressional procedures, there are few rules but many precedents. Although the Supreme Court has suggested that the Bill of Rights broadly applies to hostile questioning, it has provided few details.

Paul Lermack

See also: Bill of Rights; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; First Amendment; Immunity; Payne v. Tennessee.

FURTHER READING

Linde, Hans. "Due Process of Lawmaking." Nebraska Law Review 55 (1975): 197.

Navasky, Victor S. Naming Names. New York: Penguin Books, 1980.

Taylor, Telford. Grand Inquest: The Story of Congressional Investigations. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1955.

Tiefer, Charles. "Privilege Pushover: Congressional Investigations Can Obliterate Legal Privilege Claims." Texas Lawyer, January 15, 1996: 28.

Ring v. Arizona (2002)

In Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), the U.S. Supreme Court ended the practice of judges deciding the critical sentencing issues in a death penalty case. The Court held that the sentencing procedure in a capital trial of having a judge, rather than a jury, determine the aggravating factors necessary for a death sentence violated the defendant's constitutional right to a trial by jury. Under the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution, defendants are entitled to a jury trial, and the Court determined that right extended to the sentencing phase of a capital case as well.

Timothy Ring was tried in Arizona for murder, and although the jurors deadlocked on premeditated murder, they found Ring guilty of felony-murder occurring in the course of an armed robbery. Under Arizona law, Ring could not be sentenced to death unless further findings were made by a judge conducting a separate sentencing hearing. Following the hearing, the trial judge sentenced Ring to death. Ring appealed, arguing that Arizona's capital sentencing scheme violated the Sixth Amendment jury trial guarantee by entrusting to a judge the finding of facts that could raise the defendant's maximum penalty. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, in delivering the seven–two opinion of the Court finding for Ring, turned to the dissent in Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639 (1990), and used the precedent of Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968). In overruling Walton, Ginsburg wrote:

> We see no reason to differentiate capital crimes from all others in this regard. Arizona suggests that judicial authority over the finding of aggravating factors "may . . . be a better way to guarantee against the arbitrary imposition of the death penalty." The Sixth Amendment jury trial right, however, does not turn on the relative rationality, fairness, or efficiency of potential factfinders. Entrusting to a judge the finding of facts necessary to support a death sentence might be "an admirably fair and efficient scheme of criminal justice designed for a society that is prepared to leave criminal justice to the State. . . . The founders of the American Republic were not prepared to leave it to the State, which is why the jury-trial guarantee was one of the least controversial provisions of the Bill of Rights. It has never been efficient; but it has always been free."

Ring underscored the importance of trial by jury, but questions have arisen about its applicability. Death-row inmates in various states have begun to raise appeals based on Ring arguing that their sentences were unconstitutional. The answer to those appeals remains an open issue. The circumstances are somewhat similar to those arising after Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), in which the Court struck down the death penalty on procedural grounds. Thus, it is more likely that petitioners pursuant to Ring will have their sentences reduced to life in prison rather than be granted new trials.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, dissented, centering on the effect of Ring. She argued that it would greatly burden the states that allowed judges to decide sentencing in separate hearings. Further, she said the 529 inmates then on death row in the five affected states would be greatly inconvenienced by the massive appeals.

The impact of Ring on the criminal justice system has yet to be determined. Regardless, the importance of juries remains an issue for constitutional scholars. As Justice Byron R. White wrote in Duncan in 1968, "The guarantees of jury trial in the Federal and State Constitutions reflect a profound judgment about the way in which law should be enforced and justice administered. . . . If the defendant preferred the common-sense judgment of a jury to the more tutored but perhaps less sympathetic reaction of the single judge, he was to have it."

Aaron R. S. Lorenz

See also: Capital Punishment; Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996; Furman v. Georgia; Gregg v. Georgia.

FURTHER READING

Little, Rory K. "The Federal Death Penalty: History and Some Thoughts on the Department of Justice's Role." Fordham Urban Law Journal 26 (1999): 347, 360–440.

Ripeness

The concept of "ripeness" refers to a judicial constraint that the U.S. Supreme Court imposed upon itself in the historic case of Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288 (1936). In this case, Justice Louis D. Brandeis explained the gist of the ripeness doctrine: "The Court will not anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it." Usually, the Court has interpreted ripeness to mean that an individual must demonstrate that there is an actual "case or controversy" and/or that an injury has occurred. The Court has applied the ripeness doctrine in several important civil liberties cases.

Most notably, the Court turned away a challenge to a state's prohibition on contraception in Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961). In this "test case" (a case in which the parties intentionally try to get to the U.S. Supreme Court), a married couple in the state of Connecticut challenged the constitutionality of that state's ban on birth control. The Court declined to review the case because the justices observed that although this law had been on the books since 1879, it was not being prosecuted. Thus, the majority thought that the fear of being punished for using birth control was unfounded.

The majority's decision in Poe brought strident dissent from the justices in the minority. They thought the Court was using the doctrine to dodge important civil liberties issues. Indeed, their view prevailed only four years later when challengers again brought a test case in the same state but achieved a different result. In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), the Court overcame its ripeness concerns and overturned the state's prohibition on contraception. This time, though, the petitioners made sure they were actually penalized before bringing suit. The Griswold case, which established a federally protected right to privacy, was the precursor to the much more controversial Roe v. Wade decision, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), which lifted most restrictions on access to abortion.

Another illustration of the Court's use of the ripeness doctrine dealt with the Hatch Act of 1939. This legislation prohibited federal employees from participating in political campaigns. Several federal employees wanted to be involved politically and thought this was their First Amendment right, but they feared losing their jobs and asked the Supreme Court to rule on the constitutionality of the Hatch Act. The Court again decided that this case was not yet ripe for review because the employees' fear of being fired was merely "hypothetical." Many civil libertarians have said the Court's reliance on the ripeness doctrine denied federal employees their First Amendment freedoms of speech and assembly. Essentially, the obstacle of ripeness forced employees to be prosecuted for their political activity before they could question the constitutionality of the Hatch Act.

In sum, the Court has used ripeness to avoid deciding controversial civil liberties cases—some of which the justices eventually faced in spite of their earlier reservations.

Lori M. Maxwell

See also: Standing.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J. The Judicial Process. 7th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

O'Brien, David M. Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics. 6th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2003.

Rivera, Diego (1886–1957)

In 1933, Nelson Rockefeller of the famous Rockefeller oil family (and U.S. vice president in the 1970s) and Mexican artist Diego Rivera engaged in a standoff over freedom of artistic expression and the rights of artistic patronage. At the time, Rockefeller maintained offices in the new Rockefeller Center in New York City and was heavily involved in the city's construction boom.

His sister, Abby, an avid art collector, recommended Rivera to paint a mural for Rockefeller Center. The mural was to be an expression of man's choice between continued capitalist development and a more humane future under socialism. It was to be entitled "Man at the Crossroads." It seemed odd subject matter for an art piece that would grace the lobby of the RCA building in Rockefeller Center in downtown Manhattan, but Nelson Rockefeller approved preliminary sketches and bypassed famous painters Pablo Picasso and Henri Matisse in favor of having Rivera do the mural.

Rockefeller was aware of Rivera's leftist politics, but when V. I. Lenin showed up in the painting, Rockefeller asked Rivera to reconsider. Given the economic and political situation in the United States at the time, Rockefeller feared that inclusion of the Soviet leader would prove inflammatory to potential tenants. Rockefeller asked Rivera to substitute a worker for Lenin. Rivera responded with an offer to balance Lenin's portrait with one of Lincoln, which Rockefeller rejected. Rivera's assistants threatened to strike if he gave in to Rockefeller. The artist agreed with his assistants and refused to change the painting, saying he would rather see the mural destroyed.

Rockefeller Center management—and there is some debate whether Rockefeller himself was involved in this decision—immediately paid the balance of Rivera's fee and asked him to vacate the premises. For almost a year, the mural remained intact but covered. Rockefeller faced a barrage of criticism in the art world as artists, led by Rivera, decried the intrusion on Rivera's freedom of artistic expression. The Rockefellers searched, in vain, for a more appropriate home for the mural. It was destroyed in 1934.

Rivera re-created the mural in Mexico City, but he never had another opportunity for such a public stage in the United States again. In fact, by the turn of the century, most of Rivera's murals in the United States had been destroyed. Rockefeller's reputation as a patron of the arts was temporarily tarnished, but it recovered. Today, Abby Rockefeller's collection of Diego Rivera paintings belongs to the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Rivera's mural can be seen at the Museo del Palacio de Bellas Artes in Mexico City under the title "Man, Controller of the Universe." Included in the new mural was a portrait of Rockefeller in a nightclub.

Rockefeller is rumored to have paid Rivera's fee, and Rivera later reproduced the work in an arena where he had full artistic freedom. Ultimately, however, this conflict between the rights of artists and their patrons left bitter questions for both sides to answer.

Tim Hundsdorfer

See also: Censorship; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Rivera, Javier. "The Diego Rivera Web Museum." http://www.diegorivera.com/index.html.

Roadblocks

In certain circumstances, the government may constitutionally set up roadblocks. A roadblock is a form of seizure, even if it results in nothing more than a brief stop. That action in itself interferes with freedom of movement and as such raises civil liberties issues under the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Under the Fourth Amendment, people are protected against "unreasonable searches and seizures." Thus, whether a roadblock is constitutional depends on its reasonableness. The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld as reasonable, and therefore constitutional, roadblocks designed for three purposes: (1) ensuring the safety of driving as an activity; (2) preventing illegal immigration; and (3) protecting the integrity of U.S. national borders. It has also hinted that a fourth purpose, carrying out emergency crime control, is constitutional.

Under the Fourth Amendment, the government may seize someone or something only if it is reasonable to do so. Courts ordinarily determine whether roadblock seizures are reasonable by balancing the government's interest against the intrusion on individual liberty and by considering the purpose of the roadblock. The term "ordinarily" is an important qualifier. Courts do not perform a balancing test when it comes to "routine" customs searches at the border because of the government's special power to protect the integrity of the nation's borders; the Court held in United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985), that these searches are per se reasonable.

There are two parts to the balancing portion of the test: (1) the government's interest and (2) the individual's interest. In considering the government's interest, courts look at the importance of the problem at which the seizure is aimed and the degree to which the seizure advances the public interest. When investigating a roadblock's interference with individual liberty, courts look at both its objective intrusion (the length of the stop and the intensity of the officer's scrutiny) and subjective intrusion (the fear and surprise engendered in law-abiding motorists).

A roadblock's purpose usually must be something other than the mere advancement of a general interest in crime control. For example, the Court established in City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000), that police cannot set up roadblocks simply to look for drug traffickers. In contrast, the Court decided in Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990), that roadblocks designed to find drunk and unlicensed drivers were constitutional, because although they may lead to criminal convictions, they also protect the safety of others on the road. Similarly, the previously noted Montoya de Hernandez decision held that roadblocks aimed at preventing illegal immigration were constitutional because they did more than enable the government to prosecute violators of immigration laws; they also supported the government's sovereign power over citizenship and immigration by facilitating the deportation of illegal immigrants. Protecting the integrity of the border is an important sovereign interest, and roadblocks to advance that interest are constitutional. Finally, as an exception to the general rule, the Supreme Court has indicated that it would uphold roadblocks aimed at crime control in emergency situations—for example, to catch a dangerous suspect who is likely to flee by a particular route or to thwart an imminent terrorist attack.

Officers in Colorado inspect cars at gunpoint at a roadblock set up to search for three suspected cop killers, June 4, 1998. (© Nancy Richmond/The Image Works)

In sum, a roadblock is legal if it is reasonable. Reasonableness is measured by balancing the government's interest against the interference with individual freedom and by analyzing the roadblock's purpose to ensure that it is not merely a general governmental interest in crime control.

Justin M. Sandberg

See also: Balancing Test; Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio; Search; Seizure.

FURTHER READING

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Rochin v. California (1952)

The U.S. Supreme Court in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952), established that some law enforcement methods can be so intrusive that they are irreconcilable with the requirements of due process guaranteed under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

By 1952, the Supreme Court had required that federal courts apply the exclusionary rule to illegally obtained evidence for almost forty years. Under the exclusionary rule, any physical evidence obtained as a result of police conduct that violates a defendant's constitutional rights (for example, the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable search and seizure), or that is otherwise unlawful, cannot be used as primary evidence against the defendant in a criminal trial. At the time, state courts were not bound by the exclusionary rule, and despite the opportunity provided in Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), the Supreme Court declined to hold that they were likewise bound to exclude illegally obtained evidence.

The Court was then presented with the egregious police misconduct that was the basis of a constitutional challenge in Rochin. Three Los Angeles deputy sheriffs, having been informed about an individual dealing drugs, made a warrantless entry of his home through an open outside door and forced their way into the bedroom occupied by the individual and his wife. One of the deputies spied two capsules on the bedside table and asked "Whose stuff is this?" whereupon the suspect grabbed the capsules and put them in his mouth. Following a struggle in which the deputies tried forcibly to extract the capsules, they handcuffed him and took him to the hospital, where he was subjected to an involuntary stomach-pumping. The contents of his stomach included two capsules of morphine.

Justice Felix Frankfurter, the author of the Wolf opinion, relied on a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process argument in concluding that the individual's conviction must be set aside. Although acknowledging the dangers of relying on the vague concepts of fairness and decency that underlie the Due Process Clause, Justice Frankfurter held that police behavior that "shocks the conscience" could not pass constitutional muster. The forcible stomach-pumping to which the suspect was subjected was "too close to the rack and the screw" to be permissible as a crime control practice in a civilized society.

Nine years later in 1961, the Court overruled Wolf in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), and held that evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment was inadmissible in state court. Taken in conjunction with a previous bar on the use in state criminal proceedings of coerced confessions obtained in violation of the Fifth Amendment, much of the conduct that could presumably trigger a substantive due process claim in the criminal procedure context was covered under other constitutional proscriptions. Frankfurter's shock-the-conscience test with its potential for subjectivity mostly disappeared from constitutional analysis. However, in County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 532 U.S. 833 (1998), the Court, while noting that today Rochin would be considered an illegal search and seizure case, showed that the shock-the-conscience test had life in it yet and was the proper standard by which to determine whether a high-speed police chase, resulting in a civilian death, constituted a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive due process guarantee.

Virginia Mellema

See also: Mapp v. Ohio; Schmerber v. California; Weeks v. Ohio.

Roe v. Wade (1973)

In 1973 the U.S. Supreme Court held in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, that the Constitution afforded women a qualified right to obtain an abortion. The seven–two decision rendered unconstitutional most states' laws prohibiting abortion. Roe sits at the center of fundamental debates in the United States—debates about the limits of individual rights, about when fetal life begins and when it deserves state protection, and about the propriety of the Court's deciding such momentous questions. As a result, Roe remains one of the most controversial decisions in the Court's history and is a source of constant comment and conflict in the nation's legal, political, cultural, moral, and religious life.

Abortion had long been illegal at English common law, but only after "quickening," the point at which the fetus could be felt to move in the womb. Prior to quickening, abortion was not deemed a criminal act. Because only the pregnant woman herself could know when the fetus was quick, the state rarely prosecuted cases of abortion, focusing its attention instead on infanticide. The newly independent states of America adopted the English quickening rule, either through the receipt of the English common law or by codifying it in their early statutes. Beginning in the middle of the nineteenth century, however, states began to enact statutes prohibiting abortion at any time during the pregnancy and imposing prison terms and fines on people who performed them or, in some cases, on the women themselves. By the end of the century, elective abortion was illegal in almost all states.

Scholars seeking to explain this movement to outlaw abortion have pointed to several explanations. Americans in the nineteenth century witnessed dramatic demographic and societal changes in their lifetimes. Rising immigration and changes in traditional gender roles brought on by urbanization and industrialization led to anxiety among upper- and middle-class whites. Many of these people feared that high birthrates among immigrants and blacks would fundamentally alter the nature of American society, especially in the face of dramatically declining fertility rates among native-born white women. Easy access to abortion, it was argued, allowed native-born white women to shirk their womanly responsibility to produce the next generation of white Americans. It also allowed them to pursue unwomanly activities, such as obtaining higher education; agitating on behalf of political causes such as equal rights for women, abolition of slavery, and temperance; and enjoying the fruits of the growing consumer society—all of which undermined traditional female gender roles.

The newly founded (1847) American Medical Association (AMA) tapped into this anxiety and was the driving organizational force behind the nationwide campaign to outlaw abortion. The AMA's membership was composed of scientifically trained doctors eager to differentiate themselves from the diverse range of healers and midwives practicing medicine at the time and popular with ordinary people. The "regular" physicians, as they called themselves, opposed abortion on moral grounds and argued that it was dangerous when performed by nonregular physicians. They used their opposition to abortion to increase their moral and professional standing in society while at the same time tarring alternative practitioners with the accusation that they performed the lion's share of the procedure.

Abortion rights supporters held a counterdemonstration at the annual antiabortion "Respect Life Walk" sponsored by the Massachusetts Citizens for Life in October 2002.
(© Marilyn Humphries/The Image Works)

Despite legal prohibitions, women continued to seek and obtain abortions. In some states abortions were legally obtainable when the woman could show a threat to health or life, in cases when there was severe fetal defect, or when the pregnancy was the product of rape or incest. Many women obtained illegal abortions from sympathetic doctors, others turned to nonphysician abortionists, and still others traveled to states or countries where abortions were legal. Some women suffered injury at the hands of their abortionists and some died—usually as a result of infection or uncontrolled bleeding following a botched procedure. Beginning in the 1960s, feminists who saw access to abortion as crucial to women's sexual and physical autonomy, as well as some physicians angry about the states interfering with their medical judgments, began to challenge state abortion laws. On the eve of the Roe decision, several states had liberalized or repealed their abortion laws either by statute or state-court decisions.

Roe was a challenge to a Texas law that prohibited abortion except in cases necessary to save the life of the mother and imposed a prison sentence on persons convicted of performing the procedure. The petitioners were a single pregnant woman, Norma McCorvey, (aka Jane Roe); a married couple, David and Marsha King (aka John and Mary Doe), who had been instructed by their doctor that a pregnancy would endanger Marsha King's health; and a Texas doctor, James Hallford, who faced prosecution in state court for performing abortions in violation of the Texas law.

Justice Harry A. Blackmun wrote the majority opinion. All the parties faced a threshold problem of "justiciability" (whether the Court should hear the case). The married couple's claim was purely speculative, as the wife was not pregnant at the time she and her husband brought their challenge. Hallford had not yet been tried by Texas, and the Court was loath to intervene before the state courts had entered a final judgment in his case. As a result, these parties' claims were dismissed by the Court. Jane Roe faced standing problems, since she had long since delivered her baby and given the girl up for adoption. Justice Blackmun noted that given the short period of human gestation, it was unlikely that any woman ever would be able to see a challenge to an abortion law through the appellate stage if the Court adhered too rigidly to its standing rules. Finding such challenges to abortion laws by pregnant women "capable of repetition, yet evading review," Justice Blackmun ruled that Roe had standing to challenge the Texas law.

He next turned to the substantive question raised by Roe's challenge: Was the Texas law unconstitutional? Roe had challenged the law on a variety of grounds—that it violated her liberty interests under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; that it violated her right to privacy protected by various portions of the Bill of Rights; or that it intruded on those rights protected from government interference by the Ninth Amendment. Roe's scattershot approach reflected the fact that the Bill of Rights, the Fourteenth Amendment, and their respective legislative histories were silent on the matter of abortion. In addition, the dearth of explicit textual support for a right to privacy caused the Court to locate the right in a variety of constitutional provisions or to describe its origins in the "penumbras" and "emanations" from the Bill of Rights, as it suggested in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). This imprecision thus gave little guidance for litigants like Roe seeking a more expansive definition of the privacy right.

Justice Blackmun began by reviewing historical attitudes toward abortion down through Western history, finding that the ancient Greeks and Romans were ambivalent on the question of the morality and legality of abortion. He then turned to the common law, concluding that abortion prior to quickening had not been an indictable offense and that even after quickening there were few examples of prosecutions for abortion in either England or the United States. Justice Blackmun saw as significant to his analysis that it was only as a result of statutory action in the mid-nineteenth century that abortion both before and after quickening became a prosecutable offense in the vast majority of states. He then reviewed the policies of the American Medical Association, the American Bar Association, and the American Public Health Association, all of which had recently offered either qualified or unqualified support for the liberalization of state abortion laws.

Justice Blackmun reviewed the three reasons advanced to justify the state's interest in restricting abortion—an attempt, grounded in Victorian sexual mores, to restrict illicit sexual conduct; a desire to regulate a medically dangerous procedure; and an effort to protect fetal life. He rejected the first reason out of hand; Texas had not even asserted it as a justification for its abortion law. Protecting women from medical malpractice and protecting the fetus were valid concerns, but only when balanced against what Blackmun determined was a woman's constitutionally protected privacy right to obtain an abortion free from state interference. Justice Blackmun noted that the privacy right was not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, but he asserted that various Court decisions or decisions written by individual justices had found such a right to be contained in portions of the Bill of Rights and in the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. He concluded that regardless of where one located such a privacy right, it was "broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy," and that the detriments to the woman caused by the state's denying her the ability to terminate her pregnancy were apparent. They included medical and psychological damage resulting from pregnancy and unwanted child-rearing, the "distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child," the inability of the family to care for it once born, and the stigma of unmarried motherhood. These concerns were for the woman and her doctor to take into account in determining whether or not an abortion should be performed.

Having determined that a constitutional right to an abortion existed, Justice Blackmun next turned to the limitations the state could impose upon it. He ruled that prior to the end of the first trimester, the state could not interfere in any way with a doctor's decision to perform an abortion. After that point, the state had a legitimate interest in protecting maternal health through reasonable regulation of the medical procedure in such areas as licensing of facilities and practitioners. And, after determining that the fetus was not a "person" for purposes of constitutional analysis, he did conclude that the state's interest in protecting "potential life" became compelling after viability. At this point, the state's interest in protecting potential life could override the right of a woman to an abortion, and states could completely prohibit post-viability abortions except to save the life or health of the mother, although this point was retracted in a companion case issued the same day as Roe.

In the companion case to Roe, Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), Justice Blackmun, for the same seven-member majority, struck down portions of Georgia's more modern abortion law. The law permitted abortions only when pregnancy would endanger the life of the mother or seriously and permanently injure her health; when the fetus would be born with severe physical or mental defect; or when the pregnancy resulted from rape. The law required that even first-trimester abortions be performed in an accredited hospital; that a committee of physicians on the hospital staff sign off on the abortion decision; that two other physicians examine the patient and concur with her own doctor that the abortion complied with Georgia law prior to the procedure; and that the woman be a resident of Georgia. In striking down all of these requirements, the Court held that the decision to have an abortion was solely up to the woman and her doctor in all cases. Doe effectively vitiated that part of the Roe decision that allowed states to prohibit post-viability abortions. Since such prohibitions were subject to an exception when the mother's health, including psychological health, was at stake, and since Doe left such decisions wholly to the discretion of the doctor, the medical exception rendered post-viability bans ineffective.

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justices Potter Stewart and William O. Douglas filed concurrences to the opinions in Roe and Doe. Chief Justice Burger agreed that a woman had a constitutional right to obtain an abortion, but did not believe that Georgia's requirement of certification by two physicians before the abortion could be performed was "unduly burdensome." Justice Stewart agreed that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protected a woman's right to an abortion, but made clear that the right was based on a substantive due process interpretation of the amendment—even though the Court had claimed to have rejected substantive due process years before. Justice Douglas reiterated the development of the notion of the right of privacy in family, procreative, and medical affairs first spelled out in his opinion in Griswold as well as the disabilities that forced pregnancy imposed on a woman, agreeing that the Georgia statute's accreditation and medical necessity requirements impermissibly interfered with the woman's liberty interest in choosing an abortion.

Justices William H. Rehnquist and Byron R. White dissented from both decisions. Justice White was clearly bothered by what he saw as the majority's privileging of the pregnant woman's "convenience, whim, or caprice" over the life or potential life of the fetus, thus overturning the judgment of democratically elected state legislatures. And the majority had done so, according to Justice White, in the absence of any constitutional authority. To him, this was nothing but "an exercise of raw judicial power." Justice Rehnquist too was troubled by the absence of authority for the majority's determination that abortion was a right protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Ordinarily, only rights "so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental" had been protected from state interference by the Court. But he demonstrated that at the time of ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, thirty-six states had laws prohibiting abortion. Thus, according to Justice Rehnquist, "[t]he only conclusion possible from this history is that the drafters did not intend to have the Fourteenth Amendment withdraw from the States the power to legislate with respect to this matter."

The decision in Roe has cheered the feminist movement and civil libertarians for three decades. Civil libertarians argue that personal decisions such as whether to have a baby should be made free from government interference. Feminists see the right of a woman to make reproductive decisions as essential to her autonomy. Preserving Roe and expanding on it are central efforts of the feminist movement, which retains a strong voice in the national Democratic Party. Those opposed to abortion on moral and religious grounds denounce the decision. They argue that abortion terminates a human life and that Roe elevated the killing of the unborn to a constitutional principle. This opposition has expressed itself in a well-organized antiabortion movement with strong ties to the national Republican Party. Some legal scholars have also been critical of Roe, arguing that the decision lacks constitutional and historical authority and that it was the product of an activist Court that substituted its judgment for that of the people, thus undermining democratic principles.

In 1992, in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the basic holding in Roe while at the same time rejecting Roe's trimester approach in favor of a pre-viability/post-viability framework and permitting greater state regulation of the abortion procedure. Prior to viability, the state may impose some restrictions on the right, such as waiting periods and mandatory informational presentations on the medical risks of abortion and the development of fetal life, so long as these restrictions do not constitute an "undue burden" on the woman's right to an abortion. The ability to bar abortions post-viability remains, but continues subject to the health exception first announced in Roe and Doe, thus essentially barring the state from prohibiting such abortions. Casey did little to solve the conflict over abortion among the justices or in American society. Debates between supporters and opponents of Roe continue to play out in society and manifest themselves in all aspects of American political life—in local, state, and national elections, in the courts, and in battles over appointments to federal executive and judicial offices.

In 1995, Norma McCorvey, whose challenge to Texas's abortion law had started the controversy, renounced the decision in Roe and joined the antiabortion movement. In June 2003 she petitioned the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas, the court that had originally heard her case, to reopen Roe and reverse the decision. As of 2004, the court had not decided the case. McCorvey's change of heart and return to court symbolize the ongoing moral and legal intractability of abortion in U.S. society.

Hal Goldman

See also: Birth Control and Contraception; Griswold v. Connecticut; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Hoffer, Peter Charles, and N.E.H. Hull. Roe v. Wade: The Abortion Rights Controversy in American History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Reagan, Leslie J. When Abortion Was a Crime: Women, Medicine, and Law in the United States, 1867–1973. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Romer v. Evans (1996)

In Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the voters of Colorado could not amend the state constitution to prohibit antidiscrimination ordinances protecting gay and lesbian people. After a number of Colorado municipalities adopted statutes outlawing discrimination based on sexual orientation in areas such as housing, employment, education, public accommodations, and health and welfare services, voters in 1992 approved a referendum, Amendment 2, to the state constitution. The amendment prohibited legislative, executive, or judicial action that would protect people based on their "homosexual, lesbian, or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices, or relationships." The referendum was approved 53 percent to 47 percent. Colorado briefly acquired a reputation of being "the hate state."

The amendment was challenged in court. At trial, Colorado argued that Amendment 2 served a compelling state interest that was narrowly tailored to meet important objectives because it deterred factionalism; preserved the integrity of the state's political functions; preserved the ability of the state to remedy discrimination against suspect classes; prevented the government from interfering with personal, familial, and religious privacy; prevented the government from subsidizing the political objectives of a special interest group; and promoted the physical and psychological well-being of children. The Colorado Supreme Court rejected these claims and held that the amendment violated the strict-scrutiny test that applied when the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was implicated. The state high court found that the amendment infringed on the fundamental rights of gays and lesbians to participate in the political process.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in a six–three decision, agreed with the Colorado Supreme Court's decision but used a different standard for reviewing the state's justification of the amendment. The Court said there was no "rational basis" for the amendment. Amendment 2 could not be justified under the premise of simply denying "special rights" to gays and lesbians, and it could not be justified under other citizens' freedom of association. Writing for the majority, Justice

Anthony M. Kennedy stated that this initiative petition went beyond prohibiting special rights: "[I]t imposes a broad disability upon those [gay and lesbian] persons alone, forbidding them, but no others, to seek specific legal protection from injuries caused by discrimination in a wide range of public and private transactions." The Court concluded that this state constitutional amendment was actually based on a dislike for gay and lesbian people, and that a "State cannot so deem a class of persons a stranger to its laws."

Justice Antonin Scalia, writing in dissent for himself and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Clarence Thomas, wrote scathing commentary that the "Court has mistaken a Kulturkampf [cultural war] for a fit of spite." Scalia called Colorado voters "tolerant" and out "to preserve traditional sexual mores against the efforts of a politically powerful minority." Scalia argued that the Court should not overturn precedent lightly, and constitutional principles should not be modified by cultural trends. Since the Constitution does not mention homosexuality, these issues should be addressed by the legislative process. Also, since homosexual conduct could be criminalized, it was "permissible for a state to enact a law merely disfavoring homosexual conduct." It must be noted, however, that the Court in 2003 overturned sodomy statutes criminalizing homosexual conduct in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

Gay and lesbian rights groups hailed the Romer v. Evans decision for its strong statement supporting equal rights and for its prohibition of statutes that discriminated against gays and lesbians. Supporters of Amendment 2 derided the opinion as an example of judicial activism by a liberal Court. Scholars have debated the impact of the case. Although the Court struck down Amendment 2, the majority opinion did not outline which of the three constitutional standards (rational basis, heightened scrutiny, or strict scrutiny) should be applied to gay and lesbian rights claims. The Court explicitly distanced itself from the state court's analysis using the strict-scrutiny test and concluded that the amendment did not pass even the rational-basis test. Consequently, no new rights or greater constitutional protections were afforded to gay and lesbian citizens. The case did signal, however, that gays and lesbians would not be strangers to the constitutional protections of the law and did generate a great deal of awareness of gay and lesbian issues. The Court addressed some of these issues seven years later in the Lawrence decision in finding that the right to privacy included gay and lesbian conduct.

Martin Dupuis

See also: Bowers v. Hardwick; Lawrence v. Texas; Rational-Basis Test; Strict Scrutiny; Transgender Legal Issues in the United States.

FURTHER READING

Keen, Lisa, and Suzanne B. Goldberg. Strangers to the Law: Gay People on Trial. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998.

Murdoch, Joyce, and Deb Price. Courting Justice: Gay Men and Lesbians v. the Supreme Court. New York: Basic Books, 2001.

Rosenberg, Ethel (1915–1953) and Julius (1918–1953)

In the late 1940s a fear of communism swept through the United States. This phenomenon, reminiscent of a similar hysteria that permeated American society after World War I, became known as the "second red scare." The fear was that communism would spread to the United States and destroy democracy and capitalism. The U.S. government was willing to do whatever was necessary to stop individuals who would help communism take over the United States. Among the actions the government took were the trial and execution of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg for espionage and treason.

Julius Rosenberg and Ethel Greenglass were born in the same poor New York City neighborhood. Each was the child of Jewish immigrants from Europe—Julius's parents were from Poland, Ethel's from Austria and Russia. They graduated from the same high school, but did not know each other during their school days because she was nearly three years older than he.

After high school, Ethel became a clerk at a shipping company. By the mid-1930s she had helped to organize a union and had led a strike. She met Julius at a labor rally in 1936. He was an engineering student at City College of New York where he had become actively involved in radical political causes and an engineering union. By the time he and Ethel met, both were members of the Communist Party. They married in 1939.

In 1940 Julius became an engineer with the U.S. Army Signal Corps. When the first of the Rosenbergs' two sons was born in 1943, Ethel quit her job and settled down to domestic affairs in the couple's housing project apartment. They supported the war effort and in 1943 quit the Communist Party. In 1945, however, the U.S. government fired Julius when it learned of his past political affiliations.

Meanwhile, Ethel's brother, David Greenglass, worked as a machinist for the U.S. government in Los Alamos, New Mexico, helping to perfect the atomic bomb. He later alleged that he gave Julius Rosenberg diagrams and other information that would help the Soviet Union copy U.S. technology. When the Soviets built their first atomic bomb in 1949, the fear of communism that existed in the United States increased dramatically. The government arrested Julius for violating the Espionage Act of 1917; Ethel was later arrested for allegedly typing the information that her brother had given her husband.

Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, separated by heavy wire screen as they leave the federal courthouse after being found guilty by a jury in 1951 of providing government secrets to the Soviet Union. (Library of Congress)

The Rosenbergs were tried in March 1951. Many observers believed that the government would drop charges against Ethel if she would convince Julius to plead guilty. She refused to cooperate, however, and both steadfastly maintained their innocence. David Greenglass made a deal for a limited prison sentence and became the government's star witness. Both Rosenbergs were convicted and sentenced to death. Appeals and pleas for presidential pardons were rejected, and they were executed at Sing-Sing prison in Ossining, New York, on June 19, 1953.

The Rosenberg case has been controversial since it occurred. Many people argued at the time of the trial that the government was framing the couple, and others—though in favor of prosecuting Julius—agreed that the case against Ethel was weak. Their sons crusaded for years to prove their parents' innocence. One conclusion that almost everyone agrees upon is that because the Rosenbergs were the only people executed for espionage and treason during the Cold War era, the government was making examples of them. The case has long been cited as an example of overweening government power gone unchecked in an atmosphere of hysteria over communism.

Roger D. Hardaway

See also: Communists; Espionage Act of 1917; Treason.

FURTHER READING

Carmichael, Virginia. Framing History: The Rosenberg Story and the Cold War. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993.

Meeropol, Robert, and Michael Meeropol. We Are Your Sons: The Legacy of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg. 2d ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Radosh, Ronald, and Joyce Milton. The Rosenberg File. 2nd ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.

Schneir, Walter, and Miriam Schneir. Invitation to an Inquest: Reopening the Rosenberg "Atom Spy" Case. 2d ed. New York: Praeger, 1983.

Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995)

In Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the University of Virginia's denial of student activity funds to a campus religious organization violated the students' right of free speech guaranteed by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Using funds generated by student activity fees, the University of Virginia paid printing costs to an outside printer for the publications of selected student organizations. The publications included disclaimers that they did not represent official university views. University officials refused this funding for the university-approved student group Wide Awake Productions (WAP) to print its magazine, Wide Awake: A Christian Perspective at the University of Virginia. The university, as a public institution, defended its position as necessary to maintain separation of church and state, whereas WAP believed its rights to free exercise of religion, free speech, and free press were being denied. In a five–four decision, the Supreme Court in 1995 ruled in favor of WAP.

The Court majority relied primarily on the free speech argument. It focused on the university's stated intent that student activity funds should go to groups that enhanced its educational purpose, including groups involved in disseminating news, information, and opinion. The Court concluded that the university was practicing "viewpoint discrimination" and found its refusal to fund publications that "primarily promote or manifest a particular belief in or about a deity or ultimate reality" to have a stifling effect on the exchange of ideas. In fact, argued Justice Anthony M. Kennedy in his majority opinion, even a great thinker like Plato would have trouble getting funded under the university's restrictions unless he chose to write about "making pasta or peanut butter cookies."

The Court did not find that the Establishment Clause posed any problems for university funding of WAP because viewed as part of the overall funding policy, such support would place the university in the appropriate neutral position required by the First Amendment. Justice Kennedy also distinguished the student activity fee from public tax money and found the use of an outside printer to be a sufficient safeguard against misuse of funds,

In his dissenting opinion, Justice David H. Souter denounced the Court's decision as allowing for the first time "direct funding of core religious activities by an arm of the State." Unlike the Court majority, he focused on the portion of the university's guidelines forbidding funding of religious activities, and he concluded that this plus the Establishment Clause should prevent university funding of WAP. He found WAP's magazine to be unabashedly religious, filled with exhortations to repent and seek salvation. Even articles on what appeared to be secular themes such as racism or eating disorders used these topics as vehicles for discussions of sin and salvation.

The two sides of the Court disagreed on whether there was a difference between providing funding and providing facilities for religious groups. The majority, relying on earlier Court rulings, saw no significant difference. The dissent, relying heavily on James Madison's admonition in his Memorial and Remonstrance that government not provide even "three pence" to support religion, saw a major difference that was central to its opposition stance.

There were two concurring opinions. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor preferred to state her support in more narrow ad hoc terms than did Justice Kennedy, and Justice Clarence Thomas used the opportunity to disagree with Justice Souter's interpretation of James Madison's views on church and state.

Jane G. Rainey

See also: Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Separation of Church and State; Student Rights.

FURTHER READING

French, David A. FIRE's Guide to Religious Liberty on Campus. Philadelphia: Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), 2002.

Rostker v. Goldberg (1981)

The issue in Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981), was whether a military registration law applicable only to men violated the Constitution under provisions guaranteeing equal protection of the laws or due process of law. The U.S. Supreme Court held that it did not. Because of a crisis in Southwest Asia, President Jimmy Carter decided in 1980 to reactivate the draft registration process and asked Congress to allocate funds for the universal registration of young men and women. Congress budgeted the funds for registration of men age eighteen to twenty-six but declined to give the president the authority to extend registration to women.

Several men sued Bernard Rostker, the director of the Selective Service System (draft board), arguing that male-only registration violated the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. That clause had been held by the Court to prohibit the national government from denying anyone the equal protection of the laws. The young men claimed that the government was nonetheless discriminating by imposing a burden only on them when it reasonably should be placed on all people their age.

Justice William H. Rehnquist declared for a six-justice Court majority that the decision to register only men was well within the powers of Congress. The Court had traditionally been loath to interfere with congressional power over military matters, he wrote. "Not only is the scope of Congress' constitutional power in this area broad, but the lack of competence on the part of the courts is marked," he said, explaining the Court's "healthy" deference to Congress.

The plaintiffs claimed that in excluding women from the draft registration program, Congress acted "reflexively and not for any considered reason" and on the basis of narrow, outmoded stereotypes about women. Justice Thurgood Marshall, one of the three dissenters from the Court's decision, added that the Court was "plac[ing] its imprimatur on one of the most potent remaining public expressions of 'ancient canards about the proper role of women.' " Not at all, Justice Rehnquist replied; Congress had excluded women because the purpose of the registration was to maintain records of people who could be called for combat duty. Congress, charged with the "important governmental interest" of raising and supporting armies, had long prohibited women from serving in combat. It was reasonable for the legislators, after their extensive hearings and discussions, to conclude that no purpose would be served by registering people who could not be called for combat duty.

Justices Marshall, Byron R. White and William J. Brennan noted that military officials' testimony before Congress indicated that in the event of a draft of 650,000 individuals, 80,000 women would be needed to fill noncombat positions. There was no indication that those slots would be filled by volunteers, and the government had not demonstrated that its gender-based classification bore " 'a close and substantial relationship to [the achievement of] important government objectives" or that its purposes could not be achieved by a gender-neutral method.

None of the justices, however, questioned the prohibition against women serving in combat. Whether such a decision would be upheld today is an open question, in light of the role of women in combat during the 1991 Gulf War and in Iraq in 2003 and given the Court's decision in United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515 (1996), holding that it was unconstitutional for the state to deny women admission to a previously all-male military academy.

Philippa Strum

See also: First Amendment; Strict Scrutiny.

FURTHER READING

Cushman, Clare, ed. Supreme Court Decisions and Women's Rights: Milestones to Equality, pp. 98–103. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001

Fenner, Lorry M., and Marie E. DeYoung. Women in Combat: Civic Duty or Military Liability? Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 2001.

Roth Test

In the companion cases of Roth v. United States and Alberts v. California, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), the U.S. Supreme Court for the first time formulated a test to be applied to determine whether sexually oriented material could be judged legally obscene and thus excluded from constitutional protection under the First Amendment clauses that provide freedom of speech and freedom of the press. According to the majority opinion written by Justice William J. Brennan Jr., sexually oriented material was obscene only if it dealt with sex "in a manner appealing to prurient interest," that is, "material having a tendency to excite lustful thoughts." Thus, the appropriate standard to be applied by the courts in obscenity cases was "whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest."

Various elements of this test can be traced to the obscenity section of the Model Penal Code formulated by the American Law Institute and the numerous obscenity decisions of state and federal courts cited in Justice Brennan's opinion, but the actual wording of the Roth test apparently was original. Although the majority ruled that the trial courts in the cases under review had applied the standard properly and thus affirmed the obscenity convictions of both defendants, the Roth test could also be used to loosen the censor's hold on sexually oriented works. In his opinion, Justice Brennan cited historical evidence supporting the conclusion that obscenity was not protected speech, but he also stressed that the First Amendment guarantees were adopted primarily to protect speech on important social and political issues and that "all ideas having even the slightest social importance" were fully protected. Indeed, he explicitly acknowledged that sex had been "a subject of absorbing interest to mankind through the ages." In adopting the "average person" and "dominant theme" approach of the Roth test, Justice Brennan explicitly rejected the use by U.S. courts of the repressive English standard examined in Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518 (1978), which allowed material to be judged "merely by the effect of an isolated excerpt upon particularly susceptible persons."

From the time the case was decided, the Roth test became an easy mark for critics who decried everything from its lack of certainty to the circular quality of its definition of obscenity in terms of material that tended to incite lustful thoughts. Nonetheless, as the Earl Warren and Warren E. Burger Courts further refined the test of obscenity over the years, the original Roth test was almost always included as one part of a multilayered test of obscenity. In Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 115 (1973), Chief Justice Burger invoked the logic of the Roth opinion as the basis for applying First Amendment standards to sexually oriented materials and adopted language taken directly from Roth as the first prong of a revised three-part test that remains the keystone of the contemporary Supreme Court's approach to obscenity. Thus, the Roth test survives as one element of the constitutional law of obscenity in the twenty-first century.

Edward V. Heck

See also: Censorship; First Amendment; Miller v. California; Obscenity; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Hixon, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Rust v. Sullivan (1991)

Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), sits at the intersection of free speech, abortion rights, and the government's power to set conditions on grants of federal funds. At issue was an interpretation of Section 1008 of Title X of the Public Health Service Act of 1970, legislation designed to provide funding for family planning services. Under Section 1008, no government funds "shall be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning." In 1988 the Reagan administration, relying on that provision, issued a regulation that barred any recipients of Title X funds from advocating, giving referrals for, or even counseling patients on abortion. Outraged at what they regarded as interference with the right to abortion and the free speech right of physicians to advise their patients fully, a group of doctors and clinics sued to have the "gag rule" voided.

In a five–four decision written by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the regulation. Arguing that the statute was ambiguous regarding the questions of abortion advocacy, referral, or counseling, the Court ruled that the secretary of health and human services was within his discretion in enacting the regulation, and the courts should defer to him. In regard to the First Amendment issue, the majority pointed to Maher v. Roe, 432

U.S. 464 (1977), in which the Court held that government had the right to prefer childbirth to abortion; thus in Rust, Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote, "the government has not discriminated on the basis of viewpoint; it has merely chosen to fund one activity to the exclusion of another." With regard to the right to abortion, the Court went on to note, "The government has no constitutional duty to subsidize an activity merely because it is constitutionally protected. . . . [The regulation] places no governmental obstacle in the path of a woman seeking to terminate her pregnancy, and leaves her with the same choices as if the government has chosen not to fund family planning services at all."

Although acknowledging that most Title X recipients would not have access to abortion-related services under the regulations, the majority dismissed that fact as a consequence of poverty, not governmental restrictions.

The dissenters in Rust argued that the regulation was a new interpretation of the statute, which had always been read as affecting only the practice of abortion. They further argued that the regulation was inconsistent with the statute as a whole, that it was a content-based ban on speech that interfered with physicians providing their patients with medically necessary information, and that by limiting information, it effectively limited access to abortion.

Although the gag rule was rescinded in the opening days of President William Clinton's administration, Rust v. Sullivan remains significant on two counts. First, it left open the possibility that a similar regulation could be reinstated. More broadly, it raised an as yet unanswered question of what restrictions on free speech the government can enforce on those who accept government grants. As Justice Harry A. Blackmun noted in his dissent, "[u]nder the majority's reasoning, the First Amendment could be read to tolerate any governmental restriction upon an employee's speech so long as that restriction is limited to the funded workplace."

Stephen L. Robertson

See also: First Amendment; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey; Right to Privacy; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Craig, Barbara Hinkson, and David M. O'Brien. Abortion and American Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1993.

S

San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973)

In San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a Texas school funding system that resulted in wide differences in how much could be spent in a school district based on the wealth of a district's real estate that was subject to taxation. Parents who had won their case in a three-judge U.S. district court claimed that this system discriminated against children in tax-poor districts by denying them an education equal to that of children in wealthy districts. The Court addressed two strands of constitutional law that are important in analysis of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It did so both by asserting that, although important, education did not represent a fundamental right, and by deciding that it would not consider wealth to be a "suspect" classification.

Furthermore, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., writing for the five–four majority, found that if discrimination was occurring, it was not necessarily occurring against poor children. Poor families did not invariably live in areas with low property taxes; many lived in commercial and industrial areas that had high property tax incomes. Therefore, if discrimination occurred, it was based not upon wealth but upon the area in which a student lived.

However, the Court denied that discrimination even was taking place. Not only did the justices not consider education to be a fundamental right and interest under the Equal Protection Clause, but the justices also emphasized that Texas had not denied education absolutely to any student. All students received a minimum basic free education, regardless of their income or their location. To argue that education was such a basic right that all people ought to receive a completely equal education, the Court argued, would bring into question whether the state might be forced to fund equal housing and food for the poor.

Additionally, the Court ruled that the Texas plan was constitutional because it helped preserve local control. Just as other local resources such as hospitals and police may be funded in part by property taxes, the funding of schools should remain at least in part up to individual communities. Different communities might decide to allocate resources in different ways, resulting in varying amounts of money being available for schools.

Opponents of the law argued that the right to education was implicit in the Constitution for several reasons. A satisfactory education was necessary for citizens to exercise their First Amendment speech rights, for example, because they must be able to read and write in order to communicate their ideas and to learn about the ideas of others. Furthermore, the Texas education system disenfranchised voters by limiting the quality of their participation in the political process. Because the right to an equal education was so related to fundamental rights explicitly listed in the Constitution, the minority argued that it was an implicit right—that is, a right not listed but still inherent in the Constitution. Moreover, by limiting the amount a school district could tax itself, the dissent argued, this system of school funding did not allow local control of schools.

In a related case, Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982), the Court ruled that Texas could not deny education to any student if it was provided to all. At issue was a Texas law that denied admission to Texas public schools to the children of illegal aliens. Although education was not such a fundamental right that equal access was guaranteed, it was nonetheless important enough that the government could not refuse it to any student absolutely. This case became an important precedent in restricting government from denying public primary and secondary education to children no matter how they arrived in a state. Moreover, a number of state courts, including those in New Jersey, California, Tennessee, and Kentucky, have ruled that their constitutions do regard education as a fundamental right and have accordingly struck down state educational funding programs similar to those that the Supreme Court upheld in Rodriguez.

Ronald Kahn and Steven A. Peterson

See also: Education; Fundamental Rights; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Kahn, Ronald. The Supreme Court and Constitutional Theory, 1953–1993. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.

Reed, Douglas S. On Equal Terms. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe (2000)

In Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), the U.S. Supreme Court yet again struck down a scheme enabling prayer in a public school in a decision that embodied the two interlocking developments prevalent in the Court's work in this area: the Court's consistent warnings to school officials to keep prayer out, and the insistent attempts by school officials to keep prayer in. With each order from the Court to excise prayer from public education, school districts have creatively tried to find ways to evade the directives and usher prayer in through a side door, be it a "moment of silence" at the start of the school day or a nonsectarian prayer delivered at a graduation ceremony. The Court's decisions on prayer in school have been grounded in the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution. Pursuant to that clause, government cannot engage in activity that would constitute "establishment of religion."

In 2000, the Court's school-prayer jurisprudence ran headlong into a Texas tradition that for many people was nearly as sacred an experience as church worship: high school football. Santa Fe, a small town thirty miles southeast of Houston, had recently introduced a policy placing the decision to have a prayer read over a loudspeaker before the start of games—as a means of "solemnizing" the event—in the hands of the student body via a two-step vote. The first vote would be whether to have a pregame "invocation or benediction." If that vote succeeded, a second vote would select one student as that season's pregame speaker; that student would be able choose the materials to read without any input from school officials. Although the policy was carefully worded to omit the word "prayer," the school superintendent left no uncertainty as to the district's intentions: "Our policy is to allow unrestricted prayer. By that I mean, it's not restricted to nonproselytizing, nonsectarian language." Two local families, one Catholic and one Mormon, immediately sought an injunction. Fearing retribution from their community, they requested to remain anonymous.

Members of the Yorktown Patriots High School football team have a religious moment of silence, Arlington, Virginia. In the Santa Fe case (2000), the Supreme Court reinforced its earlier decisions, stating that the school's scheme to include a prayer at the beginning of a football game violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. (© Rob Crandall/The Image Works)

The Supreme Court struck the policy before it was implemented, coloring the policy as governmental coercion. Although student attendance at football games was mostly voluntary, some students' attendance was mandatory; players and cheerleaders did not have the option of leaving the premises during the reading of a pregame invocation. More important, although the school district insisted the voting mechanism made the prayer entirely voluntary and bereft of any official involvement, the six–three Court majority saw the student vote as a ruse concocted to end-run the Court's clearly articulated mandates: "An objective Santa Fe High School student will unquestionably perceive the inevitable pregame prayer as stamped with her school's seal of approval," noted Justice John Paul Stevens. "The text and history of this policy, moreover, reinforce our objective student's perception that the prayer is, in actuality, encouraged by the school."

In a remarkably trenchant dissent, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist excoriated the majority for an opinion that "bristles with hostility to all things religious in public life" and criticized its depiction of the process as state-run. But the following September, in a gesture that perhaps unwittingly disproved Rehnquist's point about the voluntary nature of the invalidated policy, fans at Santa Fe High's opening game recited the Lord's Prayer just before kickoff, without any official policy organizing the prayer or any prompting over a loudspeaker.

Steven B. Lichtman

See also: Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman; Prayer in Schools.

FURTHER READING

Feldman, Stephen M. Please Don't Wish Me a Merry Christmas: A Critical History of the Separation of Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Fisher, Louis. Religious Liberty in America: Political Safeguards. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 2003.

Sheffer, Martin. God Versus Caesar: Belief, Worship, and Proselytizing Under the First Amendment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999.

Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania (2003)

In a narrow (five–four) decision in Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a jury's imposition of a capital sentence in a second trial did not violate the double jeopardy provision of the Fifth Amendment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment when a previous jury had deadlocked on the appropriate sentence and the trial judge had imposed a mandatory life sentence. David Allen Sattazahn and an accomplice had killed a restaurant manager during the commission of a robbery. After he was convicted, Sattazahn appealed, and the Pennsylvania appellate court ordered a new trial after finding the trial judge's instructions in the first trial were defective. At the new trial, the state introduced a new second aggravating factor. This time the jury imposed the death sentence, which both the Pennsylvania Supreme Court and the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed.

Justice Antonin Scalia pointed out that Sattazahn had initiated the appeal of his first conviction and that in this case the jury had not imposed the original life sentence in the sentencing phase of the trial; rather the sentence was a default judgment based on the hung jury. Citing Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317 (1984), for the proposition that ordinarily "a retrial following a 'hung jury' does not violate the Double Jeopardy Clause," Justice Scalia saw no reason to impose a different principle in death penalty cases. Juries have unique roles in capital cases, and had a jury imposed a life sentence in Sattazahn's first trial, it would stand, but that had not happened. Justice Scalia argued that the second sentencing did not implicate "any of the perils against which the Double Jeopardy Clause seeks to protect." Two justices joined his arguments, relating this case to precedents in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), and Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002). Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote a concurring opinion joined by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote a dissent joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, and Stephen G. Breyer. Acknowledging that the specific issue in the case was "genuinely debatable," Justice Ginsburg believed that the double jeopardy provision should have protected Sattazahn. She argued that the ordeal of a second life-and-death penalty was a peril that the Fifth Amendment was designed to prevent. She was further concerned that the majority decision effectively punished an individual for pursuing his rights, and she pointed to precedents indicating the uniqueness and severity of capital punishment. She believed the judge's first sentence should have been final.

John R. Vile

See also: Capital Punishment; Double Jeopardy; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination.

FURTHER READING

Stone, Clayborne S. "Recent Developments." Arkansas Law Review 56 (2003): 255–60.

Scales v. United States (1961)

Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961), is the only Supreme Court case in which an individual was convicted solely under the membership clause of the Smith Act of 1940, the major antisubversive legislation used against the Communist Party's leadership during the Cold War. Whereas all other individuals convicted under the Smith Act were charged with organizing the American Communist Party, Junius Scales was charged because of his ongoing operations as a party activist in his native North Carolina and the South. Scales is also distinctive because the Court upheld his conviction several years after it had seemingly made Smith Act convictions far more difficult to obtain in Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957).

The key to the Court's decision lies in Junius Scales's longtime party activism. Writing for the Court, Justice John M. Harlan relied on a series of previous Court cases that distinguished between "nominal" and "active" party membership. From Yates, in particular, the Court derived a two-step test to be implemented in the jury instructions for any trial under the Smith Act. The first question was whether the Communist Party itself advocated the forcible overthrow of the U.S. government. The second question was whether the defendant was an active party member who understood and agreed with the party's goal of violent revolution. The jury instructions given during Scales's trial made such a distinction and required the jury to find that Scales had devoted substantial time to furthering the party's goal of violent revolution. This instruction also distinguished Scales from Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961), decided the same day, in which the Court found that the defendants had engaged in advocating Communist doctrine but had not actively promoted the doctrine of violent revolution.

In dissent in Scales, Justice William J. Brennan Jr., joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas, argued that the Internal Security Act of 1950 (ISA), which specifically declared that "neither the holding of office nor membership in any Communist organization by any person shall constitute per se a violation of [the ISA] . . . or of any other criminal statute," had made the membership clause of the Smith Act unenforceable. Justice Hugo L. Black and Justice Douglas wrote separately to emphasize their belief that the First Amendment prohibited any such prosecution.

Scales repudiated the Communist Party long before all of his legal troubles ended and was pardoned by President John F. Kennedy after the Court ruled against him.

Daniel A. Levin

See also: Communists; Dennis v. United States; First Amendment; Smith Act Cases.

FURTHER READING

Scales, Junius Irving, and Richard Nickson. Cause at Heart: A Former Communist Remembers. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.

Scalia, Antonin G. (b. 1936)

The first justice of the U.S. Supreme Court of Italian American ancestry, Antonin Scalia has advanced constitutional interpretations grounded in late-twentieth-century conservatism. Reflecting his conservative political objectives, he has endeavored to promote moral order through restrictions on expressive liberties, criminal defendants' rights, and policies designed to promote racial equality.

Born in 1936, Scalia attended public schools in Queens, New York, and a Jesuit preparatory school. He earned his bachelor's degree at Georgetown University in 1957 and his law degree at Harvard in 1960. After several years of practice in Cleveland, Ohio, he joined the faculty of the law school at the University of Virginia. In 1972, Scalia became general counsel of the Office of Telecommunications Policy in the Executive Office of the President. The next year he was named chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States. In 1974, President Gerald Ford appointed him as assistant attorney general in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel. Beginning in 1977, Scalia was a scholar in residence at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, and that fall he became a law professor at the University of Chicago. At Chicago he served as chairman of the American Bar Association section on administrative law and as editor of the journal Regulation. In July 1982, President Ronald Reagan nominated Scalia to serve as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. He wrote opinions in 133 cases, of which 90 addressed the statutory powers of federal agencies.

In 1986, President Reagan selected Justice William H. Rehnquist to serve as chief justice. Scalia was nominated to fill Rehnquist's associate seat. The Senate voted 98–0 to confirm Scalia. Scalia soon voiced a distinctive jurisprudence. Drawing on "legal process" legal theory, Scalia has supported judicial deference to legislative decisions and limits on judicial inquiry into new forms of rights claims. He has become a frequent participant in oral argument, and he has written opinions that contain biting commentary on the opinions of other justices.

FIRST AMENDMENT ISSUES

Scalia's controversial opinion for the Court in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), restricted a claim of religious liberty and proposed an interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause and other First Amendment rights that would enhance governmental regulation of religious expression. However, in several issues involving freedom of expression, he sought to defend the constitutionality of expressive actions that were contrary to restrictive legislation or injunctions. These actions include his vote permitting flag burning as a protest in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989); his dissenting opinions critical of decisions that restricted protests at abortion clinics, as in Madsen v. Woman's Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994); Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997); and Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000); his opposition to campaign finance regulation as a hindrance of expression, as he outlined in Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990); his refusal in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), to vote to curtail indecent transmissions on the Internet; and his opinion in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), allowing cross burning. In Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), and County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989), he proposed an interpretation of the Establishment Clause that would permit far greater governmental support for religious organizations and religious practices.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE RIGHTS

Justice Scalia's opinions in cases involving defendants' rights have been marked by reluctance to expand those rights. He refused to augment defendants' rights pertaining to search and seizure in Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); to self-incrimination in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000); and to capital punishment in Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991) and Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719 (1992). Also, he has adopted a literalist reading of the Confrontation Clause, as he set out in Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988).

EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS

Scalia's opinions on matters of racial equality frequently have impeded uses of judicial and legislative power to eliminate racial discrimination. An opponent of affirmative action programs to increase racial diversity in employment—as signaled by his dissenting opinion in Johnson v. Transportation Agency of Santa Clara County, 480 U.S. 646 (1987), and his concurring opinion in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200 (1995)—he has consistently voted against such programs. He has dissented against extending judicial relief for racial discrimination in higher education, and he has written a concurring opinion to support an end to judicial supervision of a school system in which racial discrimination persisted. Many of his opinions about legislation designed to end discrimination in employment and voting have opposed the government's remedies. Also, in United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515 (1996), he dissented and argued that male-only state-supported education did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. In Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), he dissented from the Court's conclusion that a Colorado referendum disqualifying homosexuals from special disability status violated the Equal Protection Clause. Especially in his opinions on abortion and the right to die, he has criticized the development of privacy rights under the Due Process Clause. His abortion decisions, particularly his dissent in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), have been marked by an impassioned hostility to constitutional arguments for the protection of abortion.

Richard Brisbin

See also: Conservatism.

FURTHER READING

Brisbin, Richard A., Jr. Justice Antonin Scalia and the Conservative Revival. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.

Scalia, Antonin. "The Rule of Law as a Law of Rules." University of Chicago Law Review 56 (1989): 1175–88.

———. A Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Schenck v. United States (1919)

In Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), one of the U.S. Supreme Court's earliest free speech cases, the Court upheld a conspiracy conviction under the 1917 Espionage Act of a prominent member of the Socialist Party who had distributed leaflets that urged people to oppose the draft instituted during World War I. In doing so, however, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. issued an opinion that laid the foundation for the development of greater free speech protections under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The case is now famous as the source of what was to become known as the "clear and present danger" test.

Prior to Schenck, it was unclear to what extent, if at all, the First Amendment protected individuals from punishment based on their speech. Earlier Supreme Court opinions, including Holmes's own opinion in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454 (1907), indicated that the primary purpose of the First Amendment was to prevent prior restraints (prohibiting expression from being published at all) on speech and not necessarily to prevent subsequent punishment based on speech. In Schenck, Justice Holmes acknowledged that "the prohibition of laws abridging speech is not confined to previous restraints" and even noted that the defendant's distribution of antidraft leaflets may have been constitutionally protected "in many places and in ordinary times."

However, Justice Holmes said that the question of whether individuals could be punished for their speech depended on the circumstances under which the speech took place, and he illustrated with his now famous example that the First Amendment "would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theater." For Justice Holmes, the question was whether the speech at issue created a "clear and present danger" of a harm the government had a right to prevent. In ruling that the government could punish Charles Schenck for encouraging people to resist the draft, Justice Holmes concluded that speech during wartime may be curtailed to a greater extent than might be permissible during a time of peace. Further, since the government could outlaw actual obstruction of military recruiting, it could outlaw attempts to obstruct recruiting whether or not they succeeded.

In addition to his opinion in Schenck, Justice Holmes authored two other opinions, Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919), and Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919), during the same month that upheld convictions for speech that was said to obstruct military recruiting. Thus, although Schenck contained language that acknowledged certain free speech rights, in reality very little protection was afforded to controversial speech. Indeed, in practice, the Court apparently applied the common law "bad tendency" test, which allowed government to punish speech that had a reasonable tendency to produce a bad result.

Toward the end of 1919, however, Justice Holmes grew more concerned about growing government intolerance of free speech. In this he was influenced by a number of legal scholars who criticized the Court's failure to provide adequate protections under the First Amendment. Chief among these scholars was Zechariah Chafee Jr., who published an article in Harvard Law Review arguing that the First Amendment provided greater protection of the right to criticize the government than the Court had recognized under the common law rule. As a result, Justice Holmes moved toward a more speech-protective interpretation of the First Amendment. In Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919), Justice Holmes, along with Justice Louis D. Brandeis, dissented from the Court's opinion upholding a conviction for distributing leaflets that advocated a general strike to protest U.S. actions during the war.

In the dissent, Justice Holmes asserted that the appropriate question was still whether a clear and present danger of harm existed, but he argued that the Court failed to apply the standard correctly. For him, the clear-and-present-danger standard protected opinions unless they imminently threatened immediate interference with vital government purposes. More important, Justice Holmes's dissent in Abrams introduced into Supreme Court cases the philosophy that society was ultimately made better when all speech, however unpopular, was allowed to be heard in the marketplace of ideas and that truth was best found from this competition of ideas.

The speech-protective qualities of the clear-and-present-danger test were further developed by both Justices Holmes and Brandeis in a dissenting opinion in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), and in a concurring opinion in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927). The Supreme Court sporadically applied the clear-and-present-danger test to protect free speech, while allowing speech-based prosecutions at other times, until it decided Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). In Brandenburg, the Court relied, in part, on the clear-and-present-danger test in announcing that speech was protected by the First Amendment unless it was "directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."

J. C. Salyer

See also: Abrams v. United States; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Clear and Present Danger.

FURTHER READING

Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. "Freedom of Speech in War Time." Harvard Law Review 32 (June 1919): 932–73.

Polenberg, Richard. Fighting Faiths: The Abrams Case, the Supreme Court, and Free Speech. New York: Penguin, 1989.

Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years, 1870–1920. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977.

Schlup v. Delo (1995)

In Schlup v. Delo, 513 U.S. 298 (1995), the U.S. Supreme Court clarified the appropriate standard for overcoming procedural bars on the filing of successive habeas corpus petitions in death penalty cases. Schlup involved a state prison inmate who was convicted and sentenced to death for murdering a fellow prisoner. The inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus (petition for release from unlawful confinement) and was denied relief in his first round of federal proceedings. After obtaining new counsel, he filed a successive federal habeas petition alleging that due to prior ineffective counsel and the state's improper withholding of evidence at trial, he had been wrongly convicted. The lower federal courts denied review of these constitutional claims, applying standards set forth in Sawyer v. Whitley, 505 U.S. 333 (1992), which had required "clear and convincing evidence that but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found the petitioner eligible for the death penalty."

Writing for a five-member majority, Justice John Paul Stevens explained that in the interest of finality and comity (respect for decisions by state courts), the Supreme Court had long upheld procedural bars against multiple filings and abuse of the writ. Given the severity of capital proceedings and the limited function of the "miscarriage of justice" exception as only a trigger for additional review, however, Stevens believed that the lower courts should have applied the test in Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478 (1986). Using this test, the inmate in Schlup was entitled to consideration of claims raised in a successive petition if he could demonstrate that a "constitutional violation has probably resulted in the conviction of one who is actually innocent," thereby creating a "miscarriage of justice." Because the lower courts had mistakenly relied on Sawyer in denying review of the inmate's second petition, the Court vacated and remanded (returned to the lower court) the matter for reconsideration under the Carrier standard.

In concurrence, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor reiterated that the miscarriage-of-justice exception in Carrier was a narrow one, available only in extraordinary cases. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist dissented, arguing to retain the Sawyer standard. Joined by Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Clarence Thomas, he chastised the majority for weakening and further confusing the Court's already complicated habeas jurisprudence. Justice Antonin Scalia also wrote in dissent, emphasizing that under existing federal statutes the courts were not required under any circumstances to entertain successive or abusive petitions.

Federal laws governing the filing of successive habeas petitions were subsequently revised with the passage of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996.

Lisa K. Parshall

See also: Capital Punishment; Habeas Corpus.

FURTHER READING

Zimring, Frank E. The Contradictions of American Capital Punishment. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Schmerber v. California (1966)

Just five years after its decision in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), extending the application of the exclusionary rule to all state criminal court proceedings, the U.S. Supreme Court significantly limited the rule's reach in the context of drunk driving investigations and rejected constitutional challenges to an involuntary blood-alcohol test. Under the exclusionary rule, any statements or physical evidence obtained as a result of police conduct that violates a defendant's constitutional rights (for example, the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable search and seizure), or that is otherwise unlawful, cannot be used as primary evidence against the defendant in a criminal trial. Further, an involuntary blood-alcohol test raised several constitutional issues.

The petitioner/defendant in Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), was taken to the hospital after sustaining injuries when the car he was driving struck a tree. At the hospital, he was placed under arrest and subjected to a blood test over his objection. He was convicted of driving under the influence based largely on the fact that his blood-alcohol exceeded the legally permissible level. On appeal, he argued that the blood test was illegally performed and the results therefore should have been excluded at trial.

In a five–four decision, Justice William J. Brennan Jr., writing for the majority, held that the defendant's involuntary blood test did not violate the Fourth, Fifth, or Fourteenth Amendments and thus the results were not subject to the exclusionary rule. Turning to the substantive due process issue, he found that the blood extraction, made by a physician in a hygienic hospital environment, did not offend that "sense of justice" underlying a Fourteenth Amendment claim. With regard to the defendant's contention that his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination had been violated, the Court held that the withdrawal of blood did not involve "evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature," and, as with the taking of fingerprints, the Fifth Amendment does not exclude the use of the defendant's physical person when it is the source of evidence.

The Fourth Amendment claim, however, proved more troublesome for the Court. Brennan acknowledged that the warrantless invasion of the defendant's body implicated the proscription against "unreasonable" searches and seizures. Although the police officer had probable cause to arrest the defendant in light of his conduct at the scene of the accident and later at the hospital, the "search incident to arrest" exception to the warrant requirement was inapplicable. That exception is based on the need for officers to protect themselves and to prevent the imminent destruction of evidence; however, such concerns are unlikely to be relevant to searches below the body surface.

Nevertheless, the Court found the search was reasonable under the circumstances. First, because of the evanescent nature of alcohol in the bloodstream, the officer did not have time to take the accused to the hospital, investigate the scene of the accident, and then seek out a judicial officer and secure a warrant. Second, citing the commonplace nature of blood tests and the medically acceptable circumstances under which the extraction was performed, Brennan held that this minor intrusion into the defendant's body did not constitute an unreasonable search and seizure.

Legal commentators widely considered Schmerber to be the death knell for self-incrimination claims involving physical evidence obtained from the suspect's person and a major retreat in exclusionary rule application. However, subsequent case law indicated that the Court's emphasis on the "minimally intrusive" nature of the physical invasion was to be taken seriously; in Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985), the Court refused to allow nonconsensual surgery under general anesthesia to remove a bullet from a defendant for forensic purposes.

Virginia Mellema

See also: Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio; Rochin v. California.

FURTHER READING

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 3d ed. St. Paul. MN: West Group, 1996.

Wetterer, Charles M. The Fourth Amendment: Search and Seizure. Springfield, NJ: Enslow, 1998.

Scopes v. State of Tennessee (1927)

Scopes v. State of Tennessee, 154 Tenn. 105, 289 S.W. 363 (1927), is the seminal case in the ongoing public school debate between scientists following evolutionary theory and religious fundamentalists who accept Genesis as set out in the Christian Bible as the explanation for the origin of human beings. It became known famously as the "monkey trial."

In 1925, the Tennessee legislature passed the Butler Act outlawing the teaching of evolution in the "Universities, Normals and public schools of the state." Tennessee was not the only state to pass such a bill; fourteen others had as well. The Tennessee act did, however, generate a conspiracy hatched in Fred Robinson's drugstore in the city of Dayton in the eastern hill country of that state. Some citizens were convinced that the churches controlled too much of civic life and only a direct challenge to the law could correct the predicament. The collision of the plan to dramatize the conflict between the law and science made headlines around the world. The trial of John T. Scopes also represented a demarcation between mainline Protestant churches that accepted the biblical creation story as allegorical and evangelical and Pentecostal churches and others that held as factual the creation story in the Christian Bible.

The Dayton trial was prepared as a test case of statutes such as the Butler Act. As early as July 1923, Clarence Darrow had propounded fifty-five questions to William Jennings Bryan on justifications for teaching the biblical version of creation rather than the Darwinian version. These questions represented the challenge by science to religion. Both men were famous in their own right. Darrow was well known as a defender of liberal causes and criminal defendants. Bryan was a politician who had run for the U.S. presidency on three separate occasions, primarily supporting populist causes. Neither was chief counsel during the trial, but the outside world saw them as the lead attorneys.

As a biology teacher, Scopes was urged by some townspeople to have Dayton be the site of the test of the Butler Act rather than Chattanooga, which had been thought to be the likely venue. Scopes brought George W. Hunter's Civic Biology to class on May 4, 1925, and he was arrested three days later for violation of the Butler Act. After preliminary legal proceedings, including a grand jury indictment, Bryan announced his willingness to serve as a prosecutor in the case. John Randolph Neal, a former law professor and dean at the University of Tennessee, who had been forced out by fundamentalists for his support of evolution, became Scopes's trial counsel but quickly contacted the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). The ACLU brought in Darrow to conduct the defense. Darrow arrived one day before the trial began.

On July 10, 1925, the "monkey trial" opened with Judge John T. Raulston presiding. Trial opened with prayer, over the objection of defense counsel. The grand jury was again called to reindict Scopes, which the jurors did. After prayer, a petit (trial) jury was selected by the second day of trial. Following prayer, on the third day the indictment was read to the jury, and Scopes entered a plea of not guilty. No testimony was heard until the fourth day of trial because of various objections by the defense.

On that day and subsequent to prayer, testimony was heard from several students that Scopes had taught evolution from the textbook known as Hunter's Civic Biology in the Rhea County High School. A copy of the King James Version of the Bible was introduced into evidence. The prosecution then rested.

Over the course of the next six days of the trial, the defense, with much difficulty, added the testimony of a variety of expert witnesses and affidavits from others. The pattern of daily prayer continued.

Clarence Darrow at the trial of John Scopes for teaching evolution, Dayton, Tennessee, July 1925. (Library of Congress)

The jury eventually convicted Scopes, but the Supreme Court of Tennessee reversed the decision based merely upon a judicial error in assessing the fine (the Tennessee Constitution required that juries impose fines). Still, the Tennessee court worked through an extensive analysis that included the thought that the Butler Act did not violate the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution or the analogous section of the Tennessee Constitution. The court stated, "We are not able to see how the prohibition of teaching the theory that man has descended from a lower order of animals gives preference to any religious establishment or mode of worship."

The controversy continued to rage. After a variety of cases had been tried and appealed, the U.S. Supreme Court decided in Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968), that the teaching of the biblical creation story did violate the U.S. Constitution. Yet the Kansas State Board of Education, as recently as August 1999, decided that the study of evolution was to be deleted from the science curriculum of all Kansas schools, leaving the subject of evolution versus creationism to resolution by local school boards. That policy was reversed two years later by a newly elected board. Similarly, in February 2004 the state superintendent of education in Georgia reversed an evolution decision to replace the word "evolution" with the phrase "biological changes over time" after this proposal drew intense criticism.

Charles C. Howard

See also: Creation Science; Darrow, Clarence; Evolution; Student Rights.

FURTHER READING

De Camp, L. Sprague. The Great Monkey Trial. 1st ed. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1968.

Larson, Edward J. Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate over Science and Religion. New York: Basic Books, 1997.

Mencken, H.L. Thirty-five Years of Newspaper Work. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.

Rosen, W.G. High School Biology Today and Tomorrow. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 1989.

Settle, Mary Lee. The Scopes Trial: The State of Tennessee v. John Thomas Scopes. New York: F. Watts, 1972.

Search

The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution seeks to protect "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures." The legal definition of a "search" has evolved dramatically since its first meaning in the English common law. Originally understood to include the physical intrusion upon a private residence in the pursuit of evidence, the term "search" has been expanded to include any breach of an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy.

Early jurisprudence concerning the meaning of a search drew heavily from the common law understanding of trespassing. As a result, early courts defined a search in terms of physical intrusions upon private property. Whereas the unwelcome invasion of a personal residence constituted a search, an observation made from a distance was considered mere surveillance. From this legal perspective, the position of the observer, not the location of the evidence, provides the critical line of demarcation.

Courts were eventually forced to reexamine the meaning of a search in light of important technological innovations. By the early twentieth century, it was possible for the first time to monitor ostensibly private behavior without setting foot on traditionally protected space.

In Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), the Supreme Court upheld traditional conceptualizations when it ruled that tapping a suspect's telephone line did not constitute a search as defined by the Fourth Amendment, because the intercepted communications were transmitted over wires that extended well beyond the security of the home. "The language of the [Fourth] Amendment cannot be extended and expanded to include telephone wires reaching to the whole world from the defendant's house or office. The intervening wires are not part of his house or office any more than are the highways along which they are stretched."

The Supreme Court eventually reversed this long-established precedent in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967). Ruling that listening devices placed outside of a phone booth constituted a breach of a defendant's Fourth Amendment rights, the Supreme Court radically changed how a search was defined. "We conclude that the underpinnings of Olmstead and Goldman have been so eroded by our subsequent decisions that the 'trespass' doctrine they enunciated can no longer be regarded as controlling. The Government's activities in electronically listening to and recording the petitioner's words violated the privacy upon which he justifiably relied while using the telephone booth and thus constituted a 'search and seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment." Katz established a Fourth Amendment protection based on an expectation of privacy. So long as citizens take reasonable steps to guard their behavior from outside observers, any attempt to pierce this veil of privacy constitutes a search.

Although Katz moved the Court away from the property-centered trespass doctrine, the legal definition of a search has not remained entirely independent of the privacy venue. Indeed, the Supreme Court regards a personal residence as a special sanctuary, deserving a higher degree of constitutional protection than an open field, automobile, or place of business. As a result, observations defined as a search in one setting might be considered mere surveillance in another. This subtle distinction is exemplified by a pair of decisions concerning the valid use of sensory-enhancing technology.

After being refused entry into a Dow Chemical manufacturing plant, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) contracted with a commercial aerial photography firm to gather photographic evidence against the suspect facility. In Dow Chemical Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227 (1986), Dow Chemical argued that this use of high-powered photographic equipment to see inside the secure perimeter of the 2,000-acre facility constituted a search under the privacy expectation doctrine established in Katz. Reiterating elements of venue-specific privacy doctrine, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger held that the government's actions did not constitute a search, as a manufacturing plant did not necessarily enjoy the same degree of protection as a private residence. "The intimate activities associated with family privacy and the home and its curtilage simply do not reach the outdoor areas or spaces between structures and buildings of a manufacturing plant."

This notion was reinforced by the Supreme Court when it decided that heat measurements taken off of a private residence with thermal-imaging equipment constituted a search under the Fourth Amendment. The Court in Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001), distinguished the Dow Chemical case: "Dow Chemical, however, involved enhanced aerial photography of an industrial complex, which does not share the Fourth Amendment sanctity of the home. . . . In the home, our cases show, all details are intimate details, because the entire area is held safe from prying government eyes."

With few exceptions, the Supreme Court has continued to uphold Katz, even as it places specific limits on the privacy expectation doctrine. Although the modern definition of a search is not exclusively bound to the physical intrusions upon private property, the Court applies the term most aggressively to potential threats to the privacy of the home.

Matthew Woessner

See also: Fourth Amendment; Katz v. United States; Olmstead v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Woessner, Matthew, and Barbara Sims. "Technological Innovation and the Application of the Fourth Amendment: Considering the Implications of Kyllo v. United States for Law Enforcement and Counterterrorism." Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice 19, 2 (2003): 214–38.

Search Incident to Arrest

The general requirement under the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is that police must obtain prior judicial approval to make searches, but this requirement has never been absolute. Among the established exceptions is the rule, first suggested in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), that neither a warrant nor probable cause is necessary when police conduct a search, at the time of arrest, of a suspect's person and immediate surroundings. In a line of rulings since Weeks, the U.S. Supreme Court has offered two primary reasons for maintaining this exception to general Fourth Amendment standards.

The first is the law enforcement interest in having police discover and preserve any evidence in an arrestee's possession. The second is the need for police to ensure that suspects in their custody are not secretly harboring weapons or tools useful in inflicting harm or fashioning an escape.

For many years, controversy in this field of law centered on how far a "search incident to arrest" could properly extend into an arrestee's physical environment. Inconsistent Supreme Court rulings on the question left the Fourth Amendment waters muddy for decades. In Harris v. United States, 331 U.S. 145 (1947), for instance, the Court read the search-incident-to-arrest exception so broadly as to authorize a top-to-bottom search of a four-room apartment—including a sealed envelope in a closed desk drawer—following an arrest in the living room. In Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192 (1927), and United States v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56 (1950), the Court likewise approved extensive warrantless searches of private offices and storage areas in the wake of valid on-premises arrests. Meanwhile, rulings such as Go-Bart Importing Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 344 (1931), and Trupiano v. United States, 334 U.S. 699 (1948), suggested that searches incidental to arrest had to remain quite narrow in scope. In Go-Bart, the Court held that the act of arresting a suspect at his workplace did not, in itself, license police officers to search his desk and office safe. Similarly in Trupiano, the Court invalidated a warrantless seizure of an illegal distillery because federal agents in the case, after arresting the distillery operator, failed to secure a search warrant despite having ample time to do so.

After a half century of such legal uncertainty, the Court in Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969), finally established a single limiting standard for incidental searches under the Fourth Amendment: Contemporaneous with a valid arrest, police may search only an arrestee's person and the area "within his immediate control." Ample justification is generally present for searches of areas from which an arrestee "might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence." But casual police sweeps of entire dwellings (as in Chimel) go too far in the absence of a warrant and probable cause; so, too, do comprehensive searches of closed containers or concealed spaces in the immediate vicinity but beyond the reach of the arrestee.

For over three decades, the Chimel formulation has remained the leading standard for judging the constitutionality of searches carried out incident to a valid arrest. As a result, some of the most aggressive uses of warrantless searches by police have been reined in; Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970), for instance, established that a house's interior may not be considered "within the immediate control" of a drug suspect arrested on the front porch. More commonly, however, Court challenges since Chimel have ended up expanding rather than constraining the recognized scope of police authority in the field. In United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973), for instance, the Court declared that police may conduct a full search under Chimel even when, in the particular circumstances, there is no suspicion that the arrestee may be concealing evidence or a weapon. Under United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800 (1974), a search may be considered "incidental" even if delayed by several hours. The Court in Michigan v. Defillippo, 443 U.S. 31 (1979), held an incidental search to be valid although the underlying arrest was illegal but was carried out in "good faith." In the same vein, the Court in Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990), recognized the authority of police to conduct a warrantless "protective sweep" when making an arrest inside a suspect's own house.

Critics suggest that such decisions have gravely undermined the Fourth Amendment's protections against abuse of governmental authority. Recent rulings by the Supreme Court, however, suggest that little dramatic change is forthcoming in this doctrinal field.

John P. Forren

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Search.

FURTHER READING

McWhirter, Darien. Search, Seizure, and Privacy. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx, 1994.

Search of Student Lockers

School officials who have a reasonable suspicion of improper activity can search the lockers of U.S. public school students. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure provided by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution does not fully protect belongings stored in student lockers. To conduct a search, school authorities need have only a "reasonable suspicion," based in fact, that the search will produce evidence that a law or school rule has been violated. Policies vary from district to district, dependent on state laws, court rulings, and school board rules. In practice, there are few constitutional limitations on school officials who wish to have access to lockers.

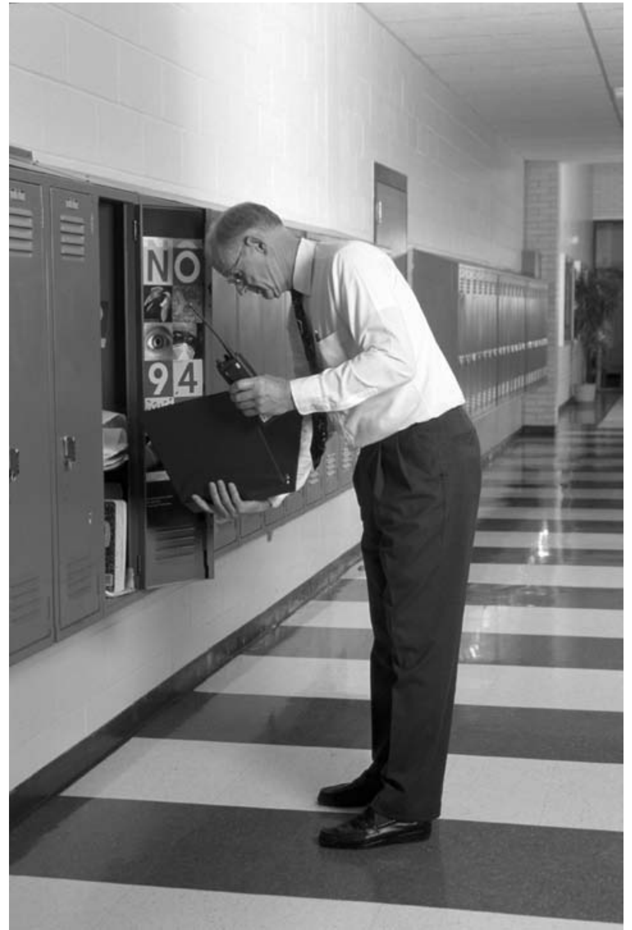
In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), the Supreme Court ruled that school officials have the authority to search the personal belongings of school children without a warrant. When a high school assistant principal found a student smoking in the bathroom, he searched her purse for cigarettes and discovered marijuana. The student was convicted of delinquency and appealed the search as a violation of her Fourth Amendment rights. Balancing students' legitimate expectation of privacy with the need for discipline, the Court ruled that school officials need only a reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing, not probable cause, before searching student property. Violations of school rules alone can create a reasonable suspicion, even if the subsequent search discovers unlawful conduct. A student caught for smoking can be searched for drugs. Searches cannot be based on hunches or speculation. Courts have denied searches based on odd lumps in a backpack or on frequent trips to the bathroom. Suspicions based on information from another student have been held to be reasonable.

The T.L.O. decision in some ways expanded student rights. The Court rejected previous rulings that schools were private parties acting in loco parentis (in place of a parent), and defined relations between student and school in terms of constitutional rights. Yet the Court, heeding the rising presence of narcotics and weapons in schools, also acknowledged that the "swift and informal disciplinary procedures needed in the schools" made search warrants impractical. An unintended consequence of the decision was to place school officials in a relationship to students that resembled the police more than parents.

The years since T.L.O. have seen a gradual erosion of Fourth Amendment protections in the schools.



The Supreme Court has ruled that the Fourth Amendment does not fully protect belongings stored in student lockers. To conduct a search, school authorities need only have a reasonable suspicion, based in fact, that the search will produce evidence that a law or school rule has been violated. (© Bob Daemmrich/The Image Works)

Many districts, supported by state legislatures, have asserted the right to search lockers without constitutional impediment. Proponents of privacy rights claim that students have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their lockers, which are given to them for exclusive personal use, are equipped with locks, and hold private belongings. School officials respond that students have no expectation of privacy because the officials have a master key, lockers are school property, and they are located in public places with their contents in public view when opened. The expectation of privacy can be nullified when the school posts notice that lockers are subject to search. Many states have passed laws declaring that lockers are the property of schools, which can open and search them at any time. Such issues have been decided in state courts since T.L.O., and jurisdictions have been inconsistent.

Do students have a legitimate expectation of privacy in their lockers? What limits does the Fourth Amendment place on locker searches in states that declare them school property? Courts as a rule have not allowed officials to conduct general or random locker searches without individualized suspicion, and most jurisdictions still require reasonable suspicion before any search can take place. Courts have not allowed police narcotics dogs to sniff around locker areas. Police officers must adhere to Fourth Amendment constraints when they are in schools. Schools nevertheless find themselves acting more as police officials than as parents in their relations to students.

James von Geldern

See also: Student Rights; Student Searches.

FURTHER READING

Cordero, Rebecca N. "No Expectation of Privacy: Should School Officials Be Able to Search Students' Lockers Without Any Suspicion of Wrong Doing?" Comment. University of Baltimore Law Review 31 (Spring 2002): 305–35.

Search Warrants

It is a long-standing legal principle of Anglo-American jurisprudence that an individual's home is that individual's castle. Search warrants are among the protections that the framers of the U.S. Constitution designed to protect homes and other places where individuals are entitled to privacy against unreasonable searches and seizures.

FOURTH AMENDMENT: APPLICATION AND ENFORCEMENT

The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, part of the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) ratified in 1791, specifies: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized."

The U.S. Supreme Court in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), developed the exclusionary rule as a means to enforce the provisions of the Fourth Amendment against the national government. Under the exclusionary rule, illegally obtained evidence was to be excluded from use at trial in federal criminal cases. In Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), the Court extended the Fourth Amendment to the states without also applying the exclusionary rule, but it subsequently applied this rule as well in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). Exceptions developed, however, one of which was the "good faith" exception, identified in United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), in which the Court upheld admission of evidence secured by a search conducted under a facially valid warrant that later was found to lack probable cause.

LINKING THE REASONABLENESS AND WARRANT CLAUSES

The two primary clauses of the Fourth Amendment—the Reasonableness and Warrant Clauses—leave room for ambiguity. One reading of the amendment, which closely links the two clauses, suggests that all searches and seizures are "unreasonable" if they do not follow the provisions of the second clause providing for search warrants supported by evidence given under oath and describing "the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized." Although some scholars adhere to this view and would thus invalidate all warrantless searches, U.S. courts have generally followed the reasoning that although the Fourth Amendment calls for the issuance of a warrant as a way of assuring reasonableness, searches may sometimes be reasonable in the absence of such warrants. In this view, the primary purpose of the Warrant Clause was to prohibit "general warrants," or writs of assistance, giving public officials wide discretion to conduct searches. The British had abused privacy rights by using such writs in the colonies prior to the American Revolution.

WARRANT REQUIREMENTS

Although the Fourth Amendment does not specifically so state, court decisions have established that police officers are expected to apply to a judicial magistrate to obtain a search warrant. An applicant should not have a vested interest in the search. The standard of probable cause requires a "fair probability, or substantial chance, that evidence of criminal activity or contraband will be found in the place to be searched" but does not require absolute certainty.

Police may seize evidence found in a search if the evidence, although not described in the warrant, is found during the regular course of the investigation. The exclusionary rule, however, prohibits police from using evidence found in places not described by, or authorized in, a warrant. For example, police who sift through a sugar jar in search of a machine gun cannot introduce as evidence illegal drugs found in the jar, whereas police searching a sugar jar for illegal drugs may use evidence of a dead body over which they stumble in the process of finding the jar. Police are generally expected to knock and identify themselves prior to a search, but exceptions may be recognized when destruction of evidence is perceived to be imminent.

SEARCH WARRANTS AND ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE

Because the language of the Fourth Amendment specifically identifies the searches of "persons, houses, papers, and effects," the Court initially ruled in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), that police were not required to obtain a search warrant prior to engaging in wiretapping, as long as they did not trespass or physically penetrate the individual's house. The Court theorized that unlike the objects specified in the Fourth Amendment, conversations could not be "seized." The Court later reversed Olmstead in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), indicating that the provision was designed more broadly to protect people rather than places and establishing what was to become a two-part test. Under this test, the inquiry is whether a person had an expectation of privacy, and whether this expectation was reasonable.

JUDICIALLY RECOGNIZED EXCEPTIONS TO THE WARRANT REQUIREMENT

Two scholars have delineated nine circumstances under which the Supreme Court has recognized the reasonableness of searches conducted without search warrants. These include searches incident to lawful arrests, items in "plain view," searches of vehicles, searches to which consent has been given, searches within school settings, searches undertaken when officers are in "hot pursuit," so-called stop-and-frisk searches, certain drug testing, and highway checkpoints.

The Supreme Court significantly narrowed the scope of a search incident to an arrest in Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969), when it restricted the search largely to the area within an arrestee's immediate control rather than allowing the search to encompass an entire house. The plain-view exception, which covers routine police observations, has been extended to cover aerial surveillance, most notably in California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986), which involved law enforcement's use of a plane and camera to secure evidence that a suspect was growing plants to make illegal drugs.

The Court first recognized the warrantless exception for searches of movable vehicles in Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925), and this doctrine was subsequently widened to include even searches of closed containers in vehicles when police had probable cause to suspect criminal activity. This exception to the warrant requirement almost appears to have swallowed the general rule, although the Court ruled in Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113 (1998), that a citation for speeding did not provide probable cause for a full search of a car. In United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194 (2002), the Court upheld a search to which a bus passenger had consented, even though the police had not cautioned him that he could refuse.

Schools provide special circumstances when searches are at issue. In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), the Court granted school officials power to conduct a warrantless search of a student's pocketbook, though this would not be permitted outside the school setting. In Board of Education v. Earls, 436 U.S. 822 (2002), the Court widened its earlier decision in Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646

(1995), to permit warrantless random drug testing not only of student athletes—who might pose a harm to themselves or others—but of all school students participating in extracurricular activities. The Court has applied similar permissiveness to other administrative searches when the discovery of criminal activity is not the primary function being served.

In Warden, Maryland Penitentiary v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967), the Court established that police officers in "hot pursuit" of a fleeing criminal suspect did not have to get a warrant, reasoning that the delay might result in escape, harm to others, or the destruction of evidence. The stop-and-frisk search upheld in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), was conducted by a police officer who had reason to suspect that a crime was about to be committed and that his physical safety might be endangered.

Just as warrantless drug testing is permitted in the school setting, so too it may be applied in other contexts. Thus, in Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989), the Court upheld the testing of railroad employees who were involved in train accidents. In National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989), it further upheld such tests for individuals within the U.S. Customs Service who were seeking promotion or whose job required them to carry firearms.

The Supreme Court has permitted road checkpoints at which police officers test all drivers for sobriety. The Court limited the scope of such roadblocks, however, in City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000), when it decided that police could not stop all cars in the hope of finding illegal drugs or evidence of other crimes.

John R. Vile

See also: Administrative Searches; Bill of Rights; Board of Education v. Earls; Carroll v. United States; Exclusionary Rule; Mapp v. Ohio; New Jersey v. T.L.O.; No-Knock Warrant; Open-Fields Exception; Plain-Sight Doctrine; Search; Seizure; Stop-and-Frisk; Student Rights; United States v. Leon; Vernonia School District v. Acton; Wiretapping; Wolf v. Colorado.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. "Fourth Amendment: First Principles." Harvard Law Review 107 (1994): 757–819.

Garcia, Alfredo. "Search Warrant." In The Oxford Companion to American Law, ed. Kermit L. Hall, 723–24. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Rossum, Ralph A., and G. Alan Tarr. The Bill of Rights and Subsequent Amendments. Vol. 2 of American Constitutional Law. 6th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2003.

Second Amendment

The Second Amendment, like each of the original ten constitutional amendments (the Bill of Rights), was ratified December 15, 1791. The Second Amendment reads: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." The amendment has become part of the U.S. Supreme Court's history because of the difficulty in interpreting its exact meaning and intention. Briefly, gun rights activists focus on the prohibition against infringing on the "right of the people to keep and bear arms." In contrast, individuals who support the passage and enforcement of firearms legislation argue that the right to bear arms is collective. Moreover, opponents of the Second Amendment argue that the militia, as understood by the framers, is no longer relevant and therefore restrictions governing types of firearms and gun buyers are constitutional.

The battles over the understanding of this contentious amendment have been fought in the Supreme Court, albeit infrequently. Despite the historical controversy, the Supreme Court has ruled in, at most, six cases that dealt directly with Second Amendment issues. Significantly, in none of these cases did the Supreme Court incorporate the amendment against the states—that is, require the prohibition of firearms by individual states.

In United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876), a case in which William Cruikshank was charged with interfering with two men's right to bear arms, the Court ruled that the Second Amendment's constraints were applicable only to Congress and could not be understood as limitations on individuals to interfere with rights of firearm ownership. In Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252 (1886), a case involving a state law that prohibited nonmilitia members from carrying firearms in public, the Supreme Court again ruled that the Second Amendment was a limitation only on the federal government and not a limit on state action. Finally, in United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174 (1939), a case in which the constitutionality of the National Firearms Act of 1934 was questioned, the Court not only failed to incorporate the Second Amendment against the states, but also ruled unanimously that the Second Amendment was intended to guarantee the continuation and effectiveness of militias and therefore should be understood as protecting a collective right rather than an individual right to bear arms. Miller was the last time the Supreme Court heard a Second Amendment case, which might lead one to conclude that the interpretation that the Second Amendment is a collective protection is settled. However, the controversy surrounding it continues.

Since the late 1990s, the battle for the legal extension of the Second Amendment to include the rights of individuals has been renewed and expanded. In Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997), a case in which the background-check provision of the Handgun Violence Prevention Act of 1993 (the Brady bill) was called into question, Justice Clarence Thomas argued that according to the historical record, the right to keep and bear arms was in fact an individual right. Likewise, in United States v. Emerson, 46 F. Supp. 2d 598 (1999), the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas ruled that the Second Amendment was intended to protect the rights of individuals. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit seconded this interpretation, at 270 F.3d 203 (2001), although arguing that some restrictions were permissible. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court, but the justices declined to hear Emerson.

Perhaps the most powerful advocate for the individual rights argument is Attorney General John Ashcroft. In an open letter dated May 17, 2001, to James Jay Baker, the former executive director for the National Rifle Association's (NRA's) Institute for Legislative Action, Ashcroft proclaimed his belief that "it is clear that the Constitution protects the private ownership of firearms for lawful purposes."

In short, there clearly is no settled interpretation of the Second Amendment. Both gun advocacy groups such as the NRA and gun control groups, including the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence, continue to press for support for their interpretation of the amendment. However, until the Supreme Court agrees to hear a case in which it announces its interpretation, there will not be a generally accepted understanding of the meaning of the Second Amendment.

Tobias T. Gibson

See also: National Firearms Act of 1934.

FURTHER READING

Cottrol, Robert J., ed. Gun Control and the Constitution: Sources and Explorations on the Second Amendment. New York: Garland, 1994.

Norell, James O.E. "In Step with the Founding Fathers." America's First Freedom 2 (2001): 34–37.

Section 1983 Actions

See Bivens and Section 1983 Actions

Sedition Act of 1918

Passed in connection with U.S. involvement in World War I, the Sedition Act of 1918 severely limited free speech rights. The Sedition Act contained several provisions, applicable only when the United States was at war. One provision criminalized the making of false reports with the intention to interfere with U.S. military operations or with U.S. sale of bonds or other financing instruments. A second provision criminalized any action that caused or attempted to cause disloyalty or insubordination in the U.S. military. A third provision criminalized the speaking, publishing, or writing of any language "disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive" to the United States, its form of government, its Constitution, its flag, or its military or any language intended to bring the United States, its form of government, its Constitution, its flag, or its military into contempt or scorn. A fourth provision criminalized the opposition, by word or act, of the cause of the United States and the favoring, by word or act, the cause of a country at war with the United States. A fifth provision criminalized the teaching and advocacy of any of these acts. Conviction of any of these offenses was punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 or twenty years' imprisonment.

Passed May 16, 1918, the Sedition Act was technically an amendment to the Espionage Act of 1917 (passed June 15, 1917). Although the Espionage Act of 1917 contained provisions limiting free speech rights during war, the Sedition Act of 1918 substantially expanded these limitations. With these expanded powers, the U.S. government prosecuted not only legitimate acts of espionage that involved both conduct and speech but also individuals whom it viewed as obstructing the war effort. Thus, under these two laws, the government prosecuted pacifists and anarchists as well as trade union and Socialist Party leaders who made antiwar speeches or who were critical of the government's wartime policies. These prosecutions helped the government significantly weaken the large Socialist Party movement that existed in the United States at the time. According to Stephen Kohn, the government filed approximately 2,000 cases under these two acts. Of these 2,000 prosecutions, approximately half resulted in convictions. After World War I ended, the government began gradually releasing individuals convicted under these acts—some as a result of the completion of their sentence, others as a result of government pardons or sentence commutations. By June 1924, all persons convicted under these two acts had been released.

Two of the most famous convictions under the Sedition Act of 1918 were those of Eugene Debs and Jacob Abrams. Debs, the leader of the Socialist Party and its presidential candidate in 1904, 1908, 1912, and 1920, was convicted of obstructing enlistment in the military and sentenced to ten years in prison. Abrams, along with four others, was convicted of uttering language abusive to the form of government of the United States and sentenced to twenty years in prison. Both men appealed their convictions all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919), a unanimous Court upheld Debs's conviction. In Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919), a divided Court upheld the convictions of Abrams and his four coconspirators. Abrams is significant because the Court's holding in that case rejected the clear-and-present-danger test, adopted by the Court in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), just eight months earlier, in favor of the bad-tendency test for determining whether speech was protected by the First Amendment or could be regulated by the government. Abrams is also significant because the Court's decision in that case inspired Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. to write one of the most famous dissenting opinions in Supreme Court history. Both Debs and Abrams were eventually released—Debs was pardoned and released in 1921; Abrams's sentence was commuted in 1921. Abrams was deported to Russia and prohibited from ever returning to the United States.

After the war, the limitations on freedom of expression reflected in the Sedition Act of 1918 did not immediately end. The "red scare" of 1919–1920 resulted in the arrest and holding of thousands of individuals who were suspected Communist sympathizers. Some of these individuals were deported, and many others were eventually released after being held for lengthy periods with no trial. The hysteria surrounding the red scare eventually subsided, and in March 1921, Congress repealed the Sedition Act of 1918.

Scott A. Hendrickson

See also: Abrams v. United States; Bad-Tendency Test; Clear and Present Danger; Debs, Eugene Victor; Espionage Act of 1917; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Schenck v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Kohn, Stephen M. American Political Prisoners: Prosecutions Under the Espionage and Sedition Acts. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1994.

Magee, James. Freedom of Expression. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Mock, James R. Censorship, 1917. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1941.

Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years, 1870–1920. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
Rehnquist, William H. All The Laws But One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.
Washburn, Patrick S. A Question of Sedition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Seditious Libel

A common law offense, seditious libel criminalizes political criticism directed at the government (in the broad sense, the state) and its officials. Seditious libel rests on the premise that criticism harms a state by discrediting it in the eyes of its citizens. As such, seditious libel is a subset of sedition, which refers to all speech that harms, or threatens to harm, a state for whatever reason. Seditious libel came to the United States through England, where the concept dates back to the Star Chamber of the seventeenth century. From England, seditious libel prosecutions spread to the American colonies. In these early cases, a judge decided the major issues of the case, including whether the statement was libelous. Nor was it a defense to assert the truth of the libelous statement; to the contrary, seditious libels that were true had an even greater potential to discredit the rulers.

In the eighteenth century there was an effort to introduce libertarian reforms into the law of seditious libel. The trial of John Peter Zenger (1735), a New York publisher, marked a turning point. In the Zenger trial, a jury disregarded the judge's instructions and acquitted Zenger, even though he admitted making the statement. Spurred on by Zenger's trial, eighteenth-century libertarians argued that truth should be a defense to a seditious libel charge, one that should be assessed by a jury. Even these libertarians, however, did not criticize seditious libel, especially when the target of the criticism was not the crown but the popularly elected colonial assemblies. Nevertheless, the eighteenth-century libertarians had a major impact. When Congress passed the 1798 Sedition Act—which made it illegal to criticize the government through false and scandalous writings—it provided both truth as a defense and jury trials.

It is uncertain whether Congress, when it enacted the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1791), intended to outlaw seditious libel, but the passage of the Sedition Act seven years later acted as a further impetus to libertarianism. The Sedition Act came at a time of intense partisan struggle between the Hamiltonian Federalists and the Jeffersonian Republicans. The Federalists proceeded to use the law to harass the Republican Party. That a law adopting the libertarian reforms of the day could be used for politically motivated prosecutions pushed Republicans to reject the Sedition Act even after they took over Congress after the election of 1800. Instead, Congress let the act lapse and repaid the fines administered under it, in the process depriving the U.S. Supreme Court of the opportunity to rule on its constitutionality.

Because the legislation never received Supreme Court scrutiny, throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries lawyers debated whether the Sedition Act had been unconstitutional or merely unwise. On the answer to this question turned the constitutionality of seditious libel more generally. In Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919), which took up the constitutionality of a World War I–era Sedition Act, both the majority and Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr.'s dissent sidestepped the issue. In the 1920s, Zechariah Chafee Jr. argued that the First Amendment had outlawed seditious libel and that therefore Justice Holmes's "clear and present danger" test should apply. By contrast, in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952), Justice Felix Frankfurter suggested that all libels—including seditious libel—lacked constitutional protection.

The issue finally came to a head in 1964 in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964). Faced with a case involving criticism of a public official, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. took the opportunity to state that even if the constitutional status of the Sedition Act was uncertain when passed in 1798, it had become unconstitutional with time. In making this point, he stressed the wide-open, robust debate that characterizes a democracy. Although Justice Brennan declared seditious libel unconstitutional, he did not rule out the possibility that public officials could sue if they were libeled. But they would have to show that the person who made the statement acted with "actual malice"—in other words, that he or she deliberately, or recklessly, lied. This limitation was criticized by Justices Hugo L. Black and William O.

Douglas, who would have preferred to immunize all criticism of public officials. Nevertheless, they agreed with Justice Brennan that seditious libel was unconstitutional, and since 1964 there has been no attempt to revive seditious libel.

Robert A. Kahn

See also: Alien and Sedition Acts; Beauharnais v. Illinois; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; Zenger, John Peter.

FURTHER READING

Emerson, Thomas. The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Vintage, 1970.

Kalven, Harry, Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.

Levy, Leonard W. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Seizure

A seizure is a taking of a person's liberty, life, or property usually by the government. The legal concept of "seizure" is governed primarily by the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, to some extent by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, and by certain decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. The relevant portion of the Fourth Amendment that governs seizures states: The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable . . . seizures, shall not be violated" (emphasis added).

A taking or seizure of a person by the government can occur in a number of circumstances and can vary in degree, severity, and complexity. All seizures are subject to the requirement that they cannot be "unreasonable." The government may briefly detain, arrest, imprison, or ultimately execute a person. In the least severe seizure of a person, commonly known as a "Terry stop," after the Supreme Court decision in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the government may briefly seize or detain a person based on a reasonable, articulable suspicion of criminal activity. In Terry, the Supreme Court ruled that a police officer could briefly detain or seize the defendant without probable cause to arrest him provided the officer had a reasonable, articulable suspicion that the defendant was up to no good. The Terry stop must be limited in duration and scope. In the interest of officer safety, an officer conducting a Terry stop can conduct a "pat-down" search to check for weapons that may endanger the officer, if the officer has a reason to believe the person may be armed.

The government can seize a person pursuant to an arrest made based upon probable cause and can take that person into custody pending criminal proceedings and a bail hearing. After conviction, the government can imprison someone, seizing that person's liberty potentially for a life term in order to prevent recidivism, as the Court noted in Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003).

The government can execute a person, seizing the person's life, upon conviction of a capital offense. Through civil commitment, the government can detain or seize persons adjudged to be a danger to themselves or others for a period as long as the persons remain such a danger. The government can seize or detain a person as a material witness and if the witness is a flight risk can keep the witness in custody until after the witness's testimony is secured in court. The government can seize or detain a person whom the nation's president has designated an "enemy combatant," and even U.S. citizens may be denied their constitutional rights if so designated; the constitutionality of this "enemy combatant" rationale, however, is dubious, and is being questioned in cases challenging the Patriot Act.

Property (real estate or personal) can also be seized or taken, again, usually by the government. Seizure of property can vary in degree, severity, and complexity. The government has the police power to seize contraband, evidence, and ill-gotten property. Sometimes the state seizes property through regulation. The state has the power to regulate the use of property for the public good, and sometimes this regulation means that property owners will not be allowed to use the property in a way that harms society. This type of taking through regulation does not typically require compensation by the state, as does the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment when government takes property for public use.

Ultimately, as one of its sovereign powers, the state has the power of "eminent domain," by which the government can seize private property for public use, usually real estate. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments require that property cannot be taken without providing the deprived property owner due process (substantive and procedural) and, in eminent domain cases, just compensation pursuant to the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause. Often there is much litigation in cases of eminent domain regarding the fair market value (to satisfy "just" compensation) of property taken by the government. There is also much litigation over definitions of property and exactly what constitutes a compensable taking.

Some jurisdictions allow an individual to seize or take the real estate of another through the doctrine of "adverse possession." If a person openly and notoriously exercises dominion and control over another's real estate continuously for a period of many years (states vary, but twenty years is common), the squatter may gain legal title to the real estate. Courts typically do not like the doctrine of adverse possession and usually hold the squatter to very strict compliance with all of the doctrine's requirements.

The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments each require due process by the state in order to deprive a person of life, liberty, or property. Both substantive due process and procedural due process are required by the Constitution. This means that seizures of people and property and all hearings and proceedings regarding seizures by the state must be actually and procedurally fair. A person can consent to a seizure if the person does so knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily.

James E. Headley

See also: Due Process of Law; Search; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3d ed. New York: Foundation, 2000.

Selective Incorporation

Selective incorporation refers to the application of most core protections in the Bill of Rights to state governments through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Originally, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) placed restrictions only on the actions of the federal government. The framers of the U.S. Constitution reasoned that state governments, being closer to the people, would be less likely to infringe on or take away their rights. Also, many states had their own bill of rights, and the framers expected others would adopt protections for their citizens. Accordingly, the Court, not fully appreciating that states could be more oppressive than the federal government, applied the Bill of Rights only to federal government actions.

Some years after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, the Court began to interpret its Due Process Clause as placing some of the same limitations on state and local governments that already applied to the national government. This interpretation was the precursor to the doctrine of "selective incorporation" by which selected Bill of Rights provisions were made applicable to the states.

The Fourteenth Amendment's due process provision says that states may not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law—clearly marking state governments as possible oppressors. This is significant because, for the first time, the Court interpreted this to mean that state governments—not just the federal government—must protect and provide most liberties specified in the Bill of Rights. In Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226 (1897), the Court used the Due Process Clause to prevent state governments from taking private property without just compensation; thereafter, the justices were hesitant to incorporate other Bill of Rights provisions for decades. The application of the Bill of Rights to state and local government actions occurred gradually, and not all of its provisions were incorporated.

In 1925, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), that safeguards in the Bill of Rights essential to liberty, such as free speech, must be protected not only by the national government but by state governments as well. By the early 1940s, all provisions in the First Amendment, including freedom of speech, religion, press, assembly, and right to petition government, were incorporated as applicable against state and local governments. The Supreme Court justices who questioned whether the rest of the provisions of the Bill of Rights should also be incorporated largely won the debate. Most, though not all, provisions of the Bill of Rights have been incorporated as applicable against the states as well.

The doctrine of selective incorporation actually came about in Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), referred to as the Palko test. Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo wrote that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause did not provide specific instructions on how to administer justice or carry out executive actions. Instead, it prohibited states from enacting procedures that would violate a fundamental principle of justice or deprive the people of rights essential to ordered liberty. This doctrine was used from the 1930s and up until 1972, resulting in the selective incorporation of almost all provisions in the Bill of Rights.

Among the provisions not incorporated is the Fifth Amendment's requirement that the federal government must use indictment by grand jury to charge persons with a capital or infamous crime (usually interpreted to mean a felony). Although the Court agreed that this procedure furthers justice, it stated that other procedures could accomplish the same objective. For example, states may indict persons, charging them with a crime and placing them in a position to stand trial, by what is called an "information"—a formal accusation charging someone with a crime signed by the prosecuting attorney. Thus, a procedure other than grand jury indictment may be used to secure a fundamental principle of justice.

The Court has refused to incorporate or make applicable to the states the following Bill of Rights provisions, indicating that these provisions are not fundamental to justice or ordered liberty or that their objectives are achievable by other means: the right to bear arms (Second Amendment); the right to indictment by grand jury (Fifth Amendment); the right to trial by jury in civil cases involving more than twenty dollars (Seventh Amendment); and protection against excessive bail and fines (Eighth Amendment). In addition, the Court has ruled that rights not specifically listed in the Bill of Rights could still receive protection. For example, in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), the Court invoked the penumbras, or shadows, of provisions in the Bill of Rights, including the Ninth Amendment, to protect the right of privacy. The Ninth Amendment states that the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights should not be interpreted to mean that other rights would be denied. Therefore, the Court believes that the Due Process Clauses in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments may place additional limits on the national and state governments beyond those specified in the Bill of Rights.

The process of selective incorporation is often referred to as the "nationalization of the Bill of Rights." This has occurred primarily through the U.S. Supreme Court's review of cases involving Bill of Rights protections as the justices attempt to provide guidelines on how these provisions should be applied by local, state, and national authorities. Nationalization of the Bill of Rights has not ended constitutional debates over what constitutes an unreasonable search and seizure, what is cruel and unusual punishment, what police action leads to involuntary self-incrimination, what constitutes establishment of religion, what types of free speech are permissible, and so on. Selective incorporation has had a significant impact by placing limits on state and local government officials that the framers of the Constitution had not deemed necessary.

Ruth Ann Strickland

See also: Adamson v. California; Barron v. City of Baltimore; Duncan v. Louisiana; Incorporation Doctrine; Palko v. Connecticut.

FURTHER READING

Cortner, Richard C. The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Nationalization of Civil Liberties. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.

Corwin, Edward Samuel, J. W. Peltason, and Sue Davis. Corwin and Peltason's Understanding the Constitution. 15th ed. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt College, 2000.

Levy, Leonard W. The Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights: The Incorporation Theory. New York: Da Capo, 1970.

Self-Incrimination

See Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination

Sell v. United States (2003)

In Sell v. United States, 539 U.S. 166 (2003), a six–three decision authored by Justice Stephen G. Breyer, the U.S. Supreme Court held that an individual's Fifth Amendment liberty interest precluded the government from involuntarily administering antipsychotic drugs simply for the purpose of rendering the defendant capable of standing trial for nonviolent offenses.

The defendant, Dr. Charles Sell, a dentist, had suffered with mental illness for almost twenty years. He was charged with a variety of offenses, from making fictitious insurance claims to attempting to murder an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and a psychiatrist where Sell was institutionalized had authorized the administration of drugs to enable him to stand trial. The medical center, a U.S. federal magistrate, a U.S. District Court, and a U.S. Court of Appeals had all approved this decision. Although accepting the involuntary administration of drugs, the district and appellate Courts had found "clearly erroneous" the lower-level findings that Sell, who was not kept in solitary confinement, was a danger to himself and to others.

Justice Breyer accepted jurisdiction in the case prior to trial on the ground that the harm Sell sought to prevent (involuntary administration of drugs) could otherwise be addressed only after it occurred. Justice Breyer turned to decisions in Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127 (1992), and Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210 (1990), to establish standards for forced medication in cases where the purpose was simply to render a defendant competent to stand trial for nonviolent offenses.

The Court focused on a four-part test. The government should establish "that important governmental interests are at stake"; "that involuntary medication will significantly further those concomitant state interests"; that such "involuntary medication is necessary to further those interests"; and that such medications are "medically appropriate," that is, "in the patient's best medical interest in light of his medical condition" (emphasis in original).

Perhaps because lower-level decision-makers had based their conclusions on the danger Sell posed to others, they had given inadequate attention to how antipsychotic might affect his own defense. Justice Breyer raised the possibility that such drugs could "sedate" a defendant, interfere with his ability to communicate with counsel, prevent "rapid reaction to trial developments," or diminish his ability to "express emotions" appropriately. Moreover, because the defendant was in a mental institution, there was little danger to the public. If such danger presented itself, and the Court acknowledged that Sell's medical condition may have changed since the initial determinations, a different calculus might be in order, but absent such danger, the government's interest in a conviction was inadequate to permit involuntary medication of Sell.

In dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Clarence Thomas, focused on what they believed to be the Supreme Court's lack of jurisdiction. They feared that opening pretrial-stage cases to collateral attacks would lead to "a breathtaking expansion of appellate jurisdiction over interlocutory [provisional] orders."

John R. Vile

See also: Due Process of Law.

FURTHER READING

Klein, Dora W. "Trial Rights and Psychotropic Drugs: The Case Against Administering Involuntary Medications to a Defendant During Trial." Vanderbilt Law Review 55 (January 2002): 165–218.

Separation of Church and State

The separation of church and state as a fundamental principle of American democracy is guaranteed by the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The clause states "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion," a directive that applied to the federal government when it was ratified in 1791. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently applied the Establishment Clause to the states by holding it was incorporated into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Historically, two different primary interpretations of the Establishment Clause have been advanced. Under one approach, the Establishment Clause is viewed as prohibiting the establishment of a national religion but allowing government involvement with and regulation of all religions as long as none is favored over others. Under the other approach, the Establishment Clause is interpreted to mean that there must be a "wall of separation" between church and state such that there is no interaction between government and religion at all.

Establishment Clause issues have been raised in many different forums, including the workplace, schools, government bodies, and the public square. Throughout the history of its decisions in this area, the Supreme Court has analyzed Establishment Clause cases primarily by using a modified "wall of separation" approach. For example, throughout its opinion in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947), the Court made clear its position that the "wall between church and state . . . must be kept high and impregnable" even as it upheld a New Jersey law authorizing school districts to pay for the transportation of students to and from religious schools. A resident of New Jersey had challenged this law on the basis that using tax money to pay for the students' transportation to religious schools violated the Establishment Clause. The Supreme Court disagreed, stating that New Jersey was not supporting religious schools by this legislation but rather was simply providing a "general program to help parents get their children, regardless of religion," to and from school.

In Establishment Clause cases since Everson, however, the Court has retreated somewhat from a strict separationist approach. For example, in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), the Court advanced a three-part test to determine when laws violate the Establishment Clause: They must have a "secular religious purpose"; their primary effect "neither advances or inhibits religion"; and they cannot create "an excessive government entanglement with religion." The Court used this three-pronged test in Lemon to hold that a state may not reimburse private religious schools for such items as teachers' salaries and textbooks. According to the Court, even though such a practice might have a secular purpose and not operate to advance religion, such a practice would create an excessive entanglement between government and religion.

Although the Lemon test created a clear framework for analyzing Establishment Clause cases, the Court has moved away from that test over time, partly because of concerns that such a strict test could lead to violation of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, which further prohibits governmental interference in the individual's right to free exercise of religion. Accordingly, the Court must examine each Establishment Clause case anew, tailoring its analysis to fit the specifics of each case. Although the Court does not adhere to a strict test, Lemon, Everson, and similar cases serve as precedents to ensure that a wall of separation (although not impregnable) continues to exist between church and state. Only by maintaining such a wall of separation can freedom of religion continue to flourish.

The Establishment Clause and the corresponding doctrine of church-state separation pose controversial constitutional issues for the Court. Ironically, the individuals most protected by this doctrine—those who have strong religious convictions and/or participate in identifiable religious groups—historically have opposed the Court's strict interpretation of the Establishment Clause. Some of this opposition seems to be due to the mistaken idea that strict enforcement of it implies government hostility toward religion rather than neutrality.

In addition, other individuals think that even neutrality toward religion is unacceptable. They argue that the United States was founded as a religious nation, a Christian nation, and so cannot act neutral. Even if the argument is correct that the founders intended the country to be Christian (and there is ample historical evidence to suggest otherwise), the religious diversity of the country today makes it impossible for the government to endorse one religion over another. Even among Christians, there are so many different types of Christianity that for the government to espouse one Christian doctrine over another not only would be unjust but also would encroach on free exercise of religion for all.

Martha M. Lafferty

See also: Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education; Free Exercise Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman.

FURTHER READING

Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

"Seven Dirty Words"

In Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality of government regulation of offensive, but not legally obscene, speech on the radio. The Pacifica, California, radio station aired a speech by comedian George Carlin called "Filthy Words," a piece of social satire that addressed the seven words that can never be said on the airwaves. The father of a young boy heard the broadcast with his son and wrote to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to complain. The FCC defined the speech as "patently offensive" and put a comment in the Pacifica Foundation's file, noting that the complaint would be taken into consideration when the radio station's license was up for renewal. The station appealed. In response, the Court ruled that such speech could be regulated due to content, though not altogether prohibited.

Although offensive speech is generally protected under the free speech right extended under the First Amendment to the Constitution, the Court here cited the special nature of the radio as a limited resource that had long been under governmental regulation, and ruled that speech that was broadcast could therefore be limited. It recommended that stations broadcast offensive or indecent speech at a time when children would likely not be listening (late at night), a recommendation that the station followed. Traditionally, the Supreme Court has protected political speech at its highest level. Many scholars have suggested that Carlin's presentation should have been protected as political speech, but the Court refused to recognize the speech as protected political expression.

Under the First Amendment, the mere categorization of speech as offensive does not automatically permit the government to limit it. Although in this case the Court permitted the government to limit speech on public airwaves, such limitations are not necessarily permitted in other forms of media, such as the Internet. In Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), the Supreme Court struck down the 1996 Communications Decency Act wherein Congress had prohibited the knowing transmission of obscene or indecent messages to any recipient under age eighteen. The act was already problematic as a criminal law because it was impermissibly vague and overbroad. The Supreme Court decided that the law was invalid under free speech doctrine because the nature of the Internet makes this sort of regulation much more restrictive than it would be if it were applied to other sorts of media.

Comparing Reno with Pacifica, the Court found that the radio, unlike the Internet, is intrusive. Since it is a broadcast medium, listeners have no way of knowing what they will hear before tuning to a certain channel. In contrast, Internet users must "click on" to access different sites, and they generally have a good idea of whether they will be likely to view objectionable material. Additionally, radio stations, unlike sites on the Internet, are scarce, one of the reasons the government is able to justify regulation of radio. Last, radio programs are broadcast at a specific time. Since many children might be listening in the afternoon, a radio station must air indecent programs late at night. Conversely, Web sites are "on" all the time. These fundamental differences mean that a regulation on Internet indecency amounts to a greater restriction of speech.

The protection of children from offensive speech must be weighed against First Amendment concerns, such as the right of adults to speak and to raise their children as they wish, and against the requirement that government must show specific conditions justifying regulation of speech, such as the Court found in Pacifica. As the Court affirmed in Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957), the state may not restrict the adult population to reading material that is only fit for children.

Ronald Kahn

See also: Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; Obscenity.

FURTHER READING

Fraleigh, Douglas. "First Amendment Challenges to Restrictions on Internet Expression: Which Standard for Judicial Review." In Real Law Virtual Space: Regulation in Cyberspace, ed. Susan J. Drucker and Gary Gumpert. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton, 1999.

Nesson, Charles, and David Marglin. "The Day the Internet Met the First Amendment: Time and the Communications Decency Act." Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 10 (Fall 1996): 113–35.

Seventeenth Amendment

The Seventeenth Amendment, adopted in 1913, altered the method for choosing senators from selection by state legislatures to direct election by the people of each state. This amendment to the Constitution effected one of the most fundamental transformations of U.S. governmental institutions and strengthened participation by individuals in the political process. Other amendments protected civil rights, combined the ballot for the president and vice president, clarified succession to the presidency, and expanded suffrage, but no other amendment shifted the electoral base of a major organ of government from one institution directly to the people. Similarly, no other amendment so significantly altered the federal balance between the national and state governments.

Selection by state legislatures was an integral part of the constitutional design. The delegates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 unanimously rejected a motion to consider electing senators directly by the people and then voted unanimously in favor of appointment by state legislatures. The delegates thought this mode of selecting senators was consistent with the principles of bicameralism and federalism. A bicameral (two-house) legislature diminished the ability of factions to capture control of the legislative process. Providing the separate chambers of the legislature with two distinct foundations of power made this principle more effective while also maintaining a due dependence on the people. The delegates were unwilling to create an entirely national government after having suffered under the central authority of the British system. They believed the state governments should be given a means of self-defense by making them "constituent parts" of the national government.

An amendment calling for the popular election of senators was introduced in Congress as early as 1826, but there was little interest in such proposals until the 1880s and 1890s. The House of Representatives first approved a bill calling for direct election by the required two-thirds vote in 1893, but resistance in the Senate proved to be insurmountable for nearly two more decades. The Seventeenth Amendment was referred to the states after passing the Senate on June 12, 1911, and the House on May 13, 1912. The states acted quickly on the amendment, ratifying it in less than a year. The amendment achieved constitutional status when Connecticut became the thirty-sixth state to approve it April 8, 1913.

There is no clear scholarly consensus on the reasons for the change. At least four distinct perspectives have been offered. The most common view argues that amendments usually occur in clusters as the result of the influence of a successful social movement, the progressive movement in the case of the Seventeenth Amendment. The progressives believed that common people had superior judgment and had the capacity to take a more direct role in governance due to the increased information available through newspapers and the telegraph. The movement championed the initiative, recall, direct primaries, and the popular election of senators as means to overcome corruption and give people a greater voice in government. Progressive insurgents in the Republican Party were key to the Senate's capitulation to the change. These rebellious types were senators mostly from midwestern or western states who became disillusioned with the influence of corporations in the Republican Party. They were particularly concerned with regional issues such as unfair railroad shipping rates and the domination of their party by railroad interests. These insurgents guided the proposal through the Senate and forced the first roll call on direct election, even though the old-guard Republican leadership opposed the action.

Another view describes the Seventeenth Amendment as the result of partisan politics. This perspective argues that constitutional change can best be understood in terms of strategic democratization to achieve partisan electoral advantages. Prior to the Seventeenth Amendment, Republicans enjoyed electoral advantages in the Senate compared with the popularly elected House as the result of malapportioned state legislatures. The Democrats used the democratic appeal of popular election as a way to break the Republican juggernaut in the Senate.

A similar view sees the Seventeenth Amendment as the result of interest group activity. This perspective characterizes the western insurgents in the Senate as an interest group rather than as part of the progressive movement. Goals of the insurgents were limited to overcoming sectional economic disadvantages suffered by western states. They were not interested in the social reforms usually identified with the progressives, such as minimum-wage laws and old-age pensions. Western senators typically had shorter tenure in office than their eastern counterparts, and this limited their ability to influence policy on railroad regulations and tariffs. They championed the Seventeenth Amendment as a means of increasing the length of their service to achieve greater influence in the seniority-based system for distributing power in the Senate.

Yet another view attributes the Seventeenth Amendment to incremental changes over time. The Constitution did not specify how state legislatures should elect senators, and the lack of a uniform system sometimes was exploited for personal or partisan advantage. In many states, lower and upper chambers of the legislature voted separately to select senators, and deadlocks between chambers were not uncommon. Sometimes the impasse resulted in vacancies in Senate delegations. Congress enacted a law in 1866 that imposed a uniform system for selecting senators. Upper and lower chambers voted separately, and if no candidate obtained a majority in both chambers, the legislature was required to vote in a joint session every day until a candidate won a majority vote. The regulations only worsened the deadlocks, holding up legislative business and creating more vacancies in the Senate.

With the Senate's resistance to direct election, states experimented with a number of innovations to increase public participation in the selection of senators. In 1904 Oregon began holding a direct senatorial primary. Although members of the legislature could not be forced to vote for the winner of the senatorial primary, ballots for state legislative candidates indicated whether the candidate had taken a pledge to elect the people's choice for the U.S. Senate. Even in many states without such innovations, Senate candidates had adopted the practice of canvassing the public to win support, and state legislative candidates often made campaign pledges supporting a particular Senate candidate. The Seventeenth Amendment merely acknowledged in constitutional language the conventions that already governed the process of selecting senators.

Owen Abbe

See also: Constitutional Amending Process; Constitutional Amendments.

FURTHER READING

Easterling, Larry J. "Senator Bristow and the Seventeenth Amendment." Kansas Historical Quarterly 41 (1975): 488–511.

Hoebeke, C.H. The Road to Mass Democracy. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 1995.

King, Ronald F., and Susan Ellis. "Partisan Advantage and Constitutional Change: The Case of the Seventeenth Amendment." Studies in American Political Development 10 (1996): 69–102.

Riker, William H. "The Senate and America Federalism." American Political Science Review 49 (June 1955): 452–69.

Seventh Amendment

Whereas the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution deal primarily with the rights of individuals accused of or on trial for crimes, the Seventh Amendment deals with civil cases, that is, with disputes between private individuals or their claims for damages. Specifically, the amendment provides, "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of common law." With the exception of the term "common law," which may not be universally familiar, this amendment appears fairly clear on its face, but its application is more complicated than the language would suggest.

Common law is the system of law that developed in Great Britain based on judicial decisions made in cases over hundreds of years. The system of trial by jury had roots that dated at least as far back as the Norman conquest of 1066. Jurors replaced previous systems of "trial by ordeal" or "trial by battle," and evolved from a group of twelve men of the local area who served largely as witnesses into twelve men who could judge a case among their fellows without bias. In the Magna Carta of 1215, the right to "judgment by one's peers" was limited primarily to the nobility, but by 1689 the English Bill of Rights recognized this right as one shared by all Englishmen.

Americans in the New World believed they had carried their rights as Englishmen to the new continent, and they criticized the British both in the Declaration of Rights of 1774 and in the Declaration of Independence for what they believed to be violations of this right, as in cases where Americans were taken to England for trial before judges sympathetic to the crown. When the colonies declared their independence of England, all provided for trial by jury, with ten states specifically doing so in their constitutions.

Although the Constitutional Convention of 1787 made provision for trial by jury in criminal cases, it failed to do so in civil cases. In the only discussion of the issue, delegates decided that this right would be adequately protected at the state level. The omission of this guarantee was a major concern of Antifederalist opponents of the new Constitution, and six states that ratified the Constitution specifically recommended a proposal for civil juries along with their ratifications. James Madison subsequently took the lead in getting this proposal incorporated into the first ten amendments to the Constitution, known as the Bill of Rights. His original proposal was that "In suits at common law, between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of the best securities to the rights of the people, ought to remain inviolate." This language was transformed during debates in congressional committees into the current wording of the Seventh Amendment.

A number of U.S. Supreme Court decisions subsequently interpreted and, arguably, narrowed the language of the amendment. In a federal circuit court decision that Justice Joseph Story authored in United States v. Wonson, 28 F. Cas. 745 (1812), the Court developed the principle that the Seventh Amendment did not intend to apply the common law of individual states but rather the common law that was in place in England. In Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343 (1898), the Court further ruled that one would ascertain this law not by looking at contemporary developments but by examining the law as it stood in 1791. These decisions thus established what has become known as the "historical test."

Consistent with the British view that the sovereign cannot be sued without its consent (a view that was incorporated into the Eleventh Amendment of the U.S. Constitution), the Supreme Court has limited the use of juries in civil cases in which individuals bring suits for damages against the government. Congress has been given wide leeway in providing for alternate procedures, often involving decisions by a judge, in establishing the U.S. Court of Claims in 1855 and in adopting the Tort Claims Act of 1946. This exception is generally known as the "public rights" exception and has been increasingly applied in the area of administrative law. For example, in Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission, 430 U.S. 442 (1977), the Court decided that jury trials were not necessary in reviewing occupational safety regulations as enforced under the Occupational Safety and Health Act. In general, legislation permitting suits against the government is not interpreted to require jury trials unless it so specifies.

Other decisions have also ruled that the right does not generally apply to issues involving either maritime law or patent infringements, where courts have decided that issues primarily involve interpretation of the law rather than of the facts. Similarly, because English law distinguished between cases involving law and equity, contemporary courts have ruled that the guarantee of a civil jury comes into play only in cases involving monetary damages, not in equitable cases where individuals are seeking an injunction or some other measure to prevent a future harm from being done.

The guarantee of a right to a jury in a civil case is one of the few provisions in the Bill of Rights (originally interpreted to limit actions of the national government) that the Court has not applied to the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Hardware Dealers Mutual Fire Insurance Co. of Wisconsin v. Glidden Co., 284 U.S. 151 (1931), reaffirmed an earlier decision to this effect. As was the case prior to the adoption of the Seventh Amendment, however, many states continue to protect this right with guarantees in their own state constitutions.

Although juries in Great Britain in 1791 consisted of twelve men, the U.S. Supreme Court decided in Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149 (1973), that juries of six individuals were permissible in civil cases. The Court majority determined that smaller juries performed the same functions as larger ones.

John R. Vile

See also: Jury Size; Trial by Jury.

FURTHER READING

Cretan, Richard J. "Seventh Amendment." In Constitutional Amendments: 1989 to the Present, ed. Kris E. Palmer, 163–79. Detroit, MI: Gale Group, 2000.

Pendergast, Tom, Sara Pendergast, and John Sousanis. Constitutional Amendments: From Freedom of Speech to Flag Burning. 3 vols. "Seventh Amendment," vol. 1, 140–57. Detroit, MI: UXL, 2001.

Sexual Harassment

Sexual harassment is defined as a form of sex discrimination prohibited under the Civil Rights Act of 1964. That law makes it illegal to discriminate against an employee with respect to "terms, conditions, or privileges of employment because of such an individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." The statute is an example of congressional enactment of laws that address civil liberties in the United States.

Although women have probably experienced sexual harassment as long as they have been in schools or workplaces, the behavior did not have a formal name or a legal definition until the latter part of the twentieth century. The U.S. Supreme Court first recognized sexual harassment as a form of discrimination in Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson, 477 U.S. 57 (1986). The justices read the Civil Rights Act as an attempt by Congress to eliminate the whole range of unequal treatment of men and women in the workplace. They defined two types of harassment that could constitute this disparate treatment. The first is what many people envision as sexual harassment, the quid pro quo type. In this instance, a supervisor, employer, or colleague offers or threatens some tangible consequence in exchange for sex. A woman might be promised a raise or a promotion, or she might be threatened with a negative report or even with being fired. To force a female employee into such a "bargain" is clearly a form of discrimination based on sex. The second type of harassment recognized by the Court is the hostile environment. In this situation, a worker is exposed to "severe and pervasive" abusive behavior. In the eyes of the Court, such an offensive atmosphere is comparable to being exposed to constant and demeaning racial slurs. It is unreasonable to expect anyone to endure that mistreatment in exchange for the privilege of being allowed to work and earn a living.

The Court revisited the issue of sexual harassment in Harris v. Forklift Systems Inc., 510 U.S. 17 (1993). Teresa Harris worked in a nontraditional job as rental manager and sales coordinator at a heavy equipment company. Under the guise of humor, her boss made incessant comments about her body and her clothing, as well as demeaning sexual suggestions. The lower courts denied her claim of sexual harassment because her employer was "just joking" and because Harris had not suffered "serious psychological harm." A unanimous Supreme Court, however, reversed and provided a definition of hostile environment as conduct a "reasonable person" would find hostile or abusive. The victim did not need to demonstrate that she had suffered either physical or psychological harm, but only that the behavior detracted from her job performance. Since this decision, courts have attempted to define this "reasonable person." Is it a man or a woman? Do men and women have different standards for what constitutes tolerable workplace behavior? If a "reasonable" man thinks his conduct is funny, is it

Male executive harassing a female office worker. Sexual harassment is defined as a form of sex discrimination prohibited under the Civil Rights Act of 1964. That law makes it illegal to discriminate against an employee with respect to "terms, conditions, or privileges of employment because of such an individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." (© Esbin-Anderson/The Image Works)

"reasonable" for a woman to find it threatening or abusive? Some scholars have suggested that in sexual harassment claims the courts should ask, "Would a reasonable person the same sex as the victim be offended?"

One of the most famous sexual harassment allegations occurred when Professor Anita Hill accused Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas during his confirmation hearings before the United States Senate. Hill had worked for Thomas when he served as assistant secretary for civil rights in the Department of Education and as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Hill told humiliating stories that provided graphic examples of behavior that surely met the test for a hostile environment. A reasonable person the same sex as the victim would definitely be offended, as the reaction of women around the country demonstrated. Yet the members of the Senate did not focus on Thomas's alleged behavior but wondered instead, "Why didn't she quit?" At the very least, those televised hearings revealed the gap between men's and women's experiences and perceptions and, perhaps, opened the door to a more thorough examination of the problem.

The Court issued opinions in several significant sexual harassment cases in 1998. In Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Services, 523 U.S. 75 (1998), the Supreme Court addressed the issue of whether a man could be sexually harassed by other men, even if none of them were homosexual. Joseph Oncale was a member of an eight-man crew on an offshore oil rig. His colleagues repeatedly subjected him to humiliating, sex-related actions, including assault and the threat of rape, apparently because Oncale was small in stature and, in their eyes, "feminine." The tormenters claimed it was just horseplay, but the Court found sexual harassment. They held that a hostile environment need not be caused by sexual desire but could be a general hostility expressed in sexual and derogatory terms, such that a reasonable person would find it abusive. In this case, the Court seemed to assume that the reasonable person would be the same sex as the victim.

Several times the Supreme Court has addressed the question of employer liability for employees who engage in sexual harassment. Who should be responsible for compensating the victim? In Faragher v. City of Boca Raton, 524 U.S. 775 (1998), the Court found that lifeguard Beth Ann Faragher had experienced sexual harassment when her supervisors engaged in uninvited touching, lewd remarks, and speaking of women in offensive terms, thereby creating a hostile work environment for her and the other female lifeguards. The Court held the city responsible and said other employers would be similarly liable unless they could demonstrate that they had taken reasonable care to prevent and correct harassing behavior and that the complaining employee had reasonably failed to take advantage of opportunities to report.

Educational institutions can also be the setting for sexual harassment. The quid pro quo, where a professor offers a student a better grade in exchange for sexual favors, is a familiar example. Hostile environment can be a concern in schools and colleges. Adding a sexual dimension to the teacher-student relationship is an abuse of power. It can interfere with the learning experience. When professors or teachers treat certain students in sexually inappropriate ways, those students are likely to find that their peers distrust them. In order to demonstrate that they have taken reasonable care to prevent such behavior, schools and colleges have developed a variety of policies. Some prohibit any romantic or sexual relationships between faculty and students. Others limit the prohibition to students currently under a faculty member's supervision. At issue in such relationships is the clear power differential, the potential for coercion, and the vulnerability of students in dealing with someone who can control their future prospects.

Sexual harassment is similar to other gender-based offenses in that, like domestic violence and stalking, it is seldom an isolated act. Rather, it is usually a pattern of behavior involving repeated, and often escalating, confrontations. Like other crimes against women, it tends to grow out of unequal power relationships—supervisors and employees, professors and students. Sexual harassment has real consequences, as it may limit women's and some men's opportunities in the workplace or the school. Yet despite a number of significant Supreme Court decisions supporting action against sexual harassment, only a small percentage of victims lodge formal complaints. Although most women are not passive victims—many avoid the harasser, tell him to stop, or confide in friends and family—most feel their complaints will not be taken seriously, they will face reprisals, or they will be publicly humiliated. Some studies have shown that women who complained experienced worse treatment. Anita Hill's experience illustrated the hazards of coming forward to claim sexual harassment and the difficulty in establishing its seriousness.

Mary Atwell

See also: Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc.

FURTHER READING

DeBruin, Debra A. "Identifying Sexual Harassment: The Reasonable Woman Standard." In Violence Against Women: Philosophical Perspectives, ed. Stanley G. French, Wanda Teays, and Laura M. Purdy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1998.

Forell, Caroline A., and Donna M. Matthews. A Law of Her Own: The Reasonable Woman as a Measure of Man. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

MacKinnon, Catharine. Sex Equality. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Shapiro v. Thompson (1969)

In Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969), the U.S. Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a one-year state residency requirement for receipt of welfare benefits. Under Chief Justice Earl Warren, the Court substantially expanded the scope of the Constitution's equal protection guarantee. Traditionally, discriminatory laws had been upheld if reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective. Building on isolated earlier opinions, however, the Warren Court erected a two-tiered equal protection doctrine. Under that "new" standard, most discriminatory laws were subject to "rational-basis" review, whereas laws based on "suspect categories" of classification or that infringed upon "fundamental rights" were declared unconstitutional unless found necessary to a legitimate and compelling state interest, called the "strict-scrutiny test." A majority of justices not only deemed racial and related classifications inherently suspect, but also suggested that discrimination based on wealth and illegitimacy were subject to strict scrutiny. Among "fundamental rights" given strict review, moreover, were not only those stated elsewhere in the Constitution, such as First Amendment freedoms, but others mentioned nowhere in the constitutional text, including the right to interstate travel, fairly apportioned governmental bodies, and the necessities of life.

Shapiro v. Thompson was the most significant of Warren Court cases applying the fundamental-rights branch of modern equal protection doctrine. In Shapiro and two companion cases, the Court struck down Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and District of Columbia regulations conditioning receipt of Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) benefits on a one-year residency requirement. Such laws creating two classes of needy citizens, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. declared for a six–three majority, deterred people from exercising their fundamental right to interstate travel and were thus subject to strict judicial review. Yet the governmental interests asserted in support of the residency requirement were either constitutionally impermissible or served no compelling interest that could not be furthered through means less restrictive of interstate travel. A policy designed to limit migration into states generally, or by those seeking more generous welfare benefits, Justice Brennan concluded, was constitutionally forbidden, as were governmental attempts to reserve benefits for those who had previously contributed to a state's tax revenues. Administrative and related objectives were equally unavailing. There was no evidence that the residency requirement actually facilitated budget planning, as the appellees claimed. Moreover, other regulations were used to determine legal residency; less drastic means were available for preventing the fraudulent receipt of benefits; and any desire to encourage newcomers promptly to join the labor force logically should also be applied to long-term residents.

The federal Social Security Act stipulated that states could impose no more than a year's residency requirement for receipt of AFDC benefits. But Justice Brennan refused to read that provision as authorizing such a restriction and held that, in any event, Congress could not authorize states to violate equal protection.

In dissent, Chief Justice Warren, joined by Justice Hugo L. Black, contended that Congress had the authority, under its power over interstate commerce, to impose the challenged residency requirement or authorize states to do so. Justice John M. Harlan's dissent was more far-reaching. He contended that the Court, through the fundamental-rights branch of modern equal protection philosophy, was acting as a "super-legislature," creating rights that were not grounded in the Constitution and subjecting them to broad judicial protection. He agreed that a right of interstate travel was part of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. But he argued that such freedoms were subject to regulation under any law rationally related to legitimate governmental objectives, such as those raised in defense of the challenged residency requirement.

Tinsley E. Yarbrough

See also: Compelling Governmental Interest; Rational-Basis Test; Right to Travel; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications.

FURTHER READING

Poppe, Matthew. "Defining the Scope of the Equal Protection Clause with Respect to Welfare Waiting Periods." University of California Law Review 61 (1994): 291–323.

Rosenheim, Margaret K. "Shapiro v. Thompson: The Beggars Are Coming to Town." In Supreme Court Review 1969, Philip B. Kurland, 303–34. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.

Sheppard v. Maxwell (1966)

On July 3, 1954, pregnant housewife Marilyn Sheppard was brutally beaten to death in a suburb of Cleveland, Ohio. The police focused on her husband Sam as the main suspect, ignoring Sam's insistence that a "bushy-haired intruder" had broken into their home and knocked him unconscious before attacking his wife. The case pointed to the way in which untrammeled press coverage of criminal trials could undermine the rights of criminal defendants.

The lurid nature of the crime—it later emerged that Sam Sheppard had been having an extramarital affair—provoked a frenzy in the Cleveland media. After a flurry of front-page editorials demanded Sheppard's arrest, the coroner convened an inquest. To accommodate the widespread interest in the case, the inquest was held in a high school gymnasium and broadcast live on radio and television. At one point, Sheppard's attorney (who was allowed to be present only as an observer) attempted to introduce documents into evidence, prompting the coroner and some burly assistants physically to remove the attorney from the room.

The trial itself, though not broadcast, was nevertheless a media circus. All three Cleveland newspapers printed the names and addresses of the seventy-five people in the pool of potential jurors. Photographs of the impaneled jury were published over forty times during the trial, and both the jury and the judge were filmed entering and leaving the courthouse every day. The judge, who was running for reelection, even gave a staged interview on the courthouse steps. Additionally, the courthouse was virtually commandeered by the press: Print and broadcast reporters occupied rooms on every floor of the building and took up three of the four rows of seats in the courtroom, which was swarming with wires and cameras.

On December 21, 1954, Sheppard was convicted. Within a month of the verdict, both of his parents were dead; his mother committed suicide, and his father died of a stress-induced hemorrhaging ulcer.

It took over a decade for redemption to arrive, but in Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966), the U.S. Supreme Court threw out his conviction. Focusing on "the totality of the circumstances"—the intensity of the pretrial media coverage, the outrageousness of the coroner's inquest, and the "carnival atmosphere" resulting from the media's takeover of the courthouse—Justice Tom C. Clark concluded that the overwhelming publicity had deprived Sheppard of his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights and ordered a new trial. The second time around, aided by new counsel (a young attorney named F. Lee Bailey), Sheppard was acquitted. Sadly, he enjoyed his vindication only for four years; in April 1970, Sheppard died of liver failure at the age of forty-six.

The Sheppard case retains a prominent place in American culture. It served as the inspiration for the 1960s television show The Fugitive (subsequently made into a feature film and remade into another television series). Several books on the case pointed to a local handyman named Richard Eberling as the likely killer. Additionally, the quest of the Sheppards' son to clear his father's name became a celebrated case in its own right, culminating in a 2000 civil verdict that Ohio had not committed misconduct in pursuing the original charges.

Steven B. Lichtman

See also: Due Process of Law; First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Bailey, F. Lee. The Defense Never Rests. New York: New American Library, 1995.

Cooper, Cynthia L., and Sam Reese Sheppard. Mockery of Justice: The True Story of the Sheppard Murder Case. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1995.

Neff, James. The Wrong Man. New York: Random House, 2001.

Sherbert v. Verner (1963)

In Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), the U.S. Supreme Court held that it was unconstitutional for the state of South Carolina to deny unemployment compensation to a Seventh-Day Adventist woman who was fired from her job for refusing to work on Saturdays. The Court's expansive interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause contained in the First Amendment to the Constitution set an important but controversial precedent for how cases involving religious freedom ought to be decided.

The First Amendment guarantees that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion" (the Establishment Clause) "or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" (the Free Exercise Clause). In Sherbert, the Court ruled that the state could not infringe upon a person's right to free exercise of religion unless it had a "compelling interest" that could not otherwise be satisfied. However, the Court's interpretation of the First Amendment in Sherbert was regarded by some constitutional scholars as bringing the Free Exercise Clause into tension with the Establishment Clause—a concern that led the Court effectively to overrule the Sherbert doctrine nearly thirty years later.

The case originated when Adell Sherbert, a member of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church, was discharged by her employer for refusing to work on Saturday, the Sabbath day of her faith. When, for the same reason, she was unable to find work elsewhere, Sherbert sought unemployment compensation from the state of South Carolina. However, the state Employment Security Commission rejected her application under a state law according to which a claimant was ineligible for employment benefits if she had "failed, without good cause . . . to accept available suitable work when offered." The commission's ruling was upheld by the South Carolina Supreme Court but reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court, which found that it abridged Sherbert's right to the free exercise of her religion as guaranteed by the First Amendment and applied to the states under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Writing on behalf of a seven-member majority, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. endorsed a three-part test that aimed to balance an individual's right to free exercise against the interests of the state. According to this test, which later came to be known as the "Sherbert test," the plaintiff must first show that the law under review constitutes a substantial burden to her right to free exercise of religion. If so, the state must show that it has a "compelling interest" that would outweigh this burden. Finally, it is incumbent on the state to demonstrate that "no alternative forms of regulation" could be used to satisfy the same interest without infringing First Amendment rights.

The majority found that the ruling of the commission forced Sherbert "to choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand," and that this effectively penalized the free exercise of her constitutional liberties. It also found no compelling state interest that would justify such a penalty. In overturning the decision of the lower court, the majority noted that its ruling "plainly" did not foster the establishment of the Seventh-Day Adventist religion.

Interestingly, Sherbert was decided the same day as Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), in which the Court reaffirmed the government's obligation under the Establishment Clause to "maintain strict neutrality, neither aiding nor opposing religion." Justice Potter Stewart, the lone voice of dissent in Schempp, concurred with the majority's result in Sherbert but expressed concern that the Court's expansive interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause effectively privileged religious reasons for being "unavailable for work" over secular ones, thereby pitting the Court's interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause against its interpretation of the Establishment Clause in Schempp. In dissent in Sherbert, Justice John M. Harlan, joined by Justice Byron R. White, raised the same objection, arguing that according to the precedent set by the majority, the state "must single out for financial assistance those whose behavior is religiously motivated, even though it denies such assistance to others whose identical behavior . . . is not religiously motivated."

Based in part on such concerns, a series of increasingly restrictive interpretations of the Free Exercise Clause culminated in the overruling of the Sherbert test in 1990 in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990). Writing for the majority, Justice Antonin Scalia argued that to require the state to demonstrate a "compelling interest" in enforcing generally applicable laws "contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense," and that "any society adopting such a system would be courting anarchy." However, critics of Smith have worried that the rejection of the Sherbert test could impose special burdens on members of minority religions.

Richard Amesbury

See also: Abington School District v. Schempp; Compelling Governmental Interest; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith.

FURTHER READING

Eisgruber, Christopher L., and Lawrence G. Sager. "Equal Regard." In Law and Religion: A Critical Anthology, ed. Stephen M. Feldman, 200–25. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Epps, Garrett. To an Unknown God: Religious Freedom on Trial. New York: St. Martin's, 2001.

Hammond, Phillip E. With Liberty for All: Freedom of Religion in the United States. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998.

Wellons, Gregory D. "Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith: The Melting of Sherbert Means a Chilling Effect on Religion." University of San Francisco Law Review 26, 1 (Fall 1991): 149–73.

Sixth Amendment

As one of the amendments within the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution, the Sixth Amendment protects a variety of criminal defense rights. It provides:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which shall have > been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

The U.S. Supreme Court is the government body that interprets the Sixth Amendment. Therefore, understanding the rights conferred by the Sixth Amendment depends in large measure on Supreme Court case law.

RIGHT TO SPEEDY TRIAL

In Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967), the Supreme Court held that the right to speedy trial was so fundamental that it applied to state courts through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. The Court traced this protection all the way back to England's 1215 Magna Carta, which provided "We will sell to no man, we will not deny or defer to any man either justice or right." The Court in Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514 (1972), deemed the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial to be "generically different" from any other constitutional right, for it had a "societal interest" existing separately from, "and at times, in opposition to, the interests of the accused." For instance, this right is meant to protect the public from criminal defendants who, seeing large case backlogs in courtrooms caused by delay, "manipulate the system" to negotiate for guilty pleas to lesser offenses.

At the same time, the Court in Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374 (1969), recognized that a speedy trial may aid a defendant by preventing "undue and oppressive" pretrial incarceration, "minimize anxiety and concern accompanying public accusation," and limit harm to the defendant's ability to present a defense. To guard against delay constituting violation of this right, courts should weigh four factors: (1) length of delay, (2) reason for delay, (3) whether and how the defendant asserts his or her speedy-trial right, and (4) prejudice to the defendant. If the combined weights of these factors show a violation, the court must dismiss the charges facing the defendant.

RIGHT TO PUBLIC TRIAL

Although characterizing the "exact date of its origin" as "obscure," the Court recognized in In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257 (1947), that the right to public trial "has its roots in our English common law heritage." This right grew out of the "distrust for secret trials" fostered by such infamous tribunals as the Spanish Inquisition and England's Star Chamber. The public nature of a trial is therefore meant to act as a safeguard against courts becoming "instruments of persecution." Public trial, however, is a personal right of the individual defendant and cannot be exercised by the public or press. Media access to courtrooms therefore involves consideration not of the Sixth Amendment but of the First Amendment.

RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL

In Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968), the famous "selective incorporation" case, the Court recognized that the right to jury trial was so fundamental to ordered liberty that it was applicable to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The jury, envisioned as composed of laypersons from the community, was to act as a buffer between the individual and government officials and therefore protect defendants from government oppression. The right to a jury trial, however, is not available for every case. A criminal defendant is guaranteed a jury only when charged with a "serious" crime, one that exposes the defendant to more than six months' imprisonment. Petty offenses can be tried by court trials.

The number of jurors for a trial is no longer fixed at twelve, for the Court in Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), held that juries with as few as six members could still perform meaningful deliberation and possess the common sense of the entire community. Moreover, in Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972), the Court determined that unanimity in the verdict was not constitutionally required. Every jury, however, must be drawn from a group that represents a fair cross-section of the community. Moreover, in Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. 130 (1979), the Court decided that a six-member jury verdict must be unanimous.

RIGHT TO NOTICE OF ACCUSATION

The Sixth Amendment also includes the right to receive adequate notice of the crimes being charged. In United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876), the Court interpreted this right to mean that the indictment, or charging document, should provide a description of every charge not only to enable the defendant to present a defense in the case but also to protect against "double jeopardy," or further prosecutions on the same matter. The Court has also connected the right to notice with other Sixth Amendment rights. In the case of In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257 (1947), the Court thus stated: "A person's right to reasonable notice of a charge against him, and an opportunity to be heard in his defense—a right to his day in court—are basic in our system of jurisprudence; and these rights include, as a minimum, a right to examine witnesses against him, to offer testimony, and to be represented by counsel."

As with the other rights in the Sixth Amendment, the right to notice is so fundamental that it also applies to state courts through the Fourteenth Amendment.

RIGHT OF CONFRONTATION

One of the main goals of confrontation of witnesses is to provide protection against convictions based on unreliable evidence. In Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990), the Court explained that confrontation promoted reliability by causing witnesses to testify under oath, be subject to cross-examination, and expose their demeanor to the jury. "Hearsay" evidence, testimony that presents an assertion made by someone who is not subject to these three tests of reliability, is potentially violative of the Sixth Amendment. The Group portrait of the jury that cleared Frank James, brother of notorious outlaw Jesse James and coleader of the James Gang, at Gallatin, Missouri, September 1883. A criminal defendant is guaranteed a jury only when charged with a "serious" crime, one that exposes the defendant to more than six months' imprisonment. (Library of Congress)

Court therefore developed a confrontation test for hearsay in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), requiring (1) either the appearance of the hearsay declarant, or a showing that the declarant is "unavailable" to appear at trial, and (2) if the declarant is unavailable, that the hearsay be shown to be reliable.

Even when a witness is present for testimony, confrontation issues may arise. In Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990), the Court considered whether confrontation was satisfied when a child-abuse victim testified over closed-circuit television. The Court carefully limited such proceedings to situations in which actual physical presence would impair a child's ability to communicate and the setting preserved the reliability of the testimony.

RIGHT TO COMPULSORY PROCESS

The Sixth Amendment also guarantees the right of compulsory process, meaning that criminal defendants may use the court's subpoena power to, if need be, force witnesses to appear and testify in court. In Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967), the Court explained this right: "The right to offer the testimony of witnesses, and to compel their attendance, if necessary, is in plain terms the right to present a defense, the right to present the defendant's version of the facts as well as the prosecution's to the jury so it may decide where the truth lies."

The right to confrontation may be violated not only by refusing the defendant the power to call a witness but also by evidence statutes deeming such a witness ineligible to testify. The Court has found this right so fundamental that, again, it has been incorporated and made applicable to the states in their court proceedings through the Fourteenth Amendment.

RIGHT TO ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL

In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), the Court ruled that the right to counsel was so important that criminal defendants could have a lawyer represent them, even if they could not afford to hire one. This right has been limited to those who are genuinely indigent and who are facing a criminal charge that will result in even one day's imprisonment. This right to counsel is so vital that it attaches even before trial. In Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), the Court held that upon indictment or other formal charge, defendants have the right to have an attorney present during police questioning.

The lawyer supplied to a defendant must be competent. In Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), the Court crafted a test with two prongs a defendant must prove to prevail on a claim of incompetence of counsel. The defendant must show that (1) counsel's errors were so serious that the attorney failed to function as Sixth Amendment counsel in the adversary system and (2) the error was so prejudicial that it affected the trial's outcome.

Even though the Court has seen the right to counsel as crucial, this assistance cannot be foisted upon defendants against their wishes. In Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975), the Court interpreted the Sixth Amendment's "assistance of counsel" phrase as enabling the defendant to forgo appointment of counsel for self-representation. In certain circumstances, however, a trial court can appoint "standby counsel" to aid the defendant if need be.

The Sixth Amendment thus provides criminal defendants with an array of rights. Each right is so crucial that all of them apply in state as well as federal courts.

George M. Dery III

See also: Bill of Rights; Gideon v. Wainwright; Right of Confrontation; Right to Counsel; Speedy Trial, Right to; Trial by Jury.

FURTHER READING

Cammack, Mark E. Advanced Criminal Procedure in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2001.

Whitebread, Charles H., and Christopher Slobogin. Criminal Procedure: An Analysis of Cases and Concepts. 4th ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2000.

Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942)

In Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), the U.S. Supreme Court laid the jurisprudential foundation for extending constitutional protection to individual liberty relating to sexual activity, holding that sterilization of convicted felons violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The question before the Court in Skinner was whether Oklahoma's Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act—mandating that persons convicted at least twice of designated felonies be involuntarily sterilized—violated the Equal Protection Clause. Skinner had been convicted of and imprisoned for committing felonies on three separate occasions: larceny once (stealing chickens) and armed robbery twice. During Skinner's third incarceration, the state of Oklahoma enacted the statute imposing an additional penalty triggered by multiple convictions of specified felonies. Since Skinner's criminal record triggered the recidivist penalty, the state began proceedings to effect the sterilization. Skinner unsuccessfully fought the constitutionality of the statute in state court. He pursued his legal battle in federal court, ultimately reaching the Supreme Court.

Writing for the majority, Justice William O. Douglas concluded that Oklahoma's statute constituted invidious discrimination repugnant to the Constitution. The statute failed to survive strict-scrutiny analysis; the arbitrarily constructed recidivist penalty did not promote a compelling governmental interest. Providing differential punishment for some felonies but not others arbitrarily designated as "involving moral turpitude" exacerbated the Court's skepticism. Justice Douglas underscored the class bias embodied in the measure, illustrating his point by comparing similar felonies carrying dissimilar punishment: Embezzlement (a white-collar crime) was explicitly exempted, whereas larceny (a working-class crime) was specifically targeted by the statute.

Moreover, the nature of the penalty was particularly problematic for the Court. Justice Douglas asserted that it > involves one of the basic civil rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race. The power to sterilize . . . may have subtle, far-reaching and devastating effects. In evil or reckless hands it can cause races or types which are inimical to the dominant group to wither and disappear. There is no redemption for the individual whom the law touches. Any experiment which the State conducts is to his irreparable injury. He is forever deprived of a basic liberty.

Justice William O. Douglas wrote the majority opinion for the Supreme Court's decision in Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942), in which the Court concluded that Oklahoma's Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act constituted invidious discrimination repugnant to the Constitution.
(Library of Congress)

The disparate treatment mandated by the recidivist sterilization statute, the Court recognized, irreversibly vitiated the individual dignity and bodily autonomy protected by the Constitution. Imposing such heinous punishment on those lacking social influence while specifically precluding its imposition on society's most privileged was irreconcilable with the principle of equal protection of the law.

The Supreme Court's opinion in Skinner established the doctrinal foundation for extending constitutional protection to more specific facets of individual liberty relating to sexual activity, including access to contraception and abortion. Since the right to procreate is fundamental, statutes infringing upon this liberty attract the most rigorous judicial scrutiny. Therefore, this liberty is afforded the strongest constitutional protection.

Melanie K. Morris

See also: Buck v. Bell; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Sloan, Irving J. The Law Governing Abortion, Contraception, and Sterilization. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1988.

Slander

Both slander and libel are forms of defamation. Libel is defamation expressed in a form that is visible, such as writing, print, pictures, or effigies. Slander, on the other hand, is defamation by spoken communication. Defamation has the potential to damage a person's reputation, by the communicator disseminating hostile or disparaging opinions or aiding in the generation of bad feelings toward someone. Defamation may cause others to refuse to associate with the person, may cause financial harm, and may damage the person's good name, subjecting the person to ridicule, shame, scorn, disrespect, and contempt. Still, people's interest in protecting their reputation must be weighed against the social interest in free speech and a vibrant press, rights granted by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The distinction between slander and libel is one more of historical circumstance rather than of legal principle. English common law did not distinguish between slander and libel until the 1660s. Most early defamation cases concerned slander, as would be expected in a society without widespread literacy or printing. Slander and libel raise slightly different legal issues. Libel has been considered the more serious offense, since the defamation is more permanent, with a greater opportunity for being widely disseminated. There is also a greater likelihood that the libelous defamation was premeditated and therefore more serious than a burst of angry speech.

Because courts have deemed libel to be of greater social and individual harm, they have made it easier for the plaintiff to win damages, as compared with slander suits. In most libel suits, the plaintiff need only prove that the communication was libel per se (libel in and of itself) to recover damages; the person is not required to prove actual damages. It is more difficult for the plaintiff to win slander suits. Typically, the plaintiff must prove "special damages," actual proof of financial damage or loss of society and companionship, with a degree of precision and exactitude. There are, however, four exceptions, in which it is not necessary to prove actual damages in order to prevail in a slander suit. These four exceptions, considered slanderous per se, concern the imputation of (1) criminal behavior (such that it is either punishable by imprisonment or reflects moral turpitude); (2) having a "loathsome" disease (considered communicable, like AIDS, STD [sexually transmitted disease], leprosy); (3) unfitness for business or profession (due to lack of ability or ethics); or (4) sexual misconduct (typically a category that has been applied only to women, although there have been exceptions).

Changes in the technology of communication have rendered the distinction between libel and slander more difficult to maintain. There is no uniform national standard, but most courts have concluded that statements on radio and television should be considered libel, not slander. The view taken in Second Restatement of Torts (sec. 568) is that the distinction can no longer be defined as one of medium (written versus spoken). Rather, the critical difference concerns the premeditated character of the statement and the persistence of the defamation. If it is ephemeral or transitory, in no fixed form, then the utterance is defined as slander. If it is fixed in a more permanent form, including radio and television broadcasts, it will likely be classified as libel. The most common forms of slander remain unrecorded speech.

Before 1964, all defamation laws were handled through the common law on a state-by-state basis. In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), the U.S. Supreme Court announced that libel and defamation were not constitutionally protected categories of speech. State libel laws, in this era, tended to favor the plaintiff. The plaintiff usually did not have to prove harm (it was presupposed by the nature of the statement), strict liability was the standard used, the defendant had the burden of proving that the statement was true, and the punitive damages were unlimited. That situation changed radically with New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), in which the Court placed some libelous speech under the protection of the First Amendment and imposed uniform federal rules for defamation suits. Under Sullivan, before pubic officials can recover for damages from defamation, it must first be proved that the defendant (typically the press) acted with "actual malice," meaning purposeful lying or a reckless disregard for the truth. The core significance of Sullivan is that the Court brought libel of public officials under the protection of the First Amendment. Until this case, libel claims were often used by states as the equivalent of seditious libel, the defamation of the government, in order to punish and silence critics.

The Court subsequently expanded the protection from libel suits in the years after Sullivan. The key issues in these cases have been the characteristics of the plaintiff and the nature of the subject matter. The Court has expanded First Amendment coverage to defamation cases involving public figures, persons who are in positions of influence or importance, or persons who have sought to place themselves in the spotlight. Such persons are more likely to be in a position of access to the media to respond to falsehoods or defamation. The Court has also expanded Sullivan to cover even defamation of private figures if the issues involved are of public concern, for example, child abuse. In more recent cases, the Supreme Court has used the term "defamation" generally, blurring further the distinction between libel and slander. Many commentators have called for the erasure of the distinction, but the differing rules for recovery of damages requires the perpetuation of the two terms.

Douglas C. Dow

See also: Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire; Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.

FURTHER READING

Post, Robert. "The Social Foundations of Defamation Law: Reputation and the Constitution." University of California Law Review 74 (May 1986): 691–742.

VerSteeg, Russ. "Slander and Slander Damages After Gertz and Dun & Bradstreet." Villanova Law Review 38 (1993): 655–91.

Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)

In the famous Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873), Justice Samuel F. Miller wrote the opinion for the five–four majority, holding that the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution had to be considered in light of the original purpose of its framers—to guarantee the freedom of former black slaves. As such, the amendment was inapplicable to state regulation of slaughtering facilities.

The Slaughterhouse Cases combined three suits involving a Louisiana law that regulated the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughtering Company and required that all slaughtering of animals be done at the New Orleans facility. The case brought the recently passed Fourteenth Amendment (1868) before the U.S. Supreme Court for review for the first time.

The law involved the need for stricter health regulations. Since modern refrigeration techniques had not yet been implemented, there was grave concern about serious health risks surrounding improperly slaughtered meat. Louisiana lawmakers sought to regulate slaughterhouse sites as a way of controlling the risks. States had the choice to build centralized slaughterhouses or allow private businesses to operate public slaughterhouses.

The slaughterhouse laws enraged butchers who had historically slaughtered animals on their own property and then moved the carcasses. Various butchers filed lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the legislation, arguing that they were protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, during the 1870s the amendment was not envisioned as primarily applicable to white citizens but chiefly to the freed slaves. The butchers lost in state courts, and their counsel, former associate justice of the Supreme Court John A. Campbell, took their argument through federal appellate court and finally to the Supreme Court.

In affirming the lower courts, Justice Miller gave a history of the Civil War–era constitutional amendments, including the Fourteenth, and held:

> We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all; and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him.

Thus, the majority interpreted the Privileges and Immunities Clause narrowly, holding that the only privileges and immunities protected were those that owed their existence to the federal government. Under this interpretation, freedom of enterprise and occupation was not included.

Justice Miller's opinion focused on the limitations of the Fourteenth Amendment. He argued that the term "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States" called for a separation between rights associated with state citizenship and rights associated with national citizenship. According to Miller, the Fourteenth Amendment forbade states to abridge rights associated with U.S. citizenship.

The four dissenting justices penned three different opinions. Justice Stephen J. Field argued that the Fourteenth Amendment was not designed solely to protect the rights of blacks. Two other justices added that the slaughterhouse legislation in fact violated the Fourteenth Amendment because it deprived the butchers of property without due process of law.

The Slaughterhouse Cases have historically been viewed as an example of the Court narrowing the scope of the Privileges and Immunities Clause. Critics have complained that the Slaughterhouse decision severely restrained the ability of courts to protect the rights of blacks in the 1870s. Although this claim does have arguable legitimacy, scholars counter that Slaughterhouse did not involve the rights of black Louisianans. In many senses, Justice Miller's opinion remains deeply rooted in its historical context.

The real significance of the Slaughterhouse Cases, Justice Field wrote, was that monopolies were unconstitutional infringements on the fundamental right of people to sustain their lives through labor. Noting that monopolies had been illegal under the common law of England, Field demonstrated that the antimonopoly attitude epitomized the United States as well.

Aaron R. S. Lorenz

See also: Citizenship; Fourteenth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Labbé, Ronald M. "New Light on the Slaughterhouse Monopoly Act of 1869." In Louisiana's Legal Heritage, ed. Edward F. Haas. Pensacola, FL: Perdido Bay Press, 1983.

Maltz, Earl M. The Fourteenth Amendment and the Law of the Constitution. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2003.

Smith Act Cases

The Smith Act of 1940 "made it a crime to teach or advocate the violent overthrow of any government in the United States, to set up an organization to engage in such teaching or advocacy, or to conspire to teach, advocate, or organize the violent overthrow of any government in the United States." Passed as war was looming, the legislation was in constant tension with the rights of expression and assembly protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Smith Act was the brainchild of Representative Howard W. Smith of Virginia. Known as Judge Smith because of his prior service on the bench in Virginia, Smith was the powerful Republican chairman of the House Rules Committee during the 1950s. He was also a fervent anti-Communist. Though the Smith Act was passed during the period leading up to World War II, the legislation was not aggressively used until the "red scare" of the late 1940s and early 1950s. At that time, the United States was gripped by Communist hysteria urged on by Senator Joseph McCarthy (R-WI) and his special investigative committee in the Senate and the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) under the direction of Representative Richard Nixon (R-CA). It was in this atmosphere that individuals were aggressively prosecuted for their alleged Communist ties, the most famous being Alger Hiss and Julius and Ethel Rosenberg.

The U.S. Supreme Court was also grappling with this sense of fear in the country as the justices reviewed Smith Act prosecutions that reached their bench. From 1951 to 1961, the Court reviewed many Smith Act convictions; however, four major Smith Act cases demonstrate how the Court shaped its analysis of incitement precedent to address the public's anxiety about the perceived Communist threat.

Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), concerned an indictment brought against the leaders of the Communist Party in the United States for conspiracy to overthrow the U.S. government. The trial lasted nine months before the twelve Communist leaders were convicted, and it resulted in 16,000 pages of court record. In Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson's opinion for the fractured Court, he stated that "[s]peech is not an absolute, above and beyond control of the legislature when its judgment, subject to review here, is that certain kinds of speech are so undesirable as to warrant criminal sanction." But these words hid Vinson's true fear—the overt menace of communism. His opinion showed that the Court was willing to let the government take whatever steps it felt necessary to stop the Communists, even if the threat was not imminent: "If the ingredients of the reaction are present, we cannot bind the Government to wait until the catalyst is added." Vinson's beliefs, however, were not shared by a number of other justices. Justices Felix Frankfurter and Robert H. Jackson concurred with Vinson's opinion but grounded their analysis on the historical origins of the First Amendment. Justices Hugo L. Black and William O. Douglas dissented strongly. In fact, Justice Douglas's refrain that "free speech is the rule, not the exception" would eventually become the tenor of later Smith Act cases.

By the time of the second major Smith Act case, Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957), the composition of the Court had changed. Vinson—the fervent anti-Communist—was dead, and Earl Warren had taken his place as chief justice. Other new faces included William J. Brennan Jr. and John Marshall Harlan II, the grandson of the great dissenter on the Court at the end of the nineteenth century. Harlan would return the Court to the incitement test that was established during the World War I era by Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), and by Learned Hand in Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 244 F. 535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917).

Yates concerned the conspiracy aspects of the Smith Act, but Justice Harlan ruled that, unlike in Dennis, the defendants could not be prosecuted for organizing a group to overthrow the government because the statute of limitations had run (the Communist Party was formed in 1945) before the government garnered an indictment in 1951. Harlan also reaffirmed the principle that the mere teaching of communism was insufficient for a prosecution; there must be incitement to immediate lawless action. In fact, Harlan stated, "We recognize that distinctions between advocacy or teaching of abstract doctrines, with evil intent, and that which is directed to stirring people to action, are often subtle and difficult to grasp." Yet the Court ordered retrial of nine of the individuals in question. Again, Justices Black and Douglas argued for all the convictions to be reversed.

Decided the same day in 1961, Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961), and Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961), spelled the end to Smith Act prosecutions. Justice Harlan again penned the Court's opinions. Scales and Noto concerned the membership clause of the Smith Act. In Scales, the convictions were affirmed; in Noto, they were reversed. In Scales, Harlan stated that the membership "clause does not make criminal all association with an organization which has been shown to engage in illegal advocacy. There must be clear proof that a defendant 'specifically intend(s) to accomplish (the aims of the organization) by resort to violence.' " In fact, if the member does not have the specific intent to overthrow the government, "[s]uch a person may be foolish, deluded, or perhaps merely optimistic, but he is not by this statute made a criminal." Dissenting again were Justices Black and Douglas; this time they were joined by Justice Brennan and Chief Justice Warren. In Noto, however, the Court was united, finding the advocacy to lawless action in the future was too amorphic and the evidence too weak. As Harlan stated, "To permit an inference of present advocacy from evidence showing at best only a purpose or conspiracy to advocate in the future would be to allow the jury to blur the lines of distinction between the various offenses punishable under the Smith Act." The Smith Act was for all intents and purposes dead. The red scare that brought it to dominance was over.

David T. Harold

See also: Abrams v. United States; Communists; Dennis v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Belknap, Michael R. Cold War Political Justice: The Smith Act, the Communist Party, and American Civil Liberties. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1977.

Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Kutler, Stanley I. The American Inquisition: Justice and Injustice in the Cold War. New York: Hill and Wang, 1982.

Smith Act of 1940. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, sec. 2385.

Smith v. Collin (1978)

Frank Collin, the leader of the National Socialist Party of America (NSPA), a self-described Nazi group of two or three dozen members, managed to acquire a media footprint out of all proportion to his real significance. In the 1970s, the American Nazi movement was microscopic, and Collin's NSPA was a small faction within that movement. The NSPA carved out a place in the nation's memory by the shocking tactic of planning a demonstration in Skokie, Illinois—a community with a large Jewish population and an unusually high concentration of Holocaust survivors. Prevented from demonstrating, the NSPA took legal action, which eventually succeeded. Even among civil libertarians, the case was extremely divisive. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), which agreed to take the case, reportedly lost thirty thousand members as a result and still must frequently defend this decision. For the foreseeable future, any discussion of hypothetical limits to First Amendment rights must inevitably include this case.

In 1976, the Chicago Park District had tried to stop the NSPA (and the Martin Luther King Jr. Coalition) from demonstrating in Marquette Park, a racially divided neighborhood in Chicago, by requiring $250,000 in insurance against damages from any groups wishing to do so. The ACLU agreed to help the NSPA to fight this requirement. In early 1977, however, before the matter was resolved, Collin asked several Chicago suburbs for permits to demonstrate. Most did not reply; representatives of Skokie wrote that they would require $350,000 in insurance. Collin wrote the Skokie Park District on March 20 to announce a planned demonstration against the insurance requirement, to be held May 1 in front of the village hall (visible from people's homes nearby) and centered on the theme "White Free Speech." Participants would wear Nazi uniforms, including swastikas. The NSPA voluntarily offered several restrictions on their activity: Participants would obey all laws and refrain from derogatory speech or slogans.

In late April, an injunction was obtained to stop the NSPA from demonstrating in Skokie. The city passed three ordinances clearly designed to prevent the NSPA from demonstrating or parading. These included a formalization of the insurance requirement, (waivable by a unanimous vote) and bans on demonstrations with content insulting to or hostile toward individuals or groups or involving political parties wearing military-style uniforms. Collin sought help from the ACLU again, appealing, as in the Marquette Park case, on grounds of freedom of speech and assembly. The ACLU took the case, and a long series of trials and appeals began, some initiated by Skokie Mayor Albert Smith, some by Collin and the NSPA.

In the first case, Collin v. Smith, 447 F. Supp. 676 (1978), the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois voided the three ordinances intended to deny the NSPA a permit, a decision upheld by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. Skokie was then compelled to issue a demonstration permit. Smith tried to take the case to the Supreme Court, but the Court denied certiorari in Smith v. Collin, 439 U.S. 916 (1978), meaning that the lower court decision was upheld, thus permitting the march.

A separate case, Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, was filed in state court in response to an injunction prohibiting the NSPA from parading in Nazi uniforms and regalia. This case also went to the Supreme Court, but was sent back to the Illinois appellate court; it finally ended with the injunction reversed. Skokie officials then tried to have the Supreme Court reverse some of these results, but the Court denied them.

In the end, all cases were resolved in favor of Collin and the NSPA. The march was finally allowed—but it was canceled. Marquette Park meanwhile had become available, and the Skokie march was expected to draw many more counterprotesters than Nazis, possibly by as much as a thousand to one. The NSPA marched in Marquette Park on June 24 and July 9, 1978.

Smith v. Collin remains controversial. Critics often claim that, in some sense, Nazis should have only limited rights—that as opponents of freedom as a political principle, they have forfeited protections deriving from that principle. Many argue that reasonable limits to free speech are consistent with the First Amendment. Some say that the proposed demonstration was a threat or assault, specifically targeting Jewish residents of Skokie, especially Holocaust survivors, and therefore not a protected form of expression, or that the promotion of Nazism constitutes "clear and present danger," or falls under the scope of cases involving hate speech, fighting words, or group libel.

For some, Smith v. Collin typifies everything wrong with single-minded pursuit of First Amendment rights, but for others it represents a high point in the application of those rights, which are easy to apply to noncontroversial speech but require great commitment to apply evenhandedly, even to opponents of liberty. Aryeh Neier, a Jew, a survivor of World War II and part of the ACLU's efforts on behalf of the NSPA, strikingly related his reaction to the question "How can you, a Jew, defend freedom for Nazis?" He replied, "How can I, a Jew, refuse to defend freedom, even for Nazis?"

Victor Greeson

See also: Hate Speech; Symbolic Speech.

FURTHER READING

Downs, Donald Alexander. Nazis in Skokie: Freedom, Community, and the First Amendment. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1985.

Hamlin, David. The Nazi/Skokie Conflict: A Civil Liberties Battle. Boston: Beacon, 1980.

Neier, Aryeh. Defending My Enemy: American Nazis, the Skokie Case, and the Risks of Freedom. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Strum, Philippa. When the Nazis Came to Skokie: Freedom for Speech We Hate. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1999.

Solicitor General

The U.S. Solicitor General's Office is headed by the fourth-highest-ranking lawyer in the United States, and he is the official representative of the executive branch before the U.S. Supreme Court. He has a highly salient, unique, and special relationship with the nation's highest court. Congress established the Solicitor General's Office in 1870 when the Department of Justice was created.

The solicitor general has four central functions at the Supreme Court level. First, the office determines whether the federal government should appeal cases lost in lower federal courts to the Supreme Court. Second, the solicitor general acts as a gatekeeper, who argues for or against full review of cases appealed to the Court. Third, he argues cases as a direct party. Fourth, he files amici curiae (friend of the court) briefs as a third party, especially when the Supreme Court requests his opinion on important constitutional and statutory issues.

Since he is the only lawyer to have an office at the Supreme Court, it is little surprise that the solicitor general is not only the most frequent litigator before the Court; his success rates are among the highest as well. Whereas the Court grants less than 5 percent of all discretionary appeals (writs of certiorari), it accepts over 60 percent of the solicitor general's appeals as a direct or third party. As a litigant or amicus curiae at the full review stage, the solicitor general wins more frequently than other litigants.

Several reasons have been offered to explain this success. First, the Solicitor General's Office is a special kind of repeat player. The office has a small attrition rate and unparalleled expertise. Second, unlike many other parties, the solicitor general is not constrained by as many of the financial pressures other litigants face. The office can usually afford many of the start-up costs of litigation and can continue a lengthy appeal process. Third, the office generally enjoys an excellent reputation with the Court, as the office has the country's most talented lawyers and is well respected for the quality of briefs filed and the presentation of oral arguments. The solicitor general understands the internal dynamics of Supreme Court decision-making and knows which arguments to forward and which will fall on deaf ears. As a general rule, the office chooses the cases it wishes to appeal, weighing its chances of winning before the Court. Of course, this is not possible in cases where the Court invites the solicitor general to file an amicus curiae brief.

Solicitor General William Mitchell, 1925. The solicitor general is the fourth-highest-ranking lawyer in the United States and the official representative of the executive branch before the Supreme Court. (Library of Congress)

Perhaps the most important reason for the solicitor general's success results from the special relationship between the executive and judicial branches. The framers intended to create a harmonious relationship between the Court and the chief executive to offset the most powerful branch, Congress. As presidential appointees, the solicitor general and the Court's justices often represent the prerogatives of the chief executive.

Many Court watchers question whether the Solicitor General's Office has an undue influence over the Supreme Court. This issue will continue to be debated, but it is important to understand the office's functions and role before the nation's high court.

John R. Hermann

See also: Attorney General; Department of Justice.

FURTHER READING

Caplan, Lincoln. The Tenth Justice. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1987.

Salokar, Rebecca Mae. The Solicitor General: The Politics of Law. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1992.

Souter, David H. (b. 1939)

When David H. Souter was named in 1990 by the first President George Bush to succeed Justice William J. Brennan Jr. on the U.S. Supreme Court, there was alarm in some quarters that a leading liberal jurist would be replaced by a staunch conservative.

There was no doubt that Souter was bright. He was Phi Beta Kappa at Harvard, had been a Rhodes Scholar, and graduated from Harvard Law School. He served as assistant and deputy attorney general in New Hampshire and was appointed state attorney general (serving 1976–1978), succeeding his mentor, Warren Rudman, who went on to be U.S. senator. Souter was attorney general under an ultraconservative governor and argued a conservative position before the courts. Then he served on the state's Superior Court (1978–1983) and Supreme Court (1983–1990). As a New Hampshire judge, he was known for his strict construction of the Constitution. Souter was briefly on the U.S. Court of Appeals (1990) before being nominated for the U.S. Supreme Court. (Another of his backers was John Sununu, former New Hampshire governor and President Bush's White House chief of staff.)

Souter was called a "stealth candidate." Unlike the rejected Supreme Court nominee Robert Bork, Souter had left no "paper trail." He was an enigma. Some, like the National Organization for Women, feared the worst and campaigned against his confirmation, believing he might be a likely vote to overturn Roe v. Wade. (He refused to tell the Senate Judiciary Committee how he might vote on issues likely to come before the Supreme Court.) Others were suspicious that he was cloistered from the hurly-burly world. (This fiftyish bachelor still lived in his parents' rural home.) Perhaps all that could be deduced was that he was a workaholic.

Souter was comfortably confirmed. Initially regarded as a conservative, he has emerged as a member of the Court's moderate bloc. In his first year on the Court, he voted 90 percent of the time with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Justices Souter, O'Connor, and Anthony M. Kennedy were the swing votes, positioned between Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas and the Court's moderate left wing of Justices John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen G. Breyer. An example of the trio's centrist balancing occurred in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), in which they upheld the state's restrictions on abortion but would not condone overruling Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). Justices O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter felt that states could not impose any "undue burden" on a woman's decision to obtain an abortion prior to viability. In 2000 the three joined in the seven–two decision upholding the Miranda rule in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000). Stare decisis (pronounced STAR-ry de-SI-sis), or precedent, was to be followed.

In Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), Justice Souter cast the deciding vote to uphold Health and Human Services regulations preventing federal funds for programs in which abortion was a method of family planning.

However, over time Justice Souter has moved away from Justices O'Connor and Kennedy to form a fourth vote in the minority (with Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer) in race-based reapportionment that created majority-minority districts, for example, in Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993); in gun control cases; and in the controversial Bush v. Gore decision, 531 U.S. 98 (2000), about the 2000 presidential election. Justice Souter votes approximately 70 percent of the time with Justice Stevens and about 80 percent with Justices Breyer and Ginsburg. In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000), he dissented from the decision that the Scouts not be required to accept gay scoutmasters. He authored the opinion in Board of Education v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687 (1994), striking down creation of a separate school district in New York state composed exclusively of members of a particular religious community.

Justice Souter was in the majority in the 1991 Johnson Controls case (International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW v. Johnson Controls, Inc., 499 U.S. 187), which barred employers from excluding fertile employees from jobs that might harm fetuses they might conceive. He was the lone dissent in National Endowment for the Arts v. Findley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998), disagreeing that Congress could constrain the NEA's ability to fund certain categories of artistic expression. In his view, Congress may not use its power of the purse to suppress offensive ideas.

Justice Souter has emerged as a defender of juries and an opponent of cameras in the courtroom. He is a pragmatic jurist. He is willing to respect traditional community values but is highly suspicious of governmental intrusion on personal rights.

Martin Gruberg

See also: Bush, George H. W.; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey.

FURTHER READING

Garrow, David J. "Justice Souter: A Surprising Kind of Conservative." New York Times Magazine, September 6, 1994, 36.

Perry, Barbara A. "The Supremes": Essays on the Current Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: P. Lang, 1999.

Special-Needs Doctrine

See Fourth Amendment

Speedy Trial, Right to

The right to a speedy trial is one of the most fundamental liberties protected by the U.S. Constitution. The right is established by the Sixth Amendment, which provides a check on government powers that relate to government's capacity to accuse an individual of violating the law, initiate court proceedings, or incarcerate an accused individual. According to the Sixth Amendment, an accused person has the right to legal counsel, notification and delineation of charges, a speedy and public trial, an impartial jury, the opportunity to confront the accusers, and the obligatory acquisition by subpoena of favorable witnesses. The accused also has the right to have the trial conducted in the geographical area where the crime occurred.

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment allowed the U.S. Supreme Court to extend the rights of the Sixth Amendment to apply in state criminal proceedings. The Speedy Trial Act of 1974 established time limits for completing the steps associated with a federal criminal prosecution. Whether or not the accused is represented by an attorney at arraignment (when charges are made), the right to a speedy trial by jury is to be preserved unless the defendant decides to waive that right. A judge should not assume that this right has been waived if the accused does not initiate a discussion about it. A judge may advise the defendant of the right to a speedy trial by letter or oral communication. It is not required that a written waiver of a speedy trial by jury be signed by the accused, but it is a preferred practice.

The right to a speedy trial protects the accused from a lengthy period of incarceration prior to trial, minimizes the anxiety and stress for the accused, and reduces the possibility of losing witnesses as time progresses, as well as the possibility of critical evidence becoming contaminated or lost. Delays may also hinder rehabilitation efforts for the accused. The right to a speedy trial is available not only to the accused but also to the prosecution. Both are entitled to the disposition of a case without unnecessary delays that may hinder the administration of justice. If the accused is in jail, a speedy trial minimizes the public cost for sustenance. If the accused is out on bail, a speedy trial reduces the opportunity for the commitment of other crimes by the defendant, as well as the chance of jumping bail.

Although a speedy trial protects the rights of the accused, delays are sometimes necessary. If so, an inquiry should be convened to consider the length of delay, the reason for delay, any harm caused to the defendant by a delay, and whether the defendant waived the right to a speedy trial. Situations in which a delay is warranted include when an important witness is unavailable or when the court schedule is too full. If it is determined that a defendant has been denied the right to a speedy trial, the indictment is dismissed. However, if the delay was devised by the defense to give an unfair advantage to the defendant, it will most likely be construed as a waiver by the accused of the right to a speedy trial.

Alvin K. Benson

See also: Arraignment; Bail, Right to; Fundamental Rights; Right of Confrontation; Right to Counsel; Subpoena; Trial by Jury.

FURTHER READING

Arnest, Lauren Krohn. Children, Young Adults, and the Law. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 1998.

Garner, Bryan A. Black's Law Dictionary. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Gifis, Steven H. Dictionary of Legal Terms: A Simplified Guide to the Language of Law. 3d ed. Hauppauge, NY: Barron's Educational Series, 1998.

Standing

Before the U.S. Supreme Court will agree to accept a case, the petitioners must convince the justices that they have standing—that is, that they are the appropriate persons to bring the suit and that they have suffered or will suffer actual injury unless the Court intervenes. Standing cases have coalesced around several key civil liberties issues: economic freedoms, the right to protest and other First Amendment freedoms, and environmental protection.

In the area of economic freedoms, the Supreme Court for many years did not allow individuals to claim standing to challenge taxes. However, the Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren, known for safeguarding civil liberties, did allow limited standing in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968). In this case the Court extended standing to individuals who were challenging tax appropriations to private religious schools on First Amendment Establishment Clause grounds.

The more conservative Warren E. Burger Court sought to limit the expansion of civil liberties granted by the Flast decision. In United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166 (1974), the Court denied standing to a taxpayer who sought to challenge the exemption given to the Central Intelligence Agency regarding public disclosure of funding. In a second case, the Burger Court justices denied standing to taxpayers who challenged a transfer of public property to a Christian college.

With respect to the right to protest, the Warren Court held in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), that parents had standing to challenge a school's authority to regulate the wearing of black armbands to protest the Vietnam War. The Warren Court also broadened standing for citizens in the area of free speech in Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 499 (1965). Here the Court allowed judges to declare unconstitutional laws that have a "chilling effect" on free speech. This case led to a deluge of challenges that threatened state laws against pornography, obscenity, and vagrancy. Wanting to stop this burgeoning caseload, the Burger Court replaced the lenient chilling-effect standard with a more stringent "irreparable injury" standard that forced citizens to demonstrate that they were being harassed by the state.

As for environmental protections, the Burger Court received mixed reviews from civil libertarians. The justices denied standing to a group protesting the building of a ski resort in a national park. However, they granted standing to students who opposed a freight surcharge on recycled goods in United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures, 412 U.S. 669 (1973), just one year later. The Court under William H. Rehnquist, though, limited the standing precedent established in that decision, nicknamed SCRAP. In Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992), the Rehnquist Court denied standing to environmentalists who feared that a foreign building project would threaten endangered wildlife.

In conclusion, the Supreme Court has indicated that individuals must be the appropriate parties to the case or controversy and must have suffered an actual injury. In the areas of economic freedoms, First Amendment freedoms such as the right to protest, and environmental concerns, more liberal Courts have been willing to grant standing, whereas conservative justices tend to limit individuals' access to the Court.

Lori M. Maxwell

See also: Judicial Review; Ripeness.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J. The Judicial Process. 7th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America. 4th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

O'Brien, David. Constitutional Law and Politics: Civil Rights and Civil Liberties. Vol. 2. 5th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2002.

Perry, H. W. Deciding to Decide: Agenda Setting in the United States Supreme Court. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1991.

Stanley v. Georgia (1969)

The U.S. Supreme Court in Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), declared that individuals have a right under the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution to possess sexually obscene material in the privacy of their own home. Prior to Stanley, the Court had ruled in decisions later reaffirmed in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), that obscene material was not protected as free speech by the First Amendment, so cities or states could outlaw its sale and distribution.

In Stanley, police searching a man's home found obscene films. He was arrested and convicted for violation of a Georgia statute that outlawed the possession of obscene material. He appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which overturned his conviction. The Court noted that despite the government's interest in outlawing the public distribution of obscene material, those justifications did not apply to mere private possession in the home. Moreover, any such justifications were outweighed by the individual's interest in being free from unwanted governmental intrusions into one's privacy, especially one's private thoughts in the privacy of one's own home. The Court's ruling is perhaps best summed up by this quotation from the decision: "If the first amendment means anything, it means that a state has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch."

The Supreme Court, however, has never extended the ruling in Stanley v. Georgia to include a right to possess other materials in the privacy of one's home. For example, the Court in Stanley declared its ruling would not extend to drugs, firearms, or stolen goods. In Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990), the Court declined to extend Stanley and instead announced there was no First Amendment right to possess child pornography in one's home. In short, the Stanley ruling regarding when illegal conduct is protected in the privacy of one's home currently applies exclusively to the possession of obscene material portraying adult participants.

Rick A. Swanson

See also: Obscenity; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Sullivan, Kathleen, and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 14th ed. New York: Foundation, 2001.

State Action

"State action" refers to governmental legislation or conduct done "under the color" of law. The "state" can refer to any level of government, from the federal level to the states to local governmental entities. For purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, "state" obviously refers to any one of the fifty states and each of their subunits of government (counties, cities, villages, special districts, boards of education, and so on). A more difficult issue is whether certain actions of private individuals or entities are such that their conduct can be "under the color of law" as well and thus constitute "state action."

The Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution guarantees that "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Fundamental to realizing the reach of the Fourteenth Amendment is the question, who is the state? The obvious answer is the government itself. But what about institutions that are fundamental to the daily lives of citizens and whose practices are regulated by the government? Do they, in effect, act with the color of authority to make them the state? Can the Fourteenth Amendment reach private actors who discriminate?

Section 5 of the amendment authorizes Congress to enforce it with "appropriate legislation." Using this clause, Congress has sought to provide remedial measures to individuals denied equal protection at the hand of the state. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 and the Civil Rights Act of 1875 sought to end racial discrimination in private contractual arrangements and in places of public accommodation. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), ruled eight–one that the enforcement provision of the Fourteenth Amendment barred only discrimination that was a result of state action; the justices found the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional. This ruling, in conjunction with Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), gave rise to the doctrine of separate-but-equal facilities for blacks and whites.

It was not until the post–World War II era that the Court used the state-action doctrine to eliminate racial discrimination. In Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948), the Court ruled that racially restrictive covenants in land deeds violated the Fourteenth Amendment. A white couple living in Saint Louis, Missouri, went to court to enforce a racially restrictive covenant against a black couple who wanted to purchase a home in an otherwise all-white neighborhood. The Court ruled that because the covenant required the state to enforce it, the covenant was "under the color" of the law and therefore violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Shelley v. Kraemer was the first of many cases in which the Court used the state-action principle to reach seemingly private discrimination. The Court used the doctrine to regulate whites-only restaurants, city parks, prisons, housing, and ultimately the very public facility of elementary schools in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), in which the Court ended segregation in the Topeka, Kansas, public schools.

Reminiscent of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was a law Congress enacted to end racial discrimination in places of public accommodation. Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 extended the reach of the Fourteenth Amendment to employment and public facilities. In addition, in Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409 (1968), the Court ruled that the Civil Rights Act of 1866 was valid, giving support to the power of Congress to prohibit "racial discrimination in the making and enforcement of private contracts."

The scope of the doctrine of state action evolved as the Court personnel changed. In Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163 (1972), the Supreme Court held that a facility that refused to serve blacks could not be reached by the Fourteenth Amendment merely because its liquor license was granted by the state. The majority reasoned that the state regulated and licensed numerous businesses and that the act of licensing alone did not create the "color of state law" or a meshed relationship that triggered the state-action doctrine. Rulings such as Moose Lodge allowed many private activities to remain beyond the reach of Fourteenth Amendment scrutiny. Other rulings, however, such as race-based challenges in the selection of juries, indicated that the doctrine of state action could still be used to combat discrimination. In Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), the Court found that the use of peremptory challenges (challenges without cause) to eliminate blacks from a jury pool were subject to review if the use of challenges seemed to be on the basis of race alone.

Justice John Marshall Harlan said in his dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson, "The Constitution is color blind." The history of the doctrine of state action illustrates that was not always the case.

Priscilla H. M. Zotti

See also: Bill of Rights; Fourteenth Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Hyman, Harold, and William Wiecek. Equal Justice Under the Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. New York: Harper and Row, 1982.

Kull, Andrew. The Color Blind Constitution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.

State Bills of Rights

In the federal system of government in the United States, the nation exists under fifty-one constitutions, one national document and one for each state. The U.S. Constitution and separate state constitutions, both designed to create governments and set out the scope of their powers, share many features, including the protection of individual rights. The U.S. Constitution does this through the Bill of Rights, made up of the first ten amendments to the Constitution; these are designed to protect individual rights from infringement by the national government. The state constitutions contain similar bills of rights (often referred to as "declarations of rights") to protect individual rights from infringement by the state government.

In May 1776, the Second Continental Congress adopted a resolution urging the various colonies to set up their own governments. Congress provided no direction, but common experiences and historical tradition resulted in similarities among the state constitutions ultimately adopted to construct these governments. Virginia was the first colony to give effect to the resolution, ratifying a constitution that set forth both a framework for a new state government as well as a separate declaration of rights for its citizens. The provisions of the Virginia Declaration of Rights drew from early English documents that addressed rights of citizens, including the Magna Carta, the Petition of Right, and the English Bill of Rights, as well as colonial charters and legislation. Over time, similar protections were adopted by other colonies and eventually all states, generally appearing as the initial article of the state constitution, a place of prominence evidencing their importance in the state constitutional system. These declarations had many similarities, as drafters often used language of other states' provisions as a template for their own protections.

State constitutions with bills of rights predated the ratification of the federal Bill of Rights in 1791. Consequently, until these federal protections took effect, the state charters provided the only explicit protections of citizens' rights and liberties in the governmental system. Indeed, many framers of the national Constitution argued against the inclusion of a bill of rights in that document, recognizing that state constitutional guarantees would serve as the primary protections of citizens' rights because they applied against the government that would have the most influence on everyday life—the individual states.

After the push for inclusion of a bill of rights in the U.S. Constitution to provide the same guarantees against the federal government that citizens had against their state governments, the First Congress, at the insistence of James Madison, began considering amendments to the Constitution setting out rights of the citizens. The overwhelming majority of provisions considered came from states' suggestions, and thus the proposed new amendments were heavily influenced by the protections and language in existing state bills of rights. Except for the retained rights of the people protected under the Ninth Amendment, all of the rights protected in the first ten amendments to the Constitution were taken from one or more of the state constitutions.

Although the rights protected in a state's bill of rights today in large part mirror those protected in the federal Bill of Rights and other state constitutions, the specific language of a state provision often differs from the federal language and the language of other state constitutions. For example, the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution notes, "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging freedom of speech." Some state bills of rights contain language that is substantially similar; others, although protecting the same fundamental right, contain very different language. For instance, Article I, Section 4 of the Hawaii constitution mirrors the federal protection, providing, "No law shall be enacted . . . abridging freedom of speech." However, Article II, Section 6 of the Arizona constitution provides, "Every person may freely speak, write and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right." Beyond language differences, many state bills of rights protect certain rights not explicitly protected in the federal Bill of Rights. For example, eleven states contain specific privacy protections not contained in the federal document.

One major difference between state bills of rights and the federal Bill of Rights is the greater frequency of amendments to the state bills of rights. The federal Bill of Rights has never been amended since its ratification in 1791 (there have been constitutional amendments), whereas most state bills of rights have been subjected to numerous amendments. Often these amendments modify the language of the state provisions to make the wording more consistent with the language of the federal counterparts.

Since the U.S. Supreme Court's application of most of the federal Bill of Rights to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment (in a process called "selective incorporation"), these federal provisions, not provisions in the state bills of rights, have served as the primary protections of individual rights. There has been a movement since the early 1970s to give more recognition to state-based rights and use state provisions to provide more expansive protections than guaranteed under the federal Bill of Rights. These state constitutional decisions often have been in issue areas in which the U.S. Supreme Court has taken a conservative turn and modified or reversed earlier holdings. For example, numerous state supreme courts have used their state constitutions to recognize greater protections in search and seizure in response to conservative decisions of the Supreme Court carving out exceptions to Fourth Amendment protections. However, more often than not, state-court interpretation of state bills of rights has followed the U.S. Supreme Court's interpretation of the analogous federal provisions, even in the face of significant differences in constitutional language.

James N. G. Cauthen

See also: Bill of Rights; Federalism; Madison, James; State Constitutional Rights; Virginia Declaration of Rights.

FURTHER READING

Friesen, Jennifer. State Constitutional Law: Litigating Individual Claims, Rights, and Defenses. 2d ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1996.

Schwartz, Bernard. The Great Rights of Mankind: The History of the American Bill of Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Tarr, G. Alan. Understanding State Constitutions. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.

State Constitutional Rights

In the federal system used in the United States, each of the fifty states was created and exercises powers under a constitution. Like the federal Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution, these state constitutions have their own provisions protecting individual liberties from infringement by the state governments. During the early years of the country when states exercised significantly more governmental power than the national government, these state constitutional rights provided the primary protections of individual rights against governmental abuse. However, with the incorporation movement beginning in the early 1900s, through which the U.S. Supreme Court used the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to apply most of the provisions of the federal Bill of Rights to limit actions by the state governments, the significance of state constitutional rights has diminished, although a movement began in the 1970s toward greater reliance on state constitutional rights to protect individual liberties.

State constitutions guarantee individual liberties from infringement by the state government, generally through a declaration of rights included as a separate article in the state constitution. The rights guaranteed in these articles for the most part mirror those guaranteed in the federal Bill of Rights, not because they are taken from the federal document but because the drafters of the Bill of Rights relied heavily on previously adopted state constitutions to construct the federal guarantees. Except for the retained rights of the people protected under the Ninth Amendment, all of the rights protected in the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution were taken from one or more of the state constitutions. As a result, the state constitutions guarantee such rights as freedom of speech, freedom of the press, free exercise of religion, and protections afforded the criminally accused. However, the specific language of state provisions protecting the same right covered by the federal Bill of Rights often differs from the federal language and the language of other state constitutions. In addition, there are some rights guaranteed under state constitutions that are not explicitly included in the federal Bill of Rights. For instance, many state constitutions include a specific right of privacy.

The incorporation movement that began in the early 1900s increased federal dominance in civil liberties litigation and served to retard the historical participation of state courts in constitutional decision-making using state-based rights. The period of incorporation generally led to broad, national rights through the 1960s, but with a change in membership on the U.S. Supreme Court and under the leadership of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, the decision-making in civil liberties cases became significantly more conservative, retreating from the Earl Warren Court's more expansive view of the federal Bill of Rights. Since the early 1970s, and in reaction to this conservative trend, state courts have increased their use of state constitutions to resolve constitutional law claims, a period that has been referred to as the "new judicial federalism." Litigants began to seek refuge in state constitutions, arguing that state courts should reassert their historical function and develop an independent body of state constitutional law, as opposed to consistently relying on the federal Bill of Rights to resolve civil liberties claims. A significant boost to this movement came from Justice William J. Brennan Jr., who argued in a law review article that state courts interpreting their state constitutions should not blindly follow federal decisions interpreting the analogous provisions of the Bill of Rights.

As the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized, state courts are the final arbiters of their state constitutional law. Consequently, a state court's interpretation of state constitutional rights will not be reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court, even though the same right may be included in the federal Bill of Rights. In interpreting state constitutional rights, state courts may choose to interpret the state provisions more expansively than the U.S. Supreme Court interprets the analogous provisions of the federal Bill of Rights.

The increase of state constitutional decision-making in recent years has resulted in more decisions expanding rights under state constitutions beyond the levels afforded under the federal Bill of Rights. For example, although the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that a private shopping center owner could prohibit free speech activities on its premises consistent with the First Amendment of the federal Bill of Rights, numerous state courts have found that such free speech activities are protected under the analogous provisions of their state constitutions. In addition, many state supreme courts have used their state constitutions to expand rights of the criminally accused, especially in areas in which the U.S. Supreme Court has modified or overturned earlier decisions. In these cases, state courts, through their constitutions, may be restoring a right previously recognized under the federal Bill of Rights.

State court expansion of rights beyond federal levels is not only in reaction to U.S. Supreme Court decisions. For example, numerous state supreme courts have found that their citizens are entitled to jury trials in more types of cases than they are under the federal Bill of Rights, decisions not reached in response to a decision of the U.S. Supreme Court retracting rights. In the end, however, most state court decisions interpreting state constitutional rights have generally chosen to follow the U.S. Supreme Court's interpretation of the analogous provision in the federal Bill of Rights.

James N. G. Cauthen

See also: Bill of Rights; Incorporation Doctrine; State Bills of Rights.

FURTHER READING

Brennan, William J. "State Constitutions and the Protections of Individual Rights." Harvard Law Review 90, 2 (1977): 489–504.

Friesen, Jennifer. State Constitutional Law: Litigating Individual Claims, Rights, and Defenses. 2d ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1996.

Latzer, Barry. State Constitutions and Criminal Justice. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1991.

Tarr, G. Alan. Understanding State Constitutions. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.

State Courts

The fifty states in the United States have unique and independent court systems. As in the federal system, each of the fifty states has its own constitution that sets forth the powers and authority of its trial and appellate courts. Whereas the federal courts hear cases that involve the federal government as a party, that involve issues of "diversity" (cases in which a person from one state sues a person from another state for more than $50,000), or that constitute "federal questions" (related to U.S. statutes or the Constitution), state courts deal with issues of state law and state policies. Since state laws differ, the jurisdictions, powers, policy-making abilities, and rulings of each state court also differ.

Although the U.S. Supreme Court receives a majority of public and media attention, decisions by state jurists have a far greater immediate impact on public policy. The influence of state courts stems from three factors. First, a vast majority of all criminal violations are violations of state law, and thus decisions are rendered by the state courts. For instance, the federal courts in the early 1990s heard approximately 1 million cases each year, but the state courts combined decided well over 100 million cases. Numerically, most of the country's legal business is litigated in state courts. Second, state courts are most likely the final arbiters of any given case. Although issues raising federal constitutional questions can be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court following a ruling in the state's highest court, cases raising only issues of state law or the state constitution cannot be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. As such, the highest appellate court within each state is the final arbiter on all issues relating to state law and the state constitution. Moreover, even cases containing federal constitutional questions are rarely heard by the U.S. Supreme Court. Indeed, the Court receives 7,000–8,000 case petitions annually but grants certiorari to (accepts) only 75–100.

Finally, interest groups and other national organizations have used the differences in the state court systems to engage in a process of choosing the court system most likely to result in a desired outcome. Interest groups, for example, might consider the ideological leanings of state court members as well as whether the judges are elected and the timing of elections before bringing lawsuits. This process of "forum shopping" has resulted in numerous liberal decisions at the state level that the current conservative U.S. Supreme Court most likely would not have rendered.

STATE COURT ORGANIZATION

Although the structure of the court systems differ, some general similarities emerge. Cases usually start in trial courts of either general or limited jurisdiction. Trial courts of general jurisdiction typically deal with the most serious criminal violations (those classified as felonies) and the largest civil suits. General jurisdiction courts are considered courts of record in which clerks maintain proceedings on cases. In all states, judges presiding over general jurisdiction courts are required to have law degrees and exhibit a degree of professionalism lacking in limited jurisdiction courts. Indeed, in many states, general jurisdiction courts can retry cases on appeal from courts of limited jurisdiction.

Trial courts of limited jurisdiction, although less professional, poorly staffed, and often using part-time judges or judges with no formal legal training, deal with a bulk of litigation in the United States. In fact, about 90 percent of all cases originate in trial courts of limited jurisdiction. These cases deal most often with less serious crimes like infractions and misdemeanors as well as civil lawsuits involving smaller sums of moneys, usually less than a few thousand dollars. In addition, limited jurisdiction courts can be highly specialized, like traffic court, small claims court, or juvenile crime court. Typically, limited jurisdiction courts are not courts of record; that is, cases are handled informally with no written record of the proceedings kept. In some states, limited jurisdiction courts do not even meet in courthouses, instead conducting business in private homes, restaurants, and grocery stores. As noted, appeals from limited jurisdiction courts usually go to general jurisdiction courts.

Following a ruling by a general jurisdiction court, a case can be appealed to a state appellate court. The state's highest appeals court is usually called the supreme court. Before the supreme court, however, most states have intermediate courts of appeals. Most cases end at the intermediate appellate court, reaching the state supreme court only if the state supreme court, under its discretionary jurisdiction, decides to hear a case, or if it is required to hear a case because of the severity of the charges and punishment (death penalty and life imprisonment).

RECRUITMENT METHODS

In comparison to the relatively uncomplicated system for the selection of federal court judges (presidential nomination and Senate confirmation), there are five types of selection methods used for judges on state courts: partisan election, nonpartisan election, selection by governor, selection by state legislature, and merit system. The two electoral systems require judicial candidates to raise money and campaign, as is similarly required of other politicians. Jurists selected under the merit system are initially appointed by the governor but then face retention elections. Finally, jurists can be appointed by either the governor or the state legislature. Most state judges do not have life tenure.

Given the political pressures potentially inherent in electoral recruitment methods, the lack of life tenure for state court jurists, and the ability of state courts to engage in significant policy-making, the decision-making practices of state court jurists have garnered much attention. In specific, research tends to indicate elected state court judges render more conservative rulings in criminal justice cases than do appointed justices, and they are most conservative just before an election. These findings hold among highly liberal state courts as well. Moreover, in some states elected judges must raise money and thus may be influenced by campaign contributions. Research reveals judicial races have become increasingly expensive. For instance, during the 2000 elections, judicial candidates for state supreme courts alone spent over $45 million, representing a full 61 percent increase from the 1998 election cycle. In addition, some evidence suggests state court judges tend to rule more consistently with the policy desires of campaign contributors. As long as state courts remain important in the creation and implementation of public policy, scholars will continue to scrutinize methods of state judicial selection and retention.

Madhavi McCall

See also: Federalism; State Constitutional Rights.

FURTHER READING

Carp, Robert, and Ronald Stidham. Judicial Process in America. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Glick, Henry. Courts, Politics, and Justice. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1993.

Lewis, Neil. "Gifts in State Judicial Races Are Up Sharply." New York Times, February 14, 2002, A2.

McCall, Madhavi. "Buying Justice in Texas: The Influence of Campaign Contributions on the Voting Behavior of Texas Supreme Court Justices." American Review of Politics 22, 2 (Fall 2001): 349–73.

Statute of Limitations

A statute of limitations specifies a time limit for filing a civil or criminal action. These statutes prevent civil lawsuits and criminal prosecutions in which the lapse of time, death of witnesses, failure of memory, and destruction of physical evidence may obscure the facts. They serve to preserve the individual's right to due process under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

Three questions arise when deciding if a statute of limitations bars (prohibits) a particular action. First, what is the statutory time limit for the specific action? Second, when does the time limit begin to run? Third, has either party done anything to extend the time for filing the action?

CIVIL ACTIONS

Each state has its own statutes of limitations, as does the federal government. The specific time limits for filing claims will vary, but the following is a general framework applicable to civil suits.

- Ten years: Each state usually has a statute of limitations for those actions not otherwise covered by a specific statute. Often this statute may be the longest among the statutes of limitations. Actions on any writing or calling for the payment of money or property and actions on any covenant or warranty contained in a deed must be brought within this time. The ten-year statute also cuts off the right to recover on any judgment or its revival and actions to recover land. Actions against architects, engineers, or contractors to recover damages for personal injury or property damages arising out of defective or unsafe conditions of any property improvement must be brought within ten years of the completion of the improvement.
- Five years: Actions for fraud, damage to person or property, actions for trespass to real estate, and all actions upon contracts must be brought within five years.
- Four years: Contracts for sale under the Uniform Commercial Code must be brought within four years.
- Three years: Actions for wrongful death and actions against a public official for liability for an act in an official capacity must be brought within three years.
- Two years: Actions for personal injuries against health care providers; for certain harms to person or reputation, such as libel, slander, assault, battery, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution; or for payment of minimum wages or overtime compensation must be brought within two years.
- Six months: Actions that have a statute of limitations as short as six months include bulk sales actions under the Uniform Commercial Code.

The second issue in analyzing a statute of limitations for a specific action is to determine the point at which the prescribed statute of limitations begins to run. This is specified by some statutes. Court decisions determine when others start to run. Typically, a statute begins to run either when the wrongful event occurs, when the wrongful event is discovered, or when the last item of damage resulting from the wrong may be ascertained.

The third issue in analyzing a statute of limitations for a specific case is to determine whether any condition of the plaintiff or defendant may extend ("toll") the statute. For instance, when the person having a cause of action is a child, insane, or imprisoned for less than life, the statute does not begin to run (it is tolled) until the disability has been removed. Fraud or absence of the potential defendant from the state also extends the operation of the statute until, respectively, the fraud is discovered or the absent person returns.

CRIMINAL ACTIONS

Similarly, the criminal code in the several states sets the time within which the prosecution must bring a criminal charge. Murder and the most serious felonies often have no statute of limitations and may be filed at any time. Typical statutes for other felonies are three years, whereas misdemeanors must be filed within one year, and minor offenses within six months.

As in civil cases, the first task is to determine the time length provided in the criminal statute and then when the statute begins to run. Quite often, the criminal statute specifies when the statute begins to run. Other times this has been specified by judicial decision.

Statutes of limitations may be extended by the amount of time defendants are absent from the state but for no more than three years. Statutes do not run while defendants are concealing themselves from justice within or outside the state.

Patrick K. Roberts

See also: Due Process of Law.

FURTHER READING

Martindale-Hubbell Law Digest 2003. New Providence, NH: Martindale Hubbell, 2003.

Stevens, John Paul (b. 1920)

John Paul Stevens was appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court by President Gerald R. Ford in 1975 to replace retiring Justice William O. Douglas. Court watchers initially thought Stevens would be a moderate, but he gradually become one of the Court's most liberal members during the 1990s after William H. Rehnquist became chief justice in 1986. Justice Stevens consistently supported the rights of women and civil rights issues and became an opponent of the death penalty later in his tenure on the Court.

Born in Chicago, Stevens was the youngest of four sons of Ernest and Elizabeth Stevens. The Stevens children grew up near the University of Chicago around parents who had amassed significant wealth in the hotel and insurance business, with the family at one time owning what is now the Hilton Hotel, located on Michigan Avenue. After attending a preparatory school, young John graduated magna cum laude and first in his class from the University of Chicago in 1941. He married Elizabeth Jane Sheeran a year later, and the marriage lasted until their divorce in 1979.

Stevens served in the Navy from 1942 to 1945, engaged in efforts to intercept and break Japanese code. After the war, he graduated in 1947 from Northwestern University Law School, again magna cum laude and first in his class while also editing the law review. From law school he went on to clerk for Supreme Court Justice Wiley B. Rutledge. In 1949, Stevens began practicing with the firm of Poppenhusen, Johnston, Thompson, and Raymond where he developed expertise in antitrust law. In 1951 he was associate counsel for a U.S. House of Representatives committee studying monopoly power, and he subsequently became a partner in his own Chicago law firm.

Because of his superb legal skills and his highly respected integrity, the Illinois Supreme Court in 1969 named him to be chief counsel to a commission studying judicial misconduct in the state. His work there brought Stevens significant exposure, and soon U.S. Senator Charles Percy (R-IL) contacted him about his interest in serving on the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1970, President Richard M. Nixon nominated Stevens to serve on that court, and from then until 1975 he authored nearly 200 opinions, all noted for their scholarship, style, and political moderation. His swift confirmation to the Supreme Court—three days of hearings and only thirteen days after being nominated—came on a 98-0 Senate vote.

In his first year on the bench, Justice Stevens voted with Justices Thurgood Marshall and William J. Brennan Jr. 60 percent of the time. Women's and civil liberty groups were initially concerned about how Justice Stevens would vote, but quickly were assured when he dissented in General Electric Co. v. Gilbert, 429 U.S. 125 (1976), in which the majority had held that the exclusion of pregnancy from health insurance was not discrimination. He also supported women's rights in Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976), in which the Court struck down different minimum drinking ages for men and women, and he quickly became a supporter of abortion rights, voting to support a woman's right to choose in cases such as Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), and Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992).

Initially, Justice Stevens was not a supporter of affirmative action, voting against the use of racial preferences in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978), and Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448 (1980), but beginning in the early 1990s, with Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 497 U.S. 547 (1990), he shifted course and became a supporter of such programs.

In First Amendment jurisprudence, Justice Stevens has produced a mixed record. He dissented from both Supreme Court decisions that upheld flag burning as a free speech right, and in Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), he wrote the majority opinion that upheld government decency laws that prevented broadcast of George Carlin's "seven dirty words" comedy skit. Stevens has also consistently supported campaign finance reform over the objection of First Amendment advocates, writing, for example, the majority opinion in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 124 S. Ct. 619 (2003), upholding the McCain-Feingold Act. He has consistently argued that money is not speech and it can be regulated. In other First Amendment areas, however, Stevens has supported commercial free speech rights and the rights of individuals to practice their religion.

In the course of his tenure, it appeared Justice Stevens moved from being moderately liberal to perhaps the most liberal member of the Court. For example, he has become increasingly opposed to the death penalty, and he has become more supportive of defendants' rights. Yet the "liberal" label is somewhat misleading: Perhaps it is more accurate to note that the departure of Justices Brennan and Marshall, the appointment of more conservative and moderate justices, and the ascension of Rehnquist to chief justice all brought increasing conservatism to the Court. By sheer longevity and shift in the Court's makeup, Stevens now seems to be the most liberal justice on the Court.

David Schultz

See also: Brennan, William J., Jr.; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey.

FURTHER READING

Gottlieb, Stephen E. Morality Imposed: The Rehnquist Court and Liberty in America. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Perry, Barbara A. "The Supremes": Essays on the Current Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: P. Lang, 1999.

Stewart, Potter (1915–1985)

Justice Potter Stewart was born in Jackson, Michigan, in 1915, the son of an Ohio Supreme Court justice. The younger Stewart was an excellent student and attended Yale for both his undergraduate work and a law degree, interrupted by a year at Cambridge University. Stewart attended Yale on scholarship and paid his expenses from summer employment at a Cincinnati newspaper. He received his law degree in 1941, and after practicing law in a prestigious New York firm for only a year, he left the firm to join the Navy during World War II.

After the war Stewart was elected to the Cincinnati city council, where he was one of the most vocal accusers of the "Cincinnati Trio," a group of two other council members and a city planning director accused of being Communists. The accusations proved largely without basis (at least as to the council members) and led to an electoral backlash that cost Stewart his seat on the council. After this defeat, President Eisenhower appointed Stewart to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit and, only four years later, nominated him to the Supreme Court during a congressional recess. At forty-three, he was the second-youngest member of the Court since the Civil War. His record on school desegregation as an appellate judge drew the ire of Southern Democrats during his confirmation.

Stewart gained a reputation as an effective writer with a knack for summing up the issues of cases in catchy phrases. His attitude in opposition to judicial activism was clearly on display in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963): "But my views as to the correctness of the Court's decisions in these cases are beside the point here. The point is that the decisions are on the books."

Stewart's civil rights record continued with his appointment to the Supreme Court, and in Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960), Stewart wrote the Court's opinion that a Texas law requiring teachers to divulge associations could not be used to expose membership in groups like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. In United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745 (1966), and Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), Stewart's decisions reflected his earlier philosophy on minority rights: As he wrote in McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964), "It is simply not possible for a state law to be valid under our Constitution which makes the criminality of an act dependent upon the race of the actor."

Stewart was consistently in favor of allowing free exercise of religion, as opposed to restricting it as government establishment, as in school prayer. In Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), Stewart expressed this attitude succinctly: "I cannot see how an 'official religion' is established by letting those who want to say a prayer say it."

Although generally a centrist on criminal justice issues, Stewart displayed a conservative attitude on some evidentiary issues, as in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964). Concerned about the sweeping impact of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), which gave rise to the famous Miranda warnings and other protections, Stewart dissented and argued that the law should make a distinction between when an investigation was under way and when an adversarial relationship was established. Stewart's ruling in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), overturned earlier decisions and determined that warrantless wiretaps violated a defendant's Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. Katz, perhaps Stewart's most notable decision, is laced with these internal contradictions, and it is notable that there were no fewer than four concurrences. Stewart rejected privacy (sparking most of the concurring opinions) as a basis for striking down the government's wiretap. Instead, he supported the principle of "the procedure of antecedent justification . . . that is central to the Fourth Amendment." In other words, Stewart supported placing the burden of proof upon the government to show that someone was committing a crime before it could intrude on the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Perhaps Stewart's most memorable quotation appeared in Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964), a case that established the role of the courts in settling on community standards on pornography: "I shall not today attempt further to define the kinds of material I understand to be embraced within that shorthand description, and perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly doing so. But I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that." Stewart should not be construed as a liberal on privacy issues, however. Only a year following Jacobellis, Stewart dissented in one of the more important cases concerned with the privacy of sexual relations, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). Although Stewart suggested that the Connecticut law banning contraceptives for married couples was "an uncommonly silly law," he did not believe that there was anything unconstitutional about it. He explicitly rejected a constitutional right to privacy: "What provision of the Constitution, then, does make this state law invalid? The Court says it is the right of privacy 'created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees.' With all deference, I can find no such general right of privacy in the Bill of Rights, in any other part of the Constitution, or in any case ever before decided by this Court."

Stewart resigned from the Court in good health in 1981. No doubt he will be remembered as an articulate and quotable justice and as the justice replaced by the first woman on the U.S. Supreme Court (Sandra Day O'Connor). Stewart's incisive decision-making and writing skills will likely remain overshadowed by his moderate positions and ability to provide a quotable decision. He continued to be active as an appellate judge until his death in 1985.

Tim Hundsdorfer

See also: Burger, Warren Earl; Obscenity; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Cushman, Clare. "Potter Stewart." In The Supreme Court Justices: Illustrated Biographies, ed. Clare Cushman, 456–60. Washington: Congressional Quarterly, 1993.

Wilkerson, Howard. "Local Leader Had 'Red Scare.' " Cincinnati Enquirer, May 22, 2002.

Stone v. Graham (1980)

In Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980), the U.S. Supreme Court addressed whether a Kentucky statute that required the posting of a copy of the Ten Commandments on the wall of each public school classroom in the state violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. The inquiry was whether this posting constituted governmental "establishment of religion" prohibited by the First Amendment. The statute required that each posting contain a small notation below the last commandment as follows: "The secular application of the Ten Commandments is clearly seen in its adoption as the fundamental legal code of Western civilization and the common law of the United States." The statute further provided that the required copies be purchased with voluntary contributions to the state treasury.

The Supreme Court issued only a per curiam decision, a procedural device by which the Court simultaneously grants review and reaches the merits of the case without giving the parties the opportunity to file briefs or to argue orally before the Court. The Court then issues a decision without identifying the individual judge who wrote it.

In analyzing whether the Kentucky statute violated the Establishment Clause, the Court used the three-part test from Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971): "First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion . . . ; finally the statute must not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion." The Court struck down the statute, concluding that it served no secular legislative purpose. Kentucky argued that the statute did have such a purpose, citing the legislature's requirement that the purpose be specifically noted at the bottom of each copy of the Ten Commandments. The Supreme Court stated that such "avowed" secular purposes were insufficient to avoid conflict with the First Amendment and that the statute's purpose was "plainly religious in nature."

In reaching its conclusion, the Court focused on several features of the statute. First, the Court concluded that the "Ten Commandments are undeniably a sacred text in the Jewish and Christian faiths, and no legislative recitation of a supposed secular purpose can blind us to that fact." The Court specifically noted that the first part of the Commandments relates specifically to religious duties rather than secular matters. Next, the Court noted that although the Ten Commandments could be permissibly integrated into a school curriculum to advance study, a display had no such purpose except to "induce the schoolchildren to read, meditate upon, perhaps to venerate and obey, the Commandments." Finally, even though the statute provided that the copies were to be financed by private contributions, the Court held that the mere posting of the display "under the auspices of the legislature" constituted the official support that the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment forbids.

Justice William H. Rehnquist dissented, arguing that the Court's summary rejection of a secular purpose had no support beyond its own ipse dixit (a statement that is asserted but not proved). Rather, Justice Rehnquist contended that the Court should have given deference to the secular purpose articulated by the Kentucky legislature and found to have existed by the trial court. Although agreeing with the majority that the Ten Commandments constitute a sacred text, Justice Rehnquist stated that it is "equally undeniable . . . that the Ten Commandments have had a significant impact on the development of the secular legal codes of the Western world." Furthermore, drawing an analogy to constitutionally permissible Sunday-closing laws, Justice Rehnquist argued that "the fact that the asserted secular purpose may overlap with what some may see as a religious objective does not render it unconstitutional."

Since the Stone decision, courts have struggled with the question of whether it is ever permissible to display the Ten Commandments on public property.

Elizabeth M. Rhea

See also: Lemon v. Kurtzman; Ten Commandments, Posting.

FURTHER READING

Cowan, Bradley M. "The Decalogue in the Public Forum: Do Public Displays of the Ten Commandments Violate the Establishment Clause?" Ave Maria Law Review 2 (Spring 2004): 183–211.

Kuntz, Paul G. "The Ten Commandments on Schoolroom Walls? Why Did the Supreme Court Reject the 1978 Kentucky Statute (Stone v. Graham)? Could Such a Law Succeed?" Journal of Law and Public Policy 9 (Fall 1977): 1–36.

Stone, Harlan Fiske (1872–1946)

The son of a New England farm family, Harlan Fiske Stone graduated from Amherst College as a Phi Beta Kappa scholar and a football athlete. After starting his career as a high school teacher and football coach in Massachusetts, he embarked upon a legal career in 1895 by enrolling in Columbia Law School in New York City. Stone graduated and was admitted to the New York bar in 1898. He began his legal career as a law clerk for the prestigious Wall Street law firm Sullivan and Cromwell and at the same time became an instructor of law at Columbia Law School. During the first ten years of his professional career, Stone married his childhood sweetheart, Agnes Harvey, with whom he had two sons, and he continued to teach and produce scholarly publications while conducting a part-time legal practice. From 1905 until 1910, he left academia and became a full-time partner, practicing law with Wilmer, Canfield, and Stone.

From 1910 until 1923, he was a professor at Columbia University, which had lured him to return, and he eventually rose to become the dean of Columbia Law School. In 1924, after Stone had returned to Sullivan and Cromwell and again reached partnership, President Calvin Coolidge appointed him first as U.S. attorney general and then as an associate justice to the U.S. Supreme Court to replace retiring Justice Joseph McKenna. Stone was the first Supreme Court appointee to appear and testify before the U.S. Senate, and on February 5, 1924, the Senate confirmed him by a vote of seventy-one to six. On June 12, 1941, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Stone to lead the Court to replace retired Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes; Stone served until his death in 1946.

JUDICIAL PHILOSOPHY

Stone was a strong advocate of adherence to the doctrine of precedent (stare decisis, pronounced STAR-ry de-SI-sis), insisting that two cases must be decided in the same way if their "material" facts are the same. The reasoning for the doctrine is based upon fairness, rational decision-making, predictability, stability in the law, and efficiency. Adherence to precedent tends to make the law change slowly, a step at a time, incrementally, thus limiting sudden changes of direction or adoption of new doctrines without the aid of significant discourse. According to Stone, "the rule of 'stare decisis' embodies a wise policy because it is often more important that a rule of law be settled rather than it be settled right."

Stone believed that stare decisis created the necessary limiting borders that would curtail judicial power. He stated that the only check on the justices' "exercise of power is their own self-restraint." Stone was acutely aware that the Supreme Court was constitutionally removed from the democratic process, especially because, aside from the appointment and confirmation process, there is little connection between the voters and the Supreme Court.

Activism and restraint refer to opposing views of the deference the Court should show toward the other branches of the government. Judicial restraint holds that the Court should approach its duties fully cognizant that (1) the Court is not an elected body; (2) the other elected branches of the federal government are coequal with the Supreme Court; and (3) the Court lacks institutional capacities enjoyed by the other branches, such as congressional investigative fact-finding commissions or executive oversight resources. A proponent of judicial restraint advocates that the Court must use its power of judicial review to strike down as unconstitutional the laws, policies, and actions of the other branches only when the violations are clear and plain, deferring to the executive and legislative branches in other cases.

In contrast, supporters of activism for the Court would expand its role by rejecting the need to defer to the other branches, especially when the majority voting structures, the representatives, and special interest groups threatened to overwhelm and in some cases undermine fundamental individual rights. Because Stone recognized that judicial restraint would create major gaps and uncertainties in the law, he suggested that the Court adopt the "preferred-position doctrine," a double standard affording economic cases greater deference or lower scrutiny, but subjecting fundamental rights cases (speech, press, and the like) to stricter judicial scrutiny.

Former Attorney General Harlan F. Stone in the office of the Supreme Court of the United States. (Library of Congress)

COMMITMENT TO CIVIL LIBERTIES

In 1938, Stone presented his preferred-position doctrine in his famous footnote four in the opinion in United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144, a case involving the regulation of skim milk. He urged the Court to monitor and overturn laws that disadvantaged individuals and groups who lacked access to the representative process. He suggested that deference might not be appropriate in cases involving legislation that "restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation" or that represents "prejudice against discrete and insular minorities."

Stone's tenure on the Court marked the beginning of the period in which the justices deemphasized the protection of property and contract rights and began to guard other civil rights and civil liberties, especially in First Amendment speech and religion cases. Eventually, during Stone's tenure as chief justice, the Court took a more active role in scrutinizing laws that distorted the voting process and in promoting antidiscrimination principles under the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), in which children who were Jehovah's Witnesses challenged on religious grounds state laws requiring salute to the flag and the Pledge of Allegiance in the public schools, Stone dissented from the majority and proclaimed his commitment to individual civil liberties: "The Constitution expresses more than the conviction of the people that democratic processes must be preserved at all costs. It is also an expression of faith and a command that freedom of mind and spirit must be preserved, which government must obey, if it is to adhere to that justice and moderation without which no free government can exist." Three years later Stone's dissent became the majority view in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943).

Stone's achievements have been overshadowed by the fact that, as chief justice, he was unable to keep the Court from fragmenting. Of course, the intellectually powerful individuals who dominated the Court during that period would have been a monumental challenge for any chief justice to have led the nation's high court.

J. David Golub

See also: Carolene Products, Footnote 4.

FURTHER READING

Pacelle, Richard L., Jr. The Role of the Supreme Court in American Politics: The Least Dangerous Branch? Boulder, CO: Westview, 2002.
Renstrom, Peter G. The Stone Court Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2001.
Urofsky, Melvin I. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court Under Stone and Vinson, 1941–1953. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Stop-and-Frisk

The concepts of search and seizure are important to the understanding of civil liberties in the United States, because they present significant parameters for permissible conduct by law enforcement officials in keeping with the protections afforded by the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Those protections include the right to be free from "unreasonable" search and seizure and free from arrest except upon "probable cause."

In general, a seizure by a law enforcement officer or authorized police officer is defined as the taking into legal custody any objects relating to or believed to relate to criminal activity. A search refers to the examination or inspection of a location, vehicle, or person by a law enforcement officer for the purpose of locating objects believed to relate to criminal activities or wanted persons.

A stop-and-frisk is a special category of police activity that is less than the thorough examination of a person or premises that would constitute a search. A stop-and-frisk is intended to serve objectives of law enforcement but to stop short of a violation of a citizen's constitutional rights. The stop-and-frisk is defined as the detaining of a person by a law enforcement officer for the purpose of investigation, accompanied by a superficial examination by the officer of the person's body surface or clothing—known as a "pat-down" or "frisk"—to discover concealed weapons, contraband, or other paraphernalia relating to criminal activity. Thus, the stop-and-frisk concept represents an exception to the requirements for probable cause or a search warrant under the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution.

In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the U.S. Supreme Court recognized for the first time that a police stop-and-frisk might be constitutional on the basis of "reasonable suspicion" rather than probable cause. In this case a detective with thirty years of police work experience noticed that the defendant and an accomplice were loitering on a street corner for a considerable length of time. The detective observed their conduct and behavioral patterns, especially their deliberate pacing and their focus on a specific store window. There were conferences with a third party who exited and returned to the scene on numerous occasions. The detective surmised that the men planned a daytime robbery, and he questioned them about their presence on the street corner. After receiving ambiguous and confused responses to specific questions, the detective, who had identified himself as a police official, performed a pat-down of the defendant's clothing, which revealed a revolver. The detective arrested the defendant and charged him with carrying a concealed weapon.

The Court in Terry established the precedent that certain categories of police conduct, typically called a "stop," may be undertaken upon less evidence than is needed for arrest because a stop is a lesser intrusion. The so-called Terry stop applies to crime prevention and crime detection. Thus, an officer who is conducting an investigation immediately after the perpetration of a crime may make inquiry of individuals on the basis of suspicion—about location, identification, unusual conduct, articles of dress, physical behavior, and the like—in connection with the facts and circumstances of the case. For example, the mere fact that individuals congregated at or near the scene of the crime may justify a stop. Alternatively, the identification by another credible witness or informant, even if vague, may justify a Terry stop-and-frisk. Police interrogation of such individuals followed by a search of the person would be considered constitutionally valid action. Because the police must exercise discretion in each particular situation, courts must often ascertain on review whether the conduct was a stop-and-frisk or an actual arrest.

Seven men line up against a fence as they are frisked by a policeman in Brooklyn, New York, 1956. (Library of Congress)

If the police initially stop and frisk a suspect on the basis of reasonable suspicion, and further inquiry and investigation provide grounds for arrest, then continued restraint and detention of the person may be justified. However, if the police employ the wrong investigative technique, the stop may be converted to an illegal arrest. Moreover, if the individual who is temporarily detained believes that under the particular circumstances he or she is not free to leave after the police confrontation has occurred, that person's liberty interests have been compromised. The critical legal issue is at what point the stop-and-frisk became a search and seizure, which would require a higher level of justification and afforded the suspect a greater level of constitutional protection.

J. David Golub

See also: Fourth Amendment; Terry v. Ohio.

FURTHER READING

Wetterer, Charles M. The Fourth Amendment: Search and Seizure. Springfield, NJ: Enslow, 1998.

Story, Joseph (1779–1845)

Joseph Story served as an associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court from 1812 until his death in 1845. Prior to his promotion to the nation's highest court, Story had been both a Massachusetts state representative and a member of the U.S. House of Representatives. In addition to his roles in these public offices, Story was also a reputable lawyer and esteemed scholar. A graduate of Harvard College, Story had an intimate association with his alma mater, later serving as an overseer, fellow, and professor of law. He led the charge in establishing Harvard's law school.

The death in September 1810 of William Cushing, the sole remaining justice appointed to the Court by President George Washington and a staunch New England Federalist, left a vacancy on the Court and gave President James Madison, a Jeffersonian Republican, his first opportunity to appoint a justice. To maintain a regional balance on the Court, Madison wanted to find a sound Republican in the Federalist-dominated New England region to succeed Cushing. When his first few choices fell through, Madison offered the position to Joseph Story against the advice of Thomas Jefferson, who had labeled Story a "pseudo-republican."

Jefferson's fears came to fruition as Justice Story, after taking his seat in early 1812, quickly aligned himself with the Court's Federalist bloc headed by Chief Justice John Marshall. Like Marshall, Justice Story became a leading constitutional nationalist and a conservative in the tradition of Britain's Edmund Burke (1729–1797), who stressed the value of adhering to precedents that embodied a nation's collective wisdom. Together with Marshall and Justice Bushrod Washington, Story sought to limit states' power while expanding the scope of the national government's authority. He often justified this position by distinguishing between popular sovereignty and state sovereignty, holding that the former trumped the latter because the people in the several states had ratified the Constitution.

Also like Marshall, Story sought to enhance the authority of the Court in the nation's early years. As such, he objected to delivering dissenting opinions because they undermined the Court's authority and served no public benefit. Add to this norm of consensus the fact that Marshall himself authored a majority of the Court's opinions (and an even higher percentage in constitutional cases), and it is easy to understand how and why many of the justices who served on the Marshall Court—Story included—have been obscured in the annals of history due to the domineering presence of the great chief justice. Yet, of Marshall's associates, Story wrote a plurality of the Supreme Court's opinions in the remaining cases.

Justice Story's greatest impact on the development of the law may have been his opinions while he rode circuit (presiding over lower courts). His opinion in United States v. Coolidge, 25 F. Cas. 619 (No. 14, 857) (C.C.D. Mass. 1813), skillfully argued for a broad adoption of the common law, thereby providing more Supreme Court Associate Justice Joseph Story. Story's moral opposition to slavery directly conflicted with his profound concern for the protection of private property.

(Library of Congress)

discretionary authority for federal judges, and his opinion on circuit in Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U.S. 43 (1815), served as the framework for Marshall's later enunciations in the landmark case of Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. 518 (1819).

Justice Story's opinion for the Court in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304 (1816), was his greatest constitutional opinion. It derived from a politically charged case in which Virginia essentially challenged the whole structure of the federal judiciary by arguing that federal matters decided by state courts could not be reviewed. Assembling an "unanswerable and conclusive" constitutional argument, Story admonished the state of Virginia and held that even though some constitutional questions had been permitted to be heard in state courts, the Constitution had given such authority to the federal courts in Article III of the Constitution. As such, if a uniform federal law was to be established, it was absolutely imperative that those state court decisions be reviewable by the U.S. Supreme Court.

On the controversial issue of slavery, Story's moral opposition to the practice directly conflicted with his profound concern for the protection of private property. Before a federal grand jury in 1819, Story condemned slavery, declaring it "repugnant to the natural rights of man and the dictates of justice." Yet when the two principles collided, Justice Story upheld the property rights of slave owners in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. 539 (1842), a case involving the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793. Writing for the Court, he ruled that a state could not impede the just rights of an owner to repossess his slave and thus reclaim his property. Although contemporaries viewed this decision as a victory for slavery, Justice Story saw it as a victory for property rights and as a limit on state powers.

After Marshall's death in 1835, Justice Story was often the lone nationalist voice on the Court for his remaining ten years. He died in September 1845, having served for thirty-three years on the Supreme Court. He had planned to retire at the end of the year.

Chris McCloskey

See also: Federalism; Madison, James; Marshall, John.

FURTHER READING

Dunne, Gerald T. Justice Joseph Story and the Rise of the Supreme Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1970.

McClellan, James. Joseph Story and the American Constitution. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1971.

Newmyer, R. Kent. Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story: Statesman of the Old Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1985.

Story, Joseph. A Familiar Exposition of the Constitution of the United States. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1840.

Story, William W., ed. Life and Letters of Joseph Story. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown, 1851.

———. The Miscellaneous Writings of Joseph Story. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown, 1852.

Strickland v. Washington (1984)

In Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court set standards for determining the circumstances under which ineffective representation by defense counsel would require that a conviction or death sentence be overturned. The Court had established, in such cases as Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), dealing with a capital offense, and Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), extending to all felonies, that criminal defendants enjoyed a right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment, that this right was necessary to ensure the fairness of trials, and that this right encompassed a right to effective assistance of counsel at trial and capital sentencing proceedings. Without some kind of effectiveness requirement, the Sixth Amendment's guarantees could be rendered a mere formality. But the question of what constituted a sufficient level of effectiveness remained, and the frequency with which convicted criminal defendants were raising claims of ineffective assistance of counsel on appeal highlighted the need to establish uniform standards.

The particular claim at issue in Strickland centered around the capital sentencing of David Leroy Washington, a man who was sentenced to death after pleading guilty to three murders and several lesser offenses. Washington challenged his death sentence on the ground that his counsel had failed to provide effective assistance at the sentencing proceeding. More specifically, Washington's counsel failed to request a psychiatric evaluation or to investigate character witnesses, either of which might have introduced mitigating factors that could have lessened Washington's sentence. A federal district court rejected this claim, but the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals set forth new standards for determining effectiveness of counsel and remanded to the district court for fact-finding related to counsel's performance.

In a seven–two decision, the Court, led by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, reversed the Circuit Court of Appeals and held that to set aside a conviction or death sentence based on ineffectiveness of counsel, a defendant would have to demonstrate not only that counsel performed poorly but also that such poor representation so adversely affected the defense that the defendant was effectively denied a fair trial. In other words, the appellate court must determine, based on the totality of circumstances, whether there existed a reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceeding would have been different had counsel not performed in substandard fashion. Counsel's performance should be evaluated in relation to a baseline "objective standard of reasonableness" based on prevailing professional standards, and under the presumption that counsel did properly represent the defendant's best interests. At the same time, judicial inquiries should be flexible and avoid reliance on hindsight, so as to avoid creating incentives for every losing defendant to claim ineffectiveness.

Courts could avoid thorny inquiries into the adequacy of representation by first conducting what is usually the more tractable inquiry into whether confidence in the trial outcome had been sufficiently undermined by the alleged flaws in counsel's performance. If the fairness of the proceedings was not called into question by these alleged defects, then the no-harm, no-foul principle would govern. Washington's particular claim, said the majority, fell short on both counts: His counsel's actions represented strategic choices falling within the range of acceptable practice, and presenting the evidence requested by Washington would not have affected the sentencing decision measurably.

Writing in dissent, Justice Thurgood Marshall argued that the majority purported to clarify the determination of ineffectiveness of counsel but instead offered vague, intuitive guidelines where more specific standards were available. Furthermore, expecting defendants to demonstrate a reasonable probability that the outcome would have differed had counsel performed more effectively raised an unreasonably difficult barrier to overcome.

On one level, Strickland appeared to preclude frivolous claims of ineffective assistance of counsel without jeopardizing criminal defendants' right to a fair trial. But given current shortfalls in funding for indigent defense, especially in capital cases, in practice Strickland has erected substantial barriers to those who believe their criminal defense representation was substandard.

Jeremy Buchman

See also: Gideon v. Wainwright; Ineffective Assistance of Counsel; Right to Counsel.

FURTHER READING

Klein, Richard. "The Constitutionalization of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel." Maryland Law Review 58 (1999): 1433–79.

Strict Scrutiny

The phrase "strict scrutiny" refers to the highest degree of examination that the courts give to particular types of legislation or actions of the executive branch. The concept of strict scrutiny is important because this high level of judicial analysis has become critical to the protection of individual rights in the United States.

In general, courts must give wide deference to legislation passed by Congress or other legislative bodies or to decisions made by the president or other executive-branch officials at the federal, state, or local level. This judicial deference is part of the respect the courts are supposed to show to those branches of government that are directly elected by the people and that in a democracy have primary responsibility for making policy and law. When actions of the other branches of government are challenged in most routine matters, the level of examination is referred to as "rational-basis" review.

Under a rational-basis test, legislation is presumed to be valid, and the burden is upon the person challenging it to show why it is illegal or unconstitutional. Here, all that must be shown is that the legislature had some reason—some rational basis—for enacting the law. If some reason can be shown, the law or policy will be upheld. Thus, if Congress passed a law making it illegal to possess narcotics or a law mandating clean air standards and someone challenged these laws, the courts would use a rational-basis test and uphold both laws so long as some reason could be offered for why Congress wanted to make narcotics illegal or water cleaner.

The origins of the concept of strict scrutiny perhaps may be found in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819), which involved the issue of whether Congress had constitutional authority to create a national bank. In finding Congress had that authority, Chief Justice John Marshall was required to interpret the last clause of Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution (giving Congress authority to make all laws that are "necessary and proper" for executing its powers). He acknowledged that the Constitution did not specifically authorize Congress to charter the bank, but he was willing to grant broad deference to Congress to legislate provided it had some reason to act and there was no specific constitutional prohibition against such action. Thus, McCulloch v. Maryland is a good example of how the Court has used the rational-basis test in analyzing legislation.

In general, the judiciary should defer to the other branches of government to act and make policy, but there are some circumstances when it should not. The concept of judicial review, or the power of the courts to declare laws unconstitutional, also means that in some circumstances, the judiciary may decline to extend the usual deference and instead rule that a specific piece of legislation (or a particular executive action) is unconstitutional, illegal, or beyond the powers of that body to adopt. For example, in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), perhaps the most important case in U.S. constitutional law, Chief Justice Marshall used the power of judicial review to declare a law unconstitutional. The case established that the Supreme Court was the ultimate arbiter of the Constitution, and the concept of strict scrutiny grew out of that power of judicial review.

Some legal scholars argue that strict scrutiny as a tool of judicial analysis emerged in the late nineteenth century when the Supreme Court used its power of judicial review to examine economic legislation and strike down laws that regulated the economy, but the modern conceptualization of that power first emerged in United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). In examining the power of Congress to regulate adulterated milk, the Court announced that although it would give the legislature broad, rational-basis deference to engage in economic regulation, Justice Harlan Fiske Stone cautioned in footnote four that rational-basis presumption of constitutionality would not be given in certain matters. These included legislation that appeared to be in violation of the Bill of Rights, that restricted access to the political process, or that was directed against "discrete and insular minorities." In such cases, Stone stated, the Court should instead use some form of more exacting judicial scrutiny.

The Court later elaborated upon footnote four, holding, for example, in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), that the right to procreate was a fundamental right that would be examined with strict scrutiny. Similarly, although it upheld restrictive policies excluding Japanese Americans from the West Coast, in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), the Court declared that policies or actions that categorized individuals by race created suspect classifications and would be subject to the strict-scrutiny test.

As a result of Carolene Products, Skinner, and Korematsu, courts now adopt differing standards of review depending on the type of legislation. In economic and most other legislation, the courts will employ a rational-basis test that presumes the constitutionality of laws. However, in cases involving fundamental rights (such as procreation, privacy, voting) or suspect classifications (race, ethnicity), the judiciary will reject the presumption of constitutionality and instead require Congress, for example, to show that the law is necessary to accomplish a compelling governmental interest and that the law uses the least restrictive means available to fulfill that interest. Legislation that can meet this demanding standard of review will be upheld, but few laws can survive such a test, which has led some skeptics, such as former Justice Thurgood Marshall, to state that strict scrutiny is "strict in theory but fatal in fact."

Strict scrutiny is an important tool of judicial analysis in American democracy. It gives the courts the power to review legislation and protect minority rights against abuse by majority rule. Today there are varying levels of scrutiny given to different types of action—for example, gender classifications are subject to intermediate-level scrutiny—but the dichotomous tests of rational basis and strict scrutiny remain the basis of most judicial examination of legislation and government action.

Dale Mineshima and David Schultz

See also: Carolene Products, Footnote 4; Due Process of Law; Korematsu v. United States; Marshall, John; Rational-Basis Test; Skinner v. Oklahoma.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Elizabeth S. "Integration, Affirmative Action, and Strict Scrutiny." New York University Law Review 77, 5 (November 2002): 1195–1271.

Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.

Strikes and Arbitration

The ability of workers to use the power of an organized strike to express workplace grievances is considered an important civil liberty. This right is tied to workers' rights of association under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and, more generally, to the nation's historical commitment to a free enterprise system. But this liberty is not unfettered; indeed, it has been curtailed by a host of statutory and judicial limitations. The most significant limitation has been legislative and judicial approval of mandatory arbitration clauses that, in effect, substitute for the "right to strike" a guaranteed forum to resolve labor disputes by a neutral third party.

POWER OF A RIGHT TO STRIKE

The threat of a strike is the most potent weapon in labor's arsenal. This weapon not only has the power to cripple an individual business but has the potential to shut down an entire industry or region as well. For example, in 1934, the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) called for a strike of all West Coast dock workers. Other unions joined in the strike, effectively shutting down waterfront commerce along the entire western coast and bringing San Francisco to a standstill. The demands of the workers were eventually met after the union agreed to negotiate the dispute.

ARBITRATION CLAUSES

During World War II, the War Labor Board (1941–1946), which had been established to minimize strikes and to administer wage controls in key industries, was instrumental in efforts to insert mandatory arbitration clauses into collective bargaining agreements. These clauses were designed to prevent workers from leaving their work station and joining a picket line. A grievance subject to the arbitration clause could be brought before an arbitrator (a neutral third party) who would make a decision based on that person's interpretation of the collective bargaining agreement. Whether the arbitrator's decision was binding and whether a court could intervene if a party decided not to respect the decision were matters initially open to question. Although this framework for resolving labor disputes resulted in less disruption at the workplace, it potentially restricted a union's ability to express the raw power of a strike.

PRESUMPTION OF ARBITRABILITY

It did not take long for Congress and the U.S. Supreme Court to weigh in on whether arbitration clauses were in harmony with laws governing labor relations. Congressional reports explaining amendments to federal labor law in 1947 indicated a concern that if unions could break collective bargaining agreements with relative impunity, then such agreements would fail to stabilize industrial relations.

The Supreme Court took cues from this legislative history in elevating the achievement of industrial peace over the protection of the right to strike. In Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills of Alabama, 353 U.S. 448 (1957), the Court held that the federal judiciary could enforce an arbitration clause in a collective bargaining agreement. Once parties agreed to arbitrate a type of dispute, either party could request that a court compel a party to submit to arbitration or to abide by the arbitrator's decision. Whatever the decision, a union could not strike in protest of a decision without facing judicial sanctions.

In the seminal Steelworkers trilogy of cases—United Steelworkers v. Enterprise Wheel and Car Corp., 363 U.S. 593 (1960), United Steelworkers v. Warrior and Gulf Navigation Co., 363 U.S. 574 (1960), and United Steelworkers v. American Manufacturing Co., 363 U.S. 564 (1960)—the Supreme Court expanded the reach of arbitration clauses. The issue posed in these cases was what situations called for applying an arbitration clause to a labor grievance. The Court ruled that in determining whether a particular dispute was subject to an arbitration clause, courts must resolve any doubts in favor of arbitration. In applying this "presumption of arbitrability," a court must order a party to arbitrate a dispute unless it may be said with positive assurance that the arbitration clause is not susceptible of an interpretation that covers the asserted dispute. In situations involving broad arbitration clauses, the Court found the presumption of arbitrability "particularly applicable," and only an express provision excluding a particular grievance from arbitration or the most forceful evidence of a purpose to exclude the claim from arbitration would overcome the presumption. This presumption of arbitrability curbs the instances in which members of a union agreeing to arbitrate some disputes will be able to drop their tools and express their sentiments through a strike.

United Air Lines pilots form a picket line as they march past the airline's entrance at Chicago Midway Airport, 1951. (Library of Congress)

FUTURE IMPACT OF MANDATORY ARBITRATION

Although there is no necessary connection between accepting arbitration and forfeiting the right to strike, the Supreme Court has insisted on one, characterizing the arbitration clause in Textile Workers Union, for example, as a "quid pro quo" for the union's agreement not to strike. This view has fundamentally altered the relationship between unions and employers. The debate persists, however, over whether this change in the relationship has weakened the foundational strength of unionization or instead merely reoriented labor relations while preserving the balance of power between a union and the employer.

Ion B. Meyn

See also: Labor Union Rights.

FURTHER READING

Corrada, Robert L. "Taft-Hartley Symposium: The First Fifty Years: The Arbitral Imperative in Labor and Employment Law." Catholic University Law Review 47 (Spring 1998): 919.

Stromberg v. California (1931)

In Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), an important turning point in the history of free speech, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a state law that made it illegal to display a red flag. Notwithstanding the free speech protections provided under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the Supreme Court during the 1920s routinely upheld laws aimed at suppressing Communist and anarchist speech, although Justices Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. and Louis D. Brandeis often dissented. They argued that the Court should restrict only speech that posed a "clear and present danger" of a harm that Congress had a right to prevent. In Stromberg the liberals won. For the first time, the Court used the clear-and-present-danger test to strike down a restriction on speech. Stromberg was also the first time the Court extended the First Amendment to cover symbolic speech.

The state law in Stromberg dated from 1919 when, in the immediate aftermath of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, fears about anarchism and communism ran high in the United States. The California state legislature made it illegal to display a "red flag" to express anarchist views, to incite sedition, or to serve as a symbol of "opposition to organized government." The case arose when Yetta Stromberg, a nineteen-year-old counselor at a Socialist summer camp, flew a red flag over the campgrounds. The San Bernardino authorities argued that the flag violated California law because it was seditious, incited anarchism, and symbolized "opposition to organized government." The jury found Stromberg guilty.

The Supreme Court, in a seven–two opinion by Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes, reversed. Justice Hughes found that the "opposition to organized government" prong of the statute violated Stromberg's right of free speech. He stressed that the prong could cover a broad range of innocent activity, such as a flag directed against an opposition party. Foreshadowing the overbreadth doctrine, which is designed to ensure that regulations of speech are narrowly tailored to suppress only that which is illegal, he noted that such a broad law prevented the "fair use" of citizen rights. Justices James C. McReynolds and Pierce Butler dissented on technical grounds related to the jury verdict. However, Justice Butler, reaching the merits, suggested that the state had the power to prohibit "opposition to organized government."

Stromberg was significant for two reasons. First, although it was a victory for free speech, the victory came on what one scholar called "ultra-technical" grounds. Justice Hughes said surprisingly little about the red flag itself. And he conceded that the parts of the California law targeting anarchism and sedition were constitutional. If Stromberg lacked the ringing endorsement of public debate present in the earlier dissents by Justices Holmes and Brandeis, it showed how the Court could defend speech in an unfavorable political climate.

Second, Stromberg was the first time the Court recognized that speech encompassed symbols as well as words. In taking this step, the Court was helped by the law itself, which banned red flags for explicitly expressive reasons. Later the Court would struggle to apply this to situations in which the link between symbolic action and expression was less clear, as was true in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), a case involving the burning of draft cards.

Robert A. Kahn

See also: First Amendment; Flag Burning; Symbolic Speech.

FURTHER READING

Kalven, Harry, Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.

Student Newspapers

Student newspapers within a public school setting involve two competing yet compelling interests. First, the schools have an interest as institutions to control the expressive content students create, distribute, and read. Second, the students have interests in exercising their freedom of speech rights granted through the First Amendment to the Constitution. The issue, then, is which side will prevail when these interests conflict.

The U.S. Supreme Court created a special grouping of speech entitled "school-sponsored" speech in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988), defined as speech that is expressed through a medium closely affiliated with the school. This closeness may make the speech appear to be endorsed by the school. Examples of school-sponsored speech include student artwork, school assemblies, and student newspapers.

Schools are permitted to establish reasonable rules regulating the time, place, and manner of distribution of publications. For instance, educators can require publications to be reviewed by the administration prior to distribution. Further, schools can forbid students to distribute newspapers at a time and place where distribution might cause a disturbance.

Schools are entitled to regulate what is printed in student newspapers provided the regulation is reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns. In practice, this gives broad deference to the school—it may regulate a school newspaper in any manner if it can point to a pedagogical matter. Some pedagogical concerns include promoting societal values and educating students in an effective manner. For example, in Hazelwood a school principal stopped the publication of an article about several pregnant students because he believed references to sexual activity and birth control might be inappropriate for younger students, and the "anonymous" pregnant students would be identifiable by the text of the article.

A school may censor a student's written article based on that student's gross disobedience of school regulations, so long as those regulations are constitutional. For example, in Sullivan v. Houston Independent School District, 475 F.2d 1071 (5th Cir. 1973), a federal appeals court held that when a student openly disregarded a school requirement to obtain the principal's approval prior to distribution of the paper and subsequently used profanity when told of school policies, the school could prohibit further distribution of the paper. A school may also refuse to allow a student to distribute libelous or obscene material.

A school is allowed to protect its students from defamatory press. Draudt v. Wooster City School District, 246 F. Supp. 2d 860 (N.D. Ohio 2003), involved editors of a school newspaper in Ohio who planned to distribute an article describing the school board's practice of giving preferential treatment to student athletes caught drinking underage. The article named and quoted two students as admitting to drinking at a party and being caught. Because the named students had earlier denied drinking, the principal and superintendent found the statements potentially defamatory and pulled the newspaper from publication. This was found to be a permissible form of censorship.

Underground newspapers create their own special circumstances. Because they are not subsidized by the school or supervised by faculty members, underground newspapers do not constitute the pure school-sponsored speech defined in Hazelwood. However, courts still grant schools some discretion when they forcibly end distribution of an underground newspaper. For instance, in Bystrom v. Fridley High School, 686 F. Supp. 1387 (D. Minn. 1987), the trial court upheld a suspension handed down to students who distributed a newspaper that, among other things, praised the vandalism of a teacher's home.

Newspapers distributed at colleges receive more free speech protection than newspapers at elementary, middle, or high schools. In general, courts believe that college-age students are more resilient to offensive material than high school students. This distinction does not rest with newspapers alone; freedom of speech gains more protection on college campuses in many other contexts as well.

Journalists in a private school do not receive the same protections as their public school counterparts. The relationship between a private school and its students is based on contract rather than regarded as a right generated by the public school system. Therefore, the private school may make rules as it sees fit when regulating its students and the management of its institution.

Zachary Crain

See also: First Amendment; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District.

FURTHER READING

Annenst, Janna J. "Only the News That's Fit to Print: The Effect of Hazelwood on the First Amendment Viewpoint-Neutrality Requirement in Public School–Sponsored Forums." Washington Law Review 77 (2002): 1227–59.

Hamilton, Patricia Anne. "Freedom of Expression in Public Schools: Regulation of Student Newspapers and Other Publications." Cumberland Law Review 18 (1987/1988): 181–203.

Peltz, Richard J. "Censorship Tsunami Spares College Media: To Protect Free Expression on Public Campuses, Lessons from the 'College Hazelwood' Case." Tennessee Law Review 68 (2001): 481–555.

Student Rights

When the constitutional rights of minors attending public elementary and secondary schools conflict with school administrators' pursuit of a regulated educational environment, the U.S. Supreme Court typically rules that the students do not wholly forfeit the rights they enjoy outside of school, but that the scope of those rights is limited. This pattern arises in cases involving free speech, due process, and search and seizure. The only area in which public school students may have a stronger claim to constitutional protection is in regard to freedom from state-established religion.

SPEECH

Student Expression

The U.S. Supreme Court case setting the pattern for most modern student rights cases is the famous Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969). A group of Des Moines, Iowa, junior high and high school students opposed to the war in Vietnam decided to wear black armbands to school as a silent statement of protest. Learning of the plan, the school district enacted a rule banning all armbands, a measure the families challenged with the help of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

The Supreme Court began its constitutional analysis with the frequently quoted statement "It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate." The scope of a student's speech rights within the school may nonetheless be tempered to ensure the state's ability to conduct classes effectively. In Tinker the Court concluded that school discipline could be imposed for a student's on-campus speech only if the speech would "materially" and "substantially" disrupt the work and discipline of the school or if the speech invaded the rights of others. Although this standard allows for more governmental control over student speech than would be allowed outside of school, it is more protective of speech than were some alternatives debated at the time, such as a standard allowing schools to forbid speech that would cause any disruption of school, whether or not it was substantial.

In Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986), the Court upheld a school's five-day suspension of a high school student for delivering a sexually suggestive speech at a school assembly. The discipline was upheld in part because the speech could be viewed as a material and substantial disruption of the educational process, and in part because the school has a valid interest "in teaching students the boundaries of socially appropriate behavior." Bethel has been widely viewed as a partial retreat from Tinker, and it has been used to justify discipline of students' oral or written communications or controversial T-shirts that school administrators consider socially inappropriate.

Student Publications

Following Tinker, many cases from the 1970s upheld the right of students to be free of school discipline for writing and distributing their own underground newspapers outside of school, even if the papers contained speech that might lead to punishment if it had been uttered in class. As cyberspace became a popular medium for speech at the turn of the twenty-first century, the reasoning used in the underground newspaper cases has begun to be applied to students' independent speech on the Internet and World Wide Web.

The same freedom does not extend to school-sponsored newspapers. In Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988), the Court ruled that a school principal did not violate the First Amendment by deleting articles from a school-sponsored student newspaper, as long as the newspaper had not been designated a limited public forum and the editorial decision was "reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns." Some states or school districts responded with "anti-Hazelwood" laws that designated student newspapers as public forums or otherwise restricted the censorship powers of school principals.

SCHOOL DISCIPLINE

School administrators have great leeway to impose discipline on students for infractions of school rules, but this authority is not without limits. Goss v. Lopez, 419

Exhibit panel for compulsory education and child labor reform. All states have compulsory education laws requiring some minimum amount of formal education. Although a state may require compulsory education, it cannot require that the education occur at a public school. (Library of Congress)

U.S. 565 (1975), recognized that students' right to a public education was a form of "liberty" or "property" under the Fourteenth Amendment that could not be deprived without due process. In the school setting, due process does not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt, trial by jury, or a right to counsel. Instead, a short-term suspension of ten days or less need be accompanied only by what the Court in Goss termed "rudimentary" due process: The student "must be told what he is accused of doing and what the basis of the accusation is," after which he must have "an opportunity to present his side of the story." This abbreviated process may occur after the imposition of suspension in cases of emergency.

Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651 (1977), established that school discipline—even when it involves corporal punishment—is not subject to the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment, which is limited to the criminal justice system. State or local laws, however, may limit public schools' ability to impose corporal punishment.

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

The Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizure protects public school students against searches by school administrators to a lesser extent than it protects them from searches by police outside of school. In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), the Court ruled that a search of a student's purse or backpack did not require a search warrant or probable cause. Instead, a search by school personnel may be justified under a relaxed test of reasonableness: There must be reasonable grounds to suspect that the search will uncover evidence that the student has violated the law or the school rules, and the manner of search must be reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not "excessively intrusive" in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction. When school officials conduct searches at the behest of the police for law enforcement purposes, however, the usual Fourth Amendment standards apply.

The Supreme Court has approved as reasonable school policies requiring students enrolled in extracurricular activities to take drug tests. The process began with Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995), which upheld urine testing for student athletes when the school had demonstrated a rampant drug problem centered on the athletes themselves. Although there was much language in Vernonia explaining that the search was justified by the scope of the drug problem in the individual school, the role of athletes in the drug culture, the physical dangers of the sports field, and the fact that athletes are accustomed to having their bodies under scrutiny by the coach and in the locker room, none of these limitations was important to the Court in Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002), which upheld urine testing for students in all extracurricular activities, whether or not there was a demonstrated drug problem, safety concern, or bodily scrutiny.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION

Minors unquestionably have far less freedom than adults in their choice of whether to pursue education in the first place. All states have compulsory education laws requiring some minimum amount of formal education, which is deemed a societal interest outweighing any purported interest of children or parents to avoid education. A state may require compulsory education, but it cannot require that the education occur at a public school; under Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), states must allow students to attend religious schools that meet minimum educational requirements. Similarly, in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), the Court struck down a state law prohibiting the teaching of modern foreign languages in such schools.

RELIGION

Public school students may have stronger constitutional protection than the public at large with regard to protection from state establishment of religion. Courts have recognized that religious upbringing and indoctrination are the province of the family rather than the state. Because young children subject to the daily authority and instruction of teachers are more likely to view religious messages from school officials as being legally required or officially endorsed, schools must be vigilant against conveying a message of sponsorship or endorsement of religion. For this reason, public schools may not require readings of the Bible or the Lord's Prayer, Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), lead supposedly "nondenominational" prayers, Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), or have moments of silence for the express purpose of prayer, Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985). Public schools may not post images of the Ten Commandments, Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980), or hold official prayers at graduation ceremonies, Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), or sporting events, Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000). Curricula in public schools must also be religiously neutral, a concern that arises most often in conjunction with state laws that restrict the teaching of evolution, Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968), or mandate the teaching of creationism, Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987).

The mandate of religious neutrality is to ensure freedom of religion, not inhibit it. Schools must accommodate nondisruptive student behavior compelled by the student's faith. This principle was firmly cemented in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), which upheld the right of a Jehovah's Witness to remain silently seated while the class recited the Pledge of Allegiance. In a frequently quoted phrase, the Court, speaking through Justice Robert H. Jackson, stated: "If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

Aaron H. Caplan

See also: Abington School District v. Schempp; Bethel School District v. Fraser; Engel v. Vitale; Flag Salute; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier; Lee v. Weisman; Meyer v. Nebraska; Pierce v. Society of Sisters; Prayer in Schools; Random Drug Testing; Search of Student Lockers; Student Newspapers; Student Searches; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Thomas, et al. "Constitutional Law Symposium: The Constitution Inside the Schoolhouse Gate: Student Rights Thirty Years After Tinker v. Des Moines School District." Drake Law Review 48 (2000): 433.

Johnson, John W. The Struggle for Student Rights: Tinker v. Des Moines and the 1960s. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1997.

Yudolf, Mark, et al. "Symposium: Twenty-five Years After Tinker: Balancing Students' Rights." St. John's Law Review 69 (Summer/Fall 1995): 365.

Student Searches

Student searches are subject to the Fourth Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches and seizures. Determining whether a search or seizure is permissible under any circumstances depends on determining its reasonableness. What constitutes "reasonable" in the public school setting, however, is not necessarily the same as what constitutes "reasonable" in other settings, as the U.S. Supreme Court made clear in New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985). In this case, an assistant vice principal searched a student's purse after the student was caught smoking in the bathroom, in violation of school policy. That search yielded marijuana and other items implicating the student in drug dealing, which led to delinquency charges brought by the state. In finding the search permissible, the Court reasoned that school officials had a responsibility to maintain discipline to foster a safe educational environment, and requiring probable cause for student searches such as this one (the requirement that would have been necessary to obtain a search warrant) would compromise school officials' ability to meet that responsibility. In the school context, Fourth Amendment protections may be met by a reasonableness standard instead, in which the circumstances of the search (for example, nature of the infraction, intrusiveness of the search) are considered, rather than the more stringent probable-cause standard required of typical criminal investigations.

The Court has not directly addressed what this means in the context of school locker searches. Some lower courts require reasonable suspicion that illegal items are stored in a locker prior to a search; others permit school officials unfettered authority to search student lockers on the premise that lockers are jointly controlled by schools and students. Likewise, the Court has not expressly ruled on the permissibility of metal detectors in schools, though it is unlikely the Court would find them to pose a threat to constitutionally protected rights under the Fourth Amendment. The Court has, however, explicitly dealt with the issue of student drug tests under the Fourth Amendment.

In 1995 the Court upheld a school policy requiring students to submit to urinalysis prior to participation in school sports in Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995). The policy was instituted to combat a student culture in which drug use was prevalent in the Vernonia, Oregon, schools. Student athletes, in particular, were found to be leaders in this drug culture, which raised concerns about increases in the risks of sports-related injuries. Finding in favor of the school district, the majority opinion focused, first, on the fact that the expectation of privacy school students have is necessarily limited to some degree, since students are subject to physical exams and vaccinations in the interests of maintaining a healthy school environment. Further, student athletes have an even more circumscribed expectation of privacy given that they voluntarily choose to participate in sports and such participation involves communal undressing and showering. As the Court opined, "School sports are not for the bashful." In evaluating the drug testing policy, the Court also considered the degree of intrusion necessary to collect the urine specimens, finding the intrusion to be minimal. Female students were permitted to provide their urine samples in a closed bathroom stall with a monitor listening for the normal sounds of urination. Males produced their samples at a urinal with a monitor positioned at least twelve feet behind them.

The Court revisited the issue in Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002), granting school authorities even greater latitude with regard to student drug testing. The drug policy in this case required all middle and high school students wishing to participate in any extracurricular activity, whether sports-related or otherwise, to consent to drug testing. In disposing of this case, the Court reiterated the limitations on a student's privacy interests imposed by virtue of the public school environment. The majority asserted that participation in any extracurricular activity is voluntary, and most activities involve the same sorts of intrusions to which student athletes are subject. Despite being a member of the majority in Vernonia, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg dissented on this point, arguing that athletics involve greater intrusions into student privacy than participation in other extracurricular activities and that this distinction was crucial for the outcome in Vernonia. The Court majority further argued that the procedure used to collect urine samples was even less intrusive than that used in the Vernonia schools, since both male and female students were allowed to produce their samples in a closed bathroom stall. And, despite the absence of a clear demonstration of a drug problem of "epidemic proportions," as was the case in the Vernonia schools, the drug policy in Earls was deemed constitutionally permissible given that schools have an important interest in preventing drug use among students.

Wendy L. Martinek

See also: Board of Education v. Earls; Random Drug Testing; Vernonia School District v. Acton.

FURTHER READING

McCarthy, Martha M., Nelda H. Cambron-McCabe, and Stephen B. Thomas. Public School Law: Teachers' and Students' Rights. 4th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1997.

Raskin, Jamin B. We the Students: Supreme Court Cases for and About Students. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2000.

Rossow, Lawrence F., and Jacqueline A. Stefkovich. Search and Seizure in the Public Schools. 2d ed. Dayton, OH: Education Law Association, 1996.

Subpoena

A subpoena is a written order, issued by a tribunal (for example, a court, a legislative body, a regulatory agency if it has subpoena power), that requires a person to appear before and provide testimony to it. The term subpoena is derived from two Latin words, sub (meaning under) and poena (penalty). This is because a person who receives a subpoena must obey it under penalty of being found in contempt of the issuing tribunal. Although a subpoena is typically used to compel a person to testify before a tribunal, one can also be compelled to produce books, files, records, and other documents through a subpoena duces tecum (Latin for bring with you under penalty), a variant of the subpoena. The subpoena power as it is understood today originated in medieval England, and its existence has evolved in the United States within the context of the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the Constitution.

Subpoenas gain their compulsive force through the possibility of contempt and the consequences that contempt entails. In this context, contempt is the willful disregard or disobedience of a public authority, such as a court or a legislative assembly (thus, contempt of court or contempt of Congress). In order to discourage such disrespect of the government's tribunals, those who commit contempt may be subject to fine or imprisonment. Thus, a person risks being severely penalized for failing to appear before the tribunal and provide testimony as required by a subpoena.

The goal of the subpoena, when it is used in the legislative arena, is to gain information that will be useful in the conduct of legislative affairs. A classic example is the use of the subpoena by the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) during the 1950s in its attempts to gauge the spread of communism in the United States. Scores of citizens were compelled to testify before HUAC through the use of subpoenas. Those who refused to appear were often charged with contempt of Congress, and courts upheld convictions stemming from those charges with impressive regularity.

Within the judicial context, the subpoena is typically used to elicit testimony or documents from less-than-willing witnesses. The subpoena is not without controversy when it is used in this fashion, because issuance of a subpoena may give rise to a conflict between information-gathering efforts and civil liberties. The use of the subpoena power aids a tribunal significantly in its efforts to obtain vital information from unwilling sources. This information-gathering function, however, can easily touch upon evidence that is protected by the Fifth Amendment's freedom from self-incrimination, and it might also have a chilling effect on First Amendment rights of speech and association.

There are ways in which the tension between information-gathering and self-incrimination concerns can be alleviated. Most notable among these is through a grant of immunity, which prevents the government from using any incriminating testimony obtained from subpoenaed witnesses against them. With the possibility of self-incrimination removed, the tribunal can compel and fully develop the testimony of an unwilling, subpoenaed witness. A classic example of this occurs when a prosecutor offers a plea bargain and immunity to a member of a conspiracy in exchange for testimony against coconspirators.

Persons who have received a subpoena, however, may invoke their Fifth Amendment protection from self-incrimination only with regard to any oral testimony that is being demanded of them. In a series of cases during the 1970s, the Supreme Court established that the freedom from self-incrimination applies only to testimonial evidence. Physical evidence, including papers and documents, are outside the scope of the Fifth Amendment's protection. Thus, a recipient of a subpoena duces tecum may generally not withhold personal papers and documents from the court solely on the grounds that they are self-incriminating.

The Sixth Amendment also implicates the subpoena power as a form of compulsory process. In particular, the Sixth Amendment grants a criminal defendant the right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." This Sixth Amendment right affords the criminal defendant the right to present a defense in court through the testimony of witnesses, even to the extent that the defendant may have to drag recalcitrant defense witnesses into court. Use of the court's subpoena power is the primary method by which unwilling defense witnesses may be compelled to appear before the court. Although a defendant's use of compulsory process may appear to conflict with the prosecution's use of subpoenas to build the case against the defendant, the two uses serve the same purpose of bringing necessary information before the tribunal.

In whichever occasion it is applied, the subpoena aims to bring as much information to the tribunal as possible, compelling those who are unwilling to provide evidence or testimony. Courts have, however, placed certain limitations on the subpoena power to protect other civil liberties.

Keith Wesolowski

See also: Congressional Investigations; Contempt Powers; Immunity.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure: First Principles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Beck, Carl. Contempt of Congress: A Study of the Prosecutions Initiated by the Committee on Un-American Activities, 1945–1957. New Orleans, LA: Hauser, 1959.

Goldfarb, Ronald L. The Contempt Power. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.

Hageman, John Frelinghuysen. Privileged Communications as a Branch of Legal Evidence. Littleton, CO: F. B. Rothman, 1983.

Rapalje, Stewart. A Treatise on Contempt. Littleton, CO: F. B. Rothman, 1981.

Rogge, O. John. The First and The Fifth. New York: Thomas Nelson and Sons, 1960.

Substantive Due Process

Under the legal concept known as "substantive due process," courts may void government action and policies, even though the action or policy does not violate an explicit constitutional provision. Throughout the history of civil liberties in the United States, the standard the U.S. Supreme Court uses when reviewing the procedure a government followed in adopting a policy or interacting with a citizen must be one of "fairness"; this standard is central to the principle of "procedural due process." In contrast, courts have used "substantive due process" to review the actual content—the substance—of the government action or policy, particularly in economic and social policy.

Under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, citizens have the right not to "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The meaning behind these Due Process Clauses is that neither the national nor a state government may arbitrarily deprive or deny an individual of fairness and justice within government procedures. Within the doctrine of substantive due process, courts will scrutinize the content of the government policy, even though it may have been enacted with the required procedures of fairness.

As with most American law and legal concepts, the doctrine of substantive due process originated from the English tradition of guaranteed fundamental freedoms and rights, which existed even without a written constitutional document. With this basis, a written constitution simply reaffirmed preexisting rights and liberties, and rights not explicitly stated in the document were still protected. Substantive due process was articulated in an early case before the U.S. Supreme Court. In Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798), the Court's majority wrote that no government authority was omnipotent, and that even though government authority may not be expressly prohibited in a written constitution, the actions and substance of government acts could be declared illegal. In the same case, however, Justice James Iredell challenged this approach, saying that judges could not pronounce a law void simply because it violated an unwritten principle as determined by judges themselves.

Most of the subsequent early U.S. Supreme Court cases followed Justice Iredell's approach and were linked to specific constitutional provisions. It was at the state level that courts began to strike down laws due to their substance, most notably New York's liquor-prohibition law in Wynehamer v. People, 13 N.Y. 378 (1856). Yet one infamous case at the national level signaled the reemergence of substantive due process on the controversial policy of slavery in the nineteenth century. In Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857), Chief Justice Roger B. Taney ruled that the Missouri Compromise (which admitted Missouri to the Union as a slave state but Maine as a free one and prohibited slavery in states formed from the Louisiana Purchase north of latitude 36°30') unconstitutionally deprived southerners of their property in slaves, thus violating the Due Process Clause by its substance.

In the aftermath of the Civil War, another infamous case involving federal protections of rights for newly freed black Americans brought substantive due process back to the judicial forefront. Under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, state governments were now prohibited from denying due process for their citizens. In the Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873), however, the U.S. Supreme Court narrowly interpreted the due process guarantee against state government actions to pertain chiefly to newly freed slaves. Yet, according to Justice Stephen J. Field's dissent in the case, the Due Process Clause protected a God-given liberty "to pursue a lawful employment in a lawful manner." Given the nation's growing industrialization and philosophical adherence to a free-market capitalistic economy, the U.S. Supreme Court, through substantive due process, embarked on a path of what many critics considered to be judicial activism, in support of laissez-faire economics.

ECONOMIC SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS

With the Industrial Revolution and the expansion of government regulatory efforts, economic matters became subject to the Supreme Court's use of substantive due process. Under this approach, the Court reviewed regulatory laws, such as those regulating rates charged by grain elevators and railroads as well as state prohibition of liquor, to determine whether the regulations were "reasonable" or if they violated an individual's constitutionally protected rights, particularly the right to determine one's employment. In Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623 (1887), the Court declared unconstitutional the substance of a Kansas law prohibiting intoxicating beverages. Ten years later, in Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U.S. 578 (1897), the Court struck down a state law requiring all corporations to pay Louisiana a fee if they did any business with a state citizen. The Court held that the law interfered with an individual's ability to freely contract his livelihood and employment.

The high point of economic substantive due process came with Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), in which the Court invalidated a New York law regulating the employment of bakery employees, based on an infringement of the right to contract between an employer and employee. The court came to its judgment by questioning if the state law was a "fair, reasonable and appropriate exercise" of its power, deciding instead that the law's substance violated an individual's freedom to contract his employment. This case heralded the beginning of the Court's activism in striking down government regulations (minimum-wage laws, for example), a proactive Court position that continued until the New Deal, with some notable exceptions.

The antagonism between the Court and the New Deal administration came to a head with the Supreme Court striking down New Deal regulations of the economy and President Franklin D. Roosevelt proposing his "Court-packing" plan to gain acceptance of government regulatory power in 1937. The Court, recognizing that the use of substantive due process to strike down government regulation was losing favor, ruled in two important cases (one dealing with a state minimum-wage law for women, the other concerning the constitutionality of a government regulatory agency) that legislatures could protect those who were unable to protect themselves in contracting their work. With the "switch in time that saved nine," the Court allowed government economic regulations to stand and thus ended the practice of scrutinizing the substance of legislation in economic matters.

SOCIAL POLICY AND SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS

Nevertheless, the doctrine of substantive due process was not abandoned with the Court's acceptance of economic regulations. The Court subsequently turned its attention to matters regarding social policy. The basis of this new intervention into the substance of legislation could be traced to footnote four of Justice Harlan F. Stone's majority opinion in United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). In it, Justice Stone argued that the Court could review the substance of legislation dealing with such issues as religious, racial, and political discrimination. This led later Courts to determine the validity of many social issues, using substantive due process to read unexpressed liberties into constitutional provisions, most notably the right of privacy.

For example, a Connecticut law restricting the ability of married couples to receive contraceptive devices from their physicians was declared unconstitutional, due to the fact that "various guarantees create zones of privacy" within the U.S. Constitution, as the Court expressed it in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). The most famous use of substantive due process was in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), in which the Court used the right of privacy to strike down the substantive restrictions of state abortion laws regulating a woman's right to terminate a pregnancy, particularly in the first three months.

Nevertheless, on occasion the Court has been unwilling to strike down laws that interfere with sexual activities and the perceived right to die. In Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), the Court upheld a Georgia statute that outlawed sodomy (the Georgia Supreme Court later declared the statute a violation of the state constitution), but the Court later reversed itself in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003). In Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990), the Supreme Court allowed the state to regulate how and when someone could declare a desire to terminate medical procedures. Continued controversies over the Court's power to review the substance of legislation will continue to make substantive due process an integral concept to understanding civil liberties in the United States.

J. Michael Bitzer

See also: Due Process of Law; Lochner v. New York; Right to Privacy; Slaughterhouse Cases.

FURTHER READING

Corwin, Edwin. "The Basic Doctrine of American Constitutional Law." Michigan Law Review 12 (1914): 247.

———. "The 'Higher Law' Background of American Constitutional Law." Harvard Law Review 42 (1928–29): 149.

Gillman, Howard. The Constitution Besieged: The Rise and Demise of Lochner-Era Policy Powers Jurisprudence. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1993.

Kens, Paul. Lochner v. New York: Economic Regulation on Trial. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.

Rosenberg, Gerald N. Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.

Subversive Speech

Governments have an inherent right to survive, a corollary of which is that they have the right to take action against subversive action, including subversive speech. The term "subversive speech" is ambiguous, for it contains two ideas: speech and action. Although speech and action are obviously not coextensive, neither are they necessarily mutually exclusive. Despite the fact that the First Amendment generally protects speech but not action, both rules are subject to exception. For example, some action, like burning the U.S. flag, can be so intimately connected to expression that the First Amendment protects it, as the U.S. Supreme Court held in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), and United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990). Pure speech at one end becomes so inextricably linked to action that the two are indistinguishable. Subversive speech is of that type.

The old adage "Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me" captures the distinction between words and actions, but when words are likely to produce an imminent and unlawful act—"hurting one's bones"—the First Amendment does not protect the words. The Court made this distinction in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968): "[W]hen 'speech' and 'non-speech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest can justify incidental limitations on [speech]." Courts have been very quick to find such an important governmental interest in matters involving national security, especially in times of war.

Subversive acts include treason, espionage, sabotage, sedition, terrorism, and insurrection. Of the group, sedition is the most likely to involve subversive speech, for it involves inciting others—usually by speech—to commit overt acts of subversion. The U.S. government proscribed subversive expression as early as 1798 with enactment of the alien and sedition laws, which prohibited any person from writing, printing, uttering, or publishing any false or scandalous and malicious statements about the government of the United States, including both houses of Congress and the president. The 1798 act (1 Stat. 596) was a response to perceived insurrection by French sympathizers during a period when the United States faced a possible war against France.

Later Congress enacted measures to promote national security by curtailing subversive speech either during wartime or in response to the perceived post–World War II Communist threat. These included the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Sedition Act of 1918, both enacted during World War I; the Alien Registration (Smith) Act of 1940, enacted on the eve of World War II; and the Internal Security (McCarran) Act of 1950 and the Communist Control Act of 1955, which Congress enacted in the early stages of the Cold War with the Soviet Union. These acts dealt with subjects from obtaining and using national defense information and interfering with the war efforts in various ways to prohibiting speech that advocated or advised the violent overthrow of the U.S. government.

One of the earliest Supreme Court decisions dealing with subversive speech was Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), which involved the prosecution of Charles Schenck, general secretary of the Socialist Party, and others for distributing antidraft materials to men the government was recruiting for military service. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., speaking for a unanimous Court in upholding the constitutionality of the 1917 Espionage Act and Schenck's conviction, enunciated the now famous "clear and present danger" test. The test, according to Justice Holmes, depends on whether one's words are "used in such circumstances and are of such nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent."

Although the clear-and-present-danger test underwent some changes after 1919, it has remained essentially intact. The Court addressed it more recently in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), and altered the wording somewhat. Clarence Brandenburg had been found guilty of violating Ohio's criminal syndicalism statute by speaking at a Ku Klux Klan rally where he made a threat of revenge against the president, Congress, and the Supreme Court. The author of the per curiam opinion in the decision that reversed his conviction stated that expression is within the protection of the First Amendment unless it "is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."

After the nation sustained the major terrorist attack on September 11, 2001, in New York City, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania, Congress quickly acted to broaden the scope of antiterrorism laws to include a new category, which it called "domestic terrorism." Section 802 of the USA Patriot Act of 2001 (U.S. Code, Vol. 18, sec. 2332) defines "domestic terrorism" to include "acts dangerous to human life that are a violation of the criminal laws" if they "appear to be intended . . . to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion" and if they "occur primarily within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States." The practical implications for the tension between civil liberties and national security under such legislation must await more definitive decisions by the courts.

Clyde E. Willis

See also: Alien and Sedition Acts; Clear and Present Danger; Espionage Act of 1917; Patriot Act; Schenck v. United States; Sedition Act of 1918; Smith Act Cases.

FURTHER READING

Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. Freedom of Speech. Buffalo, NY: W. S. Hein, 1996.

USA Patriot Act. U.S. Code, Vol. 18, sec. 2332 (2001).

Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Suicide

See Physician-Assisted Suicide; Right to Die

Summary Judgment

A civil lawsuit is a proceeding in the courts between private parties to enforce private rights or remedy private wrongs. The party initiating the lawsuit, the plaintiff, files a document stating the claims, a complaint, against one or more other persons, the defendants. Although plaintiffs file lawsuits with the presumption that the claims will result in a trial before a judge (bench trial) or a jury (jury trial), most civil lawsuits terminate before trial. Summary judgment is one of the ways in which this pretrial termination may occur. In federal courts, summary judgment is governed by Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. State courts have procedural rules governing summary judgment as well.

Summary judgment is a procedural device that allows a court to grant a judgment on the merits for a party as to part or all of the claims asserted. The basic requirement for a court to grant a party's motion for summary judgment is that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that, based on these undisputed facts, the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. The essence of the motion for summary judgment is that a trial is unnecessary because the important (or material) facts underlying the plaintiff's complaint are not in dispute and the law as applied to these facts shows that the party filing (typically the defendant) is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

Before considering a motion for summary judgment, parties are usually allowed to develop the relevant facts and present those facts to the court. This process of developing the facts is called discovery and usually involves an exchange of documents between the parties, responses to written questions proposed by the opposing party, and even sworn oral testimony outside of the courtroom context (depositions). After the parties have engaged in whatever discovery they deem necessary, either or both of them may move for summary judgment as to some or all of the plaintiff's claims.

In order to grant a motion for summary judgment, the court must conclude that all of the material facts related to the plaintiff's claim are undisputed. Applying the law to these undisputed facts, the court reaches a determination that one party or the other is entitled to judgment, and the claims in the lawsuit challenged by the summary judgment motion are dismissed, subject to appeal to a higher court.

Granting a summary judgment motion might seem at odds with the right to a trial by jury provided in the Seventh Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. This concern is more superficial than real, since a jury's job primarily is to resolve factual disputes. By definition, the motion for summary judgment will be granted only if there are no material facts in dispute—there is nothing for the jury to resolve. Recognizing, however, the potential for summary judgment to impose on the province of the jury, courts grant motions for summary judgment sparingly.

One benefit of summary judgment is that it disposes of litigation before a possible costly and time-consuming trial, conserving the parties' and the court's resources. The potential for losing the case at this pretrial stage arguably encourages the parties to determine actively all of the underlying material facts and be prepared to challenge the motion should it be brought. This active exploration of the facts also may enlighten the parties as to the strength of their claims and defenses, which may encourage settlement negotiations and ultimate pretrial settlement.

Other examples of disposition before trial are default judgment, dismissal for failure to state a claim, and settlement. Once a plaintiff serves a complaint, the defendant has a set time, for example, twenty days, to answer the complaint. If a defendant fails to respond to the complaint within the designated time period, the defendant "defaults" and a court may grant the plaintiff a "default judgment." This terminates the litigation, unless the defendant successfully can vacate the judgment. A default judgment is the penalty for not showing up in court.

A defendant also may challenge the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's claim by filing a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Assuming everything that the complaint sets out is true, this pleading challenges whether the law can recognize any legal violation based on the facts. For example, if a complaint alleges that the plaintiff was not invited to dinner by the defendant when a number of mutual friends were, the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim will prevail. Discourteous behavior is not the type of conduct for which the law generally provides a remedy. People may not like the behavior, but it does not give rise to a legal claim.

A party may file a lawsuit and then decide that the time and expense of pursuing judicial relief is not worth it. For this and for many other reasons, the parties to a lawsuit may settle their dispute before trial by some negotiated compromise. Settlement is the most common form of disposition of civil litigation before trial.

John H. Matheson

See also: Seventh Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Glannon, Joseph W. Civil Procedure: Examples and Explanations. 4th ed. New York: Aspen, 1999.

Suspect Classifications

Suspect classifications involve laws enacted or presumed to be enacted with an intent to discriminate against a specific class or group of people. Most laws are enacted to achieve reasonable public policy goals. However, because of the legacy of slavery and the history of race relations in the United States, laws classifying people based on race are presumed to be discriminatory, or suspect, under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. The U.S. Supreme Court identifies the groups protected by the Equal Protection Clause and develops standards of review for laws alleged to violate it.

Ratified in 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to protect the rights of the newly freed slaves, but the wording of the amendment is broad. States cannot enact laws that abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens; deny persons life, liberty, or property without due process; or deny persons the equal protection of the laws. The Equal Protection Clause limits the policy-making authority of the states by making sure that state laws are applied evenhandedly, so that the same rules apply to everyone.

After the Civil War, southern states enacted laws that discriminated against blacks. These laws were grounded in prejudice and were intended to discriminate. Yet the Supreme Court did not initially interpret the Equal Protection Clause in a way that protected blacks. In Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that "separate but equal" accommodations for blacks and whites did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. Thus, laws segregating people by race received constitutional protection that did not begin to erode until almost a half century later.

A fundamental shift in constitutional perspective occurred during the 1930s. Between the end of the Civil War and the late 1930s, the Court focused much of its attention on cases involving federalism and government regulation of business. The country was undergoing social and political changes, and people were demanding protection of their civil rights and liberties under the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) and the Fourteenth Amendment. Members of the Court, notably Justices Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. and Louis D. Brandeis, articulated new approaches to interpreting First Amendment freedoms. The Court rendered landmark decisions involving the First Amendment and applied First Amendment freedoms to state action through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The concept of suspect classifications also evolved during this time, from perhaps the most famous footnote in constitutional history. In his majority opinion in United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), Justice Harlan Fiske Stone suggested in footnote four that judges pay closer attention to cases involving legislation affecting fundamental rights, such as the rights protected by the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment; laws restricting political processes; and laws singling out "discrete and insular minorities." Justice Stone's suggestion steered the Court down the path of accepting and deciding cases involving individual rights and liberties, including those protected by the Equal Protection Clause.

In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), Justice Hugo L. Black declared that laws singling out particular ethnic-racial groups would be subject to a higher level of judicial scrutiny than other laws. This concept later evolved into the strict-scrutiny test. To survive strict scrutiny, a law must serve a compelling government interest and use the least restrictive means possible to achieve that compelling interest. Ironically, the Korematsu Court upheld the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II.

The Court defined the criteria for inclusion in a suspect classification in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973). Writing for the Court, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. declared the criteria for inclusion to be "an immutable characteristic determined solely by the accident of birth, or a class saddled with such disabilities, or subjected to such a history of purposeful unequal treatment, or regulated to such a political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process."

The protection extended suspect classifications requires proof of intent to discriminate, which is difficult if not impossible to prove. It is much easier to prove that the burden of some laws, regardless of intent, falls more heavily on certain groups. In Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977), the Court held that discriminatory intent could be proved by showing a law had highly disparate impact.

The Court's equal protection jurisprudence is controversial, and over the years, groups have tried to move under the protective umbrella of suspect classifications. In the 1960s, the Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren added alienage to the category of suspect classifications, but the Court does not always use the strict-scrutiny test for this category of cases. Religion is also considered a suspect classification, although there have been no Supreme Court cases defining it as such. Although they have not met with total success, other groups have succeeded in getting the Court to create an intermediate category, "disfavored" classifications. This category applies to a greater or lesser degree to state laws that classify on the basis of gender, age, disability, poverty, and illegitimacy. The applicable standard of review for such classifications is generally called intermediate-level scrutiny.

Judith Haydel

See also: Fundamental Rights; Intermediate-Level Scrutiny; Skinner v. Oklahoma; Strict Scrutiny.

FURTHER READING

Baer, Judith A. Equality Under the Constitution: Reclaiming the Fourteenth Amendment. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1983.

McWhirter, Darien A. Equal Protection. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx, 1995.

Nelson, William E. The Fourteenth Amendment: From Political Principle to Judicial Doctrine. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1988.

Peltason, J. W., and Sue Davis. Corwin and Peltason's Understanding the Constitution. 15th ed. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt College, 2000.

Symbolic Speech

Symbolic speech is communication that is expressed through conduct and is usually nonverbal and nonwritten. The U.S. Supreme Court has generally afforded protection for such expression under the right to free speech contained in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Examples of protected symbolic speech include the wearing of armbands and the burning of flags. When symbolic speech is peaceful and neither poses a threat to the community nor intrudes upon an important government interest, it is protected as being comparable to traditional forms of political speech, such as demonstrations, leafleting, and public speeches; otherwise, it may be regulated in various ways. The Court has said that symbolic acts will be protected except when they cause harm that is specific or direct in nature.

BURNING DRAFT CARDS

In United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), the Supreme Court set the standard by which symbolic speech would be tested in examining a law, passed during the Vietnam War, that prohibited the burning of draft cards. David O'Brien burned his card in opposition to the war, claiming that this act amounted to symbolic speech. The government disagreed, arguing that there was a legitimate government interest in preventing the destruction of draft cards that was separate and distinct from the regulation of speech: Draft cards revealed draft status and information that easily and efficiently allowed communication between the citizen and the government during a time of war.

The Court accepted the government's reason as a neutral interest that was sufficiently removed from the individual's right of free expression and viewed its possible effect on speech as secondary and justified. In so ruling, the Court established the four-part "O'Brien test" to determine when laws regarding limitations on expressive conduct were to be permitted:

1. Is the law within the constitutional power of the government?
2. Does the law further a substantial or important government interest?
3. Is the interest unrelated to the suppression of free expression?
4. If the conduct is related to speech, are the means used by government to meet important government interests the least restrictive possible with regard to free speech?

ARMBANDS IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), also decided during the Vietnam War, affirmed the right of students to wear black armbands in protest of the war. Although the school argued it had a legitimate interest in maintaining order, the Court did not believe this interest had been threatened here, and it held that the rule banning the armbands constituted suppression of the students' right to expression. In so ruling, the Court began the process of more evenly balancing the right to symbolic speech as against governmental interests, such as preservation of order.

FLAG BURNING

Although O'Brien established that the burning of draft cards implicated a legitimate government interest, in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), the Supreme Court found that flag burning and desecration did not implicate an important government interest that was distinct from the expression the conduct was meant to convey. Prior to Johnson, the Court had done everything it could to avoid addressing the constitutionality of flag burning directly. In Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974), for example, the Supreme Court specifically stated that the O'Brien test was not applicable because "the Court for decades has recognized the communicative connotations of the use of flags." In Spence a flag was affixed with a removable peace sign and then displayed in a window. In a ruling that rested narrowly on the grounds that the taped-on symbol did not threaten the physical integrity of the flag, the Court overturned the petitioner's conviction.

In Texas v. Johnson (1989), the Court addressed flag burning directly. The Texas law specified not only that the actor had to deface or damage the flag, but also that the actor must know that such action would seriously offend one or more persons likely to observe or discover the action. In overturning Gregory Johnson's conviction, the Court found that the statute turned standard thinking about symbolic speech on its head. Instead of permitting the conduct because of its political or otherwise expressive content, the law banned the burning of a flag because it was expressive. Texas argued that its interest in the law was in preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity. The Court replied that this interest was related to suppressing free expression; that is, it was content-based because any reason the government might have to ban this form of symbolic speech would necessarily be based on the content of that speech and therefore constitutionally invalid. Although many people find flag burning and the message it communicates to be offensive, the Court wrote that this was not enough to permit the government to prohibit the behavior. Rather, the First Amendment was designed to protect especially that speech with which others disagree.

In fact, the Texas law, as well as the similar Flag Protection Act of 1989 passed by Congress shortly after Johnson—and invalidated in United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990)—would have prohibited the use of the symbol of the flag by some speakers and not others, because the law limited only speakers with a particular viewpoint. A person owning an old, tattered flag could respectfully burn it in a ceremony in order to dispose of it; a protester could not perform essentially the same action in opposition to a government policy.

CROSS BURNING

In R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), the Court addressed cross burning and the use of other symbols that might be considered symbolic speech or expressive conduct. Saint Paul, Minnesota, had a hate-crime ordinance (the Bias-Motivated Crime Ordinance) that banned the use of Nazi swastikas, burning crosses, and similar symbols to arouse fear or anger on the basis of race, color, creed, religion, or gender. The city argued that the law merely prohibited the use of fighting words—that is, speech that in a specific context is directed at specific individuals and is likely to bring about a breach of peace, usually by speech that is threatening or intimidating. Fighting words are not constitutionally protected speech under First Amendment principles.

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court found Saint Paul's antibias law unconstitutional because it banned the offensive symbols only when used by the proponents of racial and religious hatred. Speakers who had other intentions, such as opposing racial intolerance, could use the symbols as they pleased. The ordinance prevented the use of these fighting words only by specific groups, therefore creating an unconstitutional content-based restriction on speech.

The Supreme Court was willing to prohibit cross burning when the action was directly tied to a specific threat. The Court again dealt with a cross-burning law in Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003), stating that the law was permissible only when the action was carried out with an attempt to intimidate. The ruling was consistent with R.A.V. because it dealt specifically with cross burning, with the Court noting that this particular act had a long history in the United States and that in certain circumstances, burning a cross could become a truly threatening action rather than being simply speech. When used in situations of intimidation, with the perpetrator using the symbol to cause fear, the state may regulate the conduct because it would be a "true threat," a threat in which the speaker was communicating a serious expression of an intent to commit an act of unlawful violence to a particular individual or group of individuals. Because the Ku Klux Klan historically often used the burning of crosses to relay this message, the conduct still holds the same threat today and is therefore not protected when used to intimidate in this manner. The place in U.S. history of a burning cross as a particularly dangerous form of intimidation made it legal for the state to single it out for prohibition. When the act of burning a cross is a specific threat directed toward an individual, it is no longer protected symbolic speech and has become action that is not protected by the First Amendment.

Ronald Kahn

See also: First Amendment; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul; Texas v. Johnson; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District.

FURTHER READING

Bollinger, Lee C., and Geoffrey R. Stone. "Dialogue." In Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era, ed. Lee C. Bollinger and Geoffrey R. Stone, 1–31. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.

Goldstein, Robert Justin. Flag Burning and Free Speech: The Case of Texas v. Johnson. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Johnson, John W. The Struggle for Student Rights: Tinker v. Des Moines and the 1960s. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1997.

T

Taft, William Howard (1857–1930)

The only man to serve as the nation's president (1909–1913) and as chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court (1921–1930), William Howard Taft had remarkably varied experience in public service. Yet every office he held was appointive except for the one term when he was elected president as the hand-picked candidate of predecessor Theodore Roosevelt. Taft proved an ineffective and unhappy campaigner and much preferred the Court to the White House.

Today, Taft is primarily remembered as the leading advocate of judicial reform in the early years of the twentieth century and as a conservative president. He is considered the leader of a conservative, probusiness Court during the presidencies of Warren G. Harding and Calvin Coolidge in the 1920s. Yet Taft's conservatism is often overestimated; as both president and chief justice, he produced a record that had more progressive aspects than is commonly recognized.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

When Theodore Roosevelt left the White House, Secretary of War Taft was his choice as a successor. The two men had developed a close relationship over the years, although they were a study in contrasts. Roosevelt loved the political world; Taft detested campaigning. Roosevelt was a dynamic personality; Taft was a plodder. Roosevelt was an orator; Taft was a poor public speaker. Roosevelt was a bundle of energy and activity; Taft was grossly overweight and lethargic.

As president, Taft had a more cautious and restrained view of the presidency than did Roosevelt. Taft's presidency was limited to one term due to a break with Roosevelt precipitated by Roosevelt's ambition and sense that his brand of progressivism had been betrayed by Taft. Particularly disturbing, from the perspective of progressives, was Taft's support for high tariffs and for his Department of Interior secretary, who was accused of favoring private interests over Roosevelt's conservation policies. Taft also refused openly to support the revolt against the dictatorial control of the House of Representatives by Speaker Joseph Cannon. Yet Taft's antitrust efforts surpassed those of Roosevelt. About seventy antitrust suits were pursued in the four years of the Taft administration compared with about forty in Roosevelt's seven years as president. The Mann-Elkins Act of 1910, which strengthened railroad rate regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, was also passed during the Taft administration, as was postal savings bank legislation, both strongly supported by progressives.

Although Taft's presidency was a progressive-conservative one, the split with Roosevelt led to a split in the Republican Party. The result was the election of Democrat Woodrow Wilson in 1912.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE COURT

In keeping with his long-standing interest in the judiciary, President Taft had significant impact on the composition of the federal courts. In his term in office, he named 45 percent of all federal judges and named six justices to the Supreme Court. One of Taft's judicial appointments was Chief Justice Edward E. White. Court observers often claimed that Taft appointed him calculating that White's advanced age would give Taft a chance to be appointed chief justice. Indeed, Taft was appointed chief justice in 1921 upon White's death.

Taft proved to be an activist chief justice. He recommended judicial appointments to the president and lobbied Congress for judicial reforms. Although Taft's years on the Court produced conservative judicial activism through which the Court promoted a pro–property rights agenda against the social legislation of both the states and national government, Taft was not always on the conservative side. In Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495 (1922), for example, Taft showed a broad view of the power to regulate interstate commerce. In his dissent in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923), he rejected the majority's liberty-of-contract argument in favor of a minimum wage for women in the District of Columbia. However, Taft would not accept the social engineering involved in taxing child labor and struck down the Child Labor Tax Law of 1919 in Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co., 259 U.S. 20 (1922).

Although William Howard Taft's years on the Supreme Court are remembered as an era of conservative judicial activism, during which the Court promoted a pro–property rights agenda against the social legislation of both the states and national government, Taft was not always on the conservative side. (Library of Congress)

In noneconomic regulation cases, Taft's votes were generally conservative. He voted to uphold the sterilization of the mentally retarded in Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927). In Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), he wrote the majority opinion holding that the tapping of telephone lines did not violate the Fourth Amendment (Burton 1998). His judicial record, much like his presidency, was mixed. However, as a skillful social leader—as opposed to intellectual leader—of the Court, he excelled and proved his great strength in judicial administration.

Anthony Champagne

See also: Judicial Review; Olmstead v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Burton, David H. Taft, Holmes, and the 1920s Court: An Appraisal. Madison, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1998.

Coletta, Paolo E. The Presidency of William Howard Taft. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1973.

Mason, Alpheus Thomas. William Howard Taft: Chief Justice. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.

Pringle, Henry F. The Life and Times of William Howard Taft. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1939.

Takings Clause

The Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that the government cannot take private property for public use without paying the property owner "just compensation." One of the many complaints the revolting colonists had about the British crown was the royal prerogative to seize, or "take," the privately owned property of individuals or businesses for almost any reason, usually without any compensation.

There are two forms of takings. One is by the government's right of eminent domain. Under eminent domain, or condemnation, the government may take private property for a public use or purpose. But it must first legally condemn the property and then pay the owner for the fair market value of the property. The other type of taking occurs when a government regulation or action has the effect of depriving a property owner of any viable economic use of that property. This is sometimes referred to as a regulatory taking.

The Takings Clause originally applied only to actions of the federal government, as did all of the original Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution). The clause did not apply to actions of the several state governments. This hands-off approach regarding the states reflected not only the distrust the framers of the Constitution had of a very powerful central government but also the demands of the states for autonomy. These sentiments also were reflected in the Ninth and Tenth Amendments.

It was not until after passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, ratified July 9, 1868, that the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment was extended by the U.S. Supreme Court to the actions of individual states. This was accomplished by a doctrine known as "incorporation." The Supreme Court reasoned that the Fourteenth Amendment, by declaring all citizens of the various states also to be citizens of the United States, provided that any individual state action that abridged the rights of citizens of the United States under the federal Constitution was unlawful. The Fourteenth Amendment "incorporates" certain rights provided in the U.S. Constitution and applies them to the states under the Due Process Clause. This interpretation provided a powerful new tool for challenging the actions of individual states that discriminated against one or more individuals or groups.

Federal, state, and local governments engage in many activities that require the use of land, for example, for buildings, parks, water facilities, reclamation projects, and the like. These needs can be met by exercising the government's power of eminent domain. The tract, right-of-way, or parcel needed by the government must be condemned according to well-established procedures. Once the property is condemned, its fair market value is determined, and the government must pay the private owner for the property.

The issue of a "taking" outside the exercise of eminent domain arises when a property owner establishes that some government action not part of a formal condemnation proceeding nevertheless has "taken" property without the consent of the owner and without compensation. These claims normally arise from some type of regulation of the use of land. This may include forbidding or limiting construction on or other uses of land that is environmentally sensitive or aesthetically desirable, for example. Regulatory takings frequently involve the use of zoning as an urban-planning tool, which has the effect of limiting the economic uses to which privately owned land can be put, thus diminishing its value. It should be noted, however, that zoning frequently can have the effect of increasing the value of land.

Court cases concerned with alleged takings proliferated over the decades, as the scope and complexity of government regulation of land use grew. This was especially true with the growth of densely populated urban areas. With increasing congestion and stress on the environment, plus the growing desire for quiet, tranquil residential areas, the number of complaints alleging a governmental taking grew apace.

What precisely constitutes a regulatory taking requiring government compensation to an affected property owner is a complicated question. Federal and state courts have wrestled with this question in thousands of court cases. Public regulation for the "health, morals, safety, and welfare" of the community was accepted throughout the nineteenth century as necessary and beneficial and permitted in the exercise of the government's police power. Also not questioned was the fact that government's exercise of the police power might have the necessary consequence of limiting the property rights of some individuals and businesses. Where the issue was joined was to what extent government regulation could be imposed without going so far as to violate the constitutional rights of affected parties within the meaning of the Takings Clause.

One of the pioneering cases to address the takings issue was Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393 (1922). In the early 1900s, Pennsylvania, underlain with vast deposits of anthracite coal, was so heavily mined that parts of the state were suffering severe subsidence. Sections of the surface area literally were collapsing into the voids left by the empty mine shafts.

In an effort to control the problem, Pennsylvania passed the Kohler Act, which prohibited the mining of coal if it would result in the subsidence of any housing units. The Mahon family, owners of the surface rights to land for which the coal company held the mineral rights, sued to prevent the company from mining beneath their dwelling. The coal company claimed the act was unconstitutional and violated its Fifth Amendment rights.

Chief Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., writing for the Court, found that Pennsylvania's statute went too far and constituted a taking in violation of the Fifth Amendment. The opinion did not elaborate on what would constitute "too far" so as to constitute a taking, thus requiring that subsequent takings decisions had to be made on a case-by-case basis.

Later Supreme Court decisions did little to improve the precision with which takings determinations could be made. The Court issued numerous subsequent decisions, but each addressed a particular situation, and collectively they failed to develop a coherent body of Takings Clause law. The cases included Penn Central Transportation v. City of New York, 438 U.S. 104 (1978), which used a multifactor balancing test, including investor-backed expectations; Agins v. Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255 (1980), holding that substantial advancement of a legitimate state interest through residential zoning laws did not deny an owner all economically viable use of his land; Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, 483 U.S. 825 (1987), noting that the alleged taking must bear a reasonable relation (nexus) to the government interest advanced; Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003 (1992), finding a taking per se (in itself) when government deprived the owner of all economically viable use of the land; and the most recent, Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302 (2002), holding that a temporary moratorium on development was not a taking.

In addition to requiring that government compensate property owners, the Fifth Amendment requires that lands appropriated by the government shall be devoted to public use. The Supreme Court has interpreted this provision liberally, allowing the government in Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26 (1954), to condemn land that would be sold to private developers for slum clearance; and upholding in Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229 (1984), a state plan to condemn rental housing in Hawaii to break an oligopoly on the part of a small number of landowners.

James V. Cornehls

See also: Eminent Domain; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Selective Incorporation.

FURTHER READING

Bosselman, Fred P., David Callies, and John Banta. The Taking Issue. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1973.

Callies, David, ed. Takings: Land-Development Conditions and Regulatory Takings After Lucas and Dolan. Chicago, IL: American Bar Association, 1996.

Delaney, John J. "What Does It Take to Make a Take? A Post-Dolan Look at the Evolution of Regulatory Takings Jurisprudence in the Supreme Court." Urban Lawyer 27 (Winter 1995): 55–69.

Fischel, William. Regulatory Takings: Law, Economics, and Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.

U.S. Congressional Budget Office. Regulatory Takings and Proposals for Change. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1998.

Taney, Roger Brooke (1777–1864)

Roger Brooke Taney, who served from 1836 to 1864 as the fifth chief justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, had the difficult task of succeeding the legendary John Marshall. Although he never equaled his predecessor's brilliant performance or longevity on the high court, Taney traditionally has been ranked among its top dozen greatest justices. He achieved this rank despite his responsibility for the Dred Scott decision, Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857), often viewed as judicial blight—not only the worst decision in Supreme Court history but also a contributing factor to the outbreak of the Civil War.

ORIGINS

A border-state provincial born on Saint Patrick's Day in 1777, Taney was the third of seven children born into a Roman Catholic family in Calvert County, Maryland. He lived a privileged life in the same tidewater area of Maryland where his family roots extended back to the 1660s. He maintained his family's religious, social, and economic status quo, but the reputations of both Taney and his father were compromised in their later lives. Taney's father experienced late-life disgrace after killing someone during an argument and died a fugitive. Taney's Dred Scott decision, declaring that African Americans could never be citizens, permanently marred his otherwise great legal career.

Taney's father, an eldest son who had inherited the family estate, continued to support the practice of primogeniture even after it was abolished in Maryland. As a consequence, the elder Taney decided that second son, Roger, would become a lawyer. His decision even extended to choosing the college and subsequent clerkship for his son. The dutiful son won his father's approval at Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and then began a clerkship with a prominent judge in Annapolis. Taney was admitted to the bar in 1799, and that same year, at age twenty-two, he was elected to the Federalist seat formerly held by his father in the Maryland Legislature. He was defeated for reelection during the Jeffersonian landslide in Maryland.

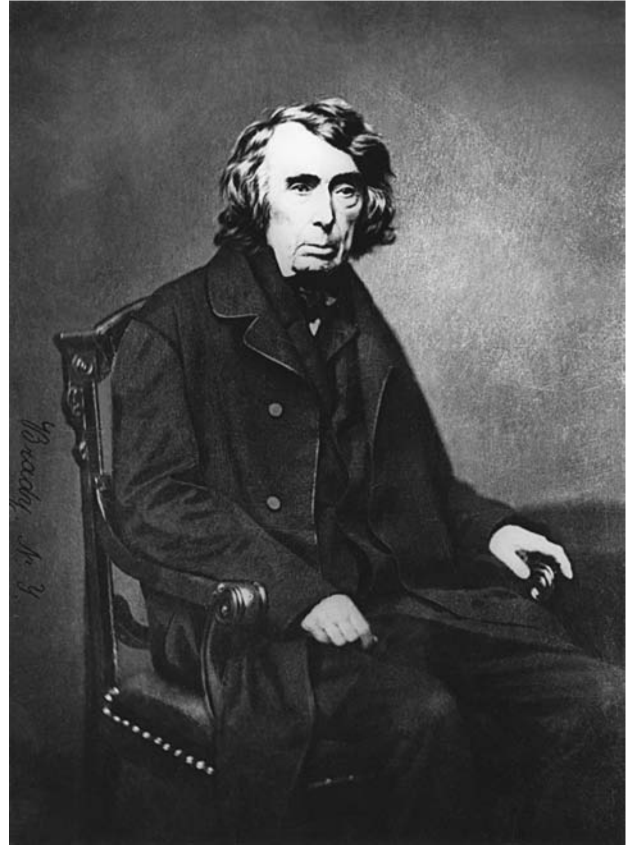
Taney practiced briefly in Annapolis before moving to Frederick in 1800. He remained there until he moved to Baltimore in 1823. In 1806, Taney solidified his social status by marrying Elizabeth Key, daughter of another wealthy plantation family and sister of Francis Scott Key, who later composed "The Star-Spangled Banner." During their lengthy marriage, the couple had six daughters and one son who died in infancy.

Unlike many New England Federalists, Taney supported the War of 1812 that transformed Andrew Jackson into a national hero and converted Taney into a Jacksonian Democrat. Taney reentered the political arena and was elected Maryland's attorney general in 1827. Both Jackson and Taney favored economic growth by small entrepreneurs over commercial monopolies. Both sympathized with slaveholders, although Taney had manumitted (freed) his slaves. Jackson rewarded the ever-loyal Taney by appointing him to his Cabinet, first as attorney general, then briefly as secretary of war, and temporarily as secretary of the treasury. Taney supported Jackson by engineering legal justifications for actions taken by the charismatic president. After Chief Justice John Marshall died in 1835, the Jackson revolution on the Court began. Jackson's first appointment was to name the loyal Taney as chief justice. The provincial Marylander became the first Catholic on the Supreme Court.



In 1857, Chief Justice Roger B. Taney wrote the majority opinion in Scott v. Sandford, a controversial ruling that neither the federal government nor territorial governments could prohibit slavery in the territories. (Library of Congress)

JACKSON JURISPRUDENCE

Both Jackson and Taney exhibited border-state personalities and favored less federal government intervention in the economy, except as related to the protection of slaveholders. Jackson's political philosophy of majority rule among whites—Indians were considered incidental—was echoed in the legal positivism of Taney's jurisprudence. Because he rejected the natural law found in the Declaration of Independence, Taney could justify whatever white majorities wanted. His approach worked well relative to banking, commerce, transportation, and other economic issues, but was disastrous for human rights. His ultimate solution for slavery was to encourage colonization abroad. His Dred Scott ruling reflected his fundamental hierarchical and provincial view of social life, but its judicial activism was atypical for Taney.

Taney and sixteenth president Abraham Lincoln conflicted over presidential actions during the Civil War. Some scholars praise Taney for his criticism of Lincoln's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus (a petition for release from unlawful confinement), but the same critics overlook Andrew Jackson's even more egregious behavior after the battle of New Orleans just as they overlook Jefferson Davis's widespread suspension of the same basic legal right.

On one level, Taney did introduce several democratic, if superficial, institutional changes in the Court. For example, he ended the custom among the brethren of wearing formal knee breeches, the practice of having the Court issue a single opinion, and the expectation that all justices live in the same boardinghouse.

He could abandon those external behaviors, but he could not abandon his fundamental elitism, ingrained by his aristocratic Southern upbringing, to embrace the democratic values of the Lincoln administration.

William D. Pederson

See also: Civil War and Civil Liberties.

FURTHER READING

Neely, Mark E., Jr. Southern Rights: Political Prisoners and the Myth of Confederate Constitutionalism. Charlottesville: University of Virginia, 1999.

Pederson, William D., and Norman W. Provizer, eds. Leaders of the Pack. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Swisher, Carl B. Roger B. Taney. New York: Macmillan, 1935.

Walker, Lewis. Without Fear of Favor: A Biography of Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965.

Taxation and Civil Liberties

The American Revolution will always be remembered for the slogan of "no taxation without representation," a rallying cry that has deep roots in English history. The war challenged the British Parliament over its right to tax the colonists, who had no political representation in that body. The Declaration of Independence noted that fundamental injustice: "The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. . . . He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation: . . . [f]or imposing taxes on us without our consent."

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS RELATED TO TAXATION

Remembering this grievance, the authors of the U.S. Constitution vested the taxing power in the people's representatives in Congress, who exercise the "power of the purse." Article I, Section 8 of the U.S. Constitution provides that Congress has the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises" and that "all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." The uniformity criterion imposes a restriction upon Congress that prohibits taxing the states differently or imposing taxes on some while exempting others, unless some specific constitutionally legitimate policy can be demonstrated. Congress has the power to regulate indirectly by taxation, as long as the measure bears some relationship to the production of government revenues.

The Sixteenth Amendment has further extended congressional power to tax incomes, a power the Supreme Court had originally denied in Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co., 158 U.S. 601 (1895). The Sixteenth Amendment, ratified in 1913, specified that "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration." Section 61(a) of the Internal Revenue Code provides that, except as otherwise provided by law, gross income means all income from whatever source derived. Therefore, Congress intends to tax all gains or undeniable accessions to wealth, clearly realized and required to be recognized, over which taxpayers have complete dominion, as the U.S. Supreme Court held in Commissioner v. Glenshaw Glass Co., 348 U.S. 426 (1955). It also means that Congress does not intend to tax wealth that was confiscated or expropriated and later returned or compensated through war, police action, or litigation, such as reparations to Nazi Holocaust survivors, or stolen assets that were returned or restored to the original rightful property owners. Nor does Congress intend to tax contributions to corporate capital, or the original cost of investments. Also, Congress does not intend to tax the distribution or return of original capital investments, held by shareholders, in contrast to or as distinguished from accretions to wealth. Even direct local government grants to corporate businesses, given as incentives to attract economic activity to enhance employment, may not be taxed.

Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution further grants Congress the power "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." Therefore, Congress is vested with the power to impose uniform taxes throughout the United States and to spend revenues accumulated from its taxing power. Congress has the power to spend revenues to promote any objective that it deems worthy, so long as it does not violate the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) or other specific constitutional limitations. The contours of the congressional power and reach to impose a tax was challenged in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936), which dealt with a 1933 tax on agriculture levied to pay for the extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of a national emergency relating to deflationary pressure on farmers and farm prices. The U.S. Supreme Court reiterated the Hamiltonian position that Congress had a substantive power to tax and appropriate, limited only by the requirement that it must be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States. However, the Court affirmed the reversal of the lower-court decision and opined that aggregating a large number of local agricultural issues into one large national problem did not solve the general welfare requirement, which must have a comprehensive broad and sweeping overall objective and not merely a local purpose. Such legislation may also not interfere with the states' regulatory powers under the Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

TAXPAYER SUITS AND EXEMPTIONS

The limitation on Congress to meddle in the areas reserved for the states may not be transformed into an argument about tracing the specific benefit at the individual citizen level. In Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923), the state, as representative of its citizenry, challenged the 1921 Maternity Act, and in this consolidated action, an individual citizen, Mrs. Frothingham, challenged the act because the statute represented a taking of or tax on her property without due process. The Supreme Court rejected the state's claim that this matter was reserved to the states and a usurpation of state power, because the federal appropriations were made optional, subject to state acceptance or rejection. Frothingham's claim was rejected because she had no "standing" to sue, since her personal interest in the case was comparatively so small. The Court reasoned that if every citizen taxpayer could challenge the congressional purpose and appropriation of every dollar of tax revenue, which is commingled in the treasury with those paid by millions of Americans, the result would be political anarchy, gridlock, and chaos.

The contours of this judicial precedent were somewhat refined in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968), a case involving the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, which prohibits government from engaging in activity that would constitute establishment of religion. The Court in Flast held that taxpayers could satisfy the standing requirement if they could demonstrate a personal stake in the outcome that would assure concrete adverse consequences. Thus taxpayers must show that the exercises of congressional power under the taxing and spending clause are unconstitutional because the expenditures directly affected the taxpayer and a strong nexus existed between the taxpayer's status and the alleged constitutional infringement.

The clash between the freedom of religion and the power to tax was further clarified in Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664 (1970), a case in which a taxpayer who owned Staten Island real property challenged the tax exemption afforded religious organizations for properties dedicated to religious use and worship. The taxpayer argued that the New York State Constitution that authorized this exemption to church property indirectly required the petitioner to make a contribution to religious bodies. This policy, he claimed, violated the First Amendment prohibition on the establishment of religion. The Court held that the tax exemption was not sponsorship because there was no physical transfer of money to the church; rather, the exemption meant the state abstained from collecting a tax. Moreover, it restricted the fiscal relationship between church and state and tended to complement and reinforce the desired separation insulating each from the other. In contrast, such an exemption will be restricted when the policies of the institution violate other constitutional provisions, such as racial discrimination. In Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983), for example, the Internal Revenue Service denied tax-exempt status to an educational institution that denied admission to applicants who participated in or advocated interracial marriages.

TAXATION AND FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS

The role of the judiciary as the ultimate interpreter of the liberties and rights protected in the Constitution is especially pertinent in the head-to-head confrontation and convergence between the constitutional power to tax versus the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press. Thus, in Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), the Supreme Court invalidated a tax on large newspapers that appeared to be directed against critics of Huey Long, a former powerful, populist-style governor of Louisiana and then U.S. senator. In Minneapolis Star and Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Commissioner of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575 (1983), the Court struck down a state tax on the ink and paper used in publishing newspapers because a special exemption within the statute was given to smaller newspapers, thus shifting the entire tax burden to the larger in-state newspapers. The Court balanced censorship against revenue raising and disallowed the tax as a potential suppression on critical commentary contrary to the First Amendment. In Arkansas Writers Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221 (1987), a general sales tax was held unconstitutional because it discriminated among a group of newspapers, exempting some but taxing others. Once again, the potential for censorship overwhelmed the taxing power.

The clash between taxation and rights emerges when a tax measure creates imbalances among competing interests or rights—that is, it disfavors or burdens some conduct or behavior that is alleged or deemed to be a constraint on a fundamental right of one group of citizens at the expense of another group.

STATE TAXATION VERSUS CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

There is a body of state cases holding that the taxing power may not be exercised for private purposes but may only be exercised to serve public purposes. The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. The Supreme Court has generally applied a rational-basis test in determining whether a nonfederal classification or taxing scheme has met a legitimate state purpose and thus does not violate equal protection. Therefore, states can divide and tax all forms of property into different groups at varying rates. In one case a New York state tax violated equal protection because it artificially singled out taxpayers who operated in-house refrigerated warehouses and categorized them as utilities. Ultimately, the highest state court in Merchants Refrigerating Co. v. Taylor, 275 N.Y. 113, 9 N.E.2d 799 (1937), recognized that such warehouses were not regulated by the public service commission, and thus the tax was upheld on the receipts derived from refrigeration furnished to persons outside the taxpayer's building.

Furthermore, the states have attempted to regulate the growth of chain stores within their boundaries via tax classification schemes. In A&P v. Grosjean, 301 U.S. 412 (1937), the Supreme Court upheld an incremental regressive tax on the number of stores owned by the taxpayer irrespective of in-state or out-of-state location. The national grocery chain was taxed at $550 per store but the local in-state Louisiana grocery chain was taxed at $30 per store. The classification of the number of stores was held to be reasonable, and the Court struck down the argument that only A&P stores located in Louisiana should be counted in the license tax. By contrast, the adoption of Proposition 13 in 1978 limiting property taxes in California gave rise to Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1 (1992), in which the Court permitted the state to set property tax rates for senior citizens and longtime residents that differed from rates for other taxpayers.

However, state tax discrimination against foreign nonprofit entities conducting charitable, educational, or other activities within the state under a state grant that would confer tax exemption to the domestic entity providing similar services would not withstand equal protection challenge. Thus, in WHYY v. Borough of Glassboro, 393 U.S. 117 (1968), a foreign corporation engaged in noncommercial educational television, which owned and maintained a station and transmittal tower in New Jersey that shared a 70 percent out-of-state audience, successfully challenged a New Jersey Supreme Court decision denying an exemption on state property taxes.

The bulk of the controversies in these tax cases usually arise when a state is attempting to favor in-state resident taxpayers by taxing out-of-state or nonresident taxpayers at higher rates. Generally, the federal goals of preserving an integrated efficient national economy must be weighed against the rights of the states to impose taxation policy to promote economic growth within the state while protecting the respective citizenry domiciled within the state. In Metropolitan Life Insurance Company v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869 (1985), the majority opinion by the Court ruled that Alabama's declared purpose for taxing foreign insurance companies at higher rates was unconstitutional because the use of a taxing power to promote a domestic insurance industry and encourage capital investment within its state borders violated the Equal Protection Clause. In Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437 (1992), the state of Wyoming had standing to challenge another state's legislation requiring all power plants, public or private, to use Oklahoma coal, which created an overall reduction in specific Wyoming severance taxes that it collected on coal mined within its territorial boundaries. This was found to violate the dormant Commerce Clause. In general, taxation that does not affect interstate commerce, other than incidentally, does not fall within the broad constitutional doctrine that direct taxes that unduly burden interstate commerce will be overturned under the Commerce Clause.

Finally, governments use taxation as an instrument to promote favored economic and social policy. An example is the taxation of gun manufacturers that allow their guns to be acquired by those members of society who intend to do evil with the weapons. Here the Second Amendment right to bear arms clashes with government power through pending litigation to tax or penalize the gun-production industry. The result presents another showdown between competing rights.

J. David Golub

See also: Due Process of Law; Establishment Clause; Exclusionary Rule; Fundamental Rights; Standing.

FURTHER READING

Hellerstein, Jerome R., and Walter Hellerstein. State and Local Taxation Cases and Materials. 5th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1988.

———. State Taxation. Vols. 1–2. Boston: Warren Gorham and Lamont, 1998.

Holmes, Stephen, and Cass R. Sunstein. The Cost of Rights: Why Liberty Depends on Taxes. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.

Rotunda, Ronald D. Modern Constitutional Law: Cases and Notes. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1993.

Shughart, William F., II. Taxing Choice: The Predatory Politics of Fiscal Discrimination. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1997.

Ten Commandments: Posting

According to the book of Exodus in the Bible, when Moses descended Mount Sinai, he brought with him the Ten Commandments. Many displays of and references to the Ten Commandments are found throughout U.S. history. In fact, an image of Moses and the Ten Commandments currently adorns the wall of the U.S. Supreme Court. Nonetheless, in recent years some critics have claimed that posting the Ten Commandments on government property violates the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. According to that clause, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The Supreme Court has not yet definitively ruled on whether the posting of the Ten Commandments on government property violates the Establishment Clause. In Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980), the Court addressed the very narrow question of the constitutionality of a Kentucky state law requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in schoolrooms. In a five–four decision, the Court found the Kentucky law violated the Establishment Clause. Stone, however, concerned only a schoolroom posting and left unanswered the broader question of the constitutionality of the display of the Ten Commandments in other contexts.

In 2001, the Supreme Court had the opportunity to consider that broader question in City of Elkhart v. Books, 532 U.S. 1058 (2001), which involved a Ten Commandments monument resting outside the Elkhart, Indiana, courthouse. The lower court held that displaying the monument on government property violated the Establishment Clause, relying on the three-part test created by the U.S. Supreme Court in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), to address Establishment Clause challenges. Applying the Lemon test, the court asked whether the monument (1) had a secular (nonreligious) purpose; (2) had the principal effect of advancing or inhibiting religion; or (3) created an excessive entanglement with religion. The Books court concluded that because the Ten Commandments referenced God—"I am the Lord thy God" and "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain"—the monument had a religious purpose. The court concluded that the monument violated the second part of the Lemon test because its presence on government property suggested an endorsement of religion and thus had the effect of advancing religion. As such, the display was unconstitutional. The city of Elkhart unsuccessfully sought Supreme Court review, although three justices asserted the Court should have heard the appeal and indicated they viewed the display as constitutional. That view, however, did not prevail, which left intact the lower court's decision in Books.

Several other courts have followed similar reasoning, holding that the posting of the Ten Commandments on government property is unconstitutional. Recently, and indeed famously, a federal district court judge in Glassroth v. Moore, 229 F. Supp. 2d 1290 (M.D. Ala. 2002), held that the chief justice of the Alabama Supreme Court, Roy S. Moore, violated the Establishment Clause by placing in the courthouse rotunda a 5,280-pound granite monument that had engraved upon it, among other things, the Ten Commandments. The district court ordered the monument to be removed but stayed its ruling pending appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit. On July 1, 2003, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the district court, holding that Judge Moore violated the Establishment Clause by placing the monument in the courthouse. Moore's fellow judges refused to support him, and his monument was removed.

In contrast to the Books and Glassroth courts, the Colorado Supreme Court in State of Colorado v. Freedom from Religion Foundation, Inc., 898 P.2d 1013 (Colo. 1995), concluded that a Ten Commandments monument placed in a state park was constitutional. The court noted that the monument served a secular purpose—namely, recognition of the Ten Commandments as the foundation for the U.S. legal system. The court also concluded that the mere placement of the monument on government property did not constitute a governmental endorsement of religion. Following similar reasoning, in 2003 the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Freethought Society v. Chester County, 334 F.3d 247 (2003), held that a Pennsylvania county did not violate the Establishment Clause by refusing to remove a bronze Ten Commandments plaque placed on the courthouse facade in 1920.

Several judges, legal scholars, and lawmakers have supported the views expressed in the Colorado and Pennsylvania cases, comparing the posting of the Ten Commandments to constitutionally permissible holiday displays of religious symbols. The Supreme Court has held that nativity scenes and menorahs may be placed on government property without violating the Establishment Clause, even under the Supreme Court's formulation of that clause in Lemon. Specifically, the Court has reasoned that even though nativity scenes and menorahs are religious symbols, such displays serve the secular purpose of celebrating the nation's cultural heritage and the holiday season. The Court has also recognized that when religious symbols are but one aspect of a holiday display that also includes other nonreligious symbols, no inference can be drawn that the government is endorsing religion. Therefore, the Court has upheld such religious displays under the three-part Lemon test.

By analogy, many believe that the posting of the Ten Commandments on government property passes the Lemon test when the display also includes other historical documents. For instance, several governments have created displays that include the Ten Commandments, the Constitution, and the Declaration of Independence, the latter of which also references God. To date, however, most courts have concluded that these attempts to display the Ten Commandments on government property are unconstitutional. Until the Supreme Court resolves the conflict—for example, the variant opinions of the Third and Eleventh Circuits—the constitutionality of such displays will remain open to debate.

Margot O'Brien

See also: Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman; Religious Symbols and Displays.

FURTHER READING

Cowan, Bradley M. "The Decalogue in the Public Forum: Do Public Displays of the Ten Commandments Violate the Establishment Clause?" Ave Maria Law Review 2 (Spring 2004): 183–211.

Terry v. Ohio (1968)

In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the conviction of an individual who was arrested for the possession of concealed firearms after being searched by a police officer who suspected him of preparing to rob a store. The case is important because it not only upheld an important exception to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule—under which evidence illegally seized by police cannot be used to convict a person at trial—but it also appeared to give police broad discretion to stop and frisk individuals whom they suspect of committing a crime.

Under the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, police generally are required to obtain warrants to search and seize individuals. This means the government cannot randomly stop people and search them for evidence of a crime. Instead, the Constitution requires that there be some probable cause or "particularized suspicion" that a person has violated the law, and generally then a judge must issue a warrant that identifies the person or place to be searched and the items that are sought.

The exclusionary rule prohibiting use of illegally obtained evidence at trial was developed partly to forestall overzealous, illegal police activity. In Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), the Supreme Court applied this rule against the federal government, and then in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), the Court applied it to state and local governments. As a result of these decisions, police officers are generally required to have a warrant or some other good reason to stop people and search them. Nevertheless, there are certain exceptions to the warrant requirement, and one known as the stop-and-frisk exception arose from the Terry case.

Terry involved a thirty-year police veteran in Cleveland, Ohio, who observed two individuals pacing back and forth in front of a convenience store, occasionally and repeatedly looking in the window while talking to themselves and another party. Suspecting that they were planning on robbing the store, the officer approached them, and, believing they were armed, he frisked them and found concealed weapons. The two individuals were convicted; one (Terry) appealed his case to the Supreme Court, which upheld his conviction.

Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Earl Warren contended that the search was perfectly legal, ruling that the officer had articulable suspicion to stop the defendant, and that once the officer approached him, he could stop and frisk him to assure the officer's personal safety. In upholding the stop, the chief justice seemed willing to defer to a police hunch or suspicion that the suspect was contemplating some illegal action, and he argued that the stop-and-frisk could be considered a narrow, reasonable exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant and exclusionary rule requirements.

Supporters of the police consider Terry v. Ohio an important case defending and upholding the ability and discretion of officers to stop and search individuals whom they suspect of breaking the law. However, critics of the decision claim that it has opened up such wide discretion for police to stop people that it has led to abuses. For example, some commentators argue that Terry v. Ohio seems to endorse the stopping of people on the basis of race or other personal biases of the police, if such characteristics form the basis of the officer's hunch, and this, they contend, allows police to engage in racial profiling. In fact, the Terry defendant was African American, and some critics contend that had he been white, the Court would not have allowed the stop-and-frisk.

David Schultz

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio.

FURTHER READING

Heumann, Milton, and Lance Cassak. Good Cop, Bad Cop: Racial Profiling and Competing Views of Justice. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Texas v. Johnson (1989)

Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), was the controversial U.S. Supreme Court decision that overturned on free speech grounds the conviction of an outspoken political activist and self-styled Communist who had burned an American flag as part of a protest at the 1984 Republican National Convention. The decision unleashed a firestorm of political protest and ignited an effort to amend the U.S. Constitution to overturn it.

The case began at the 1984 Republican gathering in Dallas, Texas. Gregory Lee Johnson and a number of other protesters staged a series of demonstrations and "die-ins" to protest policies of President Ronald Reagan's administration on nuclear arms and Central America. During one demonstration, a fellow protester handed Johnson a flag that had been taken from in front of a local bank. Johnson doused the flag with lighter fluid and set it on fire. Johnson and eighteen other demonstrators were arrested, and Johnson was charged under a Texas statute for desecration of a venerated object. He was found guilty and sentenced to one year's imprisonment and a $2,000 fine.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals reversed Johnson's conviction by a five–four decision. The U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear the case and set oral arguments for March 1989. Noted litigator William Kunstler represented Johnson before the Court. On June 21, 1989, the Supreme Court issued its narrow five–four decision upholding the Texas court's reversal of Johnson's conviction.

In the majority opinion, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. stressed that Johnson's act was clearly one of political speech and that no evidence of a breach of peace was present. He stated, "We are tempted to say, in fact, that the flag's deservedly cherished place in our community will be strengthened, not weakened, by our holding today." Justices Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun, Antonin Scalia, and Anthony M. Kennedy, who wrote a concurring opinion, joined Justice Brennan.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, joined by Justices Byron R. White and Sandra Day O'Connor, filed a long and fervent dissent in which he recited flag history and quoted extensively from poems praising the flag. Justice John Paul Stevens also dissented, arguing that Texas had not prosecuted Johnson for the content of his message but only his means.

Public and political reaction to the decision was vitriolic and emotional. Nine days after the decision was released, President George H. W. Bush made a speech in front of the Iwo Jima Memorial endorsing a constitutional amendment to outlaw flag desecration. Many members of Congress also supported the amendment. Supporters of the flag amendment said the flag was a symbol of national unity and permitting its desecration dishonored veterans. Opponents of the amendment supported freedom of speech and argued that an amendment would lead to a weakened Constitution.

On June 26, 1990, the U.S. Senate defeated a constitutional amendment that would have overturned the Johnson decision. The issue played no role in subsequent elections and quickly dropped off the political landscape. The case remains an important one for symbolic speech and served as a catalyst for a national debate on the meaning of the First Amendment. The Supreme Court reaffirmed this decision in United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990), when it struck down the 1989 Flag Protection Act that the U.S. Congress had adopted in reaction to the Texas v. Johnson decision.

Charles C. Howard

See also: Flag Burning; Symbolic Speech; United States v. Eichman.

FURTHER READING

Goldstein, Robert Justin. Flag Burning and Free Speech: The Case of Texas v. Johnson. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Howard, Charles. "A Lonely Place of Honor: A Rhetorical Analysis of the Movement to Amend the Constitution to Prevent Flag Burning." Unpublished dissertation, University of Kansas, 1992.

Third Amendment

The Third Amendment to the U.S. Constitution reads: "No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law." The amendment reflects the concerns the framers of the Constitution had about past abuses committed by British soldiers, including the famous Boston Massacre.

HISTORICAL ORIGINS

The Third Amendment traces its origins to early Anglo-Saxon law. Beginning around the twelfth century, soldiers of various armies were making use of English homes, and many English towns began amending their charters to declare a right of citizens against the involuntary quartering of soldiers in their homes. This right eventually spread throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland but did not initially take serious root outside Britain. Despite this right, English citizens frequently were forced to quarter soldiers in their homes from the thirteenth through the seventeenth centuries. Citizens were constantly angered by this practice and frequently declared that it violated their rights. The 1689 English Bill of Rights, for example, included a statement declaring that the citizens' liberties had been infringed by this practice.

English colonization of North America continued the practice of quartering, which similarly brought continued public objections. Quartering became a major problem in the colonies during the French and Indian War (1754–1763). In 1765, the British Parliament passed the Quartering Act, which required the colonists to provide barracks, food, and other supplies to British soldiers. If enough barracks were not available, citizens were required to provide shelter to the troops in private buildings, such as barns. Under the act, limited compensation was supposed to be provided to private citizens for the food, supplies, and shelter given to the troops. However, the citizens were often paid less than what they were owed or were not paid at all.

As tensions between England and the American colonies increased, the British Parliament passed a second Quartering Act in 1774. This new act additionally authorized the quartering of troops in private homes, not just private buildings. This practice of quartering soldiers in private homes without the consent of citizens was listed in the U.S. Declaration of Independence as one of the abuses committed by King George against the colonies. Upon independence, most states included in their state constitutions a right against involuntary quartering of soldiers. When the new U.S. Constitution was proposed in 1787, the lack of a Bill of Rights was one of the key Antifederalist arguments against the ratification of the Constitution. As a result, the Federalists agreed to add a Bill of Rights to the Constitution after its ratification. Thereafter, James Madison submitted a proposed list of rights to the first Congress, one of which was a right against the involuntary quartering of soldiers. Congress passed this proposal, and the states ratified it; it became the Third Amendment to the Constitution.

The final wording of the amendment as it was adopted essentially means that government cannot house soldiers in private homes during peacetime without homeowners' consent. In time of war, however, the government may house soldiers in private homes but only subject to express preexisting guidelines written into law. This wartime exception was probably enacted to allow the government to engage in this practice in case of crisis or emergency, probably during a time of war.

LEGAL DEVELOPMENT

Despite the Third Amendment's protections, the U.S. government has disregarded these on more than one occasion. American troops were quartered in private residences during the War of 1812. During the Civil War, the Union army extensively quartered troops in residences in both loyal states in the North and rebellious states in the South, although most quartering occurred in southern states. Congress did eventually pay several hundred thousand dollars in claims based on quartering during the Civil War, but this was only a fraction of the potential total, and Congress did not provide any further compensation for such claims.

Since its adoption, the Third Amendment has come to be known as the "forgotten" amendment, because not a single case in U.S. history has ever been resolved based on the amendment; indeed, only a handful of cases have ever involved a direct Third Amendment claim. The most direct discussion of the Third Amendment came in Engblom v. Carey, 677 F.2d 1957 (2d Cir. 1982), which involved a claim by striking prison workers against the state of New York. The workers had been provided apartments on the prison site but were locked out of their residences by the prison superintendent when they went on strike. In response to the strike, the governor called out National Guard troops and housed them in what had been the workers' residences. The workers filed a lawsuit claiming violation of their Third Amendment right. Eventually the case was decided on other grounds, but both the trial court and the court of appeals noted the workers arguably had presented a legitimate Third Amendment claim.

The U.S. Supreme Court has only rarely cited the Third Amendment. Probably the most significant citation was in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S 479 (1965), in which the Court identified the Third Amendment as one of several amendments included in the Bill of Rights that together demonstrated the existence of a right of privacy in the Constitution. However, the Court later declared the right of privacy was instead found in the word "liberty" as included in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In short, absent any possible direct future violation of the language of the Third Amendment, it has little legal relevance today. Some people may deem the Third Amendment obsolete, but it nevertheless stands as part of the important and enduring principle of limited military power, particularly the foundational principle of ultimate civilian control over the military as found in the U.S. democratic system of government.

Rick A. Swanson

See also: Bill of Rights.

FURTHER READING

Bell, Tom W. "The Third Amendment: Forgotten but Not Gone." William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 2 (1993): 117–50.

Fields, Thomas S., and David T. Hardy. "The Third Amendment and the Issue of the Maintenance of Standing Armies: A Legal History." Journal of American Legal History 35 (1991): 393–431.

Thomas, Clarence (b. 1948)

Clarence Thomas was born June 23, 1948, in Pinpoint, Georgia, just outside Savannah, to M. C. Thomas and Leola (Anderson) Thomas. When Thomas was only two years old, his father left the family and moved north to Philadelphia to find work, leaving behind two young children and a pregnant wife. Thomas's mother provided for the family by picking crabmeat and working as a housekeeper, until their house burned down when Thomas was only age seven. At this time, the family was split, with Thomas's mother and sister going to live with an aunt in Savannah. Thomas and his brother went to live with their grandparents, Christine and Myers Anderson, in Savannah, where they owned and operated an ice and fuel delivery business.

Thomas was raised in a religious household that emphasized the importance of education. His grandfather made sure that Thomas and his brother attended Saint Benedict the Moor, an all-black Roman Catholic school operated by white nuns. Thomas went to the all-black Saint Pius X High School for the ninth and tenth grades, before enrolling as one of the first two black students at Saint John Vianney Minor Seminary, a Catholic boarding school in rural Georgia. Because of the legal segregation that existed at the time, Thomas was able to attend integrated institutions only in the final two years of his secondary education.

Judge Clarence Thomas at the Senate Judiciary Committee's confirmation hearings. (© M. Reinstein/The Image Works)

By the time Thomas finished high school, he was considering a career in the priesthood and enrolled in the Immaculate Conception Seminary in Conception, Missouri, in 1967. He was one of only four black students in his class. Thomas later recalled, during his Supreme Court nomination hearings, an incident at the seminary that would change his life. When Thomas learned that Martin Luther King Jr. had been shot, a fellow white student, unaware of Thomas's presence, remarked, "That's good, I hope the son of a bitch dies." According to Thomas, it was at that moment that he decided to leave the seminary. He transferred to Holy Cross College in Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1968 and graduated cum laude in 1971. From there he entered Yale Law School and received his law degree in 1974.

As a conservative Republican, Thomas began work as a prosecutor for the Missouri Republican attorney general, John C. Danforth, a fellow Yale alumnus. Later, when Danforth was elected to the United States Senate, Thomas continued to work for him as a legislative assistant. After Ronald Reagan was elected to the presidency in 1980, Thomas joined the administration in May 1981 as assistant secretary for civil rights in the Department of Education. In 1982, Thomas was nominated to chair the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, where he served until 1989. He was nominated to the U.S. Court of Appeals in 1989 and confirmed in 1990. In 1991, when Justice Thurgood Marshall announced his retirement from the Supreme Court, President George H. W. Bush nominated Thomas as his replacement.

Thomas's confirmation hearings were marred by sexual harassment allegations by law professor and former employee Anita Hill. Thomas's nomination presented blacks with a dilemma: Although his judicial philosophy was inconsistent with the views of many civil rights organizations, if Thomas were not confirmed to the Supreme Court, it would have no black representation. He was confirmed by a small Senate majority vote of 52-48.

Thomas quickly aligned himself with the Court's most conservative justices and was branded as a "Scalia clone" because of his close philosophical ties with Justice Antonin Scalia. Although often silent during oral arguments, Justice Thomas has developed a reputation for writing numerous opinions and dissents. He appears to follow strictly the original intent of the framers of the U.S. Constitution. He believes in maintaining the theory of federalism and the Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in which all powers not given to the federal government by the Constitution are reserved to the states. In Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70 (1995), Justice Thomas concurred with the majority and in a separate opinion criticized federal courts for overstepping their equitable powers to remedy segregation. Another benchmark of his views on civil liberties is his penchant for judicial activism, which stands in sharp contrast with the typical "classic conservative" justice. Curiously, Justice Thomas exercises judicial restraint through federalism while promoting judicial activism in many other areas. One such example is his use of the Commerce Clause by which he has practically invited parties to bring litigation to the Supreme Court.

In Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), Justice Thomas authored a dissent objecting to the use of race in university admissions. In Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), he dissented in the opinion that struck down a Texas sodomy statute, not because he thought the law was wise—he called it "uncommonly silly"—but because he found nothing in the Constitution prohibiting such laws.

Thomas is married to Virginia Bess Lamp and has a son, Jamal Adeen, from a previous marriage to Kathy Grace Ambush.

Dewey Clayton

See also: Rehnquist, William Hubbs; Scalia, Antonin G.

FURTHER READING

"Clarence Thomas." Wikipedia. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Clarence_Thomas.

Clayton, Dewey. African Americans and the Politics of Congressional Redistricting. New York: Garland, 2000.

Current Biography. Bronx, NY: H. W. Wilson, 1992.

Wermiel, Stephen J. "Clarence Thomas After Ten Years: Some Reflections." American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy, and the Law 10, 2 (2002): 315–25.

Thoreau, Henry David

See "Civil Disobedience"

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (1986)

In Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986), the U.S. Supreme Court overturned six provisions of the Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act of 1982 that gave the state enormous leeway in preventing the termination of a pregnancy on the grounds that it was protecting the mother's health and the potential life of the unborn child. The Court rejected Pennsylvania's argument that it had a compelling interest in preserving life under both circumstances even if it meant overriding the mother's right to privacy as guaranteed under Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

The Pennsylvania law contained an informed-consent provision that required any woman wishing to obtain an abortion to be given information geared toward convincing her that she should continue the pregnancy. This printed material included medical analysis concerning the dangers of abortion as opposed to carrying a child to full term and offered support for the belief that the psychological effects of an abortion were likely to be lasting. Detailed information was given about the development of the fetus from the moment of conception until full term. Under the guise of informed consent, Pennsylvania offered a number of alternatives to abortion and promised that help would be forthcoming from specific agencies if the woman chose to continue the pregnancy. The information also assured a pregnant woman that medical benefits were available for prenatal care, childbirth, and neonatal care and reminded her that the baby's father was legally liable for financial support.

Additionally, the Pennsylvania law enforced mandatory counseling and a waiting period before an abortion could be obtained. A controversial spousal-consent provision required that a married woman obtain the permission of her husband before she could have an abortion. If the pregnancy had progressed past the first trimester, the Pennsylvania law required that a physician determine the issue of viability (whether a fetus had a medical chance of surviving outside the mother's womb). If viability were established, the presence of a second physician was required during all abortion procedures.

The majority of the Court determined in Thornburgh that no state was "free, under the guise of protecting maternal health or potential life, to intimidate women into continuing pregnancies." The Court rejected the entire concept of informed consent as an attempt to violate a woman's right to privacy and viewed the reminder of the father's liability as "poorly disguised elements of discouragement for the abortion decision," calling the attempt to point out the "detrimental physical and psychological effects" of legal abortions the "antithesis of informed consent."

In a ringing dissent to Thornburgh, Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and William H. Rehnquist insisted that the Court had distorted its constitutional jurisdiction. O'Connor and Rehnquist contended that Thornburgh made it "painfully clear that no legal rule or doctrine is safe from ad hoc nullification by the Court when an occasion for its implementation arises in a case involving state regulation of abortion."

The five–four decision in Thornburgh indicated that the Court was heavily divided on the abortion issue and suggested that President Ronald Reagan's administration might be close to achieving its goal of overturning Roe v. Wade. In a complete reversal of Thornburgh, six years later in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), the Supreme Court upheld the provisions it had rejected in 1986 except for the spousal-notification provision. In Casey, a still-divided Court accepted that a state did have a "legitimate interest in promoting the life or potential life of the unborn" even to the extent of overriding a woman's right to privacy. However, Casey stopped short of overturning Roe v. Wade.

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Abernathy, M. Glenn, and Barbara A. Perry. Civil Liberties Under the Constitution. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. 8th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Lindgren, J. Ralph, and Nadine Taub. The Law of Sex Discrimination. Minneapolis, MN: West, 1993.

Simon, James F. The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Three-Strikes Laws

Three-strikes laws, commonly referred to as "three strikes and you're out" legislation, consist of a series of laws, passed by state legislatures, that mandate either life in prison or severe prison sentences for offenders convicted of three major offenses, usually felonies. These laws, designed to target career criminals, have been challenged on various constitutional grounds, especially under the Eighth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment.

The 1993 kidnapping and murder of Polly Klaas in California focused national attention on Richard Davis, a repeat offender, who was later arrested for her murder. As a result, public concerns about the effectiveness of the criminal justice system were heightened, and support for "get tough on crime" legislation increased. This event paved the way for California's passage of the first three-strikes law in the United States and also the toughest in the country.

Twenty-six states and the federal government passed three-strikes laws between 1993 and 2003. State statutes vary according to (1) who has the power to invoke the third strike, a judge or a prosecutor; (2) the number of prior felonies required to bring about sentence enhancement; (3) the type of felony—violent versus nonviolent—required to trigger a third strike; (4) whether a third-strike offense must be recent or if any prior conviction may count; (5) the period of incarceration for violent crimes; and (6) whether parole is a possibility. The federal three-strikes provision targeted a narrow set of offenders who had three strikes and had also substantially injured their victims.

Proponents of three-strikes laws argue that the criminal justice system should place repeat offenders in prison and throw away the key, as they have demonstrated that they are dangerous to society and unwilling to change. Furthermore, supporters of these laws claim that harsh penalties (even life sentences) will fulfill the goal of specific deterrence because the repeat offenders will be off the streets. Supporters also assert that three-strikes laws will save money in the long term by reducing victimization and the costs that crime inflicts on society as a whole. Advocates further argue that anecdotal evidence shows the laws are having an impact, claiming that some offenders have migrated out of states that have such laws to avoid conviction under them and that offenders in prison attend workshops on three-strikes provisions to learn how to avoid being subject to them. In a cost-benefit analysis, proponents argue that individual repeat offenders are responsible for the majority of crime, and that if their crime rates are reduced or eliminated by a third strike, costs associated with their crimes will be prevented and the benefits of reduced crime and victimization will justify the costs of imprisonment.

Opponents of three-strikes laws argue that the increased incarceration of repeat offenders will have little effect on violent crime rates. Moreover, life terms for three-strikes offenders means that prison space is allocated to a population of offenders who are beyond their peak ages for criminal conduct. As a result, three-strikes laws incarcerate offenders who are at the lowest risk of reoffending and therefore waste valuable societal resources. There is an enormous drain on resources resulting not only from aging prisoners but also from costs of having to build and operate new prisons. Also, the justice system must consider how three-strikes laws will affect the criminal mind-set: To reduce chances of being apprehended and caught, offenders with two strikes and facing a third-strike conviction might kill victims, witnesses, and police officers to avoid the harsher third-strike penalty. In addition, the courts face new costs: The burden on criminal courts increases exponentially as three-strikes defendants demand jury trials and as costs for defending the indigent rise.

Other opponents of three-strikes laws point to the effects of these laws on the African American community. Although drug usage is not significantly greater in the African American community than among other groups, drug enforcement efforts are more intense in these communities. As a result, African Americans have been incarcerated by three-strikes laws at thirteen times the rate of whites. For civil liberties advocates, this result of the laws represents an unintended consequence that violates the principle of equal treatment under the law. Opponents of three-strikes laws argue that tax money could be spent more effectively in areas that address the root causes of crime rather than only its end result.

In 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court was petitioned by two shoplifters, Gary Ewing and Leandro Andrade—who were prosecuted under California's three-strikes law—to declare the law unconstitutional as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's protection against cruel and unusual punishment. In Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003), and Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63 (2003), however, the Court upheld the law and the imposition of life sentences, stating that three-strikes laws were a legitimate response to address crime and that life sentences were not disproportionate when applied to career criminals. Thus, the Court held that California's three-strikes law did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Although these laws will continue to generate controversy, challenges to their constitutionality will probably not be successful.

Ruth Ann Strickland

See also: Cruel and Unusual Punishments; Eighth Amendment; Ewing v. California.

FURTHER READING

Austin, James. "Three Strikes and You're Out": The Implementation and Impact of Strike Laws. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs; National Institute of Justice, 1999.

Marshall, Patrick. "Three-Strikes Laws." Congressional Quarterly Researcher 12 (May 10, 2002): 417–32.

Schiraldi, Vincent, and Tara-Jen Ambrosio. Striking Out: The Crime Control Impact of "Three Strikes" Laws. Washington, DC: Justice Policy Institute.

Vitiello, Michael. "Three Strikes: Can We Return to Rationality?" Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 87, 2 (1997): 395–481.

Tillman Act of 1907

The Tillman Act of 1907 was named after populist Senator Benjamin R. Tillman (D-SC), commonly referred to as "Pitchfork Ben." As a southern agrarian, he was highly suspicious of industrial power and attacked President Theodore Roosevelt for accepting corporate contributions in 1904 despite the president's trust-busting reputation.

Tillman's legislation prohibited corporations from contributing to political campaigns, but Congress did not pass it until January 1907 because the leadership did not want to harm potential corporate contributions in the 1906 midterm elections. Once enacted, the law proved relatively easy to evade. Companies instead awarded bonuses to their executives, expecting them to contribute to political campaigns and political parties.

The Tillman Act arguably had implications for civil liberties because it extended a degree of constitutional rights to corporations. Although a corporation is a creation of the state and can limit stockholder liability, the U.S. Supreme Court in the nineteenth century in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 118 U.S. 394 (1886), and other cases used the Fourteenth Amendment to secure a corporation rights as a "person" that the same Court did not initially provide to blacks, the group the Fourteenth Amendment was most designed to protect. The issue became whether corporations were entitled to equal protection and freedom of expression in the same manner as individuals. Federal courts will almost certainly continue to grapple with determining how corporate campaign finance activities can be regulated in the aftermath of the passage of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, popularly known as McCain-Feingold (after its sponsors, Republican Senator John McCain of Arizona and Democratic Senator Russell Feingold of Wisconsin).

The Supreme Court reiterated the equation of money with speech in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), which upheld most of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974, but struck down limits on campaign expenditures and how much one could spend on one's own campaign. In its aftermath, Steve Forbes, Frank Lautenberg (NJ), Michael Huffington (CA), and Ross Perot all conducted lavish, largely self-financed campaigns for political office.

The holding in Buckley thus raises the issue of the relationship between equality and civil liberties. Students of democracy as far back as the Greeks have maintained that a large middle class is necessary for democracy to flourish and that vast inequities in wealth are problematic at best for the successful functioning of democracy. Similarly, Robert A. Dahl, professor emeritus of political science at Yale University,

Senator Benjamin R. Tillman's legislation prohibited corporations from contributing to political campaigns. Once enacted, it proved relatively easy to evade as companies awarded bonuses to executives who were expected to contribute to political campaigns and political parties. (Library of Congress) has maintained that "The justices failed to view campaign expenditures and contributions in the context of a democratic system that derives its legitimacy from the principles of political equality." The Supreme Court's recent decision in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 124 S. Ct. 619 (2003), upholding limits on "soft money" expenditures (those not directly made by the candidates), will further impact campaign finance laws.

Henry B. Sirgo

See also: McConnell v. Federal Election Commission.

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Herbert E. Financing Politics: Money, Elections, and Political Reform, 3d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1984.

Dahl, Robert A. How Democratic Is the American Constitution? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Joo, Thomas W. "Corporate Governance and the Constitutionality of Campaign Finance Reform." Election Law Journal 1, 3 (2002): 361–72.

Parenti, Michael. Democracy for the Few. 6th ed. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Simkins, Francis Butler. Pitchfork Ben Tillman: South Carolinian. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1944.

Time, Place, and Manner Restrictions

Time, place, and manner (TPM) restrictions are a balancing test created by the U.S. Supreme Court to clarify the extent to which government can legitimately regulate speech, which is in general a fundamental liberty protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The test is used in freedom of speech cases and designed to regulate the trappings of the expression rather than the speech itself. The doctrine holds that the government can protect society from the harmful effects of expression as long as the regulation is narrow and content-neutral. The Court recognizes the authority of the state to impose reasonable restrictions on the time, place, and manner of constitutionally protected speech occurring in a public forum.

TPM restrictions are designed to preserve public order, respect privacy and property rights, accommodate public convenience, and protect the administration of justice through reasonable regulations. The Court has used the restrictions to deal with cases involving licensing requirements, access to public places, solicitation of funds, and zoning laws. The restrictions are designed to focus on the behavior (time, place, manner) that animates the expression rather than on the speech itself. They seek to distinguish the medium from the message. The test permits the government to regulate the context of the message but not the content of the message.

Prior to the late 1930s, the Supreme Court permitted states and localities to control and even prevent expression on public property. After the Court opened the public streets to free speech, there was a need to develop a standard to determine which restrictions on speech were tolerable. In the first set of cases (1939–1943) to create the roots of the test, the Court began applying the time, place, and manner restrictions in cases that involved the Jehovah's Witnesses and state and local ordinances that forbade parades or required licenses for organizing. In Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941), the Court limited the licensing discretion of the state for the first time on the basis of a time, place, and manner restriction. These decisions were used as precedent for similar cases during the Earl Warren Court years. In these subsequent cases, many of which involved civil rights protests such as Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965), the Court refined this doctrine. The standard was rekindled during the tenure of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, as a function of the more conservative nature of the Court and cases that often involved elements of public protest combined with conduct. In the late 1970s, the Court began to articulate the standard explicitly, culminating in its decision in Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989), in which the Court upheld New York City guidelines requiring sponsors of bandshell concerts in Central Park to use sound-amplification equipment and a sound technician provided by the city.

The Court in Rock Against Racism created a four-prong test to determine whether the time, place, and manner restrictions were legitimate. In order for the government to restrict speech, it must prevail on all four prongs. First, the regulation must be made without regard to the content. Thus, in Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely, 408 U.S. 92 (1972), the Supreme Court ruled that a law that forbade all picketing except labor picketing favored some types of speech at the expense of others and was unconstitutional because it was a content-based restriction. Second, the regulation must further a significant state interest. Thus, the state cannot restrict a public protest simply to stop littering. Third, the regulation must be narrowly tailored to achieve that state interest. This prong is a variant of the least-restrictive-means test. The state must assert its interest in the manner that will be the least burdensome to the constitutional right in question. In Madsen v. Women's Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994), which involved a buffer zone to prohibit abortion protesters from interfering with women seeking to exercise their reproductive rights, the Court ruled that a thirty-six-foot buffer zone was permissible around entrances and driveways, but a 300-foot "no approach" zone was not narrow enough. Finally, the state's regulation must leave open alternative channels of communication. If the expression could be communicated in other places, then the burden on speech would not be overly burdensome. But if the regulation would effectively leave the individual or group without any means of exercising its freedom of expression, the regulation would be unconstitutional. For example, the Court has upheld zoning regulations designed to limit the placement of adult theaters because they can be moved to other parts of the city.

"Time" restrictions might permit a municipality to ban parades during rush hour. Decisions regarding "place" involve the forum or location in which the speech takes place and are tied to the Court's guidelines for forum-based restrictions. For instance, in Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966), the Court ruled that a jail was not an appropriate place for a demonstration and there were alternative places suitable for the communication of ideas. "Manner" refers to the means by which the expression takes place. For instance, the Court ruled in Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966), that a silent protest against segregation in the Clinton, Louisiana, library was protected, but a demonstration that would disrupt its patrons would not be.

Attempts to use TPM restrictions to limit allegedly objectionable or indecent material have often run afoul of the first prong of the test requiring content-neutrality.

Time, place, and manner restrictions have served as a guide for other special tests, such as those used in commercial speech, articulated in Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980); and for symbolic speech, as outlined in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), involving the burning of draft cards. Many of these tests have provisions similar to the TPM restrictions.

Because this is a balancing test, it requires the justices to determine whether the regulation is content-neutral, whether it is narrowly tailored, whether the government's interest is substantial, and whether there are adequate alternative means of communication. Thus, there is an ad hoc nature to the test. Critics have argued that the test has not been applied consistently. As the Court has become more conservative, it has changed the definition of what constitutes a public forum and, in doing so, made it easier for the state and local governments to limit the "place" for expression and still avoid violating the prongs of the time, place, and manner test.

Richard L. Pacelle Jr.

See also: Adderley v. Florida; First Amendment; Pure-Speech Doctrine; Symbolic Speech.

FURTHER READING

Fraleigh, Douglas, and Joseph Tuman. Freedom of Speech in the Marketplace of Ideas. New York: St. Martin's, 1997.

Tedford, Thomas, and Dale Herbeck. Freedom of Speech in the United States. 4th ed. State College, PA: Strata Publications, 2001.

Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party (1997)

In Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351 (1997), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a 1901 Minnesota law prohibiting candidates for elected office from running under more than one party banner. The case involved a challenge to the law based on the right to freedom of association provided by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution; this amendment and others in the Bill of Rights have been made applicable to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court had to address whether the state prohibition against multiparty candidates violated their right to free association.

So-called fusion, or multiple-party, candidacies are currently outlawed in most states (New York being a prominent exception). For minor parties, fusion candidacies provide an opportunity to garner political influence. Single-member-district plurality elections favor the two largest parties because of their winner-take-all nature. As a result, minor parties fall prey to the "wasted vote" phenomenon: Voters and donors are reluctant to support candidates whose chances of winning are marginal at best, and potential minor-party candidates are reluctant to run when they know that voters who might favor them have incentives to vote for a less favored candidate who has a better shot at winning. Where fusion candidacies are permitted, voters can express support for their favored party while still supporting an electorally viable candidate.

Timmons was the result of a legal challenge brought by a chapter of the national New Party, which had been denied the opportunity to nominate a state legislative candidate who had already been nominated by another party. The New Party chapter claimed that the Minnesota law violated its right of association under the First Amendment, as applied to the states under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The state defended its law as important to furthering the stability of its political system and preventing voter confusion. Candidates, the state feared, could effectively use the ballot for political advertising by running under the banners of shadow parties consisting only of promotional slogans. In addition, minor parties could evade nominating-petition requirements by nominating major-party candidates; as a result, such parties could obtain ballot access in future elections by virtue not of their own popularity but of a prominent candidate's popularity.

The U.S. Supreme Court, by a six–three margin, upheld the Minnesota statute. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist held that the law did not excessively burden citizens' associational rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Had it done so, the state would have had to demonstrate that the law was narrowly tailored to furthering a compelling state interest. Since, in the majority's view, the law was not excessively burdensome, the state had to show only that its reasonable policy interests outweighed the asserted associational rights.

According to the majority, the law did not excessively burden associational rights because it did not prevent individuals from supporting or endorsing any particular candidate, nor did it deny any candidate access to the ballot. It did limit the range of candidates who could appear under a party's banner and did inhibit parties from expressing support for candidates already nominated by another party, but the Court held that the primary purpose of ballots was to enable orderly elections, not to promote political expression. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote that Minnesota's interest in "protecting the integrity, fairness, and efficiency of [its] ballots and election processes" was sufficiently weighty to justify upholding the statute. Although states may not use such requirements to entrench the two major parties at the expense of outside competitors, they may enact reasonable electoral laws that effectively favor the two-party system.

Jeremy Buchman

See also: First Amendment; Minor Political Parties; Political Parties.

FURTHER READING

Issacharoff, Samuel, and Richard H. Pildes. "Politics as Markets: Partisan Lockups of the Democratic Process." Stanford Law Review 50 (February 1998): 643–717.

Rosenstone, Steven J., Roy L. Behr, and Edward H. Lazarus. Third Parties in America: Citizen Response to Major Party Failure. 2d ed. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)

Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), marked the first time the U.S. Supreme Court formally established the doctrine of symbolic free speech. Previously, the Court had made clear distinctions between speech and action, limiting the protection that action received under the First Amendment to the Constitution. Tinker also was the first major case in which the Supreme Court agreed to consider cases of public elementary and secondary school student disciplinary cases. Accordingly, the Court indicated a willingness to consider cases that previously had been solely matters of state and local control.

The Tinker case involved the suspension of five students who violated a Des Moines, Iowa, school district regulation by wearing black armbands to school in protest against U.S. military involvement in Vietnam. On appeal, the Supreme Court, through Justice Abe Fortas for the majority, ruled the suspensions unconstitutional because the wearing of an armband was a symbolic act, which was "closely akin to 'pure speech' " and thus a constitutionally protected right. Furthermore, Justice Fortas added that students do not lose their constitutional right of freedom of speech "at the schoolhouse gate."

Justice Hugo L. Black registered a vigorous dissent, arguing that the opinion had severe implications for federalism because the majority took away from elected local and state officials the power to control the discipline of pupils and in effect transferred that power to the Supreme Court. He stated:

> I, for one, am not fully persuaded that school pupils are wise enough, even with this Court's expert help from Washington, to run the 23,390 public school systems in our 50 states. . . . One does not need to be a prophet or the son of a prophet to know that after the Court's holding today some students in Iowa and indeed in all schools will be ready, able, and willing to defy their teachers on practically all orders. . . . It is a myth to say that any person has a constitutional right to say what he pleases, where he pleases, and when he pleases.

Justice Black's dissent surprised some Court observers, given his previous strong support of free speech in First Amendment cases. In fact, he had maintained his traditional distinction between speech and action, arguing that wearing an armband was action and not speech. His dissent was also consistent with his absolutist position on finding First Amendment protection for pure speech cases but not for the symbolic speech cited in Tinker.

Many unresolved questions remain concerning the long-term impact of Tinker on how far school officials may go in student disciplinary matters. Will courts sustain bans on wearing street gang symbols and clothing? What about bans on buttons or T-shirts with Confederate flags or other racist or political cause symbols? What about explicit slogans on T-shirts or jackets that might be considered obscene or sexual harassment? May teachers wearing armbands or other overt political symbols be suspended or dismissed? Although the Supreme Court has not provided any clear answers, the debate continues. In Warren Hills Regional Board of Education v. Sypniewski, 538 U.S. 1033 (2003), however, it did refuse to hear an appeal from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit that had overturned a suspension of a Warren Hills, New Jersey, high school student for wearing a T-shirt with the slogan "Top Ten Reasons You Might be a Redneck Sports Fan." Among the reasons were "You wear a baseball cap to bed," and "You know the Hooter's menu by heart."

Warren R. Wade

See also: Student Rights; Symbolic Speech; United States v. O'Brien.

FURTHER READING

Farish, Leah. "Tinker v. Des Moines: Student Protest." In series Landmark Supreme Court Cases. Springfield, NJ: Enslow, 1997.

Tolerance

Tolerance is a very demanding concept, because it entails making allowances for what one finds distasteful or even worse. To be tolerant seems to cede the power of an unequal advantage that presupposes for oneself or one's group a liberty to restrict something disliked in or about another person or group. Tolerance, as such, is not mentioned in the U.S. Constitution, though it is an implication of First Amendment freedoms of religion, disestablishment, speech, assembly, and press and the Fourteenth Amendment principle of equality in citizenship. Protected by the constitutional guarantees in place, American citizens can presume that the state must meet a very high bar before official intolerance can manifest itself regarding their conscientious beliefs, unruly speech, or questionable voluntary association, if ever it can.

The constitutionally ordered republic implicitly relies on a principle of toleration in order to achieve civic stability, if not compatriotism, among a diverse citizenry; many people otherwise would not be reconciled to one another as equal members participating in the same society. The constitutional guarantee of religion, in particular, reinforces the liberal move to privatize belief, such that in America's marketplace of ideas there is a wide diversity of beliefs alongside nonbelief, with all but the most intolerant individuals capable of enjoying the higher good of peaceably pursuing their truths in the company of both the like-minded and the vehemently opposed.

Toleration is a modern concept, though its roots date to early and medieval Christianity. Tolerance was an early Christian concern, when defenders of this new faith were on the defensive, competing for adherents in the religiously plural Roman Empire. Once Catholicism's ascension to dominance was achieved during the medieval period, its primary thinkers such as Thomas Aquinas were decidedly less than tolerant of rival religions, and they rationalized brutal treatment of their recalcitrant adherents—though not if assertion of the Christian faith would in kind arouse the intolerance of a more powerful pagan regime. The tolerant humanism of the Renaissance, echoing its Roman sources, reintroduced the language and practice of civil discourse, which itself later was overtaken by the metaphor of a marketplace of ideas, wherein all individuals were equally free to advance and defend their most worthy and reprehensible ideas.

Unfortunately, the political climate of the early modern period was fraught with religious wars, accelerated by the Protestant Reformation, such that only for the sake of a higher worldly good—namely, peace—would the two opposing sides desist. This period prompted John Locke to write "A Letter on Toleration" (1689), which linked his epistemology (people assent to knowledge, it cannot be coerced) to his political philosophy (the state's legitimacy rests on the free consent of the people) such that tolerance is grounded in prudence, it being irrational to attempt to compel another's beliefs and foolish to believe one's attempt had been successful. The later liberal John Stuart Mill linked tolerance to human progress and was of the view that intolerance was the greatest threat to the rational pursuit of truth that could occur, and the greatest boon for untruth.

In modern usage, tolerance may find its grounds in either prudence or rationality, or find itself affirmed as an independent moral principle in its own right, far beyond the sense that tolerance is a public indulgence when one does not truly have to endure the dislikable. The concept can be said to have a dual nature: In the negative view, toleration is a necessary evil in an imperfect world, though a minimal entitlement one has a right to expect from others. More positively, toleration is a genuine good and a duty one has toward others whereby people affirm their equal standing for legal and political rights and the other benefits of membership in society.

Analysis of American constitutionalism through the lens of the concept of tolerance helps to give meaning to and put into perspective unpopular claims to equality and exercise of basic rights and liberties. Notably, toleration reflects not indifference but commitment to broader liberal values that also are ensconced in the Constitution's fundamental guarantees to all citizens, and in the nature of the regime where there is equality before the law.

Gordon A. Babst

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Heyd, David, ed. Toleration: An Elusive Virtue. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

King, Preston. Toleration. London: Frank Cass, 1998.

Mendus, Susan, ed. Justifying Toleration: Conceptual and Historical Perspectives. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Nederman, Cary J. Worlds of Difference: European Discourses of Toleration, c. 1100–c. 1550. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2000.

Richards, David A. J. Toleration and the Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Walzer, Michael. On Toleration. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Torture

Torture is the infliction of physical or psychological pain on a victim to serve as punishment, to elicit information, or to compel assent to a statement issued by the torturer. Typically torture is used in the context of an interrogation, hence the Latin term for torture quaestio—to question. Although the history of torture dates to the ancient world, the purposes of the practice have changed with time. In ancient Athens, torture was used by parties in civil lawsuits to verify the testimony of slaves. In this instance, torture was designed to counterbalance what was believed to be the slave's natural proclivity to testify on the owner's behalf. Torture of slaves was also common in the Roman world, where during the late stage of empire the practice was extended to the poor.

MEDIEVAL TORTURE

After a brief respite following the fall of the Roman Empire, torture emerged again in the High Middle Ages (1100–1300). During this time, the papacy and most secular states adopted strict rules of proof, including the requirement of a confession to establish guilt. These rules gave the accused protections that were lacking in earlier periods, but they had a downside—to obtain the necessary confession, medieval judges routinely turned to torture. Over the next several hundred years, torture was used against those accused of heresy and witchcraft as well as against common criminals. It also played a prominent role in the Medieval and Spanish Inquisitions.

Medieval torture was strictly governed by legal rules. Torture could not be used unless there was some evidence against the accused. In addition, torture was only a final resort, to be used after interrogation had failed and after the mere sight of the torture implements failed to compel a confession. If that failed, suspects would be tortured for a specific period of time. After victims confessed, they would have to confirm their confession a day later in writing. Despite these rules, medieval judges did not worry about the possibility that victims would make false confessions. In part this came from the repeated use of torture against suspected heretics and witches; to the torturers, the victim's earthly pain could not compare to the torment that awaited in the afterlife.

By the eighteenth century, a movement for the abolition of judicial torture gathered steam. Prussia abolished torture in 1754, the first European state to do so. By 1830 judicial torture was abolished in most of Europe. The reasons for this were twofold: On the one hand, the association of torture with religious persecution—most notably the Spanish Inquisition—made it a natural target for Enlightenment reformers, especially those who began to grow skeptical of the veracity of confessions obtained by torture. Second, the rigid norms of proof eased. It was now possible to convict the accused without a confession. Because a confession was no longer necessary, neither was torture.

"Images Removed Due to Copyright Issues"

MODERN TORTURE

The victory of the abolitionists, however, was short-lived. Although judges no longer needed torture to secure confessions, the police, army, and other security agencies used torture during the nineteenth century to obtain information to help prevent future crimes. Many of the early cases involved national security and spies, but over time torture spread to encompass routine law enforcement activities. More recently, torture has been debated as a means to combat international terrorism.

Because modern torturers are often concerned about the quality of the information they obtain, they are more sensitive than their medieval counterparts to the possibility that victims will lie to avoid extreme physical pain. As a result, modern torture has evolved from strictly physical means to measures such as sleep deprivation that compel the victim to talk.

Like its medieval counterpart, modern torture has spawned a strong abolitionist movement. Torture was outlawed by the United Nations (UN) Declaration of Human Rights (1948) and by the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights. In 1975 the UN adopted the Convention Against Torture (CAT), which bans torture among member states even under exceptional circumstances such as war. The CAT also makes it illegal for a state to return refugees to countries where they will face torture. Most countries adopted the CAT, including the United States, which signed the CAT in 1988 and ratified it in 1994.

The CAT defines torture broadly to include psychological as well as physical means and compels member states to offer refuge to torture victims. Today no state admits to using torture. Yet it remains a widespread practice, in part because it is performed by independent agents (guerrillas, paramilitary groups) over which the state claims to have no control and in part because states define their own interrogation practices as constituting something less than torture.

THE UNITED STATES AND TORTURE

In the United States torture is outlawed by the Eighth Amendment, which prohibits the use of "cruel and unusual punishments." The Supreme Court has consistently used the Eighth Amendment to outlaw inhumane forms of executions. But the Court has not argued that execution itself is a "cruel and unusual" punishment.

Torture has also been an issue in the context of police interrogations of criminal suspects. In Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a confession obtained by torture was invalid under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Despite this, reports of police brutality during interrogations of criminal suspects were common up to the early 1960s and led in part to the Supreme Court's ruling in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), giving the accused the right to have an attorney present during questioning. Despite Miranda, the problems of police torture and false confessions remain serious, as demonstrated by the brutal police assault on Abner Louima in New York City in 1997 and by the considerable number of confessions later proved false by DNA evidence.

As a signatory to the CAT, the United States offers refuge to victims of torture. In addition, torture victims have used the Alien Torts Claims Act to sue their torturers in U.S. courts. In 1995 a lower federal court held that Radovan Karadzic, the former president of the Bosnian Serb Republic, could stand trial for human rights violations committed in Bosnia. This followed a previous case, Filártiga v. Peña-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (1980), in which a Paraguayan couple successfully sued their torturer in the United States.

The September 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and the unsuccessful attempt in Pennsylvania have brought the question of torture to the forefront: Is it justifiable to use torture to prevent a terrorist attack? International law clearly forbids torture under any circumstances, but whether a majority of Americans would take this position in the immediate aftermath of a terrorist attack is an open question.

Robert A. Kahn

See also: Eighth Amendment; Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Miranda v. Arizona.

FURTHER READING

Langbein, John. Torture and the Law of Proof. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.

Peters, Edward. Torture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985.

Totality-of-Circumstances Test

Law enforcement officers who are unable to establish a basis for probable cause from an anonymous tip may overcome that deficiency if they can present information gathered from the entire set of circumstances that bear out the contents of the anonymous tip. In such instances, they can receive valid search and/or arrest warrants from the magistrate and be in compliance with the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution.

The Fourth Amendment states that searches and seizures may not be conducted without probable cause and benefit of a search warrant and, further, that probable cause must be determined by a neutral and detached magistrate. The U.S. Supreme Court in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964), and Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969), stated that the magistrate reviewing the application for the warrant must be able to determine independently that if the information it contains came from an informant, (1) the informant's tip must provide information establishing how the informant knew about the information furnished in the tip and (2) the information related to the current case, as provided by the informant, is either truthful or otherwise reliable. In cases where the informant's identity is known by law enforcement officers, there is normally not a problem. But when the information tip has come from an unknown informant (an unsigned letter, an anonymous telephone message or e-mail message), it is much more difficult to establish probable cause to procure the search warrant. This situation prompted the Court to respond to the issue in Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983).

The totality of the circumstances allows the magistrate to verify that the information contained in an anonymous tip is reliable, based upon such matters as observation by law enforcement officers fulfilling their duty to investigate the alleged illegal activity. This is true even when the officers are operating in a jurisdiction different from where the suspected person(s) resides. The totality of the circumstances will allow the magistrate to issue the requested warrant, and all evidence uncovered during the course of a search conducted under the auspices of that warrant is completely admissible. As the Court said in Gates, "the deficiency in one prong may be offset by a stronger than usual set of information in the other prong, thereby meeting the Fourth Amendment requirements."

Sam W. McKinstry

See also: Fourth Amendment; Illinois v. Gates.

FURTHER READING

Dressler, Joshua, and George C. Thomass III. Criminal Procedure: Investigating Crime. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2003.

Trademark

See Copyright, Patent, and Trademark

Transgender Legal Issues in the United States

Transgender individuals face numerous civil liberties issues that affect their legal rights and freedoms in the United States. This analysis requires understanding, first, the terms transgender, transsexual, and cross-dresser and, second, the importance the legal system places on a person's sex. Some legal rights, obligations, and protections are dependent on whether an individual is labeled male or female. For example, a person's legal sex is relevant in the following situations:

- A man and a woman can marry. In general, two men or two women cannot. (Massachusetts extended an exception in 2004, and a few cities and states have attempted to extend marriage to same-sex unions; the validity of these is not yet known.)
- Men and women are separated in the U.S. penal system.
- Only men must register for military service.
- The sex of an individual is recorded by the state after birth.
- Access to restrooms, locker rooms, and other gender-segregated facilities may be restricted based on a person's sex.

At birth, individuals are identified as male or female according to their external genitalia. Secondary sex characteristics (breasts, facial hair, musculature), hormone levels, reproductive organs, and DNA provide additional information regarding an individual's sex. "Gender identity," a person's internal psychological identification (a continuum between male and female), is another important characteristic. In the vast majority of individuals, these differentiating characteristics are in agreement: A person might have female genitalia, her DNA says she is female, and her gender identity is female. For some people, these differentiating characteristics are not in agreement. When a person's gender identity is not congruent with the other characteristics, the individual is often referred to as transgender.

Transgender is an informal term used to refer to any person with any type of gender-identity issue. This includes people who cross-dress (transvestites) and transsexuals. It does not include intersexed individuals, those born with chromosomal or genital ambiguities. Cross-dressers are people who periodically take the role of the other sex. Transsexuals are those who wish to change or have changed their primary or secondary sex characteristics. A postoperative transsexual person is one who has completed sex-reassignment surgery.

How to classify transgender individuals is difficult because of the complex nature of a transgender person's sex. Important legal issues arise in matters such as official identification documents (and amendments to them); family law (marriage and parental rights); employment (including discrimination); health insurance coverage and claims; and criminal behavior such as hate crimes.

The legal system has been more willing to recognize the preferred sex of transgender individuals if they have undergone sex-reassignment surgery. Postoperative transsexuals benefit from having acquired "new anatomy." Sex-reassignment surgery is generally a necessary but not alone sufficient condition for an individual to be legally recognized as the sex of choice; even the postoperative individual faces uncertain legal situations. States have contradictory laws and court decisions, and some federal and state statutes exempt transsexuals from coverage. The legal framework for changing sex is "very thin, heterogeneous, and ad hoc." The outcome is dependent on the particular judge, the jurisdiction, and the legal context in which the issue is raised.

AMENDING OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS

Most states allow postoperative transsexual individuals to amend their birth certificate. Some of these states allow this via administrative procedure; others require a court order. States requiring a court order create additional hardship for the transsexual person who is no longer a resident. The problem stems from court jurisdictional concerns in the transsexual's adopted state of residence. In 2003, however, a Maryland appeals court held that Maryland circuit courts did have jurisdiction to confirm a nonnative citizen's sex change.

Some states do not allow birth certificates to be amended. Tennessee by statute explicitly forbids birth certificate amendments in the event of a sex change. Absent statutory language, some state courts, such those in Ohio, have refused to amend birth certificates, citing a lack of statutory authority. Transsexuals who are able to amend their birth certificates still face obstacles in having the document recognized in other states.

FAMILY LAW

Transsexual individuals may face legal hurdles relating to marriage. State courts have issued contradictory opinions on the validity of marriages entered into by transsexuals. Texas and Kansas courts have rejected arguments that postoperative male-to-female transsexuals are female for the purposes of marriage. In contrast, New Jersey, California, and Florida courts have upheld the validity of marriages involving postoperative transsexuals. Much of the legal analysis in these cases has focused on laws prohibiting same-sex marriages and on how to determine a person's legal sex. As a result of these differing court decisions, a transsexual person might be able to marry a male in one state or a female in another. Marriages entered into by a postoperative transsexual person may face legal scrutiny regardless of the sex of the partner. The intersection of transphobia and homophobia creates a void in the rights of transsexuals.

Another uncertain situation exists in the legality of an existing marriage when a partner changes sex. Few entities outside of the married couple have legal standing to challenge the validity of an existing marriage. However, problems may arise when a spouse attempts to seek the legal benefits of marriage. These benefits include but are not limited to inheritance, rights of survivorship, ownership status of real estate and securities, health insurance, or tax benefits. There have been no published rulings on this type of situation.

Parental rights are another uncertain area. Transsexuals face additional scrutiny when trying to adopt. Additionally, transgender parents can face difficult custody fights in divorces when children are involved. Given the questions about the legality of marriages involving postoperative transsexuals, their parental status can also be challenged. Some courts have terminated parental rights because of a sex change, but courts in Florida and Colorado have upheld the parental rights of transsexuals in custody issues.

EMPLOYMENT LAW AND DISCRIMINATION

Transgender people (especially those who are transsexual) face tremendous discrimination in the workplace. Often these individuals are stigmatized and face chronic underemployment or unemployment. Transsexuals have lost jobs after beginning a gender transition, although there has been some movement to include transgender individuals under antidiscrimination statutes. As of March 2003, more than fifty U.S. cities and counties protected individuals from employment discrimination based on gender identity.

On the state level, except in Minnesota and Rhode Island, transsexuals and other transgender people are not a protected class in terms of employment discrimination. Transgender individuals are not explicitly protected under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibiting sex discrimination. However, a federal district court has upheld the rights of a transsexual person to proceed with a sexual harassment case under Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. Finally, many jurisdictions include sexual orientation under prohibited forms of employment discrimination. However, transgender individuals are often not covered under this language because sexual orientation and gender identity are different concepts.

HEALTH INSURANCE

Sex reassignment is always an expensive and often cost-prohibitive process. The cost of surgeries, hormones, psychotherapy, and other related procedures can reach upward of $100,000. Cosmetic procedures, hormones, and surgeries related to sex reassignment are almost always excluded from coverage under private health insurance. Additionally, future complications, even those remotely related to such procedures, may be excluded from coverage. Such exclusions are often so broadly constructed that the transsexual might have difficulty getting any medical treatment covered. However, a recent decision by the Superior Court of Massachusetts ruled that a transsexual could not be excluded from necessary breast-reconstruction surgery because of her sex change.

A few successful cases have established transsexuals' right to have sex reassignment covered under Medicaid, but many states ban such coverage. Some courts have overturned such bans, citing inconsistency with federal guidelines on medical necessity. In these states, decisions are determined on a case-by-case basis. However, there are some medical and social questions as to whether sex-reassignment surgery is medically necessary. Sex reassignment also may be defined as cosmetic surgery and thus excluded from coverage.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND HATE CRIMES

Men and women are segregated in prison based on anatomical sex. Therefore, transsexual individuals are generally placed in prisons corresponding to their genitalia. This places a preoperative male-to-female transsexual in either a dangerous situation or in a situation where the individual must be segregated from the general prison population. Courts have denied transfers to prisons based on psychological rather than anatomical identities.

Transgender individuals face greater risks of violence than do most members of society. The highly publicized murders of Gwen Araujo and Brandon Teena illustrate the safety risks of being transgender. Araujo was killed in Newark, Pennsylvania, in 2002 after her male companions discovered that she was biologically male. Teena was murdered in 1993 in Falls City, Nebraska, when it was discovered that he was biologically female. At present, only five states (California, Minnesota, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Vermont) include transgender people under hate-crimes legislation. Federal hate-crime laws do not currently protect transgender people.

The transgender community includes a wide variety of gender-questioning individuals and presents complicated legal questions. Postoperative transsexuals have been the most successful transgender group in integrating their gender identity into the legal system, although they still face an uncertain legal climate.

Jami Kathleen Taylor

See also: Marriage, Right to; Sexual Harassment.

FURTHER READING

Albright, Jennifer Marie. "Gender Assessment: A Legal Approach to Transsexuality." Southern Methodist University Law Review 55 (Spring 2002): 593–619.

Currah, Paisley, Shannon Minter, and Jamison Green. Transgender Equality: A Handbook for Activists and Policymakers. Washington, DC: National Center for Lesbian Rights and NGLTF Policy Institute, 2000.

Dasti, Jerry. "Advocating a Broader Understanding of the Necessity of Sex-Reassignment Surgery Under Medicaid." New York University Law Review 77 (December 2002): 1728–75.

Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association. "Standards of Care for Gender Identity Disorders," February 2001. 6th version. http://www.hbigda.org/soc.cfm.

Minter, Shannon. "Representing Transsexual Clients: An Overview of Selected Legal Issues," 2003. National Center for Lesbian Rights. http://www.transgenderlaw.org/resources/translaw.htm.

Swartz, Louis H. "Legal Implications of the New Ferment Concerning Transsexualism." International Journal of Transgenderism 2: 4 (October–December 1998).

Treason

Treason is an act that undermines or usurps the authority of the state to which one owes allegiance. Although treason charges can function legitimately to protect the state, they can also function to limit or deny civil liberties. The primary challenge for any conception of treason is to secure a balance between security and liberty.

The Statute of 25, Edward III (1350), distinguished petty treason from high treason. Petty (petit) treason concerned threats to fellow citizens, whereas high treason concerned threats to the king and the state. "Treason" is now short for what was called high treason.

The U.S. Constitution addresses treason in Article III, Section 3:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.
>
> The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.

Treason applies to only three behaviors: levying war against the United States; adhering to enemies, such as by devoting oneself to enemy doctrines; and giving enemies aid and comfort. Only Congress declares the punishment for treason, which stands as death, or imprisonment for five years minimum and a fine of no less than $10,000, and the person cannot hold office in the United States (U.S. Code, Title 18, Part 1, ch. 115, sec. 2381). If the defendant does not admit to treason in open court, the state must justify its charge with two or more witnesses who testify to the same overt act. The Constitution forbids "corruption of blood," meaning that punishment cannot extend to family.

How one interprets the key phrases in the Constitution determines whether any particular behavior is treason. English legal commentaries demonstrate two approaches to drafting and interpreting treason legislation: A constructive interpretation of treason argues to broaden the scope of treason and to protect the state. A restrictive interpretation, in contrast, argues to narrow the scope of treason and to protect civil liberties.

Two English laws are especially relevant to the U.S. Constitution on treason, Statute of 25, Edward III, and Statute of 7, William III (1694). The Constitution retains some phrases from these statutes, but it omits key terms in Statute of 25, Edward III, which defines treason as "where a man doth compass or imagine the death of our lord the King, the Queen, or their heir." The charges of "compassing," or imagining the king's death, were constructively interpreted to silence political opposition of any kind. Thomas Jefferson's letter to Virginia's Chancellor George Wythe (November 1, 1778), a prominent attorney who had taught Jefferson at the College of William and Mary, shows that Jefferson knew well the dangers of the constructive interpretation. In that letter, he commented on his drafts of treason legislation as follows: "I pray you to be as watchful over what I have not said, as what is said; for the omissions of this bill have all their positive meaning." The Constitution omits the terms "compass" and "imagine." In drafting the Constitution, the framers endorsed a restrictive interpretation.

The Federalist Papers No. 43 reads:

> But as new-fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free government, have usually wreaked their alternate malignity on each other, the convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger, by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress, even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author.

This Federalist discussion offered a restrictive interpretation of treason, to guard against abuse of the charge by majority factions against minority factions. Subsequently, Federalist No. 74 argued that the presidential power of pardon (U.S. Constitution, Article 2, Section 2) concerning treason achieved the same end.

After ratification of the Constitution, the leaders of the Whiskey Rebellion (1795), which was a protest against federal taxation of spirits that Pennsylvania farmers made from their grain, were convicted of treason; President George Washington (1732–1799) subsequently pardoned them. Some participants in another protest on property tax in Pennsylvania (1799), led by John Fries (circa 1750–1818), were convicted of treason; subsequently, President John Adams (1735–1826) pardoned Fries. Former Vice President Aaron Burr (1756–1836) also was charged with treason for intriguing with Spain over America's West but was acquitted (1807). In famous state trials, Thomas Wilson Dorr (1805–1854) was convicted of attempting to overthrow the government of Rhode Island but was eventually pardoned (1844); whereas John Brown (1800–1859) was convicted and executed for capturing a federal arsenal and attempting to foment a slave rebellion at Harpers Ferry, West Virginia (1859).

World War II generated the first treason case reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court. In Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1 (1945), the Court restrictively interpreted treason by narrowly construing the term "overt act." The Court held that an overt act was not proof of treasonous intent and that such intent required separate proof by two witnesses. Two other decisions from this period were influential. In Haupt v. United States, 330 U.S. 631 (1947), the Supreme Court upheld a conviction of treason for the first time. The decision offered a constructive interpretation of treason by holding that a series of overt acts in aiding an enemy agent demonstrated treasonous intent to give aid and comfort to the enemy. In Kawakita v. United States, 343 U.S. 717 (1952), the Supreme Court again upheld a conviction of treason. The Court used a constructive interpretation of treason by holding that the statements and actions of a defendant who had attempted to renounce his U.S. citizenship and who had abused U.S. prisoners of war in Japan proved treasonous intent, despite the prosecution's failure to produce two witnesses to the overt acts.

Of all the treason charges filed, the federal government has completed prosecution on the charge fewer than forty times. No one has been executed on a federal conviction of treason. The military may not prosecute treason; however, military and civil codes sometimes prosecute treasonous crimes under different names. The Sedition Act of 1798 was among the first attempts to do so. After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the U.S. government again held citizens as "enemy combatants," to be denied their civil rights and to be tried in closed military tribunals. President George W. Bush's administration cited Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), as support for this action. In Quirin, the Court held that a U.S. citizen lost his citizenship by joining the German military.

When the citizen was captured in the United States where he was planning sabotage, he was tried in a military tribunal.

Also after the 2001 terrorist attacks, two U.S. citizens (John Walker Lindh and Jose Padilla) were held as "enemy combatants" after Lindh was captured in fighting against the United States in Afghanistan and Padilla was accused of conspiring with the al-Qaeda network to set off a "dirty bomb." Both men were denied their civil rights; neither was prosecuted for treason. Prosecuting treasonous behavior under different names assumes a constructive interpretation of treason. Such prosecutions circumvent civil rights, the two-witness rule, and other burdens of a federal civil prosecution on treason.

When the security of the state is at the forefront of concern, the constructive interpretation of treason gains ground. When civil rights seem to be impermissibly threatened, the restrictive interpretation gains ground. In the coming years, Congress and the Supreme Court will continue to weigh these competing interests.

Kirk Fitzpatrick

See also: Alien and Sedition Acts.

FURTHER READING

Hamilton, Alexander, James Madison, and John Jay. The Federalist Papers, ed. Clinton Rossiter. New York: Mentor, 1999.

Hurst, James W. The Law of Treason in the United States. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1971.

Lawson, John Davidson. American State Trials. Wilmington, DE: Scholarly, 1972.

Trial by Jury

The right to trial by jury, which the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution guarantees to all criminal defendants except those prosecuted for only trivial offenses, is meant to inject a degree of popular control into criminal trials. As the U.S. Supreme Court noted in Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), the jury "prevent[s] oppression by the government [by the] interposition between the accused and his accuser of the commonsense judgment of a group of laymen and [by] the community participation and shared responsibility that result from that group's determination of guilt or innocence." The jury operates as a constraint on the government's power to prosecute and punish and serves as a needed balance in a democratic society to protect the rights of the accused.

The jury thus protects defendants from biased, corrupt, or overzealous officials by resting ultimate power in the hands of ordinary citizens who have nothing to gain or lose by their verdicts. Jurors are "anonymous" in the sense that they come together for only one decision. They do not seek career advancement, preferment, or financial gain from making any particular decision.

The jury counters the tendency of power to corrupt a single decision-maker by putting a veto over the official decision in the hands of a group. Though jury proceedings are kept secret from outsiders, the jurors must deliberate with one another. They must give reasons for their views, and they must use reason and logic to persuade one another. Therefore, a jury must be small enough that each member can participate and large enough—no fewer than six—that diverse views are likely to emerge. The opinion of each juror must be considered because most states require juries to be unanimous to convict. (A few states allow conviction on a three-quarters or larger majority.)

Finally, juries legitimize decisions and make them more acceptable by emphasizing that they come from the people themselves. Juror selection procedure must be pervasive enough to maximize the likelihood that different elements of the community will be represented. Although no community subgroup is guaranteed a seat, governments are forbidden to structure the process of recruiting jurors in such a way as to prevent any politically cognizable subgroup from serving. To this end, legislatures have repealed, or courts have overturned, bans that formerly prevented women, African Americans, and various other subgroups from serving on juries.

It is this perception of juries representing the judgment of the community (as apart from that of the government) that requires the use of juries in death penalty cases. In other serious cases, individual defendants can waive the right to trial by jury and opt instead for a bench trial (trial by a judge) or for a plea bargain. Most defendants do one or the other. Juries are thus statistically rare in practice. But because they are typically used in the most visible cases, and because they are always available to protect defendants who want them, juries are more important than their numbers would warrant.

Lawyers have long studied jury decision-making in hopes of learning how to influence and control it. Journalists have satisfied public curiosity by reporting on individual trials, sometimes interviewing former jurors. And in recent years, as legal proceedings became increasingly technical and complex, social scientists have studied juries to determine if the ordinary people who serve on them are intellectually and temperamentally capable of making the extremely complex decisions that the courts demand of them. For all these reasons, the jury system has become the most studied U.S. political institution. The backgrounds, capabilities, and behavior of jurors have been studied more empirically than the behavior of bureaucrats, legislators, or indeed any other people who exercise power. On the whole, the research findings have been positive. Jurors do not always behave the way the civics textbooks say they should, but they are generally capable of making good decisions and seem to do so most of the time.

Juries have also been studied to answer the normative question of whether they are too expensive for the benefits they convey. Since jurors must be recruited, paid, and supervised (and, if sequestered, even guarded against outside influences), and since the use of jurors slows court proceedings and thus increases the cost to the public of judges and other professionals, it is clear that jury trials are more expensive than the bench trials that would replace them. Communities have tried to reduce the cost through various reforms, including the use of six-member or nonunanimous juries, reduced voir dire proceedings (the questioning of prospective jurors), computerized scheduling (which reduces the time between proceedings and thus theoretically reduces the time for which jurors must be paid), plain-language scripts and jury instructions, and many others. But studies have shown that most of these reforms have saved little public money.

At the same time, critics have pointed to other safeguards that now protect defendants from government oppression. Defense attorneys, procedural safeguards such as Miranda warnings, universal public education, independent mass media, and appellate courts did not exist or were not as protective when the Sixth Amendment was adopted. Now that all these institutions vigorously protect defendants, have they made juries superfluous? Opinion is divided on that question. In a sense, the jury on juries is still out. But public opinion generally supports juries, wants to see them in high-profile cases, and sometimes feels vaguely cheated when important decisions are made by a judge alone—or worse, by a negotiated plea.

Since the public retains confidence in juries, they are used for purposes other than criminal trials. Juries are available in all nontrivial federal civil trials and in many state ones. States may also use them for such purposes as fixing the value of real estate in eminent domain seizures and, under the supervision of coroners, determining the cause of death.

Paul Lermack

See also: Fifth Amendment and Self-Incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Grand Jury; Jury Size; Jury Unanimity.

FURTHER READING

Abbott, Walter F. Jury Research: A Review and Bibliography. Chicago: American Law Institute, 1993.

Abramson, Jeffrey. We the Jury. New York: Basic Books, 1994.

Hastie, Reid, Steven Penrod, and Nancy Pennington. Inside the Jury. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.

Jonakait, Randolph N. The American Jury System. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003.

Trop v. Dulles (1957)

Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958), involved the involuntary removal of U.S. citizenship from a native-born citizen. In 1944 a twenty-year-old soldier born in Ohio was court-martialed and given a dishonorable discharge for a one-day desertion from his post in Casablanca, Morocco, during World War II. Eight years later when he applied for a passport, the application was denied on the ground that his previous court-martial and dishonorable discharge for wartime desertion resulted in a loss of citizenship under the Nationality Act of 1940, section 401(g). The Supreme Court's decision in the case was noteworthy in two respects: The first was the Court's consideration of the national government's role in denationalizing citizens, and the second was the Court's views on interpreting the Eighth Amendment and its prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

On the denationalization issue, a five-member plurality of the Court agreed that section 401(g) was unconstitutional but for different reasons. Chief Justice Earl Warren—joined by Justices Hugo L. Black, William O. Douglas, and Charles E. Whittaker—stated that citizenship could not be removed unilaterally by the government, although an individual could voluntarily renounce citizenship either expressly or by language or conduct that showed relinquishment. The government, especially the military, could not forfeit the person's citizenship as punishment for a crime, even one as reprehensible as desertion. Justice William J. Brennan Jr. compared the relationship between the war powers of Congress and a deserting soldier to the taxing powers of Congress and a tax evader. In each instance, the nexus was too weak to sustain the forfeiture of citizenship, especially when other penalties existed; therefore the statute was invalid.

The Eighth Amendment came into play in the controversy when the Court classified the forfeiture of nationality as punishment. While recognizing that the contours of "cruel and unusual punishments" had never been clearly defined, the Court indicated that any punishment other than fines, imprisonment, or death was subject to close scrutiny and interpretation by the judiciary as the arbiters of the meaning of the Constitution. Chief Justice Warren wrote, "The Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." In other words, society's ideas as to the appropriateness of punishments shift over time; for example, punishments such as public whippings and hangings have been discarded.

The pronouncements about the two key aspects of Trop v. Dulles have proved to be durable. The Court continued to whittle away at the statutory attempts to authorize involuntary termination of citizenship until finally, in Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S.253 (1967), the Court resolved the issue by bluntly announcing that the government cannot cancel citizenship without the individual's consent. Still, Chief Justice Warren's statement in Trop about the nature of punishment and its changing character has become a staple in litigation about punishment and prisoners' rights.

Susan Coleman

See also: Citizenship; Cruel and Unusual Punishments; Evolving Standards of Decency.

FURTHER READING

Karst, Kenneth L. Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981.

Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819)

The vested-rights doctrine is rooted in the idea that property is the cornerstone of individual rights; property sets boundaries beyond which government authority may not be exercised. The Dartmouth College case tested the doctrine through a struggle for control of the college. In Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. 518 (1819), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Contracts Clause of the Constitution prevented a state from infringing on the property rights of an institution chartered by the crown.

Dartmouth College trustees, a group of private persons, based their claim of governing authority on a 1769 charter from King George III. In 1816, the Jeffersonian-controlled legislature of New Hampshire enacted a law amending the original charter to give the state authority to select trustees and govern the college. To regain control, the original trustees, who were represented by Daniel Webster, brought an unsuccessful suit in the state courts against the state-appointed trustee. The Supreme Court subsequently reversed the state courts in a five–one decision (Justice Gabriel Duvall dissented).

Chief Justice John Marshall spoke for the Court and divided the case into two issues: whether the king's charter was constitutionally protected through the Contracts Clause, under which states cannot pass laws "impairing the obligation of contracts," and if so, whether the legislative enactments of New Hampshire impaired the charter's obligations. The Court concluded that the character of civil institutions grows out of the "manner in which they are formed, and the objects for which they are created." This made the Dartmouth charter a "contract within the letter of the Constitution, and within its spirit also." Dartmouth College was chartered to be a "private eleemosynary" (charitable) institution, and the charter included establishment of a perpetual succession of trustees to act on behalf of the original donors and ensure its private status. That the government initially recognized use of the property in this way did not give government the "consequent right substantially to change that form, or to vary the purposes to which the property is applied." The Court further concluded that New Hampshire impaired the charter provisions. The "whole power of governing the college is transferred from trustees appointed according to the will of the founder" to the state, and its will is substituted for that of the donors "in every essential operation of the college." Such a change is not "immaterial." Even if the change brought about by the legislation "may be for the advantage of the college" and the public good, it interfered with the "will of the donors."

The Dartmouth decision represented the Court's most expansive interpretation of the Contracts Clause, and its most significant consequences fell on business corporations. Private corporations were brought within the scope of the Contracts Clause and seemed to be fully insulated from legislative regulation. The decision tightly joined contract and natural law concepts, and the Contracts Clause became an impenetrable shield for private property rights. Contracts were used to preserve interests, and if a charter was ambiguous, Marshall said, the benefit of the doubt should go to the private party rather than to the state. This position was subsequently modified in Charles River Bridge Co. v. Warren Bridge Co., 36 U.S. 420 (1837). The corporate charter became less effective as a means of insulating private property when, as Justice Joseph Story suggested in his Dartmouth concurrence, states could reserve options for future modification of or even the repeal of charters granted by the state.

Peter G. Renstrom

See also: Contract, Freedom of; Contracts Clause; Property Rights.

FURTHER READING

Friendly, Henry J. The Dartmouth College Case and the Public-Private Penumbra. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971.

Kutler, Stanley I. Privilege and Creative Destruction: The Charles River Bridge Case. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1990.

Stites, Francis N. Private Interest and Public Gain: The Dartmouth College Case. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1972.

Twenty-sixth Amendment

The Twenty-sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that "[t]he right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age." Adopted in 1971, this amendment marks the most recent alteration to the Constitution to provide political equality to U.S. citizens. It adds to the provisions of the Fifteenth Amendment (1870), prohibiting male citizens from being denied the right to vote regardless of race, and the Nineteenth Amendment (1920), which prohibited women from being denied the right to vote in 1920. Enfranchisement is, of course, one of the most fundamental liberties in a democracy.

The Twenty-sixth Amendment was ratified during Richard M. Nixon's presidency in 1971 at the time of the controversial Vietnam War. Indeed, part of the controversy surrounding the war prior to the passage of this amendment was that in most states, young men were eligible to be drafted into the military at age eighteen, but they could not vote until they were twenty-one years old.

Similar public opposition to this seeming injustice during World War II had prompted two states, Kentucky and Georgia, to lower their voting age to eighteen, but other states declined to follow suit. Thus, when the issue resurfaced during the Vietnam conflict, Congress attempted to force a uniform voting age by adding a provision to the Voting Rights Act of 1965 when Congress extended it in 1970. This provision lowered the age qualification to eighteen in all federal, state, and local elections. President Nixon, however, had U.S. Attorney General John Mitchell challenge whether this could be accomplished through legislation or would require a constitutional amendment.

The U.S. Supreme Court struck down this congressional legislation in Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970). The Court's opinion was badly divided. Part of the controversy surrounded the appropriate interpretation of the "time, place, and manner" restrictions of the first paragraph of Article I, Section 4 of the federal Constitution. Ultimately, the Supreme Court, in an opinion written by Justice Hugo L. Black, decided that Congress was within its legislative authority in determining the appropriate voting age for federal elections, but that it could not regulate the age of voters in state and local elections.

The ruling left the states in a quandary. Complying would require copious recordkeeping at the state level to allow eighteen-year-olds to vote in federal elections but only twenty-one-year-olds to vote in state and local elections. Accordingly, most of the states were quite receptive to the Twenty-sixth Amendment, proposed by Senator Jennings Randolph of West Virginia. Also, some politicians hoped the amendment would help to quell the political unrest that surrounded the Vietnam War. As a result, the amendment, supported strongly by the public interest group Common Cause, was ratified by the states in record time—less than five months after Congress proposed it. Another reason for its swift passage was that most people thought that teenagers of the time were better educated than ever before in the nation's history and therefore were capable of making informed electoral decisions. Passage of the amendment effectively overturned the Supreme Court's decision in Oregon v. Mitchell.

Unfortunately, however, the freedoms provided by the Twenty-sixth Amendment have not been fully realized by America's young people. The amendment did establish a legal precedent for proof of adulthood and secured the ability of eighteen-year-olds to enter into legal contracts. However, although there is racial and gender diversity in voting, eighteen- to twenty-five-year-olds are the least likely to vote of any age group in the country. Congress tried to improve turnout through the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (the Motor Voter Law), but it has proved to be largely ineffective. Because of problems surrounding the presidential election of 2000, many states have undertaken electoral improvements.

Some civil libertarians suggest that full voter equality would be assured only by a national election day in which people have a day off from work, as in some European countries. Others hope that technological advances such as online voting may be especially appealing to young voters. Regardless of what the electoral future may hold, it was made a bit brighter for the enfranchised youth of the United States by virtue of the adoption of the Twenty-sixth Amendment in 1971.

Lori M. Maxwell

See also: Nixon, Richard M.; Vietnam War.

FURTHER READING

Bardes, Barbara A., Mack C. Shelley, and Steffen W. Schmidt. American Government and Politics Today: The Essentials, 2000–2001. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2000.

Stephens, Otis H., Jr., and John M. Scheb II. American Constitutional Law. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson/West, 2003.

Vile, John R. A Companion to the United States Constitution and Its Amendments. 3d ed. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.

Tyranny of the Majority

Numerical strength does not necessarily connote moral supremacy. This is why Alexis de Tocqueville, the acute French observer who authored Democracy in America in 1835, expressed concern over what he described as the "tyranny of the majority." Tocqueville believed that the power of the majority, as expressed in reverence for public opinion and as sometimes translated into laws promoting conformity, grew out of the relative "equality of conditions" in America. He believed this equality prevented the sustained development of formally hierarchical relations in America. Democratic man was thus independent, sovereign, self-interested, and enfranchised.

Although these equalities taken separately are socially and politically benign, collectively they present a subtle threat to democratic liberty. Power is held by all and by no one because men "are all perfectly equal because they are all entirely free." With little faith in individual opinions and no despot's opinion to revere, the democratic individual exhibits an "almost unlimited confidence in the judgment of the public." According to Tocqueville, "This is because it does not seem likely that truth would not be found on the side of the greatest number, since everyone has a similar perspective on it." The tyranny of the majority can ensue as members of the public tailor their opinions to those of the majority and as the majority attempts to enact its views into law.

Tocqueville took some comfort from his observation that in America "[s]carcely any political question arises . . . that is not resolved, sooner or later, into a judicial question." Tocqueville viewed lawyers and judges, who helped instruct individuals serving on juries or otherwise appearing in court, as an aristocracy of talent and training that could overbalance public opinion and instruct individuals on the value of individual rights. Tocqueville thus observed that "all parties are resolved to borrow in their daily controversies, the ideas, and even the language, peculiar to judicial proceedings."

The longevity and exceptionalism of America's liberal democracy, for Tocqueville, rested not only in the deference paid to the American legal system but also in the societal and institutional protections afforded to minorities and designed to divert democracy from its own excesses. Political associations and civil associations were vehicles for collective protection and "resistance against tyranny and oppression," but these supports were strengthened by institutional protections, including federalism; separation of powers; forced majority—and even supermajority—consensus on legislation (brought about in part by bicameralism); limited government; and judicial assent.

Although Tocqueville's terminology may have been new, concerns about majority rule were not. Institutional protections that could balance majority rule against minority rights were at the heart of Federalist and Antifederalist debates over ratification of the U.S. Constitution. James Madison thus observed in Federalist No. 10 (1787–88) that human nature made it inevitable that societies would develop factions, "whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or the permanent and aggregate interests of the community." He further feared that if uncontrolled, the effects of such faction would enable it "to sacrifice to its ruling passion or interests both the public good and the rights of other citizens." The Federalists thus advocated representative democracy, and a republic extending over a large land area with multiple factions, none of which would be dominant, as mechanisms for dealing with the adverse effects of factions. Thomas Jefferson later advocated what became the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) with the argument that such rights would provide a tool by which the judiciary could protect individual liberties. Over time, the judiciary has applied rights that once applied only to the national government to the states as well. In so doing, American courts have widened protections against oppressive state majorities and inconsistent applications of justice at both the state and national levels. Fundamental to these adjudications, as well as to the institutional supports for minority rights, lies recognition that, to quote Lani Guinier, perhaps echoing John Stuart Mill (a mid-nineteenth-century English theorist who further elaborated on the tyranny of the majority), "Majority rule, which presents an efficient opportunity for determining the public good, suffers when it is not constrained by the need to bargain with minority interests."

Tyson King-Meadows

See also: Bill of Rights; Ely, John Hart; United States Constitution.

FURTHER READING

Galston, William A. "Civil Society and the Art of Association." Journal of Democracy 11, 1 (January 2000): 64–70.

Guinier, Lani. Tyranny of the Majority: Fundamental Fairness in Representative Democracy. New York: Free Press, 1994.

Hamilton, Alexander, James Madison, and John Jay. The Federalist Papers, ed. Issac Kramnick. New York: Viking, 1987.

Manent, Pierre. Tocqueville and the Nature of Democracy, trans. John Waggoner. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

O'Donnell, Guillermo. "The Judiciary and the Rule of Law." Journal of Democracy 11, 1 (January 2000): 25–31.

Prempeh, H. Kwasi. "Lawyers and Liberal Democracy." Journal of Democracy 11, 1 (January 2000): 71–8.

Tocqueville, Alexis de. Democracy in America, ed. Phillips Bradley. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.

U

United States Constitution

Apart from the Constitution of Massachusetts, the Constitution of the United States, drafted in 1787 and ratified the following year, is the world's oldest written constitution. It created a republican government based on the sovereignty of the people. The framers of the Constitution endeavored to "to secure the blessings of liberty" while simultaneously establishing a national government sufficiently strong to maintain order, establish justice, defend the nation against attack, and promote the general welfare. The Constitution also allows the people to shape national policies through regular elections to the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the presidency.

Although the body of the original plan of government contained numerous protections for civil liberties, including the right to trial by jury, opponents of ratification succeeded in obtaining a promise from its supporters to add a Bill of Rights as soon as possible. The bill took the form of ten amendments ratified in 1791. The Supreme Court nationalized the Bill of Rights in the twentieth century, applying its provisions nearly equally to the national and state governments through a process known as "selective incorporation." The Constitution provides for widespread personal, political, artistic, scientific, religious, and economic freedom and has served as a model for more than one hundred constitutions subsequently adopted throughout the world.

DRAFTING

In February 1787, the Congress, meeting under the authority of the Articles of Confederation, put out a call to the states for delegates to a convention. Each state was asked to send at least four delegates to Philadelphia in May to revise the Articles of Confederation. Twelve states selected delegates. Rhode Island refused to participate, concerned that wealthy creditors and landowners would dominate the meeting. Some of those chosen by their state governments did not attend, including Patrick Henry of Virginia, who feared that a new, strong central government would too easily threaten civil liberties and the sovereignty of the states. Described by Thomas Jefferson as "an assembly of demi-gods," the convention numbered among its members some of the most distinguished leaders and brightest political minds in the country, including George Washington, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, Rufus King, Benjamin Franklin, Gouverneur Morris, John Dickinson, Roger Sherman, and James Wilson. Jefferson and John Adams did not attend because they were serving as envoys overseas.

Thirty-nine of the forty-two delegates present signed the document on September 17, 1787. The three who withheld their signature, George Mason, Edmund Randolph, and Elbridge Gerry, did so largely because it lacked a bill of rights. The proposed Constitution was sent to special state ratifying conventions. Several states approved the plan without difficulty, but during the Massachusetts ratifying convention, the supporters of the Constitution, called Federalists, encountered effective resistance from its opponents, known as Antifederalists. The latter argued that in the absence of a bill of rights, the national government would trample on the rights for which the Revolution had been fought, including freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of the press, freedom to worship as one chooses, freedom to acquire property, and freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment.

The supporters of the Constitution replied that, unlike the British Parliament, which enjoyed unlimited power, Congress would have only those powers enumerated in Article I, Section 8. Nowhere in the document was Congress given the authority to suppress speech, the press, or religion. Moreover, the framers included several protections for civil liberties in the plan. Article I, Section 9, guaranteed the privilege of habeas corpus (a petition for release from unlawful confinement), prohibited titles of nobility, and banned congressional enactment of bills of attainder (providing punishment without trial, usually for political expression) and ex post facto laws (laws applied with retroactive effect). Article I, Section 10 imposed similar limits on the states. Article III granted to all defendants in federal criminal trials the right to trial by jury and confined treason to levying war against the United States or providing aid and comfort to the enemy. The Antifederalists, however, were not convinced by these assertions. Only by promising to add a bill of rights at the first opportunity did the Federalists obtain assent from Massachusetts, the sixth state to ratify. Each subsequent ratifying convention exacted the same promise.

George Washington presiding at the signing of the Constitution of the United States in Philadelphia on September 17, 1787. (Library of Congress)

On June 8, 1789, Madison introduced the proposed bill of rights to the House of Representatives in the form of a series of amendments. Congress subsequently approved twelve amendments on September 25 and sent them to the states for approval. Ten of the amendments were ratified by three-quarters of the states on December 15, 1791, and these ten became known as the Bill of Rights. The Constitution has been amended seventeen more times, but, at under 5,000 words, it is still the shortest constitution of any government in the world.

PHILOSOPHICAL FOUNDATIONS

In the design of the fundamental law, Madison, who was most responsible for the Virginia plan, which Randolph introduced at the beginning of the Constitutional Convention, drew upon the state constitutions, especially the Virginia Constitution, and the Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776. He based the Constitution on the political theory expressed in John Locke's Second Treatise of Government (1690) and David Hume's Political Discourses (1752). Madison believed that the highest goal of government was to secure individual liberty. There are two major threats to freedom—one's fellow citizens and one's rulers. The Constitution is grounded in Locke's and Hume's view of human nature, namely, that human beings are selfish and motivated largely by greed, vanity, and fear. They are also rational and form governments in order to establish a power to arbitrate disputes by peaceful means. The purpose of government is not, as the ancient Greeks and Romans thought, to make people more virtuous but to protect them from each other. Under conditions of peace and security, individuals can exercise their natural rights to live freely, to acquire property, and to pursue happiness.

Madison knew that it was not enough to establish a powerful government able to control individuals; it was equally important to control the government itself. He relied primarily on the principles of separation of powers and checks and balances to do this. The Constitution divides the powers of the national government among three branches (with Congress itself being divided into two houses), each of which has the means and the motivation to defend itself against the encroachments of the others. Because all government is based on the consent of the governed, sovereignty lay in the people. Madison, however, did not trust the people to rule themselves directly as they did in ancient Athens. The Constitution establishes a representative democracy, or republic, in which the people select others to govern, accountable to the people in regular elections. Madison thought a political union of the thirteen states under a strong central government solved the problem of the tyranny of the majority. In a diverse country like the United States, with an extended territory, no one group, or faction, could impose its will on Congress. All laws, therefore, must be compromises put together by a coalition of various and competing interest groups. Such compromises, claimed Madison, would approximate "justice and the general good."

Baron de Montesquieu's The Spirit of Laws (1748) strongly influenced the Antifederalists. The French philosopher contended that liberty was safe only in small countries with homogeneous populations. Otherwise the people would lack a common interest. Moreover, Montesquieu pointed out, all large countries must be ruled despotically because they are constantly at war. Only a dictatorship could raise taxes and govern a large territory with a substantial population. When citizens live far away from the seat of government and when government becomes complex, the people lose interest in politics. Rulers, he said, would take advantage of the public's apathy to destroy the liberties of the people. One of the Constitution's major principles, federalism—the division of powers between the states and the federal government—bears the stamp of Montesquieu's teachings.

PROVISIONS

The first words of the fundamental law are "we the people," a phrase that makes clear that sovereignty rests in the people, not in the states, as the Articles of Confederation had specified, or in the national government. The Constitution divides powers of government among three branches. Article I enumerates the powers of Congress, Article II those of the president, and Article III the powers of the judiciary. Congress is limited to those powers listed or implied in Article I, Section 8. Congress has "the power of the purse" as well as the power to impeach and remove from office the president and the justices of the Supreme Court. The president has the power to appoint the heads of departments and the justices, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The president is also the commander-in-chief of the armed forces. The legislature must present all bills to the president for signature, but Congress can override a presidential veto by a two-thirds vote in both houses. The president makes treaties, but to become effective they must be approved by a two-thirds vote in the Senate.

Article III authorizes the establishment of a supreme court and such lower federal courts as Congress decides are necessary for the administration of justice. Article III does not explicitly grant to the federal courts judicial review, the power to declare acts of Congress or the state legislatures unconstitutional. Chief Justice John Marshall claimed this power for the Supreme Court in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), largely on the basis of Article VI, which makes the Constitution and laws of the United States "made in pursuance thereof" the "supreme law of the land." Article V lays out the process for amending the Constitution. Two-thirds majorities of both houses of Congress, or a convention called by two-thirds of the states, must propose an amendment, which is then submitted to the state legislatures or special state ratifying conventions. Three-fourths of the states must approve an amendment before it can go into effect.

The most important amendments for civil liberties are the ten in the Bill of Rights (1791) and the Fourteenth Amendment (1868). The First Amendment protects the freedoms of speech, assembly, press, and religion and bans a congressional establishment of religion. The Second Amendment guarantees the state militias' right to keep and bear arms. Amendments Four, Five, Six, and Eight contain protections for the criminally accused. Property rights are protected by the Fifth Amendment requirements that government compensate owners when taking their property for a public use and that no person be deprived of his property without due process of law.

The Fourteenth Amendment dramatically reversed responsibility for civil liberties from the states to the federal government. Section 1 made the former slaves citizens of the United States and the state where they resided and prohibited the states from depriving anyone of life, liberty, or property without due process of law or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws. The Supreme Court, beginning in 1925 with a series of cases, selectively incorporated the first eight amendments of the Constitution into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth, effectively nationalizing the Bill of Rights. Nearly all the cases in which the Court struck down a state law or judicial proceeding as an unconstitutional infringement on civil liberties were decided after 1925 and especially after Earl Warren assumed the office of chief justice in 1953.

Kenneth Holland

See also: Bill of Rights; Constitutional Amending Process; Constitutional Amendments; Constitutionalism; Judicial Review.

FURTHER READING

Berkin, Carol. A Brilliant Solution: Inventing the American Constitution. New York: Harcourt, 2002.

Hamilton, Alexander, John Jay, and James Madison. The Federalist Papers, ed. Isaac Kramnick. New York: Penguin, 1987.

Ketcham, Ralph, ed. The Anti-Federalist Papers and the Constitutional Convention Debates. New York: Mentor, 1996.

McDonald, Forrest. Novus Ordo Seclorum: The Intellectual Origins of the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1986.

Monk, Linda R. The Words We Live By: Your Annotated Guide to the Constitution. New York: Hyperion, 2003.

Skousen, W. Cleon. The Making of America: The Substance and Meaning of the Constitution. Washington, DC: National Center for Constitutional Studies, 1985.

Vile, John R. A Companion to the United States Constitution and Its Amendments. 3d ed. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.

United States Court System

The United States court system is an integral component of American government. Eventually, courts comment on most important political issues. They have had an important say in issues such as racial segregation, abortion, affirmative action, the limits of free speech, the rights of criminal defendants, the death penalty, and how voting districts are drawn. It is important to remember that although the court system is often less visible than other political institutions, courts are very much a part of the political process.

The court system in the United States is divided into two main parts—the federal-court system and the state-court system. Law in the United States is not a single set of rules but rather comes from a complex set of sources including the U.S. Constitution, U.S. Supreme Court decisions, Congress, state legislatures and high courts, local legislatures, administrative agencies, and legal customs. Both state and federal courts must interpret and implement information from these sources when making their decisions.

Court systems in the United States are organized in a hierarchical structure. This hierarchy is based on the jurisdiction of each court. Jurisdiction is the authority of a court to hear and decide a certain type of case. It is determined by either the state or federal legislature. Generally, federal courts hear cases involv-

All judges in the federal courts are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. Pictured is Judge James B. Parsons, the first black judge appointed to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. When Parsons became senior judge of the district in April 1975, he also became the first black senior judge in the country. (National Archives)

ing constitutional issues, federal laws, treaties, disputes between states, disputes between citizens of different states, and cases in which the United States is a party. State courts hear some of these as well and also handle cases that involve state laws.

There are two types of jurisdiction—original and appellate. Courts of original jurisdiction hear a case for the first time. This is the type of court where a trial takes place. District courts in the federal system, they are often called district or circuit courts in the states. Appellate jurisdiction refers to a court's ability to hear appeals. Appellate courts can review lower-court decisions, overturn those that are necessary, and, under the doctrine of judicial review, even review actions of the legislature to determine their constitutionality.

FEDERAL SYSTEM: OVERVIEW

The U.S. Constitution establishes the general outline of the federal-court system, but it was the Judiciary Act of 1789 that fleshed out the details. In the Judiciary Act, Congress established the structure of the U.S. Supreme Court and created federal district courts and federal circuit courts (now called Circuit Courts of Appeals). There are also several types of special legislative federal courts, including the United States Court of Military Appeals, bankruptcy courts, and the Court of Federal Claims (which hears cases dealing with patent and trademark issues).

United States Supreme Court

The United States Supreme Court is perhaps the most famous court, especially since the election of 2000 when it decided the outcome of the presidential race. It is composed of nine justices. This number is not set by the Constitution. It can be, and has been, changed by Congress. The Supreme Court is often referred to as the least understood government institution in the United States. Much of its business is conducted in secrecy. The public may attend oral arguments, but its decisions are made in private conference.

The Supreme Court has both original and appellate jurisdiction. It has original jurisdiction for a limited number of cases, including cases that involve states suing each other and cases against ambassadors or other diplomatic personnel. Its appellate jurisdiction is discretionary. This means that it can decide whether or not to take appellate cases. The justices vote on whether to issue certiorari (agreeing to review a case); four justices must vote to hear the appeal. The chief justice and other justices prepare a list of cases they would like to hear and discuss the list in conference. If a case is not discussed in conference, it is automatically denied. Any case that cannot garner the necessary four votes is not heard; rather, the decision of the last court stands.

The Court hears about 100 cases per year, less than 2 percent of the 8,000 petitions for certiorari it receives. There is no set rule to explain why the Court selects the cases it does, but it is more likely to hear a case if one or more factors are present: The case involves important political issues; the federal government is a party in the case; or different circuit courts of appeals are in disagreement and the Court wants to clear up the inconsistency.

The Supreme Court sits from the first Monday in October until late June. Generally, the Court sits for two weeks of each month. It hears oral arguments Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays. Each participant is given thirty minutes to present its side, during which justices may engage in sharp questioning. Fridays and Wednesdays the justices sit in conference and vote on the cases they have heard. After the conference vote, the most senior justice in the majority (or the chief justice if he is in the majority) can either assign the opinion or write the opinion. These conferences are secret, and only the justices are present. When the Court is not sitting, the justices write opinions, review memos on cases, and review pending petitions.

United States Courts of Appeals

United States Courts of Appeals were created by Congress in 1891 to relieve the caseload pressure on the U.S. Supreme Court. There are eleven regional courts of appeals (one each for the First through Eleventh Circuits, each encompassing a geographical area of states); one Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia; and one Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which hears cases previously adjudicated by the Court of Claims and the Court of Customs and Patents Appeals. Many cases on their dockets are mandatory; that is, they may not choose which cases to hear. Unlike the Supreme Court, which has a constitutionally protected sphere of jurisdiction, the courts of appeals are statutory in nature. They exercise only the jurisdiction that Congress grants them. Congress may limit the jurisdiction of these courts or may broaden it, as it has in the past.

These courts are very important in that they will often have the last word on federal issues. The Supreme Court will review only 0.5 percent of their decisions. Most of the caseload for the federal courts of appeals comes from United States district courts. Other cases come from administrative appeals. These cases usually are heard in three-judge panels, but occasionally an entire circuit (from four to twenty-eight judges) sit together to hear an appeal en banc. En banc reviews, however, are extremely rare.

Federal District Courts

The federal district courts are the trial courts of the federal judicial system. They are organized into districts—ninety-four in all. Federal district courts hear both civil and criminal matters arising under federal law or involving diversity cases. Diversity cases are those in which citizens of different states are suing each other (subject to some monetary restrictions). These courts may also hear cases in which the federal government is a party to the lawsuit.

There are also two special district courts that have jurisdiction nationwide. These are the Court of International Trade (which hears cases involving trade and customs issues) and the Court of Federal Claims (which hears cases involving federal contracts, governmental taking of private property, and damages against the United States).

STATE SYSTEM: OVERVIEW

There is no single mold for organization of state courts in the United States. Rather, states have implemented individualized systems over time. But state courts are extremely important as part of the overall court system. Most cases tried in the United States are tried in state courts and end in state courts. The U.S. Supreme Court has recognized the authority of state courts to interpret their own state laws. As long as state law does not conflict with the Constitution or federal laws, state law rules supreme in each state.

Trial Courts

States have two basic types of trial courts—those of limited jurisdiction and those of general jurisdiction. Trial courts of limited jurisdiction make up a majority of courts and are where most litigation takes place. They are created to hear particular types of cases, usually misdemeanor criminal cases and small-claims civil cases.

Most of these courts were created after the industrial revolution. Industrialization, population growth, and urbanization led to more people using the court system than ever before. Legislatures created limited jurisdiction trial courts to help take the caseload pressure off more traditional courts.

Trial courts of limited jurisdiction do not resemble "regular" trial courts in that they often are more informal and use abbreviated procedures. For example, they generally do not use juries, often are not courts of record (they do not keep verbatim records by tape or transcript), and sometimes do not provide a right to appeal. In addition, the participants often are not represented by attorneys but rather represent themselves. These parties may be in court for traffic violations, disagreements with neighbors, or other ordinance violations.

Trial courts of general jurisdiction are the major civil and criminal courts. This is where the more serious criminal and civil cases are tried. Contrary to popular belief, trial courts hear more civil cases than criminal cases. The most common types of civil cases heard include those involving domestic relations, personal injury, and estates. Trial courts of general jurisdiction are courts of record and may operate with a judge and a jury or only a judge. Attorneys often represent participants.

It is important to remember, however, that most cases will never get to the trial stage. In criminal cases, the parties often plea bargain. In civil cases, the rules of procedure are designed partly to help ensure that most cases can be resolved before trial. These rules set out the specifics of pleadings, discovery, motions, and pretrial conferences. For example, in a civil case either side may file a motion for summary judgment. A motion for summary judgment means a judge is asked to determine that one side should win the case as a matter of law, without trial, based solely on the pleadings and supplemental information supplied thus far in the suit. This tool encourages lawyers to do extensive pretrial work and attempt to resolve as many issues as possible before trial.

In addition, many states are now using forms of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) during the trial process or often before trial as a means to cut the number of cases coming into the court system. ADR can take the form of informal mediation, forced mediation, arbitration, or private judging. Most states that use ADR use it for domestic relations cases and more minor civil cases.

Intermediate Appellate Courts

Roughly two-thirds of all states have intermediate appellate courts, which are usually referred to as courts of appeals. The cases they hear originate in trial courts. Because these courts have mandatory dockets, they play a major role in siphoning appeals because fewer cases need to be heard by the highest state court.

Some states divide their intermediate appeals courts into two courts—civil and criminal. Other states combine civil and criminal cases into one court of appeals. Either way, intermediate appellate courts do not use juries, and cases are usually heard by panels of judges. The number of judges on the panel varies, depending on the state, but three is average. As with the federal courts of appeals, occasionally these courts can sit en banc, depending on the rules of the state, but this occurs only infrequently.

State Courts of Last Resort

Most states refer to their court of last resort as a supreme court. However, New York, for example, refers to its highest court as the court of appeals, whereas the state supreme courts are the trial-level tribunals. State supreme courts hear cases en banc. The number of judges ranges from five to nine, with the average being seven. These courts are very important because they have the last word on state law. Unless a party alleges a federal violation (either statutory or constitutional), state courts of last resort are the final arbiters of state law.

State courts of last resort primarily hear cases already heard by lower courts. In states with intermediate appellate courts, the docket of the court of last resort is discretionary. In states without intermediate appellate courts, generally at least part of the docket is mandatory. State courts of last resort also have some original jurisdiction. For example, these courts have original jurisdiction over such matters as attorney discipline.

As with intermediate appellate courts, courts of last resort do not use juries. Rather, cases are decided using the record from the lower court and by using the entire set of judges on the court. Appellate opinions are generally issued en banc, but if a court of last resort decides an issue using its original jurisdiction, one judge or a panel of judges may determine the issue.

SPECIAL ISSUES IN BOTH SYSTEMS

Rights of Defendants in Criminal Cases

Criminal defendants have the right to an attorney. In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), the U.S. Supreme Court held that states must provide attorneys to indigent clients in felony cases. Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972), expanded this ruling to cover misdemeanors for which incarceration was the sentence. States are not, however, required to provide counsel to individuals who can afford their own attorney.

States have various ways of providing counsel to indigent defendants. Some communities choose an assigned counsel system, under which lawyers who wish to provide indigent defense sign up with the state court and the court assigns them indigent cases on a rotating basis. The attorneys are paid on a case-by-case or hourly basis. Other communities have chosen to use public defenders. Public defenders are attorneys salaried by the state who handle indigent defense full-time. Still other communities choose to use a contract system in which a community contracts with a law firm to provide legal services for a set amount of time for a set amount of money. Most states use a combination of all of these methods in providing legal services for the poor. Studies are mixed as to which system provides the best and most effective services.

The right to an attorney in criminal cases has been hotly debated and is a politically charged issue. Arguments have arisen over who exactly should have the right to an attorney, when the state should have to pay (who qualifies as indigent), and what type of representation is guaranteed. For example, one famous case centered on whether an attorney who slept during part of a trial had provided adequate representation for his indigent client. Both state courts of last resort and the U.S. Supreme Court have ruled on these issues.

Selection of Judges

All judges in the federal courts are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. They serve for "good behavior," which essentially equates to life, as they can be removed only by impeachment. Generally, for lower-court judges, the president will consult with the senator of the nominee's state. Supreme Court appointments, however, are different. These are considered the prerogative of the president. Either way, these appointments are rife with political infighting because some of these judges will serve for decades.

Both senators and the president fight to appoint individuals who will uphold their political beliefs. Legislators try to determine a potential nominee's stance on controversial issues such as affirmative action, abortion, religion in schools, and the death penalty. In addition, politicians often try to make appointments based on particular characteristics of judges—sometimes these appointments are reserved for minority groups. For example, the U.S. Supreme Court generally is believed to have an African American seat and a Jewish seat. Although informal, these seats are meant to address concerns that the judiciary should reflect the diversity of the population in order to ensure that it is truly representative and that it maintains its legitimacy.

Judges in state courts are selected according to state law. States have chosen various ways of selecting judges. Some states elect all of their judges, on either a partisan or nonpartisan basis. Other states choose to appoint their judges, generally by the governor but in some states by the legislature. Finally, other states use what has been called the merit system, under which the legislature or governor appoints a judge from a list provided by a nonpartisan commission. After a couple of years of service, these judges must face a retention election. In practice, however, these judges almost never are defeated once appointed.

Regardless of how a state selects its judges, politics usually plays a major role in the choice. Under most systems, the tendency has been for the same type of individual to become a judge. Judges are overwhelmingly white, middle-class, and Protestant, although this profile has been changing somewhat since the 1980s.

Joy A. Willis

See also: Judicial Review; United States Supreme Court.

FURTHER READING

Federal Judiciary Home Page. http://www.uscourts.gov.
Goldman, Sheldon. American Court Systems: Readings in Judicial Process and Behavior. New York: Longman, 1989.
Neubauer, David W. Judicial Process: Law, Courts, and Politics in the United States. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt Brace, 1997.
Tarr, G. Alan. Judicial Process and Judicial Policymaking. Belmont, CA: West/Wadsworth, 1999.

United States Supreme Court

The Supreme Court defines the authority and powers of the national government and the states and their subdivisions and the nature of individual rights. Individual rights, such as freedom of speech and the right to privacy, protect citizens from the abuses of government authority. The Supreme Court, the highest court in the United States, is the final interpreter of whether the laws and actions of the U.S. government, states, subdivisions, and its citizens are permissible under the U.S. Constitution. The U.S. Congress set the present size of the Supreme Court, nine justices, in 1869.

POWER OF JUDICIAL REVIEW

The most important power of the Supreme Court is its power of judicial review, through which its justices determine whether actions of executive officials or state and federal laws violate the Constitution. Judicial review is also its most controversial power, because in exercising it, nine justices can nullify the decisions of government bodies that are democratically elected. One of the Supreme Court's most controversial decisions was Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), which protected women's right to abortion choice as part of the right to privacy. Thus, the Supreme Court declared most state criminal abortion laws to be unconstitutional. Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), which outlawed racial segregation in the public schools, was another case that was quite controversial when it was decided, because a number of states in the South and North had segregated schools.

Critics often react to Supreme Court decisions based on whether they think such decisions are prudent or wise; whether they are firmly rooted in the text and/or in the intentions of those who wrote and ratified the Constitution; or whether they think the Court has a responsibility to adapt the Constitution to the times or to enforce certain constitutionally rooted principles. In addition to exercising judicial review of legislative and executive actions, the Supreme Court exercises the power of statutory interpretation to determine what laws mean.

APPOINTMENT OF JUSTICES

The president appoints Supreme Court justices and other federal judges subject to the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate. Periodically, presidents are forced to withdraw nominees from consideration when opposition in the Senate is great. At times the Senate formally rejects a nominee. Justices leave the Court only through resignation, death, or impeachment by the U.S. House of Representatives and trial and conviction by the Senate. Only one justice has been formally impeached.

JURISDICTION

Article III of the Constitution specifies that the Supreme Court has original and appellate jurisdiction. It has original and exclusive jurisdiction—that is, it is the court of first resort—in controversies between two or more states. It has original but not exclusive jurisdiction in cases involving public ministers and consuls, and in all actions by a state against citizens of another state or against aliens. All other cases are taken on appeal from federal district and circuit courts or the highest-level state appellate courts, with the Court having full discretion whether to take a case. Since the 1990s, however, the distinction between original and appellate jurisdiction has been of little note, because Congress passed laws giving the Supreme Court full discretion whether to hear a case, no matter the nature of the parties involved.

Contemplation of Justice statue at the U.S. Supreme Court, Washington, D.C. (Library of Congress)

PROCEDURAL MATTERS

Writs of Certiorari and Court Selection of Cases

Parties seeking Supreme Court action request the Court to reply positively to petitions for writs of certiorari; if a petition is granted, the Court directs the lower court(s) to supply it with the records in a case. Law clerks, individually or in pools, review the "cert petitions" for the constitutional questions they raise for the justices to consider. The Supreme Court has complete discretion as to whether it hears cases. For the Court to agree to hear a case, four justices must agree to take it; this is known as the "rule of four." For a case to be taken on appeal from a state court, it must present a substantial federal question. For example, a party must argue that a right or principle in the Constitution or a federal law has been violated. The Court often decides to hear cases in which lower federal courts have made conflicting decisions with regard to interpreting the Constitution, laws of the United States, or prior cases of the Supreme Court.

Caseload

The caseload, or workload, of the Supreme Court can be measured in part by the number of filings, or cases it is asked to decide. Filings have continued to increase over the years, and in 1999 the number of cases topped 8,000. Despite the thousands of petitions it receives each year, the Court has not for more than a decade given full review (listening to oral arguments and writing full opinions) to more than 130 cases a year. The Court reviews another 75 to 125 cases each year through brief decisions without hearing oral arguments. The workload may also be measured by the expanded burdens and responsibilities of each of the associate justices and the chief justice.

The number of filings increased because of population growth; the greater complexity of U.S. political, economic, and social systems; and congressional legislation that provided new bases on which individuals, interest groups, and governments could bring legal actions to federal courts, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court. The Court's work has also expanded with its definition of new individual rights and its expansion on limits on government power through interpretation of the Constitution and its amendments.

Briefs

All cases require that there be actual controversies between parties seeking a decision from the Court. Parties may include individuals, states, cities, corporations, and legal advocacy groups, such as the American Civil Liberties Union, and groups supporting or opposing controversial rights, such as the rights of criminal defendants or the right of abortion choice. The opposing parties must present detailed legal briefs. These documents marshal all possible relevant legal principles and precedents. On matters of broad public policy, the Supreme Court allows amicus curiae (friend of the Court) briefs. Legal advocacy groups, public and private institutions, and at times other interested parties are permitted to file such briefs, ostensibly on behalf of one of the parties but actually to provide a line of argument or rationale consistent with their interests.

Oral Argument, Conferences, and Court Voting

After the justices have read the briefs filed by the opposing sides in a case, they set a date to hear oral arguments. In oral arguments, the attorneys for each party present their side of the case for an allotted period of time, usually thirty minutes. The Court may sit for a longer period of oral arguments on the most important cases. In oral argument, the justices often interrupt the attorneys with questions and discuss legal issues among themselves. In most cases oral argument plays a minor role in the final decision, though it may be crucial in some landmark decisions. On the most significant cases, the Court has allowed radio communication of oral arguments. A few days after hearing oral argument, the justices confer to discuss and vote on cases. Conferences are secret. At times the notes of justices offer a clue to conference proceedings. Only occasionally do these conferences win over an undecided justice to a particular position.

MAJORITY, CONCURRING, AND DISSENTING OPINIONS

After the justices vote on a case in conference, if the chief justice has voted with the majority, he writes or assigns the majority opinion, which states the legal findings of the Court. If the chief justice is not in the majority, the judge with the most seniority who has voted with the majority decides who will write the majority opinion. The majority opinion is the most important written opinion in each case because it usually states what the law is; it is always printed first. Any justice may decide to affirm the majority decision or to dissent. Members of the Court who agree with the majority decision may choose to write a concurring opinion. They may agree with the majority decision but disagree with the legal principles that were used to support it. Or, justices might agree with both the majority decision and its reasoning but wish to clarify their own views on the case or respond to one or more issues raised by a dissenting opinion. In some cases justices may write an opinion that concurs with the majority opinion in some respects but dissents from it in some aspect with which they disagree. Concurring opinions were rare for most of the Court's history. They became more common in the mid-twentieth century and have been especially prevalent since the 1960s.

During the drafting stage, justices circulate drafts of written opinions for comment. Any justice might contribute to the draft of a colleague's opinion, make suggestions for revisions, or, in rare cases, even switch sides. Compromises over the language in opinions are common. They result from justices' efforts to win support for their views. For example, a justice writing an opinion may tone down language or add or subtract a principle to win over another justice. Despite the role that such compromise can play in Supreme Court decision-making, justices change their initial conference votes in less than 10 percent of the cases they hear.

Usually, dissenting opinions are not as legally significant as the majority opinion, for they do not form a precedent that justices feel obliged to follow in later cases. However, dissenting opinions can prove to be more important than even some majority opinions. Such opinions might be unusually forceful or eloquent, or might advance a novel or influential method of interpretation, as did Justice Thurgood Marshall's unique "sliding-scale" principle in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973), a case dealing with the level of constitutional scrutiny (rational basis, strict scrutiny, or intermediate level) that should be extended to different classifications of individuals under principles of equal protection. A dissenting opinion might subsequently prove so influential that it informs the majority opinion in later cases, giving justices who are not in the majority a chance to have great influence on future Court decision-making.

Ronald Kahn

See also: Judicial Review; United States Court System.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J. The Judicial Process: An Introductory Analysis of the Courts of the United States, England, and France. 7th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Kahn, Ronald. The Supreme Court and Constitutional Theory, 1953–1993. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.

O'Brien, David M. Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics. 6th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2002.

Perry, H. W. Deciding to Decide: Agenda Setting in the United States Supreme Court. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1991.

United States v. American Library Association, Inc. (2003)

In United States v. American Library Association, Inc., 539 U.S. 194 (2003), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the national government could use its power over spending to require that public libraries accepting federal funds install removable filters to block access to pornographic sites. A three-judge district court in Pennsylvania had struck the blocking provision in the Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA) as an improper content-based restriction on access to a legitimate public forum that was protected by the free speech rights provided in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In a six–three decision, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist ruled otherwise.

Rehnquist pointed to the worthy roles of libraries in "facilitating learning and cultural enrichment." Such libraries must necessarily choose materials that best meet the needs of their clientele. Rehnquist cited both Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666 (1998), and National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998), to note that in analogous circumstances, the Court had accepted some content-based judgments as to the appropriateness of speech in given settings. Rehnquist argued that Internet access had developed too recently to be considered a traditional public forum, and he argued that the Internet was designed to be little more "than a technological extension of the book stack." Libraries are not obligated to examine every individual image or message when deciding to exclude categories of speech that are illegal or pornographic. Although Internet filters might initially block materials that might otherwise be available to adults, the law allows adults to request that such blocking devices be disabled. When the government appropriates funds, it has the right to set conditions for their expenditure, and it is under no obligation to fund pornographic expression.

In a concurring opinion, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy left open the possibility that the ability of adults to unblock access could be so restrictive as to permit them to bring a suit challenging the law as actually applied. In another concurrence, Justice Stephen F. Breyer argued for the application of "heightened scrutiny" to this case but believed that the state had a "compelling" interest in preventing children from accessing pornography. He likened blocking access to juveniles to library policies involving closed stacks or interlibrary loans.

Justice John Paul Stevens's dissent focused on the concern that filtering mechanisms would block some materials that were not illegal or pornographic. Although he argued that local libraries had the right to use such blocking mechanisms, he did not believe Congress had the right to make this decision. He further argued that use of federal funds as an incentive was the equivalent of penalizing the exercise of freedom of speech.

Justice David H. Souter's dissent, joined by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, expressed concern that a law ostensibly designed to protect children actually had the effect of blocking adult access as well. Comparing the policy required by CIPA to the Library Bill of Rights, Souter argued that the law effectively provided for censorship in violation of the First Amendment.

John R. Vile

See also: First Amendment; National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley; Pornography.

FURTHER READING

Peck, Robert C. Libraries, the First Amendment, and Cyberspace: What You Need to Know. Chicago: American Library Association, 2000.

United States v. Drayton (2002)

United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194 (2002), involved the scope of police authority to search public buses and their passengers absent prior judicial approval or clear evidence of crime. Christopher Drayton and a companion had been en route from Florida to Michigan in early 1999 when, during a scheduled stop in Tallahassee, three plain-clothed police officers boarded their bus to conduct a random sweep for illegal drugs and weapons. Approaching the men at their seats, officers first sought and gained their permission to search an overhead bag. Finding no contraband there, officers then asked, "Mind if I check you?" Both men agreed, which led to pat-down searches that revealed several bundles of powdered cocaine concealed in their pants. Drayton and his companion were arrested and charged with violating federal drug trafficking statutes. At trial and on appeal, they challenged the admissibility of the drug evidence on the grounds that they were effectively forced to cooperate with unjustified police searches and were never informed of their right to refuse under the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's majority opinion upheld the constitutionality of the officers' conduct by stressing the broad authority of law enforcement officials to investigate and deter crimes even in the absence of any specific suspicion or evidence of illegal acts. Citizens were frequently asked to aid in criminal investigations, Kennedy wrote, and a public encounter with police amounted to a Fourth Amendment "seizure" only when a reasonable person in the circumstances would have felt unable to terminate it at will. Drayton and his companion, however, faced "no application of force, no intimidating movement . . . not even an authoritative tone of voice." In any event, Kennedy continued, the two men had effectively waived any Fourth Amendment objections to the encounter when they consented to the searches at the scene—even though police had failed to provide any explicit notice of their right to refuse. The touchstone for valid consent, Kennedy concluded, was voluntariness rather than explicit notice and waiver of the right to deny cooperation. And although a failure by officers to advise a suspect of his rights certainly would be relevant to that issue, any judicial determination about the nature of an encounter with police ultimately required a careful case-specific weighing of all the particular circumstances.

All nine justices in Drayton endorsed the majority's "reasonable person" and voluntariness standards for judging the validity of police investigatory actions under the Fourth Amendment. Yet three dissenters (Justices David H. Souter, John Paul Stevens, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg) disputed the majority's application of those standards to the particular facts at hand. Justice Souter wrote that Drayton's arresting officers, by displaying their badges and engaging passengers in close quarters, inevitably fostered an "atmosphere of obligatory participation" on the bus. Accordingly, officers were constitutionally required to provide adequate procedural safeguards—including notice of the right to refuse cooperation—so as to preserve passengers' effective freedom of choice.

John P. Forren

See also: Fourth Amendment; Search; Search Warrants.

FURTHER READING

Daniel, Sandra. "Bus Passengers Had Implicit Right to Refuse Search." Chicago Daily Law Bulletin, October 14, 2002, 6.

United States v. Eichman (1990)

In United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990), the U.S. Supreme Court reiterated its controversial decision of the year before in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), upholding First Amendment protection for symbolic speech that gave individuals the right to burn American flags as a form of political protest. In the wake of angry protests over the Johnson decision, Congress passed the Flag Protection Act of 1989 that made it a federal crime to intentionally "mutilate, deface, physically defile, burn, maintain on the floor or ground, or trample upon the United States flag, except conduct related to the disposal of a 'worn or soiled' flag." Shawn Eichman and some of his friends, including Mark John Haggerty, whose case was heard along with Eichman's, and Gregory Johnson of Texas v. Johnson decided to challenge the new law by publicly burning an American flag outside a post office in Seattle, Washington, on October 29, 1989, the day the new flag law went into effect. In a press conference, the lawyer for Eichman and Haggerty stated that congressional attempts to glorify the flag ignored the fact that it had flown over the massacres of Native Americans early in the history of the United States and over the bodies of slaughtered villagers in My Lai, Vietnam (1968). To the dismay of many Americans, particularly those on the right of the political spectrum, the conservative Court maintained its position that burning or otherwise defacing the flag was protected by the U.S. Constitution.

By a slim five–four decision, the Supreme Court held the Flag Protection Act of 1989 unconstitutional because it was a clear effort on the part of Congress to violate the right to free expression guaranteed by the First Amendment. Writing for the majority, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. maintained that despite its stated intent, the congressional language embodied in the act was specifically content-based rather than content-neutral, which called for an "exacting" level of scrutiny by the Court. Reiterating an entrenched respect for First Amendment protections, Brennan wrote, "If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment, it is that the Government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable."

Justice Brennan further insisted that denying individuals the constitutional right to desecrate the American flag diluted "the very freedom that makes this emblem so revered, and worth revering." Arguing that destroying or disfiguring a symbol did nothing to change the symbol itself, the majority determined in Eichman that "[t]he Government's interest is implicated only when a person's treatment of the flag communicates a message to others that is inconsistent with the identified ideals."

In a separate dissent written by Justice John Paul Stevens and supported by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Byron R. White, the minority agreed with the majority position that the government had no right to restrict speech simply because it disagreed with the message. However, the minority argued that the government was within its rights to prohibit speech that was "supported by a legitimate societal interest that is unrelated to suppression of the ideas the speaker desires to express as long as the prohibition does not entail any interference with the speaker's freedom to express those ideas by other means."

After determining in Spence v. Washington (418 U.S. 405) in 1974 that an individual had the right to hang a flag upside down as a protest against the Vietnam War, the Supreme Court for several years refused to hear a number of flag burning or defacement cases. Then in 1989 the Court agreed to decide whether Gregory Johnson's burning of the American flag in protest of the economic policies of President Ronald Reagan's administration was constitutionally protected. At the time Johnson burned the American flag, forty-eight states and the federal government prohibited such acts by law.

In the aftermath of Eichman, which was announced June 11, 1990, pressure was put on Congress to propose a constitutional amendment that would have made it a violation of the Constitution to burn an American flag. On June 21, by a vote of 254 to 177, the House of Representatives defeated the proposed amendment, ensuring that the flag amendment would not be sent to the states for ratification.

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: First Amendment; Symbolic Speech; Texas v. Johnson.

FURTHER READING

Abernathy, M. Glenn, and Barbara A. Perry. Civil Liberties Under the Constitution. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Simon, James F. The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Tedford, Thomas L. Freedom of Speech in the United States. New York: Random House, 1985.

United States v. Kirschenblatt (1926)

In United States v. Kirschenblatt, 16 F.2d 202 (2d Cir. 1926), Judge Learned Hand helped rein in federal abuse of search warrants by making it clear that the existence of a warrant could not be used as a pretext to gather up a person's papers when such papers were unspecified in the warrant and were not the means to illegal acts. The case represented an early precursor for later Supreme Court decisions that would give individuals more protection against illegal searches by the police.

Police had sought and obtained a warrant for Kirschenblatt's house allowing for the seizure of "liquor, the containers thereof" and "property designed for the manufacture of liquor." They had arrested him at his residence and used their warrant and arrest to seize a variety of incriminating documents that they discovered at the time but that were not listed on the warrant.

Although acknowledging that "strict consistency" might give to a search of the premises incident to arrest "the same scope as to the search of the person" (then recognized as fairly extensive), Judge Hand feared that such an interpretation would result in approving the very kinds of general warrants, or writs of assistance, that the Fourth Amendment had been designed to prevent. Hand said that "it is broadly a totally different thing to search a man's pockets and use against him what they contain, from ransacking his house for everything which may incriminate him." Granting that the power to rummage among a person's papers after arresting him at home would not exist if the person were not there, Hand observed that "it is small consolation to know that one's papers are safe only so long as one is not at home." Moreover, in words that would have special significance for later cases involving First Amendment freedoms of expression, Hand observed that "what seems fair enough against a squalid huckster of bad liquor may take on a very different face, if used by a government determined to suppress political opposition under the guise of sedition."

Acknowledging that the propriety of seizing "the fruits, or the tools of the crime, itself" upon arrest had ancient roots, Hand denied that search warrants could rightfully be used as means simply to gain access to a person's home, office, or papers "solely for the purpose of making search to secure evidence to be used against him in a criminal or penal proceeding." If police needed papers, they first should have to establish probable cause to specify them on the warrants themselves. Although police might have cause to seize "[t]he forged note, the fraudulent prospectus, the policy slip, the written contract, if that be forbidden, [or] the seditious broadside," Hand denied that either the arrest or the warrant justified seizing "the whole of a man's correspondence, his books of account, the records of his business, in general, the sum of his documentary property."

Subsequent decisions demonstrated that Hand did not uniformly favor the rights of the defendant over the prosecutor. Thus, in United States v. Sherman, 171 F.2d 619 (2d Cir. 1948), he observed that "No prosecution is tried with flawless perfection; if every slip is to result in reversal, we shall never succeed in enforcing the criminal law at all." Similarly, in United States v. Wexler, 79 F.2d 526 (2d Cir. 1935), he ruled that it was improper to tie the hands of a prosecutor during closing arguments while allowing defense attorneys free rein.

Likewise, Hand's concern for freedom of expression in Kirschenblatt had been reflected earlier in Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 244 F. 535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917), in which he overturned a postmaster's refusal to circulate in the mails a magazine that spoke out against the government, especially as related to conscription. Although Hand is better known for formulating the "gravity of the evil test," which reflected intervening Supreme Court decisions and which the U.S. Supreme Court employed in Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), to convict leading U.S. Communists of organizing the Communist Party, the Supreme Court's opinion in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), arguably came closer to protecting the concerns for free expression that Hand had expressed in Masses and in Kirschenblatt. Similarly, Kirschenblatt appears to be a precursor to the Supreme Court's decision in Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969), restricting the scope of a search that could be conducted in conjunction with an arrest of a person in his home.

David T. Harold

See also: Dennis v. United States; Fourth Amendment; Hand, Learned; Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten; Search Warrants.

FURTHER READING

Griffith, Kathyrn. Judge Learned Hand and the Role of the Federal Judiciary. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.

Gunther, Gerald. Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.

Hand, Learned. The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1958.

Schick, Marvin. Learned Hand's Court. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970.

Shanks, Herschel. The Art and Craft of Judging: The Decision of Judge Learned Hand. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

United States v. Leon (1984)

In United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court tackled the difficult question of whether evidence resulting from a faulty search warrant should be admissible in a criminal trial if the police officer obtained the warrant in good faith. An informant, who had not been established as reliable, tipped off police that two individuals he knew were dealing drugs. Police began a thorough investigation of the pair and, based upon the tip and surveillance information, sought and obtained a warrant for the search of several residences and automobiles. The searches produced large quantities of drugs, and Alberto Leon and a companion were indicted on drug charges. The case raised issues pertaining to use of the exclusionary rule, under which evidence obtained as a result of an illegal search—here the faulty warrant made the search illegal—cannot be admitted at trial.

The attorneys for the defendants sought to suppress the admission of the drugs into evidence on the basis that because the original informant's credibility was not set forth in the affidavit, use of the affidavit to obtain the warrant was insufficient to establish probable cause, and thus the warrant was invalid. The prosecution admitted that the warrant was defective but claimed that because the police officers believed they had a valid warrant, and acted in good faith reliance on it, the evidence should be admissible. The trial court granted a defense motion to suppress evidence obtained from the warrant on the basis that police had not established probable cause, and rejected the government's argument that good faith reliance on a defective warrant constituted an exception to the exclusionary rule. The court of appeals affirmed the exclusion of the evidence, but the Supreme Court chose to review the case to decide the question of whether a good faith exception to the exclusionary rule should be recognized.

In a six–three decision, the Court reversed the decision of the lower court and held in favor of the government. Justice Byron R. White wrote the majority opinion, stating that the exclusionary rule was not a Fourth Amendment right for criminal defendants but rather a judicially created remedy designed to deter police misconduct. Justice White declared that in deciding whether the exclusionary rule should be imposed in a case as a deterrent to police misconduct, courts must weigh the costs and benefits of denying the admission of the evidence. Applying this standard, Justice White concluded that the cost of excluding the evidence in this case was too great, and the benefit was too small. He stated that penalizing an officer for the mistake of a judge would not deter police misconduct, and it could generate disrespect for the law and the administration of justice. Justice White reasoned further that excluding the evidence resulting from a defective warrant would also not have a deterrent effect on the issuing judge or magistrate. Only when a warrant was based on a knowingly or recklessly false police affidavit, Justice White asserted, would there be reason for excluding the evidence.

Justice William J. Brennan Jr., joined by Justice Thurgood Marshall, dissented from the majority opinion and asserted that the evidence from an invalid search warrant should be suppressed regardless of whether the officers acted in good faith. Justice Brennan argued that the judiciary is responsible for ensuring Fourth Amendment rights are respected, and that the Fourth Amendment condemns not only the initial illegal invasion of privacy stemming from the invalid search but also the use of the evidence at trial. Because the purpose of the search is to introduce evidence at trial, the invasion and admission of evidence should be regarded as two aspects of one illegal government act. He argued that the drafters of the Fourth Amendment knew that some evidence would be lost to the government but also knew this was a necessary result to protect the privacy of citizens. Justice Brennan also stated that applying the exclusionary rule strictly would force police departments to train officers better. In his view, however, the majority opinion removed any incentive for judges to be careful, since their mistakes would have no consequences, and the decision would encourage ignorance among police because they would be trained that as long as they had a signed warrant, they could rely on it. The long-run effect of this decision, Brennan predicted, would be an undermining of the integrity of the warrant process.

The Leon case carved out a significant exception to the exclusionary rule, which had been interpreted as a constitutional protection by the Supreme Court in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). In Mapp, the Court suggested that the exclusionary rule was a constitutionally protected right that should be broadly enforced, whereas in Leon the Court recast the exclusionary rule as a tool, peripheral to the Fourth Amendment, for deterring police misconduct. This shift in precedent in 1984 reflected that the Supreme Court under Chief Justice Warren Burger was more conservative in its criminal procedure decisions than was the Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren when its members decided Mapp twenty-three years earlier.

Keith Rollin Eakins

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Good Faith Exception; Mapp v. Ohio; Search Warrants.

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 4th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Israel, Jerold H., Yale Kamisar, and Wayne R. LaFave. Criminal Procedure and the Constitution: Leading Supreme Court Cases and Introductory Text. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

United States v. National Treasury Employees Union (1995)

In United States v. National Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454 (1995), a split (six–three) U.S. Supreme Court struck down the honoraria ban in section 501(b) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. The divided Court held that the ban on federal employees accepting compensation for activities outside the scope of their employment, such as speechmaking or publishing, violated employees' freedom of expression under the First Amendment to the Constitution.

In 1989 Congress amended the Ethics in Government Act to prohibit federal officials, members of Congress, and other government employees from accepting compensation for making an appearance, giving a speech, or writing an article. The language of the honoraria prohibition provided "An individual may not receive any honorarium while that individual is a [m]ember [of Congress], officer, or employee." The ban applied to nearly all employees of the federal government as well as to Congress. The ban was imposed on activities even unrelated to a worker's employment with the government, "such as religion, history, dance and the environment." The Court cited as an example a postal worker in Arlington, Virginia, who had given lectures on the Quaker religion, earning him a modest but useful amount of supplemental income.

The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held 501(b) unconstitutional, as did the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. A major concern of both courts was the lack of a nexus between the employee's specific job responsibilities and duties and the skill for which the individual received an honorarium. In other words, it did not appear that employees were personally profiting from their connection to the government, and the government failed to show how the honoraria ban was in the best interest of the public.

In upholding the lower courts and outlawing the honoraria ban, the majority opinion, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, noted the significant contributions to the marketplace of ideas made by federal employees writing in their spare time. He noted that authors Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman Melville were employed by the Customs Service and that poet Walt Whitman worked for both the Justice and Interior Departments. Stevens argued that federal workers did not surrender their First Amendment right of free expression by working in the public sector, a right they would otherwise retain. Nor did the extracurricular endeavors of federal employees compromise the public's trust in their job performance.

The dissenters, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, argued that the majority exaggerated the amount of speech deterred by the ban and overstated the necessary justifications the government must make in support of such a ban. The dissenters argued that the government must have broad authority in regulating the activities of its employees, such as controlling their partisan political activity. The honoraria ban, they argued, was content-neutral and did not deny federal employees speech rights, only compensation. The balance between the interests of the government and the right of its employees to be compensated for their free expression was a reasonable control on speech.

Priscilla H. M. Zotti

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Collins, Robert S. "Ethics and the First Amendment: The Applicability of the Honorarium Ban of the Ethics Reform Act of 1989 to the Executive Branch." George Washington Law Review 62 (1994): 888.

Lin, Judy M. "Casenote: United States v. National Treasury Employees Union and the Constitutionality of the Honoraria Ban: Protecting the First Amendment Rights of Public Employees." University of Richmond Law Review 29 (1995): 1555.

United States v. O'Brien (1968)

In United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the conviction of an individual who burned his draft card in violation of federal law. The significance of this case rests in the important issues of free speech it raised under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and in the test the Court formulated for what has come to be called "symbolic speech."

David Paul O'Brien burned his Selective Service registration certificate (draft card) on the steps of a South Boston courthouse to protest against the war in Vietnam and the draft. For this action, he was indicted, tried, and convicted under a federal statute prohibiting the intentional destruction or mutilation of such certificates. O'Brien appealed his conviction, arguing that the statute was unconstitutional, both facially and as applied, because it abridged his right to freedom of expression under the First Amendment. The case eventually made its way to the Supreme Court, and on May 27, 1968, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the statute.

Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Earl Warren noted that there was "nothing necessarily expressive" about the knowing destruction of a draft card because "[a] law prohibiting destruction of Selective Service certificates no more abridges free speech on its face than a motor vehicle law prohibiting the destruction of drivers' licenses, or a tax law prohibiting the destruction of books and records."

The Court rejected O'Brien's argument that his act of burning a draft card on the steps of a courthouse was protected "symbolic speech" under the First Amendment, reasoning "[w]e cannot accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled 'speech' whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea." The Court also emphasized that even if the burning of a draft card in this manner was sufficient to implicate First Amendment interests, it did not necessarily follow that this form of expression was constitutionally protected, because "when 'speech' and 'nonspeech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms."

The Court then delineated a four-part analytical framework that has become a key pillar of its First Amendment jurisprudence. Under the O'Brien test, a governmental regulation is sufficiently justified, despite its incidental impact upon expressive conduct implicating First Amendment interests, if (1) the regulation is within the constitutional power of the government; (2) the regulation furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; (3) the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free speech; and (4) the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. The O'Brien Court found that the federal statute prohibiting the intentional destruction of draft cards easily met these requirements, and therefore upheld the constitutionality of the statute and O'Brien's conviction.

The O'Brien test has had broad application in First Amendment issues and in civil liberties. The "important or substantial interest" prong of the test would later be used as a baseline for other Court attempts to finesse what would otherwise be hard-and-fast distinctions. Most notably, in Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976), the Court adopted this language as the test to evaluate gender-discrimination claims. Unwilling to elevate gender discrimination to the level of race discrimination (which would require the use of the "compelling-interest" test inherent in strict scrutiny), yet also unwilling to relegate gender discrimination to the undemanding requirements of the rational-basis test, the Court fell back on the O'Brien language and required that "classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives."

Stephen Louis A. Dillard and Steven B. Lichtman

See also: First Amendment; Symbolic Speech; Texas v. Johnson.

FURTHER READING

Cray, Ed. Chief Justice: A Biography of Earl Warren. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.

Greenawalt, Kent. Fighting Words: Individuals, Communities, and the Liberties of Speech. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.

Schweber, Howard. Speech, Conduct, and the First Amendment. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Legislation on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group (2000)

In United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. 803 (2000), the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the constitutionality of a content-based restriction on broadcasting contained in section 505 of the Telecommunications Act of 1996 and held the law violated the rights of free speech protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Section 505 required that cable operators either (1) provide a complete scramble of certain types of adult-oriented content, such as the sexually explicit films broadcast by Playboy Entertainment Group, or (2) limit such content to the "safe harbor" hours of 10:00 P.M. to 6:00 A.M. In a complete (full) scramble, both audio and visual content is totally blocked such that no signal other than visual snow and audio static can be discerned. The complete-scramble requirement was intended to address the claim that conventional scrambling occasionally permitted bleed-through of signals that allowed children to overhear or catch momentary glimpses of sexually explicit entertainment. Because the technological modifications necessary to inhibit any possibility of signal bleed were costly, most cable operators instead chose the safe-harbor option. This restriction of opportunity to sell adult-oriented programming directly reduced the possibility of generating income through those sales.

Playboy Entertainment Group filed suit in federal court in Delaware seeking an injunction to block enforcement of section 505 as unconstitutional under the First Amendment. The three-judge panel held for Playboy and determined the law was an overly broad content-based restriction that might restrict more than was intended by the government. The government appealed to the Supreme Court, which was sharply divided in its five–four opinion. In the majority opinion, written by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the Court agreed that addressing the problem of the inadvertent exposure of children to sexually explicit images was legitimate governmental activity, but the government had not narrowly tailored the solution to the problem. In other words, a permissible government solution could not also violate the Constitution. Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Clarence Thomas, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined in the majority opinion.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Stephen G. Breyer, Antonin Scalia, and Sandra Day O'Connor dissented. They argued that the law was indeed narrowly tailored and served the purpose of protecting children from exposure to sex on cable television. The underlying premise of the dissent was that the government was entitled to dictate reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions on commercial speech. In interesting dicta (nonbinding analysis) in his separate dissent, however, Justice Scalia inadvertently undermined the dissenters' argument that the law was narrowly tailored when he asserted that "It is not only children who can be protected from occasional uninvited exposure to what [Playboy] calls 'adult-oriented programming'; we can all be."

Charles Anthony Smith

See also: Pornography; "Seven Dirty Words"; United States v. American Library Association, Inc.

FURTHER READING

Kang, Jerry. Communications Law and Policy: Cases and Materials. New York: Aspen, 2001.

Siegal, Paul. Communication Law in America. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2001.

United States v. The Progressive, Inc. (1979)

The effort by the liberal-oriented Progressive magazine to publish antinuclear activist Howard Morland's freelance article, "The H-Bomb Secret: How We Got It, Why We're Telling It," kindled a firestorm of debate over the government's exercise of prior restraint, the practice of quashing expression even before its publication. This use of prior restraint raised major issues pertaining to freedom of the press as protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Cold War arms race was still hot in March 1979, and United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 486 F. Supp. 5 (1979), was heard and decided by U.S. District Judge Robert Warren of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, that year. Judge Warren blocked publication of what the government contended was "restricted data" under the Atomic Energy Act, a law that automatically treated virtually all nuclear information as classified.

Yet author Morland had gathered all his information from publicly accessible sources, including the Encyclopedia Americana, government documents, and his college physics textbook. His intent in the article was to show how easy it was for any nation to design—though not necessarily build—its own bomb. In an interview years later, he noted that his initial goal was political criticism, "a sort of in-your-face piece of guerrilla theater to cause a commotion, to get people thinking and break down the wall of secrecy," which he considered to be a sham. He successfully caused that commotion.

Without Morland's knowledge, the magazine had sent the manuscript for prepublication review to a Massachusetts Institute of Technology scientist, who then forwarded it to the U.S. Department of Energy; later, the magazine also sent a copy directly to the department. The government demanded deletion of technical details. When the magazine refused, the government sought an injunction blocking publication, arguing that not all the data were publicly accessible and that the substantially accurate article included concepts outside the public realm.

Judge Warren's decision acknowledged that prior restraints on publication carried a heavy presumption of unconstitutionality, but he ruled that the article fell into a narrow exception for national security matters. "The Morland piece could accelerate the membership of a candidate nation in the thermonuclear club," he speculated in his opinion, rejecting the magazine's argument that the article would merely alert readers to their false illusion of security and to the government's futile attempts at secrecy. In balancing the First Amendment against national security concerns, he found a "disparity of risks" and concluded that allowing publication "could pave the way for thermonuclear annihilation for us all. In that event, our right to life is extinguished and the right to publish becomes moot."

The reach of the decision as precedent was limited because the ultimate issue of censorship of public domain information under the Atomic Energy Act was never decided on appeal. During the six months the injunction remained in effect, a variety of publications printed similar information, culminating in an alternative newspaper's detailed story. After such disclosures and after arguing the appeal before three openly skeptical appellate judges, the government dropped the case before a final decision. That cleared the way for the Progressive itself to publish Morland's original article.

Subsequently, Morland noted that it was "still hard to pry information out of the government, but I don't see any indication that the government would again reach out and censor private authors and journalists who are speculating on this subject."

Eric Freedman

See also: Censorship; First Amendment; Near v. Minnesota; New York Times Co. v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Day, Samuel H., Jr. Crossing the Line: From Editor to Activist to Inmate—A Writer's Journey. Baltimore, MD: Fortkamp, 1991.

Foerstel, Herbert N. Banned in the Media: A Reference Guide to Censorship in the Press, Motion Pictures, Broadcasting, and the Internet. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1998.

Morland, Howard. The Secret That Exploded. New York: Random House, 1981.

United States v. Santana (1976)

At issue in United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976), was the scope of Fourth Amendment restrictions on warrantless arrests and searches within private residences. In August 1974 Philadelphia police officers approached "Mom" Santana's house with probable cause—but no warrant—to arrest her on felony drug distribution charges. Seeing the officers, Santana quickly retreated from the front doorway—where she had been standing with a brown paper bag in hand—to the interior of the house. Officers followed through the open door and arrested her in the vestibule, seizing two packets of heroin and a small cache of previously marked money as well. A U.S. district court granted Santana's motion to suppress the evidence, and the Third Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The U.S. government appealed. Santana continued to assert that absent a warrant or dire emergency, the Fourth Amendment barred police officers from entering her private dwelling and arresting her inside.

In a seven–two opinion by Justice William H. Rehnquist, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected Santana's argument and expanded the "hot pursuit" exception to the Fourth Amendment's general warrant requirements. Upon probable cause to suspect a crime, the Santana majority explained, police officers clearly may execute a warrantless arrest in a public place. Along with that power must come the ability to thwart a suspect who flees from such an arrest by retreating into her own home. Within private dwellings, the Court emphasized, individuals generally do enjoy strong privacy protections under the Fourth Amendment; in most instances, police may not enter without an owner's permission or prior judicial authorization.

Yet, as here, when a valid "hot pursuit" begins in a public area, law enforcement officials need not end the chase—and thereby allow the suspect to escape or destroy evidence—simply because the suspect succeeded in reaching a private place.

In a concurring opinion, Justice Byron R. White endorsed the majority's expansion of the hot-pursuit exception, though suggested that a warrant may indeed be required if police must enter a private dwelling by force. Justices John Paul Stevens and Potter Stewart, also concurring, emphasized that a warrant requirement in these circumstances would have created a "significant risk" that critical evidence of crime would be lost. Dissenting Justices Thurgood Marshall and William J. Brennan Jr. objected to the majority's characterization of an open doorway as a "public place." More fundamentally, they also urged the Court to adopt stricter constitutional standards for warrantless arrests. In their view, the Fourth Amendment required warrants for all arrests—in public and private areas alike—except when the police can demonstrate the presence of exigent circumstances not created by their own behavior.

John P. Forren

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Fourth Amendment; Hot Pursuit; Search Warrants.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure: First Principles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

United States v. Sokolow (1989)

In United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989)—commonly referred to as the "drug-courier profile" case—the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a search of a suspect in an airport on the grounds that agents had a "reasonable suspicion" that he was engaged in drug trafficking. At issue was whether the search violated the prohibition on unreasonable search and seizure provided in the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution.

When Andrew Sokolow approached the United Airlines ticket counter in Honolulu in July 1984, he purchased two round-trip tickets from Honolulu to Miami totaling $2,100, paying for them from a roll of twenty-dollar bills. Sokolow also was traveling under an assumed name, and despite the fact that travel from Honolulu to Miami took twenty hours, he scheduled his stay in Miami (a source city for drugs) for only forty-eight hours. The ticket agent was suspicious: The twenty-five-year-old Sokolow appeared nervous, was dressed in a black jumpsuit, and wore gold jewelry; and neither he nor his companion checked any of the four pieces of luggage in their possession. The ticket agent informed the Honolulu Police Department of the unusual cash purchase, and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) was notified. Upon his return to Honolulu, Sokolow was approached by DEA officials, who had narcotics-detecting dogs that responded positively to several pieces of luggage. Sokolow was arrested and a warrant was obtained to search his luggage. Agents found 1,063 grams of cocaine in his carry-on items.

After Sokolow was indicted for possession with the intent to distribute cocaine under federal drug law, he sought to have the cocaine declared inadmissible, claiming it was obtained in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable search and seizure. The trial court disagreed and ruled that the officers had reasonable suspicion to believe Sokolow was involved in drug trafficking. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed Sokolow's conviction on the grounds that the search was unreasonable. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, agreeing with the trial court that the DEA did have reasonable suspicion to stop and search Sokolow. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist wrote the seven–two majority opinion. Without fully commenting on the "profile" used, the majority ruled that the factors present and articulated by the searching agents amounted to reasonable suspicion.

Justices Thurgood Marshall and William J. Brennan Jr. dissented. Marshall argued that the facts surrounding Sokolow did not amount to reasonable suspicion but seemed more to be stereotyping by DEA. Merely because Sokolow "matched one of the DEA's 'profiles' of a paradigmatic drug courier" was not sufficient grounds to conclude he was engaged in criminal activity. Marshall feared that allowing police to depend on broad categories of stereotypical behavior would result in more searches of innocent citizens in the name of fighting the war on drugs.

In the continuing war on drugs, the United States has increased enforcement programs at places of public transportation. The Fourth Amendment protects citizens from unreasonable searches and seizures, but the expectation of privacy for commercial travelers is very low. Because commercial transportation is inherently public, programs to interdict drugs have been ruled constitutional despite their effect on personal privacy rights. If the Sokolow ruling is extended, civil libertarians contend, the Court's rationale could be used to uphold other forms of profiling. Although racial profiling may be less linked to a policy goal of the government, profiling in support of the war on terror may adopt the Sokolow reasoning to support a major government agenda item. A "terrorism profile" much like the drug-courier profile could be integrated into the totality-of-the-circumstances argument to support its use, particularly for commercial travelers like Andrew Sokolow.

Priscilla H. M. Zotti

See also: Fourth Amendment; Exclusionary Rule; Terry v. Ohio.

FURTHER READING

Coulter, A. "Drug Couriers and the Fourth Amendment: Vanishing Privacy Rights for Commercial Travelers." Vanderbilt Law Review 43 (May 1990): 131.

United States v. United States District Court (1972)

In United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297 (1972), the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously ruled that the executive branch, although acting in the name of national security, did not have the inherent power to use electronic surveillance to monitor domestic organizations without first acquiring a warrant. In other words, the executive branch could not sidestep protections guaranteed by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution by claiming national security as justification.

The debate over the war in Vietnam escalated in the early 1970s following President Richard Nixon's excursion into Cambodia and the deaths of four students at a demonstration at Kent State University in Ohio. As protests engulfed the nation, some radicals took the increasingly militant rhetoric of the antiwar movement to an extreme by bombing college facilities housing government research. Citing national security, Nixon and Attorney General John Mitchell authorized the use of wiretaps to investigate domestic organizations they believed were trying to undermine the government. In approving the wiretaps, however, Mitchell did not follow the procedure outlined in the Fourth Amendment, which required the government to present evidence of probable cause to a court in order to obtain a warrant allowing for surveillance. Instead, Mitchell justified his action as part of the executive branch's inherent responsibility to protect the government from attack and subversion.

In a unanimous eight-justice decision (Justice William H. Rehnquist did not participate) written by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., the Court ruled the executive branch did not have the power to authorize electronic surveillance without first obtaining a warrant. Powell noted a historical connection between the First and Fourth Amendments in national security cases. The government may have an interest in monitoring those who pose a threat to national security, but the government also has a tendency to suspect its most outspoken opponents of subversion. An unrestrained executive power of eavesdropping, Powell argued, should not discourage constitutionally protected political dissent or infringe on personal privacy. It was therefore necessary for the executive to appeal to the judicial branch when it came time to justify an investigation on constitutional grounds.

Although recognizing the pragmatic concerns involved in an issue as important as national security, the Court found the executive did not present reasonable evidence to justify its need to use warrantless wiretaps. First, Powell found the executive's conception of domestic security and its means of surveillance were too broad in scope. Second, he dismissed the claim that federal courts did not have the expertise needed to understand domestic security issues. Finally, Powell rejected the argument that warrant applications jeopardized the secrecy that law enforcement officers needed in order to pursue their objectives.

Citing national security, President Richard Nixon and Attorney General John Mitchell (far left) authorized the use of wiretaps during the 1970s to investigate domestic organizations they believed were trying to undermine the government. In approving the wiretaps, however, Mitchell did not follow the procedure outlined in the Fourth Amendment, which required the government to present to a court evidence of probable cause of suspicion in order to obtain a warrant allowing for surveillance. (National Archives)

A final note: The same week the Court handed down its decision in United States v. United States District Court, five men with electronic surveillance devices were apprehended breaking into Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate Hotel complex in Washington, D.C. Their connections to the Nixon White House ultimately led to the president's resignation in summer 1974.

Jason Stonerook

See also: Electronic Eavesdropping; Katz v. United States; Search Warrants; Wiretapping.

FURTHER READING

Stevens, Gina M., and Charles Doyle. Privacy: Wiretapping and Electronic Eavesdropping. New York: Novinka, 2002.

USA Patriot Act

See Patriot Act

V

Vagueness

In "vagueness" cases, the plaintiffs argue that a law suffers from such imprecision and ambiguity that it should not be enforceable. The vagueness doctrine finds its roots in the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution and may be applied to cases involving criminal law or freedom of speech. In Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385 (1926), the U.S. Supreme Court expressed concern about statutes that were so vague that they required people of common intelligence to guess at their meaning, and that differed as to how they were applied. Thus both a law against "vagrancy" or one against "obscenity" could fail to warn an individual in advance of precisely what kind of behavior was being prohibited.

In Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972), the Court explained the policy considerations underlying the vagueness doctrine: "First, [vague laws] may trap the innocent by not providing fair warning. Second, if arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement is to be prevented, laws must provide explicit standards for those who apply them. A vague law impermissibly delegates basic policy matters to policemen, judges, and juries for resolution on an ad hoc and subjective basis, with the attendant dangers of arbitrary and discriminatory application."

Vagueness challenges can involve either a "facial" challenge to a law—a claim that the law is unconstitutional on its face and should be struck down in its entirety—or an "as-applied" challenge—an assertion that the law does not on its face appear vague but is nonetheless applied in a completely arbitrary manner. The facial challenge is especially controversial because the party before the court may not be arguing that a particular law is vague as to the party or the party's conduct, but may instead be asking the court to strike down the law because of its effect on others. In other words, the party may be seeking to raise the rights of others not before the court.

Courts are generally reluctant to let individuals assert the rights of others. When constitutional rights are involved, the courts have typically required plaintiffs to establish "standing." In other words, they must show that their own rights are being or may be violated. For example, in New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982), the Court referred to the "traditional rule" that prohibited litigants from defending their actions on the basis that a law might be unconstitutionally applied to others. Likewise, in Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972), the Court referred to facial challenges as "strong medicine," since they allowed a defendant to escape punishment because legislators did not draft a law with sufficient precision.

In general, the Court prefers to deal with the case before it, not with some hypothetical case that the parties might construct. As the Court noted in Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), it is better to work from a developed record that has the facts needed for an "informed judgment." This approach allows the Court to see whether it can narrowly construe a law "to avoid constitutional infirmities."

Despite its reluctance, the Court sometimes permits facial challenges, particularly when free speech is implicated. As the Court noted in Grayned, "Uncertain meanings inevitably lead citizens to steer far wider of the unlawful zone than if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked."

Illustrative cases include Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965), and Coates v. Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971). In Cox, a state court construed a breach-of-the-peace ordinance to mean "to agitate, to arouse from a state of repose, to molest, to interrupt, to hinder, to disquiet." The Court struck down the law on vagueness grounds because it could be used to punish individuals merely for expressing unpopular views. In Coates, an ordinance punished the sidewalk assembly of three or more persons who "conduct themselves in a manner annoying to persons passing by." The Court struck down the ordinance as "impermissibly vague" because it regarded the word "annoying" as completely subjective.

Russell L. Weaver

See also: Due Process of Law; First Amendment; Overbreadth Doctrine.

FURTHER READING

Weaver, Russell L., Donald E. Lively, and Fernando E. Saralegui. Understanding the First Amendment. New York: Matthew Bender, 2003.

V-Chip

A V-chip (V is for violence) is a microprocessor in a television receiver that responds to a ratings signal embedded in the programs broadcast to the receiver. The V-chip permits a viewer to program the receiver to screen programming so that it displays only programs with selected ratings. In particular, a programmed V-chip can screen out reception of programs containing violence and sexuality. The device was one attempt to reconcile the tension between the right of free expression protected by the First Amendment and government's legitimate interest in restricting children's access to material unsuitable for their age.

During the early 1990s, Timothy Collings of Simon Fraser University developed the V-chip from devices that screen outgoing telephone calls. His work came to the attention of the Canadian parliament during debates about television violence. Tests of the system by Canadian cable firms in 1995 proved satisfactory and resulted in its inclusion in Canadian television receivers. In 1993 Rep. Edward Markey (D-MA) proposed the V-chip be a mandatory component of U.S. television sets. During debate on the Telecommunications Act of 1996, Markey mustered supporters from both political parties to secure the production of receivers with V-chips or equivalent technology after February 1998 and to require the rating of broadcasts, except for commercials and sports and news programs.

The Telecommunications Act required Federal Communications Commission (FCC) approval of ratings voluntarily adopted by the broadcasting industry. After a White House summit attended by broadcasters, the industry agreed to adopt a set of age-based ratings of broadcasts: TV-G, for general audience including unattended children; TV-PG, to suggest parental guidance in viewing of the program by younger children because of moderate violence, sexual situations, coarse language, or suggestive dialogue; TV-14, to "strongly caution" parents that material in the program should not be viewed by children under age fourteen because of "intense" violence, sexual situations, coarse language, or suggestive dialogue; and TV-MA for "mature audience only" because the show contained "graphic violence, explicit sexual activity, or crude indecent language." The ratings scheme also added distinctions for programs designed for children: TV-Y for all children and TV-Y7 for children age seven and older because of mild fantasy or comedic violence. Also, the industry agreed that broadcasters would assign ratings, include publication of the rating in programming guides, and display the rating on-screen in the upper left-hand corner as a small identifier for the first fifteen seconds of a program. If the program is longer than one hour, the rating symbol is to be repeated at the start of the new hour. The rating symbol electronically activates a V-chip so that a parent can program the television set to block access to programs of a particular ratings category. Unedited movies carry the age-based rating assigned by the Motion Picture Association of America, and subscription cable services provide additional ratings of violence, nudity, and content.

Although the inclusion of ratings in programming began January 1, 1997, criticism of the lack of specificity of the age-based ratings came immediately from concerned interest groups. On July 10, 1997, participants in informal discussions to revise ratings—except NBC and Black Entertainment Television (BET)—agreed to add content ratings in smaller letters below the six-category age-based rating. For TV-PG, the letters could be S for "some sexual situations," L for "infrequent coarse language," D for "some suggestive dialogue," and V for "moderate violence." For TV-14, an S indicated "intense sexual situations," L "strong coarse language," D "intensely suggestive dialogue," and V "intense violence." For TV-MA, an S indicated "explicit sexual activity," L

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman talks about the V-chip and the blocking of inappropriate television programming and other media topics during a visit with students at Morgan High School in Connecticut and, through videoconferencing, with students in other area schools, April 1996.
(© Peter Hvizdak/The Image Works)

"crude indecent language," and V "graphic violence." They also agreed to a new rating, TV-Y7 FV, for "more combative programs" with fantasy violence recommended for children age seven and older.

In terms of consumer viewing, the V-chip has had minimal impact. A survey indicated that only 7 percent of parents employed the V-chip to control their children's access to television programming and only 5 percent knew what the rating "D" meant. Several studies have concluded that broadcasters often inaccurately rate many programs, so viewers might receive programming they do not desire.

Politically, the V-chip requirement represents a major change in the censorship of televised violence and sexuality. Far-reaching congressional and FCC regulation of indecent and offensive content of programs and the time of broadcast of programs with violence and sexuality, which had existed since the passage of the Radio Act of 1927, was abandoned. Other than a general ban on obscenity—as defined by the U.S. Supreme Court—and a requirement for the electronic scrambling of "sexually explicit" programs provided by cable, the FCC no longer censors program content for violence and sexuality. In place of governmental television censorship, presumably enlightened viewers must practice self-censorship through decisions to program their V-chip not to accept certain programming or not to view programs with certain ratings. In this marketplace of programs, broadcasters assist viewers' choices by assigning the rating and producing a range of programs with violence and sexuality to accommodate their diverse tastes. This programming is designed, censored, and rated within the broadcasting firm in order to maximize the audience and the broadcaster's advertising revenue, and to prevent interest group or political criticism that might threaten profits. It does not have to satisfy legislated moral criteria.

Richard Brisbin

See also: First Amendment.

FURTHER READING

Center for Media Education. A Parent's Guide to the TV Ratings and the V-Chip. Washington, DC: Center for Media Education, 1999.

Greenberg, Bradley S., ed. The Alphabet Soup of Television Ratings. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton, 2001.

Kunkel, Dale, et al. "Deciphering the V-Chip: An Examination of the Television Industry's Program Rating Standards." Journal of Communication 52, 1 (March 2002): 112–38.

Price, Monroe E., ed. The V-Chip Debate: Content Filtering from Television to the Internet. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1998.

Vernonia School District v. Acton (1995)

In a six–three decision authored by Justice Antonin Scalia, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995), that an Oregon school district's policy of warrantless, suspicionless, random drug testing of high school athletes did not violate the prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure as provided by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution. Although the Court generally interprets this Amendment to require a warrant supported by probable cause indicating that criminal activity is afoot, this decision is one of a line of cases in which the Court has held that "special needs" may justify warrantless, suspicionless administrative searches, subject to reasonableness analysis.

Vernonia school officials began drug testing after observing a significant increase in disciplinary problems, including drug use, in the high school. An investigation concluded that high school athletes participated in illicit drug use and that such drug use increased the risk of sports-related injury. James Acton, a student, challenged the policy after he was barred from his school's football program when he refused to be tested.

Justice Scalia acknowledged that state-mandated collection and testing of urine constituted a search under the Fourth Amendment, but he believed such administrative searches were "reasonable" when the promotion of legitimate governmental interests outweighed the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment rights. The Court found no reason to doubt the gravity and immediacy of the district's concern about illegal drug use by students. It also observed that the efficacy of the policy was essentially "self-evident," since "a drug problem largely caused by athletes, and of particular danger to athletes, is effectively addressed by ensuring that athletes do not use drugs."

Scalia noted that the privacy interest of students was diminished by the fact that schoolchildren are committed to the temporary custody of the state, which was expected to exercise more supervision and control than it exercised over free adults. School students already submitted to physical examinations and vaccinations and thus had a lesser privacy expectation with regard to medical procedures than the general population. The privacy interest of student athletes was further diminished by the fact that they commonly undressed while using showers and locker rooms and were subject to regular physical exams and to other rules regulating their conduct.

The Court found the privacy loss in the actual process of collecting the urine to be negligible, since students were given essentially the same level of privacy as in a public restroom, with test monitors standing nearby and listening "for normal sounds of urination." Intrusions into privacy were further limited because the tests looked only for standard drugs, not medical conditions, and the results were released to a limited group and not communicated to the police. The majority feared that testing based on individualized suspicion would be more likely to shame students who were selected and would impose unreasonable duties on teachers.

Three justices dissented. They believed that because teachers were constantly observing students, they should base searches only on individualized suspicion. Noting that the Court had previously dispensed with the standards for warrants and probable cause in school settings, they feared that further eliminating individualized suspicion would undermine Court claims that student rights did not end at the schoolhouse door.

Schools with much less evidence of drug problems relied on Vernonia as a basis for testing all students participating in extracurricular activities. The Court upheld these policies in Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002).

Justin M. Sandberg and Ronald Steiner

See also: Board of Education v. Earls; Ferguson v. Skrupta; Fourth Amendment; New Jersey v. T.L.O.; Random Drug Testing; Search; Seizure; Skinner v. Oklahoma.

FURTHER READING

DeCew, Judith Wagner. In Pursuit of Privacy: Law, Ethics, and the Rise of Technology. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Hutchens, Neal H. "Suspicionless Drug Testing: The Tuition for Attending Public School?" Alabama Law Review 53 (2002): 1265.

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Zeese, Kevin B. Drug Testing Legal Manual and Practice Aids. 2d ed. Deerfield, IL: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1996.

Vested Rights

See Property Rights

Victim-Impact Statement

A victim-impact statement (VIS) allows individuals emotionally close to the victims of capital crimes to testify in front of a jury or through written testimony during the sentencing phase, which may result in a death sentence for the defendant. The purpose of the VIS is to explain the emotional impact of the crime on the victim's family, friends, or other emotionally vested parties and to inform the sentencing parties about the outstanding character of the victim. The VIS may also include statements about how the families and friends feel about the accused and the circumstances of the crime. The determination of whether to allow the use of victim-impact statements in the sentencing stage has added an additional controversial element to the already acrimonious debate over capital punishment.

Supporters of victim-impact statements insist that the testimony of family and friends gives voices to victims who can no longer speak for themselves, and that it is important for those imposing death sentences to be in command of all relevant facts in the case. Critics of VISs argue that permitting emotionally charged testimony to sway the emotions of judges and juries is a denial of the constitutional rights of the defendant and is more likely to incite retribution than justice. Victim-impact statements, in essence, weigh the character of the victim against the character of the accused in situations where no cross-examination of the witnesses is possible.

In Booth v. Maryland, 482 U.S. 496 (1987), the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear a Maryland case in which a jury sentenced a defendant to death after finding him guilty on two counts of first-degree murder. Under Maryland law, the report given to the jury included VISs composed of interviews with the victims' families detailing the severe emotional impact of the crime on the families, including a ruined wedding, sleeplessness, anxiety, loss of trust, and other emotions common among those who suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). In statements referring to the victims as being "butchered like animals," family members asserted that the accused could never be "forgiven" or "rehabilitated."

By the barest majority (five–four), the Court decided in Booth that victim-impact statements violated the Eighth Amendment (prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment) and were "irrelevant" to the sentencing process. Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., joined by Justices William J. Brennan Jr., Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun, and John Paul Stevens, acknowledged the legitimacy of the trauma experienced by the families but held that sentencing hearings should focus not on the emotions of a victim's family and friends but on the specific crime(s) committed and on the criminal whose life was at stake. Powell also argued that emotional testimony in the courtroom tended to favor the socially connected defendant or victim whose relatives and friends were likely to be more articulate and savvy over those of a defendant or victim whose family and friends were poor and ignorant and less likely to make favorable impressions on juries. The result of victim-impact statements, in Powell's view, was that they established an environment that posed an "unacceptable risk that the jury may impose the death penalty in an arbitrary and capricious manner."

Two years after Booth, the Court reiterated its position in South Carolina v. Gathers, 490 U.S. 805 (1989). In a capital murder case, a South Carolina prosecutor had read a religious tract in its entirety as part of his closing argument during the sentencing phase. Because the victim had been carrying the tract and a voter registration card when he was murdered, the prosecutor argued that the items gave witness to the victim's sterling character. In banning the use of victim-impact statements, the Court held that "punishment must be tailored to . . . [the] personal responsibility and moral guilt" of the accused rather than to the emotional impact of the crime on the victim's family.

The majority in Gathers determined that the tract and the voter registration card were of no use because neither could "provide any information relevant to respondent's moral culpability." Dissenting in Gathers, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, opted to "reject a rigid Eighth Amendment rule which prohibits a sentencing jury from hearing argument or considering evidence concerning the personal characteristics of the victim."

Two years later in Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991), the Court backtracked and allowed victim-impact statements to be introduced into the sentencing phase of a capital case. In Payne, the defendant was sentenced to death for the murder of Charisse Christopher and her two-year-old daughter in the course of attempted rape. The defendant had also been charged with the attempted murder of Christopher's three-year-old son. In the victim-impact statements, the jury was asked to weigh testimony that pitted the impact of the murder of his mother and sister on three-year-old Nicholas against the mitigating circumstances of the defendant's background offered by his relatives and friends in their testimony.

Writing for the majority in Payne, Chief Justice Rehnquist cast aside the Court's decisions in Booth and Gathers to argue that victim-impact statements did serve legitimate purposes by bringing additional information into the decision-making process. With his tendency toward deviating from stare decisis (precedent, pronounced STAR-ry de-SI-sis), Rehnquist insisted that "when governing decisions are unworkable or are badly reasoned," the Court was not bound by them. In citing the Court's decisions in Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978), and Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104 (1982), the Court maintained that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments did not prohibit a sentencing party from "considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record . . . that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death." Therefore, sentencing should "reflect the moral judgment of the community regarding the proper penalty to be inflicted on a particular individual for his or her actions."

In his last opinion before his retirement, Justice Thurgood Marshall offered a strongly critical dissent to Payne, informing the conservative majority that "power, not reason is the new currency of the Court's decision making." Marshall argued that victim-impact statements were just as irrelevant and unconstitutional in 1991 as they had been in 1987 (Booth) and 1989 (Gathers), insisting that rationality, not emotion, should take precedence in a court of law. The retiring civil rights pioneer warned his colleagues on the Court that "an even more extensive upheaval of this Court's precedents may be in store" that would place individual rights on shifting ground. After the session ended, Justice Stevens added his voice to Marshall's, warning that in Payne the Court had "placed its stamp of approval on the use of victim-impact evidence to facilitate the imposition of the death penalty."

Elizabeth Purdy

See also: Payne v. Tennessee.

FURTHER READING

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. 8th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Simon, James F. The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Witt, Elder. The Supreme Court and Individual Rights. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1988.

Victimless Crimes

Although many writers have argued that governments should not prosecute "victimless crimes," there is no consensus on which crimes are victimless and whether such offenses should be punished by the criminal justice system. If certain conduct—for example, drug use or sexual activity—that is forbidden by the law is engaged in willingly by the participants without harm to third parties, should there be prosecutions? Or do these offenses interfere with the orderly flow of social life?

Some prohibitions have a biblical basis. Some have become dead letters or have been revived for different reasons than initially intended. Among crimes that have been identified as victimless are homosexuality, nudism, pornography, prostitution, polygamy, incest, transvestism, public urinating and copulating, gambling, jaywalking, loitering and vagrancy (so long as these don't become trespassing or disturbing the peace), desecration of the Sabbath, vulgarity, cursing, selling oneself or members of one's family or body parts, circumcision, dueling, unorthodox medical practices, suicide, use of drugs, gluttony, and violent or degrading entertainment.

Some regulations are calculated to protect consenting persons from physical injury (for example, laws addressing seatbelts, helmets, and speed limits). Some scholars claim that laws against consensual crimes discriminate against the poor and minorities, and that prohibitions often have been enacted by those influenced by racism and xenophobia. (Historically, critics maintained that African Americans, Hispanics, Germans, Asians, Catholics, and other groups were undermining American virtues with their indulgence in alcohol and drugs.) Cigarettes do more damage and cause more deaths than all of the consensual crimes combined, yet their use is not usually treated as criminal. The punishment for drug crimes is more severe in the United States than in other industrialized nations. Roughly half of the arrests and court cases in the United States each year involve consensual crimes.

In Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that an individual could not be prosecuted for the private possession of pornography in one's home, but in Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990), the Court decided that individuals could be prosecuted for such possession of child pornography. In decisions moving in the opposite direction, however, the Court first ruled in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), that states could criminalize private consensual acts of sodomy, but then it reversed course in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

Prosecution of victimless crimes may lead a populace that does not see the behavior as criminal to develop a disrespect for the law and to see the police as the enemy, not as protectors. Those prosecuted for such offenses garner criminal records that result in a stigma that limits opportunities to pursue noncriminal vocations. Incarceration puts such persons in proximity with other criminals and may result in their being schooled for other crimes and/or being preyed on by fellow criminals.

The individual who is probably most frequently associated with the doctrine of a "private right to private harm" is the English philosopher John Stuart Mill (1806–1873), but many philosophers who preceded him had made similar arguments. Earlier thinkers who expressed similar sentiments include Dutch philosopher Benedict de Spinoza (1632–1677); Mill's English utilitarian predecessor, Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832); American essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882); and French social-contract philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778). The French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of Citizens (1789), adopted at the start of the French Revolution, decreed that persons were to have "the power of doing whatever does not injure another." This was the basis for the Napoleonic Code, which imposed no criminal sanctions on consensual adult sexual acts, such as homosexuality and prostitution.

In countries like the United States, however, government intervenes to prohibit some behavior for ethical, aesthetic, or pragmatic reasons. The police powers granted to government and recognized by the Tenth Amendment enable authorities to regulate on behalf of the public safety, health, and morals.

The supporters of governmental sanctions argue that society is the victim—that sanctions are important to prevent social disintegration and to protect children and women. Even if it is difficult to identify the victims of such behavior or the nature of the harm done, criminalization performs an educational function for society by indicating behaviors of which it disapproves. Lord Patrick Devlin (1905–1992), author of The Enforcement of Morals (1959), urged acting to restrict practices that any "right-minded man" would find so offensive as to threaten the moral fabric of society.

The community may be the other victim of the supposedly victimless crime. Families suffer from neglect, impoverishment, and so on. Sexually transmitted diseases such as AIDS create a chain of victims. Those indulging in so-called victimless crimes such as drug use may resort to other crimes to obtain money to support these activities. Law-abiding neighbors may have to flee their neighborhoods to protect their families.

Drug use breaks up families, harms businesses, and results in injuries and property damage to those in the vicinity of those acting under the influence. Suicides may also harm third parties, especially if other lives are ended during the suicide. The military assumes that active homosexuality disrupts service performance. Individuals who are severely injured in accidents while riding motorcycles without wearing helmets or while driving cars without wearing safety belts may increase health insurance costs for everyone.

Justice David Souter's concurrence in Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991), in which the Court upheld a ban on completely nude dancing in public establishments, agreed with the prohibition because of the secondary effects created by these businesses, such as prostitution, sexual assault, or other criminal activity.

Martin Gruberg

See also: Lawrence v. Texas; Mill, John Stuart; Right to Privacy.

FURTHER READING

Clor, Harry M. Public Morality and Liberal Society: Essays on Decency, Law, and Pornography. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996.

Devlin, Patrick. The Enforcement of Morals. London: Oxford University Press, 1959.

Feinberg, Joel. Harm to Self: The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

McWilliams, Peter. Ain't Nobody's Business If You Do: The Absurdity of Consensual Crimes in a Free Society. Los Angeles, CA: Prelude, 1993.

Richards, David A. J. Sex, Drugs, Death, and the Law: An Essay on Human Rights and Overcriminalization. Totowa, NJ: Rowman and Littlefield, 1982.

Victims' Rights

Victims can be defined to include any innocent party affected by an endless array of crimes, everything from homicide to elder abuse, identity theft to terrorism, rape to hate crimes, and stalking to domestic or child abuse. The common theme for all such victims is the same: A criminal act has occurred and an innocent party exists. Virtually every state has passed laws to create rights for victims, and most states have amended their constitutions for the same purpose. Some states, for example, require registration of sex offenders. Others have provisions for DNA testing to facilitate genetic identification of repeat offenders. Still others have compensation programs aimed at providing financial remuneration to individuals who, through no fault of their own, suffer a loss at the hands of a criminal. Specialized programs exist, such as rape crisis centers and peer harassment groups in schools. Increasing numbers of community and professional groups offer antistalking seminars, identity-protection training, and practical legal guides for individuals who want to interact with the criminal justice system. Advocacy groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving are evidence of the growing interest in the public policy issues affecting crime victims and the available remedies.

VICTIMS OF CRIME

The rights of crime victims were the subject of the President's Task Force on Victims of Crime in 1982. The task force concluded that there was a serious imbalance between the rights of criminal defendants and the rights of crime victims. Although victims are often protected by statutory remedies enacted by the states, the protection is not always consistent. The limitation of resources to fund victim programs and the failure of victims to report crimes contribute to the inconsistent application of remedies. Courts are often monitored by victims and victims' rights groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving. This monitoring tends to ensure some protection for victims. Some courts allow for victim participation in sentencing, plea agreements, and case dismissals. Most states provide for notice to victims and their families on post-conviction action, such as parole hearings, release dates, and clemency. In Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991), the Supreme Court overturned earlier precedents to allow for the introduction of victim-impact statements in the sentencing phase of capital-crime hearings.

VICTIMS' REMEDIES

A majority of the states have some form of a victim compensation fund. Compensatory actions may be limited to violent crimes and may require actual physical harm or death for eligibility. Some funds are restitution-funded, meaning the criminal has or will be ordered to pay restitution to the court or an agency that will then disburse funds to victims. These funds are often the product of "Son of Sam" laws, named after the New York Son of Sam killer, David Berkowitz. Berkowitz obtained hundreds of thousands of dollars for the rights to his story of his random killing of innocent young women and their companions. Under these laws, criminals cannot profit by the retelling of their crimes through books, movies, or other media. These and other funds generally have some limits on the amount of compensation allowed to the victims. Limitations are usually categorized by reasonableness and typically include costs for medical bills, lost wages, and funeral and legal expenses.

Most states have passed state constitutional amendments protecting the rights of victims. Some states, for example, require registration of sex offenders. Here, Robert Briggs, chief of police for the East Syracuse Police Department, holds a copy of the New York State directory of registered sex offenders. (© Syracuse Newspapers/The Image Works)

RAPE AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

The increase in the number of reported rape and domestic violence cases has led to changes in arrest and prosecution criteria. Most states do not require corroborating information in order to arrest an individual accused of rape or domestic violence. Victims are no longer required to testify or request a petition for protection as evidence of the crime. Some states keep the name of the victim of a sexual assault confidential. Most states will pay for the health care costs of examination and treatment for sexual assaults reported to law enforcement agencies. Some states make it illegal to identify the name or other identifying information of a victim in the news. All states have some provisions for protection against intimidation and obstruction of justice. In all states, there is a duty to notify victims of these crimes of the assistance available.

CHILDREN AS VICTIMS

Increased publicity about child abuse and victimization has helped to promote stricter laws to ensure that children are well protected against ongoing abuse. Child and family service agencies routinely act on behalf of children. Educators and health care providers are trained to recognize signs of abuse and are required to report them to the appropriate authorities. Since criminal prosecutions and trials are public, most states allow for a child's testimony by videotape. Laws dealing with specific issues for children have been developed. In states that have a "Megan's law" (so named for one victim of a sex predator), sex offenders must register their addresses when they move into a neighborhood, thus notifying the residents of an offender's presence nearby. The Amber Plan is a program between broadcasters and law enforcement authorities; created in 1996, this plan uses the Emergency Alert System to broadcast the description of an abducted child and a suspected abductor. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, established in 1981, serves as a focal point for relatives, law enforcement, and communities in recovering missing children. As an organization that raises public awareness to help prevent children from becoming victims, this nonprofit organization is recognized as the nation's resource center for child protection.

CONSUMER PROTECTION

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is the regulatory body responsible for most consumer protection. As a department of the U.S. government, the FTC has regulations on everything from automobile purchases to telemarketing. The agency's primary goal is to educate consumers and to bring about responsible change. The FTC protects the buyer of products that cost more than $25. The commission offers tips on identity theft, telemarketing fraud, investment scams, and travel deception, among other things, to assist in protecting the consumer from deception. Most states have "lemon laws" intended to protect consumers against fraudulent vehicle sales. These laws protect the manufacturer's written warranty and require repair of the vehicle during the warranty period. Contract law dealing with the sale of products is regulated by the Uniform Commercial Code, which has been adopted (with some variations) in all fifty states.

Civil laws often provide remedies for individuals who have been harmed by defective products that cause personal injuries, or for the negligent actions of others that have led to accidents. The Environmental Protection Agency is one of a number of governmental agencies that may fine industries whose activities result in collective harm to the environment.

Darlene Evans McCoy

See also: Payne v. Tennessee; Victim-Impact Statement.

FURTHER READING

Elias, Robert. The Politics of Victimization. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Wilson, Debra J. The Complete Book of Victims' Rights. Highlands Ranch, CO: ProSe Associates, 1995.

Vietnam War

The Vietnam War during the 1960s and early 1970s raised a series of civil liberties issues unlike those in any other major military conflict in the United States up to that time. The issues ranged from contesting the very constitutionality of the war, to the draft, and then to the political rights of demonstrators to protest the war and the government's reaction to these protests. In a few cases these issues made it to the courts, but many of the disputes remained political and took place in the news, on the streets, and in university campuses across the nation.

The power to engage in war or defend the United States from foreign attacks is located both in Congress and the president. Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution grants to Congress the power to declare war, whereas Article II, Section 2 makes the president "commander in chief" of the armed forces. The Constitution makes Congress responsible for the formal declaration of war (and vests in Congress numerous powers to raise and maintain armed forces), and such declarations were issued in the cases of World War I and II. Yet the president's commander-in-chief powers also suggest that the executive branch has significant military authority to act, especially to defend the United States from attacks, and prior to Vietnam there were many examples of when the president used this authority to defend the country.

Vietnam, however, tested exactly where the power of Congress ends and the president's power begins. In response to an alleged attack on U.S. ships off the coast of North Vietnam in 1964, President Lyndon B. Johnson sought from Congress the authority to "take all necessary steps, including the use of armed force," to repel the attack and assist South Vietnam in its defense. The resolution of Congress on August 10, 1964, known as the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, became the supposed legal or constitutional basis for Presidents Johnson and Richard Nixon to deploy about a half million troops in Vietnam through 1972.

But because this resolution did not constitute a formal declaration of war, many critics contended that the Vietnam War was unconstitutional and that the president of the United States did not have the authority to engage in this military action. In Katz v. Tyler, 386 U.S. 942 (1967), Mitchell v. United States, 386 U.S. 972 (1967), and Mora v. McNamara, 389 U.S. 934 (1967), individuals who had been drafted into the military sought to have the Supreme Court adjudicate the constitutionality of the war in an effort to halt their deployment to Vietnam. The Court refused to hear these cases, however, claiming that matters of war were "political questions" best left to Congress and the president to resolve.

Even though the judiciary refused to address the constitutionality of the war, criticism persisted that the president was exceeding his authority as commander in chief. In 1973 Congress passed, over President Nixon's veto, the War Powers Act, a law intended to place limits on how long the president could deploy troops without congressional approval. The law also required presidential notification to Congress when the law was being invoked, and it allowed for Congress, by a vote of both houses, to require withdrawal of troops. Since its passage, the act has been invoked only once by the president, and many scholars claim the law is unconstitutional, citing two grounds: Either it intrudes upon presidential power, or the two-house resolution to mandate withdrawal of troops is an impermissible use of legislative power.

A second civil liberties issue growing out of the Vietnam War surrounded the draft. While some people argued that the war was illegal and therefore the draft for that purpose was illegitimate, others contended that the draft as it was implemented for that purpose was unfair. Specifically, the draft laws in place at the time gave deferments from conscription to individuals who were married and had young children or were expecting a child or who were in college. Many individuals opted to attend college and therefore received deferments from the draft. This meant, in many cases, that more affluent individuals who could afford college did not fight, which left poorer people to be drafted. The result was that draftees were generally people of color and from poor families. Thus, the class and racial divide in those drafted versus those deferred was seen as unfair.

Similarly, many who were drafted but refused to go to Vietnam or fight either fled to Canada or claimed conscientious-objector status. Conscientious objectors had to show religious or moral reasons for being opposed to all wars, not just the conflict in Vietnam. As with the debate over the fairness of the draft along racial and class lines, some critics claimed that those who fled to Canada or objected to the war on religious grounds either were given special privileges or that local draft boards did not sufficiently respect the moral and political disagreements individuals had against the war.

Across the United States, college students and those opposed to the war engaged in protests. These protests led to another set of civil liberties problems—specifically, the right of free speech to protest. In United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), the Supreme Court upheld the conviction of an individual who burned his draft card in protest against the war. The Court rejected arguments that such an act was a form of protected speech under the First Amendment. In contrast, in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), the Court upheld the First Amendment right of high school students to wear black armbands in school to protest the war.

Yet many other protests occurred in the streets, and the results were violent. In 1968, Chicago police beat individuals protesting the war when they sought to demonstrate outside the Democratic National Convention. On May 4, 1970, during a protest against the war at Kent State University in Ohio, National Guard soldiers shot and killed four students and wounded another nine. President Nixon called the protesters "bums," and in sympathy for those who had died, over 700 colleges closed.

During the antiwar protests, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, under the guidance of its chief, J. Edgar Hoover, and the Nixon White House engaged in surveillance of the demonstrators. They secretly and illegally wiretapped phones and followed individuals. In addition, Nixon maintained a so-called enemies list, composed mostly of media personalities, and he had these people followed and investigated. All of these actions constituted violations of the Fourth Amendment.

Finally, debates over the reason for U.S. entry into Vietnam reached a major First Amendment confrontation when, in 1971, the New York Times sought to publish the Pentagon Papers. These papers, released to the media by Daniel Ellsberg, contained secret and confidential information pertaining to U.S. involvement in the war, and the government sought to prevent their publication. However, in New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), the Supreme Court rejected the government's demand for prior restraint to halt their publication and instead defended the freedom of the press to print the papers.

The issues raised during the Vietnam War have had an enduring impact upon the United States. After the war ended, the draft was halted and has not yet been reinstituted. This arrangement has led some critics to claim that an all-volunteer army is unfair because it still discriminates against the poor who join to find a job, whereas others say that an all-volunteer army respects rights of conscience. Especially since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States, many scholars note that presidential power to deploy troops and the problems of dissent remain unresolved political and legal issues.

David Schultz

See also: New York Times Co. v. United States; United States v. O'Brien; War Powers Act.

FURTHER READING

Kalven, Harry, Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.
Morgan, Ted. Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Random House, 2003.

Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974)

In Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the right of local governments to enact ordinances that have the effect of defining what constitutes a "single family" and of limiting the number of persons unrelated by blood or marriage who may live together in a single residence. The Court ruled that such an ordinance did not violate the constitutional protections of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and did not infringe legitimate privacy rights.

Belle Terre arose when a group of unrelated students from the State University of New York campus at Stony Brook rented a dwelling in a very small, exclusive neighborhood near the campus on Long Island. The Stony Brook campus had received considerable notoriety when local law enforcement made one or more drug raids there in the late 1960s. The students owned several automobiles, some painted in gaudy colors popular during the 1960s, lived communally, were not married, and engaged in activities on the premises considered undesirable by their tonier neighbors.

The applicable ordinance forbade more than two persons not related by blood or marriage to share a dwelling. Thus, a residence could be occupied by any number of related or married persons but not by three or more unrelated or unmarried persons. It seemed clearly directed at the "hippie" lifestyle of the town's unwanted neighbors.

In a surprising majority opinion, Justice William O. Douglas, long a champion of individual rights when weighed against government regulation, opined that the Belle Terre ordinance was not unconstitutional, as claimed by the plaintiffs, but instead merely reflected the legitimate preferences of the community.

> A quiet place where yards are wide, people few, and motor vehicles restricted are legitimate guidelines in a land use project addressed to family needs. . . . The police power is not confined to elimination of filth, stench and unhealthy places. It is ample to lay out zones where family values, youth values and the blessings of quiet seclusion and clean air make the area a sanctuary for people.

In a forceful dissent, Justice Thurgood Marshall argued that

> The instant ordinance discriminates on the basis of . . . a personal lifestyle choice as to household companions. It permits any number of persons related by blood or marriage, be it two or twenty, to live in a single household. . . . Belle Terre imposes upon those who deviate from the community norm in their choice of living companions significantly greater restrictions than are applied to residential groups who are related by blood or marriage, and compose the established order within the community.

Belle Terre generally is regarded as limiting challenges to local ordinances that constitute what is commonly referred to as "exclusionary zoning." Though generally directed at racial minorities or lower-income groups, exclusionary zoning can be used to keep out many socially unpopular groups and activities when these are thought to violate some community standard of decency or to have the alleged potential to decrease property values.

The principal issues Belle Terre raises, however, are whether limitations on the civil rights of individuals to associate freely (live with whomever they choose) constitute a violation of the right to privacy or of the equal protection provision of the Fourteenth Amendment. One result of Belle Terre has been a split between the federal courts and some state courts on the definition of "family." A number of state courts, interpreting their own state constitutions, have given a broader definition to "family unit," so as to include more than two unrelated individuals.

James V. Cornehls

See also: Fourteenth Amendment; Right of Unmarried People to Live Together; Right to Privacy; Zoning.

FURTHER READING

Dawson, Alexandra. Land Use Planning and Law. New York: STPM Press, 1982.

Wright, Robert, and Morton Gitelman. Land Use in a Nutshell. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Vinson, Frederick Moore (1890–1953)

Frederick Moore Vinson, the thirteenth chief justice of the United States, was born in Louisa, Kentucky, on January 22, 1890. He began his public career as a city attorney and was elected to Congress as a Democrat in 1922. After serving six uneventful years in a Republican-controlled House, Vinson was defeated in 1928, largely because of his support of Democrat Al Smith for the presidency. Reelected in 1930, Vinson played a leading role during Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal in shaping the Social Security Act and in supporting the president's Court-packing plan. In 1938, FDR rewarded Vinson by appointing him to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, and five years later, the president appointed him director of the Office of Economic Stabilization and, thereafter, director of War Mobilization and Reconversion. President Harry Truman chose Vinson first as his secretary of treasury in 1945 and, after Chief Justice Harlan Fiske Stone died, named Vinson chief justice in June 1946. During his seven-year tenure, Vinson and the Court struggled with constitutional issues raised by the Cold War and the civil rights revolution.

The Cold War and the fear of communism dominated the Supreme Court's docket during this period. Vinson's two major opinions documented his support for the government's loyalty and security programs and revealed his lukewarm sensitivity to claims of individual liberty. In American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950), he avoided the free speech issue and upheld the constitutionality of section 9 of the Taft-Hartley Act, requiring labor union officers to sign non-Communist affidavits, because the statute was reasonably related to a congressional interest in protecting interstate commerce from the consequences of politically motivated strikes. Then in Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), he directly confronted the First Amendment and affirmed the convictions of eleven Communist Party leaders for violating the Smith Act. In his opinion for the Court, he broadened the clear-and-present-danger test to extend to a conspiracy to advocate the violent overthrow of government and to permit speech to be proscribed, no matter how remote, because the gravity of that evil was so great.

Vinson's commitment to a strong federal government included a vigorous conception of the presidency, a view reflected in his dissent in Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). In it he rejected the majority's view that President Truman's seizure of the steel mills was an unconstitutional encroachment on the power of Congress to make law. The president's seizure, he argued, responded to a genuine emergency, avoiding a strike that would have imperiled the conduct of the Korean War, and was a legitimate exercise of his power as commander-in-chief and his duty to enforce congressional statutes authorizing seizure.

Frederick Moore Vinson, thirteenth chief justice of the United States, 1945. (Library of Congress)

During Vinson's tenure, the Supreme Court took decisive action against racial discrimination in education, housing, transportation, criminal justice, voting rights, and labor relations. A moderate on race relations, Vinson made a distinctive contribution to the struggle for racial equality with his unanimous opinions in three major cases. In Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948), he held that judicial enforcement of racially restrictive covenants violated the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. Two years later, he handed down Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950), and McLaurin v. Oklahoma Board of Regents, 339 U.S. 637 (1950), on the same day. In Sweatt he acknowledged that the white University of Texas Law School and the state's African American law school were not physically equal, but he declined to follow Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), and require the admission of African Americans. Instead, Vinson crafted a new equal protection standard based on intangible differences and then found that racial segregation in legal education violated the Equal Protection Clause. His McLaurin opinion applied his Sweatt definition of equality to physical racial barriers created within a formerly all-white graduate school and found that separate classroom, cafeteria, and library seating were inequalities that would handicap the ability of African Americans to receive an effective education.

In 1952 the Court turned its attention to segregation in the public elementary and secondary schools and heard oral argument in five cases, now known by the title of the Kansas case, Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). Instead of deciding them, Vinson announced in June 1953 that the cases would be reargued the following term, but he died of a massive heart attack that September. When the Court reheard the cases, Earl Warren, the new chief justice, presided and handed down in May 1954 a unanimous opinion that relied upon Vinson's Sweatt and McLaurin opinions to hold that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal."

William Crawford Green

See also: Dennis v. United States; Stone, Harlan Fiske; Warren, Earl.

FURTHER READING

Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.

Rudko, Frances. Truman's Court: A Study in Judicial Restraint. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.

St. Clair, James E., and Linda C. Gugin. Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson of Kentucky: A Political Biography. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2002.

Violence Against Women Act

Congress passed the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) as a part of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1996. The law contained a number of noncontroversial items, such as providing funding for shelters for battered women and for antiviolence education programs, making interstate stalking a federal offense, and providing for the enforcement of protective orders outside the state where they were issued.

The VAWA provision that ultimately became the subject of a Supreme Court case was section 13,981, which proclaimed that "all persons within the United States shall have the right to be free from crimes of violence motivated by gender." It thus defined freedom from gender-based violence as a civil right, a right entitled to federal protection. Victims of crimes animated by gender animus were, under VAWA, entitled to sue their assailants in federal court. The law was modeled on nineteenth-century legislation designed to protect African Americans from racially motivated violence as well as on twentieth-century civil rights laws. As with those laws, VAWA offered the alternative of federal protection against civil rights violations when states were unwilling or unable to afford that protection, even if the violations were committed by private individuals. The legislation was based on two constitutional grounds—the authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and section 5, the enforcement provision, of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The law's framers held hearings over a period of three years during which they collected evidence of the impact of gender-based violence on women's health, education, employment, and general mobility. They found this evidence showed that violence against women had a substantial impact on the national economy. Thus, they believed the law could be enacted within the congressional power to regulate interstate commerce as provided in Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution. The congressional committees also heard testimony, including statements from forty-one state attorneys general, that at least in part based on traditional stereotypes about men and women, states failed to adequately protect women who were raped or battered. Supporters of the legislation thus argued that the failure to afford safety to women was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Under section 5 of that amendment, Congress had the power to "enforce by appropriate legislation" the equal protection guarantee.

The court test of section 13,981 developed from the case of Christy Brzonkala, who was allegedly raped by Antonio Morrison and James Crawford when she was a freshman at Virginia Polytechnical Institute and State University. When she sued her attackers in federal court, as provided in VAWA, the lower courts found the law unconstitutional. Both the district court and the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held that Congress had exceeded its power under the Commerce Clause and that the law was not a legitimate application of section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Brzonkala appealed to the Supreme Court, and the Justice Department joined her suit.

In a five–four opinion in United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist (joined by Justices Sandra Day O'Connor, Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy, and Clarence Thomas) found the law unconstitutional on both Commerce Clause and Fourteenth Amendment grounds. The majority opinion determined that Congress had exceeded its authority—that violence against women did not fall under the Commerce Clause as it was not an economic activity. In effect, the Court narrowed congressional authority to define what fell into the category of interstate commerce, although courts had deferred to congressional definitions of commerce since the 1930s. In addition, the majority rejected the argument that the law could be upheld under the Fourteenth Amendment, holding that it prohibited equal protection violations by states, but the VAWA remedy dealt with conduct by private individuals.

Some commentators found that although Morrison removed the opportunity for victims of gender-motivated violence to sue in federal court, the defeat was mostly symbolic because the remedy would have been used by only a few victims. The remaining provisions of VAWA would affect many more women. Others were troubled by the decision as it seemed to reveal the Court's misunderstanding of violence against women. Supporters of the law had argued that violence against women was deeply embedded in a social structure based on gender inequality. The recognition of a civil right to be free from such violence would have been a step toward full equality for women.

Mary Atwell

See also: Victims' Rights.

FURTHER READING

Post, Robert C., and Reva B. Siegel. "Equal Protection by Law: Federal Antidiscrimination Legislation After Morrison and Kimel." Yale Law Journal 110 (December 2000): 441–525.

Schneider, Elizabeth M. Battered Women and Feminist Lawmaking. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000.

Virginia Declaration of Rights

In June 1776, Virginia's constitutional convention adopted the Virginia Declaration of Rights. Authored by George Mason (1725–1792), it was the first bill of rights adopted in the United States and became one of the world's most influential documents in the development of civil liberties. Thomas Jefferson borrowed from it the following month in drafting the Declaration of Independence, and James Madison drew from it when he wrote the U.S. Bill of Rights in 1789. French revolutionary Emmanuel-Joseph Sieyès in the same year based the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen on the Virginia Declaration. By 1783, all but two states, Rhode Island and Connecticut, had adopted a bill of rights in some form.

The declaration explicitly protected civil liberties against governmental intrusion, including rights of the criminally accused, right to trial by jury in civil suits, bans on unreasonable searches and seizures, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, and the right to bear arms. The Virginia Declaration contributed greatly to the development of constitutionalism, the notion that written documents ratified by the sovereign people limit the power of government.

PHILOSOPHICAL FOUNDATION

Faced with armed resistance from the colonial militia, the royal governor of Virginia fled to a British warship in 1775, marking the end of British rule in the colony. On May 15, 1776, the Virginia Convention instructed its delegates to the Second Continental Congress in Philadelphia to support independence from Great Britain and voted to establish a committee to prepare a declaration of rights and a constitution for the new state. Mason drafted the declaration between May 20 and 26. He also wrote much of the Virginia constitution. Jefferson penned the constitution's preamble, accusing King George III of tyranny. The convention added sections 10, condemning general warrants, and 14, outlawing the colonial government, to Mason's draft of the declaration. The convention unanimously adopted the declaration on June 12 and the constitution on June 29. These documents became models for subsequent state constitutional conventions.

Mason drew from earlier documents limiting the power of government in the name of liberty, including the Magna Carta (1215), the English Bill of Rights (1689), and his own Fairfax Resolves (1774). He based the declaration on the political theory expressed in John Locke's Second Treatise of Government (1690) and William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England (1769). Sections 1–3 of the Virginia Declaration express the social-contract theory of government, under which men are born equal, possessed of inalienable rights to life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness. The purpose of government is to secure these natural rights, and all legitimate government is based on the people's consent. When government fails in its purpose, the people have a right to abolish it. The second paragraph of the Declaration of Independence expresses the same theory, in many of Mason's exact words. Although he owned slaves, Mason condemned slavery as inconsistent with these principles, blaming the institution on English colonial policy.

Mason tempered his emphasis on individual rights with provisions designed to link freedom with responsibility. Section 15 reminds the people that they cannot long enjoy the blessings of liberty unless they firmly adhere "to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue." In section 16, he proclaims it to be "the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity toward each other."

ENUMERATION OF RIGHTS

Sections 5 and 6 exalt the separation of powers, periodic and frequent election of legislators and executive officers, term limits, and universal suffrage, as means of preventing tyranny. The Constitutional Convention in 1787, to which Mason was a delegate, incorporated most of these institutions in the plan for the new national government.

Sections 8–13 and 16 of the Virginia Declaration of Rights enumerate the rights of individuals. Section 8 guarantees to persons charged with crimes the right to know the nature of the charges against them, to confront witnesses, to a speedy trial by an impartial jury, to remain silent, and to due process of law. Section 9 contains a ban on excessive bail and fines and cruel and unusual punishments. Section 10 prohibits searches and seizures unless they are authorized by warrants, based on evidence of wrongdoing, specifically describing the place to be searched or the person to be seized. The right to trial by jury is extended to civil suits in Section 11. Section 12 guarantees freedom of the press, "one of the great bulwarks of liberty." Mason, in section 13, called standing armies in time of peace "dangerous to liberty" and mandated "a well-regulated militia . . . trained to arms." Mason's initial draft of section 16 spoke of "the fullest toleration in the exercise of religion." James Madison successfully amended this language to read "all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion."

Some civil liberties, which were later to be considered fundamental, are missing from the Virginia Declaration of Rights, most notably freedom of speech and a prohibition on government support for religious sects. The Episcopal Church was not disestablished until 1786 when the Virginia legislature passed Thomas Jefferson's Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom.

Toward the end of the Constitutional Convention's deliberations, Mason introduced a motion to include a declaration of rights, seconded by Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts. Not a single state, however, voted in favor of the motion. Mason and Gerry, in protest, refused to sign the proposed constitution. Mason was vindicated four years later when a bill of rights, in the form of ten amendments, was added to the document.

Kenneth Holland

See also: Bill of Rights; Constitutionalism; Declaration of Independence.

FURTHER READING

Henri, Florette. George Mason of Virginia. New York: Crowell-Collier, 1971.

Heymsfeld, Carla R., and Joan W. Lewis. George Mason: Father of the Bill of Rights. Rockville, MD: Patriotic Education, 1993.

Miller, Helen Hill. George Mason, Constitutionalist. San Diego, CA: Simon Publications, 1938.

Pacheco, Josephine F., ed. To Secure the Blessings of Liberty: Rights in American History. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1993.

Rutland, Robert Allen. The Birth of the Bill of Rights, 1776–1791. New York: Collier, 1966.

———. George Mason: Reluctant Statesman. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.

Shumate, T. Daniel, ed. The First Amendment: The Legacy of George Mason. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1985.

Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. (1976)

In Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976), the U.S. Supreme Court provided some resolution to the confusion it had previously created in commercial speech (advertising) cases and made clear that such speech enjoyed First Amendment protection. In Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942), the Supreme Court had held that "purely commercial advertising" was not protected by the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech and press. More than three decades later, however, in Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Harry A. Blackmun, concluded that commercial speech that "contained factual material of clear public interest" had some constitutional protection. Although Bigelow appeared to extend, in Blackmun's words, "some degree" of First Amendment protection to commercial speech, the Court did not overturn its decision in Valentine and emphasized that commercial speech was not protected to the same extent as political speech, although the Court's opinion did not specify the degree of protection to which commercial speech was entitled.

In the Board of Pharmacy case, the Court, again in an opinion by Justice Blackmun, attempted to reconcile these two previous decisions. At issue in the case was a Virginia statute that prohibited pharmacists from advertising their prices or credit terms for prescription drugs. A consumer group challenged the law as violating both the pharmacists' right to speak and the public's right to receive information. In a seven–one decision, with only Justice William H. Rehnquist dissenting, the Court held the law violated the First Amendment's protections of speech and press.

On the First Amendment side of the balance, Justice Blackmun noted that individuals have a keen interest in the prices of prescription drugs so that they may make informed decisions regarding allocation of their personal finances. Furthermore, society in general has an interest in the free flow of this information in order to make intelligent decisions concerning important public policy questions, such as the adequacy of health care or the practices of pharmaceutical companies. Although the state had legitimate countervailing interests in protecting the professionalism of pharmacists and protecting consumers from fraudulent or misleading advertising, the justices held that Virginia could do so by measures less destructive of First Amendment freedoms than an absolute ban on prescription drug price advertising.

The Board of Pharmacy case stands for the proposition that the First Amendment forbids the government to prohibit truthful speech about legal products and services. In later commercial speech cases—for example, Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986), and 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)—the Court's justices were in disagreement over this absolutist position, but all agreed with the statement in Board of Pharmacy that, consistent with First Amendment protections of free speech and press, false or fraudulent speech could be prohibited, as could speech advertising illegal products or services.

Michael W. Bowers

See also: Bigelow v. Virginia; Commercial Speech; First Amendment; Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico.

FURTHER READING

Garvey, John H., and Frederick Schauer, eds. The First Amendment: A Reader. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1992.

Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom

The Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom of 1786, drafted by Thomas Jefferson and pushed through the Virginia legislature by James Madison, outlawed the taxing of individuals to support local churches. The statute is considered a major milestone in the push for separation of church and state and has been called the inspiration for what eventually would become the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The established church was a fact of life in the American colonies prior to the Revolutionary War. When the colonies formed the United States, establishment of churches was in the forefront of political issues harking back to the founding of each colony. The Puritans who had fled England and its established church to practice their religion wanted that religion to be established. As they developed and spread throughout New England, they were concerned about the "wrong" church being established and became intolerant themselves.

One famous example of such intolerance was the trial of a former Anglican clergyman who found that the Puritans' example of religious freedom did not measure up to his radical ideas. Expelled from the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Roger Williams founded the colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in 1636 as a refuge for people persecuted for their religious beliefs. Anabaptists, Quakers, and Jews settled in Rhode Island. Various other denominations built churches elsewhere in the colonies—Catholics in Maryland, Anglicans in Virginia, and Methodists in Georgia. All practiced varying levels of toleration of other faiths and religions.

Although each sect had ideas of spreading its distinct faith throughout the New World, that possibility was prevented by the variety of religious organizations and the vivid memories of religious wars in the European homelands. Many colonists were refugees from the conflicts of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation or were their first- or second-generation descendants.

In Virginia Colony, the established Church of England (Episcopal) was firmly entrenched. Its mission included a requirement that individuals pay taxes to support local churches, a provision against which the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom was directed.

Jefferson's draft of the Virginia statute had three sections. The longest, the first, set forth his views on established religion and the woes it had foisted on individuals of every belief and denomination. The third section recognized that the bill would be a mere piece of legislation subject to repeal, but he asserted that rescinding the law would violate what would, in modern terms, be called human rights. The statute led to the wording of the First Amendment that "Congress shall make no law regarding the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

The second section of the Virginia statute contained the rationale that served as foundation for the two religion clauses of the First Amendment:

> We the General Assembly of Virginia do enact that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or [burdened] in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer, on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil rights.

The bill initially was submitted to the Virginia General Assembly in 1779 but was defeated by the efforts of the Episcopal Church. That established denomination began losing ground to other sects when the legislature that year denied further tax support for the church. When the act finally passed in 1786, it was despite opposition of the established churches and political leaders, including George Washington, who wanted, as a compromise measure, to establish all Christian churches and support them with tax dollars.

While the religious-freedom bill was still being debated in the legislature, Jefferson and James Madison started the process to have the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg cease granting degrees in divinity. Progress on that front, as with the religious-freedom bill, was incremental. Amid these political battles in Virginia and the other states, Jefferson's ideas became integral to the Constitution, adopted in 1789 and amended with the first ten amendments called the Bill of Rights in 1791. Among these, of course, was the First Amendment. This move was somewhat at odds with nine state constitutions. Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, and Pennsylvania never established religions, but other states did. The last state to disestablish its church was Massachusetts in 1833.

Jefferson remained adamant and wrote to the Baptist Assembly of Danbury, Connecticut, January 1, Passage from the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, Jefferson Memorial, Washington, D.C.

(© North Wind Picture Archives)

1802: "I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should 'make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,' thus building a wall of separation between church and State." This use of the metaphor of a wall has continued to resonate throughout U.S. history and law.

In the meantime, there were continuing echoes of the two attitudes that churches needed to be either protected or disfavored. In Virginia as recently as 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court found itself in Brown v. Gilmore, 533 U.S. 1301 (2001), dealing with the issue of a statute mandating time for a moment of silence in the state's public schools. The Court in this instance refused to issue an injunction after lower courts had found a "clear secular purpose" in upholding the statute, even though similar statutes had been struck down. At about the same time, Reverend Jerry Falwell and his Thomas Road Baptist Church successfully challenged the Virginia Constitution in federal court and were granted incorporation papers, the first for a church since the Revolutionary War. In these instances, the courts succeeded in treating religion and its churches like any other organization, thus carrying out Jefferson's intent when he drafted his original bill.

Stanley Morris

See also: Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Jefferson, Thomas; Madison, James; Separation of Church and State.

FURTHER READING

Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

Virginia v. Black (2003)

In Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003), the U.S. Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a Virginia law banning cross burning. The case required the justices to examine the perplexing line between permissible "symbolic speech" protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and impermissible conduct. In R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), the Supreme Court struck down a conviction for cross burning on the basis that it was content-based, since the Saint Paul, Minnesota, ordinance prohibited symbolic acts intended to intimidate but limited only to grounds of "race, color, creed, religion, or gender." By contrast, Virginia's law made cross burning for the purpose of intimidating any "person or group of persons" illegal and specified that an act of cross burning was itself "prima facie evidence of intent to intimidate."

The Virginia law had been applied in two cases. Barry Black had been charged on the basis of a cross that had been burned at a Ku Klux Klan rally in Carroll County, Virginia. Richard Elliott, Jonathan O'Mara, and an unnamed individual were charged with attempting to burn a cross on the lawn of an African American neighbor in Virginia Beach. The Virginia Court of Appeals had affirmed the convictions, but the state Supreme Court held the statute to be unconstitutional on its face.

In her opinion for the majority, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor traced cross burnings to fourteenth-century Scotland and then described how the Klan had taken on this practice in the United States. She concluded that cross burnings had become both "potent symbols of shared group identity and ideology" and "a symbol of hate," often designed to intimidate others. The protection for free speech in the First Amendment was designed to promote a "free trade in ideas," but it did not provide for absolute protection for free speech. Thus, O'Connor and five other justices agreed that laws against cross burnings that were designed to intimidate others, as in the case of Elliot and O'Mara, were permissible, but the lower court should review the case. O'Connor and four other justices further decided that the provision of the law specifying that cross burning was itself prima facie evidence of intimidation, however, rendered Black's conviction unconstitutional, since the ritual could also be used as "a statement of ideology, a symbol of group solidarity," which would be constitutionally permissible.

In a concurring opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens agreed that the First Amendment was not designed to allow for intimidation. In dissent, Justice Clarence Thomas argued that "a page of history is worth a volume of logic." Describing the Klan as "the world's oldest, most persistent terrorist organization," Thomas argued that Virginia had adopted the cross-burning law during the heyday of segregation, making it implausible that it was designed to suppress speech. Given the history of cross burning in America, Justice Antonin Scalia believed it was quite rational for Virginia to conclude that cross burning per se was designed to intimidate. In his partial dissent, Scalia voted to uphold the law on the basis that the law's presumption that cross burning was designed to intimidate was not absolute but was rebuttable by the defendant in court. Justice David H. Souter argued that the Virginia statute was not content-neutral because it singled out cross burning for special treatment.

John R. Vile

See also: First Amendment; Hate Crimes; Hate Speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul; Symbolic Speech.

FURTHER READING

Brandon, Chris. "Recent Decision, Constitutional Law: Hate Speech: First Amendment Permits Ban on Cross Burning When Done with the Intent to Intimidate." Mississippi Law Journal 73 (Fall 2003): 323–44.

Vile, John R., and Joseph F. Menez. Summaries of Leading Cases on the Constitution. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2004.

Voir Dire

The term "voir dire" is a French phrase that literally means "to see, to say," or "to speak the truth." The term found its way into American legal procedure, and modern usage of it usually refers to the process of jury selection at the beginning of most civil and criminal trials. Whenever a jury is employed as a fact-finding body in a trial, the attorneys have the right to question potential members in order to choose those they feel would best respond to their role as juror. The first mention of a jury dates back to the Greek play The Eumenides by Aeschylus in 458 B.C.E. These early juries consisted of between 500 and 6,000 citizens who would hear the cases and determine sentences. By the late 1100s, Henry II had implemented the use of juries in criminal disputes. The jury became a fixed element in the judicial system with the Magna Carta, which stated that a person could not be deprived of his freedom without a jury's consent.

The jury is an important factor in the U.S. justice system. The founding fathers held the institution in high regard and cited the lack of its use as a grievance against Great Britain in the Declaration of Independence. Furthermore, the framers of the Constitution guaranteed criminal defendants the right to a trial by jury in Article III, Section 2, "The trial of all crimes . . . shall be by a jury." The Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) also addresses juries: The Seventh Amendment assures that civil plaintiffs and defendants will be granted the right to a trial by jury when the trial involves an amount of over twenty dollars. Finally, the Sixth Amendment promises criminal defendants an impartial jury.

The procedure of voir dire is an attempt by the justice system to obtain an "impartial jury." Attorneys are allowed to question and remove jurors they feel are partial or would obstruct the justice system in some way. A portion of society may not serve as members of the jury. For example, excluded from serving on a federal criminal jury are citizens who have a felony charge pending, have been convicted of a felony charge, are unable physically or mentally to perform the duties required, are not a U.S. citizen, are under age eighteen, are not a resident of the district for more than one year, or are unable to read, write, and understand English.

If lawyers feel that a potential juror is clearly partial or biased, they may attempt to use a "challenge for cause." A challenge for cause is an objection to a prospective juror because of obvious bias or other factors that would impede that person's ability to view the case fairly, as the U.S. Supreme Court noted in Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717 (1961). Other such factors could include kinship or employment relationships with an individual on trial. Attorneys have an unlimited number of challenges for cause, but the judge must sustain, or support, each challenge. Jurors who could be excluded on a challenge for cause include those who lie and those who purposely conceal facts pertinent to the trial. Other prospective jurors who could be excused for cause include individuals who have been victims of crimes similar to the crime charged or who have political or social opinions relating to the case or knowledge of certain factors of the case, such as the defendant's prior criminal record.

Finally, attorneys are entitled to "peremptory challenges" (or strikes). Each side is given a limited number of peremptory strikes that enable the lawyers to exclude a certain number of jurors from service. The number of peremptory strikes allowed varies among individual state courts and federal courts. More peremptory challenges are permitted for death penalty cases than for lesser felonies and misdemeanor trials. From the perspective of attorneys, the benefit of the peremptory challenge is that they are free to strike any juror they choose without having to establish a good reason. In 1965, in Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202, the Supreme Court's ruling made it difficult to challenge the racially discriminatory use of peremptory strikes. This case was overruled in 1986 when the Supreme Court decided in Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, that it was unlawful to strike a potential juror on the basis of race. This decision was extended to prohibit peremptory challenges on the basis of gender in J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994).

Today many types of juries are used throughout the country. They vary in many ways, including size, type of offense, and court level. The jury remains an integral part of the American justice system, however. It is a clear example of direct democracy at work. In fact, Thomas Jefferson believed the right to trial by jury was more precious to the maintenance of a democracy than even the vote. The process of voir dire greatly affects the jury. Because of this, it is crucial to the maintenance of justice that the jury is representative of the larger community.

Maureen E. Foley

See also: Batson v. Kentucky; Trial by Jury.

FURTHER READING

Frederick, Jeffrey T. Mastering Voir Dire and Jury Selection: Gaining an Edge in Questioning and Selecting a Jury. Chicago: American Bar Association, 1995.

Guinther, John. The Jury in America. New York: Facts on File, 1988.

Levine, James P. Juries and Politics. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1991.

Starr, V. Hale, and Mark McCormick. Jury Selection: An Attorney's Guide to Jury Law and Methods. Boston: Little, Brown, 1985.

Wrightsman, Lawrence S., Saul M. Kassin, and Cynthia E. Willis. In the Jury Box: Controversies in the Courtroom. Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1987.

Volstead Act

The U.S. Congress passed the Volstead Act on October 28, 1919, in order to implement the Eighteenth Amendment prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and transportation of alcoholic beverages. The law assigned responsibility for enforcement of prohibition to the federal government. Confronted with widespread disobedience, the U.S. Department of the Treasury and other federal law enforcement agencies engaged in surveillance and in searches and seizures affecting ordinary citizens that led to repeated complaints about violations of civil liberties. Concern about protecting individual freedom contributed to ratification of the Twenty-first Amendment, repealing prohibition, in 1933.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

In 1916 more than half the candidates elected to the U.S. Congress pledged to support alcoholic prohibition. U.S. entry into World War I the following year provided the opportunity for them to act. The war produced a shortage of grain, and Congress, in order to protect the nutritional uses of grain and the morals of soldiers, passed a wartime prohibition on the production of alcoholic beverages. Republicans in Congress, faced with demobilization and a return to a peacetime economy, proposed the Eighteenth Amendment on December 18, 1917.

The final state ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment occurred January 16, 1919. The amendment, however, was not self-enforcing and needed enabling legislation. A Republican member of the House of Representatives, Andrew Joseph Volstead of Minnesota, proposed the needed law. A reformer, he also advocated, unsuccessfully, a federal antilynching law. President Woodrow Wilson, a Democrat, vetoed the prohibition bill, but Congress overrode the veto by a two-thirds vote in both chambers. The National Prohibition Enforcement Act, as it was officially named, took effect January 17, 1920.

In section 1, the law simply continued the wartime prohibition on the production of intoxicating drink. Section 3 banned the possession of intoxicating liquor as well as its manufacture, sale, and transportation. The law defined a banned beverage as one that contained more than 0.5 percent alcohol. It set the penalties and fines for violation. The act did permit physicians to prescribe the use of alcohol for medicinal purposes and churches to use wine in sacraments. It also allowed private persons to possess and consume liquor in their homes. Congress assigned responsibility for enforcement to the commissioner of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, an officer within the Department of the Treasury. The U.S. attorneys located in federal judicial districts under the direction of the U.S. attorney general were responsible for prosecutions under the act. The law did not outlaw the consumption of intoxicating liquors but only their manufacture, sale, transportation, import, or export.

Florence Prag Kahn (R-CA), John Phillip Hill (R-MD), and Mary Teresa Norton (D-NJ), members of the unofficial committee on the modification of the Volstead Act, 1926. The 1919 law had ushered in the Prohibition era.
(Library of Congress)

ENFORCEMENT

In 1920 Congress appropriated funds to hire special inspectors who reported to a prohibition commissioner. Congress took further efforts in 1927 to bolster enforcement by establishing the Bureau of Prohibition. In 1930 Congress transferred responsibility for enforcement to the Department of Justice, an agency under the control of the attorney general. There were never enough agents, investigators, or Customs Bureau employees to stem the illegal manufacture, sale, and importation of liquor. There were only 1,520 prohibition agents in 1920 and 2,836 in 1930. The highest-paid agent earned $50 a week. Cooperation from state and local law enforcement officers was minimal. In 1925 there were an estimated 100,000 "speakeasies," clubs that illegally served liquor, in New York City alone. Congress lacked the will to provide the funds necessary for effective enforcement.

The term "Volsteadism" came to mean the intolerable searches, seizures, and shootings by police who seemed to threaten intrusion into the private lives of law-respecting persons. In response to gangland shootings and widespread corruption of law enforcement officers, President Herbert Hoover created the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, chaired by George Wickersham, in 1929. The Wickersham Commission report acknowledged the lack of enforcement of the Volstead Act but refused to support expanding the federal government's power to conduct warrantless searches and seizures. It called for substantially higher appropriations from Congress for enforcement.

The Volstead Act had unintended consequences not only for Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures but also for the Second Amendment right to keep and bear arms. Criminal gangs, led by such ruthless men as Al Capone, attempted to monopolize the supply of intoxicating beverages. In 1929 alone, Capone is estimated to have earned $60 million from the illegal sale of liquor. Violent armed conflicts between gang members and law enforcement agents in their efforts to subdue the gangs led to legislation restricting the use of guns. In 1924, Congress held hearings on "Firearms and Intoxicants in the District of Columbia" in response to an incident in which a stray bullet had wounded Senator Frank Greene of Vermont in a shootout between police and bootleggers. Congress imposed a permit requirement for carrying handguns in the nation's capital and a ban on mail-order handguns, the first federal legislation regulating firearms.

The Volstead Act, according to its critics, also restrained religious liberty. Attorney Clarence Darrow compared prohibition to the Spanish Inquisition. The advocates of prohibition were overwhelmingly Protestant. Roman Catholics complained that the law deprived them of the free exercise of their religion as guaranteed by the First Amendment. Immigrants from Catholic regions such as Ireland, Italy, southern Germany, and Poland said Congress singled them out, because the consumption of alcoholic beverages was a deeply rooted custom in their native lands.

REPEAL

Republican presidential nominee Herbert Hoover referred to prohibition as a noble experiment during the 1928 campaign. He easily defeated his Democratic opponent, Alfred E. Smith, a Roman Catholic who opposed prohibition. By 1931, however, public opinion had shifted dramatically. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment (AAPA) led the campaign to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment. The AAPA was nonpartisan, well organized, and well funded. Its members were wealthy and influential citizens in all states who feared that the federal government, by means of prohibition, might permanently compromise the tradition of individual liberty. In 1932 the Democratic Party came out clearly in favor of repealing prohibition and won a large majority of seats in Congress. On February 20, 1933, Congress approved a constitutional amendment repealing prohibition. On March 22 Congress amended the Volstead Act to permit the sale of 3.2 percent beer and wine. Special state ratifying conventions approved the Twenty-first Amendment in December 1933, thus voiding the Volstead Act.

Kenneth Holland

See also: First Amendment; Fourth Amendment; Second Amendment; Victimless Crimes.

FURTHER READING

Behr, Edward. Prohibition: Thirteen Years That Changed America. New York: Arcade, 1997.

Clark, Norman H. Deliver Us from Evil: An Interpretation of American Prohibition. New York: W. W. Norton, 1985.

Coffey, Thomas M. The Long Thirst: Prohibition in America, 1920–1933. New York: W. W. Norton, 1975.

Hamm, Richard F. Shaping the Eighteenth Amendment: Temperance Reform, Legal Culture, and the Polity, 1880–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Kobler, John. Ardent Spirits: The Rise and Fall of Prohibition. New York: Putnam, 1973.

Kyvig, David E. Repealing National Prohibition. 2d ed. Kent, OH: Kent State University Press, 2000.

Murchison, Kenneth M. Federal Criminal Law Doctrines: The Forgotten Influence of National Prohibition. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1994.

Vulgar Speech

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that except in very limited circumstances, the First Amendment to the Constitution prohibits government from censoring speech simply because it is vulgar or offensive. Although "vulgar speech" is not technically a legal term, states and the federal government have often claimed that certain censorship or punishment of speech is permissible, even under the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment, because the speech at issue is vulgar or otherwise offensive. The Supreme Court has generally rejected these arguments except in limited circumstances involving schools or a particular likelihood that children will be exposed to vulgar speech being broadcast, such as by radio.

The Court most clearly addressed the issue of whether certain speech could be prohibited simply because it was vulgar in Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971). In that case, Paul Cohen was sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment for the "offensive conduct" of wearing a jacket emblazoned with the words "Fuck the Draft" in a county courthouse. The Court first noted that under the First Amendment government generally may not dictate the form or content of speech except in the case of very limited categories of expression that do not receive First Amendment protection, such as "obscenity" or "fighting words." The Court held that Cohen's jacket did not meet the legal test for obscene speech since it was in no way erotic, nor did it meet the test for fighting words because it was not a personal insult directed at provoking a particular individual to commit an immediate breach of the peace.

The Court considered California's main claim that there was a state interest in protecting the public from particularly offensive words and rejected it for three reasons. First, the state's argument was boundless, since it would be difficult to define what words could be considered criminally offensive. Second, the Court held that the emotive impact of speech was protected just as much as the cognitive content of the words chosen, and Cohen's jacket conveyed "otherwise inexpressible emotions." Finally, the Court reasoned that censoring particular disfavored words could be used a pretext for censoring disfavored ideas. In upholding Cohen's right to speak, the Court remarked that although offensive speech may sometimes be part of the "verbal cacophony" created by the First Amendment, such speech was a sign of the strength of the commitment to peaceful exchange of ideas and must be tolerated because it is "often true that one man's vulgarity is another's lyric."

In the public school setting, however, the Court has been willing to give school officials greater latitude in restricting speech because it is vulgar, lewd, or plainly offensive. In Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986), the Court held that it was permissible to punish a student for making a speech at a school assembly that was rife with sexual innuendo and that school officials considered vulgar and offensive. The Court's previous precedent recognized that students maintained certain First Amendment rights and could not be punished unless their speech caused disruption, but in Fraser, the Court held that the schools also had a duty to teach students to be civil, including teaching students not to use vulgar and offensive terms in public discourse. Likewise, in Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982), the Court rejected the claim by school officials that they could remove books from a school library because they contained unorthodox or controversial ideas, but the Court seemed to assume that school officials could remove books that were pervasively vulgar.

In Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the Court allowed greater regulation of offensive or vulgar speech in the context of broadcast, based on the concern that unsupervised children would have access to the speech, at least when such broadcast took place during the day. Interestingly, however, six of the nine justices rejected the suggestion that vulgar speech occupied a lower rank in the First Amendment hierarchy and could therefore be subject to greater regulation. Thus, the Pacifica case appears to stand for the proposition that the FCC may require broadcasters to channel vulgar speech into time slots when children are less likely to be exposed to it, but the case does not support the claim that such speech could be banned outright.

In Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), the Court rejected a further expansion of this sort of regulation of vulgar or offensive speech that had been upheld in Pacifica when it held that a federal law that made it a crime to make "indecent" and "patently offensive" speech available to minors on the Internet violated the First Amendment. The Court held that the Internet was not as intrusive as broadcast and therefore speech on the Internet was fully protected by the First Amendment. Since it was impossible to know if an individual accessing a Web site was a minor, the law would impermissibly limit the level of speech available to adults to only speech that was appropriate for children.

J. C. Salyer

See also: Bethel School District v. Fraser; Board of Education v. Pico; Cohen v. California; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation; First Amendment; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union.

FURTHER READING

Dooling, Richard. Blue Streak: Swearing, Free Speech, and Sexual Harassment. New York: Random House, 1996.

W

Waite, Morrison Remick (1816–1888)

Morrison Remick Waite—the seventh chief justice of the United States, serving 1874–1888—was born in Lyme, Connecticut. A competent administrator, Waite proved to be essentially an economic and constitutional conservative (as were many justices during his time) when deciding property rights cases as well as issues involving civil liberties.

After graduating from Yale College in 1837, Waite moved to Ohio where he read law and was admitted to the bar in 1839. He was elected to the Ohio legislature as a Whig in 1849 and served one term. After unsuccessful campaigns for Congress in 1846 and 1862, he declined an appointment to the Ohio Supreme Court.

Waite gained national prominence in 1871 when President Ulysses S. Grant appointed him to serve as one of three U.S. counselors at the Geneva Arbitration Tribunal established to settle claims against Great Britain arising out of that nation's assistance to the Confederacy during the Civil War. Upon the death of Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, Waite was nominated for the post by President Grant—though only after six other individuals either declined the nomination or had their nomination withdrawn.

In Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. 162 (1875), he wrote for a unanimous Court that the Fourteenth Amendment did not grant suffrage to women, because suffrage was not a right of citizenship. He asserted that "the Constitution, when it conferred citizenship, did not necessarily confer the right of suffrage . . . the constitutions and laws of the several states which commit that important trust to men alone are not necessarily void."

Two 1876 decisions—United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214 (1876), and United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)—narrowed the protection of the newly freed slaves. Both cases dealt with the Fifteenth Amendment, passed after the Civil War, which provided that neither the federal nor any state government could infringe on the individual's right to vote on grounds of race or previous status as a slave.

Waite wrote for an eight–one Court in Reese that "The Fifteenth Amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone. It prevents the States, or the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This opinion voided a portion of the Enforcement Act of 1870 and narrowed the scope of the Fifteenth Amendment.

In Cruikshank, a unanimous Court weakened the Fifteenth Amendment by holding that punishment for offenses committed in the Reconstruction Louisiana "Colfax massacre" (over a disputed gubernatorial election) lay with the state, not the federal government. White men had been arrested for breaking up an African American political meeting and were indicted under a section of the congressional Enforcement Act of 1870 that disallowed interference with a person's federal rights. Chief Justice Waite, writing for a unanimous Court, held that the Fifteenth Amendment had not granted the suffrage to African Americans. Consequently, the defendants had not violated any federal right. Waite's opinion concluded that the right of suffrage was not a necessary attribute of national citizenship, but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race was. The right to vote in the states came from the states, but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination came from the United States.

Another case in which Waite was indifferent to protecting the rights of African Americans was Neal v. Delaware, 103 U.S. 370 (1880). An African American had been convicted of rape by an all-white jury in New Castle County, Delaware. The Court found that William Neal was deprived of equal protection of the law on the basis that African Americans had been excluded from the jury. Waite dissented, believing the exclusion of African Americans from the jury did not deprive Neal of equal protection.

The nation's seventh chief justice, Morrison Remick Waite served from 1874 to 1888. He generally favored the states in the areas of economic regulation and civil liberties and rights and was less sympathetic to the plight of African Americans. (Library of Congress)

In the first church-state case to come before the Court as a result of the Grant administration's effort to eliminate Mormon polygamy, Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879), Waite wrote for a unanimous Court to uphold the conviction of a Mormon in such a marriage. The Court held that federal statutes constitutionally could punish criminal activity regardless of religious beliefs. The polygamist was free to believe that he ought to have multiple wives, but he was not free to act on this belief. Waite wrote that "laws are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with practices."

In the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), Waite was with an eight–one majority declaring unconstitutional provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 that prohibited racial discrimination in hotels and other public accommodations. This decision discouraged federal efforts to protect African Americans from private discrimination and cast constitutional doubts on the ability of Congress to legislate in the area of civil rights.

An effective judicial administrator, Waite wrote for the Court 872 times during his fourteen years on the Court. He generally favored the states in the areas of economic regulation and civil liberties and rights—areas that showed him to be unsympathetic to the plight of blacks in the United States.

Mark Alcorn

See also: Judicial Review; Reynolds v. United States; State Action.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J. Justices, Presidents, and Senators: A History of the U.S. Supreme Court Appointments from Washington to Clinton. 4th ed. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1999.

Filler, Louis. "Morrison R. Waite." In The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1798–1969, Their Lives and Major Opinions, Volume 2, ed. Leo Friedman and Fred Israel. New York: R. R. Bowker, 1969.

Magrath, C. Peter. "Morrison Remick Waite." In The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States, ed. Kermit L. Hall, 906–7. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Wallace v. Jaffree (1985)

In Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down an Alabama law providing for a daily minute of silence in public school classrooms "for meditation or voluntary prayer." At issue was whether this practice infringed the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution; under that clause, government cannot engage in activity that would constitute "establishment of religion."

Alabama enacted three laws between 1978 and 1982 on school prayer. The first required a minute of silence for meditation; the second authorized a moment of silence "for meditation or voluntary prayer"; the third allowed teachers to lead students in spoken prayer. Ishmael Jaffree, a father of three schoolchildren, challenged the laws. Wallace v. Jaffree involved the second law.

A federal district court upheld the law on the grounds that nothing in the U.S. Constitution prohibited Alabama from establishing a state religion. The federal appellate court, however, ruled the law unconstitutional as being a violation of the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. In a six–three decision, the Supreme Court agreed.

Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the majority, invoked Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), which had provided a guide for deciding Establishment Clause cases. Under the Lemon test, legislation must have a valid secular purpose. By examining legislative intent, including insertion of the phrase "or voluntary prayer" and a statement by the bill's sponsor that it was "an effort to return voluntary prayer" to the schools, Stevens concluded that the Alabama law failed the test. He explained that Alabama's intent was an unconstitutional state endorsement of prayer and not the same as "merely protecting every student's right to engage in voluntary prayer during an appropriate moment of silence."

Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. in a concurring opinion defended the Lemon test as a useful guide. He noted that both lower courts agreed the law had no secular purpose though disagreed on whether this rendered the law unconstitutional. He thought a plain moment of silence might be justified in secular terms and could pass the Lemon test.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor in her concurring opinion defended the Lemon test but also called for its refinement by means of the "endorsement test" she had proposed in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984). Using this test, the Court's job was not just to apply the Lemon criteria but to determine "whether the government's purpose is to endorse religion and whether the statute actually carries a message of endorsement." This, she believed, would prevent courts from reaching absurd conclusions about impermissible interactions between government and religion. O'Connor also speculated that a law mandating a simple moment of silence would not face constitutional obstacles: "It is difficult to discern a serious threat to religious liberty from a room of silent, thoughtful schoolchildren."

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justices Byron R. White and William H. Rehnquist dissented. Burger disagreed with the Court's assessment of legislative intent. He said the statute was meant to clarify children's right to pray voluntarily at school, and rather than moving toward an established religion, it promoted religious freedom. White posed a question: How would a teacher respond if a student asked whether prayer was allowed during the moment of silence? He thought the teacher would have to answer affirmatively. Thus the Alabama legislature had simply addressed this issue before it arose. Rehnquist used his dissent to offer historical support for his view that neither the "wall of separation" metaphor nor the Lemon test reflected the original intent of the authors of the Establishment Clause.

Jaffree broke no new ground because the Court had already forbidden government promotion of prayer in school. Nor did it entirely resolve the moment-of-silence issue, since the justices, despite hints, avoided ruling definitively on whether a plain moment of silence was constitutional.

Jane G. Rainey

See also: Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman.

FURTHER READING

Alley, Robert S. Without a Prayer: Religious Expression in Public Schools. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.

Ivers, Gregg. Redefining the First Freedom: The Supreme Court and the Consolidation of State Power. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1993.

War on Drugs

The "war on drugs" began during the presidency of Richard M. Nixon and has played a role in every presidential administration since. Its impact has had a ripple effect throughout the United States, not only for the large increase in law enforcement expenditures and incarcerations but also for its widespread effect on civil liberties.

When the war on drugs began under President Nixon, antidrug policies were separated into two general camps, one focused on reducing supply, the other on reducing demand. Supply-reduction strategies sought to decrease the availability of drugs by limiting access to drug sources and increasing punishment for possession and distribution. Demand-reduction strategies sought to lower demand for illegal drugs through drug use prevention and treatment.

President Nixon's initial drug policy reserved a large place, and more than half of the drug control budget, for drug treatment. The treatment focus was soon abandoned and U.S. drug policy thereafter shifted the focus to supply reduction. Presidents Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter did not make the war on drugs a centerpiece of their agenda, but President Reagan revamped the effort with his "Just Say No" campaign (also promoted by his wife, Nancy). He also primarily embraced a supply-reduction strategy by focusing on interdiction, seizure, and criminal prosecution.

President George H. W. Bush then established a national office of drug policy, appointed a drug "czar," increased antidrug spending, and intensified drug law enforcement efforts. His Department of Justice also adopted tough anticrime policies that required federal prosecutors to push for lengthy drug sentences, and Congress established mandatory prison sentences for many federal drug offenders. As a result, the average federal drug sentence increased from about four and a half years in 1980 to more than seven years in 1992.

President William J. Clinton then increased the antidrug budget by 25 percent, proposed expanded drug testing rules, and intensified efforts toward drug interdiction and prosecution. The war on drugs continued into the presidency of George W. Bush. In 2004, almost one quarter of America's 2 million inmates (and 61 percent of federal prisoners) were in prison for drug offenses, costing the states alone $5 billion annually.

Many of the various administrations' efforts to curtail drugs and drug use have raised major issues pertaining to civil liberties. Confinement is only one weapon deployed against drug offenders. Under federal law, many offenders who have served their sentences find they are ineligible for health benefits, food stamps, college loans, and public housing. Indeed, in Department of Housing and Urban Development v. Rucker, 535 U.S. 125 (2002), the U.S. Supreme Court even ruled that a drug user's parents could be constitutionally evicted from public housing on the basis of their child's use of drugs.

First lady Nancy Reagan speaking at a "Just Say No" rally in Los Angeles, May 1987. (National Archives)

Many of the liberties protected under the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) have been affected by the war on drugs. The Fourth Amendment's restriction on search and seizure has been implicated because in order to unearth drug crimes, the police often engage in wiretapping, surveillance, and undercover operations. They also offer reduced sentences to drug users who provide information on suppliers. Police most often search individuals and their automobiles if probable cause exists to justify a search. The determination of whether probable cause existed to justify an individual's arrest for drug possession is debated countless times every day between prosecutors and defense attorneys in courtrooms across America. The Fourth Amendment requires an officer to have "reasonable suspicion" before stopping an individual to search for drugs. The reasonable-suspicion test requires the police officer to point to specific and articulable facts that, taken together with rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant that intrusion. In United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266 (2002), the Court held that whether a police officer's inferences were justified required consideration of the "totality of the circumstances," not just one aspect.

In Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the Court held that warrants were required for wiretapping, but the Court subsequently has held that Fourth Amendment protections do not apply in nonwiretapping cases to circumstances in which an individual does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy. Businesses, schools, and government agencies now increasingly require intrusive drug tests. In Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995), the Supreme Court approved a high school's requirement of drug testing for students to participate in athletics, a requirement subsequently approved in Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002), for all students engaged in extracurricular activities.

The war on drugs has also raised issues under the Fifth Amendment, particularly the Takings Clause. The Takings Clause, which forbids government seizure of private property without compensation to the owner, does not apply to contraband—illegal goods such as drugs. However, the asset-forfeiture laws that were created as part of the war on drugs permit the seizure of goods if police assert they have reason to believe the property facilitated a drug crime. If any drugs are found on any property, that property is considered to have facilitated a drug offense, and the seizure of perfectly legal goods often results. The burden of proof for demonstrating the property's innocence falls upon the rightful owner.

Recent decisions of the Supreme Court have focused on the Eighth Amendment's provision prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment. Tough anticrime measures such as "three strikes and you're out" have been enacted in part to fight the war on drugs. In Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003), the Court held five–four that these policies did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Similar laws have been enacted to enhance punishment for possession of weapons or selling drugs near schools. These laws have increased the proportion of convicted drug dealers sentenced to prison and increased the length of their sentences.

Another core right to come under attack has been freedom of speech. In 1996, California passed Proposition 215 providing protection from state prosecution to patients who chose to use marijuana for medical purposes upon the recommendation of their doctors. Federal officials responded by pledging to punish doctors who recommended medical marijuana. The threats included revocation of the doctor's prescription drug license, loss of Medicare/Medicaid provider status, and criminal prosecutions.

The war on drugs has been an ongoing feature of U.S. law and politics for more than three decades. After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., and the failed attempt in Pennsylvania, the public exhibited some willingness to forgo a degree of privacy in return for added safety, but the focus of the war on drugs shifted slightly from supply reduction to demand reduction. This shift may lessen the war's impact on civil liberties. Ballot initiatives to legalize small amounts of drugs, especially marijuana, continue to find public support, and some states have begun requiring that first-time drug offenders be placed on probation and afforded drug treatment. A continued shift to reduce demand and prison sentences for small amounts of drugs will likely result in less governmental intrusion and litigation.

James Barger

See also: Board of Education v. Earls; Ewing v. California; Takings Clause; Three-Strikes Laws; Vernonia School District v. Acton.

FURTHER READING

American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). Drug Policy. http://www.aclu.org/DrugPolicy/DrugPolicyMain.cfm.

Blumenson, Eric. "Recovering from Drugs and the Drug War: An Achievable Public Health Alternative." Journal of Gender, Race, and Justice 6 (Fall 2002): 225.

Gray, James P. Why Our Drug Laws Have Failed and What We Can Do About It: A Judicial Indictment of the War on Drugs. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2001.

Office of National Drug Control Policy. http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov.

"Symposium: New Voices on the War on Drugs." Villanova Law Review 47 (Winter 2003).

Wisotsky, Steven. Beyond the War on Drugs: Overcoming a Failed Public Policy. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1990.

War Powers Act

In 1973 the Vietnam War continued raging even as citizens were engaging in ever-stronger protests against it. In response to actions ordered by the president that were inconsistent with the tone of public opinion about the ongoing war and specifically the bombing of enemy positions in Cambodia, Congress enacted the War Powers Act of 1973. Passed over the veto of President Richard M. Nixon, the law called on the commander-in-chief to consult with Congress before placing military forces in a position of imminent hostility.

Although the Constitution provides a separation of powers between the president's ability to "make war" and the ability of Congress to "declare war" and control the funds needed by the president (the power of the purse), there have been about 230 instances of the use of the U.S. military abroad. Congress has declared war only five times. In other instances, local military commanders have taken actions on behalf of the United States; in most other occurrences, the actions were ordered by the president. As early as 1798, local commanders at times must have acted independently, simply because of the inability then to communicate with higher authority. This explanation could have accounted for military actions before the development of rapid communications, but nearly half the incidents occurred after World War I. In the post–World War II era, there have been over eighty U.S. interventions abroad, including in Grenada (1983), Panama (1989), the Gulf War (1991), the former Yugoslavia (1999), and Iraq (2003).

The 1973 legislation requires the president to report to Congress on any action that places the military at risk, and without the approval of Congress, the president must withdraw forces in sixty days. This mechanism by which lack of consent by Congress triggers an event has been termed a "legislative veto." The legislative veto included in the War Powers Act has not been directly challenged, but the Supreme Court in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), considered a legislative veto in the immigration context (by which either house could invalidate an executive branch decision to allow a deportable alien to remain in the country) and found it unconstitutional. Chadha could be an important precedent in any challenge to the legislative veto of the War Powers Act.

There have been attempts to evaluate the compliance and value of the legislation. U.S. Department of State and congressional evaluations of the policy revealed that of the seventy-six reports submitted under the act, only the 1975 Mayaquez seizure off of Cambodia cited the section that triggered the time-frame requirements. In all other reports, the actions precipitated congressional action, but this came often in the form of support resolutions.

Critics of such legislation point out that the modern-day president must have immediate control of military forces to permit quick and adequate response to security threats. Supporting this contention is the example President Gerald Ford discussed in his memoirs about the 1975 evacuation of Saigon, Vietnam, when Congress was in recess and the senior members quite literally were spread across the globe. The final days of the war in Vietnam exemplifies the problems with the act. In 1975, President Ford ordered the evacuation of U.S. citizens and foreign nationals from Vietnam and Cambodia. These events and the Mayaquez rescue were reported in accordance with the War Powers Act. The executive branch contended that the consultation requirement was met through the notification process. Congressional leaders argued that consultation demanded the offering and the consideration of congressional opinion before the president used armed forces.

The impact of the War Powers Act on civil liberties is multifaceted. It can have a direct and devastating impact on the citizen-soldier, who is placed at risk by actions the president orders without the consent of the Congress. Concerns over the extent of presidential powers have been expressed by political scientists and public representatives to the extent that thirty-one members of the House of Representatives brought suit against President William J. Clinton in 1999 to discontinue military operations in the Balkans, at least partly to have a court decide the constitutionality of the War Powers Act. The court held that the plaintiffs lacked "standing" (no right to bring suit) on the issue; this holding was later affirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court. Further, the case was considered moot; the operations were complete by the time the case was brought by Representative Tom Campbell (R-CA) and his House colleagues.

The balance of power between the legislative and executive branches is in constant flux. The experiment known as the War Powers Act was an attempt to increase the communication between Congress and the president but without eliminating the president's ability to react to a military crisis. The policy failed to meet that objective in several instances, however, and the result was additional strife between the branches of government.

The political conflict between the executive branch and the legislative branch was designed into the Constitution. The level of conflict between the branches of government has varied with the dynamics of national and international activity. Overall, however, the congressional effort to curtail the president's power via the War Powers Act has been circumvented by the manner of reporting used by the last six presidents.

Important questions regarding the War Powers Act remain after thirty years: Is the act consistent with the concept of separation of powers? Does the act weaken the presumed power structure of government where an adverse impact on civil rights could result? There are three potential answers: First, the act should be repealed as unconstitutional and as encroaching on the powers of the presidency; second, the act has been functional and achieved the goal of increased consultation between the president and Congress; third, the act should be strengthened through removal of time constraints in the legislative veto clause or the addition of a joint resolution clause.

The policy options are complex, but the need for a commander-in-chief to anticipate or react to military conflict should remain unencumbered. Congress has other means to prevent the country from becoming mired in another Vietnam. Still, changes in the modern world have often left the United States in the position of providing a peacekeeping function; U.S. military personnel remained in the Balkans, Afghanistan, and Iraq for months or years after cessation of direct hostilities. The War Powers Act may be outmoded, but even if the legislation remains unchanged, it will have far-reaching effects on performance of the United States in international politics.

Kevin G. Pearce

See also: Checks and Balances; Vietnam War.

FURTHER READING

Grimmett, Richard F., ed. The War Powers Resolution. New York: Novinka, 2002.

Way, Almon L., Jr. "The President, American Law, and U.S. Military Intervention into Foreign Conflicts." http://www.geocities.com/way_leroy/ProConVolTwoIssueOnePage2.html.

Warren, Earl (1891–1974)

Earl Warren was the fourteenth chief justice of the United States, serving from 1953 to 1969. Born in Los Angeles, California, in 1891, Warren grew up in Bakersfield and graduated from the University of California School of Law in Berkeley. He left private law practice in 1920 and over the next half century served in a variety of public offices. He was a district attorney for fourteen years, winning reelection three times after his initial appointment. Warren served as California attorney general (1939–1943) and was elected governor in 1943, the only California governor to be elected three successive times. In his last reelection, the popular incumbent ran unopposed, having won both the Democratic and Republican nominations.

Warren was nominated as the candidate for vice president on the Republican ticket with Thomas Dewey in 1948, the only election he would ever lose. The ambitious Warren was interested in the Republican nomination for president in 1952, but the nod went to popular war hero General Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Chief Justice Earl Warren is escorted through a crowd of protesters, 1963. (Library of Congress)

Warren's pre-Court experience contrasted sharply with some of his decisions on the Court. During World War II, he helped orchestrate the removal of Japanese American citizens to internment camps, one of the darkest chapters in U.S. history. Warren repeatedly defended the decision, saying that it was a reasonable response to the times. In his autobiography, however, he expressed great regret for the policy. On the Court, Warren was a strong defender of equal rights. As a prosecutor, he was considered tough on crime, but the Warren Court was unparalleled in protecting the rights of criminal defendants. Finally, Warren made part of his reputation in California opposing nominations and candidacies by engaging in red baiting, but on the Court he sought to protect the rights of alleged Communists. In general, the moderate-conservative governor became the liberal chief justice.

President Eisenhower was reported to have promised Warren the first vacancy on the Supreme Court in part because Warren helped deliver California to Eisenhower at the 1952 Republican convention. At the outset of the administration, Eisenhower considered Warren for the position of solicitor general. The sudden death of Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson created a vacancy on the Court, and Eisenhower reportedly was set to renege on the promise because he did not want Warren to be chief justice. Eisenhower's hand was forced, however, and he offered the position to Warren. After some opposition, directed more at delaying the vote than rejecting the nomination, Warren was confirmed March 1, 1954, and took over as chief justice in the middle of the Brown v. Board of Education desegregation case, which was already on the Court's docket. Warren was credited for providing the leadership that helped the Court achieve unanimity in Brown, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). His opinion in the case was a precursor to his jurisprudence in that it was not based solely on traditional legal analysis or precedent but incorporated social science data and psychological research as well.

The Supreme Court had drifted under the leadership of Vinson and was facing many unprecedented civil rights and civil liberties issues. Eisenhower assumed that he appointed a moderate conservative who reflected his brand of Republicanism when he chose Warren, but he was ultimately disappointed. In one of his final press conferences as president, Eisenhower reportedly claimed that the appointments of Warren and Justice William J. Brennan Jr. to the Court were the two biggest mistakes of his presidency. After a moderate voting record in his first term, Warren turned dramatically to the liberal side over the remainder of his career on the Court. Warren's apparent change from a moderate to a progressive Republican is often cited as the classic example of why presidents should be reluctant to appoint elected officials to the Supreme Court.

Warren presided over a constitutional revolution that dramatically expanded civil rights and civil liberties. Under his leadership, the Court incorporated many provisions of the Bill of Rights and applied them to the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Warren Court also continued the expansion of civil rights, extended the reach of the First Amendment, and created the right to privacy. Among the most important and controversial decisions of the Warren Court were Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), banning organized state written prayer in the classroom; Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), narrowing the definition of what was obscene; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), doing likewise for what was libelous; Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), extending the exclusionary rule to the states; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), requiring police to give Miranda warnings; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), extending the right to counsel for indigents in all felony cases; Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), mandating one person, one vote in apportioning legislative districts; and Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), striking down a Connecticut birth control law on the basis of a judicially crafted right of privacy.

Warren guided the Court during a period of great judicial activism. The Court finally fulfilled the potential of footnote four of United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), and the preferred-position doctrine that promised the protection of individuals and insular minorities. He helped redefine the role of the Supreme Court as the protector of individual rights and liberties.

Despite the major landmark decisions such as Brown, Mapp, and Miranda, Warren claimed that the reapportionment decisions, such as Reynolds v. Sims, were the most important of his stewardship. Warren felt that equal representation in Congress and the state legislature would help the poor acquire political muscle that would be translated into favorable public policies.

Warren was undoubtedly the most liberal chief justice in Supreme Court history. Historians generally regard him as second only to John Marshall among the great chief justices. Warren's excellence was more a function of his leadership than his constitutional philosophy. Warren came to symbolize a result-oriented jurisprudence that stretched constitutional provisions and legislation, such as the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act, to reach the intended results.

During his tenure as chief justice, he headed the Warren Commission to investigate the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. At first, Warren declined Attorney General Robert Kennedy's request that he lead the commission because he feared it would interfere with the Court's business and affect its legitimacy. But President Lyndon Johnson persuaded him to do so for the good of the nation. The commission concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald had acted alone and there was no conspiracy, though the report was widely criticized for being superficial.

Warren became the symbol of his controversial Court. The Warren Court's civil rights decisions rankled the South, but the decisions that protected the rights of the accused and freed alleged Communists angered the entire nation. "Impeach Earl Warren" kits and bumper stickers were circulated, and billboards sprang up across the nation. Presidential candidates like Richard Nixon made the Warren Court a campaign issue. Congress threatened the Court with attempts to overturn its decisions and limit its jurisdiction and even considered impeachment of individual justices.

Warren decided to retire from the Court late in 1968 to allow the Democratic president to choose his successor. He told Johnson he would resign at the president's pleasure. Warren heartily endorsed Johnson's decision to promote Abe Fortas from associate to chief justice. Johnson then selected his friend Homer Thornberry to fill Fortas's seat on the Court. But with the calendar close to the 1968 election, Johnson's unpopularity at an all-time high, and charges of cronyism, Republicans in Congress were encouraged to fight and delay the nomination. An angry Warren rescinded his resignation, deciding to retire instead at the end of the 1968 Court term. This timing provided Nixon with his first appointment, Warren E. Burger. Earl Warren died July 9, 1974, in Washington, D.C.

Richard L. Pacelle Jr.

See also: Burger, Warren Earl; Engel v. Vitale; Gideon v. Wainwright; Griswold v. Connecticut; Mapp v. Ohio; Miranda v. Arizona; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; Roth Test; Vinson, Frederick Moore.

FURTHER READING

Cray, Ed. Chief Justice: A Biography of Earl Warren. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.

Schwartz, Bernard. Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court. New York: New York University Press, 1983.

White, G. Edward. Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Washington v. Glucksberg (1997)

In Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997), the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously rejected a constitutional challenge to a Washington state law that made it a felony for physicians to assist in the suicide of mentally competent, terminally ill patients. This unanimity, however, was belied by the number of concurring opinions that left open the possibility of finding some constitutionally protected right of the terminally ill to die in a time and manner of their choosing. The right to physician-assisted suicide for terminally ill patients has been but one part of the larger ongoing right-to-die debate. When the Court found a liberty interest to refuse life-sustaining treatment in Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990), it left unanswered the question of a right to active assistance in terminating one's life.

Glucksberg involved a Washington state criminal code that made it a felony for anyone knowingly to aid someone in committing suicide. Most states had such a law, traditionally deemed an element of the state's police power. Four doctors filed suit on their own behalf and on the behalf of three terminally ill, mentally competent patients who wanted the doctors' aid in prescribing drugs meant to bring about their death. Dr. Harold Glucksberg argued that there was a liberty interest found in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment for competent terminally ill patients to have physician assistance to end their life, and that interest was violated by the application of the Washington law. The Court historically had argued that for a substantive due process claim to be validated, the liberty interest must be carefully described and be found in the history and traditions of the nation.

In the majority opinion, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist argued that the "right to commit suicide which itself included a right to assistance in doing so" was not such a fundamental right. He stressed that most states had laws, dating back to their founding and beyond, forbidding assisted suicide. Rehnquist also enumerated a number of state interests in banning fully assisted suicide, including to prevent coercion by family or doctors worried about expense and to protect depressed patients. Ultimately, Rehnquist concluded, the states should be allowed to decide this matter through the democratic process.

A number of the concurrences, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's most forcefully, argued that there might be a liberty interest in obtaining relief from physical suffering even at the expense of hastening death. Justice Stephen G. Breyer also challenged what he took to be the Court's overly narrow definition of the liberty interest, arguing instead that it properly concerned the "right to die with dignity."

Justice David H. Souter argued that state legislatures had greater institutional competencies than courts for determining the tricky balance between one's right to autonomy over one's body and the state's interest in preventing potential cases of involuntary euthanasia. Nevertheless, he suggested a method of determining a substantive liberty interest much more amenable to protecting a right to physician assistance to determine the time and manner of one's death. Both he and Justice John Paul Stevens offered a more narrowly defined scope of the state's legitimate interests in interfering in the patient-physician relationship than what Rehnquist proffered.

Rehnquist in his opinion rejected the analogy between the right to terminate treatment when the known result would be death and the right to a physician's active assistance to such an end. Nevertheless, given the number of justices who held open the door to finding a possible liberty interest in physician-assisted suicide, it is almost certain that Glucksberg will not be the Court's final word on this matter.

Douglas C. Dow

See also: Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health; Physician-Assisted Suicide; Right to Die.

FURTHER READING

Rawls, John, et al. "Assisted Suicide: The Philosopher's Brief." New York Review of Books, March 27, 1997.

Wolf, Susan M., et al. "Symposium: Physician-Assisted Suicide: Facing Death After Glucksberg and Quill." Minnesota Law Review 82 (April 1998): 885–1101.

Watkins v. United States (1957)

Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957), presented the Supreme Court with the related questions of the breadth of congressional power to investigate and whether individuals subpoenaed by Congress to discuss their political beliefs and associations were protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Watkins significantly restricted congressional power to investigate, but the holding was effectively reversed only two years later.

John Watkins, an organizer for the United Automobile Workers (UAW), was called in 1954 to testify before the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC). Watkins did not invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and agreed to answer questions about himself and about individuals he believed to be past, as well as continuing, members of the Communist Party. However, Watkins refused to answer any questions concerning individuals he believed had left the party. He testified that he had never been a party member, although he had previously associated with many party members as part of his union work. He also argued that his identification of others no longer associated with the party would not serve any legislative purpose and that any questions regarding former Communists were not pertinent to the purposes of the investigation.

Chief Justice Earl Warren's opinion in Watkins had two major components. The first was founded in the requirement that Congress could compel only testimony pertinent to its legislative purposes. Those purposes were defined by the resolutions establishing a committee's power to investigate. Warren found that the resolution establishing HUAC was far too vague in defining the committee's jurisdiction, asking "Who can define the meaning of 'un-American?' " The second component, which was far weaker, was Warren's requirement that the jurisdiction of the committee needed to be particularly well-defined when the subject of inquiry involved the rights of free speech and association.

In dissent, Justice Tom C. Clark argued that the authorizations for committee hearings were often broad of necessity and that many of the other standing committees in Congress had equally broad jurisdictions. Clark was most outraged that Watkins had deigned to answer some questions but not others in order to clear himself of the charges against him yet to maintain his credibility in the labor movement by refusing to act the stool pigeon. Clark wrote that "remote and indirect disadvantages such as 'public stigma, scorn and obloquy' may be related to the First Amendment, but they are not enough to block investigation."

The Watkins opinion was handed down June 17, 1957—"Red Monday"—with three other controversial Supreme Court decisions, Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957), Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957), and Service v. Dulles, 354 U.S. 363 (1957), all of which affirmed the rights of suspected subversives against the government and encountered significant criticism. Warren's challenge to the broad grant of investigative authority to HUAC became a particular target in Congress, where numerous resolutions were offered to strip the courts of the power to review congressional contempt citations. Only two years later, in Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959), the Court reversed course, finding that Congress properly had broad authority to investigate subversion and requiring that Barenblatt's First Amendment rights be balanced against congressional interest in preserving national security.

Daniel A. Levin

See also: Barenblatt v. United States; Congressional Investigations; House Un-American Activities Committee.

FURTHER READING

Hamilton, James. The Power to Probe: A Study of Congressional Investigations. New York: Random House, 1976.

Web

See Internet and the World Wide Web

Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989)

Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), was among a long line of challenges undermining the trimester analysis of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), in which the U.S. Supreme Court balanced women's privacy rights and the state's interest in protecting potential life. Webster generated enormous public attention: Abortion foes and advocates rallied in Washington, D.C., in January and April 1989, sent thousands of letters to the Court, flooded its switchboard, launched significant advertising campaigns, and wrote a record number of amicus (friend of the Court) briefs (seventy-eight). Why such fury? President Ronald Reagan's 1987 appointment of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy (who replaced Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., member of the Roe majority) buoyed the spirits of abortion foes that he would provide the crucial fifth vote to overturn Roe and return abortion policy-making to state legislatures.

Reproductive Health Services, an abortion provider in Saint Louis, and other plaintiffs challenged several provisions of a 1986 Missouri abortion law. Missouri's attorney general, William Webster, defended the law, the preamble of which declared "life begins at conception." The law also required doctors to determine the viability of fetuses more than twenty weeks old by performing tests to determine fetal age, weight, and lung maturity. It restricted public employees and facilities from performing abortions not necessary to save a mother's life. Finally, the law prohibited public funds, employees, and facilities from encouraging or counseling women to secure abortions, unless necessary to save their lives.

In a five–four decision, the Court upheld the viability testing requirements and the ban on public employees and facilities performing abortions. Because the preamble did not directly restrict abortion access or regulate medical practice, the Court did not rule on the constitutionality of that portion. The Court unanimously declared the counseling provisions moot because Missouri agreed not to prosecute doctors who violated it.

The justices issued five separate opinions in the case. Writing for a plurality, Chief Justice William H.

Rehnquist (joined by Justices Byron R. White and Anthony M. Kennedy) abandoned Roe's trimester analysis, which previously had been used to strike most provisions such as those at issue in Webster. Rather, Rehnquist said the state had a compelling interest to protect life throughout pregnancy. Employing this revised jurisprudence, the plurality allowed for substantial regulation of abortion, but did not believe the issues presented in Webster required the Court to overrule Roe. In a concurring opinion that provided more constitutional protection for women seeking abortions than did the plurality, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor upheld Missouri's provisions because they did not present an "undue burden" to women seeking abortions. Justice Antonin Scalia wrote a blistering concurrence calling for Roe to be overturned.

Justice Harry A. Blackmun wrote an impassioned dissent, joined by Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Thurgood Marshall, arguing that the Court's decision repudiated Roe, diluted women's rights, and issued an invitation to state legislatures to restrict abortion. In a separate dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens argued the preamble infringed on reproductive choices, including birth control, and constituted an establishment of religion.

Webster served as the prelude to the current controlling precedent in abortion law, Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992).

Glen Halva-Neubauer

See also: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Gorney, Cynthia. Articles of Faith: A Frontline History of the Abortion Wars. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.

Hull, N.E.H., and Peter Charles Hoffer. Roe v. Wade: The Abortion Rights Controversy in American History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Weeks v. United States (1914)

In Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), the U.S. Supreme Court issued two important holdings. First, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures prohibited the use at trial of evidence seized by federal officials in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution. Thus, Weeks represented one of the first applications of the exclusionary rule—a judicially created doctrine prohibiting the use of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment against an individual at trial. Second, the Court held that the limitations on government action provided by the Fourth Amendment did not apply to state and local officials. Thus, evidence seized by state and local officials in violation of the Fourth Amendment was not subject to the exclusionary rule and could be used at trial.

Fremont Weeks was convicted on federal criminal charges involving the improper use of the U.S. mail to deliver lottery tickets. His conviction was based on evidence seized from his home by local police officers and, later, the U.S. marshal. Neither the marshal nor the local police officers possessed a search warrant at the time they seized the evidence in question. At trial, Weeks objected that the evidence had been obtained in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights, but the trial court overruled his objection.

In reversing Weeks's conviction, the Supreme Court distinguished between the evidence obtained by the two different law enforcement agencies. The Court held that the evidence obtained by the U.S. marshal had been obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment and therefore could not be used as evidence against Weeks at trial. However, because the Court had not yet begun the process of selectively incorporating the guarantees provided by the Bill of Rights into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (and thus making them applicable to the states), the Court refused to apply the Fourth Amendment to the actions of the local police officers. Thus, the evidence the local police obtained could be used as evidence against Weeks at trial, even if it had been procured in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The Court overturned Weeks's initial conviction and returned the case to the lower court for a new trial based only on the evidence obtained by the local police officers.

The effect of the Court's holdings in Weeks was to create a loophole by which federal officials could use evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment—if it had been obtained by state or local officials and not federal officials. Thus, after Weeks, federal prosecutors often obtained convictions based on evidence illegally obtained by state or local officials. Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), provides an excellent example of this practice. Not until Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1964), did the Court apply the exclusionary rule to evidence obtained through the illegal actions of state and local officials.

Scott A. Hendrickson

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Incorporation Doctrine; Mapp v. Ohio; Wolf v. Colorado.

FURTHER READING

Greenhalgh, William W., and Gina Marie Stevens. The Fourth Amendment Handbook: A Chronological Survey of Supreme Court Decisions. 2d ed. Chicago: Criminal Justice Section, American Bar Association, 2002.

Ramen, Fred. The Right to Freedom from Searches: Individual Rights and Civil Responsibility. New York: Rosen, 2001.

Welsh v. United States (1970)

Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970), was a landmark ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court that upheld the right of an individual to receive conscientious-objector status to military service under federal law, even though his objection to service in the armed forces did not stem from orthodox or traditional religious sources. The Court managed to avoid dealing with the two religion clauses of the First Amendment to the Constitution while finding a right to claim status as a conscientious objector on grounds beyond the parameters of traditional religion.

Elliott Ashton Welsh II applied for exemption from military service by seeking conscientious-objector status under section 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act, which exempted from combat and noncombat service a person who, "by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form." The law defined religious training and belief as "an individual's belief in relation to a Supreme Being" and not merely the person's own ethical or moral code of conduct. On his exemption application, Welsh struck out "my religious training" and neither affirmed nor denied belief in a Supreme Being. His exemption application was denied, and later he was convicted for failure to report for induction into the armed services. A federal court of appeals upheld his conviction, finding that although his beliefs were legitimate and serious, they were insufficiently religious to meet the standard set by section 6(j).

The U.S. Supreme Court, speaking through the plurality opinion of Justice Hugo L. Black, decided that 6(j) was not limited to individuals whose opposition to war was based on traditional or orthodox religious beliefs. According to Black, a person's opposition to war and military service was religious within the meaning of the law if the opposition derived from the person's moral, ethical, or philosophical beliefs about right and wrong, and if those beliefs were held with the same devoutness or intensity as traditional religious convictions. The key question for Black, which he answered affirmatively, was whether Welsh's beliefs occupied the same or equivalent role of religion and functioned as a religion in his life; if so, Black argued, Welsh was covered by the law and deserved the exemption for which he applied.

Justice Black, over the objections of Justice John Marshall Harlan in his concurring opinion, chose to avoid ruling on the constitutionality of 6(j) under the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment; Black both saved the statute and legitimated the exemption by choosing to construe the meaning of the statute as he did. Justice Harlan argued the law violated the Establishment Clause (which prohibits government from engaging in action that would constitute "establishment of religion"), and Welsh therefore deserved his exemption under the principle of state neutrality between religious and nonreligious beliefs. Justice Byron R. White dissented and was joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice Potter Stewart. White accused the Court of making draft exemption policy and concluded that Welsh, under the plain meaning of the statute, had no First Amendment right to avoid military service.

In Welsh, the Court adopted a functional definition of religion, similar to previous rulings concerning the two religion clauses. Even as it tried to avoid this theological thicket, the Court planted itself there by elevating conscience to the status of religion. To this day, the Court still struggles mightily with—one might say is bedeviled by—the meaning of the religion clauses of the First Amendment.

Stephen K. Shaw

See also: Conscientious Objectors; Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Vietnam War.

FURTHER READING

Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Noonan, John T., Jr. The Lustre of Our Country: The American Experience of Religious Freedom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)

In West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a state cannot enforce on public school pupils the civic ritual of saluting the American flag. This decision overturned the ruling in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), that the Court had issued a mere three years earlier. Barnette stands as one of the Court's most famous First Amendment cases, one continuing to be significant given the ongoing relevance to many Americans of the flag of the United States and decorum surrounding it. The Supreme Court struck down the West Virginia State Board of Education's regulation requiring pupils to recite the Pledge of Allegiance and salute the flag. The Court found the rules were unduly burdensome on

In West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), the Supreme Court ruled that a state could not enforce on school pupils the civic ritual of saluting the American flag. One of the most famous First Amendment cases, Barnette continues to be significant given the ongoing relevance to many Americans of the flag and decorum surrounding it. (Library of Congress) the freedom of religious expression of persons such as Jehovah's Witnesses (who considered the flag salute to be a form of idolatry) and thus in violation of the Free Exercise Clause and the free speech provision of the First Amendment to the Constitution. Children who refused the compulsory flag salute would have been expelled for unlawful behavior, and they and their parents or guardians prosecuted for causing delinquency.

West Virginia believed that the flag was the nation's unique common symbol, and that participating in patriotic acts such as the flag salute during the regular activities of the school day was an appropriate means to the end of inculcating loyalty to country in the nation's youth. The state was seeking by this regulation to promote the "ideals, principles, and spirit of Americanism," against which a dissenting pupil was to be considered guilty of insubordination and subject to expulsion. The flag salute, then, compelled West Virginia pupils to declare a belief, precisely the act proscribed by some religious faiths. For all the justices, Barnette presented the fundamental issue of the use of state power against the individual, with historical precedent of "such attempts to compel adherence" revealing an "ultimate futility" and possibly constituting a pivotal step on the route toward "exterminating dissenters."

Justice Robert H. Jackson, writing for the eight–one Court, opined that not to rely on voluntary and spontaneous endorsements made "an unflattering estimate of the appeal of our institutions to free minds." He also argued that the state could not enforce an orthodoxy on its citizens, even when government and citizens differed fundamentally as regarding "things that touch the heart of the existing order." Justice Frank Murphy's concurring opinion stressed the importance of seeing "spiritual freedom to its farthest reaches" for all Americans.

In the lone dissent, Justice Felix Frankfurter admonished his fellow justices for their apparent "writing into the Constitution the subordination of the general civil authority of the state to sectarian scruples"—for having prioritized religious scruples above a civic measure of general applicability, such as the measure in question, albeit unartfully designed, to train children in good citizenship. Justice Frankfurter thought that West Virginia had left individuals free to believe or disbelieve what they wanted. The Barnette opinion foundered by subjecting lawmaking authority to the bar of "an almost numberless variety of doctrines and beliefs," because the "validity of secular laws cannot be measured by their conformity to religious doctrines." Justice Frankfurter also was sensitive to the Court's tilt toward acting as a superlegislature, substituting its wisdom for that of lawmakers of the legislative branch.

Gordon A. Babst

See also: First Amendment; Flag Salute; Free Exercise Clause.

FURTHER READING

Gedicks, Frederick Mark. The Rhetoric of Church and State: A Critical Analysis of Religion Clause Jurisprudence. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1995.

Swomley, John M. Religious Liberty and the Secular State: The Constitutional Context. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1987.

White, Byron R. (1917–2002)

Byron R. White, associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court (1962–1993), was born in Fort Collins, Colorado, in 1917. Growing up in rural Wellington, Colorado, the six-year-old began work in the sugar beet fields for $1.50 a day. White was an All-American halfback at the University of Colorado and later played football professionally; he was also a Rhodes scholar. His football (and basketball) career was significant because it brought him notoriety his entire life, which White seemed to loathe. White's jealously guarded privacy and terse media style were hallmarks of his relations with members of the national press.

White's tenure as a naval intelligence officer during World War II was remarkable chiefly because he wrote the report on the loss of the PT-109 torpedo boat and subsequent heroism of Lt. John F. Kennedy. After the war, White returned to Yale University Law School, where he graduated magna cum laude in 1946. The excellence of White's football career combined with his obvious legal talents landed him a clerkship with U.S. Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson. As a clerk, White showed a parallel tendency strictly to apply rules of due process while displaying sympathy for racial justice. After a single term, White left Vinson and returned to Denver to practice law.

Although White was active in the local Democratic Party upon his return to Denver, and he served on many campaign committees, he rebuffed attempts to draft him to run for office. His social, family, and athletic contacts in Colorado, coupled with a personal history, made White an easy choice for running Kennedy's presidential campaign in Colorado. Although the state went for Republican Richard M. Nixon, White gained the admiration of Kennedy and an appointment as a deputy attorney general.

White's years at the Department of Justice were notable chiefly because of the role he played in diffusing an explosive civil rights situation. Following the 1961 Mother's Day riot in Alabama, in which a Freedom Ride bus (a bus commissioned by civil rights advocates who traveled through the South to challenge policies of racial segregation) was burned and a number of Freedom Riders were beaten, White developed a plan of action to ensure their further safety. White flew to Montgomery in command of an ad hoc force deputized as federal marshals and stood up to Alabama Governor John Patterson, while emphasizing publicly that the Justice Department's role was to ensure the safety of interstate bus routes rather than to enforce civil rights. With the situation diffused, White returned to Washington, his status greatly raised with the Kennedy brothers and clearly destined for a higher appointment. When Justice Charles E. Whittaker retired, there was an impulse to appoint the first African American to the Court. Politically, however, the appointment of an African American in 1962 was impossible; White's name was formally delivered to the Senate on April 4 and he was confirmed a week later.

White's civil liberties record as a justice was decidedly conservative. His logic in concurring in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), in which he suggested that capital punishment was not used frequently enough to act as a deterrent and therefore did not serve the social purposes for which it was imposed, underscored that even when White sided with liberals on civil liberties, it often was on terms that made them uncomfortable.

On issues of due process, he consistently sided with conservatives, as in his dissent in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), in which he stated: "The proposition that the privilege against self-incrimination forbids in-custody interrogation without the warnings specified in the majority opinion and without a clear waiver of counsel has no significant support in the history of privilege or in the language of the Fifth Amendment."

On privacy issues, White rigorously defended a strict interpretation of the Constitution, almost universally voting to uphold states' rights to pass legislation affecting private moral issues, as he showed in his dissent to abortion rights in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). No opinion White ever delivered was as controversial as Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), in which the Court upheld Georgia's sodomy laws. He stated, "[R]espondent . . . insists that majority sentiments about the morality of homosexuality should be declared inadequate. We do not agree, and are unpersuaded that the sodomy laws of some 25 states should be invalidated on this basis." The Supreme Court subsequently overturned this decision in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

Given Justice White's personal background of individual achievement, it is not surprising he took an individualist, conformist view of civil liberties. White's legacy in relation to civil liberties, based on his strict view of due process and inability to acknowledge the legal concept of privacy within the constitutional system, must be judged as consistently conservative.

Justice White retired in 1993 and died at his home in Denver in 2002.

Tim Hundsdorfer

See also: Bowers v. Hardwick; Furman v. Georgia; Miranda v. Arizona; Roe v. Wade.

FURTHER READING

Hutchinson, Dennis D. The Man Who Once Was Whizzer White. New York: Free Press, 1998.

Lazarus, Edward. "Justice Byron White and His Career on the Court," 2002. Findlaw.com. http://writ.news.findlaw.com/lazarus/20020418.html.

Whitney v. California (1927)

Anita Whitney, a social worker, was convicted by California of organizing, assisting in organizing, and being a member of the Communist Labor Party. The party advocated the use of unlawful force, although Whitney herself was opposed to the use of violence. At issue in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), was the constitutionality of California's criminal syndicalism law in light of the free speech protection applicable to Whitney under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, as applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

When Whitney's appeal reached the U.S. Supreme Court in 1927, Justice Edward Sanford held that the kind of "united and joint action" implicit in the existence of the Communist Labor Party was much more dangerous than individual speech and could legitimately be punished for the "danger to the public peace and security" it presented to the state. Advocacy of violence, Justice Sanford declared, was the equivalent of a criminal conspiracy that the state had a right to forbid.

Justice Louis D. Brandeis wrote separately, indicating his disagreement with the Court's reasoning and fashioning what may be the most eloquent statement of the approach to free speech in the United States. The Constitution's framers, he declared, "believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth." Citizens of a democracy had an obligation to participate in "public discussion" of political issues, in order to find the "political truth" that would be the basis for good public policy. There could be no meaningful discussion of such issues, however, without free speech.

The writers of the Constitution, Brandeis said, knew that speech could be dangerous, but they believed "in the power of reason as applied through public discussion." They knew it was "hazardous to discourage thought" through "fear of punishment." "Fear breeds repression," he wrote; "repression breeds hate," and "hate menaces stable government." The safe thing for a democracy to do was to ensure citizens the "opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies." "The fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones," he continued, for open discussion would ensure that wiser and cooler heads would ultimately prevail.

That was the reason the framers of the First Amendment prohibited Congress (and, by extension, the states) from abridging speech. Advocacy of something that might or might not happen was not sufficient reason to stifle speech, which could be suppressed only if it presented a clear and present danger: "reasonable ground to fear that serious evil will result if free speech is practiced" and that "the danger apprehended is imminent" and will be "immediately acted on."

The importance of the Brandeis approach, which the Court would adopt four decades later in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), was its articulation of the reasons for free speech and its alteration of the clear-and-present-danger doctrine that had been enunciated by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919). Holmes's formulation had seemed to permit punishment of advocacy. Brandeis in Whitney changed that to differentiate advocacy from incitement to imminent action, so that the only permissible limit was on speech that presented an immediate threat of extremely serious danger. The great breadth of the speech right articulated by Brandeis continues to differentiate U.S. speech law from that of any other country in the world.

Philippa Strum

See also: Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Brandenburg v. Ohio; First Amendment; Schenck v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Blasi, Vincent. "The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civil Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California." William and Mary Law Review 29 (1988): 653–97.

Strum, Philippa. Brandeis: Beyond Progressivism. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993.

Widmar v. Vincent (1981)

In Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the right of student religious organizations to meet on public university campuses. The case raised issues pertaining both to free speech rights and to free exercise of religion as protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

From 1973 to 1977, Cornerstone, a religious organization, was one of more than a hundred student groups approved to meet on the campus of the University of Missouri at Kansas City. In 1977, however, the university denied Cornerstone this privilege because of a prohibition against use of university facilities "for purposes of religious worship or religious teaching." University officials argued that such meetings on campus violated the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which prohibits government from engaging in activity that would constitute "establishment of religion." Cornerstone claimed that the new policy denied its rights to free speech and free exercise of religion.

The university position prevailed at trial, but the appellate court ruled in favor of Cornerstone. In an eight–one decision, the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., affirmed that ruling on the basis that the university had created a "public forum" by allowing numerous groups to meet on campus. Having created this forum, the university could not then deny the use of campus facilities to a group simply because it wished to engage in religious speech. Such a denial was "content discrimination," which the Court had long held to be in violation of the First Amendment. The Court acknowledged that extending public-forum rights to religious groups would benefit these groups, but the policy also benefited secular groups. To include religious organizations in no way conferred state approval on any religion. The university could thus claim no particular justification for restricting student religious speech in order to be in compliance with the Establishment Clause. It could, of course, make reasonable regulations about when and where student groups could meet, and school officials could determine the best use of academic resources.

In a concurring opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens agreed that the university's fear of violating the Establishment Clause was groundless. Still, he was unwilling to apply the public-forum standard because he feared it could impinge on a university's leeway in allocating limited resources. As an example, he suggested that if one group wanted to view cartoons and another wanted to rehearse Hamlet, the university should be able to make a content-based choice as to which group was more relevant to the university's mission.

The lone dissenter, Justice Byron R. White, distinguished between what he thought the state may do and what it must do under the Establishment Clause, and he saw this as a case of may. He further rejected the majority's idea that religious speech was just another category of speech competing in a public forum. He observed that in cases involving school prayer and posting of the Ten Commandments, religious speech was clearly placed in a distinct category. Finally, he maintained that the most satisfactory approach to resolving this issue was to ask to what extent the university's policy placed a serious burden on Cornerstone members' free exercise of religion, and he concluded that having to walk a little farther to meet because of the university policy was an incidental and therefore allowable inconvenience.

In a footnote to the majority opinion, Justice Powell described college students as "young adults" and "less impressionable than younger students." The implication, consistent with other Court rulings, was that the Court might strike down a policy similar to Missouri's if it were in a secondary school setting. Nonetheless, the Widmar decision encouraged Congress in 1984 to pass the Equal Access Act (U.S. Code, Vol. 20, secs. 4071–4074) prohibiting high schools from barring student religious groups from meeting on their campuses. The Court, in turn, upheld that law in Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990).

Jane G. Rainey

See also: Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause.

FURTHER READING

Ivers, Gregg. Lowering the Wall: Religion and the Supreme Court in the 1980s. New York: Anti-Defamation League, 1991.

Wiggins v. Smith (2003)

Although courts are generally reluctant to find that a defendant has had ineffective assistance of counsel, the Supreme Court did so in Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003), which involved the penalty phase of a capital crime. The issue before the Court was whether attorneys for the defendant conducted an adequate presentation at the sentencing hearing and thus satisfied the Sixth Amendment provision guaranteeing an accused the right to "have the assistance of counsel." A recurring factor in such cases involves whether counsel provided "effective" assistance, because the Sixth Amendment is silent about the type of assistance to be provided.

Kevin Wiggins had been convicted for drowning an elderly woman in her bathtub and robbing and ransacking her apartment. After a Maryland judge found Wiggins guilty of first-degree murder, his two public defenders attempted to bifurcate (split in two) a hearing before a jury to establish that Wiggins was not the principal offender, and, only if they lost on this point, to focus on mitigating circumstances. After the court rejected the bifurcated approach, one of his attorneys said in her opening statement that the defense planned to introduce mitigating circumstances. Although they established that Wiggins had no prior convictions, Wiggins's attorneys introduced no evidence of his life history, which included neglect, abuse, and sexual molestation. The jury sentenced Wiggins to death, and the Maryland Court of Appeals affirmed.

Wiggins subsequently sought postconviction relief in a Baltimore County Circuit Court, arguing that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel. This court and a state appellate court rejected Wiggins's plea, and he subsequently filed for a writ of habeas corpus in a U.S. district court. This court granted relief but was overturned by the U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. The case then reached the U.S. Supreme Court.

In assessing Wiggins's Sixth Amendment claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, the majority justices cited Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984). Under a test established by this precedent, a defendant must establish that the performance of counsel "fell below an objective standard of reasonableness" and thereby prejudiced his defense. Although his attorneys had hired a psychologist, they relied only on cursory reports of Wiggins's background and failed to order preparation of a social history report, despite the availability of state funds for such a purpose. Without knowledge of the facts of Wiggins's childhood, his attorneys were not in a reasonable position to make the strategic choices to focus on his degree of participation in the crime for which he had been convicted, rather than on mitigating factors related to the abuse he had suffered. The majority further found it likely that the jury's decision might well have been different had its members had access to such information.

In dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Justice Clarence Thomas, pointed to evidence from the lower courts' records showing that Wiggins's attorneys were aware of his background. Scalia denied that they were under an obligation to hire a social worker to compile a social history report and noted that much of the "evidence" the majority cited about Wiggins's childhood abuse consisted of unsubstantiated assertions by the defendant that would have been excluded from the sentencing hearing.

John R. Vile

See also: Ineffective Assistance of Counsel; Strickland v. Washington.

FURTHER READING

Egland, Terrence T. "United States Supreme Court: Wiggins v. Smith, 123 S. Ct. 2527." Capital Defense Journal 16 (Fall 2003): 101–12.

Payne, Daniel L. "Building a Case for Life: A Mitigation Specialist as a Necessity and as a Matter of Right." Capital Defense Journal 16 (Fall 2003): 43–72.

Williams, Edward Bennett (1920–1988)

Edward Bennett Williams (1920–1988) was one of the best-known criminal defense attorneys during the second half of the twentieth century. He was the lawyer the rich and famous, especially those in Washington D.C., called when they were in trouble. Interestingly, he was one of the top names on President Richard Nixon's enemies list, but he was also the person Nixon wished could have represented him during the Watergate scandal (the bungled 1972 burglary of Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate apartment complex by individuals connected with Nixon's reelection campaign and the subsequent cover-up efforts by the White House). Williams, however, was more than the nation's leading criminal defense attorney; he was also an author and teacher who stressed the importance of protecting the civil rights and civil liberties of every citizen.

Edward Bennett Williams was born in Hartford, Connecticut, May 31, 1920. He grew up in a very devout Catholic household that stressed the importance of education. In fact, he would be greatly influenced by the teachings of the Jesuits both during his undergraduate studies at the College of the Holy Cross and later while in law school at Georgetown College in Washington, D.C. As a lawyer, he would represent both of these Jesuit institutions pro bono ("for the good," or without charge) on many occasions. After law school, Williams worked at a large Washington law firm, but he found the practice there to be dull. He was more interested in the high-paced world of criminal law, so he decided to establish his own practice.

Williams made a reputation for himself as a well-respected litigator, and his list of clients steadily grew. One of his guiding principles as a criminal defense attorney was that everybody needed a competent legal defense, and it was not his role to condone or absolve his clients of their misfeasance. Williams was fond of saying, "I defend my clients against legal guilt. Moral judgments I leave to the majestic vengeance of God." This attitude served him well when he defended his first well-known client, Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin. McCarthy was in the process of being censured by the Senate for his conduct during his anti-Communist hearings, and the Republican senator desperately needed legal help.

Up to that time, individuals appearing in front of a congressional committee did not always have legal representation. Williams changed that. He became the veritable counselor at the witness table during congressional investigations, and he went a long way toward curbing the abuses that tyrannical and publicity-seeking committee chairs such as McCarthy had inflicted on witnesses. Williams did this by demanding that his clients give him total control of their case. He felt that by having complete control, he could make the strongest argument in his client's best interest. During his defense of McCarthy, in fact, the former dictatorial committee chair was very meek. Although Williams did not save McCarthy from being censured, he was able to lessen what could have been an extremely acrimonious hearing.

Williams's actions did not go unnoticed. A few years later when leaders of the Mafia were hailed in front of a congressional committee, the chief don and model for the top boss in The Godfather, Frank Costello, hired Williams to be the man sitting next to him at the witness table. Again, Williams was able to defuse the highly contentious atmosphere of the hearings by his mere presence; significantly, he also kept Costello from being deported. His greatest success, however, came in his defense of Jimmy Hoffa in front of a congressional committee that charged him with bribery. Williams tangled daily with the committee's legal counsel, a young Robert Kennedy. In fact, Kennedy boasted that if Jimmy Hoffa got off on the bribery charges, he would jump off the Capitol. Williams gained an acquittal for Hoffa and sent a parachute to Kennedy.

Though having an attorney sit next to a witness at a congressional committee may not seem like an advance in civil liberties, it was more important than would be expected. Especially during the 1940s and 1950s, individuals were subjected to great abuses of their rights in front of congressional committees, and the actions of lawyers like Williams served to advance the right to counsel in that most important venue. Also at that time, Williams was making significant contributions to civil rights and civil liberties through his scholarship and his teaching at Georgetown Law School.

In the early 1960s, the United States was undergoing a major transition in civil rights and civil liberties brought on by the U.S. Supreme Court under Chief Justice Earl Warren. Williams was at the forefront of this change. His book, One Man's Freedom, was fifth on the best-sellers list. It touted the importance of having young committed lawyers who were concerned about gaining justice for their clients no matter what the public at large felt. Reviewers described Williams as the next Clarence Darrow, and many individuals looked to him for inspiration. Even Raymond Burr, television's Perry Mason, sought an audience with him. But his book had an even greater influence by showing how a commitment to civil rights and civil liberties was critical to the proper functioning of the legal system.

Williams did not cease his dedication to civil rights and civil liberties after his book was published but rather took an active role in a number of noteworthy cases. In 1963 he was the lead counsel for a hospital that challenged the right of a Jehovah's Witness to withhold life-saving medical treatment from his wife. Judge Skelly Wright overrode the husband's choice to withhold treatment and had the hospital save the woman's life. The full appellate court later reversed the judgment of Judge Wright; however, Williams believed that advocating to save the life of the woman was essential, even though it impinged on the husband's religious liberties.

Another noteworthy case came through Williams's representation of the Washington Post. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, there was much contention over the war in Vietnam, and the Washington Post and the New York Times came into possession of what later became known as the Pentagon Papers, which exposed in great detail the U.S. government's dealings in Vietnam. The federal government did not want the documents released, but Williams advised Washington Post editors that they had every right to publish the information under the freedom of press rights protected by the First Amendment of the Constitution. Williams was correct in his assessment, as the U.S. Supreme Court later ruled.

By the mid-1970s, Williams had become an elder statesman of the legal community. Many of his protégés were employing what they had learned from Williams to guarantee the rights of their clients. But Williams still was a much sought-after defense attorney. During this period, he successfully defended former Texas governor and U.S. treasury secretary John Connally on charges of bribery. His cross-examination of the lead prosecution witness in that case is still used as an example of how to cross-examine a witness effectively. When Williams died August 13, 1988, the nation remembered not only his reputation as a stellar trial advocate but also his commitment to ensuring the civil rights and civil liberties of all Americans.

David T. Harold

See also: McCarthy, Joseph; McCarthyism.

FURTHER READING

Couric, Emily. The Trial Lawyers: The Nation's Top Litigators Tell How They Win. New York: St. Martin's, 1990.

Pack, Robert. Edward Bennett Williams for the Defense. New York: HarperCollins, 1983.

Wilson, Woodrow (1856–1924)

Woodrow Wilson served as the twenty-eighth president of the United States. Elected in 1912, he left office after two terms and died in 1924. Wilson became president after an extraordinarily successful career as a college professor, president of Princeton University, and governor of New Jersey. He was among the most intellectually prepared persons ever to be president. His Constitutional Government is considered a classic that showed his theoretical understanding of government. Wilson prided himself on being a man of high moral standards who acted on principle.

Raised as a Southern Democrat, Wilson was elected president largely because Republicans split their votes with conservatives supporting William Howard Taft and progressives supporting Theodore Roosevelt. Elected with only 44 percent of the vote, Wilson was a strong, progressive president who fought vigorously and won against long-entrenched business interests.

He pushed to lower tariffs that protected manufacturers but forced consumers to pay higher prices, reformed antitrust laws, created the Interstate Commerce Commission, and revamped the banking system, including creating the Federal Reserve System.

For all his successes, President Wilson gained a reputation for indifference to civil liberties. During the campaign of 1912, Wilson had actively courted African American voters, but events during his first term reflected the attitude of most southern whites toward racial matters. The House of Representatives passed a law making interracial marriages in the District of Columbia a felony. The Post Office, Treasury Department, Bureau of the Census, Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and the Department of the Navy began to segregate their bureaucracies. A new requirement that all applicants for federal jobs submit photographs resulted in the systematic exclusion of African Americans from federal jobs. When confronted, Wilson replied that "the purpose of these measures was to reduce friction. . . . It is as far as possible from being a movement against the Negroes. I sincerely believe it to be in their interest." Many historians consider Wilson's position on race to have been one of the greatest defects in his moral vision for the nation.

Like other presidents, Wilson never completely controlled his agenda. In economic issues he was focused, disciplined, and passionate. This was not the case with prohibition, a great social issue of the day. Although he was a Presbyterian teetotaler, he thought prohibition was a bad idea because it was divisive and unenforceable. Still, he acquiesced in legislation banning the sale of alcohol and allowing the Eighteenth Amendment to be ratified. His reluctance earned him the disdain of the prohibitionists; his acquiescence, the anger of the "wets." His attitude toward child labor laws was also equivocal. Progressives had worked for years to pass a federal law prohibiting child labor. Although Wilson expressed sympathy, he thought the Constitution left this issue in state hands and refused to provide leadership or moral support to suppress child labor.

President Wilson fared little better on the issue of women's suffrage. His campaign in the northern states led people to believe he supported women's right to vote. Once in the White House, he initially refused to provide leadership, arguing again that this was a state matter and that the Democratic Party's platform did not contain a suffrage plank. Faced with persistent demonstrations outside the White House, he eventually supported the Nineteenth Amendment.

No issue so undermined Wilson's progressive reputation as his willingness to sacrifice freedom of speech and the press once World War I began. Reelected in 1916 on the motto "He kept us out of war," Wilson soon realized neutrality was no longer possible. Congress declared war on April 6, 1917. Wilson viewed the war as a crusade to "make the world safe for democracy." Within a week he created the Committee on Public Information (CPI) and appointed journalist George Creel as chairman. Creel quickly arranged a "voluntary" self-censorship of the American press, lest it provide classified information or give opponents of the war sympathetic coverage. A CPI publicity campaign constantly reiterated that Americans fought only for freedom and democracy, and that Germans were barbarian "Huns." The CPI questioned the loyalty of German Americans and sought to undermine socialist and even prounion attitudes.

A second wartime initiative, the loosely worded Espionage Act of 1917, authorized the Post Office and Justice Department to punish "obstructionism," permitting prosecution of people who expressed antiwar sentiments or criticized such institutions as the Red Cross, the YMCA, or Wall Street. Not satisfied, the president pushed through the Sedition Act of 1918 to punish expressions of opinion that were "disloyal, profane, scurrilous or abusive" of American government, the flag, or the armed forces. As a result of the hysteria that CPI engendered, more than 1,500 people were arrested. Of these, only ten were for actual efforts to sabotage the war effort; 450 of the others were arrested for being conscientious objectors. To be sure, there were violent antiwar protesters, but they were few in number and concentrated in a few major cities. During the years that are now called the "red scare," 1919–1920, Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer used the Espionage and Sedition Acts to conduct raids and launch attacks against socialists and other left-wing groups that expressed opposition to U.S. involvement in the war. Socialist presidential candidate Eugene Debs and several others were sentenced to twenty years in prison for daring to speak out against the war effort.

Wilson so focused on winning the war that he was willing to sacrifice First Amendment freedoms during hostilities. In the latter years of his presidency, Wilson became obsessed with gaining congressional approval for the ill-fated League of Nations. He refused any compromise with his opponents, campaigned across the country to win popular support, and ended up with a stroke. By this time he had alienated so many potential supporters that his efforts failed. He left the presidency a broken man.

Paul J. Weber

See also: Debs, Eugene Victor; Espionage Act of 1917; Palmer Raids; Red Scare; Sedition Act of 1918; World War I.

FURTHER READING

Blum, John Morton. Woodrow Wilson and the Politics of Morality. New York: Little, Brown, 1956.

Link, Arthur S. Woodrow Wilson in the Progressive Era, 1910–1917. New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1954.

Stid, David. The President as Statesman: Woodrow Wilson and the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.

Wilson, Woodrow. Constitutional Government in the United States. Reprint. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.

Wiretapping

A wiretap is an electronic recording device used to gather information as it passes through a communications circuit. In most cases, wiretaps have been used to record telephone conversations in secret. More recently, wiretaps have been used to gather information sent by fax machines, e-mail, and cellular phones. Law enforcement officials use the information gathered through a wiretap for criminal prosecutions and for gathering foreign intelligence.

States and the federal government have passed laws directed at regulating the use of wiretaps by the government and by private citizens. As a matter of constitutional principles, the federal law lays down the minimum requirements, but most states have enacted laws granting further protection for their citizens. State law cannot grant protection for its citizens where protection does not exist under federal law. If a state law and federal law conflict, federal law will decide the legality of the wiretap.

FEDERAL LAW

Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 regulates the use of wiretaps to intercept oral or wire conversations. Originally, this law was passed to help federal officials fight organized crime. Today, wiretaps are used for various reasons by federal and state authorities as well as private citizens.

The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution protects individuals from unlawful searches and seizures. Neither police nor private citizens may conduct searches of a person's home or property without permission or probable cause. Wiretapping is one type of search that implicates a citizen's Fourth Amendment rights.

In general, no person may intentionally intercept any wire, oral, or electronic communication. Any person who unlawfully intercepts another's oral, wire, or electronic communication can face criminal and civil charges. A criminal offense may result in a fine and up to five years' imprisonment. Additionally, a court may grant monetary and injunctive relief to a victim of unlawful wiretapping.

Nevertheless, not every person whose phone lines have been tapped is entitled to money, nor is every person who reads another individual's e-mail subject to imprisonment. The statute lists several instances in which a person's communication may be lawfully intercepted. These exceptions protect private citizens as well as government employees who may need to listen in on conversations as part of their everyday job.

A judge, upon request, can authorize the use of a wiretap. A wiretap is allowed if the information gathered may provide evidence of a crime, such as sabotage of nuclear facilities, espionage, trade secrets, or piracy. Additionally, a judge can allow a wiretap if the information gathered may offer evidence of a murder, kidnapping, robbery, or extortion, among many other felonies.

For instance, United States v. Jackson, 345 F.3d 638 (8th Cir. 2003), involved the use of a wiretap on a suspected cocaine trafficker's cellular phone. In part because of the evidence gained through the wiretap, the defendant was given concurrent life sentences for his role in the drug ring. In another case, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agents tapped into the defendant's phone and fax lines to gather information about bank fraud. In United States v. McGuire, 307 F.3d 1192 (9th Cir. 2003), the defendant was sentenced to 180 months with help from the evidence gained by the FBI's wiretap search.

Editorial cartoon showing U.S. government official, "Wiretapping and Bugging," binding a man, "American Privacy," with reel-to-reel tape, preparing him for a sarcophagus; on the wall in the background, hieroglyphics suggest that "mum's the word." (Library of Congress)

If an officer does not have permission of a judge, no part of the information gained can be used in any trial. Additionally, evidence that arises from information learned during a wiretap is known as "fruit of the poisonous tree." Fruit of the poisonous tree may not be used in a trial either.

Further, unlawful wiretapping can lead to legal remedies for the person whose phone line was tapped. For example, David Taketa, a Drug Enforcement Administration agent, and Thomas O'Brien, an officer for the Nevada Bureau of Investigations, faced criminal charges because they conducted wiretaps without a judge's order. In United States v. Taketa, 923 F.2d 665 (9th Cir. 1991), the defendants' convictions were overturned because the trial court admitted a warrantless videotape of Taketa and O'Brien committing the illegal wiretaps.

The federal wiretapping statute exempts certain classes of individuals under its authority from civil or criminal liability. For instance, switchboard operators and employees of the Federal Communications Commission are exempt from prosecution while operating in their respective positions.

Other exceptions also fall under the type of communication being intercepted. For example, one exception is referred to as the "extension phone exception." This exception protects people who may hear conversations through a work telephone. In some cases, this exception has been broadened to include a wiretap that one spouse conducts on another. Additionally, few courts will find a violation of law when a parent listens in or even records a child's telephone conversation.

STATE STATUTORY AUTHORITY

States can regulate wiretaps only to the extent that the federal government gives them discretion. Of those states that have enacted legislation regarding wiretaps, few vary from the federal guidelines in any substantial way. In general, because state statutes are modeled after the federal laws, most states are uniform in the application of laws to wiretapping.

PATRIOT ACT

The Patriot Act, enacted by Congress after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks upon the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., increased the authority granted to law enforcement officials to conduct wiretaps. Traditionally, officers gathering information regarding foreign intelligence faced much lower standards than those required for a domestic wiretap. The Patriot Act now expands the authority of officers to conduct wiretaps that are not as directly involved with gathering foreign intelligence. Specifically, the law allows officials to monitor the Internet and to conduct "roving" wiretaps. As long as foreign intelligence is a significant purpose, federal agents face many fewer restrictions when they conduct a wiretap search.

Zachary Crain

See also: Electronic Eavesdropping; Exclusionary Rule; Fruits of the Poisonous Tree; Katz v. United States; Patriot Act.

FURTHER READING

Kennedy, Charles H., and Peter P. Swire. "State Wiretaps and Electronic Surveillance After September 11." Hastings Law Journal 54 (2003): 971–85.

Lee, Laurie Thomas. "The USA Patriot Act and Telecommunications: Privacy Under Attack." Rutgers Computer and Technology Law Journal 29 (2003): 371–401.

Rahavy, Shana K. "The Federal Wiretap Act: The Permissible Scope of Eavesdropping in the Family Home." Journal of High Technology Law 2 (2003): 87–92.

Zerman, Allan H., and Cary J. Mogerman. "Wiretapping and Divorce: A Survey and Analysis of the Federal and State Laws Relating to Electronic Eavesdropping and Their Application in Matrimonial Cases." Journal of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers 12 (1994): 227–69.

Wisconsin v. Mitchell (1993)

In Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a penalty-enhancement law that doubled the standard punishment for individuals who committed crimes based on their abstract beliefs was consistent with the free speech rights protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In this application, a belief biased against white people because of injustices done to blacks, when that belief was the motive for criminal behavior, was not entitled to First Amendment protection.

On October 7, 1989, Todd Mitchell and his friends, all African Americans, were gathered at an apartment complex in Kenosha, Wisconsin, discussing a scene from the movie Mississippi Burning, in which a Caucasian beat a young African American boy who was praying. As perceived retaliation for the beating in the motion picture, Mitchell and his friends ran toward a Caucasian boy, beat him ruthlessly, and stole his tennis shoes. The boy was left unconscious and remained in a coma for four days.

The maximum penalty for aggravated battery in Wisconsin was two years. Because Mitchell intentionally selected his victim based on race, however, his sentence was increased to four years, according to the state's penalty-enhancement statute. The Wisconsin Court of Appeals upheld the decision. Relying on R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), a U.S. Supreme Court precedent, the Wisconsin Supreme Court reversed, reasoning that Mitchell's free speech rights included offensive thoughts and the state could not increase punishment of an individual based on his beliefs. On appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, Wisconsin contended that it was punishing only conduct, not speech, and to consider the motives behind a crime was appropriate when determining the severity of the sentence.

Writing for a unanimous Court, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist held that the penalty-enhancement statute did not violate the First Amendment free speech right. In discerning what sentence to impose, the Court asserted that a judge traditionally would consider a variety of factors in addition to the evidence of guilt. The Court recognized that although a judge could not consider a defendant's abstract beliefs, the penalty-enhancement law targeted not speech but conduct, which was unprotected by the First Amendment. In Mitchell, the physical assault was not entitled to constitutional protection.

The Court, moreover, rejected Mitchell's claim that the Wisconsin law had a "chilling effect" on free speech, which would prevent Mitchell's free and unobstructed flow of ideas. The Court mused that the notion that his ideas would be used as evidence against Mitchell if he were to commit a serious offense was too speculative to confirm. The most essential factor for the Court was that Wisconsin used the penalty-enhancement law to prevent greater individual and societal harm. The Court noted that hate crimes were more likely to induce retaliatory measures by offended actors, which the state had a right to control under its police powers.

The Mitchell decision endorsed penalty-enhancement laws and paved the way for other states to codify similar laws to punish individuals more severely when they committed hate crimes. Mitchell was another indication by the Rehnquist Court that protecting the safety of society may outweigh any potential competing civil liberties claims.

John R. Hermann

See also: Hate Crimes; Hate Speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul.

FURTHER READING

Fish, Stanley. There's No Such Thing as Free Speech and It's a Good Thing, Too. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Walker, Samuel. Hate Speech: The History of an American Controversy. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

Wolfson, Nicholas. Hate Speech, Sex Speech, Free Speech. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1997.

Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972)

In Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972), the U.S. Supreme Court addressed whether application of Wisconsin's compulsory school-attendance law to members of the Amish religion violated their right to free exercise of religion as guaranteed by the First Amendment to the Constitution and applied to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. The Wisconsin statute required all children to attend school until age sixteen, but certain members of the Amish religion refused to send their children to any school (public or private) after the eighth grade. The Amish parents were therefore tried for violating the law.

The parents contended that attendance at high school was contrary to the Amish religion and way of life. Noting that a hallmark of the Amish faith was life in a community separated from the modern world, the parents presented uncontroverted testimony that the values taught in high school conflicted with Amish values, especially by exposing Amish children to competitiveness, materialism, and worldliness. Because their objection to formal schooling was intertwined so closely with their religious beliefs, the parents challenged the Wisconsin law based on the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, which through the doctrine of incorporation has been applied to the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court found that although the compulsory-attendance law did interfere with the parents' religious freedom, the law was a reasonable exercise of governmental power, and the parents were subsequently convicted for violating the state law. On appeal, the Wisconsin Supreme Court reversed the convictions, finding that the law violated the First Amendment. The state appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In its six–one decision (Justices Lewis F. Powell Jr. and William H. Rehnquist did not participate), written by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, the Court initially noted that there is "[n]o doubt as to the power of a state, having a high responsibility for education of its citizens, to impose reasonable regulations for the control and duration of basic education." Relying primarily on Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), the Court also noted that this power of the state must be balanced against, and at times yield to, parental rights.

Next, the Court examined whether the compulsory-attendance law infringed on the free exercise of religious belief. In reviewing the record, the Court found that it "abundantly supports the claim that the traditional way of life of the Amish is not merely a matter of personal preference, but one of deep religious conviction, shared by an organized group, and intimately related to daily living." Additionally, the Court found in the record support for the conclusion that the values taught in modern secondary school contradicted those espoused by the Amish faith and constituted a grave threat to the child's religious development. Therefore, the Court concluded that the compulsory-attendance law, with the threat of criminal sanction, would "endanger if not destroy" the free exercise of religion.

Finding that the law infringed the free exercise of religious belief, the Court next asked whether the state's interest in compelling education was sufficient to override the First Amendment. The state argued that compulsory education prepared citizens to participate in the democratic process and to be self-sufficient members of society. Accepting these propositions, the Court found that requiring Amish children to attend two years of high school would do little to serve those interests, noting that the Amish community was a successful one, with highly productive and law-abiding members who rejected public welfare. Given this success, and noting that compulsory education beyond the eighth grade was a recent historical development, the Court concluded that it would require a more "particularized showing from the state on this point to justify the severe interference with religious freedom such additional compulsory attendance would entail." Finding that the state had not met its burden, the Court held that the parents' rights to free exercise of religion under the First and Fourteenth Amendment had been violated.

In dissent, Justice William O. Douglas focused on what he thought was the Court's inadequate provision for allowing the students involved to state their desires in the matter. He also expressed concern that the Court was giving greater deference to members of organized religion than to individuals who were motivated by more individualistic beliefs. By contrast, Justice Potter Stewart in concurrence believed the record established that the children held the same views as their parents.

Elizabeth M. Rhea

See also: Free Exercise Clause; Pierce v. Society of Sisters.

FURTHER READING

Peters, Shawn F. The Yoder Case: Religious Freedom, Education, and Parental Rights. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Wolf v. Colorado (1949)

Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), is often cited as the case in which the U.S. Supreme Court made the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures applicable to the states, though refusing to require state courts to follow the federal rule that evidence obtained illegally may not be introduced against an accused at trial (the exclusionary rule). The majority opinion by Justice Felix Frankfurter provided support for this interpretation by proclaiming that "the security of one's privacy against arbitrary intrusion by the police—which is at the core of the Fourth Amendment—is basic to a free society" and thus "enforceable against the states" under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, it was plausible for the authors of the concurring and dissenting opinions in Wolf—all four of whom were on record in support of the position that all provisions of the Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution) should be applied to the states—to argue that the Court had "incorporated" the Fourth Amendment into the "liberty" protected against state deprivation without due process of law by the Fourteenth Amendment. This broad reading was probably not what Frankfurter intended, however.

Of even greater significance was the majority's view in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), that the Court had already made the Fourth Amendment applicable to the states in Wolf. On this understanding, Justice Tom C. Clark was able to assert that the Court in Mapp needed only to overturn the inexplicable refusal of the Wolf Court to apply the exclusionary rule—the only meaningful sanction for violations of the Fourth Amendment—in state as well as federal courts.

When Wolf is read in light of contemporary debates about incorporation of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment, however, it is clear that Frankfurter did not understand Wolf as making the Fourth Amendment applicable to the states. Indeed, Frankfurter was careful to specify that federal law enforcement activities were governed by the Fourth Amendment itself, whereas the constitutionality of state action that invaded privacy was to be determined solely by reference to the more open-ended language of due process. In Frankfurter's view, the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited arbitrary invasion of a home (or doctor's office) by state or local law enforcement officers, but did not mandate exclusion in state court of evidence so obtained. In short, Frankfurter's opinion in Wolf was fully consistent with the "fundamental fairness" approach to due process that he consistently offered as an alternative to the incorporation doctrine endorsed by his more liberal colleagues. Because Frankfurter's opinion in Wolf did not embrace the proposition that the Fourth Amendment was incorporated into the Fourteenth, it was logical that the majority justices in Mapp were willing to make the constitutional protection against unreasonable searches or seizures fully applicable to the states.

Edward V. Heck

See also: Exclusionary Rule; Mapp v. Ohio; Weeks v. United States.

FURTHER READING

Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure: First Principles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Wetterer, Charles M. The Fourth Amendment: Search and Seizure. Springfield, NJ: Enslow, 1998.

World War I

When the United States entered World War I in 1917, the administration of President Woodrow Wilson adopted a comprehensive policy to limit dissent. The U.S. entry into the war was described as a noble endeavor aimed at making the world safe for democracy. Individuals who challenged the idea of U.S. involvement in the war soon found that their ability to express ideas was limited by the actions of federal, state, and local officials. The government's rush to quell dissent raised difficult issues involving freedom of speech and press as protected under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

When Wilson asked Congress during 1917 and 1918 to grant him powers to regulate speech, Congress responded by passing two measures, the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Sedition Act of 1918. These legislative measures gave broad powers to the federal government to regulate speech. The Espionage Act provided for fines and jail sentences for those found to be in violation of its provisions. Among its stipulations was a clause making it illegal to interfere with the recruitment of soldiers. The Sedition Act was more intrusive on civil liberties than the Espionage Act. Under its provisions, it was illegal to criticize the president, the Constitution, the government, or members of the military. By issuing an executive order, the president also identified the use of the postal system for antiwar activities to be a violation of the Espionage Act. Wilson used these measures to the fullest extent. Indeed, his wartime presidency has been compared with Abraham Lincoln's Civil War presidency, during which civil liberties also were restricted. Still, Wilson never sought to suspend the writ of habeas corpus (petition for release from unlawful confinement) as Lincoln did; Wilson claimed that such action would have violated the Constitution.

Wilson also requested authority to regulate economic matters, and Congress responded with the Lever Food and Fuel Control Act of August 10, 1917. This measure authorized the president to regulate the national economy for the wartime effort. Businesses would henceforth be required to follow presidential directives. Given this measure's extensive sweep, many members of Congress were reluctant to give such power to the president. Therefore, an amendment was added that set up a congressional committee to supervise the executive branch's use of the powers granted to it by the Lever Act. On this matter, however, Wilson was particularly upset. He charged that the amendment would weaken the ability of his administration to wage war. In fact, he said that Lincoln had faced a similar committee during the Civil War, the Committee on the Conduct of the War. According to him, the committee that oversaw Lincoln's management of the war had made his job untenable. After resisting the amendment, Wilson secured a victory. Congress deleted the amendment, thus giving President Wilson the extraordinary powers he had sought.

Many Americans, both well known and less well known, were imprisoned for their political speech during this period. Over two thousand citizens were charged with violation of the antispeech laws, with half being found guilty of the charges. One prominent American, Eugene V. Debs, leader of the Socialist Party, presidential candidate, and activist, was sent to prison for two years and eight months for a speech delivered in June 1918 attacking President Wilson's leadership of the nation. Debs's Socialist Party was also the target of the Wilson administration's attack on civil liberties. By 1919 party membership had declined from 109,000 to 36,000, and it never recovered from the attacks it suffered during the war years. President Warren G. Harding commuted Debs's sentence in December 1921.

President Woodrow Wilson. When the United States entered World War I, the Wilson administration adopted a comprehensive policy to limit dissent. Congress responded by passing two measures, the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Sedition Act of 1918. (National Archives)

Another noteworthy case from the World War I period involved Charles Schenck, who sent draft resistance letters through the mail system. Charged with violating the Espionage Act, Schenck was convicted, and his case was never overturned. Despite this, the matter did reach the Supreme Court, which not only upheld the conviction by a unanimous vote but also developed the noteworthy "clear and present danger" test for application to matters involving freedom of speech under the First Amendment.

By the end of the war, several states had sedition laws restricting free speech. During the interwar period, the Supreme Court reviewed the sedition act of New York, which closely resembled Wilson's requested Sedition Act of 1918. In Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), although the Supreme Court upheld Benjamin Gitlow's conviction for engaging in expression prohibited by the New York law, the Court nevertheless ruled that the First Amendment was applicable to the states as being "incorporated" through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In other words, states as well as the federal government were bound to honor the fundamental freedoms protected by the First Amendment. Gitlow was the first among numerous cases through which the Court applied against the states most of the fundamental liberties protected by the Bill of Rights, in a process known as "selective incorporation." In this manner, the Supreme Court made it possible for the Bill of Rights eventually to influence state laws.

Government actions during World War I are illustrative of the nation's tendency to infringe on civil liberties during times of national crisis. Although the executive branch initiates the actions hostile to civil liberties, the legislative and judicial branches are reluctant to challenge executive actions. Once the crisis is over, the executive branch becomes more circumspect about its actions, and the courts become less willing to permit infringement of civil liberties. Measures taken during World War I are by no means unique. World War II, the Korean War, the Cold War, Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, not to mention the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C., and the failed attempt in Pennsylvania—all these and other crises have led to renewed efforts to restrict fundamental liberties. In the latest round of restrictions is the Patriot Act of 2001, which civil liberties advocates seek to challenge for several constitutional infractions.

Michael E. Meagher

See also: Debs, Eugene Victor; Espionage Act of 1917; Incorporation Doctrine; Palmer Raids; Red Scare; Sedition Act of 1918; Wilson, Woodrow.

FURTHER READING

Milkis, Sidney M., and Michael Nelson. The American Presidency: Origins and Development, 1776–2002. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2003.

Miroff, Bruce. Icons of Democracy: American Leaders as He- roes, Aristocrats, Dissenters, and Democrats. New York: Basic Books, 1993.

Riccards, Michael P. The Ferocious Engine of Democracy: A History of the American Presidency. Vol. 2. New York: Madison Books, 1995.

World War II

World War I is known both for the adoption of the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Sedition Act of 1918 as well as for a number of U.S. Supreme Court decisions upholding convictions under these and similar laws passed during patriotic fear and fervor but subsequently found to infringe on constitutional liberties. Supreme Court decisions during World War II generally did less damage to First Amendment freedom of expression, but a number of decisions established the dangerous precedent, since largely repudiated, of upholding the use of racial classifications to restrict civil liberties.

In Hartzel v. United States, 322 U.S. 680 (1944), the Court, in a five–four opinion authored by Justice Frank Murphy, overturned a conviction based on the Espionage Act of 1917 of a fascist who had mailed literature critical of the United States to Selective Service (draft) registrants. The majority narrowly interpreted the law's provision that individuals must seek "willfully" to cause insubordination or to obstruct the draft. Similarly, in another five–four decision authored by Justice Owen J. Roberts, the Court in Keegan v. United States, 325 U.S. 478 (1945), set aside convictions of members of the German American Bund (previously designated Friends of the New Germany) for conspiring to counsel against the draft on the basis that the government had failed to establish specific intent. In Baumgartner v. United States, 322 U.S. 665 (1944), the Court further overturned the attempted denaturalization of an alleged Nazi sympathizer under the Nationality Act of 1940, again deciding that the government's evidence had been insufficient.

One of the most notable opinions from World War II was the Court's decision in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), reversing an earlier decision in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), and invalidating compulsory flag salutes in public schools, which Jehovah's Witnesses had opposed as being idolatrous. In an opinion appropriately issued on Flag Day (June 14), five of the eight other justices agreed with Justice Robert H. Jackson's opinion that "If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

Just as World War I had witnessed the adoption of laws expressing animus against Germans and the teaching of the German language, so, too, the toughest issues the nation faced during World War II involved the treatment of Japanese Americans. Shortly after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued Executive Order No. 9066 giving military commanders on the West Coast power to take measures against the potential for a Japanese threat. Fearful of a possible Japanese invasion and arguably influenced by strands of racism, these commanders first issued a curfew for the region's 112,000 individuals of Japanese ancestry, most of them U.S. citizens; excluded the Japanese from these military zones (thus displacing them from their homes); and then ordered that the Japanese be incarcerated in detention camps.

These policies were based on the fear that Japanese Americans, some of whom were considered to be dual U.S. and Japanese citizens, would constitute a type of "fifth column," consisting of individuals who would be sympathetic to Japanese invaders. Unfortunately, the military applied similar policies to both Issei, who retained their Japanese citizenship, and to Nisei, who were U.S.-born. In Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943), the Supreme Court unanimously upheld a curfew on Japanese Americans but was careful to limit its decision to this action. In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), the Court further approved the order excluding Japanese from the designated military zones but attempted somewhat unpersuasively to sidestep the issue of whether the detention camps were legal. In language that has since been put to more liberal uses as the backbone of the Court's "strict-scrutiny" standard of review, Justice Hugo L. Black said that "all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect." Nevertheless, Justice Black said the Court had to defer to the military judgment that exclusion based on race in this instance was needed. Recognizing that such exclusion presented hardships, Black argued that "hardships are part of war, and war is an aggregation of hardships." By contrast, Justice Murphy argued that the exclusion of Japanese Americans "goes over 'the very brink of constitutional power' and falls into the ugly abyss of racism." Similarly, Justice Jackson feared that the judicial authorization of such exclusion would serve, like a loaded gun, as a possible precedent for further erosion of rights. Finally in Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283 (1944), the Court offered a small victory to Japanese Americans by releasing from detention a Japanese American woman who had filed a writ of habeas corpus and for whom the government could establish no individualized suspicion of disloyalty.

In a case on a related issue, the Court decided in Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946), that the trial and sentencing by military courts of two civilians in Hawaii, under a declaration of martial law by the territory's governor later supported by a presidential order, had been unconstitutional. One civilian was a shipfitter who was tried and convicted for assaulting two military personnel; the other was a stockbroker accused of embezzling. In both cases, the Court could find no reason that the regular civilian courts, under which the full panoply of rights would have been upheld, could not try such individuals.

In Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), the Court upheld the trial and conviction of German saboteurs (one of whom claimed to be a U.S. citizen) who had landed by submarine in the United States and hidden their uniforms with the apparent intention to spy and destroy. In contrast to the Civil War context that the Court had reviewed in Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866), the Court decided that the Germans were prisoners of war and thus legitimately subject to military trial and punishment. Similarly, in the case of In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946), the Court unanimously upheld the conviction by military court of a Japanese general who, it was alleged, had not properly restrained his troops from committing atrocities against civilians in the Philippines.

World War II highlighted the evils of racism. African Americans who had served as soldiers (like Japanese Americans who had likewise distinguished themselves in battle) returned home with the knowledge that they had played an important role in America's victory and with the belief that they should be entitled to equal treatment. Not long after the war, President Harry S Truman ended segregation in the U.S. military by executive order, and the Court's decision on school desegregation, Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), followed within a decade and was in turn succeeded by an invigorated civil rights movement.

The end of World War II was followed relatively quickly by the Cold War between the United States and the Soviet Union, then the world's two major superpowers. During this time the Alien Registration (Smith) Act of 1940, adopted just before U.S. entry into World War II, and the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 were frequently directed at domestic dissent, especially by Communists or their sympathizers. A number of the issues raised during World War II have been relevant to post–September 11, 2001, decisions involving individuals captured in the war on terrorism in the aftermath of the attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and on the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.

John R. Vile

See also: Espionage Act of 1917; First Amendment; Flag Salute; Korematsu v. United States; Martial Law; Milligan, Ex parte; President and Civil Liberties; Sedition Act of 1918; Smith Act Cases; Strict Scrutiny; Suspect Classifications; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette; World War I.

FURTHER READING

Belknap, Michael R. "World War II." In The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States, ed. Kermit L. Hall, 943–45. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Irons, Peter, ed. Justice Delayed: The Record of the Japanese American Internment Cases. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1989.

Rehnquist, William. All the Laws But One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.

Write-in Votes

Voters sometimes wish to cast a vote for a candidate not listed on the ballot. Forty-five states and the District of Columbia permit write-in votes; voters may write the name of their preferred candidate on the ballot in a special location. When election officials later count the ballots, they count the number of votes cast for each candidate, including the write-ins. In many states the write-ins are not individually reported unless it appears that the total number of write-in votes exceeds the number of votes cast for any ballot-listed candidate.

In five states (Hawaii, Nevada, South Dakota, Oklahoma, and Louisiana), the election code does not permit write-in votes. In other states, write-ins are used in only some elections, for instance, only in general elections.

Alan Burdick, a voter in Hawaii (a non-write-in state), brought suit to compel the state to allow him to cast a write-in vote and to compel the state to count such votes and publish the results. Burdick claimed that he wished to vote for a person who had not filed nomination papers to run for a seat in the state House of Representatives (only one candidate had filed the papers). Burdick argued that the inability to cast a write-in vote violated his First Amendment rights to expression (his dissent against the number of candidates) and association (with his preferred candidate).

In Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428 (1992), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a state's burden to justify its election laws varied with the burden imposed on individual voters. In the case of write-in votes, the Court held, there was little burden on voters because of Hawaii's relatively easy process for a candidate or a new political party to qualify for the ballot. For instance, a candidate could appear on a nonpartisan primary ballot by filing nominating papers with fifteen to twenty-five signatures and then advance to the general election by receiving only 10 percent of the primary vote.

Write-in votes can be important in an election system, but they are probably not constitutionally required when a state provides fairly easy access to the ballot. The fundamental liberty of voting in elections is not compromised in this situation.

Edward Still

See also: Right to Vote.

FURTHER READING

Brown, Mark R. "Popularizing Ballot Access: The Front Door to Election Reform." Ohio State Law Journal 58 (1997): 1281–1324.

Writs of Certiorari

In order to hear cases involving civil liberties (or any other subject), the U.S. Supreme Court must first accept them. It does so through reviewing written petitions known as writs. There are three primary types of writs—writs of appeal, similar to the old writs of error, which the Court must hear as a matter of right; writs of certification, in which courts are asked to answer a question of law in which a lower court seeks instructions; and writs of certiorari. Writs of appeal have been seriously curtailed since a 1988 law that largely limited them to cases in which three-judge district courts have issued or denied injunctions, and writs of certification are rarer still. Thus, most cases (90 percent or more) that get to the Supreme Court get there through writs of certiorari.

"Certiorari" is a Latin term meaning "made more certain." Lawyers who file writs of certiorari are asking the Court to reconsider the rulings in their cases. Most writs are appealed from decisions by U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeal, but in cases involving "federal issues" (cases arising under the Constitution or federal statutes), such writs may also be filed from state supreme courts. Writs typically explain how the Supreme Court has jurisdiction, state the issues presented and the facts relevant to these issues, and explain why a party thinks the Court should accept review. The Court decides which cases to review on a purely discretionary basis, although it typically looks for issues on which lower courts have split, for matters involving interpretation of the U.S. Constitution or U.S. laws or treaties, or for cases where decisions seem to conflict with those the Supreme Court has itself issued.

Eight of nine justices (all but Justice John Paul Stevens) currently participate in a "cert pool" under which their clerks, usually recent law school graduates, collectively review petitions and recommend to the justices whether they should be reviewed on their merits. Any justice may place a case on the "discuss list" of those deemed worthy of consideration, but the large majority are consigned to the "dead list" that do not receive further review. The Court operates according to the "rule of four" by which it will not accept a case unless four of the nine justices think it is worthy of a hearing (some justices will occasionally file a "join-3" vote, indicating they will accept cert if three others agree to do so). Justices do not give written reasons for denials of cert, although justices will occasionally file dissents from such denials. Of the thousands of writs that the Court reviews each year, it currently accepts only about seventy-five for oral argument; the percentage of cases that actually receive full review is thus quite small.

Justices themselves dispute the meaning of a denial of certiorari. Such a denial leaves lower-court decisions in place, but it does not necessarily mean that the Supreme Court would have ruled the same way. The Court simply might think that an issue is not important enough, that the case is not yet "ripe" for review, or that a particular case has other infirmities that do not make it a particularly good vehicle for decision-making.

The right of appeal is a basic civil liberty designed to serve as a guard against mistakes or injustices in lower courts and as a means of providing for general uniformity in a federal system. However, without the ability to turn down appeals it considers frivolous or otherwise lacking in merit that writs of certiorari provide, the Supreme Court would be overwhelmed.

John R. Vile

See also: Right to Appeal; United States Supreme Court.

FURTHER READING

Abraham, Henry J. The Judicial Process: An Introductory Analysis of the Courts of the United States, England, and France. 7th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

O'Brien, David M. Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics. 6th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2003.

Y

Yates v. United States (1957)

In 1940 the U.S. Congress passed the Smith Act making it illegal for anyone in the United States to advocate or teach the forcible overthrow of the government. After World War II, the Smith Act was used during the Cold War era to prosecute leaders of the Communist Party in the United States. The first such case to reach the Supreme Court was Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), in which the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the convictions of eleven Communist Party members for organizing a party designed to overthrow the U.S. government. Applying a modified clear-and-present-danger test—a test the Court had first developed in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), to analyze the extent of free speech rights protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution—the Court found that even though the possibility of overthrow was remote, significant harm would result from any attempt. When the government was aware of a group advocating and teaching the necessity of overthrow, the government was required to act.

In Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957), the Court modified its ruling in Dennis to increase First Amendment protections for political speech. Six years had passed since Dennis, during which time the political climate had changed. Senator Joseph McCarthy (R-WI) had died, and anti-Communist sentiment had somewhat abated.

Yates involved the 1951 convictions of fourteen "second string" members of the Communist Party in California. The Court's decision was based on interpreting the Smith Act instead of addressing First Amendment issues. In the opinion for the Court majority, Justice John M. Harlan found that the trial judge's instructions to the jury did not adequately distinguish between advocacy and teaching of abstract doctrine and advocacy of unlawful action either now or at some point in the future. The Smith Act prohibited advocacy of action and not advocacy of ideas. Advocacy and teaching addressed at taking action, whether or not incitement, was punishable. Advocacy addressed at merely believing in something was not punishable. In Dennis, the Court was concerned with the presence of advocacy aimed at taking forcible action in the future and not with a conspiracy to engage in seditious advocacy at some point in the future.

Although Justice Harlan stated that Yates was a clarification of Dennis, many scholars believed that Yates was an evolution in the Supreme Court's First Amendment jurisprudence. The Court began to incorporate elements of District Court Judge Learned Hand's incitement approach. Hand's analysis in Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 244 F. 535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917), was to focus on the speaker's words. If the language used incited those who heard it to action, the speech was not protected under the First Amendment.

Carrie A. Schneider

See also: Clear and Present Danger; Communists; Dennis v. United States; Hand, Learned; Schenck v. United States; Smith Act Cases.

FURTHER READING

Gunther, Gerald. "Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine." Stanford Law Review 27 (1975): 719.

Redish, Martin H. "Advocacy of Unlawful Conduct and the First Amendment: In Defense of Clear and Present Danger." California Law Review 70 (1982): 1159.

Sullivan, Kathleen, and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 14th ed. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. (1976)

In Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976), the U.S. Supreme Court, in a plurality opinion by Justice John Paul Stevens and with a separate opinion by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., narrowly upheld (by a five–four vote) the constitutionality of a Detroit, Michigan, ordinance passed under the city's zoning power to isolate the location of "adult" theaters and bookstores. The ordinance required that adult theaters and bookstores be located at least 1,000 feet from regulated businesses, including bars, hotels, and cabarets, and 500 feet from residential areas. The ordinance defined adult theaters as those exhibiting motion pictures that featured specific sexual activities (aroused human genitals, masturbation, sexual intercourse, sodomy, and erotic touching of genitalia, buttocks, and breasts) or specific anatomical areas (uncovered genitalia and female breasts and covered but discernible genitals in a "turgid" state). At issue was whether the zoning ordinance infringed the right to free expression provided by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Justice Stevens held that the ordinance was a constitutional regulation of expressive material that had lesser value than the political speech protected by the First Amendment. As with incitement, fighting words, and defamation—which also were not entitled to First Amendment protection—he judged the ordinance did not violate the government's "primary obligation of neutrality in its regulation of protected communication." Also, the ordinance did not demand the total suppression of the sexual material. Instead, Detroit had required only the reasonable separation of adult businesses from other enterprises and residences to "preserve the quality of urban life."

Powell concluded the ordinance was constitutional because it was not a limitation on the content of expression and because it did not restrict "in any significant way" the opportunity to view movies at a theater. In addition, the ordinance was a reasonable government regulation of the place and manner of expression, according to Justice Powell's application of the four-part balancing test announced in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968).

The four dissenting justices, in an opinion by Justice Potter Stewart, asserted that the ordinance was an unconstitutional regulation of content. They argued that it was neither a valid regulation of expression of lesser value than other speech nor a valid regulation of the time, place, or manner of expressive activities.

Subsequent decisions refined the meaning of Young. In City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986), the Court revisited the zoning of adult businesses. Using the balancing approach of Justice Powell in Young, Justice William H. Rehnquist upheld a zoning ordinance concentrating the location of adult theaters because their "secondary effects" (drugs, prostitution, traffic, and the like) were harmful to the surrounding community. Also, in City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 535 U.S. 425 (2002), Justice Sandra Day O'Connor in the plurality opinion allowed the use of any "reasonably relevant" evidence to show the harmfulness of adult businesses' direct or secondary effects on urban life. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the fifth vote in support of the Los Angeles ordinance, required "substantial" rather than "reasonably relevant" evidence of harm to the community.

Richard Brisbin

See also: City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc.; City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.; Obscenity; Zoning.

FURTHER READING

Andrew, Christopher J. "The Secondary Effects Doctrine: The Historical Development, Current Application, and Potential Mischaracterization of an Elusive Judicial Precedent." Rutgers Law Review 54 (2002): 1175–1220.

Z

Zablocki v. Redhail (1978)

The U.S. Supreme Court has recognized the right to marry as a fundamental—albeit unenumerated—constitutional right under both the "fundamental rights" prong of equal protection and the substantive Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. Thus, it is a basic civil liberty that is entitled to the strongest degree of constitutional protection.

In Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), the Court applied strict scrutiny to a Virginia statute that prohibited interracial marriage, reasoning that marriage was a basic civil right fundamental to human existence and survival. Nevertheless, the Court in Loving implied that infringements on marital relationships would be upheld if drawn narrowly to achieve a compelling government interest. Later, in Califano v. Jobst, 434 U.S. 47 (1977), the Court upheld the validity of a Social Security regulation that cut off benefits to a disabled dependent child of a covered wage earner upon the disabled person's marriage, unless the marital partner was independently entitled to such benefits. Despite upholding the regulation, the Court reaffirmed the notion that any obstacle directly and substantially interfering with the right to marry would trigger heightened scrutiny.

The Court considered one such obstacle a year later in Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978). An indigent plaintiff, a father, challenged a Wisconsin law requiring that a parent under court order to support a minor child who was not in his custody must demonstrate (1) that all court-ordered child support had been paid, and (2) that the child was not currently benefiting and was not likely to benefit from welfare, in order for the parent to be permitted to marry. The father failed to meet the requirement pertaining to child support and therefore was prohibited from getting married. Consequently, he attacked the statute on both equal protection and substantive due process grounds.

The Supreme Court invalidated the Wisconsin law, grounding its holding in the Equal Protection Clause, which mandates strict judicial scrutiny of any statute impinging on a fundamental right. Although Wisconsin's interests were legitimate and substantial, the state's method of furthering those interests unnecessarily interfered with a fundamental right. According to the Court, in order to ensure compliance with child support requirements, the state could have devisedless drastic compliance methods. The Court also determined that the means used were grossly underinclusive. In other words, many other financial commitments—apart from marriage—were not similarly barred. In short, the provision at issue tended to discourage marriage by placing a direct legal obstacle in the path of any parent desiring to marry and therefore was a significant interference with the marriage right.

In Zablocki, the Court reiterated the notion that the right to marry was "fundamental," and substantial interference with that right could not be sustained merely because the state could cite a "rational" justification. This case reinforced the distinction between regulations that grant or deny public benefits based on marital status (Jobst) and ones that determine who may lawfully marry (Zablocki). Regulations judged to fall into the latter category probably will be subject to strict scrutiny and deemed invalid under Zablocki.

Zablocki can be criticized because of the Court's failure to consider the broader social and economic concerns that affect families and children. For example, in the years after Zablocki, there was a substantial increase in the number of female-headed households with children. The means of fulfilling the Wisconsin legislature's objectives that were implemented in this case ensured that parents fulfilled their financial responsibility to noncustodial children before being allowed to marry and have more. Notably, since Zablocki, there has been a significant decline in the standard of living of divorced women with children compared with how their former husbands fared; overall, the husbands' financial positions after divorce markedly improved.

Gia Elise Barboza

See also: Loving v. Virginia; Marriage, Right to; Parental Rights.

FURTHER READING

Nolan, Laurence C. "The Meaning of Loving: Marriage, Due Process, and Equal Protection (1967–1990) as Equality and Marriage, from Loving to Zablocki." Howard Law Journal 41 (Winter 1998): 245–70.

Zadvydas v. Davis (2001)

In Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that resident aliens held by the government beyond the ninety-day removal period were entitled to a habeas corpus hearing (hearing held on a petition for release from unlawful confinement) if they were detained more than six months beyond expiration of this time period. The case was significant because it limited the power of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) to indefinitely detain aliens awaiting deportation.

Aliens are individuals who are not citizens but nonetheless reside in the United States. In some cases, these individuals have entered the country illegally, or they have been convicted of a crime or otherwise have failed to comply with the conditions that allow them to remain in the United States. In such circumstances, these individuals may be deported if a final order has been issued. If that occurs, federal law states that the INS may hold in custody for up to ninety days (called the removal period) the person subject to deportation. During this time the INS prepares the alien for removal while, for example, it seeks to determine to what country to send that person.

In some situations, the ninety-day period expires before the individual is ready to be deported. In these situations, federal law allows the U.S. attorney general to detain the person beyond the removal period if officials believe the person is a risk to the community, a security threat, or in danger of flight if released. This post-removal-period detention has no time limit, which implies that the INS may hold an alien indefinitely. This indefinite holding of an alien by the INS was the subject of the dispute in Zadvydas v. Davis.

Kestutis Zadvydas was a resident alien who was born in Germany of Lithuanian parents and immigrated to the United States with his parents when he was eight years old. Zadvydas had a long criminal record that included burglaries and drug convictions, and in 1974 after a conviction for the possession and sale of cocaine, he was taken into custody by the INS and ordered deported. However, Germany refused to accept Zadvydas that year, the Dominican Republic refused in 1996, and in 1998 Lithuania also rejected him.

Beginning in 1995, Zadvydas filed habeas corpus petitions in court seeking release from detention by the INS. His claim was that he was being illegally detained beyond the ninety-day removal period. In 1997 a federal district court granted his habeas petition and ordered him released, but the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, indicating that his detention was not unconstitutional because his deportation was impossible and because the government was making good faith efforts to remove him from the United States. The U.S. Supreme Court accepted the case for review and reversed the Fifth Circuit opinion.

Writing for the Court, Justice Stephen G. Breyer first noted that habeas corpus in federal court was available to review post-removal-period detentions. He then addressed the main issue of whether the government could detain someone for an indefinite period of time beyond the ninety-day removal period. The INS argued that the statute permitted this, but the Court stated that indefinite detention raised serious constitutional questions, especially when deportation hearings were supposed to be civil and nonpunitive.

Moreover, Justice Breyer questioned whether Congress had intended to allow this indefinite detention, noting that Congress had changed the law to limit the removal period to ninety days and this fact suggested an intent to limit how long the government could detain someone. He also rejected government arguments that detention of aliens was inherently an issue for the executive department in its security considerations and that the president and attorney general should be given significant leeway in making these types of decisions. Overall, the majority concluded some reasonable limit was necessary on how long a person could be held, which the Court decided was six months beyond the expiration of the ninety-day removal period. At that point the detainee could petition for release, and the burden then would be on the government to show why continued detention was required.

Zadvydas v. Davis was considered an important victory for the rights of aliens. The case was decided in June 2001, but it took on even more importance after the terrorist attacks on the United States later that year on September 11. As the United States was cracking down on individuals suspected of being terrorists, the decision placed limits upon the government's ability to detain them indefinitely simply because they were aliens.

David Schultz

See also: Due Process of Law; Immigration Law.

FURTHER READING

Reckers, Rob. "The Future of Aliens Ordered Removed from the United States in the Wake of Zadvydas v. Davis." Houston Journal of International Law 25 (Fall 2002): 195.

Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002)

In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), the U.S. Supreme Court was asked to review an Ohio school "voucher" program that provided state funds to Cleveland parents for tuition payments at religious schools. Building on earlier decisions in Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000), and Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), the Court continued to lower the wall between church and state erected in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947), and rejected the claim that the Ohio program, which transferred millions of tax dollars to religious (and primarily Catholic) schools, violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Under that clause, government is prohibited from engaging in activity that would constitute "establishment of religion."

In response to a perceived failure by the Cleveland public school system to educate Ohio's citizens adequately, the state legislature enacted in 1995 the Pilot Project Scholarship Program. The new policy provided parents with two options for supplementing a free public education. For children remaining in public schools, financial assistance for private tutoring was provided to parents. Parents could also choose to remove their children to a private school, for which the state would provide tuition assistance. Among those parents choosing tuition assistance, more than 96 percent enrolled their children in private religious schools. This tuition assistance portion of the program came under review in Zelman.

The Court's increasing leniency in certain Establishment Clause cases was emphasized in Justice David H. Souter's dissent. Souter identified four waves to the Court's Establishment Clause jurisprudence. In 1947 Everson established a "no-aid" principle that lasted until 1968, when the Court began to distinguish between the secular and religious activities of religious institutions. In 1983 the Court liberalized its standard to allow aid, provided that it did not create a substantial benefit for the religious institution, was offered on a neutral basis, and was directed to the institution by the free choice of individuals. Justice Souter identified the Zelman decision with a fourth reworking of Establishment Clause requirements, a reworking that ignored the substantiality of the aid directed to the religious institution.

Justice Souter also challenged the Ohio program on the grounds that the aid was not offered on a neutral basis (most of the private schools benefiting from the program were Catholic), and that parents were coerced into sending aid to religious schools (the difference between tuition and tutorial assistance was so great as to force the hands of parents in the direction of religious education).

The Zelman majority rejected Souter's charge of judicial creativity. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor argued in her concurrence that a fair reading of precedent revealed a Court consistently willing to condone neutral and noncoerced state aid to religious institutions. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, meanwhile, challenged Souter's contention that the aid program was impermissibly generous or even coercive.

Regardless of Justice Souter's charge, Zelman represents the reasoning in a line of cases in which the Rehnquist Court has responded with less hostility to the public funding of religious institutions than was the norm on the Court under Chief Justices Earl Warren and Warren E. Burger.

Brendan Dunn

See also: Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education; Rosenberger v. University of Virginia.

FURTHER READING

Garnett, Richard. "The Right Questions About School Choice: Education, Religious Freedom, and the Common Good." Cardozo Law Review 23 (March 2002): 1281.

Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Muñoz, Vincent Phillip. "James Madison's Principle of Religious Liberty." American Political Science Review 97, 1 (February 2003): 17–32.

Zenger, John Peter (1697–1746)

John Peter Zenger was an impoverished immigrant who became a printer, a pawn, a patriot, and eventually a symbol for the importance of a free and independent press. He was born in the Rhine region of Germany in 1697, and at age thirteen he emigrated with his family to America. Unfortunately, his father did not survive the two-month voyage, and his mother was left to raise him and his siblings. Soon after his arrival, Zenger was indentured as an apprentice for eight years to New York's only printer, William Bradford. At the end of his apprenticeship, Zenger traveled the colonies looking for printing work. He met and married Mary White and settled in Chestertown, Maryland. He returned to New York shortly thereafter, however, in part due to the death of his wife. Upon his return, he married Anna Catherina Maulin with whom he eventually had five children.

In 1625, Zenger's previous master, William Bradford, began publishing Manhattan's first newspaper, the New York Gazette. Bradford also held all of the colonial government's printing contracts, and because his livelihood was dependent on these contracts, the Gazette became the quasi-official publication of the governor's office. For a brief period, Zenger partnered with Bradford, but he soon struck out on his own. At first, his printing business was slow, consisting mostly of religious texts, but that would rapidly change with the arrival of a new colonial governor, William Cosby, in 1731.

Cosby was an arrogant governor and a lightning rod for controversy. In one of his first official actions, he demanded that local councilman Rip Van Dam turn over half of the salary Van Dam had earned while serving as acting governor of New York during the year between Cosby's appointment and his arrival in the colony. Van Dam agreed, but only if Cosby also split the salary he had earned during that same time period. Cosby refused and ordered that the Supreme Court of New York sit as a court of equity and decide the dispute. Lewis Morris, who was chief justice at the time, despised this improper use of the court as an attempt to avoid the colony's established jury system. Unfortunately, his was the lone voice of dissent, and in April 1733, the court ruled in favor of Cosby. Morris, however, was not without recourse. He hired Zenger to print his stinging dissent from the decision as a pamphlet that was distributed throughout New York. Cosby immediately removed him from office and replaced him with loyalist James De Lancey.

In response, Rip Van Dam, Lewis Morris, and local attorney James Alexander organized what came to be known as the Popular Party or Morrisites. They approached Zenger to publish a newspaper sympathetic to their party platform. Thus on November 5, 1733, the Morrisites unleashed the nation's first independent weekly newspaper, the New York Weekly Journal. The paper, which was advertised to contain "the freshest advises, foreign and domestic," was an instant success and, due to its political slant, stood in stark contrast to Bradford's Gazette. Its pages were filled with articles, written anonymously by Morris and Alexander, that attacked Cosby as an idiot, a Nero, a rogue, and a lawbreaker, "tyrannically flouting the laws of England and New York." The paper focused on stories of Morris's political success while simultaneously accusing Cosby of "incompetence, influence peddling, corruption, collusion with the French, election fraud, and tyranny."

Andrew Hamilton's defense of John Peter Zenger, which established freedom of the press in the American colonies, 1734–35. (© North Wind Picture Archives)

In response, Cosby ordered the colonial grand jury to issue indictments against Zenger for seditious libel, but the jury twice refused. When the Morrisites won numerous seats in the September 1734 city elections, Cosby could take no more. He ordered his attorney general to file a complaint before the New York Supreme Court, and the justices issued a bench warrant for the arrest of John Peter Zenger for seditious libel. On November 17, 1734, the sheriff arrested Zenger and took him to New York's old city jail. Subsequently, Francis Harison, who was the governor's unofficial censor and an editor of the rival Gazette, went to Zenger's shop, confiscated all copies of the Weekly Journal, and burned them on the steps of city hall.

Chief Justice De Lancey set bail for Zenger at £400, an incredibly high amount for that time. Zenger's supporters were all rich men and could have raised the bail easily, but Zenger was worth more to their cause as a symbol of the governor's tyranny, so he was left in jail. During his eight-month incarceration, the Weekly Journal was published each week by his wife, Anna Catherina, who received her instructions "through the Hole of the Door of the Prison." Zenger was finally brought to trial in April 1735. However, his first set of attorneys, which included James Alexander, were disbarred for having the audacity to attack the validity of the judge that Cosby had handpicked to hear the case, the infamous Justice De Lancey. Zenger's cause was not lost, though, because the famous advocate Andrew Hamilton, also noted architect of Independence Hall, agreed to plead his case before the judge and jury.

Pursuant to colonial law, seditious libel was the publication of statements intended to arouse the people against the government by either bringing it into contempt or exciting dissatisfaction. Zenger was clearly guilty of this offense, and truth was not recognized as a defense to the charge. Hamilton surprised the prosecution, however, by freely admitting that Zenger had indeed published the articles. Hamilton instead argued that the law ought not to be interpreted to prohibit "the just complaints of a number of men who suffer under a bad administration." Hamilton also argued that it was within a jury's inherent power to judge the law as well as the facts and that the jury should refuse to convict Zenger if the law was unjust. (This tactic is known modernly as "jury nullification.") In his stirring and eloquent closing statement, Hamilton urged the jury to consider Zenger's case as one of utmost importance:

> The question before the Court and you gentlemen of the jury, is not of small nor private concern, it is not the cause of the poor printer, nor of New York alone, which you are now trying. No! It may in its consequence affect every freeman that lives under a British government on the mainland of America. It is the best cause. It is the cause of liberty; and I make no doubt but your upright conduct this day will not only entitle you to the love and esteem of your fellow citizens, but every man who prefers freedom to a life of slavery will bless and honor you as men who have baffled the attempt of tyranny; and by an impartial and un-> corrupt verdict, have laid a noble foundation for securing to ourselves, our posterity, and our neighbors, that to which nature and the laws of our country have given us a right—the liberty both of exposing and opposing arbitrary power (in these parts of the world, at least) by speaking and writing truth.

After Hamilton's closing statement, De Lancey basically instructed the jury members that they must convict Zenger. Their role, he told them, was merely to determine whether the statements had been published and, if so, whether they referred to the persons or institutions described in the charges. For the purposes of their deliberations, he said, the truth of the statements was irrelevant and immaterial. In his own account of the trial, which was published in the Weekly Journal, Zenger described what followed: "The Jury returned in about Ten Minutes, and found me Not Guilty; upon which there were immediately three Hurra's of many Hundreds of People in the presence of the Court." Years later the great-grandson of Lewis Morris, Gouverneur Morris, one of the principal drafters of the Constitution, would describe the Zenger case as "the germ of American freedom, the morning star of that liberty which subsequently revolutionized America."

As a reward for his services, Zenger was made the public printer for New York and New Jersey in 1738 when the Morrisites gained control of the colonial government. However, the life of a responsible corporate printer was not for him. He was soon dismissed from both positions because of his poor English and ignorance of local idioms. Zenger died virtually penniless in 1746. His wife managed the Weekly Journal until December 1748, when it was taken over by John Zenger, a son of his first marriage, who continued it until 1751.

The Zenger verdict did not immediately establish that truth was a defense to libel in the American common law; it took almost a century for that maxim to be officially codified as the law of the new land. However, Zenger's acquittal stands as an example of the independence of the American spirit and the importance of a free press. Although the Weekly Journal itself did not survive, freedom of the press remains one of the nation's most cherished freedoms because the ability to criticize those who govern serves to preserve all liberties. As Justice Hugo L. Black stated in the Pentagon Papers case, New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), "The Government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government."

Andrew Braniff

See also: Libel; New York Times Co. v. United States; Seditious Libel.

FURTHER READING

Alexander, James. A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger, ed. Stanley N. Katz. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963.

Bogen, David S. "The Origins of Freedom of Speech and Press." Maryland Law Review 42 (1983): 429.

Finkelman, John. "The Zenger Case: Prototype of a Political Trial." In American Political Trials, ed. Michael R. Belknap. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981.

Putnam, William Lowell. John Peter Zenger and the Fundamental Freedom. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1997.

Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District (1993)

The Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." In many of the U.S. Supreme Court's cases, such as Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 509 U.S. 1 (1993), the justices have struggled with the application of this amendment in the context of governmental aid to religious or sectarian schools. The most difficult cases involve government aid provided in indirect fashion rather than through overt, direct funding to religious schools. Zobrest involved indirect assistance.

James Zobrest, who was deaf from birth, was a student in Tucson, Arizona. He attended a school for the deaf from first grade through fifth grade and then attended public school through the eighth grade. Once he reached high school, his parents enrolled him in a Catholic high school for religious reasons. At that time, his parents requested his public school district to provide a sign-language interpreter to accompany Zobrest to his classes at the Catholic high school.

When the school district refused, Zobrest and his parents brought a lawsuit in federal court against the school district based on the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act of 1990 (IDEA). The IDEA statute was intended to assist states and localities in the education of handicapped children. The federal district court denied Zobrest's request, concluding that providing him an interpreter would violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed, also concluding that providing an interpreter to accompany Zobrest to a private religious school would unconstitutionally advance religion.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed and held that the Establishment Clause did not bar the school district from providing an interpreter to Zobrest. In its five–four decision written by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, the Court reasoned that "government programs that neutrally provide benefits to a broad class of citizens defined without reference to religion are not readily subject to an Establishment Clause challenge." Otherwise, the Court pointed out, churches and religious schools could not receive the protection of police and fire departments. Additionally, the Court reasoned that a broadly available statutory scheme that incidentally benefited religious schools "as a result of numerous private choices of individual parents" was different from a law that directly provided aid to the schools.

Applying those principles to the facts of this case, the Court concluded that the benefits provided under IDEA were generally available to any handicapped child, regardless of the school the child attended. The Court noted that the choice of school was dependent on the parents' choice and that the statute provided no financial incentive for a parent to choose a religious school. Thus, any benefit Zobrest's Catholic high school might receive under IDEA was not an impermissible advancement of religion.

The school district argued that the provision of an interpreter was similar to the provision of educational services on school premises, a form of aid struck down by the Court in prior cases. The Court responded that the provision of an interpreter to Zobrest was not direct aid to the Catholic high school. Additionally, the Court reiterated that "any attenuated financial benefit that parochial schools do ultimately receive from the IDEA is attributable to the private choices of individual parents." Because "handicapped children, not sectarian schools, are the primary beneficiaries of the IDEA," the Court concluded that the provision of an interpreter to Zobrest to facilitate his education did not violate the Establishment Clause. Later case law regarding governmental aid to religious schools expanded on Zobrest's premise—that the principles of neutrality and private choice would ensure that any incidental benefit to religion was not attributable to the national government.

Elizabeth M. Rhea

See also: Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education; Locke v. Davey.

FURTHER READING

Stiltner, Jeffrey W. "Note: Rethinking the Wall of Separation: Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District—Is This the End of Lemon?" Capital University Law Review 23 (1994): 823–61.

Sturtz, Jody. "Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District: Handicapped Children Versus the Establishment Clause." Detroit College of Law Review (1994): 279–308.

Zoning

Zoning can be described as the legislative attempt to provide for orderly urban growth and to prevent incompatible land uses. It seeks to accomplish this by the designation of zoning categories. Each category includes a description of the types of land use permissible within that category. Zoning may or may not be accompanied by the creation of an overall plan for the development of the city or other geographic entity (county, region, and so on).

In the United States some of the earliest attempts to regulate land use were pioneered by New York City, which developed the first zoning ordinance in 1916. The ordinance was simple. It established height and setback controls on buildings and separated incompatible uses to halt the encroachment of industry into Manhattan's office and department-store districts. Because of the growth of skyscrapers and complaints from city residents that these blocked the sunlight, the ordinance specified buildings should be shaped so as to taper toward their top, like a multitiered cake.

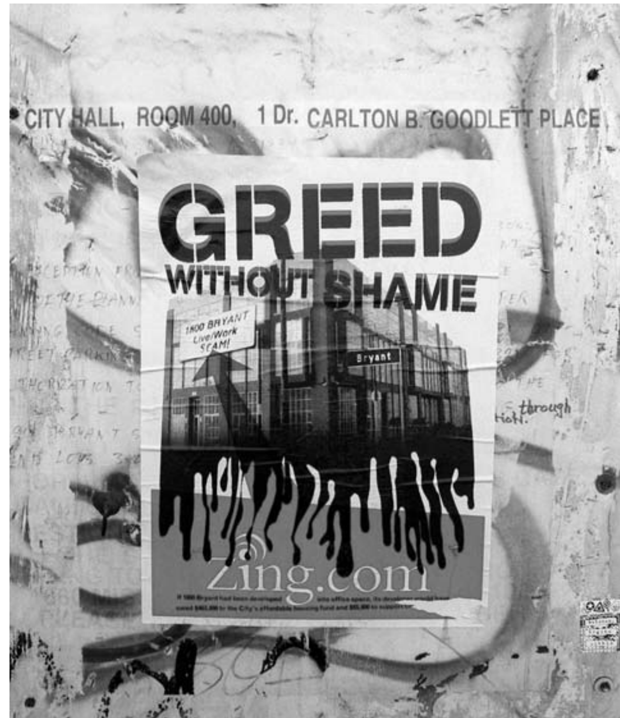
Zoning quickly became popular as cities struggled with uncontrolled urban expansion and development. They sought to protect residential areas from obnoxious and noisy uses. In the process, the values of urban land were affected, some adversely and some positively. Land zoned for industrial and commercial purposes often became more valuable. Landowners sought to obtain zoning classifications that would enhance the value of their land. This principle, which came to be know as the "highest and best use," meant only the most economically valuable use of the land from the perspective of the owner.

During the 1920s, the U.S. Department of Commerce proposed what was to become the Standard Zoning Enabling Act (SZA). All state zoning legislation is based on this act, and although state enabling acts in some instances have substantially modified the SZA, the similar basic framework has led to remarkably consistent court decisions on zoning nationwide.

Zoning began to arouse hostility from landowners whose land was zoned in a category that lessened its value. Some of them challenged the zoning ordinances. In the landmark case Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 375 (1926), the small village of Euclid, on the fringes of Cleveland, Ohio, enacted a zoning ordinance designed to protect Euclid from being overrun by the expansion of Cleveland. Ambler Realty, which owned property it wanted to sell for industrial use, challenged the Euclid ordinance. Ambler claimed the ordinance was unconstitutional on its face and that it constituted a "taking" under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution, under which government cannot take property for public use without compensating the property owner. The U.S. Supreme Court ultimately upheld the validity of Euclid's zoning ordinance as a permissible exercise of the police power to provide for the health, safety, and welfare of the community. After Euclid, it became extremely difficult to invalidate a zoning-change denial or other change, unless it could be shown the change was arbitrary and capricious or was inconsistent with the city's zoning map and/or comprehensive plan.

Zoning became a more complex process over time.



One of several posters hung in San Francisco's Mission District about a controversial use of "live/work" lofts for commercial space, mostly for Internet businesses. Activists placing the posters claim the businesses are bypassing the city's zoning laws and not paying their fair share of taxes as a result. (© Thor Swift/The Image Works)

Original zoning ordinances employed what was known as "cumulative zoning." If there was a zoning category, Ind-1 (Industrial-1), which included heavy industry, any lesser use, such as commercial or even residential, could be placed in an area zoned Ind-1. In contrast, in land zoned R-1 (single-family residential), industrial and commercial uses were prohibited, as were multifamily uses. Cumulative zoning failed to solve many problems, because it often resulted in incompatible uses, such as housing developments located alongside noisy, polluting industrial activities. Thus, noncumulative zoning categories were substituted in modern zoning ordinances. Ind-4, for example, could be used only for heavy industry.

As new urban developments became larger and more complex, cities began to experiment with various new zoning categories, such as "planned urban development" (PUD). Rather than zoning or rezoning individual parcels of land, cities would zone large tracts, which might contain several different zoning categories, such as single-family, multifamily, light office, and commercial retail. A category known as a "floating zone" was even invented, which did not exist in fact but which could be allocated to a tract of land in order to meet certain developmental needs of a developer or the city.

Another Supreme Court decision, Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393 (1922), laid the groundwork for a new line of attack on zoning. Although not a zoning case itself, Pennsylvania Coal established the principle that when regulation (of land use) goes too far, it can be challenged under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments as a regulatory taking. The Court did not provide more specific guidelines as to how far was too far, and this ambiguity provided the basis for extensive litigation in the ensuing years.

In recent years there have been concerted attacks on zoning, at both the federal and state levels, based on the concept of a taking. Bills were introduced in both the U.S. Congress and in numerous state legislatures to provide for automatic compensation by municipalities to landowners when a zoning change had the effect of reducing the value of a landowner's property by some arbitrary percentage, usually around 25 percent. These efforts nationwide were spearheaded by real estate agencies, developers, and timber and mining interests and often went beyond an attack on zoning to include any government regulation having the effect of reducing the value of property interests. A few states and a number of municipalities enacted such laws, among them Oregon and Washington. Washington's law was subsequently repealed.

Zoning also has been criticized for being used to prevent socially undesirable results. This is termed "exclusionary zoning" and usually involves the exclusion of some unwanted group of persons, for example, lower-income or mentally challenged groups. This can be accomplished by large-lot restrictions, up to as much as four acres, and by specific zoning categories that result in exclusion. Courts have been divided on the constitutional validity of these ordinances.

Finally, the concept of zoning itself has been questioned by urban planners in recent years. The so-called New Urbanism movement seeks to replace zoning with the creation of compact, walkable, mixed-use cities, similar to neighborhoods at the turn of the nineteenth century. As of 2003, more than 500 New Urbanism projects were planned or under construction in the United States, half of them in historic urban centers.

James V. Cornehls

See also: Land Use; Property Rights; Takings Clause.

FURTHER READING

Babcock, Richard F. The Zoning Game: Municipal Practices and Policies. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966.

Cordes, Mark W. "Leapfrogging the Constitution: The Rise of State Takings Legislation." Ecology Law Quarterly 24 (1997): 187–242.

Kaiser, Edward J., and David R. Godschalk. "Twentieth Century Land Use Planning: A Stalwart Family Tree." Journal of the American Planning Association 61 (1995): 365.

Mandelker, Daniel. Land Use Law. 4th ed. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 1997.

Zorach v. Clauson (1952)

In Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that students at public schools could be excused from school one hour per week for the purpose of attending religious observance and education off school premises. The Court held that granting students release time from school for religious exercise did not violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, as applied to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Under that religion clause, government is prohibited from engaging in activity that would constitute "establishment of religion." The issue in Zorach was whether the state was advancing religion by permitting students to leave school premises to attend such sessions.

Unlike Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948), which involved unconstitutional use of the public school classroom for religious instruction, Zorach dealt with New York City's policy of granting release time during the school day for students who had parental permission to attend religious instruction or devotional exercises elsewhere; nonattending students remained at school. One important question before the Court was whether school officials used coercion to get students to attend these religious programs and thus violated the Establishment Clause by making the state an agent of one or another religious entity.

The Court wondered whether its previous First Amendment rulings that required "complete and unequivocal separation of church and state" were meant to address every instance in which state action possibly might benefit religion in general. The Court found that an absolute separation of the governmental and religious spheres, without exception, evinced an alienating, "hostile, suspicious, and even unfriendly" stance toward religion. This was not in keeping with the nation's historical wellsprings, as given in perhaps the most famous passage from Zorach: "We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being." Justice William O. Douglas, writing for the Court, stated that merely to adjust classroom schedules so as to encourage religious instruction, or to cooperate with religious authorities, "follows the best of our traditions." To do otherwise would be to "show a callous indifference to religious groups. That would be preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe." The Court construed a thoroughgoing lack of cooperation toward religion as hostility and as favoring nonbelievers.

The three dissenting justices (Hugo L. Black, Felix Frankfurter, and Robert H. Jackson) were not persuaded that moving the religious instruction off school premises crucially distinguished Zorach from McCollum, or that the issue of coercion was adequately understood by the majority. For the dissent, the program not only relied on the state's power to secure school attendance—which a denominational organization perhaps could not do, or not do with confidence—but also denigrated classroom time for those who remained in school. Those who left school were granted release time only on the condition that they attend religious instruction, but Justice Jackson expressed concern for students who remained in class: "[S]chooling is suspended during the 'released time' so the nonreligious attendants will not forge ahead of the churchgoing group. But it serves as a temporary jail for a pupil who will not go to Church."

In addition, the dissenting justices thought it presumptuous to believe that were it not for state cooperation, the intrinsic attractiveness of religion could not by itself draw adherents. For Justice Black, the Establishment Clause turned on whether the state had "entered this forbidden field" of entanglement of church and state at all, the slightest entry being "not separation but combination of Church and State."

Gordon A. Babst

See also: Establishment Clause; Release-Time Program; Separation of Church and State.

FURTHER READING

Feldman, Stephen M. Please Don't Wish Me a Merry Christmas: A Critical History of the Separation of Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Swanson, Wayne R. The Christ Child Goes to Court. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.

Zurcher v. Stanford Daily News (1978)

In Zurcher v. Stanford Daily News, 436 U.S. 547 (1978), the U.S. Supreme Court examined whether the government violated the Constitution when it executed a search warrant issued against a newspaper office that was not a criminal suspect. The Court analyzed important issues pertaining to search and seizure, as governed by the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and to freedom of the press, as guaranteed by the First Amendment; these provisions also have been applied to state governments through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The case arose during the period of protest demonstrations against the Vietnam War, as waves of antiwar activity swept across the country.

On April 9, 1971, demonstrators seized the administrative offices at Stanford University Hospital in Stanford, California, and barricaded the doors. When the police forced their way inside, rioters attacked them with clubs and sticks, injuring nine officers. The student newspaper, The Stanford Daily, ran a special issue devoted to the incident that indicated one of the paper's journalists may have photographed the assailants. The Santa Clara County District Attorney's Office secured a search warrant, and four police officers searched the newspaper office for film of the assailants, but they found nothing relevant.

The Stanford Daily filed a civil suit in federal district court alleging that the search violated their First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The court ruled in favor of the newspaper, holding that the Fourth Amendment prohibited issuing a warrant to search one not suspected of crime except upon a showing that a subpoena would be ineffective. The court also held that the First Amendment prohibited the search of newspaper offices unless the government showed that important evidence would otherwise be destroyed or removed and that a restraining order to prevent destruction or removal of evidence would be futile. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the ruling, and the Supreme Court agreed to review the case.

A divided Supreme Court (five–three, with Justice William J. Brennan Jr. not participating) ruled in favor of the government and reversed the lower-court decision, holding that warrants could be issued to search any property when police had probable cause to believe that evidence related to a crime would be found. In the majority opinion, Justice Byron R. White stated that the government's interest was in enforcing the criminal law, regardless of whether the subject of a search was a criminal suspect or not, and that the framers of the Constitution did not forbid issuing warrants to search the press. He argued that using a subpoena to get evidence could cause delay and result in the disappearance of evidence, since parties would have the opportunity to contest the issuance of subpoenas. Further, because search warrants were more difficult to obtain than subpoenas and subpoenas were not reviewed by judges or magistrates, Justice White argued, subpoenas would not protect the interests of third-party nonsuspects.

Justice Potter Stewart, joined by Justice Thurgood Marshall, dissented from the majority opinion, arguing that it was self-evident that police searches of newspaper offices unconstitutionally burdened freedom of the press. A search, he argued, involved a physical disruption of the operation of the newspaper, but even more serious was the possible disclosure of information from or identity of confidential sources. It was necessary, Justice Stewart urged, to protect these sources to enable the press to fulfill its constitutional function of informing the public.

Justice John Paul Stevens also wrote a dissenting opinion. He argued that countless law-abiding citizens might have materials in their possession relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation, and the consequences of exposing all these people to unannounced police searches would be extremely serious. The dramatic character of a sudden police search, Stevens wrote, could cause an unjustified injury to the reputation of the person searched.

The significance of Stanford Daily was the Court's holding that search warrants could be issued legally against nonsuspects who might have some evidence related to a crime. Furthermore, and particularly alarming to First Amendment advocates, the Court held that the press was subject to these searches to the same degree as were private individuals. This ruling, made by the relatively conservative members of the Court under the leadership of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, however, was circumvented by the Democratic-controlled Congress through its enactment of the Privacy Protection Act of 1980. This law prohibited unannounced searches of media newsrooms by law enforcement officials except in limited circumstances.

Keith Rollin Eakins

See also: Branzburg v. Hayes; First Amendment; Search Warrants.

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 4th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Israel, Jerold H., Yale Kamisar, and Wayne R. LaFave. Criminal Procedure and the Constitution: Leading Supreme Court Cases and Introductory Text. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Magna Carta (1215)

PREAMBLE:

John, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and count of Anjou, to the archbishop, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justiciaries, foresters, sheriffs, stewards, servants, and to all his bailiffs and liege subjects, greetings. Know that, having regard to God and for the salvation of our soul, and those of all our ancestors and heirs, and unto the honor of God and the advancement of his holy Church and for the rectifying of our realm, we have granted as underwritten by advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England and cardinal of the holy Roman Church, Henry, archbishop of Dublin, William of London, Peter of Winchester, Jocelyn of Bath and Glastonbury, Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worcester, William of Coventry, Benedict of Rochester, bishops; of Master Pandulf, subdeacon and member of the household of our lord the Pope, of brother Aymeric (master of the Knights of the Temple in England), and of the illustrious men William Marshal, earl of Pembroke, William, earl of Salisbury, William, earl of Warenne, William, earl of Arundel, Alan of Galloway (constable of Scotland), Waren Fitz Gerold, Peter Fitz Herbert, Hubert De Burgh (seneschal of Poitou), Hugh de Neville, Matthew Fitz Herbert, Thomas Basset, Alan Basset, Philip d'Aubigny, Robert of Roppesley, John Marshal, John Fitz Hugh, and others, our liegemen.

1. In the first place we have granted to God, and by this our present charter confirmed for us and our heirs forever that the English Church shall be free, and shall have her rights entire, and her liberties inviolate; and we will that it be thus observed; which is apparent from this that the freedom of elections, which is reckoned most important and very essential to the English Church, we, of our pure and unconstrained will, did grant, and did by our charter confirm and did obtain the ratification of the same from our lord, Pope Innocent III, before the quarrel arose between us and our barons: and this we will observe, and our will is that it be observed in good faith by our heirs forever. We have also granted to all freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs forever, all the underwritten liberties, to be had and held by them and their heirs, of us and our heirs forever.

2. If any of our earls or barons, or others holding of us in chief by military service shall have died, and at the time of his death his heir shall be full of age and owe "relief," he shall have his inheritance by the old relief, to wit, the heir or heirs of an earl, for the whole barony of an earl by L100; the heir or heirs of a baron, L100 for a whole barony; the heir or heirs of a knight, 100s, at most, and whoever owes less let him give less, according to the ancient custom of fees.

3. If, however, the heir of any one of the aforesaid has been under age and in wardship, let him have his inheritance without relief and without fine when he comes of age.

4. The guardian of the land of an heir who is thus under age, shall take from the land of the heir nothing but reasonable produce, reasonable customs, and reasonable services, and that without destruction or waste of men or goods; and if we have committed the wardship of the lands of any such minor to the sheriff, or to any other who is responsible to us for its issues, and he has made destruction or waster of what he holds in wardship, we will take of him amends, and the land shall be committed to two lawful and discreet men of that fee, who shall be responsible for the issues to us or to him to whom we shall assign them; and if we have given or sold the wardship of any such land to anyone and he has therein made destruction or waste, he shall lose that wardship, and it shall be transferred to two lawful and discreet men of that fief, who shall be responsible to us in like manner as aforesaid.

5. The guardian, moreover, so long as he has the wardship of the land, shall keep up the houses, parks, fishponds, stanks, mills, and other things pertaining to the land, out of the issues of the same land; and he shall restore to the heir, when he has come to full age, all his land, stocked with ploughs and wainage, according as the season of husbandry shall require, and the issues of the land can reasonable bear.

6. Heirs shall be married without disparagement, yet so that before the marriage takes place the nearest in blood to that heir shall have notice.

7. A widow, after the death of her husband, shall forthwith and without difficulty have her marriage portion and inheritance; nor shall she give anything for her dower, or for her marriage portion, or for the inheritance which her husband and she held on the day of the death of that husband; and she may remain in the house of her husband for forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned to her.

8. No widow shall be compelled to marry, so long as she prefers to live without a husband; provided always that she gives security not to marry without our consent, if she holds of us, or without the consent of the lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another.

9. Neither we nor our bailiffs will seize any land or rent for any debt, as long as the chattels of the debtor are sufficient to repay the debt; nor shall the sureties of the debtor be distrained so long as the principal debtor is able to satisfy the debt; and if the principal debtor shall fail to pay the debt, having nothing wherewith to pay it, then the sureties shall answer for the debt; and let them have the lands and rents of the debtor, if they desire them, until they are indemnified for the debt which they have paid for him, unless the principal debtor can show proof that he is discharged thereof as against the said sureties.

10. If one who has borrowed from the Jews any sum, great or small, die before that loan be repaid, the debt shall not bear interest while the heir is under age, of whomsoever he may hold; and if the debt fall into our hands, we will not take anything except the principal sum contained in the bond.

11. And if anyone die indebted to the Jews, his wife shall have her dower and pay nothing of that debt; and if any children of the deceased are left under age, necessaries shall be provided for them in keeping with the holding of the deceased; and out of the residue the debt shall be paid, reserving, however, service due to feudal lords; in like manner let it be done touching debts due to others than Jews.

12. No scutage not aid shall be imposed on our kingdom, unless by common counsel of our kingdom, except for ransoming our person, for making our eldest son a knight, and for once marrying our eldest daughter; and for these there shall not be levied more than a reasonable aid. In like manner it shall be done concerning aids from the city of London.

13. And the city of London shall have all its ancient liberties and free customs, as well by land as by water; furthermore, we decree and grant that all other cities, boroughs, towns, and ports shall have all their liberties and free customs.

14. And for obtaining the common counsel of the kingdom anent the assessing of an aid (except in the three cases aforesaid) or of a scutage, we will cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, severally by our letters; and we will moveover cause to be summoned generally, through our sheriffs and bailiffs, and others who hold of us in chief, for a fixed date, namely, after the expiry of at least forty days, and at a fixed place; and in all letters of such summons we will specify the reason of the summons. And when the summons has thus been made, the business shall proceed on the day appointed, according to the counsel of such as are present, although not all who were summoned have come.

15. We will not for the future grant to anyone license to take an aid from his own free tenants, except to ransom his person, to make his eldest son a knight, and once to marry his eldest daughter; and on each of these occasions there shall be levied only a reasonable aid.

16. No one shall be distrained for performance of greater service for a knight's fee, or for any other free tenement, than is due therefrom.

17. Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be held in some fixed place.

18. Inquests of novel disseisin, of mort d'ancestor, and of darrein presentment shall not be held elsewhere than in their own county courts, and that in manner following; We, or, if we should be out of the realm, our chief justiciar, will send two justiciaries through every county four times a year, who shall alone with four knights of the county chosen by the county, hold the said assizes in the county court, on the day and in the place of meeting of that court.

19. And if any of the said assizes cannot be taken on the day of the county court, let there remain of the knights and freeholders, who were present at the county court on that day, as many as may be required for the efficient making of judgments, according as the business be more or less.

20. A freeman shall not be amerced for a slight offense, except in accordance with the degree of the offense; and for a grave offense he shall be amerced in accordance with the gravity of the offense, yet saving always his "contentment"; and a merchant in the same way, saving his "merchandise"; and a villein shall be amerced in the same way, saving his "wainage" if they have fallen into our mercy: and none of the aforesaid amercements shall be imposed except by the oath of honest men of the neighborhood.

21. Earls and barons shall not be amerced except through their peers, and only in accordance with the degree of the offense.

22. A clerk shall not be amerced in respect of his lay holding except after the manner of the others aforesaid; further, he shall not be amerced in accordance with the extent of his ecclesiastical benefice.

23. No village or individual shall be compelled to make bridges at river banks, except those who from of old were legally bound to do so.

24. No sheriff, constable, coroners, or others of our bailiffs, shall hold pleas of our Crown.

25. All counties, hundred, wapentakes, and trithings (except our demesne manors) shall remain at the old rents, and without any additional payment.

26. If anyone holding of us a lay fief shall die, and our sheriff or bailiff shall exhibit our letters patent of summons for a debt which the deceased owed us, it shall be lawful for our sheriff or bailiff to attach and enroll the chattels of the deceased, found upon the lay fief, to the value of that debt, at the sight of law worthy men, provided always that nothing whatever be thence removed until the debt which is evident shall be fully paid to us; and the residue shall be left to the executors to fulfill the will of the deceased; and if there be nothing due from him to us, all the chattels shall go to the deceased, saving to his wife and children their reasonable shares.

27. If any freeman shall die intestate, his chattels shall be distributed by the hands of his nearest kinsfolk and friends, under supervision of the Church, saving to every one the debts which the deceased owed to him.

28. No constable or other bailiff of ours shall take corn or other provisions from anyone without immediately tendering money therefor, unless he can have postponement thereof by permission of the seller.

29. No constable shall compel any knight to give money in lieu of castle-guard, when he is willing to perform it in his own person, or (if he himself cannot do it from any reasonable cause) then by another responsible man. Further, if we have led or sent him upon military service, he shall be relieved from guard in proportion to the time during which he has been on service because of us.

30. No sheriff or bailiff of ours, or other person, shall take the horses or carts of any freeman for transport duty, against the will of the said freeman.

31. Neither we nor our bailiffs shall take, for our castles or for any other work of ours, wood which is not ours, against the will of the owner of that wood.

32. We will not retain beyond one year and one day, the lands [of] those who have been convicted of felony, and the lands shall thereafter be handed over to the lords of the fiefs.

33. All kydells for the future shall be removed altogether from Thames and Medway, and throughout all England, except upon the seashore.

34. The writ which is called praecipe shall not for the future be issued to anyone, regarding any tenement whereby a freeman may lose his court.

35. Let there be one measure of wine throughout our whole realm; and one measure of ale; and one measure of corn, to wit, "the London quarter"; and one width of cloth (whether dyed, or russet, or "halberget"), to wit, two ells within the selvedges; of weights also let it be as of measures.

36. Nothing in future shall be given or taken for a writ of inquisition of life or limbs, but freely it shall be granted, and never denied.

37. If anyone holds of us by fee-farm, either by socage or by burage, or of any other land by knight's service, we will not (by reason of that fee-farm, socage, or burage), have the wardship of the heir, or of such land of his as if of the fief of that other; nor shall we have wardship of that fee-farm, socage, or burgage, unless such fee-farm owes knight's service. We will not by reason of any small serjeancy which anyone may hold of us by the service of rendering to us knives, arrows, or the like, have wardship of his heir or of the land which he holds of another lord by knight's service.

38. No bailiff for the future shall, upon his own unsupported complaint, put anyone to his "law," without credible witnesses brought for this purpose.

39. No freemen shall be taken or imprisoned or disseised or exiled or in any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him nor send upon him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

40. To no one will we sell, to no one will we refuse or delay, right or justice.

41. All merchants shall have safe and secure exit from England, and entry to England, with the right to tarry there and to move about as well by land as by water, for buying and selling by the ancient and right customs, quit from all evil tolls, except (in time of war) such merchants as are of the land at war with us. And if such are found in our land at the beginning of the war, they shall be detained, without injury to their bodies or goods, until information be received by us, or by our chief justiciar, how the merchants of our land found in the land at war with us are treated; and if our men are safe there, the others shall be safe in our land.

42. It shall be lawful in future for anyone (excepting always those imprisoned or outlawed in accordance with the law of the kingdom, and natives of any country at war with us, and merchants, who shall be treated as if above provided) to leave our kingdom and to return, safe and secure by land and water, except for a short period in time of war, on grounds of public policy-reserving always the allegiance due to us.

43. If anyone holding of some escheat (such as the honor of Wallingford, Nottingham, Boulogne, Lancaster, or of other escheats which are in our hands and are baronies) shall die, his heir shall give no other relief, and perform no other service to us than he would have done to the baron if that barony had been in the baron's hand; and we shall hold it in the same manner in which the baron held it.

44. Men who dwell without the forest need not henceforth come before our justiciaries of the forest upon a general summons, unless they are in plea, or sureties of one or more, who are attached for the forest.

45. We will appoint as justices, constables, sheriffs, or bailiffs only such as know the law of the realm and mean to observe it well.

46. All barons who have founded abbeys, concerning which they hold charters from the kings of England, or of which they have long continued possession, shall have the wardship of them, when vacant, as they ought to have.

47. All forests that have been made such in our time shall forthwith be disafforested; and a similar course shall be followed with regard to river banks that have been placed "in defense" by us in our time.

48. All evil customs connected with forests and warrens, foresters and warreners, sheriffs and their officers, river banks and their wardens, shall immediately be inquired into in each county by twelve sworn knights of the same county chosen by the honest men of the same county, and shall, within forty days of the said inquest, be utterly abolished, so as never to be restored, provided always that we previously have intimation thereof, or our justiciar, if we should not be in England.

49. We will immediately restore all hostages and charters delivered to us by Englishmen, as sureties of the peace of faithful service.

50. We will entirely remove from their bailiwicks, the relations of Gerard of Athee (so that in future they shall have no bailiwick in England); namely, Engelard of Cigogne, Peter, Guy, and Andrew of Chanceaux, Guy of Cigogne, Geoffrey of Martigny with his brothers, Philip Mark with his brothers and his nephew Geoffrey, and the whole brood of the same.

51. As soon as peace is restored, we will banish from the kingdom all foreign born knights, crossbowmen, serjeants, and mercenary soldiers who have come with horses and arms to the kingdom's hurt.

52. If anyone has been dispossessed or removed by us, without the legal judgment of his peers, from his lands, castles, franchises, or from his right, we will immediately restore them to him; and if a dispute arise over this, then let it be decided by the five and twenty barons of whom mention is made below in the clause for securing the peace. Moreover, for all those possessions, from which anyone has, without the lawful judgment of his peers, been disseised or removed, by our father, King Henry, or by our brother, King Richard, and which we retain in our hand (or which as possessed by others, to whom we are bound to warrant them), we shall have respite until the usual term of crusaders, excepting those things about which a plea has been raised, or an inquest made by our order, before our taking of the cross; but as soon as we return from the expedition, we will immediately grant full justice therein.

53. We shall have, moreover, the same respite and in the same manner in rendering justice concerning the disafforestation or retention of those forests which Henry our father and Richard our brother afforested, and concerning the wardship of lands which are of the fief of another (namely, such wardships as we have hitherto had by reason of a fief which anyone held of us by knight's service), and concerning abbeys founded on other fiefs than our own, in which the lord of the fee claims to have right; and when we have returned, or if we desist from our expedition, we will immediately grant full justice to all who complain of such things.

54. No one shall be arrested or imprisoned upon the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other than her husband.

55. All fines made with us unjustly and against the law of the land, and all amercements, imposed unjustly and against the law of the land, shall be entirely remitted, or else it shall be done concerning them according to the decision of the five and twenty barons whom mention is made below in the clause for securing the peace, or according to the judgment of the majority of the same, along with the aforesaid Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and such others as he may wish to bring with him for this purpose, and if he cannot be present the business shall nevertheless proceed without him, provided always that if any one or more of the aforesaid five and twenty barons are in a similar suit, they shall be removed as far as concerns this particular judgment, others being substituted in their places after having been selected by the rest of the same five and twenty for this purpose only, and after having been sworn.

56. If we have disseised or removed Welshmen from lands or liberties, or other things, without the legal judgment of their peers in England or in Wales, they shall be immediately restored to them; and if a dispute arise over this, then let it be decided in the marches by the judgment of their peers; for the tenements in England according to the law of England, for tenements in Wales according to the law of Wales, and for tenements in the marches according to the law of the marches. Welshmen shall do the same to us and ours.

57. Further, for all those possessions from which any Welshman has, without the lawful judgment of his peers, been disseised or removed by King Henry our father, or King Richard our brother, and which we retain in our hand (or which are possessed by others, and which we ought to warrant), we will have respite until the usual term of crusaders; excepting those things about which a plea has been raised or an inquest made by our order before we took the cross; but as soon as we return (or if perchance we desist from our expedition), we will immediately grant full justice in accordance with the laws of the Welsh and in relation to the foresaid regions.

58. We will immediately give up the son of Llywelyn and all the hostages of Wales, and the charters delivered to us as security for the peace.

59. We will do towards Alexander, king of Scots, concerning the return of his sisters and his hostages, and concerning his franchises, and his right, in the same manner as we shall do towards our other barons of England, unless it ought to be otherwise according to the charters which we hold from William his father, formerly king of Scots; and this shall be according to the judgment of his peers in our court.

60. Moreover, all these aforesaid customs and liberties, the observances of which we have granted in our kingdom as far as pertains to us towards our men, shall be observed by all of our kingdom, as well clergy as laymen, as far as pertains to them towards their men.

61. Since, moveover, for God and the amendment of our kingdom and for the better allaying of the quarrel that has arisen between us and our barons, we have granted all these concessions, desirous that they should enjoy them in complete and firm endurance forever, we give and grant to them the underwritten security, namely, that the barons choose five and twenty barons of the kingdom, whomsoever they will, who shall be bound with all their might, to observe and hold, and cause to be observed, the peace and liberties we have granted and confirmed to them by this our present Charter, so that if we, or our justiciar, or our bailiffs or any one of our officers, shall in anything be at fault towards anyone, or shall have broken any one of the articles of this peace or of this security, and the offense be notified to four barons of the foresaid five and twenty, the said four barons shall repair to us (or our justiciar, if we are out of the realm) and, laying the transgression before us, petition to have that transgression redressed without delay. And if we shall not have corrected the transgression (or, in the event of our being out of the realm, if our justiciar shall not have corrected it) within forty days, reckoning from the time it has been intimated to us (or to our justiciar, if we should be out of the realm), the four barons aforesaid shall refer that matter to the rest of the five and twenty barons, and those five and twenty barons shall, together with the community of the whole realm, distrain and distress us in all possible ways, namely, by seizing our castles, lands, possessions, and in any other way they can, until redress has been obtained as they deem fit, saving harmless our own person, and the persons of our queen and children; and when redress has been obtained, they shall resume their old relations towards us. And let whoever in the country desires it, swear to obey the orders of the said five and twenty barons for the execution of all the aforesaid matters, and along with them, to molest us to the utmost of his power; and we publicly and freely grant leave to everyone who wishes to swear, and we shall never forbid anyone to swear. All those, moveover, in the land who of themselves and of their own accord are unwilling to swear to the twenty five to help them in constraining and molesting us, we shall by our command compel the same to swear to the effect foresaid. And if any one of the five and twenty barons shall have died or departed from the land, or be incapacitated in any other manner which would prevent the foresaid provisions being carried out, those of the said twenty five barons who are left shall choose another in his place according to their own judgment, and he shall be sworn in the same way as the others. Further, in all matters, the execution of which is entrusted, to these twenty five barons, if perchance these twenty five are present and disagree about anything, or if some of them, after being summoned, are unwilling or unable to be present, that which the majority of those present ordain or command shall be held as fixed and established, exactly as if the whole twenty five had concurred in this; and the said twenty five shall swear that they will faithfully observe all that is aforesaid, and cause it to be observed with all their might. And we shall procure nothing from anyone, directly or indirectly, whereby any part of these concessions and liberties might be revoked or diminished; and if any such thing has been procured, let it be void and null, and we shall never use it personally or by another.

62. And all the will, hatreds, and bitterness that have arisen between us and our men, clergy and lay, from the date of the quarrel, we have completely remitted and pardoned to everyone. Moreover, all trespasses occasioned by the said quarrel, from Easter in the sixteenth year of our reign till the restoration of peace, we have fully remitted to all, both clergy and laymen, and completely forgiven, as far as pertains to us. And on this head, we have caused to be made for them letters testimonial patent of the lord Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, of the lord Henry, archbishop of Dublin, of the bishops aforesaid, and of Master Pandulf as touching this security and the concessions aforesaid.

63. Wherefore we will and firmly order that the English Church be free, and that the men in our kingdom have and hold all the aforesaid liberties, rights, and concessions, well and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, for themselves and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all respects and in all places forever, as is aforesaid. An oath, moreover, has been taken, as well on our part as on the part of the barons, that all these conditions aforesaid shall be kept in good faith and without evil intent. Given under our hand—the above named and many others being witnesses—in the meadow which is called Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines, on the fifteenth day of June, in the seventeenth year of our reign.

The Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776)

VIRGINIA CONVENTION OF DELEGATES

Adopted unanimously June 12, 1776

I
That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

II
That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them.

III
That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation or community; of all the various modes and forms of government that is best, which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety and is most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration; and that, whenever any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal.

IV
That no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services; which, not being descendible, neither ought the offices of magistrate, legislator, or judge be hereditary.

V
That the legislative and executive powers of the state should be separate and distinct from the judicative; and, that the members of the two first may be restrained from oppression by feeling and participating the burthens of the people, they should, at fixed periods, be reduced to a private station, return into that body from which they were originally taken, and the vacancies be supplied by frequent, certain, and regular elections in which all, or any part of the former members, to be again eligible, or ineligible, as the laws shall direct.

VI
That elections of members to serve as representatives of the people in assembly ought to be free; and that all men, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community have the right of suffrage and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses without their own consent or that of their representatives so elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not, in like manner, assented, for the public good.

VII
That all power of suspending laws, or the execution of laws, by any authority without consent of the representatives of the people is injurious to their rights and ought not to be exercised.

VIII
That in all capital or criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, to call for evidence in his favor, and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he cannot be found guilty, nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; that no man be deprived of his liberty except by the law of the land or the judgement of his peers.

IX
That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

X
That general warrants, whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded to search suspected places without evidence of a fact committed, or to seize any person or persons not named, or whose offense is not particularly described and supported by evidence, are grievous and oppressive and ought not to be granted.

XI

That in controversies respecting property and in suits between man and man, the ancient trial by jury is preferable to any other and ought to be held sacred.

XII

That the freedom of the press is one of the greatest bulwarks of liberty and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.

XIII

That a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defense of a free state; that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided as dangerous to liberty; and that, in all cases, the military should be under strict subordination to, and be governed by, the civil power.

XIV

That the people have a right to uniform government; and therefore, that no government separate from, or independent of, the government of Virginia, ought to be erected or established within the limits thereof.

XV

That no free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.

XVI

That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator and the manner of discharging it, can be directed by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and therefore, all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity towards each other.

The Declaration of Independence (1776)

ACTION OF SECOND CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, JULY 4, 1776

The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen United States of America

WHEN in the Course of human Events, it becomes necessary for one People to dissolve the Political Bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the Earth, the separate and equal Station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the Separation.

WE hold these Truths to be self-evident, that all Men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness—That to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed, that whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these Ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its Foundation on such Principles, and organizing its Powers in such Form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient Causes; and accordingly all Experience hath shewn, that Mankind are more disposed to suffer, while Evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the Forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long Train of Abuses and Usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object, evinces a Design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their Right, it is their Duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future Security. Such has been the patient Sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the Necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government. The History of the present King of Great Britain is a History of repeated Injuries and Usurpations, all having in direct Object the Establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid World.

HE has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public Good.

HE has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing Importance, unless suspended in their Operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

HE has refused to pass other Laws for the Accommodation of large Districts of People, unless those People would relinquish the Right of Representation in the Legislature, a Right inestimable to them, and formidable to Tyrants only.

HE has called together Legislative Bodies at Places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the Depository of their public Records, for the sole Purpose of fatiguing them into Compliance with his Measures.

HE has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly Firmness his Invasions on the Rights of the People.

HE has refused for a long Time, after such Dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative Powers, incapable of the Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the Dangers of Invasion from without, and the Convulsions within.

HE has endeavoured to prevent the Population of these States; for that Purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their Migrations hither, and raising the Conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.

HE has obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary Powers.

HE has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the Tenure of their Offices, and the Amount and Payment of their Salaries.

HE has erected a Multitude of new Offices, and sent hither Swarms of Officers to harrass our People, and eat out their Substance.

HE has kept among us, in Times of Peace, Standing Armies, without the consent of our Legislatures.

HE has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil Power.

HE has combined with others to subject us to a Jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution, and unacknowledged by our Laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:

FOR quartering large Bodies of Armed Troops among us:

FOR protecting them, by a mock Trial, from Punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States:

FOR cutting off our Trade with all Parts of the World:

FOR imposing Taxes on us without our Consent:

FOR depriving us, in many Cases, of the Benefits of Trial by Jury:

FOR transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended Offences:

FOR abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighbouring Province, establishing therein an arbitrary Government, and enlarging its Boundaries, so as to render it at once an Example and fit Instrument for introducing the same absolute Rules into these Colonies:

FOR taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments:

FOR suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with Power to legislate for us in all Cases whatsoever.

HE has abdicated Government here, by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us.

HE has plundered our Seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our Towns, and destroyed the Lives of our People.

HE is, at this Time, transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to compleat the Works of Death, Desolation, and Tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty and Perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous Ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized Nation.

HE has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the Executioners of their Friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.

HE has excited domestic Insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the Inhabitants of our Frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known Rule of Warfare, is an undistinguished Destruction, of all Ages, Sexes and Conditions.

IN every stage of these Oppressions we have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble Terms: Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated Injury. A Prince, whose Character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the Ruler of a free People.

NOR have we been wanting in Attentions to our British Brethren. We have warned them from Time to Time of Attempts by their Legislature to extend an unwarrantable Jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the Circumstances of our Emigration and Settlement here. We have appealed to their native Justice and Magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the Ties of our common Kindred to disavow these Usurpations, which, would inevitably interrupt our Connections and Correspondence. They too have been deaf to the Voice of Justice and of Consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the Necessity, which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of Mankind, Enemies in War, in Peace, Friends.

WE, therefore, the Representatives of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in GENERAL CONGRESS, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the Rectitude of our Intentions, do, in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly Publish and Declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be,

FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES; that they are absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political Connection between them and the State of Great-Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which INDEPENDENT STATES may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm Reliance on the Protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

John Hancock.

Georgia: Button Gwinnett, Lyman Hall, Geo. Walton.

North Carolina: Wm. Hooper, Joseph Hewes, John Penn.

South Carolina: Edward Rutledge, Thos. Heyward, Jr., Thomas Lynch, Jr., Arthur Middleton.

Maryland: Samuel Chase, Wm. Paca, Thos. Stone, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton.

Virginia: George Wythe, Richard Henry Lee, Thos. Jefferson, Benja. Harrison, Thos. Nelson, Jr., Francis Lightfoot Lee, Carter Braxton.

Pennsylvania: Robt. Morris, Benjamin Rush, Benja. Franklin, John Morton, Geo. Clymer, Jas. Smith, Geo. Taylor, James Wilson, Geo. Ross.

Delaware: Caesar Rodney, Geo. Read.

New York: Wm. Floyd, Phil. Livingston, Frank Lewis, Lewis Morris.

New Jersey: Richd. Stockton, Jno. Witherspoon, Fras. Hopkinson, John Hart, Abra. Clark.

New Hampshire: Josiah Bartlett, Wm. Whipple, Matthew Thornton.

Massachusetts Bay: Saml. Adams, John Adams, Robt. Treat Paine, Elbridge Gerry.

Rhode Island: C. Step. Hopkins, William Ellery.

Connecticut: Roger Sherman, Saml. Huntington, Wm. Williams, Oliver Wolcott.

IN CONGRESS, JANUARY 18, 1777.

Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union (1781)

TO ALL WHOM THESE PRESENTS SHALL COME, we the undersigned Delegates of the States affixed to our Names send greeting. Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

Article I

The Stile of this Confederacy shall be "The United States of America."

Article II

Each state retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled.

Article III

The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever.

Article IV

The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively, provided that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State, to any other State, of which the owner is an inhabitant; provided also that no imposition, duties or restriction shall be laid by any State, on the property of the United States, or either of them.

If any person guilty of, or charged with, treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any State, shall flee from justice, and be found in any of the United States, he shall, upon demand of the Governor or executive power of the State from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of his offense.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these States to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other State.

Article V

For the most convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislatures of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year.

No State shall be represented in Congress by less than two, nor more than seven members; and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he, or another for his benefit, receives any salary, fees or emolument of any kind.

Each State shall maintain its own delegates in a meeting of the States, and while they act as members of the committee of the States.

In determining questions in the United States in Congress assembled, each State shall have one vote.

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress, and the members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests or imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendence on Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

Article VI

No State, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance or treaty with any King, Prince or

State; nor shall any person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any of them, accept any present, emolument, office or title of any kind whatever from any King, Prince or foreign State; nor shall the United States in Congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.

No two or more States shall enter into any treaty, confederation or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No State shall lay any imposts or duties, which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties, entered into by the United States in Congress assembled, with any King, Prince or State, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by Congress, to the courts of France and Spain.

No vessel of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any State, except such number only, as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in Congress assembled, for the defense of such State, or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any State in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgement of the United States in Congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defense of such State; but every State shall always keep up a well-regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutered, and shall provide and constantly have ready for use, in public stores, a due number of filed pieces and tents, and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition and camp equipage.

No State shall engage in any war without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such State, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay till the United States in Congress assembled can be consulted; nor shall any State grant commissions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the United States in Congress assembled, and then only against the Kingdom or State and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be infested by pirates, in which case vessels of war may be fitted out for that occasion, and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the United States in Congress assembled shall determine otherwise.

Article VII

When land forces are raised by any State for the common defense, all officers of or under the rank of colonel, shall be appointed by the legislature of each State respectively, by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such State shall direct, and all vacancies shall be filled up by the State which first made the appointment.

Article VIII

All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint.

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled.

Article IX

The United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article—of sending and receiving ambassadors—entering into treaties and alliances, provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners, as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever—of establishing rules for deciding in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the service of the United States shall be divided or appropriated—of granting letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace—appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies commited on the high seas and establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures, provided that no member of Congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the said courts.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting or that hereafter may arise between two or more States concerning boundary, jurisdiction or any other causes whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following. Whenever the legislative or executive authority or lawful agent of any State in controversy with another shall present a petition to Congress stating the matter in question and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of Congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other State in controversy, and a day assigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint by joint consent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question: but if they cannot agree, Congress shall name three persons out of each of the United States, and from the list of such persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven, nor more than nine names as Congress shall direct, shall in the presence of Congress be drawn out by lot, and the persons whose names shall be so drawn or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controversy, so always as a major part of the judges who shall hear the cause shall agree in the determination: and if either party shall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without showing reasons, which Congress shall judge sufficient, or being present shall refuse to strike, the Congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each State, and the secretary of Congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgement and sentence of the court to be appointed, in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and if any of the parties shall refuse to submit to the authority of such court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce sentence, or judgement, which shall in like manner be final and decisive, the judgement or sentence and other proceedings being in either case transmitted to Congress, and lodged among the acts of Congress for the security of the parties concerned: provided that every commissioner, before he sits in judgement, shall take an oath to be administered by one of the judges of the supreme or superior court of the State, where the cause shall be tried, 'well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question, according to the best of his judgement, without favor, affection or hope of reward': provided also, that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil claimed under different grants of two or more States, whose jurisdictions as they may respect such lands, and the States which passed such grants are adjusted, the said grants or either of them being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall on the petition of either party to the Congress of the United States, be finally determined as near as may be in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different States.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective States—fixing the standards of weights and measures throughout the United States—regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the States, provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated—establishing or regulating post offices from one State to another, throughout all the United States, and exacting such postage on the papers passing through the same as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the said office—appointing all officers of the land forces, in the service of the United States, excepting regimental officers—appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the United States—making rules for the government and regulation of the said land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The United States in Congress assembled shall have authority to appoint a committee, to sit in the recess of Congress, to be denominated 'A Committee of the States,' and to consist of one delegate from each State; and to appoint such other committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the United States under their direction—to appoint one of their members to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of president more than one year in any term of three years; to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the United States, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expenses—to borrow money, or emit bills on the credit of the United States, transmitting every half-year to the respective States an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted—to build and equip a navy—to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each State for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such State; which requisition shall be binding, and thereupon the legislature of each State shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men and cloath, arm and equip them in a solid-like manner, at the expense of the United States; and the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled. But if the United States in Congress assembled shall, on consideration of circumstances judge proper that any State should not raise men, or should raise a smaller number of men than the quota thereof, such extra number shall be raised, officered, cloathed, armed and equipped in the same manner as the quota of each State, unless the legislature of such State shall judge that such extra number cannot be safely spread out in the same, in which case they shall raise, officer, cloath, arm and equip as many of such extra number as they judge can be safely spared. And the officers and men so cloathed, armed, and equipped, shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled.

The United States in Congress assembled shall never engage in a war, nor grant letters of marque or reprisal in time of peace, nor enter into any treaties or alliances, nor coin money, nor regulate the value thereof, nor ascertain the sums and expenses necessary for the defense and welfare of the United States, or any of them, nor emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the United States, nor appropriate money, nor agree upon the number of vessels of war, to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised, nor appoint a commander in chief of the army or navy, unless nine States assent to the same: nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day be determined, unless by the votes of the majority of the United States in Congress assembled.

The Congress of the United States shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the United States, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of six months, and shall publish the journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts thereof relating to treaties, alliances or military operations, as in their judgement require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each State on any question shall be entered on the journal, when it is desired by any delegates of a State, or any of them, at his or their request shall be furnished with a transcript of the said journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the legislatures of the several States.

Article X

The Committee of the States, or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of Congress, such of the powers of Congress as the United States in Congress assembled, by the consent of the nine States, shall from time to time think expedient to vest them with; provided that no power be delegated to the said Committee, for the exercise of which, by the Articles of Confederation, the voice of nine States in the Congress of the United States assembled be requisite.

Article XI

Canada acceding to this confederation, and adjoining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this Union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine States.

Article XII

All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed, and debts contracted by, or under the authority of Congress, before the assembling of the United States, in pursuance of the present confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the United States, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said United States, and the public faith are hereby solemnly pledged.

Article XIII

Every State shall abide by the determination of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the Articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.

And Whereas it hath pleased the Great Governor of the World to incline the hearts of the legislatures we respectively represent in Congress, to approve of, and to authorize us to ratify the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union. Know Ye that we the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do by these presents, in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents, fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union, and all and singular the matters and things therein contained: And we do further solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents, that they shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions, which by the said Confederation are submitted to them. And that the Articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the States we respectively represent, and that the Union shall be perpetual.

In Witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands in Congress. Done at Philadelphia in the State of Pennsylvania the ninth day of July in the Year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-Eight, and in the Third Year of the independence of America.

The Constitution of the United States (1788)

WE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, in order to form a more perfect union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

Section 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

Section 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of Honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

Section 4. The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

Section 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member. Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time: and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

Section 7. All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by Yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Section Law. Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Section 8. The Congress shall have Power to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

- To borrow Money on the credit of the United States;
- To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;
- To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;
- To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;
- To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;
- To establish Post Offices and post Roads;
- To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;
- To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;
- To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offenses against the Law of Nations;
- To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;
- To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;
- To provide and maintain a Navy;
- To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;
- To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;
- To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;
- To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings;—And
- To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

Section 9. The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another: nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear or pay Duties in another.

No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

Section 10. No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Control of the Congress.

No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II

Section 1. The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States. No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be encreased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Section 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Section 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Section 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III

Section 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Section 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;

- to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;
- to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;
- to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;
- to Controversies between two or more States;
- between a State and Citizens of another State;
- between Citizens of different States;

- between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects. In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

Section 3. Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

ARTICLE IV

Section 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records, and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Section 2. The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

Section 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new States shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI

All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

Done in Convention by the Unanimous Consent of the States present the Seventeenth Day of September in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the Twelfth. In witness whereof We have hereunto subscribed our Names,

George Washington—President and deputy from Virginia
New Hampshire: John Langdon, Nicholas Gilman
Massachusetts: Nathaniel Gorham, Rufus King
Connecticut: William Samuel Johnson, Roger Sherman
New York: Alexander Hamilton
New Jersey: William Livingston, David Brearly, William Paterson, Jonathan Dayton
Pennsylvania: Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Mifflin, Robert Morris, George Clymer, Thomas FitzSimons, Jared Ingersoll, James Wilson, Gouverneur Morris
Delaware: George Read, Gunning Bedford, Jr., John Dickinson, Richard Bassett, Jacob Broom
Maryland: James McHenry, Daniel of Saint Thomas Jenifer, Daniel Carroll Virginia: John Blair, James Madison, Jr.
North Carolina: William Blount, Richard Dobbs Spaight, Hugh Williamson
South Carolina: John Rutledge, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Charles Pinckney, Pierce Butler
Georgia: William Few, Abraham Baldwin

The Bill of Rights (1789)

Amendment I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Amendment II

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Amendment III

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Amendment IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Amendment V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Amendment VI

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Amendment VII

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

Amendment VIII

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Amendment IX

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Amendment X

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Chronology

1215 King John I of England signs the Magna Carta at Runnymeade, England; the document was the basis for subsequent claims for many civil liberties.

1607 English settlers found Jamestown, Virginia.

1619 First meeting of the Virginia House of Burgesses.

Africans arrive in Virginia as indentured servants.

1620 Settlers in modern-day Massachusetts sign the Mayflower Compact.

1628 English Parliament drafts Petition of Right.

1641 Massachusetts adopts the Massachusetts Body of Liberties.

1644 John Milton publishes his Areopagitica in defense of freedom of the press.

1647 Putney debates in England raise serious questions about the nature of liberty.

1679 English Parliament adopts Habeas Corpus Act.

1681 King Charles II grants a charter to William Penn for a colony in North America.

Penn's colony in Pennsylvania would become a haven for Quakers fleeing religious persecution.

1688 "Glorious Revolution" in England replaces James II with King William of Orange and Queen Mary.

1689 English Parliament establishes a Bill of Rights.

1692 Salem witch trials.

1735 Trial of John Peter Zenger results in an acquittal on charges of seditious libel.

1761 James Otis argues for colonial rights in the Writs of Assistance Case. His opposition to general warrants prepared the way for the limits on search warrants later established by the Fourth Amendment.

1763 End of the French and Indian War marks the end of Britain's policy of "salutary neglect" in the colonies and the beginning of assertions of parliamentary power that result in the Revolutionary War.

1770 John Adams defends British soldiers in the Boston Massacre trials.

1775 Fighting between the colonists and the English breaks out at Lexington and Concord, Massachusetts.

1776 George Mason authors the Virginia Declaration of Rights.

Thomas Jefferson writes, and the Second Continental Congress revises and adopts, the Declaration of Independence.

1777 Continental Congress proposes the Articles of Confederation.

1780 Massachusetts adopts a state constitution that will influence the later writing of the U.S. Constitution.

1781 The last state ratifies the Articles of Confederation.

1783 Treaty of Paris is signed recognizing peace between the United States and Great Britain.

George Washington refuses to support troops who want to march on the national capital to demand back pay, thus helping to reinforce the idea of military subordination to civilian authorities.

1785 James Madison authors "Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments."

1786 Virginia adopts Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom.

1787 U.S. Constitutional Convention meets in Philadelphia.

Articles of Confederation adopts the Northwest Ordinance.

1788 Requisite number of states ratify the U.S. Constitution.

1789 George Washington is inaugurated as the first president of the United States.

1789 Judiciary Act establishes the U.S. Supreme Court and permits appeals to reach the Court both from lower federal courts and from state supreme courts.

Office of Attorney General created by act of Congress.

Led by James Madison, the First Continental Congress proposes twelve amendments, ten of which would become the Bill of Rights.

Alexander Hamilton's proposal for the establishment of a national bank leads to divisions between Federalists and Democratic-Republicans (precursors to today's Democrats).

1791 Bill of Rights is ratified by the requisite number of states.

1798 Congress adopts the repressive Alien and Sedition Acts.

Virginia and Kentucky respond with resolutions questioning congressional authority.

Supreme Court decides in Calder v. Bull that the ex post facto provision in the Constitution applies only to retroactive criminal laws.

1801 Thomas Jefferson wins the presidential election, resulting in a transfer of power from the Federalist Party to the Democratic-Republicans.

John Marshall becomes chief justice of the United States.

1803 Chief Justice John Marshall asserts the principle of judicial review, by which federal courts can invalidate national legislation, in Marbury v. Madison.

1810 In Fletcher v. Peck, the Supreme Court declares it has the power to review the constitutionality of state laws.

1819 In McCulloch v. Maryland, the Supreme Court upholds the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States and indicates that Congress has expansive power under the Necessary and Proper Clause of the Constitution.

Supreme Court rules in Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward that a colonial charter is a contract protected against infringement under the U.S. Constitution.

1820 Missouri Compromise admits Maine as a free state and Missouri as a slave state and attempts to divide Louisiana Purchase lands into free and slave territories.

1824 In Gibbons v. Ogden, the Supreme Court recognizes broad congressional powers to regulate interstate commerce.

1826 Both Thomas Jefferson and John Adams die on July 4.

1828 Andrew Jackson is elected president.

1831 In Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, the Supreme Court issues the first of several decisions regarding the status of Native Americans in the United States.

1833 Chief Justice John Marshall decides in Barron v. City of Baltimore that the Bill of Rights limits only the national government.

1836 Roger B. Taney succeeds John Marshall as chief justice of the United States.

1836 James Madison, the last surviving delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1787, dies.

1837 Supreme Court loosens its reading of the Contracts Clause in Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge.

1848 Seneca Falls (New York) Convention meets to discuss the rights of women.

1849 Henry David Thoreau writes his essay "Civil Disobedience."

1854 Republican Party is founded in Ripon, Wisconsin, opposing the expansion of slavery.

1857 Chief Justice Roger B. Taney declares in Scott v. Sandford (Dred Scott decision) that blacks are not and cannot be citizens of the United States.

1860 Abraham Lincoln is elected president, the first Republican to hold the office.

1861–1865 Nation is torn by the Civil War after Southern states secede and Abraham Lincoln attempts to preserve the Union.

1863 Lincoln issues the Emancipation Proclamation freeing all slaves behind enemy lines.

1865 States ratify the Thirteenth Amendment outlawing involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crimes.

1866 Supreme Court invalidates the military trial of a civilian in Indiana in Ex parte Milligan.

1868 States ratify the Fourteenth Amendment defining citizenship and guaranteeing the rights of all citizens.

1870 States ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, which, on paper, prohibits discrimination in voting on the basis of race.

Department of Justice is created.

1873 In the Slaughterhouse Cases, the Supreme Court gives a narrow reading to the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

1875 Supreme Court rules in Minor v. Happersett that states may deny women the right to vote.

1877 Federal troops withdraw from the South, ending the period of congressional Reconstruction.

1878 American Bar Association is founded.

1883 In the Civil Rights Cases, the Supreme Court decides that the Fourteenth Amendment outlaws only discriminatory state (as opposed to private) action.

1886 On May 3 police shoot and kill striking workers of the McCormick Reaper Works outside Haymarket Square in Chicago, Illinois. The Haymarket Affair becomes the basis of what eventually would be a May 1 (May Day) celebration of workers' rights.

1895 Supreme Court upholds the use of injunctions to halt labor strikes in In re Debs.

Supreme Court narrows the application of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the power of Congress to regulate commerce in United States v. E. C. Knight Co.

1896 Supreme Court approves a policy of "separate but equal" for treatment of the races in Plessy v. Ferguson.

1897 In Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago, the Supreme Court applies the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the states, thus beginning the process of "incorporation" by which most other provisions in the Bill of Rights are also later applied.

In Allgeyer v. Louisiana, the Supreme Court strikes down a state law regulating a private contract.

1905 In Lochner v. New York, the Supreme Court invalidates a law designed to limit the hours of New York bakers.

1908 In Muller v. Oregon, the Supreme Court upholds laws limiting working hours for women; Louis D. Brandeis introduces the famous "Brandeis brief" in the case.

1910 Congress adopts the Mann Act penalizing the transportation of women across state lines for immoral purposes.

1914 In Weeks v. United States, the Supreme Court applies the exclusionary rule to the federal government.

1917 Bolshevik Revolution brings communism to Russia.

Congress adopts the Espionage Act of 1917.

1918 Congress adopts the Sedition Act of 1918.

In Hammer v. Dagenhart, the Supreme Court strikes down child labor laws as an unconstitutional regulation of commerce.

1919 Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. articulates the clear-and-present-danger test for First Amendment issues in Schenck v. United States.

In Abrams v. United States, the Supreme Court upholds the convictions of Russian immigrants who circulated antiwar documents.

1919 A fear of communism, known as the "red scare," sweeps the United States, and U.S. Attorney General Mitchell Palmer leads raids on suspected radicals and Communists.

Nation enacts Eighteenth Amendment providing for national prohibition of alcohol.

1920 States ratify the Nineteenth Amendment forbidding discrimination against women who want to vote.

American Civil Liberties Union is founded.

1921 William Howard Taft becomes chief justice of the United States, the only former president to fill such a role.

1923 In Meyer v. Nebraska, the Supreme Court strikes down a Nebraska law prohibiting the teaching of modern foreign languages.

1925 The Supreme Court in Carroll v. United States establishes the basis for warrantless searches of automobiles.

The trial of teacher John Scopes deals with a Tennessee state law prohibiting the teaching of evolution.

In Gitlow v. United States, the Supreme Court renews the process by which provisions of the Bill of Rights (in this case freedom of speech within the First Amendment) are applied to the states, but upholds the conviction of suspected radicals for distributing pamphlets believed to have a "bad tendency."

In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, the Supreme Court recognizes the right of parents to educate their children in parochial schools.

1927 Supreme Court permits the involuntary sterilization of an "imbecile" in Buck v. Bell.

1928 In Olmstead v. United States, the Supreme Court refuses to invalidate wiretapping.

1929 Stock market crash initiates the Great Depression.

1930 Charles Evans Hughes becomes chief justice of the United States.

1931 In Near v. Minnesota, the Supreme Court emphasizes the strong presumption under the First Amendment against "prior restraint" of publication.

1932 Franklin D. Roosevelt is elected to his first term as president and begins his New Deal programs, significantly expanding the federal government's role in the economy.

Supreme Court decides in Powell v. Alabama (one of the "Scottsboro boys" cases) that states must provide counsel for defendants in capital cases.

1933 Twenty-first Amendment repeals national prohibition of alcohol.

1934 Supreme Court upholds the Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Law in Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell.

1935–1936 Supreme Court strikes down a number of important pieces of New Deal legislation.

1937 President Franklin D. Roosevelt's proposal for a "Court-packing plan" probably helps bring about the Court's acceptance of most New Deal legislation dealing with economic matters (a move called the "switch in time that saved nine").

Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo articulates the principle of "selective incorporation" in Palko v. Connecticut.

1938 Harlan Fiske Stone authors his historic footnote four in United States v. Carolene Products Co., articulating two standards of judicial review depending on the constitutional issue under consideration.

Congress creates the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC).

1939 Hatch Act limits campaign activities of governmental workers.

1940 In Minersville School District v. Gobitis, the Supreme Court upholds a compulsory flag-salute law.

1941 Harlan Fiske Stone becomes chief justice of the United States.

Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, leads to U.S. entry into World War II.

1942 Supreme Court decides in Betts v. Brady not to require state appointment of counsel in nonfelony cases, a decision later reversed in Gideon v. Wainwright (1963).

Supreme Court declares in Skinner v. Oklahoma that individuals have a fundamental right to procreate.

1943 In West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, the Supreme Court outlaws compulsory flag salutes.

1944 In Korematsu v. United States, the Supreme Court refuses to invalidate the exclusion of Japanese Americans from designated military zones in the West.

1945 U.S. use of atomic weapons against the Japanese brings an end to World War II.

1946 Frederick Moore Vinson becomes chief justice of the United States.

In Colegrove v. Green, the Supreme Court says it will not hear reapportionment cases.

1947 In Everson v. Board of Education, the Supreme Court announces that the First Amendment intended to create a "wall of separation" between church and state.

Americans for Democratic Action is founded.

Central Intelligence Agency is created.

1949 In Wolf v. Colorado, the Supreme Court applies the Fourth Amendment but not the exclusionary rule to the states.

Federal Communications Commission formulates the fairness doctrine.

1950 Congress adopts the Internal Security (McCarran) Act.

1951 In Dennis v. United States, the Supreme Court upholds the conviction of leading members of the U.S. Communist Party under provisions of the Smith Act.

Senator Joseph McCarthy (R-WI) gives a February speech declaring that the State Department is infiltrated with at least fifty-seven card-carrying members of the Communist Party. This speech begins three years of oratory and hearings that McCarthy and his assistant Roy Cohn use to investigate alleged Communist infiltration in the United States.

1952 In Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, the Supreme Court declares that President Harry Truman's seizure of the steel mills during the Korean War was unconstitutional.

1953 Earl Warren becomes chief justice of the United States.

Julius and Ethel Rosenberg are executed for passing U.S. atomic secrets to the Soviet Union.

1954 Supreme Court issues its historic decision in Brown v. Board of Education overturning Plessy v. Ferguson (which upheld the separate-but-equal concept) and calling for an end to racial segregation in public schools.

Senate censures Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin for abuses in connection with his investigations of communism.

In Berman v. Parker, the Supreme Court upholds the broad authority of governments to take private property for a variety of public uses, including urban renewal.

1955 Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. launches boycott of Montgomery, Alabama, buses after Rosa Parks engages in an act of civil disobedience by refusing to give up her bus seat to a white person.

Congress adopts the Communist Control Act.

1957 In Watkins v. United States, the Supreme Court decides that questions asked by congressional committees must be pertinent to the subject of the investigation.

1958 In Trop v. Dulles, Supreme Court invalidates removal of citizenship from a native-born American as "cruel and unusual punishment."

In Cooper v. Aaron, the Supreme Court reaffirms its power of judicial review and commands the Little Rock, Arkansas, school board to continue with racial desegregation.

1961 In Mapp v. Ohio, the Supreme Court extends the exclusionary rule to the states.

1962 In Engel v. Vitale, the Supreme Court invalidates the reciting of public prayers in public schools.

In Baker v. Carr, the Supreme Court accepts the justiciability (appropriateness for Court consideration) of cases dealing with state legislative apportionment, which the Court previously had treated as a "political question."

1963 In Abington School District v. Schempp, the Supreme Court widens the prohibition in Engel v. Vitale to include the Lord's Prayer and Bible reading.

In Gideon v. Wainwright, the Supreme Court extends the right to appointed counsel to apply in felony cases.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. delivers his famous "I Have a Dream" speech during the historic "March on Washington" in the nation's capital.

1964 Congress adopts the Civil Rights Act.

In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, the Supreme Court establishes a high standard of proof for public figures to meet in pursuing libel cases against the media.

Supreme Court in Reynolds v. Sims mandates that both houses of state legislatures follow the principle of "one person, one vote."

1965 Supreme Court invalidates a Connecticut birth control law in Griswold v. Connecticut on the basis of a right to privacy that it locates within the "penumbras" of various provisions of the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment.

Congress adopts the Voting Rights Act.

1966 Supreme Court announces the Miranda rules governing conduct when individuals are arrested and interrogated by police.

1967 Supreme Court decides in Katz v. United States that governmental agents need a warrant before they can place a wiretap.

Thurgood Marshall, former U.S. solicitor general, becomes the first African American to serve on the Supreme Court.

In Loving v. Virginia, the Supreme Court strikes down a Virginia miscegenation law.

1968 In Terry v. Ohio, the Supreme Court permits warrantless stop-and-frisk searches.

Supreme Court in Duncan v. Louisiana applies the right to a jury trial to the states.

1969 In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent School District, the Supreme Court recognizes that school students have a right to symbolic speech.

Warren E. Burger is named chief justice of the United States.

In Brandenburg v. Ohio, the Supreme Court decides that speech can be prosecuted only if it is likely to lead to "imminent, lawless action."

1971 Supreme Court articulates the three-part Lemon test whereby it analyzes laws for violations of the Establishment Clause (prohibiting establishment of religion) of the First Amendment.

Supreme Court lifts a lower-court injunction and permits publication of the Pentagon Papers.

Twenty-sixth Amendment extends voting rights to individuals ages eighteen to twenty-one.

On May 4, four students protesting the U.S. invasion of Cambodia are shot and killed by National Guardsmen at Kent State University in Ohio. More than 700 campuses around the country close to protest the killings.

1972 In Furman v. Georgia, the Supreme Court invalidates the death penalty as then administered.

Supreme Court expands the right to counsel in Argersinger v. Hamlin.

1973 Supreme Court establishes the Miller test (applying community standards) to judge obscenity.

1973 In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court recognizes a woman's right to secure an abortion during the first two trimesters of pregnancy.

In Frontiero v. Richardson, the Supreme Court indicates it is giving increased scrutiny to classifications involving gender.

Supreme Court in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez declares that education is not a fundamental constitutional right and that Texas does not have to equalize school funding.

1974 President Richard M. Nixon resigns from office in disgrace as a result of the Watergate break-in and its subsequent cover-up.

1976 Nation celebrates the bicentennial of the Declaration of Independence.

Supreme Court permits reinstitution of the death penalty in Gregg v. Georgia provided the trial is bifurcated and the jury considers aggravating and mitigating circumstances.

In Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court upholds most provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act related to contributions (except for those that candidates make to themselves) but strikes down some spending limits.

1980 Ronald Reagan is elected president of the United States.

Supreme Court in Stone v. Graham strikes down a Kentucky statute requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public school classrooms.

1981 Sandra Day O'Connor becomes the first woman to serve on the Supreme Court.

1984 Supreme Court in Lynch v. Donnelly upholds city display of nativity scene as part of a larger Christmas display that includes secular symbols.

1986 Supreme Court refuses to overturn state laws banning sodomy in Bowers v. Hardwick.

Justice William H. Rehnquist, first named to the Supreme Court in 1972, is elevated to the position of chief justice.

Supreme Court decides in Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson that sexual harassment violates the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

1987 Nation celebrates the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution.

1989 In Texas v. Johnson, the Supreme Court overturns a conviction for burning an American flag as a violation of freedom of speech.

1990 Supreme Court in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith rules that states need not have a compelling state interest to justify a criminal law that falls unequally on religious groups.

In Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, the Supreme Court rules that individuals have a right to die and withhold medical treatment, but it permits Missouri to continue life support over parental objections in the absence of "clear and convincing evidence" that the patient would have wanted treatment stopped.

1991 United States engages in its first war with Iraq, a response to the Iraqi invasion of neighboring Kuwait.

Supreme Court permits use of victim-impact statements in Payne v. Tennessee.

1992 In Lee v. Weisman, the Supreme Court extends the ban on public prayer to public school graduation exercises.

In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, the Supreme Court upholds the "central holding" of Roe v. Wade permitting abortion.

Supreme Court strikes down a cross-burning law as a violation of the First Amendment in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul.

1995 Supreme Court rules in Rosenberger v. University of Virginia that a denial of student activity funds to a religious group violates freedom of speech.

1996 In Romer v. Evans, the Supreme Court invalidates an amendment to the Colorado state constitution prohibiting legislation on behalf of gays.

1997 In City of Boerne v. Flores, the Supreme Court strikes down the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993.

Supreme Court in Washington v. Glucksberg upholds Washington state's ban on physician-assisted suicide.

1999 Congress adopts Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act.

2000 George W. Bush is declared president after the Supreme Court decision in Bush v. Gore halts vote recount in Florida.

In Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, the Supreme Court invalidates student-led prayers at football games.

2001 Attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and the failed attempt in Pennsylvania, raise increased fears of foreign terrorists.

Congress adopts USA Patriot Act to fight terrorism.

2002 Supreme Court invalidates imposition of the death penalty for individuals who are retarded in Atkins v. Virginia.

In Board of Education v. Earls, the Supreme Court affirms the right of public schools to conduct drug testing of students participating in extracurricular activities.

2003 Supreme Court overturns a Texas sodomy statute in Lawrence v. Texas, thus negating its earlier decision in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986).

In Virginia v. Black, the Supreme Court upholds a law banning cross-burning for the purpose of intimidating others.

Supreme Court in McConnell v. Federal Communications Commission upholds the "soft money" ban in the Bipartisan Campaign Finance Reform Act of 2002.

In Connecticut Department of Public Safety v. Doe, the Supreme Court upholds Connecticut's "Megan's law" requiring that individuals convicted of sexual offenses register with the Department of Public Safety.

Supreme Court in Ewing v. California upholds California's three-strikes-and-you're-out law.

United States deposes Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq.

2004 Supreme Court rules in Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow that father seeking to strike the words "under God" from flag salute in public schools does not have proper standing to bring his case.

After two decisions by its highest court, Massachusetts becomes the first state to allow gay marriages, which leads to nationwide discussion of the contentious subject.

In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, Supreme Court rules that a U.S. citizen captured in Afghanistan and being held in a military brig could file a habeas corpus appeal.

Supreme Court in Rasul v. Bush upholds the right of federal courts to hear habeas corpus appeals by foreign nationals being held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

George W. Bush elected to a second term.

Chief Justice William Rehnquist treated for thyroid cancer, fueling speculation about his position and other possible Supreme Court appointments.

Attorney General John Ashcroft resigns.

Bibliography

Abbott, Walter F. Jury Research: A Review and Bibliography. Chicago: American Law Institute, 1993.

Abernathy, M. Glenn. The Right of Assembly and Association. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1981.

Abernathy, M. Glenn, and Barbara A. Perry. Civil Liberties Under the Constitution. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Abraham, Henry J., and Barbara A. Perry. Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States. 8th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Abraham, Henry J. The Judicial Process: An Introductory Analysis of the Courts of the United States, England, and France. 7th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

———. Justices, Presidents, and Senators: A History of the U.S. Supreme Court, Appointments from Washington to Clinton. 4th ed. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1999.

Abrams, J. Marc, S. Mark Goodman, and William R. Mureiko. "Comment: End of an Era? The Decline of Student Press Rights in the Wake of Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier." Duke Law Journal 1988 (September): 706–32.

Abramson, Jeffrey. We the Jury. New York: Basic Books, 1994.

Adabinsky, Howard. Law and Justice: An Introduction to the American Legal System. 2d ed. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1991.

Adams, Bradley. "Union Dues and Politics: Workers Speak out Against Unions Speaking for Them." Journal of Law and Public Policy 10 (Fall 1998): 10.

Adelman, William J. Haymarket Revisited. 2d ed. Chicago: Labor History Society, 1986.

Adler, David Gray, and Robert George, eds. The Constitution and the Conduct of American Foreign Policy. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.

Adler, Libby S. "Federalism and Family." Columbia Journal of Gender and Law 8 (1999): 197–258.

Adlerstein, David M. "In Need of Correction: The 'Iron Triangle' of the Prison Litigation Reform Act." Columbia Law Review 101, 7 (November 2001): 1681.

Albert, Craig J. "Your Ad Goes Here: How the Highway Beautification Act of 1965 Thwarts Highway Beautification." Kansas Law Review 48 (April 2000): 463–544.

Albright, Jennifer Marie. "Gender Assessment: A Legal Approach to Transsexuality." Southern Methodist University Law Review 55 (Spring 2002): 593–619.

Aldisert, Ruggero. Winning on Appeal: Better Briefs and Oral Arguments. Chicago: National Institute for Trial Advocacy, 1996.

Aleinikoff, T. Alexander. "Between Principles and Politics: The Direction of U.S. Citizenship Policy." International Migration Policy Program Series 8. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, New York, 1999.

Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, and Douglas Klusmeyer, eds. From Migrants to Citizens: Membership in a Changing World. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2000.

Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, David Martin, and Hiroshi Motomura, eds. Immigration, Process and Policy. 3d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1995.

Aleman, Steven R., Andorra Bruno, and Charles V. Dale. English as the Official Language of the United States. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service, 1997.

Alexander, Herbert E. Financing Politics: Money, Elections, and Political Reform, 3d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1984.

Alexander, James. A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger, ed. Stanley N. Katz. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963.

Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building Bombing, April 19, 1995: Final Report. Oklahoma City, OK: City of Oklahoma City, 1996.

Alien Tort Claims Act. U.S. Code. Vol. 28, sec. 1350 (1982).

Allen, Francis. The Habits of Legality: Criminal Justice and the Rule of Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Alley, Robert S. Without a Prayer: Religious Expression in Public Schools. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.

———. The Constitution and Religion: Leading Supreme Court Cases on Church and State. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.

Alonso, Karen. The Chicago Seven Political Protest Trial: A Headline Court Case. Berkeley Heights, NJ: Enslow, 2002.

Alpert, Leo. "Judicial Censorship of Obscene Literature." Harvard Law Review 52 (1938): 40.

Amar, Akhil Reed. "Fourth Amendment: First Principles." Harvard Law Review 107 (1994): 757–819.

———. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure: First Principles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

———. "Justice Kennedy and the Ideal of Equality." Pacific Law Journal 28 (1997): 515–32.

———. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

Amar, Vikram. "Jury Service as Political Participation Akin to Voting." Cornell Law Review 80 (1995): 206–59.

Ambrose, Stephen E. Nixon: The Triumph of a Politician, 1962–1972. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.

American Association of University Professors. “Academic Freedom and Electronic Communications,” June 1997. http://www.aaup.org/publications/Footnotes/FN01/fn01ron.htm.htm.

———. “1940 Statement of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure with 1970 Interpretive Comments,” June 2002. http://www.aaup.org/statements/Redbook/1940stat.htm.

American Bar Association. Law and the Courts: A Handbook About United States Law and Court Procedures, with a Glossary of Legal Terms. Chicago: American Bar Association, Division for Public Education, 1995.

American Bar Association Center for Professional Responsibility. “Information on Professionalism and Ethics in Lawyer Advertising and Marketing.” http://www.abanet.org/cpr/clt-dev/home.html.

American Bar Association Task Force on Child Witnesses. The Child Witness in Criminal Cases. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2002.

American Bar Association Task Force on Terrorism and the Law. “Report and Recommendations on Military Commissions,” January 4, 2002. www.abanet.org/leadership/military.pdf.

American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). “ACLU Hails Victories in New Homeland Security Bill,” November 13, 2004. ACLU News Release. http://www.aclu.org/safeandfree/safeandfree.cfm?ID1295&c 06.

———. Drug Policy. http://www.aclu.org/DrugPolicy/DrugPolicyMain.cfm.

American Jurisprudence 2d. Vol. 21-A, sec. 1185, “Assistance of Counsel.” St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

American Jurisprudence 2d. Vol. 67, p. 489. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Amnesty International. “Annual Report 2002.” http://web.amnesty.org/web/ar2002.nsf/amr/usa!Open.

Anastaplo, George. Abraham Lincoln: A Constitutional Biography. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1999.

Anderson, Elizabeth S. “Integration, Affirmative Action, and Strict Scrutiny.” New York University Law Review 77, 5 (November 2002): 1195–1271.

Anderson, James, and Laronistine Dyson. Legal Rights of Prisoners: Cases and Comments. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001.

Andrew, Christopher J. “The Secondary Effects Doctrine: The Historical Development, Current Application, and Potential Mischaracterization of an Elusive Judicial Precedent.” Rutgers Law Review 54 (2002): 1175–1220.

Andrews, Richard N.L. Managing the Environment, Managing Ourselves. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.

Annas, George J., Leonard H. Glantz, and Patricia A. Roche. “The Genetic Privacy Act and Commentary,” 1995. http://www.ornl.gov/sci/techresources/human_genome/resource/privacy/privacy1.html.

Annenst, Janna J. “Only the News That’s Fit to Print: The Effect of Hazelwood on the First Amendment Viewpoint-Neutrality Requirement in Public School–Sponsored Forums.” Washington Law Review 77 (2002): 1227–59.

Anschutz, August V., ed. Campaign Financing in the United States: Issues and Laws. New York: Nova Science, 2002.

Ansolabehere, Stephen, Roy Behr, and Shanto Iyengar. The Media Game. New York: Macmillan, 1993.

Ansolabehere, Stephen, and Samuel Issacharoff. “Baker v. Carr in Context: 1946–1964,” 2003. MIT Working Papers Archive. http://web.mit.edu/polisci/research/representation.html.

Aquinas, St. Thomas. The Treatise on Law: Summa Theologiae. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.

Arblaster, Anthony. The Rise and Decline of Western Liberalism. New York: Basil Blackwell, 1984.

Aristotle. “The Athenian Constitution.” In The Complete Works of Aristotle. Vol. 2, ed. J. Barnes, 2341–83. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.

Arkes, Hadley. “Civility and the Restriction of Speech: Rediscovering the Defamation of Groups.” In The Supreme Court Review 1974, ed. Philip B. Kurland, 281–335. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

Arnest, Lauren Krohn. Children, Young Adults, and the Law. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 1998.

Ashby, LeRoy. William Jennings Bryan: Champion of Democracy. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Ashcroft, John, and Gary Thomas. Lessons from a Father to His Son. Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson, 1998.

Atleson, James B. “The Legal Community and the Transformation of Disputes: The Settlement of Injunction Actions.” Law and Society Review 23 (1989): 41–73.

Atwell, Mary Wekek. Equal Protection of the Law: Gender and Justice in the United States. New York: P. Lang, 2002.

Austin, James. “Three Strikes and You’re Out”: The Implementation and Impact of Strike Laws. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs; National Institute of Justice, 1999.

Avalon Project at Yale Law School. “The Papers of Thomas Jefferson,” 1996–2003. http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/presiden/jeffpap.htm.

Avery, Michael. “Confronting Issues in Criminal Justice: Law Enforcement and Criminal Offenders: You Have a Right to Remain Silent." Fordham Urban Law Journal 30 (January 2003): 571–615.

Avila, Daniel, and James R. Bopp. "Perspectives on Cruzan: The Sirens' Lure of Invented Consent: A Critique of Autonomy-Based Surrogate Decisionmaking for Legally Incapacitated Older Persons." Hastings Law Journal 42 (March 1991): 779–815.

Aylmer, G. E., ed. The Levellers in the English Revolution. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1975.

Babcock, Richard F. The Zoning Game: Municipal Practices and Policies. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966.

Babst, Gordon A. Liberal Constitutionalism, Marriage, and Sexual Orientation: A Contemporary Case for Disestablishment. New York: Peter Lang, 2002.

Baer, Judith A. Equality Under the Constitution: Reclaiming the Fourteenth Amendment. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1983.

Bailey, F. Lee. The Defense Never Rests. New York: New American Library, 1995.

Baird, Robert M., and Stuart E. Rosenbaum, eds. Pornography: Private Right or Public Menace? Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1998.

Baker, C. Edwin. "Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech." University of California at Los Angeles Law Review 25 (1978): 964.

Baker, J. H. An Introduction to English Legal History. 3d ed. London: Butterworths, 1990.

Baker, Leonard. John Marshall: A Life in the Law. New York: Macmillan, 1974.

Baker, Liva. The Justice from Beacon Hill: The Life and Times of Oliver Wendell Holmes. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.

Baker, Lynne. Persons and Bodies: A Constitution View. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Baker, Susan, and Mary Tipper Gore. "Record Industry Misunderstands PMRG." Billboard 5 (April 1993).

Baker, Thomas, et al. "Constitutional Law Symposium: The Constitution Inside the Schoolhouse Gate: Student Rights Thirty Years After Tinker v. Des Moines School District." Drake Law Review 48 (2000): 433.

Ball, Howard, and Phillip J. Cooper. Of Power and Right: Hugo Black and William O. Douglas, and America's Constitutional Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Balz, Dan. "Academic Experts Score Debate Commission, Parties for Shutting Out Perot." Washington Post, September 19, 1996.

"Ban on Funding Religious Study Upheld," February 25, 2004. CNN.com. http://www/cnn.com/2004/LAW/02/25/scotus.religious.scholarship/index.html.

Bandes, Susan. "Reinventing Bivens: The Self-Executing Constitution." Southern California Law Review 68 (1995): 289.

Banning, Lance. The Sacred Fire of Liberty: James Madison and the Founding of the Federal Republic. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1995.

Barbour, Hugh, and J. William Frost. The Quakers: Denominations in America. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.

Bardes, Barbara A., Mack C. Shelley, and Steffen W. Schmidt. American Government and Politics Today: The Essentials, 2000–2001. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2000.

Barker, Lucius, et al. Civil Liberties and the Constitution: Cases and Commentaries. 8th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.

Barlow, Frank. The Feudal Kingdom of England 1042–1216. 5th ed. London and New York: Longman, 1999.

Barovick, Robin D. "Comment: Between a Rock and a Hard Place: Polygraph Prejudice Persists After Scheffer." Buffalo Law Review 47 (Fall 1999): 1533–86.

Barron, Jerome A., and C. Thomas Dienes. First Amendment Law in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Baum, Lawrence. American Courts: Process and Policy. 5th ed. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.

Beaney, William M. Right to Counsel in American Courts. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1955.

Beck, Carl. Contempt of Congress: A Study of the Prosecutions Initiated by the Committee on Un-American Activities, 1945–1957. New York: Da Capo, 1974.

Becker, Carl L. The Declaration of Independence: A Study in the History of Political Ideas. New York: Vintage, 1970.

Beckford, James A. The Trumpet of Prophecy: A Sociological Study of Jehovah's Witnesses. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1975.

Bedau, Hugo Adam, ed. The Death Penalty in America: Current Controversies. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Behr, Edward. Prohibition: Thirteen Years That Changed America. New York: Arcade, 1997.

Beisel, Nicola. Imperiled Innocents: Anthony Comstock and Family Reproduction in Victorian America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Belknap, Michael R. Cold War Political Justice: The Smith Act, the Communist Party, and American Civil Liberties. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1977.

———. "World War II." In The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States, ed. Kermit L. Hall, 943–45. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Bell, Jeannine. Policing Hatred: Law Enforcement, Civil Rights, and Hate Crime. New York: New York University Press, 2002.

Bell, Tom W. "The Third Amendment: Forgotten but Not Gone." William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 2 (1993): 117–50.

Bellamy, Richard. Liberalism and Modern Society. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992.

Benedict, Stephen, ed. Public Money and the Muse. New York: W. W. Norton, 1991.

Bennet, Fremont O., comp. An Account of the Haymarket Massacre of May 4, 1886, and the Anarchist Trials. Chicago: Blakely, 1886.

Bennett, Katherine, and Rolando V. Del Carmen. "A Review and Analysis of the Prison Litigation Reform Act." Prison Journal 77, 4 (December 1997): 405.

Berger, Jason, ed. The Military Draft. New York: H.W. Wilson, 1981.

Berger, Vivian. "The Supreme Court and Defense Counsel: Old Roads, New Paths—a Dead End?" Columbia Law Review 86, 1 (January 1986): 9–116.

———. "The Chiropractor as Brain Surgeon: Defense Lawyering in Capital Cases." New York University Review of Law and Social Change 18, 2 (1990–1991): 245–54.

———. "Black Box Decisions on Life or Death—If They're Arbitrary, Don't Blame the Jury: A Reply to Patrick Higginbotham." Case Western Reserve Law Review 41, 4 (1991): 1067–92.

———. "Payne and Suffering—A Personal Reflection and a Victim-Centered Critique." Florida State University Law Review 20, 1 (Summer 1992): 21–65.

———. "Herrera v. Collins: The Gateway of Innocence for Death-Sentenced Prisoners Leads Nowhere." William and Mary Law Review 35, 3 (Spring 1994): 943–1023.

Bergman, Paul, and Michael Asimow. Reel Justice: The Courtroom Goes to the Movies. Kansas City, MO: Andrews and McMeel, 1996.

Berkheiser, Mary. "The Fiction of Juvenile Right to Counsel: Waiver in the Juvenile Courts." Florida Law Review 54 (2002): 577.

Berkin, Carol. A Brilliant Solution: Inventing the American Constitution. New York: Harcourt, 2002.

Berkson, Larry C. The Concept of Cruel and Unusual Punishment. Lexington, MA: D.C. Heath, 1975.

Berlin, Isaiah. Four Essays on Liberty. New York: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Berman, Larry, and Bruce Allen Murphy. Approaching Democracy. 3d ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2001.

Bernstein, Irving. Promises Kept: John F. Kennedy's New Frontier. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Berry, Jeffrey M. The Interest Group Society. New York: Longman, 1997.

Berry, Mary Francis. Stability, Security, and Continuity: Mr. Justice Burton and Decision-Making in the Supreme Court, 1945–1958. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1978.

Bestnetwork. "Release Time Bible Education: History," February 9, 2003. http://www.bestnetwork.org/history.htm.

Bettig, Ronald V. Copyrighting Culture: The Political Economy of Intellectual Property. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1996.

Bezanson, Randall P. Speech Stories: How Free Can Speech Be? New York: New York University Press, 1998.

Bible. Authorized King James Version. New York: American Bible Society (1843).

Bickel, Alexander. The Least Dangerous Branch. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merill, 1962.

———. "The Voting Rights Cases." In Supreme Court Review 1966, ed. Philip B. Kurland, 79–102. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

Bieluch, Brian G. "Thirty-first Annual Review of Criminal Procedure: IV. Sentencing: Probation." Georgetown Law Journal 90 (May 2002): 1813–27.

Birenbaum, Anna. "Shielding the Masses: How Litigation Changed the Face of Birth Control." Southern California Review of Law and Women's Studies 10 (Spring 2001): 411.

Biskupic, Joan, and Elder Witt. Guide to the U.S. Supreme Court. 3d ed. Vol. 1. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1997.

———. The Supreme Court and Individual Rights. 3d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1997.

Bitensky, Susan H. "Legal Theory: Theoretical Foundations for a Right to Education Under the U.S. Constitution: A Beginning to the End of the National Education Crisis." Northwestern University Law Review 86 (1992): 550.

Black, Charles. Capital Punishment: The Inevitability of Caprice and Mistake. 2d ed. New York: Norton, 1981.

Black, Earl, and Merle Black. Politics and Society in the South. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1987.

Black, Henry Campbell. An Essay on the Constitutional Prohibitions Against Legislation Impairing the Obligation of Contracts, and Against Retroactive and Ex Post Facto Laws. Littleton, CO: F. B. Rothman, 1980.

Blackmun, Harry A. "Movement and Countermovement." Drake Law Review 38 (1989): 747–58.

Blackstone, William. Blackstone's Commentaries. Buffalo, NY: W. S. Hein, 1992.

Blank, Robert, and Janna C. Merrick. Human Reproduction, Emerging Technologies, and Conflicting Rights. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1995.

Blasi, Vincent. "The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civil Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California." William and Mary Law Review 29 (1988): 653–97.

Blaustein, Albert P., and Robert L. Zangrando, eds. Civil Rights and the American Negro: A Documentary History. New York: Washington Square, 1968.

Block, Sharon I. "Note and Comment: The Establishment Clause in Public Schools: A Model for Future Analysis of Clayton v. Pace." Georgetown Law Journal 79 (October 1990): 121–40.

Bloom, Harold, ed. George Orwell: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.

Bloom, Lackland H., Jr. "NEA v. Finley: A Decision in Search of a Rationale." Washington University Law Quarterly 77 (Spring 1999): 1–51.

Bloom, Robert M. Searches, Seizures, and Warrants: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2003.

Blum, John Morton. Woodrow Wilson and the Politics of Morality. New York: Little, Brown, 1956.

Blumenson, Eric. "Recovering from Drugs and the Drug War: An Achievable Public Health Alternative." Journal of Gender, Race, and Justice 6 (Fall 2002): 225.

Boaz, David. Libertarianism: A Primer. New York: Free Press, 1997.

Bodenhames, David J. Fair Trial: Rights of the Accused in American History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Bogen, David S. "The Origins of Freedom of Speech and Press." Maryland Law Review 42 (1983): 429.

Bok, Derek. Beyond the Ivory Tower: Social Responsibilities of the Modern University. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.

Boles, Donald E. Mr. Justice Rehnquist, Judicial Activist. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1987.

Bolick, Clint. Grassroots Tyranny: The Limits of Federalism. Washington, DC: Cato Institute, 1993.

Bollinger, Lee C., and Geoffrey R. Stone. "Dialogue." In Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era, ed. Lee C. Bollinger and Geoffrey R. Stone, 1–31. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.

Bolton, Michael J. "In Stark Contravention of Its Purpose: Federal Communications Commission Enforcement and Repeal of the Fairness Doctrine." University of Michigan Law Review 20 (Spring 1987).

Bolton, Richard. Cultural Wars: Documents from the Recent Controversies in the Arts. New York: New Press, 1992.

Bond, R. Douglass. "Making Sense of Billboard Law: Justifying Prohibitions and Exemptions." Michigan Law Review 88 (August 1990): 2482–2525.

Boorstin, Daniel J. The Mysterious Science of the Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1941.

Bork, Robert H. "Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems." Indiana Law Journal 47 (1971): 1.

———. The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press, 1990.

Bosmajian, Haig. The Freedom Not to Speak. New York: New York University Press, 1999.

Bosselman, Fred P., David Callies, and John Banta. The Taking Issue. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1973.

Bowman, Cynthia. "The Law of Patronage at a Crossroads." Journal of Law and Politics 12 (1996): 134.

Boyer, Paul S. Book Censorship in America from the Gilded Age to the Computer Age. 2d ed. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002.

Bracton, Henry de. De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae [On the Laws and Customs of England], trans. Samuel E. Thorne. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1968.

Bradford, William. Of Plymouth Plantation: 1620–1647. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1952.

Bradley, Craig M. "Two Models of the Fourth Amendment." Michigan Law Review 83 (1985): 1468–1501.

Brailsford, Henry N. The Levellers and the English Revolution, ed. Christopher Hill. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1961.

Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.

———. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–1965. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.

Brandeis, Louis D., and Samuel D. Warren Jr. "The Right to Privacy." Harvard Law Review 4 (1890–1891): 193.

Brandon, Chris. "Recent Decision, Constitutional Law: Hate Speech: First Amendment Permits Ban on Cross Burning When Done with the Intent to Intimidate." Mississippi Law Journal 73 (Fall 2003): 323–44.

Branham, Lynn S. The Law of Sentencing, Corrections, and Prisoners' Rights. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Brauneis, Robert. "The Foundation of Our 'Regulatory Takings' Jurisprudence: The Myth and Meaning of Justice Holmes' Opinion in Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon." Yale Law Journal 106 (1996): 613.

Brennan, William J., Jr. “The Bill of Rights and the States.” New York University Law Review 36 (1961): 761.

———. “State Constitutions and the Protections of Individual Rights.” Harvard Law Review 90, 2 (1977): 489–504.

Brenner, Saul, and Harold J. Spaeth. Stare Indecisis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Brewer, Garry D., and Peter DeLeon. The Foundations of Policy Analysis. Pacific Grove, CA: Brooks/Cole, 1983.

Brienes, Paul, ed. Critical Interruptions: New Left Perspectives on Herbert Marcuse. New York: Herder and Herder, 1970.

Briffault, Richard. “Campaign Finance, the Parties, and the Court: A Comment on Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission.” Constitutional Commentary 14 (Spring 1997): 91–126.

Briggs, Joe Bob. “Linda’s Life,” April 25, 2002. Joe Bob Briggs National Review Online. www.Nationalreview.com.

Brinkley, Douglas, and David R. Facey-Crowther, eds. The Atlantic Charter. New York: St. Martin’s, 1994.

Brisbin, Richard A., Jr. Justice Antonin Scalia and the Conservative Revival. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.

Brogden, Aaron. “Notes and Comments: Improper Application of First-Amendment Scrutiny to Conduct-Based Public Nudity Laws: City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M. Perpetuates the Confusion Caused by Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc.” Brigham Young University Journal of Public Law 17 (2002): 89–112.

Broun, Heywood, and Margaret Leech. Anthony Comstock: Roundsman of the Lord. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1927.

Brovins, Joan, and Thomas Oehmke. Dr. Death: Dr. Jack Kevorkian’s Rx: Death: The Inside Story of America’s Most Outspoken Advocate and Practitioner of Physician-Assisted Suicide. Hollywood, FL: Lifetime Books, 1993.

Brown, Cheryl A. C. “Challenging the Challenge: Twelve Years After Batson, Courts Are Still Struggling to Fill in the Gaps Left by the Supreme Court.” University of Baltimore Law Review 28 (Spring 1999): 379–422.

Brown, Jennifer Gerarda. “Facilitating Boycotts of Discriminatory Organizations Through an Informed Association Statute.” Minnesota Law Review 87 (2002): 481.

Brown, Mark R. “Popularizing Ballot Access: The Front Door to Election Reform.” Ohio State Law Journal 58 (1997): 1281–1324.

Brown, Robert McAfee. Saying Yes and Saying No: On Rendering to God and Caesar. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.

Brown, William Garrott. The Life of Oliver Ellsworth. New York: Macmillan, 1905.

Buckley, William F., Jr. The Committee and Its Critics: A Calm Review of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Chicago: Henry Regnary, 1962.

Buerger, Michael. “Supervisory Challenges Arising from Racial Profiling Legislation.” Police Quarterly 5 (June 2, 2002): 380–408.

Bugliosi, Vincent. “Not Guilty and Innocent: The Problem Children of Reasonable Doubt.” Court Review 20, 1 (1981): 16–25.

Buhaniak, Susan M., and Arthur V. Svenson. Physician-Assisted Suicide. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Bunker, Matthew D. Justice and the Media. Reconciling Fair Trials and a Free Press. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1997.

Burbank, Stephen B., and Barry Friedman. Judicial Independence at the Crossroads: An Interdisciplinary Approach. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2002.

Bureau of Justice Statistics. Capital Punishment 1999. Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics, 2001.

Burgess, Lee. Battle of the Books: Library Censorship in the Public Schools, 1950–1985. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1989.

Burke, John P. “George H. W. Bush: Transition and Early Presidency.” In Triumphs and Tragedies of the Modern Presidency, ed. David Abshire, 41–44. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.

Burke, Thomas. “The Concept of Corruption in Campaign Finance Law.” Constitutional Commentary 14 (Spring 1997): 127.

Burnette, Caroline Slater. “Making Specimen Cups as Normal as Prom Night: The Implications of Board of Education v. Earls on Public Schools Across the Nation.” Campbell Law Review 25 (2002): 71.

Burns, Edward McNall. James Madison: Philosopher of the Constitution. New York: Octagon Books, 1973.

Burns, James MacGregor, and Stewart Burns. The Pursuit of Rights in America: A People’s Charter. New York: Random House, 1991.

Burton, David H. Taft, Holmes, and the 1920s Court: An Appraisal. Madison, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1998.

Byrd, Douglas D. “A Right to Die: Can a Massachusetts Physician Withdraw Artificial Nutrition and Hydration from a Persistently Vegetative Patient Following Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health?” New England Law Review 26 (Fall 1991): 199–224.

Byrne, Edward V. "The Demise of the Peremptory Challenge: Evisceration of an Ancient Privilege." Kansas Law Review 42 (1994): 15–54.

Caldeira, Gregory A., and John R. Wright. "Amicus Curiae Before the Supreme Court: Who Participates, When, and How Much?" Journal of Politics 52 (1990): 782–806.

Callies, David. "Regulatory Takings and the Supreme Court." Stetson Law Review 28 (1999): 523.

———, ed. Takings: Land-Development Conditions and Regulatory Takings After Lucas and Dolan. Chicago, IL: American Bar Association, 1996.

Calvert, Clay. "Where the Right Went Wrong in Southworth: Underestimating the Power of the Martketplace." University of Maine Law Review 53 (2001): 53.

Calvi, James V., and Susan Coleman. American Law and Legal Systems. 2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1992.

Cammack, Mark E. Advanced Criminal Procedure in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2001.

Camp, Camille Graham, and George M. Camp. The Corrections Yearbook 1998. Middletown, CT: Criminal Justice Institute, 1999.

Cantor, Norman L. Advance Directives and the Pursuit of Death with Dignity. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.

Caplan, Lincoln. The Tenth Justice. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1987.

Cardozo, Benjamin N. The Nature of the Judicial Process. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1921.

Carlson, Elof Axel. The Unfit: A History of a Bad Idea. Cold Spring Harbor, NY: Laboratory, 2001.

Carmichael, Virginia. Framing History: The Rosenberg Story and the Cold War. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993.

Carnahan, Burrus M. "Lincoln, Lieber, and the Laws of War: The Origin and Limits of the Principle of Military Necessity." American Journal of International Law 92, 2 (April 1998): 213–31.

Caro, Robert A. The Master of the Senate. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2002.

Carp, Robert, and Ronald Stidham. Judicial Process in America. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Carr, Robert K. The House Committee on Un-American Activities 1945–1950. New York: Octagon Books, 1979.

Carson, Clayborne, ed. The Papers of Martin Luther King Jr.: Called to Serve. Vol. 1. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1997.

Carson, Clayborne, et al. Malcom X: The FBI File. New York: Carroll and Graf, 1991.

Carter, Dan T. Scottsboro: A Tragedy of the American South. Rev. ed. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1979.

Carter, Stephen L. "The Morgan 'Power' and the Forced Reconsideration of Constitutional Decisions." University of Chicago Law Review 53 (1986): 819–63.

Casto, William R. The Supreme Court in the Early Republic. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.

———. Oliver Ellsworth and the Creation of the Federal Republic. New York: Second Circuit Committee on History and Commemorative Events, 1997.

Caudill, Edward, Edward Larson, and Jesse Fox Mayshark. The Scopes Trial: A Photographic History. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2000.

Center for Media Education. A Parent's Guide to the TV Ratings and the V-Chip. Washington, DC: Center for Media Education, 1999.

Center on Juvenile and Criminal Justice. The Impact of Juvenile Curfew Laws in California. 1998. http://www.cjcj.org/pubs/curfew/curfew.html (accessed July 3, 2004).

Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. "Freedom of Speech in War Time." Harvard Law Review 32 (June 1919): 932–73.

———. Freedom of Speech. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and Howe, 1920; Buffalo, NY: W. S. Hein, 1996.

———. Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1946.

———. Three Human Rights in the Constitution of 1787. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1956.

Chang, Nancy. Silencing Political Dissent: How Post–September 11 Anti-Terrorism Measures Threaten Our Civil Liberties. New York: Seven Stories, 2002.

Chapin, Bradley. The American Law of Treason: Revolutionary and Early National Origins. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1964.

Chapman, Dan. " 'Palmer Raid' Put Civil Liberties Under Attack." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 30, 2002, 1F.

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Federal Jurisdiction. New York: Little, Brown, 1994.

———. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. Boston: Little, Brown, 1997.

———. "Students Do Leave Their First Amendment Rights at the Schoolhouse Gates: What's Left of Tinker?" Drake Law Review 48 (2000): 527–46.

Chibundu, M. O. "Making Customary International Law Through Municipal Adjudication: A Structural Inquiry." Virginia Journal of International Law 39 (Summer 1999): 1069–1149.

Child Online Protection Act of 1998. U.S. Code. Vol. 47, sec. 231.

Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, sec. 2256.

Child Protection Act of 1984. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, sec. 2251.

Choi, Alice M. "National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley: A Dispute over the 'Decency and Respect' Provision." Akron Law Review 32 (1999): 327–50.

Choper, Jesse H. "Congressional Power to Expand Judicial Definitions of the Substantive Terms of the Civil War Amendments." Minnesota Law Review 67 (1982): 299–341.

———. "Consequences of Supreme Court Decisions Upholding Individual Constitutional Rights." Michigan Law Review 83 (October 1984): 10.

———. Securing Religious Liberty: Principles for the Judicial Interpretation of the Religion Clauses. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

Christof, Nicholas D. "Security and Freedom." New York Times, September 10, 2002, A-25.

Churchill, Ward, Jim Vander Wall, and John Trudell. The Cointelpro Papers: Documents from the FBI's Secret Wars Against Dissent in the United States. Classics Series, vol. 8, ch. 2. Boston: South End Press, 1988.

Cigons, Michael J. "Comment: Polygraph Evidence: Where Are We Now?" Missouri Law Review 65 (Winter 2000): 209–27.

Civil Liberties Act of 1988. U.S. Code. Vol. 50 app., sec. 1989–1989b-9 (1988).

Clanchy, M. T. England and Its Rulers 1066–1272. 2d ed. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1998.

"Clarence Thomas." Wikipedia. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Clarence_Thomas.

Clark, Norman H. Deliver Us from Evil: An Interpretation of American Prohibition. New York: W. W. Norton, 1985.

Clarke, Matthew St. Clair, and D. A. Hall. Legislative and Documentary History of the Bank of the United States. 1832. Reprint, New York: Augustus M. Kelley, 1967.

Clausen, Aage R. How Congressmen Decide: A Policy Focus. New York: St. Martin's, 1973.

Clausewitz, Carl Von. On War. Trans. and ed. Michael Howard and Peter Paret. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1976.

Clayton, Cornell. The Politics of Justice: The Attorney General and the Making of Legal Policy. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1992.

Clayton, Dewey. African Americans and the Politics of Congressional Redistricting. New York: Garland, 2000.

Clear, Todd, and Harry Dammer. The Offender in the Community. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2000.

Clinton, Robert Lowry. Marbury v. Madison and Judicial Review. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1989.

Clor, Harry M. Public Morality and Liberal Society: Essays on Decency, Law, and Pornography. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996.

Cloud, Morgan. "Searching for History." University of Chicago Law Review 63 (1996): 1707–47.

Coben, Stanley. A. Mitchell Palmer: Politician. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.

Coffey, Thomas M. The Long Thirst: Prohibition in America, 1920–1933. New York: W. W. Norton, 1975.

Cogan, Neil H., ed. The Complete Bill of Rights: The Drafts, Debates, Sources, and Origins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Cohen, William. "Equal Treatment for Newcomers: The Core Meaning of National and State Citizenship." Constitutional Commentary 1 (1984): 9–19.

Cohler, Anne, Basia Miller, and Harold Stone, eds. The Spirit of the Laws by Montesquieu. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Cohn, Margorie, and David Dow. Cameras in the Courtroom: Television and the Pursuit of Justice. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1998.

Cole, Barry G., and Mal Oettinger. Reluctant Regulators: The FCC and the Broadcast Audience. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1978.

Cole, David. "First Amendment Antitrust: The End of Laissez Faire in Campaign Finance." Yale Law and Policy Review 9 (1991): 236–78.

———. No Equal Justice. New York: New Press, 1999.

———. "Enemy Aliens." Stanford Law Review 54 (May 2002): 953–1004.

Cole, David, and John Lamberth. "The Fallacy of Racial Profiling." New York Times, May 13, 2001.

Cole, Simon A. Suspect Identities: A History of Fingerprinting and Criminal Identification. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Coletta, Paolo E. The Presidency of William Howard Taft. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1973.

Collins, Robert S. "Ethics and the First Amendment: The Applicability of the Honorarium Ban of the Ethics Reform Act of 1989 to the Executive Branch." George Washington Law Review 62 (1994): 888.

Colucci, Frank. "The Jurisprudence of Anthony Kennedy." Ph.D. diss., University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, 2003.

Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution (CBUSC). The Bill of Rights and Beyond: A Resource Guide. Washington, DC: CBUSC.

Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Personal Justice Denied: Report of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1997.

Communications Decency Act of 1996. U.S. Code. Vol. 47 sec. 223.

Conkle, Daniel O. Constitutional Law: The Religion Clauses. New York: Foundation, 2003.

Conrad, Clay S. Jury Nullification: The Evolution of a Doctrine. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1998.

Constitution Project. Uncertain Justice: Politics and America's Courts. New York: Century Foundation, 2000.

Cookson, Catherine. Regulating Religion: The Courts and the Free Exercise Clause. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Cooley, Thomas McIntyre. A Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest upon the Legislative Power of the States of the American Union. Union, NJ: Law Exchange, 1998.

Cooper, Cynthia L., and Sam Reese Sheppard. Mockery of Justice: The True Story of the Sheppard Murder Case. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1995.

Cooper, J. O. "Searching for Harmlessness: Method and Madness in the Supreme Court's Harmless Constitutional Error Doctrine." University of Kansas Law Review 50 (January 2002): 309–45.

Copelon, Rhonda. "Beyond the Liberal Idea of Privacy: Toward a Positive Right of Autonomy." In Judging the Constitution, ed. Michael M. McCann and Gerald L. Houseman, 297. Glenview, IL: Scott, Foresman, 1989.

Cordero, Rebecca N. "No Expectation of Privacy: Should School Officials Be Able to Search Students' Lockers Without Any Suspicion of Wrong Doing?" University of Baltimore Law Review 31 (Spring 2002): 305–35.

Cordes, Mark W. "Leapfrogging the Constitution: The Rise of State Takings Legislation." Ecology Law Quarterly 24 (1997): 187–242.

Corrada, Robert L. "Taft-Hartley Symposium: The First Fifty Years: The Arbitral Imperative in Labor and Employment Law." Catholic University Law Review 47 (Spring 1998): 919.

Corrado, Anthony. Campaign Finance Reform: Beyond the Basics. New York: Century Foundation, 2000.

Corrado, Anthony, et al. Campaign Finance Reform: A Sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1997.

Corrado, Anthony, Thomas E. Mann, Dan Ortiz, Trevor Potter, and Frank Sorauf, eds. Inside the Campaign Finance Battle. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2003.

Corre, Neil, and David Wolchover. Bail in Criminal Proceedings. London: Blackstone, 1999.

Cortner, Richard C. The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Nationalization of Civil Liberties. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.

Corwin, Edward Samuel, J. W. Peltason, and Sue Davis. Corwin and Peltason's Understanding the Constitution. 15th ed. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt College, 2000.

Corwin, Edwin. "The Basic Doctrine of American Constitutional Law." Michigan Law Review 12 (1914): 247.

———. "The 'Higher Law' Background of American Constitutional Law." Harvard Law Review 42 (1928–29): 149.

———. The Commerce Power Versus States' Rights. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1936.

———. The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutionalism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1955.

Costonis, John. "Law and Aesthetics: A Critique and a Reformation of the Dilemmas." Michigan Law Review 80 (1982): 355.

Cottrell, Robert C. Roger Nash Baldwin and the American Civil Liberties Union. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Cottrol, Robert J., ed. Gun Control and the Constitution: Sources and Explorations on the Second Amendment. New York: Garland, 1994.

Coulter, A. "Drug Couriers and the Fourth Amendment: Vanishing Privacy Rights for Commercial Travelers." Vanderbilt Law Review 43 (May 1990): 131.

Countryman, Vern, ed. The Douglas Opinions. New York: Random House, 1977.

Couric, Emily. The Trial Lawyers: The Nation's Top Litigators Tell How They Win. New York: St. Martin's, 1990.

Cousins, Norman, ed. "In God We Trust": The Religious Beliefs and Ideas of the American Founding Fathers. New York: Harper and Row, 1958.

Cowan, Bradley M. "The Decalogue in the Public Forum: Do Public Displays of the Ten Commandments Violate the Establishment Clause?" Ave Maria Law Review 2 (Spring 2004): 183–211.

Cox, Archibald. Freedom of Expression. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981.

Coyne, Thomas A. Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. 2d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2001.

Craig, Barbara Hinkson, and David M. O'Brien. Abortion and American Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1993.

Cramm, Tim. "The Designated Nonpublic Forum: Remedying the Forbes Mistake." Albany Law Review 67 (2003): 89–166.

Cranston, Maurice W. John Locke: A Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Cray, Ed. Chief Justice: A Biography of Earl Warren. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.

Creedon, Lawrence P., and William D. Falcon. United for Separation: An Analysis of POAU Assaults on Catholicism. Milwaukee, WI: Bruce, 1959.

Cretan, Richard J. "Seventh Amendment." In Constitutional Amendments: 1989 to the Present, ed. Kris E. Palmer, 163–79. Detroit, MI: Gale Group, 2000.

Cripe, C. A. Legal Aspects of Corrections Management. New York: Aspen, 1997.

Critical Art Ensemble. Electronic Civil Disobedience and Other Unpopular Ideas. Brooklyn, NY: Autonomedia, 1996.

Cruz, David B. " 'The Sexual Freedom Cases': Contraception, Abortion, Abstinence, and the Constitution." Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 35 (Summer 2000): 299.

Cunningham, Tom Alan, and Paula K. Hutchinson. "Bifurcated Trials: Creative Uses of the Moriel Decision." Baylor Law Review 46 (Summer 1994): 807.

Currah, Paisley, Shannon Minter, and Jamison Green. Transgender Equality: A Handbook for Activists and Policymakers. Washington, DC: National Center for Lesbian Rights and NGLTF Policy Institute, 2000.

Current Biography. Bronx, NY: H. W. Wilson, 1992.

Currie, Harold W. Eugene V. Debs. Boston: Twayne, 1976.

Curtis, Michael Kent. No State Shall Abridge: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1990.

———. Free Speech, "the People's Darling Privilege": Struggles for Freedom of Expression in American History. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.

Cushman, Clare. "Potter Stewart." In The Supreme Court Justices: Illustrated Biographies, ed. Clare Cushman, 456–60. Washington: Congressional Quarterly, 1993.

———, ed. Supreme Court Decisions and Women's Rights: Milestones to Equality. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Cushman, Robert E. "The Case of the Nazi Saboteurs." American Political Science Review 36 (December 1942): 1082.

Dahl, Robert A. "Decision-Making in a Democracy: The Supreme Court as a National Policy Maker." Journal of Public Law 62, 1 (1957): 1–33.

———. On Democracy. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

———. How Democratic Is the American Constitution? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Dallek, Robert. Lone Star Rising: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1908–1960. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

———. Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1961–1973. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Dalrymple, Mary. "Department's Blueprint Approved, Final Plan Far from Complete." Congressional Quarterly Weekly 60, 45 (November 23, 2002): 3072–77.

Daly, J. Bowles. The Dawn of Radicalism. London: Sonnenschein, 1892.

Danelski, Daniel J. "The Saboteurs' Case." Journal of Supreme Court History 61 (1996): 1.

Daniel, Sandra. "Bus Passengers Had Implicit Right to Refuse Search." Chicago Daily Law Bulletin, October 14, 2002, 6.

Danielson, Dennis, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Milton. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Darrow, Clarence. The Story of My Life. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1932.

Darwin, Charles. The Descent of Man. New York: D. Appleton, 1871.

———. The Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex. Rev. ed. New York: D. Appleton, 1896.

———. On the Origin of Species. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Dasti, Jerry. "Advocating a Broader Understanding of the Necessity of Sex-Reassignment Surgery Under Medicaid." New York University Law Review 77 (December 2002): 1728–75.

Daunt, Tina, and Jill Leovy. "LAPD Offers First Data on Traffic Stops: Study Finds Blacks and Latinos Were More Likely to Be Searched When Pulled Over by Police." Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2003, A1.

Davidson, Sandra, and Betty Houchin Winfield. Bleep! Censoring Rock and Rap Music. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1999.

Davies, Thomas Y. "The Fictional Character of Law-and-Order Originalism: A Case Study of the Distortions and Evasions of Framing-Era Arrest Doctrine in Atwater v. [City of] Lago Vista." Wake Forest Law Review 37, 2 (Summer 2002): 239–357.

Davis, Sue. Justice Rehnquist and the Constitution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.

Dawson, Alexandra. Land Use Planning and Law. New York: STPM Press, 1982.

Day, Samuel H., Jr. Crossing the Line: From Editor to Activist to Inmate—A Writer's Journey. Baltimore, MD: Fortkamp, 1991.

Daynes, Byron, William D. Pederson, and Michael Riccards, eds. The New Deal and Public Policy. New York: St. Martin's, 1998.

De Camp, L. Sprague. The Great Monkey Trial. 1st ed. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1968.

Dean, John. The Rehnquist Choice. New York: Free Press, 2001.

DeBruin, Debra A. "Identifying Sexual Harassment: The Reasonable Woman Standard." In Violence Against Women: Philosophical Perspectives, ed. Stanley G. French, Wanda Teays, and Laura M. Purdy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1998.

DeCew, Judith Wagner. In Pursuit of Privacy: Law, Ethics, and the Rise of Technology. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Delaney, David. Race, Place, and the Law, 1836–1948. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.

Delaney, John J. "What Does It Take to Make a Take? A Post-Dolan Look at the Evolution of Regulatory Takings Jurisprudence in the Supreme Court." Urban Lawyer 27 (Winter 1995): 55–69.

DeLoggio, Louis. "Beyond a Reasonable Doubt—A Historic Analysis." New York State Bar Journal 58, 3 (1986): 19–25.

Demmer, Valerie L. "Civil Liberties and Homeland Security." Humanist 62, 1 (January–February 2002): 7–9.

Dempsey, James X., and David Cole. Terrorism and the Constitution: Sacrificing Civil Liberties in the Name of National Security. 2d ed. Washington, DC: New Press, 2002.

Dennis, Denise. Black History for Beginners. New York: Writers and Readers Publishing, 1984.

Dershowitz, Alan M. Shouting Fire: Civil Liberties in a Turbulent Age. Boston: Little, Brown, 2002.

Dery, George M., III. "Are Politicians More Deserving of Privacy Than Schoolchildren? How Chandler v. Miller Exposed the Absurdities of Fourth Amendment 'Special Needs' Balancing." Arizona Law Review 40 (1998): 73–103.

Desch, Michael C. Civilian Control of the Military. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999.

"Development in the Law: The Law of Prisons." Harvard Law Review 115, 7 (May 2002): 1838.

Devlin, Patrick. The Enforcement of Morals. London: Oxford University Press, 1959.

Dewey, John. Democracy and Education: An Introduction to the Philosophy of Education. 1916. Reprint, New York: Dove Publications, 2004.

Diamond, Edwin, Norman Sandler, and Milton Mueller. Telecommunications in Crisis: The First Amendment, Technology, and Deregulation. Washington, DC: Cato Institute, 1983.

Diamond, Paul S. Federal Grand Jury Practice and Procedure. 3d edition. New York: Aspen, 1995.

Diamond, Sander A. The Nazi Movement in the United States 1924–1941. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1974.

Diffie, Whitfield. Privacy on the Line: The Politics of Wiretapping and Encryption. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1998.

DiIulio, John J., Jr., ed. Courts, Corrections, and the Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

DiMento, Joseph. "Mining the Archives of Pennsylvania Coal: Heaps of Constitutional Mischief." Journal of Legal History 11 (1990): 349.

Disch, Lisa Jane. The Tyranny of the Two-Party System: Power, Conflict, and Democracy. American Politics into the Twenty-first Century series. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Dixon, Robert G., Jr. Democratic Representation: Reapportionment in Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Donahue, Hugh Carter. The Battle to Control Broadcast News: Who Owns the First Amendment? Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1989.

Donner, Wendy. The Liberal Self: John Stuart Mill's Moral and Political Philosophy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1991.

Donovan, Robert J. Tumultuous Years: The Presidency of Harry S. Truman, 1949–1953. New York: W. W. Norton, 1982.

Donziger, Steven R. The Real War on Crime: The Report of the National Criminal Justice Commission. New York: Harper Perennial, 1996.

Dooley, John A., and Alan W. Houseman. Legal Services History. Washington, DC: Center for Law and Social Policy, 1984.

Dooling, Richard. Blue Streak: Swearing, Free Speech, and Sexual Harassment. New York: Random House, 1996.

Dorf, Michael C., and Barry Friedman. "Shared Constitutional Interpretation." In Supreme Court Review 2000, 61–107. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Dougherty, Keith L. Collective Action Under the Articles of Confederation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Douglas, Elizabeth A. "Note: United States v. Virginia: Gender Scrutiny Under an 'Exceedingly Persuasive Justification' Standard." Capital University Law Review 26 (1997): 173.

Downs, Donald A. Nazis in Skokie: Freedom, Community, and the First Amendment. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1985.

———. The New Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.

Doyle, Charles. Exclusionary Rule: Brief Overview of the Federal Fourth Amendment Rule and Related Matters. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, 1996.

———. "The USA Patriot Act: A Legal Analysis." Order Code RL31377, Congressional Research Service, 2002.

Dreisbach, Daniel L. "A Lively and Fair Experiment: Religion and the American Constitutional Tradition." Emory Law Journal 49 (Winter 2000): 223–53.

Dressler, Joshua, and George C. Thomass III. Criminal Procedure: Investigating Crime. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2003.

Drug Kingpin Act. U.S. Code. Vol. 21, sec. 848 (1988).

Du Noyer, Paul. The Story of Rock and Roll: The Year-by-Year Illustrated Chronicle. New York: Carlton, 1995.

Dugger, Ronnie. The Politician: The Life and Times of Lyndon Johnson. New York: W. W. Norton, 1982.

Dunham, Robert Brett. "Note and Comment: Defoliating the Grassroots: Election Day Restrictions on Political Speech." Georgetown Law Journal 77 (August 1989): 2137–96.

Dunn, Mary Maples. William Penn: Politics and Conscience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1967.

Dunne, Gerald T. Justice Joseph Story and the Rise of the Supreme Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1970.

Dworkin, Andrea. Pornography: Men Possessing Women. New York, Putnam, 1981.

Dye, Thomas R. Understanding Public Policy. 7th ed. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1992.

Easterling, Larry J. "Senator Bristow and the Seventeenth Amendment." Kansas Historical Quarterly 41 (1975): 488–511.

Eblen, Jack Ericson. The First and Second United States Empires. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1968.

Echeverria, John, and Raymond B. Eby, eds. Let the People Judge. Washington, DC: Island Press, 1995.

Eddy, Mary Baker. Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Boston: Christian Science Publishing, 1875.

Edelman, Peter B. "Toward a Comprehensive Antipoverty Strategy: Getting Beyond the Silver Bullet." Georgia Law Journal 81 (1993): 1697.

Editors of Columbia Law Review. "Symposium on Campaign Finance Reform." Columbia Law Review 94, 4 (May 1994): 1126–1414.

Editors of Cornell Law Review. Symposium. "Victims and the Death Penalty: Inside and Outside the Courtroom." Cornell Law Review 88, 2 (January 2003): 257–581.

Editors of Harvard Law Review. Sexual Orientation and the Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Eggen, Dan. "High Court Won't Rule on Terror Surveillance." Washington Post, March 25, 2003.

Eglund, Terrence T. "United States Supreme Court: Wiggins v. Smith, 123 S. Ct. 2527." Capital Defense Journal 16 (Fall 2003): 101–12.

Eisenach, Eldon J., ed. Mill and the Moral Character of Liberalism. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1998.

Eisgruber, Christopher L., and Lawrence G. Sager. "Equal Regard." In Law and Religion: A Critical Anthology, ed. Stephen M. Feldman, 200–25. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Ekstrand, Victoria Smith. "Unmasking Jane and John Doe: Online Anonymity and the First Amendment." Communication Law and Policy 8 (Autumn 2003): 405–27.

Elias, Robert. The Politics of Victimization. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Elster, Jon, and Rune Slagstad, eds. Constitutionalism and Democracy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Ely, James W., Jr. The Chief Justiceship of Melville W. Fuller, 1888–1910. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.

———. "The Fuller Court and Takings Jurisprudence." Journal of Supreme Court History 2 (1996): 120–35.

———. The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

———. "Cooley, Thomas McIntyre," in Great American Judges: An Encyclopedia, ed. John R. Vile, 175–181. Vol. 1 of 2 vols. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

———, ed. The Contract Clause in American History. New York: Garland, 1997.

Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.

———. War and Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons of Vietnam and Its Aftermath. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993.

———. "The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade." Yale Law Journal 82 (1993): 920.

———. On Common Ground. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Emanuel, Linda L., ed. Regulating How We Die: The Ethical, Medical, and Legal Issues Surrounding Physician-

Assisted Suicide. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.

Embry, Jessie L. Mormon Polygamous Families: Life in the Principle. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1987.

Emerson, Deborah Day. Grand Jury Reform: A Review of Key Issues. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, 1983.

Emerson, Thomas I. "Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment." Yale Law Journal 72 (1963): 877.

———. The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Vintage, 1970.

Emord, Jonathan W. Freedom, Technology, and the First Amendment. San Francisco, CA: Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy, 1991.

Engdahl, David E. "Soldiers, Riots, and Revolutions: The Law and History of Military Troops in Civil Disorders." Iowa Law Review 57, 1 (October 1971): 1–73.

———. Constitutional Federalism in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1987.

Epp, Charles R. The Rights Revolution: Lawyers, Activists, and Supreme Courts in a Comparative Perspective. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Epps, Garrett. To an Unknown God: Religious Freedom on Trial. New York: St. Martin's, 2001.

Epstein, Lee, and Jack Knight. "Mapping Out the Strategic Terrain: The Informational Role of Amici Curiae." In Supreme Court Decision-Making: New Institutionalist Approaches, ed. Cornell W. Clayton and Howard Gillman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.

Epstein, Lee, and Joseph F. Kobylka. The Supreme Court and Legal Change: Abortion and the Death Penalty. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.

Epstein, Lee, and C. K. Rowland. "Debunking the Myth of Interest Group Invincibility in the Courts." American Political Science Review 85, 1 (1991): 205–17.

Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 4th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2001.

Epstein, Richard A. Takings: Private Property and the Power of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.

Epstein, Robert. "Fingerprints Meet Daubert: The Myth of Fingerprint 'Science' Is Revealed." Southern California Law Review 75 (2002): 605.

Equal Access Act of 1984. U.S. Code. Vol. 20, secs. 4071–74.

Estes, Pam. Billie Sol: King of Texas Wheeler-Dealers. Abilene, TX: Noble Craft Books, 1984.

Etzioni, Amitai. The Limits of Privacy. New York: Basic Books, 1999.

Euben, Donna R. "Academic Freedom of Individual Professors and Higher Education Institutions: The Current Legal Landscape," May 2002. American Association of University Professors. http://www.aaup.org/Com-a/aeuben.htm.

Eule, Julian. "Promoting Speaker Diversity: Austin and Metro Broadcasting." In The Supreme Court Review, ed. Gerhard Casper, Dennis Hutchinson, and David Strauss, 105–32. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Ewald, Alec C. "Civil Death: The Ideological Paradox of Criminal Disenfranchisement Law in the United States." Wisconsin Law Review (2002): 1045–1138.

Faberman, Stephen. "Note: The Lessons of DeShaney: Special Relationships, Schools, and the Fifth Circuit." Boston College Law Review 35 (December 1993): 97–139.

Fallon, Richard H., Jr. "Making Sense of Overbreadth." Yale Law Journal 100, 4 (January 1991): 853–908.

———. "Judicial Legislation and the Unwritten Constitution: A Comment on Miranda and Dickerson." New York Law School Law Review 45 (2001): 119–40.

Fallon, Richard H., Jr., and D. J. Meltzer. "New Law, Non-Retroactivity, and Constitutional Remedies." Harvard Law Review 104, 8 (June 1991): 1733.

Farber, Daniel A. The First Amendment. New York: Foundation, 1998.

———. Lincoln's Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Farber, Daniel A., and Phillip P. Frickey. Law and Public Choice: A Critical Introduction. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Farish, Leah. "Tinker v. Des Moines: Student Protest." In series Landmark Supreme Court Cases. Springfield, NJ: Enslow, 1997.

Farnsworth, E. Allan. Contracts. 3d ed. New York: Aspen, 1999.

Farnsworth, Elizabeth. NewsHour transcript "Seeing Red." October 24, 1997. www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/entertainment/july-dec97/blacklist_10-24.html.

Federal Death Penalty Act. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, secs. 3591–98 (1994).

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rules 26–37.

Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rules 12; 15–16.

Federal Rules of Evidence. Secs 801–807.1.

Feinberg, Joel. Harm to Self: The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Feinberg, Joel, and Hyman Gross, eds. Philosophy of Law. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1995.

Feldman, Linda. "Debate Uproar Shows No Sign of Quieting." Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 1996.

Feldman, Stephen M. Please Don't Wish Me a Merry Christmas: A Critical History of the Separation of Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Fellman, David. The Limits of Freedom. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1959.

———. Religion in American Public Law. Boston: Boston University Press, 1974.

———. The Defendant's Rights Today. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1976.

Fellner, Jamie, Human Rights Watch, and Marc Mauer. "The Sentencing Project." In Losing the Vote: The Impact of Felony Disenfranchisement Laws in the United States. New York: Human Rights Watch, 1998.

Fenner, Lorry M., and Marie E. DeYoung. Women in Combat: Civic Duty or Military Liability? Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 2001.

Ferris, Charles, and Terrence Leahy. "Red Lions, Tigers, and Bears: Broadcast Content Regulation and the First Amendment." Catholic University Law Review 38 (1989): 299.

Fey, Harold E. With Sovereign Reverence: The First Twenty-five Years of Americans United. Rockville, MD: Roger Williams, 1974.

Fields, Thomas S., and David T. Hardy. "The Third Amendment and the Issue of the Maintenance of Standing Armies: A Legal History." Journal of American Legal History 35 (1991): 393–431.

Filler, Louis. "Morrison R. Waite." In The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1798–1969, Their Lives and Major Opinions, Volume 2, ed. Leo Friedman and Fred Israel. New York: R. R. Bowker, 1969.

Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities of the United States Senate. 94th Congress, 2d session. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1976.

Fine, Sidney. Frank Murphy: The Washington Years. Vol. 3. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1984.

Finkelman, John. "The Zenger Case: Prototype of a Political Trial." In American Political Trials, ed. Michael R. Belknap. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981.

Finnis, John. Natural Law and Natural Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Fischel, William. Regulatory Takings: Law, Economics, and Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Fish, Stanley. There's No Such Thing as Free Speech and It's a Good Thing, Too. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Fisher, Louis. Presidential War Power. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1995.

———. Constitutional Conflict Between Congress and the President. 4th ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1997.

———. Religious Liberty in America: Political Safeguards. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Fiss, Owen M. History of the Supreme Court of the United States. Vol. 8: Troubled Beginnings of the Modern State, 1888–1910. New York: Macmillan, 1993.

Flanders, Henry. The Lives and Times of the Chief Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. Vol. 2. Philadelphia: T. and J. W. Johnson, 1881.

Fleischer, Doris Zames, and Freida Zames. Disability Rights Movement: From Charity to Confrontation. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2001.

Flemming, Roy B. Punishment Before Trial: An Organizational Perspective of Felony Bail Processes. New York: Longman, 1982.

Fletcher, George P. Basic Concepts of Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

———. Our Secret Constitution: How Lincoln Redefined American Democracy. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Fliter, John A. Prisoners' Rights: The Supreme Court and Evolving Standards of Decency. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2001.

———. "What Is Cruel and Unusual Punishment? Federal Courts and the Proportionality Principle After Harmelin v. Michigan." The Justice Professional 15, 3 (2002): 213–26.

Foerstel, Herbert N. Banned in the U.S.A.: A Reference Guide to Book Censorship in Schools and Public Libraries. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

———. Banned in the Media: A Reference Guide to Censorship in the Press, Motion Pictures, Broadcasting, and the Internet. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1998.

Foley, Michael S. Confronting the War Machine: Draft Resistance During the Vietnam War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Foner, Eric. The Story of American Freedom. New York: W. W. Norton, 1984.

Footlick, Jerrold K. "Bailey for the Defense." Newsweek, October 20, 1975, p. 64.

Ford, Norman. When Did I Begin? Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Ford, Paul Leicester, ed. The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Vol. 10, 1816–1826. New York: G. P. Putnam, 1892–1899.

Forehand, Walter E. "Tinkering with Tinker: Academic Freedom in the Public Schools—Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier." Florida State University Law Review 16 (Spring 1988): 159–83.

Forell, Caroline A., and Donna M. Matthews. A Law of Her Own: The Reasonable Woman as a Measure of Man. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Formicola, Jo Renee, and Hubert Morken, eds. Everson Revisited: Religion, Education, and Law at the Crossroads. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1997.

Foster, Dick. Compelling Civic Interest: Indictment of a Grand Jury. Encampment, WY: Affiliated Writers of America, 1996.

Foster, James C. The Ideology of Apolitical Politics: Elite Lawyers' Response to the Legitimation Crisis of American Capitalism, 1870–1920. New York: Garland, 1990.

Foster, Lawrence. Women, Family, and Utopia: Communal Experiments of the Shakers, the Oneida Community, and the Mormons. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1991.

Fowler, Robert Booth, Allen D. Hertzke, and Laura R. Olson. Religion and Politics in America. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1999.

Fraleigh, Douglas. "First Amendment Challenges to Restrictions on Internet Expression: Which Standard for Judicial Review." In Real Law @ Virtual Space: Regulation in Cyberspace, ed. Susan J. Drucker and Gary Gumpert. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton, 1999.

Fraleigh, Douglas, and Joseph Tuman. Freedom of Speech in the Marketplace of Ideas. New York: St. Martin's, 1997.

Francois, William E. Mass Media Law and Regulation. 4th ed. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1986.

Frankel, Marvin E. The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial. New York: Hill and Wang, 1977.

Franklin, John H. Reconstruction After the Civil War. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

———. The Emancipation Proclamation. New York: Doubleday, 1965.

Franklin, Marc A., and David A. Anderson. Cases and Materials on Mass Media Law. 5th ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 1995.

Frankowski, Stanislaw, and Dinah Shelton. Preventive Detention: A Comparative and International Law Perspective. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1992.

Frase, Richard S. "What Were They Thinking? Fourth Amendment Unreasonableness in Atwater v. City of Lago Vista." Fordham Law Review 71, 2 (November 2002): 329–421.

Fraser, Caroline. "Suffering Children and the Christian Science Church." The Atlantic, April 1995.

Fraser, James. Between Church and State. New York: Palgrave-Macmillan, 2000.

Frederick, Jeffrey T. Mastering Voir Dire and Jury Selection: Gaining an Edge in Questioning and Selecting a Jury. Chicago: American Bar Association, 1995.

Fredman, Lionel. The Australian Ballot: The Story of American Reform. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1968.

Fredrickson, Darin D., and Raymond P. Siljander. Racial Profiling: Eliminating the Confusion Between Racial and Criminal Profiling and Clarifying What Constitutes Unfair Discrimination and Persecution. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 2002.

Freedman, Warren. The Constitutional Right to a Speedy and Fair Criminal Trial. New York: Quorum Books, 1989.

Freilich, Robert H., Adrienne H. Wyker, and Leslie Eriksen Harris. "Federalism at the Millennium: A Review of U.S. Supreme Court Cases Affecting State and Local Government." Urban Lawyer 31, 4 (Fall 1999): 683–775.

French, David A. FIRE's Guide to Religious Liberty on Campus. Philadelphia: Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), 2002.

Freund, Ernst. The Police Power. New York: Arno, 1976.

Fricke, Aaron. Reflections of a Rock Lobster: A Story About Growing Up Gay. Boston: Alyson, 1995.

Fricke, Aaron, and Walter Fricke. Sudden Strangers: The Story of a Gay Son and His Father. New York: St. Martin's, 1991.

Friedman, Lawrence M. A History of American Law. 2d ed. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1985.

———. American Law in the Twentieth Century. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2002.

Friedman, Leon. The Justices of the United States Supreme Court. New York: Chelsea House, 1978.

———. "Warren E. Burger." In The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1995: Their Lives and Major Opinions, ed. Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, 1465–96. New York: Chelsea House, 1995.

Friendly, Fred W. Minnesota Rag. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1981.

———. The Good Guys, the Bad Guys, and the First Amendment: Free Speech Versus Fairness in Broadcasting. New York: Random House, 1977.

Friendly, Henry J. The Dartmouth College Case and the Public-Private Penumbra. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971.

Friesen, Jennifer. State Constitutional Law: Litigating Individual Claims, Rights, and Defenses. 2d ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1996.

Fritsch, Eric J., and Craig Hemmens. "Juvenile Waiver in the United States 1979–1995: A Comparison and Analysis of State Waiver Statutes." Juvenile and Family Court Journal 46, 3 (1995): 17–36.

Furst, Alan, ed. The Book of Spies: An Anthology of Literary Espionage. New York: Modern Library, 2002.

Gabriel, Ralph H. "American Experience with Military Government." American Historical Review 49, 4 (July 1944): 630–43.

Gagarin, M. Early Greek Law. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986.

Gaines, Larry K., and Roger L. Miller. Criminal Justice in Action. 2d ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2003.

Gale, David. "Released-Time Programs a Staple in Students' Lives," January 29, 2003. Religious News from NewsNet at Brigham Young University. http://newsnet.byu.edu/story.cfm/41820.

Gall, Gilbert J. The Politics of Right to Work: The Labor Federations as Special Interests, 1943–1979. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.

Galston, William A. "Civil Society and the Art of Association." Journal of Democracy 11, 1 (January 2000): 64–70.

Garcia, Alfredo. The Fifth Amendment: A Comprehensive Approach. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

———. "Search Warrant." In The Oxford Companion to American Law, ed. Kermit L. Hall, 723–24. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Garcia, Crystal A., and Sheila Seuss Kennedy. "Back to School: Technology, School Safety, and the Disappearing Fourth Amendment." Kansas Journal of Law and Public Policy 12 (Winter 2003): 273–85.

Gardbaum, Stephen A. " 'The Government Made Me Do It': A Proposed Approach to Entrapment Under Jacobson v. United States." Cornell Law Review 79 (May 1994): 995.

Gardner, Martin R. Understanding Juvenile Law. New York: Matthew Bender, 1997.

Gardner, Michael R. Harry Truman and Civil Rights: Moral Courage and Political Risks. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2002.

Garner, Bryan A. Black's Law Dictionary. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Garnett, Richard. "The Right Questions About School Choice: Education, Religious Freedom, and the Common Good." Cardozo Law Review 23 (March 2002): 1281.

Garrow, David J. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. New York: Macmillan, 1994.

———. "Justice Souter: A Surprising Kind of Conservative." New York Times Magazine, September 6, 1994, 36.

Garvey, John H., and Frederick Schauer, eds. The First Amendment: A Reader. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1992.

Gaudin, Anne Marie. "Note: Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health: To Die or Not to Die: That Is the Question—But Who Decides?" Louisiana Law Review 51 (July 1991): 1307–45.

Gay, John. "Note: Bowen v. Kendrick: Establishing a New Relationship Between Church and State." American University Law Review 38 (Spring 1989): 953–92.

Geary, James W. We Need Men: The Union Draft in the Civil War. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1991.

Gedicks, Frederick Mark. The Rhetoric of Church and State: A Critical Analysis of Religion Clause Jurisprudence. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1995.

———. "The Ironic State of Religious Liberty in America." University of Mercer Law Review 46 (Spring 1995): 1157–66.

Genetic Privacy Act of 1995. http://www.ornl.gov/TechResources/Human_Genome/resource/privacy/privacy1.html.

Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. August 12, 1949. 6 United States Treaties 3516; 75 United Nations Treaty Series 287.

Gerard, Jules B. "Election Signs and Time Limits." Washington University Journal of Law and Policy 3 (2000): 379–96.

Gerhardt, Michael J. "The Role of Precedent in Constitutional Decision-Making and Theory." George Washington Law Review 60, 1 (November 1991): 68–159.

———. "The Pressure of Precedent: A Critique of the Conservative Approaches to Stare Decisis in Abortion Cases." Constitutional Commentary 10 (1993): 67–86.

———. "Johnson, Frank M., Jr." In Great American Judges: An Encyclopedia, ed. John R. Vile, 415–23, vol. 1 (of 2 vols.). Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

Gersh, Debra. "A Debate About the Debates." Editor and Publisher 126 (July 24, 1993): 18–20.

Gershman, Bennett L. Prosecutorial Misconduct. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Gianos, Phillip L. Politics and Politicians in American Film. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1998.

Gifis, Steven H. Dictionary of Legal Terms: A Simplified Guide to the Language of Law. 3d ed. Hauppauge, NY: Barron's Educational Series, 1998.

Giglio, Ernest. Here's Looking at You: Hollywood, Film, and Politics. New York: P. Lang, 2000.

Gillman, Howard. The Constitution Besieged: The Rise and

Demise of Lochner-Era Policy Powers Jurisprudence. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1993.

Ginger, Ray. The Bending Cross: A Biography of Eugene Victor Debs. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1949.

Ginsburg, Ruth Bader. "The Burger Court's Grapplings with Sex Discrimination." In The Burger Court: The Counter-Revolution That Wasn't, ed. Vincent Blasi. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983.

Gitlow, Benjamin. I Confess: The Truth About American Communism. 1940. Reprint, Freeport, NY: Books for Libraries Press, 1972.

Glad, Paul W. The Trumpet Soundeth: William Jennings Bryan and His Democracy, 1896–1912. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1960.

Glade, M. E., and J. R. Giese. Immigration: Pluralism and National Identity. Public Issues Series. Boulder, CO: Social Science Education Consortium, 1989.

Glannon, Joseph W. Civil Procedure: Examples and Explanations. 4th ed. New York: Aspen, 1999.

Glendon, Mary Ann. The Transformation of Family Law: State, Law, and Family in the United States and Western Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.

Glick, Henry. Courts, Politics, and Justice. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1993.

Gold, John Coopersmith. Board of Education v. Pico (1982): Book Banning. New York: Twenty-first Century Books, 1994.

Goldberg, Dorothy. A Private View of a Public Life. New York: Charterhouse, 1975.

Goldberg, Linn, et al. "Drug Testing Athletes to Prevent Substance Abuse: Background and Pilot Study Results of the SATURN (Student Athlete Testing Using Random Notification) Study." Journal of Adolescent Health 32, 1 (January 2003): 16.

Golden, Troy E. "The Inevitable Discovery Doctrine Today: The Demands of the Fourth Amendment, Nix and Murray, and the Disagreement Among the Federal Circuits." Brigham Young University Journal of Public Law 13 (1998): 97.

Goldfarb, Ronald L. The Contempt Power. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.

Goldman, Sheldon. American Court Systems: Readings in Judicial Process and Behavior. New York: Longman, 1989.

———. Picking Federal Judges: Lower Court Selection from Roosevelt Through Reagan. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Goldstein, Anne B. "History, Homosexuality, and Political Values: Searching for the Hidden Determinants of Bowers v. Hardwick." Yale Law Journal 97 (May 1988): 1073–1103.

Goldstein, Leslie Friedman. The Constitutional Rights of Women: Cases in Law and Social Change. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989.

Goldstein, Robert Justin. Flag Burning and Free Speech: The Case of Texas v. Johnson. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Goodman, Walter. The Committee: The Extraordinary Career of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1968.

Goodstein, Laurie. "Directive on Searches." New York Times, November 20, 2001.

Gora, Joel M., David Goldberg, Gary M. Stern, and Morton H. Halperin. The Right to Protest: The Basic ACLU Guide to Free Expression. Springfield: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991.

Gore, Tipper. Raising PG Kids in an X-Rated Society. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1987.

Gorney, Cynthia. Articles of Faith: A Frontline History of the Abortion Wars. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.

Gottlieb, Stephen E. Morality Imposed: The Rehnquist Court and Liberty in America. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Gould, Lewis L. The Modern American Presidency. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Graber, Doris A. Mass Media and American Politics. 5th ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1997.

Graber, Mark A. Transforming Free Speech. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

Graber, Mark A., and Michael Perhac. Marbury Versus Madison: Documents and Commentary. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2002.

Graham, Hugh D. The Civil Rights Era: Origins and Development of National Policy 1960–1972. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Graham, Michael H. Handbook of Federal Evidence. 5th ed. Vol. 3. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2001.

Graham, Otis, Jr. "Bethune, Mary McLeod." In Franklin D. Roosevelt: His Life and Times, ed. Otis Graham Jr. and Meghan Robinson Wander. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985.

Granucci, Anthony F. "Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishments Inflicted: The Original Meaning." California Law Review 57, 4 (1969): 838–65.

Gray, Fred. Bus Ride to Justice. Montgomery, AL: Black Belt Press, 1995.

Gray, James P. Why Our Drug Laws Have Failed and What We Can Do About It: A Judicial Indictment of the War on Drugs. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2001.

Gray, John. Mill on Liberty: A Defence. 2d ed. London: Routledge, 1996.

———, ed. John Stuart Mill on Liberty and Other Essays. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Gray, Lawrence N. The Role of Counsel at the Grand Jury. Albany: New York State Bar Association, 1987.

Green, John, Mark J. Rozell, and Clyde Wilcox, eds. The Christian Right in American Politics: Marching to the Millennium. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 2003.

Green, Thomas M., and William D. Pederson. "The Behavior of Lawyer-Presidents: A 'Barberian' Link." In The "Barberian" Presidency, ed. William D. Pederson. New York: P. Lang, 1989.

Greenawalt, Kent. Speech, Crime, and the Uses of Language. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

———. Fighting Words: Individuals, Communities, and the Liberties of Speech. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.

Greenberg, Bradley S., ed. The Alphabet Soup of Television Ratings. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton, 2001.

Greenberg, Milton. "Loyalty Oaths: An Appraisal of the Legal Issues." Journal of Politics 20, 3 (195 8): 487–514.

Greene, Abner S. "Kiryas Joel and Two Mistakes About Equality." Columbia Law Review 96 (January 1996): 1.

Greene, John Robert. The Presidency of Gerald R. Ford. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1995.

Greenhalgh, William W. The Fourth Amendment Handbook: A Chronological Survey of Supreme Court Decisions. 2d ed. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2002.

Greenhouse, Linda. "Justices Allow Religious Groups After-Hours Use of Public Schools." New York Times, June 8, 1993.

———. "States Allowed to Avoid Subsidy of Divinity Study." New York Times, February 26, 2004, A1, A18.

———. "Justices Allow Unsigned Political Fliers." New York Times, April 20, 1995.

Gregg, Pauline. Free-Born John: A Biography of John Lilburne. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1961.

Grieve, David L. "Possession of Truth." Journal of Forensic Identification 46 (1996): 521.

Griffin, Rayanne J. "Sacred Site Protection Against a Background of Religious Intolerance." University of Tulsa Law Journal 31 (Winter 1995): 393–419.

Griffith, Kathryn. Judge Learned Hand and the Role of the Federal Judiciary. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.

Grimes, Alan P. Democracy and the Amendments to the Constitution. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1978.

Grimmett, Richard F., ed. The War Powers Resolution. New York: Novinka, 2002.

Gross, Emanuel. "Human Rights, Terrorism, and the Problem of Administrative Detention in Israel: Does a Democracy Have the Right to Hold Terrorists as Bargaining Chips?" Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law 18 (2001): 721.

Grossman, Joel B., and Richard S. Wells. Constitutional Law and Judicial Policymaking. New York and London: Longman, 1988.

Grudberg, David Thomas. "Note: Criminal Procedure—Illinois v. Gates: A New Test For Informers' Tips." North Carolina Law Review 62 (June 1984): 1024.

Grunes, Rodney A. "William J. Brennan Jr. and Human Dignity." In Leaders of the Pack: Polls and Case Studies of Great Supreme Court Justices, ed. William D. Pederson and Norman W. Provizer, 215–31. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Guggenheim, Martin. "Minor Rights: The Adolescent Abortion Cases." Hofstra Law Review 30 (Spring 2002): 589–646.

Guidorizzi, Douglas D. "Should We Really Ban Plea Bargaining? The Core Concerns of Plea Bargaining Critics." Emory Law Journal 47 (1998): 753.

Guinier, Lani. Tyranny of the Majority: Fundamental Fairness in Representative Democracy. New York: Free Press, 1994.

Guinther, John. The Jury in America. New York: Facts on File, 1988.

Guliuzza, Frank. Over the Wall: Protecting Religious Expression in the Public Square. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.

Gunther, Gerald. "Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine." Stanford Law Review 27 (1975): 719.

———. Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.

Gutmann, Amy. Democratic Education. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987.

Guy, J. A. "The Origins of the Petition of Right Reconsidered." Historical Journal 25, 2 (1982): 289–312.

Hacker, Andrew. Congressional Districting: The Issue of Equal Representation. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1963.

Hageman, John Frelinghuysen. Privileged Communications as a Branch of Legal Evidence. Littleton, CO: F. B. Rothman, 1983.

Hall, Christopher. Milton and the English Revolution. New York: Viking, 1977.

Hall, John Wesley. Search and Seizure. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 2000.

Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to The Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Halpern, Sheldon W. Copyright Law: Protection of Original Expression. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2002.

Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Hamilton, Alexander. "Federalist Paper No. 84." In The Federalist Papers, by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay. New York: McLean, 1788.

Hamilton, Alexander, James Madison, and John Jay. The Federalist Papers, ed. Clinton Rossiter. New York: Mentor, 1999.

Hamilton, James. The Power to Probe: A Study of Congressional Investigations. New York: Random House, 1976.

Hamilton, John W. "Bishop v. Aronov: Religion-Tainted Viewpoints Are Banned from the Marketplace of Ideas." Washington and Lee Law Review 49 (Fall 1992): 1557–90.

Hamilton, Patricia Anne. "Freedom of Expression in Public Schools: Regulation of Student Newspapers and Other Publications." Cumberland Law Review 18 (1987/1988): 181–203.

Hamlett, Patrick W. Understanding Technological Politics: A Decision-Making Approach. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1992.

Hamlin, David. The Nazi/Skokie Conflict: A Civil Liberties Battle. Boston: Beacon, 1980.

Hamm, Richard F. Shaping the Eighteenth Amendment: Temperance Reform, Legal Culture, and the Polity, 1880–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Hammond, Matthew Carlton. "The Posse Comitatus Act: A Principle in Need of Renewal." Washington University Law Quarterly 75, 2 (Summer 1997): 953–84.

Hammond, Phillip E. With Liberty for All: Freedom of Religion in the United States. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998.

Han, Cynthia. "Evolving Standards of Decency: Legislative and Judicial Developments Leading to Atkins v. Virginia." Georgetown Journal of Poverty Law and Policy 9 (Summer 2002): 469–79.

Hand, Learned. The Spirit of Liberty: Papers and Addresses, collected by Irving Dillard. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1953.

———. The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1958.

Haney, Robert W. Comstockery in America: Patterns of Censorship and Control. Boston: Beacon, 1960.

Hanley, Robert. "Racial Data on Turnpike Arrests Criticized." New York Times, March 28, 2002.

Hans, Valerie. "The Power of Twelve: The Impact of Jury Size and Unanimity on Civil Jury Decision Making." Delaware Law Review 4 (2001): 1–32.

Hans, Valerie, and Neil Vidmar. Judging the Jury. New York: Plenum, 1986.

Hanson, Roger, William Hewitt, Brian Ostrom, and Christopher Lomvardias. Indigent Defenders: Get the Job Done and Done Well. Williamsburg, VA: National Center for State Courts, 1992.

Hardin, Russell. Liberalism, Constitutionalism, and Democracy. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Harer, John B., and Jeanne Harrell. People for and Against Restricted or Unrestricted Expression. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Hargrove, Erwin C. Jimmy Carter: Leadership and the Politics of the Public Good. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988.

Harlan, Malvina Shanklin. Some Memories of a Long Life, 1854–1911. New York: Modern Library, 2002.

Harper, Alan D. The Politics of Loyalty. Westport CT: Greenwood, 1969.

Harris, David A.. "Driving While Black: Racial Profiling on Our Nation's Highways," June 1999. American Civil Liberties Union Special Report. http://Archive.Aclu.Org/Profiling/Report/Index.Html.

———. Profiles in Injustice: Why Racial Profiling Cannot Work. New York: New Press, 2002.

Harrison, Charles. Clarence Darrow. New York: J. Cape and H. Smith, 1931.

Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association. "Standards of Care for Gender Identity Disorders," February 2001. 6th version. http://www.hbigda.org/soc.cfm.

Hartman, Rhonda Gay. "Adolescent Autonomy: Clarifying an Ageless Conundrum." Hastings Law Journal 51 (August 2000): 1265–1362.

Hartog, Hendrik. Man and Wife in America: A History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Hasen, Richard L. "Shrink Missouri, Campaign Finance, and 'The Thing That Wouldn't Leave.' " Constitutional Commentary 17, 3 (Winter 2000): 483–509.

Hastedt, Glenn. Espionage: A Reference Handbook. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

Hastie, Reid, Steven Penrod, and Nancy Pennington. Inside the Jury. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.

Hatch, Nathan O. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.

Hayek, Friedrich A. The Constitution of Liberty. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.

Haynes, John Earl. Red Scare or Red Menace? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996.

Haynie, Erick J. "Populism, Free Speech, and the Rule of Law: The 'Fully Informed' Jury Movement and Its Implications." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 88 (Fall 1997): 343–79.

Hefferman, William C. "The Fourth Amendment Exclusionary Rule as a Constitutional Remedy." Georgetown Law Journal 88, 5 (2000): 799–878.

Heineman, Robert A., William T. Bluhm, Steven A. Peterson, and Edward N. Kearny. The World of the Policy Analyst: Rationality, Values, and Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1990.

Heins, Marjorie. Not in Front of the Children: "Indecency," Censorship, and the Innocence of Youth. New York: Hill and Wang, 2001.

Held, David. Models of Democracy. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1996.

Hellerstein, Jerome R., and Walter Hellerstein. State and Local Taxation Cases and Materials. 5th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 1988.

———. State Taxation. Vols. 1–2. Boston: Warren, Gorham, and Lamont, 1998.

Hemmens, Craig, Katherine Scarborough, and Rolando del Carmen. "Grave Doubts About Reasonable Doubt: Confusion in State and Federal Courts." Journal of Criminal Justice 25, 2 (1997): 231–54.

Hendrix, Robert K. "The Inevitable Discovery Exception to the Exclusionary Rule: Nix v. Williams, 104 S. Ct. 2501 (1984)." University of Cincinnati Law Review 54 (1986): 1087.

Henkin, Louis. Constitutionalism, Democracy, and Foreign Affairs. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

———. Foreign Affairs and the United States Constitution. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.

Henneberg, Maureen. Bureau of Justice Statistics 2000: At a Glance. U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 2000.

Henning, Peter J. "Prosecutorial Misconduct and Constitutional Remedies." Washington University Law Quarterly 77 (Fall 1999): 713.

Henri, Florette. George Mason of Virginia. New York: Crowell-Collier, 1971.

Herendeen, Susan. "Lessons in Language, English-Only Beats Bilingual in Test Scores." Modesto Bee, July 29, 2001.

Herman, Arthur. Joseph McCarthy. New York: Free Press, 2000.

Hermann, Robert, Eric Single, and John Boston. Counsel for the Poor. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1977.

Hernshkoff, Helen. "Positive Rights and State Constitutions: The Limits of Federal Rationality Review." Harvard Law Review 112 (1999): 1131.

Heumann, Milton, and Lance Cassak. Good Cop, Bad Cop: Racial Profiling and Competing Views of Justice. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Heyd, David, ed. Toleration: An Elusive Virtue. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Heydon, John D. Economic Torts. 2d ed. London: Sweet and Maxwell, 1978.

Heyman, Steven J. "The First Duty of Government: Protection, Liberty, and the Fourteenth Amendment." Duke Law Journal 41 (1991): 507.

———. "Spheres of Autonomy: Reforming the Content-Neutrality Doctrine in First Amendment Jurisprudence." William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 10 (2002): 647–717.

Heymsfeld, Carla R., and Joan W. Lewis. George Mason: Father of the Bill of Rights. Rockville, MD: Patriotic Education, 1993.

Hickok, Eugene W., and Gary L. McDowell. Justice vs. Law: Courts and Politics in American Society. New York: Free Press, 1993.

Higginbotham, A. Leon, Jr. Shades of Freedom: Racial Politics and Presumptions of the American Legal Process. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Hill, Christopher. The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas During the English Revolution. New York: Penguin, 1972.

Hillyard, Daniel, and John Dombrink. Dying Right: The Death with Dignity Movement. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Hinck, Edward A. Enacting the Presidency: Political Argument, Presidential Debates, and Presidential Character. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993.

Hindman, Elizabeth Blanks. Rights vs. Responsibilities: The Supreme Court and the Media. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1997.

Hirsch, Harry N. The Enigma of Felix Frankfurter. New York: Basic Books, 1981.

Hixon, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Hobbes, Thomas. Leviathan. New York: Penguin, 1968.

Hobson, Charles F. The Great Chief Justice: John Marshall and the Rule of Law. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1996.

Hockett, Jeffrey D. New Deal Justice: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Hugo L. Black, Felix Frankfurter, and Robert H. Jackson. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

Hoebeke, C. H. The Road to Mass Democracy. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 1995.

Hoffer, Peter Charles, and N.E.H. Hull. Roe v. Wade: The Abortion Rights Controversy in American History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Hoffman, David. The Oklahoma City Bombing and the Politics of Terror. Los Angeles: Feral House, 1998.

Hofstadter, Richard, and Walter P. Metzher. The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States. New York: Columbia University Press, 1955.

Hofstadter, Richard, and Wilson Smith, eds. American Higher Education: A Documentary History, Vol. 2, Part 10, Academic Freedom in the University. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

Holbrook, Thomas. Do Campaigns Matter? Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 1996.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr. The Common Law. Cambridge, MA: Belknap, 1963.

Holmes, Stephen, and Cass R. Sunstein. The Cost of Rights: Why Liberty Depends on Taxes. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.

Holsinger, M. Paul. "The Oregon School Bill Controversy, 1922–1925." Pacific Historical Review 37, 3 (August 1968): 327–41.

Holt, John. How Children Fail. New York: Dell, 1964.

———. How Children Learn. New York: Dell, 1967.

Holtz, Larry E. Contemporary Criminal Procedure. 2d ed. Longwood, FL: Gould, 1992.

Hook, Sidney, ed. In Defense of Academic Freedom. New York: Pegasus, 1971.

Hoover, J. Edgar. Masters of Deceit: The Story of Communism in America and How to Fight It. New York: Holt, 1958.

Hornsby, William E., Jr. Marketing and Legal Ethics: The Boundaries of Promoting Legal Services. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2000.

Horsman, Reginald. The Frontier in the Formative Years, 1783–1815. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1970.

Horwitz, Morton J. The Transformation of American Law, 1780–1860. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979.

Hostetler, John A. Amish Society. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1993.

Houck, John W., ed. Outdoor Advertising: History and Regulation. Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame University Press, 1969.

Howard, Alan J. "When Can the Moral Majority Rule? The Real Dilemma at the Core of the Nude Dancing Cases." Saint Louis University Law Journal 44 (Summer 2000): 897–908.

Howard, A. E. Dick. Magna Carta: Text and Commentary. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1964.

———. "Garcia: Of Federalism and Constitutional Values." Publius: The Journal of Federalism 16 (Summer 1986): 17–31.

Howard, Charles. "A Lonely Place of Honor: A Rhetorical Analysis of the Movement to Amend the Constitution to Prevent Flag Burning." Unpublished dissertation, University of Kansas, 1992.

Howard, J. Woodford. Mr. Justice Murphy: A Political Biography. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.

Howard, Thomas C., and William Pederson, eds. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Formation of the Modern World. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 2003.

Hubbard, F. Patrick. "Palazzolo, Lucas, and Penn Central: The Need for Pragmatism, Symbolism, and Ad Hoc Balancing." Nebraska Law Review 80 (2001): 465–479.

Hudson, James J. "The Role of the California National Guard During the San Francisco General Strike of 1934." Military Affairs 46, 2 (April 1982): 76–83.

Hull, Mary E. Censorship in America: A Reference Handbook. Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO, 1999.

Hull, N.E.H., and Peter Charles Hoffer. Roe v. Wade: The Abortion Rights Controversy in American History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Hunter, Nan D., Sherryl E. Michaelson, and Thomas B. Stoddard. The Rights of Lesbians and Gay Men: The Basic ACLU Guide to a Gay Person's Rights. 3d ed. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.

Hurst, James W. The Law of Treason in the United States. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1971.

Hutchens, Neal H. "Suspicionless Drug Testing: The Tuition for Attending Public School?" Alabama Law Review 53 (2002): 1265.

Hutchinson, Dennis D. The Man Who Once Was Whizzer White. New York: Free Press, 1998.

Hyman, Harold M. To Try Men's Souls: Loyalty Tests in American History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.

Hyman, Harold, and William Wiecek. Equal Justice Under the Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. New York: Harper and Row, 1982.

Irons, Peter H. Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

———. "Biddle, Francis Beverly." In Franklin D. Roosevelt: His Life and Times, ed. Otis Graham Jr. and Meghan Robinson Wander. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985.

———. A People's History of the Supreme Court. New York: Penguin Books, 1999.

———, ed. Justice Delayed: The Record of the Japanese American Internment Cases. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1989.

———, ed. May It Please the Court: Courts, Kids, and the Constitution. New York: New Press, 2000.

Israel, Jerold H., and Wayne R. La Fave. Criminal Procedure: Constitutional Limitations in a Nutshell. 5th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1993.

Israel, Jerold H., Yale Kamisar, and Wayne R. LaFave. Criminal Procedure and the Constitution: Leading Supreme Court Cases and Introductory Text. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Issacharoff, Samuel, Pamela S. Karlan, and Richard H. Pildes. The Law of Democracy: Legal Structure of the Political Process. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2002.

Issacharoff, Samuel, and Richard H. Pildes. "Politics as Markets: Partisan Lockups of the Democratic Process." Stanford Law Review 50 (February 1998): 643–717.

Ivers, Gregg. Lowering the Wall: Religion and the Supreme Court in the 1980s. New York: Anti-Defamation League, 1991.

———. Redefining the First Freedom: The Supreme Court and the Consolidation of State Power. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1993.

Jackson, Robert H. That Man: An Insider's Portrait of Franklin D. Roosevelt, ed. John Q. Barrett. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Jacobs, Clyde Edward. Law Writers and the Courts: The Influence of Thomas M. Cooley, Christopher G. Tiedeman, and John F. Dillon upon American Constitutional Law. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1954.

Jacobs, James, and Kimberly Potter. Hate Crimes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

James, Dinita L. "Note: The School as Publisher: Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier." North Carolina Law Review 67 (January 1989): 503–16.

Jamieson, Kathleen Hall, and David S. Birdsell. Presidential Debates: The Challenge of Creating an Informed Electorate. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Jasper, Margaret C. The Law of Libel and Slander. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1996.

———. The Law of Obscenity and Pornography. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1996.

Jeffreys-Jones, Rhodri. The CIA and American Democracy. 2d ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

Jeffries, John W. Testing the Roosevelt Coalition: Connecticut Society and Politics in the Era of World War II. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1979.

Jelsema, Mindi M. "Zoning Adult Businesses After Los Angeles v. Alameda Books." Saint Louis University Law Journal 47 (Summer 2003): 1117.

Jenkins, Philip. Beyond Tolerance: Child Pornography on the Internet. New York: New York University Press, 2001.

Jensen, Merrill. The New Nation: A History of the United States During the Confederation, 1781–1789. New York, Vintage, 1950.

Jenson, Joan M. Army Surveillance in America. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1991.

Johnson, David R., and Laurie K. Scheuble. "Gender Bias in the Disposition of Juvenile Court Referrals: The Effects of Time and Location." Criminology 29, 4 (1991): 677–99.

Johnson, Herbert A. American Legal and Constitutional History. San Francisco: Austin and Winfield, 1994.

———. The Chief Justiceship of John Marshall, 1801–1835. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Johnson, John W. The Struggle for Student Rights: Tinker v. Des Moines and the 1960s. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1997.

Jonakait, Randolph N. The American Jury System. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003.

Jones, Alan R. The Constitutional Conservatism of Thomas McIntyre Cooley: A Study in the History of Ideas. New York: Garland, 1987.

Jones, Augustus J., Jr., and Michelle Donaldson Deardorff. "State Attorneys General as Policymakers: AG Responses to the Hodgson and Akron Abortion Cases." National Political Science Review 4 (1994): 80–97.

Jones, E. Michael. Dionysos Rising: The Birth of Cultural Revolution out of the Spirit of Music. San Francisco: Ignatius, 1994.

Jones, Steve. Pop Music and the Press. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2002.

Joo, Thomas W. "Corporate Governance and the Constitutionality of Campaign Finance Reform." Election Law Journal 1, 3 (2002): 361–72.

Jung, Donald J. The Federal Communications Commission, the Broadcast Industry, and the Fairness Doctrine, 1981–1987. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1996.

"Justices Expand Right to Counsel." The Legal Intelligencer, May 21, 2002.

Justman, Stuart. The Hidden Text of Mill's Liberty. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1991.

Kahn, Ronald. "God Save Us from the Coercion Test: Constitutive Decision-Making, Polity Principles, and Religious Freedom." In "Symposium: Religion and the Public Schools After Lee v. Weisman." Case-Western Reserve Law Review 43 (Spring 1993): 983–1020.

———. The Supreme Court and Constitutional Theory, 1953–1993. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.

———. "Institutional Norms and Supreme Court Decision-Making: The Rehnquist Court on Privacy and Religion." In Supreme Court Decision-Making: New Institutionalist Approaches, ed. Cornell W. Clayton and Howard Gillman, 175–98. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.

Kaiser, Edward J., and David R. Godschalk. "Twentieth Century Land Use Planning: A Stalwart Family Tree." Journal of the American Planning Association 61 (1995): 365.

Kalman, Laura. Abe Fortas: A Biography. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1990.

Kalven, Harry, Jr. The Negro and the First Amendment. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.

———. Contempt. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1970.

———. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.

Kalven, Harry, Jr., and Hans Zeisel. The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown, 1966.

Kamin, Sam. "Harmless Error and the Rights/Remedies Split." Virginia Law Review 88 (March 2002): 1–86.

Kang, Jerry. Communications Law and Policy: Cases and Materials. New York: Aspen, 2001.

Kaplar, Richard T. Advertising Rights, the Neglected Freedom: Toward a New Doctrine of Commercial Speech. Washington, DC: Media Institute, 1991.

Kaplin, William A., and Barbara A. Lee. The Law of Higher Education. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 1995.

Kappeler, Victor. Critical Issues in Police Civil Liability. Prospect Heights, IL: Waveland, 2001.

Karl, Terry, Larry Diamond, Donald K. Emmerson, Michael McFaul, and Gail Lapidus. "Comparative Democratization Project," 2000–2003. Stanford University, Institute of International Studies. http://democracy.stanford.edus.

Karst, Kenneth L. Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981.

Katz, Richard S. Democracy and Elections. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Katznelson, Ira, and Margaret Weir. Schooling for All: Class, Race, and the Decline of the Democratic Ideal. New York: Basic Books, 1985.

Kaufman, Andrew. Cardozo. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Kearney, Joseph D., and Thomas W. Merrill. "The Influence of Amicus Curiae Briefs on the Supreme Court." University of Pennsylvania Law Review 148 (2000): 743–854.

Keen, Lisa, and Suzanne B. Goldberg. Strangers to the Law: Gay People on Trial. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998.

"Keeping Name Private Can Be Crime, Court Rules," June 21, 2004. CNN.com. http://www.cnn.com/2004/LAW/06/21/scotus.police.id.

Keim, Albert N., ed. Compulsory Education and the Amish: The Right Not to Be Modern. Boston: Beacon, 1975.

Kellner, Douglas. Herbert Marcuse and the Crisis of Marxism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.

Kelly, A. H., and W. A. Harbison. The American Constitution. 7th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 1991.

Kelly, Alfred H., Winfred A. Harbison, and Herman Belz. The American Constitution: Its Origins and Development. New York, W. W. Norton, 1991.

Keman, Hans, ed. Comparative Democratic Politics: A Guide to Contemporary Theory and Research. London: Sage, 2002.

Kendall, Willmoore, and George Carey. The Basic Symbols of the American Political Tradition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1970.

Kennedy, Charles H., and Peter P. Swire. "State Wiretaps and Electronic Surveillance After September 11." Hastings Law Journal 54 (2003): 971–85.

Kennedy, David M. Freedom from Fear: The American People in Depression and War, 1929–1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Kennedy, Robert F., Jr. Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr.: A Biography. New York: Putnam, 1978.

Kennedy, Sheila Suess. Free Expression in America: A Documentary History. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1999.

Kennett, Lee, and James La Verne Anderson. The Gun in America: The Origins of a National Dilemma. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1975.

Kens, Paul. Lochner v. New York: Economic Regulation on Trial. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.

Kessler, Ronald. Inside the CIA. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992.

Ketcham, Ralph, ed. The Anti-Federalist Papers and the Constitutional Convention Debates. New York: Mentor, 1996.

Keynes, Edward. Liberty, Property, and Privacy: Toward a Jurisprudence of Substantive Due Process. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.

Keyssar, Alexander. The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

King, Andrew J. "Sunday Law in the Nineteenth Century." Albany Law Review 6 (2000): 675.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. "Letter from Birmingham City Jail." In King, Why We Can't Wait. New York: New American Library, 1964.

King, Preston. Toleration. London: Frank Cass, 1998.

King, Ronald F., and Susan Ellis. "Partisan Advantage and Constitutional Change: The Case of the Seventeenth Amendment." Studies in American Political Development 10 (1996): 69–102.

Kirk, Russell. The Conservative Mind: From Burke to Santayana. Chicago: Regnery, 1953.

Klehr, Harvey, and John E. Haynes. The American Communist Movement: Storming Heaven Itself. New York: Maxwell Macmillan International, 1992.

Klein, Dora W. "Trial Rights and Psychotropic Drugs: The Case Against Administering Involuntary Medications to a Defendant During Trial." Vanderbilt Law Review 55 (January 2002): 165–218.

Klein, Richard. "The Constitutionalization of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel." Maryland Law Review 58 (1999): 1433–79.

Klicka, Christopher J., and D. James Kennedy. Homeschooling, the Right Choice: An Academic, Historical, Practical, and Legal Perspective. Sisters, OR: Loyal, 2000.

Kline, Robert L. "Give Me Liberty and Give Me Death: Assisted Suicide as a Fundamental Liberty Interest." Boston Public Interest Law Journal 6 (Winter 1997): 527–50.

Kmiec, Douglas W. "Natural Law Originalism—Or Why Justice Scalia Is (Almost) Right." Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 21 (1998): 1.

Kmiec, Douglas, and Stephen B. Presser. Individual Rights and the American Constitution. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 1999.

Kobler, John. Ardent Spirits: The Rise and Fall of Prohibition. New York: Putnam, 1973.

Koenig, Louis W. Bryan: A Political Biography of William Jennings Bryan. New York: Putnam, 1971.

Kohn, Stephen M. Jailed for Peace: The History of American Draft Law Violators, 1658–1985. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1986.

———. American Political Prisoners: Prosecutions Under the Espionage and Sedition Acts. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1994.

Kolbert, Kathryn, and Zak Mettger. Censoring the Web. New York: New Press, 2001.

Kommers, Donald P., and Michael J. Wahoske, eds. Freedom and Education: Pierce v. Society of Sisters Reconsidered. Notre Dame, IN: Center for Civil Rights, University of Notre Dame Law School, 1978.

Kousser, J. Morgan. The Shaping of Southern Politics: Suffrage Restriction and the Establishment of the One-Party South 1880–1910. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1974.

———. "Suffrage." In Encyclopedia of American Political History, ed. Jack P. Greene. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1984.

Kozol, Jonathan. Savage Inequalities: Children in America's Schools. New York: Crown, 1991.

Kramer, Larry D. "Putting the Politics Back into the Political Safeguards of Federalism." Columbia Law Review 100 (2000): 215.

Krasnow, Erwin G., and Herbert A. Terry. The Politics of Broadcast Regulation, foreword Newton Minow. 4th ed. New York: St. Martin's, 1993.

Krause, Jason. "Can Anyone Stop Internet Porn?" American Bar Association Journal (September 2002): 58.

Kraybill, Donald B. The Riddle of Amish Culture. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Krieger, Linda Hamilton, ed. Backlash Against the ADA: Reinterpreting Disability Rights. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2003.

Krislov, Samuel. "The Amicus Curiae Brief: From Friendship to Advocacy." Yale Law Journal 72 (1963): 694–721.

Kull, Andrew. The Color Blind Constitution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.

Kunkel, Dale, et al. "Deciphering the V-Chip: An Examination of the Television Industry's Program Rating Standards." Journal of Communication 52, 1 (March 2002): 112–38.

Kunstler, William M. My Life as a Radical Lawyer. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1994.

Kuntz, Paul G. "The Ten Commandments on Schoolroom Walls? Why Did the Supreme Court Reject the 1978 Kentucky Statute (Stone v. Graham)? Could Such a Law Succeed?" Journal of Law and Public Policy 9 (Fall 1977): 1–36.

Kurland, Philip B., ed. Church and State: The Supreme Court and the First Amendment. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

Kutler, Stanley I. "Ex parte McCardle: Judicial Impotency? The Supreme Court and Reconstruction Reconsidered." American Historical Review 72, 3 (April 1967): 835–51.

———. The American Inquisition: Justice and Injustice in the Cold War. New York: Hill and Wang, 1982.

———. Privilege and Creative Destruction: The Charles River Bridge Case. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.

———, ed. Abuse of Power: The New Nixon Tapes. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.

Kyriazis, Arthur J., and Harry M. Caldwell. "Unchecked Discretion, the Buck Stops Here: Is There a Fourth Amendment at the International Borders of the United States?" Whittier Law Review 14 (1993): 613.

Kyvig, David E. Repealing National Prohibition. 2d ed. Kent, OH: Kent State University Press, 2000.

Laband, David N., and Deborah Heinbuch. Blue Laws: The History, Economics, and Politics of Sunday-Closing Laws. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1987.

Labbé, Ronald M. "New Light on the Slaughterhouse Monopoly Act of 1869." In Louisiana's Legal Heritage, ed. Edward F. Haas. Pensacola, FL: Perdido Bay Press, 1983.

Labriola, Albert C. "John Milton." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 131: Seventeenth-Century British Nondramatic Poets, 3d series, ed. M. Thomas Hester, 153–89. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Labunski, Richard. Libel and the First Amendment. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 1987.

Lacayo, Richard. "The War Comes Back Home: Can Attorney General John Ashcroft Fight Terrorism on Our Shores Without Injuring Our Freedoms?" Time, May 4, 2003.

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 3d ed. St. Paul. MN: West Group, 1996.

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Lafave, Wayne R., and Austin Scott Jr. Criminal Law. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1986.

Lamm, Richard D., and Alan Simpson, eds. Blueprints for an Ideal Legal Immigration Policy. Washington, DC: Center for Immigration Studies, 2001.

Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959. U.S. Code. Vol. 29, sec. 401.

Landynski, Jacob W. Search and Seizure and the Supreme Court. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1966.

Langbein, John. Comparative Criminal Procedure: Germany. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1977.

———. Torture and the Law of Proof. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.

Langeluttig, Albert. The Department of Justice of the United States. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1927.

Langer, Gary. "Terror vs. Liberties Poll: Americans Believe Stopping Terror Is More Important Than Privacy," June 10, 2002. http://abcnews.go.com/sections/us/DailyNews/terror_poll020610.html.ibtx.

"Language on Obscene Art Hangs Up Interior Bill." Congressional Quarterly Almanac. Vol. 45, 731–36. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1989.

Langum, David J. Crossing over the Line: Legislating Morality and the Mann Act. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

———. William M. Kunstler: The Most Hated Lawyer in America. New York: New York University Press, 1999.

Larson, Edward J. Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate over Science and Religion. New York: Basic Books, 1997.

Lasky, Victor. Arthur J. Goldberg: The Old and the New. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1970.

Lasson, Nelson B. The History and Development of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution. New York: Da Capo, 1970.

Latham, Frank B. The Great Dissenter. New York: Cowles, 1970.

Latzer, Barry. State Constitutions and Criminal Justice. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1991.

Lauritzen, Paul. Cloning and the Future of Human Embryo Research. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Lawrence, Alexander. Constitutionalism: Philosophical Foundations. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Lawrence, Frederick M. Punishing Hate. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

Lawrence, John Shelton. "Copyright Law, Fair Use, and the Academy: An Introduction." In Fair Use and Free Inquiry: Copyright Law and the New Media, ed. J. S. Lawrence and B. Timberg, 3–19. 2d ed. Norwood, NJ: Ablex, 1989.

Lawson, John Davidson. American State Trials. Wilmington, DE: Scholarly, 1972.

Lawton, Kim A. "Trio of Rulings Clarifies Religious-Liberty Rights." Christianity Today, July 19, 1993, p. 56.

Lazarus, Edward. Closed Chambers: The First Eyewitness Account of the Epic Struggles Inside the Supreme Court. New York: Times Books, 1998.

———. "Justice Byron White and His Career on the Court," 2002. Findlaw.com. http://writ.news.findlaw.com/lazarus/20020418.html.

Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. "Wrong Then, Wrong Now: Racial Profiling Before and After September 11," 2003. http://www.Civilrights.Org/Publications/Reports/Racial_Profiling.

"Leading Cases: I. Constitutional Law: Sixth Amendment–Right to Appointed Counsel for Suspended Sentences." Harvard Law Review 116 (2002): 252.

Leahy, James E. The First Amendment, 1791–1991: Two Hundred Years of Freedom. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1991.

LeDuc, Lawrence, Richard G. Niemi, and Pippa Norris, eds. Comparing Democracies 2: New Challenges in the Study of Elections and Voting. 2d ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2002.

Lee, Laurie Thomas. "The USA Patriot Act and Telecommunications: Privacy Under Attack." Rutgers Computer and Technology Law Journal 29 (2003): 371–401.

Lee, William E. "The Unwilling Listener: Hill v. Colorado's Chilling Effect on Unorthodox Speech." University of California at Davis Law Review 35 (2002): 387–426.

Leech, Beth L., and Frank R. Baumgartner. Basic Interests: The Importance of Groups in Politics and Political Science. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.

Lemper, Tim. "The Promise and Perils of 'Privileges or Immunities': Saenz v. Roe." Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 23 (Fall 1999): 295.

Leonard, Arthur S. Sexuality and the Law: An Encyclopedia of Major Legal Cases. New York: Garland, 1993.

LeSueur, Stephen C. The 1838 Mormon War in Missouri. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987.

Leuchtenburg, William E. The Supreme Court Reborn: The Constitutional Revolution in the Age of Roosevelt. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Levin, Murray B. Political Hysteria in America: The Democratic Capacity for Repression. New York: Basic Books, 1971.

Levine, James P. Juries and Politics. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1991.

Levine, Judith. Harmful to Minors: The Perils of Protecting Children from Sex. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2002.

Levine, Lawrence W. Defender of the Faith: William Jennings Bryan, the Last Decade, 1915–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1965.

Levinson, Sandford. Constitutional Faith. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Levy, Leonard W. Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History: Legacy of Suppression. New York: Harper and Row, 1963.

———. Origins of the Fifth Amendment. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

———. The Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights: The Incorporation Theory. New York: Da Capo, 1970.

———. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

———. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

———. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. 2d ed. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

Levy, Leonard W., Kenneth L. Karst, and Dennis Mahoney. Encyclopedia of the American Constitution. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

Lewis, A. H. "Critical History of Sunday Legislation from 321 to 1888." North American Review 147 (October 1888): 383.

Lewis, Anthony. Gideon's Trumpet. New York: Random House, 1964.

———. Make No Law: The Sullivan Case and the First Amendment. New York: Random House, 1991.

Lewis, Charles, and Adam Mayle. "Justice Department Drafts Sweeping Expansion of Anti-Terrorism Act." Center for Public Integrity (Washington, DC), February 7, 2003.

Lewis, Neil. "Gifts in State Judicial Races Are Up Sharply." New York Times, February 14, 2002, A2.

Lewontin, Richard. It Ain't Necessarily So: The Dream of the Human Genome and Other Illusions. New York: New York Review Books, 2001.

Libel Defense Resource Center (LDRC). LDRC Fifty-State Survey: Current Developments in Media Libel Law. New York: LDRC, 1996–2003.

Library of America, ed. The Debate on the Constitution: Federalist and Antifederalist Speeches, Articles, and Letters During the Struggle over Ratification. 2 vols. New York: Library of America, 1993.

Lieberman, Jethro K. The Evolving Constitution: How the Supreme Court Has Ruled on Issues from Abortion to Zoning. New York: Random House, 1992.

———. A Practical Companion to the Constitution: How the Supreme Court Has Ruled on Issues from Abortion to Zoning. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Lin, Judy M. "Casenote: United States v. National Treasury Employees Union and the Constitutionality of the Honoraria Ban: Protecting the First Amendment Rights of Public Employees." University of Richmond Law Review 29 (1995): 1555.

Linde, Hans. "Due Process of Lawmaking." Nebraska Law Review 55 (1975): 197.

Lindgren, J. Ralph, and Nadine Taub. The Law of Sex Discrimination. Minneapolis, MN: West, 1993.

Linenthal, Edward Tabor. The Unfinished Bombing: Oklahoma City in American Memory. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Link, Arthur S. Woodrow Wilson in the Progressive Era, 1910–1917. New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1954.

Lipset, Seymour Martin. The First New Nation: The United States in Historical and Comparative Perspective. New York and London: W. W. Norton, 1979.

Litka, Michael. "The Use of Eminent Domain and Police Power to Accomplish Aesthetic Goals." In Outdoor Advertising: History and Regulation, ed. John W. Houck, 89–98. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1969.

Little, Rory K. "The Federal Death Penalty: History and Some Thoughts on the Department of Justice's Role." Fordham Urban Law Journal 26 (1999): 347, 360–440.

Lively, Donald E. Essential Principles of Communications Law. New York: Praeger, 1992.

Lloyd, Gordon, and Margie Lloyd. The Essential Bill of Rights: Original Arguments and Fundamental Documents. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1998.

Locke, John. Of Civil Government: Two Treatises. London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 1924.

———. The Second Treatise of Government, ed. Thomas P. Peardon. New York: Liberal Arts Press, 1952.

———. Two Treatises of Government, ed. Peter Laslett. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.

Lockyer, Roger. Tudor and Stuart Britain: 1471–1714. 2d ed. New York: St. Martin's, 1991.

———. The Early Stuarts: A Political History of England, 1603–1642. 2d ed. London and New York: Longman, 1999.

Loeb, Vernon. "Kingpin Bill Is Lobbyists' Target." Washington Post, November 4, 1999.

Lombardo, Paul A. "Medicine, Eugenics, and the Supreme Court: From Coercive Sterilization to Reproductive Freedom." Journal of Contemporary Health Law and Policy 13 (Fall 1996): 1–25.

Lostaglio, Keith L. "Karen Ann Quinlan." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes, vol. 18, 42–3. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Lovell, S. D. The Presidential Election of 1916. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1980.

Lowenstein, Daniel. "A Patternless Mosaic: Campaign Finance and the First Amendment After Austin." Capital University Law Review 21 (1992): 381–427.

Lowenstein, Daniel Hays, and Richard L. Hasen. Election Law: Cases and Materials. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2001.

Lowenthal, David. No Liberty for License: The Forgotten Logic of the First Amendment. Dallas, TX: Spence, 1997.

Lowenthal, Max. The Federal Bureau of Investigation. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1971.

Lozowick, Yaccov. Hitler's Bureaucrats: The Nazi Security Police and the Banality of Evil. Trans. Haim Watzman. London: Continuum, 2002.

Ludlow, Daniel H., ed. The Encyclopedia of Mormonism. New York: Macmillan, 1992.

Lugosi, Charles I. "Rule of Law or Rule by Law: The Detention of Yaser Hamdi." American Journal of Criminal Law 30 (Spring 2003): 225–78.

Lundmark, Thomas. Power and Rights in U.S. Constitutional Law. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 2001.

Lupa, Ira C. "Uncovering the Village of Kiryas Joel." Columbia Law Review 96 (January 1996): 104.

Lutz, Donald S. Colonial Origins of the American Revolution. Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund, 1998.

Lyman, Isabel. The Homeschooling Revolution. Amherst, MA: Bench Press International, 2000.

Lynch, Timothy. In Defense of the Exclusionary Rule. Washington, DC: Cato Institute, 1998.

Lynn, Barry, Marc D. Stern, and Oliver S. Thomas. The Right to Religious Liberty: The Basic ACLU Guide to Religious Rights. 2d ed. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1995.

MacDonnell, Timothy C. "Military Commissions and Courts-Martial: A Brief Discussion of the Constitutional and Jurisdictional Distinctions Between the Two Courts." Army Lawyer 19 (2002): 27–28.

MacIntyre, Alasdair. Herbert Marcuse: An Exposition and Polemic. New York: Viking, 1970.

MacIver, Robert M. Academic Freedom in Our Time. New York: Gordian, 1967.

Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Laws, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

MacKinnon, Barbara. Human Cloning: Science, Ethics, and Public Policy. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

MacKinnon, Catharine. "Pornography, Civil Rights, and Speech." Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 20 (1985): 1137.

———. Sex Equality. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Maclin, Tracey. "The Complexity of the Fourth Amendment: A Historical Review." Boston University Law Review 77 (1997): 925–74.

Macpherson, C. B. The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism: Hobbes to Locke. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.

Madison, James. Federalist No. 44. New York: Bantam Classic, 1982.

Maeroff, Gene I. "After 20 Years, Educational Programs Are a Solid Legacy of Great Society." New York Times, September 30, 1985, B7.

Magee, James. Freedom of Expression. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Magleby, David B., ed. The Other Campaign: Soft Money and Issue Advocacy in the 2000 Congressional Elections. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Magrath, C. Peter. "Morrison Remick Waite." In The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States, ed. Kermit L. Hall, 906–7. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

———. Yazoo: Law and Politics in the New Republic, the Case of Fletcher v. Peck. Providence, RI: Brown University Press, 1966.

Maier, Pauline. American Scripture: Making the Declaration of Independence. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1997.

Malbin, Michael, ed. Life After Reform: When the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act Meets Politics. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Males, Mike A. The Scapegoat Generation: America's War on Adolescents. Monroe, ME: Common Courage, 1996.

Malone, Dumas. The Story of the Declaration of Independence. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954.

Maltz, Earl M. The Fourteenth Amendment and the Law of the Constitution. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2003.

Mandelker, Daniel. Land Use Law. 4th ed. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 1997.

Mandelker, Daniel, and Rebecca L. Rubin, eds. Protecting Free Speech and Expression: The First Amendment and Land Use Law. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2002.

Manent, Pierre. Tocqueville and the Nature of Democracy, trans. John Waggoner. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

Mangrum, R. Collin. "Shall We Pray? Graduation Prayers and Establishment Paradigms." Creighton Law Review 26 (June 1993): 1027–52.

Mansnerus, Laura. "Verniero Admits Being Lax on Profiling Data." New York Times, March 29, 2001.

Manuto, Ron, and Sean Patrick O'Rourke. "Dances with Wolves: Nudity, Morality and the Speech/Conduct Doctrine." Free Speech Yearbook 32 (1994): 86–109.

Manwaring, David R. "Freedom of Conscience: The Flag-Salute Case." In The Third Branch of Government: Eight Cases in Constitutional Politics, ed. C. Herman Prichett and Alan F. Westin, 20–49. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and World, 1963.

Marcus, Maeva. Truman and the Steel Seizure Case. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.

Marcus, Maxine. "Humanitarian Intervention Without Borders: Belligerent Occupation or Colonization." Houston Journal of International Law 25 (Fall 2002): 99–139.

Marcus, Paul. The Entrapment Defense. 2d ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1995.

Marcus, Paul, and Charles H. Whitebread. Gilbert Law Summaries: Criminal Procedure. 14th ed. Chicago: Harcourt Brace Legal, 1996.

Marcus, Paul, and Jack Zimmerman. Criminal Procedure in Practice. Notre Dame, IN: National Institute for Trial Advocacy, Notre Dame Law School, 2001.

Marcuse, Herbert. Reason and Revolution: Hegel and the Rise of Social Theory. Boston: Beacon, 1941.

———. Eros and Civilization: A Philosophical Inquiry into Freud. Boston: Beacon, 1955.

———.One-Dimensional Man: Studies in the Ideology of Advanced Industrial Society. Boston: Beacon, 1964.

———. "Repressive Tolerance." In A Critique of Pure Tolerance, ed. Robert Paul Wolff, Barrington Moore Jr., and Herbert Marcuse. Boston: Beacon, 1965.

———. An Essay on Liberation. Boston: Beacon, 1969.

Marder, Nancy S. "The Myth of the Nullifying Jury." Northwestern University Law Review 93 (Spring 1999): 877–959.

Maritain, Jacques. Natural Law Reflections: Theory and Practice. South Bend, IN: St. Augustine Press, 2001.

Marshall, Patrick. "Three-Strikes Laws." Congressional Quarterly Researcher 12 (May 10, 2002): 417–32.

Martin, Walter, and Norman H. Klann. Jehovah of the Watchtower. Minneapolis, MN: Bethany House, 1981.

Martindale-Hubbell Law Digest 2003. New Providence, NH: Martindale-Hubbell, 2003.

Mason, Alpheus T. Brandeis: A Free Man's Life. New York: Viking, 1946.

———. Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law. New York: Viking, 1956.

———. "Inter Arma Silent Leges: Chief Justice Stone's Views." Harvard Law Review 69 (1956): 806.

———. William Howard Taft: Chief Justice. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.

Maveety, Nancy. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor: Strategist on the Supreme Court. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

Mayberry, Richard. "Public Servant v. Private Citizen." Campaigns and Elections 13, 3 (September 1992): 54–55.

Mayer, Carl J. "Personalizing the Impersonal: Corporations and the Bill of Rights." Hastings Law Journal 41 (1990): 577–667.

McCain, John. Worth the Fighting For. New York: Random House, 2002.

McCall, Madhavi. "Buying Justice in Texas: The Influence of Campaign Contributions on the Voting Behavior of Texas Supreme Court Justices." American Review of Politics 22, 2 (Fall 2001): 349–73.

McCann, Michael W. Rights at Work: Pay Equity Reform and the Politics of Legal Mobilization. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

McCann, Michael W., and H. Silverstein. "Rethinking Law's Allurements: A Relational Analysis of Social Movement Lawyers in the United States." In Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities, ed. Austin Sarat and Stuart A. Scheingold, 261–92. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

McCarthy, Martha M., Nelda H. Cambron-McCabe, and Stephen B. Thomas. Public School Law: Teachers' and Students' Rights. 4th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1997.

McClellan, James. Joseph Story and the American Constitution. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1971.

McCoy, Donald R. The Presidency of Harry S Truman. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1984.

McCoy, Drew R. The Last of the Fathers: James Madison and the Republican Legacy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

McCulloch, David. Truman. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992.

McDonald, Forrest. Novus Ordo Seclorum: The Intellectual Origins of the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1986.

———. The American Presidency: An Intellectual History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.

McDonald, William, ed. Creating Campus Community: In Search of Ernest Boyer's Legacy. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2002.

McDonough, Susan M. "The Fourth Power? Administrative Searches vs. The Fourth Amendment." New England Journal on Criminal and Civil Confinement 20 (1993): 195.

McGough, Lucy S. Child Witnesses: Fragile Voices in the American Legal System. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1994.

McKenna, Marian C. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Great Constitutional War. The Court-Packing Crisis of 1937. Bronx, NY: Fordham University Press, 2002.

McKenzie, Linda. "Note: The Pledge of Allegiance: One Nation Under God." Arizona Law Review 46 (Summer 2004): 379–414.

McLain, Erik. "An Investigation into the Role of Media Activities and the Rights of Citizens Under the Fourth Amendment." Whittier Law Review 22 (2001): 937.

McMunigal, Kevin C. "Disclosure and Accuracy in the Guilty Plea Process." Hastings Law Journal 40 (1989): 957–1029.

McPherson, Daniel N. "Municipal Regulation of Political Signs: Balancing First Amendment Rights Against Aesthetic Concerns." Drake Law Review 45 (1997): 767–86.

McStay, Rob. "Terminal Sedation: Palliative Care for Intractable Pain, Post Glucksberg and Quill." American Journal of Law and Medicine 29, 45 (2003).

McWhirter, Darien A. Search, Seizure, and Privacy: Exploring the Constitution. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx, 1994.

———. Equal Protection. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx, 1995.

McWilliams, Peter. Ain't Nobody's Business If You Do: The Absurdity of Consensual Crimes in a Free Society. Los Angeles, CA: Prelude, 1993.

Meeropol, Robert, and Michael Meeropol. We Are Your Sons: The Legacy of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg. 2d ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Meiklejohn, Alexander. "The First Amendment Is an Absolute." Supreme Court Review (1961): 245.

Melone, Albert P., and George Mace. Judicial Review and American Democracy. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1988.

Melusky, Joseph A., and Keith A. Pesto. Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Rights and Liberties Under the Law. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

Mencken, H. L. Thirty-five Years of Newspaper Work. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.

Mendus, Susan, ed. Justifying Toleration: Conceptual and Historical Perspectives. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Menendez, Albert J. The December Wars: Religious Symbols and Ceremonies in the Public Square. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1993.

Merritt, Deborah Jones. "Hearing the Voices of Individual Women and Men: Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg." Hawaii Law Review 20 (1998): 635.

Merryman, John Henry. The Civil Law Tradition: An Introduction to the Legal Systems of Western Europe and Latin America. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1984.

Meyer, David D. "The Paradox of Family Privacy." Vanderbilt Law Review 53 (2000): 527.

Meyers, Jeffrey. Orwell: Wintry Conscience of a Generation. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Michaels, C. William. No Greater Threat: America After September 11 and the Rise of a National Security State. E-book. New York: Algora, 2002.

Michel, Lou, and Dan Herbeck. American Terrorist: Timothy McVeigh and the Oklahoma City Bombing. New York: HarperCollins, 2001.

Milkis, Sidney M., and Michael Nelson. The American Presidency: Origins and Development, 1776–1993. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1994.

———. The American Presidency: Origins and Development, 1776–2002. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2003.

Miller, Frank W., et al. The Juvenile Justice Process: Cases and Materials. 4th ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2000.

Miller, Frank W., Robert O. Dawson, George E. Dix, and Raymond I. Parnas. The Police Function. 6th ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2000.

Miller, Helen Hill. George Mason, Constitutionalist. San Diego, CA: Simon Publications, 1938.

Miller, John C. Crisis in Freedom: The Alien and Sedition Acts. Boston: Little, Brown, 1951.

Miller, Jonathan Lewis. "Search and Seizure of Air Passengers and Pilots: The Fourth Amendment Takes Flight." Transportation Law Journal 22 (1994): 199.

Miller, Merle. Lyndon: An Oral Biography. New York: G. P. Putnam, 1980.

Miller, Perry. The New England Mind in the Seventeenth Century. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1954.

Milligan, Ann. "The Constitutionality of Drug Interdiction Checkpoints: City of Indianapolis v. Edmond." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 93 (Fall 2002): 227.

Mills, John Gladstone, III, Robert Clare Highley, and Donald Cress Reiley. Patent Law Fundamentals (material previously authored by Peter D. Rosenberg). 2d ed. Eagan, MN: Thomson/West, 2002.

Milton, John. Complete Prose Works of John Milton. Vol. 2. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1959.

———. Areopagitica: A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing to the Parliament of England. Savannah, GA: Frederic C. Bell, 1988.

Minter, Shannon. "Representing Transsexual Clients: An Overview of Selected Legal Issues," 2003. National Center for Lesbian Rights. www.transgenderlaw.org/resources/translaw.htm.

Miroff, Bruce. Icons of Democracy: American Leaders as Heroes, Aristocrats, Dissenters, and Democrats. New York: Basic Books, 1993.

Mitchell, Don. The Right to the City: Social Justice and the Fight for Public Space. New York: Guilford, 2003.

Mock, James R. Censorship, 1917. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1941.

Moe, Terry M. "Toward a Broader View of Interest Groups." Journal of Politics 43, 2 (1981): 531–43.

Monk, Linda R. The Bill of Rights: A User's Guide. Alexandria, VA: Close Up, 2000.

———. The Words We Live By: Your Annotated Guide to the Constitution. New York: Hyperion, 2003.

Montagu, Ashley, ed. Science and Creationism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Montesquieu, Charles-Louis de Secondat. The Spirit of the Laws, trans. Anne M. Cohler, Basia Carolyn Miller, and Harold Samuel Stone. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Moran, Rachel F. Interracial Intimacy: The Regulation of Race and Romance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

Morano, Anthony. "A Reexamination of the Development of the Reasonable Doubt Rule." Boston University Law Review 55, 4 (1975): 507–28.

Morehouse, Sarah McCally, and Macolm E. Jewell. State Politics, Parties, and Policy. 2d ed. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Moreland, James P., ed. The Creation Hypothesis: Scientific Evidence for an Intelligent Designer. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1994.

Morgan, Kathryn. "Factors Influencing Probation Outcome: A Review of the Literature." Federal Probation 57 (1993): 23–9.

Morgan, Richard E. The Supreme Court and Religion. New York: Free Press, 1972.

Morgan, Ted. Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Random House, 2003.

Morland, Howard. The Secret That Exploded. New York: Random House, 1981.

Morris, Kenneth E. Jimmy Carter: American Moralist. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.

Mumola, Christopher, with the assistance of Thomas P. Bonczar. Substance Abuse and Treatment of Adults on Probation, 1995. U.S. Department of Justice. Bureau of Justice Statistics. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1998.

Muñoz, Vincent Phillip. "James Madison's Principle of Religious Liberty." American Political Science Review 97, 1 (February 2003): 17–32.

Murchison, Kenneth M. Federal Criminal Law Doctrines:

The Forgotten Influence of National Prohibition. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1994.

Murdoch, Joyce, and Deb Price. Courting Justice: Gay Men and Lesbians v. the Supreme Court. New York: Basic Books, 2001.

Murphy, Bruce Allen. Fortas: The Rise and Ruin of a Supreme Court Justice. New York: W. Morrow, 1988.

Murphy, Paul L. World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: W. W. Norton, 1979.

Murphy, Walter. "Constitutions, Constitutionalism, and Democracy." In Constitutionalism and Democracy: Transformations in the Contemporary World, ed. Douglas Greenberg, Stanley Katz, Melanie Beth Oliviero, and Steven Wheatley. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Murray, Charles. What It Means to Be a Libertarian: A Personal Interpretation. New York: Broadway Books, 1997.

Murray, Robert K. Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919–1920. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1955.

Mushlin, Michael, and Donald Kramer, eds. Rights of Prisoners. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson/West, 2002.

Mussio, Donna. "Drawing the Line Between Administrative and Criminal Searches: Defining the 'Object of the Search' in Environmental Inspections." Boston College Environmental Affairs Law Review 18 (1990): 185.

Mutch, Robert E. Campaigns, Congress, and Courts: The Making of Federal Campaign Finance Law. New York: Praeger, 1988.

Nash, George H. The Conservative Intellectual Movement in America Since 1945. New York: Basic Books, 1976.

Nasheri, Hedieh. Crime and Justice in the Age of Court TV. New York: LFB Scholarly, 2002.

National Archives and Records Administration. "Our Documents: A National Initiative on American History, Civics, and Service." Washington, DC: National Archives and Records Administration, 2002.

National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act (amended 1990). U.S. Code. Vol. 20, sec. 954(d).

National Institute of Justice. "Report to the Attorney General on Delays in Forensic DNA Analysis." U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs. National Institute of Justice Special Report, March 2003.

Navasky, Victor S. Naming Names. New York: Penguin Books, 1980.

Nederman, Cary J. Worlds of Difference: European Discourses of Toleration, c. 1100–c. 1550. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2000.

Neeley, G. Steven. The Constitutional Right to Suicide: A Legal and Philosophical Examination. New York: P. Lang, 1996.

Neely, Mark E., Jr. The Fate of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln and Civil Liberties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

———. Southern Rights: Political Prisoners and the Myth of Confederate Constitutionalism. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1999.

Neff, James. The Wrong Man. New York: Random House, 2001.

Neier, Aryeh. Defending My Enemy: American Nazis, the Skokie Case, and the Risks of Freedom. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Neilsen, Suzanne C. "The Civil-Military Relations of the U.S. Army and Military Effectiveness: A Framework for Analysis." Paper for presentation at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, 2001. U.S. Military Academy, Department of Social Sciences, West Point, NY.

Nelson, Michael. Guide to the Presidency. 3d ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2002.

Nelson, William E. The Fourteenth Amendment: From Political Principle to Judicial Doctrine. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.

Nesson, Charles, and David Marglin. "The Day the Internet Met the First Amendment: Time and the Communications Decency Act." Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 10 (Fall 1996): 113–35.

Neubauer, David W. Judicial Process: Law, Courts, and Politics in the United States. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt Brace, 1997.

———. America's Courts and the Criminal Justice System. 7th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2002.

Neuberger, Babette, and Tom Christoffel. "The Legal Basis of Public Health: An Individual or Group Study Course in Ten Modules," 1999. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (Atlanta), http://www.phcdc.gov/phtn/legal-basis/mainmenu.htm.

Neuman, Gerald. "Justifying U.S. Naturalization Policies." Immigration and Nationality Law Review 16 (1994–1995): 83.

———. Strangers to the Constitution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Newman, Roger. Hugo Black. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.

Newmyer, R. Kent. Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story: Statesman of the Old Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1985.

———. John Marshall and the Heroic Age of the Supreme Court. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001.

News Reporter's Handbook on Law and Courts. Jefferson City, MO: Missouri Press-Bar Commission, 1981.

Newton, Merlin Owen. Armed with the Constitution: Jehovah's Witnesses in Alabama and the U.S. Supreme Court, 1929–1946. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1995.

Nimmer, David. Copyright: Sacred Text, Technology, and the DMCA. Boston: Kluwer Law International, 2002.

"Ninth Circuit Upholds Proposition 227 English Language Requirement." General Education 5, 9 (2002).

Nolan, Dennis R. "Sir William Blackstone and the New American Republic: A Study of Intellectual Impact." New York University Law Review 51 (November 1976): 731.

Nolan, Laurence C. "The Meaning of Loving: Marriage, Due Process, and Equal Protection (1967–1990) as Equality and Marriage, from Loving to Zablocki." Howard Law Journal 41 (Winter 1998): 245–70.

Noll, Mark A., ed. Religion and American Politics: From the Colonial Period to the 1980s. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Noonan, John T. The Lustre of Our Country: The American Experience of Religious Freedom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Noonan, John T., and Edward McGlynn Gaffney. Religious Freedom: History, Cases, and Other Materials on the Interaction of Religion and Government. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Nord, Warren A. Religion and American Education: Rethinking a National Dilemma. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Norell, James O. E. "In Step with the Founding Fathers." America's First Freedom 2 (2001): 34–7.

Novick, Sheldon M. Honorable Justice: The Life of Oliver Wendell Holmes. Boston: Little, Brown, 1989.

Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Treatise on Consitutional Law: Substance and Procedure, secs. 20.11, 20.41. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

———. Hornbook Series. Constitutional Law. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Nuzum, Eric D. Parental Advisory: Music Censorship in America. New York: Perennial, 2001.

O'Brien, David M. Constitutional Law and Politics: Struggles for Power and Governmental Responsibility. New York: W. W. Norton, 1991.

———. Judges on Judging. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1997.

———. Constitutional Law and Politics: Civil Rights and Civil Liberties. 5th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2003.

———. Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics. 6th ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2003.

O'Connor, Michol. Federal Rules: Civil Trials 2003. Vols. 1 and 2. Houston, TX: Jones and McClure, 2003.

O'Connor, Sandra Day. Lazy B: Growing up on a Cattle Ranch in the American Southwest. New York: Random House, 2002.

———. The Majesty of the Law: Reflections of a Supreme Court Justice. New York: Random House, 2002.

O'Donnell, Guillermo. "The Judiciary and the Rule of Law." Journal of Democracy 11, 1 (January 2000): 25–31.

O'Hair, Madalyn. Freedom Under Siege. Los Angeles, CA: J. P. Tarcher, 1974.

O'Neill, Kevin Frances. "Disentangling the Law of Public Protest." Loyola Law Review 45 (Fall 1999): 411.

Oakley, Andy. '88.' An Undercover News Reporter's Expose of American Nazis and the Ku Klux Klan. Skokie, IL: P.O., 1987.

Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970. U.S. Code. Vol. 42, secs. 4905, 4907.

Oklahoma City, Seven Years Later: Lessons for Other Communities. Oklahoma City, OK: Oklahoma City National Memorial Institute for the Prevention of Terrorism, 2002.

Olivetti, Alfred. This Land Is Your Land, This Land Is My Land: The Property Rights Movement and Regulatory Takings. New York: LFB Scholarly, 2003.

Olken, Samuel R. "Charles Evans Hughes and the Blaisdell Decision: A Historical Study of Contract Clause Jurisprudence." Oregon Law Review 72 (Fall 1993): 513–602.

Olson, Mancur. The Logic of Collective Action. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1965.

Omori, Emiko, Chizaho Omori, et al. Rabbit in the Moon. Video. San Francisco, CA: Wabi-Sabi Productions, 1999.

Ordover, Nancy. American Eugenics: Race, Queer Anatomy, and the Science of Nationalism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2003.

Orfield, Gary, Susan Eaton, and the Harvard Project on School Desegregation. Dismantling Desegregation: The Quiet Reversal of Brown v. Board of Education. New York: New Press, 1996.

Orth, John V. Due Process of Law. A Brief History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Orwell, George. Animal Farm. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1946.

———. 1984. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1949.

———. Homage to Catalonia. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace, 1952.

———. The Road to Wigan Pier. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace, 1958.

———. Essays. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.

Osur, Alan M. 1982. "The Role of the Colorado National Guard in Civil Disturbances." Military Affairs 46, 1 (February 1982): 19–24.

Otis, D. S. The Dawes Act and the Allotment of Indian Lands. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.

Owens, Erik C. "Taking the 'Public" Out of Our Schools: The Political, Constitutional, and Civic Implications of Private School Vouchers." Journal of Church and State 44, 4 (Autumn 2002): 717.

Pacelle, Richard L., Jr. The Transformation of the Supreme Court's Agenda. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1991.

———. The Role of The Supreme Court in American Politics: The Least Dangerous Branch? Boulder, CO: Westview, 2002.

———. "A Mapp to Legal Change and Policy Retreat: United States v. Leon." In Creating Constitutional Change, ed. Gregg Ivers and Kevin McGuire. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2004.

Pacheco, Josephine F., ed. To Secure the Blessings of Liberty: Rights in American History. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1993.

Pack, Robert. Edward Bennett Williams for the Defense. New York: Harper Collins, 1983.

Packard, Gabriel. "Hundreds of U.S. Soldiers Emerge as Conscientious Objectors." Inter Press Service. April 15, 2003. http://www.commondreams.org/headlines03/0415-11.htm.

Palmer, John. Constitutional Rights of Prisoners. 7th ed. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 2003.

Palmer, Kris E., ed. Constitutional Amendments: 1789 to the Present. Detroit, MI: Gale Group, 2000.

Palmer, Louis J. The Death Penalty: An American Citizen's Guide to Understanding Federal and State Laws. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1998.

Papke, David Ray. The Pullman Case: The Clash of Labor and Capital in Industrial America. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1999.

Pappas, Demetra. "Recent Historical Perspectives Regarding Medical Euthanasia and Physician-Assisted Suicide." British Medical Bulletin 52, 2 (1996): 386–92.

Parenti, Michael. Democracy for the Few. 6th ed. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Parker, Richard A., ed. Free Speech on Trial: Communication Perspectives on Landmark Supreme Court Decisions. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2003.

Parker, William Riley. Milton: A Biography. 2 vols. Oxford: Clarendon, 1968.

Parrish, Michael E. Anxious Decades: America in Prosperity and Depression, 1920–1941. New York: W. W. Norton, 1992.

Pastore, Mariana. "Running from the Law: Federal Contractors Escape Bivens Liability." University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 4 (2002): 850.

Patriot Act. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, sec. 2331.

Patterson, Lillie. Martin Luther King Jr. and the Freedom Movement. New York: Facts on File, 1989.

Payne, Daniel L. "Building a Case for Life: A Mitigation Specialist as a Necessity and as a Matter of Right." Capital Defense Journal 16 (Fall 2003): 43–72.

Pease, Allison. Modernism, Mass Culture, and the Aesthetics of Obscenity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Peck, Robert C. Libraries, the First Amendment, and Cyberspace: What You Need to Know. Chicago: American Library Association, 2000.

Pederson, William D. "Amnesties and Pardons." In The American Revolution, 1775–1783, ed. Richard L. Blanco, 32–33. Vol. 1. New York: Garland, 1993.

———, ed. The Barberian Presidency. New York: P. Lang, 1989.

Pederson, William D., and Norman W. Provizer, eds. Leaders of the Pack. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Pederson, William D., and Frank J. Williams. "America's Presidential Triumvirate: Quantitative Measures." In George Washington: Foundation of Presidential Leadership and Character, ed. Ethan Fishman, William D. Pederson, and Mark Rozell, 143–61. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2001.

Peltason, J. W., and Sue Davis. Corwin and Peltason's Understanding the Constitution. 15th ed. Fort Worth, TX: Harcourt College, 2000.

Peltz, Richard J. "Censorship Tsunami Spares College Media: To Protect Free Expression on Public Campuses, Lessons from the 'College Hazelwood' Case." Tennessee Law Review 68 (2001): 481–555.

Pence, Gregory. Flesh of My Flesh. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.

Pendergast, Tom, Sara Pendergast, and John Sousanis. Constitutional Amendments: From Freedom of Speech to Flag Burning. 3 vols. Detroit, MI: UXL, 2001.

Penn, Jillette. "alt.fan.gutenberg," PC-Computing 7, no. 9 (September 1994): 352.

Penton, M. J. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985.

Perea, Juan. Race and Races: Cases and Resources for a Diverse America. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Peretti, Terri Jennings. In Defense of a Political Court. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Perkins, David, and Jay Jamieson. "Judicial Probable Cause Determinations After County of Riverside v. McLaughlin." Criminal Law Bulletin (November–December 1995): 534–46.

Perry, Barbara A. "The Supremes": Essays on the Current Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: P. Lang, 1999.

Perry, H. W. Deciding to Decide: Agenda Setting in the United States Supreme Court. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1991.

Perry, Michael J. We the People: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Supreme Court. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Perry, Nancy W. The Child Witness: Legal Issues and Dilemmas. Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1991.

Peters, Edward. Torture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985.

Peters, Shawn F. The Yoder Case: Religious Freedom, Education, and Parental Rights. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Petersilia, Joan. "A Decade of Experimenting with Intermediate Sanctions: What Have We Learned?" Justice Research and Policy 11 (1999): 9–24.

———. "Community Corrections." In Crime: Public Policies for Crime Control, ed. James Q. Wilson and Joan Petersilia, 483–508. San Francisco, CA: Institute for Contemporary Studies, 2002.

———, ed. Community Corrections: Probation, Parole, and Intermediate Sanctions. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Peterson, Iver. "Attorney General Was Alerted to Profiling, Predecessor Says." New York Times, March 22, 2001.

———. "Racial Study of Speeders Is Released in New Jersey." New York Times, March 27, 2002.

Pettit, Philip. Republicanism: A Theory of Freedom and Government. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Pickus, Noah, ed. Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-first Century. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.

Pigliucci, Massimo. Denying Evolution: Creationism, Scientism, and the Nature of Science. Sunderland, MA: Sinauer Associates, 2002.

Pinaire, Brian K. "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Market: The Supreme Court and Political Speech in the Electoral Process." Journal of Law and Politics 17, 3 (Summer 2001): 489–551.

———. "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Market: The Supreme Court and Freedom of Speech in the Electoral Process." Ph.D. diss., Rutgers University, New Brunswick, NJ, 2003.

Pincoffs, Edmund L., ed. The Concept of Academic Freedom. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1975.

Platt, Anthony. The Child Savers: The Invention of Delinquency. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.

Platt, Rutherford H. Land Use and Society: Geography, Law, and Public Policy. Washington, DC: Island Press, 1996.

Polenberg, Richard. Fighting Faiths: The Abrams Case, the Supreme Court, and Free Speech. New York: Penguin, 1989.

Polman, H. L. Constitutional Debate in Action: Civil Rights and Liberties. New York: Harper Collins, 1995.

Poppe, Matthew. "Defining the Scope of the Equal Protection Clause with Respect to Welfare Waiting Periods." University of California Law Review 61 (1994): 291–323.

Posner, Richard A. Benjamin N. Cardozo. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.

———. Economic Analysis of Law. New York: Aspen, 1998.

Post, Louis F. The Deportations Delirium of Nineteen-Twenty. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1923.

Post, Robert C. "The Social Foundations of Defamation Law: Reputation and the Constitution." University of California Law Review 74 (May 1986): 691–742.

Post, Robert C., and Reva B. Siegel. "Equal Protection by Law: Federal Antidiscrimination Legislation After Morrison and Kimel." Yale Law Journal 110 (December 2000): 441–525.

Powe, Lucas A., Jr. "Mass Speech and the Newer First Amendment." In The Supreme Court Review, ed. Philip Kurland, Gerhard Casper, and Dennis Hutchinson, 243–84. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983.

———. The Fourth Estate and the Constitution: Freedom of the Press in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

———. The Warren Court and American Politics. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 2000.

Powell, Jeff. "The Compleat Jeffersonian: Justice Rehnquist and Federalism." Yale Law Journal 91 (1982): 1317–70.

Powers, Richard Gid. Secrecy and Power: The Life of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: Free Press, 1987.

———. Not Without Honor. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

———. "Hoover, J. Edgar." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes, 157–

60, vol 11 (of 24). New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Prempeh, H. Kwasi. "Lawyers and Liberal Democracy." Journal of Democracy 11, 1 (January 2000): 71–8.

Price, Monroe E., ed. The V-Chip Debate: Content Filtering from Television to the Internet. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1998.

Pring, George W., and Penelope Canan. SLAPPs: Getting Sued for Speaking Out. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1996.

Pringle, Henry F. The Life and Times of William Howard Taft. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1939.

Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.

Privacy Act of 1974. U.S. Code. Vol. 5, sec. 552a (2000) http://www.usdoj.gov/foia/privstat.htm.

Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation Act of 1977. U.S. Code. Vol. 18, sec. 2251.

Prucha, Francis Paul. The Great Father, the United States Government, and the American Indians. 2 vols. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1984.

———, ed. Documents of United States Indian Policy. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1975.

Pusey, Nathan. Charles Evans Hughes. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.

Putnam, William Lowell. John Peter Zenger and the Fundamental Freedom. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1997.

Pybas, Michael. "An Update on the Prison Litigation Reform Act." Corrections Today 64, 1 (February 2002): 14.

Quadres, Harold. "Content-Neutral Public Forum Regulations: The Rise of the Aesthetic State Interest, the Fall of Judicial Scrutiny." Hastings Law Journal 37 (January 1986): 439–97.

Quillen, Chris. "Posse Comitatus and Nuclear Terrorism." Parameters, U.S. Army War College Quarterly 32, 1 (Spring 2002): 60–74.

Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years, 1870–1920. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Radosh, Ronald, and Joyce Milton. The Rosenberg File. 2d ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.

Rahavy, Shana K. "The Federal Wiretap Act: The Permissible Scope of Eavesdropping in the Family Home." Journal of High Technology Law 2 (2003): 87–92.

Ramen, Fred. The Right to Freedom from Searches: Individual Rights and Civic Responsibility. New York: Rosen, 2001.

Rapalje, Stewart. A Treatise on Contempt. Littleton, CO: F. B. Rothman, 1981.

Rapp, Geoffrey Christopher. "Low Riding." Yale Law Journal 110, 6 (April 2001): 1089.

Raskin, Jamin B. We the Students: Supreme Court Cases for and About Students. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 2000.

Ravitch, Diane. The American Reader: Words That Moved a Nation. New York: Harper Collins, 1990.

Ravitch, Diane, and Joseph P. Viteritti, eds. Kid Stuff: Marketing Sex and Violence to America's Children. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

Ravitch, Frank S. School Prayer and Discrimination: The Civil Rights of Religious Minorities and Dissenters. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1999.

Rawls, John. Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.

Rawls, John, et al. "Assisted Suicide: The Philosopher's Brief." New York Review of Books, March 27, 1997.

Raynor, Peter, and Maurice Vanstone. Understanding Community Penalties: Probation, Policy, and Social Change. Philadelphia: Open University Press, 2002.

Reagan, Leslie J. When Abortion Was a Crime: Women, Medicine, and Law in the United States, 1867–1973. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Reckers, Rob. "The Future of Aliens Ordered Removed from the United States in the Wake of Zadvydas v. Davis." Houston Journal of International Law 25 (Fall 2002): 195.

Redano, Richard T., and Daniel E. Venglarik. "Texas Supreme Court Lassos the Punitive Damages Broncing Bull." Texas Intellectual Property Law Journal 2 (1994): 229.

Redish, Martin H. "Advocacy of Unlawful Conduct and the First Amendment: In Defense of Clear and Present Danger." California Law Review 70 (1982): 1159.

———. Freedom of Expression: A Critical Analysis. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law, 1984.

———. Money Talks. New York: New York University Press, 2001.

Reed, Douglas S. On Equal Terms. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Reeve, L. J. "The Legal Status of the Petition of Right." Historical Journal 29, 2 (1986): 257–77.

Reeves, Richard. President Nixon: Alone in the White House. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2001.

Reeves, Thomas. The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy. Lanham, MD: Madison Books, 1997.

Regan, Priscilla M. Legislating Privacy: Technology, Social Values, and Public Policy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

"Regulation of Demonstrations." Harvard Law Review 80 (June 1967): 73.

Rehnquist, William H. All The Laws But One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.

Reid, John Phillip. The Concept of Liberty in the Age of the American Revolution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993. U.S. Code. Title 42, secs. 2000bb–2000bb-4.

Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000. U.S. Code. Vol. 42, secs. 2000cc–2000cc-5.

Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of Lady Chatterley, Tropic of Cancer, and Fanny Hill. New York: Random House, 1968.

Renstrom, Peter G. The Stone Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2001.

———. The Taft Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

"Restrictions Removed on Arts Funding." Congressional Quarterly Almanac. Vol. 46, 430–33. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1990.

Rhee, Jamie L. "Rational and Constitutional Approaches to Airline Safety in the Face of Terrorist Threats." DePaul Law Review 49 (2000): 847.

Riccards, Michael P. The Ferocious Engine of Democracy: A History of the American Presidency. 2 vols. New York: Madison Books, 1995.

Rice, Charles E. Fifty Questions on the Natural Law. Fort Collins, CO: Ignatius Press, 1999.

Richards, David A. J. Sex, Drugs, Death, and the Law: An Essay on Human Rights and Overcriminalization. Totowa, NJ: Rowman and Littlefield, 1982.

———. Toleration and the Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Richards, Eric L. "Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee: Implications for Parties, Corporate Political Dialogue, and Campaign Finance Reform." American Business Law Journal 40 (Fall 2002): 83–123.

Richardson, H. G. "The English Coronation Oath." Speculum 24 (1949): 44–75.

Richelson, Jeffrey. The Wizards of Langley: Inside the CIA's Directorate of Science and Technology. Boulder, CO: Westview, 2001.

Riker, William H. "The Senate and America Federalism." American Political Science Review 49 (June 1955): 452–69.

Risen, James, and Judy L. Thomas. Wrath of Angels: The American Abortion War. New York: Basic Books, 1998.

Rivard, Michael. "Toward a General Theory of Constitutional Personhood: A Theory of Constitutional Personhood for Transgenic Humanoid Species." UCLA Law Review 39 (1992): 1425–1509.

Robertson, James E. "The Jurisprudence of the PLRA." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 91, 1/2 (Fa11 2001/Winter 2002): 187.

Robinson, Greg. By Order of the President: FDR and the Internment of Japanese Americans. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Rockwell, George L. "White Power and the American Nazi Party." In The White Separatist Movement, ed. M. T. Williams, 118–28. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven, 2002.

Rodell, Fred. Nine Men. New York: Random House, 1955.

Roedinger, David, and Franklin Rosemont, eds. Haymarket Scrapbook. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1986.

Rogers, John. Note, "Bombs, Borders, and Boarding: Combatting International Terrorism at United States Airports and the Fourth Amendment." Suffolk Transnational Law Review 20 (1997): 501.

Rogge, O. John. The First and The Fifth. New York: Thomas Nelson and Sons, 1960.

Rohrbough, Malcolm J. The Trans-Appalachian Frontier: People, Society, and Institutions, 1775–1850. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Roleff, Tamara L., ed. Censorship: Opposing Viewpoints. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven, 2002.

Rome, Edwin P., and William H. Roberts. Corporate and Commercial Free Speech: First Amendment Protection of Expression in Business. Westport, CT: Quorum Books.

Romero, Elsie. "Fourth Amendment: Requiring Probable Cause for Searches and Seizures Under the Plain View Doctrine." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 78 (Winter 1998): 763–91.

Rorty, Richard. "The Last Intellectual in Europe: Orwell on Cruelty." In Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Rosato, Jennifer L. "The Ultimate Test of Autonomy: Should Minors Have a Right to Make Decisions Regarding Life-Sustaining Treatment?" Rutgers Law Review 49, 1 (Fall 1996): 3–14.

Rosen, Perry. "The Bivens Constitutional Tort: An Unfilled Promise." University of North Carolina Law Review 67 (1989): 337.

Rosen, W. G. High School Biology Today and Tomorrow. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 1989.

Rosenberg, Gerald N. Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Rosenheim, Margaret K. "Shapiro v. Thompson: The Beggars Are Coming to Town." In Supreme Court Review

1969, ed. Philip B. Kurland, 303–34. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.

Rosenkranz, Joshua E. Reason and Passion: Justice Brennan's Enduring Influence. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997.

Rosenstone, Steven J., Roy L. Behr, and Edward H. Lazarus. Third Parties in America: Citizen Response to Major Party Failure. 2d ed. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Rosini, Neil J. The Practical Guide to Libel Law. New York: Praeger, 1991.

Ross, William G. Forging New Freedoms: Nativism, Education, and the Constitution, 1917–1927. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

Rossiter, Clinton, ed. The Federalist Papers. New York: Mentor, 1961.

Rossow, Lawrence F., and Jacqueline A. Stefkovich. Search and Seizure in the Public Schools. 2d ed. Dayton, OH: Education Law Association, 1996.

Rossum, Ralph A., and G. Alan Tarr. The Bill of Rights and Subsequent Amendments. Vol. 2 of American Constitutional Law. 6th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2003.

Rothbard, Murray N. For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto. San Francisco: Fox and Wilkes, 1994.

Rothstein, Mark A., and Laura F. Rothstein. "Administrative Searches and Seizures: What Happened to Camara and See?" Washington Law Review 50 (1975): 341.

Rotunda, Ronald D. Modern Constitutional Law: Cases and Notes. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 1993.

Royarin, Jonathan. "Circumscribing Constitutional Identities in Kiryas Joel." Yale Law Journal 106 (March 1997): 1537.

Rowan, Carl T. Dreammakers and Dreambreakers: The World of Justice Thurgood Marshall. Boston, MA: Little, Brown, 1993.

Rubenfeld, Jeb. "The Right to Privacy." Harvard Law Review 102 (February 1989): 737–807.

———. "The First Amendment's Purpose." Stanford Law Review 53 (2001): 767.

Rubenstein, William B., ed. Lesbians, Gay Men, and the Law. New York: New Press, 1993.

Rudenstine, David. The Day the Presses Stopped: A History of the Pentagon Papers Case. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Rudko, Frances. Truman's Court: A Study in Judicial Restraint. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.

Rudolph, Samuel B., ed. The Philosophy of Freedom: Ideological Origins of the Bill of Rights. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1993.

Russell, Charles Taze. Studies in the Scriptures. Allegheny, PA: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1907.

Russell, Gregory D. The Death Penalty and Racial Bias: Overturning Supreme Court Assumptions. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1994.

Rustman, F. W., Jr. CIA, Inc.: Espionage and the Craft of Business Intelligence. Washington, DC: Brassey's, 2002.

Rutland, Robert Allen. The Birth of the Bill of Rights, 1776–1791. New York: Collier, 1966.

———. George Mason: Reluctant Statesman. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.

———. The Presidency of James Madison. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1990.

Sabin, Arthur J. In Calmer Times: The Supreme Court and Red Monday. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

Sachs, Daniel Finegold. "D.C.'s Political Report: Minor Parties Links," 1998–2003. http://www.dcpoliticalreport.com/PartyLink.htm.

Sackman, Julius L., et al. Nichols on Eminent Domain. New York: Matthew Bender, 1997.

Sadler, A. E., and Scott Barbour, eds. Juvenile Crime: Opposing Viewpoints. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven, 1997.

Sajo, Andras, and Monroe E. Price. Rights of Access to the Media. Boston: Kluwer Law International, 1996.

Salisbury, Robert H. "An Exchange Theory of Interest Groups." American Journal of Political Science 13 (1968): 1–32.

Salokar, Rebecca Mae. The Solicitor General: The Politics of Law. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1992.

Salvatore, Nick. Eugene V. Debs: Citizen and Socialist. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1982.

Sandwith, Henry. Some Observances on the Four Freedoms of the First Amendment. Boston: Boston University Press, 1957.

Sanford, Bill W., Jr. "Perspective: Separation v. Patriotism: Expelling the Pledge from Schools." St. Mary's Law Journal 34 (2003): 461–502.

Sarat, Austin, and Stuart A. Scheingold. "Cause Lawyering and the Reproduction of Professional Authority: An Introduction." In Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities, ed. Austin Sarat and Stuart A. Scheingold. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Scales, Junius Irving, and Richard Nickson. Cause at Heart: A Former Communist Remembers. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.

Scalia, Antonin. "The Rule of Law as a Law of Rules." University of Chicago Law Review 56 (1989): 1175–88.

———. A Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

———. "God's Justice and Ours," 2002. First Things: The Journal of Religion and Public Law. http://www.firstthings.com/ftissues/ft0205/articles/scalia.html.

Scanlon, Thomas A. "A Theory of Freedom of Expression." Philosophy and Public Affairs 1 (1972): 204.

Schattschneider, E. E. The Semisoverign People: A Realist View of Democracy in America. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1960.

Scheb, John M., and John M. Scheb II. Criminal Law and Procedure. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1999.

Scheck, Barry, Peter Neufeld, and Jim Dwyer. Actual Innocence: Five Days to Execution and Other Dispatches from the Wrongly Convicted. New York: Doubleday, 2000.

Scheiber, Harry N., ed. The State and Freedom of Contract. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1998.

Schick, Marvin. Learned Hand's Court. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970.

Schijanovich, Ran Zev. "Note: The Second Circuit's Attack on Jury Nullification in United States v. Thomas: In Disregard of the Law and the Evidence." Cardozo Law Review 20 (March 1999): 1275–1324.

Schiraldi, Vincent, and Tara-Jen Ambrosio. Striking Out: The Crime Control Impact of "Three Strikes" Laws. Washington, DC: Justice Policy Institute.

Schlanger, Margo. "Inmate Litigation." Harvard Law Review 116, 6 (April 2003): 1557.

Schlesinger, Steven R. Federalism and Criminal Justice: The Case of the Exclusionary Rule. Washington, DC: Heritage Foundation, 1975.

Schlichter, Kurt Andrew. "Locked and Loaded: Taking Aim at the Growing Use of the American Military in Civilian Law Enforcement Operations." Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review 26, 4 (June 1993): 1291–1334.

Schmalleger, Frank. Criminal Justice. A Brief Introduction. 5th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2004.

Schmidt, Benno C. Freedom of the Press Versus Public Access. New York: Praeger, 1976.

Schmidt, Regin. Red Scare: FBI and the Origins of Anticommunism in the United States, 1919–1943. Copenhagen: Museum Tusculanum Press, University of Copenhagen, 2000.

Schneider, Carl. "Free Speech and Corporate Freedom: A Comment on First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti." Southern California Law Review 59 (September 1986): 1227–91.

Schneider, Elizabeth M. Battered Women and Feminist Lawmaking. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000.

Schneir, Walter, and Miriam Schneir. Invitation to an Inquest: Reopening the Rosenberg "Atom Spy" Case. 2d ed. New York: Praeger, 1983.

Schoepflin, Rennie B. Christian Science on Trial: Religious Healing in America. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

Schoolman, Morton. The Imaginary Witness: The Critical Theory of Herbert Marcuse. New York: Free Press, 1980.

Schrecker, Ellen, and Natalie Zemon Davis. The Age of McCarthyism: A Brief History with Documents. New York: Palgrave, 2002.

Schroeder, Alan. Presidential Debates: Forty Years of High-Risk TV. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Schuck, Peter. Suing Government. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983.

———. "Membership in the Liberal Polity: The Devaluation of American Citizenship." In Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America, ed. W. R. Brubaker, 51–65. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1989.

Schuck, Peter, and Rogers Smith. Citizenship Without Consent: Illegal Aliens in the American Polity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.

Schultz, David A. Property, Power, and American Democracy. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 1992.

———. "Church-State Relations and the First Amendment." In Law and Politics: Unanswered Questions, ed. David A. Schultz, 235–66. New York: P. Lang, 1994.

———. "No Joy in Mudville Tonight: Impact of "Three Strike" Laws on State and Federal Corrections Policy, Resources, and Crime Control." Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy 9 (2000): 557.

Schultz, David A., and Christopher A. Smith. The Jurisprudential Vision of Justice Antonin Scalia. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

Schultz, John. The Chicago Conspiracy Trial. New York: Da Capo, 1993.

Schurr, Richard A. "Burson v. Freeman: Where the Right to Vote Intersects with the Freedom to Speak." Whittier Law Review 15 (1994): 869–916.

Schwartz, Bernard. The Great Rights of Mankind: The History of the American Bill of Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

———. Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court. New York: New York University Press, 1983.

Schwartz, Brad K. "Note: Development Agreements: Contracting for Vested Rights." Boston College Environmental Affairs Law Review 28 (Summer 2001): 719.

Schwartz, Herman, ed. The Rehnquist Court: Judicial Activism on the Right. New York: Hill and Wang, 2002.

Schweber, Howard. Speech, Conduct, and the First Amendment. New York: P. Lang, 2003.

Schweninger, Loren, ed. The Southern Debate over Slavery, Vol. 1: Petitions to Southern Legislatures, 1778–1864. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2001.

Scopes, John Thomas. The World's Most Famous Court Trial: State of Tennessee v. John Thomas Scopes. Cincinnati, OH: National Book, 1925.

Scotch, Richard K. From Good Will to Civil Rights: Transforming Federal Disability Policy. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1984.

Scott, Craig, ed. Torture as Tort: Comparative Perspectives on the Development of Transnational Human Rights Litigation. Portland, OR: Hart, 2001.

Seabury, Paul, ed. Bureaucrats and Brainpower: Government Regulation of Universities. San Francisco: Institute for Contemporary Studies, 1979.

Segal, Jeffrey A., and Harold J. Spaeth. The Supreme Court and the Attitudinalist Model Revisited. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Segers, Mary C., and Ted G. Jelen. A Wall of Separation? Debating the Public Role of Religion. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.

Seidman, Louis M. Our Unsettled Constitution: A New Defense of Constitutionalism and Judicial Review. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Seper, Jerry. "Bush Adds Dirty Dozen to Drug List; Government Can Seize U.S. Assets of Repeated Kingpins Under 1999 Act." Washington Times, June 2, 2001.

Settle, Mary Lee. The Scopes Trial: The State of Tennessee v. John Thomas Scopes. New York: F. Watts, 1972.

Severance, Lawrence, and Elizabeth Loftus. "Improving the Ability of Jurors to Comprehend and Apply Criminal Jury Instructions." Law and Society Review 17, 2 (1982): 153–97.

Shamir, Ronen, and Sara Chinski. "Destruction of Houses and Construction of a Cause." In Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities, ed. Austin Sarat and Stuart A. Scheingold. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Shanks, Herschel. The Art and Craft of Judging: The Decisions of Judge Learned Hand. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

Shapiro, Andrew. "Challenging Criminal Disenfranchisement Under the Voting Rights Act: A New Strategy." Yale Law Journal 103 (1993): 537.

Shapiro, Barbara. Beyond Reasonable Doubt and Probable Cause: Historical Perspectives on the Anglo-American Law of Evidence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

Shapiro, Joseph P. No Pity: People with Disabilities Forging a New Civil Rights Movement. New York: Random House, 1994.

Shapiro, Martin. Freedom of Speech: The Supreme Court and Judicial Review. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1966.

Sharp, Andrew, ed. The English Levellers. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Sharpe, Gene. The Politics of Nonviolent Action. Boston: P. Sargent, 1973.

Shaw, Stephen K., William D. Pederson, and Frank J. Williams, eds. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Transformation of the Supreme Court. New York: M. E. Sharpe, 2003.

Shear, Michael D. "[Virginia] Finds No Proof of Racial Profiling." Washington Post, January 26, 2002.

Sheehan, Reginald S., William Mishler, and Donald R. Songer. "Ideology, Status, and Differential Success of Direct Parties Before the Supreme Court." American Political Science Review 86, 2 (1992): 464–71.

Sheffer, Martin. God Versus Caesar: Belief, Worship, and Proselytizing Under the First Amendment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999.

Shelden, Randall G., and William B. Brown. Criminal Justice in America. A Critical View. New York: Pearson Education, 2003.

Shiffrin, Steven H. "Government Speech." UCLA Law Review 27 (1980): 1258.

———. The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.

———. Dissent, Injustice, and the Meanings of America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000.

Shklar, Judith. Montesquieu. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Shouse, Aimee D. Presidents from Nixon through Carter, 1969–1991. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Shughart, William F., II. Taxing Choice: The Predatory Politics of Fiscal Discrimination. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1997.

Shull, Steven A. A Kinder, Gentler Racism? The Reagan-Bush Civil Rights Legacy. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1993.

———. American Civil Rights Policy from Truman to Clinton: The Role of Presidential Leadership. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1999.

Shumate, T. Daniel, ed. The First Amendment: The Legacy of George Mason. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1985.

Shwayri, Rebecca. "Sex Meets the City: Lowering a City's Evidentiary Burden on Zoning Ordinances: City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc." Florida Law Review 55 (July 2003): 927.

Sickels, Robert J. Race, Marriage, and the Law. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1972.

Siegal, Paul. Communication Law in America. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2001.

Siegan, Bernard H. Property Rights from Magna Carta to the Fourteenth Amendment. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press, 2001.

Simkins, Francis Butler. Pitchfork Ben Tillman: South Carolinian. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1944.

Simon, James F. The Antagonists: Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter, and Civil Liberties in Modern America. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.

———. The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Simone, James F. The Antagonists. New York: Touchstone Books, 1989.

Simonelli, Frederick J. "The American Nazi Party, 1958–1967." The Historian 57, 3 (1995): 553–66.

———. American Fuehrer: George Lincoln Rockwell and the American Nazi Party. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

Sitkoff, Harvard. The Struggle for Black Equality, 1954–1980. New York: Hill and Wang, 1981.

Skinner, Quentin. Liberty Before Liberalism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Skinner, Renee. "The Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hileah: Still Sacrificing Free Exercise." Baylor Law Review 46 (Winter 1994): 259.

Sklansky, David A. "The Fourth Amendment and Common Law." Columbia Law Review 100 (2000): 1739–1814.

Skouras, George. Takings Law and the Supreme Court: Judicial Oversight of the Regulatory State's Acquisition, Use, and Control of Private Property. New York: P. Lang, 1998.

Skousen, W. Cleon. The Making of America: The Substance and Meaning of the Constitution. Washington, DC: National Center for Constitutional Studies, 1985.

Slaff, Sara. "Note: Silencing Student Speech: Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser." American University Law Review 37 (Fall 1987): 203–23.

Slater, Dashka. "huMouseTM." Legal Affairs 1, 4 (November/December 2002): 20–8.

Sloan, Irving J. The Law Governing Abortion, Contraception, and Sterilization. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1988.

Slocum, Alfred. "The Jurisprudence of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor." Women's Rights Law Reporter 13 (Summer/Fall 1991): 105.

Smith, Bradley. Unfree Speech. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Smith, Christopher E. Courts and the Poor. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1991.

———. "Supreme Court Surprise: Justice Anthony Kennedy's Move Toward Moderation." Oklahoma Law Review 45 (1992): 459–76.

———. Law and Contemporary Corrections. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2000.

Smith, Don L. "The Right to Petition for Redress of Grievances: Constitutional Development and Interpretations." Ph.D. diss., Texas Tech University, 1971.

Smith, Donald L. Zechariah Chafee, Jr.: Defender of Liberty and Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1986.

Smith, Douglas. "The Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV, Section 2: Precursor of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment." San Diego Law Review 34 (May/June 1997): 809.

Smith, James Morton. Freedom's Fetters: The Alien and Sedition Laws and American Civil Liberties. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1956.

Smith, Jean Edward. John Marshall: Definer of a Nation. New York: Henry Holt, 1996.

Smith, Joseph, trans. The Book of Mormon. Salt Lake City, UT: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1986.

Smith, Rogers. Civic Ideals. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Smolla, Rodney A. Suing the Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

———. Jerry Falwell v. Larry Flynt: The First Amendment on Trial. Chicago: University Press of Illinois, 1990.

———. Free Speech in an Open Society. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1992.

Snyder, Howard, and Melissa Sickmund. Juvenile Offenders and Victims: 1999 National Report. Washington, DC: Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 1999.

Solinger, Rickie, Marie Bass, and Patricia Anderson. Abortion Wars: Half a Century of Struggle, 1950–2000. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Sonderlund, Jean R. Quakers and Slavery: A Divided Spirit. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985.

Sorauf, Frank J. The Wall of Separation: The Constitutional Politics of Church and State. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1976.

———. Inside Campaign Finance: Myths and Realities. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.

Spanier, John W. The Truman-MacArthur Controversy and the Korean War. New York: W. W. Norton, 1965.

Spencer, Shaun B. "Vantage Point: Nevada Case Threatens to Expand Terry Stops." Boston Bar Journal 48 (March/April 2004): 27.

Spiro, Peter. "Questioning Barriers to Naturalization." Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 13 (Summer 1999): 479.

Spitz, David. The Real World of Liberalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.

Spitzer, Robert J. The Politics of Gun Control. 2d ed. New York: Chatham House, 1998.

Spriggs, James F. "The Supreme Court and Federal Administrative Agencies: A Resource-Based Theory and Analysis of Judicial Impact." American Journal of Political Science 40, 4 (1996): 1122–51.

St. Clair, James E., and Linda C. Gugin. Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson of Kentucky: A Political Biography. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2002.

Starczewski, Lisa Marie. IRS National Office Procedures. Washington, DC: Tax Management, 2002.

Starr, Kenneth. The Law of Preemption. Chicago: American Bar Association, 1991.

Starr, V. Hale, and Mark McCormick. Jury Selection: An Attorney's Guide to Jury Law and Methods. Boston: Little, Brown, 1985.

"States Seek Solutions to Influx of Spanish-speaking Residents." USA Today. http://www.usatoday.com/news/nation/census/2002-08-06-states-spanish_x.htm.

Stearns, Maxwell. "Standing Back from the Forest: Justiciability and Social Choice." California Law Review 83 (December 1995): 1309–1413.

Stebenne, David L. Arthur J. Goldberg: New Deal Liberal. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Steinhardt, Ralph G., and Anthony D'Amato, eds. The Alien Tort Claims Act: An Analytical Anthology. New York: Transnational, 1999.

Stepan-Norris, Judith, and Maurice Zeitlin. Left Out: Reds and America's Industrial Unions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Stephens, Beth, and Michael Ratner. International Human Rights Litigation in U.S. Courts. New York: Transnational, 1996.

Stephens, Otis H., Jr., and John M. Scheb II. American Civil Liberties. New York: West, 1999.

———. American Constitutional Law. 3d ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson/West, 2003.

Stevens, Duncan N. "Supreme Court Review: Off the Mapp: Parole Revocation Hearings and the Fourth Amendment." Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 89 (Spring 1999): 1047–94.

Stevens, Gina M., and Charles Doyle. Privacy: Wiretapping and Electronic Eavesdropping. New York: Novinka, 2002.

Stid, David. The President as Statesman: Woodrow Wilson and the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.

Stiltner, Jeffrey W. "Note: Rethinking the Wall of Separation: Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District—Is This the End of Lemon?" Capital University Law Review 23 (1994): 823–61.

Stim, Richard. Trademark Law. Albany, NY: West/Thomson, 2000.

Stites, Francis N. Private Interest and Public Gain: The Dartmouth College Case. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1972.

Stoebuck, William B. "A General Theory of Eminent Domain." Washington Law Review 47 (1972): 553–608.

Stone, Clayborne S. "Recent Developments" Arkansas Law Review 56 (2003): 255–60.

Stone, Geoffrey R. "Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places." Supreme Court Review (1974): 233.

Stone, Geoffrey R., Richard A. Epstein, and Cass R. Sunstein. The Bill of Rights in the Modern State. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Stone, Irving. Clarence Darrow for the Defense. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, Doran, 1941.

Stoner, James R., Jr. "Is Tradition Activist? The Common Law of the Family in the Liberal Constitutional World." University of Colorado Law Review 73 (Fall 2002): 1291–1306.

Stoney, David A., and John I. Thornton. "A Critical Analysis of Quantitative Fingerprint Individuality Models." Journal of Forensic Science 31 (1986): 1187.

Story, Joseph. A Familiar Exposition of the Constitution of the United States. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1840.

Story, William W., ed. Life and Letters of Joseph Story. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown, 1851.

———. The Miscellaneous Writings of Joseph Story. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown, 1852.

Storzer, Roman P., and Anthony R. Picarello Jr. "The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000: A Constitutional Response to Unconstitutional Zoning Practices." George Mason Law Review 9 (2001): 929.

Strauss, Leo. Natural Right and History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953.

Streib, Victor. Death Penalty in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Strossen, Nadine. In Defense of Pornography: Free Speech and the Fight for Women's Rights. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Strum, Philippa. The Supreme Court and Political Questions. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1974.

———. Brandeis: Beyond Progressivism. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993.

———. When the Nazis Came to Skokie: Freedom for Speech We Hate. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1999.

———. "Change and Continuity on the Supreme Court: Conversations with Justice Harry A. Blackmun." University of Richmond Law Review 34 (2000): 285–304.

———. Women in the Barracks: The VMI Case and Equal Rights. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2002.

Sturtz, Jody. "Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District: Handicapped Children Versus the Establishment Clause." Detroit College of Law Review 1994: 279–308.

Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. First Amendment Law. New York: Foundation, 1999.

———. Constitutional Law. 14th ed. New York: Foundation, 2001.

Sullivan, Patricia. Days of Hope: Race and Democracy in the New Deal Era. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Sunstein, Cass. "Standing and the Privatization of Public Law." Columbia Law Review 88 (November 1988): 1432–81.

———. Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: Free Press, 1993.

———. Designing Democracy: What Constitutions Do. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Sussman, Alan. Rights of Parents. New York: Avon, 1980.

Swanson, Wayne R. The Christ Child Goes to Court. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.

Swartz, Jennifer Kathleen. "Beyond the Schoolhouse Gates: Do Students Shed Their Constitutional Rights When Communicating to a Cyber-Audience?" Drake Law Review 48 (2000): 587–604.

Swartz, Louis H. "Legal Implications of the New Ferment Concerning Transsexualism." International Journal of Transgenderism 2, 4 (October–December 1998).

Swisher, Carl B. Roger B. Taney. New York: Macmillan, 1935.

Swomley, John M. Religious Liberty and the Secular State: The Constitutional Context. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1987.

"Symposium: New Voices on the War on Drugs." Villanova Law Review 47 (Winter 2003).

Taft-Hartley Act of 1947. U.S. Code. Vol. 29, secs. 141–197.

Tanenhaus, Joseph. "Group Libel." Cornell Law Quarterly 35, 2 (Winter 1950): 261–302.

Tarr, G. Alan. Understanding State Constitutions. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.

———. Judicial Process and Judicial Policymaking. Belmont, CA: West/Wadsworth, 1999.

Tate, C. Neal, and Torbjön Vallinder. The Global Expansion of Judicial Power. New York: New York University Press, 1995.

Taylor, Jack. Internal Revenue Service. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.

Taylor, Maxwell, and Ethel Quayle. Child Pornography: An Internet Crime. Philadelphia: Brunner-Routledge, 2003.

Taylor, Telford. Grand Inquest: The Story of Congressional Investigations. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1955.

———. Nuremberg and Vietnam: An American Tragedy. New York: Quadrangle, 1970.

Tedford, Thomas L., and Dale A. Herbeck. Freedom of Speech in the United States. 4th ed. State College, PA: Strata, 2001.

Temple, Ronald. "Entrapped! Jacobson v. United States: When the Quest to Convict Child Pornographers Goes Too Far." South Dakota Law Review 38 (1993): 147.

Terman, Donna L., Edwin W. Martin, and Reed Martin. "The Legislative and Litigation History of Special Education." Future of Children (Special Education for Students with Disabilities) 6, 1 (Spring 1996): 25–39.

Theroux, Christine. "Assessing the Constitutionality of Mandatory Student Activity Fee Systems: All Students Benefit." Connecticut Law Review 33 (Winter 2001): 691–723.

Thoe, Kari. "A Learning Experience: Discovering the Balance Between Fees-Funded Public Fora and Compelled-Speech Rights at American Universities." Minnesota Law Review 82 (May 1998): 1425–63.

Thomas, Benjamin P. Abraham Lincoln. 1952. Reprint, New York: Modern Library, 1968.

Thomas, Kendall. "Beyond the Privacy Principle." Columbia Law Review 92 (October 1992): 1431–1516.

Thomson, Ernie. "Discrimination and the Death Penalty in Arizona." Criminal Justice Review 22 (1997): 65–77.

Thoreau, Henry David. "Civil Disobedience" and Other Essays. New York: Dover, 1993.

———. "Walden" and "Civil Disobedience": Complete Texts with Introduction, Historical Contexts, Critical Essays. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.

Thucydides. The Peloponnesian War, trans. Richard Crawley. New York: Modern Library, 1951.

Tiedeman, Christopher G. A Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States. Union, NJ: Lawbook Exchange, 2001.

Tiefer, Charles. "Privilege Pushover: Congressional Investigations Can Obliterate Legal Privilege Claims." Texas Lawyer, January 15, 1996: 28.

Tierney, Kevin. Darrow: A Biography. New York: Crowell, 1979.

Tocqueville, Alexis de. Democracy in America, ed. Phillips Bradley. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.

Tone, Andrea. Devices and Desires: A History of Contraceptives in America. New York: Hill and Wang, 2001.

Torture Victims Protection Act. U.S. Code. Vol. 28, sec. 1350 (1994).

Trafford, Abigail. "National Opinion—At Last: An Alternative to Painful Death." Washington Post, October 10, 2000, Z08.

Travis Lawrence F., III. Introduction to Criminal Justice. 3d ed. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 1998.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3d ed. New York: Foundation, 2000.

Tribe, Laurence H., and Michael C. Dorf. On Reading the U.S. Constitution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1991.

Tuck, Richard. Philosophy and Government, 1572–1651. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Turley, Jonathon. " 'From Pillar to Post': The Prosecution of American Presidents." American Criminal Law Review 37 (Summer 2003): 1049–1106.

Tushnet, Mark V. "Change and Continuity in the Concept of Civil Rights: Thurgood Marshall and Affirmative Action." Social Philosophy and Policy 8, 2 (Spring 1991): 150–71.

———. Making Civil Rights Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1935–1961. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Tussey, Jean Y., ed. Eugene V. Debs Speaks. New York: Pathfinder: 1994.

Tuttle, Robert W. "Religious Institutions and Land Use Control: How Firm a Foundation? Protecting Religious Land Uses After Boerne." George Washington Law Review 68 (2000): 681.

Tyack, David B. "The Perils of Pluralism: The Background of the Pierce Case." American Historical Review 74, 1 (October 1968): 74–98.

U.S. Attorney General's Office. Final Report of the Attorney General's Commission on Pornography. Nashville, TN: Rutledge Hill Press, 1986.

U.S. Congressional Budget Office. Regulatory Takings and Proposals for Change. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1998.

U.S. Department of Defense. "Military Commission Order Number 1," March 21, 2002. http://www.cdt.org/security/usapatriot/020321militaryregs.pdf.

U.S. Department of Education. A Nation at Risk. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1983.

U.S. Department of Education, Office of Education Research and Improvement. "Homeschooling in the United States: 1999," 2001. http://nces.ed.gov/pubsearch/pubsinfo.asp?pubid 0010333.

U.S. Department of Justice. Convicted by Juries, Exonerated by Science. U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1996.

U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. Probation and Parole Statistics: Summary Findings. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 2003.

U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. Curfew: An Answer to Juvenile Delinquency and Victimization? April 1996. http://www.ncjrs.org/pdffiles/curfew.pdf.

Udell, Collin O'Connor. "Signaling A New Direction in Gender Classification Scrutiny: United States v. Virginia." Connecticut Law Review 29 (Fall 1996): 521.

Uggen, Christopher, and Jeff Manza. "Democratic Contraction? Political Consequences of Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States." American Sociological Review 67 (2002): 777.

Unger, Robert. The Union Station Massacre: The Original Sin of J. Edgar Hoover's FBI. Kansas City, MO: Andrews McMeel, 1997.

Uradnik, Kathleen. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on Youth. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Urofsky, Melvin I. Felix Frankfurter: Judicial Restraint and Individual Liberties. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

———. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court Under Stone and Vinson, 1941–1953. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Urofsky, Melvin I., and Paul Finkelman. A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. Vol. 1, From the Founding to 1890. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Utter, Jack. American Indians: Answers to Today's Questions. Lake Ann, MI: National Woodlands, 1993.

Van Alstyne, William W. First Amendment. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 1991.

Van Wagoner, Richard S. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 1986.

VerSteeg, Russ. "Slander and Slander Damages After Gertz and Dun & Bradstreet." Villanova Law Review 38 (1993): 655–91.

Viera, Norman. Constitutional Civil Rights in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1998.

Vile, John R. "Proposals to Amend the Bill of Rights: Are Fundamental Rights in Jeopardy?" Judicature 75 (August–September 1991): 62–7.

———. A Companion to the United States Constitution and Its Amendments. 3d ed. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.

———. Encyclopedia of Constitutional Amendments, Proposed Amendments, and Amending Issues, 1789–2002. 2d ed. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

———, ed. Great American Judges: An Encyclopedia. 2 vols. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

Vile, John R., and Joseph F. Menez. Summaries of Leading Cases on the Constitution. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2004.

Vina, Stephen. "Virtual Strip Searches at Airports: Are Border Searches Seeing Through the Fourth Amendment?" Texas Wesleyan Law Review 8 (2002): 417.

Viteritti, Joseph P. Choosing Equality: School Choice, the Constitution, and Civil Society. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1999.

Vitiello, Michael. "Three Strikes: Can We Return to Rationality?" Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 87 (1997): 395–481.

Vizzard, William J. Shots in the Dark: The Policy, Politics, and Symbolism of Gun Control. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.

Volokh, Eugene. The First Amendment: Problems, Cases, and Policy Arguments. New York: Foundation, 2001.

———. "How the Justices Ruled in Free Speech Cases 1994–2000." UCLA Law Review 48 (2001): 1191–1292.

Wagner, John. Historical Dictionary of the Elizabethan World, Britain, Ireland, Europe, and America. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx, 1999.

Wald, Kenneth D. Religion and Politics in the United States. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 2003.

Waldron, Paul. "Comments and Notes: Religion in Our Public Schools: Has the Supreme Court's Treatment of Religion Made Government Intervention in Education Unconstitutional?" Brigham Young University Education and Law Journal 1996 (Spring 1996): 96–112.

Walker, James Robert, and Douglas A. Ferguson. The Broadcast Television Industry. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1998.

Walker, Lewis. Without Fear of Favor: A Biography of Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965.

Walker, Samuel. In Defense of American Liberties: A History of the ACLU. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

———. Hate Speech: The History of an American Controversy. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

———. Sense and Nonsense about Crime and Drugs: A Police Guide. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2001.

Walzer, Michael. On Toleration. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Warren, Charles. "New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789." Harvard Law Review 37 (November 1923): 49–132.

Warren, Samuel, and Louis Brandeis. "The Right to Privacy." Harvard Law Review 4 (1890): 193.

Warren, W. L. King John. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1978.

Wasby, Stephen L., ed. "He Shall Not Pass This Way Again": The Legacy of Justice William O. Douglas. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.

Washburn, Patrick S. A Question of Sedition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Washington, James M. A Testament of Hope: The Essential Writings of Martin Luther King Jr. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1986.

Washington, Joseph R. Marriage in Black and White. Boston: Beacon, 1971.

Waters, M. Dane, ed. The Battle over Citizen Lawmaking: A Collection of Essays. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2001.

Way, Almon L., Jr. "The President, American Law, and U.S. Military Intervention into Foreign Conflicts." http://www.geocities.com/way_Leroy/ProConVolTwo IssueOnePage2.html.

Weaver, Russell L., Donald E. Lively, and Fernando E. Saralegui. Understanding the First Amendment. New York: Matthew Bender, 2003.

Weber, Paul J., ed. Equal Separation: Understanding the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1990.

Weber, Paul J., and Barbara A. Perry. Unfounded Fears: Myths and Realities of a Constitutional Convention. New York: Praeger, 1989.

Weedn, Victor Walter, and John W. Hicks. "The Unrealized Potential of DNA Testing." National Institute of Justice Newsletter, June 1998. U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs.

Weinberg, Arthur, ed. Attorney for the Damned: Clarence Darrow in the Courtroom. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1957.

Weinberg, Arthur, and Lila Weinberg. Clarence Darrow: A Sentimental Rebel. New York: Putnam, 1980.

Weinberg, Arthur, Lila Weinberg, and Clarence Darrow, eds. Clarence Darrow: Verdicts Out of Court. Chicago: Quadrangle, 1963.

Weisberg, Robert. “Deregulating Death.” Supreme Court Review 1983: 305–95.

Weisenmiller, Mark. “Military Tribunals in the United States.” History Today 52, 4 (April 2002): 28.

Welch, Michael. Flag Burning: Moral Panic and the Criminalization of Protest. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 2000.

Weller, Jim. “The Legacy of Quarles: A Summary of the Public Safety Exception to Miranda in the Federal Courts.” Baylor Law Review 49 (Fall 1997): 1107–28.

Wellons, Gregory D. “Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith: The Melting of Sherbert Means a Chilling Effect on Religion.” University of San Francisco Law Review 26, 1 (Fall 1991): 149–73.

Wells, Christina E. “Bringing Structure to the Law of Injunctions Against Expression.” Case Western Reserve Law Review 51 (Fall 2000): 1

Wermiel, Stephen J. “Clarence Thomas After Ten Years: Some Reflections.” American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy, and the Law 10, 2 (2002): 315–25.

West, Fred. Contempt of Court. Portland, OR: Halcyon, 1990.

West, John G., Jr. The Politics of Revelation and Reason. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.

Westin, Alan F., and Barry Mahoney. The Trial of Martin Luther King. New York: Crowell, 1974.

Wetterer, Charles M. The Fourth Amendment: Search and Seizure. Springfield, NJ: Enslow, 1998.

“What Price Security?” Editorial. Nation 275, 21 (December 16, 2002): 3.

Whichard, Willis. Justice James Iredell. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2000.

White, G. Edward. Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

———. “The Anti-Judge: William O. Douglas and the Ambiguities of Individuality.” In The American Judicial Tradition: Profiles of Leading American Judges, ed. G. Edward White. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

———. Oliver Wendell Holmes: Sage of the Supreme Court. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

White, John Kenneth, and Daniel M. Shea. New Party Politics: From Jefferson and Hamilton to the Information Age. Boston and New York: Bedford/St. Martin’s, 2000.

White, Welsh S. The Death Penalty in the Eighties: An Examination of the Modern System of Capital Punishment. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1987.

Whitebread, Charles H., and Christopher Slobogin. Criminal Procedure: An Analysis of Cases and Concepts. 4th ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation, 2000.

Wiecek, William M. “The Great Writ and Reconstruction: The Habeas Corpus Act of 1867.” Journal of Southern History 36, 4 (November 1970): 530–48.

Wildes, Harry Emerson. William Penn. New York: Macmillan, 1974.

Wiley-Webb, Yvonne. IRS: A View from the Inside. Huntington, NY: Kroshka Books, 2000.

Wilkerson, Howard. “Local Leader Had ‘Red Scare.’ ” Cincinnati Enquirer, May 22, 2002.

Willcox, William B., and Walter L. Arnstein. The Age of Aristocracy: 1688 to 1830. 6th ed. Lexington, MA: D. C. Heath, 1992.

Williams, Frank J., and William D. Pederson, eds. Abraham Lincoln, Contemporary: An American Legacy: A Collection of Essays. Campbell, CA: Savas Woodbury, 1996.

Williams, Frank J., William D. Pederson, and Vincent J. Marsala, eds. Abraham Lincoln: Source and Style of Leadership. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1994.

Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America’s Civil Rights Years 1954–1965. New York: Penguin, 1987.

———. Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary. New York: Times Books, 2000.

Williams, Neville. Elizabeth the First Queen of England. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1968.

Willis, Clyde E. Student’s Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Wills, Garry. Inventing America: Jefferson’s Declaration of Independence. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1978.

———. Under God: Religion and American Politics. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990.

Wilson, Bradford P. Enforcing the Fourth Amendment: A Jurisprudential History. New York: Garland, 1986.

Wilson, Bradford P., and Peter W. Schramm, eds. Separation of Powers and Good Government. Boston: Rowman and Littlefield, 1994.

Wilson, Debra J. The Complete Book of Victims’ Rights. Highlands Ranch, CO: ProSe Associates, 1995.

Wilson, Woodrow. Constitutional Government in the United States. 1908. Reprint, New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.

Wiltshire, Susan Ford. Greece, Rome, and the Bill of Rights. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

Winslow, Anastasia. “Sacred Standards: Honoring the Establishment Clause in Protecting Native American Sacred Sites.” Arizona Law Review 38 (Winter 1996): 1291–1343.

Winthrop, John. “ ‘Little Speech’ on Liberty.” In Free Government in the Making: Readings in American Political Thought, ed. Alpheus Thomas Mason and Gordon E.

Baker, 62–4. 4th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Wise, Stephen. Drawing the Line: Science and the Case for Animal Rights. Boulder, CO: Perseus, 2002.

Wisotsky, Steven. Beyond the War on Drugs: Overcoming a Failed Public Policy. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1990.

Witt, Elder. The Supreme Court and Individual Rights. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, 1988.

Witte, John, Jr. Religion and the Constitutional Experiment: Essential Rights and Liberties. Boulder, CO: Westview, 2000.

Wittington, Keith. Constitutional Interpretation: Textual Meaning, Original Intent, and Judicial Review. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Woessner, Matthew, and Barbara Sims. "Technological Innovation and the Application of the Fourth Amendment: Considering the Implications of Kyllo v. United States for Law Enforcement and Counterterrorism," Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice 19, 2 (May 2003): 214–38.

Wolf, Susan M., et al. "Symposium: Physician-Assisted Suicide: Facing Death After Glucksberg and Quill." Minnesota Law Review 82 (April 1998): 885–1101.

Wolfensberger, Donald R. Congress and the People: Deliberative Democracy on Trial. Washington, DC: Woodrow Wilson Center, 2001.

Wolfson, Nicholas. Corporate First Amendment Rights and the SEC. Westport, CT: Quorum Books, 1990.

———. Hate Speech, Sex Speech, Free Speech. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1997.

Woloch, Nancy. Muller v. Oregon: A Brief History with Documents. New York: St. Martin's, 1996.

Wood, James E., Jr., ed. The First Freedom: Religion and the Bill of Rights. Waco, TX: J. M. Dawson Institute of Church-State Studies, 1990.

Woodhouse, A.S.P., ed. Puritanism and Liberty: Being the Army Debates (1647–9) from the Clarke Manuscripts with Supplementary Documents. London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 1992.

Woodley, Ann E. Litigating in Federal Court: A Guide to the Rules. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1999.

Woods, Harold, and Geraldine Woods. Equal Justice: A Biography of Sandra Day O'Connor. Minneapolis, MN: Dillon, 1985.

Woodward, C. Vann. The Strange Career of Jim Crow. 3d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Wren, Jonathan. "Alternative Schools for Disruptive Youths": A Cure for What Ails School Districts Plagued by Violence?" Virginia Journal of Social Policy and the Law 2 (Spring 1995): 307–61.

Wright, Benjamin F. The Contract Clause of the Constitution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1938.

Wright, R. George. Selling Words: Free Speech in a Commercial Culture. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Wright, Robert, and Morton Gitelman. Land Use in a Nutshell. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Wrightsman, Lawrence S., Saul M. Kassin, and Cynthia E. Willis. In the Jury Box: Controversies in the Courtroom. Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1987.

Yalof, David Alistair, and Kenneth Dautrich. The First Amendment and the Media in the Court of Public Opinion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Yarbrough, Tinsley E. Judge Frank Johnson and Human Rights in Alabama. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1981.

———. The Burger Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.

———. The Rehnquist Court and the Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Young, John H. Federal Rules of Evidence. 6th ed. St. Paul, MN: American Trial Lawyers Association, 2001.

Younger, Richard D. The People's Panel: The Story of the Grand Jury in the United States, 1634–1941. Providence, RI: American History Research Center, Brown University Press, 1963.

Yudolf, Mark, et al. "Symposium: Twenty-Five Years After Tinker: Balancing Students' Rights." St. John's Law Review 69 (Summer/Fall 1995): 365.

Zaleskas, Kristine M. "Pride, Prejudice, or Political Correctness? An Analysis of Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston." Columbia Journal of Law and Social Problems 29 (1996): 507–49.

Zalman, Marvin. Criminal Procedure, Constitution, and Society. 3d ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2002.

Zeese, Kevin B. Drug Testing Legal Manual and Practice Aids. 2d ed. Deerfield, IL: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1996.

Zegart, Dan. Civil Warriors: The Legal Siege on the Tobacco Industry. New York: Delacorte, 2000.

Zeleny, John D. Communications Law: Liberties, Restraints, and the Modern Media. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson, 2001.

Zerman, Allan H., and Cary J. Mogerman. "Wiretapping and Divorce: A Survey and Analysis of the Federal and State Laws Relating to Electronic Eavesdropping and Their Application in Matrimonial Cases." Journal of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers 12 (1994): 227–69.

Zimmerman, Joseph Francis. Federal Preemption: The Silent Revolution. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1991.

———. The Referendum: The People Decide Public Policy. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.

Zimring, Franklin E. The Contradictions of American Capital Punishment. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Zimring, Franklin E., Gordon Hawkins, and Sam Kamin. Punishment and Democracy: Three Strikes and You're Out in California. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Zirkel, Perry A. "A Rare Religious Reversal." Phi Delta Kappan 78, 4 (1997): 330–35.

Zuckert, Michael P. The Natural Rights Republic. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996.

Zvekic, Ugljesa. "Probation in International Perspective." Overcrowded Times 7 (1996): 2.

Zwerdling, Alex. Orwell and the Left. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1974.

WEB SITES

American Bar Association. http://www.abanet.org.

American Library Association. "Banned Books Week." http://www.ala.org/bbooks.

Americans United for the Separation of Church and State. http://www.au.org.

Armed Forces Institute of Pathology (Maryland). http://www.afip.org.

"Banned Books Online." http://www.digital.library.upenn.edu/books/banned-books.html.

Citizens Council on Health Care. http://www.cchconline.org/index.php3.

"Clarence Thomas." Wikipedia. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Clarence_Thomas.

Commission on Presidential Debates. http://www.debates.org.

Federal Judiciary Home Page. http://www.uscourts.gov.

"Hatch Act for Federal Employees." http://www.osc.gov/hatchact.htm.

National Center for Juvenile Justice. http://www.ncjj.org.

Noise Pollution Clearinghouse. http://www.nonnoise.org.

Office of National Drug Control Policy. http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov.

Oklahoma City National Memorial. 2002. http://www.oklahomacitynationalmemorial.org.

Rivera, Javier. "The Diego Rivera Web Museum." http://www.diegorivera.com/index.html.

Vaccination Liberation Organization (Idaho). http://www.vaclib.org/legal/idahoplan.htm.

General Index

Note: Page references in bold indicate full articles devoted to the topic. Page references in italics indicate photographs.

A

ABA. See American Bar Association
Abington School District v. Schempp (1963), 1:1–2; 2:380, 559
  See also Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Incorporation doctrine; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Separation of church and state
Abood v. Detroit Board of Education (1977), 1:2–3; 2:557
  See also First Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Labor union rights Abortion
  Doe v. Bolton (1973), 1:283–284
  Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), 2:710–712
  See also Birth control and contraception; Roe v. Wade (1973)
Abrams v. United States (1919), 1:3–4, 61, 153, 204; 2:592
  See also Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969); Clear and present danger; Espionage Act (1917); First Amendment; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Schenck v. United States (1919)
Absence of Malice (film), 2:639
Academic freedom, 1:4–7, 5
  See also Congressional investigations; First Amendment; Loyalty oaths; McCarthy, Joseph; Patriot Act (2001); Red scare
ACLU. See American Civil Liberties Union
Acta Pauli, 1:147
Actual malice, 1:7–9
  See also Commercial speech; First Amendment; Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell (1988); Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Slander
ADA. See Americans for Democratic Action; Americans with Disabilities Act
Adair v. United States (1908), 1:26
Adamson v. California (1947), 1:9–10, 94
  See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Incorporation doctrine; Miranda v. Arizona (1966)
Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Penã (1995), 1:34; 2:416
Adderley v. Florida (1966), 1:10–11
  Douglas, William O., 1:287
  See also First Amendment; Public forum; Right to petition
Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923), 2:641
Adler v. Board of Education (1952), 1:55
Administrative searches, 1:11–13
  See also Search; Warrants
Adversarial versus inquisitorial legal systems, 1:13
  See also Civil law system; Common law; Trial by jury
Afroyim v. Rusk (1967), 2:654–655
Age Discrimination in Employment Act, 2:530–531
Aggravating and mitigating factors in death penalty cases, 1:14–15
  See also Capital punishment; Death penalty for mentally retarded; Effective Death Penalty Act; Federal Death Penalty Act; Juvenile death penalty
Agostini v. Felton (1997), 1:15–16, 18; 2:354
  See also Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Separation of church and state; Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002)
Aguilar v. Felton (1985), 1:15; 2:354
Aguilar v. Texas (1964), 1:16–17
  See also Arrest; Illinois v. Gates (1983);Totality-of-circumstances test Aid to parochial schools, 1:17–19, 18
  See also Child-benefit theory; Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education (1947); First Amendment; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Separation of church and state Airport searches, 1:_20_, 19–21
  See also Fourth Amendment; Stop-and-frisk; Terry v. Ohio (1968)
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1983), 2:711
A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States (1935), 1:142–143
Alabama v. Shelton (2002), 1:21–22
  See also Right to counsel; Sixth Amendment
Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), 2:607
Albertsons, Inc. v. Kirkingburg (1999), 1:278

Alden v. Maine (1999), 2:413
Alexander v. Holmes County Board of Education (1969), 1:129
Alien and Sedition Acts (1798), 1:22*, 22–24, 23; 2:609
  See also First Amendment; Immigration; Seditious libel
Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA) (1789), 1:24–25
  See also Rights of aliens
All the President's Men (film), 2:639
Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897), 1:25–26; 2:572; 3:917
  See also Contract, freedom of; Due process of law; Property rights; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873); Substantive due process
Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus (1978), 1:233
Altgeld, John, 1:253
Ambach v. Norwick (1979), 1:98
American Bar Association (ABA), 1:26–28, 27
  See also Lawyer advertising
American Booksellers Association, Inc. v. Hudnut (1985), 1:28–29
  See also Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity; Pornography
American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 1:29; 2:622
  Darrow and, 1:254
  See also Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2002); First Amendment; Texas v. Johnson (1989); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)
American Committee for Protection of the Foreign-Born v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), 2:607
American Communications Association v. Douds (1950), 3:999
American History X (film), 2:639
American Indian movement, 2:537
American Nazi Party (ANP), 1:30*, 30–31
  See also Smith v. Collin (1978); Symbolic speech
American Railway Union (ARU)
  Debs, In re (1985), 1:260–261
  Debs and, 1:259
Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), 1:31–32
  See also Democratic Party
Americans united for separation of church and state (AU), 1:32–33
  See also Establishment Clause; Separation of church and state
Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) (1990), 1:276*
  disability rights, 1:277–278
Amicus curiae, 1:33–35
  See also Solicitor General; Writs of certiorari
Amish, 1:35*, 35–36
  See also Free Exercise Clause; Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972)
Anatomy of a Murder (film), 2:639
And Justice for All (film), 2:639
Anderson v. Creighton (1987), 1:92
Anderson v. Dunn (1821), 1:214
Animal Farm (Orwell, 1946), 2:682–683
Anonymous political speech, 1:36–37
  See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976)
ANP. See American Nazi Party
Anti-dial-a-porn measures, 1:37–38
  See also Federal Communications Commission (FCC); Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity; Pornography
Aptheker v. Secretary of State (1964), 1:118; 2:607
Architectural Barriers Act (1968), 1:277
Areopagitica, 2:627
Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972), 1:38–39
  civil liberties, 1:184
  criminal defendants, 3:970
  Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 1:38
  right to counsel, 3:806
  See also Public defenders
Arizona v. Evans (1995), 1:39–40
  Fourth Amendment, 2:398
  Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, 2:416
  good faith exception, 2:421
  See also Exclusionary rule; Inevitable-discovery doctrine; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Open-fields exception; Plain-sight doctrine
Arizona v. Fulminante (1991), 1:140; 2:633
Arizona v. Hicks (1987), 2:710
Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes (1998), 1:40–41; 3:974
  See also Presidential debates; Public forum
Arkansas v. Sanders (1979), 1:59–60
Arraignment, 1:41–42, 42
  See also Bail, right to; Hearing; Reply, right to; Right to counsel; Speedy trial, right to; Trial by jury Arrest, 1:42–43, 43
  See also Fourth Amendment; Search incident to arrest
Articles of Confederation, 1:44–46, 45; 3:1073–1077
  See also Federalism; Federalists; United States Constitution
Arts and humanities funding, 1:46–48
  See also First Amendment; Obscenity
ARU. See American Railway Union
Ashcroft, John D., 1:49*, 48–49
  See also Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2002); Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002); Patriot Act (2001)
Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2002), 1:49–50; 2:528–529
  Internet, 2:501
  See also Internet and World Wide Web; Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997)

Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002), 1:50–51, 160–161; 2:528
See also Child pornography; Miller v. California (1973); New York v. Ferber (1982); Obscenity; Pornography
Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority (1936), 1:117
ATCA. See Alien Tort Claims Act
Atkins v. Virginia (2002), 1:51–52
capital punishment, 1:140
death penalty for mentally retarded, 1:255
evolving standards of decency, 1:340
juvenile death penalty, 2:523
See also Eighth Amendment; Furman v. Georgia (1972)
Attainder, bill of. See Bill of attainder
Attorney general, 1:52–54, 53
Department of Justice, 1:270–272
See also Ashcroft, John; Attorney General's list of subversive organizations; Department of Justice (DOJ); Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI); Solicitor General
Attorney General's list of subversive organizations, 1:54–55, 55*
See also Attorney general; Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI); First Amendment; Loyalty oaths
Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001), 1:56–57, 58
See also Arrest; Automobile searches; Fourth Amendment; Search; Seizure
AU. See Americans united for separation of church and state
Aurora (publication), 1:23
Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce (1990), 1:57–58
Corrupt Practices Act (1925), 1:241
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti (1978), 2:382
independent expenditures, 2:489
Scalia and, 3:842
See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976); First Amendment; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003)
Automobile searches, 1:58–60, 59
See also Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001); Fourth Amendment; Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977)
Autry, Gene, 2:642

B

Bad-tendency test, 1:61–62
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Balancing test; Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969); Clear and present danger; First Amendment; Gitlow v. New York (1925); Roth test Bail, right to, 1:62*, 62–63
See also Eighth Amendment
Bailey, F. Lee, 1:63–65, 64
See also Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI); Sheppard v. Maxwell (1966)
Bailey v. Alabama (1911), 2:439
Baker v. Carr (1962), 1:66–67, 122, 199; 2:401
See also Political-question doctrine
Balancing test, 1:67–68
See also Bad-tendency test; Black, Hugo L.; Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969); Dennis v. United States (1951); First Amendment; Frankfurter, Felix; Whitney v. California (1927)
Baldwin, Roger Nash, 1:68*, 68–69
See also American Civil Liberties Union
Baldwin v. Fish and Game Commission of Montana (1978), 1:239
Barenblatt v. United States (1959), 1:69–70, 215; 3:1024
See also Balancing test; Congressional investigations; House Un-American Activities Committee; Watkins v. United States (1957)
Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc. (1991), 1:70–71, 174; 3:994
nude dancing, 2:670
See also Nude dancing; Obscenity; Symbolic speech; United States v. O'Brien (1968)
Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833), 1:71–72, 316; 2:364, 366, 596
See also Bill of Rights; Gitlow v. New York (1925); Incorporation doctrine; Selective incorporation
Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977), 1:72–73, 149–150; 2:549
overbreadth doctrine, 2:685–686
See also Bigelow v. Virginia (1975); Commercial speech; First Amendment; Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. (1976)
Batson v. Kentucky (1986), 1:73–74, 296; 3:1008
See also Trial by jury; Voir dire
Baumgartner v. United States (1944), 3:1043
Beauharnais v. Illinois (1952), 1:74–75; 2:430–431, 446
See also Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969); Cohen v. California (1971); Fighting words; First Amendment; Group libel; Hate speech; Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964)
Beazell v. Ohio (1925), 1:343
Beck v. Alabama (1980), 1:139
Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association (1927), 1:117
Bellotti v. Baird (1979), 2:521
Benton v. Maryland (1969), 1:142, 286
Berger v. New York (1967), 1:184, 306, 307
Berman v. Parker (1954), 1:75, 316; 2:544
See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (1984); Takings Clause

Bethel School District v. Fraser (1986), 1:75–77; 2:450; 3:1011
See also First Amendment; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988); New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985); Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969); Vietnam War
Betts v. Brady (1942), 1:77–78; 2:415
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 1:78
See also Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972); Powell v. Alabama (1932); Right to counsel
Beyond reasonable doubt, 1:78–79
See also Due process of law
Bifurcation, 1:79–81
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 1:79
O'Connor and, 1:80
See also Capital punishment; Eighth Amendment; Gregg v. Georgia (1976)
Bigelow v. Virginia (1975), 1:81–82, 149–150, 240; 3:1003
See also Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977); Commercial speech; Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. (1976)
Bill of attainder, 1:54, 82–83, 342
See also Ex post facto laws
Bill of Rights, 1:83–86, 84, 139, 142, 153, 157, 161, 163, 165–166, 169, 184–186, 190, 209–211, 216–217, 221–223, 227, 279; 3:1085
democracy and civil liberties, 1:265–266
See also Constitutional amendments; Federalists; Gitlow v. New York (1925); Incorporation doctrine; Madison, James; Negative and positive liberties; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873); Tyranny of majority; United States Constitution, individual amendments (e.g., First Amendment)
Billboards, 1:86–87
See also First Amendment; Police power
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (2002), 2:611
Birth control and contraception, 1:87–91, 88
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:89
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:88–89
See also Buck v. Bell (1927); Comstock Acts; Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972); Eugenics; Right to privacy; Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942)
Bivens and Section 1983 actions, 1:91–93
See also Eighth Amendment; Fourth Amendment; Prisoners' rights; State action
Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotics Agents (1971), 1:91; 2:590
Black, Hugo L., 1:93–95, 94
Douglas and, 1:287
Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), 1:295
Black, Hugo L. (continued)
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:94
See also First Amendment; Incorporation doctrine; Symbolic speech; Warren, Earl Blacklisting, 1:95–97
See also Boycott; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; First Amendment
Blackmun, Harry A., 1:97–98, 98
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:97–98; 3:828–829
Blackstone, William, 1:98–100, 99
police power, 2:716
See also Common law; English roots of civil liberties; First Amendment
Bloom v. Illinois (1968), 1:229
Blue laws, 1:100–102, 101
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 1:101
See also First Amendment
BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore (1996), 1:80
Board of Airport Commissioners v. Jews for Jesus, Inc. (1987), 1:162
Board of Education v. Allen (1968), 1:17, 159
Board of Education v. Dowell (1991), 1:299
Board of Education v. Earls (2002), 1:102–103, 123; 2:416; 3:1017
See also Fourth Amendment; New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985); Random drug testing; Search; Seizure; Vernonia School District v. Acton (1995)
Board of Education v. Grumet (1994), 1:103–104; 2:528
See also Establishment Clause; Separation of church and state; Strict scrutiny
Board of Education v. Pico (1982), 1:104–105; 3:1011
See also Book banning; Right of school boards to ban books; Student rights; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)
Board of Regents v. Southworth (2000), 1:105–106; 2:586
See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976); Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995)
Board of Trustees v. Garrett (2001), 1:278; 2:416
Boerne v. Flores (1997), 2:403
Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp. (1983), 1:89
Bolling v. Sharpe (1954), 1:325
Bond v. United States (2000), 1:123, 133
Book banning, 1:106–108, 107
Miller v. California (1973), 1:107
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:106
See also Board of Education v. Pico (1982); First Amendment
A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts (1966), 2:624
obscenity, 2:674

Book of Mormon, 2:637
Boondock Saints (film), 2:639
Booth v. Maryland (1987), 3:991, 992
Payne v. Tennessee (1991), 2:696–697
Bordenkircher v. Hayes (1978), 2:713
Border searches, 1:109–110
See also Fourth Amendment
Bowen v. Kendrick (1988), 2:528
Bowers v. Hardwick (1986), 1:110–112; 2:547–548; 3:993, 1029
See also Griswold v. Connecticut (1965); Lawrence v. Texas (2003); Right to privacy; Romer v. Evans (1996)
Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000), 1:112–113
See also Bowers v. Hardwick (1986); Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc. (1995)
Boycott, 1:113–115, 114
See also Blacklisting; Labor union rights
Boyd v. United States (1886), 1:309
Bradfield v. Roberts (1899), 1:159
Brady rule, 1:115
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment
Brady v. United States (1970), 2:712
Brandeis, Louis Dembitz, 1:115–117, 116
See also Right to privacy; Whitney v. California (1927)
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:117–119
Abrams v. United States (1919), 1:3
bad-tendency test, 1:61
balancing test, 1:68
Beauharnais v. Illinois (1952), 1:74
civil liberties, 1:184
clear and present danger, 1:192
Dennis v. United States (1951), 1:270
First Amendment, 2:378
Gitlow v. New York (1925), 1:118
gravity-of-the-evil test, 2:425
Hand and, 2:438
Holmes and, 2:461
House Un-American Activities Committee, 2:473
Marshall and, 2:598
Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917), 2:602
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:118; 3:844
United States v. Kirschenblatt (1926), 3:978
See also Whitney v. California (1927)
Branzburg v. Hayes (1972), 1:119–120, 129, 228; 2:381, 424
See also Chilling effect; First Amendment
Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic (1993), 1:120–121
See also First Amendment; Roe v. Wade (1973)
Breedlove v. Suttles (1937), 2:370
Breithaupt v. Abrams (1957), 1:293
Brennan, William J., Jr., 1:121–123
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 1:122
United States v. Eichman (1990), 3:976
See also Baker v. Carr (1962); Marshall, Thurgood; Shapiro v. Thompson (1969); Texas v. Johnson (1989); Warren, Earl Breyer, Stephen G., 1:123–124
See also Fourth Amendment; Sixth Amendment
Bridges v. California (1941), 1:93
Briefs, United States Supreme Court, 3:973
Brinegar v. United States (1949), 1:58
Broadrick v. Oklahoma (1973), 3:987
New York v. Ferber (1982), 2:662
overbreadth doctrine, 2:685
Bronson v. Kinzie (1843), 1:232
Brown II (1955), 1:299
Brown v. Board of Education (1954), 1:29, 185, 189, 301; 2:576
Black and, 1:94
Brandeis and, 1:116
Burger and, 1:129
bus searches, 1:131
democracy and civil liberties, 1:266
Democratic Party and, 1:268
education, 1:298; 3:808
enumerated powers, 1:325
Fourteenth Amendment, 2:395
Frankfurter and, 2:401
Hand and, 2:436
King and, 2:532
lawyers defending civil liberties, 2:551
Marshall and, 2:598
overturning supreme court decisions, 2:686
Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), 2:702
state action, 3:888
Vinson and, 3:1000
Warren and, 3:1021
World War II, 3:1044
Brown v. Gilmore (2001), 3:1005
Brown v. Louisiana (1966), 1:10
Brown v. Oklahoma (1972), 1:198
Brown v. Walker (1896), 2:424
Bryan, William Jennings, 1:124*, 124–125, 254–255
See also Democratic Party; Political parties; Scopes v. State of Tennessee (1927)
Buchanan v. Warley (1917), 1:125–126
See also Due process of law; Fourteenth Amendment; Police power

Buck v. Bell (1927), 1:88, 126–127, 276, 334
birth control and contraception, 1:88
due process of law, 1:294
See also Eugenics; Right to privacy; Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942)
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 1:127–128
anonymous political speech, 1:37
Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce (1990), 1:57–58
Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission (1996), 1:200 corporate speech, 1:240
Federal Election Campaign Act, 2:362
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti (1978), 2:382
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003), 2:611
Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government (2000), 2:662
Tillman Act, 3:943
Wisconsin Board of Regents v. Southworth (2000), 1:106
See also Political parties
Bund movement, 1:30, 30
Bundy, Theodore, 1:42, 42
Burdick v. Takushi (1992), 3:1045
Burger, Warren Earl, 1:128–130
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974), 3:791
Miller v. California (1973), 1:129
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), 2:692
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:129
See also Nixon, Richard M.
Burke, Edmund, 1:219*
Burmese Days (Orwell, 1934), 2:682
Burroughs v. United States (1934), 1:242
Burson v. Freeman (1992), 1:130
Burton, Harold H., 1:130–131
Bus searches, 1:131–134, 133
See also Fourth Amendment; Search; Seizure
Bush, George H.W., 1:134–135
See also Central Intelligence Agency (CIA); Disability rights
Bush v. Gore (2000), 2:528, 673
Bush v. Vera (1996), 2:528
Bushell's Case (1670, Great Britian), 2:699
Bute v. Illinois (1948), 1:131
Butler v. Michigan (1957), 2:358

C

Cage v. Louisiana (1990), 1:78
Calder v. Bull (1798), 1:25, 136, 343
natural law, 2:649
See also Ex post facto laws
Califano v. Jobst (1977), 3:1049
California v. Acevedo (1991), 1:60
California v. Carney (1985), 1:58
California v. Ciraolo (1986), 2:680
California v. Hodari D. (1991), 2:398
California v. LaRue (1972), 2:670
Callins v. Collins (1994), 1:97
Camara v. Municipal Court (1967), 1:11
Caminetti v. United States (1917), 2:589
Campbell v. Louisiana (1998), 1:296–297; 2:528
Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940), 1:136–137, 184, 185; 2:402, 403
See also Free Exercise Clause; Incorporation doctrine; Jehovah's Witnesses
Capital punishment, 1:137–140, 138
Atkins v. Virginia (2002), 1:140
Douglas and, 1:288
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 1:139
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 1:139
See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Eighth Amendment; Payne v. Tennessee (1991); Ring v. Arizona (2002); Trop v. Dulles (1958); Victim-impact statement Captive audience, 1:140–141
See also Cohen v. California (1971); Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment
Cardozo, Benjamin N., 1:141–143, 142
Palko v. Connecticut (1937), 2:688
See also Hughes, Charles Evans; Incorporation doctrine; Selective incorporation
Carey v. Population Services International (1977), 1:89
Carlin, George, 3:863
See also "Seven dirty words"
Carolene Products, footnote 4 (1938), 1:143–144
See also Compelling governmental interest; Intermediate-level scrutiny; Rational-basis test; Stone, Harlan Fiske; Strict scrutiny
Carroll v. United States (1925), 1:58–60, 144–145
See also Automobile searches; Fourth Amendment
Carter, Jimmy, 1:145–146, 146
See also Presidents and civil liberties
Case for Courage, 2:537
Caseload, United States Supreme Court, 3:972–973
Censorship, 1:146–149, 148
Miller v. California (1973), 1:149
See also Book banning; First Amendment; Milton, John; Near v. Minnesota (1931)
Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York (1980), 1:149–150, 201–202, 240; 2:546, 553

Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York (1980) (continued)
See also Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1975); Commercial speech; First Amendment
Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 1:150–152, 151
See also Patriot Act (2001)
Central Intelligence Agency Act (1949), 1:150
Chafee, Zechariah, Jr., 1:152–153
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Seditious libel
Chamber (film), 2:639
Champion v. Ames (1903), 2:586
Chandler v. Florida (1980), 1:333
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942), 1:74, 93, 153–154, 198; 2:374, 379
overbreadth doctrine, 2:685
See also Fighting words; First Amendment
Chapman v. California (1967), 2:440–441
Charles I, England, 2:705–706, 706
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge (1837), 1:154–155, 232
See also Contracts Clause; Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (1934); Property rights
Chavez v. Martinez (2003), 1:155–156
See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Miranda v. Arizona (1966)
Checks and balances, 1:156–158
See also Carolene Products, footnote 4 (1938); Four freedoms; Incorporation doctrine; Judicial review
Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (1831), 2:596
Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago (1897), 1:316; 2:395
Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (1996), 1:168
Child-benefit theory, 1:158–159
See also Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education (1947); Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002)
Child pornography, 1:159–161
Miller v. California (1973), 1:160
See also Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002); New York v. Ferber (1982); Obscenity
Child Pornography Prevention Act (1996), 1:50–51, 160
Child Protection Act (1984), 1:160
Children's Healthcare Is a Legal Duty, Inc. v. Deters (1996), 1:168
Chilling effect, 1:161–163
See also Near v. Minnesota (1931); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Overbreadth doctrine; Vagueness
Chimel v. California (1969), 2:397
Christian roots of civil liberties, 1:163–166, 164
See also First Amendment; Natural law; Natural rights
Christian Science, 1:166–168, 167
See also First Amendment
Christian Science Monitor, 1:167
Church and state, 1:33
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah (1993), 1:168–169; 2:404, 575
See also Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990); First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Sherbert v. Verner (1963)
CIA. See Central Intelligence Agency
Cipollone v. Liggett Group (1992), 1:169–170
See also Corporate speech; Federal Communications Commission
Citizen Ruth (film), 2:640
Citizenship, 1:170–173, 171
See also Rights of aliens
City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), 1:173–174, 318
See also Compelling governmental interest; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990); First Amendment; Religious Freedom Restoration Act (1993)
City of Chicago v. Morales (1999), 2:521
City of Cincinnati v. Discount Network, Inc. (1993), 1:202
City of Erie v. Pap's A.M. (2000), 1:174–175; 2:671
See also First Amendment; Nude dancing; Obscenity
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond (2000), 1:175–176
O'Connor and, 1:175
See also Roadblocks; Search; Seizure; War on drugs
City of Ladue v. Gilleo (1994), 1:176–177; 2:545–546
See also Lawn signs
City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc. (2002), 1:177; 3:1048
See also City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (1986); First Amendment; Zoning
City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (1986), 1:174, 177, 178; 3:1048
See also First Amendment; Time, place, and manner restrictions; Zoning
City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co. (1989), 2:528, 599, 615
Civil disobedience, 1:178–181, 180
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:181
See also Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic (1993); "Civil Disobedience"; King, Martin Luther, Jr.
"Civil Disobedience" (Thoreau, 1849), 1:179, 181–182; 2:532
See also Civil disobedience; Conscientious objectors
Civil law system, 1:182–184, 203
See also Adversarial versus inquisitorial legal systems; Common law

Civil liberties, 1:184–185
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:184
Department of Justice, 1:272
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 1:184
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:185
See also Bill of Rights; Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation doctrine
Civil Rights Act (1870), 1:189
Civil Rights Act (1871), 1:187
Civil Rights Act (1875), 1:185–187, 189
Civil Rights Act (1964), 1:186, 189
Civil Rights Act (1968), 1:186, 189
Civil Rights Cases (1883), 1:185–186; 2:439; 3:1014
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:185
See also Fourteenth Amendment; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)
Civil War and civil liberties, 1:186–189, 188
Declaration of Independence, 1:263
democracy and civil liberties, 1:266
See also Civil Rights Cases (1883); Fourteenth Amendment; Lincoln, Abraham; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)
Civilian control of military, 1:189*, 189–191
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:190
See also Civil war and civil liberties; Gitlow v. New York (1925); Korematsu v. United States (1944); Lincoln, Abraham; Second Amendment; Third Amendment
Clear and present danger, 1:191–192
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:192
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:191
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Dennis v. United States (1951); First Amendment; Gitlow v. New York (1925)
Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center (1985), 1:278
Clemency, 1:192–194
See also United States Constitution
Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur (1974), 2:594
Clinton, William Jefferson, 1:194–195; 2:424*
Clinton v. Jones (1997), 1:194–195
See also Presidents and civil liberties; Sexual harassment
Clockwork Orange (film), 2:639
Cloning human beings, 1:195–197, 196
See also Roe v. Wade (1973)
Coates v. Cincinnati (1971), 3:987
Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education (1930), 1:159
Cohen v. California (1971), 1:74, 94, 141, 197–199; 2:375; 3:1011
See also Fighting words; Obscenity
Cohens v. Virginia (1821), 2:595
Coke, Edward, 1:322, 322
Petition of Right, 2:705
Coker v. Georgia (1977), 1:139, 250
Colegrove v. Green (1946), 1:66, 199–200
See also Baker v. Carr (1962); Political-question doctrine
Coleman v. Miller (1939), 1:221
Collins v. Youngblood (1990), 1:343
Colonnade Catering Corp. v. United States (1970), 1:12
Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission (1996), 1:200–201; 2:363, 528
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 1:200
See also Federal Election Campaign Act
Columbus v. Penick (1979), 1:98
Commentaries on the Law of England (Blackstone), 2:649, 716
Commercial speech, 1:201–202
See also Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York (1980)
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist (1973), 2:559
Committee on Un-American Activities, 2:665
Common law, 1:202–203
See also Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.
Commonwealth v. Webster (1850), 1:78
Communications Act (1934), 2:615
Communications Decency Act (1996), 3:790–791
Communist Party, 2:702
Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1961), 1:82; 2:606
Communists, 1:203–205
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:204
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Dennis v. United States (1951); Gitlow v. New York (1925); McCarthy, Joseph; McCarthyism; Whitney v. California (1927)
Compelling governmental interest, 1:205–206
See also Fundamental rights; Least-restrictive-means test; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Compulsory Education Act, Oregon, 2:708
Comstock Acts, 1:206–209; 2:541
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:208
Miller v. California (1973), 1:208
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:208
See also Hicklin Test; Roth Test
Concurring opinions, United States Supreme Court, 3:973–974
Conferences, United States Supreme Court, 3:973
Confrontation Clause, 1:209–210
See also Coy v. Iowa (1988); Right of confrontation
Congress and civil liberties, 1:210–213, 212
See also Bill of Rights; Checks and balances; United States Constitution

Congressional investigations, 1:213–216, 215
See also Barenblatt v. United States (1959); House Un-American Activities Committee
Congressional Record, 1:211, 224
Connally v. General Construction Co. (1926), 3:987
Conscientious objectors, 1:216–217, 217
See also Civilian control of military; Federal Conscription Act (1863); Quakers; Vietnam War
Consent principle, Declaration of Independence, 1:262
Conservatism, 1:218–220
See also Barenblatt v. United States (1959); Communists; House Un-American Activities Committee
Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission (1980), 1:240
Conspiracy Theory (film), 2:640
Constitution of the United States (1788), 3:1078–1084
Constitutional amendments, 1:222*, 222–224
See also Bill of Rights; United States Constitution
Constitutional interpretation and civil liberties, 1:224–225
See also Bill of Rights; Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation doctrine; Judicial review
Constitutional regulation, 2:717–719
Constitutionalism, 1:225–227
See also Bill of Rights; Common law; Congress and civil liberties; Judicial review
Contempt powers, 1:227–230
See also Branzburg v. Hayes (1972); Congressional investigations Contract, freedom of, 1:230–231
See also Lochner v. New York (1905); Slaughterhouse Cases (1873); Substantive due process
Contractors Association of Eastern Pennsylvania v. Secretary of Labor (1971), 1:347
Contracts Clause, 1:231–233
See also Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (1934); Marshall, John; Property rights; Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819)
Cooley, Thomas McIntyre, 1:233–234
See also Police power; Property rights; Substantive due process
Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971), 2:710
plain-sight doctrine, 2:710
Copyright, patent, and trademark, 1:234–237, 236
See also United States Constitution
Corfield v. Coryell (1823), 1:238*, 238–239
Corporate speech, 1:239–241
See also Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York (1980); Commercial speech; Federal Election Campaign Act; First Amendment
Correctional Services v. Malesko (2001), 1:92
Corrupt Practices Act (1925), 1:241–242
Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce (1990), 1:241
See also Federal Election Campaign Act; Tillman Act (1907)
County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989), 1:242–243; 2:528, 560; 3:782, 789, 842
See also Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Lynch v. Donnelly (1984)
County of Riverside v. McLaughlin (1991), 1:243–244; 3:781
See also Arraignment; Arrest
Court-packing plan, 1:244–246
See also Carolene Products, footnote 4 (1938); United States Supreme Court
Court voting, United States Supreme Court, 3:973
Cox v. Louisiana (1965), 1:10; 3:987
Douglas and, 1:287
Coy v. Iowa (1988), 1:209–210, 246–247
See also Confrontation Clause
Creation science, 1:247–249
See also Establishment Clause; Evolution; Free Exercise Clause
Crime Control and Safe Streets Act (1968), 1:273–274
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:273–274
Criminal discovery, 1:280
Crucible, The (Miller), 2:609
Cruel and unusual punishments, 1:249–251
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 1:250
See also Capital punishment; Eighth Amendment; Ewing v. California (2003)
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990), 1:185, 251–252; 2:529; 3:1022
personhood and, 2:704
physician-assisted suicide, 2:707
See also Right to die; Right to privacy
Cummings v. Missouri (1867), 1:82
Cunningham v. State (1982), 1:343

D

Dames & Moore v. Reagan (1981), 1:347
Darrow, Clarence, 1:253–255, 254; 3:847*
American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 1:254
Altgeld and, 1:253
death penalty, 1:254
Debs and, 1:253
Gitlow and, 1:254
Haywood and, 1:253
McNamara brothers, 1:253
Scopes and, 1:254–255

Darrow, Clarence (continued)
  Sweet and, 1:255
  See also Capital punishment; Debs, Eugene Victor; Evolution
Darwin, Charles, 1:247, 336, 337
Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (1993), 2:568
Davis v. Alaska (1974), 1:209
Davis v. Brandemer (1986), 1:67
Davis v. Mississippi (1969), 2:376
De Republica (Cicero), 2:649
De Veau v. Braisted (1960), 1:82
Dead Man Walking (film), 2:639
Death penalty
  Atkins v. Virginia (2002), 1:255
  Darrow and, 1:254
  for mentally retarded, 1:255–256
  Penry v. Lynaugh (1989), 1:256
  Rehnquist and, 1:256
  Scalia and, 1:256
  See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Eighth Amendment; Evolving standards of decency
Death-qualified juries, 1:256–258
  Lockhart v. McCree (1986), 1:257–258
  Morgan v. Illinois (1992), 1:258
  Ross v. Oklahoma (1988), 1:258
  Wainwright v. Witt (1985), 1:257
  Witherspoon v. Illinois (1968), 1:257
  See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Eighth Amendment; Trial by jury Death Wish (film), 2:639
Debs, Eugene Victor, 1:258–260, 259
  American Railway Union (ARU), 1:259
  Darrow and, 1:253
  Pullman Company, 1:259
  Socialist Party of America, 1:258
  See also Communists; Subversive speech
Debs, In re (1895), 1:260–261
  American Railway Union (ARU), 1:260–261
  Pettibone v. United States (1893) and, 1:261
  Pullman Palace Railroad Company and, 1:260–261
  See also Debs, Eugene Victor; Labor Union Rights
Debs v. United States (1919), 1:61
Declaration of Independence (1776), 1:261–263, 262; 3:1070–1072
  Civil War and, 1:263 consent principle, 1:262 equality principle, 1:261–262
  Jefferson and, 1:261–263
  right to revolution principle, 1:262–263
Declaration of Independence (1776) (continued)
  See also Jefferson, Thomas; Natural rights; United States Constitution
Deep Throat (film), 1:264
  See also Censorship; First Amendment; Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity; Pornography
Defense of Marriage Act (1996), 2:594
Delaware v. Prouse (1979), 1:58
Delegation doctrine, 2:716
Democracy and civil liberties, 1:264–267, 265
  Bill of Rights, 1:265–266
  Brown v. Board of Education (1954), 1:266
  Civil War and, 1:266
  Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), 1:266
  United States Constitution and, 1:265–266
  See also Constitutionalism; Judicial review; Tyranny of majority; United States Constitution
Democracy in America (Tocqueville), 2:604
Democratic Party, 1:267–269
  New Deal, 1:267
  Roosevelt and, 1:267–268, 268
  September 11, 2001, 1:269
  Truman and, 1:268
  two-thirds rule, 1:267
  Watergate and, 1:269
  Wilson and, 1:267
  World War II, 1:267–268
  See also Minor political parties; Republican Party
Dennis v. United States (1951), 1:67, 192, 204, 269–270; 2:425; 3:999, 1047
  Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:270
  Douglas and, 1:288
  Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917), 1:269–270
  Smith Act (1940), 1:269
  United States v. Carroll Towing Co. (1947), 1:270
  Vinson and, 1:270
  See also Communists; Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917)
Department of Housing and Urban Development v. Rucker (2002), 3:1016
Department of Justice (DOJ), 1:270–272
  civil liberties, 1:272
  Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), 1:271–272
  Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 1:271
  history, 1:271
  Kennedy and, 1:272
  Patriot Act (2001), 2:693–696
  U.S. Marshals Service, 1:271
  See also Attorney general; Federal Bureau of Investigation Descent of Man, The (Darwin, 1871), 1:247, 336, 337

Desegregation, 1:298–299
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1989), 1:272–273
  Due Process Clause, 1:273
  Fourteenth Amendment, 1:273
  negative and positive liberties, 2:657–658
  Rehnquist and, 1:273
  See also Due process of law; Fourteenth Amendment
Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft (2002), 2:411
Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act (1975), 1:277
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:156, 273–274
  Crime Control and Safe Streets Act (1968), 1:273–274
  Miranda v. Arizona (1966), 1:273–274
  Rehnquist and, 1:274
  stare decisis, 1:274
  See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination
Dillon v. Gloss (1921), 1:221
Directed verdicts, 1:275
  Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1:275
  See also Discovery; Trial by jury
Dirty Harry (film), 2:639
Disability rights, 1:275–279
  Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) (1990), 1:277–278
  Architectural Barriers Act (1968), 1:277
  Buck v. Bell (1927), 1:276
  civil rights limitations, 1:278–279
  Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act (1975), 1:277
  history, 1:276
  Honig v. Doe (1988), 1:277
  Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) (1997), 1:277
  O'Conner v. Donaldson (1975), 1:277
  Pennhurst State School v. Halderman (1981), 1:277
  Rehabilitation Act (1973), 1:277
  Social Security, 1:276
  See also Eugenics
Discovery, 1:279–281
  criminal, 1:280
  Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1:279
  Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1:279
  See also Brady rule; Due process of law; Exclusionary rule; Mapp v. Ohio (1961)
Dissenting opinions, United States Supreme Court, 3:973–974
DNA testing, 1:281–283
  Health Information Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) (1996), 1:283
DNA testing (continued)
  National Institute of Justice, 1:281
  See also Right to privacy
Doe v. Bolton (1973), 1:283–284
  Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:283–284
  See also Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992); Right to privacy
Doe v. Unocal (2000), 1:25
DOJ. See Department of Justice
Dolan v. City of Tigard (1994), 1:284–285; 2:545
  Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), 1:284; 2:669
  See also Eminent domain; Land use; Property rights
Donovan v. Dewey (1981), 1:12
Double jeopardy, 1:285–287
  Benton v. Maryland (1969), 1:286
  Green v. United States (1957), 1:287
  Heath v. Alabama (1985), 1:285–286
  Kepner v. United States (1904), 1:286
  Palko v. Connecticut (1937), 1:286
  Richardson v. United States (1984), 1:286
  Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania (2003), 1:286
  Serfass v. United States (1975), 1:286
  United States v. Lanza (1922), 1:285
  United States v. Perez (1824), 1:286
Douglas, William O., 1:287–289
  Adderley v. Florida (1966), 1:287
  Black and, 1:287
  capital punishment, 1:288
  Cox v. Louisiana (1965), 1:287
  Engle v. Vitale (1962), 1:288
  Equal Protection Clause, 1:288–289
  Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 1:288
  Ex parte Endo (1944), 1:288
  Feiner v. New York (1951), 1:288
  Furman v. Georgia (1972), 1:288
  Girouard v. United States (1946), 1:288
  Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 1:288
  Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:288
  Korematsu v. United States (1944), 1:288
  Mapp v. Ohio (1961), 1:287
  Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), 1:288
  Parker v. Levy (1974), 1:288
  Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:288
  Roth v. United States (1957), 1:288
  Schneider v. Rusk (1964), 1:288
  Separation of church and state, 1:288
  Terminiello v. Chicago (1949), 1:288
  United States v. Macintosh (1931), 1:288
  United States v. Schwimmer (1929), 1:288

Douglas, William O. (continued)
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), 1:288
Zorach v. Clauson (1952), 1:288
See also Bill of Rights; Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Incorporation doctrine
Down and Out in Paris and London (Orwell, 1933), 2:682
Draft Card Mutilation Act (1965), 1:289–291, 290
United States v. O'Brien (1968), 1:290–291
See also R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992); Symbolic speech; Texas v. Johnson (1989)
Dred Scott, 1:315
Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), 1:271–272
Drug Kingpin Act (1999), 1:291–292
See also Congress and civil liberties; Due process of law; Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI); Property rights
Due Process Clause, 2:625
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1985), 1:273
Due process of law, 1:292–295
Breithaupt v. Abrams (1957), 1:293
Buck v. Bell (1927), 1:294
development, 1:292
Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), 1:293
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 1:293
Goldberg v. Kelly (1970), 1:294
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:294
Lochner v. New York (1905), 1:294
Mapp v. Ohio (1961), 1:293
Mathews v. Eldridge (1976), 1:294
Miranda v. Arizona (1966), 1:293
procedural, 1:293–294
Rochin v. California (1952), 1:293
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:294
Schmerber v. California (1966), 1:293
Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942), 1:294
substantive, 1:293–294
United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), 1:294
See also Carolene Products, Footnote 4 (1938); Exclusionary rule; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation doctrine; Magna Carta
Duncan v. Kahanamoku (1946), 2:600, 620; 3:1044
Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), 1:185, 295; 2:395
due process of law, 1:293
Fortas, Abe, 1:295
See also Jury size; Jury unanimity; Trial by jury
Dunlop v. United States (1896), 2:674
Duren v. Missouri (1979), 2:416

E

Early v. DiCenso (1971), 1:17; 2:558–559
Easley v. Cromartie (2001), 1:123
Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (1998), 1:136
Eberheart v. Georgia (1977), 1:250
Eddings v. Oklahoma (1982), 3:992
Eddy, Mary Baker, 1:166–167
Edenfield v. Fane (1993), 1:202
Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. (1991), 1:74, 296–297; 2:528
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 1:296
See also Sixth Amendment; Trial by jury
EDPA. See Effective Death Penalty Act
Education, 1:297–300, 298, 299
See also Home schooling; Right to education; San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973)
Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), 1:248, 338
Edwards v. California (1941), 1:300–301
See also Right to travel
Edwards v. Healy (1975), 2:416
Edwards v. South Carolina (1963), 1:10, 301–302
See also First Amendment; Incorporation doctrine; Right to petition; Smith v. Collin (1978)
Effective Death Penalty Act (EDPA) (1996), 1:297, 302–303
See also Capital punishment; Habeas corpus
Eighth Amendment, 1:84, 303–304
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 2:412
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 1:304
See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Effective Death Penalty Act; Evolving standards of decency; Proportionality of sentences
Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), 1:89, 122, 305
See also Griswold v. Connecticut (1965); Right to privacy; Roe v. Wade (1973)
Electronic eavesdropping, 1:305–307
See also Katz v. United States (1967); Olmstead v. United States (1928); Patriot Act (2001); Wiretapping
Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow (2004), 1:307–309; 2:385
See also Establishment Clause; Flag salute; Lee v. Weisman (1992); Prayer in schools; Standing; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)
Elkins v. United States (1960), 1:309–310
Weeks v. United States (1914), 1:309
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Fruits of poisonous tree; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Search; United States v. Leon (1984); Wolf v. Colorado (1949)

Ellsberg, Daniel
New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 2:660
Nixon, Richard M., 2:665
Ellsworth, Oliver, 1:310–312, 311
See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Establishment Clause; United States Constitution; United States court system
Elred v. Ashcroft (2003), 1:237
Ely, John Hart, 1:312–313
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:312
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:312–313
See also Baker v. Carr (1962); Constitutional Interpretation and civil liberties; Judicial review Emancipation Proclamation, 1:313–315, 314
See also Fourteenth Amendment; Lincoln, Abraham
Eminent domain, 1:315–317
See also Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833); Berman v. Parker (1954); Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (1984); Property rights
Employee Polygraph Protection Act (1988), 2:568
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990), 1:173, 317–318; 2:380, 403
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Sherbert v. Verner (1963)
Enemy of the State (film), 2:640
Engel v. Vitale (1962), 1:318–319; 2:554, 731; 3:896, 912, 1021
Douglas, William O., 1:288
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Prayer in schools
England's New Chains Discovered, 2:569
English Bill of Rights (1689), 1:319*, 319–320
See also Common law; Declaration of Independence; English roots of civil liberties; Magna Carta; Petition of right English-only laws, 1:320–321
See also Meyer v. Nebraska (1923)
English roots of civil liberties, 1:321–323
See also Common law; Declaration of Independence; English Bill of Rights (1689); Magna Carta; Petition of right
Enmund v. Florida (1982), 1:139
Enumerated powers, 1:323–326
See also United States Constitution
Epperson v. Arkansas (1968), 1:248, 337, 338
Equal Protection Clause, 1:288–289
Equal-time rule, 1:326–327
See also Fairness doctrine; Federal Communications Commission; Reply, right to Equality principle, Declaration of Independence, 1:261–262
Erie Rail Road Co. v. Tompkins (1938), 2:650
Escobedo v. Illinois (1964), 1:327–328; 2:420, 633
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 1:328
See also Exclusionary rule; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Miranda v. Arizona (1966); Right to counsel
Espionage Act (1917), 1:328–330; 2:602, 621
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:329
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Communists; Gitlow v. New York (1925); Rosenberg, Ethel and Julius; Sedition Act (1918)
Essay on Liberty (Mill, 1859), 2:622–624
Establishment Clause, 1:330–332
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 1:331
See also Abington School District v. Schempp (1963); Engel v. Vitale (1962); Free Exercise Clause; Prayer in schools; Separation of church and state; Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom
Estelle v. Gamble (1976), 1:251
Estes v. Texas (1965), 1:332–334
See also Due process of law; First Amendment; Sixth Amendment; Totality-of-circumstances test
Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co. (1926), 2:544; 3:1056
Eugenics, 1:334–335
See also Buck v. Bell (1927); Cloning human beings; DNA testing; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.
Evers, Medgar, 1:287
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 1:335–336
aid to parochial schools, 1:17
blue laws, 1:101
child-benefit theory, 1:159
Douglas decision, 1:288
Establishment Clause, 1:331
Federal Aid to Elementary and Secondary Education Act (1965), 2:353
First Amendment, 2:380
release-time program, 3:783
separation of church and state, 3:862
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), 3:1051
See also Engel v. Vitale (1962); Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Prayer in schools; Religious symbols and displays Evolution, 1:336–338
See also Bryan, William Jennings; Censorship; Creation science; Darrow, Clarence; Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)
Evolving standards of decency, 1:338–341
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 1:340
See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Death penalty for mentally retarded; Eighth Amendment; Trop v. Dulles (1958)

Ewing v. California (2003), 1:251, 303, 341–342; 3:1017
See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Eighth Amendment; Proportionality of sentences; Three-strikes laws
Ex parte Andrews (1861), 1:101
Ex parte Endo (1944), 1:347; 2:535; 3:1044
Douglas, William O., 1:288
Ex parte Garland (1867), 1:82
Ex parte Jackson (1878), 1:207
Ex parte McCardle (1869)
original jurisdiction, 2:681–682
Ex parte Milligan (1866), 1:187, 190; 2:434, 600, 605, 620, 626–627; 3:1044
Ex parte Newman (1858), 1:101
Ex parte Quirin (1942), 2:434–435, 703; 3:1044
personhood and, 2:703
Ex post facto laws, 1:342–344
See also Calder v. Bull (1798); Judicial review
Exclusionary rule, 1:344–345
Weeks v. United States (1914), 1:344
See also Fourth Amendment; Fruits of poisonous tree; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Patriot Act (2001); Right to privacy
Executive orders, 1:345–348, 346
See also Korematsu v. United States (1944); Presidents and civil liberties Express Company v. Caldwell (1875), 2:357

F

Fairness doctrine, 2:349–350
See also Chilling effect; Equal-time rule; Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1969); Reply, right to Fair-use doctrine, 2:350–351
See also Copyright, patent, and trademark
Family rights, 2:351–353
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:352
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:352
See also Lawrence v. Texas (2003); Loving v. Virginia (1967); Parental rights; Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925); Right to privacy; Rights of minors Fanny Hill, 2:624–625
obscenity, 2:674
See also Miller v. California (1973)
Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union v. WDAY, Inc. (1959), 1:326
Fay v. Noia (1963), 2:432
FBI. See Federal Bureau of Investigation
FCC. See Federal Communications Commission
FECA. See Federal Election Campaign Act
Federal Aid to Elementary and Secondary Education Act (1965), 2:353–355
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 2:353
See also Agostini v. Felton (1997); Aid to parochial schools; Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Separation of church and state; Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002); Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District (1983)
Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 2:355–356
Department of Justice, 1:271
See also Hoover, J. Edgar; Palmer raids
Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act (1965), 1:169–170
Federal Communications Act (1934), 1:38
Federal Communications Commission (FCC), 2:356–358, 357, 614–615
See also Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment; Internet and World Wide Web; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997)
Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978), 1:76; 2:358–359; 3:863–864, 1011
"seven dirty words," 3:863–864
See also Federal Communications Commission; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997); United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group (2000)
Federal Conscription Act (1863), 2:359–360, 360
See also Civil War and civil liberties; Fundamental rights; Presidents and civil liberties
Federal Death Penalty Act (1996), 2:361–362
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 2:361
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 2:361
See also Capital punishment; Drug Kingpin Act (1999)
Federal district courts, United States court system, 3:968
Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) (1971), 2:362–363
See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976); Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission (1996); Corrupt Practices Act (1925); Tillman Act (1907)
Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee (2001), 1:200–201; 2:363–364
See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976); McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003)
Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life (1986), 1:57, 241
Federal Election Commission v. National Right to Work Committee (1982), 1:241

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1:275
directed verdicts, 1:275
discovery and, 1:279
Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 2:440
discovery and, 1:279
Federal Rules of Evidence, 2:568
Federalism, 2:364–365
See also Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation doctrine; United States Constitution
Federalist No. 74, 3:955
Federalist No. 10 (1819), 1:154, 155; 2:581
Federalist Papers, 2:581, 613
Federalists, 2:365–366
See also Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833); Bill of Rights; Incorporation doctrine; Madison, James; United States Constitution
Feiner v. New York (1951), 1:288
Felix v. Westinghouse Radio Station (1950), 1:326
Felon disenfranchisement, 2:367–369
See also Hunter v. Underwood (1985); Richardson v. Ramirez (1974); Right to vote
Ferguson v. Skrupta (1963), 2:369–370
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:369
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:369
See also Carolene Products, footnote 4 (1938); Substantive due process of law
Fifteenth Amendment, 2:370–372, 371
See also Right to vote
Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination, 1:83; 2:372–374, 373
See also Double jeopardy; Due process of law; Grand jury; Immunity; Incorporation doctrine; Miranda v. Arizona (1966); Takings Clause Fighting words, 2:374–375
See also Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942); Cohen v. California (1971); First Amendment; Flag burning; Hate speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992); Symbolic speech; Texas v. Johnson (1989); Virginia v. Black (2003)
Filártiga v. Peña-Irala (1980), 1:24
Fingerprinting, 2:375–378, 377
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment
First Amendment, 1:83; 2:378–381, 379
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:378
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 2:380
police, restrictions on, 2:719–720
Schenck v. United States (1919), 2:378
First Amendment (continued)
See also Abington School District v. Schempp (1963); Branzburg v. Hayes (1972); Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990); Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Hate crimes; Lee v. Weisman (1992); National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson (1958); Right to petition; Separation of church and state; Sherbert v. Verner (1963); Time, place and manner restrictions; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969); Virginia v. Black (2003); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barrette (1943)
First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles (1987), 2:545
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti (1978), 1:57–58, 240; 2:381–382
Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce (1990), 2:382
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 2:382
personhood, 2:703
See also Corporate speech
Flag burning, 2:382–384, 383
See also First Amendment; Symbolic speech; Texas v. Johnson (1989); United States v. Eichman (1990)
Flag salute, 2:384–386
See also Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow (2004); Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)
Flast v. Cohen (1968), 2:386–387
See also Standing; United States Constitution
Flemming v. Nestor (1960), 1:82
Fletcher v. Peck (1810), 1:232; 2:387–388, 595
See also Contracts Clause; Property rights
Florida State Bar v. Went For It (1995), 1:72; 2:549
Florida v. Bostick (1991), 1:42–43, 132; 2:398
Florida v. J.L. (2000), 2:388–389, 416
See also Fourth Amendment; Stop-and-frisk; Terry v. Ohio (1968)
Folsom v. Marsh (C.C.D. Mass. 1841), 2:350
Ford, Gerald R., 2:389–390, 390
See also Central Intelligence Agency; Clemency
Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, 2:622
Forsyth County, Georgia v. The Nationalist Movement (1992), 2:390–391
See also First Amendment
Fortas, Abe, 2:392–393
Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), 1:295
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 2:392

Fortas, Abe (continued)
See also Warren, Earl
44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island (1996), 1:150, 240; 3:1004
Four freedoms, 2:393*, 393–394
See also Carolene Products, footnote 4 (1938); Presidents and civil liberties
Fourteenth Amendment, 1:84–85; 2:394–396
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1985), 1:273
See also Bill of Rights; Due process of law; Duncan v. Louisiana (1968); Incorporation doctrine; Selective incorporation; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)
Fourth Amendment, 1:83; 2:396–399
Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977), 2:701
plain-sight doctrine, 2:709–710
Weeks v. United States (1914), 2:398
See also Exclusionary rule; Good faith exception; Incorporation doctrine; Katz v. United States (1967); Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Search; Seizure; United States v. Leon (1984)
Frank v. Maryland (1959), 1:11
Frankfurter, Felix, 2:399–401, 400
See also Baker v. Carr (1962); Korematsu v. United States (1944); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)
Franks, Bobby, 1:254
Free Exercise Clause, 1:136, 137, 168–169, 173, 174, 217, 248, 249; 2:401–405
See also Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940); Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah (1993); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990); Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Sherbert v. Verner (1963); Strict scrutiny; Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972)
Freedman v. Maryland (1965), 1:149
Freedman's Freedom, 2:569
Fricke v. Lynch (1980), 2:405–406
See also First Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)
Friend of the court, 2:406
See also Amicus curiae
Front (film), 2:640
Frontiero v. Richardson (1973), 2:406–407
See also Incorporation doctrine; Selective incorporation; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Frothingham v. Mellon (1923), 2:386
Fruits of poisonous tree, 2:407–409
Weeks v. United States (1914), 2:407
Fruits of poisonous tree (continued)
See also Exclusionary rule; Inevitable-discovery doctrine; Mapp v. Ohio (1961)
Frye v. United States (1923), 2:567
Fugitive Slave Act (1850), 1:182
Fuller, Melville W., 2:409*, 409–410
See also Federalism; Fourteenth Amendment; Substantive due process
Fullilove v. Klutznick (1980), 1:129
Fundamental rights, 2:410–412
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:411
See also Bill of Rights; Civil liberties; Declaration of Independence; Due process of law; First Amendment; Natural law; Natural rights; Pure-speech doctrine; Strict scrutiny; United States Constitution
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 2:412
bifurcation, 1:79
Brennan, William J., Jr., 1:122
capital punishment, 1:139
Douglas, William O., 1:288
Eighth Amendment, 2:412
evolving standards of decency, 1:340
Federal Death Penalty Act, 2:361
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 2:427
Marshall, Thurgood, 2:598
McCleskey v. Kemp (1987), 2:610
Rehnquist, William Hubbs, 3:781
Ring v. Arizona (2002), 3:823
White, Byron R., 3:1029
See also Cruel and unusual punishments

G

Gandhi, Mahatma, 1:182
Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority (1985), 2:413–414
National League of Cities v. Usery (1976), 2:648
See also Federalism
Gault, In re (1967), 2:392, 414–415, 524
See also Juvenile justice system; New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985)
Gay rights, 2:415
See also Transgender legal issues, United States
Gay Students Organization v. Bonner (1974), 2:406
Gayle v. Browder (1956), 1:114
Gazette of the United States, 1:23
Gelpche v. City of Dubuque (1864), 1:232
Geneva Conventions of 1949 and 1977, 2:619
Georgia v. McCollum (1992), 1:74, 296
Gerstein v. Pugh (1975), 1:244

Gibbons v. Ogden (1824), 2:586
Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee (1963), 1:230; 2:381
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 2:415
  Alabama v. Shelton (2002), 1:21
  Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972), 1:38
  Betts v. Brady (1942), 1:78
  Burton, Harold H., 1:131
  civil liberties, 1:184
  due process of law, 1:293
  Escobedo v. Illinois (1964), 1:328
  in forma pauperis petition, 2:486
  Fortas, Abe, 2:392
  ineffective assistance of counsel, 2:491
  Powell v. Alabama (1932), 2:730
  public defenders, 2:756
  Rehnquist, William Hubbs, 3:781
  right to counsel, 3:806
  Sixth Amendment, 3:875
  Strickland v. Washington (1984), 3:903
  Warren, Earl, 3:1021
  See also Incorporation doctrine; Miranda v. Arizona (1966)
Gideon's Trumpet (film), 2:639
Giglio v. United States (1972), 1:115
Gilbert v. Minnesota (1920), 1:117
Gillette v. United States (1971), 1:217
Ginsberg v. New York (1968), 1:76
Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, 2:415–416, 416
  Arizona v. Evans (1995), 2:416
  See also Frontiero v. Richardson (1973)
Girouard v. United States (1946), 1:288
Gitlow, Benjamin, 1:254
Gitlow v. New York (1925), 2:417–418
  bad-tendency test, 1:61
  Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833), 1:72
  Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:118
  gravity-of-the-evil test, 2:425
  incorporation doctrine, 2:489
  Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:844
  selective incorporation, 3:859
  World War I, 3:1042
  See also Bill of Rights; First Amendment
Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court (1982), 2:418
  See also First Amendment
Godfather (film), 2:639
Goldberg, Arthur J., 2:419–421, 420
  Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 2:420
  Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:420
  See also Brennan, William J., Jr.
Goldberg v. Kelly (1970), 1:122; 2:418–419
  due process of law, 1:294
  See also Hearing
Goldman v. United States (1942), 1:306; 2:397
Gompers v. Buck's Stove and Range Co. (1911), 1:228
Good faith exception, 2:421
  Weeks v. United States (1914), 2:421
  See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Fruits of poisonous tree; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); United States v. Leon (1984)
Good News Club v. Milford Central School (2001), 2:422–423
  See also Free Exercise Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)
Goodfellas (film), 2:639
Gooding v. Wilson (1972), 1:198; 2:374; 3:987
  overbreadth doctrine, 2:685
Goodridge v. Department of Public Health (2003), 2:594
Gore, Tipper, 2:691–692
Goss v. Lopez (1975), 1:76
Graham v. Richardson (1971), 1:98
  naturalization, 2:654
Grand Central Terminal, New York, 2:698
Grand jury, 2:423–425, 424
  See also Branzburg v. Hayes (1972); Immunity; Trial by jury; Zenger, John Peter Gravity-of-the-evil test, 2:425–426
  Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:425
  Gitlow v. New York (1925), 2:425
  See also Bad-tendency test; Clear and present danger; First Amendment; Smith Act cases
Gray v. Maryland (1998), 1:123
Grayned v. City of Rockford (1972), 3:987
Greek roots of civil liberties, 2:426*, 426–427
  See also Bill of Rights
Green Mile (film), 2:639
Green Party, 2:630
Green v. Board of Elections (1967), 2:368
Green v. United States (1957), 1:287
Green v. United States (1964), 1:229
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 2:427–428
  bifurcation, 1:79
  capital punishment, 1:139
  cruel and unusual punishments, 1:250
  Douglas and, 1:288
  Eighth Amendment, 1:304
  Federal Death Penalty Act, 2:361
  Furman v. Georgia (1972), 2:427
  See also Aggravating and mitigating factors in death penalty cases

Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:428–429
birth control and contraception, 1:89
Black, Hugo L., 1:94
Civil Rights Cases (1883), 1:185
Comstock Acts, 1:208
Douglas, William O., 1:288
due process of law, 1:294
Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), 1:305
Ely, John Hart, 1:312
family rights, 2:352
Ferguson v. Skrupta (1963), 2:369
Goldberg, Arthur J., 2:420
legal basis of public health, 2:556
marriage, right to, 2:594
Meyer v. Nebraska (1923), 2:616
Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), 2:709
Quinlan, In re (1976), 3:767
right to privacy, 3:812
ripeness, 3:824
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:428–429
selective incorporation, 3:860
Stewart, Potter, 3:896
substantive due process, 3:917
Third Amendment, 3:938
Warren, Earl, 3:1021
Grosjean v. American Press Co. (1936), 2:429–430
See also Censorship; First Amendment; Incorporation doctrine; Near v. Minnesota (1931)
Grotius, Hugo, 2:650*
Group libel, 2:430–431
See also First Amendment; Hate speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992)
Grove Press, Inc. v. Christenberry (1960), 2:542
Grovey v. Townsend (1935), 2:370
Guilty by Suspicion (film), 2:640
Gut v. Minnesota (1869), 1:343

H

Habeas corpus, 2:432–433, 433
See also Capital punishment
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), 1:213; 2:434–435, 626
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:434
See also English roots of civil liberties; Habeas corpus; Korematsu v. United States (1944); Presidents and civil liberties; Rasul v. Bush (2004)
Hamilton, Alexander, 2:550
Hammer v. Dagenhart (1918), 2:589
Hand, Learned, 2:435–438, 436
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:438
Hand, Learned (continued)
Dennis v. United States (1951), 1:269–270
Miller v. California (1973), 2:437
See also First Amendment; Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917); Obscenity
Harlan, John Marshall, 2:439*, 438–440
See also Incorporation doctrine; Lochner v. New York (1905)
Harmelin v. Michigan (1991), 1:140, 251
Harmless error, 2:440–441
See also Beyond reasonable doubt; Due process of law
Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc. (1993), 2:441–442
See also Sexual harassment
Harris v. United States (1971), 1:63
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:274
Hartzel v. United States (1944), 3:1043
Hatch Act, 2:442–443
See also First Amendment; Political parties
Hate crimes, 2:443–445, 444
See also First Amendment; Hate speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992); Violence Against Women Act; Virginia v. Black (2003)
Hate speech, 2:445–447
See also Beauharnais v. Illinois (1952); Hate crimes; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992); Virginia v. Black (2003); Wisconsin v. Mitchell (1993)
Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (1984), 1:316; 2:447–448, 544
See also Property rights; Takings Clause
Haymarket affair, 2:448–449, 449
See also Labor union rights
Haywood, William, 1:253
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988), 2:449–451
See also Student rights; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)
Health Information Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) (1996), 1:283
Hearing, 2:451–452
See also Due process of law; Goldberg v. Kelly (1970)
Hearsay, 2:452–453
See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Right of confrontation; Trial by jury Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States (1964), 2:531
Heath v. Alabama (1985), 1:285–286
Heller v. Doe (1993), 1:278
Henry VIII, 1:319, 319
Herndon v. Lowry (1937), 1:61
Herrera v. Collins (1993), 2:453–454
See also Capital punishment; Cruel and unusual punishments

Hester v. United States (1924), 2:709
Hicklin Test, 2:454–455
See also Brennan, William J., Jr.; First Amendment; Hand, Learned; Lady Chatterley's Lover; Obscenity; Pornography; Roth Test
High Noon (film), 2:640
Hiibel v. Nevada (2004), 2:456
See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Stop-and-frisk; Terry v. Ohio (1968)
Hill v. Colorado (2000), 2:457–458, 528
See also First Amendment; Time, place, and manner restrictions
Hilton v. City of Wheeling (2000), 2:657
Hirabayashi v. United States (1943), 1:347; 2:535, 642; 3:1043
Hitler, Adolf, 1:30, 30
Hobbes, Thomas, 2:651
Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining and Reclamation Association (1981), 2:648
Hodgson v. Minnesota (1990), 2:458–459, 528
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:458
See also Right to privacy
Hoke v. United States (1913), 2:586
Hollingsworth v. Virginia (1798), 1:221
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr., 2:459–462
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:461
Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon (1922), 2:700
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Buck v. Bell (1927); Clear and present danger; Schenck v. United States (1919)
Homage to Catalonia (Orwell, 1938), 2:682
Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (1934), 1:155, 233; 2:462–463
See also Hughes, Charles Evans; Property rights; Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819)
Home schooling, 2:463*, 463–465
See also Meyer v. Nebraska (1923); Parental rights; Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925)
Homeland Security Act, 2:465–467
See also Airport searches; Border searches; Bus searches; Civil liberties; Due process of law; Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004); Rasul v. Bush (2004); Rights of aliens
Honig v. Doe (1988), 1:277
Hoover, J. Edgar, 1:271*; 2:467–468
See also Communists; Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI); Fingerprinting; Palmer raids; Red scare; Rosenberg, Ethel and Julius
Hope v. Pelzer (2002), 1:92
Hostile audience, 2:468–469
See also Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940); Clear and present danger; Fighting words; First Amendment; Gravity-of-the-evil test; Hate speech; Time, place, and manner restrictions
Hot pursuit, 2:470–471
See also Exclusionary rule; Search; Search warrants
House Un-American Activities Committee, 2:471–474, 472, 608, 639
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:473
Hughes, Charles Evans, 2:474–476, 475
See also Court-packing plan; Near v. Minnesota (1931); Stromberg v. California
Humanitarian Law Project v. Ashcroft (2004), 1:213
Hunter v. Underwood (1985), 2:476–477
See also Right to vote
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc. (1995), 1:112; 2:477–478
See also Bowers v. Hardwick (1986); Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000); First Amendment
Hurtado v. California (1884), 2:478–479
See also Grand jury; Incorporation doctrine; Selective incorporation; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)
Hustler, 2:560
Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell (1988), 2:479–480, 560
See also First Amendment; Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Right to privacy

I

I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang (film), 2:639
Idaho v. Wright (1990), 1:210
If These Walls Could Talk (film), 2:640
Illinois Central Railroad v. Illinois (1892), 1:233
Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education (1948), 3:1057
Illinois v. Gates (1983), 2:481
See also Aguilar v. Texas (1964); Search warrants; Totality-of-circumstances test
Illinois v. Krull (1987), 2:421
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha (1983), 3:1018
Immigration law, 2:481–483
See also Rights of aliens; United States Constitution; Zadvydas v. Davis (2001)
Immunity, 2:483*, 483–484
See also Contempt powers; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fundamental rights; Plea bargaining; Trial by jury; Victims' rights
Implied powers, 2:484–486
See also Congress and civil liberties; Korematsu v. United States (1944); Presidents and civil liberties

In forma pauperis petition, 2:486, 743
See also Gideon v. Wainwright (1963); Movie treatments of civil liberties
In God we trust, 2:486–488, 487
See also Establishment Clause; Flag salute
In re Debs (1895). See Debs, In re (1895)
In re Dellinger (1972), 1:229
In re Gault (1967). See Gault, In re (1967)
In re Halko (1966), 2:555
In re Kemmler (1890), 1:250
*In re Pappas (1972)*, 2:424
In re Primus (1978), 2:549
In re Quinlan (1976), 2:529, 707
In re Yamashita (1946), 3:1044
Incorporation doctrine, 2:488–489
See also Adamson v. California (1947); Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833); Bill of Rights; Duncan v. Louisiana (1968); Hurtado v. California (1884); Palko v. Connecticut (1937); Selective incorporation
Independent expenditures, 2:489–490
See also First Amendment; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003)
Index Liborum Prohibitorum (Guide to Prohibited Books), 1:147
Indian Appropriations Act (1871), 2:490–491
See also United States Constitution
Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (1997), 1:277
Ineffective assistance of counsel, 2:491–492
See also Gideon v. Wainwright (1963); Powell v. Alabama (1932); Right to counsel
Inevitable-discovery doctrine, 2:493
See also Exclusionary rule; Fruits of poisonous tree; Right to counsel
Initiatives and referenda, 2:493–495
See also Democracy and civil liberties
Innocence Protection Act (2003), 1:140
Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, 2:600
Interest groups, 2:495–497
See also First Amendment
Intermediate appellate courts, 3:969
Intermediate-level scrutiny, 2:497–498
See also Compelling governmental interest; Rational-basis test; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Internal Revenue Service (IRS), 2:498–499, 499
See also Fundamental rights; Presidents and civil Liberties
Internal Security Act (McCarran Act) (1950), 1:55; 2:606–607
International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee (1992), 2:500, 528
See also First Amendment
International Union, United Mine Workers v. Bagwell (1994), 1:230
Internet and World Wide Web, 2:500–502; 3:1024
Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2002), 2:501
Miller v. California (1973), 2:501–502
Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997), 3:790–791
See also Censorship; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment; Music censorship
IRS. See Internal Revenue Service
Irvin v. Dowd (1961), 3:1007

J

Jackson, Robert H., 2:503*, 503–504
See also Black, Hugo L.; Douglas, William O.; Frankfurter, Felix
Jacobellis v. Ohio (1964), 2:437
obscenity, 2:675
Jacobson v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts (1905), 2:555
Jacobson v. United States (1992), 2:504–505
See also Child pornography
Jagged Edge (film), 2:639
J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B. (1994), 1:74, 296; 2:528; 3:1008
Jefferson, Thomas, 2:505–507, 506
Declaration of Independence and, 1:261–263
See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Declaration of Independence; First Amendment; Madison, James; Separation of church and state; Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom
Jehovah's Witnesses, 2:507–509, 508
See also First Amendment; Flag salute; Free Exercise Clause
Jim Crow Laws. See Civil Rights Cases (1883)
Johnson v. Louisiana (1972), 2:509–510
See also Beyond reasonable doubt; Jury unanimity; Trial by jury
Johnson, Frank M., Jr., 2:510–511
See also Judicial review
Johnson, Lyndon Baines, 2:511–513, 512
See also Nixon, Richard M.; Warren, Earl
Johnson v. Zerbst (1938), 1:21, 77; 2:415
Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath (1951), 1:54
Jones v. Opelika (1942), 2:385
Judges selection, United States court system, 3:970–971

Judicial review, 2:513–515
United States Supreme Court, 3:971
See also Marshall, John; United States Constitution; United States Supreme Court
Jurek v. Texas (1976), 1:139
Jurisdiction, United States Supreme Court, 3:971–972
Jury nullification, 2:515–516
See also Zenger, John Peter
Jury size, 2:516–518, 517
See also Jury unanimity; Movie treatments of civil liberties; Seventh Amendment; Sixth Amendment
Jury unanimity, 2:518–519
See also Beyond reasonable doubt; Johnson v. Louisiana (1972); Jury size; Movie treatments of civil liberties; Seventh Amendment; Sixth Amendment
Just compensation, 2:519–520
See also Property rights; Takings Clause
Justices appointment, United States Supreme Court, 3:971
Juvenile curfews, 2:520–522
See also Overbreadth doctrine; Right to travel; Rights of minors; Vagueness
Juvenile death penalty, 2:522–523
See also Atkins v. Virginia (2002); Capital punishment; Evolving standards of decency; Juvenile justice system
Juvenile justice system, 2:523–525, 524
See also Gault, In re (1967); Juvenile death penalty; Rights of minors

K

Kaiser Aetna v. United States (1979), 1:316
Kant, Immanuel, 2:563*
Kastigar v. United States (1972), 2:424
Katz v. Tyler (1967), 3:996
Katz v. United States (1967), 1:185, 306, 307; 2:397, 526–527, 538; 3:1017
Olmstead v. United States (1928), 2:680
See also Search; Wiretapping
Katzenbach v. Morgan (1966), 1:122; 2:527–528
See also Congress and civil liberties
Keegan v. United States (1945), 3:1043
Kennedy, Anthony M., 2:528–529
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:528
See also O'Connor, Sandra Day; Rehnquist, William Hubbs
Kennedy, Robert F., Department of Justice, 1:272
Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez (1963), 2:654
Kent v. Dulles (1958), 1:19
Kent v. United States (1966), 2:524
Kepner v. United States (1904), 1:286
Ker v. California (1963), 2:710
Kevorkian, Jack, 2:529–530, 707
See also Physician-assisted suicide; Right to die; Washington v. Glucksberg (1997)
Keyes v. Denver School District No. 1 (1973), 1:299
Keyishian v. Board of Regents (1967), 1:118, 192
Kimel v. Board of Regents (2000), 2:416, 530–531
See also Federalism
King, Martin Luther, Jr., 1:182, 228; 2:531–533, 532
See also Boycott; Civil disobedience
King, Rodney, 1:285
Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown (1957), 1:107
Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents (1959), 2:542
obscenity, 2:674
Klopfer v. North Carolina (1967), 2:533–534
See also Sixth Amendment; Speedy trial, right to Knowles v. Iowa (1998), 2:702
Kohl v. United States (1875), 1:315
Korematsu v. United States (1944), 1:29, 94, 190, 206, 325, 347; 2:401, 435, 534–535, 642; 3:1043
Douglas, William O., 1:288
Patriot Act (2001), 2:696
See also Black, Hugo L.; President and civil liberties; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Kovacs v. Cooper (1949), 2:667
Ku Klux Klan, 1:266
Kunstler, William, 2:536–537
See also Prisoners' rights; Texas v. Johnson (1989); Vietnam War
Kyles v. Whitley (1995), 1:115
Kyllo v. United States (2001), 1:184; 2:398, 537–538
See also Electronic eavesdropping; Katz v. United States (1967); Search; Search warrants; Wiretapping

L

Labor union rights, 2:539–541, 540
See also Strikes and arbitration
Lady Chatterley's Lover (Lawrence), 2:541–542
See also Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity; Roth test
Laird v. Tatum (1972), 1:162; 2:622
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District (1993), 2:423, 542–543
See also Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Scalia, Antonin G.; Separation of church and state
Land use, 2:543–545
See also Berman v. Parker (1954); Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (1984); Locke, John; Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council (1992); Takings Clause; Zoning

Landmarks Preservation Law, New York, 2:698

Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections (1959), 2:370, 527

Lawn signs, 2:545–547

See also City of Ladue v. Gilleo (1994); First Amendment; Land use; Time, place, and manner restrictions

Lawrence v. Texas (2003), 1:112, 163, 185; 2:352, 547, 547–549; 3:993, 1029

natural rights, 2:652

O'Connor and, 2:678

See also Bowers v. Hardwick (1986); Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000); Right to privacy; Romer v. Evans (1996)

Lawyer advertising, 2:549–550

See also Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977); Commercial speech; First Amendment

Lawyers defending civil liberties, 2:550–552, 551

See also American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU); Movie treatments of civil liberties; Public defenders

Least-drastic-means test. See Least-restrictive-means test

Least-restrictive-means test, 2:552–553

See also First Amendment; Lawn signs; Overbreadth doctrine; Preferred-freedoms doctrine; Time, place, and manner restrictions; United States v. O'Brien (1968); Vagueness

Lee v. Weisman (1992), 1:308; 2:380, 554

See also Abington School District v. Schempp (1963); Engel v. Vitale (1962); Establishment Clause; Prayer in schools; Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe (2000)

Legal basis of public health, 2:555–556

See also Griswold v. Connecticut (1965); Jacobson v. United States (1992); Police power; Quarantines

Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez (2001), 2:556–557

See also First Amendment; Rust v. Sullivan (1991)

Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association (1991), 2:557–558

See also First Amendment; Labor union rights

Lemon test. See Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)

Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), 1:16, 17, 33, 129, 158, 242, 332, 336, 338; 2:543, 558–560, 579; 3:1015

O'Connor and, 2:560

See also County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989); Establishment Clause; Wallace v. Jaffree (1985)

Leopold, Nathan, 1:254

Letter on Toleration (Locke, 1689), 2:573

Levitt v. Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty (1973), 2:559

Leyra v. Denno (1954), 2:373

Libel, 2:560–562, 561

See also First Amendment; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Slander

Liberalism, 2:562–564, 563

See also Declaration of Independence; Locke, John; Mill, John Stuart; Natural law; Natural rights

Libertarianism, 2:564–565

See also Property rights

Liberty versus license, 2:565–567

See also Christian roots of civil liberties; Liberalism; Locke, John; Natural law; Natural rights

Lie detector tests, 2:_567_, 567–568

See also Due process of law

Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean (film), 2:639

Life of David Gale (film), 2:639

Liggett Co. v. Lee (1933), 1:117

Lilburne, John, 2:568–570

See also Christian roots of civil liberties; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Putney debates

Lincoln, Abraham, 2:_570_, 570–572

See also Civil War and civil liberties; Emancipation Proclamation; Habeas corpus; Presidents and civil liberties

Lindmark Associates, Inc. v. Willingboro (1977), 2:545–546

Little Caesar (film), 2:639

Living will. See Right to die

Lochner v. New York (1905), 1:26, 313; 2:369, 410, 436, 438, 572–573, 640

due process of law, 1:294

natural rights, 2:652

Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:572

See also Contract, freedom of; Police power; Substantive due process

Locke, John, 2:573–574, 574

natural rights, 2:651

See also Declaration of Independence; Liberalism; Property rights

Locke v. Davey (2004), 2:574–575

See also Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah (1993); Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995)

Lockett v. Ohio (1978), 1:139; 3:992

Lockhart v. McCree (1986), 1:257–258

Lockyer v. Andrade (2003), 1:303

Loeb, Richard, 1:254

Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly (2001), 1:202

Louisiana ex rel. Francis v. Resweber (1947), 1:138

Louisville v. Radford (1935), 1:117

Lovelace, Linda, 1:264

Lovell v. City of Griffin (1938), 2:384
Loving v. Virginia (1967), 2:352, 575–576, 594; 3:1049
See also Family rights; Marriage, right to Loyalty oaths, 2:576–578
See also Communists; First Amendment; Red scare
Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council (1992), 1:144; 2:370, 545, 578
Lujan v. G & G Sprinklers (2001), 1:92
Luther v. Borden (1849), 1:238
Lynce v. Mathis (1997), 1:344
Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), 1:243, 332; 2:579; 3:1015
See also County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989); Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Religious symbols and displays
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), 2:580
See also City of Boerne v. Flores (1997); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990); Free Exercise Clause; Sherbert v. Verner (1963)

M

Mad Max (film), 2:639
Madison, James, 2:581–583, 582
tyranny of majority, 1:265
See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Articles of Confederation; Bill of Rights; Jefferson, Thomas; United States Constitution
Madsen v. Kinsella (1952), 2:619
Magna Carta (1215), 2:583*, 583–584; 3:1061–1067
See also Due process of law; English Bill of Rights (1689); English roots of civil liberties; Petition of right; Takings Clause
Maher v. Roe (1977), 2:584–585
See also Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992); Roe v. Wade (1973)
Majestic (film), 2:640
Majority opinions, United States Supreme Court, 3:973–974
Malloy v. Hogan (1964), 1:185, 229
Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (film), 2:639
Mandatory student activity fees, 2:585–587
See also Board of Regents v. Southworth (2000); Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)
Mann Act (1910), 2:587–589, 588
See also Congress and civil liberties; Police power
Mapp v. Ohio (1961), 1:185, 310, 328, 344, 345; 2:396, 401, 589–590; 3:1021, 1026, 1040
Douglas and, 1:287
due process of law, 1:293
Weeks v. United States (1914), 2:590
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Good faith exception
Marbury v. Madison (1803), 1:157, 210, 213, 227; 2:527, 594
oaths of office, 2:673
original jurisdiction, 2:681
Marcuse, Herbert, 2:590–592
See also Liberalism
Marketplace of ideas, 2:592–593
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); First Amendment; Gitlow v. New York (1925); Schenck v. United States (1919)
Marriage, right to, 2:593*, 593–594
See also Family rights; Griswold v. Connecticut (1965); Loving v. Virginia (1967); Parental rights; Polygamy; Reynolds v. United States (1879); Transgender legal issues, United States; Zablocki v. Redhail (1978)
Marshall, John, 2:594–597
See also Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833); Fletcher v. Peck (1810); Judicial review; Property rights; Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819)
Marshall, Thurgood, 2:597–599, 598
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:598
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 2:598
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:598
See also Brennan, William J., Jr.; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Solicitor general; Thomas, Clarence
Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc. (1978), 1:12
Martial law, 2:599–601, 600
See also Lincoln, Abraham; Presidents and civil liberties
Maryland v. Craig (1990), 1:209–210, 247
Maryland v. Wilson (1997), 2:702
Massachusetts Body of Liberties, 2:601–602
See also Bill of Rights; Christian roots of civil liberties; Magna Carta
Massachusetts v. Sheppard (1984), 2:421, 590
Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917), 1:269–270; 2:436, 437, 602–603; 3:1047
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 2:602
Schenck v. United States (1919), 2:602
See also Clear and present danger; First Amendment; Hand, Learned; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.
Mathews v. Eldridge (1976), 2:434
due process of law, 1:294
Mattox v. United States (1985), 1:209

Maughn v. Bibb County (1998), 2:680–681
Mayflower Compact, 2:603–605, 604
See also Constitutionalism; Declaration of Independence; English roots of civil liberties; United States Constitution
Maynard v. Hill (1888), 2:352, 593
McCardle, Ex parte (1868), 2:605–606
See also Civil War and civil liberties; Habeas corpus
McCarran Act (1950), 1:55; 2:606–607
See also Communists; First Amendment
McCarthy, Joseph, 2:607*, 607–608
See also Blacklisting; Communists; Dennis v. United States (1951); McCarthyism; Movie treatments of civil liberties
McCarthyism, 2:608–610
See also Blacklisting; McCarthy, Joseph; Movie treatments of civil liberties; Red baiting; Red scare
McCleskey v. Kemp (1987), 1:139–140; 2:610–611
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 2:610
See also Capital punishment; Gregg v. Georgia (1976)
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003), 1:128; 2:362, 611–612
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 2:611
See also First Amendment; Independent expenditures
McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), 1:324; 2:587
McGautha v. California (1971), 1:339, 340
McGowan v. Maryland (1961), 1:100, 101
McGrain v. Daugherty (1927), 1:213
McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission (1995), 2:612–613
See also Anonymous political speech; First Amendment
McLaurin v. Oklahoma Board of Regents (1950), 3:1000
McNamara brothers, 1:253
McReynolds, James C., 2:709
McVeigh, Timothy, 2:678–679
Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent (1984), 2:546, 613–614
See also First Amendment; Lawn signs; Overbreadth doctrine; Police power; Time, place, and manner restrictions
Memorial and Remonstrance (film), 1:224
Mencken, H.L., 1:254
Meredith Corp. v. Federal Communications Commission (1987), 2:350
Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson (1986), 2:441
Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1990), 1:122; 2:528, 614–615
See also Fourteenth Amendment; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Metromedia v. San Diego (1981), 1:86
Meyer v. Nebraska (1923), 1:26, 320; 2:616
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:616
parental rights, 2:689
See also Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925); Substantive due process; Taft, William Howard
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974), 2:617
Burger and, 3:791
reply, right to, 3:791–792
See also Fairness doctrine; First Amendment; Reply, right to Michael H. v. Gerald D. (1989), 2:618–619
See also Parental rights; Right to privacy; Substantive due process
Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz (1990), 1:58, 176
Military commissions, 2:619–621, 620
See also Due process of law; Sixth Amendment
Military surveillance of civilians, 2:621–622
See also First Amendment; Fourth Amendment; Patriot Act (2001); Posse comitatus; Search; Seizure
Mill, John Stuart, 2:563, 622–624, 623
See also First Amendment; Liberalism; Right to privacy
Miller test, 2:624–625
Miller v. California (1973), 2:624
See also Obscenity; Pornography
Miller v. California (1973), 2:625–626
anti-dial-a-porn measures, 1:38
Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2002), 1:50
Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002), 1:50
book banning, 1:107
Burger and, 1:129
censorship, 1:149
child pornography, 1:160
Comstock Acts, 1:208
Deep Throat (film), 1:264
Hand and, 2:437
Internet and World Wide Web, 2:501–502
Miller test, 2:624
New York v. Ferber (1982), 2:661–662
obscenity, 2:674
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), 2:692–693
pornography, 2:727
pure-speech doctrine, 2:759
Roth test, 3:836
Stanley v. Georgia (1969), 3:886
See also First Amendment
Milligan, Ex parte (1866), 1:187, 190; 2:434, 600, 605, 620, 626–627; 3:1044
See also Civil War and civil liberties; Habeas corpus; Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004); Presidents and civil liberties; Quirin, Ex parte (1942); Rasul v. Bush (2004)

Milliken v. Bradley (1974), 1:299
Milton, John, 2:627–628
See also Censorship; English roots of civil liberties
Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), 1:93; 2:384, 385, 403, 628–629, 641; 3:1027, 1043
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause
Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993), 2:629–630
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Search warrants; Stop-and-frisk
Minor political parties, 2:630–632, 631
See also Democracy and civil liberties; First Amendment; Political parties; Presidential debates; Tyranny of majority
Minor v. Happersett (1875), 3:1013
Minority Report (film), 2:640
Miranda v. Arizona (1966), 1:328; 2:373, 632–633, 633; 3:1021, 1029
Bill of Rights, 1:158
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:273–274
due process of law, 1:293
grand jury, 2:423–424
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan (1982), 2:633–634
O'Connor and, 2:635
See also Balancing test; Intermediate-level scrutiny; Strict scrutiny
Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Nebraska (1896), 1:316
Mitchell, William, 3:883*
Mitchell v. Helms (2000), 1:18; 3:1051
Mitchell v. United States (1967), 3:996
Model Rules of Professional Conduct (ABA, 2002), 1:28
Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States (1893), 1:316
Monroe v. Pape (1961), 1:91
Monteiro v. Tempe Union High School District (1998), 1:108
Montesquieu, Baron de, 2:634–635, 635; 3:965
See also Constitutionalism; United States Constitution
Moore v. City of East Cleveland (1977), 2:636
See also Family rights; First Amendment; Right of unmarried people to live together; Right to privacy; Substantive due process; Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974)
Mora v. McNamara (1967), 3:996
Morgan v. Illinois (1992), 1:258
Mormons, 2:637*, 637–638
See also First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Polygamy; Reynolds v. United States (1879)
Morton v. Mancari (1974), 1:98
Mott, Lucretia, 3:764*
Movie treatments of civil liberties, 2:638–640
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:640
Movie treatments of civil liberties (continued)
See also Blacklisting; Capital punishment; Due process of law; First Amendment; Right to privacy; Trial by jury
Mueller v. Allen (1983), 1:17
Muller v. Oregon (1908), 1:116; 2:640–641
See also Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Contract, freedom of; Lochner v. New York (1905); Substantive due process
Munn v. Illinois (1877), 1:26
Murphy, Frank, 2:641–642
See also Korematsu v. United States (1944); Preferred-freedoms doctrine
Murphy v. Hunt (1982), 1:63
Murphy v. United Parcel Service, Inc. (1999), 1:278
Murray v. United States (1988), 2:408
Music censorship, 2:642–643
See also Censorship; First Amendment; Internet and World Wide Web; Obscenity; Parents Music Resource Center
Myers v. United States (1927), 1:117

N

NAACP. See National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
Naim v. Naim (1955), 2:575
Nardone v. United States (1939), 1:306; 2:408
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 2:644
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers (1964), 2:644
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson (1958), 2:381, 644
See also First Amendment; Right to privacy
National Endowment for the Arts, 2:645
National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998), 2:645–646
O'Connor and, 2:635
See also First Amendment; Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity
National Firearms Act (1934), 2:646–647
See also Second Amendment
National Institute of Justice, 1:281
National Labor Relations Board, 2:539
National League of Cities v. Usery (1976), 2:413, 647–648
Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining and Reclamation Association (1981), 2:648
See also Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority (1985)
National Organization for Women v. Scheidler (1994), 2:648–649
See also First Amendment; Roe v. Wade (1973)
National Prohibition Act, 2:679

National Prohibition Cases (1920), 1:221
National Security Act (1947), 1:150
National Security Agency, 2:621
Natural law, 2:649–651
Calder v. Bull (1798), 2:649
Commentaries on the Law of England, 2:649
De Republica, 2:649
Erie Rail Road Co. v. Tompkins (1938), 2:650
Swift v. Tyson (1842), 2:650
Treatise on Law, 2:649
See also Christian roots of civil liberties; Constitutional interpretation and civil liberties; Natural rights
Natural rights, 2:651–652
Hobbes, Thomas, 2:651
Lawrence v. Texas (2003), 2:652
Lochner v. New York (1905), 2:652
Locke, John, 2:651
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:652
See also Bill of Rights; Civil disobedience; Declaration of Independence; Natural law; Right to privacy; Substantive due process
Naturalization, 2:652–655, 653
Afroyim v. Rusk (1967), 2:654–655
Graham v. Richardson (1971), 2:654
Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez (1963), 2:654
Naturalization Act (1906), 2:653
Trop v. Dulles (1958), 2:654
See also Citizenship; Immigration law
Naturalization Act (1906), 2:653
Neal v. Delaware (1880), 3:1013
Near v. Minnesota (1931), 1:148–149, 161, 170; 2:429, 476, 655–656
See also First Amendment; Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); New York Times Co. v. United States (1971)
Nebbia v. New York (1934), 2:369
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart (1976), 1:129; 2:656–657
See also First Amendment; Near v. Minnesota (1931); New York Times Co. v. United States (1971)
Negative and positive liberties, 2:657–658
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1989), 2:657–658
Hilton v. City of Wheeling (2000), 2:657
See also Bill of Rights; United States Constitution
New Deal
Democratic Party, 1:267
New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985), 2:450, 658–659
See also Fourth Amendment; Gault, In re (1967); Rights of minors; Search; Search of student lockers
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964), 1:74, 122, 153, 162; 2:420, 560, 659–660; 3:1021
See also Actual malice; Chilling effect; First Amendment; Libel; Slander
New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 1:97, 129, 158, 170; 2:660*, 660–661; 3:997, 1054
Ellsberg and, 2:660
Nixon and, 2:665
Pentagon Papers, 2:411, 660–661
See also First Amendment; Nixon, Richard M.; Presidents and civil liberties
New York v. Burger (1987), 1:12
New York v. Ferber (1982), 1:50–51, 160; 2:661–662; 3:987
Broadrick v. Oklahoma (1973), 2:662
Miller v. California (1973), 2:661–662
Osborne v. Ohio (1990), 2:662
See also Child pornography; First Amendment; Miller v. California (1973); Overbreadth doctrine; Pornography
New York v. Quarles (1984), 2:633
Newberry v. United States (1921), 1:241
Newdow v. U.S. Congress (9th Cir. 2002), 1:308; 2:386
Nichols, Terry, 2:678–679
Nike, Inc. v. Kasky (2003), 2:593
1984 (Orwell, 1949), 2:682–683
Ninth Amendment, 1:84
Nix v. Williams (1984), 2:408, 633
Nixon, Richard M., 2:663*, 663–666
Committee on Un-American Activities, 2:665
Ellsberg and, 2:665
New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 2:665
Pentagon Papers, 2:665
United States v. Nixon (1974), 2:665
Watergate, 2:663–665
See also Burger, Warren Earl; Fourth Amendment; Sixth Amendment
Nixon v. Administrator of General Services (1977), 1:82
Nixon v. Fitzgerald (1982), 1:194
Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC (2000), 2:528, 662–663
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 2:662
See also Federal Election Campaign Act; Independent expenditures; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003)
Noise, freedom from, 2:666*, 666–667
Kovacs v. Cooper (1949), 2:667
Occupational Safety and Health Act (1970), 2:666
U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, 2:666
See also First Amendment; Police power

No-knock warrant, 2:667–668
Richards v. Wisconsin (1997), 2:668
Wilson v. Arkansas (1995), 2:667–668
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio (1961)
Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), 1:284; 2:545, 668–669
Dolan v. City of Tigard (1994), 1:284; 2:669
See also Property rights; Takings Clause
Northwest Ordinance, 2:669–670
Scott v. Sandford (1857), 2:670
See also Fundamental rights
Noto v. United States (1961), 1:118
Nude dancing, 2:670–671
Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc. (1991), 2:670
California v. LaRue (1972), 2:670
City of Erie v. Pap's A.M. (2000), 2:671
See also First Amendment

O

Oaths of office, 2:672*, 672–673
Bush v. Gore (2000), 2:673
Marbury v. Madison (1803), 2:673
Sumner v. Mata (1981), 2:673
See also Lincoln, Abraham; Presidents and civil liberties
Obscenity, 2:673–675
A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts (1966), 2:674
Dunlop v. United States (1896), 2:674
Fanny Hill case, 2:674
Jacobellis v. Ohio (1964), 2:675
Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents (1959), 2:674
Miller v. California (1973), 2:674
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), 1:674–675
Regina v. Hicklin (1868), 2:674
Roth v. United States (1957), 2:674
United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses" (1993), 2:674
See also Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment; Lady Chatterley's Lover; Pornography; Roth test
Occupational Safety and Health Act (1970), 2:666
O'Conner v. Donaldson (1975), 1:277
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:675–678, 676
Agostini v. Felton (1997), 1:15
beyond reasonable doubt, 1:78
bifurcation, 1:80
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond (2000), 1:175
City of Ladue v. Gilleo (1944), 1:176
O'Connor, Sandra Day (continued)
Coy v. Iowa (1988), 1:247
Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. (1991), 1:296
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), 2:434
Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc. (1993), 2:441
Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (1984), 2:447
Lawrence v. Texas (2003), 2:678
Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), 2:560
Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), 2:579
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), 2:580
Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1990), 2:615
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan (1982), 2:635
National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998), 2:635
physician-assisted suicide, 2:708
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), 2:677, 711 political patronage, 2:722
public-danger exception, 2:755
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:677
Romer v. Evans (1996), 2:677
Stanford Law Review, 2:676
stare decisis, 2:677
Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), 3:1015
See also Ginsburg, Ruth Bader; Rehnquist, William Hubbs
Ogden v. Sanders (1827), 1:232
Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1990), 2:528
Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association (1978), 1:72; 2:549
Oklahoma city bombing, 2:678–679
McVeigh and, 2: 678, 678–679
Nichols and, 2:678–679
September 11, 2001, 2:678
See also Patriot Act (2001)
Oliver v. United States (1984), 2:680
Olmstead v. L.C. (1999), 1:278
Olmstead v. United States (1928), 1:111, 117, 185, 306, 307, 344; 2:396, 526, 679–680
Katz v. United States (1967), 2:680
National Prohibition Act, 2:679
Omnibus Judgeship Act (1978), 1:145–146
On Lee v. United States (1952), 1:306
On Liberty (Mill, 1859), 2:563
On the Origin of Species (Darwin, 1859), 1:247, 336
On the Subjection of Women (Mill, 1869), 2:623
On the Waterfront (film), 2:640
Open-fields exception, 2:680–681
California v. Ciraolo (1986), 2:680
Maughn v. Bibb County (1998), 2:680–681

Open-fields exception (continued)
Oliver v. United States (1984), 2:680
United States v. Dunn (1987), 2:680
See also Fourth Amendment; Right to privacy; Search warrants
Oral arguments, United States Supreme Court, 3:973
Oregon v. Mitchell (1970), 3:960
Original intent. See Constitutional interpretation and civil liberties
Original jurisdiction, 2:681–682
Ex parte McCardle (1868), 2:681–682
Marbury v. Madison (1803), 2:681
Yakus v. United States (1944), 2:681–682
See also McCardle, Ex parte (1868); United States Constitution
Originalism, 2:704
Orwell, George, 2:682–684
See also Censorship; First Amendment; Movie treatments of civil liberties
Osborne v. Ohio (1990), 1:160; 3:993
New York v. Ferber (1982), 2:662
Overbreadth doctrine, 2:684–686
Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977), 2:685–686
Broadrick v. Oklahoma (1973), 2:685
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942), 2:685
Gooding v. Wilson (1972), 2:685
Thornhill v. Alabama (1940), 2:685
See also First Amendment
Overturning supreme court decisions, 2:686–687
Brown v. Board of Education (1954), 2:686
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), 2:686
Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), 2:686
Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co. (1895), 2:687
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:686
stare decisis, 2:686–687
Ox-Bow Incident (film), 2:639

P

Pacesetter Homes, Inc. v. Village of South Holland (1958), 1:102
Pacific Gas and Electric Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1986), 1:202
Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip (1991), 1:80
Palko v. Connecticut (1937), 1:142; 2:688
Cardozo, Benjamin N., 2:688
selective incorporation, 2:688
See also Bill of Rights; Incorporation doctrine; Selective incorporation
Palmer raids, 2:688–689
World War I, 2:689
See also Democratic Party; Department of Justice; Hoover, J. Edgar; Red scare
Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville (1972), 2:520
Parental rights, 2:689–690
Meyer v. Nebraska (1923), 2:689
Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), 2:690
Prince v. Massachusetts (1944), 2:690
Troxel v. Granville (2000), 2:690
Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), 2:690
See also Right to privacy
Parents Music Resource Center, 2:691–692
See also Censorship; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), 2:692–693
Douglas, William O., 1:288
Miller v. California (1973), 2:692–693
obscenity, 1:674–75
See also Pornography
Parker v. Levy (1974), 1:288
Parks, Rosa, 2:377*
Parsons, James B., 3:967*
Patriot Act (2001), 2:609, 693–696, 694
Democratic Party, 1:269
Korematsu v. United States (1944), 2:696
Scales v. United States (1961), 2:696
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Milligan, Ex parte (1866); Olmstead v. United States (1928)
Patterson v. Colorado (1907), 2:439
Patterson v. Texas (2002), 2:523
Payne v. Tennessee (1991), 1:140; 2:696–697; 3:992, 994
See also Capital punishment; Effective Death Penalty Act; Victim-impact statement
Pell v. Procunier (1974), 2:381
Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York (1978), 1:122; 2:697–698
See also Eminent domain; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Takings Clause
Penn, William, 2:699*, 699–700
See also First Amendment; Quakers
Pennhurst State School v. Halderman (1981)
disability rights, 1:277
Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon (1922), 2:544, 700–701; 3:1057
Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York (1978), 2:698
See also Eminent domain; Property rights; Takings Clause
Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977), 1:58–59; 2:701–702
Fourth Amendment, 2:701

Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977) (continued)
Knowles v. Iowa (1998), 2:702
Maryland v. Wilson (1997), 2:702
Terry v. Ohio (1968), 2:701–702
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Racial profiling; Search; Seizure
Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), 2:702–703
Brown v. Board of Education (1954), 2:702
Communist Party, 2:702
Reed dissent, 2:702
Warren decision, 2:702
See also Communists; Preemption; Smith Act Cases
Penry v. Lynaugh (1989), 1:52, 140, 256
Pentagon Papers, 1:158
New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 2:411, 660–661
Nixon, Richard M., 2:665
Pentagon Papers case, New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 1:94
People v. Abrahams (1976), 1:102
People v. Defore (1926), 2:590
People v. Kevorkian (2001), 2:529
People v. Larry Flynt (film), 2:639
Perez v. Brownell (1958), 1:172
Perry, Rick, 1:282*
Personhood, 2:703–705
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990), 2:704
Ex parte Quirin (1942), 2:703
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti (1978), 2:703 originalism and, 2:704
Reid v. Covert (1956), 2:704
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:703, 704
Scott v. Sandford (1857), 2:704
United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez (1990), 2:703
See also Cloning human beings; Rights of aliens; Transgender legal issues, United States
Petition of Right, 2:705–707, 706
Charles I, England, 2:705–706, 706
See also Bill of Rights; Blackstone, William; English Bill of Rights (1689)
Pettibone v. United States (1893)
Debs, In re and, 1:261
Philadelphia Spelling Book, 1:236
Physician-assisted suicide, 2:707–708
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990), 2:707
Kevorkian, Jack, 2:707
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:708
Quinlan, In re (1976), 2:707
Physician-assisted suicide (continued)
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:707
Vacco v. Quill (1997), 2:708
Washington state and, 2:707
Washington v. Glucksberg (1997), 2:707–708
See also Cloning human beings; Right to die
Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), 2:352, 708–709; 3:1039
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:709
McReynolds decision, 2:709
parental rights, 2:690
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:709
See also Due process of law; Education; Family rights; Right to privacy
Pierce v. United States (1920), 1:117
Pilgrims, 2:603–604
Piss Christ (Serrano), 1:46–47
Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations (1973), 1:81, 240
Plain-sight doctrine, 2:709–710
Arizona v. Hicks (1987), 2:710
Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971), 2:710
Hester v. United States (1924), 2:709
Ker v. California (1963), 2:710
Texas v. Brown (1983), 2:710
United States v. Lee (1927), 2:709
See also Arizona v. Evans (1995); Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Search; Seizure
Plako v. Connecticut (1937), 1:286
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth (1976), 2:352
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), 1:313; 2:458, 528, 710–712; 3:1025
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1983), 2:711
O'Connor and, 2:677, 711
overturning supreme court decisions, 2:686
Thornburg v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (1986), 2:711
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989), 2:711
See also Griswold v. Connecticut (1965); Right to privacy; Roe v. Wade (1973)
Plea bargaining, 2:712–714, 713
Bordenkircher v. Hayes (1978), 2:713
Brady v. United States (1970), 2:712 criticisms of, 2:713 reforms, 2:713–714
Santobello v. New York (1971), 2:712–713
See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Sixth Amendment

Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), 1:126, 188–189; 2:439, 532; 3:1000 democracy and, 1:266
overturning supreme court decisions, 2:686
Plyler v. Doe (1982), 1:98; 3:838
Poe v. Ullman (1961), 1:89
Pointer v. Texas (1965), 1:209
Points of Rebellion (Douglas, 1969), 1:289
Police brutality, 2:714–715
See also Bivens and Section 1983 actions; Fourth Amendment; Police, restrictions on Police power, 2:715–716
Blackstone and, 2:716
delegation doctrine, 2:716
See also Due process of law; Takings Clause
Police, restrictions on, 2:717–720
constitutional regulation, 2:717–719
First Amendment and, 2:719–720
See also Due process of law; Exclusionary rule; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Immunity; Miranda v. Arizona (1966); Search; Search warrants; Seizure; Sixth Amendment
Political parties, 2:720–722
Smith v. Allwright (1944), 2:721
See also Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission (1996); First Amendment
Political patronage, 2:722–723
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:722
See also First Amendment
Political-question doctrine, 2:723–724
See also Baker v. Carr (1962); United States Constitution
Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co. (1895), 2:410
overturning supreme court decisions, 2:687
Polygamy, 2:724–726, 725
See also Free Exercise Clause; Mormons
Pornography, 2:726–728
Miller v. California (1973), 2:727
See also Child pornography; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment; Lady Chatterley's Lover; New York v. Ferber (1982); Obscenity
Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico (1986), 1:150; 2:728; 3:1004
See also Commercial speech; First Amendment
Posse comitatus, 2:728–729
See also Civilian control of military; Police power
Posse Comitatus Act (1878), 2:621
Posusta v. United States (1961), 2:437
Powell, Lewis F., 2:692–693
Powell v. Alabama (1932), 1:77; 2:729–730
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 2:730
See also Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972); Hurtado v. California (1884); Right to counsel
Powers v. Ohio (1991), 1:74; 2:528
Prayer in schools, 2:730–732, 731
See also Engel v. Vitale (1962); Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Lee v. Weisman (1992); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943)
Precedent, 2:732–734
followed, 2:733 not followed, 2:733–734
See also United States Constitution
Preemption, 2:734–735
See also United States Constitution
Preferred-freedoms doctrine, 2:735–737
See also Bill of Rights; Carolene Products, Footnote 4 (1938); First Amendment; Fundamental rights; Strict scrutiny
President and civil liberties, 2:737–739
Schenck v. United States (1919), 2:737–738
See also Civil War and civil liberties; Espionage Act (1917); McCardle, Ex parte (1868); Patriot Act (2001); World War I
Presidential debates, 2:740–741
Roe v. Wade (1973), 2:740
See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976); First Amendment
Presumed Innocent (film), 2:639
Preventive detention, 2:741–743, 742
See also Bail, right to; Eighth Amendment; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Habeas corpus; Immigration law; Rasul v. Bush (2004)
Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842), 1:238, 315
Prince v. Massachusetts (1944), 2:555
parental rights, 2:690
Prison Litigation Reform Act (1996), 2:743–744
See also In Forma Pauperis Petition; Prisoners' rights
Prisoners' rights, 2:744–745
See also In Forma Pauperis Petition; Prison Litigation Reform Act
Probation, 2:745–748, 746
See also Prisoners' rights
Probationer rights, 2:748*, 748–749
See also Prisoners' rights
Procedural due process. See Due process of law
Proffitt v. Florida (1976), 1:139
Prohibition. See Volstead Act

Property rights, 2:749–751
See also Bill of Rights; Due process of law; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fourteenth Amendment; Takings Clause
Proportionality of sentences, 2:751–753
See also Capital punishment; Cruel and unusual punishments; Effective Death Penalty Act; Eighth Amendment
Prosecutorial misconduct, 2:753–754
See also Brady rule; Due process of law; Racial profiling
Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation Act (1977), 1:160
Providence Bank v. Billings (1830), 1:155
Public-danger exception, 2:754–755
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:755
See also Exclusionary rule; Miranda v. Arizona (1966); Search; Seizure
Public defenders, 2:755–757, 756
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 2:756
See also Right to counsel; Sixth Amendment
Public forum, 2:757–758
See also Democracy and civil liberties; First Amendment; Strict scrutiny
Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act (1969), 1:169–170
Public Health Service Act, 3:765
Publicity Act (1910), 2:758
See also Buckley v. Valeo (1976); Federal Election Campaign Act; Tillman Act (1907)
Pullman Palace Railroad Company
Debs, In re (1895), 1:260–261
Debs and, 1:259
Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co. (1871), 1:316
Pure-speech doctrine, 2:758–760
Miller v. California (1973), 2:759
Schenck v. United States (1919), 2:759
See also Democracy and civil liberties; First Amendment; Palko v. Connecticut (1937); Whitney v. California (1927)
Putney debates, 2:760–762
See also English roots of civil liberties; Locke, John; Natural law; Natural rights

Q

Quaker City Cab v. Pennsylvania (1928), 1:117
Quakers, 2:699; 3:763–764, 764
Penn and, 2:699
See also Christian roots of civil liberties; Civil disobedience
Quarantines, 3:764–766, 765
See also Bill of Rights; First Amendment; Police power
Quinlan, In re (1976), 3:766–767, 767
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:767
See also Right to die; Right to privacy
Quirin, Ex parte (1942), 3:767–768
See also Milligan, Ex parte (1866); Patriot Act (2001)

R

R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992), 1:74, 97; 2:374, 375, 431, 444–446; 3:769, 1006, 1038
See also First Amendment; Hate crimes; Hate speech; Texas v. Johnson (1989); Virginia v. Black (2003)
Racial profiling, 3:770–772, 771
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Roadblocks; Search; Seizure; Terry v. Ohio (1968)
Railway Labor Act (1926), 2:539
Rakas v. Illinois (1978), 1:59
Randolph, Edmund, 1:53*
Random drug testing, 3:772–773
See also Board of Education v. Earls (2002); Fourth Amendment; Search; Seizure
Rankin v. McPherson (1987), 3:773–774
Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:773
See also First Amendment
Rasul v. Bush (2004), 1:213; 2:434, 626; 3:774–775
See also Habeas corpus; Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004); Quirin, Ex parte (1942)
Rational-basis test, 3:775–776
See also Romer v. Evans (1996); San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973); Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Ratliff v. Beale (Miss. 1896), 2:368
Reagan, Ronald, 2:676*
Reason and Revolution (Marcuse, 1941), 2:591
Red baiting, 3:777–778
See also Communists; Dennis v. United States (1951); House Un-American Activities Committee; McCarthy, Joseph; McCarthyism; Yates v. United States (1957)
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1969), 2:349; 3:778–779
See also First Amendment
Red scare, 3:779–780
See also Dennis v. United States (1951); Palmer raids; Red baiting
Reed, Stanley F., 2:702
Reed v. Reed (1971), 1:129, 144, 185; 2:407
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978), 2:598
Regina v. Hicklin (1868), 1:207
obscenity, 2:674
Rehabilitation Act (1973), 1:277

Rehnquist, William Hubbs, 3:780–782
death penalty for mentally retarded, 1:256
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1985), 1:273
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:274
Dolan v. City of Tigard (1998), 1:284
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 3:781
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 3:781
Payne v. Tennessee (1991), 2:697
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:782
See also Capital punishment; Fourteenth Amendment; Prisoners' rights
Reid v. Covert (1956), 2:704
Release-time program, 3:782–784
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 3:783
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Prayer in schools; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943); Zorach v. Clauson (1952)
Religious Freedom Restoration Act (1993), 1:173–174; 3:784–785
See also City of Boerne v. Flores (1997); Compelling governmental interest; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990); Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Strict scrutiny
Religious holidays, 3:785–787
See also County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989); Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Lynch v. Donnelly (1984)
Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (2000), 3:787–788
See also City of Boerne v. Flores (1997); Free Exercise Clause; Land use; Zoning
Religious symbols and displays, 3:788–790
See also County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989); Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)
Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997), 1:49, 184; 2:358, 359; 3:790–791, 1011
Communications Decency Act (1996), 3:790–791
See also Censorship; Chilling effect; First Amendment
Reply, right to, 3:791–792
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974), 3:791–792
See also Fairness doctrine; First Amendment
Republica v. Oswald (1778), 1:147
Republican Party, 3:792–795, 793
See also Democratic Party; Minor political parties; Political parties
Republican Party of Minnesota v. White (2002), 3:795–796
See also First Amendment
Reynolds v. Simms (1964), 1:66, 199; 3:1021
Reynolds v. United States (1879), 2:402, 594; 3:796, 1014
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause
Richards v. Wisconsin (1997), 2:668
Richardson v. Ramirez (1974), 3:796–797
See also Felon disenfranchisement; First Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment
Richardson v. United States (1984), 1:286
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia (1980), 1:129; 2:381
Right of confrontation, 3:798–799
See also Adversarial versus inquisitorial legal systems; Confrontation Clause; Hearsay
Right of school boards to ban books, 3:800–801
See also Board of Education v. Pico (1982); Censorship; First Amendment
Right of unmarried people to live together, 3:801–802
See also Family rights; Moore v. City of East Cleveland (1977); Right to privacy; Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974)
Right to appeal, 3:802–805, 803
See also Due process of law; Harmless error; United States Supreme Court
Right to counsel, 3:805–807
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 3:806
See also Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972); Powell v. Alabama (1932); Sixth Amendment
Right to die, 3:807*, 807–808
See also Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990); Right to privacy; Washington v. Glucksberg (1997)
Right to education, 3:808–809
See also San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973); Suspect classifications
Right to petition, 3:809–811
See also English roots of civil liberties; First Amendment; Magna Carta
Right to privacy, 3:811–813
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:812
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:812
See also Birth control and contraception; Bowers v. Hardwick (1986); Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Fourth Amendment; Katz v. United States (1967); Lawrence v. Texas (2003); Olmstead v. United States (1928); Right to die; Wiretapping
Right to revolution principle
Declaration of Independence, 1:262–263
Right to travel, 3:813–815
See also First Amendment; Shapiro v. Thompson (1969); Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)

Right to vote, 3:815–818, 816
See also Felon disenfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; First Amendment; Richardson v. Ramirez (1974); Twenty-sixth Amendment
Rights of aliens, 3:818–820
See also Due process of law; Immigration law
Rights of defendants in criminal cases
United States court system, 3:970
Rights of minors, 3:820–821
See also Gault, In re (1967); Juvenile justice system; Parental rights; Search of student lockers; Student rights; Student searches
Rights of witnesses, 3:821–822
See also Bill of Rights; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; First Amendment; Immunity; Payne v. Tennessee (1991)
Ring v. Arizona (2002), 1:40; 3:822–823
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 3:823
See also Capital punishment; Effective Death Penalty Act; Gregg v. Georgia (1976)
Ripeness, 3:823–824
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:824
See also Standing
Rivera, Diego, 3:824–825
See also Censorship; First Amendment
Road to Wigan Pier (Orwell, 1937), 2:682
Roadblocks, 3:825–826, 826
See also Balancing test; Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Search; Seizure
Robbins v. California (1981), 1:59
Roberts v. Louisiana (1976), 1:139
Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees (1984), 1:112
Robinson v. California (1962), 1:250, 303
RoboCop (film), 2:639
Rochin v. California (1952), 3:826–827
due process of law, 1:293
See also Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Schmerber v. California (1966)
Rock the Cradle (film), 2:640
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:827–831, 828
Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897), 1:26
American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 1:29
birth control and contraception, 1:88–89
Blackmun, Harry A., 1:97–98; 3:828–829
Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic (1993), 1:120
Burger and, 1:129
Carter and, 1:146 civil disobedience and, 1:181 civil liberties and, 1:185
Comstock Acts, 1:208
Roe v. Wade (1973) (continued)
Doe v. Bolton (1973), 1:283–284
Douglas and, 1:288
due process of law, 1:294
Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), 1:305
Ely and, 1:312–313
family rights, 2:352
fundamental rights, 2:411
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 2:428–429
Hodgson v. Minnesota (1990), 2:458
Kennedy, Anthony M., 2:528
Lochner v. New York (1905), 2:572
Maher v. Roe (1977), 2:584–585
Marshall and, 2:598
movie treatments of civil liberties, 2:640
natural rights, 2:652
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:677
overturning supreme court decisions, 2:686
personhood and, 2:703, 704
physician-assisted suicide, 2:707
Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), 2:709
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), 2:710–712 precedent, 2:733
presidential debates, 2:740
Rehnquist, William Hubbs, 3:782
right to privacy, 3:812
ripeness, 3:824
Souter and, 3:884
substantive due process, 3:917
Thornburg v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (1986), 3:940–941
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989), 3:1024
White and, 3:1029
Roe v. Wade (film), 2:640
Romer v. Evans (1996), 1:29; 2:458, 528; 3:831–832
O'Connor and, 2:677
See also Bowers v. Hardwick (1986); Lawrence v. Texas (2003); Rational-basis test; Strict scrutiny; Transgender legal issues, United States
Roosevelt, Franklin D., 1:267–268, 268
Rosenberg, Ethel and Julius, 3:832–833, 833
See also Communists; Espionage Act (1917); Treason
Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995), 1:105; 2:423, 528, 575, 586; 3:834, 1051
See also Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Free Exercise Clause; Separation of church and state; Student rights
Rosenfeld v. New Jersey (1972), 1:198

Ross v. Oklahoma (1988), 1:258
Rostker v. Goldberg (1981), 3:834–835
  See also First Amendment; Strict scrutiny
Roth test, 2:625; 3:835–836
  Miller v. California (1973), 3:836
  See also Censorship; First Amendment; Obscenity; Pornography
Roth v. United States (1957), 1:61, 94, 208; 2:541, 624, 625; 3:1021
  Douglas, William O., 1:288
  obscenity, 2:674
Rudolph, 1:340
Ruiz v. Hull (1998), 1:321
Rummel v. Estelle (1980), 1:250, 303, 342
Rumsfeld v. Padilla (2004), 1:213; 2:434
Rust v. Sullivan (1991), 2:557; 3:836–837
  See also First Amendment; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992); Right to privacy; Roe v. Wade (1973)

S

Sable Communications of California, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission (1989), 1:149; 2:359
Saenz v. Roe (1999), 1:239; 2:395
Sale v. Haitian Centers Council (1993), 1:98
San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973), 1:299; 2:598–599; 3:838–839
  Plyler v. Doe (1982), 3:838
  See also Education; Fundamental rights; Suspect classifications
Sanger, Margaret, 1:88*
Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad. Co. (1886), 1:239
Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe (2000), 2:554; 3:839*, 839–840
Santobello v. New York (1971), 2:712–713
Santosky v. Kramer (1982), 2:352
Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania (2003), 1:286; 3:840–841
  See also Capital punishment; Double jeopardy; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination
Saucier v. Katz (2001), 1:56
Scales v. United States (1961), 2:696; 3:841
  Patriot Act (2001), 2:696
  See also Communists; Dennis v. United States (1951); First Amendment; Smith Act cases Scalia, Antonin G., 3:842–843
  death penalty for mentally retarded, 1:256
  See also Conservatism
Schaefer v. United States (1920), 1:117
Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:843–844
  bad-tendency test, 1:61
  book banning, 1:106
  Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:118; 3:844
  civilian control of military, 1:190
  clear and present danger, 1:191
  communists, 1:204
  Espionage Act (1917), 1:329
  First Amendment, 2:378
  Gitlow v. New York (1925), 3:844
  Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917), 2:602 presidents and civil liberties, 2:737–738
  pure-speech doctrine, 2:759
  Rankin v. McPherson (1987), 3:773
  Sedition Act (1918), 3:856
  Smith Act cases, 3:880
  summary judgment, 3:919
  Whitney v. California (1927), 3:1030
  Yates v. United States (1957), 3:1047
  See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Brandeis, Louis Dembitz
Schlup v. Delo (1955), 3:844–845
  See also Capital punishment; Habeas corpus
Schmerber v. California (1966), 3:845–846
  due process of law, 1:293
  See also Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Rochin v. California (1952)
Schneckloth v. Bustamonte (1973), 1:132
Schneider v. Rusk (1964), 1:288
Schneider v. State (1939), 2:385, 553
School desegregation, 1:298–299
School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball (1985), 1:15
Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures (Eddy, 1875), 1:166
Scopes v. State of Tennessee (1927), 1:124, 248, 337; 3:846–848, 847
  See also Creation science; Darrow, Clarence; Evolution; Student rights
Scott v. Illinois (1979), 1:21
Scott v. Sandford (1857), 1:26, 157, 171, 223, 238, 315; 2:704
  Northwest Ordinance, 2:670
  personhood, 2:704
Search, 3:848–849
  See also Fourth Amendment; Katz v. United States (1967); Olmstead v. United States (1928)
Search incident to arrest, 3:849–850
  Weeks v. United States (1914), 3:849
  See also Exclusionary rule; Search
Search of student lockers, 3:850–852, 851
  See also Student rights; Student searches

Search warrants, 3:852–854
Weeks v. United States (1914), 3:852
Second Amendment, 1:83; 3:854–855
See also National Firearms Act (1934)
Second Treatise of Government, 2:566, 574
Section 1983 actions. See Bivens and Section 1983 actions
Sedition Act (1918), 2:621; 3:855–857
Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:856
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Bad-tendency test; Clear and present danger; Debs, Eugene Victor; Espionage Act (1917); Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.
Seditious libel, 3:857–858
See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Beauharnais v. Illinois (1952); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Zenger, John Peter
See v. City of Seattle (1967), 1:11
Seeger v. United States (1965), 1:217
Seizure, 3:858–859
See also Due process of law; Search; Takings Clause
Selective incorporation, 3:859–860
Gitlow v. New York (1925), 3:859
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:860
Palko v. Connecticut (1937), 2:688
See also Adamson v. California (1947); Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833); Duncan v. Louisiana (1968); Incorporation doctrine
Self-incrimination. See Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination
Sell v. United States (2003), 3:861
See also Due process of law
Separation of church and state, 3:861–863
Douglas and, 1:288
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 3:862
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)
September 11, 2001, 1:152, 172, 190, 213, 220, 227; 2:622, 626
Democratic Party, 1:269
Oklahoma city bombing, 2:678
Patriot Act (2001), 2:693–696
Serfass v. United States (1975), 1:286
Serrano, Andres, 1:46–47
Serrano v. Priest (1971), 1:299
Service v. Dulles (1957), 3:1024
"Seven dirty words," 3:863–864
Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978), 3:863–864
See also Obscenity
Seventeenth Amendment, 3:864–865
See also Constitutional amendments
Seventh Amendment, 1:84; 3:865–867
See also Jury size; Trial by jury
Sexual harassment, 3:867–869, 868
See also Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc. (1993)
Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association (1988), 2:549
Shapiro v. Thompson (1969), 1:122; 3:869–870
See also Compelling governmental interest; Rational-basis test; Right to travel; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications
Shaw v. Reno (1993), 1:67
Shawshank Redemption (film), 2:639
Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), 1:131; 2:576, 597; 3:1000
Shelton v. Tucker (1960), 2:553
Sheppard v. Maxwell (1966), 1:64, 333; 3:870–871
See also Due process of law; First Amendment
Sherbert v. Verner (1963), 1:173, 317; 2:380, 403, 585; 3:871–872
See also Abington School District v. Schempp (1963); Compelling governmental interest; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990)
Silverman v. United States (1961), 2:397, 526
Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States (1920), 2:408, 590
Simpson, O. J., 1:64*
Sixth Amendment, 1:83–84; 3:872–875, 874
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 3:875
See also Bill of Rights; Right of confrontation; Right to counsel; Speedy trial, right to; Trial by jury
Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942), 1:88, 127, 335; 2:593; 3:875–877, 876
due process of law, 1:294
Slander, 3:877–878
See also Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942); Libel; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964)
Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), 1:26, 52, 84; 2:364, 395; 3:878–879
See also Citizenship; Fourteenth Amendment
Smith Act (1940)
Dennis v. United States (1951), 1:269
Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), 2:702
Smith Act cases, 3:879–881
Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:880
See also Abrams v. United States (1919); Communists; Dennis v. United States (1951)
Smith v. Allwright (1944), 2:370, 597, 721
Smith v. Collin (1978), 3:881–882
See also Hate speech; Symbolic speech

Smith v. Doe (2003), 1:343
Smith v. Goguen (1974), 1:97
Smith v. Maryland (1979), 2:526
Social Security, 1:276
Socialist Party of America, 1:258
Solem v. Helm (1983), 1:303, 341
Solicitor general, 3:882–883, 883
See also Attorney general; Department of Justice
Somerset case (1772), 1:315
Sonny Bono Copyright Term Extension Act (1998), 1:237
Soon Hing v. Crowley (1885), 1:101
Souter, David H., 3:883–884
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:884
See also Bush, George H.W.; Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992)
South Carolina v. Gathers (1989), 2:697; 3:991, 992
South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966), 2:371, 527
Spano v. New York (1959), 2:373
Spartan's Industries, Inc. v. Oklahoma City (Okla.1972), 1:102
Special-needs doctrine. See Fourth Amendment
Speedy trial, right to, 3:885
See also Arraignment; Bail, right to; Fundamental rights; Right of confrontation; Right to counsel; Subpoena; Trial by jury
Spence v. Washington (1974), 2:383
United States v. Eichman (1990), 3:976–977
Spirit of the Laws, The (Montesquieu, 1748), 2:563, 566, 635; 3:965
Standing, 3:885–886
See also Judicial review; Ripeness
Stanford Law Review, 2:676
Stanford v. Kentucky (1989), 1:140, 250; 2:522–523
Stanley v. Georgia (1969), 3:886–887, 993
Miller v. California (1973), 3:886
See also Obscenity; Right to privacy
Star Chamber (film), 2:639
Stare decisis, 1:274; 2:732–734
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:274
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:677
overturning supreme court decisions, 2:686–687
State action, 3:887–888
See also Bill of Rights; Fourteenth Amendment
State bills of rights, 3:888–890
See also Bill of Rights; Federalism; Madison, James; State constitutional rights; Virginia Declaration of Rights
State constitutional rights, 3:890–891
See also Bill of Rights; Incorporation doctrine; State bills of rights
State courts, 3:891–893
See also Federalism; State constitutional rights
State courts of last resort
United States court system, 3:969–970
State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell (2003), 1:80
State of Utah v. Schreuder (Utah 1986), 1:343
Statute of limitations, 3:893–894
See also Due process of law
Stenberg v. Carhart (2000), 2:528
Stevens, John Paul, 3:894–895
See also Brennan, William J., Jr.; Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003); Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992)
Stewart, Potter, 3:895–897
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:896
See also Burger, Warren Earl; Obscenity; Pornography
Stone v. Graham (1980), 3:897–898
See also Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Ten Commandments, posting
Stone, Harlan Fiske, 3:898–900, 899
See also Carolene Products, Footnote 4 (1938)
Stone v. Mississippi (1880), 1:233
Stone v. Powell (1976), 2:432
Stop-and-frisk, 3:900–901, 901
See also Fourth Amendment; Terry v. Ohio (1968)
Story, Joseph, 3:902*, 902–903
See also Federalism; Madison, James; Marshall, John
Story of My Life, The (Darrow, 1932), 1:255
Strauder v. West Virginia (1880), 1:73
Street v. New York (1969), 2:383
Strength to Love, 2:533
Strickland v. Washington (1984), 3:903–904, 1032
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 3:903
See also Ineffective assistance of counsel; Right to counsel
Strict scrutiny, 3:904–906
See also Carolene Products, Footnote 4 (1938); Due process of law; Korematsu v. United States (1944); Marshall, John; Rational-basis test; Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942)
Stride Toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story, 2:533
Strikes and arbitration, 3:906–908, 907
See also Labor union rights
Stromberg v. California (1931), 3:908–909
See also First Amendment; Flag burning; Symbolic speech
Student newspapers, 3:909–910
See also First Amendment; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988); Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)

Student rights, 3:910–913, 911
See also Abington School District v. Schempp (1963); Bethel School District v. Fraser (1986); Engel v. Vitale (1962); Flag salute; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988); Lee v. Weisman (1992); Meyer v. Nebraska (1923); Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925); Prayer in schools; Random drug testing; Search of student lockers; Student newspapers; Student searches; Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)
Student searches, 3:913–914
See also Board of Education v. Earls (2002); Random drug testing; Vernonia School District v. Acton (1995)
Sturges v. Crowninshield (1819), 1:232
Subpoena, 3:914–916
See also Congressional investigations; Contempt powers; Immunity
Substantive due process, 3:916–918
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:917
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:917
See also Due process of law; Lochner v. New York (1905); Right to privacy; Slaughterhouse Cases (1873)
Substantive due process of law, 1:293–294
Subversive Activities Control Board, 2:606
Subversive speech, 3:918–919
See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Clear and present danger; Espionage Act (1917); Patriot Act (2001); Schenck v. United States (1919); Sedition Act (1918); Smith Act cases
Sugarman v. Dougall (1973), 1:98
Suicide. See Physician-assisted suicide; Right to die
Summary judgment, 3:919–920
Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:919
See also Seventh Amendment
Summit Health, Ltd. v. Pinhas (1991), 1:96
Sumner v. Mata (1981), 2:673
Sunday-closing laws, 1:100–102
See also Blue laws; First Amendment
Suspect classifications, 3:921–922
See also Fundamental rights; Intermediate-level scrutiny; Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942); Strict scrutiny
Sutton v. United Air Lines, Inc. (1999), 1:278
Swain v. Alabama (1965), 3:1008
Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education (1971), 1:129, 299
Sweatt v. Painter (1950), 2:597; 3:1000
Sweet, Ossian, 1:255
Sweezy v. New Hampshire (1957), 3:1024
Swift v. Tyson (1842), 2:650
Symbolic speech, 1:289; 3:922–924
See also First Amendment; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992); Texas v. Johnson (1989); Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969)

T

Taft, William Howard, 3:925–926, 926
See also Judicial review; Olmstead v. United States (1928)
Taft-Hartley Act (1947), 2:540
Takings Clause, 3:926–928
Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon (1922), 2:700–701
See also Eminent domain; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Selective incorporation
Talk Radio (film), 2:639
Taney, Roger Brooke, 3:928–930, 929
See also Civil War and civil liberties
Taxation and civil liberties, 3:930–933
See also Due process of law; Establishment Clause; Exclusionary rule; Fundamental rights; Standing
Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic (1984), 1:24
Telephone Consumer Protection Act (1991), 2:550
Tempting of America (Bork, 1990), 1:136
Ten Commandments, posting, 3:933–935
See also Establishment Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971); Religious symbols and displays
Tennessee v. Lane (2004), 1:278
Tenth Amendment, 1:84
Terminiello v. Chicago (1949), 1:288
Terrett v. Taylor (1815), 1:155
Terry v. Ohio (1968), 1:20, 56; 2:388, 630; 3:935–936
Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977), 2:701–702
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio (1961)
Texas v. Brown (1983), 2:710
Texas v. Johnson (1989), 1:29, 97, 122, 206; 2:375, 383, 384, 528, 546; 3:936–937
See also Flag burning; Symbolic speech; United States v. Eichman (1990)
Theory and Practice of Oligarchical Collectivism, The (Goldstein), 2:683
Third Amendment, 1:83; 3:937–938
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 3:938
See also Bill of Rights
Thomas, Clarence, 3:938–940, 939
See also Rehnquist, William Hubbs; Scalia, Antonin G.
Thomas Cusack Co. v. City of Chicago (1917), 1:86
Thompson v. Oklahoma (1988), 2:522
Thoreau, Henry David, 1:179, 181, 181–182; 2:532

Thornburg v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (1986), 2:711; 3:940–941
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:940–941
See also Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992)
Thornburg v. Gingles (1986), 1:67
Thornhill v. Alabama (1940), 2:641
overbreadth doctrine, 2:685
Three-strikes laws, 3:941–942
See also Cruel and unusual punishments; Eighth Amendment; Ewing v. California (2003)
Tileston v. Ullman (1943), 1:89
Tillman Act (1907), 3:942–944, 943
See also McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003)
Tilton v. Richardson (1971), 1:17; 2:559
Time, place, and manner restrictions, 3:944–945
See also Adderley v. Florida (1966); First Amendment; Pure-speech doctrine; Symbolic speech
Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago (1961), 1:147
Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party (1997), 3:945–946
See also First Amendment; Minor political parties; Political parties
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969), 1:76; 2:379, 392, 406; 3:946–947, 997
See also Student rights; Symbolic speech; United States v. O'Brien (1968)
Tison v. Arizona (1987), 1:139, 250
To Kill a Mockingbird (film), 2:639
Tolerance, 3:947–948
See also First Amendment
Torture, 3:948–950, 949
See also Eighth Amendment; Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Miranda v. Arizona (1966)
Totality-of-circumstances test, 3:950–951
See also Fourth Amendment; Illinois v. Gates (1983)
Townsend v. Sain (1963), 2:453
Trademark. See Copyright, patent, and trademark Transgender legal issues, United States, 3:951–954
See also Marriage, right to; Sexual harassment
Transportation Insurance Co. v. Moriel (1994), 1:80
Treason, 3:954–956
See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798)
Treatises on Civil Government (Locke, 1689), 2:573, 649
Trial by jury, 3:956–957
See also Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination; Fourth Amendment; Grand jury; Jury size; Jury unanimity
Trial courts, United States court system, 3:968–969
Trop v. Dulles (1958), 1:140, 250, 303, 339, 340; 2:367; 3:957–958
naturalization, 2:654
See also Citizenship; Cruel and unusual punishments; Evolving standards of decency
Tropic of Cancer. See Miller v. California (1973); Obscenity; Roth test
Troxel v. Granville (2000), 2:521, 636
parental rights, 2:690
Truman, Harry S, 1:268
Truong Dinh Hung v. United States (1978), 1:63
Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819), 1:155, 232; 2:595–596; 3:958–959
See also Contract, freedom of; Contracts Clause; Property rights
Twelve Angry Men (film), 2:639
Twentieth Century Music Corp. v. Aiken (1975), 1:235
Twenty-sixth Amendment, 3:959–960
Oregon v. Mitchell (1970), 3:960
See also Nixon, Richard M.; Vietnam War
Twining v. New Jersey (1908), 2:395
Two-thirds rule, Democratic Party, 1:267
TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. (1993), 1:81
Tyranny of majority, 1:265; 3:960–962
See also Bill of Rights; Ely, John Hart; United States Constitution

U

Unions
Debs, In re (1895), 1:260–261
Debs and, 1:258–260
United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947), 2:442
United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers (1974), 2:442
United States Constitution, 3:963–966, 964
democracy and civil liberties, 1:265–266
drafting, 3:963–964
philosophical foundations, 3:964–965
provisions, 3:965–966
See also Bill of Rights; Constitutional amendments; Constitutionalism; Judicial review
United States court system, 3:966–971, 967
federal, 3:966–968, 967
federal district courts, 3:968
intermediate appellate courts, 3:969 judges selection, 3:970–971
rights of defendants in criminal cases, 3:970
state, 3:968–970
state courts of last resort, 3:969–970

United States court system (continued)
trial courts, 3:968–969
United States Courts of Appeals, 3:968
United States Supreme Court, 3:967–968
See also Judicial review
United States Courts of Appeals, 3:968
United States Department of Agriculture v. United Foods, Inc. (2001), 2:528
United States ex rel. Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson (1921), 1:329
United States ex rel. Negron v. New York (2d Cir. 1970), 1:320
United States Supreme Court, 3:803*, 967–968; 971–974, 972
briefs, 3:973
caseload, 3:972–973
concurring opinions, 3:973–974 conferences, 3:973 court voting, 3:973 dissenting opinions, 3:973–974
judicial review, 3:971
jurisdiction, 3:971–972
justices appointment, 3:971 majority opinions, 3:973–974 oral arguments, 3:973
writs of certiorari, 3:972
See also United States court system
United States Trust Co. v. New Jersey (1977), 1:233
United States v. Albarado (1974), 1:20
United States v. American Library Association, Inc. (2003), 3:974–975
See also First Amendment; National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998); Pornography
United States v. Arvizu (2002), 3:1017
United States v. Bagley (1985), 1:115
United States v. Biswell (1972), 1:12
United States v. Brown (1965), 1:82
United States v. Caicedo- Guarnizo (1984), 1:110
United States v. Calandra (1974), 2:424
United States v. Caldwell (1972), 2:424
United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), 1:35, 143–144, 157, 312; 2:553; 3:1021
due process of law, 1:294
United States v. Carroll Towing Co. (1947), 1:270
United States v. Causby (1946), 1:316
United States v. Ceccolini (1984), 2:408
United States v. Chadwick (1977), 1:59
United States v. Cruikshank (1876), 3:1013
United States v. Davis (1973), 1:19
United States v. Dennis (1950), 2:436, 438
United States v. Drayton (2002), 1:132; 3:975–976
See also Fourth Amendment; Search; Search warrants
United States v. Dunn (1987), 2:680
United States v. E.C. Knight Co. (1895), 2:409
United States v. Edwards (1974), 1:20
United States v. Eichman (1990), 3:976–977
See also First Amendment; Symbolic speech; Texas v. Johnson (1989)
United States v. Espinoza-Seanez (1988), 1:110
United States v. Jackson (2003), 3:1036
United States v. Jacobsen (1984), 2:398
United States v. Johns (1985), 1:145
United States v. Kennerley (1913), 2:437
United States v. Kirschenblatt (1926), 2:437; 3:977–978
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 3:978
United States v. Sherman (1948), 3:978
United States v. Wexler (1935), 3:978
See also Dennis v. United States (1951); Fourth Amendment; Hand, Learned; Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917); Search warrants
United States v. Kokinda (1990), 2:528
United States v. Lanza (1922), 1:285
United States v. Lee (1927), 2:709
United States v. Lee (1982), 1:36
United States v. Leon (1984), 2:398, 421, 590; 3:978–979
See also Exclusionary rule; Good faith exception; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Search warrants
United States v. Levine (1936), 2:437
United States v. Lopez (1995), 2:413
United States v. Lovett (1946), 1:82
United States v. Macintosh (1931)
Douglas decision, 1:288
United States v. Mandujano (1976), 2:424
United States v. Martinez-Fuerte (1976), 1:109, 175
United States v. McGuire (2003), 3:1037
United States v. Mink (1973), 1:346
United States v. Morrison (2000), 2:416; 3:1001
United States v. Morton Salt Co. (1950), 2:423
United States v. National Treasury Employees Union (1995), 3:979–980
See also First Amendment
United States v. Nixon (1974), 1:129; 2:665
United States v. O'Brien (1968), 1:70, 174, 290; 2:553; 3:980–981, 997, 1048
See also First Amendment; Symbolic speech; Texas v. Johnson (1989)
United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses" (1934), 1:207–208; 2:674
United States v. Perez (1824), 1:286

United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group (2000), 2:359; 3:981–982
See also Pornography; "Seven dirty words"; United States v. American Library Association, Inc. (2003)
United States v. The Progressive, Inc. (1979), 3:982–983
See also Censorship; First Amendment; Near v. Minnesota (1931); New York Times Co. v. United States (1971)
United States v. Ramsey (1977), 1:109
United States v. Reese (1876), 3:1013
United States v. Robel (1967), 2:607
United States v. Robinson (1973), 1:58–59
United States v. Ross (1982), 1:59–60, 144–145
United States v. Salerno (1987), 1:63
United States v. Santana (1976), 3:983–984
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Hot pursuit; Search warrants
United States v. Scheffer (1998), 2:568
United States v. Schwimmer (1929), 1:288
United States v. Sherman (1948), 2:437
United States v. Kirschenblatt (1926), 3:978
United States v. Sokolow (1989), 3:984–985
See also Exclusionary rule; Fourth Amendment; Terry v. Ohio (1968)
United States v. Taketa (1991), 3:1037
United States v. United States District Court (1972), 1:307; 2:622; 3:985–986, 986
See also Electronic eavesdropping; Katz v. United States (1967); Search warrants; Wiretapping
United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez (1990), 2:703
United States v. Virginia (1996), 1:95; 2:416
United States v. Wexler (1935), 2:437
United States v. Kirschenblatt (1926), 3:978
United States v. White (1971), 1:307
United States v. Wilson (1983), 1:148
United States v. Wong (1977), 2:424
United States v. Wurzbach (1930), 1:242
U.S. Code, 1:38
U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, 2:666
U.S. Marshals Service, Department of Justice, 1:271
USA Patriot Act. See Patriot Act (2001)
Utilitarianism (Mill, 1863), 2:623

V

Vacco v. Quill (1997), 2:708
Vagueness, 3:987–988
See also Due process of law; First Amendment; Overbreadth Doctrine
Valentine v. Chrestensen (1942), 1:81, 201; 3:1003
Vallandigham, Ex parte (1864), 2:619
Vance v. Bradley (1979), 2:369
Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance (1795), 1:315
V-chip, 3:988–989
See also First Amendment
Verdict (film), 2:639
Vernonia School District v. Acton (1995), 1:102; 3:989–990, 1017
See also Board of Education v. Earls (2002); Ferguson v. Skrupta (1963); Fourth Amendment; New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985); Random drug testing; Search; Seizure; Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942)
Vested rights. See Property rights
Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), 2:607
Victim-impact statement, 3:991–992
See also Payne v. Tennessee (1991)
Victimless crimes, 3:992–994
See also Lawrence v. Texas (2003); Mill, John Stuart; Right to privacy
Victims' rights, 3:994–996
See also Payne v. Tennessee (1991); Victim-impact statement
Victor v. Nebraska (1994), 1:78
Vietnam War, 3:996–998
See also New York Times Co. v. United States (1971); United States v. O'Brien (1968); War Powers Act
Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974), 2:636; 3:998–999
See also Fourteenth Amendment; Right of unmarried people to live together; Right to privacy; Zoning
Vinson, Frederick Moore, 3:999*, 999–1000
Dennis v. United States (1951), 1:270
See also Dennis v. United States (1951); Stone, Harlan Fiske; Warren, Earl Violence Against Women Act (1996), 3:1000–1001
See also Victims' rights
Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776), 3:1001–1003, 1068–1069
See also Bill of Rights; Constitutionalism; Declaration of Independence
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. (1976), 1:72, 98, 149, 201; 3:1003–1004
See also Bigelow v. Virginia (1975); Commercial speech; First Amendment; Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico (1986)
Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, 3:1004–1006, 1005
See also Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Jefferson, Thomas; Madison, James; Separation of church and state

Virginia v. Black (2003), 2:375, 379, 445–446; 3:1006–1007
See also First Amendment; Hate crimes; Hate speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992); Symbolic speech
Voir dire, 3:1007–1008
See also Batson v. Kentucky (1986); Trial by jury
Volstead Act, 3:1008–1010
See also First Amendment; Fourth Amendment; Second Amendment; Victimless crimes
Voting Rights Act (1965), 1:189
Vulgar speech, 3:1010–1012
See also Bethel School District v. Fraser (1986); Board of Education v. Pico (1982); Cohen v. California (1971); Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978); First Amendment; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997)

W

Wagner Act (1936), 2:539
Wainwright v. Witt (1985), 1:139, 257
Waite, Morrison Remick, 3:1013–1014, 1014
See also Judicial review; Reynolds v. United States (1879); State action
Walker, John, 2:713*
Walker v. Birmingham (1967), 1:228
Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), 2:559–560; 3:1014–1015
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971)
War on drugs, 3:1015–1018
See also Board of Education v. Earls (2002); Ewing v. California (2003); Takings Clause; Three-strikes laws; Vernonia School District v. Acton (1995)
War Powers Act (1973), 1:190–191; 3:1018–1019
See also Checks and balances; Vietnam War
Ward's Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio (1989), 1:98
Warrants, search, 3:852–854
Warren, Earl, 3:1019–1022, 1020
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 3:1021
Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), 2:702
See also Burger, Warren Earl; Engel v. Vitale (1962); Griswold v. Connecticut (1965); Mapp v. Ohio (1961); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964); Roth test; Vinson, Frederick Moore
Washington, Bushrod, 1:238*
Washington state and physician-assisted suicide, 2:707
Washington v. Glucksberg (1997), 2:529; 3:1022–1023
physician-assisted suicide, 2:707–708
See also Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990); Right to die
Washington v. State (1884), 2:367
Watergate, 1:151, 214
Democratic Party, 1:269
Nixon, Richard M., 2:663–665
Watkins v. United States (1957), 1:69, 215; 3:1023–1024
See also Barenblatt v. United States (1959); Congressional investigations; House Un-American Activities Committee
Way We Were, The (film), 2:640
Weaver v. Graham (1981), 1:343
Web. See Internet and World Wide Web
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989), 1:34; 2:528, 711; 3:1024–1025
See also Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992); Roe v. Wade (1973)
Weeks v. United States (1914), 3:1025–1026
Elkins v. United States (1960), 1:309
exclusionary rule, 1:344
Fourth Amendment, 2:398
fruits of poisonous tree, 2:407
good faith exception, 2:421
Mapp v. Ohio (1961), 2:590
search incident to arrest, 3:849
search warrants, 3:852
Terry v. Ohio (1968), 3:935
See also Incorporation doctrine; Wolf v. Colorado (1949)
Weems v. United States (1910), 1:138, 250, 338, 339
Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld (1975), 2:416
Welsh v. United States (1970), 3:1026–1027
See also Conscientious objectors; Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause; Vietnam War
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), 2:379, 384, 385, 401, 403, 586, 629, 641–642; 3:1027–1028, 1043
Douglas decision, 1:288
See also First Amendment; Flag salute; Free Exercise Clause
Westside Community Schools v. Mergens (1990), 2:423; 3:1031
Whalen, Commissioner of Health of New York v. Roe (1977), 2:556
Where Do We Go from Here: Chaos or Community?, 2:533
White, Byron R., 3:1028–1030
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 3:1029
Roe v. Wade (1973), 3:1029
See also Bowers v. Hardwick (1986); Miranda v. Arizona (1966)

Whitney v. California (1927), 1:67, 117, 118, 204; 2:425; 3:1030–1031
Schenck v. United States (1919), 3:1030
See also Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969); First Amendment
"Why I Write" (Orwell, 1946), 2:684
Widmar v. Vincent (1981), 2:423; 3:1031–1032
See also Establishment Clause; Free Exercise Clause
Wiggins v. Smith (2003), 3:1032
See also Ineffective assistance of counsel; Strickland v. Washington (1984)
Wilkerson v. Utah (1879), 1:138, 250, 339
Williams, Edward Bennett, 3:1033–1034
See also McCarthy, Joseph; McCarthyism
Williams, Roger, 1:165
Williams-Coleman Amendment, 2:645
Wilson, Woodrow, 3:1034–1036, 1042
Democratic Party, 1:267
See also Debs, Eugene Victor; Espionage Act (1917); Palmer raids; Red scare; Sedition Act (1918); World War I
Wilson v. Arkansas (1995), 2:667–668
Wilson v. Layne (1999), 1:92
Wiretapping, 3:1036–1038, 1037
See also Electronic eavesdropping; Exclusionary rule; Fruits of poisonous tree; Katz v. United States (1967); Patriot Act (2001)
Wisconsin Board of Regents v. Southworth (2000), 1:105
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 1:106
Wisconsin v. Mitchell (1993), 2:447; 3:1038–1039
See also Hate crimes; Hate speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992)
Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), 1:35–36, 129; 2:403, 555; 3:1039–1040
parental rights, 2:690
See also Free Exercise Clause; Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925)
Witherspoon v. Illinois (1968), 1:139, 257
death-qualified juries, 1:257
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind (1986), 1:18; 2:353
Wolf v. Colorado (1949), 1:309, 344; 2:398, 589; 3:1026, 1040–1041
See also Exclusionary rule; Mapp v. Ohio (1961); Weeks v. United States (1914)
Wolman v. Walter (1977), 1:17
Wong Sun v. United States (1963), 2:408
Wood v. Georgia (1962), 2:423
Woodson v. North Carolina (1976), 1:139, 250, 304
Worcester v. Georgia (1832), 2:596
World War I, 3:1041–1043
Gitlow v. New York (1925), 3:1042
Palmer raids, 2:689
See also Debs, Eugene Victor; Espionage Act (1917); Incorporation doctrine; Red scare; Sedition Act (1918); Wilson, Woodrow
World War II, 3:1043–1044
Democratic Party, 1:267–268
See also Espionage Act (1917); First Amendment; Flag salute; Korematsu v. United States (1944); Martial law; Milligan, Ex parte (1866); Presidents and civil liberties; Sedition Act (1918); Smith Act cases; Strict scrutiny; Suspect classifications; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943); World War I Write-in votes, 3:1045
See also Right to vote
Writs of certiorari, 3:1045–1046
United States Supreme Court, 3:972
See also Right to appeal
Wyman v. James (1971), 1:12
Wynehamer v. People (1856), 1:26
Wyoming v. Houghton (1999), 1:60

Y

Yakus v. United States (1944), 2:681–682
Yates v. United States (1957), 1:118, 192; 2:425; 3:1024, 1047
See also Clear and present danger; Communists; Dennis v. United States (1951); Hand, Learned; Schenck v. United States (1919); Smith Act cases
Yerger, Ex parte (1868), 2:605–606
Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. (1976), 1:178; 3:1047–1048
See also City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc. (2002); City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (1986); Obscenity; Zoning
Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), 1:94, 347, 348; 2:435, 541; 3:1000

Z

Zablocki v. Redhail (1978), 2:594; 3:1049–1050
See also Loving v. Virginia (1967); Marriage, right to; Parental rights
Zadvydas v. Davis (2001), 3:1050–1051
See also Due process of law; Immigration law

Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel (1985), 1:72; 2:549
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), 1:18, 159; 2:353, 560; 3:1051–1052
See also Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education (1947); Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995)
Zenger, John Peter, 3:1052–1054, 1053
See also Libel; New York Times Co. v. United States (1971); Seditious libel
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District (1993), 1:18; 2:354; 3:1054–1055
See also Establishment Clause; Everson v. Board of Education (1947); Locke v. Davey (2004)
Zoning, 3:1055–1057, 1056
See also Land use; Property rights; Takings Clause
Zorach v. Clauson (1952), 1:331; 3:1057–1058
Douglas, William O., 1:288
See also Establishment Clause; Release-time program; Separation of church and state
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily News (1978), 3:1058–1059
See also Branzburg v. Hayes (1972); First Amendment; Search warrants

Case Index

Note: Page references in bold indicate the full case article.
Page references in italics indicate photographs.

A

Abington School District v. Schempp (1963), 1:1–2; 2:380, 559
Abood v. Detroit Board of Education (1977), 1:2–3; 2:557
Abrams v. United States (1919), 1:3–4, 61, 153, 204; 2:592
Adair v. United States (1908), 1:26
Adamson v. California (1947), 1:9–10, 94
Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Penã (1995), 1:34; 2:416
Adderley v. Florida (1966), 1:10–11, 287
Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923), 2:641
Adler v. Board of Education (1952), 1:55
Afroyim v. Rusk (1967), 2:654–655
Agostini v. Felton (1997), 1:15–16, 18; 2:354
Aguilar v. Felton (1985), 1:15; 2:354
Aguilar v. Texas (1964), 1:16–17
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1983), 2:711
A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States (1935), 1:142–143
Alabama v. Shelton (2002), 1:21–22
Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), 2:607
Albertsons, Inc. v. Kirkingburg (1999), 1:278
Alden v. Maine (1999), 2:413
Alexander v. Holmes County Board of Education (1969), 1:129
Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897), 1:25–26; 2:572; 3:917
Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus (1978), 1:233
Ambach v. Norwick (1979), 1:98
American Booksellers Association, Inc. v. Hudnut (1985), 1:28–29
American Committee for Protection of the Foreign-Born v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), 2:607
American Communications Association v. Douds (1950), 3:999
Anderson v. Creighton (1987), 1:92
Anderson v. Dunn (1821), 1:214
Andrews, Ex parte (1861), 1: 101
Aptheker v. Secretary of State (1964), 1:118; 2:607
Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972), 1:38–39, 184; 3:806, 970
Arizona v. Evans (1995), 1:39–40; 2:398, 416, 421
Arizona v. Fulminante (1991), 1:140; 2:633
Arizona v. Hicks (1987), 2:710
Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes (1998), 1:40–41; 3:974
Arkansas v. Sanders (1979), 1:59–60
Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2002), 1:49–50; 2:501, 528–529
Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002), 1:50–51, 160–161; 2:528
Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority (1936), 1:117
Atkins v. Virginia (2002), 1:51–52, 140, 255, 340; 2:523
Atwater v. City of Lago Vista (2001), 1:56–57, 58
Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce (1990), 1:57–58, 241; 2:382, 489; 3:842

B

Bailey v. Alabama (1911), 2:439
Baker v. Carr (1962), 1:66–67, 122, 199; 2:401
Baldwin v. Fish and Game Commission of Montana (1978), 1:239
Barenblatt v. United States (1959), 1:69–70, 215; 3:1024
Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc. (1991), 1:70–71, 174; 2:670; 3:994
Barron v. City of Baltimore (1833), 1:71–72, 316; 2:364, 366, 596
Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977), 1:72–73, 149–150; 2:549, 685–686
Batson v. Kentucky (1986), 1:73–74, 296; 3:1008
Baumgartner v. United States (1944), 3:1043
Beauharnais v. Illinois (1952), 1:74–75; 2:430–431, 446
Beazell v. Ohio (1925), 1:343
Beck v. Alabama (1980), 1:139
Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association (1927), 1:117
Bellotti v. Baird (1979), 2:521
Benton v. Maryland (1969), 1:142, 286
Berger v. New York (1967), 1:184, 306, 307
Berman v. Parker (1954), 1:75, 316; 2:544
Bethel School District v. Fraser (1986), 1:75–77; 2:450; 3:1011
Betts v. Brady (1942), 1:77, 78; 2:415
Bigelow v. Virginia (1975), 1:81–82, 149–150, 240; 3:1003
Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotics Agents (1971), 1:91; 2:590
Bloom v. Illinois (1968), 1:229
BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore (1996), 1:80

Board of Airport Commissioners v. Jews for Jesus, Inc. (1987), 1:162
Board of Education v. Allen (1968), 1:17, 159
Board of Education v. Dowell (1991), 1:299
Board of Education v. Earls (2002), 1:102–103, 123; 2:416; 3:1017
Board of Education v. Grumet (1994), 1:103–104; 2:528
Board of Education v. Pico (1982), 1:104–105; 3:1011
Board of Regents v. Southworth (2000), 1:105–106; 2:586
Board of Trustees v. Garrett (2001), 1:278; 2:416
Boerne v. Flores (1997), 2:403
Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp. (1983), 1:89
Bolling v. Sharpe (1954), 1:325
Bond v. United States (2000), 1:123, 133
A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts (1966), 2:624, 674
Booth v. Maryland (1987), 2:696–697; 3:991, 992
Bordenkircher v. Hayes (1978), 2:713
Bowen v. Kendrick (1988), 2:528
Bowers v. Hardwick (1986), 1:110–112; 2:547–548; 3:993, 1029
Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000), 1:112–113
Boyd v. United States (1886), 1:309
Bradfield v. Roberts (1899), 1:159
Brady v. United States (1970), 2:712
Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), 1:3, 61, 68, 74, 117–119, 184, 192, 270; 2:378, 425, 438, 461, 473, 598, 602; 3:844, 978
Branzburg v. Hayes (1972), 1:119–120, 129, 228; 2:381, 424
Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic (1993), 1:120–121
Breedlove v. Suttles (1937), 2:370
Breithaupt v. Abrams (1957), 1:293
Bridges v. California (1941), 1:93
Brinegar v. United States (1949), 1:58
Broadrick v. Oklahoma (1973), 2:662, 685; 3:987
Bronson v. Kinzie (1843), 1:232
Brown v. Board of Education (1954), 1:29, 94, 116, 129, 131, 185, 189, 266, 268, 298, 301, 325; 2:395, 401, 436, 532, 551, 576, 598, 686, 702; 3:808, 888, 1000, 1021, 1044
Brown v. Gilmore (2001), 3:1005
Brown v. Louisiana (1966), 1:10
Brown v. Oklahoma (1972), 1:198
Brown v. Walker (1896), 2:424
Buchanan v. Warley (1917), 1:125–126
Buck v. Bell (1927), 1:88, 126–127, 276, 294, 334
Buckley v. Valeo (1976), 1:37, 57–58, 106, 127–128, 200, 240; 2:362, 382, 611, 662; 3:943
Burdick v. Takushi (1992), 3:1045
Burroughs v. United States (1934), 1:242
Burson v. Freeman (1992), 1:130
Bush v. Gore (2000), 2:528, 673
Bush v. Vera (1996), 2:528
Bute v. Illinois (1948), 1:131
Butler v. Michigan (1957), 2:358

C

Cage v. Louisiana (1990), 1:78
Calder v. Bull (1798), 1:25, 136, 343
Califano v. Jobst (1977), 3:1049
California v. Acevedo (1991), 1:60
California v. Carney (1985), 1:58
California v. Ciraolo (1986), 2:680
California v. Hodari D. (1991), 2:398
California v. LaRue (1972), 2:670
Callins v. Collins (1994), 1:97
Camara v. Municipal Court (1967), 1:11
Caminetti v. United States (1917), 2:589
Campbell v. Louisiana (1998), 1:296–297; 2:528
Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940), 1:136–137, 184, 185; 2:402, 403
Carey v. Population Services International (1977), 1:89
Carolene Products, footnote 4 (1938), 1:143–144
Carroll v. United States (1925), 1:58–60, 144–145
Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York (1980), 1:149–150, 201–202, 240; 2:546, 553
Champion v. Ames (1903), 2:586
Chandler v. Florida (1980), 1:333
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942), 1:74, 93, 153–154, 198; 2:374, 379, 685
Chapman v. California (1967), 2:440–441
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge (1837), 1:154–155, 232
Chavez v. Martinez (2003), 1:155–156
Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (1831), 2:596
Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago (1897), 1:316; 2:395
Children's Healthcare Is a Legal Duty, Inc. v. Deters (1996), 1:168
Chimel v. California (1969), 2:397
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah (1993), 1:168–169; 2:404, 575
Cipollone v. Liggett Group (1992), 1:169–170
City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), 1:173–174, 318
City of Chicago v. Morales (1999), 2:521
City of Cincinnati v. Discount Network, Inc. (1993), 1:202
City of Erie v. Pap's A.M. (2000), 1:174–175; 2:671
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond (2000), 1:175–176

City of Ladue v. Gilleo (1994), 1:176–177; 2:545–546
City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc. (2002), 1:177; 3:1048
City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (1986), 1:174, 177, 178; 3:1048
City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co. (1989), 2:528, 599, 615
Civil Rights Cases (1883), 1:185–186; 2:439; 3:1014
Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center (1985), 1:278
Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur (1974), 2:594
Clinton v. Jones (1997), 1:194–195
Coates v. Cincinnati (1971), 3:987
Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education (1930), 1:159
Cohen v. California (1971), 1:74, 94, 141, 197–199; 2:375; 3:1011
Cohens v. Virginia (1821), 2:595
Coker v. Georgia (1977), 1:139, 250
Colegrove v. Green (1946), 1:66, 199–200
Coleman v. Miller (1939), 1:221
Collins v. Youngblood (1990), 1:343
Colonnade Catering Corp. v. United States (1970), 1:12
Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission (1996), 1:200–201, 363; 2:528
Columbus v. Penick (1979), 1:98
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist (1973), 2:559
Commonwealth v. Webster (1850), 1:78
Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1961), 1:82; 2:606
Connally v. General Construction Co. (1926), 3:987
Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission (1980), 1:240
Contractors Association of Eastern Pennsylvania v. Secretary of Labor (1971), 1:347
Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971), 2:710
Corfield v. Coryell (1823), 1:238*, 238–239
Correctional Services v. Malesko (2001), 1:92
County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989), 1:242–243, 528, 560; 3:782, 789, 842
County of Riverside v. McLaughlin (1991), 1:243–244; 3:781
Cox v. Louisiana (1965), 1:10, 287; 3:987
Coy v. Iowa (1988), 1:209–210, 246–247
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990), 1:185, 251–252; 2:529, 704, 707; 3:1022
Cummings v. Missouri (1867), 1:82
Cunningham v. State (1982), 1:343

D

Dames & Moore v. Reagan (1981), 1:347
Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (1993), 2:568
Davis v. Alaska (1974), 1:209
Davis v. Brandemer (1986), 1:67
Davis v. Mississippi (1969), 2:376
Debs, In re (1895), 1:260–261
Debs v. United States (1919), 1:61
Delaware v. Prouse (1979), 1:58
Dellinger, In re (1972), 1:229
Dennis v. United States (1951), 1:67, 192, 204, 269–270, 288; 2:425; 3:999, 1047
Department of Housing and Urban Development v. Rucker (2002), 3:1016
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1989), 1:272–273; 2:657–658
Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft (2002), 2:411
Dickerson v. United States (2000), 1:156, 273–274
Dillon v. Gloss (1921), 1:221
Doe v. Bolton (1973), 1:283–284
Doe v. Unocal (2000), 1:25
Dolan v. City of Tigard (1994), 1:284–285; 2:545, 669
Donovan v. Dewey (1981), 1:12
Duncan v. Kahanamoku (1946), 2:600, 620; 3:1044
Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), 1:185, 293, 295; 2:395
Dunlop v. United States (1896), 2:674
Duren v. Missouri (1979), 2:416

E

Early v. DiCenso (1971), 1:17; 2:558–559
Easley v. Cromartie (2001), 1:123
Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (1998), 1:136
Eberheart v. Georgia (1977), 1:250
Eddings v. Oklahoma (1982), 3:992
Edenfield v. Fane (1993), 1:202
Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. (1991), 1:74, 296–297; 2:528
Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), 1:248, 338
Edwards v. California (1941), 1:300–301
Edwards v. Healy (1975), 2:416
Edwards v. South Carolina (1963), 1:10, 301–302
Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), 1:89, 122, 305
Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow (2004), 1:307–309; 2:385
Elkins v. United States (1960), 1:309–310
Elred v. Ashcroft (2003), 1:237
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990), 1:173, 317–318; 2:380, 403
Endo, Ex parte (1944), 1:347; 2:535; 3:1044
Engel v. Vitale (1962), 1:288; 318–319; 2:554, 731; 3:896, 912, 1021
Enmund v. Florida (1982), 1:139
Epperson v. Arkansas (1968), 1:248, 337, 338
Erie Rail Road Co. v. Tompkins (1938), 2:650

Escobedo v. Illinois (1964), 1:327–328; 2:420, 633
Estelle v. Gamble (1976), 1:251
Estes v. Texas (1965), 1:332–334
Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co. (1926), 2:544; 3:1056
Everson v. Board of Education (1947), 1:17, 101, 159, 288, 331, 335–336; 2:353, 380; 3:783, 862, 1051
Ewing v. California (2003), 1:251, 303, 341–342; 3:1017
Express Company v. Caldwell (1875), 2:357

F

Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union v. WDAY, Inc. (1959), 1:326
Fay v. Noia (1963), 2:432
Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation (1978), 1:76; 2:358–359; 3:863–864, 1011
Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee (2001), 1:200–201; 2:363–364
Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life (1986), 1:57, 241
Federal Election Commission v. National Right to Work Committee (1982), 1:241
Feiner v. New York (1951), 1:288
Felix v. Westinghouse Radio Station (1950), 1:326
Ferguson v. Skrupta (1963), 2:369–370
Filártiga v. Peña-Irala (1980), 1:24
First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles (1987), 2:545
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti (1978), 1:57–58, 240; 2:381–382, 703
Flast v. Cohen (1968), 2:386–387
Flemming v. Nestor (1960), 1:82
Fletcher v. Peck (1810), 1:232; 2:387–388, 595
Florida State Bar v. Went For It (1995), 1:72; 2:549
Florida v. Bostick (1991), 1:42–43, 132; 2:398
Florida v. J.L. (2000), 2:388–389, 416
Folsom v. Marsh (1841), 2:350
Forsyth County, Georgia v. The Nationalist Movement (1992), 2:390–391
44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island (1996), 1:150, 240; 3:1004
Frank v. Maryland (1959), 1:11
Freedman v. Maryland (1965), 1:149
Fricke v. Lynch (1980), 2:405–406
Frontiero v. Richardson (1973), 2:406–407
Frothingham v. Mellon (1923), 2:386
Frye v. United States (1923), 2:567
Fullilove v. Klutznick (1980), 1:129
Furman v. Georgia (1972), 1:79, 122, 139, 288, 340; 2:412, 427, 598, 610; 3:781, 823, 1029

G

Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority (1985), 2:413–414, 648
Garland, Ex parte (1867), 1:82
Gault, In re (1967), 2:392, 414–415, 524
Gay Students Organization v. Bonner (1974), 2:406
Gayle v. Browder (1956), 1:114
Gelpche v. City of Dubuque (1864), 1:232
Georgia v. McCollum (1992), 1:74, 296
Gerstein v. Pugh (1975), 1:244
Gibbons v. Ogden (1824), 2:586
Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee (1963), 1:230; 2:381
Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), 1:21, 38, 78, 131, 184, 293, 328; 2:392, 415, 486, 491, 730, 756; 3:781, 806, 875, 903, 1021
Giglio v. United States (1972), 1:115
Gilbert v. Minnesota (1920), 1:117
Gillette v. United States (1971), 1:217
Ginsberg v. New York (1968), 1:76
Girouard v. United States (1946), 1:288
Gitlow v. New York (1925), 1:61, 72, 118; 2:417–418, 425, 489; 3:844, 859, 1042
Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court (1982), 2:418
Goldberg v. Kelly (1970), 1:122, 294; 2:418–419
Goldman v. United States (1942), 1:306; 2:397
Gompers v. Buck's Stove and Range Co. (1911), 1:228
Good News Club v. Milford Central School (2001), 2:422–423
Gooding v. Wilson (1972), 1:198; 2:374, 685; 3:987
Goodridge v. Department of Public Health (2003), 2:594
Goss v. Lopez (1975), 1:76
Graham v. Richardson (1971), 1:98; 2:654
Gray v. Maryland (1998), 1:123
Grayned v. City of Rockford (1972), 3:987
Green v. Board of Elections (1967), 2:368
Green v. United States (1957), 1:229, 287
Gregg v. Georgia (1976), 1:79, 139, 250, 288, 304; 2:361, 427–428
Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), 1:89, 94, 185, 208, 288, 294, 305, 312; 2:352, 369, 420, 428–429, 556, 594, 616, 709; 3:767, 812, 824, 860, 896, 917, 938, 1021
Grosjean v. American Press Co. (1936), 2:429–430
Grove Press, Inc. v. Christenberry (1960), 2:542
Grovey v. Townsend (1935), 2:370
Gut v. Minnesota (1869), 1:343

H

Halko, In re (1966), 2:555
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), 1:213; 2:434–435, 626
Hammer v. Dagenhart (1918), 2:589

Harmelin v. Michigan (1991), 1:140, 251
Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc. (1993), 2:441–442
Harris v. United States (1971), 1:63, 274
Hartzel v. United States (1944), 3:1043
Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (1984), 1:316; 2:447–448, 544
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988), 2:449–451
Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States (1964), 2:531
Heath v. Alabama (1985), 1:285–286
Heller v. Doe (1993), 1:278
Herndon v. Lowry (1937), 1:61
Herrera v. Collins (1993), 2:453–454
Hester v. United States (1924), 2:709
Hiibel v. Nevada (2004), 2:456
Hill v. Colorado (2000), 2:457–458, 528
Hilton v. City of Wheeling (2000), 2:657
Hirabayashi v. United States (1943), 1:347; 2:535, 642; 3:1043
Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining and Reclamation Association (1981), 2:648
Hodgson v. Minnesota (1990), 2:458–459, 528
Hoke v. United States (1913), 2:586
Hollingsworth v. Virginia (1798), 1:221
Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (1934), 1:155, 233; 2:462–463
Honig v. Doe (1988), 1:277
Hope v. Pelzer (2002), 1:92
Humanitarian Law Project v. Ashcroft (2004), 1:213
Hunter v. Underwood (1985), 2:476–477
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc. (1995), 1:112; 2:477–478
Hurtado v. California (1884), 2:478–479
Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell (1988), 2:479–480, 560

I

Idaho v. Wright (1990), 1:210
Illinois Central Railroad v. Illinois (1892), 1:233
Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education (1948), 3:1057
Illinois v. Gates (1983), 2:481
Illinois v. Krull (1987), 2:421
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha (1983), 3:1018
International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee (1992), 2:500, 528
International Union, United Mine Workers v. Bagwell (1994), 1:230
Irvin v. Dowd (1961), 3:1007

J

Jackson, Ex parte (1878), 1:207
Jacobellis v. Ohio (1964), 2:437, 675
Jacobson v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts (1905), 2:555
Jacobson v. United States (1992), 2:504–505
J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B. (1994), 1:74, 296; 2:528; 3:1008
Johnson v. Louisiana (1972), 2:509–510
Johnson v. Zerbst (1938), 1:21, 77; 2:415
Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath (1951), 1:54
Jones v. Opelika (1942), 2:385
Jurek v. Texas (1976), 1:139

K

Kaiser Aetna v. United States (1979), 1:316
Kastigar v. United States (1972), 2:424
Katz v. Tyler (1967), 3:996
Katz v. United States (1967), 1:185, 306, 307; 2:397, 526–527, 538, 680; 3:1017
Katzenbach v. Morgan (1966), 1:122; 2:527–528
Keegan v. United States (1945), 3:1043
Kemmler, In re (1890), 1:250
Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez (1963), 2:654
Kent v. Dulles (1958), 1:19
Kent v. United States (1966), 2:524
Kepner v. United States (1904), 1:286
Ker v. California (1963), 2:710
Keyes v. Denver School District No. 1 (1973), 1:299
Keyishian v. Board of Regents (1967), 1:118, 192
Kimel v. Board of Regents (2000), 2:416, 530–531
Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown (1957), 1:107
Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents (1959), 2:542, 674
Klopfer v. North Carolina (1967), 2:533–534
Knowles v. Iowa (1998), 2:702
Kohl v. United States (1875), 1:315
Korematsu v. United States (1944), 1:29, 94, 190, 206, 288, 325, 347; 2:401, 435, 534–535, 642, 696; 3:1043
Kovacs v. Cooper (1949), 2:667
Kyles v. Whitley (1995), 1:115
Kyllo v. United States (2001), 1:184; 2:398, 537–538

L

Laird v. Tatum (1972), 1:162; 2:622
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District (1993), 2:423, 542–543
Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections (1959), 2:370, 527
Lawrence v. Texas (2003), 1:112, 163, 185; 2:352, 547, 547–549, 652, 678; 3:993, 1029
Lee v. United States (1952), 1:306
Lee v. Weisman (1992), 1:308; 2:380, 554
Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez (2001), 2:556–557
Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association (1991), 2:557–558

Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), 1:16, 17, 33, 129, 158, 242, 332, 336, 338; 2:543, 558–560, 579; 3:1015
Levitt v. Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty (1973), 2:559
Leyra v. Denno (1954), 2:373
Liggett Co. v. Lee (1933), 1:117
Lindmark Associates, Inc. v. Willingboro (1977), 2:545–546
Lochner v. New York (1905), 1:26, 294, 313; 2:369, 410, 436, 438, 572–573, 640, 652
Locke v. Davey (2004), 2:574–575
Lockett v. Ohio (1978), 1:139; 3:992
Lockhart v. McCree (1986), 1:257–258
Lockyer v. Andrade (2003), 1:303
Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly (2001), 1:202
Louisiana ex rel. Francis v. Resweber (1947), 1:138
Louisville v. Radford (1935), 1:117
Lovell v. City of Griffin (1938), 2:384
Loving v. Virginia (1967), 2:352, 575–576, 594; 3:1049
Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council (1992), 1:144; 2:370, 545, 578
Lujan v. G & G Sprinklers (2001), 1:92
Luther v. Borden (1849), 1:238
Lynce v. Mathis (1997), 1:344
Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), 1:243, 332, 579; 3:1015
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), 2:580

M

Madsen v. Kinsella (1952), 2:619
Maher v. Roe (1977), 2:584–585
Malloy v. Hogan (1964), 1:185, 229
Mapp v. Ohio (1961), 1:185, 287, 293, 310, 328, 344, 345; 2:396, 401, 589–590; 3:1021, 1026, 1040
Marbury v. Madison (1803), 1:157, 210, 213, 227; 2:527, 594; 673, 681
Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc. (1978), 1:12
Maryland v. Craig (1990), 1:209–210, 247
Maryland v. Wilson (1997), 2:702
Massachusetts v. Sheppard (1984), 2:421, 590
Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917), 1:269–270; 2:436, 437, 602–603; 3:1047
Mathews v. Eldridge (1976), 1:294; 2:434
Mattox v. United States (1985), 1:209
Maughn v. Bibb County (1998), 2:680–681
Maynard v. Hill (1888), 2:352, 593
McCardle, Ex parte (1869), 2:681–682
McCleskey v. Kemp (1987), 1:139–140; 2:610–611
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003), 1:128; 2:362, 611–612
McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), 1:324; 2:587
McGautha v. California (1971), 1:339, 340
McGowan v. Maryland (1961), 1:100, 101
McGrain v. Daugherty (1927), 1:213
McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission (1995), 2:612–613
McLaurin v. Oklahoma Board of Regents (1950), 3:1000
Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent (1984), 2:546, 613–614
Meredith Corp. v. Federal Communications Commission (1987), 2:350
Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson (1986), 2:441
Metro Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1990), 1:122; 2:528, 614–615
Metromedia v. San Diego (1981), 1:86
Meyer v. Nebraska (1923), 1:26, 320; 2:616, 689
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974), 2:617; 3:791–792
Michael H. v. Gerald D. (1989), 2:618–619
Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz (1990), 1:58, 176
Miller v. California (1973), 1:38, 50, 107, 129, 149, 160, 208, 264; 2:437, 501–502, 624, 625–626, 661–662, 674, 692–693, 727, 759; 3:836, 886
Milligan, Ex parte (1866), 1:187, 190; 2:434, 600, 605, 620, 626–627; 3:1044
Milliken v. Bradley (1974), 1:299
Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), 1:93; 2:384, 385, 403, 628–629, 641; 3:1027, 1043
Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993), 2:629–630
Minor v. Happersett (1875), 3:1013
Miranda v. Arizona (1966), 1:158, 273-274, 293, 328; 2:373, 423, 424, 632–633, 633; 3:1021, 1029
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan (1982), 2:633–634, 635
Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Nebraska (1896), 1:316
Mitchell v. Helms (2000), 1:18; 3:1051
Mitchell v. United States (1967), 3:996
Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States (1893), 1:316
Monroe v. Pape (1961), 1:91
Monteiro v. Tempe Union High School District (1998), 1:108
Moore v. City of East Cleveland (1977), 2:636
Mora v. McNamara (1967), 3:996
Morgan v. Illinois (1992), 1:258
Morton v. Mancari (1974), 1:98
Mueller v. Allen (1983), 1:17
Muller v. Oregon (1908), 1:116; 2:640–641
Munn v. Illinois (1877), 1:26
Murphy v. Hunt (1982), 1:63
Murphy v. United Parcel Service, Inc. (1999), 1:278
Murray v. United States (1988), 2:408
Myers v. United States (1927), 1:117

N

Naim v. Naim (1955), 2:575
Nardone v. United States (1939), 1:306; 2:408
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers (1964), 2:644
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson (1958), 2:381, 644
National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998), 2:635, 645–646
National League of Cities v. Usery (1976), 2:413, 647–648
National Organization for Women v. Scheidler (1994), 2:648–649
Neal v. Delaware (1880), 3:1013
Near v. Minnesota (1931), 1:148–149, 161, 170; 2:429, 476, 655–656
Nebbia v. New York (1934), 2:369
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart (1976), 1:129; 2:656–657
New Jersey v. T.L.O. (1985), 2:450, 658–659
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964), 1:74, 122, 153, 162; 2:420, 560, 659–660; 3:1021
New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 1:97, 129, 158, 170; 2:411, 660, 660–661, 665; 3:997, 1054
New York v. Burger (1987), 1:12
New York v. Ferber (1982), 1:50–51, 160; 2:661–662; 3:987
New York v. Quarles (1984), 2:633
Newberry v. United States (1921), 1:241
Newdow v. U.S. Congress (2002), 1:308; 2:386
Newman, Ex parte (1858), 1:101
Nike, Inc. v. Kasky (2003), 2:593
Nix v. Williams (1984), 2:408, 633
Nixon v. Administrator of General Services (1977), 1:82
Nixon v. Fitzgerald (1982), 1:194
Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC (2000), 2:528, 662–663
Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), 1:284; 2:545, 668–669
Noto v. United States (1961), 1:118

O

O'Conner v. Donaldson (1975), 1:277
Ogden v. Sanders (1827), 1:232
Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1990), 2:528
Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association (1978), 1:72; 2:549
Oliver v. United States (1984), 2:680
Olmstead v. L.C. (1999), 1:278
Olmstead v. United States (1928), 1:111, 117, 185, 306, 307, 344; 2:396, 526, 679–680
On Lee v. United States (1952), 1:306
Oregon v. Mitchell (1970), 3:960
Osborne v. Ohio (1990), 1:160; 2:662; 3:993

P

Pacesetter Homes, Inc. v. Village of South Holland (1958), 1:102
Pacific Gas and Electric Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1986), 1:202
Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip (1991), 1:80
Palko v. Connecticut (1937), 1:142; 2:688
Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville (1972), 2:520
Pappas, In re (1972), 2:424
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), 1:288; 2:674–675, 692–693
Parker v. Levy (1974), 1:288
Patterson v. Colorado (1907), 2:439
Patterson v. Texas (2002), 2:523
Payne v. Tennessee (1991), 1:140; 2:696–697; 3:992, 994
Pell v. Procunier (1974), 2:381
Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York (1978), 1:122; 2:697–698
Pennhurst State School v. Halderman (1981), 1:277
Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon (1922), 2:544, 698, 700–701; 3:1057
Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977), 1:58–59; 2:701–702
Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), 2:702–703
Penry v. Lynaugh (1989), 1:52, 140, 256
People v. Abrahams (1976), 1:102
People v. Defore (1926), 2:590
People v. Kevorkian (2001), 2:529
Perez v. Brownell (1958), 1:172
Pettibone v. United States (1893), 1:261
Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), 2:352, 690, 708–709; 3:1039
Pierce v. United States (1920), 1:117
Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations (1973), 1:81, 240
Plako v. Connecticut (1937), 1:286
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth (1976), 2:352
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), 1:313; 2:458, 528, 677, 686, 710–712; 3:1025
Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), 1:126, 188–189, 266; 2:439, 532, 686; 3:1000
Plyler v. Doe (1982), 1:98; 3:838
Poe v. Ullman (1961), 1:89
Pointer v. Texas (1965), 1:209
Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co. (1895), 2:410, 687
Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico (1986), 1:150; 2:728; 3:1004
Posusta v. United States (1961), 2:437

Powell v. Alabama (1932), 1:77; 2:729–730
Powers v. Ohio (1991), 1:74; 2:528
Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842), 1:238, 315
Primus, In re (1978), 2:549
Prince v. Massachusetts (1944), 2:555, 690
Proffitt v. Florida (1976), 1:139
Providence Bank v. Billings (1830), 1:155
Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co. (1871), 1:316

Q

Quaker City Cab v. Pennsylvania (1928), 1:117
Quinlan, In re (1976), 2:529, 707; 3:766–767
Quirin, Ex parte (1942), 2:434–435, 703; 3:767–768, 1044

R

R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992), 1:74, 97; 2:374, 375, 431, 444–446; 3:769, 1006, 1038
Rakas v. Illinois (1978), 1:59
Rankin v. McPherson (1987), 3:773–774
Rasul v. Bush (2004), 1:213; 2:434, 626; 3:774–775
Ratliff v. Beale (1896), 2:368
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission (1969), 2:349; 3:778–779
Reed v. Reed (1971), 1:129, 144, 185; 2:407
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978), 2:598
Regina v. Hicklin (1868), 1:207; 2:674
Reid v. Covert (1956), 2:704
Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997), 1:49, 184; 2:358, 359; 3:790–791, 1011
Republica v. Oswald (1778), 1:147
Republican Party of Minnesota v. White (2002), 3:795–796
Reynolds v. Simms (1964), 1:66, 199; 3:1021
Reynolds v. United States (1879), 2:402, 594; 3:796, 1014
Richards v. Wisconsin (1997), 2:668
Richardson v. Ramirez (1974), 3:796–797
Richardson v. United States (1984), 1:286
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia (1980), 1:129; 2:381
Ring v. Arizona (2002), 1:40; 3:822–823
Robbins v. California (1981), 1:59
Roberts v. Louisiana (1976), 1:139
Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees (1984), 1:112
Robinson v. California (1962), 1:250, 303
Rochin v. California (1952), 1:293; 3:826–827
Roe v. Wade (1973), 1:26, 29, 88–89, 97–98, 120, 129, 146, 181, 185, 208, 283–284, 288, 294, 305, 312–313; 2:352, 411, 428–429, 458, 528, 572, 584–585, 598, 640, 652, 677, 686, 703, 704, 707, 709, 710–712, 733, 740; 3:782, 812, 824, 827–831, 828, 884, 917, 940–941, 1024, 1029
Romer v. Evans (1996), 1:29; 2:458, 528, 677; 3:831–832
Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995), 1:105; 2:423, 528, 575, 586; 3:834, 1051
Rosenfeld v. New Jersey (1972), 1:198
Ross v. Oklahoma (1988), 1:258
Rostker v. Goldberg (1981), 3:834–835
Roth v. United States (1957), 1:61, 94, 208, 288; 2:541, 624, 625, 674; 3:1021
Ruiz v. Hull (1998), 1:321
Rummel v. Estelle (1980), 1:250, 303, 342
Rumsfeld v. Padilla (2004), 1:213; 2:434
Rust v. Sullivan (1991), 2:557; 3:836–837

S

Sable Communications of California, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission (1989), 1:149; 2:359
Saenz v. Roe (1999), 1:239; 2:395
Sale v. Haitian Centers Council (1993), 1:98
San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973), 1:299; 2:598–599; 3:838–839
Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co. (1886), 1:239
Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe (2000), 2:554; 3:839–840
Santobello v. New York (1971), 2:712–713
Santosky v. Kramer (1982), 2:352
Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania (2003), 1:286; 3:840–841
Saucier v. Katz (2001), 1:56
Scales v. United States (1961), 2:696; 3:841
Schaefer v. United States (1920), 1:117
Schenck v. United States (1919), 1:61, 106, 118, 190, 191, 204, 329; 2:378, 602, 737–738, 759; 3:773, 843–844, 856, 880, 919, 1030, 1047
Schlup v. Delo (1955), 3:844–845
Schmerber v. California (1966), 1:293; 3:845–846
Schneckloth v. Bustamonte (1973), 1:132
Schneider v. Rusk (1964), 1:288
Schneider v. State (1939), 2:385, 553
School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball (1985), 1:15
Scopes v. State of Tennessee (1927), 1:124, 248, 337; 3:846–848, 847
Scott v. Illinois (1979), 1:21
Scott v. Sandford (1857), 1:26, 157, 171, 223, 238, 315; 2:670, 704
See v. City of Seattle (1967), 1:11
Seeger v. United States (1965), 1:217
Sell v. United States (2003), 3:861
Serfass v. United States (1975), 1:286
Serrano v. Priest (1971), 1:299
Service v. Dulles (1957), 3:1024

Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association (1988), 2:549
Shapiro v. Thompson (1969), 1:122; 3:869–870
Shaw v. Reno (1993), 1:67
Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), 1:131; 2:576, 597; 3:1000
Shelton v. Tucker (1960), 2:553
Sheppard v. Maxwell (1966), 1:64, 333; 3:870–871
Sherbert v. Verner (1963), 1:173, 317; 2:380, 403, 585; 3:871–872
Silverman v. United States (1961), 2:397, 526
Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States (1920), 2:408, 590
Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942), 1:88, 127, 294, 335; 2:593; 3:875–877, 876
Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), 1:26, 52, 84; 2:364, 395; 3:878–879
Smith v. Allwright (1944), 2:370, 597, 721
Smith v. Collin (1978), 3:881–882
Smith v. Doe (2003), 1:343
Smith v. Goguen (1974), 1:97
Smith v. Maryland (1979), 2:526
Solem v. Helm (1983), 1:303, 341
Soon Hing v. Crowley (1885), 1:101
South Carolina v. Gathers (1989), 2:697; 3:991, 992
South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966), 2:371, 527
Spano v. New York (1959), 2:373
Spartan's Industries, Inc. v. Oklahoma City (1972), 1:102
Spence v. Washington (1974), 2:383; 3:976–977
Stanford v. Kentucky (1989), 1:140, 250; 2:522–523
Stanley v. Georgia (1969), 3:886–887, 993
State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell (2003), 1:80
State of Utah v. Schreuder (Utah 1986), 1:343
Stenberg v. Carhart (2000), 2:528
Stone v. Graham (1980), 3:897–898
Stone v. Mississippi (1880), 1:233
Stone v. Powell (1976), 2:432
Strauder v. West Virginia (1880), 1:73
Street v. New York (1969), 2:383
Strickland v. Washington (1984), 3:903–904, 1032
Stromberg v. California (1931), 3:908–909
Sturges v. Crowninshield (1819), 1:232
Sugarman v. Dougall (1973), 1:98
Summit Health, Ltd. v. Pinhas (1991), 1:96
Sumner v. Mata (1981), 2:673
Sutton v. United Air Lines, Inc. (1999), 1:278
Swain v. Alabama (1965), 3:1008
Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education (1971), 1:129, 299
Sweatt v. Painter (1950), 2:597; 3:1000
Sweezy v. New Hampshire (1957), 3:1024
Swift v. Tyson (1842), 2:650

T

Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic (1984), 1:24
Tennessee v. Lane (2004), 1:278
Terminiello v. Chicago (1949), 1:288
Terrett v. Taylor (1815), 1:155
Terry v. Ohio (1968), 1:20, 56; 2:388, 630, 701–702; 3:935–936
Texas v. Brown (1983), 2:710
Texas v. Johnson (1989), 1:29, 97, 122, 206; 2:375, 383, 384, 528, 546; 3:936–937
Thomas Cusack Co. v. City of Chicago (1917), 1:86
Thompson v. Oklahoma (1988), 2:522
Thornburg v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (1986), 2:711; 3:940–941
Thornburg v. Gingles (1986), 1:67
Thornhill v. Alabama (1940), 2:641, 685
Tileston v. Ullman (1943), 1:89
Tilton v. Richardson (1971), 1:17; 2:559
Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago (1961), 1:147
Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party (1997), 3:945–946
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969), 1:76; 2:379, 392, 406; 3:946–947, 997
Tison v. Arizona (1987), 1:139, 250
Townsend v. Sain (1963), 2:453
Transportation Insurance Co. v. Moriel (1994), 1:80
Trop v. Dulles (1958), 1:140, 250, 303, 339, 340; 2:367, 654; 3:957–958
Troxel v. Granville (2000), 2:521, 636, 690
Truong Dinh Hung v. United States (1978), 1:63
Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819), 1:155, 232; 2:595–596; 3:958–959
Twentieth Century Music Corp. v. Aiken (1975), 1:235
Twining v. New Jersey (1908), 2:395
TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. (1993), 1:81

U

United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947), 2:442
United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers (1974), 2:442
United States Department of Agriculture v. United Foods, Inc. (2001), 2:528
United States ex rel. Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson (1921), 1:329
United States ex rel. Negron v. New York (1970), 1:320
United States Trust Co. v. New Jersey (1977), 1:233
United States v. Albarado (1974), 1:20
United States v. American Library Association, Inc. (2003), 3:974–975
United States v. Arvizu (2002), 3:1017

United States v. Bagley (1985), 1:115
United States v. Biswell (1972), 1:12
United States v. Brown (1965), 1:82
United States v. Caicedo- Guarnizo (9th Cir. 1984), 1:110
United States v. Calandra (1974), 2:424
United States v. Caldwell (1972), 2:424
United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), 1:35, 143–144, 157, 294, 312; 2:553; 3:1021
United States v. Carroll Towing Co. (1947), 1:270
United States v. Causby (1946), 1:316
United States v. Ceccolini (1984), 2:408
United States v. Chadwick (1977), 1:59
United States v. Cruikshank (1876), 3:1013
United States v. Davis (1973), 1:19
United States v. Dennis (1950), 2:436, 438
United States v. Drayton (2002), 1:132; 3:975–976
United States v. Dunn (1987), 2:680
United States v. E.C. Knight Co. (1895), 2:409
United States v. Edwards (1974), 1:20
United States v. Eichman (1990), 3:976–977
United States v. Espinoza-Seanez (1988), 1:110
United States v. Jackson (2003), 3:1036
United States v. Jacobsen (1984), 2:398
United States v. Johns (1985), 1:145
United States v. Kennerley (1913), 2:437
United States v. Kirschenblatt (1926), 2:437; 3:977–978
United States v. Kokinda (1990), 2:528
United States v. Lanza (1922), 1:285
United States v. Lee (1927), 2:709
United States v. Lee (1982), 1:36
United States v. Leon (1984), 2:398, 421, 590; 3:978–979
United States v. Levine (1936), 2:437
United States v. Lopez (1995), 2:413
United States v. Lovett (1946), 1:82
United States v. Macintosh (1931), 1:288
United States v. Mandujano (1976), 2:424
United States v. Martinez-Fuerte (1976), 1:109, 175
United States v. McGuire (2003), 3:1037
United States v. Mink (1973), 1:346
United States v. Morrison (2000), 2:416; 3:1001
United States v. Morton Salt Co. (1950), 2:423
United States v. National Treasury Employees Union (1995), 3:979–980
United States v. Nixon (1974), 1:129; 2:665
United States v. O'Brien (1968), 1:70, 174, 290; 2:553; 3:980–981, 997,1048
United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses" (1934), 1:207–208; 2:674
United States v. Perez (1824), 1:286
United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group (2000), 2:359; 3:981–982
United States v. The Progressive, Inc. (1979), 3:982–983
United States v. Ramsey (1977), 1:109
United States v. Reese (1876), 3:1013
United States v. Robel (1967), 2:607
United States v. Robinson (1973), 1:58–59
United States v. Ross (1982), 1:59–60, 144–145
United States v. Salerno (1987), 1:63
United States v. Santana (1976), 3:983–984
United States v. Scheffer (1998), 2:568
United States v. Schwimmer (1929), 1:288
United States v. Sherman (1948), 2:437; 3:978
United States v. Sokolow (1989), 3:984–985
United States v. Taketa (1991), 3:1037
United States v. United States District Court (1972), 1:307; 2:622; 3:985–986, 986
United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez (1990), 2:703
United States v. Virginia (1996), 1:95; 2:416
United States v. Wexler (1935), 2:437; 3:978
United States v. White (1971), 1:307
United States v. Wilson (1983), 1:148
United States v. Wong (1977), 2:424
United States v. Wurzbach (1930), 1:242

V

Vacco v. Quill (1997), 2:708
Valentine v. Chrestensen (1942), 1:81, 201; 3:1003
Vance v. Bradley (1979), 2:369
Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance (1795), 1:315
Vernonia School District v. Acton (1995), 1:102; 3:989–990, 1017
Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), 2:607
Victor v. Nebraska (1994), 1:78
Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974), 2:636; 3:998–999
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. (1976), 1:72, 98, 149, 201; 3:1003–1004
Virginia v. Black (2003), 2:375, 379, 445–446; 3:1006–1007

W

Wainwright v. Witt (1985), 1:139, 257
Walker v. Birmingham (1967), 1:228
Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), 2:559–560; 3:1014–1015
Ward's Cove Packing Co. v. Antonio (1989), 1:98
Washington v. Glucksberg (1997), 2:529; 3:1022–1023
Washington v. State (1884), 2:367
Watkins v. United States (1957), 1:69, 215; 3:1023–1024

Weaver v. Graham (1981), 1:343
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989), 1:34; 2:528, 711; 3:1024–1025
Weeks v. United States (1914), 1:309, 344; 2:398, 407, 421, 590; 3:849, 852, 935, 1025–1026
Weems v. United States (1910), 1:138, 250, 338, 339
Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld (1975), 2:416
Welsh v. United States (1970), 3:1026–1027
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), 1:288; 2:379, 384, 385, 401, 403, 586, 629, 641–642; 3:1027–1028, 1043
Westside Community Schools v. Mergens (1990), 2:423; 3:1031
Whalen, Commissioner of Health of New York v. Roe (1977), 2:556
Whitney v. California (1927), 1:67, 117, 118, 204; 2:425; 3:1030–1031
Widmar v. Vincent (1981), 2:423; 3:1031–1032
Wiggins v. Smith (2003), 3:1032
Wilkerson v. Utah (1879), 1:138, 250, 339
Wilson v. Arkansas (1995), 2:667–668
Wilson v. Layne (1999), 1:92
Wisconsin Board of Regents v. Southworth (2000), 1:105, 106
Wisconsin v. Mitchell (1993), 2:447; 3:1038–1039
Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), 1:35–36, 129; 2:403, 555, 690; 3:1039–1040
Witherspoon v. Illinois (1968), 1:139, 257
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind (1986), 1:18; 2:353
Wolf v. Colorado (1949), 1:309, 344; 2:398, 589; 3:1026, 1040–1041
Wolman v. Walter (1977), 1:17
Wong Sun v. United States (1963), 2:408
Wood v. Georgia (1962), 2:423
Woodson v. North Carolina (1976), 1:139, 250, 304
Worcester v. Georgia (1832), 2:596
Wyman v. James (1971), 1:12
Wynehamer v. People (1856), 1:26
Wyoming v. Houghton (1999), 1:60

Y

Yakus v. United States (1944), 2:681–682
Yamashita, In re (1946), 3:1044
Yates v. United States (1957), 1:118, 192; 2:425; 3:1024, 1047
Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. (1976), 1:178; 3:1047–1048
Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), 1:94, 347, 348; 2:435, 541; 3:1000

Z

Zablocki v. Redhail (1978), 2:594; 3:1049–1050
Zadvydas v. Davis (2001), 3:1050–1051
Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel (1985), 1:72; 2:549
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), 1:18, 159; 2:353, 560; 3:1051–1052
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District (1993), 1:18; 2:354; 3:1054–1055
Zorach v. Clauson (1952), 1:288, 331; 3:1057–1058
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily News (1978), 3:1058–1059