- Seraphim of Sarov. 1973. The Spiritual Instructions of Saint Seraphim of Sarov. Edited by Franklin Jones. Los Angeles: Dawn Horse.

Sergius and Bacchus

(d. c. 305 C.E.)

Christian martyrs

Sergius and Bacchus were Christian martyrs, apparently lovers, who died in about 305. No information about their early lives is available, though their actual martyrdom has been historically documented. Both men served in the Roman army, initially as members of the frontier force, eventually as officers in one of the elite imperial bodyguard units known as the schola gentilium. Emperor Galerius Maximianus (r. 305–311) held both in high favor and became furious when their allegiance to Christianity was uncovered. After being humiliated by being dressed in women's clothes and paraded through the streets, Sergius and Bacchus were shipped off to Resapha, Mesopotamia, then governed by Antiochus, a former friend of Sergius. Upon arrival, the two men were stripped and tortured. Following a severe beating, Bacchus died. Sergius lived on to endure more tortures, including being forced to run for eighteen miles in shoes that had nails pounded through the soles, and then was beheaded.

The two saints were widely venerated throughout the Christian Roman Empire, particularly in the eastern portion of the realm. Justinian (r. 527–565) had an enormous Byzantine church and monastery dedicated to the saints built in 527 in Constantinople. The church remained a center of Orthodox spirituality until it was converted into a mosque sometime between 1506 and 1512.

Today the Roman Catholic Church celebrates the feast of Sts. Sergius and Bacchus on October 7. However, most of the interest in the Sergius and Bacchus legend today is provoked by their apparent homosexual relationship. Many gay Catholics—and gay Christians in general—view these two martyrs as crucial pieces in the historical understanding of homosexuality in the Christian world. The claim is that if the church has venerated a homosexual couple for centuries, then it has no right to persecute gays today.

—Michelle M. Sauer

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

- Boswell, John. 1980. Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- . 1994. Same-Sex Unions in Pre-Modern Europe. New York: Villard.
- Carnegie-Mellon University. "The Passion of SS. Serge and Bacchus." Translated by John Boswell. <http://www.cs.cmu.edu/afs/cs/user/scotts/ftp/wpaf2mc/serge.html> (cited July 9, 2001).

Sergius of Radonezh

(1314–1392 C.E.)

Russian Orthodox ascetic, abbot

Sergius, an ascetic, abbot, and founder of Holy Trinity, is an eminent Orthodox saint. Born in 1314 near Rostov, Russia, he was the second son of Rostov boyars Cyril and Maria, who were moved by the Muscovite prince Ivan Kalita to the village of Radonezh. His birth name was Bartholomew. After the death of his parents, the twenty-three-year-old Bartholomew and his widowed older brother, Stephan, settled to live as hermits in a nearby forest, where next to their cell they built a chapel, later blessed by Metropolitan Pheognost in the name of the Holy Trinity. When, discouraged by the hardships of eremitical life, Stephan left for the Muscovite Bogoyavlenski monastery, his brother remained in solitude for two more years, taking in the meantime the name Sergius together with monastic vows.

The fame of his virtues soon drew disciples eager for a life of prayer, labor, and fasting. With the apostolic number of twelve brothers, the community surrounded their hermitage with a palisade. This was the beginning of the Troitse-Sergievski monastery and soon the center of the renaissance of Russian Christianity. Although Sergius acted as abbot of the community from 1344 on, he did not hold himself worthy of priesthood and took the post officially, together with priestly orders, only ten years later. The cloister, where Sergius remained until his death in 1392, served as a model of common ascetic life, following Sergius's new monastic rule, and laid the foundations for the religious renewal of Rus'. It gave rise to a network of monasteries covering the whole of northeastern Rus', integrated with the administrative and clerical center in Moscow.

By implementing monastic reform, propagating asceticism, charity, hard labor, and obedience, and inspiring deepest humility, love, and staunch faith, the saint restored to fourteenth-century Russia the spiritual life stifled by the chaos accompanying Tartar rule. Equally important was his presence in the events of the epoch. The internal strife and bloodshed among Russian princes encouraged continuous attacks by the neighboring Tartars that resulted in the political and material subservience of the people. The saint's voice, calling for love, agreement, and oneness, united the people behind Prince Dimitri Donskoi, who defeated the invading Tartar troops in 1380 and established an independent Rus'. After Sergius's death, the community of the Holy Trinity continued to serve throughout the ages as one of the chief centers of Russian spiritual and religious life. His relics, open to pilgrims since 1422, are venerated at the Trinity-St. Sergius Lavra. His feast is held on October 8 (September 25 according to the church calendar) and July 18 (July 5).

—Ewa Słojka

See also: Monasticism and Holy People; Orthodoxy and Saints; Patriotism and Holy People; Reform and Reaction

References and further reading:

- Borisov, Nikolai. 1990. I svecha by ne ugasla. Moscow: Molodaya Gvardia.
- Gonneau, Pierre. 1996. "Monachisme et diffusion de la foi dans la Russie moscovite (14e–16e siècle)." Annales—Histoire, Sciences Sociales 51, no. 2: 463–489.
- Miller, David B. 1993. "The Cult of Saint Sergius of Radonezh and Its Political Uses." Slavic Review: American Quarterly of Russian, Eurasian and East European Studies 52, no. 4: 680–699.
- Schultz, Günther. 1988. "Vom spirituellen Weg des Sergij von Radonezh." Pp. 647–655 in Tausend Jahre Christentum in Rußland: Zum Millenium der Taufe der Kiever Rus'. Edited by Karl Christian Felmy et al. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht.

Seton, Elizabeth

(1774–1821 C.E.)

Roman Catholic abbess, order founder, educator

Elizabeth Seton founded the American Sisters of Charity and the Catholic school system in the United States. She was the first American-born saint. Born Elizabeth Ann Bayley on August 28, 1774, in New York, she was the second of three daughters of Richard and Catherine Bayley, an Episcopalian couple. She married William Magee Seton in 1794, and they had five children before William's health began to deteriorate. He died in Italy in 1803 while on a trip there—with Elizabeth and their eldest, Anna Maria—to recover his health. At this time, Elizabeth was introduced to Roman Catholicism by William's friends, the Filicchi brothers, and their wives. Back in New York, Elizabeth converted to Catholicism on March 14, 1805. Although she was ostracized for her new faith, she accepted the invitation of Bishop John Carroll of Baltimore to move there and found a girls' school, which, in 1808, became the first Catholic school in the United States. Elizabeth took vows as a nun on March 25, 1809, and founded the order that would receive approval in 1812 as the Sisters of Charity. Later that year, she moved the school and the order to Emmitsburg, Maryland, where she died on January 4, 1821.

From childhood, Elizabeth felt a reliance on God. After her mother died in 1777 and her father remarried, Elizabeth and her one surviving sister were sent to live with their uncle in New Rochelle, New York. There Elizabeth dealt with her feelings of abandonment by turning to God and the Bible for solace. During the early years of her marriage, she began her charitable works by helping to found the Society for the Relief of Poor Widows with Small Children in New York. Her arduous decision to convert, and the subsequent conversion of her sister-in-law, alienated her from those New Yorkers who had helped to support her and her children, but she never lost her belief that God would provide for her. By founding a new order based on the French order of the Sisters of Charity, she continued her efforts to help others. Before her death, she had expanded the order by sending sisters to Philadelphia and New York. Despite the deaths of two sisters-in-law and two daughters who joined her in Emmitsburg, Elizabeth never lost her faith in God's plan.

Elizabeth Ann Seton was beatified on March 17, 1963, after healing miracles were attributed to her intercession, and canonized on September 14, 1975. Her feast day is January 4.

—Elizabeth Brownell

Elizabeth Seton, founder of the Roman Catholic school system in America, at the time of her marriage in 1794. (Library of Congress)

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Christianity and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Jones, Kathleen. 1999. Women Saints: Lives of Faith and Courage. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis.
- Kerr, Hugh T., and John M. Mulder. 1994. Famous Conversions: The Christian Experience. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans.
- Partner, Margaret, and Daniel Partner. 2000. A Cloud of Witnesses: Readings on Women of Faith. Grand Rapids, MI: F. H. Revell.
- Seton, Elizabeth. 1987. Elizabeth Seton: Selected Writings. Edited by Ellin Kelly and Annabelle Melville. New York: Paulist Press.

Setuuma

(d. 1975 C.E.)

Native American shaman

A Guajiro shaman from the Pushaina clan of the Peccary, Setuuma lived in Upper Guajira on the Guajira Peninsula of Colombia during the twentieth century. The Guajiro make up one of the largest ethnic groups in the South American lowlands and are dedicated to livestock breeding, especially sheep, goats, horses, and mules, as well as to weaving. Guajiro weavers produce hammocks and bags that they sell to buy food and supplies in the cities, especially Maracaibo, Venezuela.

Setuuma spoke with the ethnographer Michel Perrin about Guajiro practices of ethnopharmacology and the process of becoming a shaman. Perrin recorded his conversations with the shaman in his work (Perrin 1987, 1992). According to Perrin, when Setuuma spoke of the voices of spirits who taught him the names of the healing plants, he referred to himself as “we” or “he.” Setuuma told Perrin about a variety of tobacco that allows the shaman to “see beyond one’s eyes” to aid in the curing of illnesses, explaining that he could raise a dead man to life by rubbing the juice of the plant on the body. In Perrin’s collection of Guajiro elders’ texts, Setuuma narrates a myth that warns against the improper use of the tobacco, declaring that a man who has chewed it feels his arm falling asleep and commenting that this is what happens to shamans. The tobacco protects the shaman from a female divinity who would try to capture him. Other Guajiro called Setuuma “Wise Grandfather” because of his talents.

Setuuma was murdered in 1975 for reasons related to his position as shaman. Shamanic and healing practices are common throughout the Americas.

—Jeanne L. Gillespie

See also: Contemporary Holy People; Intermediaries; Shamans

References and further reading:

- Perrin, Michel. 1987. The Way of Dead Indians. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- . 1992. “Appendix: The Poetic Vision of Setuuma, Guajiro Shaman.” Pp. 181–185 in Shamans and Shamanisms: On the Threshold of the Next Millennium. Diogenes 158 (special issue).
- . “Setuuma chamane indien.” Http://www.archipress.org/narby/perrin.htm (cited July 1, 2003).

Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove

(3rd cent. C.E.)

Daoist sages

The Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove (Zhulin qixian) were a group of poets, scholar-officials, and musicians associated with various Daoist practices during the third century in the vicinity of the city of Jiankang, modern day Nanjing, in China. They were Xi Kang (223–262), Ruan Ji (210–263), Shan Tao (205–283), Wang Rong (234–305), Ruan Xian (234–305), Xiang Xiu (c. 221–300), and Liu Ling (d. c. 265).

The Seven Sages lived during the breakup of the Chinese empire after the Three Kingdoms period (221–277). Disillusioned with the chaotic social and political life of the time, they began a practice of philosophical debate known as “pure talk” (pingdan). This technique was associated with a Neo-Daoist movement occurring during the same period as the self-cultivation practices of Daoism experienced a rise in popularity. In essence, Neo-Daoism attempted to make a philosophical synthesis of Daoism and Confucianism. The Seven Sages were exemplars of the School of Mystery Learning, or School of Mystery (Xuanxue), a philosophical movement that sought understanding of the supreme reality and questioned social conventions. The members of the Mystery Learning group were interested in the spiritual freedom taught in the Daoist texts, primarily those of Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.) and Zhuangzi (c. 369–286 B.C.E.), along with those of the Yijing (Book of changes).

Although the Seven Sages were all Daoist devotees, there was nothing religious in their thought, as they were primarily interested in longevity techniques. They wrote escapist poetry that emphasized ecstasy and withdrawal from society to create a counter society in which everything induces a temporary forgetfulness through drinking, drugs, singing, and music. Through drunkenness they claimed to achieve a feeling of being outside and above the things of the world. With their metaphysical tendency, something new to China, they speculated on “being” and “nonbeing.”

Xi Kang and Ruan Ji were both master musicians of the Chinese zither, or qin, and the banjo-like instrument called the ruan, respectively. Ruan Ji wrote of his Daoist philosophies in the Daren xiansheng zhuan (Biography of Master Great Man) and in his collected poems, entitled Yonghuai shi (Poems of innermost thoughts). Liu Ling wrote his idea of the “Great Man” in his Jiude song (In praise of the virtue of wine). Xi Kang wrote a series entitled Jiuhui (Wine gatherings). The sages were known to wander as a group in a little grove of bamboo, periodically stopping to drink, then resuming their walk; finally, when they were drunk, they would talk and compose poems. Later these seven were considered Daoist immortals.

—Richard A. Pegg

See also: Daoism and Holy People; Death; Morality and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Johnston, Ellen Laing. 1974. “Neo-Taosim and the ‘Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove’ in Chinese Painting.” Artibus Asiae 36: 5–54.
- Pas, Julian F., and Man Kam Leung. 1998. Historical Dictionary of Taoism. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow.
- Spiro, Audrey. 1990. Contemplating the Ancients: Aesthetic and Social Issues in Early Chinese Portraiture. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Seven Sleepers of Ephesus

Legendary Christian and Muslim saints

The legend of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, in both Christian and Islamic tradition, involves powerful, universal symbolism in its themes of sleep/death, rebirth/awakening, the power of the divine, and the strength of faith. Of fifth-century Greek or Syriac origin, the first Latin version, by Gregory of Tours in the sixth century, contributed to the rapid and wide diffusion of this popular tale and its many later variants. The story is an esteemed narrative in Islamic tradition also; indeed, Sura 18 of the Qur’an is devoted to a commentary on the Seven Sleepers.

The core narrative involves seven young Christian men of Ephesus who, taking refuge from religious persecution, were sealed in a cave by order of the emperor Decius in the mid-third century. They would have starved to death in this prison had God not caused them to fall asleep. They slept for approximately 200 years, and when they emerged from their cave during the reign of Theodosius II in the fifth century, they discovered that their city had become Christian. After their miraculous reawakening was made known to the awestruck citizens of Ephesus, the seven men died. They were then venerated as saints, and their cave quickly became a site of pilgrimage (which is popular to this day.)

The story of the death-like sleep of the seven youths and their rebirth after several centuries inspired Christian commentators on the tale to concentrate on the themes of resurrection and the immortality of the soul. In Islamic interpretations, the emphasis is on the necessary submission to the will of God. This virtue is represented by the passive heroes, who triumph in fully abandoning themselves to God’s will.

In Western tradition, the Seven Sleepers are named Maximilian, Malchus, Marcian, John, Denis, Serapion, and Constantine; in Eastern tradition they are called Maximilian, Jamblichus, Martin, John, Dionysius, Antonius, and Constantine. Their feast day is July 27 in the Roman Catholic Church and August 2/4 or October 22/23 in Greek Orthodoxy.

—Leslie Ross

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Islam and Holy People; Legendary Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bertelli, Carlo. 1974. “The Seven Sleepers: A Medieval Utopia.” Paragone 291: 23–35.
- Jourdan, François. 1983. La tradition des sept dormants: Une rencontre entre Chrétiens et Muselmans. Paris: Editions Maisonneuve et Larose.
- Le Roux, Alain. 1999. Les Sept Dormants d’Ephèse. Gourin, France: Keltia Graphic Editions.

Sexuality and Holy People

Is it possible for a person to enjoy an active sexual life and still be regarded as holy? The position of the world religions is strongly divided on this point: Religions such as Christianity and Buddhism that have a strong ascetic element tend to answer no, while religions that focus on the goodness of creation tend to answer yes. The situation is by no means completely clear-cut, however, as ascetic movements within religions such as Islam and Hinduism have emphasized celibacy, while important branches of both Christianity and Buddhism have advocated marriage and procreation as part of a balanced spiritual life. With only one possible exception, the Christian saints Sergius and Bacchus (d. c. 305), who have been adopted as unofficial patron saints of the Roman Catholic gay community, sexual expression has been limited among the ranks of the holy to members of the opposite sex.

Among the monotheistic religions, Judaism is most consistent in its attitude toward sexuality: Every man is required to marry to fulfill a God-given duty of procreation, including even the holiest rabbi. This has been understood not as a negative “giving in to the weakness of the flesh” but as part of the covenant with God. With the exception of the Essenes, who lived a celibate life otherwise alien to their religion, every major Jewish holy person was married. Islam has remained closer to Judaism than to Christianity on this matter, regarding celibacy as well-nigh blasphemous against a God who created a beautiful world, intending his creations to enjoy it. The prophet Muhammad had ten wives, a point that has often been mocked by Christian polemicists as insatiable lack of self-control. But the prophet’s polygamy was really caused by a combination of lack of sexual puritanism in Islam, Muhammad’s specific need to marry to make alliances, and several unions that he made specifically to care for a needy widow. For Muslims, Muhammad modeled the union of married and spiritual life, which is regarded as one of the marks of Muhammad’s special excellence. Some sufis have remained celibate, for example Nasiruddin Chiragh-i Dihli (1276/1277–1356), who was celibate in imitation of his own shaykh and to allow him to focus completely on the life of the spirit, but such a course is unusual in Islam and many regard it as reprehensible.

Christianity is strongly divided on the spiritual pitfalls or benefits of sexuality. From the beginning of the Christian movement, its advocates offered a moral system that focused especially on self-control, above all in sexual matters, turning strongly against Greco-Roman cultural norms on the subjects of divorce, remarriage, abortion, and general fornication. By the third century, sexual renunciation was lauded as nearly a sine qua non for a devout Christian; by giving up sex a Christian could focus more completely on God. This stand was elevated into a central premise of female spirituality, and a large genre of tales of virgin martyrs, such as Agnes and Agatha, reinforced the higher calling of marriage to Christ. In both these cases, as in many others, the virgin Christian (always young and beautiful) refuses a very advantageous marriage for God’s sake, and, at least in legend, is martyred in a manner that is very highly sexually charged—Agatha had her breasts chopped off, and Agnes was at first sentenced to a brothel. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) tells in poignant detail about his final steps before conversion—believing, but not able to tear himself from a sexual life, a step he regarded as essential before he would be a true Christian. Such an attitude was only strengthened in the Western church by the development of the doctrine of original sin, which holds that the primal sin of Adam and Eve’s disobedience against God is transmitted by sexual intercourse. The appeal of virgin martyrdom has continued to the present day, as in the case of the child martyr Maria Goretti (1890–1902), who, at the age of twelve, died of injuries received while fighting off a would-be rapist. Important Protestant leaders have also advocated celibacy, such as Father Divine (d. 1965), the African American founder of the Peace Mission, or Ann Lee (1736–1784), the founder of the Shakers, who argued that the original human sin was sex.

Very few formally declared Christian saints have been married and sexually active. Some medieval married saints were added to the ranks of the holy on the ground that the couple involved lived in chastity—a necessary addition to present the saint as ascetic, even when almost certainly untrue, as in the case of Henry II (973–1024) of Germany and his empress Kunigunde (d. 1039). In the Roman Catholic tradition, Elizabeth of Hungary (1207–1231) is one of the rare examples of a married, sexually active saint. In fact, in the Christian tradition it has been difficult for a layperson in general to be canonized. Since in the Western medieval and Roman Catholic tradition bishops and (since the eleventh century) priests have been ordered to live celibately, while in the Orthodox tradition bishops and monks (although not priests) are also required to be celibate, almost all saints in these traditions lived lives of sexual renunciation.

It was only with the Protestant Reformation in Europe that a large number of religious leaders came to marry and procreate, often marrying, as in the case of Martin Luther (1483–1546), specifically as an act of disobedience against what they perceived to be an unjustifiable prohibition by the ecclesiastical authorities. Such acts of disobedience often put early reformers in serious danger, as was the case with the Anglican leader Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556). In these Protestant cases, sexual reintegration was part of a larger anti-ascetic movement that did indeed produce holy people, but on the grounds of their teaching or their services to society, rather than because of a state of ascetic “otherness.” Among the sects that have branched off of Christianity, Sun Myung Moon’s Unification Church (“Moonies”) is one that stands out for encouraging marriage rather than just allowing it. The centerpiece of Moon’s message is that Jesus Christ could only give redemption to the spirit and not the body, because he was killed before he could marry. Members of the Unification Church believe that Moon himself is now finishing the work of redemption by taking it into the physical realm. The children of marriages blessed by the True Parents (Moon and his wife) are regarded as free from the taint of original sin, a belief that has led Moon to organize mass weddings for his followers.

The religions that rose in India, whether advocating celibacy or not, in general have a more moderate attitude toward sexual desire and intercourse, often renouncing it as detrimental to spiritual progress but rarely with the loathing of the Christian tradition. Perhaps this stems from the fact that almost all Hindu gods are married; moreover, in Hinduism children are regarded as a blessing, a link between the living and the dead. Although Hinduism has had an ascetic tradition from an early age, the standard rule is that one should only retire as a renunciant after seeing the birth of a grandson; the life of a grihastha (householder) is recognized as the second normal life-stage of a Hindu. Even super-renunciants such as Gautama the Buddha only gave up everything to start the path to enlightenment on the day his son was born. Many Hindu devotional saints are devoted to the divine pair Krishna and Radha, many describing the love between the two in highly erotic terms, such as Hit Harivansh (c. 1502–c. 1552). Harivansh is one of many examples of a bhakti (devotional) saint who lived a normal married life—he was married three times and fathered several children; his descendants still tend his tomb in Vrindaban. There are cases of ascetic Hindu saints, such as Mirabai (sixteenth century), who refused to accept a husband, saying that Krishna was her true bridegroom. Nonetheless, she married—only to scandalize people again when she refused to commit sati (widow suicide) after her husband's death. The only Indian tradition that really condemns sexual behavior is Jainism, which believes that sexual acts by renunciants are simply bad, a single act of ejaculation being paramount to the murder of hundreds of millions of sperm. The Jain attitude can best be summed up in the legend of the nineteenth tirthankara (ford-maker) Malli, according to one Jain sect a woman. She was a beautiful princess, much bothered by suitors. So she had a hollow statue of herself made, every day putting a handful of her food in it. Finally, her suitors were shown the image: Entranced by its outward form, they were then repelled by its inner putrescence. This case can be compared to that of the Buddha's follower Ambapali, a courtesan who gradually reached awakening by contemplating the aging of her own body.

In general, Buddhist holy people have been monks vowed to a celibate life. Several great Buddhist leaders have, however, renounced celibacy in a way that parallels the Protestant reformers of Christianity. This was especially true in Japan, where Shinran (1173–1262) abandoned the practice of celibacy as of no use in attaining awakening. Similarly, the Zen monk Ikkyu (1394–1481) openly followed the teaching that the link between man and woman is natural and that no sexual desire is unnatural—he kept a mistress, with whom he had a son. And then there was the Tibetan holy fool Drukpa Kunley (1455–1529), who loved wine and women and was reputed to have had 5,000 lovers.

Besides the ascetic branches of Eastern religions, there are the tantric practitioners, whose special rituals often include sexuality as a tool to spiritual advancement. These rituals, in both Hinduism and Buddhism, can include not only erotic imagery but sexual intercourse. For example, the medieval Hindu yogis known as Naths included tantric yoga practices, including ritual sex and the use of human sexual fluids, to focus their own spiritual power. Similarly, the itinerant mystics called the Bauls rejected celibacy, regarding the human body and its sexuality as a tool to reach the divine. They brought an appreciation of sexuality up to a very high pitch, believing that the union of male and female could lead to a cosmic unity such as was seen before creation. It is important to point out, though, that this was not just sex for the sake of sex. There were careful rules for such sexual practice, and to be effective it had to be based on devotion and divine love rather than on the pleasures of this world. The Hindu guru Mukundadeva (d. 1650) was a major developer of Hindu tantra, teaching the discovery of inner divinity through a range of practices, including ritual sexual intercourse. Similarly, tantric Buddhism, practiced above all in Tibet, includes both sexual practices and symbolism, focusing all of one's physical as well as spiritual being on inner awakening. Thus, many Tibetan lamas have been married, without in this way jeopardizing their spiritual attainments.

Next to Judaism, the religion that has been most consistent in a positive attitude toward sex has been Daoism. Some Daoist schools encourage special sexual techniques to help reach a state of greater self-fulfillment, or even the highest of Daoist aims, immortality. The legend of the Yellow Emperor Huangdi (c. 2000 B.C.E.) tells that he had sexual relations with 1,200 concubines—not only without damaging his health, but as a positive aid to help him reach immortality—because he knew the correct Daoist sexual techniques, combining the yin and yang in a harmonious fashion.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Agatha; Agnes; Ascetics as Holy People; Augustine of Hippo; Bauls; Chiragh-i Dihli, Nasiruddin; Cranmer, Thomas; Drukpa Kunley; Elizabeth of Hungary; Gautama; Goretta, Maria; Harivansh, Hit; Henry II; Huangdi; Ikkyu; Kunigunde; Lee, Ann; Luther, Martin; Malli; Mirabai; Moon, Sun Myung; Muhammad; Mukundadeva; Naths; Sergius and Bacchus; Shinran

References and further reading:

- Brown, Peter. 1988. The Body and Society. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Dreuille, Mayeul de. 2002. The Rule of St. Benedict: A Commentary in Light of World Ascetic Traditions. New York: Newman Press.
- Olivelle, Patrick. 1986–1987. Renunciation in Hinduism: A Medieval Debate. 2 vols. Vienna: Gerold.
- Parrinder, Edward G. 1996. Sexual Morality in the World's Religions. Oxford: Oneworld.
- Runzo, Joseph, and Nancy M. Martin, eds. 2000. Love, Sex and Gender in the World Religions. Oxford: Oneworld.
- Stevens, John. 1990. Lust for Enlightenment: Buddhism and Sex. Boston: Shambhala.

Swidler, Arlene, ed. 1993. Homosexuality and World Religions. Philadelphia: Trinity Press International.

Shabbetai Zevi

(1626–1676 C.E.)

Jewish messiah claimant

Shabbetai Zevi, the most successful false messiah in Jewish history, was born in 1626 in the Ottoman city of Izmir. His messianic career began in 1665 and was greeted with unprecedented waves of enthusiasm. Imprisoned by the Ottomans, in 1666 he was given the choice of execution or conversion to Islam. Despite his choice of apostasy, many of his followers remained loyal to him even after his death in 1676.

Even in his youth, Shabbetai was noted both for his learning and piety and for his aberrant and occasionally antinomian behavior. The latter ultimately led to his banishment from Izmir by the rabbis of the community. He was subsequently banished from Salonika and from Istanbul for the same reasons. He later settled in Jerusalem.

Shabbetai was apparently disturbed by his periodic fits of melancholy and his breaking of the law. In 1665, on his return from a mission to collect funds for the Jews of Jerusalem in Egypt, he stopped in Gaza to consult a kabbalist, Nathan of Gaza, possibly seeking help for his condition. Nathan had a vision in which it was revealed to him that Shabbetai was the messiah. Jews as far away as Germany began to sell their possessions to be ready to travel to Jerusalem in response to the messianic age that they believed had dawned.

A few months later, on his way to Istanbul to convert the sultan, Shabbetai was arrested by the Ottomans, who hoped to quell the social upheavals caused by the movement. He continued to hold court for some months while in prison. Ultimately, in 1666, he was offered the choice between death and conversion. He chose apostasy and spent the rest of his life as a minor functionary at the sultan's court. He died in 1676.

Shabbetai himself justified his apostasy as God's will. His followers responded in various ways. Some returned to their normative Jewish lives. Others, more directly influenced by Shabbetai's message, attempted to explain it away either as an impenetrable mystery (the approach of Nathan of Gaza) or as a slander. Others said that Shabbetai had been occluded. The most radical response was the choice of some of his followers to follow him into Islam. These sabbatean converts were known as the Donmeh, and their descendants existed in Turkey until recently.

Many attempts have been made to account for the response to Shabbetai. Some attribute it to the suffering of Jews in various communities, most often to the aftermath of the massacres that occurred in Poland in 1648. These explanations are not entirely satisfactory given the broad scope of the response, encompassing almost the entire Jewish world. Local events perhaps contributed to the movement, but it also drew on an underlying current of messianic thought in Judaism and in particular on the Lurianic Kabbalah, which gave individuals a role in the reunification of the Godhead through the proper performance of the commandments and infused Kabbalah with messianic aspirations.

—Elka Klein

See also: Kabbalah; Messiahs; Recognition; Reincarnation

References and further reading:

- Liebes, Yehuda. 1993. "Sabbatean Messianism" and "Sabbetai Zevi's Religious Faith." Pp. 93–106 and 107–113 in Studies in Jewish Myth and Jewish Messianism. Translated by Batya Stein. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Scholem, Gershom. 1973. Sabbati Sevi: The Mystical Messiah, 1626–1676. Translated by R. J. Zwi Werblowsky. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Werblowsky, R. J. Zwi. 1992. "Shabbetai Zevi." Pp. 207–216 in Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy. Edited by Haim Beinart. Jerusalem: Magnes.

Shabistari, Mahmud ash-

(d. after 1340 C.E.)

Muslim sufi poet

Sa'd al-Din Mahmud ibn 'Abd al-Karim Yahya ash-Shabistari, a celebrated Muslim sufi poet of Persia during the fourteenth century, is famed mainly for his 1,000-line poem Gulshan-i raz (Garden of mystery). Composed in highly symbolic language, and drawing upon the lexicon of several centuries of Persian symbolic poetry, the poem sets forth the dicta of the sufis on a variety of themes, such as thought (fikr), the soul (nafs), knowledge (ma'rifat), the multiplicity and unity of the realms of being, the hierarchical levels of being, the spiritual voyage (sayr), methodical progression on the sufi path (suluk), nearness (qurb) and distance from God (bu'd), and the evolution of the soul. It was one of the most frequently commented upon works in all of Persian sufi literature; by the middle of the sixteenth century, close to thirty commentaries had been written on it by a number of Persian mystics, both renowned and obscure, the most important of these being the Mafatih al-i'jaz fi sharh-i Gulshan-i raz (Commentary on the garden of mystery) by Muhammad Lahiji (d. 1507).

The poem was first brought to the attention of Western orientalist by the French travelers Jean Chardin and François Bernier, who visited Persia in the seventeenth century and reported the poem's reputation in learned circles there as a somme théologique (summation of theology). A précis of the poem was subsequently translated into Latin in 1821 by August Tholuck in his Sufismus, to be followed in 1825 by his translation into German of a third of the poem, published as “Blumensammlung aus der Morgenländischen Mystik” (Bouquet of Eastern mysticism). The Gulshan-i raz entered into the mainstream of Islamic studies in the West when the Persian text was published in 1838 with a German verse translation by J. von Hammer-Purgstall. In 1880, this text was revised and collated, with several manuscripts omitted by Hammer, and republished in England accompanied by an English translation by E. H. Whinfield. It has since been translated into English several times, although few of these translations have added anything substantial to Whinfield’s rendition.

Shabistari’s only other sufi poetic epic was the Sa’adat-nama (Book of felicity), a work largely devoted to the deliberate poetization of subjects that properly belong to the science of kalam, Islamic scholastic theology. He also composed one prose theosophical treatise, the Haqq al-yaqin (Truth of certainty). Neither of these works is translated into any European language.

All of Shabistari’s work shows a peerless flair for metaphysical penetration combined with an aphoristic skill in synthesizing intricate dilemmas of Islamic theological and theosophical thought. He is unrivaled by any other medieval Persian sufi poet in brevity of output and profundity of content. While in the Gulshan-i raz Shabistari embraces without reservation the teachings of Ibn al-‘Arabi (1165–1240), in the Sa’adat-nama he is more cautious and raises certain objections to him, relying mainly on the “politically correct” Abu Hamid al-Ghazali (1058–1111). His religious orientation reflected that of the Kubrawi sufi order, to which he was probably connected. The philosophical tradition he followed, advocated by Muslim sufi mystics, theologians, and philosophers alike, emphasized attainment of knowledge through: (1) revelation (wahy), (2) reason (‘aql), and (3) visionary unveiling (kashf). These three methods correspond to theology, philosophy, and sufism, respectively.

—Leonard Lewisohn

See also: Ghazali, Abu Hamid al-; Ibn al-‘Arabi, Muhyi al-Din; Mysticism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People; Sufism

References and further reading:

Lewisohn, Leonard. 1995. Beyond Faith and Infidelity: The Sufi Poetry and Teachings of Mahmud Shabistari. London: Curzon.

Samad Muwahhid, ed. 1986. Majmu’a-i athar-i Shaykh Mahmud Shabistari. Tehran: Tahuri.

Vitray-Meyerovitch, Eva de, trans. 1991. La Roseaie du Mystère (suivi du Commentaire de Lahiji). Paris: Sindbad.

Shaka ka Senzangakhona

(1787–1828 C.E.)

Zulu ruler

King Shaka ka Senzangakhona, born in 1787, was one of several chiefs to call on the ancestors through dreams, claim protection for the people through sorcery, treat the army during battle, and perform rainmaking rituals in southeastern Africa during the nineteenth century. These were well-established features of chieftainship among large and small groups in the region. Many early writers believed that Shaka’s position resembled divine kingship. However, Shaka was not deified or worshipped.

Henry Fynn described Shaka as “given to dreams and necromancy” (Fynn 1969 [1950], 31–32). Eileen Krige suggested that one of the king’s roles was that of “tribal medicine man,” but at the same time she said that “the king has a right to be a sorcerer” (Krige 1963, 243). Sorcery, however, was the secret and unlawful use of medicines. The use of medicines by chiefs, including Shaka, features strongly in oral traditions for curing ills, protection, and influencing nature. Chiefs used medicines for both offense (to overcome an enemy) and defense (to protect oneself, army, or community), and recognition as one possessing umlingo (miraculous power, awe-inspiring magical performance) was important.

There were rules governing the materials, knowledge, and methods of application. The king prepared the medicines himself, and apparently no one was allowed to disturb him when this was being done. Stirring could be done by others, but strict rules applied. To break them would be criminal. Some medicines were for the general population, while others were considered so powerful that they could only be used or possessed by diviners/doctors and chiefs—the chief first and foremost. Chiefs were believed to have the ability to “feel” the presence of “great” medicines being unlawfully possessed, and they had the right to demand the surrender of such substances for the good of all. Possession of powerful medicine could cause a person to “fall down.” Henry Callaway’s evidence indicates that the vessel of the chief (most likely a symbol or relic of chiefship) and the medicine mixed in it was thought to protect the chief and give him foresight and influence; “his vessel is a diviner to him” (Callaway, 1970 [1870], 342).

There are many reports of Shaka’s use of special medicines. He treated the father of one of James Stuart’s informants when he was injured. Another described an incident following a battle in which two of Shaka’s men were wounded and the king treated them in his own home. Callaway’s informant mentioned Shaka’s prominence in rainmaking practices. J. Weir (2000) argued that a great many recorded wars were marked by struggles for control of ritual power, special medicines, and important practitioners of the rites of rainmaking and divination.

—Jennifer Weir

See also: African Religions and Holy People; Miracles; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

Bryant, A. T. 1929. Olden Times in Zululand and Natal. London: Longmans.

- Callaway, H. 1970 [1870]. The Religious System of the AmaZulu. Cape Town: Stuik.
- Fynn, H. F. 1969 [1950]. The Diary of Henry Francis Fynn. Edited by J. Stuart and D. McK Malcolm. Pietermaritzburg, South Africa: Shuter and Shooter.
- Krige, Eileen. 1963. Culture Contact in Africa South of the Sahara. Johannesburg: South African Institute of Race Relations.
- Weir, J. 2000. "Ideology and Religion: The Missing Link in Explanations for the Rise and Persistence of the Zulu State." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Western Australia.
- Willoughby, W. C. 1928. The Soul of the Bantu. New York: Doubleday.

Shakra (Indra)

Hindu hero, god; Buddhist devotee

Shakra (Sakka in Pali), also known by the name Indra, is the king of the devas (gods) in Hinduism and Buddhism. Indra was the most prominent deity in the Vedic pantheon, a great warrior god who wields the thunderbolt, leads devas into battle against demons, and rules gods and humans. He came to be incorporated into Buddhism as Shakra, a benevolent sovereign of the heavens, where he resides in a celestial palace and observes all happenings on earth.

The story of Shakra's conversion to Buddhism is told in the Pali scriptures, when he questions the Buddha and is won over by his moral and religious teachings. Thereafter, while Shakra retains the glory and emblems of divine kingship in Buddhist art and legend, he becomes a faithful and gentle devotee of the Buddha. He is often depicted in art with an elaborate regal headdress, mounted atop his royal elephant Airavata, and making a gesture of homage and service to the Buddha. He is known across Asia as a model of kingship and a guardian deity of Buddhism. In certain periods, kings and emperors in Southeast Asia and elsewhere have claimed identity with him in order to confer divine sanction and eminence on their rule.

Shakra witnessed many of the crucial moments of the Buddha's career. In some biographies of the Buddha, Shakra was present at the birth of Siddhartha Gautama. Siddhartha's mother, Queen Maya, gave birth standing up and leaning against a tree. As the baby emerged from Maya's side, he was received into Shakra's outstretched arms onto a piece of cloth. At Siddhartha's great renunciation, he cut off his hair and the topknot flew into the sky. Shakra caught it and placed it in a jeweled casket in his heaven, thus presiding over the first cult of relics. He was present at the night of Gautama's enlightenment, at his first sermon, and at his final passing away.

As recounted in the Jatakas (Birth stories of the Buddha), Shakra frequently appears as a main character in stories of the Buddha's previous lives. He stands as divine witness to the great deeds of the bodhisattva (enlightened being) and registers astonishment and admiration at his noble acts.

Sometimes he appears on earth in various guises in order to test the bodhisattva's resolve or to play an indispensable role in the plot. According to legend, when a great person does something extraordinary, Shakra's divine throne heats up, prompting him to investigate the matter out of fear that someone may be vying for his position.

Shakra, like all devas, is not immortal, though he does live for thousands of years. When he dies he passes on to another birth and is succeeded by someone of great merit. The bodhisattva himself once reportedly obtained birth as Shakra, and in that lifetime he exemplified righteous kingship and glorious valor as a warrior. The story takes a Buddhist turn when, owing to his great tenderness of heart, the bodhisattva turns back from battle in order to keep from crushing a nest of baby birds.

Some Mahayana texts employ a metaphor, called "Indra's net," to portray the Buddhist truth of the mutual interdependence of all things. The net has jewels at the knots, and each jewel reflects the image of every other jewel in an infinite matrix of reflections.

—Maria Heim

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Gautama; Gods on Earth; Hinduism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bakshi, Dwijendra Nath. 1979. Hindu Divinities in Japanese Buddhist Pantheon. Calcutta: Benten.
- Khoroché, Peter. 1989. Once the Buddha Was a Monkey: Arya Sura's Jatakamala. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Sahai, Bhagwant. 1975. Iconography of Minor Hindu and Buddhist Deities. New Delhi: Abhinav.

Shaku Sōen

(1859–1919 C.E.)

Zen Buddhist abbot, scholar

Shaku Sōen (also known as Shaku Soyen and Kōgaku Sōen), a monk and abbot of the Rinzaï sect of Zen Buddhism, was born in Takahama, Japan (in present-day Fukui prefecture) in 1859. One of the first generation of academic religious scholars in modern Japan, Sōen took advantage of the open intellectual climate of the Meiji era (1868–1912) to supplement his youthful Zen training at Myōshinji and Engakuji temples with a modern course of study at the newly established, Western-style Keio University in 1884. A disciple of the progressive abbot Imakita Kōsen, Sōen was permitted to travel abroad in 1887 to cultivate relations with monastic communities in Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) and India. Returning to Japan in 1891, Sōen became the abbot of Engakuji temple in Kamakura a year later.

In 1893, Sōen was invited to participate in the World Congress of Religions at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago. Against the wishes of his monks, he went to the United States and delivered a paper called “The Law of Cause and Effect, as Taught by the Buddha.” The paper, translated by lay disciple D. T. Suzuki, was among the first formal presentations of the Buddhist doctrine in the West, and its framing of the Buddhist notion of causality in such Western-friendly terms as “natural law” helped pave the way for the sympathetic introduction of Mahayana Buddhism into the newly emerging stream of “world religion.” An enthusiastic modernizer, Sōen emphasized the need to reconcile religious tradition with modern philosophical and scientific truths. Befriending editor Paul Carus of The Monist, Sōen agreed to send Suzuki to Illinois to help Carus translate a series of books on Eastern religions.

Sōen served as a chaplain in the 1894–1895 Sino-Japanese War and returned to the United States for a speaking tour in 1905, holding the first American zazen (sitting meditation) session in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Russell of San Francisco. Sōen spent the remainder of his life as abbot general of Engakuji and died in 1919. Several of Sōen’s translated essays have been published in English as Zen for Americans (1987), and his Japanese writings are collected in the Shaku Sōen Zenshū (Complete works of Shaku Sōen).

—Eric Cunningham

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Contemporary Holy People; Suzuki, Daisetz Teitarō; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

Fields, Rick. 1992. How the Swans Came to the Lake: A Narrative History of Buddhism in America. Boston: Shambhala.
Shaku Soyen. 1987. Zen for Americans. New York: Dorset.

Shakyamuni Buddha

See Gautama

Shamans

Shamans are ritual specialists, found in a number of nonindustrialized societies worldwide, whose principal task is ritual curing and whose modus operandi is trance. Shamans also restore luck at hunting and divine to find lost objects or to identify witches, taboo transgressions, and transgressors. Trance, expressed in various culturally mediated forms and degrees of intensity, is usually induced through drumming (on a flat, round or oval shaman’s drum), fasting, and other forms of sensory deprivation. Incense or tobacco, as well as psychotropic substances—especially among Central and South American shamans—may be used to induce an altered state of consciousness (ASC). A shaman has clear recollection of his spirit’s travels and travails in the trance state and may provide detailed narratives of his exploits to the assembled group (or the ethnographer) following his exit from an altered state.

The “classic” or “pure” paradigmatic forms of shamanism are found among circumpolar hunter-gatherers and reindeer herders; indeed, the term is usually said to derive from the Tungus (Evenki) saman, which means “to know” (Kehoe 2002, 8; for other glosses see Townsend 1997, 430–431). Whether other shamanic traditions—including Western “urban” or “neo-shamanism,” which has become popular among Western middle-class urbanite New Agers seeking self-actualization—should be linked to the circumpolar pattern on either historical or structural grounds is a matter of intense debate among religious scholars.

Shamans are men—or, more rarely, women—who claim to have a special closeness to spirits. These they contact and engage, either by summoning them to the site of the shamanic séance or through extra-body journeys to the spirits’ own world, when they are in their trance or trance-like state, in order to restore health to the person treated by the shaman. An experienced shaman knows and understands the spirits, both the good and the evil ones. Especially difficult to handle are the spirits who are morally ambiguous, that is, both beneficent and destructive. Such spirits are unpredictable and capricious—for instance, the Spirit Keepers of the Animals may give or withhold game animals from humans, bringing them either feast or famine, or may bring disease by “keeping lost souls.” The latter is a widespread mystical cause for sickness. Versed in the geography of the spirit world and in the capricious powers of its denizens, the shaman is said to be well qualified to journey to that world, retrieve a lost soul, and lead it back to the world of the living. Another, similar task is to lead someone in the opposite direction, that is, to act as a guide or escort for the souls of recently deceased persons, often over a river, a bridge, or some other barrier, to the world of the dead. The shaman thus sees to the soul’s safe departure from this world and arrival in what would otherwise be a bewildering and dangerous terra incognita.

The shaman is very much a traveler, a mediator between the “middle world” of the here-and-now and the upper and lower worlds, the abode of the many spirits. The shaman shuttles back and forth between these tiers of the shamanic universe, sometimes by moving up and down the mountain, tree, or tube—an axis mundi—that connects them. He may spiritually transform into the shapes of his animal familiars—becoming a bear or deer, lion or antelope—to become more connected to the spirits that inform nature laterally, the animals, plants, inanimate objects, and stones. He is thus both human and nonhuman, in and of this world and not of this world, through his powers of trance, soul travel, and transformation.

The shaman usually undergoes an initiation that confirms or formalizes his role. This usually follows his calling to the shaman’s vocation, which takes place through an intense spirit encounter, typically during the course of a protracted illness or through a vision or recurrent dream—both psychological experiences on which a shaman will draw throughout his life for mystical and spiritual inspiration or guidance. Central to the shaman's initiation is his symbolic and spiritual death and rebirth. His death includes his own dismemberment, as spirits—among the Inuit—consume his flesh and reduce him to a skeleton. His rebirth consists of his reembodiment, with new organs (which may be made of crystals). So reborn and remade, he returns to the world of the humans after having ascended the top of the cosmos to merge with the sun.

The shaman's calling, conveyed by "divine stroke" through direct contact with the spirits, links this religious figure to the mystic and surrounds him with an aura of danger and holiness. It is underscored by his frequently searching solitude and isolation, or going off on pilgrimages to holy places, both actions that consolidate and intensify his contact with the spirit world. People hold the shaman in awe and fear; a certain kind of negative charisma attaches to him that is mitigated and gains positive values through the people's appreciation of the shaman's invaluable role as curer, diviner, and spirit mediator in the spirit of self-sacrifice and self-endangering service.

What also adds to the shaman's charisma, along with renown, prestige, and status, is the dramatic spectacle of his ritual performances. A widespread performance element in "classic" shamanism is ventriloquism, through which the shaman projects the voices of different spirits to different places in the darkened yurt. Among the subarctic American Algonkians, the shaman secludes himself in a loosely built tent or lodge and summons the spirits who speak to him. According to the Algonkians, the spirits sit on the lodge's poles and induce it to shake in accordance with the shaking of the cosmos. The fact that the shaman is tied up with a rope heightens the drama of the shaking tent, all the more so as, at the conclusion of the séance, he has freed himself from his bonds, Houdini-style. Shamans have a special affinity for fire and heat—powerful symbols of shamanism worldwide. Fire is what changes the shaman into a spirit—and as "master of fire" a shaman can endure both internal and external heat, for instance by handling or walking over burning embers and glowing coals. Also laden with symbolic and cosmological import is the shaman's fringed leather costume, which is be-decked with arcane embroidered figures and designs. Hanging from it are animal bones and parts, stuffed small animals, mirrors, and metal plates to ward off or attract spirits. Another highly dramatic spectacle is the shamans' contest, consisting of two shamans in ritual combat who hurl magical objects (crystals, porcupine quills, dirt) at each other.

Yet, for all his special trancing and spirit powers, his status, awe, and charisma, the shaman is also a common mortal. He is married and has children and kin; his shamanic activities are his "work," which he may perform more or less full-time while fellow band members hunt or gather food or herd reindeer. He is of normal disposition; the notion of the shaman as psychotic and unstable is now largely discredited as an instance of Western evolutionist, romanticist, and rationalistic distortion and projection onto non-Western "primitive" religion of the "tribal Other." As the "wounded healer," who, having healed himself, heals others of the same illnesses that afflict him, he is existentially linked with normal humans. More than anything else, what makes the shaman human is that his ritual services are directed toward the community to deal with afflictions that beset his fellow humans. Unlike the Western, urban, New Age "neo-shaman," who seeks self-fulfillment through the "shaman's path," the indigenous shaman works for the benefit of the members of his band or village.

The shaman thus shares with other holy people the quality of being at once human and spirit, of this world and set apart. People seek and get help from him when they are afflicted; this is his work. That work also renders him more than human, as it takes him, through trance, into the world of spirits, who see him as one of their own. So do the people, on whose behalf he engages the spirits through flamboyant, highly public ritual performances that bring the spirits palpably close to mortals and make the geography of their world real to the people. Through him, their physical lives gain security and their spiritual lives are given contours and content. He is the catalyst in humans' attunement to the divine.

—Mathias Guenther

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Ethnopharmacology; Hermits; Intermediaries; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Atkinson, Jane M. 1992. "Shamanisms Today." Annual Review of Anthropology 21: 307–330.
- Eliade, Mircea. 1964. Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Furst, Peter, ed. 1972. Flesh of the Gods: The Ritual Use of Hallucinogens. New York: Praeger.
- Halifax, Joan. 1982. Shaman, the Wounded Healer. New York: Crossroads.
- Harner, Michael. 1980. The Way of the Shaman. New York: Harper and Row.
- Kehoe, Alice. 2000. Shamans and Religion. Prospect Heights, IL: Waveland.
- Lessa, William A., and Evon Z. Vogt, eds. 1979. Reader in Comparative Religion, 4th ed. New York: Harper and Row.
- Townsend, Joan B. 1997. "Shamanism." Pp. 429–470 in Anthropology of Religion: A Handbook. Edited by Stephen D. Glazier. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Shams-i Tabrizi

(c. 1180–c. 1247 C.E.)

Muslim sufi

Shamsuddin (Shams-i) Tabrizi, the "Sun of Faith from Tabriz," born in about 1180, was the spiritual mentor of Mevlana

Jelaluddin Rumi, who catalyzed Rumi's transformation from distinguished scholar-shaykh to impassioned poet-lover. Frequently playing on the meaning of Shams's name, Rumi described Shams—his perfect beloved, zia al-haqq (light of reality), and khworshid-e lotf (sun of grace)—as the divine presence in human form. Although depicted as a wild, antinomian, qalandar dervish, Shams was described by Rumi's son, Sultan Walad (1284–1312) as a man of “knowledge and learning” and “an eloquent author.” While staunchly challenging blind imitation, Shams also studied Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh), mathematics, and astronomy. Shams's writings, the Maqalat (Discourses), were compiled from students' notes.

Shams studied under five sufi shaykhs during extensive travels and in Damascus. His wide travel gained him the sobriquet Shams-i Perende (flying sun). Shams considered his teachers limited in their experience of truth and sought one whose “heart was inspired by God,” that is, who knew truth for himself. He claimed Uwaysi initiation, that is, investiture with the cloak of spiritual companionship by the prophet Muhammad during a dream.

Shams advocated radical adherence to the prophet Muhammad's example (sunna), demanding not just imitation but exact emulation of his spiritual attainment, making Muhammad the ultimate measure: “The meaning of the Book of God is not the text, it is the man who guides. He is the Book of God; he is its verses; he is scripture.” By “following the Prophet” (mutaba'at an-nabi), Shams meant even achieving one's own heavenly ascension (mi'raj).

Heeding a dream, Shams approached Rumi in Konya on November 29, 1244, and asked who was greater, the prophet Muhammad or the sufi saint Abu Yazid al-Bistami (d. c. 864). Citing al-Bistami's utterance, “Glory be to Me; How great is My Majesty,” Shams asked Rumi why the prophet Muhammad had only said, “Glory be to You; we have not known You in truth as You should be known.” Hearing this, Rumi felt his mind set ablaze and answered that while Abu Yazid had quenched his thirst in a cup, the prophet's limitless thirst reflected his superior station.

In another account, Shams appeared in Rumi's library and asked, “What are these?” Rumi answered, “You wouldn't understand.” As the books blazed into flames, Rumi asked, “What's this?” Shams replied, “You wouldn't understand.” From this first “meeting of the two seas” (marj al-bahrayn), they entered together into prolonged seclusion for spiritual companionship (sohbet). Their relationship later became the virtual icon and archetype of sohbet. Shams esteemed Rumi as worthy of sainthood and one to whom he had “pledged [his] head.” In addition to inaugurating Rumi's poetic expressions of transforming love, Shams taught Rumi the sema, the “whirling” contemplation of the heart turning toward God accompanied by music, poetry, and zikr (repetition of God's names).

Their companionship led to jealousy among Rumi's disciples, however, and Shams left for Syria on March 11, 1246. Rumi's son Sultan Walad returned with Shams in April or May 1247. Shams then married Rumi's daughter Kimiya, who died a month later, reportedly after leaving the house without informing Shams. After Shams disappeared again, Rumi and his closest disciples searched throughout Damascus, but they returned unsuccessful. By 1250, Rumi stopped searching altogether. Although later accounts narrate that seven of Rumi's disciples murdered Shams on December 5, 1247, textual and historical evidence suggests that Shams might have died while returning to Tabriz. A tomb for Shams rests inside a mosque in Konya.

Sultan Walad compared the companionship of inner gnosis ('ilm ladduni) between Shams and Rumi to that between Moses and Khidr (Qur'an 18:60–83). Evoking Moses' separation, Rumi wrote on Shams's door in Damascus: “This is the station of the Beloved of Khidr.” As Rumi abandoned his external search, he realized: “I am who I search for and he is me.” In his Divan-i Shams (The poems of Shams-i Tabrizi), Rumi used Shams's name as his signature (takhallus), signifying that Shams lived within and wrote through him.

Rumi once expressed the “entire account” of his own life as, “I was raw, I was cooked, I was burned [matured].” In Shams's presence, Rumi was “cooked”; in Shams's absence, he was “burned,” blazing with verses that have continued to captivate readers and seekers everywhere.

—Hugh Talat Halman

See also: Bistami, Abu Yazid; Rumi, Mevlana Jalaluddin; Sufism; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Halman, Talat Sait, and Metin And. 1992 [1983]. Mevlana Celaleddin Rumi and the Whirling Dervishes. Istanbul: Dost Yayinlari.
- Lewis, Franklin D. 2001. Rumi: Past and Present, East and West. Oxford: Oneworld.
- Onder, Mehmet. 1990. Mevlana Jelaleddin Rumi. Ankara, Turkey: Amfora.
- Rumi. 2001. The Pocket Rumi Reader. Translated by Kabir Helminski. Boston: Shambhala.
- Schimmel, Annemarie. 1975. Mystical Dimensions of Islam. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- . 1978. The Triumphal Sun. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- . 2001. Rumi's World. Boston: Shambhala.

Shangó

Yoruba orisha

Shangó, the Yoruba orisha (deity) of thunder and fire, was the fourth alafin (ruler) of ancient Oyo, a powerful Yoruba kingdom that was devastated around the first quarter of the eighteenth century. Some myths describe him as the son of Oranyán, possibly the first alafin of Oyo. Shangó became the patron orisha of Oyo, and his importance in this state was paramount. The alafin ruled in his name and claimed direct descent from him and his father Oranyán, founder of the kingdom. Most sources agree that Shangó was not Yoruba by birth, but Tapá, the name given by the Yoruba to the Nupe, northern neighbors of Oyo. He was the grandchild of the el-empé, ruler of Nupe. This belief survives in Cuba, where Lucumi súyeres (chants) allude to Shangó's relationship with Tapá.

After his tragic death, Shangó was deified to the status of an orisha, and he appropriated the status and roles associated with an earlier deity called Jakutá—the stone thrower. One myth states that while tampering with magic charms, Shangó accidentally burned his palace with his family and entourage inside. The embarrassment led him to hang himself. Another myth affirms that Shangó ruled as a tyrant. He betrayed two of his most prized generals and this treason turned against him. His people revolted and deserted him, and he fled to the forest where he committed suicide. Most olorishas (priests or priestesses) deny this version and strike their mouth with their hand as they exclaim Obá Kosó—the king did not hang.

Though Shangó is one of the most popular and beloved of the orishas, devotees greatly fear his wrath. Shangó punishes lies and deception and the abuse of ritual power. He hurls his edún ará (thunderstones) and directs his wife, Oyá, to send thunderbolts from heaven to castigate the wicked, striking them dead or burning their houses and earthly possessions. Thunderstones are important symbols of the orisha that devotees use in his worship. In addition to lightning, Shangó also punishes with fire. A myth associated with the Ifá oracle describes Shangó as a massive ball of fire in the sky that awaits the command of Olodumare (the Supreme Being) to descend to earth.

Shangó's most important symbol is the double-headed axe, which alludes to his energy and dexterity in battle. Shangó dances to the batá drums, a set of three double-headed drums that greatly resemble the form of his axe. These drums continue to resonate in Cuba, where they are indispensable for Lucumi wemileres (ritual celebrations). Another important symbol associated with this orisha is the horse. Oyo's territorial expansion in the nineteenth century was due in large part to the horse, and many of the Catholic saints who parallel Shangó in the New World are depicted on horseback. In fact, in Cuba Shangó's association with the horse extends to St. Barbara, patron saint of Spanish artillerymen. This correlation led to the creation of an image of the Christian martyr that depicts her seated on a horse with a basket of red apples, a stalk of bananas, and a red rooster, all symbols that the Lucumi associate with Shangó.

In the African diaspora, Shangó is famed for his virility, seductive powers, and incredible ability as a dancer. Many myths portray him as a passionate womanizer. His three wives are Oba, Oshún, and Oyá. His relationship with Oba is poor, but not with his other two wives. Oyá, whom he took from his brother Ogún, is almost his equal in terms of strength and dexterity in battle. She seduces him with her versatile and ardent character. Oyá brings out the best in Shangó when they go to battle, and she leads his armies so that he may enter and conquer. She accompanied him to his sad end. His relationship with the passionate Oshún, whom he stole from Erinle (orisha of fishermen), is completely different. Oshún is Shangó's favorite wife. She is the lady par excellence, the very essence of femininity and sensuality. When Shangó sees Oshún, her beauty mesmerizes him as he falls prey to the hypnotic movements of her waist, which she flirtatiously sways from side to side. She enralls the roaring thunder, which bows at her feet and accedes to her every wish.

—Miguel W. Ramos

See also: African Religions and Holy People; Apotheosis; Orishas; Oyá; Santería

References and further reading:

- Abraham, R. C. 1970. Dictionary of Modern Yoruba, 2d ed. London: University of London Press.
- Awolalu, J. Omosade. 1996. Yoruba Beliefs and Sacrificial Rites, 4th ed. Brooklyn: Athelia Henrietta.
- Bascom, William R. 1969. The Yoruba of Southwestern Nigeria. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston.
- Gleason, Judith. 1987. Oya: In Praise of the Goddess. Boston: Shambhala.
- Idowu, E. Bolaji. 1994. Olodumare, God in Yoruba Belief, 2d ed. New York: Wazobia.

Shankara

(7th–8th cent. C.E.)

Hindu philosopher

Shankara, or Shankaracarya, who lived in the seventh and eighth centuries, was one of the most influential saint-philosophers in the history of Hinduism. In his short life of thirty-two years, he laid the textual foundations for a major form of Vedanta known as Advaita Vedanta, or nondualistic Vedanta. Nearly all later Hindu philosophers have had to take the thought of Shankara into account.

Shankara was born in the village of Kaladi (now in the state of Kerala in southern India) and lost his father while still a young child. He left home at an early age to lead the religious life of a wandering renunciant. During his wanderings, he met with the saint-scholar Govinda on the banks of the Narmada River and became his disciple. Govinda sent him to the ancient city of Varanasi, where he began to teach and attract disciples. He is said to have traveled to Badarinath, the source of the Ganges, in the Himalayas, where he composed his major works. He then began a tour of India and established four seminal monasteries in the four corners of India, all of which are still active today. His biographies say that his life ended in the Himalayas.

Hundreds of works are attributed to Shankara, but scholars have recognized only a few as genuinely his. His commentaries on the Brahma Sutra, the Bhagavad Gita, and several of the major Upanishads, as well as an independent work called the Upadeshasahasri (A thousand instructions), are accepted as authentic. Shankara's main teaching is that brahman, that is, undifferentiated, distinctionless consciousness, is the only true and irrefutable reality. Living beings, being nondifferent from brahman, are also real, but in their qualified forms they are false, the result of unreal adjuncts superimposed on a real substrate. Suffering arises from ignorantly mistaking what is not real for what is real, for example, thinking a rope to be a snake. When ignorance is destroyed by discriminating knowledge, the living beings discover their true identity as brahman.

—Neal Delmonico

See also: Hinduism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Hacker, Paul. 1995. Philology and Tradition: Paul Hacker on Traditional and Modern Vedanta. Edited by Wilhelm Halbfass. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Mahadevan, T. M. P. 1968. Shankaracharya. New Delhi: National Book Trust.
- Potter, Karl. 1981. Advaita Vedanta up to Shankara and His Pupils. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Shariputra (Pali: Sariputta)

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist disciple

Shariputra, also known as Upatissa, was the chief disciple of the Buddha in approximately the fifth century B.C.E. His father, Vanganta, and his mother, Rupashari, were brahmins. It was because of his mother's name that he came to be called Shariputra (Son of Shari). Along with his childhood friend Maudgalyayana (Moggallana), he renounced the world and became a disciple of Sanjaya. But when they saw the Buddha, he immediately declared them to be his principal disciples and they began to follow him. Shariputra attained arahantship a fortnight after his ordination.

Pali canon mentions Shariputra as a dhammasenapati (chief of doctrine). Shariputra's special proficiency was in the abhidharma (higher doctrine). He condemned all magical practices, defeated many heretics, and converted them to the dharma. As a realized master, Shariputra possessed abundant supernatural power and was a charismatic reference point for the other disciples. The Udana (Solemn utterances) mentions him as an energetic person who avoided society, needed little, and liked meditation. He was meticulous about the rules laid down by the Buddha, and in the Anupada Sutra of the Majjhima Nikaya (Middle-length discourses), the Buddha mentions him as the best example of the perfect disciple.

The Buddha considered Shariputra inferior only to himself in wisdom. By virtue of his position as the Buddha's chief disciple, Shariputra considered it his duty to care for the integrity of the samgha (monastic community) and its members. He was well known for his compassion for the poor and care of the sick. Many stories and legends in Buddhist literature tell about his qualities of gratitude and willingness to learn even from those who were far below his status. He was also known for his patience, which is shown by the story of a brahmin who struck him as he entered a settlement for alms.

Shariputra died at Nalagamaka (the place of his birth) some months before the Buddha died. His body was cremated, and the disciple Cunda took Shariputra's relics, begging bowl, and outer robe to Shravasti. Xuanzang (602–664) saw the stupa (shrine) erected over the relics of Shariputra in the town of Kalapinaka.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Attributes of Holy People; Buddhism and Holy People; Disciples; Gautama; Moggallana; Veneration of Holy People

References and further reading:

- Migot, Andra. 1954. "Un grand disciple du Buddha: Shariputra." Bulletin de l'école Française d'Extrême-Orient 46, no. 2: 405–554.
- Nayanaponika. 1962. The Life of Sariputta. Kandy, Sri Lanka: Buddhist Publication Society.
- Ray, Reginald A. 1994. Buddhist Saints in India: A Study in Buddhist Values and Orientations. New York: Oxford University Press.

Sharqawi al-Khalafi, Ahmad, and Abu 'I-Wafa' al-Sharqawi

(1814–1899; 1879–1961 C.E.)

Muslim sufis, reformers, scholars

Ahmad Sharqawi al-Khalafi (1814–1899) and his son Abu 'I-Wafa' al-Sharqawi (1879–1961) were reformist Khalwati sufi shaykhs and scholars of Upper (southern) Egypt.

Ahmad Sharqawi was one of three great shaykhs responsible for the dissemination of the Khalwati sufi order in Upper Egypt. He was nicknamed Abu 'I-Ma'arif, "master of mystical knowledge." Abu 'I-Ma'arif established a retreat center called Dayr al-Sa'ada in Naj' Hammadi, Qina province, which became a center of Islamic learning. Shaykhs of the Khalwati order tend to be better educated than those of many orders; Abu 'I-Ma'arif was educated at al-Azhar University in Cairo and attracted prominent scholars as disciples, including Muhammad Hasanayn Makhluḥ (d. 1936), son of a former shaykh al-Azhar and grand mufti of Egypt, and Muhammad ibn Hamid al-Maraghi (d. 1948), a historian. He insisted on the close affiliation of sufism with mainstream Islam and was considered by some to be the “renewer” of Islam for his age and a reviver of the sunna (following the practice of the prophet Muhammad). He deemed popular religion at the time to be deviant and full of superstitions. Nonetheless, he defended traditional sufi belief in the intercession of the prophets and saints against the denunciations of the Wahhabis. Although the famous reformer Muhammad ‘Abduh (1849–1905) denounced aspects of traditional sufism, he admired Abu ‘l-Ma’arif, who likewise supported ‘Abduh’s proposed reforms at al-Azhar. Abu ‘l-Ma’arif also had close ties with the ruling class. His published works include poems on theology, sufism, and praise of the prophet. During his lifetime, children in local schools memorized his poetic prayers.

Abu ‘l-Ma’arif had three sons. One of them, Abu ‘l-Majid (1893–1929), achieved great renown for his fantastic miracles and remained all his life in a state of gazzb (jadhba), a mental impairment said to result from excessive divine illumination. It was Abu ‘l-Wafa’ who followed in his father’s footsteps as an intellectual and reformist sufi. At the age of twenty, when his father died, he inherited his father’s position as sufi shaykh as well as his contacts with the political and religious elite. He at first wrote on sufi subjects for his disciples but stopped teaching during World War I because he felt that society was not receptive to the sufi method. Nonetheless, he remained one of the most notable religious personalities of Upper Egypt. He participated in the struggle for Egyptian independence during the British protectorate, and his relationship with the leader of the national movement, Sa’d Zaghlul, is well known. Nonetheless, Abu ‘l-Wafa’ opposed the idea of a secular nation-state and retired from politics after Egypt gained formal independence in 1922. By nature he was somewhat reclusive, but he meticulously observed the rules of etiquette and was loved for his humble, respectful demeanor. His son, Ahmad al-Sharqawi, continues to reside in Dayr al-Sa’ada.

—Valerie J. Hoffman

See also: Hereditary Holiness; Islam and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Sufism

References and further reading:

Chih, Rachida. 2000. Le soufisme au quotidien: Confréries d’Egypte au XXe siècle. Paris: Sindbad/Actes Sud.

Hoffman, Valerie J. 1995. Sufism, Mystics, and Saints in Modern Egypt. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.

Shastri, Shyama

(1762–1827 C.E.)

Hindu composer

Shyama Shastri was one of three great Hindu composers living in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. He was a contemporary of Tyagaraja and of Muthuswami Dikshitar, the two other important Hindu composers of his time. Shyama Shastri was born in Tiruvarur, India, in 1762 and moved with his family to Tanjavur in 1781. He did not come from an especially musical family, but he had a melodious voice and a good ear and quickly learned the basics of music from an uncle. He learned Telugu and Sanskrit from his father. When his father invited a sannyasin (renunciant), Sanguita Swami, a former Andhra brahmin, to his home, the musician was impressed when he heard the boy sing and taught him the theory and practice of the raga and tala musical systems. In fact, he remained for four months and taught the boy many features of the music of southern India. He also gave him music treatises. In due time, the youth made impressive strides and was told to listen to the best musicians. He also learned from a brahmin teacher named Adiyappayya who was very learned in music.

Shyama Shastri composed devotional music with Telugu lyrics devoted to the Goddess, Shiva’s consort. His main inspiration was Goddess Bangaru Kamakshi, the deity of the temple at Tanjavur. He also sang to Minakshi in the Madurai temple. He was a highly creative artist, known for rare ragas and rhythmic innovations. Very pious, he sang the relationship of the child calling to the mother. Legends say Kamakshi appeared to him and blessed him several times. While praying on Fridays and other sacred days, Shyama Shastri would weep and lose ordinary consciousness; when inspired, he sang extemporaneous melodious songs. He married, and one of his sons also became a well-known musician. Shyama Shastri died in 1827.

Proverbially, Tyagaraja’s songs are said to be like grapes, with flavor that is immediately enjoyable. Shyama Shastri’s songs, in contrast, are like plaintains—they must be peeled before they are tasted. And the music of Muthuswami Dikshitar is like a coconut—it needs to be cracked open and gradually chewed. Together these composers are known as “the Trinity of South Indian Music.”

—William J. Jackson

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Dikshitar, Muthuswami; Hinduism and Holy People; Tyagaraja

References and further reading:

Raghavan, V. 1979. The Great Integrators: The Saint Singers of India. Delhi: Publications Division, Government of India.

Raghavan, V., and C. Ramanujachari. 1966. The Spiritual Heritage. Madras, India: Sri Ramakrishna Math.

Sambamoorthy, P. 1978. Great Composers. Vols. 1 and 2. Madras, India: Indian Music Publishing House.

Shankar, Vidya. 1980. Shyama Sastry. New Delhi: National Book Trust.

Shawnee Prophet

See Tenskwatawa

Shembe, Isaiah

(1867–1935 C.E.)

Syncretist prophet, visionary

Isaiah Shembe was the founder of one of the largest indigenous churches in South Africa. His claims for magical powers and visions are believed to have begun in his youth. They culminated in his prophetic role when he founded the AmaNazeretha Church in 1910.

His first contact with Christianity was through the African Baptist Church. He was baptized and ordained to preach by William M. Leshega. Shembe eventually left the Baptist Church and his four wives to found the AmaNazeretha Church because he was convinced that Saturday and not Sunday was the proper day of worship, as advocated in the Hebrew Bible. He also advocated more focus on Zulu tradition. In 1913, he established Inhlangakazi as his new church's holy city. It is on this mountain that Shembe gathered his followers every January for two weeks to honor the royal Zulu ancestors and the supreme deity. Later, he established Ekuphakameni near Durban as the movement's holy city. This is where the church celebrates its first fruit ceremonies every year in July. Both ceremonies are marked with dancing and singing with a focus on Zulu religion and practices. Also, Shembe composed significant hymns that are distinctively Zulu.

Shembe's movement kept most of the practices of Zulu religion, some of which are enacted on Mt. Nhlankakazi. Here both the Zulu religion and Christianity are brought together in a cohesive harmony. As a representative of the Zulu religion, Shembe was recognized as both king and diviner. As king, he forms an important link with the supernatural world, making contacts with the royal ancestral spirits. He also became a symbol in Zulu society as the personification of law and representative of the royal ancestors and thus the center of all ritual, a high honor. Just as the king's regalia and sacred articles of the tribe are kept in the royal kraal (compound), Isaiah Shembe's articles are kept in his house at Ekuphakameni. As a diviner, Shembe is believed to have had vivid self-revelations of the ancestral spirits who endowed him with the power to understand mysteries beyond the conception of ordinary mortals. Dreams and visions were constant occurrences in his life. After Shembe's death in 1935, his sons took over the leadership of the AmaNazeretha Church.

—Samuel K. Elolia

See also: African Religions and Holy People; Ancestors; Contemporary Holy People; Prophets

References and further reading:

- Becken, H. J. 1975. "Ekuphakameni Revisited." Journal of Religion in Africa 9, no. 3: 161–172.
- Oosthuizen, G. C. 1968. "Isaiah Shembe and the Zulu World View." History of Religions 8, no. 1: 14–26.

Thompson, Jack. 1998. "Shembe Mismanaged? A Study of Varying Interpretations of the Ibandla Lama Nazaretha." Bulletin of the John Rylands 70.

Shenxiu (Shen-hsiu; Jap.: Jinshu)

(605–706 C.E.)

Chan Buddhist patriarch

Shenxiu was the founder of the northern school of Chan/Zen Buddhism and successor to Hongren, the fifth patriarch of Chan in China. He was born in 605, and as a young man he studied Buddhism and the Daoist philosophy of Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.) and Zhuangzi (c. 369–286 B.C.E.). In 625, at age twenty, he entered the priesthood at Lo-yang monastery. Some thirty years later, he was to meet his master, Hongren, and start on the practice of seated meditation.

Much has been written about the schism that occurred between the Shenxiu's northern school and Huineng's better-known southern school. Shenxiu and Huineng shared the same master but had different teaching ideologies. Tradition has it that there was a competition to see whose insight was deep enough to secure the position of sixth patriarch. Although Huineng was given that honor and his lineage was eventually more successful, Shenxiu's lineage was successful, too, albeit more short lived.

In 675, after Hongren's death, Shenxiu moved to Danyang Mountain in Jiangling. Thus began the real start of his popularity. As word spread, Shenxiu accrued a massive following, and Empress Wu invited him to teach the dharma (Buddhist doctrine) to her and her court. Emperors Zhong Zong and Rui Zong also became his students, and he was known as the "National Teacher of Three Emperors."

Shenxiu's dharma was in line with the teachings of Bodhidharma (the first patriarch of Chinese Chan during the sixth century). Shenxiu taught that the unfettered mind is to be experienced with a sudden awakening through gradual exercises based upon the Lankavatara Sutra. In other words, one sees this unfettered mind through a labyrinth of gradual processes wrought by strenuous work and meditational practices. Huineng advocated a more sudden form of awakening. Shenxiu died in 706.

—Jeff Flowers

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Bodhidharma; Buddhism and Holy People; Hongren; Huineng; Recognition; Wu Zhao

References and further reading:

- Dumoulin, Heinrich. 1959. A History of Zen Buddhism. New York: Pantheon.
- Faure, Bernard. 1997. The Will to Orthodoxy: A Critical Genealogy of Northern Chan Buddhism. Palo Alto: Stanford University Press.
- Ferguson, Andy. 2000. Zen's Chinese Heritage: The Masters and Their Teachings. Boston: Wisdom.

Shinran

(1173–1262 C.E.)

Buddhist sect founder

Shinran was a close disciple of Honen, the founder of the Jodo (Pure Land) sect of Japanese Buddhism. The son of a low-level Kyoto aristocrat, Shinran was born in 1173 and received a thorough education in the Buddhist classics. He joined the Tendai school as a young man but, tormented by sexual impulses, became distressed over his fate in the next life. In 1201, despairing of ever achieving salvation by following the Tendai path, he renounced monastic life. He then converted to Honen's Pure Land teachings. Between 1204 and 1207, he got married and started a family. He adopted the pejorative title "Bald-head," a term that referred to monks who had broken the precepts without any sense of remorse.

Like his mentor Honen, Shinran was influenced by the doctrine that the Buddha's teachings were in decline. He believed that in the degenerate age in which he lived it was impossible for a person to perform a single good deed. He arrived at this conclusion because it seemed that good deeds were self-centered and involved passion. No one, he decided, could perform an act that could bring salvation; if a person attempted to win salvation, he or she must have an ulterior motive, such as a desire to be saved. Within this context, one must throw oneself on the mercy of Amida Buddha (Amitabha) and rely solely on the power of his saving grace.

Unlike Honen, Shinran did not consider the continual invocation of Amida's name to be a useful practice because it suggested that one could do something to win salvation and even that one could rely on one's own power. Shinran argued that a single, sincere invocation of Amida's name was sufficient. Any additional invocations were merely expressions of thanksgiving. Shinran radicalized his religious position by claiming that a wicked person might have a better chance to be reborn in the Pure Land than a good person. He reasoned that a wicked person would be more inclined to throw himself entirely on the mercy of Amida, whereas a good person might be tempted to think that his chance of salvation could be improved by his good deeds. Shinran wanted to be provocative in order to stress the importance of faith. If a person invoked the name of Amida without faith, this was not a genuine practice.

Shinran isolated three elements of faith: a sincere mind, trustfulness, and a desire for rebirth into the Pure Land. The active cause of faith was the name of Amida, whereas the passive cause was the light of Amida, which was equivalent to wisdom and a religious experience of being illumined. In the final analysis, faith was a gift from Amida, a product of his mind implanted in the believer. For Shinran, faith was the achievement of the buddha-nature, which he defined as a state of egolessness. This state involved an awareness of one's evil nature and the need for Amida's grace. Wherever faith existed for Shinran, buddhahood was imminent and truly assured. Once this state was reached, there was no retrogression, because faith represented an indestructible state of mind.

—Carl Olson

See also: Amitabha; Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Honen; Intermediaries; Ippen; Repentance and Holy People; Ritual; Sexuality and Holy People

References and further reading:

Amstutz, Galen. 1997. Interpreting Amida: History and Orientalism in the Study of Pure Land Buddhism. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Dobbins, James C. 1989. Jodo Shinshu: Sin Buddhism in Medieval Japan. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Shinto and Holy People

The term "Shinto" is commonly used to refer to all forms of ritual practice that focus on Japan's native deities, the kami. It is in this sense that the term is used in modern Japanese. It reflects the contemporary situation where Shinto manifests itself as an independent religion, clearly separate from other Japanese religions. Historically speaking, however, this is a very recent development. As a concept, "Shinto" emerged first in the fourteenth century. Institutionally, it did not become established as an independent religion before the nineteenth century.

The concept of Shinto emerged first among Buddhist monks as a specialization within the dharma (Buddhist doctrine). It took the form of series of initiations (called shintô kanjô, in which kanjô translates the Sanskrit abhiseka) into the tantric Buddhist worship of kami. The notion that the worship of kami constitutes a self-contained "way" equal or even superior to Buddhism arose first in the fifteenth century. Its pioneers were the Yoshida, a house of kami ritualists connected to the imperial court. In spite of their insistence on the non-Buddhist nature of Shinto, however, the ritual formats they used were closely patterned after tantric examples. Their bid for independence took the form of a shift of terminology and symbolism. By exchanging tantric and otherwise Buddhist terms and ritual objects for autochthonous, Yin-Yang, and Confucian equivalents, they designed a new ritual tradition that they called Shinto. They stressed the native origin of this Shinto and claimed that both Chinese learning and Buddhism were ultimately derived from it.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Japanese religion developed from a fluid body of intermingling schools and lineages into a series of clearly defined sects. In this process, Shinto, too, gained recognition as a sect of its own. As a first step toward institutionalization, shrine priests were placed under the supervision of the imperial court, mostly through the offices of the Yoshida. This had the important effect of linking the court tradition of kami ritual directly to popular practice. This linkage turned Shinto (in the Yoshida definition) from an imperial into a national tradition. The idea of Shinto as an ancient national cult was elaborated further by Confucian and nativist scholars of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. However, the influence of all this on popular practice was negligible. As in previous periods, kami continued to be worshipped mainly within combined temple-shrine complexes, most commonly led by Buddhist monks.

In the nineteenth century, two forces combined to push Shinto to the forefront of national life: a renewed search for a national identity, and the creation of a new state that was to be governed directly by the emperor. Both were triggered by the encroachment of the West, which brought an end to Japan's relative isolation. Shinto was held high as Japan's national tradition and was led by the emperor as the high priest of the kami. Institutionally, Shinto shrines were dissociated from Buddhist temples in an attempt to restore a "pure" Shinto, as reconstructed by nativist scholars. Shrine rituals were transformed into state ceremonies performed by state-appointed priests in the emperor's name. Shinto became shorthand for the divine essence of the Japanese state, embodied in its unbroken imperial dynasty. This notion was superimposed on popular shrine cults, and attempts were made to use shrines as a channel for instilling loyalty to the emperor and the state in the population.

Shinto, then, arose as an institutionally independent religion in the process of state-building in the nineteenth century. Its direct roots can be traced back to medieval specialists of kami ritual, first tantric ritualists based at temple-shrine complexes, later court ritualists. Indirectly, however, its origins are older. In their turn, these ritualists drew on a classical tradition of kami myth and ritual that was developed at the imperial court from the seventh century onward. At this time, the court set up a nationwide system of regular offerings to kami of selected localities and clans throughout the land. By assuming the prerogative of making offerings to such deities, the court established its right to raise taxes on the crops that depended on the deities' life-giving powers. Also, a mythology of national origins was compiled. These works, Kojiki (Record of ancient matters) and Nihon shoki (Chronicle of Japan), were compiled in 712 and 720, respectively. Here, the emperor and his retainers appear as the descendants of heavenly deities sent to Japan to pacify its unruly earthly deities and govern the land eternally.

This ritual and mythological system was not at the time known as Shinto but can be regarded as a precursor to it. It was organized under the highest organ of the court bureaucracy, the Jingikan, or Ministry of Heavenly and Earthly Deities. It was clearly distinguished from Buddhism in the early ninth century, when kami law (jingiryō) isolated a few major imperial rituals and ritual sites from all contact with Buddhism. At the same time, however, Buddhist rituals were used on a much wider scale to "edify" kami by exposing them to the dharma. This laid the foundation for the later integration of kami shrines in temple-shrine complexes.

Kami ritual, then, constituted a ritual category of its own since classical times, at least within the narrow confines of the court. Shinto developed when this court tradition withered away in the medieval period, and courtly kami ritual spilled out into the provinces. When tantric Shinto schools became a prominent part of the religious landscape, court ritualists from the Yoshida house made a successful attempt at reviving the court tradition, now under the name of Shinto, as an independent, non-Buddhist ritual system. With this, they opened the way for Shinto to develop into Japan's "indigenous religion."

Where are the "holy people" in this history? Can we identify a typically Shinto notion of holiness in people? Clearly, such a notion will contain many layers: from the classical kami cult of the court to (tantric) Buddhism and a variety of Chinese and nativist elements. Yet, in all its variety, the premises for its development were rooted in ritual practice at kami shrines. Shrines are places where priests invoke and interact with the spirits of the kami who inhabit those places. In this setting, holiness may be attributed either to the priests or to the kami. In the first case, people are regarded as holy during their lifetime; in the second case, holy people become a subcategory of kami: deified spirits of the dead.

Priests as Holy People

Holiness in kami traditions is not based on universal principles or moral perfection but defined as a special relationship with specific kami. This relationship is usually hereditary. It has been handed down by a kami to its descendants, or established in an ancient transaction and transmitted within a priestly lineage.

A prime example of such a relationship is that between the Japanese emperors, as heads of the imperial clan, and their ancestor, the sun goddess Amaterasu. In myth, Amaterasu granted her descendants everlasting rule over Japan. In ritual, imperial offerings to Amaterasu in the name of the nation demonstrated the emperor's special relationship with this powerful deity in the present. The same function was performed by sacred objects in the possession of the emperor: a mirror, a sword, and jewels Amaterasu gave to her grandson when he first descended from heaven to rule the land. Myths, rituals, and sacred objects were employed in similar ways by other clans. Court histories record that clan leaders presented their "kami-treasures" to the emperor as a symbol of their submission. "Narrators" (kataribe) from all corners of the land recited clan myths at imperial accession ceremonies, and these myths were incorporated in a court mythology that stressed the centrality of the imperial clan deity Amaterasu.

Since ritualists were conceived as the intendants of kami, it was only a small step to treating them as kami themselves. In imperial edicts (senmyō), the emperor referred to himself as a “manifest kami” (aki-tsu-mikami) who ruled in a “kami-like” (kannagara) fashion; this rhetoric was echoed in court poetry. The daily life of the emperor was permeated with ritual taboos and concerns for purity similar to those pertaining to kami worship. State rituals, both from the kami tradition and Buddhist ones, focused on the person of the emperor as the embodiment of the state and sought to solve or forestall national problems through rituals of healing and reinvigoration of the imperial body.

It was not the person of the emperor that was holy, but emperorship itself. When an emperor retired, all taboos were lifted and he became free to take part in the struggle for political influence. The emperor was kami-like because of his role in worshipping the kami and representing their will on earth, not because of his personal merits or achievements. In this sense, the role of the emperor has been described as that of a “holy container” for the “imperial spirit” (tennōrei). It was his function, not his person, that was treated as holy.

When the kami cult of the court and its clans was dispersed, kami acquired new roles. From protectors of clan-controlled localities, they developed into dispensers of benefits, often under the control of temples. It was in this setting that tantric Buddhist models came to be applied to kami worship, leading to the creation of tantric Shinto. The basic pattern of this tantric worship was kaji (Sanskrit: adhishthāna), a technique to activate the powers embodied by a deity through the use of mudras, mantras, and visualization. In initiations, the initiand learns how to summon and manifest a deity in a mandala, how to visualize himself as the deity and attain union with it, and how to unleash the deity’s powers, both in order to realize his own innate enlightenment and to produce worldly results. Monks of great achievement could “become” the deity they invoked; for Kakuban (1095–1144), for example, it is told that when his temple was attacked, he faced his enemies in the fierce guise of the Wisdom King Fudō Myōō.

In normal tantric practice, the initiand received the rank of ajari (“master,” from the Sanskrit ācārya) by undergoing an initiation in which he attained union with the cosmic buddha Dainichi (“Great Sun,” in Sanskrit Mahāvairocana). In tantric Shinto, the rank of emperor was granted in an initiation that involved attaining union with Amaterasu. As proof, the initiated received copies of the three treasures that symbolized imperial authority: Amaterasu’s mirror, sword, and jewels. In this tradition, then, the title of emperor had lost its clan-specificity and had become an equivalent to the tantric ajari.

The notion that one can become a kami by attaining union with a kami in ritual was adopted and adapted by the Yoshida when they designed their non-Buddhist Shinto. Drawing on earlier attempts at explaining kami ritual in Confucian terms, Yoshida doctrine posited that it was possible to “return” to the “Deity of Great Origin” (Taigen Sonshin) by becoming one with the “deity of one’s own heart/mind.” This mind-deity was seen as an emanation of the Deity of Great Origin, who in turn was derived from the account of the cosmogony in Kojiki and Nihon shoki. The way to this state of union was purification. Purification was a traditional element of kami ritual, but it was now given a new meaning as a mental (“inner”) as well as a physical (“outer”) practice. By purifying the mind, one could return to primeval unity, which was equated with the Confucian concept of union with “the way.”

The emperor was “holy” as a container for the imperial spirit, rather than as a morally superior person. In Yoshida practice, too, it was the spirit contained in one’s mind that was a kami, not the person containing that spirit. As part of their practice of inner purification, the Yoshida introduced a cult in which each practitioner worshipped his own mind-deity in front of a small, personal shrine (reisha). This cult spread among Confucianists as a Shinto equivalent to the Confucian way of becoming a “sage.”

In the same period, a less scholarly type of holy person emerged in popular practice. From the late Middle Ages onward, mountain ascetics (shugenja and other terms) established networks of “confraternities” (kō) with members who were united by faith in the deities of a sacred mountain or religious complex. By undergoing ascetic training, shugenja acquired the ability to mediate the powers of the deities and to invite, perform, and interpret oracles. As “containers” of deities and mediators of their power and knowledge, these ascetics were often treated as living deities themselves. In some places (for example, at Mount Ontake), they were thought to return to the mountain after death and worshipped by their confraternities as divine spirits (reishin).

When Shinto was employed to pull court ritual and popular practice together, this created a tension between imperial and popular notions of holy people. Nativist Shinto, especially, stressed the sacred nature of imperial rule rather than a kami-nature inherent in all humans. Nativists pleaded for a return to the natural harmony of ancient times when all Japanese were endowed with spontaneous reverence for the kami and their representatives on earth, the emperor and his magistrates. The Meiji state drew heavily on this notion. State ideology stressed Japan’s unique “national essence” (kokutai), consisting of a divine emperor and a naturally loyal populace. Shrine ritual was used to express this idea.

In the interest of this ideology, holiness had to be concentrated in the emperor, and worship of others as kami was frowned upon. At the same time, the ideological “cleansing” of shrines alienated believers and drove them into the arms of religious confraternities led by shugenja-like figures. The nineteenth century saw the emergence of a considerable number of new religious groups with founders engaging in kami-possession and revered by their followers as living kami (ikigami). The state was interested in engaging such figures as propagators of its kokutai ideology, and it succeeded to some degree in persuading or forcing them to adapt their teachings accordingly. In most cases, however, this resulted merely in a widening gap between the teachings and the actual ritual practice of these groups.

In all these different guises, the notion of the priest as a holy container of kami-power has persisted to the present day. With state-imposed ideological pressure gone, a wide spectrum of shaman-like religious figures has been extremely active in postwar Japan. The imperial mystique was removed from the main stage of public life in a famous New Year address of January 1, 1946, when the emperor explicitly denounced the idea that he was a “manifest kami.” Yet, the continuation of Meiji ritual (with only minor adaptations) has allowed many Shintoists to maintain that the emperor continues to serve as a kami-like priest of the kokutai to this day.

Holy People as Kami

Posthumous apotheosis has perhaps been more common in kami traditions than the worship of living people as kami. Worship of clan ancestors as protector deities can be traced back to ancient times, as can the belief that the spirits of the dead may haunt the living and strike them with illness, lightning, and other miseries. The spirits of historical people have been worshipped and enshrined both as dharmaprotectors—for example, Shôtoku Taishi (574–622) at Hôryûji in Nara—and as “angry spirits” (goryô)—as in the case of Sugawara Michizane (845–903) at Kitano Tenmangû in Kyoto.

Posthumous apotheosis by Shinto means became widespread as a sociopolitical practice from the seventeenth century onward. This trend was triggered by the enshrinement of Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1537–1598), who reunified Japan, after more than a century of warfare, as the deified protector of the Toyotomi clan-temple, Hôkôji. On his own instructions, Hideyoshi was raised to the status of a dharmaprotecting kami (daimyôjin) by Yoshida priests. His example was followed by Shogun Tokugawa Ieyasu (1542–1616) a generation later. Ieyasu, too, was initially deified by the Yoshida, but his cult was soon hijacked by the Tendai-Buddhist complex of Rinnōji in Nikkō, where he was enshrined as a “great avatar” (daigongen). Shrines to Ieyasu’s spirit spread across the country and set a precedent. In the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a considerable number of domainal lords ordered shrines to be built for their deified spirits after their death. Soon, even villagers erected shrines to venerate the spirits of benefactors of their communities. In Fukui, for example, the Yonaori shrine was built to celebrate the spirits of two town magistrates who canceled an oppressive tax in the 1830s, and in Kaminoyama (near Yamagata) the leaders of a 1747 peasant uprising are enshrined in Itsutsudomoe shrine.

Worshippers entering Shinto shrine, Japan. (Corel Corp)

The Meiji government adopted the practice of enshrining the spirits of heroes on a grand scale. The war dead were honored as “heroic spirits” (eirei) in a nationwide network of shrines, of which the Yasukuni shrine in Tokyo served as the nexus. Shrines were erected in honor of all kinds of paragons of the kokutai, ranging from medieval warriors loyal to embattled emperors—such as Kusunoki Masashige (d. 1336), enshrined in Minatogawa shrine in Kōbe—to nativist scholars—such as Motoori Norinaga (1730–1801), enshrined in Motoori shrine in Matsusaka. The largest effort in this vein was the construction of the huge Meiji shrine in Tokyo, completed in 1922 to commemorate the tenth anniversary of Emperor Meiji’s death.

The practice of posthumous apotheosis, then, was inaugurated by the Yoshida and spread rapidly in subsequent centuries. It drew partly on older traditions of worshipping spirits of the dead but was first routinized as a ritual procedure by the Yoshida. As with the worship of priests as holy people, the apotheosis of spirits of dead heroes was conducted both by the state and on a popular level. In both cases, it was the contest between state and local communities for control over the symbolic capital generated by the attribution of holiness to people that caused practices of sanctification to spread so widely in Shinto traditions.

—Mark Teeuwen

See also: Apotheosis; Confucianism and Holy People; Intermediaries; Kamikaze of World War II; Kitamura Sayo; Meiji Tennō; Patriotism and Holy People; Priests; Rulers as Holy People; Shotoku; Sugawara no Michizane; Tokugawa Ieyasu; Toyotomi Hideyoshi; Veneration of Holy People

References and further reading:

- Blacker, Carmen. 1986. The Catalpa Bow: A Study of Shamanistic Practices in Japan, 2d ed. London: Unwin Paperbacks.
- Ellwood, Robert S. 1973. The Feast of Kingship: Accession Ceremonies in Ancient Japan. Tokyo: Sophia University.
- Hardacre, Helen. 1986. Kurozumikyō and the New Religions of Japan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Inoue Nobutaka, ed. 2003. Shinto: A Short History. Translated and adapted by Mark Teeuwen and John Breen. London: RoutledgeCurzon.
- Miyata Noboru. 1970. Ikigami shinkō. Tokyo: Hanawa Shobō.

Naumann, Nelly. 1996. Die Mythen des alten Japan. Munich: C. H. Beck.

Teeuwen, Mark, and Bernhard Scheid, eds. 2002. “Tracing Shinto in the History of Kami Worship.” Special issue of Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 29, nos. 3–4.

Shirazi, Sayyid ‘Ali Muhammad

See Bab, The

Shivnarayan

(18th cent. C.E.)

Hindu mystic, poet

Shivnarayan, a member of the low-prestige rajput caste, was born near Ghazipur, about 50 miles north of Varanasi (Benaras) in northern India. Although the exact dates of his birth and death are not known, the scholar Ram Chandra Tiwari (1972) places him in the first half of the eighteenth century. Renowned for his asceticism and meditative powers, Shivnarayan is reported to have initiated Mughal emperor Muhammad Shah into his sect. Shivnarayan drew upon the nondualism of the Hindu philosopher-saint Shankara (c. 800), a cosmology in which the human body and the soul are identified with the universe. In a song attributed to Shivnarayan, the word of the guru is likened to an arrow that penetrates the mind of the devotee. When the devotee is quickened by the guru, the universe opens—for the universe can be seen mystically within the human body. For Shivnarayan, the human being and the entirety of creation are thus microcosm and macrocosm.

When the Shivnarayan sect was at its height it was a powerful force in northern India. Shivnarayanis would be initiated into the mysteries of the sect by a guru and renounce all image worship. Unlike most Hindus, Shivnarayanis would bury their dead. Although the sect is now virtually extinct, Shivnarayan’s songs are still sung by members of low and untouchable castes in contemporary north India, particularly in Uttar Pradesh and Bihar. Accordingly, Shivnarayan is often located within the sant or nirgun traditions of Gorakhnath, Kabir, and Ravidas. Indeed, Shivnarayan shares much with Kabir, for both proclaimed what might be called a monotheistic synthesis of Hinduism and Islam that refused to acknowledge the distinctions of caste.

—Mathew N. Schmalz

See also: Gorakhnath; Hinduism and Holy People; Ravidas; Status

References and further reading:

- Briggs, George. 1995 [1920]. The Chamars. New Delhi: D. K.
- Schmalz, Mathew N. 1998. “Catholic Tactics in Hindu North India.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Chicago.
- Tiwari, Ram Chandra. 1972. Shivnarayani Sampradaya aur uska Sahitya (The Shivnarayan lineage and its literature). Varanasi, India: Vishavidhayala Prakashan.

Shoah

(1933–1945 C.E.)

“Shoah” is the Hebrew term for the Holocaust of World War II. The term “Holocaust” derives from a Greek word meaning “burnt offering.” The Hebrew, which means “catastrophe,” is more appropriate to some because the concept of an offering suggests divine complicity in the suffering of the Jews.

The Shoah was the systematic annihilation of 6 million European Jews by Nazi Germany, but the question of holiness surrounding the dead is vexed for both Jews and gentiles. Some argue that their deaths were involuntary and cannot be considered martyrdom in the strict sense of the word; others acknowledge that even though some of the 6 million were nonreligious, their extermination by the Nazis gives them a special status; still others maintain that because religion is at the core of Jewish identity and that identity condemned them to death, they must be considered holy martyrs. For many, however, the question of holiness is less how the 6 million died than how they lived. The Shoah revealed the heroism of many Jews who went to their deaths singing “Ani Maamin” (I believe) or other songs of faith; who protected others; and who sacrificed their own safety to secure that of others. Yom Ha-Shoa, the twenty-seventh day of the Jewish month Nissan, commemorates the Shoah by focusing memory not on the atrocities but on the remarkable acts of courage displayed by Jews during the 1930s and 1940s. The day also recognizes gentiles who risked their lives to protect Jews; the names of these are commemorated at Yad Va-Shem, the monument to European Jewry in Jerusalem.

The philosophy that drove Nazi anti-Semitism was that the Aryan race, of which Germans are a part, is superior to others and that it was the duty of true Aryans to subdue all inferior peoples, including Jews, Slavs, gypsies, homosexuals, and the mentally or physically handicapped. Written in prison before he came to power in January 1933, Hitler’s Mein Kampf (My struggle) clearly articulated this mandate. The Aryan decree (April 11, 1933) defined as non-Aryan anyone having a non-Aryan, particularly a Jewish, parent or grandparent. On September 15, 1935, the Reichstag adopted the Nürnberg Laws, which deprived German Jews of their citizenship. In this way, Jews lost their rights to participate in most professions, to own property, and to operate businesses. They also lost the right to due process and protection under the law from economic and social discrimination, physical attack, and other persecutions. Violence against Jews escalated steadily until Kristallnacht (November 10, 1938), when Jewish shops were looted and synagogues burned throughout Germany. Assassinations, burning of synagogues, arrests, forced labor, beatings, incarceration in ghettos, and deportation to concentration camps increased in frequency and severity throughout the early years of the Reich. On July 31, 1941, Hermann Goering sent a message to Reinhard Heydrich, the head of the Central Security Office of the Reich, authorizing the implementation of “The Final Solution,” the extermination of European Jewry.

Jews were herded into ghettos in preparation for deportation to the camps. Extermination camps were constructed at Sobibór, Treblinka, and Maidanek. In 1941, Heinrich Himmler ordered the construction of the camp at Auschwitz-Birkenau. The Wannsee Conference systematized and coordinated the extermination policy, but in 1943, several of the ghettos and the camps witnessed uprisings. For example, in April of that year, some few thousand Jews remaining in the Warsaw ghetto took up arms to resist the Nazis as long as possible; it took the German army months to overcome the resistance.

At the end of the war, Adolph Eichmann estimated that approximately 4 million Jews had been killed in the camps, while the remaining 2 million had died in other ways, often at the hands of the Einsatzgruppen (special action groups), who were responsible for eliminating Jews in any way possible. Their methods included herding hundreds of Jews together, forcing them to dig a mass grave, then machine-gunning them and hastily shoveling dirt into the shallow graves. They also used carbon monoxide to gas truckloads of Jews, but these crude methods pale in comparison to the efficiency of the death camps.

—Mary K. Ramsey

See also: Anti-Semitism and Holy People; Contemporary Holy People; Judaism and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

- Cohn-Sherbok, Dan, ed. 2002. Holocaust Theology: A Reader. New York: New York University Press.
- Katz, Steven. 1994. The Holocaust in Historical Context. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rozett, Robert, and Shmuel Spector, eds. 2000. Encyclopedia of the Holocaust. New York: Facts on File.

Shoghi Effendi

(1897–1957 C.E.)

Baha’i guardian

Shoghi Effendi was appointed by ‘Abdu’l-Baha to succeed him as leader of the Baha’i faith. ‘Abdu’l-Baha stated that he was to be the authoritative expounder of the Baha’i scriptures and gave him the designation of Guardian of the Cause of God.

Born in Akka in 1897, Shoghi Effendi was the eldest grandson of ‘Abdu’l-Baha on his mother’s side. He chose the surname Rabbani to indicate that his paternal family was related to the Bab. He attended the American University in Beirut and the University of Oxford. During his second year at Baliol College, Oxford, in 1921, his grandfather died; on his return to Haifa, Shoghi Effendi learned that he had been appointed the guardian of the Baha’i faith.

Having decided that it was not possible to establish the Universal House of Justice, the central elected authority of the Baha'i faith, without first having more and stronger national Baha'i assemblies, Shoghi Effendi set about building up the Baha'i administrative order on the spiritual principles laid down in the writings of Baha'u'llah and 'Abdu'l-Baha. In a stream of correspondence, he guided the various Baha'i national assemblies in how to function. The guidance laid down in these letters became the pattern for all assemblies.

By 1937, Shoghi Effendi decided that the Baha'i administration was functioning sufficiently well for him to be able to move to the next phase in the development of the Baha'i faith: the expansion of the Baha'i community to all parts of the globe. He therefore gave the North American Baha'is a seven-year plan (1937–1944). This plan and others led to the Ten-Year Crusade (1953–1963) involving the whole Baha'i world in missionary work. Shoghi Effendi, concerned with enhancing the prestige and establishing the independence of the Baha'i faith, promoted links with the League of Nations and later the United Nations.

In addition to numerous letters replying to questions and guiding the Baha'i world, Shoghi Effendi produced an important interpretation of Baha'i history, God Passes By; a translation of an account of Babi history, The Dawn-Breakers; an interpretation of contemporary events, The Promised Day Is Come; and an authoritative statement on Baha'i theology, The Dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh. In addition, he translated a large amount of the Baha'i scriptures into English.

Shoghi Effendi acquired a number of historically important buildings both at the Baha'i world center in the Haifa-Akka area and elsewhere. He extensively developed the gardens at the Baha'i world center and built the superstructure of the shrine of the Bab and the International Archives building in Haifa.

With regard to his personal characteristics, he was a very modest man (always signing his letters to Western Baha'is as "your true brother, Shoghi") and he never made public appearances. His style of leadership of the Baha'i community was to overlook shortcomings and praise every effort made, to constantly exhort and encourage, to place before the Baha'is a vision and then to challenge them to rise to it, and only to impose his authority as a last resort.

—Moojan Momen

See also: 'Abdu'l-Baha; Attributes of Holy People; Bab, The; Baha'i Faith and Holy People; Baha'u'llah; Intermediaries

References and further reading:

- Nabíl. 1970. The Dawn-Breakers: Nabíl's Narrative of the Early Days of the Bahá'í Revelation. Translated by Shoghi Effendi. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í Publishing Trust.
- Rabbání, Rúhíyyih. 1969. The Priceless Pearl. London: Bahá'í Publishing Trust.
- Shoghi Effendi. 1974. God Passes By, rev. ed. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í Publishing Trust.

———. 1980. The Promised Day Is Come, rev. ed. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í Publishing Trust.

———. 1991. The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í Publishing Trust.

Shōmu

(701–756 C.E.)

Buddhist ruler

Shōmu (r. 724–749), formerly Prince Obito (b. 701), was Japan's forty-fifth emperor and the first ruler in Japanese history who embraced the imported faith of Buddhism and made it a state religion. Emperor Shōmu's reign is also referred to as the Tempyō Period (Period of heavenly peace) because of his aspiration to achieve national unity and peace throughout the nation by means of Buddhism. Emperor Shōmu advocated the Kegon (Skt.: Avatamsaka) sect of Buddhism and ordered, both in 741 and in 743, the establishment of a kokubun-ji (provincial monastery) and a kokubun-niji (provincial nunnery) in each province of the country. These provincial temples were linked with Shōmu's central Kegon temple, Tōdai-ji, in the Nara capital. The model for Shōmu's policy of constructing provincial temples and linking them with a central temple in the capital originated in China under Empress Wu (690–705). This statewide system of Buddha worship was aimed at enhancing the emperor's spiritual authority and directing the Buddha's power to the protection of the nation.

In 728, Emperor Shōmu established a shakyōshi (official scriptorium) within the imperial palace in order to provide temples with copies of sutras (Buddhist scriptures). In 743, following a nationwide smallpox epidemic, he ordered the construction of Tōdai-ji. Tōdai-ji's main hall, the largest wooden building in the world, houses the Daibutsu (Great Buddha), a sixteen-meter-high gilt bronze statue of the buddha Birushana (Skt.: Vairocana), the central buddha in Kegon belief. Regarded by the Kegon sect as the cosmic buddha, Birushana embodies the essence of buddhahood and presides over the myriad buddha worlds, an apt metaphor for the relationship between the emperor and his appointed governors in the provinces. Northeast of Tōdai-ji's main hall is the Shōsoin (treasury), a repository founded by Emperor Shōmu's wife that contains his collection of paintings, glassware, jewelry, textiles, and musical instruments.

In 749, the major casting of the Daibutsu was completed, but the unveiling did not take place until 752. Prior to this ceremony, Emperor Shōmu presented himself before the Daibutsu and declared himself to be a servant of the Three Treasures of Buddhism: the buddha (teacher), the dharma (teachings), and the samgha (monastic community). Never again in Japanese history did an emperor come so close to denying his ancestors among the Shintō kami (Japan's indigenous gods) and his own role as divine ruler of Japan.

—Monika Dix

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Rulers as Holy People; Vairocana; Wu Zhao

References and further reading:

- Kobayashi, Takeshi. 1975. Nara Buddhist Art: Tōdai-ji. Tokyo: Heibonsha.
- Noguchi, Yone. 1941. Emperor Shōmu and the Shōsoin. Tokyo: Kyobunkan.
- Piggot, Joan R. 1987. "Tōdai-ji and the Nara Imperium." Ph.D. dissertation, Stanford University.

Shotoku

(573–621 C.E.)

Buddhist ruler, lawgiver

Shotoku Taishi was a regent of Japan during the late sixth and early seventh centuries and is credited with establishing a more pure form of continental Buddhism in Japan. The second son of Emperor Yomei (r. 585–587), he was born in 573 and was a member of the Soga clan, which already supported Buddhism in Japan. As a result, Shotoku received tutelage in Buddhism as well as in Chinese culture and Confucianism. In 592, Empress Suiko (r. 592–628), Shotoku's aunt, came to power. In 593, she retired from active political life to become a Buddhist nun, appointing Shotoku as regent, thereby giving him a large degree of control over the country.

Before Shotoku came to power, Japanese Buddhism differed from that of China and other regions of Asia. This form of Buddhism, also called Soga Buddhism, had been shaped by Japanese laws and was more concerned with magic and materiality. Shotoku, who had been taught by Korean scholars, practiced a continental form of Buddhism, which focused more on the inner self and selflessness. In 594, Shotoku issued an edict in which he called for the promotion of this more "pure" form of Buddhism.

Buddhism flourished during Shotoku's reign. Many new Buddhist temples and images were created under imperial sponsorship, including Shitennoji and Horyuji. In 608, Shotoku sent students and priests to study in China. They returned not only with a greater understanding of Buddhism and knowledge of the currently favored Chinese Buddhist sects but also with advanced Chinese models for government. At the time of Shotoku's death, there were reportedly forty-six Buddhist temples, 816 priests, and 569 nuns in Japan. Shotoku is also known for furthering Japanese understanding of Buddhism through his commentaries on the Lotus, Shrimala, and Vimalakirti sutras.

Shotoku was deified after his death in 621, and during the Kamakura period (1192–1333) a cult for the worship of Shotoku, called "Taishiko," developed, becoming especially popular among Japanese artisans. Prince Shotoku is often represented as a young boy with his hair tied up on his head and his hands held together in prayer, a reference to his early understanding and devotion to Buddhism.

—Carl Gellert

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Matsunaga, Daigan. 1976. Foundation of Japanese Buddhism. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International.
- Reischauer, August Karl. 1970. Studies in Japanese Buddhism. New York: AMS.
- Saunders, E. Dale. 1964. Buddhism in Japan, with an Outline of Its Origins in India. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Tsunoda, Ryusaku. 1958. Sources of Japanese Tradition. New York: Columbia University Press.

Shramanas

(6th cent. B.C.E.)

Hindu renunciants

The term shramana means "striver" and refers to a class of wandering mendicants that flourished in India in the sixth century B.C.E. This movement reflected a spiritual revolution, radically calling into question traditional patterns of religion in ancient India. These patterns were constructed, articulated, and transmitted by brahmins, high-caste priests and technicians of the premier form of "religion" in ancient India, sacrifice. The so-called Vedic worldview, flourishing from the twelfth century B.C.E., contained within it certain assumptions that were challenged by wandering truth-seekers, whose efforts had a decisive impact on emerging Hindu and non-Hindu traditions. The former included the metaphysical speculation found in the Upanishads, the last of the Vedic texts. The latter included the philosophies of Buddhism, Jainism, and the Ajivaka tradition. Still other groups held positions of skepticism and philosophical materialism.

What gave rise to this intellectual and spiritual ferment? The answer requires some understanding of the Vedic worldview, which harbored within it the seeds of later challenges. The religion of the Vedas was largely a "this world" religion shaped decisively by ritual sacrifice. According to one cosmogony in the Rig Veda (10.129), the macrocosm of the universe as well as mesocosm of society was created by the self-sacrifice of the divine person. Such an explanation of cosmic and social origins implied that sacrifice was necessary in order to re-create (that is, maintain) the universe in its smoothly turning fashion. The sacrifice constituted a ritual reconstruction of the universe, which in turn maintained cosmic and social order. The specific motivation to perform a sacrifice, however, was personal; the patron of the sacrifice, desiring material gain, would sponsor a sacrifice with the expectation that its proper execution by priests would ensure a positive outcome, either during the sacrificer's life or in heaven. But early Vedic confidence in the sacrificial program gave way to an increasing anxiety over the temporary nature of all material and sensible rewards; moreover, heavenly exhaustion of such rewards gradually led to the notion of rebirth, a concept that in no way suggested an “interesting” return to a former life but instead meant a renewed plunge into suffering, struggle, pain, and limitations. In short, increased skepticism over the merits of sacrifice and a developing theory of karma and rebirth set the stage for shramana speculation on the ultimate truth of reality. This process was further stimulated by a rise of urban areas on the upper Gangetic plains, which saw the development of a sophisticated urban elite, perhaps more willing to challenge traditional certainties, subjecting traditional truths to rational critique and the test of experience.

These two criteria seem to mark the agenda of the shramana groups, many of which were in clear competition with each other. The “quest for truth,” based on experience, led to the development of competing metaphysics, here understood as an understanding of reality in its most complete context. The sages of the Upanishads, while affirming Vedic revelation, engaged in penetrating analyses of the cosmos, self, and sacrifice, ultimately discovering the same unconditioned principle of consciousness and generativity at the heart of each: atman-brahman. By “internalizing” the sacrifice, the sage accesses his or her deepest self (atman), which in turn was identified with brahman, the cosmic self. The notion of a unified brahman penetrating all mundane reality implicates a nondual metaphysic. Other shramana movements arrived at different metaphysical conclusions. The followers of the paths of yoga and Jainism asserted the duality of matter and spirit, and spirits, in these traditions, are infinite in number, rather than being one homogeneous immaterial “entity” as in the Upanishads. Buddhism categorically rejected, again on the basis of reason and direct experience, the notion of any underlying, enduring self or substance, whether one or many. Nothing is permanent, including our so-called self, which is merely a conglomeration of physical and mental events. Skeptics questioned the possibility of knowing anything at all, and materialists rejected the notion of any spiritual substance; in this case, “consciousness” did not indicate “soul” but occurred only as an epiphenomenon of physical and mental events. The philosophy of the Ajivakas was strongly shaped by a fatalistic determinism.

Although quite different in their assumptions, these groups shared various characteristics that in most cases included the following: the importance of direct experience of what is taken to be the truth of reality, meditation programs to facilitate such experience, a tendency toward renunciation and asceticism, and the development of a philosophy that articulates the meaning of the experience and offers justification for the spiritual programs that conduce to it. The shramana movement made a decisive impact on ancient India, and its ramifications have rippled through Indian religious history to the contemporary era.

—Thomas A. Forsthoefel

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Buddhism and Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People; Jainism and Holy People; Priests

References and further reading:

- Basham, A. L. 1981. History and Doctrine of the Ajivakas. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.
- Gethin, Rupert. 1998. The Foundations of Buddhism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Pande, G. C. 1978. Sramana Tradition. Ahmadabad, India: L. D. Institute of Indology.

Shripadaraya

(1422–1480 C.E.)

Hindu guru, composer

Shripadaraya, the saintly Vaishnava guru, was a pioneering composer of Vaishnava devotional songs in the vernacular Kannada language during the fifteenth century. He was a leader of the Madhva school of dualistic Vaishnavism, believing that the soul and God may be close but do not merge into one. He founded a monastery, was guru to a great ruler, and also guru to the great spiritual leader Vyasaraya. Shripadaraya is honored as the forefather of the influential Vaishnava group known as the Haridasas.

He was born in 1422 and grew up in a poor family in Abbur village near Channapatna in the Bangalore district. His father, Seshagiriappa, was a village accountant. Shripadaraya made good use of spare moments (when he was not busy taking care of the cattle entrusted to him) studying Sanskrit texts. Yet it was his knowledge of the life and the vernacular language common to the farmers and merchants that became integral to his work in later life. His monastic name was Lakshminarayana Tirtha, but people called him Shripadaraya to honor his achievements.

Shripadaraya was a member of the Dasakuta—the servants (dasas) or devotees of Vishnu (especially in the form of Krishna) from the four directions, congregating at the crossroads (kuta). Known as the Haridasas, these Telugu- and Kannada-speaking devotees followed a system of Vaishnavism taught by Madhva (1239–1318), the founder of Vedanta. Although they usually had families and were not monks, they owned almost no property and often lived on what they gleaned in their wanderings, singing while receiving alms. Unlike most Haridasas, Shripadaraya was a sannyasin, an unmarried renunciant.

Shripadaraya founded a matha (monastery) in Mulbagal in what is now the Kolar district of Karnataka. As a scholar he has been respected for centuries for his knowledge of Vedanta philosophy and logic. His Sanskrit text, entitled Vagvajra, gives evidence of his profundity. But Shripadaraya's originality also has to do with his love of the folk and folk expressions. He was the first acharya, or Vaishnava teacher of the Madhva school, to use Kannada in songs and poems, teaching dvaita (the view that the soul and God are not absolutely the same) concepts to believers in the common people's regional tongue, opening access to those who did not know Sanskrit. He composed many devotional songs and poems for use in the nighttime worship at his monastery. Shripadaraya is well known for the personal quality of sincere feelings voiced in his lyrics. He was the first to compose suladis (a musical-lyrical form employing a medley of different ragas and rhythmic cycles, or talas, in succession to give a series of moods to one narrative structure), which later saints such as Purandaradasa and Vyasatirtha popularized. Shripadaraya also composed in several musical performance forms, including ever-popular kirtanas—colloquial songs often sung with cymbals and tambura (a stringed drone instrument) accompaniment. His lively works were powerful expressions of devotion, influencing the renowned Telugu kirtana composer Annamacharya (1424–1503).

Shripadaraya was the guru of Saluva Narasimha, the ruler of southern India's Vijayanagara Empire from 1485 to 1493, who was impressed with Shripadaraya's spiritual, intellectual, and creative powers. Shripadaraya was also the guru of a disciple named Vyasatirtha—who was destined to become known as Vyasaraaya, a great guru during the reign of Emperor Krishnadevaraya—recognized as one of the most important spiritual leaders of his time in the region.

Shripadaraya utilized music as a vehicle to popularize religious, philosophical, and social ideas. In the Haridasas tradition of devotional singing, the first salutation in the singing program, which consists of a poem dedicated to the earliest Haridasas, invokes the name of Shripadaraya. Shripadaraya composed 133 suladis (devotional medleys), which are known today, and many kirtanas. He died in 1480.

—William J. Jackson

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Gurus; Hinduism and Holy People; Laity; Madhva; Purandaradasa; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Karmarkar, A. P., and N. B. Kalamdani. 1937. Mystic Teachings of the Haridasas of Karnataka. Dharwar, India: Karnatak Vidyavardhak Sangha.

Srinivasan, G. 1972. The Haridasas of Karnataka. Belgaum, India: Academy of Comparative Philosophy and Religion.

Sibyls

Greco-Roman prophets

Sibyls, prophetesses in the ancient Mediterranean world, were associated with several sites in the classical period, often particular caves or springs. Varro, cited by Lactantius (c. 240–320), listed ten sibyls: Persian, Libyan, Delphian, Cimmerian, Erythraean, Samian, Cumaean, Hellespontine, Phrygian, and Tiburtine. The Romans believed that a sibyl had sold three books of prophecy, written in Greek verse, to one of their Etruscan kings, Tarquinius Priscus or Superbus, in the late sixth century B.C.E. The legend relates that this sibyl had originally offered nine books but had burned three after each of two previous rejections. Yet the king was still impressed by this strange woman and upon the recommendation of his priests paid the price originally asked for all nine. These texts, the Sibylline Books, were stored away safely in the Capitoline temple of Jupiter (after they burned, later versions were kept in the Palatine Temple of Apollo) and only read in times of crisis.

The Romans had a priesthood of ten (originally two, later fifteen) men whom the Senate charged with the duty of consulting the Sibylline Books whenever people observed foreboding omens or the city faced danger from a major threat, such as war, disease, or famine. These priests would read the sacred texts and recommend some form of expiation, such as building an altar or temple, providing gifts, sacrifices, or games, or even importing a new deity into the Roman pantheon.

Virgil, in Book VI of his Aeneid, introduces the Cumaean Sibyl as Aeneas's guide to the Underworld and calls her Deiphobe, the daughter of Glaucus. She inhabits a cave in the hills near Cumae in southern Italy. Apollo possesses her body and inspires her prophecies, which Aeneas asks her to speak out loud instead of writing them on leaves that might be easily dispersed. Virgil uses the sibyl to lead Aeneas around in the Underworld and to reveal Rome's glorious future to him.

Sibyls were similar to the priestesses at the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, but they were more symbolic of sites associated with prophecies than they were with an ongoing group of real people. They were venerated and viewed as mediators between human and holy, but only because they represented sacred, prophetic texts.

Sibylline prophecy continued into the Christian world, particularly in the Eastern church. The sibyls as symbols of prophecy survived in the literature and art of the Middle Ages, and Michaelangelo even included five of them on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in the sixteenth century.

—Richard D. Weigel

See also: Greek Prophets; Mediterranean Religions of Antiquity and Holy People; Prophets; Pythia

References and further reading:

Caltabiano, Maria Caccamo. 1994. "Sibyllae." In Iconographical Lexicon of Classical Mythology 7: 753–757.

Kinter, William, and Joseph Keller. 1967. The Sibyl: Prophetess of Antiquity and Medieval Fay. Philadelphia: Dorrance.

Parke, H. W. 1988. Sibyls and Sibylline Prophecy in Classical Antiquity. London: Routledge.

Potter, David. 1994. Prophets and Emperors: Human and Divine Authority from Augustus to Theodosius. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Siddhartha

See Gautama

Sigfrid of Växsjö (Siegfrid)

(d. c. 1060–1070 C.E.)

Christian bishop, missionary, apostle of Sweden

Sigfrid is one of many English monks who undertook missionary work in the remotest regions of Europe during the early Middle Ages. From his base at Växsjö in southern Sweden, he traveled widely throughout the countryside preaching the Christian gospel, winning converts, and establishing an ecclesiastical administration to serve the continuing needs of the faithful. He staffed his new foundations with clergy he brought from England or native clergy he trained himself. Tradition reports that in 1008 Sigfrid baptized King Olaf Skötkonung (r. c. 995–1020), the first Swedish king to accept Christianity. Sigfrid's activities had the enthusiastic support of King Olaf and his son Anund James. Sigfrid lived to an extreme old age, in his last year living quietly in the bishopric of Växsjö. He died sometime between 1060 and 1070. Although Christianity was still a minority cult in Sweden in the late eleventh century, Sigfrid's work laid a strong foundation for its eventual defeat of the pre-Christian religion.

Additional information about Sigfrid, and indeed about King Olaf, is fragmentary or lost altogether. What remains is shrouded in heroic myth and saintly legends designed to serve later ecclesiastical and royal politics rather than historical accuracy. For example, recent archaeology suggests that the see of Växsjö was not established until the mid-twelfth century. Sigfrid's connection with the archdiocese of York in England, and even his origins there, are sharply contested. Further, Sigfrid, the apostle of Sweden, might be the same person as Sigurd (or Jón-Sigurd), the English missionary who worked with King Olaf Trygvesson of Norway (r. 995–1000) in that king's attempt to unite and Christianize his kingdom. Modern scholar Birgit Sawyer has even suggested that Sigfrid is a thirteenth-century fiction created to give the Swedish church a history apart from that of Germany and Denmark.

—Elaine M. Beretz

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Mission; Olaf of Norway

References and further reading:

Edgington, Susan. 1989. "Seward—Sigurd—Sigfrid? The Career of an English Missionary in Scandinavia." Northern Studies 26: 56–59.

Oppermann, Charles J. A. 1937. The English Missionaries in Sweden and Finland. London: Christian Historical Society.

Sawyer, Birgit, and Peter Sawyer. 1993. Medieval Scandinavia: From Conversion to Reformation circa 800–1500. Vol. 17, The Nordic Series. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Sawyer, Birgit, Peter Sawyer, and Ian Wood, eds. 1987. The Christianization of Scandinavia. Report of a Symposium held at Kungälv, Sweden, August 4–9, 1985. Alingsås, Sweden: Viktoria Bokförlag.

Sikh Religion and Holy People

Sikh history begins in fifteenth-century Punjab, the predominantly agricultural region now shared by India and Pakistan. Sikhs revere a successive lineage of ten spiritual guides, or gurus, whose teachings are included in the Adi Granth (First volume), the Sikh scripture. The first guru of the Sikhs was Guru Nanak (1469–1539), a well-versed poet who was born to a Hindu family and traveled extensively during his lifetime. The Sikh community traces its beginnings to Guru Nanak's first followers. In the late seventeenth century, Guru Nanak's ninth successor, Guru Gobind Singh, bade his followers abide by a distinct code of conduct, and many Sikhs keep their hair unshorn and wear turbans as he ordained.

Today, Sikhs practice their religion in places of worship called gurdwaras (literally, "door to the guru") across the globe. Seventeen million Sikhs make their home in India's Punjab province, and an additional 4 million live in other parts of India. Four million Sikhs are also spread among countries such as Canada, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Western scholarship has often branded Sikh doctrine as a compromise between Hindu and Muslim ideals, but the Sikh tradition contends for its own uniqueness.

Basic Doctrine

The Adi Granth's content principally concerns a unified divinity from which all things emerge and that resides in all things. The experience of being estranged from the divine is the problem of human existence and the cause of suffering. Deliverance in human life comes from devotion to this divinity via reflection and meditation, humanitarian service, and adherence to egalitarian ideals. Along with extolling the divine virtues in beautiful, mystical poetry, the writings of the Sikh gurus condemn the Indian caste system's inherent inequities, sound off against the destruction caused by imperial Mughal conquests, and criticize various types of holy people for neglecting their religions' principles. From early on, Sikhs developed a strong sense of communal identity; by the seventeenth century, the community developed a martial culture in order to defend itself from assimilation and conversion.

In the Sikh tradition, only gurus retain widespread, doctrinally holy status, though Sikhs who sacrificed their lives for the community are also held in high regard. Since after the time of the gurus, Sikh practitioners have venerated various individuals as spiritual guides or contacts to the divine, but mainstream Sikhism holds that spiritual authority is vested only in the divine inspiration captured in the Adi Granth's poetry and not in any living individual. Any member of the community, irrespective of gender or social status, can read and learn from this holy text and achieve exalted spiritual states by absorbing and enacting its principles.

Guru

The word “Sikh” comes from the Sanskrit for “disciple.” Sikh life has always been rooted in learning and living the teachings of the gurus—the holiest of humans—beginning with Guru Nanak, whose philosophies and lifestyle are the ultimate paradigms for Sikh behavior. Each Sikh guru is remembered for his unique historical contributions to the Sikh community's evolution. Janam sakhis, or gurus' hagiographies, often attribute miraculous and healing powers to the gurus. These accounts were maintained orally and probably first written down within a century after Nanak's death. Hagiographies for other gurus continued to be recorded in the eighteenth century.

For Guru Nanak, Vahiguru (God) is the Sovereign Lord, the primordial guru, and the source of his inspiration. Sikh hagiographic tradition tells that Nanak arrived in the world on a divine mission to reform the wrongs of the times and establish a righteous path of truthful living. In his own writings, Guru Nanak propounds that Sikhs ought to search for truth and meaning by attuning with the divine order (hukam). Sikhs consider themselves disciples of Guru Nanak and his nine successors and venerate only this specific lineage of teachers, their teachings, and their life accomplishments.

Nanak was born in what is now Pakistani Punjab to a relatively high-caste, merchant Hindu family, and his early years were heavily influenced by Punjab's rural landscape and agrarian culture. Guru Nanak's writings reveal a strong awareness of contemporary political events and the religious practices of Hindus and Muslims, as well as a profound understanding of classical Indian scriptures, of Islamic mystical philosophy, and the development of Indian philosophy and theology. Although Guru Nanak's education was probably focused in accounting, he must have also rigorously trained in scriptural and philosophical history and had a grasp of Devanagari and Persian. Young Guru Nanak found employment in Sultanpur (a diversely populated trading town on a major trade route), was married during late adolescence, and had two sons. Sikh legend suggests the guru began his mystical journey in 1499 when, after disappearing for three days, he reemerged and recited his first teaching: “There is no Hindu and no Muslim.”

Guru Nanak promoted a distinct path of internal devotion and contemplation as the more efficacious religious alternative. He was deeply critical of how brahmins, yogis, and Muslim clerics upheld notions of purity that fueled their egotism, engrossed their followers in futile repetition of religious compulsions, and thereby disconnected all from meaningful living. At the later stages of his life, Guru Nanak settled in a town called Kartarpur, lived a householder's life while spiritually guiding a small community, and chose a disciple, Lehna (1504–1552), as his successor.

When the office of guru was bestowed upon him after Nanak's death in 1539, Lehna's name was changed to Angad—related to a word for “limb,” which indicates an intention to ensure that the second Sikh guru was seen as an extension of the first. The inheritance of the position, however, was not without its controversies—not at the first succession, nor at any thereafter. The sons of the gurus and their followers split off from the mainstream Sikh tradition and formed rival communities. The resulting contention for community leadership is one reason that the Sikh tradition is cautious of venerating figures outside of the lineage of the ten gurus.

Because Guru Nanak's sons laid claim to their father's lands in Kartarpur, Guru Angad left the city and shifted the community's center to Khadur. Here, Guru Angad focused on the community kitchen (langar), which Guru Amardas (1479–1574), the third Sikh guru, developed into a flourishing institution. Guru Amardas's poetry echoed the teachings of his two predecessors. Amardas carried out two communally vital tasks just before his death: nominating Ramdas (1534–1581) as his successor, and founding a more permanent Sikh center at what is now the city of Amritsar. Guru Ramdas took on the task of digging a water tank at that new community center, and this sacred pool became a common metaphor in Sikh literature. He also contributed to Sikh identity by arranging the hymns that became the Sikh marriage rites, by trying to ensure the Sikh community had legitimate legal control over the Amritsar property, and by preventing rival claims to the land, such as those from his son Prithi Chand.

By the time Ramdas's son Arjan (1563–1606) inherited the office of guru, the Sikh community had expanded in pockets throughout the Mughal Empire in Kashmir, Kabul, Delhi, and Agra. Guru Arjan appointed representatives to look after the affairs of these communities and to collect the offerings they made to the guru. Himself an accomplished poet, Guru Arjan combined the writings of all the gurus, their poet-saint influences, and Sikh court poets into one, definitive manuscript where all Sikh ideology was concentrated—the Kartarpur Pothi (Kartarpur scripture). This manuscript was expanded in the 1680s and became the Adi Granth.

The Sikh tradition remembers Guru Arjan as its first shahed, or martyr—a category of veneration that became increasingly important as the community developed. Sikh tradition holds that leading up to Arjan's death, rival claimants to the Sikh guru lineage (mostly sons of the gurus and their followers) used the rise of Mughal Emperor Jahangir to charge Guru Arjan with supporting Prince Khusrau, an alternate heir to the Mughal throne. Before his death in Mughal hands, Arjan is said to have suffered unbearable torture with phenomenal equanimity.

A gilded plaque at the Golden Temple of Amritsar shows Guru Nanak, founder of the Sikh religion, accompanied by Mardana. (Michael Freeman/Corbis)

Sikh tradition tells that the sixth Sikh guru and son of Guru Arjan, Hargobind (1595–1644), militarized the Sikh community in response to its vulnerability, which had been made evident by his father's execution. Guru Hargobind established the center of Sikh polity at the Akaal Takht (eternal throne) in Amritsar. He was also a great warrior and an avid hunter. Guru Hargobind's successor, Guru Har Rai (1630–1661), is known for his tremendously gentle nature, and the eighth guru, Har Krishan (1656–1664), is revered for his ripe wisdom, though he died young of smallpox.

The ninth guru, Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675), spent much time traveling, preaching, and visiting the small Sikh communities that had materialized throughout upper India. According to the Sikh tradition, when he went to the center of the Mughal Empire in Delhi to represent the grievances of a group of persecuted Kashmiri brahmins, he was arrested and executed along with three of his companions at the Chandni Chauk marketplace in Delhi.

Just as the sixth guru had militarized the Sikh community in response to his father's execution, so did Guru Gobind Singh (1666–1708), Nanak's ninth successor, raise Sikh armies to defend the community's interests. As with Nanak before him, Sikh tradition paints Guru Gobind Singh's life as a momentous mission, inspired by God to establish righteous order in the world. At the end of the seventeenth century, the tenth guru formed the Khalsa, a religious order of initiates that became the formal body of the Sikh community. Probably for the first time, Sikh identity took a physical form as keeping uncut hair and wearing weapons and garments to be ever-prepared for battle became part of the Khalsa code of conduct. Himself a poet and patron of the arts, Guru Gobind Singh is renowned as the ultimate and exemplary sant-sipahi, or saint-soldier.

Having established the Khalsa identity, and having fought long campaigns against major and minor hill chieftains, and against the Mughal army, Guru Gobind Singh died in 1708 without nominating a human successor. For about a century after the death of the last Sikh guru, the Sikh community fought hard for its existence under great military threats. For the first time in history, the Sikhs were without a guru, and thus without a divinely inspired leader upon whom the entire community could agree. Though Sikh political and military power was commanded by various Sikhs in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries, no one Sikh religious leader ever gained the widespread religious authority of the Sikh gurus. Since the time of the gurus, mainstream Sikh doctrine has ordained that the office of guru be shared between the Adi Granth (referred to respectfully as the Guru Granth Sahib) and the Panth, the Sikh community.

Authority of Granth and Panth

The Adi Granth's authority is evident in everyday Sikh practice. Selections from the Adi Granth as well as some of Guru Gobind Singh's poetry make up the daily Sikh prayers. Sikh newborns are named from the first letter that appears on the text's left-hand page when opened at random. The central act of the Sikh marriage ceremony involves the bride and groom walking around the Adi Granth four times. As the exclusive repository of spiritual authority, Sikhs interpret the Adi Granth's teachings for advice. The text centers Sikh worship space and the community pays obeisance to it as if it were a living guru.

Guru Gobind Singh is supposed to have sanctioned the authority of a Sikh gathering as equal to that of the guru by saying: "Where there are five, there am I." The Khalsa began with five Sikh volunteers who represented the community because they agreed to give their lives if the community so needed. Since that time, five model Khalsa Sikhs, or panj pyare, are chosen to preside over Khalsa initiation ceremonies, and Sikh decision-making bodies are often headed by a group of five revered individuals.

For long, those Sikhs who had spilled their blood for the community attained exalted status as shaheeds. Beginning with Guru Arjan, the veneration of martyrs and the exaltation of their heroic deeds has been an important Sikh institution arousing the strongest of sentiments, especially during periods when the community was militarily threatened. To this day, the walls of Sikh homes and temples preserve shaheeds' images. At one of the holiest Sikh gurdwaras, Harimander Sahib in Amritsar, a shrine dedicates the martyrdom of Shaheed Baba Dip Singh, a Sikh warrior who, though mortally wounded, continued fighting to defend that sacred place in 1757.

The Sikh community has always set apart its most pious members and contributors with terms of respect such as baba (father) and bhai (brother). Baba Buddha is supposed to have been one of Guru Nanak's disciples, looked to by the community for counsel until the time of the sixth guru. Bhai Gurdas was a close associate of four of the early gurus, the amanuensis in the compilation of the Adi Granth, and the first Sikh exegete, whose Vaaran (Ballads) provides an unparalleled source of information about the early community.

Although Baba Buddha and Bhai Gurdas are esteemed for their close connection to the gurus' lives, non-Sikh poet-saints such as Bhagat Kabir, Bhagat Namdev, and Sheik Fareed are revered for their philosophical closeness to Sikh doctrine. Though they predeceased the gurus, their works were included in the Adi Granth and continue to be part of the Sikh liturgical traditions. Some of Guru Nanak's hagiographies mention the guru meeting and conversing with the prominent bhakti poet Bhagat Kabir, though it is unlikely that this event took place. Bhai Mardana, one of Guru Nanak's first and most loyal followers, is also remembered fondly by the community, and his poems are also included in the sacred Sikh text.

Many contemporary practitioners of Sikhism seek spiritual guidance from and make material supplications to spiritual guides revered as holy preceptors. The Punjabi countryside is replete with such sants, venerated by their particular followers, though none enjoy doctrinal distinction from mainstream Sikhism. Certain religious movements that are peripheral to the Sikh orthodoxy, such as the Namdharis, continue to worship living gurus.

Egalitarianism prevails in mainstream Sikh doctrine as there is no professional Sikh priesthood. Community leaders, decision makers, and custodians of Sikh sacred places are held to high religious standards but are not set apart from any member of the laity. Those who sing the Adi Granth's hymns or read from the text during religious services are expected to do so with utmost reverence, for they handle the divine's embodiment in the form of the eternal guru.

—R. S. Gill

See also: Amardas; Arjan; Gobind Singh; Gurus; Har Rai; Hargobind; Hereditary Holiness; Kabir; Martyrdom and Persecution; Models; Namdev; Nanak; Prophets; Purity and Pollution; Ramdas; Recognition; Ritual; Teachers as Holy People; Tegh Bahadur; Tolerance and Intolerance; Veneration of Holy People; Violence and Nonviolence; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Grewal, J. S. 1999. The Sikhs of the Punjab. New Delhi: Cambridge University Press.
- Mann, Gurinder Singh. 2001. The Making of Sikh Scripture. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- McLeod, W. H. 1996. Guru Nanak and the Sikh Religion. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- . 1998. Sikhism. New York: Penguin.
- Singh, Kushwant. 1991. A History of the Sikhs. Vol. 1, 1469–1839. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Singh, Nikki-Guninder Kaur. 1995. The Name of My Beloved: Verses of the Sikh Gurus. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Singh, Teja, and Ganda Singh. 1999. A Short History of the Sikhs. Vol. 1, 1469–1765. Patiala, India: Publication Bureau, Punjabi University.

Silvester I

(d. 335 C.E.)

Christian pope

Silvester's papacy in 314–335 coincided with a period of great change for the Christian church. Under Constantine, the first Christian Roman emperor, the persecution of Christians was stopped, the clergy was given greater authority and privileges, and the church was enriched by imperial gifts. Silvester, however, played a negligible part in these developments, although later legends made him a central figure in Constantine's conversion.

Nothing reliable is known about Silvester's early life. The sixth-century Liber pontificalis (Book of the pontiffs) claims that Silvester was born in Rome and that his father was named Rufinus. Unfortunately, much of the early material in the Liber pontificalis is legendary, so these details must be treated with skepticism. Silvester may have been a victim of the persecution of Christians under Emperor Diocletian: Liturgical texts from the fifth century refer to him as a confessor (someone who suffers for the faith but is not actually martyred). He was consecrated pope on January 31, 314, and died December 31, 335. During this time, Silvester apparently never left the city of Rome, not even to attend the first ecumenical council at Nicaea in 325. Although the Council of Nicaea, like the earlier Council of Arles (314), recognized the primacy of Rome over the Western churches, Silvester did not assume a leadership role in ecclesiastical affairs. (The account of a Roman council supposedly called by Silvester in 326 is a later forgery.) It is indicative of Silvester's papacy that his entry in the Liber pontificalis mainly consists of a list of gifts given to Roman churches by the emperor Constantine.

Legends giving Silvester a much wider role in the events of his time began to circulate within a century of his death. These legends coalesced in the late fifth century into the Actus Silvestri (Deeds of Silvester). According to this account, Constantine was afflicted with leprosy during Silvester's reign. After having a vision of Sts. Peter and Paul, Constantine summoned Silvester, who converted the emperor to Christianity, baptized him, and cured his leprosy. In the eighth or ninth century, this legend gave rise to a forgery known as the "Donation of Constantine." Purporting to be a letter from Constantine to Silvester, the "Donation" transferred authority over the Western Roman Empire from the emperor to the pope. The document formed the basis of later medieval claims to political power and was not revealed to be a forgery until the fifteenth century.

Silvester's feast day is December 31.

—Stephen A. Allen

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Constantine; Pope-Saints

References and further reading:

Davis, Raymond, trans. 2000. The Book of Pontiffs (Liber pontificalis): The Ancient Biographies of the First Ninety Roman Bishops to AD 715, 2d ed. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.

Fowden, Garth. 1994. "The Last Days of Constantine: Oppositional Versions and Their Influence." The Journal of Roman Studies 84: 146–170.

Morrison, Karl F. 1969. Tradition and Authority in the Western Church, 300–1140. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Simeon ben Yohai

(2nd cent. C.E.)

Jewish rabbi, sage

Simeon ben Yohai was a rabbinic sage and a leading disciple of the distinguished Rabbi Akiba ben Joseph during the mid-second century. In ancient rabbinic texts, Simeon was best remembered for his passionate hatred of the Roman Empire and his equally fierce devotion to the study of Torah. In the most fully developed story (Babylonian Talmud, Shabbat 33b–34a), the Roman authorities caught wind of his constant denunciations and tried to arrest him, so Simeon and his son Eleazar (later an important sage himself) ran away and hid in a cave for thirteen years. Obtaining food and drink through miraculous means, they spent this time in Torah study to the exclusion of all other matters.

When the two men finally came out of the cave, they were appalled to see that other people were spending their time on worldly concerns, plowing and sowing and the like, and their gaze made anything they looked at burn. A heavenly voice instructed them to go back to the cave, and when they emerged again a year later, they were able to devote their learning to constructive ends. Simeon thus offered the ideal model of dedication to the well-being of the Jewish people, of the charismatic power that attached to those who are dedicated to Torah, and of the dangers inherent in such power when carelessly invoked.

A thousand years later, when the Jewish mystical classic known as the Zohar (Book of splendor) began to circulate, Simeon b. Yohai was widely believed to have been its author. It became standard kabbalistic doctrine that the Zohar was a repository of ancient secret teachings that had lain undiscovered for many centuries and only now come to light. Simeon himself thus became a hero not just of Torah study in general but of Jewish mysticism in particular, a charismatic teacher of profound mysteries and a model of pure-hearted dedication to contemplative study.

Simeon's purported tomb in Meron near Safed in northern Israel has become the focus of veneration and pilgrimage; especially on the purported anniversary of his death (the semi-holiday Lag Ba'omer, on 18 Iyyar). On this occasion, thousands gather outside the town, light bonfires, arrange to give three-year-old boys their first haircuts, and stay up all night singing kabbalistic hymns.

—Robert Goldenberg

See also: Akiba ben Joseph; Judaism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Burgansky, Israel. 1971. "Simeon bar Yohai." In Encyclopaedia Judaica 14: 1551–1553. Jerusalem: Encyclopaedia Judaica.
- Rubenstein, Jeffrey L. 1999. Talmudic Stories. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Simeon of Trier*(d. 1035 C.E.)Christian monk, recluse*

Born to Christian parents in Syracuse, Sicily, Simeon was an itinerant monk and pilgrimage leader in the Holy Land, an ordained deacon at the monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai, and finished his days as a recluse in the German city of Trier. The year of his birth is unknown, but Simeon died on June 1, 1035. Information on the saint's life comes largely from the vita written by his friend, the abbot Eberwin, shortly after Simeon's death.

Simeon went to Constantinople at the age of seven to study. His vita reports that he spoke Egyptian, Syrian, Arabic, Greek, and Roman—the common speech developed out of Latin. Following his education, he journeyed to Jerusalem as a pilgrim and stayed there for seven years, working as a guide for other visitors to the Holy Land. For the next several years, Simeon also worked as a hermit's servant in Jordan and entered the monastery of the Virgin in Bethlehem before becoming a deacon at St. Catherine's.

Sent to Rouen on monastery business in 1026, Simeon was waylaid by pirates and ended up at Antioch instead. There he met a group of 700 pilgrims, one of whom was Abbot Eberwin of Tholey. Simeon eventually reached his original destination of Rouen. Once his errand was completed, he traveled on to Tholey to visit Eberwin, and then to nearby Trier, where he met Archbishop Poppo. The two became friends, and when Poppo decided to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Babylon in the years 1027–1030, Simeon accompanied him. Simeon chose not to rejoin his order at St. Catherine's and instead returned to Trier with Poppo.

In 1030, on the feast day of the Byzantine saint Andrew, Simeon had himself ritually "entombed" in the Porta Nigra, a stone gate in the old Roman wall that still partially enclosed the city. With great ceremony and the participation of the clergy and the townspeople, Simeon entered the north tower of the gate, where he would live as a recluse for the remaining five years of his life. He modeled himself after the desert saints of the East and even had a platform constructed so that, like the earlier desert penitents, he could pray while standing upon a column. Simeon was canonized in 1036, within a year of his death.

The miracles associated with Simeon are for the most part concerned with healing; pilgrims to Simeon's grave were said to have recovered from blindness, speechlessness, paralysis, and possession. The cult of St. Simeon grew quickly, eventually prompting church officials to open his grave in 1401 in order to retrieve his relics. Simeon is commonly represented carrying a palm leaf in one hand and a book in the other.

—Kristen M. Collins

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Daniel the Stylite; Desert Saints; Hermits; Miracles; Simeon the Stylite

References and further reading:

- Heintz, Albert. 1967. "Der heilige Simeon von Trier: Seine Kanonisation und seine Reliquien." Pp. 163–173 in Festschrift für Alois Thomas. Edited by Albert Heintz. Trier, Germany: Bistumsarchiv.
- Schmid, Wolfgang. 1988. Poppo von Babbenberg: Erzbischof von Trier—Förderer des hl. Simeon—Schutzpatron der Habsburger. Trier, Germany: Auenthal.

Simeon the New Theologian (Symeon)(949–1022 C.E.)Orthodox theologian, mystic

Noted as a talented mystic, Simeon the New Theologian was a controversial figure in the Byzantine church. He had powerful visions of God as light and experiences of ecstasy in which he saw Christ himself. Yet he was often accused of heresy and had many conflicts with church authorities. Eventually he was expelled from Constantinople, where he had been abbot and spiritual father of St. Mamas monastery.

The biggest influence on Simeon's life was his spiritual father, Simeon the Studite. Although Simeon the New Theologian lived a somewhat dissolute life in the world for thirty years, he was devoted to his spiritual father and followed his teachings. The Studite was a monk at the monastery of Studium, which still enjoyed the prominence it had achieved under its sainted abbot Theodore. Simeon the Studite advocated humility, simplicity, dispassion, love, and patience. Both Simeons expressed their spirituality through the tears that accompanied their prayers and the taking of communion. When the Studite died, Simeon the New Theologian treated him as a saint with the feasts and rituals accorded to saints even though he had not been officially recognized as such.

When Simeon the New Theologian decided to become a monk he was sent to St. Mamas, a monastery that had fallen into disrepair. He quickly became abbot and instituted reforms that rehabilitated both the structures and inhabitants of the monastery. But he had trouble with the monks and the authorities. Exiled from Constantinople, he founded a small monastery where he lived his life surrounded by disciples who were not offended by his expectation of mystical union with Christ or his visions of divine light. Here, according to his hagiographer, he performed healing miracles and inspired others with his compassion.

It was perhaps the intense personal aspect of Simeon's spirituality and his teachings that created such conflict. His teachings were considered dangerous and new because they seemed to center on personal experience rather than Orthodox tradition. The historian Hilarion Alfeyev (2000), however, has demonstrated that Simeon's methods and the form and content of his experience were indeed in conformity with Orthodox tradition, but a tradition older than that active in Byzantium in the late tenth and early eleventh centuries. Simeon had problems within his monastery as well. He expected that the achievement of those mystical, ecstatic states that he experienced would be within the grasp of anyone who sought them. The intensity of this expectation caused resentment among those who were unable to reach such heights. To many, however, he was an inspiring example of holiness.

—Diane Peters Auslander

See also: Mysticism and Holy People; Orthodoxy and Saints

References and further reading:

- Alfeyev, Hilarion. 2000. St. Symeon the New Theologian and Orthodox Tradition. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Charanis, Peter. 1971. "The Monk in Byzantine Society." Dumbarton Oaks Papers 25: 63–84.
- Kazhdan, A. P. 1985. Greek Orthodox Theological Review 30, no. 4.
- Keseloopoulos, Anest. 2001. Man and the Environment: A Study of St. Symeon the New Theologian. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.
- Morris, Rosemary. 1998. Monks and Laymen in Byzantium, 843–1118. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Turner, H. J. M. 1990. St. Symeon the New Theologian and Spiritual Fatherhood. New York: E. J. Brill.

Simeon the Stylite

(c. 390–459 C.E.)

Christian ascetic

Simeon was the earliest of the so-called "stylite" saints, that is, those Christian ascetics who lived their lives on top of pillars, thus removing themselves from the "world" vertically rather than horizontally, the way the desert monks of late antiquity usually did. Born around the year 390 in northern Syria, Simeon began his holy career traditionally enough in a monastery east of Antioch in preparation for a life of solitude as a hermit. His ascetic lifestyle was so extreme that he began to attract pilgrims, prompting him to distance himself even more from human contact by climbing on top of a pillar. This only added to his popularity, prompting Simeon to seek ever higher pillars, which his admirers happily built for him, until he towered some sixty feet above the ground.

Many of his visitors—including a number of emperors—sought his advice and his blessing, which he offered from his holy perch. In a region like Syria, torn apart by trinitarian controversies, Simeon distinguished himself in the last few years of his life as an advocate for the interpretation endorsed at the Council of Chalcedon (451). After spending almost forty years of his life on a pillar, Simeon died in 459 and was buried in Antioch. His example inspired many imitators, the most prominent of which was Daniel the Stylite (c. 409–493), who, after inheriting Simeon's cloak, was inspired to spend the rest of his life on a column outside of Constantinople.

—Kenneth B. Wolf

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Daniel the Stylite; Guidance; Hermits

References and further reading:

- Dawes, Elizabeth, and Norman H. Baynes. 1948. Three Byzantine Saints: Contemporary Biographies. Oxford: Blackwell.

Singh, Sundar

(1889–c. 1929 C.E.)

Protestant ascetic, visionary

Sadhu Sundar Singh is probably India's best-known Protestant Christian holy man, proclaimed by many as "India's apostle" and as a modern alter Christus (another Christ). He was born to a relatively wealthy Sikh family on September 3, 1889, in a small village of the Punjab, northern India. His mother's devotional blend of Hindu and Sikh spirituality shaped his own piety and endowed him with a lasting respect for the ancient Indian tradition of the wandering sadhu (holy man). An adolescent religious crisis—brought on in part by his mother's death and in part by his contact with Christian missionaries—culminated in the first of his many supernatural visions—an unexpected darshan (vision) of Jesus Christ. Soon tension over his conversion drove him from his home, and he determined to serve his newfound master as a sadhu. Within a few months, at the age of sixteen, he was baptized, donned the traditional saffron dress of the ascetic, and began his lifelong mission of imitating and preaching Christ through much of northern India and beyond. In the life of Sadhu Sundar Singh, imitatio Christi (imitation of Christ), evangelical mission, and the ascetic tradition of the Hindu renunciant surprisingly coincide.

After nearly a decade of wandering in relative obscurity (c. 1905–1915), Sadhu Sundar Singh's fame began to grow, leading to a considerable number of publications about him and a series of wide-ranging tours, both in India and abroad (including Japan, Europe, and America, 1918–1922). Children, archbishops, and academics compared him to Christ, and he was often hailed as a living "saint." Given Protestantism's official rejection of a special class of "saints," however, most missionaries stressed his humility, orthodoxy, evangelism, and miraculous calling rather than his spiritual power or intercessory authority. Many liberal, Western Christians and Indian Christians, more comfortable perhaps with the very idea of a “holy man,” emphasized his Indianization of Christianity. For them, the sadhu’s undeniable charisma validated and fulfilled India’s ascetic and mystical traditions through devotion (bhakti) to Jesus Christ. Finally, for some European “modernist” Christians, all such talk of the miraculous, of sainthood, and of “Oriental” mysticism was just the problem: a superstitious “sadhu cult” was the antithesis of the this-worldly Christianity they championed. As the Roman Catholic scholar of mysticism Baron F. H. von Hügel intimated upon meeting the sadhu, proclaiming any contemporary to be a living saint—especially outside the jurisdiction of Rome—was a risky and ambiguous rhetorical strategy.

In 1922, Sadhu Sundar Singh made his final return to India. His ecstatic visions, which had been frequent at least since 1912, took on added significance as illness increasingly confined him to his newly purchased home in the foothills of the Himalayas. Notably, visionary encounters with the eighteenth-century Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg during this period coincided with, or were perhaps inspired by, the sadhu’s growing correspondence with Swedenborgians. The wisdom and solace received from the “spiritual world” formed the substance of the seven short devotional books that he now composed and, he felt, rendered the ongoing European controversy about his authenticity (the Sadhustreit) practically irrelevant. When strength permitted, he made intermittent returns to the lifestyle of a sadhu. In June 1929, though in extremely poor health, Sadhu Sundar Singh set out for one last missionary trip to Tibet and never returned. His lifelong desire for martyrdom had compelled him to disappear, as one historian of religion has recently put it, into “the brilliant darkness of legend” (Sharpe, forthcoming). Churches continue to be established in his name in India today.

—Timothy S. Dobe

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Mission; Protestantism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Appasamy, A. J. 1958. Sundar Singh: A Biography. London: Lutterworth.
- Heiler, Friederich. 1927. The Gospel of Sadhu Sundar Singh. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Parker, Rebecca. 1918. Sadhu Sundar Singh: Called of God. Madras: Christian Literature Society for India.
- Sharpe, Eric J. Forthcoming. The Riddle of Sadhu Sundar Singh. New Delhi: Intercultural Publications.
- Singh, Sundar. 1922. At the Master’s Feet. London: Macmillan.
- . 1926. Visions of the Spiritual World. London: Macmillan.

Sitting Bull

(c. 1831–1890 C.E.)

Hunkpapa Lakota medicine man, warrior, political leader

Sitting Bull is one of the best-known Lakotas and American Indians of the nineteenth century. He is remembered for his role in resisting American expansion on the Plains and for his accomplishments as a warrior and war leader. Often overlooked is his intimate interaction with the spiritual world that enabled him to resist so effectively.

This photograph of Sitting Bull, the visionary and leader of the Hunkpapa Lakota Sioux, was taken shortly before his death in 1890. (Library of Congress)

From an early age, he demonstrated an ability to manipulate spiritual power as protection in war. His feats in war gained him honor and status among his people, but he continued to investigate the mysteries of the Lakota cosmos, eventually becoming a holy man who could foretell events. Sitting Bull participated in the sun dance ritual, whereby pieces of his skin were sacrificed to induce visions, numerous times. This spiritual skill and devotion to probing the deepest levels of spirituality elevated Sitting Bull above most of his contemporaries and placed an immense responsibility on his shoulders to protect and guide his people. The Lakotas looked to him as the embodiment of the courage, endurance, generosity, and wisdom that they valued.

As the U.S. government pressured the Lakotas to live on reservations in the 1860s and 1870s, Sitting Bull remained staunchly opposed to the reservation system and to accommodating to white ways. American intrusion into Lakota territory culminated in the invasion of the Lakotas' sacred Black Hills in the early 1870s and the U.S. Army's attempt to round up Lakota people once and for all in the summer of 1876. During this military campaign, Sitting Bull held a sun dance and stripped about one hundred pieces of flesh from his arms. This sacrifice induced a vision of enemy soldiers with no ears falling into the Lakota camp and being slaughtered, and this is what happened to General George Armstrong Custer's men as the Lakotas routed them at the Battle of the Little Big Horn in late June 1876. Sitting Bull did not participate in the battle because he was recovering from his sun dance, but his vision came true.

After Custer's defeat, the Lakota bands scattered, and Sitting Bull and his followers went to Canada until surrendering to the United States in 1881. In subsequent years, Sitting Bull performed with Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show and then settled in as an elder on the Standing Rock Reservation in South Dakota. When the Ghost Dance Movement exploded in 1890, the reservation agents blamed Sitting Bull and ordered him arrested. He died at the hands of Indian policemen on December 15, 1890.

—Greg O'Brien

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Black Elk; Crazy Horse; Patriotism and Holy People; Prophets; War, Peace, and Holy People; Wovoka

References and further reading:

- Hoover, Herbert. 1980. "Sitting Bull." In American Indian Leaders: Studies in Diversity. Edited by R. David Edmunds. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Utley, Robert. 1993. The Lance and the Shield: The Life and Times of Sitting Bull. New York: Henry Holt.
- Vestal, Stanley. 1957. Sitting Bull: Champion of the Sioux. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Slessor, Mary

(1848–1915 C.E.)

Presbyterian missionary, social activist

Mary Slessor was a Scottish-born missionary who arrived in Nigeria in 1876. She worked to put an end to slave trading, intertribal wars, and other social vices, such as the customary killing of twins in West Africa. A popular figure, she was nicknamed "The White Queen of Calabar" by the people to whom she ministered.

Prior to the coming of the European explorers, slavery was already an accepted part of the social system in West Africa. Whether in the Niger Delta, in Igbo country, or in Yorubaland, slaves were the principal source of investment to indicate wealth. The West Africans regarded the possession of slaves, like the custom of having several wives, as adding dignity to a man and enhancing his social status. In Yoruba country, work on the farms and in the households was for the most part done by slaves, and slaves outnumbered both the Ijaw and the Efik people. However, with the discovery of the New World and the development of its vast resources, demand for laborers for the mines and plantations arose, and African slaves, who could be readily obtained, were carried overseas. The provisioning stations of West Africa became slavetrading forts, and slave raiding was a dominant social vice plaguing the West African coast. This became the concern of Mary Slessor.

Slavery was not the only evil Mary Slessor was set to fight against. In many African societies, especially on the western coast, the birth of twins was taken as a herald of misfortune in the community. Twins constituted a sign that something had gone wrong and that something still worse would happen to the whole community unless the "evil" was removed. The children were killed for the sake of the larger community, to cleanse, "save," and protect the rest of the people. West Africans believed that if the twins were not killed, then not only would the twins themselves suffer, but the rest of the society would be in danger of annihilation. So in their eyes, the killings were carried out with good intentions, and not as cruel acts. In the Efik and Igbo regions where Mary Slessor worked, the mothers of twins were killed along with the children. Slessor intervened in cases where society sought to deal with twins according to their customary practices. As a result, each time a woman delivered twins, they were brought to Mary Slessor, and many children grew up in her home.

Mary Slessor gained a great deal of influence in the region and her decisions were recognized by the chiefs and the people of the land. Fearless and undaunted, she visited even those who had managed to avoid contact with outsiders. She brought the gospel to the people of the interior with a philosophy of ministry that focused on reaching the unreached and attacking every antisocial practice with the word of God. Slessor's first settlement was Calabar, where she had a fruitful ministry. In 1888, the British government appointed her a vice consul at Okoyong. Among the Okoyong, she adjudicated on matters of social concern, and the authorities of warring communities respected her judgments. In 1907, the chief of the Aros announced that he would rule in God's way as a result of Mary Slessor's influence over his territory.

Slessor's constant crusade against the killing of twins, slave raiding, and intertribal wars helped to eliminate these social vices in the territories of her ministry and even beyond. She died on January 13, 1915, and was buried in Calabar.

—John U. Anaba

See also: Compassion and Holy People; Mission; Protestantism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Ayandele, E. A. 1966. The Missionary Impact on Modern Nigeria, 1842–1914. London: Longmans.
- Falk, Peter. 1997. The Growth of the Church in Africa. Jos, Nigeria: African Christian Books.
- Mbiti, John. 1969. African Religions and Philosophy. London: Heinemann.

Smith, Joseph

(1805–1844 C.E.)

Latter-day Saint founder

Founder and first elder and president of the Church of Jesus Christ (later, of Latter-day Saints), Joseph Smith, Jr., is identified by members of the church as the “revelator” of a unique Christian message. Joseph, as he is still known to Mormons, was believed to be a divinely appointed prophet, like those of the Old and New Testaments, who was chosen to restore to earth the “pure gospel of Christ” and to found a new church in preparation for the second coming of the Lord.

Smith was born on December 23, 1805, to an ordinary New England farming family. In 1817, the family made its way to Palmyra, New York, where they were able to purchase a farm and make a subsistence living. Settling in this “Burned Over District” of upstate New York (so-called for its intense and varied religious life in the decades between independence and the Civil War) seems to have had a significant effect on Smith’s religious experiences. The area was the birthplace of much of the renewed religious excitement and revivalism of the Second Great Awakening, ultimately giving rise not only to the Latter-day Saints, but also to other groups, such as Mother Ann Lee’s Shakers and John Humphrey Noyes’s Oneida Community, and to revivalist preachers, such as Charles Grandison Finney.

Smith’s experiences as a visionary and prophet began in 1820 when he was just fourteen. Praying in the woods that surrounded the family home, he had a vision of the Father and Son, who cautioned him not to join any of the competing denominations that were seeking to attract new members. Three years later, on September 21 and 22, 1823, Smith had a series of visions of the angel Moroni. The angel told Smith that his father, Mormon, had entrusted him with the record of his people, which had been inscribed on “golden plates” to be revealed to Joseph. Together with two stones, the “Urim” and “Thummim,” which would allow the translation of the text of the sacred tablets, the plates were hidden close by in the hill Cumorah. Smith was instructed that he must wait for four years before gathering the plates; he did so, and in 1827 he reportedly found them. For the next three years, aided by his wife Emma and other followers, he worked to translate the plates, a labor that culminated in their publication in 1830.

The visions experienced by Smith between 1823 and 1827, and many more over the next decade, convinced him that God’s covenant with Israel was now ready to be fulfilled, that the second coming was imminent, and that the pure gospel of the Lord was to be preached in preparation for the beginning of Christ’s millennial reign. Toward this end, Smith and his followers left the Burned Over District and embarked on a latter-day exodus. During this period of “wandering” and persecution on the way to the American “promised land” in the Great Salt Lake Basin, a promised land never glimpsed by Smith, the group built their first temple and instituted the controversial practice of polygamy (ultimately overturned in 1890). Arriving and settling in Commerce, Illinois, in 1838, Smith received a charter from the state and changed the name of the city to Nauvoo—a “beautiful plantation” in the midst of the New Jerusalem that was America. Tensions arose, however, over what was perceived by others as Smith’s dictatorial control, and he was ultimately imprisoned after he had the presses of a rival newspaper destroyed. He was killed in 1844 by a mob that stormed the jail.

—Philip C. DiMare

See also: Founders of Religions as Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Prophets; Young, Brigham

References and further reading:

Brodie, Fawn M. 1995. No Man Knows My History: The Life of Joseph Smith. New York: Vintage.

Bushman, Richard L. 1984. Joseph Smith and the Beginnings of Mormonism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Faulring, Scott H. 1989. An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith. Salt Lake City: Signature.

Quinn, D. Michael. 1998. Early Mormonism and the Magic World View. Salt Lake City: Signature.

Vogel, Dan. 1996. Early Mormon Documents. Salt Lake City: Signature.

Soamiji

(1818–1878 C.E.)

Syncretic guru

Soamiji, born Shiv Dayal Singh in 1818, initiated the revival in popular northern Indian esotericism that continues as Radhasoami tradition. He drew on the legacy of the Hindi sants, poet-singers whose most famous exponent was Kabir (c. 1450–1518), bringing together particular aspects of their yoga and devotion. The practice he taught had an appeal for the partially westernized, industrious middle classes of British India. It was disciplined but did not require ascetic renunciation, and it rested on internal results, not the sanction of brahminic authority. Although Soamiji died in 1878, Radhasoami tradition remains vital among middle-class Indians of Hindu and Sikh background, with continuing Radhasoami lineages based in Agra (Soamiji’s birthplace) and Beas, Punjab. The latter have large branches in many cities of northern India and a noteworthy international following.

Soamiji was born into a mercantile family of Hindu Khatri who had emigrated from the Punjab, maintaining their reverence for Guru Nanak, the Punjabi founder of the Sikhs, and an accompanying respect for the sants (holy people) included in Sikh scripture. As was common in families like his, he was educated in Persian. Soamiji’s teaching, then, derived predominantly from Hindu modes of thought, but he easily incorporated Persian sufi idiom and, following common sant precepts, denied in principle the value of caste and the supremacy of the Vedas. His teachings were thus not Hindu in any orthodox sense, highlighting the importance of Soamiji's own cosmic status in the traditions that derived from them.

On this, the Beas and Agra Radhasoamis differ. Beas followers claim that Soamiji was a completely realized sant, a member of a class of exceptional beings. They point to other great sants and to certain sufis and suggest that Soamiji himself had a guru—Tulsi Sahib of Hathras, a nineteenth-century sant embraced by Soamiji's family. Agra followers, in contrast, claim that Soamiji was an absolutely unique being, a divine incarnation with no guru of his own. The Agra view thus credits Soamiji with starting a new religion, while the Beas view takes him as standing in a continuing line of sants.

—Daniel Gold

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Contemporary Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People; Nanak; Sikh Religion and Holy People; Sufism

References and further reading:

- Juergensmeyer, Mark. 1991. Radhasoami Reality: The Logic of a Modern Faith. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Lane, David Christopher. 1992. The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship. Vol. 14, Sects and Cults in America: Bibliographical Guides. New York: Garland.
- Mathur, Agam Prasad. 1974. Radhasoami Faith: A Historical Study. Delhi: Vikas.
- Puri, Lekh Raj. 1972. Radha Swami Teachings. Beas, India: Radhasoami Satsang.

Socrates

(c. 470–399 B.C.E.)

Greek philosopher

Socrates was a famous Athenian philosopher of the fifth century B.C.E. whose charisma and strength of character made him the founding figure of several Greek schools of thought and a hero of philosophers through the ages. Challenging his fellow Athenians through the so-called Socratic method of cross-questioning, Socrates was both admired and despised for his self-acclaimed role as the “gadfly” (Apology 30e) of the people. He earned the admiration of many through his reputation for courage and fortitude, his gentle humor, and above all his wisdom. The Delphic oracle itself reported that no one was wiser than Socrates. Some, however, seem to have been annoyed by his ways. Eventually Socrates engendered so much antagonism that a jury of his fellow Athenians sentenced him to death. Soon and forever after his death would be generally regarded as a martyrdom.

Socrates wrote nothing; our knowledge about him is derived primarily from Plato's dialogues, and also from the writings of Xenophon, from passages in Aristotle, and from Aristophanes' play Clouds. These authors gave differing portrayals. Of his early life we know only a few things. Socrates gained a reputation for tremendous courage and fortitude as a foot soldier in the Athenian army. He devoted his middle and later life to teaching, though not professionally. In 399 B.C.E., Socrates was brought to trial, apparently on charges of corrupting the youth of Athens and of impiety. After a rather defiant speech by Socrates (reproduced by Plato in the Apology), the jury of 501 citizens indicted him by only 30 votes, then sentenced him to death. Most likely the jurors were motivated in part by disdain for Socrates owing to his apparent association with some of those responsible for the recent turmoil following the Peloponnesian War. Refusing to take advantage of an opportunity to escape, Socrates drank the hemlock and died.

There is disagreement as to the extent to which Socrates formulated the philosophical ideas that are put in his mouth in Plato's dialogues. But some features of his own philosophy are certain: the wisdom of avoiding false claims to knowledge, the need to examine diligently one's opinions about moral issues, and the conviction that “no evil can come to a good man” (Apology 41d). He was primarily interested in discerning what is the good life, in a moral sense. He also insisted on the careful definition of terms, and for this he is regarded as having contributed to the development of logic. Perhaps most of all Socrates has been admired for his exemplary strength of character, as one who refused to back down from any threat or criticism. Some claim that Socrates was a critic of traditional religion. But it is clear that Socrates took seriously the pronouncements of the Delphic oracle, and he understood himself to be guided by a certain divine sign that warned him against doing certain things.

Socrates' influence on the subsequent history of Greek philosophy cannot be overstated. The fact that we label what came before him as “pre-Socratic” is one indication of his impact. Plato and several other followers went on to found influential schools. The various Hellenistic philosophers who came later tended to look to Socrates as their hero and founding figure. Christian apologists and church fathers also regarded him as a hero, noting a number of striking comparisons between Socrates and Christ.

—Jeffrey Brodd

See also: Greek Philosophers; Hagiography; Heroes; Martyrdom and Persecution; Plato; Scholars as Holy People; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Burnet, John. 1964 [1914]. Greek Philosophy: Thales to Plato. London: Macmillan.
- Guthrie, W. K. C. 1971. Socrates. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- McPherran, Mark L. 1996. The Religion of Socrates. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Plato. 1997. Complete Works. Edited by John M. Cooper. Indianapolis: Hackett.

Sojourner Truth

(c. 1797–1883 C.E.)

Christian activist, preacher

Sojourner Truth was an ex-slave, itinerant street preacher, abolitionist, and advocate for women's rights. At a time of great change during the history of the United States, Sojourner's passion for justice and human rights was powerful, compelling, and influential. A down-to-earth yet charismatic speaker and singer, she made good use of her gifts to confront the evil of personal and institutional racism in all areas of society, including slavery and the women's rights movement, and to challenge the hierarchical Christian patriarchy that kept women in subordinate positions. She knew that to free slaves without declaring women equal to men would keep black women in continued bondage, and that to declare women equal to men without abolishing slavery would be a travesty of human rights. She believed wholeheartedly that the mission of the Christian church was to bring the good news of God's reconciling love to all people, and that leadership in the church belonged to both men and women. Sojourner Truth drew strength, energy, and conviction for her ministry from her deeply held belief in an intimate relationship of love and faith with Jesus Christ.

Christian activist Sojourner Truth, c. 1864. (Library of Congress)

Sojourner Truth was born into slavery in Ulster County, New York, in about 1797; her parents named her Isabella. She was sold at auction several times, given in marriage to an older slave, and bore the first of five children around 1815. In 1826, Isabella freed herself by escaping from her home, taking only her youngest daughter. It was shortly after she escaped that she experienced Christian conversion at a deeply personal level, an encounter that changed her whole concept of God, faith, and ministry.

It was about 1843 when Isabella became convinced that God was calling her to preach the good news of salvation and redemption. She felt inspired by God to rename herself "Sojourner" because she knew she would be traveling to teach God's love for all people, especially the poor and oppressed. "Truth" became her last name because she would be declaring the truth that all people of every gender, race, culture, and way of life are God's children and worthy of equal dignity and respect.

Sojourner Truth was considered by her contemporaries to be compassionate, benevolent, and spiritually enlightened, as well as a person of moral integrity, an indefatigable defender of human rights, and a constant source of inspiration to her companions in the abolitionist cause and the women's rights movement.

—Mary Ann McSweeney

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People

References and further reading:

Fauset, Arthur Huff. 1971 [1938]. Sojourner Truth: God's Faithful Pilgrim. New York: Russell and Russell.

Gilbert, Olive. 1991. Narrative of Sojourner Truth: A Bondswoman of Olden Time, with a History of Her Labors and Correspondence Drawn from Her "Book of Life." New York: Oxford University Press.

Painter, Nell Irvin. 1996. Sojourner Truth: A Life, a Symbol. New York: W. W. Norton.

Stetson, Erlene, and Linda David. 1994. Glorying in Tribulation: The Lifework of Sojourner Truth. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press.

Solomon b. Isaac of Troyes

See Rashi

Sonam Gyatso (Dalai Lama III)

(1542–1588 C.E.)

Buddhist spiritual leader, monk, scholar

The third in the line of reincarnating Tibetan spiritual teachers known as dalai lamas, Sonam Gyatso was the first to be called a dalai lama. He was a renowned scholar and teacher who completed the conversion of the Mongolian tribes to Buddhism during the sixteenth century.

His birth into a prominent family in 1542 was preceded by his mother's auspicious dreams. In childhood, he had frequent visions of buddhas and bodhisattvas (enlightened beings). When the party searching for the reincarnation of the second dalai lama came to his home, he is said to have greeted its members by name and to have spontaneously recognized several possessions of his predecessor, such as a horse, a statue, and a rosary.

He was brought to Drepung monastery at the age of three and at age nine was formally enthroned there. The famed scholar Panchen Sonam Drakpa (pan chen bsod nams grags ba) conferred upon him the name Sonam Gyatso (bsod nams rgya mtsho), using the last name of the previous dalai lama, Gendun Gyatso, a custom that has remained to the present. Sonam Gyatso received a thorough education in Indian and Tibetan philosophy and was initiated into all the principal tantric practices of the Gelukpa monastic order. He maintained an extensive daily meditation practice his whole life, although he also spent much time in study, debate, and travel.

Sonam Gyatso's most important achievement was the conversion of the Mongolians to Buddhism. Altan Khan, a descendant of Chingis Khan, invited him to Mongolia. He performed several miracles en route, such as causing the Yangtze and then the Yellow River to subside so that the party might cross them safely. He was welcomed with great devotion and pomp and set about teaching the Mongolians to follow a path of nonviolence. They were to stop performing blood sacrifices for the dead, stop raiding and pillaging their neighbors, and instead practice Buddhist virtues.

Sonam Gyatso believed that in a previous life he had been Sakya Pakpa, the spiritual adviser to Kublai Khan. He revealed this to Altan Khan and said that Altan Khan had been Kublai Khan himself. Altan Khan conferred on Sonam Gyatso a new title for his reincarnating line, that of dalai lama (dalai means "ocean" in Mongolian, as does rgya mtsho in Tibetan). Other Asians, and eventually Europeans, began to use the title. Only recently has it been used among Tibetans.

Sonam Gyatso undertook teaching tours of eastern Tibet and returned again to Mongolia. He was invited to teach the Ming emperor, but before he could make that journey or return to Tibet he became ill and died in Mongolia in 1588, accompanied by many magical signs.

—Daniel Cozort

See also: Attributes of Holy People; Buddhism and Holy People; Mission; Recognition; Reincarnation

References and further reading:

Mullin, Glenn, trans. 1995. Path to Enlightenment. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion.

———. 2001. The Fourteen Dalai Lamas. Santa Fe, NM: Clear Light.

Samuels, Geoffrey. 1993. Civilized Shamans. Washington, DC: Smithsonian.

Shakabpa, W. D. 1967. Tibet: A Political History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Sophia

Christian legendary holy woman

Legend tells that Sophia and her three daughters, Faith, Hope, and Charity, members of a wealthy, devout family, suffered and died in Rome during the reign of Emperor Hadrian (r. 117–138). Hadrian had each of the daughters questioned individually about their religious practices, and each enraged him by her resolute belief in Jesus Christ.

Before beheading each daughter, he subjected them to various types of torture. Indeed, the list of tortures they endured catalog the cruel practices of the time. The oldest, Faith (Pistis), age twelve, was stripped, beaten, and had her breasts cut off, but God protected her from feeling pain. Second, Hope (Elpis), age ten, was beaten and then thrown into a furnace, but the fire failed to burn her. Third, Charity (love/agape), age nine, was hanged and then chained so tightly that her bones broke. When she was thrown into a blazing furnace, an angel safeguarded her. Sophia encouraged her daughters to accept death graciously, for they would soon be united with Jesus. Sophia died peacefully three days later when praying at their tomb.

Although the genealogy might be authentic, the symbolic value is clear in this allegory of the cult of divine wisdom (sophia). Sophia, source of all virtues, engenders the three theological virtues. She is the archetype of the saint. Like her daughters, she demonstrated wisdom and justice, and she showed restraint, temperance, and perseverance to a heroic degree, under challenging circumstances and with a joyful heart.

The Roman Martyrology of 1584 retains the names of these four saints, whose feast day is August 1. Their names are also inscribed in the synaxaries, and the Orthodox Church venerates them on September 17.

Icons of Sophia show her either alone or with her daughters. Generally each figure is identified by name. Most frequently, Sophia carries a cross in her right hand and raises her left hand in submission to God.

—Irene E. Gnarra

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

Easton, Sophia-Martha. 2002. "Pain, Torture, and Death in the Huntington Library Legenda aurea." In Gender and Holiness: Men, Women, and Saints in Late Medieval Europe. Edited by Samantha J. E. Riches and Sarah Salih. New York: Routledge.

- Eliade, Mircea. 1988. "Survivals and Camouflages of Myths." Pp. 32–52 in Symbols, the Sacred, and the Arts. Edited by Diane Apostolos-Cappadona. New York: Crossroad.
- Fox, Robin Lane. 1989. Pagans and Christians. New York: Knopf.
- Musurillo, Herbert. 1972. The Acts of the Christian Martyrs. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Pantel, Pauline Schmitt, ed. 1992. A History of Women in the West. Vol. 1, From Ancient Goddesses to Christian Saints. Translated by Arthur Goldhammer. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Soubirous, Bernadette

(1844–1879 C.E.)

Roman Catholic visionary, nun

Bernadette Soubirous was born on January 7, 1844, at Lourdes, to a poor miller, François Soubirous, and his wife, Louise Casterot. For a time, the family inhabited a derelict jail, for lack of better lodgings. The first of six children, Bernadette worked as a shepherdess and a servant to help support her family.

On Thursday, February 11, 1858, Bernadette, her sister Toinette, and their friend Jeanne Abadie went to gather firewood. They stopped at the Massabielle grotto, where the Virgin Mary appeared to Bernadette for the first of eighteen times. Mary, dressed in blue and white, appeared above a rose bush. She smiled at the young girl and made the sign of the cross with her rosary. Bernadette said that she dropped to her knees, took out her rosary, and prayed. The other girls never saw the apparition. Subsequently, Mary asked her to pray for sinners, do penance, and have a chapel built there in her honor. On the morning of March 1, during the twelfth apparition, Mary asked Bernadette to drink from a fountain in the grotto. Following directions, Bernadette dug in the soil, and a spring issued forth. The first healing at Lourdes occurred that same morning, when Catherine Latapie, a woman who lived in the area, regained the use of her paralyzed hand after bathing it in the spring water. Word spread that the water had curative powers, and in the years since the visions many people hoping to be healed of their ailments have visited the site.

At her fourteenth apparition, March 25, Bernadette, prompted by the local clergy, asked Mary her name. Her response was, "Que soy era Immaculada Councepcioue" (I am the Immaculate Conception). Pope Pius IX had proclaimed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception in 1854. The fourteen-year-old girl made her first communion on June 3, and she saw Mary for the last time on July 16, 1858.

While the crowds increased in size, Bernadette sought obscurity. The house of the Sisters of Notre-Dame de Nevers in Lourdes, which assumed the education of the indigent, accepted her as a student and taught her to read and write French. In 1866, they permitted her to go to the Convent of Saint-Gildard in Nevers to become a nun, but reluctantly, for Bernadette was ill. Although she survived the cholera epidemic of 1855, she suffered from asthma, tuberculosis, and digestive disorders. She professed her religious vows early, for the nuns did not think that she would live until the projected date. She assumed her baptismal name, Marie-Bernard, and worked in the Holy Cross Infirmary, which became a military hospital during the Franco-Prussian War. However, she was declared an invalid in April 1875 and received extreme unction for the fourth time in her life upon the approach of her death on April 15, 1879.

Bernadette Soubirous. (Bettmann/Corbis)

Pope Pius XI canonized Bernadette on December 8, 1933, when he sang the mass for virgins before 40,000 pilgrims in Rome. Bernadette's body was put in a silver and crystal reliquary in the chapel of the convent at Nevers, which millions of people visit annually. She is the patron saint of shepherds, the poor, and the ill.

—Irene E. Gnarra

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Intermediaries; Mary, Virgin; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

Laurentin, René. 1979. Bernadette of Lourdes: A Life Based on Authenticated Documents. New York: HarperCollins.

———. 1999. Bernadette Speaks to You: A Life of Saint Bernadette Soubirous in Her Own Words. New York: Pauline Books.

Southcott, Joanna

(1750–1814 C.E.)

Anglican millenarian leader

Joanna Southcott was a Christian mystic, a spiritual writer, and the leader of an English sect that believed she would give birth to the second Christ. Although she was born a farmer's daughter (in 1750) and received very little formal education, her visions and prophecies transformed her into the spiritual leader of thousands of people, and her popularity continued through the late nineteenth century. Throughout her life, Southcott was a regular reader of the Bible and a member of the Anglican Church. She remained single her entire life. In 1791, she joined the Wesleyan movement, and on Easter Monday of 1792 she received an apocalyptic vision and began to issue a number of prophecies. She was viewed with a great deal of skepticism, both by clergymen and by contemporary writers, including John Keats and Lord Byron, who spoke negatively of her in their poetry.

By 1801, however, her popularity had increased dramatically. In that year she paid for the publication of The Strange Effects of Faith and gained the support of several clergymen. She moved to Paddington and ultimately acquired around 140,000 followers, called Southcottians or Joannas, whose names she entered into a list of the elect. She authored approximately sixty-five different works and published two volumes of collected works, Song of Moses and the Lamb (1804) and Hymns and Spiritual Songs (1807), and two autobiographical works, Life (1814) and Memoirs (1814). Throughout her writings, Southcott reiterates the idea that, just as woman was responsible for the Fall, so would she be responsible for the salvation and redemption of humanity. It should not be surprising that she was immensely popular among women.

Southcott predicted in 1802 that she would give birth to Shiloh, the second Christ, but she did not begin to show physical signs of pregnancy until the spring of 1814. Her followers believed her prediction and began to build an expensive cradle in preparation for the birth. She remained in seclusion until her death that same year, however, and it was later determined that a large cancerous tumor had given the false appearance of pregnancy.

Southcott's influence did not end with her death. George Turner, the first Southcottian to take over leadership of the sect, prophesied that Shiloh would be born on January 28, 1817. When that proved untrue, he gave the new date of April 10, 1821, which proved both false and detrimental to his authority. Turner's immediate successor was John Wroe, but Wroe's popularity ended in 1831 after he claimed that heaven had instructed that seven virgins should be delivered to him. There have been several leaders since Wroe. All of them have predicted the birth of Shiloh, and all of them have been disappointed. Joanna Southcott still has a small number of followers in England today.

—Michelle Ruggaber Dougherty

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Prophets

References and further reading:

- Balleine, G. K. 1956. Past Finding Out: The Tragic Story of Joanna Southcott and Her Successors. London: SPCK.
- Hopkins, James K. 1982. A Woman to Deliver Her People: Joanna Southcott and English Millenarianism in an Era of Revolution. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Shattock, Joanne. 1993. Oxford Guide to British Women Writers. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Spiritual Guardians

The saints of medieval Christianity and modern Roman Catholicism play a central role as protectors and patrons of various locales, professions, and sufferers from various tribulations and in general watch over anyone who appeals to them. Despite denigration of this belief by most sects of Protestant Christianity (only the Anglican communion accepts the idea of "guardianship" by the spirits of dead saints, and that only hesitantly), this belief is by no means limited to Roman Catholics. The theme appears at least occasionally in several other religions, including ancient Greek polytheism, Buddhism, Islam, and even Judaism.

The Greek heroes in their afterlife were especially regarded as protectors of particular places, most notably cities. Sometimes they were the original founder of a city; at other times the identification was made later. It was assumed that a dead hero would especially protect the place that possessed his body. Thus Sophocles in Oedipus at Colonus emphasized that Colonus was hallowed by being the spot where Oedipus's body was swallowed by the earth. At the battle of Marathon in 490 B.C.E., it was believed that the Athenian charge against the Persians was led by their ancient king, Theseus. To enhance this spiritual protection, after the battle the Athenians acquired Theseus's purported bones and provided him with a new grave in the city center.

Similarly, the tombs of Muslim and Christian holy people are believed to provide a special link that will induce the saint whose remains are buried there to protect the location. This theme also appeared in Hasidic Judaism, whose leaders have claimed a special spiritual authority that continues even posthumously—Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav (1772–1810) moved to Uman (the site of a great massacre of Jews) shortly before his death and declared that after his death he could help the troubled souls there to heaven. Other holy people are believed to give special blessings to whoever comes to their tomb. For example, the sufi al-Hujwiri (d. 1073), “patron saint” of Lahore, is known as “the giver who bestows treasure,” and his shrine attracts vast numbers of Pakistanis.

Other holy people are credited with a posthumous interest in particular categories of people. Thus the Buddhist bodhisattva (enlightened being) Ksitigarbha is especially devoted to saving the damned in hell; in more historic context, the Buddha’s son Rahula (c. fifth century B.C.E.) has for many centuries been the patron-protector of all novices in the monastic life. In Rahula’s case, the connection to a specific function was made because Rahula himself had entered the sangha (monastic community) at a very young age. Christianity in its second millennium also developed a sense of particular functions of particular saints, usually based on some element in the saint’s hagiography. For example, Apollonia (d. c. 249), who had her teeth pulled out by her tormentors, is the patron saint to invoke for toothache; in a particularly curious linkage, the famous levitating saint Joseph of Copertino (1603–1663) is now the patron saint of astronauts. Other holy people are especially linked to groups of people, such as Benedict of Nursia (c. 480–c. 547), who serves as protector of the Benedictine monastic order, or the Tibetan Dorje Shukden, a deity believed to be the reincarnation of Drukpa Gyeltsen (1618–1655), who serves as a protector of dharma (Buddhist doctrine), shielding the Gelukpa order from its enemies. Both Christian saints and Daoists after deification have been credited with guardianship of particular groups. To cite just one example, the Daoist patriarch Lü Dongbin (eighth and ninth centuries) is the patron of scholars, ink makers, swordsmen, and the wine trade. The Buddhist monk Upagupta (dates unknown) is the guardian of dharma, and the Buddha’s teaching itself protects all those who follow the way of meditation.

Judaism and Islam, perhaps drawing from a common basis in legend, give an even more glorious role to a small group of holy people as the ultimate spiritual guardians of the entire world. Jewish legend holds that thirty-six righteous men, the lamedvavniks, must exist in every generation—their role is to keep God from destroying the world, no matter how evil it becomes. Similarly, Muslim mystical writers have proposed the existence of the abdal, a group of seventy sufi holy people, whose number will remain constant until the end of the world. These people literally form the axis of the world, a tent of protection, by the holiness of their lives. In both the Jewish and Muslim cases, these essential guardians are unknown to their fellow humans, and indeed do not recognize themselves as part of this protective web, although particular holy people in Islam have been recognized as the qutb al-Ghawth, the axis on which the mystical support of the world turns.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Benedict of Nursia; Hujwiri; ‘Ali ibn Uthman al-; Joseph of Copertino; Lamedvavniks; Lü Dongbin; Nahman of Bratslav; Oedipus; Rahula; Theseus; Upagupta

Srimala

Buddhist bodhisattva

Although the historicity of Queen Srimala of Ayodhya, India, is uncertain, she is nevertheless a famous female bodhisattva (enlightened being) in the Mahayana Buddhist tradition. Her name means “one who wears beautiful flower-garlands,” and she is the major spokesperson in the Srimaladevisimhanada Sutra (Discourse on the lion’s roar of Queen Srimala). This Mahayana Buddhist scripture, originally written in Sanskrit but now extant only in Chinese and Tibetan translations, presented the theory of the “womb of the Thuscome One” (tathagatagarbha) and the doctrine of “one vehicle” (ekayana). As a Buddhist scripture it stands out because of its egalitarian view of women, its portrayal of the wisdom of the laywoman Queen Srimala, and its demonstration of Srimala’s concern for all beings and her role as a teacher of the Buddhist path.

The details of Queen Srimala’s personal life as recorded in the sutra are drastically different from those given in other Buddhist works. The sutra maintains that she was the daughter of King Prasenajit of Kosala and his wife Mallika. Against this position, three vinaya (disciplinary) texts stress that Queen Srimala was the wife of King Prasenajit. Commentarial descriptions also vary significantly on this point. The Japanese commentary Shomangyo gisho, attributed to Prince Shotoku Taishi (573–621), presents Srimala not really as a human being but the Buddha transformed into a woman’s body.

Whenever the head of state in East Asian Buddhist countries was a female (for example, as in the case of Empress Suiko in Japan in 592–628), the Srimaladevisimhanada Sutra acquired added significance because it gave prominence to females in the Buddhist religious path. In the history of Chinese Buddhism, the reign of Empress Wu (684–705) is important because she made Buddhism the state religion and sought an ideology within Buddhism to counteract Confucian arguments for male rule and to provide a basis for female leadership. Empress Wu chose to emphasize the Mahayana idea of a female bodhisattva as presented in the character of Queen Srimala in the Srimaladevisimhanada Sutra and its central doctrine of tathagatagarbha.

—Mahinda Deegalle

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Shotoku; Wu Zhao

References and further reading:

Chang, Garma C. C., ed. 1983. “The True Lion’s Roar of Queen Srimala.” Pp. 363–386 in A Treasury of Mahayana Sutras.

- Translated by the Buddhist Association of the United States.
University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Paul, Diana Mary. 1980. The Buddhist Feminine Ideal: Queen Srimala and the Tathagatagarbha. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press.
- . 1985. Women in Buddhism: Images of the Feminine in Mahayana Tradition. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Wayman, Alex, and Hideko Wayman. 1974. The Lion's Roar of Queen Srimala: A Buddhist Scripture on the Tathagatagarbha Theory. New York: Columbia University Press.

Srong btsan sgam po

See Sengsten Gampo

Stanislaus of Cracow

(c. 1040–1079 C.E.)

Christian bishop, martyr

Stanislaus was born in Szczepanow, near Cracow, most probably around 1040 or—according to the fifteenth-century Polish chronicler Jan Dlugosz—on July 26, 1030. He died in Cracow on April 11, 1079. His feast day is May 7 in the Breviarum Romanum (Roman breviary) but May 8 in Poland.

Contemporary sources documenting Stanislaus's life (annals, catalogs of bishops, correspondence, the 1112 chronicle by Gallus Anonymus) are scarce and fragmentary; his late twelfth- and thirteenth-century biographers, Vincent Kadlubek and the Dominican Vincent of Kielce, respectively, testify to a rapid though not unproblematic development of the cult and legend of the bishop, who was canonized by Pope Innocent IV at Assisi on September 17, 1254. Biographic details, in large part questionable, have come down in the later hagiographic tradition. Stanislaus was born to parents related or connected to the royal court of Poland. Following a religious education, he was elected bishop of Cracow in 1072 by Prince Boleslaw, whose efforts at gaining political autonomy from the German king Henry IV he then firmly supported. The bishop's activity in the archdiocese of Cracow, supplemented in thirteenth-century and later legends by accounts of performed miracles (notably the restoration to life of the knight Peter), was devoted to strengthening the religious foundations of the recently Christianized Poland.

Stanislaus's harmonious cooperation with Boleslaw (a superb political leader, crowned in 1076) toward a sovereign country, on the one hand, and a reformed church, on the other (both were strong supporters of Pope Gregory VII), ended abruptly in a violent conflict culminating in the death of the bishop and the expulsion of the king. When in as yet unclear circumstances the bishop excommunicated Boleslaw II, the king brutally retaliated by ordering his assassination. According to tradition, when the guards ordered to slay the bishop dared not obey, the king assassinated the saint with his own hands during the celebration of mass in the chapel of St. Michael. The ambiguous or conflicting explanations of the background of this event by succeeding chroniclers leave present historians in doubt as to the nature of Stanislaus's responsibility in the strife. Cited by his contemporary Gallus Anonymus to have been charged with traditio ("treason," "rebellion," or "curse") and condemned, customarily for a traitor or a rebel, to dismembering, in later chronicles the bishop typically became a staunch prosecutor of vice and corruption whose invocations against immorality enraged the depraved and vindictive king. The assassination provoked a revolt of the opposition, which forced the king to escape to Hungary, where tradition has him put on penitentiary clothes in the Benedictine monastery of Osjak before his death in 1081. Stanislaus's dismembered body, which in the thirteenth- and fourteenth-century cult grew back together to symbolize a reunited Poland, was at first buried in the chapel, but between 1088 and 1242 the relics were transferred to the cathedral.

—Ewa Słojka

See also: Martyrdom and Persecution; Patriotism and Holy People; Politics and Holy People; Reform and Reaction

References and further reading:

- Grodecki, Roman. 1969. Polska Piastowska. Warsaw: PWN.
- Gustaw, Romuald, ed. 1972. Hagiografia polska: Słownik bibliograficzny. Poznan, Poland: Księgarnia Sw. Wojciecha.
- Jasienica, Pawel. 1969. Polska Piastów. Warsaw: Państwowy Instytut Wydawniczy.

Status

Do holy people come out of particular social classes or castes, or can anyone win recognition as holy? The Japanese Confucian scholar Ishida Baigan (1685–1744) angered many by openly teaching everyone, even women—a strong stand against the Confucian idea that learning should be restricted to certain classes. In general, however, hagiographers in many religious traditions have emphasized the equality of all men—and sometimes even women—before the divine. People who have broken out of the limitations of their own status have frequently been regarded as holy, and low-status people have frequently won renown for great holiness. Sometimes an aristocratic snobbery remains; for example, in Christian hagiography aristocratic Romans who converted seemed almost automatically to qualify for sainthood (including Cyprian, Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory I, and Jerome's circle of women followers). Still, one of the most consistent attributes of holy people across the world religions is a disregard for societal notions of status.

Several of the greatest religious leaders have shocked and attracted in equal parts by leaving their birth status. Mahavira (5th century B.C.E.), the twenty-fourth Jain tirthankara (ford maker), was a son of an Indian king who renounced his wealth and family; Gautama the Buddha did the same during the same period. The central Asian Muslim Ibrahim b. Adham (c. 730–777 or 790) was also of royal family, but he renounced his riches after hearing a divine voice when he was hunting, reproaching him for his wastrel life.

It is harder for a low-status person to win esteem as holy. Jesus of Nazareth's lowly birth made many doubt his message, to judge from the gospel accounts, and later Christians were often barred from the regular channels of religious life because of their status, having to work out a more personal salvation for themselves. For example, Martin de Porres of Lima (1579–1639) suffered the double handicap of being a mulatto and illegitimate; refused admission to the Franciscan order, he became a lay brother. There have, however, been antielite movements in Christianity that have attracted low-status people, often in positions of great religious authority, such as in the Chilean churches founded by Willis Hoover (1858–1937).

Harder to overcome than the distinctions of social class by far are the limitations of the caste system of India, a system still essentially in place after more than two and a half millennia of holy people rejecting it. Both Mahavira and the Buddha rejected the sanctity of the caste system, and the Buddha accepted disciples from the lowest and even untouchable communities. Buddhist legend rejoices in cases such as that of Upali, a disciple of the Buddha who was originally a barber, but in the samgha (monastic community) held a higher rank than princes because he had been ordained earlier. The Chan Buddhist Linji (d. 866/867) went so far as to argue that a true human being is someone without rank or title, that is, free from all fetters connecting him to the world. This anti-status, egalitarian Buddhist view was not always practiced but was frequently reaffirmed. For example, the Japanese Buddhist Pure Land founder Honen (1133–1212), who suffered discrimination throughout his life because his mother was of lower-class birth, emphatically taught the basic premise that every believer is an ordinary person—whether male or female, monk or lay, commoner or aristocrat.

Hinduism, while preserving the caste system, has still taken great pleasure in venerating holy people who break the laws of caste, perhaps ultimately in an affirmation that caste is a matter for this world, while in the divine economy God has the power to touch people at any level. Asceticism especially breaks the constraints of caste; already a very ancient legendary Hindu sage, Vishvamitra, changed his caste from warrior to brahmin (which was supposedly impossible) through ascetic practices. Moving to more historically attested figures, Nammalvar (sixth to ninth centuries), the most famous of the twelve Hindu poet-saints known as alvars, was of low caste, but according to tradition he emphasized that spiritual merit transcends caste. The nayanars, devotees of Shiva active late in the first millennium C.E., also refused to make distinctions based on caste, age, or sex. Cokhamela (1293–1338) was an outcaste, so was not allowed even to enter the shrine where he worshipped—but was still recognized for his piety. The poet-saint Ravidas (c. 1450–1520) was also untouchable, which did not keep him from being widely worshipped. His contemporary Kabir (c. 1450–1518), according to legend, was the son of a high-caste brahmin who was brought up by a low-caste Muslim, perhaps highlighting the fact that he refused to differentiate not just between castes but also between Hindus and Muslims.

The devotion of such saints was perceived as so great that, when they suffered snubs at the hands of humans, the gods themselves validated them. This was the case of the singer-saint Kanakadasa of the sixteenth century, who was barred by his caste from entering the Krishna temple, so he stared through a hole in the wall, with such devotion that the statue of Krishna inside turned to face him. These anti-caste holy people seem especially to cluster in the sixteenth century, but examples can be found in many other periods. Important modern examples include Chinmayananda (1916–1993), a Hindu reformer who accepted followers of all castes, and Gandhi (1869–1948), who, although he did not want to break completely with the caste system, argued forcefully for the eradication of untouchability.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Adham, Ibrahim ibn; Chinmayananda; Cokhamela; Gandhi, Mohandas K.; Gautama; Hoover, Willis Collin; Ishida Baigan; Jesus; Kabir; Linji; Mahavira; Martin de Porres; Nammalvar; Nayanars; Ravidas; Upali; Vishvamitra

Stein, Edith

(1891–1942 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun, educator; Jewish martyr

Edith Stein was an educator, mystical poet, writer, and Carmelite nun. Her doctoral dissertation, On the Problem of Empathy, explored the possibility of a connection between people so profound that the thoughts, feelings, and intentions of one person could be readily understood by another. She had a passion for truth, which she sensed could be best experienced through this kind of intimate love. She seemed to feel God in her being as the epiphany of truth that was manifest in unconditional love at the personal and universal level. She had a desire to share that universal love through acts of atonement and personal sacrifice, particularly in regard to the suffering of her own people in the Holocaust.

Edith Stein, born in Breslau, Germany, in 1891, was the youngest of eleven children in an Orthodox Jewish family. The limited instruction she received in Judaism and Jewish rituals started her on her spiritual journey. Although she admitted that at age fifteen she stopped praying, Edith nonetheless was aware of the need to balance her many achievements with deep personal reflection and humility. In 1921, Edith read Teresa of Avila's sixteenth-century autobiography and experienced a profound spiritual awakening. Although she did not reveal the details of this experience, it seems clear that what she had read sparked a deep desire to seek the truth that is God, and she felt that Roman Catholicism, along with her Jewish heritage, provided a way for her to do this.

Edith was baptized Catholic in 1922 and entered the Carmelite monastery of Cologne in 1933, making her final vows in April 1938. Her quest for spiritual transformation was aided by her disciplined lifestyle and daily surrendering of her will to God. After the infamous Kristallnacht of November 1938, Edith felt that her presence in the convent endangered her sister Carmelites, and she was transferred to a convent in Echt, Holland. However, the pastoral letter from the Catholic bishops of Holland protesting the deportation of Jews of July 26, 1942, was met with retaliation from the Nazi regime, and Jewish converts to Catholicism were rounded up for deportation. Edith and her sister Rosa, who had joined her at the convent, were among them. They both died in Auschwitz on August 9, 1942.

The Catholic Church recognized Edith Stein as a saint (St. Teresa Benedicta a Cruce) and canonized her as a martyr on October 11, 1998. It is believed that she gave witness to her faith in God in words and actions while facing her death—which was a direct result of Nazi retaliation. Yet because she was executed for being Jewish, and because her Jewish identity was intrinsic to her faith life, much dialogue has been generated about whether the church had the right to claim her as a Christian martyr. It has been suggested that her life witness might have served better as a catalyst for addressing modern-day anti-Semitism, as well as for atonement by the Catholic Church for the atrocities of the Holocaust, than simply as a Christian martyrdom.

—Mary Ann McSweeney

See also: Canonization; Contemporary Holy People; Shoah; Teresa of Avila

References and further reading:

- Batzdorff, Suzanne M. 1998. Aunt Edith: The Jewish Heritage of a Catholic Saint. Springfield, IL: Templegate.
- Carroll, James. 2002. Constantine's Sword: The Church and the Jews. Pp. 536–543. Boston/New York: Mariner Books/Houghton Mifflin Company.
- HAMPL, Patricia. 1996. "Edith Stein: A Book Sealed with Seven Seals." Pp. 196–215 in Martyrs. Edited by Susan Bergman. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Stein, Edith. 1986. Life in a Jewish Family: Her Unfinished Autobiographical Account. Translated by Josephine Koeppel. Washington, DC: ICS.
- . 1992. The Hidden Life: Hagiographic Essays, Meditations, Spiritual Texts. Translated by Waltraut Stein. Washington, DC: ICS.

———. 1996. Essays on Woman. Translated by Freda Mary Oben. Washington, DC: ICS.

Stephen

(d. c. 36 C.E.)

Christian protomartyr

Protomartyr of the Christian faith, Stephen was the first of Jesus' followers to die for the faith and was widely revered as such. His feast day (December 26) has been celebrated since at least the fifth century.

Stephen was one of the first deacons of the early church, chosen by the community in Jerusalem to serve the needs of the people and to help resolve conflicts between the Greek-speaking Jews and the Hebrew-speaking Jews. He was known to be full of "faith and the Holy Spirit" (Acts 6:5) and "God's grace and power" (Acts 6:8). These attributes were manifest in the "great wonders and miraculous signs" (Acts 6:8) Stephen performed among the people.

Stephen's faith led him to speak publicly about Jesus as the bearer of a new law. Some of his listeners, enraged by his words and attitude, forced Stephen to appear before the Sanhedrin, accusing him of blasphemy. Stephen responded by recounting the history of God's covenant with Abraham and Moses, ending with an accusation of his own: "You always resist the Holy Spirit!" (Acts 7:51). His subsequent vision of Jesus standing at the right hand of God further provoked his opponents and they stoned him to death.

A fifteenth-century tapestry shows Stephen, the first Christian martyr, being stoned to death. (Francis G. Mayer/Corbis)

The Holy Spirit as a fully equal partner in the community of God has been a topic of debate and a point of controversy throughout the history of the church. Providing Christians with insights into the person and power of the Holy Spirit, Stephen also has served as a model for Christians who strive to give witness to Jesus—in serving others, resolving conflicts with nonviolence, speaking out against injustice, confronting evil with love, forgiving enemies, surrendering one's life and spirit to God's care, and in trusting that death is the doorway to unity with God.

—Mary Ann McSweeney

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Disciples; Jesus; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

Friend, W. H. C. 1967. Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. New York: New York University Press.

Watson, Alan. 1996. The Trial of Stephen: The First Christian Martyr. Athens: University of Georgia Press.

Stephen of Hungary (Istvan, Vaik)

(c. 975–1038 C.E.)

Christian ruler

Stephen, born in around 975, succeeded his father as king of Hungary in 997, just two years after his marriage to Gisela, the sister of Henry II of Germany, a union that was to reinforce the links between the two countries. Astutely balancing political as well as religious control, he set about converting his subjects to Christianity, the faith into which he was nominally born, having been baptized along with his father by Adalbert of Prague in 986. He succeeded in getting a crown, with the title "apostolic king," from Pope Silvester II and was crowned on August 15, 1000.

Politically, Stephen united Hungary and used the legal structure to support the state move to Christianity. He outlawed the indigenous Magyar religion and the superstitious practices that it entailed. The church as well as those less fortunate were supported through a series of tithes, and an episcopal system was developed. Monasteries and churches were founded, including that at Szekesfehervar, which was dedicated, like his country, to the mother of God, and it was here that the future kings of Hungary were crowned and buried.

Stephen's political as well as religious reforms were aided by his personable and human approach. He frequently gave alms to the poor and could be approached by all. It was on one such occasion, as he was engaged in almsgiving, that an overzealous group of beggars attacked and robbed him, leaving him on the ground. Although advised by his council not to put himself at risk again, Stephen continued to undertake such acts of charity. In these acts of mercy, for which he is best known, he was similar to his countrywoman Elizabeth of Hungary, whose acts were in imitation of Christ. The premature death of Stephen's son and successor, Emeric, in 1031, caused problems for the last years of Stephen's life. He died in 1038 and was buried at Szekesfehervar but later translated to the church of Our Lady at Buda. It was not long before miracles were attributed to Stephen.

Surprisingly few scenes from Stephen's life are found in medieval art, and these center either on his birth or his role as king. He is always shown as a mature and crowned figure, usually dressed in elaborate robes and more often than not involved in narratives. It has been claimed that the Bamberg Rider, one of the most famous equestrian portraits of the early thirteenth century, represents Stephen. Other representations include those in Assisi (S. Francesco, lower church, north transept frescoes) as well as in a manuscript in the Vatican Library, Rome (lat. 8541, fol. 78r/ p. 79).

Stephen was canonized in 1038. His feast days are May 30, August 15 (formerly September 2), and August 20 (translation). He is the patron saint of Hungary, kings, and those involved in the building trade, such as masons and bricklayers.

—Colum Hourihane

See also: Adalbert of Prague; Christianity and Holy People; Elizabeth of Hungary; Patriotism and Holy People; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

Gyorffy, Gyorgy. 1994. King Saint Stephen of Hungary. Boulder: Social Science Monographs.

Homan, B. 1938. Szent Istvan. Budapest: Sárkány.

———. 1941. König Stephan I der Heilige, die Gründung des ungarischen Staates. Breslau, Poland: W. G. Korn.

Zsoldos, Attila. 2001. Saint Stephen and His Country. Budapest: Lucidus.

Stephen of Muret

(c. 1045–1124 C.E.)

Christian hermit, monastic founder

Stephen of Muret, founder of the order of Grandmont, was born in about 1045, the eldest son of Viscount Stephen of Thiers in Auvergne. Stephen the younger went on a pilgrimage at an early age, probably to the shrine of Monte Gargano (the traditional accounts, which state that Stephen went with his father to the shrine of St. Nicholas at Bari, are chronologically impossible). In the course of his travels he also became greatly impressed by the austerity of the hermits he encountered in Calabria. These Calabrian hermits strongly influenced Stephen's own ideas on the religious life, and sometime between 1076 and 1078 Stephen established a hermitage at Muret, in the mountains north of Limoges.

Stephen's reputation for austerity, piety, and asceticism—he wore chain mail over his bare skin instead of a hair shirt—soon attracted a large number of followers, which he gathered together into what later became the order of Grandmont. Known as “Bonshommes” (good men), the hermit monks of Grandmont had a popular reputation for piety and zeal that led to the order's rapid expansion. Thirty-nine years after the death of their founder in 1124, the order had thirty-nine houses in France.

The Grandmontines were known for their generosity to the poor and their hospitality toward visitors. The order thrived during most of the twelfth century, but gradual relaxation of the rule of poverty led to a series of internal disputes, scandal, and a revolt of the order's lay brothers in 1185. Repeated attempts at reform eventually led to a split into two observances; the order was finally suppressed by the Commission des Réguliers in 1772.

Although Stephen left no authentic writings—and his later vita is an admixture of fiction and hagiographical convention—his teaching, which is reflected in his Liber sententiarum (Book of sentences), or Maxims, shows the influence of the gospels and Gregory the Great (540–604). Stephen's relics were translated to the motherhouse of the order of Grandmont from Muret in about 1166. He was canonized in 1189, and his feast day is February 8.

—J. M. B. Porter

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Gregory I; Hermits; Monasticism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Hutchinson, Carole A. 1989. The Hermit Monks of Grandmont. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.
- Leyser, Henrietta. 1984. Hermits and the New Monasticism: A Study of Religious Communities in Western Europe, 1000–1150. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Stephen of Muret. 2002. Maxims: Stephen of Muret. Translated by Deborah van Doel. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Stephen of Perm

(d. 1396 C.E.)

Russian Orthodox bishop, missionary

First bishop of Perm, and one of Russia's most important missionaries, Stephen was recognized as a saint in 1547. Information about Stephen comes from Russian chronicles dating from the year of his death in 1396 and a vita written in the fifteenth century by Epiphanius the Wise.

The chronicles and vita both state that Stephen was born in Ustiug in northeastern Russia. Tonsured at Rostov, the episcopal seat, he was consecrated as a priest in 1379. He was inspired to go among the Finnic tribes, now called Zyrians, in the region known as Perm, and there he instructed the local population in the Christian faith and built a church, a school, and a chapel. Stephen was not universally welcomed, for he was threatened by locals who, resenting his construction of new monasteries and churches, attempted to drive him away. They threatened to beat him, but in keeping with his spirituality, he refrained from violence, impressing the population with his forbearance. According to his Life, Stephen gradually convinced the Zyrians to cease idol-worship and convert to Orthodoxy, despite the efforts of one, Pam, to bring them back to the old gods.

Stephen defended his flock from brigands and river pirates and fed them during famine. After visiting Vladimir and asking Metropolitan Pimen to approve a new diocese for the region of Perm, Stephen was appointed its first bishop. Eventually, foreseeing his own death, he returned to Moscow; during his illness, he called together the clergy who had come with him from Perm, urging them to return there and tell the people to remain strong in their faith. Stephen is credited with not only learning the language of Perm but providing an alphabet for it and translating Slavonic and Greek texts as well as church songs into the Perm tongue. He is remembered on April 26.

—Jennifer B. Spock

See also: Mission; Orthodoxy and Saints; Scholars as Holy People; Violence and Nonviolence

References and further reading:

- Wigzell, Faith C. M. 1971. “Convention and Originality in the ‘Life of Stefan of Perm’: A Stylistic Analysis.” The Slavonic and East European Review 49: 339–354.
- Zenkovsky, Serge, ed. 1963. “Epiphanius the Wise: Panegyric to St. Stephen of Perm.” Pp. 259–262 in Medieval Russia's Epics, Chronicles, and Tales, rev. ed. Translated by Serge A. Zenkovsky. New York: E. P. Dutton.

Sthiramati

(c. 6th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist philosopher, scholar

Sthiramati (Tib.: blo gros brtan pa; Chin.: Anhui; Jap.: Anne) was a commentator and philosopher of Mahayana Buddhist texts, in particular of works closely linked with the Yogacara Buddhist mentalistic trend.

According to Baron A. von Stael-Holstein (1926), there may have been three Sthiramatis: (1) one who wrote before 536, (2) one who lived toward the end of the sixth century, and (3) the spiritual grandfather of Silendrabodhi. Thus, according to von Stael-Holstein's account, Sthiramati could not have lived before the seventh century. Scholars differ in their dating of Sthiramati. A contemporary of the Madhyamaka philosopher Bhavaviveka (c. 490–570) and of the Yogacara thinker Dharmapala (mid-sixth century), he is considered to have been a disciple of both Gunamati (440–520) and Vasubandhu (400–480).

According to the Tibetan historian Buston (1931), Sthiramati mastered the tripitaka (three baskets of learning) very early in his life and was a scholar of both Theravada and Mahayana abhidharma (higher doctrine). By defeating the tirthikas (non-Buddhists) such as Vistapala and others, Sthiramati became famous as a master of debates. He is said to have surpassed Vasubandhu in abhidharma studies. Sthiramati was probably a student in the great Buddhist university of Nalanda established by the Gupta court (320–550), where he may have studied Yogacara Buddhism and helped make it flourish in that area.

As an advocate of Yogacara, Sthiramati interpreted Vasubandhu's teaching differently from Dharmapala (mid-sixth century), who claimed that the cognitive process was apparent in both the subject and object aspects. Sthiramati understood the subject-object dichotomy to be nothing more than a concept. Both Dharmapala and Sthiramati are listed among the ten commentators to Vasubandhu's work.

In the Japanese Buddhist tradition, there is another person named Anne (b. 795) who is often associated with Sthiramati, but this person is connected with the Japanese Tendai school of Buddhism.

—Leslie S. Kawamura

See also: Scholars as Holy People; Vasubandhu

References and further reading:

- Buston. 1931. History of Buddhism. Translated by E. Obermiller. Heidelberg, Germany: O. Harrassowitz.
- Kajiyama, Yuichi. "Shoben, Anne, Goho." Mikkyo Bunka, no. 64–65: 145–159.
- von Stael-Holstein, A. 1926. Kasyapaparivarta, a Mahayanasutra of the Ratnakuta Class, Edited in Original Sanskrit, in Tibetan, and in Chinese. Shanghai: Commercial Press.

Subhuti

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.?)

Disciple of the Buddha

Subhuti has lived many lives in the history of Buddhist literature. He remains, however, first and foremost an arahat, literally, a worthy one. It is among the earliest designations for those who have realized the depths of Buddhist practice through eradicating the roots of dissatisfaction operative in everyday experience. They are the earliest virtuosos of the Buddhist tradition, in insight and in conduct, expressing the subtleties of the Buddha's diagnosis of conative and cognitive dis-ease. Subhuti is among the most prominent of the arahats and as such is said to have been on intimate terms with the historical Buddha in approximately the fifth century B.C.E. Subhuti is aptly named; the particle su is affirmative, connoting among other things perfection and excellence. The name not only suggests a quiet dignity and positive orientation to the world but fundamentally speaks to a well-being or health (bhuuti) that has been successfully attained. As one of the earliest exemplars of human perfection in Buddhism, Subhuti presents not only the possibility of a nonafflicted experience of life but also a picture of its actualization.

The historicity of Subhuti is poorly documented. The ways in which he is depicted in Buddhist literature and the traits for which he is held in high esteem primarily serve as an invitation to examine distinguishing features of human cognitive makeup, to see how we measure up, as it were, with an instance of cognitive health. Instead of looking for an unavailable (and here, irrelevant) historical context, it is more illuminating to focus on the role played by the type of Buddhist practitioner that Subhuti exemplifies.

In many ways Subhuti represents the ideal interface between the renunciant dimension of Buddhist practice and its strong intuition that such practice is nevertheless socially relevant. The Buddha considered Subhuti to be the one whose practice was most worthy of being supported by a lay population. His very presence in society was said to be transformative; he was considered a "field of merit," which in the technical language of Buddhism translates to the idea that were a person to meaningfully interact with and provide for Subhuti's practice, such interaction would open up hitherto unsuspected horizons in that person's own conative and cognitive development. Subhuti's practice embodies the "middle way" suggested by Buddhism, that is, to be neither intoxicated by an ascetic withdrawal from human encounters, nor to blindly traffic in the projects and criteria of success that constitute the life-world of a society.

Subhuti's walk in the city afforded the chance for an exemplary human encounter, one unmotivated by anything external to a commitment to see the possibility of what humans can yet be, preserved as a possibility for all humans. Such a practice presupposes a high degree of proficiency with Buddhist training techniques; it should not surprise us that Subhuti was also regarded as accomplished in analysis and meditation and applauded for his insights into the conditions of phenomenological experience (codified formally in the Buddhist doctrine of emptiness).

—Sonam Kachru

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Gautama; Models

References and further reading:

- Conze, Edward. 1958. Buddhist Wisdom Books: Containing the Diamond Sutra and the Heart Sutra. New York: Harper and Row.
- Katz, Nathan. 1982. Buddhist Images of Human Perfection: The Arhant of the Sutta Pitaka Compared with the Bodhisattva and the Mahasiddha. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.
- Norman, K. R., trans. 1969–1971. The Elder's Verses. 2 vols. London: Pali Text Society.
- Ray, Reginald. 1999. Buddhist Saints in India: A Study in Buddhist Values and Orientations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Thera, Nyanaponika, and Hellmuth Hecker. 1997. Great Disciples of the Buddha. Boston: Wisdom.

Suffering and Holy People

Suffering of various sorts has led many of the holy people of the world to their first conversion, refocusing their attention from the ephemera of life to greater divine realities. Especially in monotheistic religions, it impels people to ask the great question of theodicy: If God is omnipotent, omniscient, and benevolent, why do bad things happen to good people? How holy people have answered that question, by a surrender of self to divine forces, marks them out from the general population; how deeply the normal human being is troubled by suffering can be seen in the veneration given to great saints who have overcome it. A surprising number of holy people, especially a staggering majority of modern leaders of sects and cults, have endured poor health, especially in childhood. Others had a life-threatening illness in adulthood—sometimes even a near-death experience—that served as a “wake-up” call, triggering a religious life. Yet others, especially among the modern nationalist heroes considered holy people, have been inspired to a more profound faith thanks to an experience of prison. The belief that suffering, by breaking down normal human habits and forcing a person into complete reliance on a god or gods, can open a door between the sufferer and the divine seems to be nearly universal. And, fundamentally, the established holy person is one who has won the struggle: Suffering can no longer touch her or him in the same way and may indeed become a source of further religious inspiration. Although many of the world’s saints have suffered exile, torture, and illness, in popular belief, at least, they accept further suffering with patience and hope.

Childhood suffering is a great incentive either to become embittered and give up on religion completely or to seek God. The prophet Mani (216–274/277) is believed to have been born with a short, twisted leg, and his pain was said to be directly linked to a first visitation by a heavenly messenger when he was twelve years old. Similar cases can be found in many eras: A modern example is Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), founder of the Church of Christ Scientist, who had severe health problems growing up until a vision brought healing following a serious accident. Others, more simply, isolated from a normal childhood by ill health, have found every conventional path closed to them. Thus, Gemma Galgani (1878–1903) suffered chronic illness from childhood, so was not accepted into a nunnery despite her wishes. Cases of actual illness in childhood are common among saints. There are also cases of social deprivation that led to an outcast status. The Hindu saint Tulsidas (c. 1532–1623) was abandoned as a baby and endured a childhood of misery and deprivation until rescued by a group of Rama devotees. Even crueler and more isolating, the Shawnee prophet Tenskwatawa (1775–1836) was simply fat, and so clumsy that he accidentally put out his own eye with an arrow. Not surprisingly, he became an alcoholic, but he eventually had a vision that led to his conversion experience. Although modern media focus on socially outcast children who set out for revenge against the world that has rejected them, one must assume that some children still find in such trials the effective first steps along a spiritual path.

Hindu renunciant practicing self-mortification. Taipusan Festival, Singapore. (Art Directors)

Adult suffering as a path to holiness has taken many forms. The fourteenth-century Hindu mystic Lalla suffered greatly in her marriage to an unsympathetic and abusive man, as did a number of Christian saints. It is not clear in most such accounts whether the victims were already saint material before the abuse or the process of suffering made them turn to divine consolation. That suffering led to conversion is clearer in cases of grave illness, such as for Julian of Norwich (c. 1343–after 1419), who experienced her visions of God when in a deathlike coma, or Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556), who converted during a long and painful convalescence after his leg was shattered in battle. The Muslim saint Abu Hamid al-Ghazali (1058–1111) made the transition from legal expert to sufi holy man after he had a nervous breakdown in 1095. He thought he was losing his faith and even became paralyzed; doctors diagnosed emotional conflict. So al-Ghazali gave up his normal life, went to Jerusalem, and practiced sufi exercises for ten years, a process from which he emerged as a spiritual master. Such a case suggests that, at least at times, holy people who have suffered profoundly from mysterious illnesses have in fact been displaying psychosomatic manifestations of inner spiritual conflict.

Time in prison tends to make people either better or worse than they were before, and in several cases prison has been the catalyst that turned a person to a life of great holiness. It hardly seems to matter whether the future holy person was imprisoned for the “right reasons” (such as punishment for murder or theft) or for “wrong reasons” (defense of their religion, the struggle against imperialism, and so on): It is the fact of isolation and helplessness that appears to be the key to spiritual awakening in such circumstances. For members of the Baha’i faith, the special revelation of their religion began when Baha’u’llah (1817–1892) was imprisoned for four months in 1852–1853. He was held, apparently unjustly, after a group of radicals tried to assassinate the shah of Iran. During his time of incarceration, Baha’u’llah enjoyed a series of visions in which a heavenly maiden appeared who assured him of his divine mission. The god Krishna came to Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950) while he was in jail after being implicated in a nationalist bombing case—he told Ghose to devote his life to the spiritual uplifting of India and the world. Examples could easily be multiplied.

Many holy people have continued to suffer following their conversion or have been stricken with a debilitating illness after already being established in the popular mind as close to God, enlightened, or otherwise linked to the divine. The ability to remain steadfast in the face of such human catastrophe is one of the ultimate tests of holiness. Many Christian saints have not only accepted suffering but have embraced it; several hundred people, ranging from Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226) to Padre Pio (1887–1968), have received the wounds of Christ on their own bodies (the stigmata) as a reward for their devotion. The greatest proof that a Buddhist holy person has truly reached enlightenment is that he or she has reached impassivity, beyond both desire and affliction.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Aurobindo Ghose; Baha’u’llah; Eddy, Mary Baker; Francis of Assisi; Galgani, Gemma; Ghazali, Abu Hamid al-; Ignatius of Loyola; Julian of Norwich; Lalla; Mani; Pio of Pietrelcina; Tenskawatawa; Tulsidas

Sufism

Sufism (Arabic: tasawwuf) is an esoteric aspect of Islam focusing on closer contact with the divine in the here and now, rather than waiting until the next world. Sufism has been taught to other Muslims by noteworthy religious figures, known as awliya’ (sing. wali), or “friends [of God],” whose teachings were followed by disciples, generation after generation, thus creating what has been called a tariqah or “[spiritual] path.” Followers of such paths meet in groups once a week to utter dhikr—prayers of praise for God and requests for his help, including special prayers passed down from the original wali of their tariqa, some of whom claim that they received them from the prophet Muhammad, either by a direct vision or through a spiritual “chain” going back to him. There is no mention of the term tasawwuf in the Qur’an, or in any known sayings of Muhammad, but the prophet himself began his mission seeking contact with God, and the textuality of his lifetime contacts is what was put together as the holy book of Islam—the Qur’an. Although many Muslims understand the text of the Qur’an in a literal way, sufis see in much of it different interpretations, which they view as spiritual understandings of divine word.

In order to become a sufi, a Muslim must devote himself to an existing sufi leader, known as a shaykh, learning from him how to purify his behavioral patterns, and through him how to contact the founding wali of his tariqah, and thus to have a channel for spiritual contact with God. The awliya’ may also be seen as “saints” in that they have bestowed on them manifestations of divine grace, known as karamat, which are like miraculous acts. Sufis often refer to Tasawwuf as haqiqah, or “absolute truth.” After working with, and for, the shaykh, the disciple would eventually be given the wird (devotional text) created by the original wali of the tariqah, so that he could repeat it following regular prayers one or more times per day to increase his spiritual development.

Sufism through tariqahs became an important element of Islamic religion from the twelfth century, though in the eighteenth century it gradually came to be opposed by a fundamentalist movement in Saudi Arabia known as the Wahhabiyya. More than twenty main tariqahs came into existence, but many of them also developed branches led by later shaykhs. The latest tariqah to establish itself was the Tijaniyyah, initiated by the Algerian Ahmad al-Tijani (1737/1739–1815), and it has been widely accepted in West Africa.

—John Hunwick

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Devotion; Guidance; Islam and Holy People; Joy; Lawgivers as Holy People; Monasticism and Holy People; Morality and Holy People; Muhammad; Mysticism and Holy People; Spiritual Guardians; Teachers as Holy People; Tijani, Ahmad al-

References and further reading:

- Burckhardt, Titus. 1976. An Introduction to Sufism, the Mystical Dimension of Islam. London: Thorsons.
- Lings, Martin. 1975. What Is Sufism? London: Allen and Unwin.
- Trimingham, J. Spencer. 1998. The Sufi Orders in Islam, 2d ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Sugawara no Michizane*(845–903 C.E.)Shinto/Buddhist politician, poet, scholar*

Sugawara no Michizane, a politician, poet, and scholar in ninth-century Heian Japan, was posthumously deified as a tenjin (heavenly deity). He has been venerated up to the present as the patron of scholarship in numerous shrines (tenmangū).

Born into a family of scholars and poets in 845, from his early days Michizane enjoyed an education in the Chinese classics by his father, Koreyoshi (812–880), who served the court as an administrator, professor, and scholar. It is said that Michizane was able to read Chinese poems at a young age and that he composed his first poem at the age of eleven. At the age of eighteen, he passed the university entrance exam. He completed his studies eight years later, passing the civil service examination. Starting his career at the court bureaucracy in the capital, Heian (present-day Kyoto), he was assigned to various administrative, political, diplomatic, and educational positions. In 886, he was appointed governor of the province Sanuki (present-day Kagawa prefecture). Upon his return to the capital, Michizane was favored by the emperor Uda, and finally advanced to the rank of udaijin (minister of the right), the second-highest office in the court bureaucracy.

Four years after the abdication of Emperor Uda in favor of his son Emperor Daigo, leaders of the Fujiwara family, who entertained antipathy against the rapidly rising Michizane and sought to strengthen their influence on court politics, intrigued against Michizane, resulting in his banishment to the government of Kyushu in Dazaifu (present-day Fukuoka prefecture) in 901. Michizane spent the years until his death in 903 mainly composing poems dealing with his fate of unjust banishment. His much-valued poetry, written in Chinese, is collected in two anthologies, the Kankebunshō and the Kankekōshū, the latter containing the poems composed during his exile in Dazaifu. He also participated in the compilation of the historical works Ruijūkokushi and Sandaijitsuroku.

After the death of Michizane, a series of calamities occurred in the capital, and persons previously involved in Michizane's banishment as well as their relatives were stricken with misfortune. According to tradition, the members of the family of Fujiwara no Tokihira, who had been the leading exponent of the intrigue resulting in the banishment of Michizane, all met with premature death before reaching their forties. These incidents were attributed to the curse of Michizane's angry spirit (goryō or onryō). Michizane was posthumously pardoned by those who wished to appease his vengeful spirit, and shrines called tenmangū (heaven-filling shrines) were dedicated to him at his place of exile, Dazaifu (Dazaifu Tenmangū, 919), and at Kitano (Kitano Tenmangū, 947), north of the capital. There he was apotheosized and worshipped as tenjin and considered not only the god of thunder, uprightness, and the wrongly accused but also god of learning, calligraphy, literature, and scholarship. By and by, the vengeful connotations weakened in favor of the latter aspect. During the Edo period (1603–1867), the worship of Michizane as tenjin, which shows a highly syncretistic character, integrating aspects of both Shinto and Buddhism, expanded widely and to all social classes. At present, Michizane's deified spirit is widely venerated as god of scholarship, commonly sought for assistance by students facing the entrance examinations for schools and universities.

—Tobias Bauer

See also: Apotheosis; Attributes of Holy People; Buddhism and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Shinto and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Borgen, Robert. 1994. Sugawara no Michizane and the Early Heian Court. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- . 1995. "Oe no Masafusa and the Spirit of Michizane." Monumenta Nipponica 50, no. 3: 357–384.
- Makabe, Toshinobu. 1994. Tenjin Shinkōshi no Kenkyū. Tokyo: Zoku Gunshoruijū Kanseikai.
- Morris, Ivan. 1975. The Nobility of Failure: Tragic Heroes in the History of Japan. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston.
- Murayama, Shūichi. 1983. Tenjin Shinkō. Tokyo: Yūzankaku.
- Sato, Hiroaki, and Burton Watson, eds. 1981. From the Country of Eight Islands: An Anthology of Japanese Poetry. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Suhrawardi, Shihabuddin*(1145–1234 C.E.)Muslim sufi*

Abu Hafṣ ʿUmar al-Suhrawardi belonged to a prominent Persian sufi family and was responsible for officially organizing the Suhrawardi sufi order. Born in 1145, at an early age he was initiated into Islamic mysticism by his renowned uncle, Abu Najib al-Suhrawardi (d. 1168), and studied jurisprudence, philosophy, law, logic, theology, Qur'anic studies, and historical studies of the prophet Muhammad. He studied theology under the eminent scholar and sufi teacher ʿAbdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166) and at a young age mastered the Hanbali branch of Islamic law in Baghdad.

Caliph al-Nasir of Baghdad designated al-Suhrawardi Shaikh al-Islam (minister of religious affairs) to supervise political and religious affairs for the Abbasid administration. As a political theorist, al-Suhrawardi advocated the supremacy of the caliph because he was the capstone who mastered the Islamic sciences, who commanded knowledge of law, and who was the mediator between God and creation. For al-Suhrawardi, since humanity was incapable of returning to God on its own, the caliphate was the temporal overseer and the representative of God on earth. His political theories did invite their share of criticism from legal scholars of his time who felt he was too closely connected to legitimizing state affairs.

Al-Suhrawardi's legacy is primarily within sufism, where he asserted that living according to sufi principles and beliefs was the perfect way to conduct devotion and to enjoy divine beauty. According to al-Suhrawardi, the sufi tradition was rooted in the life of the prophet Muhammad, who embodied human perfection and divine guidance. It is the goal of sufis to mirror the prophet in order to discipline their entire inner and outer selves. His sufi theosophy stressed proper moral conduct (adab), based on the idea that the physical world is very much related to the spiritual world, and said that in order for sufis to perfect their spirituality to meet the divine, their physical customs must reflect their internal condition.

Al-Suhrawardi's ideas on proper moral conduct stemmed from the belief that it was necessary to obey the law completely because it was a manifestation of divine order. Adab was a critical element in his ideal world because, in his view, all the minute details of an individual's behavior could be controlled, a practice the sufi novice needed to master. For al-Suhrawardi, sufis were practicing more than spiritual purity; in the larger scheme, they were attempting to reunite with the divine, and this required them to uphold the law. According to al-Suhrawardi, one needed to be prepared to carry out this extraordinary responsibility by having one's thoughts and actions planned for every moment, at every place.

One of al-Suhrawardi's best works, 'Awârif al-Ma'arif (The benefits of the spiritually learned), was one of the more popular sufi books of his time, and posthumously it became the standard preparatory textbook for sufi novices. One of the many reasons for its high reputation in the sufi world was that the manual attempted to reconcile the practices of sufism with the observance of Islamic law. To later generations of sufis, and to a wide cross-section of sufi orders, al-Suhrawardi's treatise became one of the most closely studied and memorized texts in the tradition.

Al-Suhrawardi's contribution to sufi thought, to Islamic piety, and to living a holy life was to ensure that sufis fully comprehended adab as a transformative medium between the inner and outer worlds. For him, adab was a type of theology that was less about the physical, psychological, and temporal dimensions of moral conduct than about accentuating the constant opening of the heart that inspires a real journey toward encountering God.

—Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Islam and Holy People; Jilani, 'Abdul al-Qadir; Morality and Holy People; Politics and Holy People; Sufism

References and further reading:

- Huda, Qamar-ul. 2001. "The Remembrance of the Prophet through a Sufi Text: Shaikh al-Suhrawardi's 'Awarif al-Ma'arif Sufi Manual." Journal of Islamic Studies 12, no. 2: 129–150.
- . 2003. Striving for Divine Union: Spiritual Exercises for Suhrawardi Sufis. New York: Routledge Curzon.
- Manai, Aishah Yusuf. 1991. Abu Hafis 'Umar al-Suhrawardi: Haya tuhu wa tasawwufu. Cairo: Dar al-Thaqafah.
- Rizvi, Athar Abbas. 1978. A History of Sufism in India. New Delhi: Manshiram Manoharlal.
- Suhrawardi, Abu Hafis 'Umar al-. 1973. 'Awarif al-Ma'arif. Cairo: Maktabat al-Cairo.
- . 1978. Die Gaben der Erkenntnisse des 'Umar as-Suhrawardi. Translated by Richard Gramlich. Wiesbaden, Germany: Steiner.

Sulami, Abu 'Abd ar-Rahman

(936–1021 C.E.)

Muslim scholar, mystic

A pivotal Muslim scholar, theologian, and mystic of Nishapur (a city in what is now Iran), Abu 'Abd ar-Rahman Sulami, born in 936, was one of the first to categorize the early generations of Muslim mystics into a distinct group of people called sufis. He was also the author of an important and early Qur'an commentary, as well as a number of other works that elaborated a legally minded, mainstream approach to Islamic mysticism.

Sulami is perhaps best known for his biographical dictionary, Tabaqat al-sufiyya (The generations of the sufis). It contains just over a hundred biographies of early Muslim holy men, five generations of approximately twenty people each. Each biographical notice contains the full name of the sufi, the names of his teachers, and the prophetic and mystical sayings that he transmitted to others. Sulami's emphasis on sayings not only reflects the oral nature of scholarly transmission in the early Islamic period but also Sulami's scholarly approach, one that foregrounds Muhammad's sayings and their transmission as a paradigm for Muslim learning. Sulami appended to his dictionary of sufi men a series of entries dedicated to sufi women, an appendix once thought lost but recently rediscovered and published (Sulami 1999).

As in his biographical work, Sulami's Qur'an commentary Haqa'iq al-Tafsir (The realities of exegesis) emphasizes the sayings of the early sufis, in this case using them to explain key passages of the Muslim holy text. When this crucial work is finally edited and translated, it will provide a valuable resource for examining how early Muslims in general and early sufis in particular approached the Qur'an. Recently a number of new studies on Sulami's works have begun to appear, yielding a new appreciation for the role that this Sunni sufi theologian played in shaping the formation of medieval sufism.

—Frederick S. Colby

See also: Hagiography; Mysticism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People; Sufism

References and further reading:

- Bowering, Gerhard. 1991. "The Qur'an Commentary of al-Sulami." Pp. 41–56 in Islamic Studies Presented to Charles J. Adams. Edited by Wael Hallaq and Donald Little. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- Sulami, Abu Abd ar-Rahman Muhammad Ibn al-Husayn. 1983. The Book of Sufi Chivalry: Futuwwah, Lessons to a Son of the Moment. Translated by Sheikh Tosun Bayrak al-Jerrahi al-Halveti. New York: Inner Traditions International.
- . 1999. Early Sufi Women (Dhikr an-Niswa al-Muta'abbidat as-Sufiyyat). Edited and translated by Rkia Elaroui Cornell. Louisville, KY: Fons Vitae.
- . Forthcoming. The Subtleties of the Ascension: Early Mystical Sayings on Muhammad's Heavenly Journey. Edited and translated by Frederick S. Colby. Louisville, KY: Fons Vitae.

Sultan Walad

See Baha'uddin Walad

Surb Sahak

See Isaac of Armenia

Surdas

(Early 16th cent. C.E.)

Hindu poet

Surdas was a prestigious medieval Hindu poet-saint and occupies an important niche in the canon of early Hindi literature. He is commonly seen as the foremost of eight sixteenth-century poets (Ashtachapa) affiliated with the Vaishnava sect called Vallabha-sampradaya. Recent research has shown this affiliation to be a late sectarian development, but still, the Vallabhan hagiographies have been influential in the way Surdas is remembered. They depict Surdas as a blind holy man who settled in the neighborhood of Mathura in the Braj area of northern India, then newly rediscovered as the scene of Krishna's pastimes on earth. They claim that Surdas was converted to Krishna devotion by the great guru Vallabha, who appointed him to sing in the service of the sect's main image, Shri (Govardhan) Nathji, then housed on the hill Govardhana in Braj. This is still one of the most famous Krishna images of northern India, now enshrined in Rajasthan, and Surdas's songs are still performed in front of this deity, as well as in other Vallabhan temples and households throughout the region.

The sectarian interpretation of Surdas's life is mirrored in the arrangement of modern anthologies of his poetry, entitled Sur Sagar (Sur's ocean). The standard editions are subdivided into two parts. First come the more sermon-like poems (vinaya), attributed to the preconversion stage of Surdas's life. This is followed by poems that were supposedly inspired by Vallabha, focusing on incidents of Krishna's life modeled after the Sanskrit scripture Bhagavad Purana. Recent research, however, has shown that early nonsectarian manuscripts do not arrange the poems in that pattern but intersperse many sermon-like poems with the others. This shows the sectarian interpretation to be later.

Surdas is best known for his loving descriptions of the child Krishna in the so-called "parental mode" (vatsalya bhava). Commentators often note that, while blind to the world, Surdas enjoyed a special vision of Krishna to be able to create such vivid vignettes. However, again, this understanding is not borne out by early manuscripts, which show instead a preponderance of poems in the "erotic mode" (madhurya bhava), celebrating the love for Krishna of the young girls in Braj, and a predilection for the theme of "love in separation" (viraha). Evidence for Surdas's physical blindness, too, seems sparse. However, whether blind or not, the strength of Surdas's divine vision has remained inspiring to this day, well beyond the sectarian circles that claim him as their own.

—Heidi Pauwels

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Devotion; Hinduism and Holy People; Krishna

References and further reading:

- Bryant, Kenneth E. 1978. Poems to the Child God: Structures and Strategies in the Poetry of Surdas. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hawley, John Stratton. 1984. Sur Das: Poet, Singer, Saint. Publications on Asia of the Henry M. Jackson School of International Studies, 40. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- . Forthcoming. Sur's Ocean. New York: Oxford University Press.

Suso, Henry

(c. 1295–1366 C.E.)

Christian friar, mystic

Henry Suso, a Dominican mystic, was widely read and admired—particularly in the late Middle Ages—for his devotion and asceticism. He was beatified by Pope Gregory XVI in 1831, and his feast day in the Dominican calendar is January 23.

Born into a noble family at Constance, Germany, in about 1295, at thirteen Suso entered the Dominican convent there. In 1324, he was sent to Cologne, where he studied with the mystic Meister Eckhart, who greatly influenced his spiritual development. Suso also likely knew the famed preacher and Eckhart disciple Johannes Tauler. Returning to his convent at Constance around 1327, Suso was appointed lector, responsible for training young Dominicans. Although briefly removed from his duties for suspicion of heresy—related to his espousal of Eckhart’s teachings—this charge proved unfounded. Suso served briefly as prior of the community. Transferred around 1348 to Ulm, he remained there until his death in 1366.

Suso’s mystical life began at age eighteen, when he became a self-proclaimed “servant of eternal wisdom.” He experienced frequent visions and ecstasies and practiced severe asceticism, which included prolonged bouts of fasting. He also took to wearing a nail-studded hair shirt. In later years, he moderated such practices following a celestial vision. His spirituality exemplified the ideal of patience in suffering as a living sacrifice to God.

Known for his preaching abilities, Suso was also the spiritual guide to many local Dominican nuns, especially Elspeth Stigel (c. 1300–c. 1360), with whom he developed a close spiritual bond and who was responsible for preserving many of his writings. In addition to sermons and letters, these included a number of devotional works. Suso’s spiritual autobiography, the Leben Seusses (Life of the servant), graphically detailed his austerities and tribulations. Shortly before his death, he prepared an authoritative edition of his vernacular writings, called the Exemplar Seusses (Exemplar).

—Alisa Plant

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Clark, James. 1949. The Great German Mystics: Eckhart, Tauler, and Suso. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. 1984. Unquiet Souls: Fourteenth-Century Saints and Their Religious Milieu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Suso, Henry. 1989. The Exemplar, with Two German Sermons. Translated and edited by Frank Tobin. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press.

Suzuki, Daisetz Teitarō

(1870–1966 C.E.)

Zen Buddhist scholar, teacher

Religious scholar and “apostle” of Zen Buddhism in the West, Daisetz Teitarō Suzuki is also known as Suzuki Daisetsu and D. T. Suzuki. Born in Kanazawa in present-day Ishikawa prefecture in 1870, he was a member of the first generation born in Meiji Japan (1868–1912). Suzuki was educated at Ishikawa Professional School and Tokyo Imperial University.

He began training as a lay Zen practitioner at the Rinzaï sect temple, Engakuji, in Kamakura in 1891. In 1893, he translated Abbot Shaku Sōen’s address to the World Congress of Religions in Chicago. The paper, “The Law of Cause and Effect, as Taught by the Buddha,” impressed religious publisher Paul Carus, who invited Suzuki to come to the United States to translate a number of “Oriental” texts for his Open Court Press. Suzuki spent more than ten years in America translating and performing domestic chores in the Carus home in LaSalle, Illinois. He returned to Japan in 1909 and began teaching English at the Peers’ School (now Gakushuin University). Because of philosophical differences with some administrators, Suzuki left the Peers’ School in 1919 and went to Ōtani University, where he spent many years teaching Buddhist philosophy.

In 1911, Suzuki married American Beatrice Lane, who, until her death in 1939, helped him produce a remarkable corpus of English-language literature on Buddhism, including the journal The Eastern Buddhist. Suzuki’s Essays in Zen Buddhism (1927–1934) remains the foundational English-language source on Zen, and with Zen Buddhism and Its Influence on Japanese Culture (1938) forms the core of the Zen canon in North America. Associated with Nishida Kitarō and the conservative Kyoto School during the 1930s and 1940s, Suzuki was implicated in pre–World War II Japanese cultural nationalism, but he avoided post-war ostracism by publicly condemning Japan’s initiation of hostilities.

Suzuki spent the 1950s largely outside Japan spreading the doctrines and practices of Zen Buddhism. As a writer, lecturer, and visiting professor at Columbia University, Suzuki presented Zen as a kind of antidote to Western materialism and demonstrated the applicability of Zen-style “awakening” to Western religion, psychology, and literature. Erich Fromm, Thomas Merton, Carl Jung, Gary Snyder, and Alan Watts are only a few of the Western scholars whose work was influenced by Suzuki’s interpretations of Zen. Suzuki died in Tokyo in 1966. His works in Japanese, Suzuki Daisetsu Zenshū (The complete works of Daisetz Suzuki), fill thirty-two volumes, and his English-language works, which have undergone several editions, number roughly thirty volumes.

—Eric Cunningham

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Laity; Merton, Thomas; Scholars as Holy People; Shaku Sōen; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Abe, Masao, ed. 1986. A Zen Life: D. T. Suzuki Remembered. New York: Weatherhill.
- Suzuki, Daisetz T. 1959. Zen and Japanese Culture. Bollingen Series, vol. 66. New York: Pantheon.
- . 1962. The Essentials of Zen Buddhism. Edited by Bernard Phillips. New York: E. P. Dutton.
- . 1993. Manual of Zen Buddhism. New York: Grove.

Sweet Medicine

Legendary Cheyenne prophet

The tale of Sweet Medicine, also known as Sweet Root Standing, is the most sacred story of the Cheyenne. They believe this man was used by the creator, Maheo (The Great Mysterious One), to bring all good things to the Cheyenne. Although he gave many gifts to the people, the greatest is said to be the sacred arrows. However, his life was not always one of beauty.

Sweet Medicine's parents died when he was an infant and he was raised by an older woman of limited means. She covered him with a scrap of buffalo robe, and he was known as Nivhevoss, Eagle's Nest. As he grew older, he was mischievous, performing tricks, and was disliked by some. One day, the handsome young man killed a buffalo bull with a black coat. A great chief desired the robe, but Sweet Medicine refused to part with it, and a blow to the head of the chief resulted in his death. Nivhevoss was then pursued by the Dog Soldiers, Kit Foxes, Red Shields, and the Elk Society, those men whose job it was to ensure that all things were done properly.

These men said they would kill Nivhevoss by beating him to death. He ran away and then reappeared to these men in the days that followed. He was impossible to catch, and five times he escaped as different animals—first as a coyote, then a magpie, next a crow, a blackbird, and then an owl. Next he was seen standing near the camp dressed as a Dog Soldier, then as a Red Shield. Escaping all, on the next appearance he wore a war bonnet and carried a crooked lance, both insignia of the Elk Society. Then he dressed as a Kit Fox. On the fifth day he appeared again, and on the sixth day he was acting like a chief, carrying tobacco bag and pipe, with a painted face.

Every day they chased him and every day he escaped. The people observed that whenever he left, so did the buffalo, and upon his return, the buffalo herds came back also. Realizing that his power was helpful to them, they finally welcomed him back. Sweet Medicine then made a pilgrimage to the Sacred Mountain. Most accounts of this trip include a female, the chief's daughter, who was very pretty, but they did not marry before the pilgrimage.

Upon arriving at the Sacred Mountain, Sweet Medicine was welcomed by humans, animals, and all things that grow upon the earth. Four principal men were sitting around the lodge, and Sweet Medicine was given his choice as to which one he wanted to resemble. Although all were more handsome than any he had ever seen, Sweet Medicine chose the best-looking one. Had he chosen any of the other three, he would have lived forever. But because of his choice, he would eventually die.

The chief people of the lodge gave Sweet Medicine advice and the gift of the medicine arrows. The arrows were wrapped in a coyote's skin and feathered with eagle feathers.

They were carried out by the girl and placed on her back. Upon their return, Sweet Medicine taught the people all they needed to know in order to live well, such as how to make arrows for hunting buffalo, how to tan skins, how to make clothing and robes, and pipes, and how to dry certain plants to smoke in the pipe.

Sweet Medicine lived four lifetimes, turning young in spring and summer and older each fall and winter. He died in the spring of the year as a young man. Before his death, he prophesied concerning those who would come to fight with the people, the disappearance of the buffalo, the introduction of the horse, and the white people who would be all over the land. The story of Sweet Medicine is still told, his name is still spoken, and the medicine arrows are still kept by the Cheyenne to this day.

—Connie H. Rickenbaker

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Nature; Sages

References and further reading:

- Bruchac, Joseph. 1997. "With Visible Breath: Miracles in Native American Traditions." Parabola 22, no. 4: 6–11.
- Grinnell, George B. 1962. Cheyenne Indians. New York: Cooper Square.
- Moore, John H. 1997. The Cheyenne. Washington, DC: Heldref.
- Powell, Peter John. 1969. Sweet Medicine. San Francisco: Harper and Row.
- . 1981. People of the Sacred Mountain. Vol. 1. San Francisco: Harper and Row.

Swithin

(d. 862 C.E.)

Christian bishop

Swithin, a ninth-century bishop of Winchester in England, was venerated posthumously as a miracle worker and patron of the tenth-century Benedictine reform.

Swithin served as an adviser to the West Saxon king Egbert (r. 802–839) and succeeded to the see of Winchester during the reign of King Ethelwulf (r. 839–856). He was consecrated by Ceolnoth, the archbishop of Canterbury, on October 30, 852, and died in 862. Little else is known of his life. As the tenth-century Ælfric, one of his biographers, complained, his contemporaries "out of negligence" recorded nothing of his deeds or way of life. Ælfric knew only that Swithin had been buried to the west outside his cathedral church.

Swithin's main contribution to Anglo-Saxon Christianity came more than a century after his death, when on July 15, 971, Bishop Æthelwold of Winchester dug up his remains and reinstalled them in an elaborate new shrine in the Old Minster, his cathedral church. Soon pilgrims flocked to the shrine, attracted by reports of miraculous cures worked by the saint's relics. Lantfred, a visiting monk, collected and

Although the shrines of saints throughout England were destroyed in the 1530s at the orders of Henry VIII, the Anglo-Saxon saint Swithin once again has a shrine in his cathedral at Winchester, England. (Art Directors) recorded the miracles in a Latin account, the Translatio et miracula S. Swithuni (Translation and miracles of St. Swithin). This became the basis for literary works by two of Æthelwold's pupils: a Latin poem by Wulfstan of Winchester ("Cantor") and an Old English translation by Ælfric, abbot of Eynsham.

The translation of the saint's relics increased Winchester's prestige and gave support to Æthelwold's plan to reform the cathedral clergy by replacing dissolute priests and secular canons with well-disciplined Benedictine monks. Indeed, Æthelwold's interest in ecclesiastical reform, coupled with his promotion of Swithin's cult, may well be the source of the tradition (completely unsupported by evidence) that the saint had been the prior of a Benedictine community at Winchester. It is no coincidence that one of Swithin's first recorded miracles involved a priest, Eadsige, who had been expelled from the Old Minster by Æthelwold, but who returned to the cathedral after taking monastic vows.

Swithin's remains were translated one more time, in 1093, when Bishop Walkelin erected a new church in the see. The shrine and its relics were destroyed during the Reformation.

—Nancy M. Thompson

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Veneration of Holy People

References and further reading:

- Needham, Geoffrey Ivor, ed. 1976. Ælfric: Lives of Three English Saints, rev. ed. Exeter: University of Exeter.
- Sheerin, D. J. 1978. "The Dedication of the Old Minster in Winchester in 980." Revue Bénédictine 88: 261–273.
- Skeat, Walter, ed. 1966 [1881]. "St. Swithin, Bishop." Pp. 440–471 in Ælfric's Lives of Saints. Early English Text Society, o.s. 76 and 82. London: Oxford University Press.

Sylvester

See Silvester I

Symeon

See Simeon ben Yohai; Simeon of Trier; Simeon the New Theologian; Simeon the Stylite

T

Tagami Michi

See Kikusha-ni

Tahirih (Qurratu'l-'ayn)

(1817–1852 C.E.)

Babi disciple

Tahirih (The Pure One), also known as Qurratu'l-'ayn (Consolation of the Eyes), was a leading figure in the Babi movement, the only woman among the “Letters of the Living” (the first and highest-ranking group of the Bab’s disciples).

Tahirih was born in the Iranian city of Qazvin to a family of leading Islamic clerics in 1817. From her earliest years, she showed extraordinary abilities, memorizing the Qur’an and grasping abstruse points of religious law and theology. She was also very beautiful and a talented poetess. She was married to her cousin and had four children. She became an enthusiastic supporter of the teachings of Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa’i, despite the fact that her husband and father-in-law were virulent enemies of the shaykh. Eventually, in 1843, Tahirih left for Karbala to meet with Sayyid Kazim Rashti, the successor to Shaykh Ahmad. Unfortunately, Sayyid Kazim had died by the time Tahirih arrived, but, with his wife’s permission, she set up in Sayyid Kazim’s home and continued his teaching circle, teaching the men from behind a curtain.

In 1844, news reached her of the claims of the Bab and she immediately accepted these, becoming one of the eighteen Letters of the Living. She began to teach this message in Karbala. At the end of 1847, she was arrested and sent to Baghdad, where she resided at the home of the mufti of Baghdad. The Ottoman authorities decided to expel her and she returned to Qazvin. Here, she was involved in further confrontations with her father-in-law and husband, which ended in their divorce. When in October 1847 her father-in-law was murdered, her husband accused Tahirih of complicity in the crime, and her life was in danger until Baha’u’llah, founder of the Baha’i faith, arranged for her removal from Qazvin.

Tahirih attended the Conference of Badasht in summer 1848, at which most of the leading Babis were present. Here she proclaimed the advent of a new religious dispensation by appearing unveiled. Shortly after this conference she was arrested and held at the home of the kalantar (mayor) of Tehran. She captivated her captors and succeeded in converting to Babism some women from the highest reaches of society, including a royal princess. In 1852, Tahirih, at the age of thirty-five, was strangled and her body thrown into a well.

Tahirih is considered the outstanding woman of the Babi religion and was regarded by the Babis as the return of Fatima, the daughter of the prophet Muhammad, from whom she was descended through her mother. Her holiness may be thought to reside, at least partly, in the compelling manner in which she interpreted the sacred role of Fatima. She has become for many Iranian women a symbol and icon of the women’s movement. For Baha’is she has come to symbolize their concern for the equality of women and social action, and girls are frequently named after her.

—Moojan Momen and B. Todd Lawson

See also: Ahmad al-Ahsa’i, Shaykh; Bab, The; Baha’i Faith and Holy People; Baha’u’llah; Fatima bint Muhammad; Gender and Holy People; Kazim Rashti, Sayyid

References and further reading:

Hatcher, John, and Amrollah Hemmat. 2002. The Poetry of Táhirih. Oxford: George Ronald.

Lawson, Todd. 2001. “The Authority of the Feminine and Fatima’s Place in an Early Work by the Báb” Pp. 94–127 in The Most Learned of the Shí’a: The Institution of the Marja’ Taqlid. Edited by L. Walbridge. New York: Oxford University Press.

Nabíl [Zarandi]. 1970. The Dawn-Breakers: Nabíl’s Narrative of the Early Days of the Bahá’í Revelation. Wilmette, IL: Bahá’í Publishing Trust.

Root, Martha. 1981. Tahirih the Pure, rev. ed. Los Angeles: Kalimat.

Tai HsüSee Taixu*Tailfeather WomanSioux prophet*

The vision of Tailfeather Woman is the origin of the ceremonial powwow drum. In English it is called “Sioux drum,” and in Ojibwa, it is bwaanidewe’igan. Much of the music for the traditional ceremonies of the Chippewa/Ojibwa and Potawatomi is set within the Drum Dance Religion, also called the Big Drum Religion and the Dream Dance Religion. The actual story of Tailfeather Woman and the details of the origin of the drum are not known. The basic structure is the same and the story is always told at Drum Dance ceremonies. However, there are themes that pervade all versions.

A Sioux woman lost her four sons as they fought against the white soldiers. As her people were being massacred, she fled and ran into a lake. The soldiers pursued her, and while she hid among the lily pads the Great Spirit came to her and over four days told her what to do. At noon on the fourth day, she went to see who was left and to share what the Great Spirit taught her. The only way to stop the soldiers from killing the people was to build a drum. She taught the songs to the men, and they built the drum and played and sang as Tailfeather Woman shared with them what to do.

As they sang and played, the soldiers heard the sound of the drum and put down their weapons. They stood still and stopped their killing. Peace terms were made with the Indians, and the powwow continues to this day. The Great Spirit came to Tailfeather Woman with a message of the power of peace, and the people listened. The drum, which expressed the power and beauty of Indian culture, is still the focal point in contemporary powwows.

As the story of Tailfeather Woman and the drum was being passed on to other tribes, the message of peacemaking shifted. The emphasis moved to making peace between the tribes. The ceremonies surrounding the drum still follow the original traditions, with the lead female member representing Tailfeather Woman. Although the drum itself is greatly revered, equal emphasis is placed on the ceremonies, as they symbolize the spirit helpers and the teachings shared by the Great Spirit over those four days.

—Connie H. Rickenbaker

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Prophets; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Slotkin, James, and Charles Schmitt. 1949. “Studies of Wampum.” American Anthropologist 51: 223–236.
- Vennum, Thomas. 1982. The Ojibwa Dance Drum: Its History and Construction. Washington, DC: Smithsonian.

Taixu (Tai Hsü)

(1890–1947 C.E.)

Buddhist reformer

A leading monk of the Buddhist reform movement in modern China and the “Martin Luther of Chinese Buddhism,” Taixu, born in 1890, became a Buddhist novice at the age of sixteen. Having received full ordination (bhikṣu) under Jin’an (1851–1913) in 1904, he studied Buddhism, especially Dharmalakana philosophy, and practiced meditation under various masters. In 1913, Taixu proposed a threefold reform of Buddhist organizations, economics, and intellectual learning with the hope of reviving Chinese Buddhism. In 1914, he decided to devote himself to religious practice at Mount Putuo. After almost three years of self-confinement, Taixu toured Japan and Taiwan in 1917. In 1918, Taixu, together with other gentry in Shanghai, founded the Enlightenment Society (Xueshe) and started a magazine, later renamed Haichaoyin (Sound of the sea tide). The magazine and the Wuchang Buddhist College (Wuchang foxue yuan), which he founded in 1921, became the two most important platforms for him to advocate Buddhist reforms.

Taixu’s role in the Asian Buddhist Conference held in Tokyo in 1925, and his world tour of Europe and America in late 1928 and early 1929, further established him as the Buddhist leader of China. He founded the Chinese Buddhist Study Society (Zhongguo foxue hui) in 1928 and was elected a standing committee member of the Chinese Buddhist Society (Zhongguo fojiao hui). During the Japanese War (1937–1945), Taixu actively supported the Chinese government’s war policy and led a political mission of Buddhist delegates to Burma, India, and Sri Lanka in 1939. At the end of the war, he was awarded the Medal of Victory by the nationalist government, and was authorized to reorganize the Chinese Buddhist Society. Taixu died on March 17, 1947, leaving behind 300 relics and an unharmed heart after cremation. His dharma (doctrinal) heritage was embodied in the Complete Work of Master Taixu, which consists of 7 million words. His Buddhist social philosophy of “establishing Pure Land on earth” has become a major force for Buddhist revival in Taiwan and mainland China.

—Xue Yu

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Contemporary Holy People; Reform and Reaction

References and further reading:

- Millican, Frank R. 1923. “Tai Hsü and Modern Buddhism.” The Chinese Recorder 54, no. 6: 326–334.
- Pittman, Don A. 2001. Toward a Modern Chinese Buddhism. Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press.
- Welch, Holmes. 1968. The Buddhist Revival in China. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Yingshun. 1995. Taixu fashi nianpu (The chronicle biography of Taixu). Beijing: Zongjiao wenhua chubanshe.

Takla Haymanot

(c. 1215–1313 C.E.)

Christian missionary

Takla Haymanot, among Ethiopia's most prominent evangelizers, was the first to introduce monastic institutions into central and southern Ethiopia. According to his hagiography, he was born in the region of Shoa (Selaleh, in the locality Zorare, probably present-day Bulga, Etissa). His father, Tsaga Za-Ab, was a priest, and his mother, Egzi Haraya, was of noble descent.

Takla Haymanot was born in about 1215 under unusual circumstances. When the non-Christian ruler of Damot, Motalami, invaded Shoa, he captured the beautiful Egzi Haraya and wanted to marry her, but the archangel Michael reportedly came to her rescue and brought her back to Tsaga Za-Ab. Soon afterward, she conceived and gave birth to a boy who was baptized Fesseha Seyon. The child could work miracles before he could even walk. When Fesseha Seyon grew up, Metropolitan Cyril consecrated him deacon and, after some more years, priest. Later, it is said that Jesus appealed to him to start missionary activities, giving him the new name Takla Haymanot (Plant of the Faith). From then on, Takla Haymanot ardently preached in the neighboring areas, overcoming the resistance of the local elite.

In Damot, after a bitter fight he was able to convert Motalami. Later, he traveled to other sanctuaries of Ethiopia, becoming a monk in the process. Wherever he went, he astonished other monks with his humility and miraculous deeds. Following pilgrimages to Jerusalem, he returned to Shoa and founded a monastic community called Dabra Asbo (renamed Dabra Libanos in the mid-fifteenth century). He spent his last years in seclusion, standing upright and praying. After years of standing, one of his legs apparently broke and separated from his body (this episode became a widespread motif in traditional Ethiopian painting). He died of plague at the age of almost 100 in 1313.

After Takla Haymanot's death, his veneration spread and his monastery grew in importance. He figures in many Ethiopian hagiographic texts, including at least three versions of his Acts, accounts of his life written after his death. A considerable number of other saints or notable monastic leaders are believed to be his "spiritual children" and pupils, and their monasteries are thus affiliated with the "house of Takla Haymanot." The literary heritage of Takla Haymanot's hagiography is vast: Apart from his Acts, there are homilies, cycles of miracles, spiritual genealogies, and the like.

Many churches are consecrated in the name of Takla Haymanot, and Dabra Libanos of Shoa, where his grave is located, attracts large numbers of pilgrims. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tawahedo Church celebrates annual feasts of Takla Haymanot on 24 Nahase (August 30), 24 Tahsas (January 2), and 12 Genbot (May 20); he is also commemorated on the twenty-fourth day of each month. Takla Haymanot is venerated in the Eritrean Orthodox Church, and he is the only Ethiopian saint canonized by the Coptic Church, which commemorates him on 24 Misra and 24 Kihak.

—Denis Nosnitsin

See also: Mission; Monasticism and Holy People; Orthodoxy and Saints; Veneration of Holy People

References and further reading:

- Belaynesh, Michael, et al., eds. 1975. The Dictionary of Ethiopian Biography. Vol. 1, From Early Times to the End of the Zagwé Dynasty, c. 1270 A.D. Addis Ababa: Institute of Ethiopian Studies.
- Budge, Ernest. 1906. The Life and Miracles of Tàklà Hâymanôt in the Version of Dabra Libânôs, and the Miracles of Tàklà Hâymanôt in the Version of Dabra Libânôs, and the Book of the Riches of the Kings. The Ethiopic texts, from the British Museum ms. Oriental 723, edited with English Translations, to Which Is Added an English Translation of the Waldebbân Version. London: Privately printed for Lady Meux.
- Chojnacki, Stanislaw. 2000. Ethiopian Icons: Catalogue of the Collection of the Institute of Ethiopian Studies, Addis Ababa University. Milan: Skira.
- Nosnitsin, Denis. 2003. "Mashafa folsatu la-abuna Takla Haymanot: A Short Study." Aethiopica: International Journal of Ethiopian Studies 6: 137–167.
- Taddesse Tamrat. 1974. Church and State in Ethiopia, 1270–1527. Oxford: Clarendon.

Tansi, Cyprian Michael Iwene

(1903–1964 C.E.)

Roman Catholic priest, monk

Cyprian Michael Iwene Tansi was beatified by Pope John Paul II in Oba, southeastern Nigeria, on March 22, 1998. Historian Elizabeth Isichei had labeled Tansi "a saint by acclamation" in her 1980 biography of Tansi. Isichei's work was based on dozens of oral and written accounts by those who had lived with, studied under, and taught Tansi, both in Nigeria and England, where he died.

Tansi was born in 1903 in Aguleri, an Igbo community in what was then a British colony. Tansi grew up in a "Christian village" in Aguleri, having been sent to live there with an uncle at the age of six by his widowed mother. Life in the Christian village was lived along extremely strict principles. Three years later, Iwene was baptized, taking the name Michael. At the age of sixteen, Tansi became a certified teacher. He taught for several years at Holy Trinity School, Onitsha, and served for one year as principal of the school in Aguleri. In 1925, at the age of twenty-two, he entered the newly established seminary in Igbariam. In 1937, following twelve years as a seminarian, Tansi was ordained. Ordinations to the priesthood in Igbo land were rare because of reservations on the part of both family members and the European missionaries.

In 1950, after thirteen years as a parish priest, Tansi left Nigeria to enter Mount Saint Bernard, an abbey of the Cistercians of Strict Observance in Leicestershire, England. The road to monastic life was even more difficult than the path to the priesthood. There were no monasteries in Nigeria at the time, and so aspiring monks had to appeal to European monasteries. Rejections cited the impossibility of Africans and Europeans living a communal life as dictated by monastic rules. Tansi died in England in January 1964, having spent the last eleven years of his life as a monk.

Tansi embarked on the pursuit of the ascetic ideal long before he formally made the monastic vow; companions recalled him living an extremely austere life devoted to prayer, piety, abnegation, and the pursuit of religious and moral propriety. Although abstemious himself, he was generous with others. By all accounts, Tansi showed striking religious devotion from a very early age. It should be noted, however, that some felt that Tansi's extreme religiosity made him inflexible. He was a great foe of non-Christian ritual practices. A particular concern of his was marriage and the family, and to this end he took steps to safeguard the "purity of girls," building homes where young affianced girls were required to stay until their marriage had been celebrated in church.

—Anene Ejikeme

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Monasticism and Holy People; Purity and Pollution; Tolerance and Intolerance

References and further reading:

- Isichei, Elizabeth A. 1980. Entirely for God: The Life of Michael Iwene Tansi. London: Macmillan Education.
- Obi, Celestine A., ed. 1985. A Hundred Years of the Catholic Church in Eastern Nigeria, 1885–1985. Onitsha, Nigeria: Africana-FEP.
- . 1998. Facing Mount Saint Bernard, Blessed Cyprian Tansi O.C.S.O.: The Life and Times of Blessed Cyprian Michael Iwene Tansi O.C.S.O. Onitsha, Nigeria: Africana-FEP.
- Wareing, Gregory. 1994. A New Life of Father Cyprian Michael Iwene Tansi, OSCO. Coalville, England: Mount St. Bernard Abbey.

Tao Hongjing (T'ao Hung-ching)

(456–536 C.E.)

Daoist patriarch

Tao Hongjing, born in 456, was a Chinese Daoist master who was, and still is, considered a patriarch of Mao Mountain (Maoshan) or Upper Clarity (Shangqing) Daoism. Upper Clarity Daoism included theories of the human body in relation to the external universe, longevity techniques focused on herbology and mineralogy, as well as visualization and meditation techniques. Tao was also the first to write out a Daoist lineage making the Daoist pantheon more orderly, arranging them in hierarchical order and describing all the deities in great detail.

Tao was also a very prominent political figure, serving as high-ranking minister and tutor to the royal princes in the southern Qi dynasty (479–502) court. During the Liang dynasty (502–557), even though he had retired in 492, the court still sought his advice and he became known as the "Prime Minister from the Mountains." After retiring, he lived and worked on Mao Mountain, in present Jiangsu province, southeastern China. Tao was well known for his scientific endeavors, including alchemical experiments, medicine, herbology, astronomical charts, sword making, and water-clock designs. Tao advocated a synthesis of the "Three Teachings," those of Daoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism. He was a follower of the Daoist master Ge Hong (283–343/363) and wrote some fifty works.

Tao collected, edited, and annotated the fragmentary manuscripts of the original Upper Clarity revelations. These scriptures were texts that were revealed to the Daoist Yang Xi (330–386?) by deities who appeared to him in visions between the years 364 and 370. Yang's texts had emanated from the highest reaches of the heavens, as described in the texts, from the hands of the highest deities, the Perfected Beings (zhenren). Yang's texts were collected into the first of the three sections of the Daoist canon. Writing in poetic verse, Tao created two compilations: the Dengzhen yinjue (Hidden explanations for ascending to the perfected) and Zhen'gao (Declarations of the perfected). The former was a text that instructs on the rituals of sending documents to the gods. In the latter, Tao relates his recovery of the Upper Clarity scriptures, as well as guided meditations and visualizations.

—Richard A. Pegg

See also: Daoism and Holy People; Ge Hong; Guidance; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bokenkamp, Stephen R. 1997. Early Daoist Scriptures. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Pas, Julian F., and Man Kam Leung. 1998. Historical Dictionary of Taoism. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow.
- Robinet, Isabelle. 1997. Taoism: Growth of a Religion. Translated by Phyllis Brooks. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Tao-an

See Daoan

Tapas

Hindu asceticism

In Hinduism, the term tapas has come to mean "asceticism" or spiritual austerities, and a person who practices asceticism is known as a tapasvin. The words are very old and come from the Sanskrit root tap-, "to give out heat," "to make hot," and/or "to be hot." The noun form has as its most basic and initial translation "heat" or "warmth," and in the natural world, it is literally related to the heat and energy of the sun and fire. In the earliest of Indian sacred texts, the Vedas (1500–600 B.C.E.), sacrifice was the central sacred action, and fire, as both a creative and destructive element, was the most important component of this ritual. It is not surprising that a term for and related to sacred heat came to exhibit a variety of meanings and connotations outside the strictly ritual context. In the Vedic literature, there are myths that credit tapas as the very energy or force behind the initial creation of the universe. The texts cite tapas as associated with many different kinds of heat and warmth: fertilizing heat, destructive and creative heat, consuming heat, incubating heat, purifying heat, sexual heat, and so on.

For the holy people of the Vedic period, usually the priests, or brahmins, their labor, particularly with regard to the performance of sacrifice, could in itself produce powerful heat, or tapas. However, the word becomes especially descriptive of the intense power that could be generated by the austerities, or “heated efforts,” of self-denial and bodily mortification. A man (or less often, a woman) could perform acts of asceticism such as fasting, chastity, seclusion, looking at or being exposed to fire and the sun for long periods of time, and sleep deprivation. These actions and many like them were designed to be painful, difficult, and, in fact, contrary to natural human behavior. As such, tapas-laden acts had as their consequence the elevation of the ascetic to a condition that is beyond the normal human experience. Tapas is both the means and the end—it is the ascetic activity, and it produces the “magical heat.” The tapasvin can become an extremely powerful as well as a holy figure.

In post-Vedic texts, such as the epics and Puranas, there is ample testimony that the practice of asceticism, tapas, continued to be a prominent feature of Hinduism. Asceticism remains a viable means to induce and produce an incredibly potent energy recognized by gods and humans as both creative and destructive. There are many accounts of legendary human and divine tapasvins who performed great austerities and gained great power. There are also accounts of gods who seek to prevent tapasvins from accumulating too much power by sabotaging their ascetic endeavors.

Today in India there are tapasvins practicing tapas in major cities as well as in small, remote villages. Asceticism in many forms remains an acceptable and valued form of religious experience in Hinduism as well as in other traditions existing on the subcontinent such as Buddhism and Jainism.

—Phyllis K. Herman

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Eliade, Mircea. 1973. Yoga: Immortality and Freedom. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Kaelber, Walter O. 1989. Tapta Marga: Asceticism and Initiation in Vedic India. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Klostermaier, Klaus K. 1994. A Survey of Hinduism. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Staal, Frits. 1975. Exploring Mysticism: A Methodological Essay. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Vesci, Uma Marina. 1985. Heat and Sacrifice in the Vedas. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.

Tapduk Emre

(13th–14th cent. C.E.)

Muslim sufi, teacher

Tapduk Emre is a household name in Turkish culture, though very little is known about his life. He was an accomplished sufi master during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but his fame comes from the fact that he was the spiritual teacher of Yunus Emre (c. 1241–1320/1321), the famous mystical poet of the Turkish language.

Like many figures of Anatolian sufism, Tapduk Emre’s life and teachings are recorded and narrated in folk traditions, legends, and stories. The most important source about his life, however, is his student Yunus. As Yunus Emre’s spiritual guide, he not only initiated Yunus into sufism but also inspired him to create a unique mystical-poetical imagery in Turkish. According to one story, it was Haji Bektash Wali who directed Yunus toward Tapduk Emre. Some sources relate that Yunus married Tapduk Emre’s daughter, thus becoming his disciple as well as his son-in-law. Yunus is reported to have served Tapduk Emre for more than thirty years until the master’s death. Many of Yunus’s poems refer to Tapduk Emre as a great spiritual master, and this theme runs through much of Turkish-Islamic mysticism, where unequivocal allegiance to the spiritual master is the first step in the spiritual path. With his burning soul and poetic eloquence, Yunus represents the “unripe” novice and Tapduk Emre symbolizes the pole of perfection and maturity.

In his role as a social-spiritual leader Tapduk Emre is comparable to the sufis of his time, such as Haji Bektash Wali and Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi. The Turkish sufis of this period played an important role in consolidating the sufi tradition in Turkish-speaking areas of Anatolia in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, when they were instrumental in alleviating the destructive impact of the Mongol invasion. The spiritual revival in Turkey and other places that followed the Mongol attacks can be traced back to these figures and their spiritual legacy. Tapduk Emre symbolizes this kind of active mysticism.

—Ibrahim Kalin

See also: Bektash Wali, Haji; Mysticism and Holy People; Reform and Reaction; Rumi, Mevlana Jalaluddin; Sufism; Teachers as Holy People; Yunus Emre

References and further reading:

- Lewisohn, Leonard. 1999. The Heritage of Sufism. 3 vols. Oxford: Oneworld.
- Schimmel, Annemarie. 1975. Mystical Dimensions of Islam. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Taqi Muhammad

(c. 790–c. 840 C.E.)

Isma‘ili Muslim imam

Taqi Muhammad followed his father, Wafi Ahmad, as the ninth imam of the Shi’a Isma‘ili Muslims in 828. Like his father, he lived primarily at Salamiyya, Syria, and ‘Abdallah b. Maymun al-Qadah, the chief da’i (representative), continued to serve as the hijab (cover) for him. In addition to spreading his message via his da’is, Taqi Muhammad actively engaged in the sociophilosophical concerns of his time.

Taqi Muhammad is said to have prepared with his followers an encyclopedic text called the Rasa’il Ikhwan al-Safa (The epistles of the brethren of purity, or Epistles of the sincere brethren). The work contains fifty-two epistles divided into four main categories: mathematical sciences, natural sciences, intellectual sciences, and theological sciences. In this text, pre-Islamic wisdom, such as Greek philosophy and Babylonian astrology, was presented along with Isma’ili ideas. Multiple copies of this work were secretly prepared in a cave, and when sufficient numbers were produced, they were simultaneously placed in the leading masjids (schools) of the Abbasid lands. As was to be expected, the text aroused much intellectual curiosity.

According to tradition, even the caliph, al-Mamun, was eager to discover the source of Rasa’il Ikhwan al-Safa and gathered a group of scholars to discuss the text. A representative of Taqi Muhammad, popularly referred to as Dai Tirmidhi, participated in these royal discussions. Caliph al-Mamun pretended to have completely accepted Isma’ili doctrine and expressed the desire to meet with the imam. Dai Tirmidhi was not sure of the sincerity of this request, however, and, to protect Taqi Muhammad, said that he himself was the imam. Al-Mamun quickly had him beheaded. Dai Tirmidhi’s action is very typical of the considerable sacrifices that the representatives made in order to keep the imams safe from harm. However, according to other sources the Rasa’il Ikhwan al-Safa was produced by a group of Isma’ili intellectuals in the city of Basra. Taqi Muhammad passed away in Salamiyya and was succeeded by his son ‘Abdallah, who was called Raziuddin ‘Abdallah.

—Habibeh Rahim

See also: Imams; Islam and Holy People; Wafi Ahmad

References and further reading:

Daftary, Farhad. 1990. The Isma’ilis: Their History and Doctrines.

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1998. A Short History of the Ismailis. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

———, ed. 2000. Intellectual Traditions in Islam. London: I. B. Tauris and the Institute of Ismaili Studies.

Tara

Buddhist goddess

Tara (Sgrol-ma), the Buddhist savior-goddess and the feminine counterpart of the bodhisattva (enlightened being) Avalokiteshvara, is widely venerated in Nepal, Tibet, and

The Buddhist goddess Tara, believed in several Buddhist lands to be incarnate in every virtuous woman. Darjeeling, India. (Art Directors)

Mongolia, where she is believed to be incarnate in every pious woman. With the establishment of Vajrayana Buddhism in Tibet in the eleventh century, Tara became the most popular female deity, and the Tibetan people, in fact, began to see her as the very source of their origin. She is said to have come into existence from a tear of Avalokiteshvara. This tear fell on the ground and formed a lake; out of the waters of the lake grew a lotus, and when this lotus opened Tara was revealed. Like Avalokiteshvara, she is a compassionate deity who is always ready to help. She is said to represent the very essence of loving devotion, extending her loving care to the good as well as the bad. She is not only the protector of earthly travel but also of spiritual travel on the way to enlightenment. She invariably stays by the side of her devotees in their religious practices.

Tara shares many mythic parallels with the Hindu deity Durga, and it is difficult to say which of the two influenced the other. The earliest iconic representations show Tara seated with just two arms and two hands. However, with the passage of time, her iconic representations became quite complex. Not only the number of her heads, arms, and hands increased, but also the number of different figures attending on her multiplied. Later, she also came to be associated with the dhyani (transcendent) buddhas, and she began to appear generally in colors corresponding to the colors of these buddhas.

In one tradition, Tara manifests herself in the form of five protective goddesses to protect her devotees against various earthly troubles. In another tradition, eight different Taras protect their devotees against terrors of elephants, lions, fire, serpents, robbers, fetters, sea monsters, and vampires. The banners in Tibetan temples often show a green Tara, surrounded by twenty different Taras in various colors.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Buddha; Buddhism and Holy People; Gods on Earth; Spiritual Guardians

References and further reading:

- Beyer, Stephen. 1973. The Cult of Tara: Magic and Ritual in Tibet. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Chattopadhyaya, D. P., ed. 1970. Taranatha's History of Buddhism in India. Translated by Lama Chimpa and Alaka Chattopadhyaya. Simla: Indian Institute of Advanced Study.
- Kumar, Pushpendra. 1992. Tara: The Supreme Goddess. Delhi: Bharatiya Vidya Prakashan.
- Sircar, D. C., ed. 1967. The Shakti Cult and Tara. Calcutta: University of Calcutta.
- Wilson, Martin. 1996. In Praise of Tara: Songs to the Saviouress: Source Texts from India and Tibet on Buddhism's Great Goddess. London: Wisdom.

Tayyib, Muhammad al-

(d. 1988 C.E.)

Muslim holy man

The cult of Muhammad al-Tayyib, an Egyptian saint, has remained limited to the inhabitants of the village Qurna (Upper Egypt), where he is interred, and its surroundings. But his life serves as a reminder that in Egypt saintliness is not a vestige of the past; on the contrary, it is alive and in constant renewal. Like Muhammad al-Tayyib, who died in 1988, many great saints from this country have died during the past forty years. For his devotees, Muhammad al-Tayyib was the pole (qutb) of his era, that is, the axis around which the world turns, the supreme aid (gawth).

Muhammad was born into a sharifian family (one that is descended from the prophet), and his ancestors were originally from Fez; one of them may even have been one of the companions of the great Egyptian saint Ahmad al-Badawi (1199/1200–1276). His father, Ahmad al-Tayyib al-Hassani (d. 1955), founded a mystical order, the Khalwatiyya Hasaniyya. He transmitted his charisma and baraka (divine grace) to his son Muhammad, who succeeded him as the head of the order.

Muhammad, following in the footsteps of his father, studied at the great theological university al-Azhar in Cairo before returning to his village to dedicate himself to meditation, prayer, and the spiritual direction of his disciples. The disciples say he was an ascetic who regularly took spiritual retreats in a cell, accompanied by youths. He dressed entirely in white, from his shoes to the veil covering his head. Like the prophet, he wore perfume, and he let the end of his turban hang down his neck. It is said that his face was luminous, that he inspired a mixture of fear and respect (hayba), and that he had the gift of clairvoyance and could read people's thoughts. He worked to bring people back to God and eradicate their superstitions.

At the end of his life Muhammad al-Tayyib ate very little, just a few spoonfuls of milk at a time. His skin became so delicate that he had to wrap his hand in a scarf so that his numerous visitors could touch it. He is buried today next to his father in the village of Qurna, where each year the anniversary festival (mawlid) of these two saints is celebrated.

—Rachida Chih (translated by Karna Hughes)

See also: Attributes of Holy People; Badawi, Ahmad al-; Contemporary Holy People; Hereditary Holiness; Islam and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Biegman, Nicolaas. 1990. Egypt: Moulids, Saints, Sufis. The Hague: Gary Schwartz.
- Chih, Rachida. 2000. Le soufisme au quotidien: Confréries d'Égypte au XXe siècle. Paris: Actes-Sud.
- Hoffman, Valerie. 1995. Sufism, Mystics and Saints in Modern Egypt. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.

Teachers as Holy People

The Bab (1819–1850), prophet of the Baha'i faith, taught that God would raise up a world teacher who would bring religious unity and an age of peace; Baha'is see this prophecy fulfilled in his disciple Baha'u'llah (1817–1892). All faiths acknowledge that religion must be taught and that some people are specially inspired to do the teaching. Religious teaching can take many forms, and in many religions the exemplary teacher is honored as a holy person. A distinction, however, may be made between preachers (those who share religious knowledge with a wide, public audience) and teachers (those who give instruction to a select group of disciples). In reality, the dividing line between these two practices is often unclear, especially since many holy people have emphasized public preaching while also teaching a small circle of companions, or vice versa. Such saints as the sadhus of India are especially hard to categorize because they wandered from place to place accompanied by disciples, who were their primary learners, but also had a deep impact on popular spirituality. Still, since various religious traditions have emphasized one or the other practice, the distinction is useful. The ranks of Christian saints include a wide array of preachers, but few teachers in the narrower sense. In contrast, Buddhism, Jainism, the Sikh faith, and Hinduism have all given an enormous role to the inspired teacher as an essential bridge to the divine. Islam has perhaps struck a happy medium with its tradition of both preaching and teaching. Because of the public, authoritative role of both preachers and teachers, holy people in this category were nearly always men until the twentieth century, and men still enjoy a sizable majority in this aspect of holiness.

The great religions of Asia present some teachers as conveyers of authoritative spiritual insight. The word “guru,” used in Hinduism, Sikhism, and to some extent in Buddhism, literally means “heavy,” in the sense that the words of the teacher have a special authority. In the tantric traditions, a guru is absolutely necessary for spiritual growth and is given a godlike status by disciples—even his touch or glance can bestow enlightenment or salvation. In the Hindu tradition, sometimes a god gives directions on how to find a guru; for example, Kali was said to have appeared to Radharaman Charan Das Dev (1853–1905) in a solar eclipse, telling him where to locate his destined teacher. Gurus often form part of a lineage of inspired teachers, passing down special, sometimes secret wisdom to designated successors over several generations. Sometimes the Hindu gurus are popularly believed to be reincarnations of a great teacher of the past, or even incarnations of a god. Similarly, the Jain acharyas and Tibetan lamas are spiritual teachers who pass on their special powers to designated successors.

In Buddhism, lineages of teachers—for example, the lines of Chan/Zen patriarchs—are especially important. It is regarded as nearly impossible to achieve enlightenment in Buddhism without the aid of a teacher, and the inspired teacher is the most commonly acknowledged form of holy person. A fundamental issue in the religion has been the diverse methods used by these spiritual guides, whether harsh or gentle, sudden or gradual. Thanks to the centrality of monasticism in Buddhism, teachers rather than preachers have dominated. These teachers focus their efforts on small clusters of disciples in monasteries, only rarely engaging in any concerted effort to spread Buddhism to the population at large comparable to Christian evangelization. One of the few exceptions to this generalization is Gautama the Buddha himself in the fifth century B.C.E., who both preached and taught for forty-five years after his enlightenment, giving public sermons as well as advanced teaching to a circle of disciples. In Confucianism, too, people who can plausibly be called holy men have almost always taught a select group of disciples—and their veneration has been limited to a narrow intellectual elite. One of the few exceptions was the Japanese Confucian scholar Ishida Baigan (1685–1744), who took to giving public lectures on Confucianism, and who is still one of the very few popular Confucian holy people of Japan.

Islam, especially in the sufi tradition, produced a happy synthesis of teaching and preaching, with acknowledged, inspired teachers very often wandering from place to place with their disciples, encountering popular audiences in the process. The importance of the teacher, most often called a shaykh—that is, a guide who leads disciples on the spiritual way, cleansing their hearts and leading them to God—is central. These teachers and their followers have often stressed membership in a lineage; for example, when the sufi saint Nasiruddin Chiragh-i Dihli (1276/1277–1356) died, the relics of four previous shaykhs of the Chishti line were buried with him, symbolizing the end of the first lineage. Sufis have also reached out to a wider audience, however. An excellent example of sufi saint as popular preacher is the Moroccan Ahmad ibn Idris (1749–1836). To fulfill his life’s goal of educating people to make them better Muslims, he traveled throughout North Africa, teaching people in their own dialects how to perform rituals and making sure they had a basic understanding of their religion.

Christianity, by contrast, has given much more acclaim to preachers than to teachers. In part, this is an illusion imposed by the canonization process: Catholic authorities have tended to canonize people perceived as particularly “useful” to the faith. Underlying this practice, however, is the fact that Christian accounts of saints do not emphasize the role of mentor. Even abbots and abbesses, the spiritual “parents” of monks and nuns, are usually, when they make their way into the ranks of the saints, given more credit as “rulers” than as teachers. Although there have been many great Christian spiritual advisers and inspirers, even they are not normally described in terms of the teacher or mentor relationship or even as teaching particular methods or doctrines. Instead, among the greatest of the Christian saints are the preachers. Some have been missionaries; others have preached to an audience already superficially Christianized. A few great preachers are remembered from the early centuries of the religion—for example, John Chrysostom (c. 349–407), who received his nickname “golden-mouthed” (chrysostomos) for his great skill in oratory. The great age of preachers only began in the twelfth century with the wandering preachers who inspired the great orders of mobile preachers, the Dominicans and the Franciscans, in the thirteenth century. Since then, the preaching holy man has remained a regular motif in both the Catholic and Protestant imaginations. Indeed, since the American Great Awakening in the mid-eighteenth century, Protestants have tended to give an especially important place to the evangelical, charismatic, God-inspired preacher, while in Catholicism preaching has normally taken a distant second place to administration of the sacraments. The great preachers have been regarded as having a special insight into the will of God, and the wide audiences that they have reached, especially since the advent of mass media, have rendered their influence and fame incalculable.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Bab, The; Baha' u'llah; Chiraghi Dihli, Nasiruddin; Gender and Holy People; Ishida Baigan; John Chrysostom; Radharaman Charan Das Dev; Sadhus

References and further reading:

Meslin, Michel, ed. 1990. Maître et disciples dans les traditions religieuses. Paris: Cerf.

Teachers of Religion: Christianity and Other Religions. 1988. Rome: Gregorian University Press.

Tegh Bahadur

(1621–1675 C.E.)

Sikh guru, martyr

Guru Har Krishan, who died of smallpox at the age of eight after guiding the Sikh community for only three years, nominated Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675), his grandfather's brother, as his successor in 1664. With his new office, Guru Tegh Bahadur moved the community to Makhawal, which he renamed Anandpur. Had Tegh Bahadur remained in Anandpur, he might not have angered the Mughal authorities, who wanted Ram Rai to be the leader of the Sikh community, but Guru Tegh Bahadur left Anandpur to travel extensively for the next six years. He traveled as far east as Assam and Dhacca, and throughout his journeys he reestablished contacts with the Sikh communities, especially in the towns and cities of the Gangetic plains. He returned to Anandpur in 1671 with a renewed vigor for strengthening the community in Punjab. His aggressively defiant activities eventually forced the Mughals to arrest him. His captors offered his life in exchange for either a miracle or his conversion to Islam. He refused to comply and was executed at Chandni Chowk, a prominent square in the center of Mughal Delhi, on November 11, 1675. However, before his capture he nominated his son, Gobind Das, to the guruship, thus ensuring the continuity of leadership in the community.

Tegh Bahadur added his own compositions to the Sikh sacred literature, a tradition that the previous three gurus had not followed. His compositions are similar to those of the first five gurus, and he adheres to much of the religious ideology espoused by Guru Nanak (1469–1539), founder of the Sikh community. However, he emphasizes the fragility of life on this earth and the importance of living life without fear. Thus, he treads a fine line of encouraging Sikhs to stay true to their beliefs under persecution, beliefs that included the importance of community, family, and land but at the same time recommended not becoming so entangled in the world as to lose sight of the fact that it is God's creation and not one's own. His emphasis on courage in the face of fear has prompted scholars to call him the "Prophet of Assurance."

—Daniel Michon

See also: Gobind Singh; Martyrdom and Persecution; Nanak; Politics and Holy People; Sikh Religion and Holy People

References and further reading:

Grewal, J. S. 1998. The Sikhs of the Punjab. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

McLeod, W. H. 1997. Sikhism. London: Penguin.

Singh, Fauja, and G. S. Talib, eds. 1975. Guru Tegh Bahadur: Martyr and Teacher. Patiala, India: Punjabi University Press.

Singh, Trilochan. 1967. Guru Tegh Bahadur: Prophet and Martyr. Delhi: Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre

(1881–1955 C.E.)

Roman Catholic priest, scientist

Scientist and Catholic priest, Pierre Teilhard de Chardin approached the universe with the tools of both vocations: empiricism and love. The result was a unique vision of unity that has been exceedingly attractive to people in search of a language for faith and love that befits the modern experience.

Teilhard was born in Sarcenat, France, in 1881 to a father schooled in natural history and a mother with the heart of a poet. Their two ways of seeing the world would come together in Teilhard. He entered a Jesuit novitiate at the age of eighteen, traveled to England for final training for the priesthood, and finished the doctoral thesis in 1922. In April 1923, he joined the French paleontologist Père Emile Licent in China. The first sign of his unique spirituality was the essay "Mass on the World," which came out of his experience in the solitude of the Ordos desert. His return to France in 1924 occasioned strong criticism from religious superiors over his theology. This rebuke was the beginning of an ongoing conflict with authorities in the church who did not understand or countenance his views on evolution. Eventually Teilhard left France, accepting an appointment at the Wenner-Gren Foundation in New York. He died on April 10, 1955, never having received the church's approval to have his work published.

The strictly scientific writings were not the issue for the church. The problem was such writings as The Phenomenon of Man and The Divine Milieu, in which Teilhard described an evolution that is both physical and spiritual in nature and that is energized by the attracting power of Omega, that is, Christ, also called Christ-Omega or Christ-the-Evolver. The church refused to accept the notion of a world evolving toward perfection, that is, completion, rather than having been created perfect. In Teilhard's view, the role of Christ is to attract the process upward to fulfillment. This role differed radically from the traditional christology that Christ was born into the world to redeem it to its former perfection. The view of a static universe, in Teilhard's opinion, was at odds with the position of science arrived at through empirical methodology. For different reasons neither the church nor the scientific community could accept his ideas about a spiritual-scientific evolution. Nonetheless, the writings that express this vision are for many people reason to consider Teilhard a holy man for the modern world.

—Mary E. Giles

See also: Contemporary Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Hefner, Philip. 1970. The Promise of Teilhard. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott.

Jones, Gareth D. 1969. Teilhard de Chardin: An Analysis and Assessment. Grove, IL: Inter-Varsity Press.

Kraft, Wayne R. 1968. The Relevance of Teilhard. Notre Dame, IN: Fides.

Lubac, Henri de. 1968. The Religion of Teilhard de Chardin. Garden City, NY: Image.

Ten Martyrs

(d. 135–138 C.E.)

Jewish martyrs

When the Jewish rebellion led by Simon bar Kokhba was finally subdued (135 C.E.), the Roman authorities in Judaea carried out a brief (135–138) but intense persecution of traditional Jewish practices. Rabbinic tradition names public religious instruction as among the activities most intensely suppressed, and many revered teachers of Torah, most notably Rabbi Akiba ben Joseph, were arrested and put to death. The story of the “Ten Martyrs” (‘aseret harugei malkhut) is a later literary embellishment of these events. In its developed form (not attested until the Middle Ages), the Romans arrested ten leading teachers, tried them collectively for the already ancient crime of Joseph's brothers, and then put them to death in various unspeakably cruel ways.

Some details of the later story may be historical, but it is impossible to determine which these may be. The list of ten names varies from one version to the next and often includes individuals who lived in different generations, while some other stories of martyred rabbis (for example, the death of R. Judah ben Bava [Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 14a]) are incompatible with the story of the Ten Martyrs. Nevertheless, the story worked itself into the standard liturgy for the Day of Atonement as the poem “Eleh Ezkerah” (These do I remember) and also formed the basis of several dirges written for the commemorative fast of the Ninth of Av. The ten rabbinic victims, and the earlier family of Hannah and her seven sons, became the two prototypical cases of Jewish martyrdom, stories recounted and embellished in later generations when further outbursts of persecution threatened to overwhelm the Jewish people.

—Robert Goldenberg

See also: Akiba ben Joseph; Hannah and Her Seven Sons; Judaism and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

Finkelstein, Louis. 1938. “The Ten Martyrs.” Pp. 29–56 in Essays and Studies in Memory of Linda R. Miller. New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Herr, Moshe D. 1971. “Ten Martyrs, The.” Encyclopaedia Judaica 15: 1006–1008. Jerusalem: Encyclopaedia Judaica.

Tenskwatawa

(1775–1836 C.E.)

Shawnee prophet

Tenskwatawa, also called the “Shawnee Prophet,” led a militant spiritual revitalization movement against American expansion in the early nineteenth-century Great Lakes and Ohio Valley region.

Born to a Creek mother and Shawnee father in 1775 as one of a set of triplets, but raised by older siblings, Tenskwatawa, called Lalawethika until the early 1800s, showed little promise as a youth. He was fat, he did not readily learn how to hunt, he complained constantly, and he was clumsy, accidentally putting out his right eye with an arrow. He became an alcoholic rather than an accomplished warrior, and he played almost no role in the multiracial war against the United States in the Ohio Valley during the 1790s, although his brother Tecumseh and many other Shawnees did. After the defeat of the Ohio Valley Indian Confederacy by General Anthony Wayne's army and the signing of the Treaty of Greenville in 1795, Tenskwatawa's people moved farther west to western Ohio and eastern Indiana. Tenskwatawa continued to drink heavily and enjoyed little respect from other Shawnees.

The ensuing couple of decades were hard on the Shawnees and other Ohio Valley and Great Lakes Indian groups. Game animals became increasingly scarce, American settlers encroached on their lands, diseases killed them, and apathy and alcoholism became widespread. In April 1805, Tenskwatawa passed out, apparently dead, but he awoke several hours later claiming that he had experienced a vision that told him how the Shawnees might recover from their malaise.

Americans, Tenskwatawa preached, were the children of the Great Serpent who spread evil throughout the world, whereas Indians were the chosen people of the Creator. Moreover, Indian “witches” had assisted the evil Americans in spreading chaos and disorder, and they must be exposed and killed. Tenskwatawa urged all Indians to adopt a militant message of rejection of American ways. Contact with Americans should be minimal, and American food, clothing, alcohol, and most manufactured goods should be abandoned. If these strictures were followed, Tenskwatawa insisted, game would return to the forests and dead relatives would come back to life. If not, a Christian-like hell awaited all Indians.

By 1807, after performing miracles such as correctly predicting a solar eclipse, Tenskwatawa gained hundreds of followers from tribes throughout the upper Midwest. Around this time, Tenskwatawa began to insist on being called by his new name, which meant “the Open Door,” reflecting his ability to communicate with the Great Spirit. In 1808, he and his followers formed a new village called Prophetstown near the juncture of the Tippecanoe and Wabash Rivers. Tenskwatawa’s older brother Tecumseh began recruiting far and wide for warriors to bring their families to the new village in anticipation of a showdown with the United States. Tenskwatawa’s new religious message inspired Indians from varying tribal affiliations to believe in the possibility of a successful unification and resistance to the Americans. While Tecumseh visited the southern tribes, the American governor of the Indiana Territory, William Henry Harrison, attacked Prophetstown and broke Tenskwatawa’s power at the Battle of Tippecanoe after the Shawnee prophet had erroneously promised his warriors that they would be immune to Harrison’s bullets. The warriors scattered, and Tecumseh assumed command of the multi-tribal confederacy upon his return in 1812.

When the War of 1812 erupted between the United States and Britain, Tecumseh led Indian forces against the United States, but Tenskwatawa took little part in the fighting. After the war and his brother Tecumseh’s death at the Battle of the Thames in October 1813, Tenskwatawa lived in Canada for ten years before returning to assist some Shawnees in removing west to the present site of Kansas City, where he died in 1836. To the end he still had followers.

—Greg O’Brien

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Patriotism and Holy People; Prophets; Red Sticks; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Dowd, Gregory Evans. 1992. A Spirited Resistance: The North American Indian Struggle for Unity, 1745–1815. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Edmunds, R. David. 1983. The Shawnee Prophet. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Sugden, John. 1998. Tecumseh: A Life. New York: Henry Holt.
- White, Richard. 1991. The Middle Ground: Indians, Empires, and Republics in the Great Lakes Region, 1650–1815. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Tenzin Gyatso (Dalai Lama XIV)

(1933 C.E.–)

Buddhist spiritual leader, ruler, monk, scholar

Tenzin Gyatso, Dalai Lama XIV, has governed less than several other dalai lamas, yet he has been the most important of all, for he has preserved Tibetan culture in the darkest period of its long history and has become a spiritual teacher for millions around the world. Born in 1933, he became Tibet’s ruler when he was still a teen, and he was forced into exile nine years later. He has spent the rest of his life reminding the world of his people’s plight and spreading the Buddhist religion.

Signs appeared shortly after the thirteenth dalai lama’s death in 1933 (an unusual cloud formation; a moss pattern on a wall; shifts in the position of the thirteenth’s corpse in its mummification box) to indicate that the fourteenth would be found in the northeast. These signs were confirmed by the Nechung oracle and by a vision experienced by the regent in a sacred lake. When a search party in disguise visited his house, the child, then only two, successfully identified possessions of the thirteenth and conversed in the Lhasa dialect, although he had never heard it. His family already included an important tulku (reincarnate lama) whose previous incarnation had been the thirteenth’s good friend. Tenzin Gyatso’s recognition was complicated by the need to pay a ransom to a Chinese warlord.

Tenzin Gyatso arrived in Lhasa with great celebration in 1939. He spent a lonely childhood engaged in the difficult and complex study of Buddhist philosophy in the manner of the Gelukpa order. His studies were interrupted by political events, but he completed them nonetheless and earned the highest monastic degree of Geshay Lharampa in public debate in 1959.

Tenzin Gyatso’s youth was a time of great uncertainty for Tibet, which lost its Mongolian allies to the Soviet Union and its British protection when India became independent. It now faced a new Communist China that claimed Tibet as part of the motherland. Power struggles between religious and secular officials and a rift between the powerful panchen lama (the lama from another reincarnating lineage) and the central government divided and weakened the government. In 1947, there apparently was an attempt to either remove the dalai lama or declare another boy the real dalai lama, but whether it was an attempted coup d’état by the ex-regent, Reteng Tulku, who may or may not have been acting on behalf of the Chinese, or a conspiracy by those who succeeded Reteng, is unclear. The dalai lama’s father was murdered, and Reteng died in prison from torture.

In late 1949, the Chinese began preparations for the invasion of Tibet. This accelerated the timetable for the dalai lama’s enthronement, who became ruler of Tibet in 1950 at the age of fifteen. The Chinese occupied Tibet with little difficulty, and although the “Seventeen Point Agreement” was supposed to protect Tibet’s relative autonomy, Chinese control of Tibet grew more pervasive, despite occasional revolts. The dalai lama made visits to Beijing in 1954, where he was subtly threatened by Mao Tse-tung, and to India in 1956, where Jawaharlal Nehru assured him that in the worst case Tibetans could take refuge there.

On March 10, 1959, fearing that the Chinese intended to harm the dalai lama, large crowds gathered in Lhasa around his residence. To prevent further bloodshed, the dalai lama and his party adopted disguises and escaped to India. Many Tibetans attempted to follow him, although most died or were captured in the attempt. In India, the young dalai lama did what he could to resettle the refugees, who had many difficulties, such as disease and malnutrition, in their new country. He worked with secular and religious leaders who had also escaped and with Indian and Western experts to establish a new Tibetan government in exile, a system of education, and several institutions to preserve Tibet's culture, and to reestablish some of the monasteries from Tibet.

In his role as a spiritual teacher he has given countless teachings in his home base of Dharamsala, India, and in many other places. In particular, he has conferred the Kalachakra tantric initiation, a specialty of dalai lamas, on many large public gatherings in Asia, Europe, and America. He is recognized widely as a brilliant scholar and teacher and has published dozens of books that have a wide and ever-expanding readership.

As the leader of the Tibetan people he has toured the globe to remind the world of the plight of human rights in Tibet. He has unflinchingly pressed for nonviolent solutions to world problems, and for these contributions he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989.

—Daniel Cozort

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Politics and Holy People; Recognition; Reincarnation

References and further reading:

Goldstein, Melvyn. 1989. A History of Modern Tibet, 1913–1951.

Berkeley: University of California Press.

Mullin, Glenn. 2001. The Fourteen Dalai Lamas. Santa Fe, NM: Clear Light.

Shakabpa, W. D. 1967. Tibet: A Political History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Tenzin Gyatso. 1991. Freedom in Exile. San Francisco: Harper.

Teresa of Avila

(1515–1582 C.E.)

Roman Catholic reformer, mystic, doctor of the church

Teresa de Cepeda y Ahumada, born in Avila, Spain, on March 28, 1515, did not seem destined for fame as a religious reformer and spiritual mentor when she took the habit at the Calced Carmelite convent of the Incarnation on November 3, 1536, or at her profession a year later. Teresa had been a lively child who was able to have her way with a doting father following the death of her mother when Teresa was twelve years old. By the time Teresa was a teenager, her father was so concerned about her behavior that he sent her to the Augustin-ian convent for a year and a half. There, the good example of a certain nun and the influence of a devout uncle set Teresa to thinking about the religious life. After a serious illness had frightened her into thinking she might die and go to hell, she decided on a safe course, and against her father's will entered the convent of the Incarnation. Twenty years of physical, emotional, and spiritual suffering followed.

By 1555, Teresa was in a spiritual combat reminiscent of Augustine of Hippo's (354–430). Like Augustine, whose Confessions she had read, she lamented that she loved God but that things of the world attracted her. One day, at the unexpected sight of a new crucifix in the oratory, Teresa fell to her knees in sorrow and contrition. A new life began. She negotiated the reform of the Carmelite order in Spain, from 1567 to 1582 founding seventeen convents on the principles of the original Carmelites: strict enclosure, silence, asceticism, and prayer. Responding to her own experiences in prayer, in which she was instructed by God to listen and be attentive, she imparted to nuns and laypeople the wisdom of the inner way by which God was leading her. Chief among her writings on the mystical life are The Life (1562–1565), Way of Perfection (1565), and the Interior Castle (1577). Also of importance is the Foundations (1573), the story of the founding of the Discalced (shoeless) convents.

The Interior Castle is Teresa's masterpiece, a sustained development of the image of the soul as an interior castle where God dwells unceasingly. The mystical journey is one of becoming ever more aware of God present in the soul and of responding ever more subtly yet passionately in love. The interior castle has seven mansions, and the language of love that expresses the journey inward through the mansions is prayer. The soul enters the castle by means of mental prayer, which differs from vocal prayer in requiring a person to think about the words that she utters aloud or to herself. Contrary to prevailing attitudes in the church and society, Teresa advocated that women use their minds rather than merely mouth the words, as they had been taught to do. Unless a woman thinks, Teresa maintained, she cannot even enter the castle but will be forced to remain outside with reptiles and other ugly creatures. In the first three mansions, which correspond to the purgative way, Teresa teaches how to purge imperfections, nurture virtues, and discern progress. The prayer of recollection, treated in the third chapter, is the transition from the purgative way of beginners to the illuminative way of proficients. Passive as opposed to active recollection was awareness of being quieted with no effort on the soul's part. Henceforth the journey through the inner castle would be more and more passive as the soul became gifted with the Prayer of Quiet (fourth mansion) and the Sleep of the Faculties (fifth mansion.)

The Spiritual Betrothal and Spiritual Marriage express the deepening intimacy between the soul and God as one is brought into the sixth and seventh mansions. Of all the mansions, the sixth is the most troublesome. Here Teresa treats supernatural phenomena that she herself had experienced: wounds of love, rapture, flight of the spirit, and jubilation of the soul. She also explains understandings that may come to the soul during these experiences, relying on traditional classifications to identify kinds of visions and locutions. The suffering that marks the sixth mansion, when the soul feels crucified between heaven and earth, ceases in the Spiritual Marriage of the seventh mansion as the soul is brought to rest, both within herself and with God. Teresa's account of the journey in love to Love retains its freshness because she employed the familiar language of her experience. Hers is not the language of the trained theologian but rather that of an "ignorant woman"—as she was wont to call herself.

*Teresa of Avila in ecstasy. Detail from Gian Lorenzo Bernini's sculpture group in the church of Santa Maria Maggiore, Rome.
(Bettmann/CORBIS)*

Teresa's importance as a reformer, founder, mystical writer, and teacher was recognized in her day. She died in 1957, and forty years later she was canonized. In 1970, she and Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) became the first women proclaimed doctors of the Catholic Church. Her appeal is strong today, especially for women who seek models for a creative spiritual life. The intensity of Teresa's struggle for spiritual authenticity, her courage to live in a way that was consonant with her deepest desire, which was to love God intimately, and her uniquely expressive writings are testimony to the holy life that was Teresa of Avila.

—Mary E. Giles

See also: Augustine of Hippo; Catherine of Siena; Christianity and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Hagiography; Mysticism and Holy People; Reform and Reaction; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Ahlgren, Gillian T. W. 1996. Teresa of Avila and the Politics of Sanctity. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Green, Deirdre. 1989. Teresa of Avila and the Western Mystical Tradition. Longmead, Shaftesbury, Dorset: Element Books.
- Luti, J. Mary. 1991. Teresa of Avila's Way. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.
- Slade, Carole. 1995. St. Teresa of Avila: Author of a Heroic Life. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Weber, Alison. 1990. Teresa of Avila and the Rhetoric of Femininity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Teresa of Calcutta

(1910–1997 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun, caregiver

Mother Teresa of Calcutta has caught the world's imagination like few holy people of the twentieth century. She was an Albanian by birth, born in what is now Skopje, Macedonia, in 1910. In 1928, she joined the religious order of the Sisters of Loreto in Ireland, taking the name Teresa upon her profession. Her order soon sent Teresa to India, where she began her mission to "the poorest of the poor."

At first, Teresa's time in India was spent teaching at a high school run by her order. In 1946, however, she experienced an inner conversion while on a train, feeling herself called by Jesus to what became her life's work, the care for the destitute of India. To carry out this mission, in 1948 Teresa received permission to leave her convent, wearing the white, blue-trimmed sari that became her trademark, to live and work among the poor of Calcutta. She studied some medicine, but she put the bulk of her effort into providing food and care for the hungry and sick and into personally visiting, comforting, and giving practical aid to the destitute. Soon her former students started to join her, creating a circle of caregivers that in 1950 was formally organized into the Missionaries of Charity.

The Missionaries of Charity, recognized as a religious order under the direct control of the papacy, grew rapidly, soon acquiring branch orders for male religious, and two organizations of "Co-workers," laypeople who devoted themselves to helping Teresa in her cause. The order's members, living in great personal privation, have expanded their work to supply not just food but orphanages, shelters, and hospitals throughout India and beyond. By the time of Teresa of Calcutta's death in 1997, the order had 610 foundations in 123 countries, most strikingly in a number of Communist states. She won increasing recognition during her life, including the 1979 Nobel Peace Prize, and the government of India gave Teresa a state funeral. Her tomb in Calcutta is already a locus of pilgrimage. The process for her canonization has also already begun, in the least possible time Roman Catholic law permits.

Perhaps the most striking aspect of Teresa of Calcutta's life, totally devoted as it was to a Christian model of indiscriminating love for others, was only discovered after her death. It turns out that, while devoting herself completely to Jesus' call, Teresa herself felt separated and rejected by God, a state she called "the darkness," which started about the time she began to work with the poor and continued throughout the almost fifty years until her death. That this woman persevered so long with such little interior comfort suggests indeed what the Roman Catholic Church designates as "heroic" virtue.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Contemporary Holy People; Monasticism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Kumar, Sunita. 1998. Mother Teresa of Calcutta. San Francisco: Ignatius.
- Serrou, Robert. 1980. Teresa of Calcutta: A Pictorial Biography. New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Spink, Kathryn. 1981. The Miracle of Love: Mother Teresa of Calcutta, Her Missionaries of Charity, and Her Co-Workers. San Francisco: Harper and Row.

Teresia Benedicta a Cruce

See Stein, Edith

Tezcatlipoca

Mesoamerican god-hero

Tezcatlipoca is the warrior divinity in opposition to Quetzalcoatl in Aztec accounts. He is also linked to the Chichimec warrior Mixcoatl and the Mexica patron Huitzilopochtli. Like Quetzalcoatl, this tutelary divinity is often perceived in human form. His most frequent image is that of a warrior in full battle array. He is usually portrayed with an obsidian mirror replacing his right foot, which the Earth Monster bit off as he battled Quetzalcoatl to establish the fourth sun. Many groups in Mesoamerica consider Tezcatlipoca their ancestor, and he is often referred to as Ipalnemoani, "The one by whom we live."

Tezcatlipoca also acts as the trickster in many accounts. He dresses up as an old man to go into the marketplace to observe the Toltec ruler Huemac. Tezcatlipoca also tricks the historical Quetzalcoatl of Tula, resulting in his downfall. Tezcatlipoca's magic mirror causes Quetzalcoatl to believe himself ugly and disfigured. In despair, Quetzalcoatl imbibes pulque, a fermented beverage made from the maguey cactus, and commits incest with his sister. Ashamed by his transgressions, Quetzalcoatl leaves Tula, allowing the forces dedicated to Tezcatlipoca to regain control of the city.

Although the Catholic missionaries chose Quetzalcoatl as the sacred person to be aligned with Christ, it is clear that in pre-Hispanic times many groups revered both Quetzalcoatl and Tezcatlipoca as patrons of a cosmic and sociopolitical balance. The two represented different classes: Quetzalcoatl the elite and Tezcatlipoca the military. Religion and cosmology were never far removed from statecraft, and leaders in power had to balance the forces. Any successful ruler would require support from both. The educational system of Tenochtitlan best represents this concept.

Two types of schools existed. One, the calmecac, was the educational system of the elite. This represented a closed society, accessible only by birth or marriage, where students learned to serve their patron, Quetzalcoatl. The military schools, or telpochcalli, were dedicated to the service of Tezcatlipoca. Entrance into the military and success in battle were the only methods of social advancement allowed to the nonelite segments of society. Although some accounts claim that Quetzalcoatl eliminated human sacrifice, many cities devoted to him continued the practice. Sacrifice to Tezcatlipoca occurs throughout Mesoamerica. For that reason, the missionaries favored alignment with Quetzalcoatl to discourage the militaristic aspects of Mesoamerican religion.

—Jeanne L. Gillespie

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Gods on Earth; Heroes; Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bierhorts, John, trans. 1992. History and Mythology of the Aztecs: The Codex Chimalpopoca. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.
- Brundage, Burr Cartwright. 1972. A Rain of Darts. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- . 1979. The Fifth Sun. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Graulich, Michel. 1997. Myths of Ancient Mexico. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Theban Legion

(d. c. 287 C.E.)

Christian martyrs

Almost nothing is known of the Theban Legion except for the circumstances of the group's martyrdom in about 287, but the centrality of the relics of these Christian soldiers made them a powerful thaumaturgical force in Western Europe. They were members of a Roman legion from the Thebaid in Egypt during the reign of Maximian. On campaign at Martigny, near Lake Geneva, Maximian ordered the army to sacrifice to the gods. The Theban Legion withdrew to nearby Agaune-en-Valais (now St. Moritz in Switzerland) in order to avoid compromising their beliefs, and Maximian ordered his army to attack them, killing a tenth of the legion. He believed that those remaining would then obey him, but led by their commander Maurice, they remained true to their faith even after a second onslaught, laying down their weapons and finally being slaughtered to a man.

Exaggerations and elaborations of details of the incident abound. The legion was said to number around 6,600 men, and besides their leader several became known by name, including Exuperius, Candidus, Innocent, and Vitalis. In some versions, some legionnaires escaped the massacre at Agaune and were martyred elsewhere: Ours at Soleure; Gereon at Cologne; Cassius and Florentius at Bonn; and Victor at either Agaune, Cologne, or Xanten. Later in the Middle Ages, Gregory the Moor, a black member of the legion (as Maurice was sometimes represented), was recognized.

Maurice was by far the most important member of the Theban Legion, but many churches in the Holy Roman Empire, France, Savoy, and Piedmont were dedicated to them all. The Swiss flag, a white cross on a red ground, was originally the banner of the Theban Legion. St. Moritz, which had become an important pilgrimage site by the fifth century, remains the center of their cult. The cathedrals of Magdeburg, Tours, and Angers were also dedicated to them. As soldier-saints, they were important in many military contexts. In the Roman church, the feast day of the Theban Legion, September 30, was limited to local calendars in 1969.

—James Bugslag

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Maurice; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Carolus-Barré, Louis. 1965. "Saint Louis et la translation des corps saints." In Études d'histoire du droit canonique dédiées à Gabriel Le Bras, 2: 1087–1111. Paris: Sirey.
- Dupraz, Louis. 1961. Les passions de S. Maurice d'Agaune. Fribourg, Switzerland: Editions universitaires.
- Réau, Louis. 1958. "Géréon de Cologne (10 octobre)." Pp. 581–582 in Iconographie de l'art chrétien. Vol. 3, Iconographie des saints. Part 2, G–O. Paris: Presses universitaires de France.
- . 1958. "Maurice d'Agaune (22 septembre)." Pp. 935–939 in Iconographie de l'art chrétien. Vol. 3, Iconographie des saints. Part 2, G–O. Paris: Presses universitaires de France.
- . 1958. "Ours de Soleure (30 septembre)." P. 1017 in Iconographie de l'art chrétien. Vol. 3, Iconographie des saints. Part 2, G–O. Paris: Presses universitaires de France.
- . 1958. "Victor d'Agaune, de Soleure et de Xanten (30 septembre)." P. 1321 in Iconographie de l'art chrétien. Vol. 3, Iconographie des saints. Part 3, P–Z. Paris: Presses universitaires de France.
- Suckale Redlefsen, Gude, and Robert Suckale. 1987. Mauritius: Der heilige Mohr/The Black Saint Maurice. Houston and Zurich: Menil Foundation and Schnell and Steiner.

Thecla of Iconium

(1st cent. C.E.?)

Christian legendary holy woman

Thecla of Iconium provided Christianity with the prototype of the virgin martyr. Her story, appearing in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla from the late second century, was the earliest reworking of the motifs and conventions of Greco-Roman romance to serve the new religion. In it, the maiden Thecla is converted by the apostle Paul's preaching in a manner akin to love at first sight. As a result, she refuses an arranged marriage and dedicates herself to perpetual virginity. During the course of her life, she preserves her chastity through a series of ordeals. Each time she is miraculously saved by divine intervention. Her preaching and her example are credited with gaining many more converts to Christianity.

Thecla's cult grew rapidly, becoming very popular by the end of the fourth century as she became a behavioral model for religious women and men alike. Yet the ambiguities within the story itself support a range of interpretations. It has been characterized as an exemplar of the appeal to celibacy as a higher state during Christianity's identity formation, of the conflict between men as Christian preachers challenged established authority, and of the protest of communities of continent women against the misogyny of the early church fathers.

—Helen E. Maurer

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Paul; Sexuality and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Brown, Peter R. L. 1988. The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Cooper, Kate. 1996. The Virgin and the Bride: Idealized Womanhood in Late Antiquity. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Davies, Stevan L. 1980. The Revolt of the Widows: The Social World of the Apocryphal Acts. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.
- Davis, Stephen J. 2001. The Cult of Saint Thecla: A Tradition of Women's Piety in Late Antiquity. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- James, Montague R., trans. 1963. "The Acts of Thecla." Pp. 272–281 in The Apocryphal New Testament. Oxford: Clarendon.

Theodore

(d. c. 287 C.E.)

Christian martyr

The historical circumstances surrounding St. Theodore (d. c. 287) were so vague that, by the ninth century, two separate Theodores became recognized, both among the most prominent Eastern military saints.

One of these Theodores joined the army as a young man and was martyred at Amasea on the southeast shore of the Black Sea during the dual reigns of Emperors Diocletian and Maximian. As was common among Christian soldier-saints, he refused to sacrifice to the state gods as he was ordered to do. Instead, he set fire to the temple of Cybele. He was imprisoned to die of hunger, but angels joined him in his cell to sing psalms, converting his jailers. He then underwent horrible tortures: He was suspended while his flesh was ripped with iron hooks, stretched on a rack, and then burned at the stake. The fire finally killed him but without consuming his corpse, which remained unmarked and accompanied by the odor of sanctity. His body was then taken to Euchaïta (present-day Avkat) in the Hellespont. This Theodore became known as the Tyro (recruit), or Theodore of Amasea.

Particularly in the East, however, another St. Theodore eventually was recognized, the Stratilates (general), or Theodore of Heraclea (d. c. 319). Like his namesake, Theodore Stratilates refused to worship the state gods, but during the reign of Licinius. He destroyed golden and silver cult statues, distributing the pieces to the poor. His tortures were more numerous: He was scourged with lead whips, which broke his limbs, and lacerated with broken glass or pottery shards. He was then crucified, and while he was on the cross his eyes and genitals were mutilated. But an angel took him from the cross and healed him. Finally, he was decapitated. His remains were taken to Euchaneia, near Euchaïta. Although not much else is known of the life of either saint, Theodore Stratilates became known, on the model of St. George, as a dragon slayer.

The feast of Theodore the Tyro is celebrated on November 9 by the Catholic Church and on February 17 by the Orthodox Church. Theodore Stratilates is remembered on February 7, and the translation of his relics is commemorated on June 8. Both had considerable reputations as miracle workers. One of the great soldier-saints, Theodore was considered the patron of the Byzantine armies and was credited with assuring many military victories. He is also credited with curing diseases, expelling demons, and imparting spiritual blessings, particularly at Euchaïta, the site of his shrine, a major Orthodox pilgrimage center until the Ottoman takeover in the fourteenth century. He was also venerated in Europe, the Near East, Georgia, and Russia. His body was claimed by both Euchaïta and Brindisi, his head by both Cajeta and Chartres. Before St. Mark, he was also the first patron of Venice, which claimed to have one of his arms.

—James Bugslag

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Death; Martyrdom and Persecution; Orthodoxy and Saints; Veneration of Holy People; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Delehaye, Hippolyte. 1975. Les légendes grecques des saints militaires. New York: Arno.
- Jacobus de Voragine. 1993. "Saint Theodore." In The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints, 2: 291. Translated by William Granger Ryan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Oikonomides, Nicholas. 1986. "Le dédoublement de St Théodore et les villes d'Euchaïta et d'Euchaneia." Analecta Bollandiana 104: 327–335.
- Réau, Louis. 1958. "Théodore (9 février)." Pp. 1253–1255 in Iconographie de l'art chrétien. Vol. 3, Iconographie des saints. Part 3, P–Z. Paris: Presses universitaires de France.

Theodore of Tarsus (of Canterbury)

(c. 602–690 C.E.)

Christian archbishop, organizer

Theodore, born around 602, was an accomplished Greek scholar who studied philosophy and law. He spent his early years in Tarsus, which was often troubled by Persian aggression. His early life is little known and not recorded; his major accomplishments occurred following his sixty-fifth birthday. In 667, he was working in Rome and wearing the Eastern tonsure but was highly respected by the Roman clergy and Pope Vitalian. An Englishman, Wighard, who had been sent to Rome to be consecrated archbishop of Canterbury by the pope, died from the complications of the journey. Pope Vitalian asked Hadrian, an African cleric, to accept the post. He refused but recommended Theodore for the position. As a result, Theodore was ordained subdeacon, tonsured in the Roman fashion, and consecrated archbishop of Canterbury in 668.

Hadrian accompanied Theodore to England, where they set about visiting and evaluating the entire state of Christian shrines and cathedrals on the island. Theodore convened two major synods during his archbishopric, one at Hereford in 673 and another at Hatfield in 680. Theodore's extensive influence and knowledge of Greek writings and of the Eastern church helped establish Canterbury as a major center of culture and learning in the seventh and eighth centuries. Bede, writing a generation after Theodore, noted Theodore's influence in stabilizing the structure of the English church and establishing the primacy of the church of Canterbury. Theodore died in 690, and his feast day is celebrated on September 19.

—Bradford Lee Eden

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Mission

References and further reading:

- Bede. 1990. Ecclesiastical History of the English People, rev. ed. Translated by Leo Sherley-Price. London: Penguin.
- Mayr-Harting, Henry. 1991. The Coming of Christianity to Anglo-Saxon England, 3d ed. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Stenton, Frank M. 1947. Anglo-Saxon England. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Theodore the Studite

(759–826 C.E.)

Orthodox abbot, reformer

Theodore was a monk and holy man of the Byzantine church who became abbot of the monastery of St. John of Studium in Constantinople in 794. His writings, his zeal for monastic reform, his stand on iconoclasm, and his way of life made him one of the major figures in the history of Byzantine monasticism. The overriding requirement of monastic communities was to follow Christ's instructions to leave family and all worldly things behind and live in egalitarian harmony according to his example. The need to survive, however, involved monks in the world and created a tension between the ideal and reality.

Theodore the Studite devised a rule that would return the monasteries of his time to an earlier state of purity. It set forth guidelines for communal living that included strict poverty, manual labor, and enclosure. He emphasized charity, moderation, and the stability of remaining within the community. He was so concerned for the purity of those in his care that he even banned female animals from monastic properties. This reform was a major accomplishment, as during the ninth century the development of Byzantine monasticism was interrupted by the iconoclastic controversy that pitted the monks against imperial authority. Theodore was seen as a hero in this fight to uphold Orthodox beliefs against the power of the emperor. His reputation and his reforms attracted monks from all over the Byzantine Empire to St. John of Studium. Because of his dedicated and outspoken defense of Orthodox doctrine and beliefs, he spent the last few years before his death in 826 in exile at Chalcis. He lived on, however, through his writings, and the form of monasticism he instituted had lasting influence as the standard against which all future Byzantine monastic endeavors would be measured.

—Diane Peters Auslander

See also: Martyrdom and Persecution; Orthodoxy and Saints; Politics and Holy People; Purity and Pollution; Reform and Reaction

References and further reading:

- Charanis, Peter. 1971. "The Monk in Byzantine Society." Dumbarton Oaks Papers 25: 63–84.
- Gardner, Alice. 1905. Theodore of Studium: His Life and Times. London: E. Arnold.
- Kazhdan, A. P. 1985. "Hermitic, Cenobitic, and Secular Ideals in Byzantine Hagiography of the Ninth to Twelfth Centuries." Greek Orthodox Theological Review 30, no. 4.
- Morris, Rosemary. 1998. Monks and Laymen in Byzantium, 843–1118. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Theodosius of Kiev

(c. 1030–1074 C.E.)

Russian Orthodox monk

The Russian saint Theodosius of Kiev was a monk who co-founded (with Anthony Pechersky) the Kiev Caves Lavra. He was born around 1030 in Vasilev (now Vasilkiv) near Kiev and died on May 3, 1074, in Kiev.

Theodosius grew up in the city of Kursk in the family of a pious government official. Against the will of his mother, who directed the boy's steps toward a civic career, he renounced all connection with the comfortable circumstances of his parents and at the age of twenty-three dedicated himself to monastic life. Accepted by venerable Antony, a holy ascetic, to his cave community, Theodosius received tonsure at the hands of the priest-monk Nikon and served the monastery with work, prayer, and fasting, becoming its superior around 1062. When his leadership attracted a flow of disciples (their number soon reached 100), he reformed the life at the caves in order to unite the ascetic community above the ground. He adopted the rule of the Studite monastery, introducing the ideal of cenobitic monasticism to Ukraine, a change that revived the spiritual life of the people. The abbot relieved the austerity of asceticism by emphasizing charity, instruction, missionary work, the common good, and collective life.

As the reputation of the monks for devotion and piety drew pilgrims and benefactors from among both the poor and the wealthy, the monastery's charitable works grew. Open to the outside world and disagreeing with the practice of monastic isolationism, the Kievan-Pechersky Lavra soon became one of the foremost religious institutions in Eastern Europe. It managed during Theodosius's rule to remain independent from the political strife of the Kievan princes. Throughout his life, Theodosius never ceased to be a source of inspiration for his brethren by practicing self-mortification, by dedicating himself to prayer and labor, by assisting all those in need of spiritual guidance, and by showing endless mercy, compassion, and humility toward his countrymen. His extraordinary zeal in the service of souls, united with kindness and love for the poor, won numbers for the Christian faith.

Before his death in 1074, Theodosius commissioned the building of a new stone church, the future Dormition Cathedral. He did not live to see its completion. It is in this cathedral church that the saint's relics were laid on August 14, 1091. His canonization took place in 1108, and his feast day is May 18 (or May 3 by the old calendar) and August 27 (or August 14).

—Ewa Slojka

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Mission; Monasticism and Holy People; Orthodoxy and Saints

References and further reading:

- Podskalsky, Gerhard. 1988–1989. "Der hl. Feodosij Poerskij: Historisch und literarisch betrachtet." Harvard Ukrainian Studies 12–13 (June): 714–726.
- Poppe, Andrzej. 1982. The Rise of Christian Russia. London: Variorum Reprints.
- Shchapov, Iaroslav. 1993. State and Church in Early Russia. New Rochelle, NY: A. D. Caratzas.

Theophilus the Penitent

Christian legendary holy person

The story of the legendary Theophilus was widespread in literature and art in the Middle Ages. The original story is attributed to the seventh-century writer Metaphrastes; in the tenth century, Hroswitha of Gandersheim adopted the Faustian theme for her Latin play. The story was recast in vernacular languages as well. Jacobus de Voragine included it in his Golden Legend, and it was well known in England. In the thirteenth century, the French poets Rutebeuf, Gautier de Coinci, and Philippe de Remi, and the Spaniards Gonzalo de Berceo and Alphonso, retell the story as tribute to the miraculous deeds of the Virgin Mary. Many representations of the story in stone and stained glass remain in churches in France. Among the most outstanding examples are the sculpture in the tympanum of the north portal at Notre-Dame Cathedral, Paris, and in a stained-glass window at Saint-Pierre Cathedral, Beauvais.

According to these accounts, Theophilus, archdeacon of Adana in Cilicia, was much respected because of his piety and humility. When offered the bishopric, he rejected it politely. The new bishop dismissed him from his post, which made the good man angry and jealous. Once loved by the people, he was now poor, slandered, and despised, and pride made him suffer despair. Because he wished to regain his position, he consulted a non-Christian (the Salatin in Rutebeuf's work; a Jew in Gautier de Coinci's), who introduced him to Satan. Theophilus bartered his soul, renounced Christianity, signed a pact in his own blood with the devil, and immediately regained his post. He learned how to manipulate the bishop and became as self-serving and egotistical as the other members of the clergy.

However, seven years later he came to repentance. He fasted for forty days and forty nights and prayed to the Virgin Mary, who appeared to him. She descended into hell to retrieve the charter from Satan, and returned it to Theophilus, whom she found sleeping before the altar. Theophilus made a public confession of his sins and spoke of how Mary had saved him from damnation. The bishop read the contract in public and then preached a sermon on the repentant sinner's experience. Three days later, Theophilus died and was proclaimed a saint. The saint's name was added to the Latin liturgy of the mass. His feast day is February 23.

—Irene E. Gnarra

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Mary, Virgin

References and further reading:

- Combarieu, M. 1979. "Le Diable dans le 'Comment Theophilus vint a penitence' de Gautier de Coinci." Pp. 155–182 in Le Diable au Moyen Age. Aix-en-Provence: Centre Universitaire d'études et de recherches médiévales d'Aix-en-Provence.
- Dahan, G. 1977. "Le Salatin du Miracle de Théophile." Moyen Age 83: 445–468.
- Frank, Grace. 1967. Rutebeuf. Le Miracle de Théophile. Miracle du XIIIe siècle. Paris: Honoré Champion.
- Jacobs, Gertrude. 1962. Dictionary of Mythology, Folklore, and Symbols. New York: Scarecrow.
- Tubach, F. C. 1969. Index Exemplorum: A Handbook of Medieval Religious Tales. Folklore Fellows Communications, 204. Helsinki: Suomalainen Tiedakatemia-Academia Scientiarum Fennica.

Thérèse of Lisieux

(1873–1897 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun, writer, doctor of the church

Thérèse of Lisieux, known as the "Little Flower," was a Carmelite nun and author during the nineteenth century. Her spiritual autobiography, Story of a Soul, written in the last years of her life and published posthumously in 1898, proved immensely popular and has been translated into many languages.

Born Thérèse Martin in Alençon, France, in 1873, she was the youngest of five sisters. Her mother died when she was five, and the family moved to Lisieux, where Thérèse was raised in a strict Catholic household. Convinced of her vocation at an early age, she sought to follow her two eldest sisters into the Carmelite convent at Lisieux. Faced with ecclesiastical opposition because of her age, she pleaded her case before Pope Leo XIII, interrupting the scripted flow of an audience of pilgrims. The pope was noncommittal, but despite her youth she entered the convent at fifteen as Thérèse of the Child Jesus and the Holy Face. (Another sister and a cousin later entered the same foundation.) Still a novice herself, Thérèse became novice mistress in 1896, a position she held until her death from consumption the following year.

Thérèse of Lisieux is venerated not just by Roman Catholics but by members of the Greek Orthodox Church. This painting of Thérèse is in a church dedicated to her in Hamra Beirut, Lebanon. (Art Directors)

In late 1894 or early 1895, Thérèse came to an understanding of her "little way" of spiritual childhood. She believed that heroic acts were not necessary to gain salvation; God's love and mercy extended equally to small, everyday actions and thoughts. These were the themes that she expounded so eloquently in her popular autobiography. Thérèse's simplicity and spiritual confidence—reflected in her dying statement in 1897, "I will spend my heaven doing good upon earth"—has inspired millions of Catholics. She remains one of the most popular Roman Catholic saints.

Thérèse was canonized in 1925 by Pope Pius XI, who named her copatroness of missions (with Francis Xavier) in 1927. She was named copatroness of France (with Joan of Arc) in 1944 by Pope Pius XII, and declared a doctor of the church in 1997 by Pope John Paul II. Her feast day is October 1.

—Alisa Plant

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Guidance; Joan of Arc; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

- DeMeester, Conrad, ed. 1997. St. Thérèse of Lisieux: Her Life, Times, and Teaching. Washington, DC: ICS.
- Furlong, Monica. 1987. Thérèse of Lisieux. New York: Pantheon.
- Gaucher, Guy. 1987. The Story of a Life: St. Thérèse of Lisieux. New York: HarperCollins.
- Six, Jean-François. 1998. Light of the Night: The Last Eighteen Months in the Life of Thérèse of Lisieux. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Thérèse of Lisieux. 1982. General Correspondence. 2 vols. Edited by John Clarke. Washington, DC: ICS.
- . 1996. Story of a Soul: The Autobiography of St. Thérèse of Lisieux, 3d ed. Translated by John Clarke. Washington, DC: ICS.

Theseus

Greek hero

Today, the mythical hero Theseus is best known for navigating King Minos's labyrinth and killing the Minotaur of Crete. In antiquity, however, he was counted an early Athenian king and enjoyed a special connection to that city with due prominence in the religious cult of Athena. Yet this attachment is late, and the first Theseus of myth was an obscure adventurer, and not a sympathetic one: He used and abandoned Minos's daughter Ariadne, abducted and raped a very young Helen, and was indirectly guilty of his father's death. He appears only infrequently in pre-Archaic myth. From the late classical era on, however, in texts such as the Athenaion Politeia (Athenian constitution) and Plutarch's Life of Theseus, he is credited with a variety of civilizing acts, including the unification of Attica, the invention of coinage, and even the establishment of democracy.

This change in status dates to the middle and late Archaic age of the sixth century B.C.E., when prominent Athenians began to employ his myth for propagandistic purposes. The tyrant Peisistratos (r. c. 560–527 B.C.E.) is probably the first to have done so, but Cleisthenes in the early fifth century B.C.E. also used Theseus as part of the reforms that led to the development of Athenian democracy. Later, in 476 B.C.E. after the Persian Wars, Cimon brought back the “bones” of Theseus from the island of Scyros, entombing these relics in a special shrine in the Athenian agora (marketplace). By the first century C.E., when Plutarch wrote his biography of Theseus, the hero had gone from relative obscurity to lasting fame as “the Athenian Herakles.”

—Jeanne Reames-Zimmerman

See also: Herakles; Heroes; Sages; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Boer, W. D. 1969. “Theseus: The Growth of a Myth in History.” Greece and Rome 16: 1–13.
- Frost, F. J. 1984. “Plutarch and Theseus.” The Classical Bulletin 60: 65–73.
- Ward, A. G., ed. 1970. The Quest for Theseus. New York: Praeger.

Thomas

(1st cent. C.E.)

Christian apostle

Thomas is identified as one of the twelve apostles of Jesus in each of the gospels as well as in Acts (1:3). It is only in John, however, that Thomas as a person gains any substance or clarity. He appears in four passages, and in three of them (11:16; 20:24; 21:2) he is called Didymos, “the twin.” This rather unusual appellation, which is not explained, led to later speculation that Thomas was the twin brother of Jesus.

Thomas is often called “doubting Thomas,” an unfortunate reference that has its origin in John 20:24–29. According to the story, Thomas was not present when Jesus appeared to the other apostles and refused to believe that Jesus had risen unless he could see and touch the wounds suffered by Jesus. Here Thomas asks for nothing more than the evidence already provided for the other disciples (see 20:20). Once the risen Christ appears to him, Thomas offers one of the most developed confessions in the gospels, identifying Jesus as his “Lord and God” (20:28). The picture of Thomas elsewhere in John hardly comports with the image of feckless doubter. In John 11:16, Thomas, in spite of the danger, encourages the other disciples to accompany Jesus to Bethany, vowing to be with Jesus even to the death.

The New Testament offers little else on Thomas. The third-century Acts of Thomas, however, asserts not only that Thomas was the twin brother of Jesus but also that it fell to Thomas among the apostles to travel to India. Having declared that he would not go, Thomas was sold into slavery as a carpenter to agents of Gundafor, an Indian king. Once there, Thomas was entrusted with building a palace for Gundafor, but he gave the money to the poor instead. Eventually Gundafor was converted, and Thomas began to travel throughout India. Some point out that there is evidence of a king named Gondophernes or Gunuphara in the region of present-day Afghanistan and Pakistan, who reigned from about 20 to 50 C.E. The story says that Thomas died a martyr's death there.

—David Nystrom

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Disciples; Jesus; Mission

References and further reading:

- Collins, Raymond F. 1992. “Thomas.” In The Anchor Bible Dictionary, 6: 528–529. Edited by David Noel Freedman. New York: Doubleday.

Pagels, Elaine H. 2003. Beyond Belief: The Secret Gospel of Thomas. New York: Random House.

Thomas Aquinas

(c. 1224–1274 C.E.)

Christian friar, theologian, doctor of the church

Thomas Aquinas, a medieval Western Christian theologian, is most famous for systematizing Catholic theology in such a way that his thought still dominates much of Catholic theological discussion. He is most famous for producing the Summa Theologiae (Summa of theology, 1265–1273) and the Summa Contra Gentiles (Summa against the gentiles, 1259–1267).

Thomas was born at Roccasecca in southern Italy around 1224. In 1231, he was sent to the famous Benedictine abbey of Monte Cassino as an oblate. During his nine-year stay, he was educated in the tradition of lectio divina, or divine reading. Divine reading consisted in prayerful, meditative reading of the Bible. After receiving this traditional monastic education, Thomas studied at the new University of Naples. The university was the first established by a secular ruler, Emperor Frederick II, and was a center of cultural interaction between the Arabic-, Greek-, and Latin-speaking worlds. When Thomas studied there, Naples was a great center of the emerging study of Aristotle's works, newly translated from Greek and Arabic. It was also at the university that Thomas first became familiar with the Dominican order, which he soon joined.

After entering the order, Thomas's family kidnapped him and held him for a year trying to convince him to change his mind. Upon his release, the order sent him to study at the University of Paris under the guidance of Albert the Great, the famous Dominican philosopher and scientist. By the age of twenty, Thomas had been exposed to traditional monastic spirituality and education along with the latest secular knowledge and Aristotelian thought. These experiences, combined with his encounter with the Dominican order and Albert, in addition to his natural genius, gave him the tools to create the great array of treatises he would produce in his short life.

Designed to help convert Jews and Muslims, the Summa Contra Gentiles was designed for use by Dominican missionaries. The Summa Theologiae was an attempt to cover all of Christian theology in one work in a clearer and more effective manner than earlier theological textbooks. A massive work containing thirty-eight treatises and more than 3,000 articles, it owed a great deal to Aristotle, to both Eastern and Western patristic writers, and to the biblical knowledge Thomas had attained at Monte Cassino and Paris. The popularity the work attained owes much to its elaborate scholastic structure and clarity. While attempting to cover all of Christian theology, the work is perhaps best known for its five proofs of the existence of God and for trying to find a middle way in the medieval disputes about the relationship between faith and reason. Other writings included sermons, letters, and tracts on politics and spirituality. It should be kept in mind that the overwhelming number of Thomas's writings were scriptural commentaries or spiritual in nature, many written at the request of the pope, his own order, bishops, or the University of Paris.

It is crucial to understand that for a student in theology at a medieval university, especially for a Dominican, the idea was to study, then teach, and finally to preach. Academic work was not separate from a pastoral ministry of preaching. For Thomas and the Dominican order, teaching was the most important work one could do for fellow Christians.

Although usually associated with the University of Paris, Thomas spent more of his life creating and working in the individual friary schools of Italy within the Dominican system, particularly in Rome and Naples. His intellectual abilities were noticed both by popes, who frequently pressed him into service writing on controversial matters, and kings, including Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, who asked Thomas to form a study center at Naples. Thomas would have considered himself a theologian, not a philosopher, and as such he was open to prayer to solve intellectual problems. Prayer, which was crucial throughout his life, led him to such a mystical revelation in 1273 that he stopped writing, saying that "all that I have written seems like straw to me" (Davies 1993, 9). He died in 1274.

Thomas's spiritual life and contributions to faith are often overshadowed by his philosophical accomplishments. Thomas's work, often controversial in his lifetime, was soon adopted as the base curriculum for the Dominican order. The original and controversial nature of his writings kept him from canonization until 1323. However, it was only at the Council of Trent (1545) that Thomas's Summa Theologiae became a standard text for theological education. In 1567, Pope Pius V declared him a doctor of the church. That position of primacy was reinforced by Pope Leo XIII in the nineteenth century and again by the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s. Thomas's theology is the only work of one individual recognized as official church doctrine.

—Patrick J. Holt

See also: Albertus Magnus; Christianity and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Recognition; Scholars as Holy People; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Barron, Robert. 1996. Thomas Aquinas: Spiritual Master. New York: Crossroad.
- Copleston, F. C. 1955. Aquinas. New York: Penguin.
- Davies, Brian. 1993. The Thought of Thomas Aquinas. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Gilson, Etienne. 1964. The Spirit of Thomism. New York: P. J. Kennedy.

- O'Meara, Thomas Franklin. 1997. Thomas Aquinas, Theologian. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Torrell, Jean-Pierre. 1996. Saint Thomas Aquinas. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Thomas Becket

(c. 1120–1170 C.E.)

Christian archbishop, martyr

Born in London, England, around 1120, the archbishop and martyr Thomas Becket inspired one of the most popular Christian cults of the Middle Ages. After studying at Merton Abbey and in Paris, Thomas went on to become a successful administrator and joined the curia of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury. Thomas became archdeacon of Canterbury in 1154, and the following year King Henry II appointed him chancellor of England. The two men became close friends. Thomas supported the king at court as well as on the battlefield. In 1162, Henry pushed for Thomas's election as archbishop of Canterbury. Soon afterward, the dramatic events that led to Thomas's martyrdom began to unfold as Thomas adopted a more austere life, reinventing himself in his role as primate of England, and his friendship with the king soured.

Although Thomas and Henry fought over a number of issues, the one that stirred the embers into a blaze was the rivalry between church and crown. At the center was the Constitutions of Clarendon, a collection of ancestral privileges and customs that Henry wanted to maintain and reissue in 1164. Thomas objected to the Constitutions because they professed the king to be the head of the English church. By the end of the year, emotions had become so charged that Thomas fled England; for the next six years, he waged his campaign for the rights of the English church from France.

In July 1170, Thomas and Henry were reconciled, and the archbishop returned to England on or about December 1. Relations between Thomas, Henry, and their supporters rapidly became strained throughout the month, however, and many royalists believed that while Thomas lived there would be no peace in England. This sentiment might well have needed Henry to utter the famous and ambiguous plaint: "What miserable drones and traitors have I nourished and promoted in my household, who let their lord be treated with such shameful contempt by a low-born clerk" (Barlow 1986, 235). This sentence, which Henry probably spoke on Christmas Day, sealed Thomas's fate. Four barons interpreted these words as a challenge and plotted against the archbishop. The men reached Canterbury on December 29, and by late that afternoon they had attacked Thomas, killing him in his own cathedral.

Pope Alexander III officially canonized Thomas in 1173, but a popular cult had developed immediately after his death. The focus of veneration was the martyr's blood, which had been spilled in the cathedral. Mixed with water and stored in vials for ease of transport, the blood became famous for its healing power. Thomas soon gained wide recognition as a thaumaturgic saint who interceded to cure a variety of ailments. Some claimed his intercession could raise the dead. Although focused at Canterbury, the cult was immensely successful and soon took on an international character, having been dispersed through the scattering of his relics and the belief in his ability to intercede even on behalf of those who did not have access to them. The cult remained popular until 1538, when King Henry VIII had the shrine destroyed. The Roman Catholic Church continues to celebrate his feast on December 29, the anniversary of his death.

—Dawn Marie Hayes

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Politics and Holy People; Reform and Reaction; Wealth and Poverty

References and further reading:

- Barlow, Frank. 1986. Thomas Becket. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Butler, John. 1995. The Quest for Becket's Bones: The Mystery of the Relics of St. Thomas Becket of Canterbury. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Greenaway, George, trans. and ed. 1961. The Life and Death of Thomas Becket, Chancellor of England and Archbishop of Canterbury. London: Folio Society.
- Shirley, Janet, ed. 1975. Garnier's Becket: Translated from the Twelfth-Century Vie de Saint Thomas le Martyr de Cantorbire of Garnier of Pont-Sainte-Maxence. London: Phillimore.
- Smalley, Beryl. 1973. The Becket Conflict and the Schools: A Study of Intellectuals in Politics. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Thomas Becket. 2000. The Correspondence of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1162–1170. 2 vols. Translated and edited by Anne J. Duggan. Oxford: Clarendon.
- Urry, William. 2001 [1999]. Thomas Becket: His Last Days. Stroud, England: Sutton.

Thorlákr Thórhallsson (Thorlac)

(1133–1193 C.E.)

Christian abbot, bishop

Thorlákr Thórhallsson was Iceland's first saint, and the only one recognized by Rome today. Born in 1133, he was educated for the priesthood by a learned member of the powerful family of the Oddaverjar. After spending some time as a priest, Thorlákr went abroad to finish his education, studying in Paris and Lincoln. Shortly after his return to Iceland, he was made prior of the newly founded house of Augustinian canons at Thykkvabær in 1168. He soon became abbot, and he was consecrated bishop of Skálholt in 1178.

Knowledge of St. Thorlákr comes primarily from the different versions of the vernacular saga about him. The earliest of these, composed shortly after his translation, portrays a typical holy bishop in language redolent of the Bible. A fourteenth-century manuscript of the saga contains an additional narrative, “Oddaverja Tháttr,” which portrays Thorlák fighting for church rights, as did Bishop Árni Thorláksson of Skálholt after him. The historical value of this passage has been questioned, most recently by Orri Vésteinnsson (2000). The chief value of these works for historians lies in the various collections of miracles associated with Thorlák, which provide an unparalleled window into the everyday life of medieval Icelanders.

The fact that Thorlák maintained a celibate lifestyle would have set him aside from other Icelandic clergy of his time and may have contributed to a reputation for sanctity that developed soon after his death. By the end of the twelfth century, Iceland was the only Scandinavian country without a local saint. The nearest major shrine was that of St. Olaf at Trondheim, whose archbishops had recently shown a tendency to interfere in Icelandic affairs. The impetus for Thorlák’s popular canonization appears to have originated with reports of dreams and miracles in the northern Icelandic diocese, Hólar. In 1198, at the instance of Bishop Brandr of Hólar and others, Bishop Páll of Skálholt announced at the National Assembly that vows to Thorlák were permitted and that the anniversary of his death would be liturgically commemorated. The reaction was all that could be desired; enough miracles had been collected within a month to justify his translation on July 20 of the same year.

Thorlák’s popularity is attested by the large number of churches that include him in their dedications or owned statues or paintings of him, by reports of miracles, and by translations in 1229 and 1292. The anniversary of his initial translation was established as an obligatory feast in 1237.

—Margaret Cormack

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Patriotism and Holy People; Reform and Reaction; Sexuality and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bibire, Paul. 1993. “Thorlák saga helga.” P. 671 in Medieval Scandinavia: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Philip Pulsiano et al. New York: Garland.
- Cormack, Margaret. 1994. The Saints in Iceland: Their Veneration from the Conversion to 1400. Subsidia Hagiographica, 78. Brussels: Société des Bollandistes.
- Vésteinnsson, Orri. 2000. Christianization of Iceland. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Tianhou (T’ien-hou) (Empress of Heaven)

(960–987 C.E.)

Daoist goddess

Tianhou is a Daoist goddess who emerged during the early northern Song dynasty (960–1127) in southeastern China. Although closely associated with her home in Meizhou on the coast of Fujian province, Tianhou’s popularity extends throughout China, Taiwan, and overseas Chinese communities. The goddess is particularly popular in Taiwan, where she is commonly known as Mazu (Granny). As the traditional guardian of sailors, fisherpeople, and official envoys at sea, Tianhou protects people and boats from storms. Tianhou’s duties also include prevention of droughts and floods, protection of people from bandits, and assistance with conception and childbirth. The Chinese imperial court granted the goddess the titles Tianhou and Tianshang shengmu (Holy mother in heaven). However, Tianhou has been thoroughly integrated into Chinese popular religion in a similar fashion as the Buddhist deity Guanyin.

The numerous versions of Tianhou’s hagiography reflect her appeal to people from a variety of socioeconomic backgrounds. Many accounts state that before her apotheosis the goddess was born in 960 to a family of fisherpeople surnamed Lin. Miss Lin never cried as a child and was a precocious youngster who had learned the Confucian classics by age eight and mastered the major Buddhist sutras by age eleven. As an adolescent, she encountered a Daoist spirit who gave her a magical talisman that she used to heal the sick and exorcise demons. She also developed the ability to allow her spirit to travel outside of her body. Tianhou never married. She died in 987.

Many Chinese boats have a small shrine to Tianhou on the bow. The goddess usually appears wearing a headdress of dangling beads appropriate for an empress. She is often accompanied by two fierce-looking attendants: Shunfeng Er (Ears that hear with the wind) and Qianli Yan (Eyes that see a thousand miles). Devotees celebrate her birthday on the twenty-third day of the third lunar month.

—Noelle Giuffrida

See also: Apotheosis; Daoism and Holy People; Spiritual Guardians

References and further reading:

- Boltz, Judith Magee. 1986. “In Homage to Tien-fei.” Journal of the American Oriental Society 106, no. 1: 211–232.
- Bosco, Joseph, and Puay-peng Ho. 1999. Temples of the Empress of Heaven. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Watson, James L. 1985. “Standardizing the Gods: The Promotion of T’ien Hou (‘Empress of Heaven’) along the South China Coast, 960–1960.” Pp. 292–324 in Popular Culture in Late Imperial China. Edited by David Johnson et al. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Tianming

See Mandate of Heaven

Tijani, Ahmad al-

(1737/1739–1815 C.E.)

Muslim sufi

Ahmad al-Tijani, considered an Islamic saint (wali) by Muslims throughout North and West Africa, is the founder of a sufi order (tariqa) that is named after him, the Tijaniyya. Since its establishment in the eighteenth century, the Tijaniyya order has grown to be one of the largest and most widespread orders of Islam in Africa. Pilgrims frequent al-Tijani's tomb in Fez, Morocco, on a regular basis, believing that it is a holy site.

Born around 1737 in 'Ain-Madi, Algeria, Ahmad al-Tijani was part of a Berber family. At the age of twenty-one, he journeyed to Fez to study with noted sufi scholars. Fifteen years later, in 1773, he performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, staying there for nearly a year. While traveling to and from Arabia, he joined different sufi orders along the way. Returning to Morocco in 1774, al-Tijani claimed that the prophet Muhammad had communicated with him during his journey. Shortly thereafter, he amassed a loyal following and founded his own order.

As the leader of the Tijaniyya order, al-Tijani was considered a living saint who embodied spiritual grace and divine blessing (baraka). From the outset, al-Tijani strove to maintain and ensure the existing loyalty of his followers. One of his first moves was to forbid his followers from becoming members of any other order or taking oaths of allegiance ('ahd) to anyone other than himself. In this, the Tijaniyya was different from most sufi orders of the time, and it continues to be so at present. Further differences distinguishing the order from other Muslim sects are found in the litanies (wird) that members say following prayer, and the fact that their recitation (dhikr) generally takes place collectively rather than on an individual level. Neither dhikr nor wird are practices that stem from al-Tijani—they had been in existence for some time in various sufi orders; nevertheless, al-Tijani did add specific features particular to his order.

As his order gained in numbers and he gained renown as a holy man, al-Tijani embarked on a vigorous proselytization campaign throughout Morocco. He derided public religious festivals, activities organized by Berbers from competing sufi orders, arguing that they were an exploitation of divine grace (baraka) and a negative innovation (bida) not in accordance with Islamic doctrine.

The Tijaniyya continued to expand markedly after al-Tijani's death in 1815. After first spreading throughout northern Africa, the Tijaniyya made its first significant strides in West Africa, specifically Mauritania and Senegal, in the early nineteenth century. Via trade networks and the holy wars (jihads) of a Senegalese Tijani named Omar Tall, the Tijaniyya moved eastward past the Niger bend from the 1830s through the mid-1860s. Conversions en masse were not uncommon, and by the 1930s large parts of previously non-Islamic sub-Saharan West Africa were predominantly Muslim. At present, the Tijaniyya is one of the largest and best-known orders in Africa. Indeed, Tijanis constitute majorities or are at least a close second in many of the nations of Islamic North and West Africa.

—Noah Butler

See also: Attributes of Holy People; Mission; Reform and Reaction; Sufism; Tolerance and Intolerance

References and further reading:

- Abun-Nasr, Jamil. 1965. The Tijaniyya: A Sufi Order in the Modern World. London: Oxford University Press.
- Coulon, Christian. 1981. Le Marabout et le Prince (Islam et Pouvoir au Senegal). Paris: A. Pedone.
- Geertz, Clifford. 1986. Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Gellner, Ernest. 1969. Saints of the Atlas. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- O'Brien, Donal Cruise. 1971. The Mourides of Senegal: The Political and Economic Organization of an Islamic Brotherhood. London: Oxford University Press.
- Trimingham, J. Spencer. 1959. Islam in West Africa. London: Oxford University Press.
- . 1971. The Sufi Orders of Islam. London: Oxford University Press.

Tillich, Paul

(1886–1965 C.E.)

Lutheran theologian

The son of a Lutheran minister, Paul Tillich was born in Starzeddel, Germany, in 1886. He studied theology at the universities of Berlin, Tübingen, and Halle, and in 1912 he was ordained a minister in the Evangelical Lutheran Church. During World War I, he served as a chaplain in the German Army. Developing into one of the most influential philosophical theologians of the twentieth century, he taught at a number of universities between 1919 and 1933, including Frankfurt am Main, from which he was dismissed because of his vocal opposition to the rising influence of the National Socialists (Nazis) in Germany. After his dismissal, Tillich left Germany for the United States, accepting a position at the Union Theological Seminary in New York, where he taught from 1933 until 1955. He subsequently took a position at Harvard University, where he remained until 1962, when he became the Nuveen Professor of Theology at the University of Chicago. Tillich taught at Chicago until his death in 1965.

In books such as his monumental three-volume Systematic Theology: The Courage to Be (1952) and The Dynamics of Faith (1957), Tillich sought to articulate his complex conceptualization of religion and faith. For Tillich, religion may be understood in a normative, or “narrow,” sense: belonging to a certain religious tradition or sect; attending a church, temple or mosque; maintaining particular symbols or ideas about God; or participating in certain rituals or sacramental activities. But it can also be understood in a “larger” sense. Religion in this larger sense represents an “ultimate concern” about the “meaning of one’s life,” or about the “meaning of ‘being’ as such.” Religion must be understood in relation to what concerns us ultimately, says Tillich, because in its narrower sense alone it is subject to a profane “demonization” wherein religious ideas and symbols may be absolutized and become “idols” themselves, or where one particular religious group, symbol, or worldview may begin to be understood as the “truth.”

Although Tillich alludes to religion as “ultimate concern,” he usually reserves this concept in order to define faith. True to his Lutheran roots, Tillich understands faith in relation to the Pauline notion of grace. Faith, then, is not understood as a conscious decision to accept or turn oneself over to some “thing,” perhaps God, that we take to be “unconditional,” but rather as an existential experience of being “grasped” by that which concerns us ultimately. We do not make something a matter of ultimate concern; rather, we have already been grasped by that which is unconditional when we begin to reflect upon it. In this way, God may be called the unconditional, but in the truest sense even God is indefinable, as the unconditional precedes all created things and thus lies outside the realm of finitude.

Although for many Tillich’s theology, grounded as it was in existentialist philosophy, often seemed far too difficult to understand and sometimes even nihilistic in its expression, his sermons proved to be another matter. In “You Are Accepted,” for example, although Tillich does say that our lives are characterized by “estrangement from others and ourselves,” by separation from “the mystery, the depth, and the greatness of our existence,” he goes on to say that when “grace abounds we receive the power to say ‘yes’ to ourselves, that peace enters into us and makes us whole, that self-hate and self-contempt disappear, and that our self is reunited with itself.” For Tillich, it is ultimately in the “light of grace” that we “experience moments in which we accept ourselves, because we feel that we have been accepted by that which is greater than we.”

—Philip C. DiMare

See also: Martyrdom and Persecution; Protestantism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Scharf, Uwe Carsten, and Langdon Gilkey. 1999. The Paradoxical Breakthrough of Revelation: Interpreting the Divine-Human Interplay in Paul Tillich’s Work, 1913–1964. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter.
- Tillich, Paul. 1973–1980 [1951]. Systematic Theology. Vols. 1–3. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- . 1986 [1957]. The Dynamics of Faith. New York: HarperCollins.
- . 1994 [1963]. Christianity and the Encounter of World Religions. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2000 [1952]. The Courage to Be. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Tilopa

(988–1069 C.E.)

Buddhist teacher

Tilopa was a Buddhist teacher and adept within the mahasiddha (the great perfected) traditions of early medieval India. As such, he is considered an exemplar of a type of Buddhist practice that leads the sadhaka (from the same root as siddha; it here means “realizer, attainer, practitioner”) to a direct realization of the human awakening known as buddhahood. In mahasiddha fashion, Tilopa terms both the practice for and realization of this awakening mahamudra (great seal). This is the pure, that is, nondual (advaya), awareness of the insubstantial (shunyata) nature of phenomena, simultaneously begetting liberation from deluded preoccupation with the objects of the sensory field. In addition to his role as an adept, Tilopa is revered as the founder of the lineage that would become one of the four major schools of Tibetan Buddhism, the Kagyu (Bka’brgyud, “transmission of mastery”).

Tilopa’s historicity is obscure because all of the extant works (in Sanskrit and Tibetan) purporting to illuminate the life of the master are really hagiographical, rather than biographical, in nature. Nonetheless, these texts are illuminating in ways that a strict biography is not. The most popular such account of Tilopa’s life, that of the seventeenth-century Tibetan historian Padma Karpo, provides a summary of his “outward biography.” According to this account, Tilopa was born in eastern India to a brahmin family in 988. When just a child, he was recognized by the siddha Nagarjuna to be perfectly suited for esoteric tantric training. As a young man, Tilopa trained as a Buddhist monk in the monastery at Somapuri. As is often the case in the mahasiddha literature, Tilopa’s stay in the monastery was followed by a period as a wandering yogin. During this time, he received teachings from siddhas, practiced meditation, and performed tantric rituals.

After twelve years, Tilopa settled in Bengal. Here, he took a job crushing sesame seeds (hence his name, which is derived from tila, “sesame seed”) by day and waiting on a prostitute by night. In accordance with the siddha notion that awakening can be realized in the course of everyday activities, Tilopa attained some understanding of reality through his work. He therefore resumed wandering, teaching others of his insight. When the limited nature of his realization eventually dawned on him, Tilopa set out for a cremation ground, where he sat motionless until the buddha Vajradhara appeared to him and revealed to him the highest teaching. This teaching, as he would later proclaim, consists in “allowing the muddy waters of mental activity to clear; refraining from both positive and negative projection; leaving appearances alone.”

Tilopa’s character may be glimpsed in the legend of his greatest disciple, Naropa, who saw his guru appear to him as “a dark man dressed in cotton trousers, his hair knotted in a tuft, and with protruding blood-shot eyes” (Guenther 1963, 36–37). In one of the initial encounters between master and disciple, Tilopa asks Naropa to look for the unity of all of the elements in the initiation ritual that he is about to undergo. Naropa asks, “How can I [see] when blinded by my dark ignorance?” Tilopa replies:

Watch without watching for something. Look
From the invisible at what you cannot grasp
As an entity. To see and yet to see no things Is freedom in and through yourself. (Guenther 1963, 42)

—Glenn Wallis

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Nagarjuna; Naropa

References and further reading:

- Cayley, Vyvyan, ed. 1995. The Life of the Mahasiddha Tilopa. Translated by Fabrizio Torricelli and T. Sangye. Dharamsala, India: Library of Tibetan Works and Archives.
- Dowman, Keith. 1985. Masters of Mahamudra: Songs and Histories of the Eighty-Four Buddhist Siddhas. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Guenther, Herbert. 1963. The Life and Teaching of Naropa. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Pema Donyo Nyinche (the twelfth Khentin Tai Situ) and Kenneth Holmes. 1988. Tilopa: Some Glimpses of His Life. Eskdalemuir, Scotland: Dzalendara.
- Robinson, James. 1979. Buddha's Lions. Emeryville, CA: Dharma.
- Thrangu Rinpoche. 2002. Life of Tilopa and the Ganges Mahamudra. Auckland, New Zealand: Zhyisil Chokyi Ghatsal Trust.

Tiresias

Greek seer

Of all seers in Greek myth, the blind Tiresias is best known. Son of one Everes and a nymph, Chariclo, of the family of Udaeus, one of the original inhabitants of Thebes, he first appears in Homer's Odyssey (10.490–495). There the enchantress Circe instructs Odysseus to find the spirit of the dead seer Tiresias, who, although dead, still has understanding. Homer means that Tiresias has to some extent overcome death, and when Odysseus makes a pit of blood on the other side of the river Ocean, only Tiresias's soul, his psyche (“breath”), can speak without first drinking the blood. Tiresias's psyche has a special vitality. He then does drink the blood and prophesies to Odysseus about the dangers ahead and how he will die “a gentle death from the sea.” Even in death, Tiresias knows what the future will bring.

The principal story about Tiresias explains how he gained his prophetic powers. While walking through the woods, Tiresias saw two serpents copulating. He struck and killed the female and was immediately changed into a woman. Seven years later, he again saw snakes copulating. This time he struck the male and regained his sex. Later, according to a jocular story, Zeus and Hera were squabbling about which sex derived the most pleasure from intercourse, each insisting it was the other. Because Tiresias had experience of being female and male, they asked him and learned that of ten parts of pleasure, the female enjoys all ten, whereas the male enjoys but one. His answer so enraged Hera that she struck him blind. To console him, Zeus gave Tiresias the art of prophecy and a life so long that it spanned seven generations, from the founding of Thebes by Kadmos until its destruction by the sons of the Seven against Thebes. Another story says that Tiresias was blinded when he saw Athena naked in her bath.

Tiresias turns up repeatedly in Greek tragedy as one who warns the protagonist against a disastrous course of action. In Sophocles' Oedipus the King, he is first to accuse Oedipus of having himself killed the Theban king Laertes, whose murderer Oedipus seeks. In Sophocles' Antigone, he warns King Creon against his refusal to bury Polynices, a rebel against the city, and in Euripides' Bacchae he warns King Pentheus to accept the new religion of Dionysos.

Fleeing the burning city of Thebes after the second, and successful, assault against it, Tiresias stopped to drink from a spring and immediately died.

—Barry B. Powell

See also: Attributes of Holy People; Greek Prophets; Mediterranean Religions of Antiquity and Holy People; Prophets

References and further reading:

- Buxton, R. 1980. “Blindness and Limits: Sophokles and the Logic of Myth.” Journal of Hellenic Studies 100: 22–37.
- Gantz, Timothy. 1993. Early Greek Myth. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Powell, Barry B. 2000. Classical Myth, 3d ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall.

Titu Cusi Yupanqui

(d. 1571 C.E.)

Inca priest, ruler

Known as the author of the Relación de la conquista del Perú (Account of the conquest of Peru, 1570), Titu Cusi Yupanqui was the son of the rebellious Manco Inca, one of the last incas of Vilcabamba who resisted Spanish colonization and formed a neo-Inca state outside Cuzco. Manco Inca was son of Huayna Capac and younger brother of Huascar and Atahualpa, the last incas of Cuzco. Although Manco Inca tried also to negotiate with the Spaniards, he was betrayed and killed by those whom he thought were collaborators. When Manco Inca died, his son Sayri Tupac (1534–1560) was his successor, and Titu Cusi was named high priest of the Sun. After two years of negotiations with the viceroy Antonio Hurtado de Mendoza, Sayri Tupac died mysteriously. His brother, Titu Cusi, was then proclaimed inca in Vilcabamba.

Following his father's steps, Titu Cusi Yupanqui resisted the Spaniards at the same time that he was negotiating with them. However, when he was organizing a rebellion in the southern Andes, a chieftain betrayed him. In 1566, Titu Cusi allowed the entrance of two Christian priests, Marcos García and Diego de Ortiz, into Vilcabamba. In 1567, his son Quispe Titu was baptized, and so was the inca in 1568, taking the Christian name "Diego de Castro." In spite of the apparent success of the Catholic Church, Titu Cusi remained in Vilcabamba until his death in 1571. After his death, his son Túpac Amaru was proclaimed inca at a very early age, but he was finally captured by the army sent by Viceroy Francisco de Toledo, and killed later on. With the death of Túpac Amaru, the Inca dynasty disappeared.

The Relación of Titu Cusi is addressed to the Spanish king and tells the heroic story of his father Manco Inca and his ancestors. Titu Cusi Yupanqui dictated the story of his father to the priest Marcos García, since he did not know how to write. In his Relación, the inca narrates proudly the organization and history of the Inca dynasty, justifies the rebellion of his father and the last incas of Vilcabamba, and requests a reward for his services.

The Relación joins the chronicles written by other Andean authors, such as Joan de Santa Cruz Pachacuti Yamqui Salcamaygua (1613) and Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala (1615), to offer the Inca side of the Spanish conquest of Peru.

—Rocío Quispe-Agnoli

See also: Amerindian Religions and Holy People; Patriotism and Holy People; Priests; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Adorno, Rolena, ed. 1982. From Oral to Written Expression: Native Andean Chroniclers of the Early Colonial Period. Syracuse, NY: Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.
- Chang-Rodríguez, Raquel. 1988. La apropiación del signo: Tres cronistas indígenas del Perú. Tempe: Arizona State University Press.
- Hemmings, John. 1970. The Conquest of the Incas. Cambridge: Macmillan.
- Titu Cusi Yupanqui. 1973. Relación de la conquista del Perú. Lima: Biblioteca Universitaria.

Tokugawa Ieyasu

(1543–1616 C.E.)

Shinto-Buddhist ruler, god

Tokugawa Ieyasu unified early seventeenth-century Japan, established the Tokugawa shogunate, and served as the first shogun of the Edo period (1603–1867). He was posthumously deified as tōshō daigongen (great avatar manifestation illuminating the east) and enshrined in the Tōshōgū at Nikko (Tochigi prefecture).

Born in 1543 during a bellicose period of Japanese history as the son of a minor chieftain in the province Mikawa (present-day Aichi prefecture), Ieyasu succeeded in expanding the territory he had inherited from his father after forming an advantageous alliance with the upcoming warlord Oda Nobunaga (1534–1582). After the death of Nobunaga in 1582, Ieyasu continued to ally with Nobunaga's successor, Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1536–1598), who reallocated him to a new domain, the Kantō area. Here Ieyasu established his headquarters in Edo (present-day Tokyo), then still a small fishing village. After Hideyoshi's death, Ieyasu managed to install himself as the dominant warlord of Japan, defeating his opposition in the Battle of Sekigahara in 1600. Following this victory, Ieyasu claimed authority over the whole country and started to strengthen his control over the daimyō (feudal lords). In 1603, he assumed the title of seii tai shōgun (barbarian-subduing generalissimo; abbreviated shogun), thereby laying the foundation of the rule of the Tokugawa family over the unified country, which would last until 1867. Only two years later, in 1605, Ieyasu handed the title of shogun on to his son Tokugawa Hidetada (1579–1632) and retired to Sunpu (present-day Shizuoka), where he passed away in 1616.

In accordance with his last wishes, Ieyasu's body was transferred to Kunōzan (present-day Shizuoka), where he was installed as a deity in a newly built shrine in accordance with the rites of yoshida shintō (a school of Shinto that was developed and handed down within the Yoshida family). After Ieyasu's interment, dispute arose among the leading religious advisers as to the interpretation of Ieyasu's last words, which had included ideas regarding his entombment and posthumous treatment. Main issues were the title under which Ieyasu was to be deified, as well as the ultimate location of his mausoleum. Tenkai (1536–1643), monk of the Buddhist Tendai sect, which advocated a Shinto-Buddhist syncretism, emerged out of this argument victorious. He succeeded in convincing the son and successor of Ieyasu, Tokugawa Hidetada, that Ieyasu should be conferred the title daigongen (great avatar) instead of daimyōjin (great god). Ieyasu's last words were thus reinterpreted, with the result that one year after his demise his remains were moved to Nikko, where a shrine called Tōshōgū was erected.

Ieyasu was enshrined there and by imperial edict under the title tōshō daigongen. The Nikko Tōshōgū thus became the main center of veneration for his deified spirit, which was considered the protecting deity of the ruling Tokugawa family for the next two and a half centuries. The history of his deification, the architecture of his mausoleum, as well as the posthumous title itself all testify to the Shinto-Buddhist syncretism underlying the posthumous veneration of Ieyasu, closely interweaving elements of both religious traditions.

—Tobias Bauer

See also: Apotheosis; Buddhism and Holy People; Shinto and Holy People; Toyotomi Hideyoshi

References and further reading:

- Boot, Willem Jan. 1987. "The Deification of Tokugawa Ieyasu." The Japan Foundation Newsletter 14, no. 5: 10–13.
- . 1990. "The Religious Background of the Deification of Tokugawa Ieyasu." Pp. 331–337 in Rethinking Japan. Vol. 2, Social Sciences, Ideology and Thought. Edited by Adriana Boscaro et al. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- . 2000. "The Death of a Shogun: Deification in Early Modern Japan." Pp. 144–166 in Shinto in History: Ways of the Kami. Edited by John Breen and Mark Teeuwen. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Ooms, Herman. 1985. Tokugawa Ideology: Early Constructs, 1570–1680. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Sadler, Arthur L. 1978. The Maker of Modern Japan: The Life of Tokugawa Ieyasu. Tokyo: Tuttle.
- Totman, Conrad. 1983. Tokugawa Ieyasu: Shogun. Union City, CA: Heian.

Tokugawa Mitsukuni

(1628–1700 C.E.)

Neo-Confucian leader

Tokugawa Mitsukuni, the Japanese lord of Mito domain from 1661 to 1690, was a promoter of Neo-Confucianist thought and is noted for his passion for learning, his religious activities, and his leadership skills in the first century of the Edo period (1603–1867). Born in 1628, he was a grandson of Tokugawa Ieyasu, the warrior who unified the early modern Japanese nation, and the third son of Tokugawa Yorifusa, the first ruler of Mito domain. Mitsukuni is also known by his posthumous Buddhist name Gikō, but more often by his popular name, Mito Kōmon.

With the assistance of more than 130 scholars from around Japan, Mitsukuni began to compile the work Dainihonshi (History of Great Japan) at his school in Edo, Shōkōkan. This work was begun in 1657 and not completed until 1906, but after the project was moved to Mito in 1698, Mito scholarship developed its own original style that later became known as Mitogaku.

Tokugawa Mitsukuni was deeply sensitive toward Japanese literature and Shinto, and this was reflected in his political policies. During his rule, he destroyed 1,000 Buddhist temples that had recently been constructed in his domain and established a system of one Shinto shrine for each village to replace them. In addition, until the time of Mitsukuni, it was the custom of learned Confucian scholars to shave their heads and adopt Buddhist names, but he abolished this system, commanding all his scholars to grow their hair and elevating them to samurai status. Mitsukuni was noted for his perceptive political and economic policies. He actively promoted paper production, gold mining, and other economic activities while reducing annual rice taxes and stabilizing his administration through the help of his band of retainers.

Gateway to the shrine of Tokugawa Mitsukuni. Nikko, Japan. (Art Directors)

Many legends and myths surround Tokugawa Mitsukuni. These were created by fictional publications from the late Edo and early Meiji period (1850s–1880s) that portray him as a meikun (benevolent ruler). The popular contemporary Japanese television series Mitō Kōmon also builds on these legends.

—Timothy D. Amos

See also: Confucianism and Holy People; Rulers as Holy People; Tokugawa Ieyasu

References and further reading:

- Bellah, Robert N. 1957. Tokugawa Religion: The Values of Pre-Industrial Japan. New York: Free Press.
- Koschmann, J. Victor. 1987. The Mito Ideology: Discourse, Reform, and Insurrection in Late Tokugawa Japan, 1790–1864. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Ooms, Herman. 1985. Tokugawa Ideology: Early Constructs, 1570–1680. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Tsunoda, Ryusaku, William Theodore de Bary, and Donald Keene, eds. 1958. Sources of Japanese Tradition. 2 vols. New York: Columbia University Press.

Tolerance and Intolerance

Tolerance of the beliefs or practices of others seems to be a very modern virtue of holy people. Although saints of the past may have been very tolerant, they won popular esteem much more for their ability to harm those who disagreed with them. This is a tradition that goes back at least to the Jewish prophet Elijah, who, after defeating the priests of Ba'al in an invocation contest, called for their massacre. Until modern ecumenical movements encouraged at least some populations to see the unity within all religions, a holy person was much more likely to be described as a heroic defender of the faith than as “intolerant,” “prejudiced,” or inclined to “persecute.” Thus, intolerance has been regarded as a positive attribute in the holy people of dominant religions, especially those that claim universality, and worst of all those that are monotheistic.

Intolerance appears as a defining characteristic of Christian saints through much of the history of Christianity. All of the early Christian saints are portrayed as intolerant of other religions, as well as of “heresy”—which, of course, meant interpretations of religion that they themselves did not follow. The great theologians of the early church defined their beliefs in polemic. For example, much of Augustine of Hippo's (354–430) work is polemic against non-Christians, Manichaeans, Pelagians, and Donatists. Athanasius's (c. 300–373) theology was similarly shaped in opposition to Arians. Opposition to opposing belief was sometimes extremely blatant, not excluding physical force. Cyril of Alexandria (c. 376–444) in his fight with the teachings of Nestorius bribed the imperial court and even terrorized the city of Ephesus with his own private army of monks. Throughout the Middle Ages the pattern continued: Recognized saints were not just intolerant of vice, but of Jews, much of popular religion, and above all heretics—who were often perceived in medical terms as rotten limbs that needed to be amputated to save the greater Christian body, an attitude that only grew in strength with the Reformation movements of the sixteenth century. It is often forgotten by his modern fans, for instance, that the saintly Thomas More (1478–1535) engaged in a vicious, often scatological polemic against Protestant leaders—and Protestants such as Martin Luther (1483–1546) returned the favor.

This attitude was not limited to Latin Christianity. The Russian Orthodox Joseph of Volotsk (1439/1440–1515) specialized in rooting out heretics and getting them burned. It is important to note, though, that it is often possible to find a model of tolerance active at the same time as an advocate of intolerance. At the very time Joseph of Volotsk was attacking heretics, Nilus of Sora (1433–1508) condemned all forms of coercion and violence against heretics—an attitude that, however, made him almost unique among Christians of the period. While in modern times the rhetoric has shifted to “hate the sin, love the sinner,” the popularity of various apostles of hatred and intolerance attest to the continuing strength of this theme in Christianity. A notable modern case is the Zambian prophet Alice Lenshina (1919–1978), who violently denounced many traditional religious practices, besides the general sinfulness of the world.

Intolerant holy people have won admiration in many religions. Cases are fairly rare in the religions of India, where at least since the time of Ashoka (third century B.C.E.) recognized holy men and women have advocated tolerance of religious diversity, a position made possible by both polytheism and the similarities between most of the Indian religions. Still, examples of intolerance appear, especially in folkloric accounts. A particularly horrific case is that of the Jain monk/scholar Haribhadra (eighth century C.E.), who took a gruesome revenge after his nephews, who had gone to study at a Buddhist monastery, were murdered. He challenged the leading Buddhist scholars to a debate, the losers to jump into a vat of boiling oil, which indeed they did after he bested them in argument. But perhaps this is the exception that proves the rule: Haribhadra's own writings are ecumenical, and perhaps this tale shows the temperament of the average Jain, rather than of the holy man himself. As in the Christian case, though, the tale suggests that a body of opinion wanted holy people to stop being tolerant of religions that were just plain wrong in the popular eye. And the legend concludes with the report that Haribhadra's teacher made him perform penance for his un-Jainlike behavior. Much of this traditional tolerance broke down with the Islamic drive into northern India, but the tradition of tolerance was strong enough to win a wide following for Nanak (1469–1539), the first Sikh guru, who took a stand against the caste system, advocated peace between Muslim and Hindu, and even fought to end discrimination against women.

There are also a few Buddhist holy people who are associated with attacks on their religious rivals, but in the hagiographical tradition they seem to be admired more despite their intolerance than because of it. For example, the Buddhist Aryadeva (second or third century B.C.E.), a philosopher, became so heated in his attacks on rival philosophies that he was eventually assassinated. But he is not for that reason regarded as a martyr, as his counterpart in Christianity would be. Similarly, the Japanese monk Nichiren (1222–1282) was vehement in his attacks against the reformer Honen (1133–1212), prophesying that Japan itself would fall unless all other forms of religion but his own were obliterated. He was attacked by a mob, arrested, and exiled.

Nichiren's attitude, however, gives a clue to the vehement intolerance especially of newly introduced ideologies that marks a number of modern holy people in several religions, including Buddhism. For example, the modern Thai monk Kitthiwultho calls on devout Buddhists to kill Communists as a threat both to the state and to Buddhism. He argues that some people are so depraved that killing them is like fighting disease. Such an attitude also marks some modern Christian fundamentalist groups that laud those of their members who use armed force against what they declare to be unjust law. This is also an important theme in some sectors of modern Islam—intolerance based on a deep fear that state and religion are being corrupted. When wielded by a person of great authority and religious conviction, such as Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) of Iran, the line between intolerance and defense of the faith is very blurry.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Aryadeva; Ashoka; Athanasius; Augustine of Hippo; Contemporary Holy People; Extremists as Holy People; Haribhadra; Honen; Joseph of Volotsk; Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi; Lenshina, Alice; Luther, Martin; More, Thomas; Nanak; Nichiren; Nilus of Sora

References and further reading:

Armstrong, Karen. 2000. The Battle for God. New York: Ballantine Books.

Tommaso de Vio

See Cajetan

Toral and Jesal

(16th cent. C.E.)

Hindu poets

Jesal and Toral were sixteenth-century saint-poets of the nijia tradition of Ramdev Pir in Rajasthan. Their memorial chapels are in Anjar, Kutch (Gujarat, India).

Jesal was a member of a robber band; Toral, a beautiful woman, was married to one Sasatiya Kathi, who was also a follower of the nijia path. According to legend, once Jesal came to steal Kathi's horse and sword, but Kathi caught him. However, Kathi later gave him not only the horse and the sword but also his wife, Toral, so that he would learn from her how to live a more virtuous life. In another story, Jesal and Toral were on their way to Kutch when, on a boat at sea, they got trapped in a storm. Jesal was frightened; Toral was calm. When Jesal asked her to save his life, Toral asked him to confess his sins and promise to live a virtuous life. Jesal did so, and his life was spared. He then made Toral his guru and lived a pious life. But in his final days, Jesal became a samadhi (entered the final stage of yogism). When Toral found out, she prayed for three days for Jesal's return to this mundane world, as taking samadhi without living a married life was not advised in their sect. Finally, Jesal returned from his contemplative trance, Toral married him, and they became samadhis together. People continue to worship this saintly couple today.

Toral is said to have composed many bhajans (religious songs) and narrative poems, but few of them survive today. Many of her bhajans are written in a dialogue form with Jesal. Her narrative poems are devoted to various themes, including the origin and importance of the nijia sect. In one poem, she claims that the nijia sect was originally preached by Lord Shiva. In another she narrates an event in which the king makes a lower-caste woman his guru after the latter described him as untouchable, as he was a man without guru.

—Babu Suthar

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People

References and further reading:

Karani, Dulerai. 1976. Kacchana santo (The saints of Kutch).

Amadavada, India: Sastum Sahitya Vardhaka Karyalaya.

Khan, Dominique-Sila. 1997. Conversions and Shifting Identities:

Ramdev Pir and the Ismailis in Rajasthan. New Delhi: Manohar and Center de Sciences Humaines.

Meghani, Zaverchand. 1976. Puratan Jyota (Ancient flames).

Bhavnagar, India: Prasara.

Mohanpuri, Goswami. 1977. Jesal-Toral. Porbandar, India: Goswami

Mohanpuri.

Toyotomi Hideyoshi

(1536–1598 C.E.)

Shinto ruler, god

Toyotomi Hideyoshi, a warlord in bellicose sixteenth-century Japan, succeeded Oda Nobunaga (1534–1582) and preceded the establishment of the shogunate under Tokugawa Ieyasu (1543–1616). Hideyoshi is considered one of the three unifiers of Japan. He was posthumously deified as toyokuni daimyōjin; the first term means “rich country”; the second signifies a great god. The characters for toyokuni can also be transliterated hōkoku. He is enshrined in the Toyokuni Jinja in Kyoto.

Hideyoshi was born in 1536 as the son of a foot soldier serving the Nobunaga family, an ambitious clan situated in the area around Nagoya. He started serving Oda Nobunaga from 1558 and succeeded in establishing himself as a main vassal, assigned important military missions and thereby contributing to the enlargement of his lord's sphere of control. After the death of Nobunaga in 1582, Hideyoshi greatly expanded his territory, so that by the end of 1585 he ruled over large landholdings in central Japan. He consolidated his authority by disarming the peasants and tying them to the soil, and he also conducted a land survey. After seizing control over the whole country through military expeditions to Kyushu (1587), the Kantō area, and the northeastern regions (1590–1591), he launched campaigns against Korea (1592 and 1597). Hideyoshi died in 1598 before he could satisfy his ambitions overseas.

Although his death was initially kept secret in order to avoid endangering the ongoing military campaign in Korea, construction of a shrine commenced near Kyoto. It is handed down that the Kitano shrine in the north of Kyoto, the place of worship for the deified spirit of Sugawara no Michizane (845–903), served as its archetype. The necessary religious advice for the project was provided by leading members of the yoshida shintō (or yuiitsu [unique] shintō), a school of Shinto that was developed and handed down within the Yoshida family and enjoyed recognition and high esteem at the imperial court. These same experts advised the court with regard to the divine title to be conferred upon Hideyoshi's spirit. His remains were soon moved to the newly built shrine, where he was installed as a deity with the title toyokuni daimyōjin, the divine name bestowed upon him by the emperor. However, the shrine, called Toyokuni, subsequently declined after the ultimate defeat of the Toyotomi family by the hands of Tokugawa Ieyasu, who had seized Hideyoshi's position as Japan's dominant warlord. It was not until the first year of the Meiji period (1868) that the shrine was restored as Toyokuni Jinja.

—Tobias Bauer

See also: Apotheosis; Shinto and Holy People; Tokugawa Ieyasu; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Berry, Mary E. 1982. Hideyoshi. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
 Boot, Willem Jan. 2000. "The Death of a Shogun: Deification in Early Modern Japan." Pp. 144–166 in Shinto in History: Ways of the Kami. Edited by John Breen and Mark Teeuwen. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
 Dening, Walter. 1955. The Life of Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 4th ed. Tokyo: Hokuseido.
 Elisseeff, Danielle. 1986. Hideyoshi: Bâtisseur du Japon moderne. Paris: Fayard.

Toyotomi Hideyoshi. 1975. 101 Letters of Hideyoshi: The Private Correspondence of Toyotomi Hideyoshi. Edited by Adriana Boscaro. Tokyo: Sophia University.

Trisong de Tsen

(742–797 C.E.)

Buddhist ruler

Trisong de Tsen (742–797) is considered by Tibetans to be the second religious king of Tibet, after Sengtsen Gampo (617–698) of the previous century. He is known both for asserting Tibet's secular power as well as for contributing to Tibet's spiritual development in the Buddhist tradition. In 755, he ascended the throne, and by 763 he had extended Tibetan military power to as far as Chang'an, the Tang dynasty Chinese capital.

Around 762, Trisong de Tsen began inviting hundreds of Indian scholars and yogis to Tibet, including Santariksa, the famous abbot of Nalanda University. Together with Santariksa, the king implemented plans for the first monastery in Tibet, later known as Samye. Legend has it that destructive influences from evil spirits and the king's wicked ministers hindered the monastery's construction, so Trisong de Tsen invited Padmasambhava, India's great tantric Buddhist master, to rid Tibet of its negative forces. Padmasambhava proved successful in dispelling the evil influences, and Samye monastery was finally founded in 779.

Under Trisong de Tsen's patronage, Indian scholars and 108 Tibetan translators translated many sutras and tantra texts from Sanskrit into Tibetan. After his death, Trisong de Tsen's successors continued to develop and broaden Buddhist doctrine in Tibet.

—Ingrid Pharris

See also: Padmasambhava; Rulers as Holy People; Sengtsen Gampo

References and further reading:

- Chan, Victor. 1994. Tibet Handbook. Chico, CA: Moon.
 Lopez, Donald S., Jr., ed. 1997. Religions of Tibet in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
 Thurman, Robert A. F. 1995. Essential Tibetan Buddhism. New York: HarperCollins.
 Tulku Thondup Rinpoche. 1987. Buddhist Civilization in Tibet. New York: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

Triumph

The triumph was the grand procession of a successful Roman general into the city of Rome, representing the apex of any Roman's public career. The closest equivalent in our own time to the ancient Roman triumph must surely be the ticker-tape parades given in various large cities for astronauts, victorious sports teams, and, of course, successful generals.

The triumphator, as the triumphing general of ancient Rome was called, would ride in an ornate chariot drawn by four horses on a special—indeed, ritualized—parade route, attended by his sons and freedmen, with notable captives and major items of booty in train. The soldiers of his army would follow the chariot, singing ribald verses about the triumphator; some of the verses sung about Julius Caesar have been preserved, and they are very salacious indeed, making specific remarks about his sexuality. The purpose of these verses was to avert invidia, “the evil eye (of jealousy).” The fact that we are unsure whether this jealousy was human or divine in nature gives us a valuable clue as to the exalted status of the triumphator. Akin to this was the notable appearance of the triumphator, who would be dressed in a purple toga wearing a wreath of laurel leaves on his head, with his face painted red in imitation of the statues of the gods, particularly that of Jupiter Capitolinus. As a living representation of the chief Roman god, the general embodied the majesty and dignity of the state and its religion, victorious over its enemies.

All of these details point to the extraordinary character of the triumph: In ordinary times, a general was disallowed from leading an army into the city (in fact, no military personnel on active duty were allowed within the city walls). Nor would any soldiers be free singly or in a group to insult their commanding officer. And, of course, no mortal might don a god’s guise without expecting divine retribution to follow. But on the day of his triumph, the triumphator was beyond the regulations normally imposed upon human beings. Small wonder, then, that as some sources record, a slave would stand by the triumphant general in his chariot whispering, “Look backward and remember that you are mortal.”

—Christopher McDonough

See also: Adventus; Heroes; Mediterranean Religions of Antiquity and Holy People; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bonfante Warren, Larissa. 1970. “Roman Triumphs and Etruscan Kings: The Changing Face of the Triumph.” Journal of Roman Studies 60: 49–66.
- Scullard, H. H. 1981. Roman Festivals and Ceremonies of the Roman Republic. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Versnel, Hendrik S. 1970. Triumphus: An Inquiry into the Origin, Development and Meaning of the Roman Triumph. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa (tsong kha pa blo bzang brag pa)

(1357–1419 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar

Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa, a renowned scholar, monk, and philosopher, was one of the most profoundly influential and innovative minds in the history of Tibetan Buddhism.

According to traditional biographies, Tsong kha pa, in a previous incarnation, was a young boy who offered Shakyamuni Buddha a crystal rosary and received a conch shell in return.

The Buddha then prophesied that the boy would be born in Tibet and that he would be instrumental in the spread of Buddhism in the “Land of Snows.” This prophecy would be fulfilled in 1357 when Tsong kha pa was born as the fourth child to an ordinary nomadic family in the Tibetan province of Amdo. Tsong kha pa would go on to become a prominent figure in Tibetan Buddhist scholarship, referred to in the later tradition as “the Second Buddha” (sang rgyas gnyis pa). An erudite and thoroughly trained scholar, Tsong kha pa was also an accomplished practitioner who blended together theory and practice, utilizing an emphasis on both monastic discipline and the techniques of tantric transformational technology. He is most widely known as the founder of the Ganden pa (dga’ ldan pa) school, which later evolved into the present-day Gelukpa (dge lugs pa) school. He is recognized for his innovative establishment of a definitive understanding of consequentialist middle way philosophy (dbu ma thal gyur ba) within Tibet, which integrated epistemological (tshad ma) traditions with the Madhyamaka (Middle Way) school of Mahayana Buddhist philosophy.

Tsong kha pa wrote more than 200 works in eighteen volumes. His definitive interpretation of Madhyamaka philosophy was presented within four major treatises: the Lam rim chen mo (Great stages on the path to enlightenment), the Dgongs pa rab gsal (Illumination of the thought), the Rigs pa’i rgya mtsho (Ocean of reasoning), and the Legs bshad snying po (Essential correct explanation of intentional and definitive meaning). His scholastic genius, which articulated subtle distinctions of consequentialist Middle Way philosophy, was only superseded by his acknowledgment as an embodiment of Manjushri, the buddha of wisdom himself. Tsong kha pa also performed “four great deeds” that shaped Tibetan Buddhist culture: refurbishing the Maitreya image at ‘Dzing ji (1395), teaching monastic discipline (vinaya) at Gnam-rtse-ldeng (1400), establishing the Great Prayer Festival in Lhasa (1409), and founding Dga’-ldan monastery (1410). He died in 1419.

—James B. Apple

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Gautama; Gods on Earth; Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen; Manjushri; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Cutler, Joshua W. C., ed. 2000–2003. The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path. 3 vols. Translated by the Lamrim Translation Committee. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion.
- Thurman, Robert A. F. 1991. The Central Philosophy of Tibet: A Study and Translation of Jey Tsong Khapa’s Essence of True Eloquence. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Tsung-mi

See Zongmi

Image of the Tibetan scholar Tsong kha pa from a temple in Tibet. (Art Directors)

Tukaram

(c. 1607–1649 C.E.)

Hindu poet

Tukaram was a Hindu poet who worshipped the deity Vithoba at Pandharpur, India, during the seventeenth century. He was the younger son of a poor family of the farmer caste. His father gained a considerable fortune in about 1607 upon Tukaram's birth, and this was considered to be a gift from the god Namadeva. The father wanted his eldest son to assume the family business, but this son wanted to renounce the world. Accepting his eldest son's wishes, the father entrusted the family business to Tukaram.

After his first wife became ill, Tukaram married the daughter of a wealthy banker and grew prosperous for a time. Adversity was to overshadow his family life, however. His mother and father died, and a short time later his brother's wife died; then, Tukaram's business ventures began to fail. He interpreted these events as testing from God. But as his personal sorrows increased, so did his love of God. Although he finally fell into abject poverty, he would not renounce God. During a severe famine, his elder wife starved to death, and a bit later his eldest son also died. His friends and relatives criticized him for spending too much time repeating the names of God, for being too absorbed with his religious life, and for not being more practical. Tukaram abandoned worldly life by retiring to a mountain, where he eventually had a vision of Krishna.

Tukaram practiced nonviolence, compassion, and austerities. He even invited deliberate suffering in order to be led to God. During the day, he spent his time in the jungle meditating; in the evenings, he sang and chanted. By chanting the praises of God (kirtana), Tukaram believed, it was possible for a person to encounter the divine presence. In Tukaram's vision, his deity gave him a sacred mantra (formula) that reportedly made the poet immortal because it had the power to destroy death. The vision freed him from worldly connections and ultimately drove him mad. Based on his religious experiences, Tukaram composed thousands of verses in abhang meter in which he expressed his ardent devotion to God. These poems also expressed the obliteration of caste distinctions and the equality of everyone before God.

—Carl Olson

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Death; Devotion; Hinduism and Holy People; Insanity; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Abbott, Justin E. 1980. Life of Tukaram. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.
 Ranade, R. D. 1983. Mysticism in India: The Poet-Saints of Maharashtra. Albany: State University of New York Press.
 Tukarama. 1981. The Poems of Tukarama. Translated by J. Nelson Fraser and K. B. Marthe. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.

Tukt'ong Kihwa

(1376–1433 C.E.)

Buddhist philosopher, apologist

Tukt'ong Kihwa was a leading Buddhist philosopher and apologist in the early Choson period (1392–1910) in Korea. He is known as one of the leading Buddhist thinkers in Korea because of his successful reformulation of Buddhism in Neo-Confucian terms and his ability to demonstrate the essential unity of Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism as forms for the attainment of sagehood.

Kihwa was born in 1376 the son of a Koryo provincial official and thus was trained in the Confucian classics at the National Academy in Seoul. According to the hagiographic biography that has been handed down, he was so proficient in Confucian studies that he earned the respect and admiration of his teachers and was even compared with Confucian sages. Sometime during his stay at the National Academy, he learned of the tragic death of a close friend and decided to become a Buddhist monk. He spent a couple of years wandering from monastery to monastery and eventually became a disciple of the Zen master and national teacher Muhak (1327–1405). Kihwa spent the rest of his days immersed in meditation, travel, and teaching and composing commentaries on Buddhist scriptures. His popularity as both a Confucian and Buddhist teacher grew, and King Sejong (r. 1418–1450) appointed him in 1427 as tutor to the royal family. After four years in the court, he retired once again to the mountain monasteries, where he taught and wrote until his death in 1433.

Kihwa lived at a time when Buddhism was under attack by Confucian polemicists in the court. They argued successfully before the throne of the early Choson kings that Buddhism, long the state religion of Korea, was false and evil, and should be suppressed for the sake of Confucian orthodoxy. In response to those arguments, Kihwa published two apologetic treatises, the Hyongjong non (Exposition on correct understanding) and the Yu-sok chirui ron (Exposition of questionable doubts in Confucianism and Buddhism). In both he defended the right of Buddhism to exist within the order of a Neo-Confucian state by demonstrating that Buddhism could not only aid in the development of the state by teaching people to be moral and restrained but could also show people how to become sages. Kihwa used his training in Neo-Confucian metaphysics and epistemology to show that the Confucian polemicists had either misunderstood Buddhism or misunderstood their own Confucian ideas. Though he was unable to prevent the disestablishment of Buddhism in the early Choson period, Kihwa's apologetic works did establish important philosophical links between all three traditions.

—John I. Goulde

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Confucianism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Goulde, John I. 1985. "Anti-Buddhist Polemic in 14th- and 15th-Century Korea: The Emergence of Confucian Exclusivism." Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University.
 Muller, A. Charles. 1999. "The Buddhist-Confucian Conflict in the Early Choson and Kihwa's Syncretic Response: The Hyon chong non." Review of Korean Studies 2: 183–200. Also available at http://www.human.toyogakuen-u.ac.jp/~acmuller/articles/hcn-aks.htm#_ftn5.

Tulsi

(1914–1997 C.E.)

Jain teacher, acharya

Tulsi, born in 1914, was the ninth acharya (spiritual teacher) of the Terapanthi subset of the Shvetambaras (Jains whose monks wear white robes). Acharya Tulsi was a Jain teacher from 1956 to 1994 and fostered a major revival of Terapanthi Jainism, including promotion of environmental and anti-nuclear causes, vegetarianism, animal rights, reform of Indian politics, and an active overseas missionary effort (a radical departure from traditional Jain practice). In 1949, he founded the Anuvrat Movement, which encourages people in all professions to take the lesser vows (anuvratas) of renunciation and restraint. The Anu-Vrata, "Atomic" (anu) "Vow" (vrata), was promoted as the solution to the Cold War threat of atomic annihilation. This antinuclear stance gave Terapanthi Jainism appeal to non-Jains and a modest international profile and following.

Acharya Tulsi and his chosen successor, Acharya Mahaprajna, are also well known in India and abroad for a style of Jain meditation known as Preksha Dhyana, "insight meditation." Terapanthis promote this method as a restoration of a lost Jain system of meditation, scripturally justified by a passage from the Acaranga Sutra advocating "knowing the Self by the Self," and scattered Jain scriptural references to meditation postures. Upon this basis, Acharya Tulsi and his followers have reconstructed Jain insight meditation, borrowing from Zen Buddhism, Hatha Yoga, and other sources. Preksha Dhyana is mandatory for Terapanthi monks and strongly encouraged for lay followers. It is becoming popular among Jain youth overseas, including American students, enhancing the influence of the Terapanthi sect abroad. However, some Jain scholars, for example, Nathmal Tatia, dispute the Terapanthi contention that Jain meditation was lost and had to be reconstructed, maintaining instead that detailed directions on how to meditate have always been freely available in the Jain scriptures.

Another innovation introduced by Acharya Tulsi is an order of monks and nuns with special dispensation to travel by means of mechanical transport in order to do missionary work abroad. These traveling monks are called samans; the nuns are called samanis, and they may accept food prepared especially for them instead of begging for it. These Terapanthi missionaries have made a modest number of converts and have continued their work since Tulsi's death in 1997.

—Jerome Bauer

See also: Contemporary Holy People; Jainism and Holy People; Meditation and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Dundas, Paul. 2002. The Jains, 2d ed. London: Routledge.
 Mahaprajna, Acharya. 1994. Preksa Dhyana: Theory and Practice. Ladnun, Rajasthan, India: Jain Vishva Bharati.
 Tatia, Nathmal. 1986. Jaina Meditation: Citta-Samadhi; Jaina-Yoga. Ladnun, Rajasthan, India: Jain Vishva Bharati.
 Tulsi, Acharya. 1994. Transmutation of Personality through Preksa Meditation. Ladnun, Rajasthan, India: Jain Vishva Bharati.

Tulsidas

(c. 1532–1623 C.E.)

Hindu reformer, poet

Tulsidas was one of the greatest reformers and poets in the Hindu tradition. His devotional poem Ramcaritmanas (Holy lake of the deeds of Rama) is the most popular and influential of the many narratives detailing the life of Rama (or Ram), the incarnation of the Hindu god Vishnu.

Tulsidas was most likely born around 1532. Although the date and place of his birth cannot be fixed with certainty, there are many legends about his youth. These stories agree that Tulsidas was abandoned as a baby and that his childhood was one of misery and deprivation. He was rescued from his loneliness and pain by a group of holy men, the Ramandis, who were devoted to Rama. He studied with them, and though he married and loved his wife, it is reputed to have been at her urging that he finally let go of earthly desires and concentrated his love and devotion on Rama. Tulsidas renounced the material world, including his family, and traveled to holy sites in northern India. He settled finally in the sacred city of Benares on the banks of the Ganges River and lived there until his death in 1623.

On a visit in around 1574 to Ayodhya, customarily acknowledged as the birthplace and capital of Rama, Tulsidas was inspired to begin his earliest and largest devotional poem, the Ramcaritmanas. It took several years to write, consisting finally of roughly 12,800 lines divided into 1,073 stanzas. The title suggests that, like bathing in holy water, the reading, reciting, or hearing of this text will purify the devotee. The poem was not written in Sanskrit, the traditional sacred language that had become inaccessible to most modern Hindus, but in the colloquial and popular dialect of Hindi. The Ramcaritmanas narrates the story of Rama, first told at least a thousand years before in the Sanskrit Valmiki Ramayana (Exploits of Rama). The Manas is not a translation of the older text, however, but a reformulation of devotional piety to Rama. The god is described as the Ultimate Reality in the universe, the Sacred who has infinite love (bhakti) for devotees, who in turn love him. Although Tulsidas wrote other poetry, it is the Ramcaritmanas that rendered the Absolute personal and accessible and brought this experience of the supreme Lord Rama to the masses. Quite soon after his death, Tulsidas himself became an object of reverence, and he is today described as a saint, a modern incarnation of Valmiki, and one who mastered his senses.

—Phyllis K. Herman

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Devotion; Hinduism and Holy People; Rama; Reform and Reaction; Reincarnation; Suffering and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Hawley, John Stratton, and Mark Jurgensmeyer. 1988. Songs of the Saints of India. New York: Oxford University Press.
 Hill, W. D. P., trans. 1952. The Holy Lake of the Acts of Rama. London: Oxford University Press.
 Lutgendorf, Philip. 1991. The Life of a Text: Performing the Ramcaritmanas of Tulsidas. Berkeley: University of California Press.
 Raghavan, V., ed. 1980. The Ramayana Tradition in Asia. New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi.

Tunolase

See Orimolade Tunolase, Moses

Turner, Nat

(c. 1800–1831 C.E.)

Christian ascetic, rebel

Nat Turner was born in Southampton County, Virginia, around the year 1800. No one knows the exact date of his birth because those types of records were not deemed important for those born slaves. Nat's mother did not want to see her son born into slavery so she tried to strangle him with his birth cord as he exited the womb. Turner survived, and from that moment until his death in 1831 superstitious plantation slaves felt Turner was marked by God for some special service.

Turner was a precocious child who was fond of living alone in the woods of his plantation and experimenting with gunpowder and fire. He was also very religious and early in life developed a reputation as a shaman and mystic. The reputation was well earned, for Turner grew up believing that God had specially chosen him to be the avenger of suffering black slaves and lived his life in devoted ascetics. Turner forswore the use of tobacco, alcohol, and money and sought through a life of prayer and fasting to direct himself to God's use. As he matured, Turner came to believe that God had chosen him to be the vessel to lead blacks from bondage. The Old Testament became the food from which he drew his encouragement as he began to see visions and hear voices directing his activities.

After Turner became convinced that he was God's chosen vessel, he began to foment his plans for insurrection. With these plans complete, Turner and the eight fellow slaves he enlisted to help with the rebellion waited for God's sign to begin their war for freedom. The sign came in February 1831 in the form of a solar eclipse. Nat Turner successfully executed his rebellion and sent a shock wave throughout the slaveholding south.

In October 1831, Nat Turner was captured and tried for leading a war against slavery. A month later, in a town called Jerusalem, he was hanged. Future generations of blacks would nickname Nat Turner "the Prophet," and historians would point to his insurrection as the beginning of the end for the institution of slavery in America.

—Rick Gray

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Prophets; Shamans

References and further reading:

Asante, Molefi K., and Mark T. Mattson. 1992. Historical and Cultural Atlas of African Americans. New York: Macmillian.

Bennett, Lerone. 1989. Before the Mayflower: A History of the Negro in America. Chicago: Johnson.

Quarles, Benjamin. 1987. The Negro in the Making of America. New York: Macmillian.

Tu-shun

See Dushun

Tusi, at- (Shaykh at-Ta'ifah)

(955–1067 C.E.)

Shi'i scholar, leader

Muhammad ibn al-Hasan at-Tusi, known as Shaykh at-Ta'ifah (Leader of the sect), was the outstanding Shi'i religious leader of the eleventh century. He was the first Shi'i scholar to move to Najaf, establishing it as a center of scholarship when Baghdad was no longer under Shi'ite control.

Shaykh at-Ta'ifah was born in Tus (now Mashhad) in northeastern Iran in 955 and moved to Baghdad in 1017 in order to study under Shaykh al-Mufid and 'Alam al-Hudá, the leading Shi'i scholars of the time. With the death of the latter in 1044, Shaykh at-Ta'ifa himself, with a circle of as many as 300 students, became the foremost Shi'i scholar. He lived in a period, however, when the fortunes of Shi'ism were changing. After a century during which Shi'i dynasties had controlled most of the Muslim world, Sunni powers were once again reasserting control. In 1055, the Sunni Seljuk Turks captured Baghdad, removing the Shi'i Buyid dynasty from power. In the following year, during Sunni-Shi'i riots in the city, Shaykh at-Ta'ifah's house was attacked and his valuable library burned. After this, he decided to move to Najaf and establish the center of Shi'i scholarship there. He taught the next generation of Shi'i scholars until his death in 1067. His shrine is still visited.

Shaykh at-Ta'ifah was a prodigious scholar, and his works in several fields continue to be used up to the present day. His work on biography, ar-Rijal (Biography), continues to be important as a source of information on those who transmitted the Shi'i traditions (hadith). His bibliography, al-Fihrist (Catalogue), lists a large number of Shi'i works, many of which are no longer extant. Al-Ghayba (The occultation) gives historians important information on beliefs about the occultation of the twelfth imam. And his two works at-Tahdhib (The correcting of judgments) and al-Istibsar (The examination) are among the four "canonical" collections of hadith. In the field of religious law, Shaykh at-Ta'ifah initiated important developments that allowed Shi'i clerics to undertake some of the roles previously allowed only the imam (who was now in occultation, and therefore these roles had lapsed). These roles included collecting and distributing the religious taxes and organizing the Friday prayers. So great was Shaykh at-Ta'ifah's influence that the century following his death is called a century of taqlid (imitation, that is, following his lead without question).

—Moojan Momen

See also: Islam and Holy People; Lawgivers as Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Momen, Moojan. 1985. An Introduction to Shi'i Islam: The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Tusi, Nasir al-Din at-

(1201–1274 C.E.)

Shi'i Muslim scholar

Abu Ja'far Muhammad ibn Muhammad, also known as Khwaja Nasir ad-Din and Muhaqqiq at-Tusi (the investigator or seeker after truth of Tus), was a gifted polymath scholar of the thirteenth century who is claimed by both the Twelver and Isma'ili Shi'is.

Khwaja Nasir ad-Din was born at Tus (now Mashhad) in northeastern Iran to a Twelver Shi'i family in 1201 and studied both Shi'i law and philosophy there. He left his home in about 1227, possibly because of the Mongol advance toward that area, and lived for some thirty years among the Isma'ilis, at first in eastern Iran and then at Alamut, the Isma'ili mountain stronghold in northern Iran. During this time, it appears that he became an Isma'ili; he composed a number of important writings, some of which bear an Isma'ili stamp. He is credited with developing the Isma'ili doctrine of satr (the concealment of true Isma'ili beliefs or of the imam in adverse times).

When the Isma'ili strongholds fell before the Mongol advance in 1256, Nasir ad-Din put himself at the disposal of Hulegu Khan, the Mongol leader, and was appointed court astrologer and astronomer. Because of his influential position, he was able to save many important manuscripts when the Mongols captured Baghdad in 1258. He then built an astronomical observatory in Maraghih. He died in Baghdad in 1274 and is buried near the Shi'i shrines in Kazimayn.

Nasir ad-Din wrote important works on astronomy, mathematics, medicine, geography, and history. He reworked Shi'i theology so as to incorporate philosophical concepts. His work on ethics, Akhlaq-i Nasiriyyih (The Nasiriyyan ethics), remains important up to the present time.

—Moojan Momen

See also: Islam and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Daftary, Farhad. 1990. The Isma'ilis: Their History and Doctrines. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Momen, Moojan. 1985. An Introduction to Shi'i Islam: The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Tutu, Desmond Mpilo

(1931 C.E.–)

Anglican archbishop, human rights activist

Desmond Tutu, born October 7, 1931, in Klerksdorp, South Africa, epitomizes repentance, forgiveness, and reconciliation as exemplified in the Christian scriptures. He is the voice of the voiceless, an Anglican priest who captures for many the true manifestation of God's love. With Nelson Mandela, he led the cause in the struggle for peace, justice, equality, and freedom from the oppression of apartheid in the 1970s and 1980s.

At the age of twelve, he met and was greatly influenced by an Anglican cleric, Father Trevor Huddleston, who was an outspoken critic of apartheid. Educated in Johannesburg, Tutu followed in his father's footsteps and became a teacher. He taught for four years until he decided, in 1958, to enter the ministry with the Anglican Church of the province of Southern Africa. After receiving his licentiate in theology in 1960, he was ordained in 1961. Tutu and his family lived in England between 1962 and 1966, where he worked as a curate while obtaining his bachelor's degree in divinity and a master's degree in theology.

Archbishop Desmond Tutu of Cape Town (seated), with South African President Nelson Mandela. (Art Directors)

Tutu was the first black to become the dean of St. Mary's Cathedral in Johannesburg, and three years later again the first black to become the general secretary of the South African Council of Churches. At a time when most anti-apartheid leaders were in prison, exiled, or banned, clergy members such as Tutu were prophetic voices speaking out against oppressive laws. Although in some circles he is seen as a political figure, he maintained his aggressive, forceful struggle for liberation against apartheid through his strong Christian convictions. In 1984, he received the Nobel Peace Prize for his courage and heroism and for his use of nonviolent methods in the struggle against apartheid.

In 1985, Tutu was elected bishop of Johannesburg, and in 1986 he became archbishop of Cape Town. In 1987, he was elected president of the All Africa Conference of Churches; in 1995, President Nelson Mandela named him chairperson of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission. On the commission, Tutu presided over the traumatic revelations to the world of the secrets of apartheid. Underlying Tutu's theological convictions is ubuntu, the concept of community wherein human dignity is defined in terms of the belief that people are created in the image of God. Tutu was a vocal opponent of apartheid because it denied this fundamental tenet of his faith.

—Samuel A. Paul

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Contemporary Holy People; Mandela, Nelson Rolihlahla; Politics and Holy People; Violence and Nonviolence

References and further reading:

- Battle, Michael. 1997. Reconciliation: The Ubuntu Theology of Desmond Tutu. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim.
- Meredith, Martin. 1999. Coming to Terms: South Africa's Search for Truth. New York: PublicAffairs.
- Meyer, Carolyn. 1986. Voices of South Africa: Growing Up in a Troubled Land. San Diego: CA: Gulliver.
- Thompson, Leonard. 1995. A History of South Africa. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Tutu, Desmond. 1982. Crying in the Wilderness: The Struggle for Justice in South Africa. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans.
- . 1999. No Future without Forgiveness. New York: Doubleday.

Tyagaraja

(1767–1847 C.E.)

Hindu composer, musician

Tyagaraja is the most honored saintly composer of southern India. He was born to a Telugu-speaking brahmin family living in Tamil Nadu in 1767. Telugu is called the Italian of the East; because of its vowel sounds it has a naturally flowing and musical quality. Inspired by devotion to Rama, Tyagaraja sang many songs in the classical style of the region (Karnatak music) and taught numerous students who perpetuated the tradition. Together with his contemporaries Muthuswami Dikshitar and Shyama Shastri, he is one of the “Trinity of South Indian Music.”

According to early accounts by his disciples, before his birth Tyagaraja's parents had a dream in which the deity Shiva, in the form of Tyagarajaswami of the temple in Tiruvarur, announced that a son would be born to them. This son would be an incarnation of Narada (the archetypal musician devotee of Lord Vishnu), they were told, and they should name him Tyagaraja. As it turned out, even as a baby Tyagaraja was fascinated by music and stopped nursing whenever he heard a melody.

In another dream, Tyagaraja's father, Rama Brahmam, was directed to go to Tiruvayaru, a village on the Kaveri River twenty miles from Tiruvarur. He told King Tulajaji II of the dream, and the king gave him a house and land in Tiruvayaru. The child Tyagaraja studied in the king's Sanskrit school, learned religious practices from his father, and daydreamed of Lord Rama while playing with playmates. True to his name, which means “king of renunciation,” he showed indifference and generosity regarding his belongings. He survived a famine that gripped the Tanjavur region when Haidar Ali invaded and farmers fled, and it is said that when he was ill, a wandering holy man restored his health.

Tyagaraja's father, who recited and discoursed on the Ramayana epic in the Tanjavur court, taught the boy to perform worship of Rama daily at home. Tyagaraja began composing songs for those daily devotions while still a youth. A wandering renunciant named Ramakrishnanandaswami initiated Tyagaraja with a Rama mantra and a chant invoking Narada. Tyagaraja's youthful songs showed promise, and his father took him to a famous Tanjavur court musician, Sonti Venkararaman, who taught the boy music. To explore deeper mysteries of music, Tyagaraja also developed devotion to Narada and studied his maternal grandfather's texts on music. Legends say Tyagaraja studied a rare treatise by Narada, “Ocean of Musical Notes,” on the mystical power of harmonious sounds.

After repeating the Rama mantra 10 million times, Tyagaraja reportedly glimpsed a vision of Rama and burst into song. In time, his teacher asked him to sing some of his own songs for the leading court musicians, praised him as a greater musician than himself, and gave him a gold medal and chain that he had been awarded in court, which Tyagaraja later returned to him. It is said that after twenty years, when Tyagaraja had said the mantra 960 million times, he was inspired by seeing Rama again. Tyagaraja composed many great songs and grew famous. King Sarabhoji sought to honor him, inviting him to court, but Tyagaraja declined to perform.

When Tyagaraja was twenty years old, his father died and the family home was partitioned between him and his brother, Japesha. Tyagaraja immersed himself in devotion and music. At eighteen, Tyagaraja had been married to a woman named Parvati. When she died five years later, he married his deceased wife's sister, and they had a daughter. Tyagaraja composed many songs known as kritis, including the Pancharatna kirtanas (Five gems), masterpieces that are often sung together by groups. More than 700 of his songs were published, and many are still popular among the musicians of southern India. He composed the Nauka Charitram (Boat performances) and the Prahlada Bhakti Vijaya (Devotion of Prahlada), poetic narratives in Telugu verse forms interspersed with songs. Some of his lyrics celebrate the power of music as a means of spiritual liberation. He taught many disciples his songs; they taught others, passing down Tyagaraja's original compositions.

According to one story about Tyagaraja, a wealthy man in Madras (now Chennai) wished for Tyagaraja to visit Madras and perform his music, but he could not persuade him to do so. He asked Upanishad Brahman, the saintly scholar and composer who headed the Kanchipuram monastery, to convince Tyagaraja to make the journey. Upanishad Brahman wrote as an old friend of Tyagaraja's father, and as a lover of devotional music, suggesting to Tyagaraja that he make a pilgrimage to the hill shrine at Tirupati and stop in Kanchipuram en route. In bhakti (devotional) tradition, singer-saints compose songs at temples visited on a pilgrimage, and Tyagaraja was no exception.

Nearing the end of his life, Tyagaraja formally became a renunciant, the last stage in the classical Hindu life-cycle. As the end neared, Tyagaraja asked pupils to sing his songs. He made offerings to brahmins and the poor, and in 1847, as bhajans (religious songs) were sung "in the presence of a great sound," he died, or as is said by Hindus, he entered divine formless consciousness (brahman). His gravesite memorial (samadhi) near the banks of the Kaveri is now a shrine. At annual festivals, accomplished musicians and beginners perform in his honor. His great musical contributions earned him the title "Beethoven of South India," and his lifelong devotion has been celebrated by numerous storytellers and musician-preachers (bhagavatars) dramatizing his songs and life.

—William J. Jackson

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Devotion; Dikshitar, Muthuswami; Hinduism and Holy People; Shastri, Shyama

References and further reading:

Jackson, William J. 2002. Tyagaraja—Life and Lyrics, 4th ed. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Raghavan, V. 1979. The Great Integrators: The Saint Singers of India. Delhi: Publications Division, Government of India.

Raghavan, V., and C. Ramanujachari. 1966. The Spiritual Heritage. Madras, India: Sri Ramakrishna Math.

Sambamoorthy, P. 1978. Great Composers. Vols. 1 and 2. Madras, India: Indian Music Publishing House.

Tzaddiq

Tzaddiq (pl. tzaddiqim) is a Hebrew term meaning "righteous one" or "saint." In the Jewish scriptures, the term originally denoted the sort of highly moral individual who might be called a "good person" in English; thus Noah was chosen to survive the flood because he was a tzaddiq (Genesis 6:9; 7:1) who took no part in the violence that had engulfed the world. The term had no specific denotation and could be used relatively; in the course of King Saul's murderous rivalry with his son-in-law David, for example, Saul said that David had been more tzaddiq than he, meaning only that in their quarrel David had behaved better and was more morally right (1 Sam. 24:18–19).

As time went on, the term became more abstract. The prophet Ezekiel distinguished between a tzaddiq and a rasha', or "bad person" (Ezek. 18). Proverbs 10:25 declares that the tzaddiq is the foundation of the world, but a more pessimistic passage, Ecclesiastes 7:16, warns that trying too hard to be tzaddiq can lead to unfortunate consequences, and 7:20 flatly denies that a real tzaddiq, that is, one who never sins, can even exist. This has come quite far from the term's original meaning.

Rabbinic Judaism used the term in all its biblical meanings but also to designate the special powers and rewards that accrue to persons of uncommon virtue. In the heavenly realms, the place of tzaddiqim will be closer to the divine presence than that of the angels (Jerusalem Talmud [JT], Shabbat 6:9 8d; see also Babylonian Talmud [BT], Ta'anit 31a, Sanhedrin 93a). It is the righteous who will eventually revive the dead (BT, Pesachim 68a). The prayers of a tzaddiq are always heard (BT, Yoma 29a), and the decree of a tzaddiq is always fulfilled (BT, Sotah 12a, Ta'anit 23a). The tzaddiq can transform or even overcome the will of God (BT, Sukkah 14a; JT, Ta'anit 3:10 67a), and in the future tzaddiqim will be called "holy" just as God is called holy (BT, Bava Batra 75b).

Rabbinic legend, building on Proverbs 10:25, developed the idea that the whole world exists only on the merit of a certain limited number of tzaddiqim; because such persons were exceedingly humble, it was taken for granted that no one knew who they were. Early texts mention different quantities of such saints, but eventually thirty-six became the commonly accepted number (BT, Sanhedrin 97b; forty at BT, Hullin 92a). The number thirty-six can be represented by the Hebrew letters lamed and vav, and many medieval legends grew up around the miraculous exploits of unheralded lamedvavniks.

Among the Eastern European Hasidim of the late eighteenth century, the figure of the tzaddiq was magnified to an unprecedented degree. Hasidic communities would grow under the leadership of a charismatic tzaddiq or rebbe said to be endowed with all sorts of miraculous powers and arcane wisdom. In this final stage of its development, the concept tzaddiq came to denote a spiritual giant above the ordinary human level, a virtual god (or perhaps even God) on earth.

—Robert Goldenberg

See also: Attributes of Holy People; Hasidism; Judaism and Holy People; Lamedvavniks; Sages; Spiritual Guardians

References and further reading:

“Lamed Vav Zaddikim.” 1971. In Encyclopaedia Judaica, 10: 1367–1368. Jerusalem: Encyclopedia Judaica.

Rothkoff, Aaron. 1971. “Zaddik.” Encyclopaedia Judaica, 16: 910–911. Jerusalem: Encyclopedia Judaica.

Urbach, Ephraim E. 1975. The Sages. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

U

Uich'on

(1055–1101 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar, sect founder

Uich'on, an eminent Buddhist monk of the Koryo period (918–1392) in Korea, was known as the National Teacher of Great Awakening (Taegak kuksa). He was also a bibliographer of Buddhist works and the founder of the Ch'ontae (Chin.: Tiantai) school of Buddhism in Korea.

Born in 1055, Uich'on was the fourth son of King Munjong (r. 1046–1083). He entered the monastery at age eleven, took first place in the monk examinations at age fifteen, and then five years later went to China to study with the masters of the various sects. While in China he was drawn to teachings of the Tiantai school as the one school that combined both meditation practice and a thorough grounding in scriptural study. When he returned to Korea, he attempted to bring about an end to the economic and doctrinal conflicts between the various meditative and text schools by establishing a new sect that would combine both the study of doctrine and the practice of meditation. With the backing and support of his father and three older brothers, he was able to gather many of the brightest minds from the Nine Mountain Son schools and the Huayen school into his new Ch'ontae order. His early death in 1101 put an end to his attempt to unify Korean Buddhism, however, and the Ch'ontae school became just another school among others. The reaction of the Son schools was to form a new unified Son school from their numbers and to call themselves the Chogye school. The doctrinal schools also banded together to form a new Doctrine school.

Uich'on's second major contribution to Korean Buddhism was his creation of a supplementary extension of and catalog to the first Koryo canon. After returning from China, he became the director of the library at Hungwangsa and gathered books from Sung, Liao, and Japan. He published a catalog of these works in 1090, then had them republished and disseminated. This extension contained the writings of East Asian Buddhists, and its inclusion in the canon marked an elevation of East Asian Buddhist writing to the level of sacred scripture. Of note is the fact that Uich'on did not include in his extension any writings by the practitioners of Son Buddhism. This omission was due to the status of Son Buddhism in Korea, which, until its reformation by Chinul (1158–1210), was considered useless and nonproductive, as well as Uich'on's own predilection for Ch'ontae Buddhism, which he had helped to establish as a separate sect in Korea.

—John I. Gould

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Chinul; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Grayson, James H. 2002. Korea—A Religious History, rev. ed. London: Routledge Curzon.

Lee, Peter H., ed. 1993. Sourcebook of Korean Civilization. Vol. 1. New York: Columbia University Press.

Uisang

(625–702 C.E.)

Buddhist school founder

Uisang was an eminent Buddhist monk of the Unified Silla period (668–918) and founder of the Huayen school of Buddhism in Korea. The Koryo historiographer Iryon reported in Samguk Yusa (Legends and history of the three kingdoms of ancient Korea) that Uisang was considered an emanation of the Buddha. The Sung Kao-seng Chuan (Lives of the great monks) relates how he was able to bring about the religious awakening of a young Chinese girl who had tried to seduce him soon after his arrival in China. This same girl transformed herself into a dragon spirit to protect him throughout his life.

Uisang was born into the Kim clan in 625 and was almost certainly related to the royal family of Unified Silla. After studying at Hwangbok Temple, he attempted to travel to China in the company of the Buddhist monk Wonhyo, but they were turned back by the border guards of Silla's enemy, the Koguryo Kingdom. Later, Uisang was later able to travel to China in the entourage of the Chinese ambassador. He settled at Chungnanshan near the Tang capital of Chang-an, where he studied under the Chinese monk and Huayen patriarch Chih Yen (602–668). He also studied alongside and held a life-long friendship with Chih Yen's most famous disciple and successor, the Serindian monk Fazang (643–712). After a twenty-year stay in China (650–670), Uisang returned to Silla to preach the teachings of the Huayen Sutra. There, he established ten temples dedicated to the Huayen lineage.

Uisang insisted on the exclusive use of the Huayen Sutra as the supreme doctrine of the Buddha and the path of salvation. He and his sect were accorded preeminence by the aristocrats of Unified Silla, who may have been drawn to Huayen's totalism and sense of harmony as well as the Huayen validation of the mundane world as a manifestation of the highest truth. His influence on all later developments in Korean Buddhism is clear; even the modern Korean Son Buddhism of the Chogye order is based on the Huayen philosophical tradition that Uisang introduced. His most famous and the only extant work he left behind is Hwaeom ilseung peopkye to (The diagram of the Dharmadhatu according to the One Vehicle of Huayen), which is a mandala and auto-commentary on Huayen doctrines of harmony, nontemporality, and co-origination of all phenomena. Because of his influence in both Silla and China, he was accorded the title of patriarch of Huayen in the Eastern Nation (Korea).

—John I. Goulde

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Fazang; Gods on Earth; Scholars as Holy People; Spiritual Guardians; Wonhyo

References and further reading:

Brock, Karen L. 1990. "Chinese Maiden, Silla Monk: Zennmyo and Her Thirteenth-Century Japanese Audience." Pp. 185–218 in Flowering in the Shadows: Women in the History of Chinese and Japanese Painting. Edited by Marsha Widener. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

Grayson, James H. 2002. Korea: A Religious History, rev. ed. London: Routledge Curzon.

Iryon. 1972. Samguk Yusa: Legends and History of the Three Kingdoms of Ancient Korea. Translated by Ha Tae-Hung and Grafton Mintz. Seoul: Yonsei University Press.

Lee, Peter H., ed. 1993. Sourcebook of Korean Civilization. Vol. 1. New York: Columbia University Press.

Ulrich of Augsburg

(890–973 C.E.)

Christian bishop, reformer

Ulrich, bishop of Augsburg in southern Germany, church reformer, model cleric, friend of kings, and protector of the poor, was the first saint formally canonized by the medieval Christian church. Born to noble parents in Swabia (southwestern Germany) in 890 and educated at the monastery of St. Gall (now in Switzerland), he became a priest, and in 923 he became bishop of Augsburg with the approval of King Henry I of Germany (r. 919–936). Renowned for leading Augsburg's successful resistance against the invading Magyars (Hungarians) in 955, Ulrich gained the favor and friendship of King Otto I (r. 936–973).

An activist for higher standards in the church, he preached often, strengthened Augsburg's cathedral school, made regular visitations of the clergy, and held two clerical convocations (synods) in his diocese each year. He also revived monastic life in his diocese, rebuilding monasteries destroyed by the Magyars, enforcing strict observance of monastic constitutions, and founding a religious house for women. He financed the rebuilding of run-down churches, including his own cathedral, and encouraged rich nobles to build new ones. Although an accomplished administrator, Ulrich was especially admired for his personal piety and holy lifestyle, which included frequent prayer, spiritual reading, and celebration of the mass. He visited Rome four times, cared for the poor and needy throughout his life, established a hospital for the indigent in Augsburg, and supported the rights of the weak against the powerful.

When he died on July 4, 973, Ulrich was already regarded as a saint by the common people. His grave in the church of the monastery of St. Afra immediately became a much-visited pilgrimage site, and in 993 Pope John XV proclaimed Ulrich a saint in the first formal canonization process of the Western Christian church. In the eleventh century, the monastery of St. Afra was renamed the monastery of Sts. Ulrich and Afra. Throughout the Middle Ages and into the modern period, Ulrich retained his popularity with the common people, who regarded him as the spiritual patron of wine makers, fishermen, and travelers, and an intercessor against fever, plagues of mice, and dog bites. He was also invoked against bad weather and dangers associated with water, and people with eye diseases visited numerous springs associated with his name. He is the patron saint of the city and diocese of Augsburg. In medieval images, he is often depicted holding a fish.

—Steven Sargent

See also: Afra of Augsburg; Canonization; Christianity and Holy People; Politics and Holy People; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

Butler, Alban. 1956. "Ulrich." In Butler's Lives of the Saints, 3: 16–17. 4 vols. Edited and revised by Herbert Thurston and Donald Attwater. New York: P. J. Kennedy.

Krause, A. 2003. "Ulric of Augsburg." In The New Catholic Encyclopedia, 2d ed., 14: 282. Detroit: Gale.

Upagupta

(c. 3rd cent. B.C.E.–1st cent. C.E.)

Buddhist monk, protector

Upagupta, a Buddhist monk, preached and taught Buddhist meditative practices in northern India. In Southeast Asia, he is associated with various local guardian deities and invoked primarily as a protective figure. He is also the guardian of dharma (Buddhist doctrine) and patron saint of those who follow the way of meditation. Some northern Buddhist texts refer to him as the converter and spiritual adviser of Ashoka, who is said to have remarked that in seeing Upagupta he was seeing the Buddha himself. Some texts describe Upagupta as a “Buddha without marks,” and others credit him with the compilation of the Sarvastivadin Vinaya (Monastic discipline).

According to the Divyavadana (Heavenly legend), Upagupta was born in the house of a perfume merchant of Mathura 100 years after the death of the Buddha. After meeting the early patriarch Shanakavasin, he began to take an interest in meditation and attained the first of four paths of liberation. As a layman, he had an important encounter with Vasavadatta, a famous citizen of Mathura. She had conceived a strong desire for union with him, but Upagupta resisted meeting her. Eventually, her limbs were cut off in punishment for some crime and she was left to die. By taking care of her, Upagupta not only won her for the faith but also became a nonreturner (anagamin), that is, one who would soon achieve nirvana and not have to be reborn again.

After being ordained by Shanakavasin, Upagupta became an arahant (enlightened person) and demonstrated the depth of his realization by converting the demon Mara. He then asked Mara to manifest the physical form of the Blessed One through his magical powers of transformation. Mara agreed but warned Upagupta that he should not bow down before the apparition, as it would not be the Buddha himself but only a likeness. However, when Mara produced a vision of the physical form of the Buddha, Upagupta bowed before it and justified his action by saying that it was same as paying homage to a statue of the Buddha. After confirming his disciple Dhitika in the transmission he had received, he attained nirvana and a stupa, or shrine, was raised over his remains.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Ashoka; Buddhism and Holy People; Mara; Meditation and Holy People; Spiritual Guardians

References and further reading:

- Duroiselle, M. C. 1904. “Upagutta et Mara.” Bulletin de l’Ecole Francaise d’Extreme-Orient 4: 414–428.
- Ray, Reginald A. 1994. Buddhist Saints in India: A Study in Buddhist Values and Orientations. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Strong, John S. 1992. The Legend and Cult of Upagupta. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Waddell, L. A. 1897. “Upagutta, the Fourth Buddhist Patriarch and High Priest of Ashoka.” Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal 66: 76–84.

Upaka

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Disciple of the Buddha

Upaka, a member of the heterodox Ajivaka sect, is also called Kala (the black one), perhaps because of his dark complexion. He was born during the time of Siddhartha Gautama during approximately the fifth century B.C.E. in a village called Nala in India located near the famous bodhi tree where Gautama first attained enlightenment. His first meeting with the Shakyamuni Buddha took place near the bodhi tree while the latter was on his way to Rishipatana to deliver his first discourse. Upaka asked the Shakyamuni about his accomplishment, and the Buddha told him about his enlightenment. Upaka then asked if Gautama was the ananta-jina (incomparable conqueror). When the Buddha replied in the positive, Upaka shook his head, saying, “So it be, friend,” and went his way. The commentary of the Digha Nikaya (Long discourses) points out that Shakyamuni had walked all the way from the bodhi tree to Rishipatana just to meet Upaka, though otherwise, as per the custom of the buddhas, he could have flown through the air.

After this meeting, Upaka fell madly in love with Capa, the daughter of a hunter. He fasted for a week. Finally the hunter consented to give Capa’s hand to him. Thereafter, Upaka lived by selling meat brought by the huntsman. After his wife bore him a son, she began to constantly mock Upaka. In the end, Upaka got so exasperated by her teasing that he decided to leave his home and go to meet the Buddha at Shravasti. Upon hearing his story, the Buddha admitted him to the order.

As a result of his meditation, Upaka became an anagamin (nonreturner), that is, someone who would attain nirvana and not have to go through another lifetime on earth. He was said to be reborn in the Aviha heaven. According to the commentary Majjhima (Middle-length discourses), Upaka then became an arahant (enlightened one). The Samyutta Nikaya (Connected discourses) also records a visit paid by Upaka to the Buddha in Aviha. Shakyamuni’s conversation with Upaka is not regarded as a real dharma (doctrinal) discourse as it took place before the wheel of the dharma was formally set in motion at Rishipatana. Thus, as pointed out in the commentary called the Udana (Solemn utterances), it only produced a vasana-bhagiya (impressionable) result.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Disciples; Gautama

References and further reading:

- Malalasekera, G. P. 1983 [1935]. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names. Vol. 1. New Delhi: Oriental Reprint.
- Nanamoli, Bhikkhu, and Bhikkhu Bodhi, trans. 1995. The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha. Boston: Wisdom.
- Norman, K. R., trans. 1969. Elders’ Verses II. London: Pali Text Society.

Walsh, M., trans. 1987. Thus Have I Heard: The Long Discourses of the Buddha. London: Wisdom.

Upali

(c. 5th–4th cent. B.C.E.)

Disciple of the Buddha

Upali, an eminent disciple of the Buddha, was born into a low-caste family during the time of the Shakyamuni Buddha in approximately the fifth century B.C.E. As a young man, he took up employment as a barber with the Shakyamuni princes and joined the samgha (monastic community) along with them. The Buddha ordained Upali before he ordained the princes in order to humble the latter. Many incidents related in the Buddhist texts portray him as a special friend of the monks, whom he was always willing to help. It is said that Upali had a special affinity for the forest and thus requested permission from the Buddha to dwell there. The Buddha turned down his request on the grounds that if Upali went into the forest, he would learn only meditation, whereas by remaining among humankind he could learn both meditation and the dharma (Buddhist doctrine). Upali took the Buddha's advice and by practicing insight was able to win arahantship (enlightenment). Three verses in the Theragatha, and another in the Milindapanha, are ascribed to Upali.

According to Pali sources, Upali learned the vinaya (monastic discipline) from the Buddha himself, who rated him among the foremost vinaya masters (vinayadharas). The "Upali-Panchaka" chapter of the Parivarapatha contains a list of Upali's questions on matters pertaining to the vinaya as well as the Buddha's answers. Even during the Buddha's lifetime, monks considered it a great privilege to learn the vinaya under Upali. After the Buddha's death, Upali became the vinayapramukkha (guardian of the vinaya). He performed this duty for thirty years until his death at the age of seventy-six. It was in his capacity as a vinaya master that Kassapa entrusted him with compiling the Vinaya Pitaka (Basket of monastic discipline) at the First Buddhist Council.

Because of his meritorious deeds in previous births, Upali was said to be born in heaven for 30,000 cosmic eons—1,000 times as devaraja (king of the gods) and another 1,000 times as a chakravartin (just king). He was succeeded by his disciple Dasaka as the vinayapramukkha.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Disciples; Gautama; Hermits; Kassapa; Status

References and further reading:

Hare, E. M., and F. L. Woodward, trans. 1955–1970. The Book of the Gradual Sayings. 5 vols. London: Pali Text Society.
 Horner, I. B., trans. 1938–1966. The Book of the Discipline. 6 vols. London: Pali Text Society.

Law, B. C. 1958. "The Chronicle of the Island of Ceylon or the Dipavamsa." Ceylon Historical Journal 7: 1–266.

Rockhill, W. W. 1884. The Life of the Buddha and the Early History of His Order. London: Trubner.

Upatissa

See Shariputra

Ursula

(4th cent. C.E.?)

Christian legendary martyr

In the most popular version of Ursula's story, she was the daughter of a Christian British king, possibly during the fourth century. Scheduled to marry a non-Christian prince against her wishes, Ursula was granted a three-year postponement of the wedding so she could go on a pilgrimage to Rome. She took ten companions with her, and each companion took 1,000 handmaidens. She is thus traditionally associated with approximately 11,000 virgins. The group took eleven ships and sailed first to Cologne, then down the Rhine to Basel. From Basel they crossed the Alps to Rome. When they returned to Cologne after visiting Rome, Ursula and her companions were martyred. Early versions name Romans as their killers; later legends blame the Huns. Ursula's story is included in Jacobus de Voragine's thirteenth-century Legenda Aurea (Golden Legend).

The vast number of maidens who accompanied Ursula is probably a result of a misreading of an earlier text or an error in copying. The earliest account of Ursula's story mentions only ten companions, which is much more plausible. The story as it is now began to be told in the eighth or ninth century and was very popular during the Middle Ages. However, that is not to say that the legend is entirely fictional. There is a church dedicated to St. Ursula in Cologne, and a marker there indicates that a church was originally built there in the fourth century, by a man named Clementius, to mark the site where a group of maidens was martyred, possibly during the anti-Christian campaigns of Diocletian. In the 1100s, a mass grave was discovered outside the walls of Cologne, and it was identified as dating to Roman times. The bodies were quickly identified as Ursula and her companions.

Ursula is usually represented holding an arrow, which perhaps is a confusion of Ursula with Urschel, a Germanic moon goddess who also sailed up the Rhine. Ursula's other emblems are a ship or a clock, and she is sometimes depicted with maidens under her mantle as well. The patron of young women, teachers, and drapers, she is also called upon in issues involving chastity, marriage, and plague. Her feast day is October 21. Universal observation of her feast no longer takes place; Ursula's cult was reduced to local status in 1969. The Ursulines, a religious order founded in the sixteenth century by Angela Merici for the education of young girls, took their name from Ursula.

The martyrdom of Ursula and her ten thousand virgins, German, early sixteenth century. (Gianni Dagli Orti/Corbis)

—Kelly A. O'Connor-Salomon

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Merici, Angela

References and further reading:

Kauffmann, C. M. 1964. The Legend of Saint Ursula. London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Sheingorn, Pamela, and Marcelle Thiébaux, trans. 1996. The Passion of Saint Ursula and the Sermon on the Birthday of Saint Ursula. Toronto: Peregrina.

Uthman dan Fodio (Shehu)

(1754–1817 C.E.)

Muslim sufi, scholar

Shehu Uthman dan Fodio, a Sunni Muslim of the Qadiriyya sufi order, was a Fulani scholar whose ancestors settled in the region now known as northwestern Nigeria during the fifteenth century. He was the leader of the Sokoto jihad in 1804 and 1808. After his death in 1817, the jihad continued under the leadership of his son and his brother. His surname, Fodio, means “learned” in Fulfulde. Thus, Uthman is dan, or “son of,” the learned; the title “shehu” also indicates someone who is learned. Indeed, there were many scholars in his family, including women as well as men.

The Shehu was born in 1754. His mother, Hauwa, and maternal grandmother, Rukayya, were his earliest teachers, drawing on a canon of Islamic writings for study and teaching. After a long period of study, the Shehu married and established a household that aimed to follow the pious practices (sunna) of the prophet Muhammad. The Shehu is said to be responsible for miracles, some of which are comparable to those performed by the prophet Muhammad. As a Qadiriyya sufi, he devoted himself to ascetic practices and spiritual concerns. Everyone in the family was expected to make something useful; the Shehu made rope, understanding that productivity was a necessary part of spiritual obligation.

The Shehu preached the tenets of Islam and taught sufi precepts of right living, with careful attention to equitable treatment of all, regardless of origin or gender. He fostered the pursuit of knowledge, understanding that learning is the path to God. His son, Muhammad Bello, once said that his father's scholarship "dazzled men's minds." The Shehu's personal library numbered hundreds of volumes, among them many of his own works, which he had begun writing as early as the age of twelve. In thirty years of preaching, the Shehu advocated courtesy, patience, generosity, the pursuit of knowledge, and adherence to the practices of the sunna.

Traveling widely, the Shehu gained a large following. This provoked the Hausa king of Gobir to attack him, starting the jihad. The Shehu's aim in waging jihad was to secure for his community the right to preach, study, and practice Islam freely. Eventually, the jihad was successful, and all traditional, nominally Muslim kings in the region were replaced with Fulani Muslims, who became known as "emirs." The society subsequently shifted to cultural focus on Islam.

The Shehu strove to imitate the life of the prophet Muhammad and felt that there were many parallels between them, as he wrote in his works. He was recognized as a saint during his lifetime, and his influence changed the nature of Hausa/Fulani society, instilling adherence to Sunni Islamic practices. He died in the room of his wife Hauwa in Sokoto and was buried there. His tomb remains a place of pilgrimage.

—Beverly B. Mack

See also: Islam and Holy People; Miracles; Models; Muhammad; Reform and Reaction; Scholars as Holy People; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

Boyd, Jean, and Shehu Shagari. 2003. The Life and Legacy of Shehu Uthman dan Fodiyo. Oxford: Macmillan.

Hiskett, Mervyn. 1973. The Sword of Truth. New York: Oxford University Press.

Last, Murray. 1977. The Sokoto Caliphate. London: Longman.

V

Vacchagotta

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Disciple of the Buddha

Vacchagotta, a contemporary of the Shakyamuni Buddha during approximately the fifth century B.C.E., belonged to a rich brahmin family of the Vaccha clan. He became very learned but failed to find what he sought in brahminical texts and traditions and became a wanderer (parivrajaka). He later became a disciple of the Buddha. Vacchagotta is the subject of a complete section in the ancient Samyutta Nikaya (Connected discourses), and several of his discussions with the Buddha appear in the scriptures named after him, the Vaccha, Vacchagotta, Mahavacchagotta, Tevijja Vacchagotta, and Aggi Vacchagotta sutras, which focus on whether the world is eternal, the existence of the Buddha after death, and the nature of life. His discussions with senior monks such as Ananda and Moggallana on similar subjects are also recorded in the Pali texts.

The details of his conversion are given in the Majjhima Nikaya (Middle-length discourses). According to this account, Vacchagotta so enjoyed listening to the Buddha's discourse that he instantly declared him his teacher. He was then ordained, but just two weeks later he returned to tell the Buddha that he had learned all that could be attained by someone who was not an arahant (enlightened). He asked the Buddha for a further exposition of the dharma (Buddhist doctrine), and the Buddha advised him to go further with his studies to acquire the sixfold abhijna (supernormal knowledge). Vacchagotta profited by the lesson and soon became an arahant. When some monks took his message of attainment to the Buddha, the Buddha is said to have remarked that the gods had already told him the news.

One of Vacchagotta's verses of ecstasy is included in the Theragatha. In the time of Vipassi Buddha, he was a householder of Bandhumati. During this birth, when Vipassi Buddha was invited to the king's palace, he swept and decorated the street along which the buddha passed. As a reward for this, Vacchagotta was later born as a king by the name of Sudhaja.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Ananda; Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Disciples; Gautama; Moggallana; Reincarnation

References and further reading:

Lilley, M. E., ed. 1925–1927. The Apadana. 2 vols. London: Pali Text Society.

Malalasekera, G. P. 1983 [1935]. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names. Vol. 1. New Delhi: Oriental.

Nanamoli, Bhikkhu, and Bhikkhu Bodhi, trans. 1995. The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha. Boston: Wisdom.

Rhys Davids, C. A. F., et al., trans. 1950–1956. The Book of the Kindred Sayings. 5 vols. London: Pali Text Society.

Vairocana

Buddhist deity

Vairocana (lit., “illuminator”), the buddha of light and radiance, is the cosmic embodiment of the Buddha's body of truth (dharmakaya) and a symbol of ultimate reality. His name is also a word for the sun in Sanskrit and Pali, which points to his origin as a solar deity. He is related to Virocana, a deity mentioned in Vedic literature in connection with the sun, moon, and fire. Although he appears in pre-Mahayana texts as a minor deity, Vairocana is best known as the main buddha of the Avatamsaka Sutra, also known as the Flower Garland Scripture, a monumental text that exerted great influence on the history of East Asian Buddhism and was adopted as key scripture by the Huayan school.

In the scripture Vairocana epitomizes the essence of buddhahood that is identical in the infinite buddhas of all times and places. He is also a personification of the realm of reality (dharmadhatu) that encompasses the whole universe and permeates all phenomena. In that sense, the whole universe can be seen as Vairocana's limitless body. Because in Buddhism ultimate reality is inconceivable and cannot be expressed through the medium of language, throughout the whole scripture Vairocana remains silent and communicates his teachings by emitting various kinds of light.

Vairocana came to play an important role in the esoteric (or tantric) traditions of Buddhism, where he is known as Mahavairocana (great illuminator). The main tantric text associated with him is the Mahavairocana Sutra, which in its Chinese translation became the principal scripture of the esoteric schools of East Asian Buddhism (Chin.: Mijiao or Zhenyan; Jap.: Mikkyo or Shingon) and was also a basic text of two classes of tantra in Tibetan Buddhism. In esoteric Buddhism, the absolute reality symbolized by Mahavairocana is realized by ritual practice, which includes physical postures and gestures (mudra), mystical spells (mantras), and meditative absorptions (samadhis). As a key buddha in the Mahayana pantheon, Vairocana became a focal point of cultic practice and a frequent subject of works of art. Some of his most impressive artistic representations are the giant statues at Yungang (fifth century) and Longmen (completed 675) in China and Todai-ji in Japan (consecrated 752). He is also a central motif in various mandalas (pictorial representations of reality) occupying a central place in the iconography and ritual practice of esoteric Buddhism.

—Mario Poceski

See also: Buddha; Buddhism and Holy People; Gods on Earth

References and further reading:

Cleary, Thomas. 1983. Entry into the Inconceivable: An Introduction to Huayan Buddhism. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

———, trans. 1984–1987. The Flower Ornament Scripture. 3 vols. Boston: Shambhala.

Kiyota, Minoru. 1978. Shingon Buddhism: Theory and Practice. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International.

Vairotsana

(8th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar

Vairotsana, Tibet's greatest translator, was one of the first seven Tibetan monks to be ordained by Indian master Santaraksita at Samye, the first Tibetan monastery, where he received his name, which means "radiance." He was one of the first teachers of Dzogchen (Great Perfection) in eighth-century Tibet and the translator of many important volumes. To this day, his work is the standard of excellence among Tibetan translations of Indian Buddhist scripture. Many events recounted in his biography, The Great Image, are the stuff of legend. Regardless, the biography is a classic of Tibetan literature and a very important source for understanding the early period of Tibet's Buddhist culture.

Vairotsana was discovered by King Trisong de Tsen at the age of eight and sent to Samye to study language. Already a brilliant scholar at fifteen, Vairotsana was sent to India with other translators to obtain the Dzogchen teachings. There, he studied with twenty-five masters, especially Shri Singha, for forty-two years. Once he attained ultimate enlightenment, he returned to Tibet, where he was received with great honor. At Samye, he taught King Trisong Deutsen and translated scripture. Some ministers—hostile adherents of the indigenous Bön religion—pressured for Vairotsana's removal. The king sequestered Vairotsana and continued to consult with him, however. Eventually Queen Margyen, angry because the celibate monk refused to sleep with her, betrayed Vairotsana to the ministers, and he was exiled to the empire's hinterlands.

At Vairotsana's urging, King Trisong de Tsen invited the Indian master Vimalamitra to teach and translate Dzogchen. Hearing of this, Vairotsana sent his disciple Yudra Nyingpo to debate with Vimalamitra. During their debate, Vairotsana's excellence became evident in the person of his disciple, and those who had once conspired against him were compelled to welcome Vairotsana back. On his return journey, Vairotsana met Pang Mipham, a frail old man who became his disciple and, soon thereafter, a celebrated master of Dzogchen.

After a sentimental reunion with King Trisong and Queen Margyen's sons, Vairotsana rejoined the royal translation group. After many years of engaging in translation, teaching, and solitary meditation, Vairotsana is said to have dissolved into rainbow light, leaving no mortal remains.

—Ani Jinpa Palmo and John Whitney Pettit

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Death; Martyrdom and Persecution; Santaraksita; Scholars as Holy People; Trisong de Tsen

References and further reading:

Dudjom Rinpoche et al. 2002. The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism: Its Fundamentals and History. Boston: Wisdom.

G, yu sgra snying po et al. 1995. Bai ro'i rnam thar 'dra 'bag chen mo (Great likeness of Vairo). Ch'eng-tu, China: Si khron Mi rigs Dpe skrun Khang.

Jinpa Palmo, trans. 2003. The Great Image: The Life Of Vairotsana. Boston: Shambhala.

Karmay, Samten. 1988. "The Legend of Vairochana." In The Great Perfection (rdzogs chen): A Philosophical and Meditative Teaching in Tibetan Buddhism. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Vaishnava Sahajiyas

Hindu sect

The Hindu Vaishnava Sahajiya sect is found mainly in Bengal and northeastern India. Vaishnavas are devoted to the Hindu deity Vishnu; the term sahaja means "easy or natural tendencies and instincts." The Sahajiyas thus seek to actualize devotion to Vishnu, in his incarnation as Krishna, the "Dark Lord," by focusing especially on human feelings of sexual love, longing, and ecstatic union. The beliefs and practices of the Sahajiyas are a blend of Hindu, Buddhist, and possibly Muslim concepts, but the sect was particularly influenced by tantrism, a heterodox mystical movement that emerged and spread throughout India from about the sixth century C.E. Many aspects of the tantric tradition were not sanctioned in the Hindu orthodox texts, and the Sahajiyas were and are a secretive group. Their texts are written in code, and reliable information about them is, by definition, limited.

The basic text of the Sahajiyas is the Bhagavata Purana (ninth or tenth century), which describes in detail the birth, childhood, adolescence, and adulthood of Krishna, the ninth incarnation of Vishnu. One of the most influential episodes in the Purana is the Rasalila, "Dance of Passion." Krishna, having grown into a young, handsome man in the countryside of Brindavan, plays his flute along a riverbank. Gopis, female cowherders, hear his song and are irresistibly attracted to his presence. With love and longing for Krishna, they leave their duties and families to join him. After experiencing union with Krishna, though, the Gopis feel pride and Krishna disappears. The women suffer unbearable longing and sorrow, and he returns to them, once again engaging in the Dance of Passion. Although none of the Gopis is named in the Purana, a later poet essentially collapses the many into one, naming her Radha (prosperity).

The Purana illustrates the ideal of bhakti, or devotion toward the divine, as characterized by feelings of love and longing, ecstatic union, and painful separation. The Sahajiyas see the love affair as one that can be experienced between human beings. They believe that all dualities, especially those of the genders, are false, and that through special practices, believers can bring about the union of opposites. The man in a relationship embodies the masculine divine force (Krishna), and the woman, the female divine force (Radha). The Sahajiyas thus emphasize the literal practice of sexual intercourse between the two as a means of attaining the realization of the sacred. Furthermore, the ideal of love in union/separation is found in parakiya (belonging to another)—that is, the woman involved in the relationship must be married to another man, just as the Gopis were when they went to Krishna. The sexual act must not be the ordinary, profane act of procreation. Rather, the man must not ejaculate, and there is a great deal of preparation and control necessary. The point of Sahajiya religious experience is the transformation of human bodies into spiritual ones.

The texts of this sect, dating from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, are extremely esoteric, describing meditation, ritual, and devotional techniques essential to bringing about this reconstitution of the human body into the divine.

—Phyllis K. Herman

See also: Devotion; Gopis/The Gopis; Hinduism and Holy People; Krishna; Sexuality and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bose, Manindra Mohan. 1986 [1930]. The Post-Caitanya Sahajiya Cult of Bengal. Reprint, Calcutta: University of Calcutta.
- Dimock, Edward C., Jr. 1981. The Place of the Hidden Moon: Erotic Mysticism in the Vaishnava-Sahajiya Cult of Bengal. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hayes, Glen A. 1995. "The Vaishnava Sahajiya Traditions of Medieval Bengal." In Religions of India in Practice. Edited by Donald S. Lopez, Jr. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Kennedy, Melville T. 1993 [1925]. The Chaitanya Movement: A Study of Vaishnavism in Bengal. Reprint, New Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal.
- Singer, Milton. 1981 [1966]. Krishna: Myths, Rites, and Attitudes. Reprint, Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Valentine

(3rd cent. C.E.?)

Christian bishop, martyr

There are at least nineteen saints with the name Valentine, and several of their received biographies and cults share a number of common elements. Ultimately, however, two of them vie for identification as "the" Saint Valentine celebrated on February 14: one of them of Rome, the other of the central Italian city of Terni. Scholars have generally agreed that the Roman Valentine was in fact the donor of a basilica outside Rome, and not its holy dedicatee. The Valentine identified with Terni is a martyr of the second or third century; from about the sixth century onward, he is described as being a local bishop. The earliest martyrology that describes this saint declares he went to Rome in order to heal a crippled boy, whereupon he was arrested by a prefect who demanded he worship idols; upon refusing, Valentine was decapitated. His body was taken first to a tomb near Terni and in the early seventeenth century was translated into the local cathedral. Many other places (including Glasgow and Dublin) claim to possess his relics.

Over the years, legends have grown from these basic details. Of them, the ones that are most often repeated relate that Valentine took particular pastoral care of young people, and especially of lovers. The association of the theme of love and the feast day of February 14 may well be due to the pre-Christian festival of Lupercalia held on that day; it is assumed by many that Christians sought to replace this old cult with one that was identifiably Christian, resulting in a feast with obvious ties to the celebration of love. Such an association between love and the feast of Valentine may also be found in the folkloric belief, in medieval France and England, that birds begin their annual mating on February 14. It is no surprise, then, that the earliest supposed "Valentines" should date from this time and region.

—George Ferzoco

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

- Amore, A. 1966. "San Valentino di Roma o di Terni?" Antonianum 41: 260–277.
- Kelly, Henry Ansgar. 1986. Chaucer and the Cult of Saint Valentine. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- Schoepflin, Maurizio. 2000. San Valentino di Terni: Storia, tradizione, devozione. Rome: OCD.
- Wilkins, Nigel, ed. 1972. Two Miracles: La nonne qui laissa son abbaie. Saint Valentin. Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press.

Vamaksepa

(1837–1911 C.E.)

Hindu devotee

Vamaksepa (also called Vamakhepa or Bamdeb) was a famous shakta (goddess-worshipping) saint of west Bengal in the town of Tarapith. A worshipper of the goddess Tara Ma, he was believed by his disciples to have achieved perfect insight (or siddhi). He was also a “mad saint” who violated the traditional Hindu rules of behavior and worship because of his great love and passion for the goddess.

Vamaksepa was born in the village of Atla in 1837 of brahmin parents, who named him Vamacharana Chatterji. His family was very religious. Neighbors called his sister a madwoman because of her religious intensity, and as a child Vamaksepa would scream and cry before a Kali statue. His nickname Vamaksepa means “mad Vama.” Vama’s father was a professional singer, and the child would sing with him and fall into ecstatic states. Sometimes his father would go into states of ecstatic love as well. His wife would beg him to pay attention to the world so they would not starve. They were too poor to send the child to school.

Vama took his sacred thread initiation, the rite of passage to adulthood, when he was sixteen years old and had a difficult time finding work. He came to spend more and more time in Tarapith, with its great shrine to the goddess Tara near grounds where cremations were performed, and started having visions of the goddess there. He began to sing and dance among the skulls and bones from the cremated bodies and experienced visions of ghosts and spirits. His actions eventually became more bizarre and upsetting to his neighbors. He stole their statues of the gods and set fire to the village rice storehouse. In the flames, he saw the goddess Tara dancing, shouted to her, danced with her, and jumped into the fire. He did not, however, die in this incident.

Vama was subject to mood changes, sometimes showing intense love and sometimes hatred and anger. He would cry and wail to the goddess and later curse her, calling her a prostitute and a demon. He violated brahminical purity rules by eating with dogs and by eating the sacred food offered to the goddess during ritual worship. Indeed, he would throw food at her instead of ritually offering it; once he threw his own urine at her statue, saying, “This is the holy water of the Ganges River.” Rumors abounded about him. It is said that he refused to bathe, that he drank alcohol, and that he ate flesh from human corpses. These are practices of certain types of rituals known as vamacharis, those who reverse the rules of what is pure and impure in order to go beyond the traditional rules of culture and society into liberation.

Vamaksepa spent much of his life in trance states. He was popularly believed to be capable of miracles such as curing illness, stopping epidemics and natural disasters, and engendering devotion to the goddess in nonbelievers. He could see Tara when others could not and called himself her favorite son.

Vamaksepa died in 1911, and Tarapith became a pilgrimage site for people who wished to contemplate his great devotion to the goddess. Its cremation ground became a popular place for meditation, and Vamaksepa is still invoked in meditation as a spiritual guide by many practicing Bengali shaktas.

—June McDaniel

See also: Hinduism and Holy People; Insanity; Morality and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Purity and Pollution

References and further reading:

- Banerjee, S. K. 1972. Sri Bama Ksepa. Calcutta: Sri Byomkesh Bysack.
- McDaniel, June. 1989. The Madness of the Saints: Ecstatic Religion in Bengal. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Vasubandhu

(4th–5th cents. C.E.)

Buddhist scholar, school founder

Mahayana Buddhist tradition gives Vasubandhu, along with his brother Asanga, credit for founding the influential Yogacara school of philosophy in the fourth and fifth centuries. According to Buddhist legend, Vasubandhu came from a location named “land of the hero” in northern India, where he was born into a brahmin family. Two of his brothers were also named Vasubandhu (heavenly kin). All the brothers became Buddhist monks. Asanga converted his brother to Mahayana Buddhism after Vasubandhu gained fame as a philosopher, a winner of debates, and a builder of monasteries. Vasubandhu composed treatises expounding the Yogacara position until his death at age eighty.

The Yogacara school, also called Vijñānavāda (literally, “holders of the doctrine of consciousness”), deals with the practice of yoga and argues that the two root problems of life are ignorance and craving. Followers believe that the human mind is the source of all objectifications. Not only is the root problem of ignorance located within consciousness, however, but the solution, enlightenment, finds its locus in consciousness. Vasubandhu, in fact, argued that the world is produced by consciousness only. Thus the only reality is consciousness, because the objects of the world are nothing more than products of one's consciousness. Consciousness does not see anything as an object except the perceiving consciousness itself—thus there is an identity of consciousness and object. When consciousness sees a thing as it truly is in fact, it is consciousness seeing itself as it really is. This, Vasubandhu said, is the enlightened way to see.

—Carl Olson

See also: Asanga; Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Vasubandhu. 1984. Seven Works of Vasubandhu. Translated by Steven Anacker. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.

———. 1999. The Thirty Verses on Consciousness Only and The Treatise in Twenty Verses on Consciousness Only. In Three Texts on Consciousness Only. Translated by Francis H. Cook. Berkeley: Numata Center for Buddhist Translation and Research.

Vedanta Deshika

(1268–1370 C.E.)

Hindu philosopher, poet, devotee

Vedanta Deshika, known as a great philosopher, poet, and exemplary devotee of Vishnu, was born in 1268 in Kanchipuram, one of the seven sacred cities of India, southwest of Madras. He learned the texts of Hindu religious life easily while still a youth and went on to write philosophical, poetic, and devotional masterpieces, carrying on the Vaishnava tradition of the great teacher Ramanuja (1017–1137).

Deshika's parents were elderly. His father was a retired pandit regarded locally as a sage. Lord Venkateshvara appeared to this pious brahmin in a dream, legend has it, and told him to come to Tirupati, promising that if he and his wife worshipped him there, they would be blessed with a son. Reaching Tirupati, the old couple worshipped Venkateshvara. When they went to sleep, the mother dreamed that the Lord came to her as a boy and gave her a huge bell, saying, "I will be your son. Swallow this bell," and in her dream she did. The couple awoke to a commotion. Temple priests were announcing to pilgrims, "The temple bell is gone!" and servants suspected of stealing it were being punished. The mother told the priests her dream, and the archaka was inspired to interpret the meaning, telling the mother of Lord Venkateshvara's intention to bless the son with far-reaching powers of communication. He would be an inspired saint of eloquent wisdom.

The couple went back to Kanchipuram. After twelve years, their son was born on the tenth day of the festival of the Lord of the Seven Hills. They named him Venkatanath, in honor of this deity, but he would also be known as "incarnation of the bell." Others considered him an aspect of Ramanuja (an earlier Vaishnava teacher) incarnate; still others thought of him as Lord Venkatesha himself embodied to teach devoted people. Even in his boyhood, Venkatanath showed signs of his destiny to be a great teacher. The boy easily mastered lessons useful to one who would become a spiritual leader, studying the Vedas, Upanishads, Itihasas, Shastras, and esoteric wisdom known only to initiates. Before the age of twenty, he had mastered many disciplines. Even elders who encountered him accepted him as a guide because he was so full of spiritual intelligence. During this time, one of his fellow pupils was Vidyananya, another brilliant brahmin destined to do important things.

Venkatanath went to Cuddalore to repeat his Garuda mantra, and his worship culminated in a vision of Garuda, the falcon vehicle of Vishnu and the embodiment of the Vedas, who initiated the youth into practice of the mantra of Hayagriva (Vishnu as half horse and half man). Venkatanath performed his spiritual exercises, praying, meditating, repeating his mantra, and worshipping at the site where Ramanuja had been initiated. On Herb Cure Hill overlooking the Garuda River and Devanayaka temple he prayed, concentrating intently on Hayagriva. Hayagriva is the deity of wisdom, lord of language and knowledge. It is said that in a luminous milk-white vision Hayagriva revealed himself in all his glory to Venkatanath, granting him wisdom.

The inspired youth uttered a hymn, Hayagrivastotra, a composition said to integrate intellectual clarity and bhakti feelings. Hayagriva blessed the youth with the ability and grace necessary to strengthen Ramanuja's Vaishnava teachings. With such knowledge, Venkatanath would be honorifically named Vedanta Deshika, "Teacher of Vedanta." Deshika went to Tirupati; worshipping Venkateshvara (the deity enshrined there), he was inspired to compose a dayashatakam, a series of verses on Vishnu's grace. In due course, Vedanta Deshika married a virtuous woman of good family and lived an exemplary life.

Vedanta Deshika composed many Vaishnava hymns, poems, plays, and commentaries and summaries of earlier Vaishnava works. He was honored as a great philosopher and poet. He lived in Shri Rangam much of his life, spiritually ministering to devotees. With his wide-ranging knowledge, Vedanta Deshika was master of both northern and southern traditions of Vaishnavism.

—William J. Jackson

See also: Devotion; Gods on Earth; Hinduism and Holy People; Ramanuja; Reincarnation; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Hopkins, Steven P. 1995. "Singing the Body of God: The Hymns of Vedanta-desika in their South Indian Tradition." Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University.

Singh, Satyavrata. 1958. Vedanta Desika: His Life, Works, and Philosophy: A Study. Varanasi: India Chowkhamba Sanskrit Series Office.

Vemana

(16th cent. C.E.)

Hindu ascetic, poet

Vemana, an ascetic yogi and wandering social critic who wrote verses still popular today, lived in the sixteenth century. Lines from his hundreds of poems became proverbial among Telugu-speaking people because he expressed trenchant criticism and wary wisdom in memorably incisive, colloquial language. The poetry he left is more important than the legends about his life, which contain colorful folklore and themes about passionate love and desire for gold, and renunciation of the world and constant wandering, but not much historically verifiable information.

The traditional picture of Vemana shows a naked man sitting on the ground, surrounded by the ultimate debris of life—skulls and bones—under a tree in a jungle. There Vemana sits alone, contemplating existence. It is the archetypal image of a disillusioned, solitary yogi. Sometimes the same figure is seated on a deerskin under a tree with a bowl of fruit before him, and a stream flowing nearby. In either case, he is the timeless thinker gazing into eternity, saying what he observes, not caring if some dislike his message. He nevertheless became a wandering “people’s poet.”

Some say Vemana was born in 1562 in Moogachintapalle, in Chittoor district, southeastern Andhra Pradesh, probably into a Reddi family of agriculturalists and merchants. It is thought that his mother died when he was quite young. When his father married again, Vemana’s stepmother mistreated him. In these tales, Vemana became infatuated with a devadasi (woman of the temple dancer community) when he heard her singing. She was also attracted to him. The devadasi’s mother told him that unless he could bring her jewelry, he would no longer be welcome at her house. Vemana went home, feeling pained. His sister-in-law, noticing he was not eating, asked him why. “The woman I’m in love with has asked me to bring jewels like yours. I don’t know what to do,” he replied. His sister-in-law laughed at his problem and gave him some of her jewelry. When he gave the jewels to his ladylove, she greedily grabbed them. Vemana compared this with his sister-in-law’s sweet generosity. Her virtue was so much more meaningful than this ugly avarice that he felt like a fool.

In other stories, Vemana worked as a supervisor in a goldsmith’s shop and learned a mantra from a goldsmith’s guru. In any case, Vemana grew disillusioned with dreams of love and wealth and began discerning deeper truths. He became indifferent to conventional householder life, wandered the roads as a mendicant, and shed his belongings and social relationships, even his clothes. While on the road he used his energetic mind to compose pithy teachings in verse. Some who encountered him thought him mad, but he was a yogi concerned with spiritual matters instead of material things.

In Vemana’s verses, one hears an eloquent, confident voice insisting on deeper spiritual values. A typical verse of Vemana notes that in creation everything is equal. No one is worth more or less than anyone else, and claims of superiority in religion have no meaning. There is no point in saying that devotees of one god are better than another; in the end, after all, Shiva devotees die and are buried, and Vishnu devotees are cremated. Ordinary people prized Vemana’s frank observations and repeat them to this day.

—William J. Jackson

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Awakening and Conversion; Guidance; Hinduism and Holy People; Wealth and Poverty

References and further reading:

- Gnanananda, G. 1982. Vemana. Bangalore, India: Bharata-Bharati Pustaka Sampada.
- Rao, T. Rajagopala. 1984. A Historical Sketch of Telugu Literature. New Delhi: Asian Educational Services.
- “Vemana, Book One.” Http://www.vema.freehosting.net (cited June 1, 2002).

Veneration of Holy People

The holy people of the world are commemorated in many ways. Living saints receive gifts and prayers, most notably in Hinduism. This is not particularly surprising: Great figures of any age have attracted admiration and even veneration. More surprising is that many holy people of the world continue to be venerated centuries and even millennia after their death. Prayers are addressed to them, millions of people each year visit a saint’s tomb, their anniversaries are celebrated, and people keep images of honored people in their homes or read biographies of saints; the ways to honor a holy person are endless. In different religious traditions, people honor those believed to be (or to have been) particularly close to the divine for a variety of reasons. In Hinduism, the veneration of a holy person is a way to venerate God. Similarly, in many religions veneration of a holy man or woman is considered a method of focusing the mind on religious truths. Honoring a great religious figure may also be thought of as a way to win divine favor. Even in religions such as Judaism, which discourages the veneration of any human being, popular religious practices include visits to saints’ tombs—and requests for the saint’s help in dealing with the myriad problems of human existence. The veneration of holy people is based on the premise that people in such alignment with the divine are liminal figures: They are open doors, helpers who can mediate in some way between humans and the divine. Whether this mediation takes the form of intercession for miracles or the religion emphasizes instead that holy people are simply role models and teachers, the appeal of these figures remains based on the fact that at some level they are pipelines to the divine.

Some religions (or subsections of religions) have used the bodies or other relics of a holy person as a focal point for veneration. This phenomenon appears in Islam, Shinto, Jainism, Judaism, ancient Greco-Roman religion, and even Hinduism (although bodies of dead Hindu saints are cremated and the ashes normally poured into a sacred river). Medieval Christianity made a convenient distinction between first-class relics (the actual body of a saint), second-class relics (an object handled by a saint, such as an item of clothing), and third-class relics (an object that has touched a first- or second-class relic). Islam also acknowledges and reveres second-class relics of some holy people, such as the sword of the prophet Muhammad (570–632). Christianity and Buddhism went further than other religions in the matter of relics, however, dividing the bodies of holy people, sometimes into almost microscopic parts, in the belief that every particle had special merit and could be a focal point for worship. Christianity can further be distinguished as unique because of the practice of moving relics from place to place; in other religions, devotees must go to the remains of saints for worship.

Many religions encourage veneration of holy people because of precise, tangible benefits that people believe they will receive: Pray to a saint, and the saint will help. In Islam and Christianity, it has been a common practice to seek burial near the tomb of a saint to benefit from his or her eventual bodily ascent to heaven. Thus the legend of Ethiopia's national saint, Takla Haymanot (d. 1313), tells that those buried near Takla will rise to heaven with him; many pilgrims bring the bones of their relatives to bury in the valley that contains Takla's tomb. More broadly, people of faith have often believed that a visit to a saint's remains can bring blessing to the devout pilgrim, a belief that continues in Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism today, as well as in Islam. A visit to the shrine of the modern Senegalese sufi Ibrahim Niasse (1902–1975) has become as meritorious as a journey to Mecca for his followers (just as a visit to Takla Haymanot's tomb is considered equivalent to visiting the Holy Sepulcher for Ethiopian Christians), winning them special blessings. In the late Middle Ages in Western Europe, believers were told that they could earn relief from purgatory for making visits to saints' tombs or by possessing their relics; Albrecht of Brandenburg (1490–1545) had a relic collection that could win a whopping 39 million years of remission.

More commonly, however, believers around the world have turned to holy people for relief from suffering in this life, whether they visit physical remains or just pray in their homes. The only notable exception is the Jains, who worship their tirthankaras but believe that these great “ford-makers” of the religion are totally disengaged from the world and will not intervene in human life. Most common is the holy person's ability to cure illness. Other saints deal with a variety of intractable human problems, very commonly the issue of human fertility. For example, the tomb of Rachel, one of the holiest shrines of Judaism, attracts many pilgrims—Muslims and Christians as well as Jews. Since Rachel died in childbirth, many women by logical association still visit her tomb to pray for a large family or safe delivery.

Legend tells that when the historic Buddha died, an argument arose over who would have the honor of retaining his remains. This conflict grew into what is sometimes called the War of the Relics. It was only settled when the great Indian emperor Ashoka in the third century B.C.E. divided the relics of the Buddha into 84,000 shares and had 84,000 special structures, called stupas, built all over India to contain them. Although a certain amount of pious exaggeration seems to be at work here, the story reflects three basic Buddhist beliefs about the relics of holy people: (1) They have special power, (2) even a little bit is as effective as the whole, and (3) a cult of relics developed at an early stage of Buddhist history. Early followers of the Buddha, such as Ananda, also had their cremated ashes divided and enshrined, and stupas came to house the remains of many saintly people—or sometimes just religious images, considered nearly as efficacious. The very form of early stupas—and their cousins, the pagodas—suggests veneration: Consisting of a base and an egg-shaped dome that contains the relics, they are surmounted by a spire with three rings, and the whole structure is surrounded with railings to mark off holy space. The stupa is a liminal region, containing both earth and heaven, with the relics providing a channel between the two. It has been pointed out that pagodas lay out the whole cosmos in symbolic form. The relics, especially of the Buddha himself, remain very important in Buddhism, and folk belief holds that venerating them brings protection from misfortune; veneration most commonly takes the form of circumambulation. Sri Lanka has one of the most famous of these relics, a tooth of the Buddha. Kublai Khan demanded it of the Sri Lankans in the thirteenth century, but they sent a false tooth and hid the true one—as happened again under British rule in the nineteenth century. The prime minister of Sri Lanka still holds one of three keys to the enclosure in which the relic is kept; it is, among its other functions, a symbol of political legitimacy.

The Buddha and other Buddhist holy people are venerated in other ways, as well. Sri Lanka has several “second-class” relics of the Buddha, including a depression in rock believed to be the Buddha's footprint and a tree grown from a cutting of the original bodhi tree, under which Gautama received enlightenment (a cutting of the Sri Lankan tree now grows at the site of enlightenment and draws many pilgrims). The sites of the Buddha's birth, first sermon, and death are also popular pilgrimage locales. Further removed from the physical, the lands of Theravada Buddhism celebrate an annual “Buddha’s Day” (Vishakha Puja) that falls on the full moon in the month of Vishakha (April/May). This festival commemorates the great events of the historic Buddha’s life. Zen Buddhists also have a collective commemoration of the Buddha’s enlightenment, including a great group meditation that lasts for several days. Zen monasteries celebrate the anniversary of the death of Bodhidharma (d. c. 530 C.E.?), the first Chan/Zen patriarch in China. Other holy people receive similar anniversary celebration.

Many of the same elements of venerating holy people are also present in Christianity (although rejected by the Protestant communions, with the partial exception of Anglicanism): use of relics but also a belief that commemoration in the absence of relics is efficacious; a sense of connection with the cosmic order (in Christianity defined as “God”) effected by the saint; and a belief that saints can help in misfortune. In Christianity, however, the belief that a saint upon death enters the presence of God and is thus in a position to intercede for divine favor turned reliance on saints into a central feature of the religion. Excepting Protestants, most Christians since at least the third century have believed that a saint can intercede to win miracles. There is no clear differentiation between popular and elite belief. The only difference lies in the distinction sometimes lost in popular practice between the veneration of saints and the adoration properly given to God alone; in popular belief, saints have often been perceived as powerful figures able to work miracles, while official theology teaches that their only power is intercession with God in hope of a miracle. Christians have honored saints by making pilgrimage to their tombs, by saying prayers invoking them, and by keeping images of popular saints in their homes and churches. Presently, by far the most popular of the saints is the Virgin Mary, regarded as worthy of special veneration as the mother of Jesus.

The quest for relics in Christianity has been a search for something tangible, a way to honor a saint and therefore win his or her approbation as well as simply providing comfort. Relics were needed to consecrate altars, and they were longed for by people of all ranks. This, of course, led to abuse, invention, and wishful thinking. Relics were and are valuable: At the end of the tenth century, Christians obtained the body of Adalbert of Prague from the Prussians who had killed him by paying its weight in gold—a small price to win the relics of a martyr in that age. But bits of bone and other substances are very anonymous until someone gives them a name, and many have preyed on the credulity of believers, selling them fakes. The sixteenth-century humanist Desiderius Erasmus said that there were enough relics of the True Cross (on which Jesus was crucified) to build a ship; by the fourth century armed deacons stood at either side of the relic in Jerusalem to make sure that pilgrims kissing the Cross did not bite off pieces. Legends tell how relics were miraculously conveyed to deserving places (perhaps the most spectacular is a flying house, the house of the Virgin Mary at Loreto in Italy), duplicated to prevent quarrels, or discovered thanks to dreams and visions. More prosaically, relic theft became common. A famous case comes from the ninth century, when Venetian merchants absconded with the relics of the evangelist Mark and bore them home in triumph. Protestant reformers delighted in exposing evidence of holy fraud, just as modern skeptics enjoy mocking miraculous apparitions of the Virgin Mary.

The veneration of saints, very often at their tombs, is also widely popular in Islam even though conservative Muslims denounce the practice. Unlike Christianity, there is a stark division between popular Islam, both Sunni and Shi’a (which venerates saints), and Sunni theology (which makes an absolute distinction between God and God’s creation). Muhammad’s tomb in Medina is an important pilgrimage site. However, the practice of visiting the tombs of holy people only became common with the rise of sufism from the ninth century, and charismatic sufi leaders are believed to have a special relationship with God comparable to that of Christian saints. Massive pilgrimages take place each year on the anniversary of a holy sufi’s death. It is typical to make small offerings at these sites; for example, the women who oversee Fatima of Ourika’s (c. 1000/1200) tomb place couscous at the head and foot of her grave daily. Vigils are also common, and visiting many shrines is believed to remove sin from the pilgrim.

Shi’a Islam gives a particularly central role to veneration of its early martyrs, ‘Ali b. Abi Talib (600–661) and Husayn b. ‘Ali (626–680). Najaf and Karbala in Iraq, where their tombs are found, are holy cities. So many Shi’a Muslims want to be buried near these holy men (who have a reputation for securing paradise for those who do so) that many families bring their dead to the shrine and carry the coffin around the tomb of one of these saints before burial nearby. The anniversaries of their martyrdoms are celebrated with massive public festivals that include public mourning and reenactment of their seventh-century deaths.

Muslims also honor holy people away from their tombs. Special veneration is given to Muhammad—whose name is always invoked with the phrase “peace be upon him”—because of his unique role as the last and greatest of the prophets. Public celebration of Muhammad’s birthday has led over the centuries to creation of a large body of songs and poetry for performance at the festival of Mawlid al-Nabi, celebrated on the twelfth day of the month of Rabi al-Awwal. Although figural art is forbidden in Islam, stories and writings of many holy men and women circulate widely, helping to focus devotion on these figures.

Judaism avoids the veneration of mortals, reserving worship for God alone. At least that is the official attitude toward saints. The reality is much fuzzier. Especially from the twelfth century on, perhaps thanks to Christian and Muslim influence, popular pilgrimage became an occasional (largely regionally determined) feature of Judaism. The rise of pilgrimage to the shrines of holy people can be seen in the history of the cave of Machpelah, the burial place of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in Hebron. There was apparently some early veneration of the tombs of these patriarchs; the first-century historian Josephus tells that there were fine marble tombs there, which certainly did not date back to the time the patriarchs lived and died. A church built over the site was later converted to a mosque. But only centuries later, in 1267, were Jews forbidden by Muslim authorities to pray there: Apparently enough pilgrims had been coming to constitute a nuisance. Since the Six-Day War, the cave has again become a popular Jewish pilgrimage site. Other tombs of great Jewish holy people also receive veneration. The pious still visit the grave of Gershom ben Judah (c. 960–c. 1030) in Mainz, and Hasidic pilgrims are drawn annually to the tomb of the Ba'al Shem Tov (1698/1700–1760). Thousands each year visit the supposed tomb of the second-century sage Simeon ben Yohai, especially on the anniversary of his death. There they spend the night in a vigil and also give three-year-old boys their first haircuts.

The physical remains of holy people also receive veneration in the Baha'i faith. When the Bab (1819–1850), the prophet of the religion, was executed, his followers took the body and kept it hidden in various places. It was moved to the Holy Land and finally interred on Mt. Carmel in 1909; the bodies of other great Baha'i leaders, including 'Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921), are buried at the shrine there. But it is the shrine of the founder, Baha'u'llah (1817–1892), near Akka that receives the most veneration: It is the holiest place on earth for Baha'is, and the place toward which Baha'is face to pray.

Other religions celebrate the great contributions of their holy people. Sikhs celebrate the births and deaths of the ten gurus. The most important of these events, the anniversaries of the births of Nanak (1469–1539) and Gobind Singh (1666–1708) and of the martyrdoms of Arjan Dev (1563–1606) and Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675), are marked by reading their great inspired book, the Guru Granth Sahib, cover to cover (which takes forty-eight hours). These are great public festivals that include bands playing and competitions. Hindus extend their veneration more freely to include any popular saint. Since Hindus do not normally have the physical remains of their holy people (although it is interesting to note that some of the ashes of Mahatma Gandhi [1869–1948] were kept and enshrined near Bombay until 1997), they make much use of pictures of both gods and saints, both in their homes and in temples. Still, some tombs exist and are centers for public veneration—for instance, the grave and memorial chapel of Svami Haridas (sixteenth century) at Vrindaban. Panj pir (Five guides) is a popular Hindu cult of five saints—any five the devotee chooses. Jains also make pilgrimages to sites associated with holy people. Although there are no bodily remains of any of the tirthankaras, or “ford-makers” (according to legend, when Mahavira died, the god Indra collected his relics and took them to heaven for the gods to venerate), pilgrims visit a site with footprints said to be those of Mahavira (trad. 599–527 B.C.E.) preserved at Pava-puri, where he died. It is customary for a Jain layperson to make at least one pilgrimage by the age of fifty to places associated with the tirthankaras or other ascetics of the past, as well as to revered living ascetics. Daoist and Confucian holy people receive veneration in temples as well as prayers for good fortune and health, although relics are not kept.

Veneration of holy people has been a deeply embedded element of popular religion in much of the world, often to the dismay and annoyance of religious elites or people who oppose a particular holy person's message. Elements of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam have all tried to quash popular veneration, with partial and regional success. Most notable were the Protestant reformers of Europe, who destroyed relics with enthusiasm, but such puritanical movements have also been notable in Islam. Secular authorities have sometimes tried to prevent veneration of a saint, usually by destroying his or her relics. The process continues today: When the Nazis executed the Austrian Jacob Gapp (1897–1943), the court ordered that his body be burned and the ashes dispersed. As late as 1980, the government of Nigeria exhumed and cremated the body of the radical Muslim prophet Muhammadu Marwa (d. 1980), hoping in that way to eliminate the movement he had fostered. Nevertheless, the popularity of holy people remains undiminished.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Adalbert of Prague; 'Ali ibn Abi Talib; Ananda; Arjan; Ashoka; Ba'al Shem Tov; Bodhidharma; Fatima of Ourika; Gautama; Gobind Singh; Haridas; Husayn b. 'Ali; Mahavira; Mark; Mary, Virgin; Matriarchs, Hebrew; Muhammad; Nanak; Niasse, Ibrahim Kaolack; Simeon ben Yohai; Takla Haymanot; Tegh Bahadur

References and further reading:

Brockman, Norbert C. 1997. Encyclopedia of Sacred Places. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO.

Verbermacher, Hannah Rachel

(c. 1815–1895 C.E.)

Hasidic Jewish leader

Hannah Rachel Verbermacher, known in Hasidic Judaism as “the Holy Maid of Ludomir,” is one of the few women who achieved a position of religious leadership in any form of Judaism prior to the twentieth century. Hasidism, a pietistic and mystically oriented movement that developed in eighteenth-century Poland, championed the belief that certain religious leaders are distinguished by outstanding spiritual qualities that include enhanced access to the divine. Such tzaddiqim, “righteous ones,” known individually as rebbe, have almost invariably been male. Verbermacher, born in the Ukrainian town of Ludomir, crossed gender boundaries in achieving religious leadership of a Hasidic sect.

The only child of a wealthy merchant, Hannah, born in about 1815, was unusually well educated and demonstrated exceptional piety, studying holy texts and adopting religious practices ordinarily reserved for men. Following a mystical vision, the young Hannah broke off her engagement and devoted herself to learning and prayer. When her father died, she used her sizable inheritance to build a study house with an attached dwelling in Ludomir, where she lived in complete solitude. She soon acquired a reputation for saintliness and miracle working, attracting both men and women to her Hasidic court where she delivered learned lectures on the Sabbath from behind a door.

Verbermacher’s achievements as a tzaddiq reflect a profound spirituality that found communal expression despite the absence in Judaism of leadership, contemplative, or ascetic options for women. Her success was facilitated by her personal wealth and the cultural influences of a larger Christian environment familiar with “holy maidens” and female saints, but it certainly did not go unopposed. Hannah’s rejection of a conventional female role presented a direct affront to the male Hasidic leaders of her region, who believed that Jewish women should serve as enablers of their husband’s religious activities. Ultimately Hannah acceded to rabbinic pressure and entered into two brief and unsuccessful marriages. Although apparently unconsummated, these marriages had the intended result of ending her religious leadership. Hannah spent the latter part of her life in the land of Israel, where she was involved with mystical and messianic circles; nothing she may have written survives. She died in 1895.

—Judith R. Baskin

See also: Gender and Holy People; Hasidism; Tzaddiq

References and further reading:

Rapoport-Albert, Ada. 1988. “On Women in Hasidism, S. A. Horodecky and the Maid of Ludmir Tradition.” Pp. 495–525 in Jewish History: Essays in Honour of Chimen Abramsky. Edited by Ada Rapoport-Albert and Steven J. Zipperstein. London: Peter Halbin.

Veronica

(1st cent. C.E.?)

Christian legendary saint

Associated with Christ’s passion, although not mentioned in the Bible, Veronica is the subject of a legendary story transmitted in several variants through apocryphal accounts. The oldest reference to her appears in the Acts of Pilate dating from between the second and fourth centuries. There called Berenice, she was confused with and took on characteristics of the Hemorrhissa, the woman mentioned in gospel accounts who suffered from an issue of blood and was cured after touching Christ’s garment (Luke 8:41–48; Matt. 9:20–22).

Veronica and her veil. Hans Memling, c. 1480. (Francis G. Mayer/Corbis)

According to the account of Veronica that developed in the sixth century, she wiped Christ’s face as he approached Calvary, thus preserving an imprint of it on her veil. This Vera Ikon (true image), a term that became the saint’s nickname, according to the twelfth-century Giraldu Cambrensis, had miraculous powers, and Veronica was asked to work cures by means of this precious relic. The story of King Abgar (fourth century), cured by contact with the Mandyllion (another miraculous portrait of Christ), inspired the account about Emperor Tiberius, who was likewise said to be saved by Veronica’s veil. Veronica finally reportedly joined Sts. Peter and Paul to live near them in Rome, where she was martyred under Nero.

Veronica’s veil was deposited in Rome at St. Peter’s at least by the eighth century, where it was preserved in the St. Veronica chapel until the city was sacked in 1527. It became the object of a very sizable cult, and in 1216 the church recognized the holy nature of the veil by attaching a large number of indulgences to its veneration. The enormous popularity of Veronica in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was intimately connected with these indulgences, which were made particularly large for the Roman jubilees. According to a legend popular at the end of the Middle Ages, Veronica was exiled to France with relics of the Virgin Mary (her milk and hair), and her remains were preserved at Soulac (Dordogne), where her tomb was long visited by the faithful. Although her feast was celebrated on July 12, her name was also associated at the end of the Middle Ages with the feast of Shrove Tuesday, when people veiled themselves in carnivalesque masks.

Veronica is often represented near Christ on the road to Calvary, holding the cloth in her hands. However, she is sometimes present at the crucifixion exhibiting the image. More rarely, she is represented between Sts. Peter and Paul.

—Claire Labrecque

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Jesus; Legendary Holy People; Models

References and further reading:

- Gaignebet, Claude. 1976. "Véronique ou l'image vraie." Anagrom 7–8: 45–70.
- Hennecke, Edgar. 1991 [1963]. New Testament Apocrypha. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Jacobus de Voragine. 1993. The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints. Translated by William Granger Ryan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Kuryluk, Ewa. 1991. Veronica and Her Cloth: History, Symbolism, and Structure of a "True" Image. Cambridge: Blackwell.
- Schiller, Gertrud. 1972. Iconography of Christian Art. Vol. 2, The Passion of Christ. Greenwich: New York Graphic Society.
- Westcott, A. 1916. "The Legend of S. Veronica." International Journal of Apocrypha 44: 14–16.

Vestal Virgins

Roman priestesses

The Vestal Virgins were priestesses of ancient Rome's goddess of the hearth, Vesta. From the earliest days of Rome until 394 C.E., they maintained her eternal flame and received special honors in society. Romans, including political leaders, showed them deference and respect, both for their performance of sacred duties and rituals and for the unique roles they played in Roman life.

According to Roman legend, Romulus and Remus were born in Alba Longa to the vestal Rhea Silvia (or Ilia), who had received that office from her evil uncle, usurper of the throne. After Romulus served as Rome's first king, Numa Pompilius established the Roman vestals and assigned them the duty of protecting Vesta's sacred flame and other holy objects. The vestals also had the duty of preparing the mola salsa, salt-cakes made each year from the first ears of grain harvested and used in particular religious rituals. In addition, they participated in the ceremony of the Argei every March, when they ritually tossed straw dummies into the Tiber. They safeguarded wills and treaties, prayed for the Roman people, and could intercede in disputes, such as when they helped Julius Caesar gain forgiveness from the dictator Sulla.

There were originally four vestals, but the number soon became stable at six. They had to be virgins, free from bodily defect, and with both parents living. The vestals wore white garments and had their hair closely cropped or bound, and their heads were usually covered. They lived in the Atrium Vestae near the temple of Vesta and the Regia (office of the pontifex maximus, or high priest). Men were forbidden to enter their home at night.

Vestal virgins received special honors and privileges that set them apart, including the right to own property, make a will, testify in court, have special seating reserved at festival games, and be buried within the city walls. A lictor was assigned to carry the fasces, the symbol of Roman authority, in front of a vestal while she circulated on city streets. If a vestal unintentionally passed a criminal on his way to execution, his life was to be spared. Scholar Mary Beard has pointed out that "the ambiguity of their sexual status, the way they share the characteristics of virgins, matrons and even men need be regarded no longer as an awkward aspect somehow to be accommodated in any explanation of their position, but as a crucial element in designating their sacredness" (Beard 1980, 21).

There were two methods of choosing vestals. The pontifex maximus could select twenty eligible girls from six to ten years old, from whom the successful candidates would be drawn by lot, but Roman nobles could also offer the chief priest the services of their daughters. Vestals took vows of chastity and served for thirty years, ten of learning their duties, ten of performing them, and ten of teaching novices what they needed to know. After serving for thirty years, vestals could retire and marry, but apparently few did, and many continued and served much longer terms. The senior vestal had particular duties, such as burning unborn calves, whose ashes would later be mixed with the blood of the October horse for distribution to shepherds at the Parilia festival.

The pontifex maximus could discipline the vestals and punished even minor infractions by whipping them. The punishment for breaking the vow of chastity was burial alive. The guilty vestal was carried through the forum in a covered litter and then sealed in an underground chamber located near the Colline Gate with only bread, oil, milk, and water. Famous vestals include Aemilia, who prayed to Vesta for assistance and miraculously rekindled the sacred fire by throwing a piece of her garment onto the cold altar, and Tuccia, who carried water from the Tiber to the temple of Vesta in a sieve to demonstrate her innocence of the charge that she had broken her vow of chastity.

—Richard D. Weigel

See also: Mediterranean Religions of Antiquity and Holy People; Priests; Sexuality and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Beard, Mary. 1980. "The Sexual Status of Vestal Virgins." Journal of Roman Studies 70: 12–27.
- Cody, Jane. 1973. "New Evidence for the Republican Aedes Vestae." American Journal of Archaeology 77: 43–50.
- Fischer-Hansen, Tobias. 1994. "Vesta." Iconographical Lexicon of Classical Mythology 5: 412–420.
- Worsfold, T. Cato. 1934. History of the Vestal Virgins of Rome. London: Rider.

Vianney, Jean-Baptiste Marie

(1786–1859 C.E.)

Roman Catholic priest

Jean-Baptiste Marie Vianney, the "curé of Ars" and patron of the parochial clergy, was born at Dardilly, France, in 1786. He spent his childhood years tending sheep on his father's farm and received little, if any, schooling. The French Revolution forced the family to practice its faith in secret. Vianney felt called to the priesthood yet had great difficulty being admitted to seminary because of his mediocre intellectual abilities. His extraordinary piety made up for his deficiencies in that area, however, and he was ordained in 1815. His fame as a great confessor spread rapidly, and soon he attracted hordes of pilgrims to Ars, his parish. His life of self-mortification and devotion to his flock ended on August 4, 1859. He was canonized in 1925.

The convulsions experienced by the Gallican church during and after the French Revolution may have contributed to the astonishing piety and, at times, ultrazealous activity of Vianney, attributes he shared with other members of the French clergy of the early nineteenth century. In 1790, the Civil Constitution of the Clergy had created a virtual schism in the church in France, separating those priests who swore an oath of allegiance to the newborn republic from those who remained faithful to Rome. In 1792, the de-Christianization of France began in earnest, but with scant success among the laity. By 1804, when Vianney was eighteen years old, the pope was in Paris to crown Napoleon; however, by 1815, many French parishes had no pastor.

In this same year, Vianney was sent to Ars, a village with 230 inhabitants of mostly indifferent religious practice but well-versed in blasphemy and obscenity. The village was slowly transformed by its pastor's preaching, one-on-one contact with his flock, and catechism classes for the young. But the saintliness that seemed to radiate from this man, manifested by extreme self-mortification (self-flagellation and fasting) and extraordinary insightfulness in the confessional (he was said to be able to discern an incomplete or "bad" confession), changed Ars into one of the major pilgrimage sites in France, comparable to Lourdes and Lisieux. By 1855, approximately 20,000 people a year traveled to Ars to go to confession.

Numerous miracles were reported during Vianney's lifetime, not the least of which was his ability to survive on scant food and very little sleep. He is said to have credited St. Philomena, removed from the canon in the twentieth century, with miracles he himself was responsible for, thereby virtually creating the Philomena cult. He founded an orphanage for girls, which was removed from his control under circumstances that remain clouded.

Toward the end of his life, Vianney habitually spent fourteen to eighteen hours a day in the confessional. His piety, self-mortification, and physical struggles with the devil, whom he called le grappin (the grabber), inspired the writer Georges Bernanos (1888–1948) in his descriptions of several of his saintly fictional curates. Vianney died August 4, 1859, worn out both by his asceticism and his tireless work for those seeking absolution from the saintly curé of Ars, who had struggled mightily with the devil and won.

—Kathryn E. Wildgen

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Demons and Monsters; Guidance; Priests

References and further reading:

- Ghéon, Henri. 1938. The Secret of the Curé d'Ars. Translated by F. J. Sheed. New York: Sheed and Ward.
- Kennedy, Emmet. 1989. A Cultural History of the French Revolution. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Trochu, Francis. 1977. The Curé d'Ars. Translated by Ernest Graf. Rockford, IL: Tan.

Vidyaranya

(d. 1386 C.E.)

Hindu philosopher

Madhava Vidyaranya Muni, a mysterious fourteenth-century Hindu philosopher, has been called the chief architect of the Vijayanagara Empire's founding. As a Shaivite brahmin, he had the traditional learning and the vision to show the ways to reconstitute Hindu polity in the south. He spent a significant part of his earlier life as a married householder, and there are references to his role in conducting a number of Vedic sacrifices. But in later life he advised kings and was a great religious authority, the author of important philosophical works on Advaita (nonduality).

The Vijayanagara Empire of southern India was founded sometime around 1335. According to tradition, Vidyaranya served as chief minister to the first king, Harihara, and to the succeeding kings Bukka I and Harihara II. He was the most important and influential religious thinker of his time in the region.

Vidyaranya was initiated into the renunciant stage of Hindu life in 1331. He trained students whom he later entrusted with important duties in Virupaksha and Shringeri monasteries, he debated thinkers such as Akshobhya Tirtha, and he invited the celebrated poet and philosopher Vedanta Deshika to the Vijayanagara court. As a smarta brahmin, he was a member of the priestly caste of custodians of orthodoxy. The smartas have produced many culturally creative updaters of religion who preserved essentials and systematized sprawling Hindu traditions. His brother Sayana wrote the most important surviving commentary on the Rig Veda.

Vidyaranya's philosophical clarity enabled him to delineate essentials with vision. He is known for four philosophical writings in Sanskrit: (1) Panchadasi (The fifteen), on the Advaita theme that only brahman (the supreme being) is real (the world is unreal, or a mixture; the soul is brahman); (2) Jivanmukti-viveka (Knowledge of jivanmukti), also on Advaita; (3) Anubhuti-prakashika, on interpreting the Vedas; and (4) Vivarana-prameya-sangraha (Summary of interpretation), on the interpretation of Vedanta as understood by the philosophers Padmapada (early eighth century) and Prakasatman (twelfth century). Despite its title, this large opus actually features innovative interpretations and fresh ideas. He is also known for his legal works in Sanskrit.

Vidyaranya ranks alongside Nagarjuna (c. 150–250) and Sayana (fourteenth century) as one of the all-time most important thinkers of southern India. In his philosophical writings, he shows a flair for using archetypal images. His biography of the great Advaita philosopher Shankara is an unforgettable, creatively written story of a spiritual conqueror's adventurous encounters and conquests.

Some say Vidyaranya died in 1386 near Virupaksha temple in Hampi, where a memorial grave shrine (brindavan-samadhi) still exists, though another tradition says his life ended in Kanchi, a holy city to the east of Hampi where he seems to have spent considerable time.

—William J. Jackson

See also: Hinduism and Holy People; Nagarjuna; Scholars as Holy People; Shankara; Vedanta Deshika

References and further reading:

Mahadevan, T. M. P. 1969. The Philosophy of Advaita with Special Reference to Bharati-tirtha Vidyaranya. Madras, India: Ganesh Wagoner, Phillip. 1999. Tidings of the King. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

Vieira, Eduardo Duarte

(1921–1966 C.E.)

Baha'i martyr

Eduardo Duarte Vieira died in prison in Portuguese Guinea, West Africa, on March 31, 1966, and is regarded as the first African martyr of the Baha'i faith. He was born a Catholic in 1921 in the Portuguese colony, where he was educated and eventually promoted to the position of director of tourism within the colonial government. During a brief visit to Lisbon in 1961, Vieira learned of the Baha'i faith and quickly converted to the new religion.

In 1962, upon returning to Bissau in Portuguese Guinea, he formally severed his affiliation with the church. He succeeded in converting his wife and establishing a small circle of about fifteen new Baha'is in the city. However, his Baha'i activities provoked persecution from both church and state, and he was forced to retire from his government post. He was denied travel documents, and eventually his house was raided. His Baha'i books were confiscated, he was forbidden to hold meetings in his home, and strict censorship was imposed on all his correspondence. Vieira was harassed by the colonial authorities and arrested repeatedly on various pretexts. His final arrest, on a charge of subversive political activity, took place on March 11, 1966, about two months after his forced retirement. He died in prison shortly thereafter, in uncertain circumstances, on March 31, 1966. His body showed signs of torture.

Before his death, Vieira was able to write a final message to his wife, Antonia, crudely scratched with a sharp instrument on the metal biscuit box she used to transport food into the prison for him. It reads: "Tonia: This is the way of destiny. All is terminated. Love your fellowman and raise your children with love. Love everybody. Forgive all the wrongs I have done. Be able to face life with naturalness. Goodbye, and I wish you a long life. Duarte 29–3–1966" (Lee 1974, 14: 389–390).

—Anthony A. Lee

See also: Baha'i Faith and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Patriotism and Holy People

References and further reading:

Lee, Anthony A., ed. 1974. The Baha'i World: An International Record. Vols. 14, 16. Haifa: Universal House of Justice.

Vijayakrishna Goswamin

(1841–1899 C.E.)

Hindu visionary, ecstatic

Vijayakrishna was a Bengali Hindu saint, or siddha, and a Vaishnava practitioner. However, he was not a part of the orthodox tradition of Bengali or Gaudiya Vaishnavism. Rather, he was a worshipper whose religious experience included visions of gods and ghosts, kundalini yoga, and ecstatic song and dance that would bring large crowds of people into states of intense devotional love.

Vijayakrishna was born in Shantipur, west Bengal, in 1841 into a brahmin family descended from Advaitacarya, a companion of the saint-god Chaitanya in the sixteenth century and a religious figure in his own right. Both of Vijayakrishna's parents would fall into ecstatic states, and his mother had periods of madness. By the age of six years old, Vijayakrishna would fall into trances. At these times, he would seem to speak with dead friends and relatives as well as with saints and deities. At eighteen, he left Shantipur to go to Calcutta and study medicine.

At this point Vijayakrishna married a six-year-old wife and left her in the village while he went to complete his studies. He became interested in Vedanta, however, and joined the Brahmo Samaj, a sect that followed a rationalist and humanist type of Hinduism, advocated worshipping God through meditation, and rejected caste, image worship, and festivals. Vijayakrishna eventually became a priest, left the study of medicine, and traveled as a missionary and preacher for the Samaj. After a few years he became disillusioned with the infighting within the sect and grew interested in Vaishnavism. He had visions of Chaitanya and joined several Vaishnava sects. In 1883, he visited the town of Gaya and sat in meditative trance for eleven days. This event is called his “day of regeneration.” At the high point of the trance, it is said, the name of the god Krishna resonated in every organ of his body.

During six months of constant meditation following his regeneration, Vijayakrishna experienced burning heat, or namagni (purifying heat caused by chanting the name of God). He later described his body as rearranged, destroyed, and remade. He continued to perform meditation and austerities for several years until he felt stabilized in Krishna’s grace. In 1897, he and his disciples built an ashram in the town of Gendaria, where he lived between pilgrimages. He settled there with his wife and had five children.

Vijayakrishna was well known for his religious experiences. He would fall into trances, weep, and have visions of gods and their actions that he would act out dramatically. His disciples would describe him as intoxicated with love, radiating light, and full of bliss. There were also descriptions of his visions becoming spontaneously imprinted on his body, along with mantras and Sanskrit phrases. He would sing and dance at kirtans (gatherings for worship), calling out to the gods and goddesses whom he saw before him, and whole crowds would share in his visions. These gatherings would often last for six or seven hours, with people falling into trance, dancing wildly, finding themselves possessed by gods or spirits, trembling, and sobbing with joy.

Vijayakrishna emphasized the importance of both devotion and meditation and became famous as a saint and perfected being—he was even called an avatar by his disciples. He personified intense Hindu bhakti, or devotion. By the time of his death in 1899, he had thousands of followers.

—June McDaniel

See also: Chaitanya, Krishna; Devotion; Gods on Earth; Hinduism and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Prophets

References and further reading:

- Kuladananda Brahmachari. 1975–1979. Sadguru sangha. Calcutta: Sansad Prakasani.
 McDaniel, June. 1989. The Madness of the Saints: Ecstatic Religion in Bengal. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Vimalakirti

Buddhist bodhisattva

In Indian Mahayana Buddhism, Vimalakirti is a semi-legendary bodhisattva (enlightened being), that is, an emanated incarnation of the Buddha who says and does things solely for the purpose of liberating living beings from the cycle of death and rebirth. In the Shakyamuni Buddha’s time during the fifth century B.C.E., Vimalakirti lived at Vaishali with his wife and son, endowed with great fortune and attendants. He became a bodhisattva without ever renouncing a householder’s life. In the Vimalakirtinirdesha Sutra (Exposition of Vimalakirti), Vimalakirti displays his profound wisdom as a quintessential example of the Buddhist layman, teaching that the buddha-land is accessible to anybody with a pure and clean mind who embarks on the quest for supreme enlightenment.

Vimalakirti’s presence on earth is said to have been only for the purpose of converting beings through “skillful means” (upaya-kaushalya) to the Buddha’s dharma (doctrine) and spreading the doctrines of the Mahayana. Simulating an ailing man, he allowed bodhisattvas, deities, and other non-human beings of various classes, as well as monks, nuns, and lay devotees, to come and inquire after his health and seek supreme enlightenment. In theory, he did not believe in beings or things, but in practice he worked for the good of all creatures. Thus, his contradictory actions arising out of wisdom and compassion made him appear both a skeptic and a believer. He was endowed with inconceivable psychic powers and could not only reduce or enlarge his own home but also pack different universes into each other at will. With the same powers, he could restrain the demon Mara, create imaginary bodhisattvas, and send them to the farthest corners of any of the universes.

Vimalakirti rejected the Buddhist systems current at the time and attacked the physical and moral premises on which human society was based. He preached the nonduality of things and was neither an idealist nor a nihilist. As a matter of fact, he adopted a position that may be called the absence of any position. It was perhaps because of such a position that he became the “patron saint” of Chinese intellectuals.

—K. T. S. Sarao

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Gautama; Laity

References and further reading:

- Lamotte, Etienne. 1976. The Teachings of Vimalakirti. Translated by Sara Boin. London: Pali Text Society.

Luk, Charles, ed. and trans. 1972. The Vimalakirti Nirdeśa Sūtra (Wei Mo Chieh So Shuo Ching). Berkeley: Shambhala.

Thurman, Robert A., trans. 1976. The Holy Teaching of Vimalakirti: A Mahayana Scripture. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Watson, Burton. 1996. The Vimalakirti Sūtra. New York: Columbia University Press.

Vincent de Paul

(1576–1660 C.E.)

Roman Catholic social reformer

Vincent de Paul was a social reformer during the seventeenth-century renewal of Roman Catholicism after the Protestant Reformation. He worked to turn the church in France from its alliance with the powerful toward service to the needy. The two religious orders he founded, the Daughters of Charity (1633) and the Congregation of the Priests of the Mission, or “Vincentians” (1626), are still active. The Society of Saint Vincent de Paul, familiar in American cities for its charitable work, was founded in France in 1836 by lay students inspired by his example.

Vincent de Paul was born in southern France in 1576 and ordained a priest in 1600. Moving to Paris in 1608 to seek a benefice, at the time a source of income and a means of social advancement, he came under the influence of Catholic Reformation thinkers. Although Vincent’s early careerist ambitions were satisfied by his appointment as chaplain to the general of the royal galleys and almoner to Queen Marguerite, he began to use his social prominence to serve the poor. Vincent de Paul led a strange double life. On one hand, he moved at the center of French power. An acquaintance of Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, he became the spiritual director of King Louis XIII and confessor to his widow, Queen Anne. Mazarin appointed him to the council established during the boy-king Louis XIV’s regency. On the other hand, he lived and worked among the poorest and most helpless in society.

The thread connecting the two parts of Vincent de Paul’s life was his talent for organization. The Congregation of the Priests of the Mission originated from his recruitment of a number of priests who relinquished benefices to serve poor people in country districts. The Daughters of Charity evolved from his society of upper-class ladies who visited the sick and the poor. They constituted the first religious order of women who were not cloistered but remained in the world to perform works of mercy. As his charitable concerns grew, these organizations grew as well. The Daughters of Charity brought comfort to prisoners in the galleys as well as to orphans, the mentally ill, and refugees. Their wide-winged headdress became a symbol of the nursing profession in hospitals throughout the world. Vincent defrayed the enormous cost of these efforts by insisting that his powerful patrons develop a sense of social responsibility based on their Christian faith. Vincent de Paul died in Paris in 1660 at the age of seventy-nine. He was canonized in 1737.

Vincent de Paul’s particular kind of holiness is more clearly discernible now than during his own time. The modern mind recognizes “managerial” ability, running organizations and motivating people toward common goals, as a distinctive quality. If managerial ability used in the pursuit of worthy goals can become a form of holiness, then Vincent de Paul, like Benedict of Nursia (c. 480–c. 547) and Teresa of Avila (1515–1582), merited sainthood on that ground alone. St. Vincent de Paul is represented in art holding a foundling child, with other foundlings gathered around him.

—Thomas F. Pyne

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Wealth and Poverty

References and further reading:

Cloche, Maurice, director. 1947. Monsieur Vincent. Hen’s Tooth Video.

Coste, Pierre. 1985. Vincent de Paul: Correspondence, Conferences, Documents. Brooklyn, NY: New City Press.

———. 1987. The Life and Works of Saint Vincent de Paul. New York: New City Press.

Purcell, Mary. 1963. The World of Monsieur Vincent. New York: Scribner’s.

Vincent Ferrer

(1350–1419 C.E.)

Christian friar, preacher

Vincent Ferrer, a noted Dominican preacher and thaumaturge, was born in Valencia in 1350 and died in Brittany, in the city of Vannes, in 1419, following a twenty-year preaching mission that took him through much of Europe. He was made a saint of the Catholic Church by Pope Calixtus III in 1455. Best known as an effective and moving preacher, Vincent drew enormous crowds for his daily celebrations of mass and sermons, and witnesses attributed many miracles to his intercession both before and after his death. His sermons were said to have converted thousands of Jews and Muslims in the Iberian Peninsula, including Rabbi Solomon Ha-Levi, who became Paul of Burgos, later bishop of Cartagena. A band of flagellants followed him wherever he went, just one sign of Vincent’s ability to move a crowd to penitence. Witnesses reported that Vincent had the gift of tongues, enabling him to be understood by audiences anywhere.

A pious child whose brother Boniface would become general of the Carthusian order, Vincent Ferrer entered the Dominican order in 1367 and soon distinguished himself in theological studies. The preaching mission for which Vincent was best known began only late in his life, in 1399, following a vision of Christ between Sts. Francis and Dominic in which Vincent was charged to preach the imminent Last Judgment. Before and after 1399, Vincent also saw distinguished service in university life, in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and to the crown of Aragon. Most of Vincent's career coincided with the years of the Great Schism (1378–1414) in the Catholic Church, during which time there were two rival popes headquartered in Rome and Avignon (and eventually a third, centered in Pisa), and Vincent played an important role in the intricate church politics of his day. Vincent's talents had early on attracted the attention of Pedro de Luna, a cardinal from Aragon, and when in 1394 Pedro de Luna became Pope Benedict XIII of the Avignon line, he summoned Vincent to Avignon, where he became the pope's confessor. Although Vincent remained convinced throughout his career that the Avignon papacy was the true one, he hoped to persuade Benedict to resign the papal seat in the name of bringing peace to the church. Only in 1416 did Vincent break with his former patron.

Vincent was the author of numerous works of philosophy, theology, and ecclesiology in addition to his corpus of sermons, including important treatises on logic, De vita spirituali (On the spiritual life), De moderno Ecclesiae schismate (On the current schism in the church), and a 1412 letter to Pope Benedict XIII about the end of the world, in which Vincent also described the vision that inaugurated his preaching mission.

—Laura A. Smoller

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Miracles; Politics and Holy People; Repentance and Holy People; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Ghéon, Henri. 1940. St. Vincent Ferrer. Translated by Francis Joseph Sheed. London: Sheed and Ward.
- Smoller, Laura Ackerman. 1997. "Defining the Boundaries of the Natural in the Fifteenth Century: The Inquest into the Miracles of St. Vincent Ferrer (d. 1419)." Viator 28: 333–359.
- . 1998. "Miracle, Memory, and Meaning in the Canonization of Vincent Ferrer, 1453–54." Speculum 73: 429–454.

Vincent of Saragossa

(d. 304 C.E.)

Christian deacon, martyr

Vincent of Saragossa was a Spanish Christian deacon and martyr who died on January 22, 304, in Valencia during the persecutions of the emperor Diocletian. According to the earliest source for his martyrdom, the Spanish poet Prudentius (Peristephanon 5, c. 400), Vincent was captured along with his bishop, Valerius, and other priests. Owing to the bishop's speech impediment, Vincent spoke for the group, proclaiming their devotion to Christ and refusing to turn over copies of scripture to the magistrate. Consequently, the magistrate inflicted several tortures on Vincent: He was racked and clawed, placed on a gridiron (a detail also in the martyrdom of Lawrence of Rome), and made to lie on sharp potsherds in his prison cell. Two angels came to visit him there, and the potsherds miraculously began to bloom. Vincent's followers, seeking to relieve his agonies, placed him on a soft bed they had made, where he finally died. The magistrate continued to torment Vincent's corpse: He had the body exposed to beasts and birds, but a raven defended it from mutilation. The magistrate then had Vincent's body weighted with a millstone and thrown into the sea, but the waves brought it safely to shore.

From the fifth century onward, the cult of Vincent spread throughout Spain and into Gaul, Italy, and North Africa. Augustine of Hippo (354–430), in a sermon for Vincent's feast day, declared that the saint was known everywhere in the Roman Empire. By the medieval period, his cult was firmly established in Britain as well, with Vincent's feast day listed in several English calendars and the Old English Martyrology. In art Vincent is often represented with a raven, or in diaconal dress. It has been suggested also that the fifth-century mosaic of Lawrence and the gridiron in Ravenna is actually a representation of Vincent, which would be additional proof for the popularity of Vincent's cult.

—Jessamyn Lewis

See also: Augustine of Hippo; Christianity and Holy People; Lawrence of Rome; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

- Garcia Rodriguez, Carmen. 1966. El culto de los santos en la España roma y visigoda. Madrid: Instituto Enrique Florez.
- Goddard, Allison Elliott. 1987. Roads to Paradise: Reading the Lives of the Early Saints. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England.
- Mackie, Gillian. 1990. "New Light on the So-Called Saint Lawrence Panel at the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia, Ravenna." Gesta 29: 54–60.

Violence and Nonviolence

Ahimsa, the reverence for all life, is central to Jainism, and Jain holy people can often be recognized because of their commitment to nonviolence, a commitment that they spread to Hinduism and that in the twentieth century came to be imitated by holy people through much of the world, thanks to the great example of Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948), who was influenced by the Jain spiritual reformer Shrimad Rajacandra (1867–1901). This was a development of the Hindu definition of ahimsa as "not-killing," not taking life except in sacrifice. The religions of the world are split on the issue of nonviolence. Some religions have praised warriors, especially fighters in religious causes; others have usually praised those who embraced nonviolence even against active threat to their persons or their religion. Yet other religions have an ambivalent tradition on this matter, some periods and regions praising violence in a religious cause, others adulating nonviolence as a prime virtue.

Islam has from the beginning recognized that violence is sometimes necessary both at the individual and the societal level. The problem lies in deciding when violence is justifiable and when it isn't, an issue that has divided the modern Muslim world. Islam's two daughter religions, the Sikh and Baha'i faiths, also recognize the need for violence, as can be seen in the praise they give martyrs such as the Babi Husayn Bushru'i (1813–1849), who proclaimed the coming of the mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse) with an armed revolt.

Buddhist monk performs a ritual suicide, by self-immolation, in the central market square of Saigon, 1963. (Bettmann/Corbis)

Buddhism rivals Jainism in its embrace of nonviolence. This is apparent early in the tradition, for example in the testimony of the Indian emperor Ashoka (third century B.C.E.), who tells in his edicts that he was sickened by the destruction he had caused in warfare and after his conversion to Buddhism felt a growing aversion to war and bloodshed. Buddhists have rarely praised as religious figures leaders who followed the path of violence, even against the worst of colonial oppression.

Christianity falls between these two extremes. On the one hand, the Hebrew scriptures of the Bible depict a great deal of violence for the faith, praising heroic kings, such as David, who slew "ten thousands." On the other hand, Jesus preached a message of "turn the other cheek" (Matt. 5:39; Luke 6:29). Which teaching to follow? By the central Middle Ages, a theology had developed that argued that violence, or even resistance of evil, was to doubt the power of God. Thus St. Edmund, king of East Anglia (c. 841–c. 870), is depicted as renouncing violent resistance to the Vikings who were devastating his lands; Gerald of Aurillac (c. 855–909), a military man, made his men reverse their swords and lances in battle so they would not hurt anyone (at least according to his hagiographer!); and the eleventh-century Russian princes Boris and Gleb offered no resistance when their brother seized their lands and finally murdered them. In fact, they were canonized with the special title "passion bearers" because by their innocent and voluntary suffering they shared in the passion of Christ. But Christian holy people also advocated (and sometimes participated in) war against the "enemies of God," whether Muslims, Jews, or Christian heretics, launching, most notably, a long series of crusades to win the "Holy Land" for Christianity.

There are no easy answers among the holy people of the world to the question of whether to embrace violence or nonviolence. Is it admirable to take up arms against injustice—as part of an army, or as an individual? The world's religions have often praised military saints, but less frequently have they condoned an individual decision to fight for a cause, such as the abolitionist John Brown's (1800–1859) raid on Harpers Ferry in 1859. Is the Kenyan Elijah Masinde (1908–1987), who encouraged assault on government employees and the destruction of government buildings and settlers' farms in his campaign to restore native religion and to fight colonialism, a saint or an evil man? For his victims he is a monster, but for many Kenyans he is a great hero in a religious cause. Likewise, John Brown was admired as a latter-day prophet by abolitionists and detested by slaveholders. Can ability to commit murder be regarded as an attribute of a holy person? The Tibetan Buddhist monk Belgi Dorje murdered a Tibetan king in 842 who was a noted persecutor of Buddhism, an event still regularly reenacted in dance. But when is a ruler so demonic that it is meritorious to murder him (or her)? Many Protestants regard Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–1945) as a deeply holy man—despite or because of his involvement in a plot to murder Hitler.

The way of nonviolence moved to center stage around the world in the twentieth century as religious leaders such as Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), and Dorothy Day (1897–1980), to name just two, consciously imitated the inspiring example of Gandhi. But what to do when the enemy is unscrupulous, apparently without a conscience that can be touched by persuasion and suffering, especially in impoverished and “voiceless” parts of the world? Belief that a holy person is someone willing not only to be killed but to kill is also an important part of the legacy of the twentieth century.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Anti-Semitism and Holy People; Bonhoeffer, Dietrich; Boris and Gleb; Brown, John; Day, Dorothy; Edmund of East Anglia; Gandhi, Mohandas K.; Gerald of Aurillac; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Kings; Masinde, Elijah; Rajcandra, Shrimad; War, Peace, and Holy People

References and further reading:

Berndt, Hagen. 2000. Non-Violence in the World Religions: Vision and Reality. London: SCM.

Virashaivas

(from 12th cent. C.E.)

Hindu devotees

Virashaivas are members of an important movement in the Hindu bhakti (devotional) tradition. Virashaivism means “heroic Shaivism” and clearly intends to separate the worship and cult of this community, which began in the twelfth century, from traditional patterns of orthodox Hinduism and other devotional groups, including different Shaiva traditions (those dedicated to the god Shiva). Virashaivism also is called the Lingayat tradition and evokes the aniconic image of Shiva, the linga, an upraised stone shaft centered upon a round base. The two elements symbolize, at a basic level, the male and female sexual organs; at a more profound level, they symbolize the male and female principles inherent in divinity itself and thus represent the union of Shiva and Shakti, the goddess. Thus the symbol represents the creative potency in the godhead, the straining movement toward a penetrating union with the divine that consummates in bliss. This ecstatic state (anubhava) was realized by the early Virashaiva saints, including the movement’s founder, Basavanna (1106–1167), and the great female saint Mahadeviyakka (fl. 1160).

Virashaivism shares features with other devotional traditions in India. It is a local, regional tradition, in this case established in southern India in the area of modern-day Karnataka. The passion of the tradition has been expressed by its saint-poets, written in a regional language, Kannada, in a free-style verse called vacanas (sayings). The poetry itself expresses the subjective experience of the poet, including challenging critiques of orthodox Hinduism, the bliss of consummate union, and the pain of (apparent) separation from the divine. The poetry thus represents an ideal human experience of passionate longing for and surrender to the divine. Written in the vernacular, Virashaiva poetry was and is accessible to all classes and castes, unlike the Vedas, the pan-Indian sacred scriptures, which were restricted to the “twice-born,” or high castes. Virashaivism, at least in its early phase, was an egalitarian form of religion, affirming the truth that spiritual merit was earned by authoritative spiritual experience, not by birth or caste. Its democratic sensibility finds parallels in other devotional traditions and in non-Hindu Indian traditions as well; the Buddha, for example, repeatedly appealed to the authority of experience over and against doctrine, belief, texts, or tradition.

Finally, the Virashaiva tradition tends to affirm the Supreme as beyond form or qualities, an impersonal absolute. Although this sensibility has been shared among other bhakti poets, notably Kabir (c. 1450–1518) in northern India, it does mark a difference between other kinds of devotional poetry that affirm the glorious personhood of God, including God’s auspicious form and qualities. This latter sensibility is captured by numerous poets dedicated to Vishnu, though it is also implicit in the poetry of Mahadeviyakka, who yearned to marry Shiva.

—Thomas A. Forsthoefel

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Basavanna; Bhakti Saints; Devotion; Hinduism and Holy People; Kabir; Mahadeviyakka; Sexuality and Holy People; Status

References and further reading:

Ramanujan, A. K. 1973. Speaking of Shiva. London: Penguin.

Vishvamitra

(Dates unknown)

Legendary Hindu sage

Vishvamitra (from Sanskrit, “Friend to All”) was a celebrated and legendary Indian sage, or rishi, who is noted in the earliest texts of Hinduism, the Vedas (1500 B.C.E.–600 B.C.E.). His singular career is elaborated in the later epics and puranas, literally the “old books” that tell stories of the Vedic age. Particularly important is the story of his very unusual rise from warrior to brahmin (priest), which entailed a shift in class status.

Vishvamitra had been a mighty sovereign and warrior who, on the way to a hunting tour with his 100 sons, encountered the great priest-sage Vasishtha. Vasishtha, also a rishi, deeply impressed Vishvamitra with his ability to provide anything one could possibly need or want at any given moment. Vishvamitra learned that Vasishtha owned a magical cow that granted wishes and attempted to take it for himself by force. Vasishtha's powers, gained through asceticism, roundly defeated him. Vishvamitra, angry and desirous of the superior powers of a sage, renounced his kingship and began to practice great austerities to make himself a brahmin. After long years of intense ascetic practice, Brahma, the creator god, pronounced Vishvamitra a great sage (maharishi) possessed of superior powers and knowledge.

Vishvamitra is counted as one of the seven great rishis of Hinduism, and stories and legends of his numerous abilities and his continuing enmity with Vasishtha abound in the Hindu texts. Vishvamitra was so wise in all things pertaining to both the brahmin and the warrior classes that he became the teacher of Rama, the earthly incarnation of the god Vishnu. Their relationship is described in the Valmiki Ramayana (Exploits of Rama, 200 B.C.E.–200 C.E.). At the end of the epic, owing in great part to the tutelage of Vishvamitra, Rama is described as the best of all possible kings.

—Phyllis K. Herman

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Rama; Rishis; Sages; Status

References and further reading:

- Basham, A. L. 1997. The Wonder That Was India, 3d ed. London: Sidgwick and Jackson.
- Klostermaier, Klaus. 1998. A Concise Encyclopedia of Hinduism. Oxford: Oneworld.
- Sivaramamurti, C. 1982. Rishis in Indian Art and Literature. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.

Vivekananda

(1863–1902 C.E.)

Hindu teacher

Vivekananda, a charismatic religious leader and a disciple of the Bengali saint Ramakrishna (1836–1886), is best known for his inspiring speech through which he introduced Hindu philosophy at the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893. A social reformer and powerful orator, he was also the founder of the Ramakrishna Mission, which has branches in many parts of the world.

Born Narendra Datta in a prominent family in Kolkata, India, in 1863, he learned stories from the Hindu epics at home and also had a secular education in Western-style schools. He became a disciple of the spiritual teacher Ra-makrishna, giving up his plans to become a lawyer, and eventually became a monk, taking the name Vivekananda. After his master's death in 1886, he decided to dedicate himself to the service of humanity. In 1893, Vivekananda sailed to America to attend the Parliament of Religions in Chicago. Arriving several months before the date of the conference, and without money, he was helped by strangers and eventually attended the parliament. He began his speech, considered to be one of the most inspiring messages given at the event, by addressing the delegates as “brothers and sisters.”

An eloquent speaker, Vivekananda was invited to several other forums in the United States and spoke at universities and clubs presenting Hindu philosophy and culture with clarity and with pride. Local newspapers reported his speeches in considerable detail and called him “cyclonic Hindu” and “militant monk.” Vivekananda stayed in the United States for three years and on his way back to India gave several talks in England. Among his many disciples was Margaret Noble (later known as Sister Nivedita), who went to India to serve the needy. News of Vivekananda's successful American tour had reached India by the time he came back in 1897, and he was given a hero's welcome at home. Vivekananda, with patriotic zeal, gave a rousing call to all Indians to be involved in spiritual and volunteer activities as well as social reform. In this connection, he founded the Ramakrishna Mission. He made a second trip to America in 1899. He died from complications of diabetes while he was meditating on July 4, 1902.

Vivekananda founded a monastery (Math) in Baranganore, a suburb of Kolkata, and moved it to Belur in 1899. The Math and the Ramakrishna Mission, which was formally registered in 1909, are distinct but interconnected institutions. They function as meditational, educational, and service centers. The societies welcome people of all faiths for nondominational meditation. The mission runs educational programs, schools, and colleges all over India, as well as hospitals and shelters for victims of disasters, and is also involved in other charitable activities. There are about 141 permanent centers in India and other countries, including the United States, Switzerland, Bangladesh, Argentina, and the United Kingdom. Many branches in the United States are called “Vedanta Societies.”

Vivekananda's primary teaching was a form of Hindu philosophy called Vedanta, which is based on the Hindu sacred texts such as the Bhagavad Gita and the Upanishads. There have been many interpreters of Vedanta in the Hindu tradition, and although Vivekananda's followers respect all the schools of Vedantic thought, the primary emphasis is on the nondualist philosophy made famous by Shankara (circa eighth century C.E.). Vivekananda's speeches and writings have been collected and published in several volumes. His personality and speeches have had a profound impact on generations of Hindus, many of whom understand Hinduism through his words.

—Vasudha Narayanan

See also: Contemporary Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People; Ramakrishna Paramahansa; Shankara; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

Burke, Marie, L. 1985. Swami Vivekananda in the West: New Discoveries. San Francisco: Vedanta.

Life of Swami Vivekananda by His Eastern and Western Disciples. 1980. San Francisco: Vedanta.

Vivekananda. 1947. Complete Works of Swami Vivekananda. 8 vols. San Francisco: Vedanta.

Vladimir

(d. 1015 C.E.)

Christian ruler

The name of Prince Vladimir of Kiev is firmly associated with the baptism of Russia during the tenth century. Even though Vladimir was not the first among the Russians to accept Christianity, with his conversion Christianity became the state religion. There exist several traditional accounts of Vladimir's baptism, and even the Primary Chronicle, the main source for early Russian history, offers several versions of the event. Many aspects of Vladimir's rule and conversion remain contested to this day, including exactly when he started his rule in Kiev, when and where he was baptized, and in what year the population of Kiev was baptized.

The famous "trial of the faiths" account in the Primary Chronicle starts with the report on the embassies of the Bulgars (the Muslims), the Khazars (the Jews), the Germans (Western Christians), and the Greeks (Eastern Christians) to Vladimir's court in 986. After their visitation, Vladimir addressed the boyars and the city elders with the following speech, according to the chronicle: "Behold, the Bulgars came before me, saying, 'Accept our religion.' Then came the Germans and praised their own faith. After them came the Jews. Finally the Greeks appeared, disparaging all other faiths but praising their own, and they spoke at length, telling the history of the whole world from its beginning. Their words were wise, and it was marvelous to listen and pleasant for anyone to hear them." Even though the account names all the participants of the debate on different faiths, it obviously privileges the Greeks from the beginning. Vladimir asked his subjects to advise him on the proper course of action, and the wise assembly suggested that the prince should send an embassy to witness various religious ceremonies and collect information about the different religious practices.

When the embassy returned to Kiev, they had nothing good to say about the services of the Bulgars, the Jews, and the Germans, but they rhapsodized about the ceremony of the Greek church: "Then we went to Greece, and the Greeks led us to where they worship their God, and we did not know, whether we were in heaven or on earth. For on earth there is no such splendor or such beauty, and we are at a loss to describe it. We know only that God dwells there among men, and their service is better than the ceremonies of the other nations." The boyars further bolstered the case for Orthodox Christianity with the argument that if the Greek faith had been evil, Princess Olga, Vladimir's own grandmother, would not have accepted it.

Eighteenth-century monument to Grand Duke Vladimir, known as the apostle of Russia for his encouragement of Christianity in his domains. Kiev, Ukraine. (Art Directors)

The motivation that lies behind this legendary account is widely debated to this day. The explanation offered by the famous nineteenth-century Russian historian Soloviev that Vladimir was disappointed by the emptiness and poverty of thought in the brand of polytheism practiced in Kievan Rus' seems too highbrow for the reality of tenth-century Russia. The most important factor in Vladimir's decision must have been his close ties with Byzantium, consolidated by Vladimir's marriage to the Byzantine princess Anna, the presence of a large Christian merchant community in Kiev, and perhaps the example and influence of Princess Olga.

There are two accounts of Vladimir's actual baptism. According to the version favored by the Primary Chronicle, Vladimir was baptized in Kherson in 988. In this version, Vladimir demanded the Byzantine princess Anna for his wife as the condition for restoring Kherson to Byzantium after his army took the city, and emperors Basil and Constantine agreed to the marriage only if Vladimir accepted Christianity. Vladimir received baptism in Kherson, married Anna, then returned to Kiev, destroyed all the idols, and baptized the population in the river Dnieper. According to the other version, Vladimir was baptized in Kiev in 987 after hearing the account of the embassy about the glory of the Greek faith.

The population of Kiev was baptized either in 989 or in 990. The chronicle describes how Vladimir ordered the humiliation of Perun, the main god of the Slavic pantheon, then proclaimed that everyone in Kiev would have to come to the Dnieper the next morning to be baptized or suffer the displeasure of the great prince. Vladimir erected the church of St. Basil on the site of the pre-Christian cult center. The chronicle credits Vladimir with instituting the first schools in Kiev, where the children of the best families were sent, and relates how the mothers lamented their children's fate. In reality, during Vladimir's reign Christianity took root slowly. The chronicle is silent about the incidents of resistance to the new faith. Only the chronicle of Joachim describes the revolt in Novgorod that ended in bloodshed.

—Margarita D. Yanson

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Mission; Olga; Orthodoxy and Saints; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Cross, Samuel H., and Olgerd P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, trans. 1973. The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text. Cambridge, MA: Medieval Academy of America.
- Dmytryshin, Basil, ed. 1967. Medieval Russia: A Sourcebook, 900–1700. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston.
- Fedotov, G. P. 1960. The Russian Religious Mind: Kievan Christianity, the Tenth to the Thirteenth Centuries. New York: Harper.
- Hollingsworth, Paul, trans. 1992. The Hagiography of Kievan Rus. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Jerkovich, George C. 1988. A Thousand Years of Russian Christianity: Kievan Rus to Present. Comments and a Survey of Literature. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press.
- Nowak, Frank. 1970 [1930]. Medieval Slavdom and the Rise of Russia. New York: Cooper Square.

Voes, Hendrik, and Johannes van Esschen

(d. 1523 C.E.)

Protestant protomartyrs

Hendrik Voes (or Vos) and Johannes van Esschen (or von Esch) were two Augustinian monks from an Antwerp cloister imprisoned in 1522 and burned at the stake in Brussels in 1523 for their failure to recant their Reformation convictions. They were first commemorated by Martin Luther in a famous song that immortalized their deaths, and their stories reappeared in sixteenth-century Protestant martyrologies.

After the 1521 publication of the Edict of Worms, which forbade evangelical teachings in Hapsburg domains, the University of Louvain and local communes began to publish local regulations against heresy under the influence of papal legate Hieronymus Aleander. This initiative quickly impacted the local Augustinian cloister, which had espoused evangelical teachings since 1519 under the priorship of Heinrich von Zutphen, a former colleague of Martin Luther at Wittenberg. After the dissolution of the Antwerp cloister, sixteen monks were imprisoned, including Zutphen, who was later freed by local sympathizers and hidden; he ultimately escaped to Bremen. Thirteen monks publicly recanted their evangelical convictions in the Antwerp church, but Voes, Esschen, and a third monk, Lambert von Thorn, remained steadfast despite undergoing both interrogation and torture by Louvain theologians Latomus, Tappert, and Hoogstraten.

Voes and Esschen became the first of many alleged heretics burned in the Brussels marketplace; for unknown reasons, Thorn was sentenced to life imprisonment and died there in 1528. Zutphen's escape was short-lived, as he was kidnapped and burned by peasants in 1524 while on a preaching mission in Dithmarschen (located in present-day Schleswig-Holstein, Germany) after the agitation of Dominican preachers. "Ein neues lied wir heben an" (We raise a new song), Luther's response to these events and the first hymn customarily attributed to him, was intended to counter the popular rumor that Esschen and Voes had recanted before their executions and spread a new Lutheran notion of sainthood that included the rewriting of martyrs' actions not as witness to the church's truths but rather testimony against its abuses. The song, in the metric form of a folk ballad, appeared in broadsheet in 1523 and was adopted in the first complete Lutheran hymnal, the 1524 Geistliches Gesangbuechlein (The little book of hymns), edited by Johann Walter, as well as in subsequent sixteenth-century Lutheran hymnals. Luther also composed a report on Zutphen's death in 1525 in the form of a martyr's tale that enjoyed broad dissemination. Reports of these deaths held pride of place in the Protestant martyrologies of Jean Crespin, Ludwig Rabus, and Adriaen von Haemstede.

—Susan R. Boettcher

See also: Luther, Martin; Martyrdom and Persecution; Protestantism and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Kolb, Robert. 1987. For All the Saints: Changing Perceptions of Martyrdom and Sainthood in the Lutheran Reformation. Macon: Mercer.

- Luther, Martin. 1958. "The Burning of Brother Henry." In Luther's Works, 32: 262–286. Translated by A. T. W. Steinhäuser. Edited by George Forell. St. Louis: Concordia.
- . 1965. "A New Song Here Shall Be Begun." In Luther's Works, 53: 211–216. Translated by George MacDonald and Richard Massie. Edited by Ulrich S. Leupold. St. Louis: Concordia.
- Oettinger, Rebecca Wagner. 2001. Music as Propaganda in the German Reformation. Aldershot, England: Ashgate.

Vyas, Hariram

(c. 1492–c. 1606 C.E.)

Hindu poet-saint

Hariram Vyas was a charismatic sixteenth-century Hindu poet-saint devoted to the divine pair Radha and Krishna. He belongs to the devotional movement (bhakti), which celebrates saints more for their love for God than for their wisdom or virtuous life. Thus, in the hagiographies Vyas is portrayed as valuing devotion more than the rules of conventional religion (dharma) and traditional book learning, though he was a brahmin pandit. He is understood to be an incarnation of Vishakha, one of Radha's friends (sakhis).

Vyas, born in about 1492, hailed from the small kingdom of Orcha in Bundelkhand. In the 1530s, he moved to Vrindaban in the Braj area of northern India, an area known at the time as the place where Krishna and Radha had once dwelled. Vyas lived in these inspiring environs until his death in about 1606. His tomb (samadhi) there is still tended by his descendants in a bower-like setting called Kishorban, but the image he worshipped, Yugalakishora, was later moved to Panna in Madhya Pradesh.

Vyas was a prolific poet. About 800 of his songs and 150 distichs in the vernacular of Braj are collected in Vyas Vani (The inspired word of Vyas). They include beautiful descriptions of the love play of Radha and Krishna, of which he claimed to be an eyewitness. Vyas also translated in Braj verse five chapters from the Sanskrit scripture Bhagavata Purana (the "Rasapancadhyaya"). Vyas's poems further include inspiring religious advice and biting satire on hypocrisy. Yet other poems are in praise of other devotees, both his contemporaries and predecessors. Vyas includes in his "family of devotees" non-Krishna devotees such as Kabir (c. 1450–1518) and other so-called nirguni bhaktas (devotees of God without attributes). This seems indicative of a nonsectarian atmosphere in early sixteenth-century Vrindaban. Some Sanskrit works have been attributed to Vyas, but with little manuscript attestation.

Hariram Vyas and his friends Hit Harivansh and Haridas are often classified as "the three Haris" (Hari-trayi) or "the three connoisseurs" (rasika-trayi). However, in contrast to the other two, Vyas did not come to be regarded as the founder of a new sect. Instead, his presumed sectarian allegiance became a hotly disputed topic from about a century after his death, and it has remained so until the present day. The Radhavallabhan and Gauriya sects have been the most prominent claimants. Not surprisingly, the corpus of legends that has grown around Vyas provides an interesting case of sectarian appropriation.

—Heidi Pauwels

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Devotion; Haridas; Harivansh, Hit; Hinduism and Holy People; Krishna

References and further reading:

- Pauwels, Heidi. 1996. Krsna's Round Dance Reconsidered: Hariram Vyas's Hindi. Raspancadhyayi. London Studies on South Asia, 12. Richmond: Curzon.
- . 2002. In Praise of Holy Men: Hagiographic Poems by and about Hariram Vyas. Groningen Oriental Studies. Groningen, Netherlands: Egbert Forsten.

Vyasaraya (Vyasa Tirtha)

(1460–1539 C.E.)

Hindu scholar, guru

Vyasaraya, a Hindu saint devoted to Vishnu, was a spiritual leader during his own lifetime and is remembered for his influence at court and in the Haridasa movement during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Known as Yatiraja as a child, as Vyasa Tirtha in his middle years, and as Vyasaraya in his old age, this Hindu guru was the spiritual adviser to the emperor during the height of the Vijayanagara Empire in southern India. Under his leadership, the Haridasas, enthusiastic Vishnu devotees, became a culturally creative and influential force. As a scholar, a debater, and a renowned writer of religious treatises, he set a high standard for the religious traditions of the region.

Yatiraja's father had no children with his first wife and married for a second time in the mid-1400s. Seeking divine grace to begin their family, this couple went to the guru Brahma Tirtha and he blessed them, asking only that their second son be dedicated to working with him on the path of Vaishnavism. The couple had three children, a girl and two boys. Yatiraja, born in 1460 in the village of Bannur in Karnataka, was their third child. After Yatiraja had spent several years studying, Brahma Tirtha reminded the boy's parents of their promise. Legend has it that after teaching the boy for some time, the guru wanted him to become a monk and a Vaishnava leader. Yatiraja, now a teenage boy, intuited his teacher's plan, balked, and ran away. Then, resting under a tree, he saw Lord Vishnu in a dream. Vishnu explained what was expected of him and stirred his conscience. Fortified with resolve, Yatiraja returned and became a monk, taking the name Vyasa Tirtha to identify himself during this stage of his life.

Brahma Tirtha died sometime after the famine of 1475–1476. Vyasa Tirtha then went to Kanchi, a center of learning in southern India, and studied philosophy, becoming knowledgeable in the views of Shankara (seventh and eighth centuries), Ramanuja (1017–1137), and others. He then went to Mulbagal, another center of learning, and spent years meditating and studying Dvaita Vedanta (the dualist view that the soul and God do not merge absolutely). He studied with Shripadaraya for five or six years (some accounts say a dozen years).

Next, Vyasa Tirtha spent some years in the court of Saluva Narasimha at Chandragiri in close contact with the king, debating various scholars. He was entrusted with the responsibility of performing regular worship of Vishnu at the mountain temple Tirupati, holding this position a dozen years. In around 1493 or later, he went to Vijayanagara, where Saluva Narasimha was then ruling. He was honored as spiritual guardian of the ruler, and when a team of philosophers challenged him he debated them in a month-long contest and won. He promoted the spread of Hanuman shrines in the kingdom, gave religious discourses for the king's edification, and became the leader of the Haridasas, who thrived under his encouragement.

When Krishnadevaraya became ruler, Vyasa Tirtha was his guru. At one point, when astrological portents pointed to a catastrophe for the king, Vyasa Tirtha occupied the throne at the king's behest until the inauspicious time had passed. He was called Vyasaraya (raya means "king") because of that incident. Vyasaraya taught the ruler daily and enjoyed a close relationship with him. When a neighboring ruler sent a work on Advaita, Vyasaraya answered each point to show the Dvaita position (that is, the dualist view that the soul and God are separate). In 1526, the king gave him Bettakonda village (which was renamed Vyasasamudra).

After Krishnadevaraya died in 1530, the new king, Achyutaraya, also sought Vyasaraya's advice and honored him as a guru. Vyasaraya thus played a more important role in the Vijayanagara court than previous Madhva gurus had, enjoying a close connection to three rulers. He wrote songs in the Kannada language and important works in Sanskrit. His magnum opus was Nyayamrita. Other works include Chandrika and Tarkatandava. An Indian proverb says that Vyasaraya bound the "melon" of Madhva's teachings with these three "straps," saving it from breakage and loss. In 1539, close to the end of the Vijayanagara Empire's power, Vyasaraya died.

—William J. Jackson

See also: Gurus; Madhva; Ramanuja; Recognition; Shankara

References and further reading:

- Sharma, B. N. K. 1961. A History of the Dvaita School. Vol. 2. Bombay: Booksellers Publishing.
- Srinivasan, G. 1972. The Haridasas of Karnataka. Belgaum, India: Academy of Comparative Philosophy and Religion.
- Verghese, Anila. 1995. Religious Traditions at Vijayanagara as Revealed in Its Monuments. New Delhi: American Institute of Indian Studies.

W

Wafi Ahmad

(c. 766–after 828 C.E.)

Muslim Shi'a imam

ʿAbdallah b. Muhammad, popularly called Wafi Ahmad, succeeded his father, Muhammad b. Ismaʿil, as imam in approximately 813. Born in Persia in about 766, like his father he was forced to remain in hiding from the general public to protect himself in a hostile political environment.

The Abbasid rulers were keen to eliminate those descendants of ʿAli ibn Abi Talib whom they perceived as a challenge to their authority. From his father's base in the vicinity of Ahwaz in Khuzistan, Wafi Ahmad moved 40 kilometers north to ʿAskar Mukram, where he became a successful trader with two houses. He traveled to Basra as renewed hostilities flared and then sought refuge in a Christian monastery in the hills of Jabal al-Summaq in Syria. Eventually, his da'is (agents) found refuge for him in the city of Salamiyya in Syria. This was an old city that had existed since Greek times and that also flourished during the Christian era. Here, the imam's agents purchased a suitable house for him along the main street. Wafi Ahmad lived in Salamiyya as an ordinary merchant and was known to the local inhabitants as a trader and an attar (chemist/pharmacist). Wafi Ahmad was able to meet with his followers and instruct them in spiritual matters without interference.

The imam was mild-mannered and well liked. He acquired his nickname, Wafi, which means "reliable," because he was known to be true to his word. In order to protect himself, he used the name Maymun al-Qaddah, the name of his chief da'i, who served as a hijab (cover) for him. The cover was so successful that the imam is misidentified in certain sources. Despite the hardships of leading such a restricted, anonymous life, Wafi Ahmad continued to attract followers and to send out da'is who proclaimed his ideas to the people. Even when he lived in inhospitable or difficult terrain, such as in the Daylam region, his da'wa activities continued.

Eventually he and his son gained sufficient support for the imamate that a few decades later his grandson, ʿAbd Allah al-Mahdi, was able to live openly and even became a ruler. Wafi Ahmad died in Salamiyya after 828.

—Habibeh Rahim

See also: Imams; Islam and Holy People; Mahdi, ʿAbd Allah al-Muhammad b. Ismaʿil b. Jaʿfar

References and further reading:

Daftary, Farhad. 1990. The Ismaʿilis: Their History and Doctrines. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1998. A Short History of the Ismailis. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

———, ed. 2000. Intellectual Traditions in Islam. London: I. B. Tauris and the Institute of Ismaili Studies.

Waiyaki wa Hinga

(d. 1892 C.E.)

Kikuyu holy man, warrior

Born in the mid-1800s, Waiyaki wa Hinga was a great warrior and distinguished Kikuyu leader. He led Kikuyu warriors against neighboring Maasai communities with great success, defeating their dreaded commander, Naleo.

Waiyaki was highly regarded in Kikuyu society. His homestead had several buildings, including separate huts for each of his wives, a hut for his personal porter (who carried Waiyaki's ceremonial stool when he visited other homesteads or attended meetings), and a guest hut outside the gate with a servant to care for any visitor who arrived too late to enter the homestead. The visitors were given food and shelter there until Waiyaki could meet with them. This system of governance prevailed in Kikuyuland until Captain Frederick Lugard, leader of the Imperial British East Africa Company (IBEAC), arrived in 1890 on his way to Uganda.

Waiyaki gave Lugard a piece of land to establish a stopping place for his caravans en route to Uganda at a place called Dogoretti. Waiyaki and Lugard entered a blood brotherhood by drinking each other's blood and signed a treaty stipulating that the Europeans would not take any land or property of the Kikuyu by force. Lugard gave Waiyaki five guns with which to guard his territory. However, Lugard's men later violated the treaty, raiding Kikuyu villages for food and women. They also attempted to occupy Kikuyuland. Provoked, Waiyaki ordered his warriors into battle against Lugard's men and defeated them.

In 1892, Lugard's men attacked Waiyaki's relatives, the Ndorobo, and Waiyaki once again declared war. As his warriors were celebrating a victory with a beer party, Lugard's men attacked and disarmed them. Waiyaki then ordered his men to surrender. He was injured when Lugard's men knocked him off a scaffold, crushing part of his skull. Waiyaki died as he was being driven into exile by his captors. In his last words, he cautioned his people never to surrender their land to foreigners.

The Kikuyu honor Waiyaki as a holy person and a prophet. They remember his leadership and his ability to look death in the face and still urge his people to fight for their rights and their land, and they celebrate him in song and poetry for those traits.

—Hannington Ochwada

See also: African Religions and Holy People; Patriotism and Holy People; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

Ogot, Bethwell A. 1981. Historical Dictionary of Kenya. London: Scarecrow.

Otieno, Wambui Waiyaki. 1998. Mau Mau's Daughter: A Life History. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.

Walad

See Baha'uddin Walad

Walburga

(710–779 C.E.)

Christian abbess, missionary

Venerated as protector of churches and monasteries, Walburga was born in Dorsetshire in 710 to St. Richard and Wuna, noble Anglo-Saxon Christians. She entered the monastery at Wimborne in 720, and in 748 she joined the mission to convert the Germanic peoples, directed by Boniface (673–754). He created a network of monasteries and bishoprics and appointed Wimborne-educated Benedictines as administrators. Walburga's brother St. Willibald (c. 700–787) became bishop of Eichstätt, and in 750 her brother St. Winnebald (d. 776) founded a monastery at Heidenheim, where Walburga organized a nunnery in 761. She became abbess of the double monastery upon Winnebald's death.

With her supervision, the nun Hugeburc composed his vita and an account of Willibald's pilgrimages to Rome and Palestine. Her feast day marks her death on February 25, 779.

In the ninth century, Wulfhard of Herrieden discussed Walburga's sanctification and cases of healings attributed to her intercession. After his vision of the abbess, in about 870 Bishop Otgar had her remains translated to the church in Eichstätt. When her remains were exhumed in 893 to obtain relics, Bishop Erchanbald found them immersed in liquid. A two-tiered tomb permits the collection of "Walburga oil" which is bottled for the healing of illnesses. Upon the consecration of St. Walburga Abbey in Eichstätt in about 1035, Bishop Heribert of Rothenburg composed a hymn praising her saintly perfection.

—Irene E. Gnarra

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Hereditary Holiness; Miracles; Mission; Willibald

References and further reading:

Maria Anna Birgitta zu Münster, and Andreas Bauch. 1985. Saint Walburga: Her Life and Heritage. Translated by Gerard Ellspermann. St. Meinrad, IN: Abbey Press.

Ridyard, Susan J. 1989. "Anglo-Saxon Women and the Church in the Age of Conversion." Pp. 105–132 in Monks, Nuns, and Friars in Mediaeval Society. Edited by Edward B. King et al. Sewanee, TN: Press of the University of the South.

Schulenberg, Jane Tibbets. 1990. "Saints' Lives as a Source for the History of Women, 500–1100." Pp. 285–320 in Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History. Edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens: University of Georgia Press.

Waldès, Peter

(d. c. 1205–1218 C.E.)

Christian lay preacher, reformer, dissident

Peter Waldès was a thirteenth-century layman who founded a spiritual movement within the European Christian church. The Waldensians (as their critics called them), or the Poor of Lyons (as they called themselves), had spread throughout southern and eastern Europe by the end of the twelfth century. In its literal interpretation of the Bible and its criticism of the church hierarchy, the movement anticipated many ideals of the Protestant movements 400 years later.

Waldès was a wealthy merchant in the southern French city of Lyons. Legend has it that in about 1173 he was inspired by a minstrel's song about the life of St. Alexis, an early Christian saint who gave up all of his wealth to live in extreme poverty. Waldès took Alexis as his role model. After making provision for his wife and daughters, he used the rest of his wealth to feed the people of Lyons during a famine. When his money was gone, he lived from charity, traveling and preaching the gospel in imitation of Jesus' apostles. He soon gained a wide following among the merchant classes in the trading centers of the region.

Waldès's movement centered primarily on individual piety, but it contained explicit criticisms of the institutional church. The Waldensians believed that virtuous living, not an office in a hierarchy, suited someone to preach and administer sacraments. The sect allowed equal leadership roles for women, as opposed to the all-male hierarchy of Catholicism. Waldensians based their creed on the literal interpretation of the Bible, which challenged the philosophical interpretations of professional theologians. The Waldensians had the Bible translated into the vernacular language. Before then, the Bible had been available only in Latin, and thus only to the clergy.

Waldensian beliefs had wide-ranging political ramifications. Their life of absolute poverty reproached the wealth not only of the institutional church but also of the landed nobility and the urban merchants. Waldensians also rejected many other aspects of urban and feudal life in this period, refusing to take oaths, make contracts, or condone warfare. Pope Lucius III declared the movement a heresy in 1184, and its followers were often expelled from their communities. Despite (or because of) these difficulties, Waldensianism expanded far beyond Lyons into Germany, Alsace, and Italy. Although Waldès died sometime around 1205 or 1218, many Waldensian communities survived until the sixteenth century, when they merged with Calvinism. There is still a Waldensian church active in the Piedmont region of Italy.

—Elaine M. Beretz

See also: Gender and Holy People; Laity; Martyrdom and Persecution; Reform and Reaction; Teachers as Holy People; Wealth and Poverty

References and further reading:

- Audisio, Gabriel. 1999. The Waldensian Dissent: Persecution and Survival, c. 1170–c. 1570. Translated by Claire Davison. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cameron, Euan. 2000. Waldenses: Rejections of Holy Church in Medieval Europe. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Lambert, Malcolm D. 1977. Medieval Heresy: Popular Movements from Bogomil to Hus. London: Edward Arnold.
- Little, Lester K. 1978. Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy in Medieval Europe. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Peters, Edward, ed. 1980. Heresy and Authority in Medieval Europe: Documents in Translation. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Shahar, Shulamith. 2001. Women in a Medieval Sect: Agnes and Huguette the Waldensians. Translated by Yael Lotan. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell and Brewer.
- Wakefield, Walter L., and Austin P. Evans, trans. 1969. Heresies of the High Middle Ages: Selected Sources. New York: Columbia University Press.

Wali Songo

Muslim holy people

The Wali Songo are the nine founders of Islam on Java. The term wali describes a person who is regarded as a special “friend” of God. Contemporary Javanese tradition identifies nine such saints, although in the nineteenth century in East Java there was a tradition of eight saints (wali walu).

The Babad Tanah Jawi (Chronicle of the island of Java) is the oldest Javanese source to recount the activities of these wali. This Babad gives prominence to four wali who formed part of a larger council convened in the kingdom of Demak after the fall of the great kingdom of Majapahit. It recognizes in particular the authority of Sunan Giri from Gresik. Sunan Bonang from Tuban was a critical intermediary and teacher. Sunan Kudus was the defender of Demak, his native region, and Sunan Kalijaga from Adilangu safeguarded the spiritual foundation of the kingdom of Mataram.

Other sources, as well as a lively oral tradition, provide a rich repertoire of tales about the wali. These tales combine historical narrative with exemplary accounts of their powers to portray the virtues of Islam. As such, they embody sufi traditions that have contributed to the formation of Islam on Java. In recent years, a substantial popular literature, consisting of booklets, pamphlets, and locally stenciled brochures, has developed to recount their lives.

Solichin Salam's influential Sekitar Wali Songo (Regarding the Wali Songo), first published in 1960, is principally responsible for consolidating the tradition of the Wali Songo around specifically named figures. Each of these nine saints is designated by title and a personal, usually Arabic, name. They are (1) Maulana Malik Ibrahim: Syeik Maghibi, (2) Sunan Ampel: Raden Rakmat or Raden Ainul Yaqien, (3) Sunan Bonang: Raden Maulana Makdum Ibrahim, (4) Sunan Giri: Raden Paku or Prabu Satmata, (5) Sunan Drajat: Raden Syarifuddin, (6) Sunan Kudus: Ja'far Sodik, (7) Sunan Kalijaga: Raden Mas Syahid, (8) Sunan Muria: Raden Umar Said, and (9) Sunan Gunung Jati: Faletahan or Raden Syarif Hidayatullah. Both genealogical and teacher-student relationships establish connections among these figures. The discovery at the beginning of the nineteenth century of an early Islamic gravestone at Gresik dating from the first part of the fifteenth century led to the inclusion of Maulana Malik Ibrahim in the core group of the wali.

Each of these figures has a recognized tomb associated with a mosque that serves as a site for local pilgrimage (ziarah). Visitors come at specific times determined by the intersection of cycles according to Javanese calendar reckoning to pray and carry out acts of religious piety. Tomb visitation may take place at any time, and many tombs have become the focus for local tourism. Proper visitation, however, is deemed more auspicious if it occurs at night, and especially on particular nights of the year. In East Java, the night of the Friday that coincides with Legi in the Javanese calendar is considered auspicious; in Central Java, the Friday night coinciding with Kliwon is considered so. Five of the nine wali have their tombs in East Java, three in Central Java, and one in West Java.

Besides the nine main wali, there are many other holy men who are regarded as wali in local tradition. Many of these, such as Sunan Tembayat, Sunan Geseng, and Syaikh Abdul Muhyi, also have tombs tended by descendants that are important sites of visitation. In fact, the whole of the Javanese countryside is filled with potential ziarah sites.

Visitors to the tombs of the wali believe that they gain blessing (baroka) from the rituals they perform during their visit. On their return to daily life, they look for signs of this blessing, and many return to offer thanks if they feel that they have obtained the blessing that they sought.

—James J. Fox

[Adapted and reproduced by permission of the publisher from James J. Fox, “Wali Songo” in Southeast Asia: A Historical Encyclopedia: From Angkor Wat to Timor, ed. Ooi Keat Gin (Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO, forthcoming).]

See also: Veneration of Holy People

References and further reading:

- Fox, James J. 1991. “Ziarah Visits to the Tombs of the Wali, the Founders of Islam on Java.” Pp. 19–38 in Islam in the Indonesian Social Context. Edited by M. C. Ricklefs. Clayton, Australia: Centre for Southeast Asian Studies, Monash University.
- . 1997. “Sunan Kalijaga and the Rise of Mataram: A Reading of the Babad Tanah Jawi as a Genealogical Narrative.” Pp. 187–218 in Islam: Essays on Scripture, Thought and Society. Edited by P. Riddell and A. Street. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- . 1998. “Wali: The First Preachers of Islam in Java.” In Religion and Ritual, 9: 18–19. Edited by J. J. Fox. Singapore: Archipelago.
- Salam, Solichin. 1960. Sekitar wali songo (Regarding the Wali Songo). Kudus, Indonesia: Penerbit “Menara.”

Wang Yangming (Wang Shouren)

(1472–1529 C.E.)

Neo-Confucian scholar

Wang Yangming was undoubtedly the most influential original Confucian thinker of the Ming dynasty (1368–1644), and the movement his teachings gave rise to, which took on the character of a religious revival, influenced the entire climate of Ming religion and thought. His school of thought also attracted considerable attention in Edo-period Japan, where they contributed to the idealism and political activism of the young samurai who led the anti-Tokugawa movement culminating in the Meiji Restoration. In China, Wang’s teachings were much criticized by Qing dynasty (1644–1910) scholars, some of whom even blamed them for the fall of the Ming. Yet the movement found major promoters again in the late nineteenth century in China, Japan, and Korea because of its lack of identification with the old regime and because its emphasis on self-reliance and independent moral judgment was felt to be appropriate to a modernizing society.

The course of Wang’s spiritual and intellectual development is often described with reference to “five falls” and “three changes.” The “five falls” refer to his recurrent periods of inordinate interest in “knightly ventures,” sporting and martial skills, literature, the Daoist pursuit of physical immortality, and Buddhism. The fact that he had such unorthodox interests suggests his bold and unbridled character, a character that eventually led him to redesign the whole program of Neo-Confucian self-cultivation in accord with his own personal spiritual experience. The “three changes” refer to changes in his teaching emphasis after his definitive conversion to Confucianism. According to his disciple Qian Dehong, his first period of teaching emphasized the doctrine of “the unity of knowledge and action.” Subsequently, from 1513, Wang gave special emphasis to quiet sitting or meditation. Finally, after 1521 he began to teach the doctrine of the extension of liangzhi, the “inborn knowledge of the good” (a term borrowed from the Mencius) into one’s own daily life of involvement with things and affairs.

The doctrine of the unity of knowledge and action is clearly a rejection of Zhu Xi’s (1130–1200) intellectualist teaching that knowledge precedes action, and it emphasizes that one has no real understanding of moral principles until one has struggled to put them into practice. The doctrine of the extension of liangzhi similarly rests on a rejection of Zhu Xi’s interpretation of the terms gewu and zhizhi, as found in the Confucian classic Daxue (Great learning), as meaning “to investigate things” in order to “extend [one’s intellectual] knowledge.” For Wang, the word “knowledge” actually refers to liangzhi, and the gewu practice, whereby liangzhi is extended, really means “to rectify affairs.” In line with his belief that lower-ranking and local officials should have more independent authority and more intimacy with the common people, he also rejected Zhu Xi’s emendation of the Daxue’s dictum “cherish the people” (qinmin) to read “renew the people” (xinmin), since the latter reading clearly supported the traditional paternalistic and authoritarian attitude of the official bureaucracy toward the people.

For Zhu Xi, the understanding of truth grows gradually over many years of book learning alternating with periods of quiet sitting and involvement in practical affairs. When Yangming was exiled to Longchang in the frontier region of Guizhou province, however, he had an enlightenment experience in which he realized that to search for moral principles externally is an endless task that can never reach fulfillment—because the object of the search is always separate from the subject who is searching. Rather, he proclaimed, one’s own heart-mind is in itself fully sufficient for the pursuit of sagehood, for it is born with an innate knowledge of the good (the original substance of the mind) that merely needs to be uncovered from the obscurity caused by self-centered desires. The heart-mind is naturally bright, like the sun, and becomes obscure only when hidden by some obstacle. Thus another core doctrine of Wang’s teaching, derived from Zhu Xi’s contemporary and philosophical rival, Lu Xiangshan (1139–1192), is that “the mind itself is principle.” If this is so, then truth is something that is grasped intuitively, in a single insight, even though it might take many years of practice to learn how to allow this inner light to shine forth amidst all of one’s activities.

Wang’s teachings, as with any great teacher, were open to different interpretations, and they gave rise to three main schools, usually referred to as the Existential Realization school, the Quietist school, and the Cultivation school. The first, founded on Wang’s controversial teaching that the original substance of the mind is beyond good and evil, emphasized the transcendental freedom of innate knowing and its spontaneous exercise, as well as the immediacy of the here and now and the sudden nature of enlightenment. The second taught that quietism was the essence of the doctrine of liangzhi and emphasized Wang’s doctrine of forming one body with all things. The third countered the unrestrained tendencies of the first school by emphasizing the necessity of effort, self-correction, and caution and attempted to bridge the gap between the Zhu Xi school and Wang’s teachings by maintaining that liangzhi was the same as heavenly principle (tianli).

Wang’s long interest in Buddhism and Daoism, and his strong populist emphasis on the idea that “every man can become a sage,” helped assure that his followers were more open to popular religious ideas and the theistic ideas preserved in the Confucian classics than to orthodox Confucianism, helping to fuel Ming movements toward syncretism among the “three religions.” For instance, Wang’s prominent disciple Wang Ji, the founder of the Existential Realization school, wrote, “The commitment to self-knowledge means to do without selfish calculation, premeditation, or disputation, and just to stand in the sight of the Lord-on-High to the end of one’s days” (de Bary 1999, 1: 858). Nakae Tōju (1608–1648), the founder of Wang Yang-ming learning in Japan, was first drawn to Yangming’s teachings by Wang Ji’s writings and their compatibility with religious worship. Some other of Wang’s disciples carried his teachings even further in the direction of bringing the pursuit of sagehood to the common man. Wang Gen (1483–1541), for instance, worked as a salt dealer and discussed the Four Books and the Xiao Jing (Classic of filial piety) on his business trips with anyone who would listen. He also practiced silent meditation for long periods of time, but he took no interest in scholarly study or in becoming a scholar-official. He was concerned, rather, with the conduct of life and with preserving and loving the self: “If the self is not secure, the root is not established. To make the self secure, one must love and respect the self, and one who does this cannot but love and respect others.” He also emphasized the enjoyment of life: “Enjoy and then learn, Learn and then enjoy. . . . Ah! among all the joys of this world what compares to learning!” (de Bary 1999, 1: 861, 863).

The long debate between Wang’s and Zhu Xi’s versions of Neo-Confucianism can be likened to the earlier “gradual enlightenment” vs. “sudden enlightenment” debate between different schools of Zen Buddhism, and it appears that the same tension between the affirmation of external and internal authority exists within every religious tradition. As a case in point, one might also liken Wang’s rejection of Cheng-Zhu learning, which had become institutionalized as the official doctrine of the state and the examination system, to the Protestant rejection of Catholic Christianity, even though there were advocates of what might be called “sudden and unmediated salvation” in the Catholic tradition as well, at least among the mystics.

—Barry D. Steben

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Confucianism and Holy People; Nakae Tōju; Zhu Xi

References and further reading:

- Bary, William T. de, and Irene Bloom, eds. 1999. Sources of Chinese Tradition, 2d ed. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Ching, Julia. 1976. To Acquire Wisdom: The Way of Wang Yang-ming. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Wang Yang-ming. 1963. Instructions for Practical Living. Translated by Wing-tsit Chan. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Wing-tsit Chan, ed. 1963. A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Wang Zhe (Wang Che)

(1112–1170 C.E.)

Daoist school founder

Wang Zhe, also known as Chongyan, was the founder of Quanzhen (Perfect Realization) Daoism in China. Although he lived during the twelfth century in northern China (Shaanxi and Shandong provinces), Quanzhen Daoism expanded and still survives today as a vital school throughout China, Taiwan, and the Chinese diaspora. Quanzhen is a monastic form of Daoism that includes monks, nuns, and lay believers. Wang’s teachings emphasized leaving the family (chujia) and practicing asceticism and inner alchemy (neidan). As a patriarch of Quanzhen, Wang, his life, and his teachings have been the subjects of scriptures, temple murals, statues, paintings, and rituals throughout Chinese history.

Historical and hagiographical sources provide details of Wang’s life. He was born in Xianyang (Shaanxi province) to an elite family in 1112. Some accounts report that Wang’s mother became pregnant after having a dream and that her pregnancy lasted twenty-four months. Wang briefly served as a low-level local official responsible for tax collection on alcoholic beverages. His first episode of religious awareness occurred in 1159, when he encountered two immortal beings in a butcher shop who gave him secret instructions. After this experience, Wang adopted the Daoist name Chongyang (double superior powers) and began practicing a form of self-cultivation known as internal alchemy in which he concentrated his mind and body to create a powerful elixir using the elements within himself.

Following a second encounter with some immortals in a wine shop, Wang left his family and dug a burial mound in which he lived for three years while he engaged in rigorous practice. Wang continued to live and practice in a hut nearby until he achieved enlightenment in 1167. Once enlightened, Wang burned his hut and traveled to the Shandong area, where he attracted disciples and established many congregations. He died in 1170.

Several texts preserved in the Daoist canon claim to be the works of Wang Zhe. Two of the best known are a manual for Quanzhen practice called Chongyang lijiao shiwu lun (Fifteen discourses on the teachings set forth by Chongyang) and a collection of his writings entitled Chongyang quanzhen ji (Quanzhen anthology of Chongyang).

—Noelle Giuffrida

See also: Action in the World; Ascetics as Holy People; Awakening and Conversion; Daoism and Holy People; Monasticism and Holy People

References and further reading:

Eskildsen, Stephen. 1998. Asceticism in Early Taoist Religion. SUNY Series in Chinese Philosophy and Culture. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Yao, Tao-chung. 1980. "Ch'uan-chen: A New Taoist Sect in North China during the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Arizona–Tucson.

War, Peace, and Holy People

All religions agree that war is proper under some circumstances, but not all religions make warriors into heroes of the faith. Tribal religions of the Americas and Africa especially allow the concept of the warrior as a holy person—a servant of the gods and at times a protector of religious values. At the other end of the scale, Christianity has almost always been deeply ambivalent toward war, especially in light of Jesus' admonitions to "turn the other cheek" (Matt. 5:39; Luke 6:29), and Christianity has only under special circumstances elevated the warrior to holy status. In the modern world, the spiritual leaders of many religions now advocate peace—but Islam especially still recognizes the role of the hero of the faith as an important element of holiness.

The ethnic-focused religions tend to define enemies as the "other" and give an important role in their conceptions of the divine to gods who can give aid in battle. So it is hardly surprising that great Amerindian war leaders, ranging from Aztec rulers such as Axayacatl (d. 1481) to Crazy Horse (1840–1877), were perceived as enjoying the special favor of the gods. For the peoples of central Mexico, warriors in general were regarded as holy people, their success ensured by proper rituals and a proper relationship to the gods. Indeed, it was said of the Aztec ruler Nezahualcoyotl (d. 1472) that he had been specially anointed with the "spirit of warfare," waging war as part of his sacred duty to obtain captives who could then be sacrificed to the sun. Similarly, with African rulers it is sometimes unclear whether they were great warriors because they were holy people or vice versa. Several heroic figures, such as the orisha Oyá, were deified specifically as war deities. Similarly, ancient Greek heroes such as Theseus were especially venerated because their warrior prowess in life was believed to continue after their deaths.

A similar process, making great warriors on earth into holy figures who can bring further victory, can also be seen in China and Japan. For example, Guandi, a military hero of the Han era of the third century, was promoted into the celestial hierarchy by imperial decree. Similarly, the Japanese warrior Sanno Gongen (d. 1333) was declared a god at his death and became the guardian of the Tokugawa dynasty. Also in Japan, the semilegendary emperor Ōjin (c. 400 C.E.) became the major warrior kami Hachiman.

In the other religions of the East, with the exception of Jainism, members of the warrior caste have been not only permitted but required to kill enemies in a just war. For Hinduism, the position is laid out definitively in the Bhagavad Gita, in which the god Krishna commands the unwilling Arjuna to fight his enemies as a matter of duty even though they are his kinsmen. But Arjuna is not regarded as a holy person in the Hindu tradition, nor are other members of the kshatriya caste who have fought, no matter how just the cause. Similarly, Buddhism has accepted the occasional necessity of war, but only rarely have Buddhists venerated the warriors involved as holy. More typical of the Buddhist position is the Indian emperor Ashoka's disgust in the third century B.C.E. at the destruction he himself had caused with his conquests, causing him to forswear physical warfare for the sake of "dharma war"—spreading a moral message throughout India and beyond. Nevertheless, several Buddhist national traditions include holy warriors. This is a particularly strong theme in Vietnam, which includes no fewer than three holy women who fought for Vietnamese independence: Trieu Au (third century C.E.) and the sisters Trung Trac and Trung Nhi, who led a rebellion in about 40 C.E. All three committed suicide when their rebellions were crushed, and all are still worshipped. This seems a clear case in which nationalist longings created a local variant of popular belief. Southeast Asia, so often the victim of outside conquest, has other cases of Buddhist holy people who defended their countries, ranging from the Korean monk Sosan Hyujong (1520–1604), who led a successful guerrilla war to repel the Japanese, to the modern Thai monk Kitthiwuttho, who has argued that devout Buddhists should kill Communists to cleanse their society.

Of the universal religions, Islam has produced the most holy people whose holiness derives specifically from their leadership of jihad (holy war). The evolution of this idea began with the origins of Islam: Muhammad (570–632) was not holy because he was a successful war leader, but his leadership in war was acknowledged as divinely aided and necessary to the establishment of the new religion. Muhammad's victory at the Battle of Badr in 624, in which a small Muslim army defeated a much larger force of Meccans, made it clear that warfare could not be bad. Many of the Shi'i imams who are regarded as holy people were also effective fighting men, some leading large campaigns. It was only the crucible of the early modern world, though, that began to transform the warrior of Islam from simply a pious man doing God's will into a saint.

Starting in about 1500, a series of leaders rose, widely regarded as holy people, whose central message was to urge the people to jihad. Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al-Ghazi (c. 1506–1543) waged jihad in East Africa, while in West Africa Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Karim al-Maghili (d. 1505) urged good rulers to embrace jihad. Perceived ill treatment of Muslims by colonial powers triggered all the mechanisms to call full-scale *jihad*s into being in many regions by the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Because Islam itself was perceived to be under threat, the leaders of such movements won renown as holy people, ranging from Uthman dan Fodio (1754–1817) in Nigeria to Muhammad Ahmad al-Sayed (1844–1885) of the Sudan, who declared himself to be the mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse) and drove his followers to establish a pure Islamic state. Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) of Iran is a more recent example. The Sikh faith, growing out of Islam, has not conferred holiness on its warriors, but like early Islam its followers exhibit a willingness to fight for their religion. All Sikh men carry a dagger as testimony to their commitment to defend their faith, a militant response to persecution initiated by the sixth guru, Har-gobind (1595–1644).

And then there are the Christians, coming of age in a Roman and Germanic world that idealized war, and seeking to make sense of an often-pacifist gospel message in light of their society's warrior values. The result was that mainstream Christians have sometimes advocated peace and sometimes idolized warriors; minority groups have often urged the opposite stand to that of the mainstream. Christianity soon accepted that one could practice the religion while serving in the Roman army—although not to the point of fighting fellow Christians. Thus early Christianity produced several warrior saints, Roman soldiers such as Maurice and the other members of the Theban Legion, who were loyal soldiers except for their refusal to betray their faith, and were martyred as a result in 287. Rare indeed is the legendary statement of Martin of Tours (c. 336–397) that as a soldier of Christ he was not allowed to fight. Several other Christian saints became special patrons of the military. This was a logical development in the case of the military St. George. Odder are cases of virgin martyrs defending their faithful flocks posthumously, such as Geneviève of Paris (c. 422–500), credited with diverting Attila the Hun with her prayers in life, and with stopping the Vikings long after her death. Oddest of all, though, is the afterlife of the apostle James the Greater, who in Spain became the heavenly patron of the reconquest, famed as Matamoros (killer of Moors), often depicted in armor on a white horse.

Still, few Christian saints were regarded as saints because of their qualities as fighters. An early exception from peripheral lands is the Ethiopian Caleb (d. before 549) who warred against the persecutors of Christianity. Although the crusades were preached up and down Europe as holy wars, the crusader movement produced very few saints. The only clear cases of warriors regarded as holy in the medieval centuries were the Russian Alexander Nevskii (1220–1263) and the Castilian Ferdinand III (c. 1198–1252). Ferdinand's sanctity was based especially on the great successes of the reconquest against the Moors during his reign. The Russian Alexander Nevskii was a nationalist saint similar to the Vietnamese Buddhist cases considered above; he protected his land from an invasion of people aimed at the destruction of his religion—in this case, Latin-rite Catholic Christians, the Teutonic Knights. Joan of Arc (1412–1431) was a more controversial case, since the English enemies of France whom she fought were also Christian. This ambiguity probably accounts for the fact that she was not formally canonized until 1920.

In general, though, the mainstream teachings of Christianity have more often advocated peace than war, and many more Christians are regarded as holy people for their role in making peace than in making war, suggesting that, whatever the realities of political life, popular opinion did regard peace as more true to Christianity. Thus in the 960s when the patriarch of Constantinople was asked to declare that all soldiers who died fighting Muslims were martyrs, he refused, declaring that all war is against Christianity. Much of the strength of medieval Christian monasticism lies in the fact that monks did not (with rare exceptions) fight; therefore, they could pray for the warrior classes, who were sullied with blood. Many of the greatest Christian saints, such as Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), were especially famed for their ability to reconcile enemies and end fighting.

The role of the holy person as reconciler is an important subtheme of other religions as well. The Sioux legend of Tailfeather Woman tells how the Great Spirit inspired her to make peace between her people and the soldiers; the Huron prophet Deganawida (c. 1550–c. 1600) brought peace and unity to the tribes of the Iroquois. Examples can be found in other religions of holy people whose personal spiritual authority has stopped war. The role of saint as peacemaker, indeed, has taken on new life in the twentieth century as military technology has made war more devastating than ever. A series of great Muslim leaders, such as Malik Sy (1854–1922), Ayatullah Burujirdi (1875–1962), and Cerno Bokar Salif Taal (c. 1880–1940), have condemned jihad. Christians of all denominations have advocated peace, some popular figures, such as Peace Pilgrim (1908–1981), making themselves living symbols of a desire for peace. Perhaps the greatest twentieth-century martyr for peace was the Hindu Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948), who was influenced by the Jain teaching of ahimsa (not-harming) to win India's independence peacefully and to contain the ensuing civil war.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Alexander Nevskii; Ashoka; Axayacatl; Burujirdi, Ayatullah; Caleb; Catherine of Siena; Crazy Horse; Deganawida; Extremists as Holy People; Gandhi, Mohandas K.; Geneviève; George; Ghazi, Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al-; Guandi; Hargobind; James the Greater; Joan of Arc; Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi; Malik Sy, Al-Hajj; Martin of Tours; Maurice; Muhammad; Muhammad Ahmad; Ōjin; O'yá; Peace Pilgrim; Salif Taal, Cerno Bokar; Tailfeather Woman; Theban Legion; Theseus; Uthman dan Fodio; Violence and Nonviolence

References and further reading:

Baum, Gregory. 2001. Nationalism, Religion, and Ethics. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
Peters, Rudolph. 1979. Islam and Colonialism: The Doctrine of Jihad in Modern History. The Hague: Mouton.

Ward, Mary

(1585–1645 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun, order founder, educator

Mary Ward, a Catholic Englishwoman and founder of the Institute of the English Ladies, was born in 1585 into a Yorkshire gentry family, and in 1606 she entered a convent of the Poor Clares in the Spanish Netherlands. In 1609, a vision inspired her to establish a new religious order using the organization and rules of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits) as her model. The purpose of the Institute of the English Ladies was to educate and conduct missions among women. The institute grew rapidly, founding a number of houses in the Holy Roman Empire and Italy, along with a secret house from 1614 in London.

Ward's vision was of a female religious order active in the community rather than enclosed within the walls of a convent that could operate in hostile lands outside the jurisdiction of bishops. This concept ran counter to the church's efforts after the Council of Trent (1545–1563) to enforce more strict enclosure and greater control by local bishops over female monastic houses. Thus, when Ward traveled to Rome in 1621 to gain formal recognition of her organization from Gregory XV, her request met with a hostile response. Between 1625 and 1630, the papacy closed the institute's houses, and in 1631 Ward was imprisoned in Munich for a short period by the Inquisition. After her release, she worked to transform her organization into a secular teaching institution for girls—a more acceptable vocation in the eyes of church authorities.

Ward died in 1645 and never received formal recognition from the church of her holy status. Her desire to play an active role in the educational and missionary fields outside the traditional boundaries of female monasticism made her a controversial figure during her lifetime. Nevertheless, in many respects she embodied several aspects of holiness recognized in other contemporary figures. Of the fifty-five saints canonized between 1588 and 1776, twelve, like Ward, were founders or reformers of religious orders. Moreover, missionaries and teachers were prominent among those recognized by the church as worthy of canonization. Many of her contemporaries, including Archduke Albert of the Spanish Netherlands and Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, viewed her as a holy woman despite her radical vision, which challenged the church's efforts to cloister religious women. However, the close control over the canonization process by the Catholic Reformation church removed the possibility of formal recognition of her holy status.

—Eric Nelson

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Mission; Recognition

References and further reading:

Fraser, Antonia. 1981. "Mary Ward: A Seventeenth-Century Reformer." History Today 31 (May): 14–18.
O'Laoghaire, Dominic. 1982. "Mary Ward, 1585–1645: A Personal Tribute." Archivium Hibernicum 37: 3–10.
Rapley, Elizabeth. 1990. The Dévotes: Women and Church in Seventeenth-Century France. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.

Wealth and Poverty

All of the world's religions have emphasized that a true worshipper should focus on the divine rather than concentrating energy on acquiring the goods of this world. A very frequent theme is absolute poverty, stripping away worldly goods for God's sake. At the least, as in Confucianism, Daoism, and Judaism, a person with any pretensions of holiness should not crave wealth, especially if wealth comes only at the price of moral compromise. Within this broad context, however, attitudes toward wealth and poverty have varied in the world religions, and a fair number of recognized holy people have lived in conditions of affluence, although usually with the disclaimer that wealth meant nothing to them.

Renunciation of all possessions is a very common theme in Hinduism, Buddhism, and Christianity, forming the central basis of an ascetic life. But what does this renunciation mean in practice? For Christian monks and nuns through the past two millennia, giving up possessions has meant above all a renunciation of self-will: The monastic owns nothing personally, but the monastic environment supplies all their needs, including usually plentiful food, shelter, libraries, expensive liturgical gear, and so on. The mendicant movement launched in the early thirteenth century by Sts. Francis (c. 1180–1226) and Dominic (1170–1223) in its early days stressed absolute poverty, to the point of real need, but a comfortable infrastructure of communal houses and incomes soon developed. Whether or not professional religious should have possessions has sometimes become an explosive issue in Christianity, as when a number of “spiritual” Franciscans of the early fourteenth century went to the stake to defend their commitment to utter poverty. In early sixteenth-century Russia, there was a strong movement that monks should be poor, started by Nilus of Sora (1433–1508), that led to a major struggle between “possessors” and “non-possessors,” the possessors arguing that what was important was spiritual rather than actual poverty. Similarly, Buddhist monks and nuns possess only a robe and a begging bowl—personally. But through most of Buddhist history, the corporation, the monastery, has been at least adequately and sometimes lavishly endowed. In both religions, the starting premise is that real contact to the divine, or liberation, requires complete commitment, and worldly possessions are a distraction. But to exist as an institution in time, monasticism needs a regular income. It should be noted, though, that in both religions the spiritually advanced have often retreated from the comfort of the monastery to become hermits or wanderers.

Perhaps because less institutionalized, the renunciants of Islam, Hinduism, and Jainism often appear more absolute in their commitment to absolute poverty. Some Hindu holy people have taken the vow of samnyas, complete renunciation of all possessions; indeed, renunciation is built into Hindu life as the ideal fourth stage of human life. Less common but still significant is the Muslim faqir (poor man), a person who is dependent on God sometimes specifically for spiritual needs, but often for daily physical needs. Such a person lives by begging, as do Jain renunciants. In both cases, however, the renunciant is normally protected from actual physical need by the religion’s strong emphasis on the duty of the laity to provide for such holy beggars.

Such an attitude makes it impossible to condemn wealth completely, and several religions have recognized as holy rich people who have served as patrons of renunciants. In fact, in Christianity a look at any book of saints leaves the strong impression that the best way to win a reputation for holiness has been to endow a monastery. Giving gifts to holy people is a way to obtain merit, as especially stands out in the cases of the early fifth-century female saints Paula (347–404) and Melania the Younger (c. 383–439), both exceedingly rich, and both of whom showed themselves to be holy by the practice of traveling around giving gifts to holy people, as well as founding religious houses. In more modern times, Katharine Drexel (1858–1955) inherited a large fortune that she decided to spend to help suffering blacks and Amerindians. The theme also appears in Buddhism: The early Buddhist Anathapindika (fifth century B.C.E.), a wealthy banker, provided a home for the Buddha and his disciples in the wet seasons, as well as feeding them and other renunciants. He gradually reduced himself to poverty in this way, but a god made him rich again, suggesting a divine blessing to the open-handed wealthy.

Better yet is a wealthy person who gives up everything. It is important to note that simply being impoverished is not enough to win holy status; even the comfortable middle class do not win much esteem in the popular eye by giving up their wealth, unless they do so as flamboyantly as Francis of Assisi did. But people around the world have marveled at rich people who take on complete poverty, perhaps from astonishment that perceived oppressors should have such a conversion, perhaps from a simple conviction that the rich have everything they could possibly want, so it makes a strong impression when they give it up for God. Spoiled rich kids who adopt radical poverty are indeed an edifying spectacle, especially when they have a visible conversion, such as John the Almsgiver (c. 550–616/619), who gave up all his wealth after his family influence won him the patriarchate of Alexandria, or Thomas Becket (c. 1120–1170), who distributed his wealth after becoming archbishop of Canterbury. Sometimes the conversion is portrayed as dramatic, as in the case of the Hindu Purandaradasa (1485–1565), who, according to legend, was a wealthy jeweler—and a hard-hearted miser. The tale is told of him that he refused to help a poor man, upon which his wife gave the beggar her own nose ring. Purandaradasa was outraged, and his wife decided to poison herself, but the ring that had been given away miraculously appeared in the cup of poison before she drank it.

A particularly attractive combination is when holy people have combined personal poverty with a firm commitment to help the involuntary poor. This can take the form of actually living among the poor. The monks of the ecumenical community of Taizé, who are sent in groups to live in some of the most impoverished regions of the world, are a significant recent example. The Baha’i leader Baha’u’llah (1817–1892) taught that the poor are a divine trust and that the need to help them is absolute because poverty degrades people in contradiction to God’s law. It is hard, though, to combine personal poverty with significant care of the poor, since practical support requires systematic, regular, dependable income, whether raised through collections or by any other means. Especially from the seventeenth century on, religious leaders have founded many charitable organizations. Vincent de Paul (1576–1660), Frances Cabrini (1850–1917), and Dorothy Day (1897–1980) are notable examples of holy people who have chosen this approach.

The modern consumer society has succeeded in displacing even this deeply rooted respect for poverty as an ideal for holy life, at least for some people. Many founders of new religions and cults have adopted lives of extraordinary luxury. Sometimes when word of this has spread it has led to a revulsion of feeling among their followers; at other times, the material success of the leader appears to be taken as a proof of holiness. A good example of the modern phenomenon is Osho, also known as Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (1931–1990), the founder of a Hindu movement that attracted a wide following in Europe and America (he was regarded as immoral by Indians). Osho moved to the United States, where he lived on a massive ranch in Oregon. He acquired, among other things, a vast collection of watches and ninety-three Rolls Royce automobiles before the government finally charged him with immigration fraud and tax evasion and deported him. These revelations diminished but did not destroy his following.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Anathapindika; Baha'u'llah; Cabrini, Frances; Day, Dorothy; Dominic; Francis of Assisi; Hermits; John the Almsgiver; Melania the Younger; Nilus of Sora; Osho; Paula; Purandaradasa; Thomas Becket; Vincent de Paul

Wenceslas

(907–929 C.E.)

Christian ruler, martyr

At a time of tension between the native Slavic religion and Christianity during the tenth century, Wenceslas's holiness was displayed through his promulgation of Christianity and, ultimately, by his martyrdom for the cause. The son of the Christian prince Vratislav, he was born in 907 near Prague. Vratislav had married a nominally Christian woman, Drahomira, the daughter of a non-Christian tribal chief, who held tenaciously to the ancient beliefs. When Wenceslas was thirteen, his father was killed in battle. Wenceslas was brought up by his highly religious grandmother Ludmilla, with the help of her priest, a disciple of St. Methodius.

Wenceslas became duke of Bohemia in 922. He was renowned not only for following the advice of the clergy but also for working to improve the education of his people. This required greater contact with the rest of the Christian world, especially the German empire, whose ruler, Henry I, was his overlord.

Wenceslas was killed by his brother's followers in 929, probably as an anti-Christian backlash against his Christian determination. Nevertheless, his brother had his body translated immediately to the church of St. Vitus in Prague. The position Wenceslas had held against the pagan onslaught in this period of extreme anxiety ensured that he was immediately viewed by the townspeople as a martyr for the faith. The church became a place of pilgrimage and his tomb a miracle-working shrine. For example, Charles IV recorded that a poor woman who was blind and whose arms were impaired went into the church, fell onto the ground before the grave of Wenceslas, and prayed until she regained her sight and the use of her arms.

The cult of Wenceslas spread to Bavaria and Saxony, and his feast was officially celebrated from 985. By the early eleventh century, he was recognized as the patron saint of Bohemia. His image was engraved upon coins, and the crown of Wenceslas was recognized as a symbol of Czech republicanism and nationalism. In 1344, Charles IV began the construction of the gothic cathedral of St. Vitus, employing Peter Parler to build the Wenceslas chapel, magnificently decorated with wall paintings and precious stones.

The name of Wenceslas became popularized and associated with generosity by the famous Christmas carol "Good King Wenceslas," which was adapted from a thirteenth-century spring carol by J. M. Neale (1818–1886). There is no evidence, however, that the contents of the carol are based on any particular events in the life of the saint.

—Eleanor Pridgeon

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Nagy, Balazs, and Frank Schaer, eds. 2001. Autobiography of Emperor Charles IV and His Legend of Wenceslas. Budapest: Central European University Press.
- Ormrod, Lucy. 1997. "The Wenceslas Chapel in Saint Vitus' Cathedral, Prague." 2 vols. Ph.D. dissertation, University of Bristol.
- Parrott, Cecil. 1966. "Saint Wenceslas of Bohemia." History Today 16: 225–233.

Wesley, John

(1703–1791 C.E.)

Christian mystic, founder of Methodism

Born in Epworth, England, in 1703, John Benjamin Wesley was the fifteenth child (of nineteen) of Samuel Wesley, a fervent minister of the Church of England, and his equally devout wife, Susanna; he was the grandson of stalwart Dissenters. Susanna Wesley was the strong-willed protector and frugal steward of her rectory household and instructed her children thoroughly in prayer and Christian discipline. Rescued like "a brand plucked from the burning" from a fire consuming the rectory when he was six years old, John (with his mother's concurrence) later considered his escape from sure death a sign from Providence of his marked spiritual destiny. Throughout his early years, John also absorbed his father's teachings on the authenticity of "the inward witness" of a religious life.

John Wesley, founder of the Methodist Church. Painting by Nathaniel Hone, 1766. (Bettmann/Corbis)

In 1720, Wesley entered Christ Church at Oxford University, and his years there were to be decisive for his later ministry. At Oxford, Wesley was able to enrich his inquisitive mind with a wide array of studies. In 1726, as a fellow at Lincoln College (the same year his brother Charles entered Christ Church), he was able to refine his natural abilities as a speaker and as a facile moderator of complex ideas while teaching Greek and philosophy. John Wesley was a voracious reader, particularly of spiritual writings, including the works of William Law (1686–1761) and Thomas à Kempis (c. 1379–1471), and of the Eastern and Western fathers, including Gregory of Nyssa (c. 330–394) and Ephrem the Syrian (c. 306–373). On September 19, 1725, John Wesley was ordained a deacon, and on September 22, 1728, Bishop Potter of Oxford ordained him as a priest of the Church of England.

In 1729, Wesley became the leader of a religious group at Oxford that had been recently founded by his brother. Charles Wesley had gathered together a community of students known as the Holy Club for regular Bible study, organized devotions, communion, and scholarly investigation into early Christian liturgies and practices. Upon John Wesley's assumption of leadership of the Holy Club, so frankly singular in their devotions and Christian fellowship were the members of the group perceived to be that they collectively became known as the people of "the method," or the "Methodists." Wesley set as an ideal for himself and for the members of his community to live on about £28 a year, strongly urging his group toward works of social reform. He also insisted that Methodist meetings take place at times apart from the services of local churches so that his community could still receive communion from ministers of the Church of England.

In 1735, three weeks after his father's death, John Wesley, along with his brother Charles and others from the Holy Club, sailed to America on an evangelical mission to Georgia. It was a dismal failure. However, on his voyage to America, Wesley and his comrades were shipmates with a group of Moravians who, during a violent storm at sea, merely sang hymns as the ship tossed to and fro. This so impressed John Wesley that he determined to learn more from them, including a study of their German language and its pious hymnody. His study and then translation into English of the German hymns transformed Wesley. He now embraced in a profoundly spiritual way the words of those hymns: "love," "prayer," "surrender," "grace," "assurance," and "joy." Wesley's spirituality, always on the brink, was turning more and more inward, laced with a mystical and sacramental fervor. It was a Moravian, Peter Bohler, who urged Wesley, now safely at home in London, to put aside the intellectualism of his faith and allow it to arise fully felt in his soul.

On May 24, 1738, John Wesley went to a meeting on Aldersgate Street and, as he listened to a reading of Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans, "felt his heart greatly warmed." From that experience and others over the course of the next several months, John Wesley crystallized the doctrine of Methodism as an itinerant preacher in England, emphasizing inwardness of faith, the role of grace and works, and perfect love. His spiritual message was mirrored by a tightly organized Methodist fellowship and missionary movement within the Church of England, although Methodism quickly expanded into regions such as Wales and the American colonies in response to the passionate preaching of itinerant Methodist lay preachers such as George Whitefield and Samuel Walker. In that expansion lay the doctrinal and organizational seeds of the inevitable break of the Methodist movement from the Church of England.

Wesley himself admitted that the tenets of Methodism set it apart from the Church of England because they allowed itinerant preaching by laypeople, encouraged nonliturgical prayer, supported the formation of small Methodist societies wherever they sought to arise, and had evolved a less liturgically based, less sacramental form of worship. Wesley was also very socially conscious and was often quoted as having said, “Go to those who need you most.” His various pamphlets against social ills included invectives against smugglers, freeholders, and, in 1774, slavery. He encouraged the American Methodist members to act on behalf of emancipation, stating that slavery was against the laws of God. John Wesley died materially poor but spiritually fulfilled in London after a short illness on March 2, 1791. Although married, Wesley had no children, but he did leave a growing religious sect of 135,000 members (at the time of his death) and 541 itinerant preachers.

—June-Ann Greeley

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Ephrem the Syrian; Gregory of Nyssa; Laity; Protestantism and Holy People; Reform and Reaction; Ritual

References and further reading:

- Collins, Kenneth J. 1999. A Real Christian: The Life of John Wesley. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Heitzenrater, Richard P. 1994. Wesley and the People Called Methodists. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Hindmarsh, D. Bruce. 1996. John Newton and the English Evangelical Tradition: Between Conversions of Wesley and Wilberforce. Oxford: Clarendon.
- Wesley, John. 1988. The Works of John Wesley: Sermons 1–151. 4 vols. Edited by Alfred Outler. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Wesley, John, and Charles Wesley. 1981. Selected Prayers, Hymns, Journal Notes, Sermons, Letters and Treatises. Edited by Frank Whaling. New York: Paulist Press.

White, Ellen Gould Harmon

(1827–1915 C.E.)

Cofounder of Seventh-Day Adventism

Along with Joseph Smith and Mary Baker Eddy, Ellen Gould Harmon White, cofounder of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, is recognized as one of the three most important prophets in the American Christian tradition. She was born in 1827 in Maine, where her childhood took an important turn when she received a head injury at age nine, after which she received no more formal schooling and withdrew strongly from the world. The young Ellen’s family accepted the message of William Miller that the world would end in 1844, and when the Great Disappointment came (the failure of Christ to appear), Ellen was particularly devastated by it. The great nonevent triggered the first of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of visions the prophet experienced during her lifetime.

Ellen Gould Harmon’s visionary existence took a more focused turn in 1846 when she married James White, a major leader of the Adventist movement that continued after the failure of Millerite millennial expectations. The group that the pair soon came to lead marked themselves off by the influence of the Seventh-day Baptist church and Ellen’s own vision clearly signifying that the instruction to honor the sabbath was the most important of the Ten Commandments. The group insisted on worshipping on Saturday rather than Sunday, very strictly prohibiting secular activities on that day. The combination of this and ongoing belief in the imminent coming of Christ was the beginning of the establishment of a distinctive American denomination that also came to emphasize healing, hygiene, and the belief that for most humans death is the normal end of life, but good Christians will have a new life at the resurrection and become immortal.

Ellen White’s role in the movement seems to have been intended by her husband to be that of a “tame prophet.” White’s visions were utilized to certify and confirm the movement’s doctrines and the decisions of the leaders. But after James White died in 1881, Ellen White increasingly took the initiative, sometimes to the alarm of the rest of the leadership circle, but increasingly shaping the growth of the new church. Her personal theology is perhaps best expressed by her work The Great Controversy between Christ and Satan, first published in 1858. By the time of her death in 1915, the Seventh-day Adventists were a stable body, famous for their hospitals and general care for health, with congregations in many countries.

Some Adventists read White’s works as scriptural in their authority. It is more common now, though, to recognize that she was a fallible human being—some of her reported visions are very naive—who was sometimes inspired by God.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Contemporary Holy People; Miller, William; Prophets

References and further reading:

- Conkin, Paul K. 1997. American Originals: Homemade Varieties of Christianity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- White, Ellen Gold Harmon. 1950. The Great Controversy between Christ and Satan. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press Publishing Association.

Wiborada

(d. 926 C.E.)

Christian recluse, prophet, martyr

Wiborada, the tenth-century recluse of the Christian monastery of St. Gall, was the first woman canonized by the Roman church. She displayed all the prized characteristics of an early medieval female saint: noble birth, virginity, bodily asceticism, violent martyrdom, and the ability to aid male figures of importance.

Growing up in the Swiss town of Klingnau, Wiborada spurned the luxuries of her aristocratic family. When her brother Hatto joined the monastery of St. Gall, she made his clothes and worked for the abbey, primarily by binding books for the library. Eventually, Wiborada joined Hatto, turning their house into an infirmary and saying the Latin offices with her brother. It was through her encouragement following a pilgrimage to Rome that Hatto decided to take his vows.

Although Wiborada's life became increasingly pious, a servant raised accusations that she was having improper sexual relations with Hatto. She was forced to undergo trial by ordeal. The charges were cleared when Bishop Salomon of Constance visited the abbey and recognized her goodness. Deciding to withdraw from the world, Wiborada first retreated to the mountain hermitage of St. George. Her austerity became well known, and people vied with each other to give her alms. Her desire for eremetical solitude increased so that by 891 Bishop Salomon agreed to wall her into a cell next to the church of St. Magnus, where she remained, practicing extraordinary mortifications, for thirty-four years. Due to her gifts for healing and prophecy, many came to see her, and other women, such as the blessed Rachild, whom Wiborada had cured, settled in nearby cells to also live as recluses. Among Wiborada's notable prophecies was her prediction that a young student at St. Gall would rise to the episcopate and should therefore not enter the monastery: This was the famous St. Ulrich, bishop of Augsburg.

Wiborada also had a vision that the invading Hungarians would storm the area and cause her martyrdom. Her warnings allowed the monks to escape, but she refused to leave her cell. In 926, the Hungarians burned the church and killed her with a hatchet while she knelt in prayer.

Wiborada was canonized in 1047. She was a figure of undisputed holiness and was immediately venerated as a saint. Wiborada is the patron of book lovers and sellers, the protector of items of learning usually associated with the medieval male clergy.

—Annika Elisabeth Fisher

See also: Gender and Holy People; Hermits; Martyrdom and Persecution; Prophets; Ulrich of Augsburg

References and further reading:

- Berschlin, Walter. 1982. "Verena und Wiborada: Mythos, Geschichte und Kult im X. Jahrhundert." Freiburger Diözesan-Archiv 102: 5–15.
- , ed. 1983. Vitae Sanctae Wiboradae: Die ältesten Lebensbeschreibungen der heiligen Wiborada. Mitteilungen zur vaterländischen Geschichte, 51. St. Gall, Switzerland: Historischer Verein des Kantons St. Gallen.
- Butler, Alban. 1956. "St. Wiborada, Virgin and Martyr." In Butler's Lives of the Saints, 2: 218–219. Edited and revised by Herbert Thurston and Donald Attwater. New York: P. J. Kennedy and Sons.

Wilfrid

(634–709 C.E.)

Christian abbot, bishop

Wilfrid, an Anglo-Saxon abbot of Ripon and bishop of York, is remembered for his defense of the Roman church at the Synod of Whitby in 664. He was active throughout his life both in England and on the continent.

Born in 634 in Northumbria, Wilfrid spent his early life under the influence of the Irish church but eventually became one of the staunchest defenders of the Roman church in England. At the age of fourteen, he was sent to live at the court of Oswy, king of Northumbria. Oswy's queen, Eanfleda, took a personal interest in him and supported him in his decision to study at the monastery of Lindisfarne, an Irish monastery off the east coast of England. After three years there, Wilfrid traveled to Rome and then to the kingdom of the Franks, where he received the Roman tonsure.

Wilfrid returned to England around 660 and was made abbot at the newly founded Roman-style abbey at Ripon, which replaced an existing Irish house. After having an influential role in the Roman church's triumph at the Synod of Whitby, he was made bishop of York in place of Colman, who had argued on behalf of the Irish church. Wilfrid returned to France and was consecrated there.

Wilfrid did not return to England until 666. He was caught in a storm in the English Channel and shipwrecked on the Sussex coast, where he came into contact with hostile non-Christian tribes. When he finally made it back to Northumbria, he discovered that another bishop, Chad, a proponent of the Irish church, had been appointed in his absence. Wilfrid retreated to southern England and was only reappointed as bishop in 669 through the influence of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury.

Wilfrid's troubles continued. He allowed Queen Etheldreda (Aethelthryth), the wife of Oswy's successor, Ecgfrid, to leave her husband and enter a convent, thereby earning the king's disapproval. Etheldreda later founded the monastery at Ely. Theodore, perhaps upset by Wilfrid's propensity for leaving his see for extended periods of time, subdivided the diocese of York and chose bishops himself to fill the new sees. Wilfrid left for Rome to appeal to the pope, and the case was decided in Wilfrid's favor. Though the division of York remained, the new bishops were to leave their seats. Wilfrid himself was to appoint their successors. He returned to England in 678 only to be imprisoned by Ecgfrid and later exiled to Sussex.

In 686, Wilfrid came back into favor with Theodore and returned to Northumbria. Ecgfrid had died, and his successor, King Aldfrid, welcomed Wilfrid as bishop of Hexham. He later became bishop of York again, although he fell into disfavor with Archbishop Brihtwald, who had replaced Theodore after his death in 690. In 703, Wilfrid traveled again to Rome (by way of Frisia, where he stayed with Willibrord) to argue against the subdivision of York. He was in Rome for many months but finally returned to England, where Brihtwald gave the sees of Hexham and Ripon to Wilfrid. He died in 709.

—Dorothy Carr Porter

See also: Bishop-Saints; Chad; Theodore of Tarsus; Tolerance and Intolerance; Willibrord

References and further reading:

- Bede. 1993. A History of the English Church and People. Translated by Leo Sherley Price. London: Penguin.
- Eadmer. 1998. Life of Saint Wilfrid by Eadmer. Translated by Bernard J. Muir and Andrew J. Turner. Exeter: University of Exeter Press.
- Levison, Wilhelm. 1946. England and the Continent in the Eighth Century. Oxford: Clarendon.

Wilgefortis

(Dates unknown)

Christian legendary holy woman

Wilgefortis, the bearded female saint, is known by many names, including Uncumber, Ontcommer, Kummernis, Regenfeldis, Liberata, and Livrade. “Wilgefortis” may derive from hilge vartz (holy face) or vierge forte (strong virgin); other names suggest the saint’s role as a deliverer who disencumbers supplicants from their troubles.

Wilgefortis was one of seven (perhaps nine) children (in some accounts all sisters) born to a non-Christian king of Portugal; all were eventually martyred as Christians. Wilgefortis was promised in marriage to the non-Christian king of Sicily. In order to preserve her vow of perpetual virginity, a sign of her commitment to Christ, she prayed to God for disfigurement and was blessed with a full beard and mustache. This divine deterrent worked; the king of Sicily called off the marriage. However, Wilgefortis’s father was so enraged at her for thwarting his dynastic aspirations that he had her crucified, stating that she could die in the same disgraceful manner as her heavenly bridegroom.

While on the cross, Wilgefortis prayed that all who remembered her passion be freed from their cares. According to legend, for a peck of oats Wilgefortis would liberate wives from troublesome husbands, making her the patron saint of unhappily married women. Another story reports that, from her cross, Wilgefortis dropped one of her golden boots to a poor fiddler, who played to relieve her suffering. When he was condemned to death for the theft of the boot, she kicked off the other one to prove his innocence.

Although the details of Wilgefortis’s legend remain fairly consistent, the question of when she lived remains. Dates have been suggested as early as the second century and as late as the tenth. This inability to locate her historically has contributed to theories that Wilgefortis is a completely legendary saint. She has been considered a variant of the bearded nun Galla who is mentioned by Gregory the Great (540–604) in his Dialogues. Alternatively, she has been traced to a misunderstanding of the twelfth-century Volto Santo at Lucca, a crucifix with a figure wearing a long, feminine tunic; this theory may explain the spread of her cult throughout Europe after 1200. More recently, it has been suggested that Wilgefortis was a medieval attempt to represent lanugo, the growth of hair associated with anorexia in young women.

Whatever the origin of her legend, one thing is certain: Wilgefortis continues to capture the popular imagination. She appeared in Mexican folk retablos well into the nineteenth century, figures prominently in Robertson Davies’s 1970 novel The Fifth Business, and is even featured in a contemporary comic strip as “St. Wilgefortis—Women’s Liberator.”

—Christina M. Carlson

See also: Gender and Holy People; Legendary Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution

References and further reading:

- Vita Wilgefortis*. In Acta Sanctorum. Iul. V, pp. 50–70. Brussels: Société des Bollandistes.
- Davies, Robertson. 1970. The Fifth Business. New York: Penguin.
- Delehaye, Hippolyte. 1962. The Legends of the Saints. Translated by Donald Attwater. New York: Fordham University Press.
- Giffords, Gloria Fraser. 1974. Mexican Folk Retablos. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Lacey, J. Hubert. 1982. “Anorexia Nervosa and a Bearded Female Saint.” British Medical Journal (December): 1816–1817.
- Nightlinger, Elizabeth. 1993. “The Female Imitatio Christi and Medieval Popular Religion: The Case of St. Wilgefortis.” In Representations of the Feminine in the Middle Ages: Feminea Mediaevalia 1. Edited by Bonnie Wheeler. Dallas: Academia.
- Wagner, John. 1997. The Big Book of Martyrs. New York: Paradox.

William of Norwich

(c. 1132–1144 C.E.)

Christian “martyr”

The story of William of Norwich is anti-Semitic in origin and there is no evidence for its validity. It is an example of the falsehoods about Jews that were spread throughout Europe and other regions of the world during the Middle Ages.

The central accusation in the story was that William, a twelve-year-old boy in Norwich, England, had been crucified by Jews in 1144 out of their hatred for Christians and for Christ himself. The story appears in “The Life and Passion of William the Martyr of Norwich” by Thomas of Monmouth. According to the story, the boy’s body was found on Easter day in a wood, where it apparently had been lying for over a week. Once it was found, someone buried it right where it lay. William’s uncle was notified. The boy’s aunt then told her husband about a dream she had had wherein Jews had broken her leg and torn it off of her body. Based on this alone, the uncle came to the bishop and accused the Jews of killing his nephew. In the course of the twenty years or more that it took to compile his Life of William, Thomas of Monmouth developed out of this the story, complete with miracles and relics, of an innocent Christian boy being tortured and crucified by Jews.

This was the first time on record that such an accusation had been made, but it would not be the last. William's story spread throughout Europe, and ritual murder accusations against Jews became more common, creating the blood libel that Jews ritually crucified Christian children or used the blood of sacrificed children in Jewish rituals, particularly Passover. Accusations based on this myth resulted in violent persecutions and caused fear, anxiety, and suffering among Jews and Christians alike throughout the Middle Ages and even into the nineteenth century.

—Diane Peters Auslander

See also: Anti-Semitism and Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Judaism and Holy People; Tolerance and Intolerance

References and further reading:

- Berger, David. 1990. From Crusades to Blood Libels to Expulsions: Some New Approaches to Medieval Anti-Semitism. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Dundee, Alan, ed. 1991. The Blood Legend: A Case Book in Anti-Semitic Folklore. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Hsia, Po-Chia R. 1988. The Myth of Ritual Murder. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Langmuir, Gavin L. 1984. "Thomas of Monmouth: Detector of Ritual Murder." Speculum 59, no. 4: 820–846.

Willibald

(c. 700–c. 790 C.E.)

Christian bishop, missionary

Willibald was an Anglo-Saxon world traveler, a bishop of Eichstätt, and a missionary to the Franks. He was born in about 700 in Wessex (England). His father was St. Richard; his mother was related to St. Boniface. According to legend, Willibald's parents prayed for him during a childhood illness and promised God that they would give Willibald to the church if he recovered. He survived the illness, and when he was five years old his parents brought him to the monastery at Waltham and placed him in the care of Abbot Egeald.

In 720, Willibald, his father, and his brother Winnibald set out on a pilgrimage to Rome. Richard died en route, and the young men continued the journey. They remained in Rome for two years living in a monastic community. They both became seriously ill, however, during their stay. This propelled Willibald into an even more ascetic lifestyle than the one he had already adopted.

In 724, Willibald and a few companions traveled east, visiting monasteries along the way. They arrived at the island of Cyprus at Easter and later went to Syria, where they were arrested and held in prison by the ruling Islamic government. All eight were eventually found innocent of any wrongdoing. They immediately went to Damascus, then to the Holy Mount and on to Capernaum, tracing the travels of the earliest followers of Christ. Willibald bathed in the Jordan and finally arrived in Jerusalem. The details of his travels are told in the Hodoeporicon (Account of a voyage), a work put into its final form by an Anglo-Saxon nun who was Willibald's contemporary. The account is presumably told in Willibald's own words.

The monastic pilgrims finally returned to Rome in 730. Willibald joined the monastery at Monte Cassino where Saint Benedict had written his rule some 200 years before. Ten years later, Willibald was called to assist Boniface in his mission to the Frankish kingdom. Boniface made him priest, and in 741 Willibald was consecrated bishop at Stülzenbrücken. He was appointed bishop of Eichstätt after its formation a few years later. Willibald worked hard to balance his duties as bishop and missionary and his desire to live an ascetic and humble life.

Winnibald had returned to the west long before Willibald did and had already been called to assist Boniface. In 752, the brothers founded a double monastery (a monastery housing both men and women, in separate quarters) at Heidenheim. Winnibald was superior over the men, their sister Walburga over the women. It was Huneberc, a nun of Heidenheim, who worked on the Hoedoeporicon. Willibald died in about 790.

—Dorothy Carr Porter

See also: Boniface; Christianity and Holy People; Mission; Walburga

References and further reading:

- Levison, Wilhelm. 1946. England and the Continent in the Eighth Century. Oxford: Clarendon.
- Willibald. 1954. "Hoedoeporicon." In Anglo-Saxon Missionaries in Germany. Translated by C. H. Talbot. New York: Sheed and Ward.

Willibrord

(658–739 C.E.)

Christian bishop, missionary

The Northumbrian Willibrord is considered the founder of the Anglo-Saxon missionary movement. Although Boniface is the best known of these missionaries, it was Willibrord who first crossed the English Channel to bring the word of God to the unbaptized of northern Europe. The cooperative relationship he developed with the Frankish kings extended after his death in 739, and if not for this relationship Boniface would not have had the impact on the German church that he did.

Willibrord was born in 658 and as a child studied at the monastery of Ripon under the abbacy of St. Wilfrid. He received the tonsure at the age of fifteen, and at the age of twenty he traveled to Ireland. It is notable that this year, 678, was the same year that Wilfrid was expelled from York. Many sympathetic monks exiled themselves in support of Wilfrid, and it is possible that this was the reason for Willibrord's relocation. He remained in Ireland for twelve years.

In 681, at the age of thirty-three, Willibrord and eleven others left Ireland for Utrecht. This city was in Frisia and controlled by the king Radbod, an unapologetic pagan who associated the Christian church with Frankish occupation. Willibrord left Frisia soon after his arrival and went south to the Frankish kingdom, which was under the control of Pepin, the true power behind the throne. Here he was welcomed and allowed to preach in the kingdom. In 692, he was sent to Rome to receive authorization as a missionary from the pope. He returned to the Frankish kingdom, but in 695 he traveled to Rome again, where he was consecrated bishop of the Frisians. At his consecration, his name was changed to Clement.

Willibrord went back to the Frankish kingdom and soon returned to Utrecht, where he founded a monastery and built a cathedral church. He also founded an abbey at Echternach in 698. Pepin died in 714, and the next few years were difficult ones for the mission, as Radbod was still not interested in accepting Christian teaching. In fact, he was more likely to destroy Christian churches and replace them with polytheistic temples than he was to listen to the missionaries. Eventually, Willibrord went to Denmark, and though his mission was not successful, he returned to the Frankish kingdom with thirty Danish boys who were to be raised in the church. Following Radbod's death in 719, Willibrord returned to Frisia, assisted for a time by Boniface. Willibrord was buried in the oratory at Echternach.

The main source of information on Willibrord is a Life written by Alcuin, who was born forty years after Willibrord's death. Although based on an earlier Life (no longer extant), Alcuin's writing lacks historical detail and instead focuses on Willibrord's miracles.

—Dorothy Carr Porter

See also: Boniface; Christianity and Holy People; Mission; Wilfrid

References and further reading:

- Albertson, Clinton. 1967. Anglo-Saxon Saints and Heroes. Bronx, NY: Fordham University Press.
- Levison, Wilhelm. 1946. England and the Continent in the Eighth Century. Oxford: Clarendon.
- Talbot, C. H. 1954. The Anglo-Saxon Missionaries in Germany. New York: Sheed and Ward.

Wolfgang of Regensburg

(924–994 C.E.)

Christian monk, bishop, missionary, reformer

A schoolteacher, missionary priest, and monk, Wolfgang is best known for his service as bishop of Regensburg and the reforms he brought about there in the tenth century. A vita written in 1052 by Othlo, and another, shorter work written in the same century by Arnold, both monks of St. Emmeram's in Regensburg, provide the primary information on the saint's life.

A nobleman by birth, Wolfgang requested at an early age to be allowed to study at the monastery school at Reichenau.

From there he went to Würzburg to attend the cathedral school, and in 956 he accompanied a friend, Henry, the newly appointed archbishop of Trier, to the city where he served as a schoolmaster. In Trier, Wolfgang became acquainted with Ramwold, the abbot of the monastery of St. Maximin located on the outskirts of the city, and it appears to have been here that Wolfgang formed his strong reformist principles. Saint Maximin's had been a center of the Gorzian monastic reform movement since 934. When Wolfgang was appointed the dean of canons at the Trier cathedral school, he quickly reformed the school, bringing the canons into regular community living according to the monastic rule.

A recurring theme of the vitae is Wolfgang's continued wish to retire from public life. He left Trier after the death of Archbishop Henry and in 968 took up residence in the Benedictine abbey of St. Mary at Einsiedeln. This remote abbey observed a strict rule that would have appealed to Wolfgang's ascetic tastes. He was called away from his position as schoolmaster there and ordained as a priest by Bishop Ulrich of Augsburg. Wolfgang was sent to Pannonia as a missionary to help evangelize the Magyars. He served there for only one year before being called once again to an administrative post. Wolfgang became bishop of Regensburg and abbot of St. Emmeram's in 972. He separated the two offices for the first time in 975, bringing in Ramwold of Trier to serve as abbot. Together the two reformed St. Emmeram's. Wolfgang also worked to replace the long-standing canonical tradition of the Regensburg nunneries Obermuenster and Niedermuenster with the stricter Benedictine Rule. Wolfgang retained the position of bishop, which he held for twenty-two years, until his death in 994.

The majority of Wolfgang's miracles concern his struggles to reform the foundations in Regensburg. In one miracle, the local Regensburg saint, Erhard, appeared to Wolfgang to ask him to rescue the canonesses from their corrupt ways. In another, relics were miraculously transported from one side of an altar to another after Wolfgang prayed for a signal to proceed with the reforms at Niedermuenster.

—Kristen M. Collins

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Mission; Reform and Reaction

References and further reading:

- Cohen, Adam S. 2001. The Uta Codex. University Park: Pennsylvania University Press.
- Lutz, Cora E. 1977. Schoolmasters of the Tenth Century. Hamden, CT: Archon.
- Mai, Paul, ed. 1994. Liturgie zur Zeit des Hl. Wolfgang. Der hl. Wolfgang in der Kleinkunst. Ausstellung anlässlich des 1000. Todestages des Bistumspatrons St. Wolfgang in der Bischöflichen Zentralbibliothek Regensburg. 17 Juni bis 16 September 1994. Regensburg, Germany: Schnell and Steiner.
- Mohr, Manfred. 1976. Der heilige Wolfgang in Geschichte, Kunst und Kult. Ausstellung des Landes Oberösterreich. 27 Mai bis 3

Oktober 1976. Linz, Austria: Amt der Oberösterreichischen Landesregierung, Kulturabteilung.

Wonhyo

(617–686 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar, iconoclast

An eminent Buddhist monk of the Unified Silla Period (668–918) in Korea, Wonhyo is revered as a Buddhist saint who combined the highest level of scholarship with an iconoclastic lifestyle. A renegade from the cloistered life, Wonhyo often frequented wine shops and marketplaces, ate meat, and attended popular entertainments—three activities proscribed by his clerical vows. As he traveled through the countryside, he composed and sang pious songs in honor of Amitabha Buddha and performed dances for the edification of the lowest classes. Later he broke his vow of celibacy, married a widowed princess of the Kim royal household, and fathered a son.

Wonhyo had been born in 617 into a provincial family of the Sol clan, which meant that in the context of Silla aristocratic society he would not have been allowed to achieve high social standing. Like many in his day, Wonhyo chose the career path of a Buddhist cleric, but unlike most of the clergy, he dedicated his life to the comprehensive understanding of Buddhist tradition and to the dissemination of that understanding to those outside the aristocratic order. Having mastered the Buddhist teachings available in Silla, he set out for China to obtain new teachings. One night he and a traveling companion, Uisang, were caught in a rainstorm and took shelter in cave. In the middle of the night, Wonhyo got up to get a drink of water. The next morning, when he discovered that the water vessel he had drunk from was a human skull and the cave that he had slept in was an open tomb, he felt revulsion and horror. This immediately triggered his own enlightenment, which he later described as the realization that nothing exists apart from the mind. No longer needing to obtain Buddhist teachings, he left Uisang and returned to Silla, where he decided not to study with any teacher apart from his own mind.

For the next thirty-six years, Wonhyo composed about 240 commentaries on most of the known Mahayana scriptures and philosophical treatises. He attempted, in such writings as Simmun hwajaengnon (The harmony of disputes of the ten gates) and Pophwagyong chongyo (The essentials of the Lotus Sutra), to spread the view that all the teachings and vehicles of Buddhist practice, if properly understood, form a single vehicle of Buddhism (ilsung pulgyo) leading to enlightenment. Modern historians see in his writings and in his enlightenment experience the clue to his iconoclastic lifestyle, the dissolution of all distinctions, sociological and doctrinal, that are generated by the unenlightened mind.

—John I. Goulde

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Morality and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People; Uisang

References and further reading:

- Grayson, James H. 2002. Korea: A Religious History, rev. ed. London: Routledge Curzon.
- Iryon. 1972. Samguk Yusa: Legends and History of the Three Kingdoms of Ancient Korea. Translated by Ha Tae-Hung and Grafton Mintz. Seoul: Yonsei University Press.
- Lee, Peter H., ed. 1993. Sourcebook of Korean Civilization. Vol. 1. New York: Columbia University Press.

Wovoka

(c. 1858–1932 C.E.)

Paiute prophet

The Paiute prophet Wovoka launched a major Indian religious revitalization movement in the western United States after experiencing a vision in 1889. He is credited with spreading the Ghost Dance to many Native American groups. Born in about 1858 in western Nevada, he was raised by a white ranching family, the Wilsons, after his father's death in about 1872. He took the name Jack Wilson during this time.

During a solar eclipse on January 1, 1889, Wovoka, sick with fever, had a vision that he termed his Great Revelation. In the vision, he died, entered heaven, conversed with dead ancestors, and received instructions to change his life and spread a new message. Those guidelines included abstaining from fighting, living peacefully with whites, and performing the traditional Paiute Round Dance. He also believed that he gained the power to control nature, especially the weather, during the vision experience. His reputation grew because of his purported ability to cause rain after a long drought and other miraculous occurrences. Indians throughout the West journeyed to Nevada to hear his message.

Throughout 1889 and 1890, a new religious movement based on Wovoka's teachings erupted among several western Indian groups. Seemingly everywhere new circle dances were performed, and people fell into trances and communicated with deceased ancestors. The immense popularity of this new spirituality most likely stemmed from the degraded condition that most Indians found themselves in after being confined to live on reservations where traditional rituals and practices were suppressed. Moreover, the buffalo had virtually disappeared, destroying Plains Indian peoples' ability to live traditionally. Thus, a message of renewal and the ability to establish links with relatives from the prereservation days held special appeal. The Lakotas, the people of Black Elk, Sitting Bull, and Crazy Horse, found Wovoka's preaching particularly compelling.

A Lakota delegation visited Wovoka and were impressed by what they saw. They adapted Wovoka's message to fit their history and situation, however, forever connecting Wovoka with a horrendous tragedy. When the Lakota delegation returned to South Dakota, they said that Wovoka preached the imminent destruction of the whites, the resurrection of Indian dead, and a return to the traditional way of life. As proof, they offered the buffalo they saw on their return journey, a sign that Wovoka's prophecy was coming true. As hundreds of Lakotas began practicing what they called the Ghost Dance (or Dance of Souls Departed), Bureau of Indian Affairs agents on the Lakota reservations became nervous about Indian intentions and called in the army to keep things under control, especially since the Lakota Ghost Dancers insisted that special Ghost Dance shirts made them bulletproof.

The Ghost Dance movement might have died of its own accord had the reservation agents not panicked, but the army came to South Dakota and began tracking down Ghost Dancers. Sitting Bull died at the hands of Indian reservation policemen in December 1890. That same month, 300 or so Miniconjou Lakotas under Chief Big Foot were massacred at Wounded Knee Creek. Wovoka was deeply saddened by the deaths when he heard of them. Though he lost many—but not all—of his religious supporters, he lived out his days as an active Paiute leader in Nevada still prophesying on various topics. He died in 1932.

—Greg O'Brien

See also: Black Elk; Crazy Horse; Patriotism and Holy People; Prophets; Sitting Bull

References and further reading:

- Hittman, Michael. 1997. Wovoka and the Ghost Dance. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Mooney, James. 1965. The Ghost Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890. Edited by Anthony F. C. Wallace. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Wu Zhao

(623–705 C.E.)

Buddhist ruler

Wu Zhao, born in 623, became one of the Tang emperor Taizong's concubines at a young age. She was placed in a nunnery at age thirteen following Taizong's death, but she was soon removed by then Empress Wang in a vain attempt to distract Emperor Gaozong from another concubine. Wu began to compete with Wang for Gaozong's favor and managed to make herself empress, disposing of Wang by accusing her of infanticide, a lie the emperor believed. Empress Wu quickly rose to power, becoming consort after Gaozong suffered a stroke in 660. In 674, she adopted the title "Heavenly Empress" and began making changes to the Tang imperial structure. She declared equal footing for Buddhist and Daoist clergy, removing the earlier preference given to Daoism. Giving herself the title "Sage Mother," Empress Wu equated herself with the Daoist deity revered as the mother of Laozi. Wu also funded Buddhist text translation projects and the construction of Buddhist sites. She is especially well known for having funded the colossal Buddhist image at the Longmen caves, and popular legend has it that this image was fashioned upon a portrait of Empress Wu herself.

In 690, Empress Wu terminated the Tang Empire and declared herself ruler of the new Zhou dynasty. In order to legitimize her reign, she turned to Buddhist institutions, declaring Buddhism superior to Daoism. In the same year, Wu was also presented with the Dayunjing (Great Cloud Sutra). From this text, Empress Wu gained legitimacy as ruler of China by equating herself to an enlightened princess central to the text, a princess prophesied to be reborn 700 years after the Buddha's death and to rule the largest kingdom in the East in an enlightened fashion. Wu then added to her title "Sagelike and Divine Sovereign of the Golden Wheel," in reference to the Buddhist notion of the chakravartin, or "enlightened monarch."

In 697, Empress Wu became embroiled in an affair with two brothers; eventually their dissolute activities would spell the end of her reign. Their assassination in 705 was followed immediately by Wu's own abdication and subsequent death.

—Holly Larson

See also: Laozi; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Brandauer, Frederick P., and Huang Chun-Chieh. 1994. Imperial Rulership and Cultural Change in Traditional China. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Falk, Nancy A., and Rita M. Gross. 1980. Unspoken Worlds: Women's Religious Lives in Non-Western Cultures. San Francisco: Harper and Row.
- Guisso, R. W. L. 1978. Wu Tse-T'ien and the Politics of Legitimation in T'ang China. Bellingham, WA: Western Washington University Press.

Wulfric of Haselbury

(c. 1090–1154 C.E.)

Christian recluse

Wulfric of Haselbury was an English anchorite, miracle worker, and counselor in early twelfth-century England. Born in about 1090 near Bristol to an Anglo-Saxon family, he served as a village priest while enjoying feasting and hunting in company with the local Norman lord. A chance encounter with an angelic beggar prompted an interior conversion. Moving then to the Somerset village of Haselbury Plucknett, in 1125 he enclosed himself as a recluse in a cell adjoining the village church. A steady stream of visitors afforded material support and sought his counsel. Wulfric's reputation for holiness attracted a visit from the future king Stephen and the admiration of Bernard of Clairvaux. Though supported by the nearby abbey of Ford(e), he was almost certainly not a Cistercian.

Noted for the austerity of his asceticism, Wulfric regularly bathed in ice-cold water in the dark of night while reciting the whole book of Psalms from memory. (Once he discovered an adder in his bath and fainted from fright.) He added a coat of mail to his hair shirt, a sign of the spiritual “knight-hood” on which he believed himself to be embarked. He died in 1154.

His Life was written by the Cistercian author John, abbot of Forde (1140–1214).

—Patrick J. Nugent

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Christianity and Holy People; Guidance; Hermits

References and further reading:

John of Ford. 1933. Wulfric of Haselbury, by John, Abbot of Ford. Edited by Maurice Bell. London: Somerset Record Society.

Wulfstan of Worcester

(c. 1008–1095 C.E.)

Christian monk, bishop

Wulfstan, a Benedictine monk and bishop of Worcester, enjoyed a reputation for sanctity even during his lifetime during the eleventh century. Although not formally canonized until 1203, he was venerated as a saint by the monks of Worcester cathedral from the time of his death. His vita, written by his chaplain and chancellor, Coleman, describes a humble man assiduous in his monastic and episcopal duties, able to expel demons, effect cures, and perform other miracles, both in life and posthumously. Contemporary chronicles also attribute miracles to him. One popular legend describes the miraculous intervention that thwarted an attempt by Norman authorities to depose him. This story, while apocryphal, was widely circulated in twelfth- and thirteenth-century saints’ Lives, chronicles, and histories. Nevertheless, Wulfstan’s cult remained primarily local until it attracted the attention of King John in the early thirteenth century. A collection of Wulfstan’s miracles, compiled in about 1235, attests to a wider following outside Worcestershire.

Wulfstan was born in about 1008 and educated in the monasteries of Evesham and Peterborough. He was ordained and became a monk of Worcester, where he served as schoolmaster, precentor, sacristan, and prior before being elected bishop in 1062. Wulfstan’s diplomacy helped ease the transition from English to Norman rule. Although he had been King Harold’s confessor, he worked effectively with the Norman secular and ecclesiastical authorities. By 1075, he was the sole remaining Anglo-Saxon in the English episcopate.

A capable administrator, Wulfstan recovered alienated monastic estates and acquired new ones, increased the number of monks in the cathedral priory, and rebuilt Worcester’s cathedral. The vita records his skillful preaching; his evenhanded treatment of people rich and poor, Norman and English; his efforts to end the sale of Englishmen into slavery in Ireland; and his dedication to the values of both the English monastic tradition and the Gregorian reform movement. He died in 1095, and his feast day is January 19.

—Mary Lynn Rampolla

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Miracles; Politics and Holy People

References and further reading:

Draper, Peter. 1984. “King John and St. Wulfstan.” Journal of Medieval History 10: 41–50.

Mason, Emma. 1990. St. Wulfstan of Worcester, c. 1008–1095. Oxford: Blackwell.

William of Malmesbury. 2002. Saints’ Lives: Lives of SS. Wulfstan, Dunstan, Patrick, Benignus and Indract. Edited by Michael Winterbottom and R. M. Thomson. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

X

Xavier, Francis

(1506–1552 C.E.)

Roman Catholic Jesuit, missionary

Francis Xavier, a founding member of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits) and an overseas missionary, was canonized in 1622. Indeed, he was the most famous missionary in a period of missionary fervor, and his canonization reflected the importance of missionary activity as a holy endeavor in the seventeenth-century Catholic Church.

Francis was born in the Basque region of Spain in 1506 and educated at the University of Paris. He met Ignatius of Loyola at Paris and in 1534 became one of the seven founding members of the Society of Jesus. In 1541, at the request of King John III of Portugal, Ignatius sent Francis to evangelize the East Indies. Francis arrived in Goa in May 1542 and immediately began to organize the Jesuit mission in India. Over the next seven years, he traveled as a missionary to Travancore, Malacca, the Molucca Islands, Ceylon, and the Malay Peninsula. In 1549, he traveled to Japan, where he spent eighteen months establishing a viable Catholic community among the local population. After returning briefly to Goa, he set sail for China in 1552, but he died on the island of Chang-Chuen-Shan before he could enter the kingdom.

During his travels, Francis worked tirelessly to establish and organize Catholic communities. With time, many of the communities, such as that of the Paravas in southern India, endured and grew. Francis modeled his mission on that of the apostles, seeking to bring the message of Christ and the tenets of the Catholic faith to every community he visited. To make his message intelligible, he would translate his teachings into the local language. He also sought to convert the population by living a model life. His efforts were particularly effective with the poor, among whom he willingly lived in poverty.

Francis, the patron saint of missionaries, was the most famous Catholic overseas missionary in a period when the Roman Catholic Church established itself as a world religion through the settlement of European colonists and the conversion of indigenous peoples in the New World and Asia. His missionary activities define his holiness, and he is commonly referred to as “the apostle of the Indies and Japan.” His reputation in the West was established during his lifetime through the publication of the letters he wrote to his Jesuit brethren in Europe. The uncorrupted state of his body, which was placed in quicklime at his death and eventually buried in Goa, also added to his reputation as a holy man, and his tomb became a site of popular pilgrimage.

—Eric Nelson

See also: Christianity and Holy People; Ignatius of Loyola; Mission

References and further reading:

Brodrick, James. 1952. Saint Francis Xavier, 1506–1552. London:

Burns and Oates.

O'Malley, John. 1993. The First Jesuits. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Schurhammer, Georg. 1980. Francis Xavier: His Life, His Times. 3 vols. Rome: Jesuit Historical Institute.

Xavier, Francis. 1992. The Letters and Instructions of Francis Xavier. St. Louis: Institute of Jesuit Sources.

Y

Yajñavalkya

(8th cent. B.C.E.?)

Hindu teacher

Yajñavalkya is the best known among the great teachers of the late Vedic texts known as the Upanishads, as well as of later Hindu texts. He is portrayed vividly in this literature, a rarity in the older texts of India. Presented as an innovative, humorous, and sometimes sarcastic individual, he appears as a ritualist, a defender of brahminical orthopraxy, an authority on ritual matters, and a great religious thinker who advocates groundbreaking ideas that radically revolutionize older Vedic conceptions about the meaning and significance of ritual. It is thought that he lived during the eighth century B.C.E.

Like all brahmins, Yajñavalkya was concerned primarily with accumulating cattle, which were given to the priests who were hired to perform rituals. In one account, King Janaka offers the prize of 1,000 cows to the most learned of the brahmins. After the challenge has been issued, Yajñavalkya exclaims, “This way [drive] them!” When asked if he is indeed the “best of brahmins,” he sarcastically replies, “We bow humbly to the most learned man! But we are really after the cows, aren’t we?” (Shatapatha Brahmana [SB] 11.6.3.2; Brihadaranyaka Upanishad [BAU] 3.1).

Yajñavalkya was also an authority on matters of ritual and doctrine. Though he generally deferred to his own ritual school, at times he offered his own independent solutions. In the texts, these solutions are presented in language that underscores his authority and superior knowledge. For example, Yajñavalkya once ridiculed the idea of rebirth into animal forms and the correlative idea of abstaining from eating cow meat. In response to the suggestion that the cow represented “everything here on earth,” he said, “I, for one, eat it, provided it is tender” (SB 3.1.2.21). Yajñavalkya valued his own understanding of the ritual above that of others and thus helped shape the direction of Hindu practice.

Yajñavalkya was also the spokesperson for important new concepts such as brahman, atman (BAU 3.5–4.6), and karma (BAU 3.2.13) and for new formulations regarding the nature of the dream state (BAU 4.3.9–33). When Gargi questioned him about what “this world is woven back and forth upon,” Yajñavalkya revealed that it was woven upon brahman, the imperishable, described as neti neti “not this, not that”—that is, beyond the limits of language (BAU 3.6).

In post-Vedic texts, Yajñavalkya’s status and fame are even greater. In the Mahabharata, he learns the yajus (ritual formulas) directly from the sun (12.319). He is also said to be the author of the Yajñavalkya Smṛiti (Law of Yajñavalkya, actually a work of the eighth century C.E.), a late dharma (doctrine) text that became influential through its medieval commentary, the Mitakshara (eleventh century C.E.).

—Carlos Lopez

See also: Gargi; Hinduism and Holy People; Sages

References and further reading:

- Brereton, J. 1993. “Yajñavalkya’s Curse.” Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik 20: 47–57.
- Eggeling, Julius, trans. 1963. The Shatapatha-brahmana, according to the Text of the Madhyandina School. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass.
- Fiser, Ivo. 1984. “Yajñavalkya in the Shruti Tradition of the Veda.” Acta Orientalia 10: 55–87.
- Olivelle, Patrick, trans. 1996. Upanishads. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Renou, Louis. 1948. “La relation du Shatapatha Brahmana avec la Brihadaranyakopanishad et la personnalite de Yajñavalkya.” Indian Culture 14: 75–89.
- Witzel, Michael. 1987. “The Case of the Shattered Head.” In Festschrift für W. Rau. Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik, 13/14: 363–415.

Yang Renshan

See Yang Wenhui

Yang Wenhui

(1837–1911 C.E.)

Buddhist layman, reformer

A well-known lay Buddhist and the “father of Buddhist revival” in modern China, Yang Wenhui (also known as Yang Renshan) and his family moved to Beijing after his father passed the metropolitan examination in 1838, just a year after Yang’s birth. Before he became interested in Buddhism, he studied Confucianism as well as the philosophy of Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.) and Zhuangzi (c. 369–286 B.C.E.). He was fascinated with Buddhist philosophy when he read Dacheng qixin lu (Awakening of faith in Mahayana). In 1863, Yang was put in charge of engineering and construction projects in Nanjing, which had been devastated during the war against the Taiping Rebellion. He then found a number of friends who shared a common interest in Buddhism.

In order to circulate Buddhist texts destroyed by the Taiping Rebellion, Yang donated a part of his family’s building in Nanjing and founded Jinling kejing chu (Jinling scriptural press) in 1866. He began to collect Buddhist texts and images from society and had millions of copies printed to encourage both Buddhist practices and studies. In 1878 and 1886, Yang Wenhui worked in the Chinese embassies in London and Paris, where he became acquainted with Max Müller and Nanjio Bunyiu. With their help, he was able to obtain a large number of Buddhist texts that had been lost in China. In 1884, Timothy Richard, a Baptist missionary in China, visited Yang in Nanjing. Their meeting marked the beginning of Buddhist-Christian dialogue in modern China. The two of them collaborated on the English translation of the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana. In 1893, Yang met Anagarika Dhammapala, the founder of the Maha Bodhi Society in India, and the two discussed cooperation between Buddhists in China and India.

Influenced by Japanese Buddhist missionaries who set up Buddhist schools in China, Yang edited Buddhist textbooks and founded the Jatavana Hermitage in Nanjing; twenty-four students enrolled, including Taixu (1890–1947) and Ouyang Jingwu (1871–1943). In 1909, Yang founded the Society for Buddhist Research and began to compile Dazan jiyao (Essentials of Taisho), which consists of 460 texts in more than 3,300 scrolls. Yang Wenhui died in 1911 at the age of seventy-five.

—Xue Yu

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Laity; Laozi; Reform and Reaction; Scholars as Holy People; Taixu; Zhuangzi

References and further reading:

Welch, Holmes. 1968. The Buddhist Revival in China. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Yang Wenhui. 2000. Yang Renshan quanji (Complete works of Yang Renshan). Hefei, China: Huangshan shushe.

Yared

(fl. 6th cent. C.E.)

Ethiopian Christian liturgist

Yared, also called Yared Mahletawi (Yared the Singer), is venerated as the sixth-century creator of the liturgical music of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. According to Ethiopian tradition, he composed the hymns and scholars of subsequent centuries developed them and supplied musical notation. Yared is also sometimes considered the first to write qine, Ethiopian spiritual poetry. Traditional sources narrate that some other sacred texts were given to Yared by Cyriacus, the bishop of Behnesa, when the Virgin Mary miraculously arranged their encounter near Aksum. Finally, Yared is usually mentioned as one of the early Ethiopian scholars of the traditional exegesis. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church commemorates him on Génbot 11 (May 19).

Yared was born in the ancient city of Aksum (northern Tigray). His parents, Enbaram and Tawleya, sent him to a relative named Gedeon to study. Yared’s first attempts were unsuccessful: He could not memorize the sacred texts. Finally, unable to bear his teacher’s constant punishments, he fled into the desert. There he saw a caterpillar that tried to reach the top of a bush. It fell down many times on its way, but every time it began to climb again, and finally it reached its goal. Enlightened and inspired, Yared returned and miraculously learned the Psalter and all the scriptures within one day. He was then appointed to serve in the cathedral of Aksum.

According to one legend, he once was enraptured and taken to the Garden of Eden, where he heard the heavenly music of the seraphim singing glory to God. Yared learned the heavenly mode of chanting from the “twenty-four heavenly priests.” Back on earth, he entered the cathedral and glorified the Lord “in loud voice” in the same manner. Everyone was amazed and rushed to the cathedral to hear the beautiful singing. Presumably based on this experience, Yared established three modes of chanting, known as ge’ez, ’ezel, and araray, representing the three persons of the Trinity. Tradition claims that Yared composed both music and texts for six collections of liturgical chants that are still used in the Ethiopian Church.

Yared’s vita reports that one day King Gabra Maskal was listening to Yared and unintentionally dropped his stick on the saint’s foot and pierced it. However, Yared did not stop singing until he finished the chant. In order to compensate for the harm, Gabra Maskal offered to grant any wish Yared might have, and Yared asked to be allowed to leave Aksum and become a monk. Gabra Maskal was in deep sorrow, but he could not break his word. Yared retired to Semen, northwest of Aksum, and lived there as a hermit until his death, visiting other monasteries in a “shining chariot” and teaching his chants to everyone who came to him. The place of his grave was hidden from the people and revealed by God only to a few saints.

—Denis Nosnitsin

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Christianity and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Belaynesh, Michael, et al., eds. 1975. The Dictionary of Ethiopian Biography. Vol. 1, From Early Times to the End of the Zagwé Dynasty, c. 1270 A.D. Addis Ababa: Institute of Ethiopian Studies.
- Budge, Ernest, trans. 1928. The Book of the Saints of the Ethiopian Church: A Translation of the Ethiopic Synaxarium. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Conti Rossini, Karolus. 1904. Vitae sanctorum antiquiorum I. Acta Yared et Pantalewon. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, 26, 27; Scriptorum Aethiopicorum, 9, 10. Paris: Carolus Poussegue Bibliopola; Leipzig: Otto Harrassowitz.
- Kaufman Shelemay, Kay, and Peter Jeffery. 1993, 1994, 1997. Ethiopian Christian Liturgical Chant: An Anthology. 3 vols. Recent Researches in the Oral Tradition of Music, 1, 2, 3. Madison, WI: A-R Editions.

Yellow Emperor

See Huangdi

Yeshe Od

(d. late 10th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist ruler, monk

Yeshe Od was the king of Gu-ge (western Tibet) and a key figure in what Tibetan religious historians refer to as “the later dissemination” of Buddhism in Tibet. This later dissemination began with his rule in the late tenth century following the persecution and near elimination of Buddhism from Tibet at the hands of an earlier king, Langdarma. Langdarma’s reign only lasted from 838 until 842, but his persecution was so heavy-handed that traditional histories report not a single monk or nun was seen in Tibet for seventy years after his death. When Yeshe Od assumed the throne, he embarked on a vigorous campaign to reestablish Buddhism in his country. Many of his efforts had lasting effects in Tibet. Eventually Yeshe Od himself renounced his throne in order to take ordination as a monk.

By far the most famous story in traditional accounts of Yeshe Od’s life involves his invitation to the Indian master, Atisha, to come to Tibet. Atisha was among the most revered Buddhist teachers in India at the time, and Yeshe Od relished the potential benefits for Tibetans if Atisha were to teach them. He raised a large sum of money as an offering to Atisha and sent it to India with his request. Atisha denied the invitation, citing his old age and the need for his presence among his many Indian students at Vikramashila monastery. Yeshe Od thought that he simply had not offered enough, so he embarked on a trip through western Tibet to raise more. The king of Garlok, a small kingdom in western Tibet at the time, captured Yeshe Od, stole the small fortune, and imprisoned him. A message was sent out that it would take a ransom of his body’s weight in gold to secure Yeshe Od’s release from captivity. When his great-nephew Changchub Od arrived with nearly his weight in gold, Yeshe Od told his great-nephew not to use that gold for his ransom, but rather to take it to India and offer it to Atisha with another invitation to teach in Tibet. His reasoning was that if Atisha were to come and teach in Tibet, it would be of enormous benefit to many people, but that he as an individual could not have nearly the effect.

Yeshe Od gave up his own freedom and his own life for the benefit of countless others and has been revered as a great bodhisattva (enlightened being) in Tibet ever since. Atisha did accept this second invitation and went on to be arguably the most important figure in the period of the later dissemination of Buddhism in Tibet. Yeshe Od died in the Garlok prison.

—James Blumenthal

See also: Atisha; Buddhism and Holy People; Martyrdom and Persecution; Rulers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Powers, John. 1995. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion.
- Snellgrove, David. 1987. Indo-Tibetan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors. Vols. 1 and 2. Boston: Shambhala.
- Sopa, Geshe Lhundup. 1983. Lectures on Tibetan Religious Culture. Dharmasala, India: Library of Tibetan Works and Archives.

Yeshe Tsogyal

(757–817 C.E.)

Buddhist scholar

Yeshe Tsogyal, born in 757, was a Tibetan Buddhist saint, yogini, and scholar. The daughter of the prince of Kharchen, a principality controlled by Tibet, she was exceedingly beautiful and demonstrated great intelligence and devotion to the dharma (Buddhist doctrine) throughout her childhood. As word of her beauty spread throughout the land, rival princes competed for her hand in marriage. Yeshe Tsogyal wanted to remain single and practice the dharma. Her father, fearful of the warring princes, sent her outside the palace gates to be fought over. Escaping from one suitor, she was captured by another, but she was badly beaten when she resisted. When the ruler of Tibet, King Trisong de Tsen, heard of her plight, he claimed her for himself and made her his queen.

King Trisong de Tsen, a philosopher and dharma practitioner, recognized Yeshe Tsogyal’s potential and put her in charge of dharma activities. After Guru Padmasambhava arrived in Tibet, the king offered Yeshe Tsogyal to him as his spiritual consort. She wrote down the guru’s teachings, and together they hid many of them throughout the land to be discovered by future generations.

Yeshe Tsogyal was a prolific writer herself. Among her compositions are a life of Guru Padmasambhava, an important commentary on the practice of Vajrakilaya (a compassionately wrathful form of the Buddha), an autobiography, and a prayer of remembrance of the guru.

Although considered to be an emanation of the female buddha Tara, she performed many ascetic practices in order to progress along the spiritual path and undo the effects of unfortunate karma. Humble, gentle, compassionate, and generous, she had many students. It is said that when she was raped by a gang of thugs, all of them attained realization of the dharma. She performed miracles such as raising the dead and flying in the sky.

When Guru Padmasambhava left Tibet, and after the death of King Trisong de Tsen, she remained for many years teaching the people, founding monasteries, and maintaining the dharma. It is said that she was instrumental in resolving a debate between the philosopher Kamalasila, who believed in the gradual path to enlightenment, and the yogi Hoshang Mahayana, who believed in sudden enlightenment.

—Marie Friquegnon

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Buddhism and Holy People; Compassion and Holy People; Gender and Holy People; Padmasambhava; Scholars as Holy People; Tara; Trisong de Tsen

References and further reading:

- Changchub, Gyalwa, and Namkhai Nyingpo. 1999. Lady of the Lotus-Born: The Life and Enlightenment of Yeshe Tsogyal. Translated by Padmakara Translation Group. Boston: Shambhala.
- Dowman, Keith. 1984. Skydancer: The Secret Life and Songs of the Lady Yeshe Tsogyel. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Tsogyal, Yeshe. 1978. The Life and Liberation of Padmasambhava. 2 vols. Translated by Kenneth Douglas and Gwendolyn Bays. Berkeley: Dharma.

Yisrael ben Eliezar

See Ba'al Shem Tov

Yixing

(673/683–727 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, astronomer

A Buddhist monk and astronomer in the Tang dynasty (618–907), Yixing was a child prodigy born in the 670s or 680s into an aristocratic family in decline. He could recite books that he had only read once. Yixing studied Chinese philosophy and science, especially Daoism, and established his reputation for learning when he was very young.

Later on he was approached by associates of Wu Sansi, a nephew of Empress Wu Zhao. In an attempt to avoid political involvement that would come from an association with the Wu family, Yixing renounced the world when he was about twenty-five and became a Buddhist novice under Puji in Shaoling Si. After receiving full ordination, Yixing traveled and studied under various Buddhist masters all over China. In 717, he was summoned to Chan'an by Emperor Xuangzong to assist Subhakarasiṃha (Shangwuwei) in translating the Vairocana Sutra. From that point, he concentrated on astronomy and organized expeditions to the Southern Seas to chart stars and determine latitudes. Nine stations for observing the stars were set up across China, stretching from the Great Wall in the north to the border between China and India. Based on the scientific data he collected, Yixing composed Dayanli (The great calendar) and rearranged the Chinese calendar system. He more accurately determined twenty-four seasonal periods of a year. In 723, he invented a new huntian yi (universal observatory machine) and verified the movement of the stars. Yixing was the first in human history to measure the length of the prime meridian.

Meanwhile, he studied esoteric Buddhism under Subhakarasiṃha and Vajrabodhi (Jingangzhi) and received esoteric transmission from both. In 725, he composed Darijing su (Commentary on the Vairocana Sutra), in which he elaborated on Buddhist cosmology and bodhisattvas (enlightened beings). Yixing died in 727 and was posthumously given the title Dahui chanshi (Chan master of great wisdom) by Emperor Xuangzong.

—Xue Yu

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Weinstein, Stanley. 1987. Buddhism under the T'ang. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Zanning. 1987. Song gaoseng zhuan. Beijing: Zhonghua shu ju.

Yogananda, Paramahansa

(1890–1952 C.E.)

Hindu yogi

Paramahansa Yogananda was born in Gorakhpur in northeastern India in 1890. He was the second son and the fourth of eight children. His parents were Bengalis of the kshatriya caste, the second-highest caste in Indian society, traditionally warriors but now often administrators. When Yogananda became very ill with cholera at the age of eight, he was healed by gazing at a photograph of a holy man named Lahiri Mahasaya. Yogananda reported seeing a blinding light that enveloped his body and the entire room during this experience. Yogananda is best known in the West as the author of Autobiography of a Yogi, first published in 1946.

Yogananda's father and a teacher named Sri Yukteswar (1855–1936) encouraged him to attend college in Calcutta because his teacher believed that a college degree would bolster his credibility in the West. He attended the Scottish Church College and eventually graduated from Serampore, although, by his own admission, he was not an outstanding student because he concentrated more on his spiritual life than on his studies. In his autobiography, he relates tales about powers that he acquired on his spiritual path. He says, for example, that he took a dare to defeat and chain a tiger and accomplished this feat with his bare hands. He also reports receiving a telepathic message from Sri Yukteswar. The autobiography describes various healings that he performed as well.

Yogananda viewed himself in a long line of teachers that included Lahiri Mahasaya (1828–1895), Sri Yukteswar's teacher. It was this spiritual heritage that Yogananda brought with him to the United States when he arrived in Boston on October 6, 1920. During the next decade, he taught yoga classes to many Americans. The type of yoga that he taught, Kriya yoga, was based on practical efforts. He eventually founded the Self-Realization Fellowship in California in 1925. Yogananda was one of the first Indian religious teachers to export Hinduism to the West. His efforts proved enduring.

Yogananda's name is suggestive because it implies that he finds his bliss (ananda) through yoga, whereas other Indian holy men find their bliss through, for instance, discriminatory knowledge (Vivekananda) or through mildness (Dayananda). Yogananda's emphasis on self-realization stands in contrast to other Indian spiritual leaders who stress other concepts, such as god-realization or the attainment of a state of absorption with the one real principle of the universe. With its foundation in yogic practice, Yogananda's message made an appeal for personal experience. This message found a positive reception from Americans. Although Yogananda died in 1952, his followers continued to teach his ideas and practices, and they remained popular especially through the 1970s.

One part of Yogananda's message did not resonate positively in America—the idea of becoming a world-renouncer. This emphasis is implied in his first name, Paramahansa, which in the ancient Indian epic called the Mahabharata (13.141.89) was identified as the highest state of spiritual attainment. The term paramahansa itself was instructive because it literally meant “highest goose” or “highest swan.” This bird led a wandering life that served as a symbol of the world-renouncer. Its ability to fly high suggested transcendence of the world. By traveling to America to spread his teaching, Yogananda kept alive the ancient symbol of the wandering bird and its many symbolic connotations.

—Carl Olson

See also: Ascetics as Holy People; Contemporary Holy People; Hinduism and Holy People; Mission; Vivekananda

References and further reading:

Yogananda, Paramahansa. 1946. Autobiography of a Yogi. Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship.

Yoshikawa Koretari

(1616–1694 C.E.)

Shinto teacher

A Shintoist of the early Edo period (1603–1867), Yoshikawa Koretari developed the Yoshikawa style of Shinto that greatly influenced many contemporary and future political and philosophical leaders of Japan. Yoshikawa's family name can also be read as Kikkawa, and his personal name Koretari can be read as Koretaru.

Koretari, originally named Amagasakiya Gorozaemon, was born in 1616 in Oomi-no-kuni. He was the son of a samurai but raised in Nihonbashi in Edo as the adopted son of a merchant. As a youth, Koretari showed interest in traditional Japanese literature. In 1651, finding himself not well suited to business, he moved to Kamakura, then to Kyoto in 1653 to study Yoshida Shinto under Hagiwara Kanetsugu and Hagiwara Kaneyori.

In 1656, Koretari received a certificate of instruction from Hagiwara Kanetsugu. Then based in Edo, Koretari taught the principles of Yoshida Shinto to the lord of Kishō domain, Tokugawa Yorinobu, in 1657, and to the lord of Aizu domain, Hoshina Masayuki, in 1661. Masayuki was originally an ardent Confucianist, but after hearing Koretari speak he commanded his own Confucian scholar-vassal Hattori Ankyu to further his study of Shinto. With the backing of his influential followers, Koretari received an audience with the shogun in 1667, and he was appointed Shintōkata (director of Shinto affairs) in 1681. After this, concerned that his own Yoshikawa-Shinto teachings were getting mixed up with those of the older Yoshida Shinto school, he secured the lasting dominance of his school by deciding that his own son, Yorinaga, should succeed him. Koretari died in 1694, and the Shintōkata position within the shogunate became a hereditary one for the Yoshikawa family until the end of the Edo period.

Koretari's most famous works include Shintō daii kōdan and Shindaikan koretari shō. His theology was based mainly on Yoshida Shinto with elements from Song dynasty Confucianism. Rather than advocate the coexistence of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Shintoism, Koretari held Shinto to be the fountainhead of all things, including other religions. Koretari emphasized a rational Shinto and attempted to influence the Tokugawa shogunate's policies with Shinto ideas but was unsuccessful owing to the strong influence of Tendai Shinto on the Tokugawa establishment. He was able to exert a major influence on the politics of both Aizu and Hirosaki because the lords of these domains advocated Yoshikawa's Shinto. Koretari emphasized tsutsushimi (seriousness of mind) as the way of humankind and stressed the importance of the rite of oharai (purification). He also taught Yamazaki Ansai and thus greatly influenced attempts to synthesize Shinto and Neo-Confucianism.

—Timothy D. Amos

See also: Politics and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People; Shinto and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Ooms, Herman. 1985. Tokugawa Ideology: Early Constructs, 1570–1680. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Taira, Shigemichi. 1966. Yoshikawa Shinto no kisoteki kenkyu. Tokyo: Yoshikawa Kôbunkan.

Young, Brigham

(1801–1877 C.E.)

Latter-day Saint president, preacher

Second president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Brigham Young was a preacher, governor, and colonizer who led thousands of Mormons to the “Great Salt Lake City” promised land. Following the death in 1844 of the church’s founder and first president, Joseph Smith, Young was confirmed as “prophet, seer, and revelator,” the true successor of Smith. He remained the leader of the church until his death in 1877.

In the spring of 1830, Joseph Smith’s brother, Samuel, passed through Mendon, New York, where Young and his family were living. Samuel was distributing The Book of Mormon, which Joseph Smith claimed was a translation of the “pure gospel of Christ.” A copy made its way to Young, who, although impressed with it, was cautious. After two years of investigation, he, along with his immediate family, was baptized. One week after his baptism, he preached his first sermon, proclaiming, “Nothing would satisfy me but to cry abroad in the world, what the Lord was doing in the latter days” (Young 1954, 1:313). Acting on this conversionary desire to “cry abroad,” Young set out to assist Smith and his followers in building the kingdom of God. Embarking on numerous missionary journeys, Young distinguished himself, ultimately being selected as one of the church’s original “Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.” He eventually became the president of the Quorum, second only to Smith in authority and responsibility. After Smith died, Young became the second president of the church.

The Mormons had been living in Commerce, Illinois, which Smith had renamed Nauvoo—the “beautiful plantation.” After Smith’s death, however, Young and his associates decided to move further west. Young directed this massive exodus to the Great Salt Lake Basin. Once there, he determined the exact spot on which the Salt Lake Temple would be built, explored the region, helped survey and apportion the land, and named the new settlement. In 1850, this “provisional state” was recognized by the U.S. government as “Utah Territory,” and Young was appointed governor. The region was not granted statehood at this point, though, largely because of Young’s vision of how the community should function: The “Great Basin Kingdom,” defined as it was as a theocratic cooperative, represented a nineteenth-century

Brigham Young, second president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. (Library of Congress)

“counterculture” that contradicted many of the economic and religious values of most Americans.

—Philip C. DiMare

See also: Politics and Holy People; Smith, Joseph; Teachers as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Arrington, Leonard J. 1986. Brigham Young: American Moses. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- . 1992. Building the City of God: Community and Cooperation among the Mormons. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Bringhurst, Newell G. 1998. Brigham Young and the Expanding American Frontier. Boston: Addison-Wesley.
- Taves, Ernest H. 1991. This Is the Place: Brigham Young and the New Zion. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus.
- Young, Brigham. 1954. Discourses of Brigham Young. Edited by John Widtsoe. Salt Lake City: Deseret.

Yu the Great

(c. 2200 B.C.E.?)

Confucian sage, ruler

Yu (or Yü) is described as a sage-emperor and the putative founder of the Xia (Hsia) dynasty (c. 2200–1800 B.C.E.?). He is credited with personally building canals that brought the Yellow River under control and with beginning the practice of hereditary rule.

Yu was the last of the six sage-emperors, following Fu Xi (Fu-hsi), Shen Nong (Shen-nung), Huangdi (Huang-ti), Yao, and Shun. The Shi ji (Book of historical records) places special emphasis on Yu by treating the first five sage-emperors in one chapter and beginning the next with Yu. The first five transferred the crown to their ministers, despite these ministers' demurrals in favor of the emperors' offspring. Yu broke this pattern by transferring power to his son Qi (Ch'i).

Yu is valorized for taming the Yellow River. His father, Gun (Kun), was also charged with this task but built barriers that failed to contain the waters. For this, Shun imprisoned him, giving the job to Yu. Yu built drainage channels (apparently transforming into a bear to do so). These proved effective, and Shun made Yu the next king.

Yu's efforts to improve the land for the people were hailed as highly virtuous, and Yu was set as an exemplar of ren (jen), or humaneness. That he apparently performed these labors himself has been viewed variously, with the acclaim centering around his display of rule based on work and not privilege, and the critique centering on his lack of bureaucratic leadership.

Along with other culture heroes, Yu is posited as a historical personage. The Si (Ssu) clan, whose territory was by the Yellow River, claimed descent from Yu. Yu is also noted for originating a dance designed to harmonize the empire. It is said that possession of one of the nine bronze tripods that he cast signified legitimacy of rule.

—Dan Wright

See also: Confucian Culture Heroes; Huangdi; Rulers as Holy People; Sages

References and further reading:

de Bary, William Theodore, and Irene Bloom, eds. 1999. Sources of Chinese Tradition: From Earliest Times to 1600, 2d ed. Vol. 1. New York: Columbia University Press.

Loewe, Michael, and Edward L. Shaughnessy. 1999. The Cambridge History of Ancient China: From the Origins of Civilization to 221 B.C. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Paper, Jordan D., trans. 1987. The Fu-Tzu: A Post-Han Confucian Text. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Yunus Emre

(c. 1241–1320/1321 C.E.)

Muslim mystic, poet

Known as Ashik Yunus (Yunus the lover) and Dervish Yunus, Yunus Emre of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries is revered as Turkey's greatest folk-poet, mystical troubadour, and indigenous saint. Yunus and his pioneering vernacular Turkish verse are both so highly and widely esteemed that his significance resembles a combination of St. Francis of Assisi, William Blake, Geoffrey Chaucer, and Bob Dylan. To this day, Turks universally recognize, memorize, imitate, and sing his work, especially his vast repertoire of ilahis (hymns), at Turkish sufi gatherings. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) proclaimed 1991 as International Yunus Emre Year.

Living in the Seljuk period of Mongol hegemony, Yunus is credited with forging a Turkish intertribal cohesiveness as he traveled and sang his ilahis with a six-stringed lute (cheshte). His 303 poems, collected in Divan (Collection), and his Risalat al-Nushiyat (Book of counsel) convey a universalist message of love and tolerance at the heart of Turkish culture and particularly dear to the Bektashiyya (the followers of Haji Bektash, 1248–1337). His influence especially touched Kaygusuz Abdal (fifteenth century) and Niyazi Misri (d. 1697), who wrote a commentary on Yunus Emre's verse. His tomb (among twelve others in Turkey) in his alleged birthplace of Sariköy annually attracts thousands of pilgrims.

The Vilayetname of Haji Bektash recounts the initiation of Yunus Emre. In a famine year, Yunus brought wild pears to Haji Bektash's center (tekke) to trade for wheat grains and seeds to bring back to his village. Haji Bektash offered instead a nefes (breath of blessing) to convey himmet (spiritual power) and confer initiation (nasip). Yunus declined, and Haji Bektash offered ten nefes. Yunus departed with grain but then reconsidered. When Yunus tried to return the grain and gain the nefes, Haji Bektash said, "I can't. We gave your padlock [your training] to Tapduk Emre." Yunus served at Tapduk's tekke in Emre Koyu for forty years as a woodcutter, honoring his pir (master) and path by never carrying in wet or crooked wood. During his service, he developed junun (divine madness of love), as his pir was "boiling him."

When Tapduk witnessed Yunus bundling wood with a snake, he sent Yunus on a dikme (training journey for advanced dervishes). After Yunus returned, Tapduk one day asked the resident poet (also named Yunus) to recite poetry, but he froze up. Tapduk turned to Yunus and said, "What Haji Bektash told you is now a reality. Your padlock is unlocked. I sent you as a closed box. Now you are opened." Yunus began to recite verses that inspired everyone to ecstasy.

In an apocryphal story, Rumi (1207–1273) testified of Yunus, "Whenever I arrived at a new spiritual height, there I found the footsteps left by that Turkish mystic and I never could surpass him." Yunus summarized Rumi's 24,660-couplet Mathnawi in one couplet: "I came from eternity, took form in flesh and bones/and called myself Yunus."

In his life and work Yunus expressed the vital role of humble and ardent love (ashk/ishq) for God, all humanity, and one's pir as the core of all authentic spirituality. While revering the orthodox piety of the Qur'an, love of the prophet Muhammad, and the namaz/salat (ritual prayer), Yunus emphasized deep and heartfelt love beyond forms: "I love you deep inside and way beyond my soul/There is a path deep inside and way beyond the faiths of old." Yunus addressed and described God as Dost (Beloved, Friend): "Love is minister to us; our flock is the innermost soul/The Friend's Face is our Mecca." Yunus aspired to an undogmatic, ecumenical vision that was embraced by many of his contemporary Turks as a model for “humanism”: “We regard no one’s religion as contrary to our own/True love is born when all faiths are united as a whole.”

—Hugh Talat Halman

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Attributes of Holy People; Devotion; Bektash Wali, Haji; Islam and Holy People; Kaygusuz Abdal; Mysticism and Holy People; Sufism; Tapduk Emre

References and further reading:

Birge, John Kingsley. 1965. The Bektashi Order of Dervishes. London: Luzac.

Halman, Talat Sait. 1981. Yunus Emre and His Mystical Poetry. Indiana University Turkish Studies, 2. Bloomington: Indiana University Turkish Studies.

Schimmel, Annemarie. 1975. Mystical Dimensions of Islam. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Yunus Emre. 1989. The Drop That Became the Sea: Lyric Poems of Yunus Emre. Translated by Kabir Helminski and Refik Algan. Putney, VT: Threshold.

———. 1993. The Poetry of Yunus Emre, a Turkish Sufi Poet. Translated by Grace Martin Smith. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Z

Zahir, al-

(1005–1036 C.E.)

Shi'ite imam, caliph

Abu'l-Hasan Ali al-Zahir li-I'zaz Din Allah, a hereditary imam of the Isma'ili Shi'ite Muslims and seventh Fatimid caliph, reigned in Cairo during the eleventh century. The Fatimids were first established in North Africa and then conquered Egypt, where al-Zahir was the fourth caliph of the dynasty to reign. His sovereignty was acknowledged beyond the borders of Egypt in parts of North Africa, Syria, Palestine, and Arabia. After the death of his father, the controversial caliph al-Hakim, his succession to the throne was assured by the maneuvering of his aunt Sitt al-Mulk. On March 28, 1021, at the age of sixteen, al-Zahir was acknowledged publicly as caliph.

His aunt continued to hold effective power for two years until her death in 1023. Her death led to the cancellation of a treaty she had been negotiating with Byzantium to improve bilateral relations. The young caliph seemed uninterested in wielding power and preferred to leave the responsibility for important decisions to his entourage. This tendency was to persist in the caliphate beyond his death in 1036 until the end of the dynasty in 1171.

During his reign there was a severe famine, in 1024–1025, followed by an epidemic that led to disorder. Fatimid rule in Syria was threatened by a coalition of Bedouin tribes, but order was restored in southern and central Syria through military intervention.

Relations with Byzantium improved eventually and an agreement in 1027 with Constantine VIII allowed the name of the Fatimid caliph to be acknowledged in the mosques in the emperor's domain and the mosque at Constantinople to be restored. In exchange, the caliph granted the emperor permission to rebuild the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem, which had been destroyed on the order of al-Hakim in 1009. The Druze sect, which formed toward the end of al-Hakim's reign, was brutally persecuted under al-Zahir, and in 1032 a joint Fatimid-Byzantine expedition attacked and killed the Druze in the Syrian mountains, forcing them to seek shelter in the caves.

Al-Zahir died on the eve of his thirty-second birthday on June 13, 1036. He was succeeded by his eleven-year-old son al-Mustansir, who reigned for almost sixty years.

—Hamid Haji

See also: Hakim, Abu 'Ali al-Mansur; Imams; Mustansir, Abu Tamim Ma'add al-; Rulers as Holy People; Tolerance and Intolerance

References and further reading:

Bianquis, Thierry. 1986–1989. Damas et la Syrie sous la domination fatimide (359–468/969–1076). Damascus: Institut français de Damas.

Daftary, Farhad. 1990. The Isma'ilis: Their History and Doctrines. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Lev, Yaacov. 1991. State and Society in Fatimid Egypt. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Zakariyya, Baha' ud-din

(1183–1262 C.E.)

Muslim sufi

Baha' ud-din Zakariyya was a prominent sufi disciple of Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi (1145–1234). He was born near the city of Multan in 1183 and lost his father at age twelve. He pursued studies in Khorasan and memorized the Qur'an, and in Bukhara people assigned him the affectionate name "angel" because of his recitation abilities. He studied mystical theology, law, jurisprudence, and the life of the prophet in Jerusalem, Medina, and Baghdad. Al-Suhrawardi personally invited Zakariyya to study with him in Baghdad, and within seventeen days Zakariyya was initiated into the Suhrawardi order. Al-Suhrawardi asked Zakariyya to establish the sufi order in Multan, and Zakariyya was soon recognized as an authority in sufi theology, philosophy, law, and the Islamic sciences.

Zakariyya believed that God established the daily Islamic ritualistic prayers so that creation would worship the divine and see the presence of the divine in all things. He was noted for his understanding of ablution before prayer, which he considered to be an act of prayer in itself. For Zakariyya, cleansing oneself with water before prayer (wudu) paralleled the action of the heart. Moreover, he said that in prayer, the position of the body, with legs bent, hands placed on the ground, and the forehead firmly placed on the earth, represented the heart opening and releasing impurities. Zakariyya's understanding of prayer emphasized spiritual movement toward the divine. For him, when the outer body prostrated itself it allowed the heart to prostrate itself to God and prepare a purified place for divine presence. According to Zakariyya, the sufi path required real purification of the self in order to be mentally, spiritually, and physically prepared for divine encounter.

In adhering to the Suhrawardi sufi tradition in India, Zakariyya's theology concentrated on qur'anic verses suggesting that the heart (qalb) reminded human beings that they are never left alone. He taught that the world was not a place for intense ascetic practices where one was alienated from the community; rather, the law, the Qur'an, and the customs of the prophet were all divine illuminations to follow. Zakariyya explained that the qur'anic verse 4:63, "God knows what is in their hearts," was evidence that God was to be invited to the heart of the sufi disciple to disclose his love to the seeker. One must therefore concentrate on purifying the inner essence of the heart. The heart could be used as a weapon to be self-destructive, or it could be trained to remember God. Zakariyya emphasized that the heart could only begin to cleanse away its worldly concerns when it was in prayer and in remembrance of God because at these times it opened itself up to the divine presence.

—Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Islam and Holy People; Mysticism and Holy People; Ritual; Suhrawardi, Shihabuddin

References and further reading:

Fikri, Ghulam Alam. 1993. Tadkirat 'Auliya' Pakistan. Lahore, Pakistan: Shabir.

Huda, Qamar-ul. 2003. Striving for Divine Union: Spiritual Exercises for Suhrawardi Sufis. New York: Routledge Curzon.

Kalam, Muhammad din. 1969. Suhrawardi 'Auliya'. Lahore, Pakistan: Maktaba Tarikh.

Rizvi, Athar Abbas. 1978. A History of Sufism in India. New Delhi: Manshiram Manoharlal.

Zakariyya, Baha' ud-din. 1974. Khulasat al-'Arifin. Edited by Shamim Zaidi. Rawalpindi, Pakistan: Iran-Pakistani Institute of Persian Studies.

Zarathustra

See Zoroaster

Zaynab, Sayyida

(c. 630–684 C.E.)

Muslim holy woman, heroine

Sayyida Zaynab, granddaughter of the prophet Muhammad by his daughter Fatima and his cousin and son-in-law 'Ali b. Abi Talib, accompanied her brother Husayn to Karbala in October 680, where all seventy-three males of the family were killed by troops of the ruling Umayyad caliph Yazid except for Husayn's young son 'Ali, whom Zaynab rescued. She thereby ensured the continuity of Husayn's line of descent. Zaynab is known in sufi and Shi'i Islamic traditions for her mystical knowledge, eloquence, and courage. She is particularly venerated in Egypt, where legends about her migration to that land and her burial extend beyond historical sources, and where she is known as mother of the clan of Hashim and mother of the Egyptians in general.

Early historical references to Zaynab are largely confined to her role at the battle of Karbala and its aftermath. She was born in about 630. She married her cousin 'Abdallah ibn Ja'far ibn Abi Talib and had five children, but they were later divorced. 'Aisha 'Abd al-Rahman, an Egyptian Qur'an commentator who adopted the pen name Bint al-Shati' (Daughter of the Coast), noted that Zaynab was always depicted at the side of her brothers, for whom she became a surrogate mother at the tender age of six when their mother died. In Egypt, Zaynab is called Sayyida, "lady"; indeed, she is the only one who can be identified by that title without adding her personal name. She is also known as the "heroine of Karbala" for risking her own life to save 'Ali Zayn al-'Abidin, who later became the fourth imam of the Shi'a, and for rescuing the women of the family from violation. The women were taken as captives to the caliph in Damascus, before whom she delivered ringing, eloquent denunciations that shamed him into silence. Although early historians stated that once she fainted at Karbala, modern biographies focus on her militancy, courage, and eloquence.

Shortly after returning to her home in Medina, according to Egyptian legend, Zaynab migrated to Egypt, where the Egyptians gave her an enthusiastic welcome because of their special love for the family of the prophet. There she interceded with the ruler on behalf of the poor and the oppressed, and he consulted her because of her wisdom. She lived in Cairo only six months, however, before her death in 684. She is buried in an ornate tomb that is the object of fervent veneration, including weekly visitations and an annual carnival attended by huge throngs.

Throughout the Muslim world, Zaynab is the "Pure One." Her devotees also call her "Mama," and she appears to them in visions. The oil in the lamp at her shrine is said to have healing properties for eye ailments. (The conflict between this tradition and modern medicine is the focus of an acclaimed Egyptian novella [Haqqi 1973].) Egyptians believe that along with her brother Husayn and the great jurist al-Shafi'i (767–820), Sayyida Zaynab serves on a hidden celestial court to which appeals are made for justice. The dome of her shrine radiates with light when the court convenes there to decide the affairs of the living.

Not all scholars agree that Zaynab went to Egypt, however. Yusuf Ragib (1976) wrote that Sayyida Zaynab never came to Egypt at all and that the tomb was first identified as hers in the sixteenth century by the sufi al-Sha'rani.

—Valerie J. Hoffman

See also: 'Ali ibn Abi Talib; 'Ali ibn al-Husayn, Zayn; Fatima bint Muhammad; Gender and Holy People; Husayn b. 'Ali; Imams; Islam and Holy People; Muhammad

References and further reading:

- Abu-Zahra, Nadia. 1997. The Pure and Powerful: Studies in Contemporary Muslim Society. Reading, England: Ithaca.
- Bint al-Shati' ('A'isha 'Abd al-Rahman). 1966. Al-Sayyida Zaynab, batalat Karbala'. Cairo: Dar al-Hilal.
- Haqqi, Yahya. 1973. The Saint's Lamp and Other Stories. Translated by M. M. Badawi. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- Hoffman, Valerie J. 1995. Sufism, Mystics, and Saints in Modern Egypt. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Ragib, Yusuf. 1976. "Al-Sayyida Nafisa: Sa légende, sa culte, et son cimetière." Studia Islamica 44: 61–81.

Zeno

(c. 300–c. 370/380 C.E.)

Christian bishop, writer

Zeno was the bishop of Verona, Italy, in the late fourth century. His significance is due primarily to his collection of more than ninety sermons on a variety of topics. These sermons are the oldest surviving examples in the Latin west and provide evidence of the development of the Christian liturgical calendar, rites, and customs during the late Roman/early Christian transitional period.

There is some evidence that Zeno may have been born in North Africa in about 300, that he studied in Carthage or Madaura and traveled to Syria before being ordained a priest in about 350, and that he became bishop of Verona in the 360s. He is known to have founded a convent for nuns, established a religious school in Verona, and organized the diocese. His death date is uncertain but has been placed at approximately 370/380.

Although considered one of the "minor" Latin fathers of the church, his sermons are composed in a distinctive, highly poetic, and elegant prose style derived from classical authors. This classical, rhythmic, and balanced style led him to be termed the "Christian Cicero" by Italian Renaissance humanists. A number of his sermons give evidence of lingering pre-Christian traditions during this period of the establishment of the Christian church in northern Italy. He also articulately defended Christianity against contemporary heresies, such as Arianism, and advocated charity and almsgiving. Writing during the early period of theological development in the West, he was concerned with baptism and Easter rites, the subject of more than sixty of his sermons. His work serves as important historical evidence of liturgical practices in the late fourth century.

The cult of Zeno as a saint seems to have begun in Verona in the fifth century and spread slowly elsewhere in Europe. The miracles at his tomb, and the miracle reported by Gregory the Great in his Dialogues (late sixth century), in which Zeno's intervention saved the citizens of Verona who sheltered in his church during a flood, were expanded by later hagiographers. Zeno is thus a patron saint invoked against floods and drowning. He is often depicted in art as a fisherman or with a fish hanging from his crosier. This symbol may relate to the water miracle, to other episodes in his vita, or to his pastoral position as a "fisher of souls." His feast day is April 12.

—Leslie Ross

See also: Bishop-Saints; Christianity and Holy People; Gregory I; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Jeanes, Gordon. 1995. The Day Has Come! Easter and Baptism in Zeno of Verona. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.
- Palanca, Louis. 1972. Prose Artistry and Birth of Rhyme in Saint Zeno of Verona. New York: Exposition.
- Stepanich, Martin. 1948. The Christology of Zeno of Verona. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Zhang Daoling (Chang Tao-ling)

(34–156 C.E.)

Daoist school founder

Zhang Daoling, also known as Zhang Ling, was the first to make Daoism a religion in China that served the spiritual needs of the common people. He is also the acclaimed founder of the Celestial Masters school of Daoism (Tianshi dao).

A quasi-historical biography states that Zhang was from today's Zhejiang province. Born in 34 C.E., from an early age he studied the Chinese classics and was interested in spiritual matters. He read the Daoist classic Daode jing (Classic of the Way and its power), attributed to Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.), and explored astronomy and geomancy. Later he moved to the kingdom of Shu, today's Sichuan province, where he cultivated the Dao (Way) and wrote a book in twenty-four chapters. His creation of talismans for healing and exorcism, which are still used today, brought him a large following. The talismans are strips of yellow paper with special magical script written on them invoking the power of particular Daoist deities. Zhang is often represented as a powerful, charismatic personality with frightening eyes and a black face, brandishing a sword and seated on or near a tiger.

Tradition has it that on the winter solstice of 142 (today celebrated on the first day of the fifth month of the Chinese lunar calendar), Zhang received revelations related to healing from Laozi himself, who also revealed the secret of how to produce a pill of immortality. This event marks the founding date of the Celestial Masters school of Daoism. Zhang is considered the first Celestial Master, one who was able to communicate between Daoist deities and the believers. He coined the term Taishang Laojun (Highest Venerable Lord) for Laozi, the supreme deity of his Daoist pantheon. His movement was first known as Wudoumou dao (Five Bushels of Rice Daoism), as members were told to contribute five bushels of rice as a membership fee. They set out to produce the elixir of immortality. Tradition says that Zhang achieved this: Upon swallowing the pill his face became as rosy and fresh as a young boy's even though he was over sixty at the time. It is said that Zhang and two of his closest disciples "rose to heaven in broad daylight" (feisheng) in 156, thus becoming Daoist immortals.

—Richard A. Pegg

See also: Daoism and Holy People; Death; Intermediaries; Laozi; Repentance and Holy People

References and further reading:

- Bokenkamp, Stephen R. 1997. Early Daoist Scriptures. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Maspero, Henri. 1981. Taoism and Chinese Religion. Translated by Frank A. Kierman, Jr. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Robinet, Isabelle. 1997. Taoism: Growth of a Religion. Translated by Phyllis Brooks. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Zhang Zai (Chang Tsai)

(1020–1077 C.E.)

Neo-Confucian scholar

Zhang Zai (Zhang Hengqu) is one of the five eleventh-century Northern Song masters who initiated the movement usually known as Neo-Confucianism, in English, and as Daoxue (The learning of the Dao) in Chinese. Or, in more accurate terms, he is one of the five whose ideas were drawn upon by Zhu Xi (1130–1200) in his grand synthesis that became the orthodox doctrine of the Chinese empire from the Yuan dynasty (1279–1368).

Zhang's most famous saying comes from the beginning of his Ximing (Western inscription): "Heaven is my father and Earth is my mother, and even such a small creature as I finds an intimate place in their midst. Therefore that which fills the universe I regard as my body and that which directs the universe I consider as my nature. All people are my brothers and sisters, and all things are my companions" (Wing-tsit Chan, 497). Zhang's philosophy is distinguished by his monism of qi, that is, his teaching that all reality consists of qi (ch'i, "material force"), as opposed to the dualism of li (principle) and qi developed by Zhou Dunyi (1017–1073), Cheng Yi (1033–1107), and Zhu Xi (1130–1200). To Zhang, that is, even the heaven of early Confucianism and the Dao of the Daoists were still within the realm of qi, though a rarefied qi that had not yet taken form.

Zhang's term for the original form of qi was Taixu (T'aihsü), or the "Great Vacuity." He wrote, "From the Great Vacuity we have the name 'Heaven'; from the transformation of qi we have the name 'Dao'" (Correcting Youthful Ignorance [CYI] 1.9). Furthermore, he said, "The Great Vacuity has no form; it is the original substance of qi" (CYI 1.2). Since all existing things are coagulations of qi, when physical things (including human beings) cease to exist, they all return to the Great Vacuity, which is not annihilation: "Whether integrated or disintegrated, it is my body just the same" (CYI 1.3). This monism of qi was a direct rejection of the Daoist teaching that existence is born from nonexistence and the Buddhist teaching that all things are produced by mind or consciousness. Qi is constantly moving, because it contains within itself two forces (yin and yang) that both mutually attract and mutually repel one another: "One entity, two substances: this is qi. Being one, it has spirituality; being two, it is always undergoing transformation" (CYI 2.11).

In Zhang this dialectic monism remained somewhat mixed with dualistic concepts—for instance, he said that in the beginning the universe split into that which was capable of assuming form (qi) and that which was not (spirit) (CYI 1.1). His monism of qi, however, was picked up and developed further by great thinkers such as Luo Qinchun (1465–1547) and Wang Tingxiang (1474–1544) in the Ming dynasty, by Wang Fuzhi (1619–1692) in the Qing dynasty, and in Japan by thinkers such as Kaibara Ekiken (1630–1714) and Itō Jinsai (1627–1705). At the hands of Ōshio Heihachirō (1793–1837), the concept that all things return to Taixu and are not annihilated was developed into a kind of samurai religious faith capable of overcoming the fear of death.

According to Zhang, human beings gain their knowledge of things through the senses, but their knowledge of "spirit"—the original nature of the transformations that qi undergoes—and of the Dao—the process of the transformations of qi—is independent of the senses, coming rather through people's "virtuous nature." The path to developing this virtuous nature involves recovering the original nature of qi as it exists within the human being—tiandi zhi xing, a translucent, pure, tranquil, and completely good nature that is one with heaven and earth—by transforming the impure physical nature (qizhi zhi xing) that each particular individual receives at birth.

The way to enlightenment is to discipline oneself so as to overcome the human desires that arise from the contact between the physical nature and things in order to return to the “Principle of Heaven” (or “Principle of Nature,” tianli). It is this concept of the physical nature as the lower nature of man and the source of evil that was Zhang’s greatest contribution to the Cheng-Zhu school’s methodology of spiritual self-cultivation.

—Barry D. Steben

See also: Awakening and Conversion; Confucianism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People; Zhu Xi

References and further reading:

- Bary, William Theodore de, and Irene Bloom, eds. 1999. Sources of Chinese Tradition, 2d ed. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Fung, Yu-lan. 1952–1953. A History of Chinese Philosophy. Translated by Derk Bodde. 2 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Wing-tsit Chan. 1969. A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zhisheng

(fl. c. 730 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar

Little is known about Zhisheng, a Chinese Buddhist monk during the middle of the Tang dynasty (618–907). He renounced the world at an early age and mastered the doctrine of both Mahayana and Theravada, was especially proficient in the Vinaya school, and extensively studied Chinese history, philosophy, and religion. Zhisheng’s most important work is Kaiyuan shijiao lü (Buddhist catalog in the Kaiyuan era), sometimes called Zhisheng lü (Catalog of Zhisheng), which he composed in 730. From the time of Daoan (312–385), who created the first catalog of translated Buddhist texts up to the time of Zhisheng, numerous Buddhist catalogs were composed to record translated Buddhist scriptures as well as texts written by Chinese masters. Nevertheless, discrepancies and even contradictions often occurred among them, and subsequent confusion constantly bothered Chinese Buddhists. In order to fix the problem, Zhisheng collected all available Buddhist catalogs and made a careful comparative study. In 730, he completed Kaiyuan shijiao lü in twenty scrolls.

Kaiyuan shijiao lü consists of two major parts. First, the general catalog records the scriptures translated between 67 C.E. and 730. It gives a short biography of each of 176 translators and lists the place and year that the text was translated. In addition, Zhisheng comments briefly on the previous catalogs by pointing out their strengths and mistakes. The second part is divided into seven sections according to the nature of recorded texts, including texts that still exist, such as the Bodhisattva Pitaka (Bodhisattva basket), Sravaka Pitaka (Hearer basket), and biographies of Buddhist saints; the texts that were translated yet undiscovered; individual texts that circulated independently; texts with several different translations; additional texts that are not found in the Pitakas; dubious texts that needed further clarification; and finally, apocrypha. Kaiyuan shijiao lü has become the source for assessing the status of Buddhist scriptures after the Song dynasty (960–1271).

—Xue Yu

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Hagiography; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Zanning. 1987. Song gaoseng zhuan. Beijing: Zhonghua shu ju.

Zhiyan (Chih-yen)

(602–668 C.E.)

Buddhist patriarch

Zhiyan was a Chinese Buddhist monk of the Tang dynasty (618–907) who was designated as the second patriarch of the official lineage of the Chinese Huayan school. He was born in 602. It was said that when Zhiyan was twelve, Dushun, the first patriarch of the school, came to his family and asked his parents to let him become a Buddhist monk, and they readily agreed. Thus he began to study with Dushun at Zhixiang temple on Mt. Zhongnan.

At the age of fourteen, Zhiyan went to northern China and studied the Mahayanasamgraha (Summary of Mahayana) under Fazang. Within a few years, he mastered the spectrum of Mahayana theories and was praised by his teacher’s colleagues. Having received his full precepts at the age of twenty, he traveled widely and studied numerous Buddhist texts, such as, among others, the Four Division Vinaya, Satyasiddhisāstra, Dilun, and the Nirvana Sutra. Nevertheless, he felt that there were too many Buddhist texts and schools to study so he focused on the Huayan Jing (Flower garland sutra), one of the longest Buddhist texts. He first studied under Master Zhizheng at Zhixiang temple for a year, but he still could not comprehend the difficult passages in the Huayan Jing. Then he read various commentaries and found Huiyuan’s (334–416) commentary, which led him to understand the Huayan theory of dependent origination. He started to write commentaries on the Huayan Jing and produced many works. He also lectured on Huayan Jing at Yunhua monastery. Thus, he was commonly known during his lifetime as the great master Zhixiang and the Venerable from Yunhua.

Zhiyan had many disciples, including Baocheng, Fazang, Huixiao, Huaiji, and Daocheng, but it was Fazang who inherited his Huayan study and developed it into a school. Zhiyan wrote many commentaries on the Huayan Jing. He inherited Huayan thought from Master Dushun and further developed it, but others developed it further after his death in 668. His contributions to the Huayan school are included on the ten profound gates and six characters that express the main Huayan doctrine of the interdependence of all phenomena.

—Guang Xing

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Fazang; Huiyuan; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Buddhist Association of China, ed. 1996. Zhongguo Fojiao (Chinese Buddhism). Vol. 2. Beijing: Eastern Publication Center.
- Gimello, Robert M. 1976. "Chih-yen (602–668) and the Foundations of Hua-yen Buddhism." Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University.
- Kiyotaka, Kimura. 1986. "Chih-yen." In Encyclopedia of Religion 3: 242–243. Edited by Mircea Eliade. New York: Macmillan.

Zhiyi (Chih-i)

(538–597 C.E.)

Buddhist school founder

Zhiyi was a Chinese Buddhist monk of the Sui dynasty (581–618) who founded the Tiantai school in China, which was named after the mountain on which he lived. Born in 538, he became a Buddhist at an early age and entered the monastic order at seventeen. Having received his full precepts at the age of twenty, he went to Guangzhou (today in Henan province) to study under the meditation master Huisi (515–677), who would later be listed as Zhiyi's predecessor in the Tiantai lineage. In 569, he was invited to Wuguan monastery to lecture on the Lotus Sutra. There he established a new way of Buddhist hermeneutics that laid down the foundation for his school.

After six more years of study, Zhiyi retired to Mt. Tiantai in 575 for intensive study and practice with a group of disciples. In 585, he was invited by the prince of Chen in eastern China to lecture on Dazhidulun, the commentary on the Mahaprajnaparamita (Heart sutra). Later, he moved to Guangzhai monastery and lectured on the Lotus Sutra; his lectures were written down by his disciple Guandin and compiled as the Fahuawenju (Exposition of the Lotus Sutra). In 591, on the invitation of Governor Yangguan of Yangzhou, Zhiyi came and bestowed the bodhisattva (enlightened being) precepts on him in a formal ritual. In the following year, Zhiyi came back to his native town and established Yuque monastery, where he lectured on his Fahuajing Xuanyi (Exposition of the profound meaning of the Lotus Sutra) and Mohe zhiguan (Great meditation). In 595, Zhiyi was again invited to visit Governor Yangguan. Zhiyi also wrote a commentary on the Vimalakirti Sutra before his death in 597.

Zhiyi's contribution to Chinese Buddhism is mainly in four areas. First, he is considered the first major figure to establish an indigenous Chinese system based on the teaching of the Lotus Sutra. Second, he was the first in the history of Chinese Buddhism to elaborate a complete, critical, and systematic classification of the Buddhist teachings, which almost became a standard for teaching Buddhism in East Asia. The system is named the "five periods and eight teachings" and divides the order in which Shakyamuni Buddha taught the dharma (doctrine) into five periods; his teachings are further subdivided into two groups of four each. Third, he developed a method to expound Buddhist scriptures by explaining the fivefold meaning of the title of a text first, followed by using four ways to explain its contents. Finally, he adapted the method of Indian meditation practice into his system. Only thirty of his many important works are extant.

—Guang Xing

See also: Buddhism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

- Buddhist Association of China, ed. 1996. Zhongguo Fojiao (Chinese Buddhism). Vol. 2. Beijing: Eastern Publication Center.
- Hurvitz, Leon. 1960–1962. Chih-i (538–597): An Introduction to the Life and Ideas of a Chinese Buddhist Monk. Brussels: Institut belge des hautes écoles chinoises.
- Pan, Guiming. 1996. Zhiyi Pingzhuan (Critical biography of Zhiyi). Nanjing: Nanjing University.

Zhou Dunyi (Chou Tun-i)

(1017–1073 C.E.)

Confucian scholar

Zhou Dunyi (Zhou Lianxi) is generally regarded as the pioneer of Neo-Confucianism. Although he was not very influential in his own time, the eleventh century, he had a great influence on the direction that the movement was to take. Through its adoption by Zhu Xi (1130–1200), the great synthesizer of Neo-Confucian thought in the Southern Song (1127–1279), his schema of the unfolding of the universe from the Great Ultimate, or Supreme Ultimate (Taiji or T'ai-chi), became a core concept of Chinese thought in general, and it has entered the international vocabulary of spiritual cultivation with the worldwide spread of the health-oriented martial art usually called "Taichi" (taiji-quan, or "the Supreme Ultimate pugilism").

The concept of Taiji is derived from the Xici, a commentary on the Yijing (Book of changes), a core Confucian classic, but it has long had important connections with Daoism as well. In fact, Zhou's famous "Diagram of the Supreme Ultimate" is very similar to a medieval Daoist diagram called "Diagram of the Supreme Ultimate that Antedates Heaven," which is believed to have been transmitted to Zhou through a number of intermediary teachers from a tenth-century practitioner of the Daoist arts of immortality named Chen Tuan. Zhou, however, explained the diagram purely on the basis of the Yijing, and his purpose in using it was not to obtain the elixir of eternal life by "reversing" the process of creation from multiplicity back to the original oneness, but to understand rationally how the world of multiplicity had come into being.

The "ultimate of nonbeing" (wuji) is a Daoist concept referring to the formless, infinite source of all existing things, the ultimate reality to be realized through enlightenment, very similar to the "nothingness" (wu; mu) or "emptiness" (kong; kō) of Chan and Zen Buddhism. Zhou much admired Buddhism and Chan, and he expressed his Buddhist respect for life by refusing to cut the grass outside his window or to hunt animals. His teachings, however, pointed away from Buddhism's negation of the world and Chan's rejection of logical reasoning and toward a path of self-cultivation that carefully balanced disciplined intellectual inquiry with the search for spiritual tranquillity through contemplation.

The Great Ultimate is a more positive concept than wuji, because in Zhou's understanding it is the single source of all the "principles" or "patterns" (li) by which the world of nature and the world of man are ordered. It is not only transcendent, but immanent within every thing and person in the world, making the achievement of sagehood possible for the individual. This dualism of li (unchanging principles, cognized by the human spirit and epitomized in the Taiji) and qi (material force, that is, the dynamic world of yin and yang and the five phases, cognized by the senses) was only adumbrated in Zhou's thought, but it was fully developed by Zhu Xi.

Like all Confucian thinkers, Zhou believed that ethical living according to the norms of interpersonal relationships was essential to achieving both wisdom and peace of mind, and his core ethical concept was "authenticity" (cheng), expounded most thoroughly in the ancient text Zhongyong (The doctrine of the mean), one of the Confucian classics. He believed that authenticity was the embodiment of the yang qi that emanated from the Supreme Ultimate, and that its innately perfect goodness, naturally tranquil, should be the wellspring of all human actions. Evil arises from the temptations of material desires and from environmental influences that prevent the hard and soft elements within this pure yang qi from achieving their proper balance. To overcome this imbalance and return to the original goodness of their natures, he taught, people must cultivate themselves by "making tranquility the lord" (zhujing) and by learning to be without desires. Zhou wrote: "Only when yin and yang operate according to order can they be in harmony. . . . In ancient times sage-kings instituted ceremonies and cultivated moral education. . . . Consequently all people were in perfect harmony and all things were in accord. Thereupon the sage-kings created music to give expression to the winds (people's sentiments) . . . and to appease the feelings of the people. . . . Ancient music appeased the heart but modern music enhances desires. Ancient music spread a civilizing influence, but modern music increases discontent" (Ch. 13 and 17; Wing-Tsit Chan 1963, 471–472). A great Song dynasty man of letters, Huang Tingjian (1045–1104), acclaimed Zhou as "a man of exceedingly high character, whose feelings were as free and unforced as a balmy breeze in a cloudless sky" (Feng 1952–1953, 435).

—Barry D. Steben

See also: Confucianism and Holy People; Scholars as Holy People; Zhu Xi

References and further reading:

Adler, Joseph A. 1999. "Zhou Dunyi: The Metaphysics and Practice of Sagehood." Vol. 1, pp. 669–678 in Sources of Chinese Tradition. Edited by William Theodore de Bary and Irene Bloom. 2d ed. New York: Columbia University Press.

Feng, Youlan. 1952–1953. A History of Chinese Philosophy. Translated by Derk Bodde. 2 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
Wing-Tsit Chan, trans. 1963. A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zhu Xi (Chu Hsi)

(1130–1200 C.E.)

Neo-Confucian scholar

Zhu Xi is certainly the most influential Chinese thinker of the past 800 years, and his interpretation of the Confucian classics dominated education and official ideology from the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368) until the abolition of the examination system in 1905, notwithstanding major critiques of this orthodoxy put forward by Ming and Qing dynasty thinkers. Zhu's position in laying the foundations of Neo-Confucian orthodoxy has often been compared with that of Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274) in the Western Christian tradition. Zhu Xi must be regarded as a major religious thinker as well as a great philosopher because he completed the task of reconstructing Confucianism into a complete system of cosmology, metaphysics, ethics, and spiritual practice fully capable of competing with Buddhism and Daoism—which had dominated Chinese spiritual life for over a millennium from the end of the Han (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.) into the Song (960–1120) dynasties. This paradigm shift in Chinese elite culture was closely related to the decline of the aristocracy following the fall of the Tang dynasty (618–907) and its replacement in the Song by a meritocratic system of office-holding based on the examination system, which required years of study of the Confucian classics.

He spent forty years of his life in educational work (particularly at his White Deer Grotto academy) and served as an official for less than ten, a fact that clearly affected the nature of his teachings. In his disputations with other Confucian scholars, such as Lu Xiangshan, he emphasized the importance of broad learning, observation, and systematic intellectual inquiry (dao wen xue) over the contemplative pursuit of the original mind (zun dexing, or "revering the virtuous nature"), which he thought was too close to Buddhism and Daoism. Nevertheless, he still believed that the goal of learning was not simply the accumulation of knowledge and literary skills, but the achievement of a penetrating insight into the fundamental nature of things that would transform a person's character and physical nature. He also emphasized the importance of quiet sitting (meditation) as a balance to engagement in study and work. And the most important aspect of knowledge was the understanding of moral principles (li; tianli), an understanding that requires one to put one's knowledge into practice both in one's interpersonal relations and in one's government service.

It was through his emphasis on the reality and rational knowability of the unchanging metaphysical principles that create order in both the natural and human worlds, as well as his insistence on the importance of objective knowledge of the world, that Zhu completed the work of his Northern Song predecessors in reviving Confucianism. These principles were called li, a character that as a noun refers to regular patterns or orderliness and as a verb means to put things in order. Principles—particularly the fundamental moral principles that are the basis of social order and harmony—were also referred to by the word “Dao” (Way). All the principles of individual things and affairs, Zhu Xi taught, were particular manifestations of a single Principle, for which he used the term “Supreme Ultimate” (Taiji) from the commentaries to the Yijing (Book of changes) and Zhou Dunyi (1017–1073). Individual things or human beings are also able to fully manifest the Taiji in themselves, and the Taiji is the foundation of their existence. The differences between things and persons are due to their different endowments of qi (material force).

Li is the original metaphysical cause of the existence of qi, and it requires embodiment in qi in order to become manifest as the phenomenal world of objects, beings, and events. Although li logically precedes qi, since it exists before any things come into existence, “in the world there has never been any qi without li, nor any li without qi.” All things and affairs are governed by definite principles and norms and necessary laws, and if people accord with these principles and laws, they can manage affairs easily with no need to resort to artificial effort. Accordingly, understanding of principle comes first and action afterward. Li, moreover, is present within human beings as their nature (xing)—the virtuous nature mandated by heaven as opposed to the physical nature, the mixture of li and qi that gives rise to human desires. Historically, Zhu believed that the world was ruled in accord with heavenly principle by sagely rulers in the ancient period of the Three Dynasties (Xia, Shang, and Zhou), but that subsequently human desires ran amuck and rulers began to rule by force and despotism instead of the power of virtue.

It was Zhu Xi’s commentaries that established the Four Books—the Daxue (Great learning), the Lunyu (Analects), the Mengzi (Mencius), and the Zhongyong (Doctrine of the mean)—as the core object of study for the civil service examinations, and he stipulated that the books should be studied in this order. The Daxue (an extract from the Li qi [Book of rites]) came first because it clearly laid out the proper order of learning in its teaching of the eight steps: the investigation of things (gewu), the extension of knowledge, sincerity of the will, rectification of the mind, cultivation of the person, regulation of the family, order in the state, and world peace—in which each step is the prerequisite for achieving the next. Exhaustively investigating things requires coming into contact with things and affairs one by one in their particularity—from the near at hand to the remote, from the shallow to the deep, from the outside to the inside—both through studying the classics and histories and through involving oneself in practical affairs.

Zhu Xi’s method of spiritual cultivation centered on learning to recover the original condition of the mind in which the “mind of the Way,” or heavenly principle, is not admixed with human desires. However, he revised Cheng Yi’s (1033–1107) teaching that “the human mind is the same as human desires,” saying that even the sage cannot be without the human mind (natural desires, such as the desire for food and drink), but for the sage the mind of the Way is always in charge. In fact, natural desires, when kept in moderation, are themselves heavenly (natural) principles. The mind of the Way is the mind that is naturally inclined toward humanness, rightness, propriety, and wisdom, which, as Mengzi taught, manifest themselves as the social virtues of compassion, a sense of shame, yielding to others, and the ability to distinguish right and wrong (see Mencius 2:A6).

—Barry D. Steben

See also: Confucianism and Holy People; Daoism and Holy People; Mengzi; Scholars as Holy People; Zhang Zai; Zhou Dunyi

References and further reading:

- Adler, Joseph A. 1999. “Zhou Dunyi: The Metaphysics and Practice of Sagehood.” In Sources of Chinese Tradition, 2d ed., 1: 669–678. Edited by William Theodore de Bary and Irene Bloom. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bary, William Theodore de, and Irene Bloom, eds. 1999. Sources of Chinese Tradition, 2d ed., 1: 697–754. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Ching, Julia. 2000. The Religious Thought of Chu Hsi. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Feng, Youlan. 1952–1953. A History of Chinese Philosophy. Translated by Derk Bodde. 2 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Wing-Tsit Chan, trans. 1963. A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zhuangzi (Chuang Tzu)

(c. 369–286 B.C.E.)

Daoist sage

Zhuangzi lived in the fourth century (c. 369–286) B.C.E. during the confusion and conflict of the Warring States period in China (403–222 B.C.E.). He is considered the intellectual heir of Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.) and the second most important sage in the development of Daoism. Zhuangzi transformed Laozi’s thought in a lively, insightful, and often humorous style. He deepened the philosophical basis of Daoism by developing sophisticated strategies of argumentation and confronting rival philosophical positions. The foundation of his approach is ziran: naturalness or spontaneity.

The thirty-three chapters of the Zhuangzi or Chuang Tzu describe his conversations, thought, and way of life. Zhuangzi apparently only authored the first seven Inner Chapters of the existing text. The remaining Outer Chapters are derived from his students’ writings, the “School of Zhuangzi,” and related thinkers, whom A. C. Graham classified as Primitivists, Yangists, and Syncretists. These texts were presumably included because they develop themes from the Inner Chapters or introduce other materials about Zhuangzi, although some are different in style and content. Whereas philosophers such as Confucius, Mozi, and Xunzi argued for perfecting the human condition according to contradictory ideals of human nature and morality, Zhuangzi showed the superiority of the Dao (Way) such that humans ought to live according to nature, by letting it be, rather than against it, by attempting to control it (chapter 5).

Instead of focusing on profit, progress, and morality, humans, Zhuangzi said, needed to understand how they related to nature from within nature itself. Zhuangzi thus asked whether humans could save themselves from their own activity by yielding to the immanent spontaneity of nature itself in order to let it occur. He concluded that one could do the most by doing nothing (wuwei). This nonassertive or inactive action occurs in relation to unprincipled or anarchic knowing (wuzhi) and objectless desire (wuyu). Zhuangzi viewed nature as a self-transforming web demanding naturalness, understood as spontaneity, flux, and change. All things involve a natural difference in perspective as well as relative parity such that they are equally important (chapter 2).

Zhuangzi's principle of transformation also involves the mutuality of opposites such that, for example, a man is connected to a butterfly (chapter 2), life is tied to death (chapter 6), and the masculine can find the Dao only by recourse to the feminine (chapter 7). Zhuangzi therefore ultimately affirmed the dynamic unity of opposites beyond all duality in order to recognize the uniqueness of all things as interdependent particularities.

—Eric Sean Nelson

See also: Daoism and Holy People; Laozi; Scholars as Holy People

References and further reading:

Höchstmann, Hyun. 2001. On Chuang Tzu. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

Laozi and Zhuangzi. 1962. The Texts of Taoism: The Tao Te Ching of Lao Tzu and the Writings of Chuang Tzu. 2 vols. Translated by James Legge. New York: Dover.

Zhuangzi. 1968. The Complete Works of Chuang Tzu. Translated by Burton Watson. New York: Columbia University Press.

———. 1996. The Book of Chuang Tzu. Translated by Martin Palmer et al. London: Penguin/Arkana.

———. 2001. Chuang-Tzu: The Inner Chapters. Translated by A. C. Graham. Indianapolis: Hackett.

Zongmi (Tsong-mi)

(780–841 C.E.)

Buddhist patriarch

A Chinese Buddhist scholar-monk of the Tang dynasty (618–907), Zongmi was commonly referred to by his monastic name, Guifeng. He was honored as the fifth patriarch of the Huayan school as well as a patriarch of the Heze Chan (Zen) lineage.

Zongmi was born into a wealthy family in 780 and received a classical education in Confucian studies. He also read Buddhist scriptures extensively. On his way to attain the national examination in the capital, he came to Dayun monastery in Sichuan and met meditation master Daoyuan, who inspired him to enter the monastic order. Daoyuan taught him the Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment. In 810, Zongmi met Chengguan's disciple Lingfeng, who gave him Chengguan's two commentaries on the Huayan Jing (Flower garland sutra). After reading them, Zongmi wrote to Chengguan asking to study under him. Chengguan agreed, and Zongmi studied under Chengguan for two years. He then went to Mt. Zhongnan for an intensive study of Buddhist scriptures. In 828, the emperor summoned him to court to lecture on Buddhism; he accepted the invitation and stayed at court teaching for some time. Prime Minister Peixiu became a pious Buddhist under his guidance. Zongmi died in 841, and Emperor Xuanzhong gave him the title of Chan Master Dinghui (stability and wisdom).

As one of the most important figures in Chinese Buddhist history Zongmi studied all major texts of the Chinese Buddhist canon of his time and specialized in the works of the Chan and Huayan schools. He was deeply interested in both the practical and doctrinal aspects of Buddhism, and especially advocated the harmonization between Chan and doctrine. Thus he wrote the Chanyuan Zhuquan Jidu (Origins of the various Chan teachings). In Huayan study, Zongmi inherited the teaching of the second patriarch, Zhiyan, and attempted to account for the apparent discrepancies in the Buddhist doctrines by categorizing them according to their specific aims. He wrote many important works, such as a commentary on the Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment and the Yuanren Lun (Inquiry into the origin of humanity), besides various commentaries on the Huayan Jing.

—Guang Xing

See also: Chengguan; Scholars as Holy People; Zhiyan

References and further reading:

Buddhist Association of China, ed. 1996. Zhongguo Fo jiao (Chinese Buddhism). Vol. 2. Beijing: Eastern Publication Center.

Gregory, Peter N. 1991. Tsong-mi and the Sinification of Buddhism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zoroaster (Zarathustra)

(c. 1400 B.C.E.)

Founder of Zoroastrianism

The Iranian prophet Zarathustra (more familiar to Western audiences by the Greek form of his name, Zoroaster) was the only prophet of a major religion who served as a priest of the original religion from which he separated. Zoroaster is also the oldest known prophetic founder of a religion. Although the Zoroastrians' own tradition states that Zoroaster lived 258 years before Alexander the Great (c. 600 B.C.E.), this is a late calculation based on a Greek fiction. Other Greeks argued that Zoroaster lived 6,000 years before Plato, or 5,000 years before the Trojan War, emphasizing his antiquity. Scholars now argue on the linguistic and cultural evidence of the Gathas (Hymns), the seventeen hymns written by Zoroaster that form part of Zoroastrian scripture (the Avesta [The injunction]), that the prophet lived sometime between 1500 and 1200 b.c.e., most likely in about 1400. This dating is consistent with the very early form of language in the Gathas, which is similar to the Indian Rig Veda, and also with the pastoralist, preagricultural life Zoroaster's people are described as living.

A modern artist's rendering of the ancient Iranian prophet Zoroaster, founder of the Zoroastrian religion. Zoroastrian Fire Temple, Yazd, Iran. (Art Directors)

Zoroaster may have lived in what is now Kazakhstan, but his people finally settled in eastern Iran. The religion he taught had a world-reaching importance as the belief of the rulers of the Persian Empire. Zoroaster was a priest of the traditional religion, apparently a poor man. He seems to have lived at a time when warfare was on the rise and traditional values were breaking down thanks to contact with the more settled peoples of the west and south. Certainly the Gathas include a passionate sense of the powerlessness of the poor. Even more movingly, an entire Gatha is devoted to the plight of the defenseless cow, unable to protect itself in a world of increasing violence and disruption. This unsettled world was the background to a series of visions in which the supreme god, Ahura Mazda (Lord Wisdom) appeared to Zoroaster, calling him a prophet.

Zoroaster set out to reform the traditional religion. He did not deny his polytheistic heritage but taught that in the beginning there was only one god, Ahura Mazda, who was creator and upholder of asha, the principle of truth and order in the universe. But this good god found himself opposed by an antagonistic principle, drug (deceit, or "the lie"), given form as the spirit of destruction, Angra Mainyu. They began a cosmic struggle, one that will eventually end in the victory of good and order. Each force created subsidiary gods to help in this ongoing battle, and the world itself was created as a battlefield between order and chaos.

Zoroaster can fairly be said to be the first proponent of a religion based primarily on ethics rather than sacrifice. He taught that humans are absolutely central to this battle of good and evil—they must choose to support either Ahura Mazda or Angra Mainyu and must live their lives in a way to aid the battle for good. Thus morality is central, although Zoroaster did not reject the role of ritual in religion. In the end, good will triumph, in a great "Making Wonderful" that will include punishment for evil and reward for good—an idea adopted by other religions, including Christianity.

The traditional priests did not appreciate Zoroaster's efforts at reform, and he was driven away from his native land. He found refuge with a prince named Vishtaspa, whom he converted to the new religion. Settling at court, Zoroaster preached his prophetic vision to rich and poor, men and women. With royal patronage, he became wealthy and lived a long life, perhaps reaching the age of seventy-seven. His teaching was given validation when, egged on by traditional priests, neighboring states attacked, only to be defeated by Zoroaster's supporters. Finally, according to Zoroastrian legend, he met a martyr's death, killed while carrying out his priestly function at the fire altar, either by a rival priest or in a raid by a neighboring tribe.

Later Zoroastrian legend emphasized the prophet's role as an emissary sent by Ahura Mazda, creating a nativity myth that included a miraculous conception at which all of the good creation rejoiced, while the forces of evil tried to destroy the baby (threats from which Zoroaster was saved miraculously). He was perceived as a world savior sent by God, and as it became clear that the final great battle was not imminent, the legend grew that he would come again as the future savior to finish the work he had begun.

Although the world population of Zoroastrians has sunk to only 100,000 today, the teachings of Zoroaster had an incalculable effect on the religious thought of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, and the repercussions of his thought can also be traced in China and India. The perception of humans as essential tools of God, giving humankind an elevated place in the struggle between good and evil, placed the religion of Iran on a moral footing not central to other religions for many centuries. And the millenarian heritage of Zoroaster—that a great cosmic battle will lead to the final establishment of order on earth—is with us still today.

—Phyllis G. Jestice

See also: Aesthetics and Holy People; Authority of Holy People; Founders of Religions as Holy People; Hagiography; Martyrdom and Persecution; Messiahs; Prophets; Reform and Reaction; Ritual

References and further reading:

- Clark, Peter. 1998. Zoroastrianism: An Introduction to an Ancient Faith. Brighton, England: Sussex Academic Press.
- Cohn, Norman. 1993. Cosmos, Chaos and the World to Come: The Ancient Roots of Apocalyptic Faith. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Hambach, Helmut, and Pallan Ichaporria. 1994. The Heritage of Zarathushtra: A New Translation of His Gathas. Heidelberg, Germany: Winter.

Zosima and Savatii of Solovki

(d. 1478 and c. 1430 C.E.)

Russian Orthodox monks, missionaries

Zosima and Savatii were northern Russian missionary saints in the fifteenth century and founders of Solovki monastery. Their vitae are usually bound together. The two best-known versions are in the Great Menology of Metropolitan Makarii, compiled in the mid–sixteenth century, and a later account with an introduction by Maxim the Greek.

Savatii began monastic life at Valaam monastery, one of the oldest Orthodox monasteries in northern Russia. His written Lives say that he longed for a more severe spiritual life and fled to the cloister of Cyril of Beloozero, but eventually he stole away from there in the dead of night, afraid that he was attracting too much praise for his asceticism. He then encountered a monk named German, and together they settled on Solovki Island, in the middle of the White Sea, and built a hermitage. Winter ice and storms made travel impossible for long periods, and the two remained for a few years with no other companionship. Savatii passed away in solitude in about 1430 after searching out an Orthodox priest in order to receive last rites. Though a hermit, Savatii nonetheless taught the institutional forms of Orthodoxy to those whom he encountered and in this manner participated in the missionary activity of the church. His importance in northern Russia grew when his remains were entombed in the monastery built on Solovki some decades later. Savatii, along with Zosima, became a major patron saint to the trading and fishing community of northern Russia. Savatii's spiritual role as mentor passed through German to Zosima.

Zosima came from a wealthy trading family in Novgorod. He opted for the monastic life and left his patrimony after his parents died. Zosima met German, admired his eremitic life with Savatii, and determined to go with him to Solovki. Zosima and German together founded a cloister, commonly known as Solovki, which received a blessing from the archbishop of Novgorod in about 1460. A few years later, Zosima became the leader of the cenobitic community. It appears that Zosima was an able administrator and charismatic spiritual leader. He built two churches and a refectory and attracted many disciples in addition to receiving land and wealth from the Novgorod population. Zosima and his monks contended with opposition from the local Karelian and Russian population, which resented intrusion on their fishing and hunting grounds. This opposition dissipated over time thanks to the cult of Savatii that was created by Zosima. Savatii's remains were brought to Solovki from the church where he had passed away, and Zosima created Solovki's first official shrine at his tomb. After Zosima's death in 1478, the two saints came to be revered together and received credit for protecting, healing, and punishing traders, peasants, and fishermen throughout the Russian northeast—a region dominated by trade, trapping, and fishing.

Savatii and Zosima are among the great missionary monks of Russia who carried the institution of the Orthodox Church into the northern “desert” during the late thirteenth- to early fifteenth-century renaissance of Russian monasticism. They were regional saints in three senses: They came from the north, they were tonsured in the north, and they gathered their followers primarily from the northern regions. Miracles of these two saints are recorded into the modern period. Thanks to donations, purchases, and an active role in fishing and salt-making, Solovki became a major trading house in the pre-Petrine north, where wealth depended on native industries rather than on agriculture. Solovki monastery, with its concentration of a number of major pan-Russian saints' cults, remained significant in Russia's northern spiritual and economic community until 1917. Savatii and Zosima were recognized in 1547, and they are remembered on September 27, April 17, and August 8.

—Jennifer B. Spock

See also: Cyril of Beloozero; Mission; Monasticism and Holy People; Orthodoxy and Saints; Spiritual Guardians

References and further reading:

- Rose, Seraphim. 1975. Northern Thebaid: Monastic Saints of the Russian North. Platina, CA: St. Herman of Alaska Brotherhood.
- Spock, Jennifer B. 1999. “The Solovki Monastery, 1460–1645: Piety and Patronage in the Early Modern Russian North.” Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University.

INDEX

Note: page numbers in bold type following main subject headings refer to encyclopedia entries devoted to that topic.

A

- Aaron, 1–2, 589–590, 603, 604, 697
 ‘Abata, Muhammad Hasan, 2
 Abbo of Fleury, 2–3, 249
Abdal, 818
 ‘Abduh, Muhammad, 791
 Abdul Khaliq Ghidjuwani, 99
 ‘Abdu’l-Baha, 3–4, 97
 Baha’u’llah, 3, 101
 Bahíyyih Khánum and, 102 covenant concept and, 98
 Gregory, Louis, and, 323
 hereditary holiness and, 358 holy people as models and, 595
 intermediary role, 400
 Rúhíyyih Khánum and, 747
 Shoghi Effendi and, 798
 veneration of, 3, 889
 Abelard, Peter, 119, 227, 645
 Aberman Manga, 77
 Abiodun Akinsowon, Christiana, 4, 85, 658
 Abishabis, 4–5
 Abolitionism, 142
 Abraham, 5–7, 179, 411, 451, 603
 Abraham ben David. See Ravad
 Abraham ibn Ezra, 7, 605, 773
 Abreha. See Ezra
 Abu Bakr, 36, 393, 608, 609
 Abu Hanifa, 415, 470
 Abu ‘l-Ma’arif. See Sharqawi al-Khalafi, Ahmad Acharya, Ananta, 292
 Achatius, 280
 Achilles, 361, 362
Acta Sanctorum, 563
Actus Silvestri, 807
 Acyuta Preksha, 525
 ‘Ad Sheykh, 8–9
 Adalbero of Metz, 439
 Adalbert of Prague, 9–10, 86–87, 175, 592, 888
 Adeboye, E. E., 29
 Adechina, 10
 Adelheid, 11
 Adham, Ibrahim ibn, 11–12, 71, 820
 Adhyatmika movement, 104, 720
 Adi Granth, 727, 803, 804, 806
Adibuddhas, 143
 Adinath, 630
 Adomnán, 191
 Adoptionism, 115
 Aduwo, Margaret, 559
 Advaita Vedanta, 368
 Chinmayananda, 176–177, 820
 Krishnamurti and, 485
 Madhva and, 525
 Maharshi, 528
 Ramanuja and, 724
 See also Shankara
Adventus, 12
Adversus Marcionem (Tertullian), 543
 Aedlin, 705–706
 Aegidius. See Giles
 Ælfric of Eynsham, 831, 832
 Aelred of Rievaulx, 12–13, 250, 642
 Aembu people, 402
 Aemilia, 891
 Aeneas, 361, 395
Aeneid (Virgil), 232, 802
 Aeschylus, 652
 Aesthetics, 13–15. See also Dance; Iconography;
 Music; Visual art by holy people
 Aethelbert of Kent, 249
 Æthelwold, 15, 664, 831–832
 Afghanistan, 533
 Afra of Augsburg, 15–16
 Africa. See African Christianity; African traditional holy people; African traditional religions
 African American holy people
 Ali, Muhammad, 34–35
 Bowman, 138–139
 Brown and, 142
 Coltrane, 14–15, 190–191, 203
 Cone, 195, 775
 contemporary trends, 203
 Crummell, 208
 Delany, 224, 675
 Fard, 221, 270–271, 278, 314, 583, 610
 Farrakhan, 272
 Father Divine, 314, 398, 781
 Garvey, 294, 339, 582, 675
 Gregory, Louis, 323
 King, 195, 203–204, 479–480, 693, 730, 898
 Malcolm X, 142, 534, 610
 Martin de Porres, 194, 549–550, 747, 820
 Mason, 560–561
 Muhammad, Elijah, 194, 271, 534, 610, 676,
 700
 Muhammad, Warith Deen, 611
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and,
 675–676
 prophets, 700
 Turner, Nat, 79, 869–870
See also Jamaica; Santería
 African Christianity, 9, 18
 Abiodun Akinsowon, 4, 85, 658
 Aladura movement, 4, 29, 93–94
 Aoko, 61–62, 299–300, 559
 Bakhita, 103
 Birech, 125
 Blyden, 129–130, 208
 Bonnke, 135–136, 203
 Braide, 139, 444
 Caleb, 156–157, 750, 911
 Cherubim and Seraphim Society, 4, 29, 85,
 658–659
 Chilembwe, 175–176, 595, 675
 Chisupe, 179
 Crowther, 207–208
 Crummell, 208
 Ezana, 18, 266–267, 750
 founders of, 279
 Gebre Mikael, 296–297, 414

- African Christianity (continued)
 Gutu, 203, 334
 Harris, 348, 699
 Idahosa, 387–388
 Jacobis, 296–297, 414
 Johane Masowe, 18, 434, 559
 Johnson, James, 443–444, 675
 Johnson, Samuel, 444
 Kalembe, 18, 19, 461–462
 Kimbangu, 18, 478, 552
 Kivebulaya, 87, 481–482, 551
 Lenshina, 18, 222, 506, 863
 Luwum, 18, 19, 204, 520–521, 552, 693
 Mai Chaza, 222, 532
 Mandela, 204, 538, 693, 730, 872
 Mary/Mama, 559–560
 Muzorewa, 616–617, 675
 Ntsikana, 645–646
 Nyabingi and, 647
 Orimolade Tunolase, 4, 658–659
 Pentecostal movement, 4, 29–30, 93–94, 203, 334, 505, 675
 purity/pollution, 704
 Ragot, 398, 559, 717–718
 Samuel of Waldebba, 631, 763
 Shembe, 52, 792
 Takla Haymanot, 72, 174, 837, 887
 Tansi, 837–838
 Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
 Yared, 14, 928–929
See also Legio Maria
- African Civilization Society, 224
 African Orthodox Church, 191
 “African Personality,” 129–130
 African traditional holy people
 Ali Ber, 35, 749
 Arap Koilegen, 66–67, 675
 Blyden, 129–130, 208
 Diola prophets, 37–38, 77, 222, 233–234, 675, 699, 740
 Iloibonok, 391–392
 Ireri wa Irugi, 402
 Kidongoi, 174, 357, 362, 391, 476
 Kimpa Vita, 674–675
 Kinjikitile Ngwale, 18, 19, 480–481, 675
 Maroon Nanny, 547–548
 Masinde, 18, 203, 398, 560, 657, 897–898
 Mbatiany, 19, 392, 566
 Mbona, 505, 567, 630
 Mnkabayi ka Jama, 593–594
 Moraa Moka Ngiti, 18, 85, 299, 600–601
 Morèmi, 602–603
 Mugeni, 606
 Mugo wa Kibiro, 402, 606–607
 Nongqawuse, 18, 644
 Nyabingi, 18, 19, 65, 646–647, 675
 Obatala, 65, 649
 Oduduwa, 651
 Ogún, 18, 652–653, 759
 Oyá, 18, 665, 789, 910
 priests, 18, 697
 reform and, 733
 Sakawa, 759–760
 Shaka ka Senzangakhona, 400, 784
 Shangó, 65, 665, 788–789
 Shembe, 52, 792
 Waiyaki wa Hinga, 18, 19, 675, 905–906
- African traditional religions, 16–20
 Amerindian religions and, 45
 ancestors, 51, 52, 594
 attributes of holy people, 79
 authority of holy people, 85
 child prodigies, 174
 Christianity and, 18, 135, 392, 647, 658
 contemporary holy people, 203
 dance, 14, 764
 death, 221, 222
 demons/monsters, 226
 gender, 299
 heroes, 362
 holy people as models, 595
 Idahosa and, 387
 intermediary role, 16, 399, 400
 Johane Masowe and, 434
 legendary holy people, 504, 505
 Lenshina and, 506
 Mason and, 561
 Meninha de Gantois and, 578–579
 miracles, 588
 mission and, 591
 nature, 630
 Nehanda Nyakasikana, 633
 prophets, 699, 700
 retreat vs. secular activity, 7
 ritual, 739, 740
 rulers as holy people, 19, 400, 749
 sages, 759
 Santería and, 10, 600, 767
 warfare, 19, 910
See also Orishas
- African-instituted churches (AICs). See African Christianity
- Aga Khan I (Hassan ‘Ali), 20–21
 Aga Khan II (‘Ali Shah), 21, 37
 Aga Khan III (Sultan Muhammad Shah), 21–22, 37
 Aga Khan IV (Karim al-Husaini), 22–23
 Agapitus I, 696
 Agastya, 758
 Agatha, 23–24, 182, 516, 781
 Agatho, 696
 Agnes, 24, 182, 781
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24–25
 Agnivesh, 25, 693, 733
 Ahab, 252
 Ahalya Bai, 750
Ahimsa, 123, 416, 675, 896, 911
 Ahmad al-Ahsa‘i, Shaykh, 25–26, 85, 470, 774, 835
 Ahmed Baba, 18–19
 Aiakos, 26
 Aias (Ajax), 26
 Aias son of Oileus (Ajax the Lesser), 26–27
 AICs (African-instituted churches). See African Christianity Aid, 192
 Aidan, 27, 169
 AIDS/HIV, 179
 Aigina, 26
 Aimoin, 2
 ‘Aishah, 609, 610
 Ajatashatru, 28, 124, 228, 736
 Ajatashatrakaukrtyavinodana Sutra, 540
 Ajax (Aias), 26
Akathistos, 742
 Akhenaten, 28, 570, 686
Akhlaq-i Nasiriyiyih (at-Tusi), 871
 Akiba ben Joseph, 29
 as hakham, 340
 Ishmael ben Elisha and, 404 martyrdom of, 29, 844 patriotism and, 672, 674 scholarship and, 772–773
 Simeon bar Kochba and, 582, 672
 Simeon ben Yohai and, 807
 Akihito (Emperor of Japan), 748
 Akindayomi, Josiah, 29–30
 Akinyele, Isaac, 94
 Akkad, 570
 Akkamahadevi. See Mahadeviyakka
 Akshobhya Buddha, 30
 Akshobhya Tirtha, 893
 Aksum, 156–157
 ‘Ala Muhammad, 348
 Alacoque, Margaret Mary, 30–31, 398
 Aladura movement, 4, 29, 93–94
 Alban, 31
 Albert the Great. See Albertus Magnus
 Albertus Magnus, 31–32, 238
 Albrecht of Brandenburg, 887
 Alchemy, 215–216, 296
 Alcuin, 511, 920
 Aldegunde, 563
 Aldetrude, 563
 Aleander, Hieronymus, 901
 Alexander I, 695
 Alexander (martyr of Lyons), 521
 Alexander Nevskii, 32, 33, 400, 911
 Alexander the Great, 32, 34
 apotheosis of, 34, 65, 83, 362, 524, 571
 Greek ruler cult and, 322, 748
 Muslim views of, 474
 Ptolemaic ruler cult and, 703
 Alexandra (Empress of Russia), 743
 Alfeyev, Hilarion, 809
 Alfonso VIII (King of Castile), 406
 Algonkian people, 787
 ‘Ali b. Nu‘man, 88
 Ali Ber, Sonni, 35–36, 749
 ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib, 36 authority of, 85, 392–393
 Bektash Wali and, 113
 death of, 609

- hereditary holiness and, 408
 Muhammad and, 36, 392–393, 608
 politics and, 692
 tomb of, 407
 veneration of, 36, 888
- ‘Ali ibn al-Husayn, Zayn, 36–37, 409, 588
- Ali, Muhammad, 34–35
- ‘Ali Shah. See Aga Khan II
- ‘Ali Shah, Lady, 37
- Alinesitoué Diatta, 37–38, 234, 675, 740
- Alkabez, Solomon, 466
- Alkmene, 363
- All Saints’ Day, 38–39
- Allama Prabhu, 107
- Almoravid movement, 732
- Alphonso, 852
- Altercatio cum Arianis* (Eugenius of Carthage), 263
- Alvars*, 13, 52, 121, 229, 625, 820
- Amado, Jorge, 579
- AmaNazeretha Church, 52, 792
- Amand of Maastricht, 306
- Amandus of Maastricht, 39
- Amanita muscaria*, 262
- Amardas, 39–40, 67, 804
- Amaterasu, 52, 748
- Amautas*, 40
- Ambapali, 782
- Ambedkar, B. R., 190
- Ambrose, 40–41
 Augustine of Hippo and, 41, 81
 on Gervasius and Protasius, 308 Helena and, 355
 on Lawrence of Rome, 501
 Monica and, 598
 Paulinus of Nola and, 680
- Amenhotep I, 686
- Amenhotep III, 686
- Amenhotep IV. See Akhenaten
- American Revolution, 343, 503
- Amerindian holy people
 Abishabis, 4–5
 Axayacatl, 43, 88, 525, 910
 Black Elk, 129
 Chimalman, 176, 298, 710
 Clan Mothers, 185–186
 Corn Maidens/Mothers, 205
 Crazy Horse, 207, 910
 Cuniraya Huiracocha, 209, 314
 Deganawida, 223, 329, 500, 911
 Geronimo, 79, 306
 Handsome Lake, 45, 279, 343–344, 675
 Huitzilopochtli, 43, 44, 379–380, 593, 849
 Juan Diego, 448–449, 672
 Kateri Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
 Macuilxochitl, 88, 525
 Manco Capac, 536–537
 Mankiller, 194, 540, 730
 Mixcoatl, 176, 593, 849
 Neolin, 634, 674
 Nezahualcoyotl, 636, 910
- Ollantay, 656
- Pariacaca, 669–670
- Popé, 674, 694–695
- Red Sticks, 730–731
- Sanapia, 297, 765
- Setuuma, 779
- Sitting Bull, 45, 72, 699, 810–811, 922
- Sweet Medicine, 630, 759, 831
- Tailfeather Woman, 299, 836, 911
- Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
- Tenskwatawa, 221–222, 630, 675, 700, 730–731, 825, 845–846
- Tezcatlipoca, 88, 710, 849
- Titu Cusi Yupanqui, 860–861
- Wovoka, 52, 675, 921–922
- See also* Amerindian religions; Quetzalcoatl
- Topiltzin
- Amerindian religions, 41–45
amautas, 40
 ancestors, 42–43, 51, 52, 185–186, 614–615
 asceticism, 72
 attributes of holy people, 79
 child prodigies, 174
 Christianity and, 4, 44–45, 88, 129, 223, 344, 694, 711 contemporary holy people and, 203
 dance, 14
 death, 220, 221–222
 Deer Dancers, 222–223
 demons/monsters, 226
 El Dorado, 239–240
 drug use, 262–263
 gender, 297, 298, 299
 gods on earth, 314
 heroes, 362
 holy people as models, 595
 Huaca, 376
 intermediary role, 399–400
 messiah beliefs, 581
 Midewiwin Brotherhood, 583–584, 630
 miracles, 588
 mission and, 45, 129, 591
 mummy bundles, 614–615
 nature, 630
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 675
 prophets, 699, 700
quipocamayos, 43, 711–712
 retreat vs. secular activity, 7
 ritual, 739–740
 rulers as holy people, 394–395, 399–400, 691–692, 749, 860–861
 sages, 759
 shamanism, 786
 warfare, 43–44, 88, 176, 207, 636, 910
See also Amerindian holy people
- Amerindians
 Christian martyrs and, 139–140
 Drexel and, 241, 913
 Duchesne and, 243
 Rose of Lima and, 747
- See also* Amerindian holy people;
 Amerindian religions
- Ames, Roger T., 200
- Amida. See Amitabha Buddha
- Amidism, 753
- Amidism. See Pure Land Buddhism
- ‘Amili, al-, Shaykh Baha’i, 46
- al-Amin bin Hamid bin Naf’utay, Sheykh, 9
- Amin, Idi, 520, 552
- Amitabha Buddha, 14, 30, 46–47, 193. See also Pure Land Buddhism
- Amitayurdhyana Sutra, 47
- Ammachi, 47–48, 299, 316
- Ammonius, 690
- Amnon of Mainz, 48, 453, 504–505
- Amos, 179, 699
- Amphilochios, 203, 632
- Amrtaratnavali* (Mukundadeva), 614
- An Shigao, 48, 750
- An Shih-Kao. See An Shigao
- Anabaptists, 265, 266, 423–424, 732
- Anacletus, 695
- Analects* (Confucius), 197, 198
- Anales de Cuauhtitlan*, 636, 710
- Anan ben David, 49, 732, 773
- Ananda, 49–50
 attributes of, 80
 Devadatta and, 228
 as disciple, 235
 gender and, 298
 hereditary holiness and, 357
 Vacchagotta and, 881
 veneration of, 887
- Anandamayi Ma, 85, 316, 370
- Anandatirtha. See Madhva
- Anas, Malik ibn, 415, 619
- Anastasius I, 696
- Anastasius the Persian, 50
- Anathapindika, 50–51, 492, 913
- Anathapindikovada Sutra, 51
- Ancestors, 51–52
 African traditional religions, 51, 52, 594
 Amerindian religions, 42–43, 51, 52, 185–186, 614–615
 Confucianism, 195
 Greek hero cults and, 571
 guidance and, 330
- Ancient Egypt
 Moses and, 603–604
 Ptolemaic ruler cult, 322, 571, 702–703
See also Akhenaten; Cleopatra VII; Pharaohs of Egypt
- Ancient Greek holy people
 Apollonius of Tyana, 62–63, 78, 222, 706
 Artemidorus, 68
 Calchas, 156, 321, 570–571, 600
 Empedocles, 258, 320, 321, 322, 388
 Hermetica, 358
 Iamblichus, 193, 321, 385, 588, 705, 706, 740
 Melampus, 321, 576
 Mopsus, 156, 570–571, 600

- Ancient Greek holy people (continued)
 Plotinus, 65, 70, 320, 385, 573, 690
 Proclus, 247, 321, 698, 706
 Pythia, 247, 299, 321, 571, 572, 706–707
 sibyls, 299, 321, 700, 802
 Tiresias, 156, 321, 699, 860
See also Aristotle; Greek hero cults; Plato; Pythagoras; Socrates
- Ancient Greek religion/culture, 570–571 apotheosis, 65, 361
 astrology, 75, 76
 child prodigies, 174
 Christianity and, 31, 774
 creativity, 14
 death, 220, 222
 dream interpretation, 68
 ecstatic cults, 247
 gender, 298
 guidance, 329
 heroines, 361, 363
 insanity, 396
 intermediary role, 400
 Islam and, 774
 Justin Martyr and, 458
 lawgivers, 500
 monasticism, 596
 nature, 630
 philosophers, 319–321
 prophets, 247, 299, 321–322, 570–571, 572, 699, 706–707
 reincarnation, 734 ruler cult, 322–323, 748
 scholars as holy people, 772
 spiritual guardians, 817
 veneration of holy people, 887
See also Greek hero cults; Pythagoreanism
- Ancient Mediterranean religions, 569–573
 Dido, 232, 595
 priests, 697
 prophets, 699–700
See also Ancient Greek religion/culture; Ancient Roman religion/culture
- Ancient Near East, 570
- Ancient Roman holy people
 Cato the Younger, 166, 704
 Constantine, 201–202, 354, 750
- Ancient Roman religion/culture, 572–573
 apotheosis, 65
 astrology, 75, 76
 desert saints and, 227
 Dido and, 232
 dream interpretation, 68
 indigetes, 395
 intermediary role, 400
 Justin Martyr and, 458
 Neopythagoreanism and, 705
 prophets, 700
 rulers as holy people, 12, 34, 65, 83, 572–573, 748
 sibyls, 802
 triumph, 865–866
- Vestal Virgins, 572, 697, 704, 891–892
See also Roman persecutions of Christians
- Andal, 52–53, 221, 229
 ‘Andalib, Muhammad Nasir, 217–218
- Anderl of Rinn, 58
- Andrew, 53
- Andrew of Strumi, 439
- Angad, 39, 804
- Angadi, S. M., 527
- Angiras, 738
- Anglicanism
 canonization, 181
 Charles I, 173, 749
 Cranmer, 206–207, 499, 674, 732, 737, 781
 Crowther, 207–208
 discipleship, 236
 Forty Martyrs of England and Wales and, 259–260
 intermediary role, 180
 Johnson, James, 443–444, 675
 Kivebulaya, 87, 481–482, 551
 monasticism and, 596
 Newman and, 635
 recognition, 729
 Ridley, 499, 737
 saints and, 702
 Southcott, 582, 817
 Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
 veneration of holy people, 888
- Anhui. See Sthiramati
- Anicetus, 694, 695
- Animal rights, 203
- Animals. See Nature
- Aniruddha, 235
- Annamacharya, 802
- Anne (Christian saint), 53–54, 357
- Anne (Japanese Buddhist), 824
- Ansari, Abu Isma‘il ‘Abdallah al-, 54–55, 472
- Ansari, Jabir b. ‘Abd Allah al-, 37
- Ansari, Shaykh Murtada, 55, 500
- Anselm of Canterbury, 13, 55–56, 692
- Anterus, 695
- Anticolonialism. See Patriotism/anticolonial resistance
- Antigone, 363
- Antigone* (Sophocles), 652, 860
- Anti-Semitism, 56–58
 Amnon of Mainz, 48
 Bernardino of Siena, 119
 Chosen People concept and, 180
 Hugh of Lincoln, 58, 378
 Luther, 520
 Stein and, 821
 William of Norwich, 58, 378, 918–919
See also Shoah
- Antitheses* (Marcion), 543
- Antony of Egypt. See Antony of the Desert
- Antony of Kiev, 58–59, 852
- Antony of Padua, 59–60, 61, 226
- Antony of the Desert, 60, 227–228
 Athanasius and, 60, 76, 329
- awakening/conversion, 87
- Basil the Great and, 108
- Cuthbert and, 210
 guidance and, 329
 monasticism and, 60, 108, 596
 Paul the Hermit and, 679
- Antony of Uvari, 61
- Anubhuti-prakashika* (Vidyaranya), 893
- Anubis, 184
- Anupada Sutra, 790
- Anvar, Sayyid Qasim-i, 337
- Anwar, Hasan al-, 619
- Aoko, Gaudencia, 60–61, 299–300, 559
- Apache people, 79, 306
- Apocalypse. See Millenarianism/eschatology
- Apollinarus of Laodicea, 76
- Apollo, 395
- Apollonia, 62, 183, 553, 818
- Apollonius of Tyana, 62–63, 78, 222, 706
- Apologetic Discourses against the Attackers of Holy Images* (John of Damascus), 439
- Apologeticus pro Fide* (Eugenius of Carthage), 263
- Apologia pro vita sua* (Newman), 636
- Apology* (Plato), 320, 689
- Apostles, 63–65, 235–236
 Andrew, 53
 bishop-saints and, 127
 James the Greater, 422, 911
 John the Evangelist, 443
 mission and, 592
 Thomas, 854
See also specific people
- Apotheosis, 34, 65–66, 83, 361, 362, 524, 571, 796–797
- Aquila and Prisca, 66
- Aquinas. See Thomas Aquinas
- Arahants*, 66, 86, 132, 146–147, 587, 733
- Arap Koilegen, Kipchomber, 66–67, 675
- Arap Samoei, Koitalel, 18, 19
- Arbeo of Freising, 257
- The Archaic Revival* (McKenna), 567
- Archilochus, 363, 571
- Arctinus, 27
- Ardhakathanak* (Banarsidas), 104
- Arianism
 Ambrose and, 40
 Athanasius and, 76
 Augustine of Hippo and, 81
 Basil the Great and, 108
 Clovis and, 189
 Constantine and, 202
 Ephrem the Syrian and, 261
 Eugenius of Carthage and, 263
 Gregory of Nazianzus and, 325
 Hilary of Poitiers and, 364
 intolerance and, 863
 Zeno and, 937
- Arihanemi, 631
- Arishtanemi. See Nemi
- Aristophanes, 813

- Aristotle, 320
 Albertus Magnus and, 31
 Empedocles and, 258
 Neoplatonism and, 690
 Plotinus and, 690
 Pythagoreanism and, 705
 Socrates and, 813
 Thomas Aquinas and, 855
- Arjan, 67–68, 345, 725, 804–805, 889
- Arkudiusz, Peter, 489
- Arles, Council of, 807
- Armenia, 403
- Arnold of St. Emmeram's, 920
- Arnulf of Metz, 68
- Art. See Iconography; Visual art by holy people
- Artachaeüs, 79
- Artemidorus, 68–69
- Arul Anandar. See Britto, John de
- Arya Samaj, 25, 588–589
- Aryadeva, 69, 864
- "As Kingfishers" (Hopkins), 375
- Asanga, 69–70, 193, 884
- Ascent of Mount Carmel* (John of the Cross), 441
- The Ascent to Truth* (Merton), 580
- Asceticism, 70–73
 Baha'i faith, 3, 70
 Buddhism, 70, 71, 72, 131
 Daoism, 216
 gender and, 71, 298
 Islam, 2, 70, 71, 95, 109–110, 430, 591
 Jainism, 70, 71, 417
 Judaism, 70, 71, 254
 Shinto and, 795
 status and, 820
See also Christian asceticism; Hindu asceticism
- Asclepius*, 358
- Ashoka, 73, 748, 749–750
 mission and, 592 relics and, 887 repentance and, 736 tolerance and, 863
 Upagupta and, 877
 violence/nonviolence and, 73, 897, 910
- Ash-Shahid al-Awwal. See Jizzini, Muhammad al-
- Ashtadas Siddhanta Pada* (Haridas), 347
- Askew, Anne, 73–74
- Askia Mohammed, 35
- Asklepiades, 74
- Asklepios, 74–75, 361, 362, 363
- Asma'u Fodiyo Nana, 18, 75
- Asqalani, al-, 558
- Assemblies of God Africa (AOGA), 334
- Astrology, 75–76
- Atahualpa, 45
- Athanasius, 76
 Antony of the Desert and, 60, 76, 329
 Elijah and, 254
 intolerance and, 863
 monasticism and, 596
 Origen and, 658
- Atharvan, 758
- Athenaion Politeia*, 854
- Athletes, 34
- Atila, Timotheo, 560
- Atisha, 76–77, 504, 929
 as child prodigy, 174–175
 Drom Tonpa and, 242
 Longchenpa and, 512
 mission and, 592
- Atmavidyavilasa* (Sadashiva Brahmendra), 756
- Atotarho, 223
- Atri, 738
- Atta-Essou, 38, 77–78, 222, 234
- At-Ta'ifah, Shaykh. See Tusi, at-
- Attalus of Pergamus, 521
- 'Attar, Farid al-Din, 12, 54, 78, 715–716, 764
- Attar, Shaykh Mahmud, 337
- Attila the Hun, 507
- Attributes of holy people, 78–80, 144
- Auden, W. H., 166
- Augustine of Canterbury, 80–81, 592
- Augustine of Hippo, 81–83
 Ambrose and, 41, 81
 awakening/conversion, 87
 Eulalia of Mérida and, 264
 hagiography, 339
 Hilary of Poitiers and, 364
 Ignatius of Loyola and, 390
 on imitation of Christ, 393
 intolerance and, 863
 on Joseph, 445
 Manicheanism and, 539
 Merton and, 580
 Monica and, 298, 597
 Odo of Cluny and, 651
 Plato and, 690
 on priests, 698 retreat vs. secular activity and, 182
 as scholar, 774
 sexuality and, 781
 Teresa of Avila and, 846
- Augustus Caesar (Roman emperor), 65, 83–84, 572
- AUM Shinrikyo, 266
- Aurangzeb (Mughal emperor), 312, 345
- Aurobindo Ghose, 84, 369, 675, 826
- Ausonius, 680
- Australian Uniting Church, 702
- Authority of holy people, 84–85. See also Canonization
- Autobiography of a Yogi* (Yogananda), 930
- Avalokiteshvara, 840
- Avasyaka Sutra, 346
- Avatamsaka (Flower Garland) Sutra, 174, 374, 753, 881, 939, 943
- Avatars*, 314, 316, 362, 721
- "Ave Maria," 183
- Averroës, 31, 385
- Avesta*, 944
- Avicenna, 473
- Avila, Francisco de, 209, 669
- Avot*, 340
- Avvakum, 85–86, 740
- Awa, Marie, 222
- Awakening of Faith in Mahayana*, 928
- Awakening/conversion, 86–88, 278
- Awârif al-Ma'arif* (Suhrawardi), 828
- Aweil Longar, 504
- Awliya'*, 408–410, 826
- Axayacatl, 43, 88, 525, 910
- Aydarusi, Abd-al-Rahman b. Mustafa al-, 95
- Ayimpene of Sigandar, 234
- Ayuel Longar, 18
- 'Ayun, Zurara b., 415
- Azar, 6
- 'Aziz-billah, Abu Mansur Nizar al-, 88–89
- Aztec (Mexica) people, 43–44
 ancestors, 52
 Axayacatl, 43, 88, 525, 910
 Chimalman, 176, 298, 710
 Huitzilopochtli, 43, 44, 379–380, 593, 849
 intermediary role, 400
 Juan Diego, 448–449
 Macuilochochtli, 88, 525
 Mixcoatl, 176, 593, 849
 Nezahualcoyotl, 636, 910
 Tezcatlipoca, 88, 710, 849
See also Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin
- B
- Ba ri lo tsa ba, 489
- Baal, 254, 266
- Ba'al Shem Tov, 91–92, 352, 453 anti-intellectualism and, 229 joy and, 448
 reform and, 732
 veneration of, 92, 889
- Bab, The, 92–93, 97, 100
 death and, 221
 disciples of, 236
 guidance and, 329
 Husayn Bushru'i and, 383
 martyrdom/persecution and, 552
 messiah beliefs and, 583
 Quddus and, 709
 as religious founder, 279
 veneration of, 889
- Baba Buddha, 806
- Babad Tanah Jawi*, 907
- Babalola, Joseph Ayo, 4, 93–94, 675
- Babalú Ayé, 94, 193
- Babi faith, 92–93, 97
 Ahmad al-Ahsa'i and, 26, 835
 Baha'u'llah and, 100–101
 gender and, 300
 Husayn Bushru'i, 92, 97, 383, 710, 897
 Kazim Rashti and, 470, 835
 martyrdom/persecution, 92–93, 97, 100, 383, 552, 709–710, 835
 Mubarak, 605–606
 Quddus, 92, 97, 383, 606, 709–710
 Tahirih, 92, 97, 98, 100, 300, 835

- Babylas of Nicomedia, 94–95
Bacchae (Euripides), 247, 860
 Bacchus (Christian martyr). See Sergius and Bacchus
- Badawi, Ahmad al-, 95–96, 219
 Badī, 552
Bagirwa, 647
 Baha'i faith, 96–99
 Ahmad al-Ahsa'i and, 26
 asceticism and, 3, 70
 authority of holy people, 85
 Babi faith and, 92, 97, 100–101
 compassion, 194
 discipleship, 236 founding of, 96, 100–101, 279
 gender and, 98, 298, 300
 gods on earth, 314
 hereditary holiness, 3, 358
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 400
 martyrdom/persecution, 551, 893
 messiah beliefs, 583
 mission, 591
 retreat vs. secular activity, 8
 teachers as holy people, 841
 veneration of holy people, 3, 889
 violence/nonviolence, 897
 wealth/poverty, 913
 See also Baha'i holy people
- Baha'i holy people
 Bahíyyih Khánum, 98, 102–103, 298
 Gregory, Louis, 323
 Olinga, 591, 655
 Ransom-Kehler, 554, 725–726
 Root, 591, 746–747
 Rúhíyyih Khánum, 358, 747–748
 Vieira, 893
 See also 'Abdu'l-Baha; Baha'i faith; Baha'u'llah; Shoghi Effendi
- Baha'i, Shaykh. See 'Amili, al-, Shaykh Baha'i
- Baha'uddin Naqshband, 99–100, 217, 472, 429
 Baha'uddin Walad, 100
 Baha'u'llah, 93, 96, 98, 100–101
 'Abdu'l-Baha and, 3, 101
 hereditary holiness and, 358
 messiah beliefs and, 583
 as prophet, 699
 Quddus and, 710
 as religious founder, 279
 retreat vs. secular activity and, 8 suffering and, 826
 Tahirih and, 835
 as teacher, 841
 veneration of, 889
 wealth/poverty and, 913
- Bahenabai. See Bahinabai
 Bahinabai, 14, 102, 298
 Bahini. See Bahinabai
 Bahíyyih Khánum, 98, 102–103, 298
Bahussutabuddhas, 143
 Baizhang, 149, 376
- Bakhita, Josephine, 103
 Baktashiyyah sufism, 113–114, 688
Balche, 262
 Bale, John, 74
 Balinas the Wise. See Apollonius of Tyana
 Balkhi, Abu Ma'shar al-, 388
 Balkhi, Shaiq b. Ibrahim al-, 470
 Bamba, Ahmad, 103–104
 African traditional religions and, 18, 19
 devotion and, 231
 disciples of, 103, 235
 Fall and, 270
 Malik Sy and, 535
- Bamba Sylla, 270
 Bamdeb. See Vamaksepa
 Banarsidas, 87, 104, 229, 492, 720
 Bankei Eitaku, 740
 al-Banna, Hasan, 194
 Baocheng, 939
Baopuzi (Ge Hong), 296
 Baptist churches, 702
 Baqir, Muhammad al-, 104–105
 Baqli, Ruzbihan, 105–106
 Barakah, 409, 410
 Barbara, 106, 280, 789
 Bardas, Caesar, 389
 Barlaam and Josaphat, 106–107
 Barnes, Robert, 499
 Barnett, Lionel D., 494
 Barrett, David, 718
 Barth, Karl, 132, 195
 Bartholomew, 333
 Basava, 739
 Basavanna, 107–108, 221, 898
 Bashir, Muhammad b., 469
 Bashō, 108, 477
 Basil of Caesarea, 7, 775
 Basil the Blessed, 397–398, 693
 Basil the Great, 108–109
 Benedict of Aniane and, 114
 Columbanus and, 192
 Gregory of Nazianzus and, 108, 325
 Gregory of Nyssa and, 326
 monasticism and, 108–109, 596
 Pachomius and, 667
 Seraphim of Sarov and, 776
- Basri, al-Hasan al-, 70, 109–110, 693
 Bassui, 175
 Bastami, 'Ali, 97
Batá drums, 10, 600, 659
 Battle. See Warfare
 "Battle Hymn of the Republic," 142
 Baudonivia, 716
 Bauls, 110, 370, 396, 782
 Ba-xian. See Samantabhadra
Bayan (The Tab), 93
 Bayt'Abata sufism, 2
 Bayudaya community, 18
 Bazzaz, Abu Bakr Muhammad b. 'Abd Allah al-Shafi'a al-, 470
 Beard, Mary, 891
- Beatrijs of Nazareth, 111, 112
 Beauty, 79
 Beauvais, Vincent de, 106
 Becket. See Thomas Becket Bede, 111
 on Aidan, 27 on Alban, 31
 Augustine of Canterbury and, 80 on Cuthbert, 209, 210
 on Eulalia of Mérida, 264
 on Felix of Nola, 276
 on Gregory I, 324 on Hilda of Whitby, 365 on Ninian, 642
- Bedward, Alexander, 398
 Beguines, 111–112, 545–546
 Behem, Hans, 112–113, 266
 Bektash Wali, Haji, 113–114, 410, 933
 Belatovsky, Gavril, 58
 Belgi Dorje, 898
 Bellah, Robert N., 404
 Bellarmine, Robert, 114
 Bellet, C. F., 549
 Ben Zadok, Samson, 576
 Benedict II, 696
 Benedict XI, 696
 Benedict XIII, 896
 Benedict of Aniane, 71, 114–115, 729
 Benedict of Nursia, 60, 115–116, 360, 667, 818
 Benedict the African, 116
 Benedictines
 Abbo of Fleury, 2–3, 249
 Adalbert of Prague, 9–10, 86–87, 175, 592, 888
 Benedict of Aniane, 71, 114–115, 729
 Fourteen Holy Helpers and, 280
 Griffiths, 123, 327–328, 502
- Benghu, Nicholas, 334
 Beni, 40
 Benno of Meissen, 117
 Bercero, Gonzalo de, 852
 Berengar of Saint-Affrique, 187
 Bernanos, Georges, 892
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 117–119, 228, 394, 555–556
 Bernardino of Siena, 119–120, 445
 Bernier, François, 783
 Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, 847
 Bernshtein, Moshe, 353
 Bernward of Hildesheim, 14, 120
 Bertrán, Luis, 164
 Beruria, 120–121, 300
 Besant, Annie, 484
 Besht. See Ba'al Shem Tov
Bethada Náem n'Érenn, 401
 Bethge, Eberhard, 134
 Bevegnati, Giunta, 544
 Bhagat, Bhojo, 421
 Bhagavad Gita, 291, 314, 369, 484, 899, 910
 Bhagavata Purana, 170, 317, 525, 883
Bhaktamal (Nabhadas), 724, 728

- Bhakti* Hinduism, 121–122, 369–370
 Advaita Vedanta and, 368
 anti-intellectualism, 773 devotion and, 229
 gender, 298
 Mirabai, 122, 298, 586, 782
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 Rama and, 721
 Ravidas, 40, 121, 724, 727–728, 820
 ritual and, 739
 sexuality and, 782
 Vyas, 346–347, 902
See also Kabir; Vaishnava Hinduism;
 Virashaivism
- Bhaktivedanta, Swami A. C., 122, 170, 204
 Bharadvaja, 738
 Bhattacharya, Kamalakanta. See Kamalakanta
 Bhattacharya
 Bhavaviveka, 145–146
 Bhava, Vinoba, 122–123, 369
 Bhikshu, Acharya, 123, 732
 Bhrigu, 738
Bhṛngaratnavali (Mukundadeva), 614
 Bhu Devi, 52
Bibliographies of the Eminent Monks, 274
 Biblis, 521
Bihar an-Anwar (Majlisi), 532
 Bihbihani, Muhammad Baqir, 123–124, 500
Bijak, 460
 Bijjala, 107
 Bilal, 609
 Bimbisara (King of Magadha), 124–125
 Birech, Ezekiel Kiprop, 125
 Birgitta of Sweden, 125–126
 al-Biruni, 388
 Birushana, 799
 Bishop-saints, 126–128, 164–165. See also specific bishops
 Bistami, Abu Yazid (Bayezid), 105, 128, 229, 472, 590, 617
 Bixia Yuanjun, 66, 128–129, 399
 Black Death, 280
 Black Elk, 129
Black Elk Speaks (Neihardt), 129
 Black madonnas, 556
 Black Maria. See Mary/Mama
 “Black Mary.” See Mary/Mama
Black Theology and Black Power (Cone), 195
A Black Theology of Liberation (Cone), 195
 Black, William, 580
 Blaise, 280
 Blandina, 521
 Blavatsky, Helen Petrovna, 484
 Blo bzang rgya mtso. See Losang Gyatso
 Blo gros brtan pa. See Sthiramati
 Blofeld, John, 376
 Blood libel, 58
 Blyden, Edward Wilmot, 129–130, 208
 Bobola, Andrew, 130–131
Bodhi, 86
Bodhicaryavatara (Santideva), 69, 585
Bodhicitta, 77, 495
 Bodhidharma, 131–132
 asceticism, 72
 death of, 222
 martyrdom/persecution, 552
 meditation and, 131, 569
 miracles, 588
 mission and, 592
 as patriarch, 149
 ritual and, 739
 Shenxiu and, 792
 veneration of, 888
Bodhi-patha-pradipa (Atisha), 77
Bodhisattvas, 132, 147–148
 Akshobhya Buddha, 30
 compassion and, 193
 Daoism and, 215
 as gods on earth, 316
 illustration, 133
 Ksitigarbha, 485–486, 818
 Manjushri, 28, 170, 539–540, 762, 866
 reincarnation and, 733
 Samantabhadra, 761–762
 as spiritual guardians, 818
 Srimala, 818
 Tara and, 840
 Vimalakirti, 894
 Boleyn, Anne, 499
 Bön religion, 423
 Bonaventure, 31, 81
 Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 132, 134, 182, 394, 898
 Boniface, 134–135, 511, 553, 592, 692, 906, 919
 Boniface I, 696
 Boniface IV, 38, 192, 696
 Boniface VIII, 168, 693
 Bonnke, Reinhard, 135–136, 203
Book of Changes. See Yijing
Book of Documents, 198, 199
The Book of Margery Kempe (Kempe), 456
Book of Martyrs (Foxe), 702, 737
 The Book of Mormon (Smith), 932
Book of Ritual, 198
Book of Songs, 198
Book of St. Gilbert, 310
 Boone, Daniel, 356
 Booth, William, 194
 Borgia, Francisco, 165
 Boris and Gleb, 136, 897
 Boro Baba. See Radharaman Charan Das Dev
 Borromeo, Charles, 136–137, 164
 Bosch, Hieronymus, 60
 Bosco, John, 137–138, 194, 285
 Bourbon dynasty, 302
 Bowman, Thea, 138–139
 Bradford, Helen, 644
 Braght, Thielman van, 702
 Brahamani, Bhairavi, 723
 Brahma Kumaris World Spiritual Organization, 505–506
 Brahma Tirtha, 902
Brahman, 87
 Brahmins, 368–369
 Braide, Garrick Sokari, 139, 444
 Brasidas, 524
 Braumage, Douglas, 67
 Brazil, 201, 578–579
 Brébeuf, Jean de, 139–140, 554
 Brendan of Birr, 401
 Brendan the Navigator, 72, 140, 401, 411
 Breughel, Peter, 60
Brevarium Alarici, 155
 Bridget. See Birgitta of Sweden
 Brigid of Ireland, 140–141, 218, 299, 498
 Brigittine Order, 125, 126
Brihadara Ayaka Upanishad, 293, 738
Brihad-bhagavatamrita (Sanatana Goswami), 766
 Britten, Benjamin, 166
 Britto, John de, 141–142
 ’Brog mi Lo tsa ba Shakya ye shes. See Drokmi
 Brorson, Hans, 702
 Brown, John, 142, 266, 595, 897, 898
 Brown, Peter, 308
 Browne, E. G., 3, 101
 ’Brug pa kun legs. See Drukpa Kunley
 Brunner, Emil, 195
 Bruno of Chartreuse, 142–143
 Bsod nams rtse mo, 490
 Bucer, Martin, 701
 Buddha, The. See Gautama Buddha
 Buddhadasa, 144–145, 193, 203, 774
 Buddhaghosa, 145, 774
 Buddhapalita, 145–146, 733
 Buddhas, 143–144, 146
Buddhavamsa, 143
 Buddhism, 146–149
 Akshobhya Buddha, 30
 Amitabha Buddha, 14, 30, 46–47, 193
 anti-intellectualism, 773
 asceticism, 70, 71, 72, 131
 attributes of holy people, 78, 79, 80
 authority of holy people, 85
 awakening/conversion, 86, 87
 Barlaam and Josephat and, 106–107
 buddhas, 143–144, 146
 Christianity and, 106–107
 compassion, 193
 creativity, 14
 Daoism and, 215–216, 731
 death, 221
 demons/monsters, 226
 devotion, 230
 discipleship, 235
 eremitism, 359, 360
 founder of, 278
 gender, 49, 295, 298, 300
 gods on earth, 316
 guidance, 329
 gurus, 332
 hagiography, 338
 hereditary holiness, 357
 Hinduism and, 13–14

- Buddhism (continued)
 holy people as models, 594–595
 intolerance, 864
 Karmapa reincarnation lineage, 465–466, 734
 laity, 491–492
mahasiddhas, 492, 528–529, 627, 859
 Manicheanism and, 539
 martyrdom/persecution, 551, 552, 553
 meditation, 568–569
 messiah beliefs, 580–581
 miracles, 147, 587, 588
 mission, 591–592
 monasticism, 596, 597
 morality, 601
 mysticism, 617
 nature, 630, 631
 neo-Confucianism and, 198, 354
 Ōjin and, 654
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 politics and, 692
 priests, 697
 purity/pollution and, 705
 recognition, 729
 reform, 222, 341, 735, 836, 928
 reincarnation, 733–734
 repentance, 735, 736 retreat vs. secular activity, 7, 8
 ritual and, 739
 rulers as holy people, 748, 749–750
 scholars as holy people, 772–773
 sexuality and, 780
 Shinto and, 793, 794
 spiritual guardians, 818
 status and, 820
 teachers as holy people, 842
 Tokugawa Ieyasu and, 861
 Tokugawa Mitsukuni and, 862
 veneration of holy people, 887–888
 violence/nonviolence, 73, 897, 898, 910
 Wang Yangming and, 908, 909
 warfare, 910
 wealth/poverty, 912–913
See also Bodhisattvas
- Buddhist holy people
 Ajatashatru, 28, 124, 228, 736
 An Shigao, 48, 750
 Anathapindika, 50–51, 492, 913
 Aryadeva, 69, 864
 Asanga, 69–70, 193, 884
 Atisha, 76–77, 174–175, 242, 504, 512, 592, 929
 Bashō, 108, 477
 Bimbisara, 124
 Buddhadasa, 144, 193, 203, 774
 Buddhaghosa, 145, 774
 Buddhapalita, 145–146, 733
 Buton Rinchendrup, 150–151
 Chajang, 170–171, 587, 692, 729
 Chandrakirti, 146, 171, 512, 587, 733
 Chengguan, 173–174, 943
 child prodigies, 174–175
 Chinul, 177
 Daoan, 214, 380, 592
 Devadatta, 228
 Dharmakirti, 77, 231–232, 774
 Dignaga, 231, 232–233
 Dogen, 175, 236–237, 338
 Drokmi, 241
 Drom Tonpa, 242, 316
 Drukpa Kunley, 242, 396, 782
 Dushun, 244, 316, 729, 939
 Eisai, 251–252, 592
 En no Ozunu, 71, 258
 Faxian, 274–275, 773
 Fazang, 275, 876, 939
 Fotucheng, 214, 277, 329, 588, 592
 Gampopa, 87, 290–291, 316, 569, 584
 Gendun drubpa, 79, 301
 Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen, 334–335
 Gyogi Bosatsu, 316, 335, 492, 592, 729
 Hakuin, 14, 87, 341–342, 736
 Hongren, 374
 Huangbo Xiyun, 87, 376, 510
 Huineng, 374, 379, 739, 792
 Huiyuan, 380, 492, 692
 Ikkyū, 14, 391, 397, 731, 782
 Ippen, 14, 400, 740
 Jamgon Kongtrul, 422–423, 774
 Jianzhen, 429
 Jizang, 431, 729
 Kamalashila, 85, 87, 462–463, 587, 592, 930
 Kassapa, 49, 86, 235, 338, 467–468
 Khedrup Jey, 474, 774
 Kikusha-ni, 477
 Ksitigarbha, 485–486, 818
 Kukai, 143, 221, 486, 759
 Kumarajiva, 431, 487, 773
 Kunga Nyingpo, 241, 357, 489–490
 Linji, 149, 376, 510–511, 820
 Longchenpa, 512–513
 Losang Gyatso, 8, 513–514, 682, 749
 Machig Labdron, 298–299, 524–525, 774
 Manjushri, 28, 170, 539–540, 762, 866
 Mara, 226, 542
 Marpa, 465, 492, 548, 584, 736
 Mazu, 87, 149, 376, 565–566
 Mipham Rinpoche, 585–586
 Moggallana, 228, 235, 595–596, 790, 881
 Muso Soseki, 14, 615
 Nagasena, 592, 621
 Naropa, 72, 465, 529, 548, 627–628, 859–860
 Nichiren, 552–553, 637–638, 674, 732, 864
 Pasenadi, 670–671
 Rahula, 80, 235, 719–720, 818
 Ren'nyo, 492, 735
 Ryonin, 753
 Saichō, 759
 Sakya Pandita, 242, 760
 Samantabhadra, 761–762
 Santaraksita, 585, 766–767, 882
 Sayadaw, 203, 569, 771–772
 Sengsten Gampo, 750, 775–776
 Shakra, 785
 Shaku Sōen, 785–786
 Shariputra, 228, 235, 595, 719, 790
 Shenxiu, 374, 379, 729, 792
 Shinran, 373, 400, 492, 735, 782, 793
 Shōmu, 750, 799–800
 Shotoku, 750, 796, 800
 Sonam Gyatso, 729, 814–815
 Srimala, 818
 Sthiramati, 233, 823–824
 Subhuti, 235, 824
 Sugawara no Michizane, 796, 827
 Suzuki, 786, 830
 Taixu, 222, 836, 928
 Tara, 77, 840–841
 Tenzin Gyatso, 203, 692, 730, 734, 845–846
 Tilopa, 465, 528–529, 627–628, 859–860
 Trisong de Tsen, 462, 463, 668, 865, 882
 Tukt'ong Kihwa, 868
 Uich'on, 177, 875
 Uisang, 875–876
 Upagupta, 818, 877
 Upaka, 877
 Upali, 7, 235, 820, 878
 Vacchagotta, 881
 Vairocana, 486, 881–882
 Vairotsana, 221, 552, 773, 882
 Vasubandhu, 69, 232, 487, 823, 824, 884–885
 Vimalakirti, 894
 Wonhyo, 492, 876, 921
 Wu Zhao, 750, 792, 799, 818, 922
 Yang Wenhui, 928
 Yeshe Od, 929
 Yeshe Tsogyal, 193, 300, 524, 929–930
 Yixing, 930
 Zhisheng, 939
 Zhiyan, 244, 275, 876, 939
 Zhiyi, 175, 774, 940
 Zongmi, 174, 244, 943
See also Ananda; Ashoka; Bodhidharma; Gautama Buddha; Honen; Milarepa; Nagarjuna; Padmasambhava; Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa; Zen (Chan)
- Bugenhagen, Johannes, 519
Buke shohatto, 354
 Bullhe Shah, 149–150
 Bullinger, Johann, 519
 Bunjiro Kawate, 194
 Buonaccorsi, Filippo (Callimachus), 160
 Burhaniyya sufism, 219
 Burujirdi, Ayatullah, 150, 911
 Buston, 69
 Butcho, 108
 Buton Rinchendrup, 150–151
 Bu-xian. See Samantabhadra
 Byrhtferth of Ramsey, 3, 664
 Byron, Lord, 817
 Byzantine Church. See Orthodox Christianity
 Byzantine Empire, 156, 181

- C
- Cabasilas, Nicholas, 661
- El Cabildo Yemaya de Regla, 10
- Cabrini, Frances, 153, 154, 194, 914
- Caen, Emery de, 139
- Caesarius, 255
- Caesarius of Arles, 153, 155, 693
- Caesarius of Heisterbach, 259
- Cahuillaca, 209
- Cainnech of Kilkenny, 401
- Caitanya. See Chaitanya, Krishna
- Caitanya-caritamṛta* (Krishnadasa Kaviraja), 431, 614
- Caius, 695
- Cajetan, 155–156
- Calchas, 156, 321, 570–571, 600
- Caleb, 156–157, 750, 911
- Callaway, Henry, 593, 784
- Calligraphy, 14
- Callistus, 695
- Calvin, John, 157–158, 674, 701, 705, 732, 739
- Cambodia, 749
- Cambrai, Pierre de, 244
- Camillo de Lelis, 165
- Campbell, Joseph, 361–362
- Candomblé, 578–579, 659
- Candrakirti, 69
- Candrapata* (Jagadbandhu Sundar), 416
- Canisius, Peter, 114, 158–159
- Canonical Epistle* (Gregory the Thaumaturge), 327
- Canonization, 84, 159–160, 181
- bishop-saints and, 127
 - Catholic Reformation saints and, 165
 - contemporary holy people and, 202
 - recognition and, 729, 730
 - teachers as holy people and, 842
- See also specific saints*
- Cantares mexicanos*, 88, 525
- Canterbury Tales* (Chaucer), 166, 252
- Cantilène de Sainte-Eulalie*, 264
- Cao Guoqiu, 216, 251
- Capetian dynasty, 301–302
- Caravaggio, 677
- Cargo cults, 675, 700
- Carmelites
- Elijah and, 254
 - John of the Cross and, 441
 - Stein, 820–821
 - Thérèse of Lisieux, 853–854
- See also* Teresa of Avila
- Carmina Nisibena* (Ephrem the Syrian), 261
- Carneiro, Edson, 579
- Carolingian Empire, 68, 114, 134–135, 172–173, 734–735
- Carthage, 232, 263–264, 595
- Carthage, Council of, 263
- Carthusians, 142, 143
- Carus, Paul, 786
- Carybé, 579
- Casimir of Poland, 160–161
- Cassandra, 27, 321
- Cassian. See John Cassian
- Castor and Polydeuces (Pollux). See Dioskouroi
- Catarina de San Juan, 161, 588
- Caterina de Ricci, 165
- Catherine of Alexandria, 161–162, 280, 300, 504
- Catherine of Genoa, 162–163, 165, 194
- Catherine of Siena, 163–164
- Agnes of Montepulciano and, 25
 - asceticism, 228
 - devotion, 231
 - gender and, 299
 - holy people as models and, 595
 - politics and, 163–164, 182
 - scholars as holy people and, 775
 - warfare and, 911
- Catholic Reformation, 164–166, 181
- Bellarmino, 114
 - Borromeo, 136–137, 164
 - Canisius, 114, 158
 - Francis of Sales, 30, 138, 164, 284–285
 - John of the Cross, 14, 86, 165, 328, 440–441, 580
 - Margaret of Cortona, 165, 544
 - mysticism and, 618
 - Neri and, 635
 - scholars as holy people and, 774
 - Vincent de Paul, 165, 194, 895, 914
 - Ward and, 912
 - Xavier, 164, 592, 925
- See also* Ignatius of Loyola; Teresa of Avila
- Catholic Reformation saints, 164–166, 181. See also Catholic Reformation
- Catholic Worker movement, 219–220
- Cato the Censor, 166
- Cato the Younger, 166, 704
- Catuhsataka* (Aryadeva), 69
- Catusaccabuddhas*, 143
- Caurasi Pad* (Harivansh), 347
- Causae et curae* (Hildegard of Bingen), 366
- Cauvin, Jean. See Calvin, John
- Cecilia, 166–167
- Cedd, 169
- Celebi, Asaf Halet, 14, 167, 618
- Celebi, Husam al-Din, 167–168, 752
- The Celestial Hierarchies* (Pseudo-Dionysius), 227
- Celestine I, 696
- Celestine V, 168, 693, 696
- Celestines, 168
- Céli Dé, 763
- Celibacy, 503, 556, 594, 781. See also Asceticism; Sexuality; Virginity
- Celsus of Armagh, 534
- Celtic religions. See Pre-Christian European religions
- Centuries on Love* (Maximus Confessor), 564
- Cephalophores, 168–169, 221
- Cerdo, 543
- Chad, 169, 220
- Chahar Risala* (Dard), 218
- Chaitanya, Krishna, 169–170
- anti-intellectualism, 773
 - creativity of, 13
 - devotion and, 229
 - disciples of, 236
 - gender and, 298
 - as god on earth, 316, 370
 - Jiva Gosvamin and, 431
 - Mukundadeva and, 614
 - Rupa Goswami and, 752
 - Sanatana Goswami and, 765–766
- See also* Vaishnava Hinduism
- Chaitanya tradition. See Vaishnava Hinduism
- Chajang, 170–171, 587, 692, 729
- Chalcedon, Council of, 507, 809
- Chaldeans, 75
- Chaminuka, 633
- Chan Buddhism. See Zen (Chan) Buddhism
- Chandragomin, 171
- Chandrakirti, 146, 171, 512, 587, 733
- Chandrika* (Vyasaraya), 903
- Chang Tao-ling. See Zhang Daoling
- Chang Tsai. See Zhang Zai
- Chang Tsung-yen, 85
- Chanyuan Zhuquan Jidu* (Zongmi), 943
- Chapman, Jonathon, 171–172, 194
- Chardin, Jean, 783
- Charlemagne, 68, 172–173, 310, 511, 654, 693
- Charles I (King of England), 173, 749
- Chastity. See Celibacy; Virginity
- Chaucer, Geoffrey, 166, 168, 252
- Chavez, Jonathan, 482
- Chen Tuan, 940
- Cheng Hao, 197
- Cheng Yi, 197, 199, 938, 942
- Chengguan, 173–174, 943
- Ch'eng-kuan. See Chengguan
- Cherny, Savva, 447
- Cherokee people, 185, 205, 540
- Cherubim and Seraphim Society, 4, 29, 85, 658–659
- Cheyenne people, 630, 759, 831
- Chhandogya Upanishad, 332
- Chi Yu, 377
- Chien-chen. See Jianzhen
- Chih-i. See Zhiyi
- Chih-yen. See Zhiyan
- Child prodigies, 174–175
- Chile, 374–375
- Chilembwe, John, 175–176, 595, 675
- Chimalman, 176, 298, 710
- Chinese religions
- ancestors, 51–52
 - apotheosis in, 65
 - legendary holy people, 504
 - mandate of heaven, 537–538
 - messiah beliefs, 580
 - recognition, 729
 - rulers as holy people, 748
 - sages, 758
 - Taiping Rebellion and, 85, 373–374, 699, 928

- Chinese religions (continued)
 See also Buddhism; Confucianism; Daoism
 Chinmayananda, 176–177, 820
 Chinul, 177
 Chiragh-i Dihli, Nasiruddin, 177–178, 311, 359, 781, 842
 Chiron, 74
 Chishti, Muinuddin, 14, 178
 Chisumphi cult, 567
 Chisupe, Billy Goodson, 179
 Chi-tsang. See Jizang
 Chlothar II (Frankish king), 39
 Choctaw people, 43, 51, 185
 Chodrak Gyatso, 682
 Chogye Buddhism, 177, 739
 Chogyur Lingpa, 423
 Cholomann, 222
 Chongyan. See Wang Zhe
Chongyang lijiao shiwu lun (Wang Zhe), 910
Chongyang quanzhen ji (Wang Zhe), 910
 Choni the Circle Drawer, 399
 Chosen People, 179–180
Chos-hbyung (Buton Rinchendrup), 151
 Chos-kyi-grags-pa. See Dharmakirti
 Chosröes II (King of Persia), 50
 Choti Mata, 330
 Choto, Joseph, 334
 Chou Tun-I. See Zhou Dunyi
Chrestomaty (Proclus), 698
 Christ. See Jesus of Nazareth
 Christ Apostolic Church (CAC), 94
 Christ for All Nations, 135
 Christian asceticism, 180, 182
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24
 Alacoque, 30
 Borromeo, 137
 Bruno of Chartreuse, 143
 Catherine of Genoa, 162
 Catherine of Siena, 163, 164
 Celestine V, 168
 Clare of Assisi and, 186
 desert saints, 70, 71, 182, 227
 Francis of Assisi, 71, 228
 imitation of Christ and, 394
 Îte, 71, 411–412, 498
 Jerome, 72, 424
 John Chrysostom, 437
 Juliana of Liège, 457
 Margaret of Hungary, 545
 Martin of Tours, 550–551
 Mary of Egypt, 558, 736
 Paul of the Cross, 678–679
 stylite saints, 72, 95, 213, 228, 595, 809
 Wulfric of Haselbury, 922–923
 See also Desert saints
 Christian holy people
 Abbo of Fleury, 2–3, 249
 Abiodun Akinsowon, 4, 85, 658
 Abraham, 6
 Adalbert of Prague, 9–10, 86–87, 175, 592, 888
 Adelheid, 11
 Aelred of Rievaulx, 12–13, 250, 642
 Æthelwold, 15, 664, 831–832
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24–25
 Aidan, 27, 169
 Alacoque, 30–31, 398
 Albertus Magnus, 31–32, 238
 Amandus of Maastricht, 39
 Andrew, 53
 Anne, 53–54, 357
 Anselm of Canterbury, 13, 55–56, 692
 Antony of Kiev, 58–59, 852
 Antony of Padua, 59, 61, 226
 Antony of Uvari, 61
 Aoko, 61–62, 299–300, 559
 Aquila and Prisca, 66
 Arnulf of Metz, 68
 Askew, 73–74
 Athanasius, 60, 76, 254, 329, 596, 658, 863
 Augustine of Canterbury, 80, 592
 Avvakum, 85–86, 740
 Babalola, 4, 93–94, 675
 Babylas of Nicomedia, 94–95
 Bakhita, 103
 Barlaam and Josephat, 106–107
 Beguines, 111–112, 545–546
 Behem, 112–113, 266
 Bellarmine, 114
 Benedict of Aniane, 71, 114–115, 729
 Benedict of Nursia, 60, 115–116, 360, 667, 818
 Benedict the African, 116
 Benno of Meissen, 117
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 117–119, 228, 394, 555–556
 Bernardino of Siena, 119–120, 445
 Bernward of Hildesheim, 14, 120
 Birech, 125
 Birgitta of Sweden, 125–126
 bishop-saints, 126–127, 164–165
 Bonhoeffer, 132, 134, 182, 394, 898
 Boniface, 134–135, 511, 553, 592, 692, 906, 919
 Borromeo, 136–137, 164
 Bosco, 137–138, 194, 285
 Bowman, 138–139
 Braide, 139, 444
 Brébeuf, 139–140, 554
 Brendan the Navigator, 72, 140, 401, 411
 Britto, 141–142
 Brown, 142, 266, 595, 897, 898
 Bruno of Chartreuse, 142–143
 Cabrinis, 153, 154, 194, 914
 Caesarius of Arles, 153, 155, 693
 Cajetan, 155
 Caleb, 156–157, 750, 911
 Calvin, 157–158, 674, 701, 705, 732, 739
 Canisius, 114, 158
 Casimir of Poland, 160–161
 Catarina de San Juan, 161, 588
 Catherine of Genoa, 162, 165, 194
 Celestine V, 168, 693, 696
 Chad, 169
 Chapman, 171–172, 194
 Charlemagne, 68, 172–173, 310, 511, 654, 693
 child prodigies, 174, 175
 Chilembwe, 175–176, 595, 675
 Chisupe, 179
 Christina of Markyate, 183–184
 Ciarán of Clonmacnoise, 174, 185, 401
 Clare of Assisi, 186
 Clare of Montefalco, 186–187
 Claver, 187
 Clotilde, 188–189
 Colum Cille, 72, 191, 401, 470, 471
 Columbanus, 72, 182, 192, 289, 290, 592
 Cone, 195, 775
 Conselheiro, 201
 Constantine, 201–202, 354, 750
 contemporary trends, 203
 creativity of, 14
 Crowther, 207–208
 Crummell, 208
 Cuthbert, 209–210, 313–314
 Cyril and Methodius, 210–211, 774
 Daniel the Stylite, 213, 228, 809
 Darerca, 218
 Day, 219–220, 898, 914
 Delany, 224, 675
 Delphine of Provence, 224–225
 Demetrius, 225
 Demetrius of Rostov, 225–226, 339, 776
 Denis of Paris, 168, 226–227, 280
 Dismas, 236, 736
 Dominic, 165, 193, 238, 592
 Dominic of Silos, 238–239
 Drexel, 240–241, 913
 Duchesne, 243
 Dunstan, 15, 243–244, 664
 Eddy, 248, 825
 Edmund of East Anglia, 2–3, 249, 897
 Edward the Confessor, 249–250, 750
 Edwards, 250, 394
 Eligius, 14, 126, 252, 496
 Elijah and, 254
 Elizabeth of Hungary, 255–256, 492, 545, 781, 822
 Elizabeth of Schönau, 256
 Emeric, 257
 Emmeram of Regensburg, 257, 552
 Engelbert of Cologne, 259
 Ephrem the Syrian, 14, 260–261, 539, 915
 Eric IX Jedvardsson of Sweden, 261–262, 750
 Eugenius of Carthage, 263–264
 Expeditus, 265
 Ezana, 18, 266–267, 750
 Fabiola, 269
 Felix of Nola, 275–276, 680
 Ferdinand III of Castile, 276, 911
 Fourteen Holy Helpers, 162, 280, 311

- Fox, 281, 732
 Fra Angelico, 14, 166, 282
 Frances of Rome, 282, 492
 Francis of Sales, 30, 138, 164, 284–285
 Fry, 194, 285–286
 Galgani, 289, 825
 Gall, 192, 289–290
 Garvey, 294, 339, 582, 675
 Gebre Mikael, 296–297, 414
 Geneviève, 301–302, 306, 911
 Gerald of Aurillac, 303–304, 651, 897
 Germanus of Auxerre, 305
 Germanus of Paris, 305–306
 Gertrude of Nivelles, 306–307, 357
 Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta, 307, 568
 Gilbert of Sempringham, 310, 740
 Giles, 280, 310–311
 Giuliani, 311–312
 Godric of Finchale, 14, 313–314
 Graham, 318–319
 Gregory of Nazianzus, 108, 325–326
 Gregory of Nyssa, 326, 327, 775, 915
 Gregory of Sinai, 326–327
 Gregory the Thaumaturge, 327
 Gregory VII, 324–325, 696, 732
 Griffiths, 123, 327–328, 502
 Guthlac, 333
 Guthmundr Arason, 226, 333–334
 Guti, 203, 334
 Haile Selassie, 18, 19, 339–340, 547, 582
 Harris, 348, 699
 Helena, 202, 355
 Henry II, 356, 490, 750, 781
 Hernández, 360–361
 Hilary of Poitiers, 364, 550
 Hilda of Whitby, 364–365
 Hildegard of Bingen, 256, 329, 365–366, 618
 Homobonus, 372
 Hoover, 374–375, 697, 705, 820
 Hubert, 127, 377, 496
 Hugh of Saint Victor, 378–379, 445
 Hus, 381–382, 552, 674, 700–701
 Ida of Herzfeld, 221, 386–387
 Idahosa, 387–388
 Ignatius of Constantinople, 389
 Innocent of Alaska, 396, 397, 593
 Irenaeus, 401–402, 683, 694
 Isaac of Armenia, 403, 674
 Isidore of Seville, 405, 502
 Isidore the Farmer, 405–406
 Íte, 71, 411–412, 498
 Jacobis, 296–297, 414–415
 Jadwiga, 414–415
 James, brother of Jesus, 357, 421–422
 James the Greater, 422, 911
 Jan of Leyden, 265, 266, 423–424, 732
 Jerome, 72, 269, 364, 424–425, 631, 679, 774
 Joan of Arc, 162, 433–434, 674, 911
 Johane Masowe, 18, 434, 559
 John Baptist de la Salle, 436
 John Chrysostom, 38, 58, 80, 95, 437–438, 662, 842
 John Climacus, 438, 776
 John Gualbert, 438–439, 732
 John of Damascus, 439
 John of Gorze, 439–440
 John of Kronstadt, 440, 582
 John of the Cross, 14, 86, 165, 328, 440–441, 580
 John the Almsgiver, 441–442, 913
 John the Evangelist, 443
 John XXIII, 203, 434–436, 696, 732–733
 Johnny Appleseed, 171–172, 194
 Johnson, James, 443–444, 675
 Johnson, Samuel, 444
 Jones, Jim, 204, 265, 444–445, 596
 Joseph, 413, 445–446
 Joseph of Arimathea, 446, 505, 639
 Joseph of Copertino, 165, 231, 398, 446–447, 569, 818
 Joseph of Volotsk, 447, 641, 732, 863
 Julian of Norwich, 72, 86, 299, 329, 456, 825
 Juliana of Liège, 457
 Justin Martyr, 457–458
 Kateri Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
 Kentigern, 79, 470–471
 Kevin of Glendalough, 8, 185, 231, 471
 Kilian of Würzburg, 477–478
 Kimbangu, 18, 478, 552
 King, 195, 203–204, 479–480, 693, 730, 898
 Kivebulaya, 87, 481–482, 551
 Knox, 130, 674
 Kuncewicz, 489
 Kunigunde, 490, 750, 781
 Ladislav, 491, 750
 Lalibela, 493–494, 750
 Lambert of Liège, 496
 Lasair, 498
 Latimer, 499
 Lazarus, 94, 429, 501
 Le Saux, 502
 Leander of Seville, 405, 502
 Lekganyane, 505
 Lenshina, 18, 222, 506, 863
 Leo I, 507, 696
 Leonard, 507–508
 Leonard of Port Maurice, 508
 Leopold III of Austria, 508–509, 693
 Liguori, 509
 Lioba, 299, 511
 Liudger, 511–512
 Llull, 492, 512
 Longinus, 513
 Louis IX, 58, 514–515, 554, 693, 750
 Louis of Toulouse, 515
 Luwum, 18, 19, 204, 520–521, 552, 693
 magi, 526
 Magnus of Orkney, 526–527
 Mai Chaza, 222, 532
 Malachy, 533–534
 Marcion, 543, 694
 Margaret of Cortona, 165, 544
 Margaret of Hungary, 545
 Margaret of Scotland, 545
 Marie d’Oignies, 231, 545–546
 Mark, 546
 Martha, 549, 554, 557
 Martial of Limoges, 549
 Martin de Porres, 194, 549–550, 747, 820
 Mary Magdalene, 63, 297, 554, 557, 736
 Mary of Egypt, 558, 736
 Mary, sister of Martha, 549, 554, 557
 Mary/Mama, 559–560
 Mason, 560–561
 Matilda, 11, 561–562
 Maubeuge cycle saints, 357, 563
 Maximus Confessor, 552, 564–565, 658
 Mayer, 565, 693
 Mechthild of Magdeburg, 111–112
 Mechtild of Hackeborn, 568, 617
 Melania the Younger, 576–577, 913
 Merici, 194, 492, 579
 Merton, 203, 569, 580, 581, 830
 Miller, 584–585, 916
 Monica, 298, 597–598
 Montanus, 598, 700
 Muzorewa, 616–617, 675
 Neri, 72, 329, 448, 634–635
 Newman, 84, 635–636
 Nicholas, 314, 638, 662
 Nicholas of Flüe, 329, 639
 Nicodemus, 446, 639–640
 Nikon, 59, 85, 86, 640, 687, 740
 Nilus of Rossano, 641
 Nilus of Sora, 447, 641, 732, 776, 863, 913
 Ninian, 642
 Norbert of Xanten, 645
 Ntsikana, 645–646
 Odile, 649–650
 Odilo of Cluny, 11, 650
 Odo of Cluny, 304, 650–651, 729
 Olaf of Norway, 654, 750, 803
 Olga, 654–655
 Ondeto, 61, 204, 559–560, 582, 656–657
 Onuphrios, 657
 Origen, 188, 437, 445, 658, 774
 Orimolade Tunolase, 4, 658–659
 Oswald of Worcester, 2, 664
 O’Toole, Laurence, 400, 499–500
 Otto of Bamberg, 664–665
 Pachomius, 114, 596, 667
 Pantaleon, 280, 669
 Parasceva, 662, 669
 Patrick of Ireland, 70, 218, 399, 592, 672, 673
 Paul of the Cross, 678–679
 Paul the Hermit, 425, 631, 679
 Paula, 72, 269, 425, 679–680, 913
 Paulinus of Nola, 14, 276, 680
 Peace Pilgrim, 681, 911
 Peter Damian, 685, 746
 Peter II of Tarentaise, 684
 Philip of Moscow, 686–687, 693

- Christian holy people (continued)
- Pio of Pietrelcina, 687–688
- Pirmin, 688–689
- Plunket, 691
- Prophet, 399, 698
- Radegund, 716
- Rahner, 718–719
- Raymund of Peñafort, 238, 500, 728
- Remigius of Rheims, 734–735
- Ridley, 499, 737
- Robert of Arbrissel, 740
- Roch, 741
- Rolle, 741–742
- Romanos the Melodist, 14, 742–743
- Romuald of Ravenna, 80, 228, 360, 732, 744, 746
- Rose of Lima, 165, 595, 747
- Rupert of Salzburg, 752–753
- Samson of Dol, 762
- Samthann, 498, 762–763
- Samuel of Waldebbba, 631, 763
- Savonarola, 552, 705, 731, 770–771
- Seraphim of Sarov, 662, 776–777
- Sergius of Radonezh, 674, 731, 777–778
- Seton, 778–779
- Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, 504, 780
- Shembe, 52, 792
- Sigfrid of Växjö, 803
- Silvester I, 695, 807
- Simeon of Trier, 808
- Simeon the New Theologian, 231, 618, 808–809
- Simeon the Stylite, 72, 95, 213, 228, 595, 809
- Sundar Singh, 809–810
- Slessor, 811
- Smith, 279, 553, 699, 812, 932
- Sojourner Truth, 814
- Soubirous, 174, 816
- Southcott, 582, 817
- Stanislaus of Cracow, 693, 819
- Stein, 820–821
- Stephen of Hungary, 674, 750, 822
- Stephen of Muret, 822–823
- Stephen of Perm, 823
- Suso, 829–830
- Swithin, 831–832
- Takla Haymanot, 72, 174, 837, 887
- Tansi, 837–838
- Teilhard de Chardin, 84, 843–844
- Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
- Teresa of Calcutta, 85, 183, 204, 848
- Thecla of Iconium, 850
- Theodore of Tarsus, 50, 851
- Theodore the Studite, 704, 851–852
- Theodosius of Kiev, 59, 852
- Theophilus the Penitent, 852–853
- Thérèse of Lisieux, 853–854
- Thomas, 854
- Thomas Becket, 254, 692, 856, 913
- Thorlákur Thórhallsson, 856–857
- Tillich, 195, 775, 858–859
- Turner, Nat, 79, 869–870
- Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
- Ulrich of Augsburg, 16, 876, 917
- Veronica, 890–891
- Vianney, 329, 892
- Vincent de Paul, 165, 194, 895, 914
- Vincent Ferrer, 895–896
- Vladimir, 136, 750, 900–901
- Walburga, 906, 919
- Waldès, 906–907
- Ward, 912
- Wenceslas, 750, 914
- Wesley, 87, 593, 914–916
- White, 299, 916
- Wiborada, 72, 916–917
- Wilfrid, 169, 917
- Wilgefortis, 918
- Willibald, 919
- Willibrord, 134, 919–920
- Wolfgang of Regensburg, 920
- Wulfric of Haselbury, 922–923
- Wulfstan of Worcester, 664, 923
- Xavier, 164, 592, 925
- Yared, 14, 928–929
- Young, 932
- Zeno, 937
- Zosima and Savatii of Solovki, 687, 945
- See also* Ambrose; Antony of the Desert; Augustine of Hippo; Basil the Great; Bede; Catherine of Siena; Christian martyrs; Desert saints; Francis of Assisi; Gregory I (Gregory the Great); Ignatius of Loyola; Jesus of Nazareth; John the Baptist; Luke; Mark; Martin of Tours; Mary, Virgin; Paul; Peter; Teresa of Avila; Thomas Aquinas
- Christian martyrs, 181–182
- Abbo of Fleury, 2–3, 249
- Adalbert of Prague, 9–10, 86–87, 175, 592, 888
- Afra of Augsburg, 15–16
- Agatha, 23–24, 182, 516, 781
- Agnes, 24, 182, 781
- Alban, 31
- Anastasius the Persian, 50
- Andrew, 53
- anti-Semitism and, 58
- Apollonia, 62, 183, 553, 818
- Aquila and Prisca, 66
- Askew, 73–74
- Barbara, 106, 280, 789
- Bobola, 130–131
- Bonhoeffer, 132, 134, 182, 394, 898
- Boniface, 134–135, 511, 553, 592, 692, 906, 919
- Boris and Gleb, 136, 897
- Brébeuf, 139–140, 554
- Britto, 141–142
- Brown, John, 142, 266, 595, 897, 898
- canonization and, 159
- Catherine of Alexandria, 161–162, 280, 300, 504
- Cecilia, 166
- cephalophores, 168–169, 221
- Charles I, 173, 749
- child prodigies and, 175
- Christopher, 184, 280, 504
- Clement of Rome, 127, 188, 683
- contemporary, 204
- Cosmas and Damian, 205–206
- Cranmer, 206–207, 499, 674, 732, 737, 781
- Cyprian of Carthage, 210
- death and, 222
- Denis of Paris, 168, 227, 280
- Dymphna, 244–245
- Edmund of East Anglia, 2–3, 249, 897
- Emmeram of Regensburg, 257, 552
- Engelbert of Cologne, 259
- Eulalia of Mérida, 264
- Eustace, 264–265, 280, 377
- Faith, 269–270, 448
- Fisher, 276–277, 602, 732
- Forty Martyrs of England and Wales, 259–260, 592, 693
- Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, 775
- George, 226, 280, 302–303, 504, 911
- Gerard of Csanád, 257, 304
- Gervasius and Protasius, 41, 308
- Godeliva, 313
- Goretti, 317–318, 781
- Hippolytus of Rome, 371, 695
- holy innocents, 371–372
- Hugh of Lincoln, 58, 378
- Hus, 382, 552, 674, 700–701
- Ignatius of Antioch, 338, 389, 393, 553, 683, 698
- James, brother of Jesus, 357, 421–422
- James the Greater, 422, 911
- Julia of Carthage, 455–456
- Kalemba, 18, 19, 461–462
- Kilian of Würzburg, 477–478
- Kolbe, 194, 483
- Kuncewicz, 489
- Lambert of Liège, 496
- Latimer, 499
- Lawrence of Rome, 193, 501
- Lucy, 516
- Luum, 18, 19, 204, 520–521, 552, 693
- Magnus of Orkney, 526–527
- Margaret of Antioch, 338, 543–544
- Mark, 546
- martyrs of Cordoba, 204–205, 553
- martyrs of Lyons, 521
- Maximus Confessor, 552, 564–565, 658
- Meinrad, 575
- Menas, 577
- miracles and, 587
- More, 277, 601–602, 732, 863
- Nagasaki martyrs, 222, 620–621
- Olaf of Norway, 654, 750, 803
- Pantaleon, 280, 669
- Parasceva, 662, 669
- peregrinatio* and, 140
- Perpetua and Felicity, 298, 682–683

- Peter, 683
Philip of Moscow, 686–687, 693
Plunket, 691
politics and, 691, 693
Polycarp, 181, 401, 693–694
Protestant Reformation and, 702
Ridley, 499, 737
ritual and, 740
Romero, 194, 204, 552, 693, 744, 745
Sabas the Goth, 755
Sergius and Bacchus, 777, 781
Shoah and, 821
Sophia, 815
Stanislaus of Cracow, 693, 819
Stephen, 181, 821–822
Theban Legion, 563–564, 849, 911
Theodore, 850–851
Thomas Becket, 254, 692, 856, 913
Ursula, 878–879
Valentine, 883
Vincent of Saragossa, 501, 896 virginity and, 553, 781
Voes and van Esschen, 552, 901
Wenceslas, 750, 914
Wilgefortis, 918
- Christian Science, 248, 595, 825
Christianity, 180–183
Abraham and, 6
adventus and, 12
Africa, 4, 9, 18, 61–62
African traditional religions and, 18, 135, 392, 647, 658
All Saints' Day, 38–39
Amerindian religions and, 4, 44–45, 88, 129, 223, 344, 694, 711
anti-intellectualism, 772, 774
apostles, 63–65
astrology and, 76
attributes of holy people, 78, 79, 80
authority of holy people, 84, 85
awakening/conversion, 86–87
Buddhism and, 106–107
Chosen People concept and, 180
compassion, 193
death, 220, 221, 222
demons/monsters, 226
devotion, 229, 231
discipleship, 235–236
eremitism, 359–360
extremists, 265–266
Fatimid Empire and, 88
founder of, 278
gender, 297, 298
gods on earth, 314, 316
guidance, 329, 330
hagiography, 338–339
Hannah and her seven sons and, 345
hereditary holiness, 357
holy people as models, 594, 595
imitation of Christ, 393–394
insanity, 396
insanity and, 397
intermediary role, 398
intolerance, 863, 864
laity, 491–492
lawgivers, 500
legendary holy people, 504
Maccabees and, 523
Manicheanism and, 539
martyrdom/persecution, 551, 553
Masinde and, 560
meditation, 568, 569
messiah beliefs, 581, 582
miracles, 587, 588
mission, 591, 592
monasticism, 596, 597
morality, 601
Moses and, 603
mysticism, 617, 618
nature, 630, 631
orishas and, 659
patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 672, 674
Plato and, 690
politics and, 691, 692, 693 pope-saints, 695–697
priests, 697–698
prophets, 699, 700
purity/pollution, 704–705
recognition, 729
repentance, 735, 736
retreat vs. secular activity, 7, 8, 182–183
ritual, 739
Roman imperial cult and, 83
rulers as holy people, 749, 750
Santería and, 10, 767
scholars as holy people, 772, 774
sexuality and, 780, 781
sibyls and, 802
Socrates and, 813
spiritual guardians, 817, 818
status and, 819, 820
Taiping Rebellion and, 373–374
teachers as holy people, 842–843
veneration of holy people, 887, 888, 889
violence/nonviolence, 897
warfare, 910, 911
wealth/poverty, 912–913
See also African Christianity; Canonization; Christian asceticism; Christian holy people; Christian martyrs; Jesus of Nazareth
- Christina of Markyate, 183–184
Christopher, 184–185, 280, 504
Chrysostom. See John Chrysostom Chu Hsi. See Zhu Xi
Chuang Tzu. See Zhuangzi
Church of England. See Anglicanism
Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormon), 279, 553, 699, 812, 932
Church Universal and Triumphant, 698
Ciarán of Clonmacnoise, 174, 185, 401
Cicero, 320, 705, 706
Cihuacoatl, 525
- Circumcision, 5
Cistercians
Aelred of Rievaulx, 12–13, 250, 642
Bernard of Clairvaux, 117–119, 228, 394, 555–556
Fourteen Holy Helpers and, 280
Peter II of Tarentaise, 684
The City of God (Augustine of Hippo), 81
Clan Mothers (Iroquois), 185–186
Cláirnech of Glas Noiden, 401
Clare of Assisi, 186
Clare of Montefalco, 186–187
Classic of Filial Piety, 198
Claver, Peter, 187
Clay, Cassius. See Ali, Muhammad
Clement I, 695
Clement III, 117, 325
Clement of Alexandria, 553
Clement of Rome, 127, 188, 683
Clement VII, 155
Cleopatra VII (Egyptian Pharaoh), 188
Cliff, Jimmy, 340
Clitherow, Margaret, 260
Clothar II (King of France), 39, 252
Clothing, 71. See also Asceticism
Clotilde (Frankish Queen), 188–189
Clouds (Aristophanes), 813
Clovis (King of the Franks), 188–189, 301, 734–735
Coaticue, 380
Cochlaeus, Johannes, 519
Codex regularum (Benedict of Aniane), 115
Coelius, Michael, 519
Coemgen. See Kevin
Cohens and Levites, 189–190, 697
Coillard, François, 594
Cokhamela, 190, 820
Collationes (Odo of Cluny), 651
Cologne Mani codex, 539
Coltrane, John, 14–15, 190–191, 203
Colum Cille, 72, 191, 401, 470, 471
Colum of Terryglass, 401
Columba. See Colum Cille
Columbanus, 72, 182, 192, 289, 290, 592
Comanche people, 297, 765
Comgall, 290
Comgall of Bangor, 192
Commentary on Galatians (Luther), 394
Commentary on Nyayapravesa (Kuiji), 233
Commentary on the Song of Songs (Gregory of Nyssa), 326
Commodus (Roman emperor), 12
Communion Church, 62
Company of St. Ursula, 194, 579
Compassion, 192–195
Complete Work of Master Taixu (Taixu), 836
Composers. See Music
Concordat of Worms, 664
Concordia regularum (Benedict of Aniane), 115
Cone, James H., 195, 775
The Conferences (John Cassian), 436–437
Conference of Worms, 158

- Confessing Church, 132, 134
Confession (Patrick of Ireland), 672
Confessions (Augustine of Hippo), 41, 81, 339, 393, 846
- Confessors, 182. See also Christian asceticism
- Confucian holy people
 Fujiwara Seika, 287, 354
 Hayashi Razan, 287, 354–355, 488
 Huangdi, 195, 196, 376–377, 758, 782
 Ishida Baigan, 403–404, 819, 842
 Kaibara Ekiken, 461, 773, 938
 Kumazawa Banzan, 487–488, 692
 Mengzi, 196, 578, 692, 758, 942
 Nakae Tōju, 487–488, 622–623, 909
 Ōshio Heihachirō, 662–663, 938
 Yu the Great, 195–196, 758, 932–933
 Zhang Zai, 197, 198–199, 938–939
 Zhou Dunyi, 197, 198, 938, 940–941, 942
See also Confucius; Zhu Xi
- Confucianism, 196–199
 compassion, 192
 culture heroes, 195–196, 758, 932–933
 Daoism and, 196, 197, 198, 200, 940–941
 eremitism and, 359
 founder of, 278
 Ge Hong and, 296
 holy people as models, 595
 mandate of heaven, 538
 politics and, 692
 recognition, 729
 reform, 731
 retreat vs. secular activity, 8
 ritual, 739
 rulers as holy people, 748
 sages, 758
 scholars as holy people, 772, 773
 Shinto and, 198, 794, 795
 status and, 819
 teachers as holy people, 842
 veneration of holy people, 889
 wealth/poverty, 912
 Yang Wenhui and, 928
See also Neo-Confucianism
- Confucius, 197, 199–201
 on mandate of heaven, 538
 politics and, 692
 reform and, 731
 as religious founder, 278
 as sage, 758
 as scholar, 773
See also Confucianism
- Congo, 52, 478, 481–482, 552
- Conrad of Marburg, 255
- Conrad von Thunfeld, 113
- Conselheiro, Antonio, 201
- Conservative Judaism, 454
- Constance, Council of, 382
- Constantine (Roman emperor), 201–202, 354, 750
- Constantinople, Council of, 325, 425, 658
- Constantius of Lyon, 305
- Contemplation. See Meditation
- Contemplation in a World of Action* (Merton), 580
- Contemporary holy people, 202–204
 Aga Khan IV (Karim al-Husaini), 22–23
 Agnivesh, 25, 693, 733
 Ammachi, 47, 299, 316
 Anandamayi Ma, 85, 316, 370
 Aoko, 61–62
 Aurobindo Ghose, 84, 369, 675, 826
 Bakhita, 103
 Bhaktivedanta, 122, 170, 204
 Birech, 125
 Bonnke, 135–136, 203
 Bowman, 138–139
 Buddhadasa, 144, 193, 203, 774
 Burujirdi, 150, 911
 Celebi, Asaf Halet, 14, 167, 618
 Chinmayananda, 176–177, 820
 Cone, 195, 775
 as gods on earth, 316
 Griffiths, 123, 327–328, 502
 Gumtivala Mata, 330
 Gurumayi Swami Chidvilasananda, 330–331
 Guti, 334
 Idahosa, 387–388
 Jones, Jim, 204, 265, 444–445, 596
 Karunamayi, 466–467
 Krishnamurti, 203, 484–485
 Le Saux, 502
 Maharshi, 8, 221, 329, 485, 502, 528
 Mai Chaza, 222, 532
 Mandela, 204, 538, 693, 730, 872
 martyrdom/persecution, 552
 Mary/Mama, 559–560
 Masinde, 18, 203, 398, 560, 657, 897–898
 Mason, 560–561
 McKenna, 202, 567–568
 Meher Baba, 316, 573–574
 Meninha de Gantois, 578–579
 Miram, 588–589
 Moon, 204, 582, 599, 781
 Muhammad, Warith Deen, 611
 Nizami, 492, 643
 Osho, 663, 914
 Pandurangshastri Athavale-Dada, 668–669
 Peace Pilgrim, 681, 911
 Prophet, 399, 698
 Rahner, 718–719
 Sathya Sai Baba, 316, 573, 734, 769–770
 Setuuma, 779
 Tenzin Gyatso, 203, 692, 730, 734, 845–846
 Tulsi, 203, 868–869
 Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
 wealth/poverty and, 914
 Yogananda, 930–931
- Contra Celsum* (Origen), 658
- Conversion. See Awakening/conversion
- Cordoba, martyrs of, 204–205, 553
- Cordovero, Moses, 459, 466, 517
- Cormac, 141
- Corn Maidens/Mothers, 205
- Cornelius, 695
- Cornell, Vincent J., 408, 409
- Cornplanter, 343
- Corporal mortification. See Asceticism
- Corpus Hermeticum*, 358, 388
- Corrigan, Michael, 153
- Cortés, Hernán, 710–711
- Cosmas and Damian, 205–206
- Courage, 79–80
The Courage to Pray (Rahner), 719
- Coyolxauqui, 380
- Cranach, Lucas, 519
- Cranmer, Thomas, 206–207, 499, 674, 732, 737, 781
- “Crazy Cloud” Zen, 391
- Crazy Horse, 207, 910
- Creativity of holy people, 13–15
- Creek people, 675, 730–731
- Crespin, Jean, 901
- Crockett, Davy, 356
- Cromwell, Thomas, 206
- Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon*, 216
- Crowther, Samuel Ajayi, 207–208
- Crummell, Alexander, 208–209
- Crummey, Robert, 86
- Crusades
 anti-Semitism and, 58
 Bernard of Clairvaux and, 119
 Charlemagne and, 173
 extremists and, 266
 Ferdinand III of Castile and, 276, 911
 George and, 302, 303
 Louis IX and, 514–515, 750
 violence/nonviolence and, 897
 warfare and, 911
- Cuba, 10, 94, 659, 767
- Cula Rahulovada Sutra, 720
- Cults. See Greek hero cults; Veneration of holy people
- Cunha, Euclides da, 201
- Cunigunde. See Kunigunde
- Cuniraya Huiracocha, 209, 314
- Cur Deus Homo* (Anselm of Canterbury), 56
- Custer, George Armstrong, 207, 811
- Cuthbert, 209–210, 313–314
- Cyprian of Carthage, 210
- Cyriac, 280
- Cyril and Methodius, 210–211, 774
- Cyril of Alexandria, 863
- Cyril of Beloozero (Kirill), 211–212
- Cyrus the Great (King of Persia), 749
- D
- Dabbus*, 2
- Dacheng qixin lu*, 928
- Dada. See Pandurangshastri Athavale-Dada
- Dadupanth, 460
- Dagobert (Merovingian king), 39, 227, 252
- Daibutso*, 335, 799

- Daigaku wakumon* (Kumazawa Banzan), 488
Daigaku yōryaku (Fujiwara Seika), 287
 Dainichi-kyō, 486
Dainihonshi (Tokugawa Mitsukuni), 862
 Dalai Lama I. See Gendun drubpa
 Dalai Lama III. See Sonam Gyatso
 Dalai Lama V. See Losang Gyatso
 Dalai Lama XIV. See Tenzin Gyatso
 Dalai lamas, 148, 513, 749. See also Tibetan Buddhist holy people
 Dali, Salvador, 60
 Damasus I, 696
 Dampa Sangye, 524
 Da-mu, 30
 Danae, 363
 Dance, 14, 91–92, 317, 400, 481, 764
 Daniel the Stylite, 213–214, 228, 809
 Daniel, Walter, 13
 Dante Alighieri, 168, 568
 Daoan, 214, 380, 592
 Daocheng, 939
Daode jing, 214, 497, 937
 Daoism, 214–217
 apotheosis, 66
 attributes of holy people, 79, 80
 authority of holy people, 85
 Buddhism and, 215–216, 731
 Confucianism and, 196, 197, 198, 200, 940–941
 death, 222
 eremitism, 359
 founder of, 278
 gender, 297
 gods on earth, 316
 guidance and, 329
 hereditary holiness, 357
 holy people as models, 595
 Huangdi and, 377, 782
 insanity and, 396
 intermediary role, 399
 martyrdom/persecution, 551
 miracles, 588
 morality, 601
 recognition, 729
 reform, 731
 repentance, 735
 ritual, 739
 rulers as holy people, 749
 sages, 758
 sexuality and, 782
 Shenxiu and, 792
 spiritual guardians, 818
 veneration of holy people, 889
 Wang Yangming and, 908, 909
 wealth/poverty, 912
 See also Daoist holy people
 Daoist holy people
 Bixia Yuanjun, 66, 128, 399
 Eight Immortals, 251, 588
 Ge Hong, 215–216, 296, 838
 Guandi, 66, 328, 910
 Kodōjin, 482
 Lü Dongbin, 215, 216, 251, 516, 818
 Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove, 601, 779–780
 Tao Hongjing, 329, 399, 838
 Tianhou, 857
 Wang Zhe, 79, 215–216, 909–910
 Zhang Daoling, 215, 399, 735, 937–938
 Zhongli Quan, 215, 216, 251, 516
 Zhuangzi, 214–215, 216, 482, 780, 928, 942–943
 See also Laozi
 Daoxin, 374
 Daoxuan, 429
 Daoxue. See Neo-Confucianism
Daoxue zhuan, 217
 Daoyuan, 943
 Daqqaq, Abu 'Ali al-, 713
 Dard, Khawaja Mir, 217–218
Daren xiansheng zhuan (Ruan Ji), 780
 Darerca, 218–219
Dark Night of the Soul (John of the Cross), 441
Darsan, 47
 Darwin, Charles, 41
 Dasaka, 878
 Dasam Granth, 312
Dasharatha Shataka (Ramadas of Bhadrachalam), 722
Dasheng xuanlun (Jizang), 431
 Dasuqi, Ibrahim al-, 219
 Data Ganj Bakhsh. See Hujwiri, 'Ali ibn Uthman al-
 David, Jacques-Louis, 319
 David (King of Israel), 479, 749, 897
 Davies, Robertson, 918
The Dawn-Breakers (Shoghi Effendi), 799
Daxue, 908
 Day, Dorothy, 219–220, 898, 914
 Dayal, Baba, 220
Dayunging, 922
Dazan jiyao (Yang Wenhui), 928
De controversiis (Bellarmine), 114
De diligendo Deo (Bernard of Clairvaux), 119, 394
De gradibus superbiae et humilitatis (Bernard of Clairvaux), 394
 De la Vega, Garcilaso, 45
De moderno Ecclesiae schismate (Vincent Ferrer), 896
De obitu Elisabeth (Ekbert), 256
De Principiis (Origen), 658
De sacramentis fidei (Hugh of Saint Victor), 378
De seuen manieren van minne (Beatrijs of Nazareth), 112
 De Shin Shekpa, 465
De spirituali amicitia (Aelred of Rievaulx), 13
De Trinitate (Hilary of Poitiers), 364
De viris illustribus (Leander of Seville), 502
De vita spirituali (Vincent Ferrer), 896
 Death, 220–222, 357, 542. See also Christian martyrs; Martyrdom/persecution
The Death of Socrates (David), 319
Decretals of Gregory IX (Raymund of Peñafort), 728
 Deer Dancers, 222–223
 Deganawida, 223–224, 329, 500, 911
 Deguchi Nao, 699
 Deification. See Apotheosis
 Delany, Martin, 224, 675
 Delaware (Lenape) people, 634
 Delphine of Provence, 224–225
 Demetrios Poliorcetes, 571–572
 Demetrius, 225
 Demetrius of Rostov, 225–226, 339, 776
 Democritus, 320
 Demons/monsters, 226
Demonstration of Apostolic Preaching (Irenaeus), 401
 Dengyō Daishi. See Saichō
Dengzhen yinjue (Tao Hongjing), 838
 Denis of Paris, 168, 226–227, 280
 Dentelin, 563
Denunciation and Refutation of the So-Called Gnosis (Irenaeus), 401
 Deodatus of Mans, 252
 Deovimal, Pandit, 371
Depositio Martyrum, 501
 Descartes, René, 81
 Desert saints, 227–228
 asceticism, 70, 71, 182, 227
 Athanasius and, 76
 Basil the Great and, 108
 Columbanus and, 192
 John Cassian and, 437
 Kevin of Glendalough and, 471
 Onuphrios, 657
 See also Antony of the Desert
 Desiderius, 252
 Deuchler, Martina, 196
 Deusdedit/Adeodatus I, 696
 Devacandra, 355
 Devadatta, 228–229
 Devanampiya. See Ashoka
 Devotion, 229–231, 298, 396–397. See also Bhakti Hinduism; Veneration of holy people
 Dge-'dun-grub-pa. See Gendun drubpa
 Dhammapala, Anagarika, 928
Dharma, 25, 49, 124, 193
 Dharmakara, 46
 Dharmakirti, 77, 231–232, 774
 Dharmapala, 231, 232, 233, 774, 824
 Dharmottara, 232
Dhikr, 2, 99, 103
 Dhir Mal, 312, 345
Dhyānibuddhas, 143, 841
Dialogo (Catherine of Genoa), 162
A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation (More), 601
Dialogue with Theopompus (Gregory the Thaumaturge), 327
Dialogue with Trypho (Justin Martyr), 457

- Dialogues* (Gregory the Great), 115, 116, 937
Diamond Sutra, 379
Dictatus papae (Gregory VII), 324–325
Didascalia Apostolorum, 127
Didascalicon (Hugh of Saint Victor), 378
Didimus, 658
Dido, 232, 595
Diet of Augsburg, 158
Diet of Speyer, 645
Diet of Worms, 518, 519
Dietrich, 255
Digambara Jainism, 418, 419, 465, 530
Digha Nikaya, 124, 143, 720
Dignaga, 231, 232–233
Dignana, 774
Dikshitar, Muthuswami, 233, 588, 791
Dimitrius. See Demetrius
Dinar, Abu Hamza Thabit b., 37
Dingane, 594
Dini ya Mariam, 717–718
Dini ya Msambwa (Ondeto), 657
Dini ya Musambwa, 18, 560
Dinka people (Sudan), 18, 504
Dinnaga. See Dignaga
Diogenes Laertius, 705
Diola prophets, 37–38, 77, 222, 233–234, 675, 699, 740
Dion of Syracuse, 524
Dionysius of Alexandria, 62
Dionysius, 695
Dionysius the Aeropagite, 227
Dionysos (Bacchos), 247
Dioskouroi, 234–235, 571
Dipamkara. See Atisha
Dirghagama Sutra, 275
Discipleship, 235–236, 338, 353, 556
Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth, 358
Dismas, 236, 736
The Dispensation of Baha'u'lláh (Shoghi Effendi), 799
Divan (Yunus Emre), 933
Divan-i Shams-i Tabrizi (Rumi), 100, 751, 788
Divi Bennonis vita (Emser), 117
Divination
 African traditional religions, 17, 391–392 ancient Greece, 321
 astrology, 75–76
Divine leadership. See Rulers as holy people
The Divine Milieu (Teilhard de Chardin), 843
Divyavadana, 73, 877
Diwan-i Hafiz (Hafiz), 337
Dizang. See Ksitigarbha
Djabune, Kooliny, 234
Djemelenekone Diatta, 77
Djitabeh of Karouate, 234
Dkon mchog rgyal po, 489
Dlugosz, Jan, 160
Docetism, 694
Dodge, Ralph E., 616
Dogen, 175, 236–237, 338
Dolce of Worms, 237–238, 298
Dolpopa Sherab Gyaltzen, 150
Domingo. See Dominic; Dominic of Silos
Dominic, 165, 193, 238, 592
Dominic of Silos, 238–239
Dominic of Val, 58
Dominicans
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24–25
 Albertus Magnus, 31–32, 238
 Cajetan, 155
 Fourteen Holy Helpers and, 280
 Louis IX and, 514
 preaching and, 842
 Suso, 829–830
 Vincent Ferrer, 895–896
 wealth/poverty and, 913
 See also Thomas Aquinas
Domitian, 572
Donatism, 81
Dong Zhongshu, 538
Donmeh, 783
The Doors of Perception (Huxley), 567
El Dorado, 239–240
Dorje Shukden, 818
Doshu, 335
Dōshun. See Hayashi Razan
Douglass, Frederick, 224
Dov Baer of Mezhirech, 236, 240, 338, 352
Dowie, John A., 505
Draupadi, 363
Dream interpretation, 68, 74, 77
Drexel, Katharine, 240–241, 913
Drogo of Winokbergen, 313
Drokmi, 241
Drom Tonpa, 242, 316
Drug use, 262–263, 567–568
Drukpa Kunley, 242–243, 396, 782
Drummer of Niklashausen. See Behem, Hans Dryden, John, 166
DuBois, W. E. B., 142
Duchesne, L. M. O., 549
Duchesne, Rose Philippine, 243
Dumachus, 236
Dunstan, 15, 243–244, 664
Durga, 840
Dushun, 244, 316, 729, 939
Dusum Khyenpa, 465, 466
Dvaita Vedanta, 525, 903
Dymphna, 244–245
The Dynamics of Faith (Tillich), 858
E
Eadmer, 56
Earth People movement, 202
Eastern Christianity. See Orthodox Christianity
Ebene, 263
Ecclesiastical History (Eusebius), 521
Ecclesiastical History of the English People (Bede), 111, 209, 324, 365
Eckhart, Meister, 580, 830
Economic activities, 19–20, 41–42, 104
Ecstatic cults, 247–248
Ecumenism. See Syncretism
Eddy, Mary Baker, 248–249, 825
Edgar (King of England), 15, 244, 664
Edmund of East Anglia, 2–3, 249, 897
Edward the Confessor (King of England), 249–250, 750
Edward VI (King of England), 206
Edwards, Jonathan, 250, 394
Edwin of Deira, 249
Egalitarianism, Baha'i faith, 98
Egfrith (King of Northumbria), 210
Egypt
 Badawi, 95–96, 219
 Hakim, 341
 Menas, 577
 Nafisa, 619
 Ptolemaic dynasty, 322, 571
 Radwan, 194, 398, 717
 Tayyib, 841
 See also Ancient Egypt; Islam; Muslim holy people; Pharaohs of Egypt
Eiei, 429
Eight Immortals, 251, 588
Eightfold Path, 146, 295
Eikon Basilike: The Portraiture of His Sacred Majesty in His Solitudes and Sufferings, 173
Einold of Toul, 439
Eisai, 251–252, 592
Ekbert, 256
El Salvador, 194, 204, 552, 693, 744
Eleanor of Aquitaine (Queen of England), 366
Eleazar of Worms, 352, 773
Elements of Theology (Proclus), 698
Eleutherius, 168–169, 227
Eleutherius of Tournai, 127
Eleutherius, 695
Eliade, Mircea, 756
Eligius, 14, 126, 252, 496
Elijah, 252–255
 attributes of, 80
 authority of, 85
 death and, 221
 as extremist, 266
 intolerance and, 863
 Khidr and, 474
 Serah bat Asher and, 776
Elijah ben Solomon, 175, 255
Elimelech of Lyzhansk, 352
Eliot, George, 770
Elisha, 253
Elissa. See Dido
Elizabeth of Hungary, 255–256, 492, 545, 781, 822
Elizabeth of Portugal, 165
Elizabeth of Schönau, 256–257
Elizabeth of Thuringia. See Elizabeth of Hungary
Eloi. See Eligius
Eloi of Noyon-Tournai, 127
Elton, S. G., 387

- Emendatio Vitae* (Rolle), 742
 Emeric, 257
 Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 142, 337, 519
Emittai dabognol. See Diola prophets
 Emmeram of Regensburg, 257, 552
 Empedocles, 258, 320, 321, 322, 388
Empo Dento-roku (Shiban), 339
 Emser, Hieronymus, 117
 En no Ozunu, 71, 258–259
Enchiridion militis Christiani (Erasmus), 394
 Enda of Aran, 185
 Engaged Buddhism Movement, 193
 Engelbert of Cologne, 259
 England and Wales, Forty Martyrs of, 259–260, 592, 693
 English Civil War, 173
 Enlightenment. See Awakening/conversion Enlightenment, The, 196
 Ennyo, 735
 E'no. See Huineng
 Enoch. See Idris
 Environmentalism, 203, 632
 Eon. See Huiyuan
 Eonus of Arles, 153
 Ephesus, Council of, 438, 507
 Ephraim of Bonn, 48
 Ephrem the Syrian, 14, 260–261, 539, 915
 Epicurus, 320
 Epimenides, 321
 Epiphanius, 598
 Epiphanius the Wise, 823
Epistle to the Ephesians (Ignatius of Antioch), 393
Epitaphium Adelheidae (Odilo), 11
 Erasmus, Desiderius, 280, 394, 499, 700, 888
Erdi yi (Jizang), 431
 Eremitism, 358–360
 Antony of Kiev, 58–59, 852
 asceticism, 70, 71
 Celestine V, 168
 Chajang, 170–171
 Cuthbert, 210, 313–314
 Daniel the Stylite, 213, 228, 809
 desert saints and, 227
 Giles, 280, 310–311
 Godric of Finchale, 14, 313–314
 Guthlac, 333
 Mary of Egypt, 558, 736
 Meinrad, 575
 Milarepa, 359, 360, 584
 Nicholas of Flüe, 329, 639
 Nilus of Rossano, 641
 Onuphrios, 657
 Paul the Hermit, 425, 631, 679
 politics and, 692
 Rolle, 742
 Samuel of Waldebba, 631, 763
 Simeon of Trier, 808
 Simeon the Stylite, 72, 95, 213, 228, 595, 809
 Stephen of Muret, 822–823
 Wiborada, 917
 See also Retreat vs. secular activity
 Eric IX Jedvardsson of Sweden, 261–262, 750
 Eritrea, 8–9
 Erndl, Kathleen, 330
 Ernst, Max, 60
 Esau, 413
 Eschatology. See Millenarianism/eschatology
Eser Sefirot, 459
 “Essay on the Golden Lion” (Fazang), 275
Essays in Zen Buddhism (Suzuki), 830
 Esschen, Johannes van, 552, 901
 Essenes, 60, 781
 Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim, 4
 Ethelbert of Kent (King of England), 80
 Ethiopia
 Caleb, 156–157, 750, 911
 Ezana, 18, 266–267, 750
 Gebre Mikael, 296–297, 414
 Ghazi, 309–310, 583, 911
 Haile Selassie, 18, 19, 339–340, 547, 852
 Jacobis, 296–297, 414
 Lalibela, 493–494, 750
 Samuel of Waldebba, 631, 763
 Takla Haymanot, 72, 174, 837, 887
 Yared, 14, 928–929
 Ethnopharmacology, 262–263
Etymologies (Isidore of Seville), 405
 Eudorus of Alexandria, 706
 Eugene III, 365, 696
 Eugenius I, 696
 Eugenius of Carthage, 263–264
 Euhemerus, 65
 Eulalia of Mérida, 264
 Eulogius, 205
 Eunapius, 385
 Euripides, 156, 247, 652, 860
 Eusebius, 695
 Eusebius of Caesarea, 188, 354, 521, 694
 Eustace, 264–265, 280, 377
 Eustochium, 269, 679–680
 Euthydemus of Phoenicia, 62
Euthyphro (Plato), 320, 689
 Eutyches, 507
 Eutychian, 695
 Evagrius, 658
 Evangelization. See Missionaries
 Evans, James, 4
 Evaristus, 695
Exemplar Seusses (Suso), 830
Exercitia spiritualis (Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta), 307
 Exorcism, 16, 20, 226, 427
 Expeditus, 265
Exposito Fidei Catholicae (Eugenius of Carthage), 263
 Extremists, 265–266
Eyn Sof, 459
 Ezana, 18, 266–267, 750
 Ezekiel, 873
- F
 Faber, Peter, 158
 Fabian, 695
 Fabiola, 269
Fahuajing Xuanyi (Zhiyi), 940
 Fa-hsien. See Faxian
 Faith, 269–270, 448
 Faith Tabernacle, 93–94
A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God (Edwards), 250
Fajie guanmen (Dushun), 244
 Fa-jung, 631
 Falang, 431
 Fall, Cheikh Ibra, 235, 270
 Falwell, Jerry, 203
 Family lines. See Hereditary holiness
Fana', 128
Fangshi, 215
Faqirs, 913
 al-Farazdaq, 37
 Fard, W. D., 270–271
 death and, 221
 as god on earth, 314, 583
 Elijah Muhammad and, 610
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 676
 as religious founder, 278
 Fareed, Sheik, 806
 Farel, Guillaume, 157
 Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar, 71, 271–272, 587
 Farrakhan, Louis, 272
 Fashun. See Dushun
 Fasting, 71, 417, 430, 437. See also Asceticism
 Fateh 'Ali Shah (King of Iran), 20
Fath al-Rahman (Aydarusi), 95
 Father Divine, 314, 398, 781
 Fatima bint Barri, 95
 Fatima bint Muhammad, 105, 272–273, 297–298, 408
 Fatima Ma'suma, 273
 Fatima of Ourika, 273, 274, 888
 Fatimid Empire, 88–89
 Fa-tsang. See Fazang
Fawa'id al-Fu'ad (Sijzi), 643
 Faxian, 274–275, 773
 Faxiang Buddhism, 70
 Fazang, 275, 876, 939
Fei-sheng, 66
 Felix I, 695
 Felix III/II, 695, 696
 Felix IV/III, 696
 Felix of Croyland, 333
 Felix of Nola, 275–276, 680
 Felix of Urgel, 115
 Felix, Regula, and Exuperantius, 168, 169
 Female holy people, 297–300
 Abiodun Akinsowon, 4, 85, 658
 Adelheid, 11
 Afra of Augsburg, 15–16
 Agatha, 23–24, 182, 516, 781
 Agnes, 24, 182, 781
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24–25

Female holy people (continued)

- Alacoque, 30–31, 398
 'Ali Shah, 37
 Ammachi, 47–48, 299, 316
 Anandamayi Ma, 85, 316, 370
 Andal, 52–53, 221, 229
 Anne, 53–54, 357
 Aoko, 61–62, 299–300, 559
 Apollonia, 62, 183, 553, 818
 apostles and, 63
 asceticism, 71, 72
 Askew, 73–74
 Asma'u Fodiyo Nana, 18, 75
 Baha'i faith, 98
 Bahinabai, 14, 102
 Bahiyiyih Khánum, 98, 102–103, 298
 Bakhita, 103
 Barbara, 106, 280, 789
 Beguines, 111–112, 545–546
 Beruria, 120–121, 300
 Birgitta of Sweden, 125–126
 Bixia Yuanjun, 66, 128–129, 399
 Bowman, 138–139
 Brigid of Ireland, 140–141, 218, 299, 498
 Cabrini, 153, 154, 194, 914
 Catarina de San Juan, 161, 588
 Catherine of Alexandria, 161–162, 280, 300, 504
 Catherine of Genoa, 162, 165, 194
 Catholic Reformation saints, 165
 Cecilia, 166
 Chimalman, 176, 298, 710
 Christina of Markyate, 183–184
 Clan Mothers, 185–186
 Clare of Assisi, 186
 Clare of Montefalco, 186–187
 Cleopatra VII, 188
 Clitherow, 260
 Clotilde, 188–189
 Corn Maidens/Mothers, 205
 Daoism, 216, 217
 Darerca, 218
 Delphine of Provence, 224–225
 Dido, 232, 595
 Dolce of Worms, 237, 298
 Duchesne, 243
 Dymphna, 244–245
 Eddy, 248, 825
 Elizabeth of Hungary, 255–256, 492, 545, 781, 822
 Elizabeth of Schönau, 256
 eremitism, 359
 Eulalia of Mérida, 264
 Fabiola, 269
 Faith, 269–270, 448
 Fatima bint Muhammad, 105, 272, 297–298, 408
 Fatima Ma'suma, 273
 Fatima of Ourika, 273, 274, 888
 Frances of Rome, 282, 492
 Fry, 194, 285–286
 Galgani, 289, 825
 Gangamata Goswamini, 71, 292, 750
 Gangasati, 292–293
 Gargi, 293, 300, 369, 927
 Geneviève, 301–302, 306, 911
 Gertrude of Nivelles, 306–307, 357
 Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta, 307, 568
 Giuliani, 311–312
 Godeliva, 313
Gopis, 170, 229, 316–317, 883
 Goretti, 317–318, 781
 Greek heroines, 361, 363
 guidance and, 329
 Gumtivala Mata, 330
 Hebrew matriarchs, 562–563
 Helena, 202, 355
 Hilda of Whitby, 364–365
 Hildegard of Bingen, 256, 329, 365–366, 618
 Ida of Herzfeld, 221, 386–387
 Íte, 71, 411–412, 498
 Joan of Arc, 162, 433–434, 674, 911
 Julia of Carthage, 455–456
 Julian of Norwich, 72, 86, 299, 329, 456, 825
 Juliana of Liège, 457
 Karunamayi, 466–467
 Kikusha-ni, 477
 Kimpa Vita, 674–675
 Kunigunde, 490, 750, 781
 Lalla, 494–495, 825
 Lasair, 498
 Lee, 297, 503–504, 582, 699, 781, 812
 Lenshina, 18, 222, 506, 863
 Lioba, 299, 511
 Lucy, 516
 Machig Labdron, 298–299, 524, 774
 Macuixochitl, 88, 525
 Mahadeviyakka, 71, 300, 527, 898
 Mai Chaza, 222, 532
 Malli, 419, 535, 782
 Mankiller, 194, 540, 730
 Margaret of Antioch, 338
 Margaret of Cortona, 165, 544
 Margaret of Hungary, 545
 Margaret of Scotland, 545
 Marie d'Oignies, 231, 545–546
 Maroon Nanny, 547–548
 Martha, 549, 557
 Mary Magdalene, 63, 297, 554, 557, 736
 Mary of Egypt, 558, 736
 Mary, sister of Martha, 549, 554, 557
 Mary/Mama, 559–560
 Matilda, 11, 561–562
 Mechtild of Hackeborn, 568, 617
 Melania the Younger, 576–577, 913
 Menininha de Gantois, 578–579
 Merici, 194, 492, 579
 Mirabai, 122, 298, 586, 782
 Miram, 588–589
 Miriam, 1–2, 299, 589–590, 700
 Mnkabayi ka Jama, 593–594
 Monica, 298, 597–598
 Moraa Moka Ngiti, 18, 85, 299, 600–601
 Nafisa, 221, 357–358, 504, 619
 Nakayama Miki, 299, 316, 623–624, 699
 Nehanda Nyakasikana, 633
 Nongqawuse, 18, 644
 Nyabingi, 18, 19, 65, 646–647, 675
 Odile, 649–650
 Olga, 654–655
 Oyá, 18, 665, 789, 910
 Parasceva, 662, 669
 Paula, 72, 269, 425, 679–680, 913
 Peace Pilgrim, 681, 911
 Perpetua and Felicity, 298, 682–683
 politics and, 182
 prophets, 699–700
 Pythia, 247, 299, 321, 571, 572, 706–707
 Rabi'a al-Adawiyya, 109, 299, 300, 715–716
 Ransom-Kehler, 554, 725–726
 Root, 591, 746–747
 Rúhiyyih Khánum, 358, 747–748
 Samthann, 498, 762–763
 Sanapia, 297, 765
 Sarada Devi, 767–768
 scholarship and, 772, 774
 Serah bat Asher, 80, 504, 776
 sibyls, 299, 321, 700, 802
 Slessor, 811
 Sojourner Truth, 814
 Sophia, 815
 Soubirous, 174, 816
 Southcott, 582, 817
 Srimala, 818
 Sun Bu'er, 216
 Tahirih, 92, 97, 98, 100, 300
 Tailfeather Woman, 299, 836, 911
 Tara, 77, 840–841
 Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
 Thecla of Iconium, 850
 Thérèse of Lisieux, 853–854
 Tianhou, 857
 Toral, 864
 Verbermacher, 299, 889–890
 Vestal Virgins, 572, 697, 704, 891–892
 Walburga, 906, 919
 Wiborada, 72, 916–917
 Wilgefortis, 918
 Wu Zhao, 750, 792, 799, 818, 922
 Yeshe Tsogyal, 193, 300, 524, 929–930
 Zaynab, 936–937
See also Catherine of Siena; Gender and Holy People; Mary, Virgin; Teresa of Avila
 Ferdinand III of Castile, 276, 911
 Fernando. See Ferdinand III of Castile
 Ficino, Marsilio, 388
 Fick, Carolyn, 533
The Fifth Business (Davies), 918
Fihi ma fih (Rumi), 100 al-Fihrist (at-Tusi), 870
 Fiji, 79, 699

- Filaret of Moscow, 732
 Filhas de Santo, 578–579
 Film, 216
 Filologue, Lev, 447
 Filth, 71. See also Asceticism
The Final Call, 272
 Finian of Clonard, 185
 Finney, Charles Grandison, 812
 Fintian of Clonard, 401
First Apology (Justin Martyr), 458
The First Examyacyon (Askew), 74
 Fisher, John, 276–277, 602, 732
 Fishermen, 20
 FitzGerald, Edward, 473
Five Theological Orations (Gregory of Nazianzus), 325
 Flambard, Ralph, 184
 Flamininus, 572
 Flaubert, Gustave, 60
Fließende Licht der Gottheit (Mechthild of Magdeburg), 112
 Florence, Council of, 120
 Flower Garland (Avatamsaka) Sutra, 174, 374, 753, 881, 939, 943
 Focolare movement, 203
 Foi. See Faith
 Fokuda Toshiyasu. See Kodōjin
Font of Wisdom (John of Damascus), 439
Food of the Gods (McKenna), 567
Forerunners of Christ with Saints and Martyrs (Fra Angelico), 166
 Forgione, Francesco. See Pio of Pietrelcina
The Form of Perfect Living (Rolle), 742
 Forty Martyrs of England and Wales, 259–260, 592, 693
 Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, 775
 Fotucheng, 214, 277, 329, 588, 592
Foundations (Teresa of Avila), 846
 Founders of religions, 278–279
 Akhenaten, 28, 570, 686
 Akindayomi, 29–30
 creativity and, 13
 discipleship and, 235
 Eddy, 248, 825
 as gods on earth, 314
 Kitamura Sayo, 14, 66, 481
 Lee, 297, 503–504, 582, 699, 781, 812
 Moon, 204, 582, 599, 781
 Nakayama Miki, 299, 316, 623–624, 699
 Ondeto, 61, 204, 559–560, 582, 656–657
 Osho, 663, 914
 Smith, 279, 553, 699, 812, 932
 White, 299, 916
 See also Bab, The; Baha'ullah; Confucius; Gautama Buddha; Jesus of Nazareth; Laozi; Mani; Moses; Muhammad; Nanak; Zoroaster
 Four captives, 279–280
 Four Noble Truths, 146, 295
 Fourteen Holy Helpers, 162, 280–281, 311
 Fox, George, 281–282, 732
 Foxe, John, 74, 702, 737
 Fra Angelico, 14, 166, 282
 Frances of Rome, 282–283, 492
 Francis, Josiah, 730
 Francis of Assisi, 283–284
 Antony of Padua and, 59
 asceticism, 71, 228
 attributes of, 79
 awakening/conversion, 86
 Catholic Reformation saints and, 165
 Clare of Assisi and, 186
 compassion and, 193
 Dominic and, 238
 Ignatius of Loyola and, 390
 insanity and, 396
 laity and, 492
 mission and, 592
 nature and, 631
 stigmata, 231, 284, 826
 wealth/poverty and, 913
 Francis of Sales, 30, 138, 164, 284–285
 Franciscans
 Antony of Padua, 59, 61, 226
 Benedict the African, 116
 Bernardino of Siena, 119–120, 445
 Celestine V, 168
 Clare of Assisi, 186
 Clare of Montefalco, 186–187
 Delphine of Provence, 224–225
 Ferdinand III of Castile, 276, 911
 Kolbe, 194, 483
 Louis IX and, 514
 Margaret of Cortona, 165, 544
 poverty controversy, 186
 preaching and, 842
 wealth/poverty and, 913
 See also Francis of Assisi
 Frank, Jacob, 734
 Frankish dynasty, 38, 39, 68
 Frederick the Wise, 701
 Free Spirit sect, 186, 187
Freedom of Will (Edwards), 250
 French Revolution, 892
 Freud, Sigmund, 68
 Friends of God, 639
 Friendship, 12–13
From Union Square to Rome (Day), 219
 Fromm, Erich, 830
 Fry, Elizabeth, 194, 285–286
 Fu Hsi. See Fu Xi
 Fu Xi, 195, 196, 758
 Fu-gen. See Samantabhadra
 Fujiwara no Kamatari, 65, 286–287
 Fujiwara Seika, 287, 354
Fu-ko chi (Faxian), 275
 Fulbert of Chartres, 650
 Fundamentalism, 203, 733, 772, 864
 Fusho, 429
Fusus al-Hikam (Ibn al-'Arabi), 386 al-Futuhat al-Makkiyyah (Ibn al-'Arabi), 386
 Fynn, Henry, 784
 G
 Gabon, 51
 Gabriel, 406, 558, 608, 609
 Gadadhara Pundit, 292
 Galgani, Gemma, 289, 825
 Gall, 192, 289–290
 Gallus Anonymus, 819
 Gampopa, 87, 290–291, 316, 569, 584
 Gandhi, Indira, 266
 Gandhi, Mohandas K., 291–292, 369
 Agnivesh and, 25
 asceticism, 70
 attributes of, 79
 Bhaktivedanta and, 122
 Bhave and, 122–123
 compassion and, 194
 death of, 266
 King and, 479
 Mirabai and, 586
 nonviolence and, 675, 896, 898
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 675 peace and, 911
 politics and, 693
 Rajcandra and, 720
 social activism, 204, 291–292, 693
 status and, 820
 veneration of, 889
 Gangabai. See Gangasati
 Gangamata Goswami, 71, 292, 750
 Gangasati, 292–293
 Ganjin. See Jianzhen
 Gapp, Jacob, 889
 Gardner, Gerald, 202
 Gargi, 293–294, 300, 369, 927
 Garnet, Henry Highland, 208, 224
 Garrison, William Lloyd, 142
 Garvey, Marcus Moziyah, 294, 339, 582, 675
 Gathas, 338
Gathas (Zoroaster), 944
 Gaudiya Hinduism. See Vaishnava Hinduism
 Gautama Buddha, 146, 294–296
 Ajatashatru and, 28
 Ananda and, 49
 Anathapindika and, 50–51
 asceticism and, 70
 attributes of, 78, 79
 awakening/conversion, 86
 Bimbisara and, 124
 as child prodigy, 174
 compassion and, 193
 demons/monsters and, 226
 Devadatta and, 228
 gender and, 298
 hagiography, 338
 iconography, 147
 Kassapa and, 467
 Mara and, 226, 542
 meditation and, 569
 Pasenadi and, 671
 reincarnation and, 733
 as religious founder, 278

- Gautama Buddha (continued)
 sexuality and, 782
 Shakra and, 785
 Shariputra and, 790
 status and, 820
 Subhuti and, 235, 824
 as teacher, 842
 Upaka and, 877
 Upali and, 878
 Vacchagotta and, 881
 Vairocana and, 486
 veneration of, 887–888
- Gautama, Indrabhuti, 530
 Gautier de Coinci, 852
 Gayadhara, 241
Gazb (jadhba), 2
 Ge Hong, 215–216, 296, 838
 Geber, 63
 Gebre Mikael, 296–297, 414
Geistliches Gesangbuechlein (Walter), 901
 Gelasius, 696
 Gender, 297–300
 African Christianity, 61–62, 299–300
 Aga Khan III and, 22
 Ammachi and, 47, 299
 asceticism and, 71, 298
 Baha'i faith, 98, 298, 300
 Bahinabai and, 102
 Bede on, 111
 Brahma Kumaris World Spiritual Organization and, 505
 Buddhism, 49, 295, 298, 300
 Diola prophets and, 234
 Dolce of Worms and, 237, 298
 guidance and, 329
 Hinduism, 47, 298, 299, 300
 Jainism, 418
 Kharaqani and, 472
 Mary Magdalene and, 557
 Robert of Arbrissel and, 740
 Shakers, 503
 Sojourner Truth and, 814
 Southcott and, 817
 Srimala and, 818
 teachers as holy people and, 842
 Waldensianism, 907
 See also Female holy people
- Gendun drubpa, 79, 301
 Geneviève, 301–302, 306, 911
 Geoffrey of Beaulieu, 515
 Geoffrey of St. Albans, 184
 George, 226, 280, 302–303, 504, 911
 Ger Tzedeq, 303
 Gerald of Aurillac, 303–304, 651, 897
 Gerald of Wales, 141
 Gerard of Csanád, 257, 304–305
 Gerhard, Johann, 519
 Gerland of Naumbourg, 508
 Germanus, 437
 Germanus of Auxerre, 305
 Germanus of Paris, 305–306
- Geronimo, 79, 306
 Gershom ben Judah, 773, 889
 Gertrude of Hackeborn, 568
 Gertrude of Nivelles, 306–307, 357
 Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta, 307, 568
 Gervasius and Protasius, 41, 308
Gesta episcoporum, 127
 Gestas, 236
Al-Ghayba (at-Tusi), 870
 Ghazali, Abu Hamid al-, 308–309, 329, 473, 764, 784, 826
 Ghazali, Ahmad al-, 309
 Ghazi, Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al-, 309–310, 583, 911
 Ghifari, Abu Dharr al-, 704
 Ghost Dance movement, 52, 811, 921–922
 Gibbons, Edward, 228
 Gilbert of Sempringham, 310, 740
 Gilbertines, 310
 Gildas, 31
 Giles, 280, 310–311
 Gilgamesh, 362, 474
 Giraldus Cambrensis, 890
 Giri, Gnanananda, 502
 Gisudaraz, Muhammad Bandanawaz, 178, 311
 Giuliani, Veronica, 311–312
 Gleb. See Boris and Gleb
The Glory of the Confessors (Gregory of Tours), 716
The Glory of the Martyrs (Gregory of Tours), 716
 Glossolalia, 560
 Gnosticism, 401–402
 Gobind Singh, 312–313, 803
 children of, 175
 Dayal and, 220
 death of, 805–806
 as model, 595
 veneration of, 889
Gobunsho (Rennyō), 735
God Passes By (Shoghi Effendi), 799
 Godeliva, 313
 Godric of Finchale, 14, 313–314
 Gods on earth, 314–316. See also Messiah beliefs
 Goering, Hermann, 798
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 337
Goichidaiki Kikigaki, 735
 Goindval Pothis (Amardas), 39, 40
 Golandam, Muhummad, 337
 Golden Horde, 32
Golden Legend (Voragine). See Legenda Aurea
 Goldhagen, Daniel, 57
 Goldstein, Baruch, 266
Golem, 450
 Gompopa, 465
 Gonzaga, Aloysius, 165
 “Good King Wenceslas” (Neale), 914
Gopis, 170, 229, 316–317, 883
 Gorakhnath, 70, 226, 317, 629–630
Goraksa Samhita (Gorakhnath), 317
Goraksa Sataka, 630
Goraksa Sataka (Gorakhnath), 317
 Goretta, Maria, 317–318, 781
Gorgias (Plato), 320
 Gosvamins, 431
 Gotama. See Gautama Buddha
 Gottesfreunde. See Friends of God
 Grags pa rhyal mtshan, 490
 Graham, A. C., 942
 Graham, Billy, 318–319
 Grandmontines, 822, 823
 Great Awakening, 250, 842
The Great Controversy between Christ and Satan (White), 916
The Great Image (Vairotsana), 882
Great Learning (Confucius), 198
 Greece, ancient. See Ancient Greek holy people; Ancient Greek religion/culture; Greek hero cults; Greek philosophers Greek hero cults, 361–362, 363–364, 571
 Aiakos, 26
 Aias son of Oileus, 26–27
 apotheosis and, 65, 361
 Asklepios, 74–75, 361, 362, 363
 attributes of holy people and, 79
 Dioskouroi, 234–235, 571
 gods on earth and, 314
 Herakles, 65, 174, 220, 356–357
 Oedipus, 362, 363, 651–652
 Orpheus, 14, 321, 361, 362, 659, 661
 ruler cults and, 524
 Theseus, 361, 571, 652, 817, 854, 910
 warfare and, 910
 Greek Orthodox Church
 Caleb, 156
 Gregory of Sinai, 326–327
 John Chrysostom, 38, 58, 80, 95, 437–438, 662, 842
 See also Orthodox Christianity
 Greek prophets. See Ancient Greek religion/culture
 Green Corn Festival, 205
 Gregory, Dick, 34
 Gregory I (Gregory the Great), 323–324, 696
 Aethelbert and, 249
 Augustine of Canterbury and, 80
 Benedict of Nursia and, 115, 116
 Columbanus and, 192
 Leander of Seville and, 502
 retreat vs. secular activity, 8, 360
 Zeno and, 937
 Gregory II, 134, 696
 Gregory III, 696
 Gregory IV, 38
 Gregory VII, 324–325, 696, 732
 Gregory IX, 256
 Gregory X, 58, 696
 Gregory, Louis, 323
 Gregory of Nazianzus, 108, 325–326
 Gregory of Nyssa, 326, 327, 775, 915
 Gregory of Sinai, 326–327

- Gregory of Tours on Clotilde, 189
 on Denis of Paris, 226–227
 on Eugenius of Carthage, 263
 on Eulalia of Mérida, 264
 on Felix of Nola, 276 on Martial of Limoges, 549 on Radegund, 716 on Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, 780
- Gregory Palamas, 327
- Gregory the Thaumaturge, 327
- Grierson, George, 494
- Griffiths, Bede, 123, 327–328, 502
- Gritsamada, 738
- Groote, Gerard, 492
- Grünewald, Matthias, 60
- Guadalupe, Virgin of, 45, 449, 555
- Guajiro people, 779
- Guandi, 66, 328–329, 910
- Guanyin, 193, 216
- Guatavita, 240
- Guidance, 329–330
- Guido di Piero. See Fra Angelico
- Guigo I, 143
- Guillaume of Chartres, 515
- Guillaume of Saint-Pathus, 515
- Gulshan-i raz* (Shabistari), 783–784
- Gumtivala Mata, 330
- Gunamati, 823
- Gurdas, Bhai, 806
- Gurdwaras*, 803
- Guru Granth, 332, 460, 889
- Gurumayi Swami Chidvilasananda, 330–331
- Gurus, 110, 332, 332–333, 804–805, 842
- Gusii uprising, 600–601
- Guthlac, 333
- Guthmundr Arason, 226, 333–334
- Guti, Ezekiel “Handinawangu,” 203, 334
- Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen, 334–335
- Gyogi Bosatsu, 316, 335, 492, 592, 729
- H
- Hachiman. See Ōjin
- Hadewijch of Brabant, 112
- Hadiqat al-haqiqa wa shari‘at al-tariqa* (Sana‘i), 764
- Hadith*, 110, 338, 367, 774
- Hadjo, Hillis, 730
- Hadrian II, 389, 696
- Hadrian VI, 155
- Haemstede, Adriaen von, 901
- Hafez, 410
- Hafi, Bishir al-, 470
- Hafiz, Muhammad Shamsuddin, 106, 337–338, 700
- Haft-Vadi* (Baha‘u’llah), 101
- Hagar, 5, 6, 411, 451, 559
- Hagiography, 338–339
- Hai‘iri-Yazdi, Ayatullah, 150
- Haikai*, 477
- Haiku*, 108, 391, 482
- Haile Selassie, 18, 19, 339–340, 547, 582
- Hair shirts, 71–72
- Haiti, 65, 533, 675
- Hajj*, 410, 611
- Hakam, Hisham b. al-, 415
- Hakham*, 340–341, 366, 758. See also Jewish holy people
- Hakim, Abu ‘Ali al-Mansur al-, 341
- Hakuin, 14, 87, 341–342, 736
- Halachah*, 451
- Halevi, Judah, 14, 179, 342
- Hallaj, Husayn b. Mansur al-, 342–343
 Baqli and, 105
 Idris and, 388
 insanity and, 398
 Lal Shahbaz Qalandar and, 493
 martyrdom/persecution and, 552
 mysticism and, 617
- Halloween, 38
- Hallowtide, 38
- Hamadani, Yusuf, 472
- Hamd Allah Mustawfi, 106
- Hammer-Purgstall, J. von, 784
- Han Xiangzi, 216, 251
- Han Zhongli. See Zhongli Quan
- al-Hanafiyya, Muhammad b., 37
- Hanbal, Ahmad ibn, 619
- Handel, George Frideric, 166
- Handsome Lake, 45, 279, 343–344, 675
- Hanifs*, 6
- Hanifs, 388
- Hanina ben Dosa, 344, 587
- Hannah and her seven sons, 344–345, 844
- Han-shan, 492
- Hao Datong, 216
- Haqa’iq al-Tafsir* (Sulami), 828–829
- Al-Haqa’iq* (Dasuqi), 219
- Haqq al-yaqin* (Shabistari), 784
- Har Krishan, 345, 805
- Har Rai, 345, 805
- Haravicus, 40
- Harding, Stephen, 119
- Hare Krishnas, 122, 170, 204
- Hargobind, 345–346, 805, 911
- Haribhadra, 346, 863
- Haridas, 346–347, 889
- Haridasa Pundit, 292
- Haridasas, 801–802, 902–903
- Hari-trayi, 347
- Haritsu. See Kodōjin
- Harivamsha*, 484
- Harivansh, Hit, 229, 316, 346–347, 347, 782, 902
- Harris, William Wade, 348, 699
- Hasan al-‘Askari, al-, 349–350, 531
- Hasan ‘Ali Shah. See Aga Khan I
- Hasan b. ‘Ali, 350–351
- Hasan II, 348–349
- Hasan III, 349
- Hasan-i Sabbah, 349, 351
- Hashim, Shaykh, 2
- Hasidei Ashkenaz, 351–352, 450, 552
- Hasidism, 352–354
 anti-intellectualism, 229, 772
 Ba‘al Shem Tov, 91–92, 229, 352, 448, 453, 732, 889 dance and, 14
 devotion, 229
 Dov Baer of Mezhirech, 236, 240, 338, 352
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 91, 399
 joy, 448
 Kabbalah and, 459
 martyrdom/persecution and, 552
 miracles, 587
 mysticism and, 617
 Nahman of Bratslav, 14, 352, 399, 582, 618, 621–622, 817 priests and, 697
 reform and, 732
 spiritual guardians, 817
tzaddiqim, 91, 352–353, 595, 621–622, 874
 veneration of holy people, 889
 Verbermacher, 299, 889–890
- Hassan ‘Ali. See Aga Khan I
- Hassan, Sayyid Muhammad ‘Abdullah, 354, 675
- Hatha yoga, 317
- Hatshepsut, 686
- Hatto, 916–917
- Haudenasaunee, 205
- Hayagrivastotra* (Vedanta Deshika), 885
- Hayashi Razan, 287, 354–355, 488
- Haymanot, Takla, 414
- He* (Celebi), 167
- He Xian‘gu, 216, 251
- Healing
 African traditional religions, 16, 20
 Asklepios, 74, 74–75, 361, 362, 363
 Bonnke, 136, 203
 Chad, 169
 Chisupe, 179
 drug use and, 263 ecstatic cults and, 247
 Eddy, 248, 825
 guidance and, 329
 Hanina ben Dosa, 344
 Hernández, 360–361
 Kimbangu, 478
 Mai Chaza, 532
 Martin de Porres, 549–550
 Mason, 561
 miracles and, 588
 shamanism and, 786–787
 Thomas Becket, 856
 veneration of holy people and, 887
 Zaynab, 936
See also Miracles
- Heaven and Hell* (Huxley), 567
- The Heavenly Ladder* (John Climacus), 438
- Hecataeus of Abdera, 322
- Hedwig. See Jadwiga
- Hegesippus, 422
- Hehe people (Tanzania), 19

- Heidegger, Martin, 81
Heimskringla (Snorri Sturluson), 654
 Hektor, 361
 Hekura, 263
 Helena, 202, 355
 Hellenistic culture apothecis, 34, 65, 83, 362
 Asklepios, 74
 astrology, 75 philosophy, 573 retreat, 60
 rulers as holy people, 322, 571–572
 Socrates and, 813
 Hemacandra, 220, 355–356
 Henry II (German emperor), 356, 490, 750, 781
 Henry II (King of England), 366, 856
 Henry IV (King of France), 266
 Henry VIII (King of England)
 Cajetan and, 155
 Cranmer and, 206–207
 Fisher and, 276–277, 602
 Forty Martyrs of England and Wales and, 259
 More and, 601, 602
 Ridley and, 737
 Heraclitus, 321
 Herakles, 356–357, 362
 apothecis of, 65, 361
 as child prodigy, 174
 death of, 220, 357
 Ino and, 363
 Herder, Johann, 130
 Hereditary holiness, 357–358
 African traditional religions, 18 authority of holy people and, 85
 Baha'i faith, 3, 358
 Isaac, 402–403
 Islam, 8–9, 350, 357–358, 408
 rulers as holy people and, 357, 748
 Sikhism, 67, 345, 358
 Sufism, 2, 358, 790–791
 Hermes Trismegistus, 358, 388
Hermetic Definitions, 358
 Hermetica, 358
 Hermits. See Eremitism; Retreat vs. secular activity
 Hernández, José Gregorio, 360–361
 Heroes, 362–363. See also Greek hero cults
 Heroines, Greek, 361, 363
 Herrera, Josefa “Pepa,” 10
 Herrera, Remigio. See Adechina
 Heschel, Abraham, 453
 Hesiod, 74, 363
 Hetu-vidya school, 232
 Hiawatha, 223
 Hidulf, 563
 High Head Jim, 730
 Hilarius, 696
 Hilary of Poitiers, 364, 550
 Hilda of Whitby, 364–365
 Hildegard of Bingen, 256, 329, 365–366, 618
 Hildelin, 256
 Hilduin of St.-Denis, 227
 Hillel, 279, 340, 366–367
 Hilli, Allamah al-, 367, 500
 Himes, Joshua, 584
 Himmler, Heinrich, 798
 Hincmar of Rheims, 734–735
 Hinderer, David, 444
 Hindu asceticism, 70–71
 Mahadeviyakka, 71, 527
 sadhus, 70, 368, 756–757, 841–842
 shramanas, 739, 756, 800–801
 tapas, 70, 838–839
 Hindu holy people
 Agnivesh, 25, 693, 733
 Ammachi, 47, 299, 316
 Andal, 52–53, 221, 229
 Aurobindo Ghose, 84, 369, 675, 826
 Bahinabai, 14, 102, 298
 Basavanna, 107, 221, 898
 Bauls, 110, 370, 396, 782
 Bhaktivedanta, 122, 170, 204
 Bhave, 122–123, 369
 Chinmayananda, 176–177, 820
 Cokhamela, 190, 820
 creativity of, 13–14
 Dikshitar, 233, 588, 791
 Gangamata Goswamini, 71, 292, 750
 Gangasati, 292–293
 Gargi, 293, 300, 369, 927
 Gopis, 170, 229, 316–317, 883
 Gorakhnath, 70, 226, 317, 629–630
 Gumtivala Mata, 330
 Gurumayi Swami Chidvilasananda,
 330–331
 Haridas, 346–347, 889
 Harivansh, 229, 316, 346–347, 782, 902
 Jagadbandhu Sundar, 79, 359, 415–416, 734
 Jalaram, 194, 421
 Jiva Goswamin, 231, 430–431
 Jnaneshvara, 357, 432–433, 624
 Kamalakanta Bhattacharya, 14, 462, 587
 Kanakadasa, 87, 174, 463–464, 820
 Karunamayi, 466–467
 Krishna, 169–170, 315, 316, 362, 369, 370, 483–484
 Krishnamurti, 203, 484–485
 Krishnananda Agamavagisa, 485
 Lalla, 494–495, 825
 Lekhrāj, 299, 505–506
 Madhva, 525–526, 801
 Mahadeviyakka, 71, 300, 527, 898
 Maharshi, 8, 221, 329, 485, 502, 528
 Mirabai, 122, 298, 586, 782
 Miram, 588–589
 morality, 601
 Mukundadeva, 613–614, 782
 Namdev, 40, 190, 624, 806
 Nammalvar, 624–625, 820
 Narsi Mehta, 298, 628
 Naths, 317, 369, 370, 629–630, 782
 Pandurangshastri Athavale-Dada, 668–669
 Patanjali, 671
 Purandaradasa, 14, 703–704, 913
 Radharaman Charan Das Dev, 716–717, 842
 Rama, 226, 229, 362, 721, 899
 Ramadas of Bhadrachalam, 229, 722
 Ramanand, 460, 674, 705, 723–724, 728
 Ramanuja, 231, 368, 724, 773, 885, 903
 Ramprasad Sen, 122, 462, 485, 725
 Ravidas, 40, 121, 724, 727–728, 820
 Rupa Goswami, 431, 752
 Sadashiva Brahmendra, 87, 569, 755–756
 Sanatana Goswami, 431, 765–766
 Sarada Devi, 767–768
 Sathya Sai Baba, 316, 573, 734, 769–770
 Shakra, 785
 Shastri, 791
 Shivnarayan, 797
 Shripadaraya, 801–802
 Surdas, 122, 829
 Toral and Jesal, 864
 Tukaram, 867
 Tulsidas, 122, 732, 825, 869
 Tyagaraja, 722, 791, 872–873
 Vamaksepa, 884
 Vedanta Deshika, 316, 885, 893
 Vemana, 886
 Vidyaranya, 892–893
 Vijayakrishna Goswamin, 893–894
 Vishvamitra, 738, 820, 898–899
 Vivekananda, 176, 369, 597, 723, 768,
 899–900
 Vyas, 346–347, 902
 Vyasaraaya, 464, 703, 801, 802, 902–903
 Yajñavalkya, 293, 369, 927
 Yogananda, 930–931
See also Chaitanya, Krishna; Gandhi,
 Mohandas K.; Kabir; Ramakrishna
 Paramahansa; Shankara
 Hindu poetry
 alvars, 13, 52, 121, 229, 625, 820
 Andal, 52–53, 221, 229
 Bahinabai, 14, 102, 298
 Buddhism and, 13–14
 Cokhamela, 190, 820
 Gangasati, 292–293
 Haridas, 347, 889
 Harivansh, 229, 316, 346–347, 782, 902
 Jnaneshvara, 357, 432–433, 624
 Kamalakanta Bhattacharya, 462
 Kanakadasa, 87, 174, 463–464, 820
 laity and, 492
 Lalla, 494–495
 Namdev, 40, 190, 624, 806
 Nammalvar, 624–625, 820
 Narsi Mehta, 298, 628
 nayanars, 14, 121, 632, 820
 Ramprasad Sen, 122, 462, 485, 725
 Ravidas, 40, 121, 724, 727–728, 820
 Rupa Goswami, 431, 752
 Shivnarayan, 797

- Surdas, 122, 829
 Toral and Jesal, 864
 Tukaram, 867
 Tulsidas, 122, 732, 825, 869
 Vemana, 886
 Vyas, 346–347, 902
 Hinduism, 367–371
 anti-intellectualism, 773
 Antony of Uvari and, 61
 attributes of holy people, 78, 79, 80
 authority of holy people, 85
 awakening/conversion, 87
 Britto and, 141–142
 child prodigies, 174, 175
 compassion, 194
 creativity, 13–14
 death, 221
 demons/monsters, 226
 devotion, 229, 231, 298
 as disciple, 236
 eremitism, 359, 360
 gender, 47, 298, 299, 300
 gods on earth, 314–316
 gurus, 332
 hagiography, 338
 hereditary holiness, 357
 holy people as models, 595
 insanity and, 398
 Le Saux and, 502
 meditation, 568, 569
 messiah beliefs, 580
 miracles, 587
 monasticism, 597
 mysticism, 617, 618
 nature, 630
 nayanars, 14, 121, 632, 820
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 purity/pollution, 704, 705
 Radhasoami tradition and, 813
 Rajcandra and, 720
 recognition, 729
 reincarnation, 733
 retreat vs. secular activity, 8
 rishis, 368, 504, 738, 758–759
 ritual and, 739
 rulers as holy people, 748, 750
 sadhus, 70, 368, 756–757, 841–842
 sages, 758–759
 scholars as holy people, 772
 sexuality and, 780, 782
 shramanas, 739, 756, 800–801
 siddhas and, 148
 Sikhism and, 370, 803
 status and, 820
 tapas, 70, 838–839
 teachers as holy people, 842
 Vaishnava Sahajiyas, 370, 882–883
 veneration of holy people, 886, 887, 889
 violence/nonviolence, 896
 Virashaivism, 106, 121, 122, 494–495, 629–630, 757, 898
 warfare, 910
 wealth/poverty, 912–913
 See also Bhakti Hinduism; Hindu asceticism; Vedanta Hinduism
 Hippocrates, 74
 Hippolytus of Rome, 371, 695
 Hiravijayasuri, 371, 729
 Hirmis al-Haramisah, 388
 Hirohito (Emperor of Japan), 748
Hislahavus, 91
History of Rome (Livy), 235
History of the Franks (Gregory of Tours), 226–227, 716
The History of the Yorubas (Johnson), 444
 Hitler, Adolf, 798
 Holbein, Hans the Younger, 602
 Holocaust. See Shoah
 Holy fools, 397–398, 601, 693, 731
 Holy Innocents, 371–372
 Homer on Asklepios, 74 blindness of, 321 on Calchas, 156 on Dioskouroi, 235 on Herakles, 357 hero cults and, 361 heroines and, 363 on Oedipus, 651 on Tiresias, 860
 Homobonus, 372
 Homosexuality, 13, 119, 777, 780–781
 Honecker, Martin, 718
 Honen, 372–373
 intolerance and, 864
 Ippen and, 400
 laity and, 492
 martyrdom/persecution and, 552
 Nichiren and, 637
 ritual and, 740
 Shinran and, 793
 status and, 820
 Hong Xiuquan, 85, 266, 373–374, 699
 Hongren, 374, 379
 Honi ha-Me'aggel, 221, 588
 Hoover, Willis Collin, 374–375, 697, 705, 820
 Hopkins, Gerard Manley, 14, 375
 Horace, 83
 Hormisdas, 696
 Hoshang Mahayana, 930
How to Be Born Again (Graham), 319
 How, William, 702
 Howe, Julia Ward, 142
 Howells, William Dean, 142
 Hozo, 373
 Hroswitha of Gandersheim, 852
 Huaca, 376
 Huaiji, 939
 Huang Tingjian, 941
 Huangbo Xiyun, 87, 376, 510
 Huangdi, 195, 196, 376–377, 758, 782
Huangdi neijing (Huangdi), 377
Huangliang meng, 251
 Huang-lo-chün, 316
 Huang-po Hsi-yun. See Huangbo Xiyun
 Huashang Moheyan, 463
 Huatiacuri, 670
 Huayan Buddhism
 Chengguan, 173–174, 943
 Chinul, 177
 Dushun, 244, 316, 729, 939
 Fazang, 275, 876, 939
 Zhiyan, 244, 275, 876, 939
 Zongmi, 174, 244, 943
Huayan Jing. See Flower Garland (Avatamsaka) Sutra
 Huayen Sutra, 876
 Hubert, 127, 377–378, 496
 Huddleston, Trevor, 871
 Hugelburc, 906
 Hugel, F. H. von, 810
 Hugh of Grenoble, 143
 Hugh of Lincoln, 58, 378
 Hugh of Saint Victor, 378–379, 445
 Huichol people, 262
 Huiguo, 486
 Huike, 131
 Hui-k'o, 72, 552
 Huineng, 374, 379, 739, 792
 Huisi, 940
 Hui-tsung, 749
 Huitzilopochtli, 43, 44, 379–380, 593, 849
 Huixiao, 939
 Huiyuan, 380, 492, 692
 Huizhao. See Linji
 Hujjat, 97
 Hujwiri, 'Ali ibn Uthman al-, 54, 380–381, 408, 818
 Human sacrifice, 44, 88, 232
 Humanism, 700
 Hundred Schools, 200
 Hung Hsiu-ch'üan. See Hong Xiuquan
 Hungary
 Elizabeth of Hungary, 255–256, 492, 545, 781, 822
 Emeric, 257
 Gerard of Csanád, 257, 304
 Ladislas, 491, 750
 Margaret of Hungary, 545
 Stephen of Hungary, 674, 750, 822
 Hung-jen. See Hongren
 Hunting, 20, 41–42
 Huron people, 223
 Hus, Jan, 381–382, 552, 674, 700–701 al-Husayn al-Rida, Muhammad b., 36
 Husayn b. 'Ali, 88, 382–383, 475, 888
 Husayn Bushru'i, 92, 97, 383, 710, 897
 Husayn, Sharif, 8
 Hutu people, 19
 Huxley, Aldous, 567
 Huya ania, 222–223
 Huyan Pho So, 85
Hwaeom ilseung peopkye to (Uisang), 876

- Hygenius, 695
 “Hymn to St. Cecilia” (Auden), 166 Hymns
 Amardas, 39–40
 Ambrose, 40, 364
 Arjan, 67
 Atenism, 28
 creativity and, 13, 14
 Ephrem the Syrian, 14, 261
 Hilary of Poitiers, 364
 John of Damascus, 439
 Protestant Reformation and, 901
 Ramdas, 725, 804
 Romanos the Melodist, 14, 742–743
 saints and, 702
 Sikh, 725, 804
 Track to Heaven and, 4
 Zoroaster, 13
 See also Music; Poetry
Hymns and Spiritual Songs (Southcott), 817
Hymns (Proclus), 698
Hyeongjong non (Tukt’ong Kihwa), 868
- I
I Ching. See Yijing
 Ia, 588
 Iamblichus, 193, 321, 385, 588, 705, 706, 740
 Ibar, 218
 Ibn al-‘Arabi, Muhyi al-Din, 385–386 on divinity, 406 on Idris, 388
 Jili and, 430
 Khomeini and, 475
 Kunawi and, 488–489
 on Maryam, 558
 mysticism and, 617
 Nasafi and, 628, 629
 as scholar, 774
 Shabistari and, 784
 veneration of, 410
 Ibn Battuta, 106
 Ibn Daud, Abraham, 279
 Ibn Hanbal, 406
 Ibn Hazm, 558
 Ibn Killis, 88
 Ibn Nadim, 388
 Ibn Rushd. See Averroës
 Ibn Sina, 388
 Ibn Tumart, 732
 Ibn Ubayy, 609
 Ibn Wahshiyah, 388
 Ibn Zubayr, 37
 Ibrahim (Abraham), 6
 Ibrahim ibn Adham. See Adham, Ibrahim ibn
 Iburi Izō, 624
 Iceland
 Arason, Guthmundr, 333–334
 Thórhallsson, Thorlákr, 856–857
 Icha’adon, 221
 Ichijian. See Kikusha-ni
 Iconoclast Controversy, 181, 389, 439, 701, 851
- Iconography
 Aaron, 1
 Adalbert of Prague, 9–10
 Afra of Augsburg, 16
 Agatha, 23
 Akhenaten, 28
 Akshobhya Buddha, 30
 Amitabha Buddha, 46
 Anne, 54
 Antony of the Desert, 60
 Apollonia, 62
 apostles, 64
 Asklepios, 74
 attributes of holy people and, 80
 Augustine of Hippo, 82
 Barbara, 106, 789
 Basil the Great, 109
 Benedict of Nursia, 115
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 118
 Bernardino of Siena, 120
 Bixia Yuanjun, 128–129
 Britto, 141
 canonization and, 159
 Catarina de San Juan, 161
 Catherine of Alexandria, 161
 Christopher, 184
 Clare of Assisi, 186
 Clotilde, 189
 Cosmas and Damian, 206
 Demetrius, 225
 Denis of Paris, 227
 Dioskouroi, 235
 Eligius, 126, 252
 Elizabeth of Hungary, 255
 Emmeram of Regensburg, 257
 Eustace, 265
 Expeditus, 265
 Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar, 271
 Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, 775
 Fourteen Holy Helpers, 280, 311
 Gall, 290
 Gautama Buddha, 147
 Gertrude of Nivelles, 307
 Giles, 310, 311
 Giuliani, 311
 Guandi, 328
 Gyogi Bosatsu, 335
 Helena, 355
 Herakles, 356, 357
 Hubert, 377
 Huitzilopochtli, 380
 Jerome, 425
 Jesus of Nazareth, 426
 Joan of Arc, 433
 John Climacus, 438
 John the Evangelist, 443
 Khedrup Jey, 474
 Ksitigarbha, 486
 Lambert of Liège, 496
 Lawrence of Rome, 501
 Lü Dongbin, 516
- Lucy, 516
 magi, 526
 Mahavira, 529
 Margaret of Hungary, 545
 Martin of Tours, 550
 Nanak, 805
 Nicholas, 638
 Onuphrios, 657
 Patrick of Ireland, 673
 Paul, 677
 Peter, 684
 pharaohs of Egypt, 686
 Ptolemaic ruler cult, 703
 Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin, 711
 rishis, 738
 Roch, 741
 Rumi, 751
 Rupert of Salzburg, 753
 Sadashiva Brahmendra, 756
 Samantabhadra, 762
 Shangó, 789
 Shotoku, 800
 sibyls, 802
 Simeon of Trier, 808
 Sophia, 815
 Stephen, 821
 Stephen of Hungary, 822
 Takla Haymanot, 837
 Tara, 840–841
 Teresa of Avila, 847
 Tezcatlipoca, 849
 Thérèse of Lisieux, 853
 Tianhou, 857
 tirthankaras, 419
 Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa, 867
 Ursula, 878, 879
 Vairocana, 882
 Vemana, 886
 Veronica, 890, 891
 Vincent de Paul, 895
 Vincent of Saragossa, 501
 Virgin Mary, 555
 Vladimir, 900
 Ida of Herzfeld, 221, 386–387
 Idahosa, Benson, 387–388
 Idahosa, Margret, 388
The Idea of a University (Newman), 636
 Idris, 388–389, 758
 Idris, Ahmad ibn, 842
 Ifá Moroté. See Mora, Francisco
 Ifá priesthood, 10, 600
 Ignatius of Antioch, 338, 389, 393, 553, 683, 693, 698
 Ignatius of Constantinople, 389
 Ignatius of Loyola, 165, 390–391
 Antony of the Desert and, 60
 awakening/conversion, 86
 Canisius and, 158
 Hopkins and, 375
 imitation of Christ and, 394
 laity and, 492

- mission and, 592
 reform and, 732
 suffering and, 825–826
- Ihya'Ulum al-Din* (Ghazali), 308, 764
- Ikkyū, 14, 391, 397, 731, 782
- Iliad* (Homer), 156, 651. See also Homer
- Iliupersis* (Arctinus), 27
- Illapa, 376
- Illness. See Healing
- Ilm al-kitab* (Dard), 217
- Iloibonok, 391–392
- Imagery. See Iconography
- Imakita Kōsen, 785
- Imams*. See Shi'i imams
- Imhotep, 686
- Imitation of Christ, 393–394, 809
- Imitation of Christ* (Thomas à Kempis), 394
- Immigrants, 153, 519–520
- Immortality, 66, 215, 216–217, 221, 296, 938
- Imre. See Emeric
- In His Steps* (Sheldon), 394
- Inca people, 394–395
amautas, 40
huaca, 376
 Manco Capac, 536–537
 mummy bundles, 614–615
 Ollantay, 656
quipocamayos, 43, 711–712
 rulers as holy people, 394–395, 691–692, 749, 860–861
- Incarnation. See Gods on earth
- Incendium Amoris* (Rolle), 742
- Independent Church of the Philippines, 702
- India in Transition: A Study in Political Evolution* (Aga Khan III), 22
- Indian religions
 Antony of Uvari, 61
 Bauls, 110, 370, 396, 782
 Britto, 141–142
 Christian ashram movement, 327–328
 gurus, 332
 Meher Baba, 316, 573–574
 Muslim community in, 20–22, 37
 Radhasoami tradition, 812–813
 sexuality, 781–782
 sufism, 178
 tolerance, 863–864
 “village religion,” 51
See also Buddhism; Hinduism; Jainism
- Indian Shaker movement, 222
- Indigenous religions
 Antony of Uvari and, 61
 China, 51–52, 65
 drug use, 262–263
 Japan, 71, 258, 699
 Polynesia, 535–536
See also African traditional religions;
 Amerindian religions
- Indigetes, 395
- Indonesia, 197
- Indra. See Shakra
- Indulgences, 700–701
- Inheritance. See Hereditary holiness
- Innocent I, 696
- Innocent III, 372
- Innocent V, 696
- Innocent XI, 696
- Innocent of Alaska, 396, 397, 593
- Ino, 363
- Inquisition, 161, 912
- Al-Insan al-kamil* (Jili), 430
- Insanity, 396–397, 884
- Institute of English Ladies, 912
- Institute of the Brothers of Christian Schools, 436
- The Institutes* (John Cassian), 436–437
- Institutes of the Christian Religion* (Calvin), 157
- Intelligence, 80
- Intercession. See Intermediary role
- Interior Castle* (Teresa of Avila), 846
- Intermediary role, 398–400
 African traditional religions, 16, 399, 400
 All Saints' Day and, 38
 ancestors and, 51, 52
 Cyprian of Carthage on, 210
 Deer Dancers, 22–23
 El Dorado, 239–240
 Hasidism, 91, 399
 Maroon Nanny, 548
 saints and, 180, 183
- International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON), 122, 170, 204
- Inti, 376
- Inti Raymi, 394–395
- Intolerance, 863–864. See also Anti-Semitism
- Introduction à la vie devote* (Francis of Sales), 285
- Inuit people, 787
- The Invisible Landscape* (McKenna), 567
- Ioannites, 440
- Ipalnemoani. See Tezcatlipoca
- Iphigeneia, 363
- Ippen, 14, 400, 740
- Ippen Shonin Eden*, 400
- Iran, 20, 692. See also Babi faith; Baha'i faith;
 Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi; Shi'i Islam
- Irenaeus, 401–402, 683, 694
- Ireru wa Irugi, 402
- Irfan*, 99, 475
- Irish Christianity
 Aidan, 27, 169
 Brendan the Navigator, 72, 140, 401, 411
 Brigid of Ireland, 140–141, 218, 299, 498
 Ciarán of Clonmacnoise, 174, 185, 401
 Colum Cille, 72, 191, 401, 470, 471
 Darerca, 218
 demons/monsters, 226
 holy people as models, 594
 Íte, 71, 411–412, 498
 Kevin of Glendalough, 8, 185, 231, 471
 Lasair, 498
 Laurence O'Toole, 400, 499–500
- Malachy, 533–534
- miracles, 587, 588
- nature, 630, 631
- Patrick of Ireland, 70, 218, 399, 592, 672, 673
- Paul the Hermit and, 679
- Plunket, 691
- prophets, 700
- Samthann, 498, 762–763
- Twelve Apostles of Ireland, 185, 401
- Iroquois people
 Brébeuf and, 140
 Clan Mothers, 185–186
 Corn Maidens/Mothers, 205
 Deganawida, 223, 329, 500, 911
 Handsome Lake, 45, 279, 343–344, 675
 League of the Iroquois, 223, 329
- Iryon, 875
- ‘Isa b. Nasturus, 88
- ‘Isa (Jesus), 428–429
- Isaac, 5, 402–403, 451, 562
- Isaac ben Moses, 48
- Isaac of Armenia, 403, 674
- Isaac Sagi Nahor, 459
- Isaiah, on Chosen People concept, 179
- Isfizari, Muzaffar, 473
- Ishida Baigan, 403–404, 819, 842
- Ishmael, 5, 6, 451, 562. See also Isma‘il
- Ishmael ben Elisha, 29, 404–405, 553, 772–773
- Ishvarakoti*, 733
- Isidore of Seville, 405, 502
- Isidore the Farmer, 405–406
- Isis, 188
- Islam, 406–410
 Abraham and, 6
 African Americans and, 34, 190–191, 195
 African traditional religions and, 18
 asceticism and, 2, 70, 71, 95, 109–110, 430, 591
 attributes of holy people, 78–79
 authority of holy people, 85
 awakening/conversion, 86
bhakti Hinduism and, 121
 child prodigies, 174
 compassion, 193, 194
 creativity, 14
 death, 221, 222
 devotion, 229
 Elijah and, 254
 eremitism and, 359
 extremists, 266
 founder of, 278, 607–610
 gender, 297–298, 299
 gods on earth, 314
 guidance, 329
hadith, 110, 338, 367, 774
 hagiography, 338, 339
 hereditary holiness, 8–9, 350, 357–358, 408
 holy people as models, 595
 imams, 392–393
 insanity and, 398
 intermediary role, 398–399

- Islam (continued)
 intolerance, 864
 lawgivers, 500
 legendary holy people, 504
marabouts, 542–543
 martyrs of Cordoba and, 204–205, 553
 Maryam, 555, 558–559
 meditation, 569
 messiah beliefs, 582–583
 miracles, 587
 mission and, 591
 monasticism and, 597
 morality, 601
 Moses and, 603, 604
 mysticism, 617, 618
 nature, 630, 631
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 675
 politics and, 691, 692
 prophets, 699, 700
 purity/pollution, 704
 recognition, 729, 730
 reform, 123–124, 509–510, 731, 732, 733, 790–791
 rulers as holy people, 749
 sages, 758
 scholars as holy people, 772, 774
 sexuality and, 780, 781
 Sikhism and, 803
 spiritual guardians, 817, 818
 teachers as holy people, 842
 veneration of holy people, 409–410, 887, 888, 889
 violence/nonviolence, 896–897
 warfare, 910, 911
 wealth/poverty, 913
See also Muslim holy people; Sufism
- Isma‘il, 6, 411
- Isma‘ili Muslims, 393
 Aga Khan I (Hassan ‘Ali), 20–21
 Aga Khan II (‘Ali Shah), 21, 37
 Aga Khan III (Sultan Muhammad Shah), 21–22, 37
 Aga Khan IV (Karim al-Husaini), 22–23
 ‘Aziz-billah, 88–89
 Baqir, 104–105
 Hasan II, 348–349
 Hasan III, 349
 Hasan-i Sabbah, 349, 351
 hereditary holiness, 357
 Jalal al-Din Hasan III, 348–349, 420–421, 749
 Mahdi, ‘Abd Allah al-, 530–531
 Mansur, al-, 541
 Muhammad b. Isma‘il b. Ja‘far, 612
 Mu‘izz, 612–613
 Mustansir, 351, 616
 Qasim, 709
 rulers as holy people, 692
 Taqi Muhammad, 839–840
al-Istibsar (at-Tusi), 870
- Isvarasena, 232
 Íte, 71, 411–412, 498
 Ithna-Ash‘ari Shi‘a Muslims, 104–105
 Itō Jinsai, 938
 I-tsing, 233
 Ivory Coast, 348
 Iztlíxochitl, Fernando Alva, 45
- J
- Jabir ibn Hayyan, 388
 Jacob, 413–414, 562
 Jacob ben Meir Tam. See Rabbenu Tam
 Jacob Isaac, 352
 Jacob Joseph of Polonoeye, 91, 352
 Jacob of Nisibis, 261
 Jacobis, Giustino de, 296–297, 414–415
Jadhba (gazb), 2
 Jadwiga, 414–415
 Jaeger, Stephen, 664
 Ja‘far as-Sadiq, 415, 500
 Jagadbandhu Sundar, Prabhu, 79, 359, 415–416, 734
- Jain holy people
 Banarsidas, 87, 104, 229, 492, 720
 Bhikshu, 123, 732
 Haribhadra, 346, 863
 Hemacandra, 220, 355–356
 Hiravijayasuri, 371, 729
 Kanji Swami, 104, 464–465
 Malli, 419, 535, 782
 Nemi, 193, 419, 633–634
 Parshva, 419, 420, 529, 530, 569, 670
 Rajcandra, 104, 465, 720
 Rishabha, 418, 420, 529, 737–738, 758
 Tulsi, 203, 868–869
See also Mahavira
- Jainism, 416–420
 anti-intellectualism, 773
 asceticism, 70, 71, 417
 attributes of holy people, 79
 awakening/conversion, 87
 compassion, 193
 death, 220
 devotion, 229 discipleship, 235
 founders of, 278
 Gandhi and, 291
 gods on earth, 316
 guidance, 329
 intolerance, 863
 legendary holy people, 504
 meditation, 569, 868
 monasticism, 597
 nature, 630–631
 recognition, 729
 reincarnation, 733
 rulers as holy people, 748
sadhus, 70, 368, 756–757, 841–842
 sages, 758
 sexuality and, 782
 status and, 819–820
- teachers as holy people, 842
 veneration of holy people, 887, 889
 violence/nonviolence, 123, 416–417, 896
 warfare, 910, 911
 wealth/poverty, 913
- Jalal al-Din Hasan III, 348–349, 420–421, 749
 Jalaram, 194, 421
 Jamaica, 339–340, 398, 546–548, 582
 Jamal, Bibi, 178
 James, brother of Jesus, 357, 421–422
 James I (King of England), 114
 James of Vitry, 546
 James the Greater, 422, 911
 Jamgon Kongtrul, 422–423, 774
 Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo, 423, 585
 Jan of Leyden, 265, 266, 423–424, 732
Janam sakhis, 804
 Janissaries, 113
- Japan
 ancestors, 52
 asceticism, 71
 creativity, 14
 Nagasaki martyrs, 222, 620–621
 Nakayama Miki, 299, 316, 623–624, 699
 prophets, 699
 Shugendō, 258
 Tenrikyō, 299, 316, 623–624, 699
 Tenshō Kōtai Jingu Kyō, 481
See also Buddhism; Confucianism; Shinto
- Jason, 322, 362
Jatakas, 785
 Java, 907–908
Al-Jawahir (Dasuqi), 219
Al-Jawhara (Dasuqi), 219
 Jayasimha (Chalukya monarch), 355
 Jean of Joinville, 515
 Jeanne de Chantal, 165, 285
 Jen Ngawa, 242
 Jeremiah, on Chosen People concept, 179
 Jerome, 424–425
 asceticism and, 72, 424
 Fabiola and, 269
 Hilary of Poitiers and, 364
 nature and, 631
 on Paul the Hermit, 679
 Paula and, 425, 679
 as scholar, 774
 Jerome Lanza, 116
 Jerome of Prague, 382
 Jesal. See Toral and Jesal
- Jesuits
 Bellarmine, 114
 Bobola, 130–131
 Brébeuf, 139–140, 554
 Britto, 141–142
 Canisius, 114, 158
 Hopkins, 375
 mission and, 592
 Xavier, 164, 592, 925
See also Ignatius of Loyola
- Jesus (‘Isa), 428–429

- Jesus of Nazareth, 425–428
 apostles and, 63
 apotheosis and, 65
 attributes of, 79
 as child prodigy, 174, 175
 death and, 221
 demons/monsters and, 226
 as god on earth, 314, 316
 hagiography, 338
 Herakles and, 357
 hereditary holiness and, 357
 holy innocents and, 371–372
 John the Baptist and, 427, 428, 442
 Joseph and, 445–446
 Joseph of Arimathea and, 446, 639
 King and, 479
 Lazarus and, 501
 Longinus and, 513 magi and, 526
 Martha and, 549, 554, 557
 martyrdom of, 181
 martyrdom/persecution and, 552
 messiah beliefs and, 582
 Moses and, 603
 Nicodemus and, 639
 Peter and, 683
 purity/pollution and, 705
 as religious founder, 278
 retreat vs. secular activity and, 182 status of, 820
See also Jesus ('Isa)
- Jewish holy people
 Aaron, 1–2, 589–590, 603, 604, 697
 Abraham, 5–6, 179, 411, 451, 603
 Abraham ibn Ezra, 7, 605, 773
 Amnon of Mainz, 48, 453, 504–505
 Anan ben David, 49, 732, 773
 Ba'al Shem Tov, 91–92, 229, 352, 448, 453, 732, 889
 Beruria, 120–121, 300
 Dolce of Worms, 237, 298
 Dov Baer of Mezhirech, 236, 240, 338, 352
 four captives, 279–280
 Halevi, 14, 179, 342
 Hanina ben Dosa, 344, 587
 Hannah and her seven sons, 344–345, 844
 Hillel, 279, 340, 366
 Isaac, 5, 402–403, 451, 562
 Ishmael ben Elisha, 29, 404–405, 553, 772–773
 Jacob, 413, 562
 Judah ha-Nasi, 449–450, 697
 Judah the Pious, 352, 450, 704
 Karo, 459, 466, 467, 500
 Luria, 255, 459, 466, 517–518, 569, 618, 734
 Maccabees, 523, 551, 672
 Meir of Rothenburg, 575–576, 773
 Miriam, 1–2, 299, 589–590, 700
 Moses ben Maimon, 340–341, 453, 500, 604–605, 727, 773
 Moses ben Nahman, 453, 459, 605, 618
 Nahman of Bratslav, 14, 352, 399, 582, 618, 621–622, 817
 Rabbenu Tam, 715
 Rashi, 450, 453, 605, 715, 726–727, 773
 Reuveni, 582
 Serah bat Asher, 80, 504, 776
 Shabbetai Zevi, 582, 734, 783
 Simeon ben Yohai, 8, 254–255, 807
 Ten Martyrs, 344
 Verbermacher, 299, 889–890
See also Akiba ben Joseph; Elijah; Judaism; Moses
- Jezebel, 252
 Jianzhen, 429
Jihad, 911
Jikei zusetsu (Nakae Tōju), 622–623
 Jilani, 'Abdul al-Qadir, 219, 429–430
 Badawi and, 95
 Dard and, 217
 nature and, 632
 retreat vs. secular activity and, 8
 Suhrawardi and, 827
 veneration of, 410
- Jili, Abd al-Karim al-, 430
 Jinshu. See Shenxiu
Jinsilu (Zhu Xi), 198
Jiude song (Liu Ling), 780
 Jiv Goswami, 586
 Jiva Gosvamin, 231, 430–431
Jivanmukta, 87
Jivanmukti-viveka (Vidyaranya), 893
 Jizang, 431, 729
 Jizo. See Ksitigarbha
 Jizzini, Muhammad al-, 432
 Jnaneshvara, 357, 432–433, 624
 Joan of Arc, 162, 433–434, 674, 911
 Jocelyn, 470, 471
 Jodo. See Pure Land Buddhism
 Johane Masowe, 18, 434, 559
 Johanan ben Zakkai, 80, 772
 Johannes Trithemius, 113
 John on Andrew, 53
 on James the Greater, 422
 on Jesus of Nazareth, 427
 on John the Baptist, 443
 on John the Evangelist, 443
 on Joseph of Arimathea, 446 on Martha, 549
 on Martha and Mary, 554
 on Mary Magdalene, 557
 on Nicodemus, 639 on Thomas, 854
 on Virgin Mary, 555
 John Baptist de la Salle, 436
 "John Brown's Body," 142
 John Cassian, 74, 192, 436–437
 John Chrysostom, 437–438, 662
 All Saints' Day and, 38
 anti-Semitism and, 58
 attributes of, 80
 Babylas of Nicomedia and, 95
 as preacher, 842
 John Climacus, 438, 776
 John Damascene. See John of Damascus
 John Gualbert, 438–439, 732
 John I, 696
 John II, 11
 John XXIII, 203, 434–436, 696, 732–733
 John of Damascus, 439
 John of Forde, 923
 John of Gorze, 439–440
 John of Granada, 165
 John of Hildesheim, 526
 John of Kronstadt, 440, 582
 John of the Cross, 14, 86, 165, 328, 440–441, 580
 John of the Wilderness. See Johane Masowe
 John Paul II, 182
 John the Almsgiver, 441–442, 913
 John the Baptist, 442–443
 Andrew and, 53
 attributes of, 80
 as child prodigy, 174
 Elijah and, 254
 Jesus of Nazareth and, 427, 428, 442
 Muslim views, 429
 purity/pollution and, 704
 repentance and, 735
 John the Evangelist, 443
 John the Monk, 106
 Johnny Appleseed. See Chapman, Jonathon
 Johnson, James, 443–444, 675
 Johnson, Samuel, 444
 Jón Ögmundarson, 334
 Jonah, 699
 Jonas, Justus, 518
 Jonas of Bobbio, 192
 Jones, Charles Price, 561
 Jones, David E., 765
 Jones, Jim, 204, 265, 444–445, 596
 Jordan of Limoges, 507
 José de Calansanz, 165
 Joseph (foster-father of Jesus), 413, 445–446
 Joseph of Arimathea, 446, 505, 639
 Joseph of Copertino, 165, 231, 398, 446–447, 569, 818
 Joseph of Volotsk, 447–448, 641, 732, 863
 Joseph (son of Jacob), 413, 451
 Josephat, 106–107
 Josephus, 422, 425, 442, 889
 Joshua, 474
 Joshua ben Sira, 340
 Joy, 448
 Juan Diego, 45, 448–449, 672
 Judah ben Bava, 844
 Judah Halevi. See Halevi, Judah
 Judah ha-Nasi, 449–450, 697
 Judah Loew ben Bezalel, 450
 Judah the Pious, 352, 450–451, 704
 Judaism, 451–455
 African traditional religions and, 18, 19
 ancestors, 52

Judaism (continued)

asceticism and, 70, 71, 254
 attributes of holy people, 80
 authority of holy people, 84
 child prodigies, 174, 175
 Chosen People concept, 179–180
 Cohens and Levites, 189–190, 697
 compassion, 192–193
 creativity, 14
 death, 221
 devotion, 229
 eremitism and, 359
 extremists, 265–266
 Fatimid Empire and, 88
 founder of, 278
 gender, 298, 299
 Ger Tzedeq, 303
 Gnosticism and, 401
 guidance, 329
 hagiography, 338
hakham, 340–341, 366, 758
 Hasidei Ashkenaz, 351–352, 450, 552
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 398–399
 intolerance, 863
 John the Baptist, 442–443
 judges, 455, 749
 Kabbalah, 254–255, 450, 459–460, 466
 Karaite, 49 kings, 479 lamedvavniks, 496–497, 818
 lawgivers, 500
 legendary holy people, 504
 martyrdom/persecution, 551–552
 matriarchs, 562–563
 meditation, 569
 messiah beliefs, 580, 581–582
 miracles, 587, 588
 mission and, 591
 monasticism and, 596
 morality, 601
 mysticism, 617, 618
 nature, 630
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 672, 674
 Paul and, 676, 678
 priests, 1–2, 189–190, 697
 prophets, 699
 purity/pollution, 704
rebbetzins, 728–729
 reincarnation, 734
 retreat vs. secular activity, 8
 ritual, 739
 rulers as holy people, 749
 sages, 758
 scholars as holy people, 772–773
 sexuality and, 781, 782
 Shoah and, 798
 spiritual guardians, 817, 818
tzaddiqim, 91, 340, 352–353, 595, 621–622, 873–874

veneration of holy people, 886, 887, 889
 wealth/poverty, 912
See also Anti-Semitism; Hasidism; Jewish holy people

Judges (Hebrew), 455, 749
 Julia of Carthage, 455–456
 Julian of Norwich, 72, 86, 299, 329, 456–457, 825
 Julian the Apostate (Roman emperor), 95
 Juliana of Liège, 457
 Julius Caesar (Roman emperor), 572
 Julius I, 695–696
 Julius II, 155
 Junayd, Abu al-Qasim al-, 128, 410
 Jung, Carl, 68, 830
 Jurjani, 408
 Justin, 232
 Justin Martyr, 457–458
 Jutta of Sponheim, 365

K

Ka'ba, 411
 Kabbalah, 459–460
 Judah Loew ben Bezalel, 450
 Luria, 255, 459, 466, 517–518, 569, 618, 734
 meditation and, 569
 mysticism and, 618
 Shabbetai Zevi and, 783
 Simeon ben Yohai and, 254–255, 807
 Kabir, 121, 459–460
 Amardas and, 40 on asceticism, 71
 Banarsidas and, 104
 death of, 222
 on gurus, 332
 Nabhadas on, 724
 Shivnarayan and, 797
 Sikhism and, 460, 806
 Soamiji and, 812
 status and, 820
 Virashaivism and, 898
 Vyas and, 902
 Kagubi, 633
 Kaibara Ekiken, 461, 773, 938
Kaiyuan shijiao lu (Zhisheng), 939
 Kaki, Qutbuddin Bakhtiyar, 271
 Kakuban, 795
 Kakungulu, Semei, 18, 19
 Kaleb. See Caleb
 Kalembe Mulumba (Wante) Matthias, 18, 19, 461–462
 Kali, 485, 556, 722, 723
Kalimat-i Maknunih (Baha'u'llah), 101
 Kalkin, 580
 Kalonymus ha-Hasid, Samuel, 352
 Kamalabuddhi, 171
 Kamalakanta Bhattacharya, 14, 462, 587
 Kamalashila, 85, 87, 462–463, 587, 592, 930
 Kamatha, 670
Kami, 65–66, 400, 574–575, 793. See also Shinto
 Kamikaze of World War II, 65, 463, 674

Kanakadasa, 87, 174, 463–464, 820
 Kang Hang, 287
 Kanji Swami, 104, 464–465
Kankebunshō (Sugawara no Michizane), 827
Kankekōshū (Sugawara no Michizane), 827
Kanshi, 482
 Kant, Immanuel, 718, 766
 Kaplan, Mordecai M., 180, 454
 Karaism, 49
 Karim al-Husaini. See Aga Khan IV
 Karma, 416, 417
 Karma Pakshi, 465
 Karmapa reincarnation lineage, 465–466, 734
 Karo, Joseph, 459, 466, 467, 500
Kartarpur Pothis (Arjan), 67, 804
 Kartir, 731
 Karunamayi, Sri, 466–467
Kashf al-Asrar (Baqli), 105
Kashf al-Mahjub (Hujwiri), 380
Kashkul ('Amili), 46
 Kashyapa, 738
 Kassapa, 49, 86, 235, 338, 467–468
 Kassatkin, Nicolas, 593
 Kateri Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
Kathaka Samhita, 293
 Katyayana, 235
 Kaydrub Gelek belsangbo, 335
 Kaygusuz Abdal, 14, 469, 933
 Kaysaniyya Islam, 37
 Kazantzakis, Nicholas, 501
 Kazim, Musa al-, 469–470
 Kazim Rashti, Sayyid, 92, 470, 730, 835
 Ke Hung. See Ge Hong Keats, John, 817
Kebra Nagast, 156
 Keron Buddhism, 799–800
Kelimala (Haridas), 347
 Kemmer, Moses, 139
 Kempe, Margery, 456
 Ken'o Soi, 391
 Kentigern, 79, 470–471
 Kenya
 Aoko, 61–62, 299–300, 559
 Arap Koilegen, 66–67, 675
 Birech, 125
 Masinde, 18, 203, 398, 560, 657, 897–898
 Moraa Moka Ngiti, 18, 85, 299, 600–601
 Mugeni, 606
 Mugo wa Kibiro, 402, 606–607
 Ondeto, 61, 204, 559–560, 582, 656–657
 Ragot, 398, 559, 717–718
 Sakawa, 759–760
 Waiyaki wa Hinga, 18, 19, 675, 905–906
 Kevin of Glendalough, 8, 185, 231, 471
 Khadija, 298, 398, 608, 609
 Khalsa, 805
 Khalwatiyya Hassaniyya, 841
Khanaqahs, 597
 Kharaqani, Abu al-Hasan 'Ali al-, 54, 471–472
 Kharkhi, Ma'rif al-, 470, 768
 Khattab, Abu al-, 415

- Khawaja Mir Dard, 149
Khayr al-Majalis (Qalandar), 178
 Khayyam, Omar, 14, 472–474
 Khedrup Jey, 474, 774
 Khema (Queen of Magadha), 87, 124, 300
 Khidr, 409, 474–475
Khirqqa, 71
 Khmel'nitsky, Genady, 489
 Khmer people, 749
 Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi, 203, 475–476
 Burujiirdi and, 150
 as extremist, 265, 266
 intolerance and, 864
 as lawgiver, 500
 al-Mahdi and, 531
 martyrdom/persecution, 553
 messiah beliefs and, 583
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 675
 politics and, 692
 reform and, 733
 warfare and, 911
 Khusrau, Amir, 476, 643
 Kidongoi, 174, 357, 362, 391, 476–477
 Kierkegaard, Søren, 81
Kievan Cave Patericon (Nikon), 59
 Kiga people, 19
 Kikusha-ni, 477
 Kikuyu people (Kenya), 18, 19, 402, 606–607,
 675, 905–906
 Kilian of Würzburg, 477–478
 Kimbangu, Simon, 18, 478, 552
 Kimnyole, 66
 Kimpa Vita, 674–675
 King, Franzo, 191
 King, Martin Luther, Jr., 195, 203–204, 479–480, 693, 730, 898
 Kings (Hebrew), 479
 Kingship. See Rulers as holy people
 Kingsley, Peter, 258
 Kinjikitile Ngwale, 18, 19, 480–481, 675
 Kinoshita Jun'an, 461
 Kiowa people, 185
 Kipsigis people, 66–67, 606
 Kirill. See Cyril
 Kirillov Monastery, 211–212
Kitab al-isharet wa at-tanbihat (Avicenna), 473
Kitab al-luma' fi tasawwuf (Sarraj), 769
Kitab al-Siraj (Moses ben Maimon), 604
Kitab al-tawasin (Hallaj), 343
Kitab i-Iqan (Baha'u'llah), 101
Kitab Insan-i Kamil (Nasafi), 628, 629
Kitab manazil al-sa'irin ('Abdallah al-Ansari), 55
Kitab Nur al-'ulum (Kharraqani), 472
 Kitabake Chikafusa, 674
Kitab-i-Agdas (Baha'u'llah), 96, 101
 Kitamura Sayo, 14, 66, 481
 Kitthiwultho, 864, 910
Kiuhui (Xi Kang), 780
 Kivebulaya, Apolo, 87, 481–482, 551
 Kiya Buzrugh Umid, 351
 Klaus, Brother. See Nicholas of Flüe
 Klongchen rab-'byam-pa. See Longchenpa
 Klostermaier, Klaus, 528
 KLu-yi sDe. See Nagasena
 Knox, John, 130, 674
Koans, 149, 342, 376
 Kobayashi Issa, 477
 Kōbō Daishi. See Kukai
 Kobra, Najm al-Din, 78
 Kodōjin, 482
 Kōgaku Sōen. See Shaku Sōen
Kojiki, 794
Kokushitsu, 86
 Kolbe, Maximilian, 194, 483
 Kolbeinn Tumason, 333
 Kongōcho-kyo, 486
 Kongzi. See Confucius
 Konparo Zenchiku, 391
Kore Kosmou, 388
 Korea
 Chajang, 170–171, 587, 692, 729
 Chinul, 177
 Confucianism, 196, 198
 Huineng, 739
 Tukt'ong Kihwa, 868
 Uich'on, 177, 875
 Uisang, 875–876
 warfare, 910
 Wonhyo, 492, 876, 921
 Koresh, David, 85, 204
 Kosmas, 662
 Kostka, Stanislas, 165
 K'ou Chien-chih, 731
 Koul, Pandit Andand, 494
 Kox, 42
Kozen gokoku ron (Eisai), 252
 Kratu, 738
 Krige, Eileen, 784
 Krishna, 315, 316, 362, 369, 370, 483–484, 782.
 See also Vaishnava Hinduism
 Krishnadasa Kaviraja, 431, 614
 Krishnamurti, Jiddu, 203, 484–485
 Krishnananda Agamavagisa, 485
 Ksitigarbha, 485–486, 818
 Kuan-ti. See Guandi
 Kuanyin. See Guanyin
 Kublai Khan, 85, 887
 Kubrawiyyah sufism, 78, 628, 784
 Kuhi, Baba, 337
 Kuiji, 233
 Kukai, 143, 221, 486–487, 759
 Kumarajiva, 431, 487, 773
 Kumarapala (Chalukya monarch), 355
 Kumazawa Banzan, 487–488, 692
 Kunawi, Sadr al-Din al-, 385, 488–489
 Kuncewicz, Josaphat, 489
 Kundakunda, 104, 464, 465, 720
Kundamala (Dignaga), 233
 Kunga Nyngpo, 241, 357, 489–490
 Kunga Oze, 512
 Kungo Gyalsthen. See Sakya Pandita
 Kunigunde, 490, 750, 781
 Kusunoki Masashige, 797
Kuzari (Halevi), 179
Kyounshu (Ikkyū), 391
L
 Ladislav, 491, 750
 Lahiji, Muhammad, 783
 Laity, 491–492
 Lakota Sioux people
 Black Elk, 129
 Crazy Horse, 207, 910
 creation stories, 42
 Sitting Bull, 45, 72, 699, 810–811, 922
 Wovoka and, 912–913
 Lakshmana, 229, 722
 Lal Shahbaz Qalandar, Abu 'Ali, 493
 Lalan Fakir, 110
 Lalemant, Gabriel, 139, 140
 Lalibela, 493–494, 750
Lalitavistara, 143
 Lalla, 494–495, 825
Lalla Vakyani (Lalla), 494
Lam rim chen mo (Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa), 866
Lamas, 148, 495–496, 513, 749. See also Tibetan
 Buddhist holy people
 Lambert le Bègue, 111
 Lambert of Liège, 127, 496
Lamedavniks, 496–497, 818
Lâmelif (Celebi), 167
 Lan Caihe, 216, 251
 Landeric, 563
 Landolt, H., 410
 Lanfranc, 56
 Lang Darma, 77
 Langmuir, Gavin I., 57, 378
 Lankavatara Sutra, 792
 Lantfred, 831–832
 Lao nainai. See Bixia Yuanjun
 Laodice, 322–323
 Lao-tzu. See Laozi
 Laozi, 214, 497
 as god on earth, 316
 immortality and, 215, 221
 reincarnation and, 734
 as religious founder, 278
 as sage, 758
 Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove and, 780
 Yang Wenhui and, 928
 Zhang Daoling and, 938
 Zhuangzi and, 942
Laozi (Laozi), 377
 Las Casas, Bartolomé de, 194
 Lasair, 498
Last Temptation of Christ (Kazantzakis), 501
 Laszlo. See Ladislav
Lata'if al-Isharat (Qushayri), 713
 Latif, Shah Abdul, 498–499
 Latimer, Hugh, 499
The Lattre Examynacyon (Askew), 74

- Laurence O'Toole, 400, 499–500
 Law, William, 915
 Lawgivers, 500–501
 Ansari, Murtada, 55, 500
 'Aziz-billah, 88
 Baqir, 105
 Bihbihani, 123–124, 500
 Caesarius of Arles, 155
 Ferdinand III of Castile, 276
 guidance and, 329
 Hilli, 367, 500
 Ja'far as-Sadiq, 415, 500
 Karo, 459, 466, 467, 500
 Majlisi, 500, 532–533
 Mirza Hasan Shirazi, 590
 Raymund of Peñafort, 238, 500, 728
 See also Moses; Scholars
 Lawrence of Rome, 193, 501
 Laws (Plato), 689
 Layennes, 509–510
 Lazarus, 94, 429, 501–502
 Le Caron, Joseph, 139
 Le Saux, Henry, 502
 Leadbeater, C. W., 484
 League of Nations, 22
 League of the Iroquois, 223, 329
 Leah, 562
 Leander of Seville, 405, 502–503
 Leary, Timothy, 202, 567–568
Leben Seusses (Suso), 830
 Lee, Ann, 297, 503–504, 582, 699, 781, 812
 Legati (Merici), 579
Legatus divinae pietatis (Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta), 307
Legenda Aurea (Voragine), 339 on Barlaam and Josaphat, 106 on bishop-saints, 127 on Christopher, 184
 on Denis of Paris, 168
 on John the Almsgiver, 442 on magi, 526 on Theophilus the Penitent, 852 on Ursula, 878
 Legendary holy people, 504–505
 Legio Maria
 Aoko, 61–62, 299–300, 559
 Mary/Mama, 559–560
 Ondeto, 61, 204, 559–560, 582, 656–657
 Ragot and, 559, 717, 718
Legs bshad snying po (Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa), 866
Legs parbshad po rin po che'i gter (Sakya Pandita), 760
 Lekkanyane, Ignatius, 505
 Lekhraj, Dada, 299, 505–506
 Lenana, 392
 Lenchina, Alice, 18, 222, 506–507, 863
 Leo I (the Great), 507, 696
 Leo II, 696
 Leo III, 172, 696
 Leo IV, 696
 Leo IX, 696
 Leoba. See Lioba
 Leonard, 507–508
 Leonard of Port Maurice, 508
 Léon-Portilla, Miguel, 636
 Leopold III of Austria, 508–509, 693
 Leshaga, William M., 792
 Lessing, Gotthold, 519
Letter to Amoun (Athanasius), 76
Letter to Dracontius (Athanasius), 76
Letter to the Corinthians (Clement of Rome), 188
Letters and Papers from Prison (Bonhoeffer), 134
 Levi Yizhak of Berdichev, 352
 Levitation, 231, 446–447, 569, 818
 Lewis, C. S., 327
Lexikon für Theologie unter Kirche, 719
Leyenda de los soles, 593, 710
 Li Tieguai, 216, 251
 Li T'ung-hsüan, 177
 Libasse Thiaw. See Limamou Laye
Liber divinatorum operum (Hildegard of Bingen), 366
Liber pontificalis, 807
Liber sententiarum (Stephen of Muret), 823
Liber speciale gratiae (Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta and Mechtild of Hackeborn), 307
Liber specialis gratiae (Mechthild of Magdeburg), 568
Liber Viarum Dei (Elizabeth of Schönau), 256
Liber Visionum Primus, Secundus, and Tertius (Elizabeth of Schönau), 256
Liber vitae meritorum (Hildegard of Bingen), 366
 Liberalism, 635
 Liberia, 208, 348
Il Libro della divina dottrina (Catherine of Siena), 163
Liexian zhuan, 251
Life of Antony (Athanasius), 76
Life of Charlemagne (Notker), 654
Life of Cyprian (Pontus), 210
The Life of Moses (Gregory of Nyssa), 326
The Life of Plotinus (Porphyrus), 690
Life of Saint Constantine-Cyril (Methodius), 211
Life of Saint Paul of Thebes (Jerome), 679
Life of St. Catherine (Raymond of Capua), 164
Life of St. Germanus of Auxerre, 31
Life of St. Guthlac (Felix of Croyland), 333
Life of St. John (Andrew of Strumi), 439
The Life of St. Margaret, 545
Life of Theseus (Plutarch), 854
The Life (Teresa of Avila), 846
 Liguori, Alphonsus, 509
 Limamou Laye, Seydina, 509–510, 734
 Lin Zhaoen, 287
 Lindsifarne, monastery of, 27
 Lindsay, Gordon, 387
 Lingayat tradition. See Virashaivism
 Lingfeng, 943
 Linji, 149, 376, 510–511, 820
 Linus, 695
 Lioba, 299, 511
 Literary representations of holy people
 Adham, 12
 Badawi, 95
 Barlaam and Josephat, 106–107
 Cecilia, 166
 Celestine V, 168
 desert saints, 60, 228
 Elizabeth of Hungary, 256
 Greek hero cults and, 361
 Lazarus, 94, 429, 501–502
 Savonarola, 770
 Vianney, 892
 Wilgefortis, 918
 Zaynab, 936
 See also Hymns; Poetry
 Literature by holy people. See Poetry; Scholars; Specific authors
 Liu Chuxuan, 216
 Liu Ling, 779, 780
 Liudger, 511–512
 Liudolf, 645
Lives of the Fathers, 228
Lives of the Holy Fathers of Emerita, 264 Lives of the Philosophers and Sophists (Eunapius), 385
Lives of the Saints, 265
 Livy, 235
 Llull, Ramon, 492, 512
 Lo Ching, 739
 Lobbo, Ahmad, 613
 Loehe, William, 702
Lojong, 77
 Lollardy, 557, 700
The Long Loneliness (Day), 219
 Longchenpa, 512–513
 Longevity, 80
 Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, 142
 Longhouse Religion, 343–344
 Longinus, 513
Lophophora williamsii, 262
 Lorcan Ua Tuathail. See Laurence O'Toole
 Lorenz von Mosheim, Johann, 519
 Losang Drukpa, 774
 Losang Gyatso, 8, 513–514, 682
 Lotus Sutra. See Saddharmapundrika (Lotus Sutra)
 Louis I (the Pious) (King of France), 114–115
 Louis IX (King of France), 58, 514–515, 554, 693, 750
 Louis of Toulouse, 515
 Lourdel, Simeon, 461
The Love of Jesus and the Love of Neighbor (Rahner), 719
A Love Supreme (Coltrane), 191
 Loyola, Ignatius. See Ignatius of Loyola
 Lü Dongbin, 215, 216, 251, 516, 818
 Lü Kun, 662
 Lü Tung-pin. See Lü Dongbin

- Lu Xiangshan, 287, 908–909, 941
 Lubich, Chiara, 203
 Lucius I, 695
 Lucretius, 156
 Lucumi. See Santería
 Lucy, 516–517
 Luke, 517
 on apostles, 63
 on Dismas, 236
 on James the Greater, 422
 on Jesus of Nazareth, 427
 on John the Baptist, 254, 442
 on John the Evangelist, 443
 on Joseph, 445
 on Joseph of Arimathea, 446
 on Martha and Mary, 549, 554
 on Mary Magdalene, 557
 on Virgin Mary, 555
al-Luma'ah al-Dimashqiyyah (Jizzini), 432
 Luo Qinsun, 198, 938
 Luria, Isaac ben Solomon, 255, 459, 466, 517–518, 569, 618, 734 Luther, Martin, 518–520
 asceticism and, 182
 Augustine of Hippo and, 81
 awakening/conversion and, 87
 Benno of Meissen and, 117
 Cajetan and, 155
 imitation of Christ and, 394
 intolerance and, 863
 James and, 422
 Latimer and, 499
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 reform and, 732
 ritual and, 739
 saints and, 700, 701, 702
 as scholar, 774
 sexuality and, 781
 Voets and van Esschen and, 901
 Lutheranism, 519–520, 702
 Luthuli, Albert John Mvumbi, 730
 Luwum, Janani Jakaliya, 18, 19, 204, 520–521, 552, 693
 Lwanga, Charles, 18, 19
 Lycurgus, 322, 329, 363, 500
Lyf of Joseph of Arimathia, 446
 Lyons, Martyrs of, 521
 Lysander, 524
- M
 Ma Yu, 216
Ma'arif (Baha'uddin Walad), 100
 Maasai people
 Kidongoi, 174, 357, 362, 391, 476
 Mbatiany, 19, 392, 566
 nature and, 630
Ma'aseh Book, 450
 Maccabees, 523–524, 551, 672
 MacDonald, Jeanette, 202
 Macedonia, 34, 524. See also Alexander the Great
- Machig Labdron, 298–299, 524–525, 774
 Maciel, Antonio. See Conselheiro, Antonio
 MacPherson, Fergus, 506
 Macuilxochitl, 88, 525
 Madagascar, 51
 Madalgar, Vincent, 563
 Madaltrude, 563
 Madhva, 525–526, 801
Madhyamak Alankara (Santaraksita), 585
 Madhyamaka Buddhism
 Aryadeva, 69, 864
 Buddhapalita, 145–146, 733
 Chandrakirti, 171
 founder of, 619
 Jizang, 431, 729
 Kamalashila, 462
 Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa and, 866
 See also Nagarjuna
Madhyamakavatara (Chandrakirti), 171
 Maenads, 247
Mafatih al-i'jaz fi sharh-i Gulshan-i raz (Lahiji), 783
 Magalhães, Antonio Carlos, 579
 Ma-gcig lab-sgron. See Machig Labdron
 Maggid. See Dov Baer
 Maghili, Muhammed b. 'Abd al-Karim al-, 732, 911
 Magi, 526
 Magnus (King of Sweden), 125
 Magnus of Orkney, 526–527
 Maha Rahulovada Sutra, 720
Mahabharata, 170, 368, 369, 483–484, 738, 758–759, 927, 931
 Mahadeviyakka, 71, 300, 527, 898
 Mahakassapa. See Kassapa
 Mahamoggallana. See Moggallana
 Mahaparinirvana Sutra, 49, 275, 338
 Mahaprajapati, 298
 Mahaprajna, 868
 Mahaprajnaparamitas, 374
 Maharal of Prague. See Judah Loew ben Bezalel
 Maharshi, Ramana, 8, 221, 329, 485, 502, 528
 Mahasanghika vinaya, 28, 275
 Mahasaya, Lahiri, 931
Mahasiddhas, 492, 528–529, 627, 859
 Mahavairocana Sutra, 486, 882
Mahavastu, 51, 143
 Mahavira, 418–419, 529–530
 asceticism, 71
 attributes of, 78
 awakening/conversion and, 87
 Bhikshu and, 123
 disciples of, 235
 Haribhadra and, 346
 as religious founder, 278
 status and, 819–820
 veneration of, 420, 889
 Mahayana Buddhism
 Akshobhya Buddha, 30
 buddhas, 143
 Chandrakirti, 171
 compassion, 193
 hagiography, 338
 Kumarajiva, 431, 487, 773
 laity and, 492
 miracles, 587
 miracles and, 147
 repentance, 736
 Shaku Sōen, 785–786
 Vairocana and, 881–882
 See also Bodhisattvas; Madhyamaka Buddhism
Mahayanasamgraha, 939
 Mahbub-i-ilahi. See Nizamuddin Auliyya, Khwaja
 Mahdi, 'Abd Allah al-, 530–531
 Mahdi, Muhammad al-, 531–532, 582–583, 692
Mahdis, 85, 92, 96, 509–510, 611–612
 Mahé, Jean-Pierre, 358
 Mahinda, 592
 Mai Chaza, 222, 532
 Maimonides. See Moses ben Maimon
 Maitreya, 69, 581
 Maitreya Buddha, 69
 Maitreyi, 300
 Maji-Maji movement, 480–481
Majjhima Nikaya, 790, 877, 881
 Majlisi, Muhammad Baqir al-, 500, 532–533
 Makandal, François, 65, 533, 675
 Makhluḥ, Muhammad Hasanayn, 790
 Malachy, 533–534
 Malakebu, Daniel, 176
 Malakebu, Flora, 176
 Malawi, 175–176, 179, 505, 567, 630
 Malcolm X, 142, 534, 610
 Malcolom III (King of Scotland), 545
 Malik Sy, Al-Hajj, 534–535, 911
 Malli, 419, 535, 782
 Mami Wata, 18
 Mana, 535–536
 Manco Capac, 536–537
Mandalas, 486
 Mandate of heaven, 537–538
 Mandela, Nelson Rolihlahla, 204, 538–539, 693, 730, 872
 Mani, 539, 573
 authority of, 84–85
 creativity of, 13
 death and, 222
 as god on earth, 316
 as prophet, 699
 reform and, 731
 reincarnation and, 734
 as religious founder, 279
 suffering and, 825
 Manicheanism, 81, 539, 573. See also Mani
 Manikavacakar, 13–14, 80
 Manjushri, 28, 170, 539–540, 762, 866
 Manjushrivikridita Sutra, 540
 Mankiller, Wilma, 194, 540–541, 730
 Mansur, al-, 541–542
 Mansur, Muhammad b., 765

- Mantiq al-tayr* ('Attar), 78
 Manu, 758–759
 Manuchihr Khan, 92
 Mao Ziyuan, 380
Maqamat al-qulub (Nuri), 646
 Mara, 226, 542
 Marabhuti, 670. See also Parshva
 Marabotto, Don Cattaneo, 162
Marabouts, 542–543
 Maraghi, Muhammad ibn Hamid al-, 790
 Marcellina, 40
 Marcellinus, 695
 Marcellus, 545
 Marcellus (Pope), 695
 Marcion, 543, 694
 Mardana, Bhai, 806
 Marechal, Joseph, 718
 Margaret of Antioch, 280, 338, 543–544
 Margaret of Cortona, 165, 544–545
 Margaret of Hungary, 545
 Margaret of Scotland, 454
 Marguerite Porete, 112
 Maria de Agreda, 161
 Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi, 165
 Marichi, 529
 Marici, 738
 Marie d'Oignies, 231, 545–546
 Marina. See Margaret of Antioch
 Marinus, 698, 744–745
 Marius, 572
Marja' al-taqlid, 55
 Mark, 546
 on apostles, 63
 on James the Greater, 422
 on Jesus of Nazareth, 427, 428
 on John the Baptist, 254, 442
 on John the Evangelist, 443
 on Joseph of Arimathea, 446
 on Mary Magdalene, 557
 on Peter, 684
 on Virgin Mary, 555
 Mark, 695
Markavah mysticism, 71
 Marley, Bob, 340, 546–547
 Maroon Nanny, 547–548
 Marpa, 465, 492, 548, 584, 736
 Martha, 549, 554, 557
 Martial of Limoges, 549
 Martin de Porres, 194, 549–550, 747, 820
 Martin I, 39, 696
 Martin of Tours, 550–551
 Antony of the Desert and, 60
 Hilary of Poitiers and, 364, 550
 Paulinus of Nola and, 680
 retreat vs. secular activity and, 8, 182, 360
 warfare and, 911
 Martyrdom/persecution, 180, 551–554
 Akiba ben Joseph, 29, 844
 Amnon of Mainz, 48
 Arjan, 67, 804–805, 889
 attributes of holy people and, 79
 Babi faith, 92–93, 97, 100, 383, 552,
 709–710, 835
 Babylas of Nicomedia, 94–95
 Baha'i faith, 551, 893
 Bakhita, 103
 Beguines, 112
 Behem, 112–113, 266
 Calvin and, 157–158
 death and, 220, 222
 desert saints and, 227 founders of religions and, 278
 Fox, 281
 Hallaj, 343
 Hannah and her seven sons, 344–345, 844
 Honen, 373, 552
 Husayn b.'Ali, 382–383
 Jizzini, 432
 John the Baptist, 427, 428, 442
 Kimbangu, 478, 552
 Legio Maria, 560
 Limamou Laye, 510
 Maccabees, 523, 551, 672
 Meir of Rothenburg and, 575–576
 messiah beliefs and, 582
 mission and, 592–593
 monasticism and, 108
 mysticism, 617–618
 peregrinatio and, 192
 politics and, 553, 691, 692, 693
 Polycarp and, 694
 Qushayri, 713
 Ransom-Kehler, 554, 725–726
 Romanov family, 58, 743, 749
 Shabbetai Zevi, 783
 Shakers, 503
 Shoah and, 551, 798
 Sikhism, 67, 551, 552, 553, 804–805, 806, 843
 Socrates, 813
 Ten Martyrs, 344
 Vieira, 893
 Virashaivism, 107
 See also Christian martyrs; Roman persecutions of Christians
Martyrium of Aretha, 156
 Martyrology of St. Jerome, 15–16
Martyrs' Mirror (Braght), 702
 Marwa, Muhammadu, 889
 Marx, Karl, Agnivesh and, 25
 Mary I (Queen of England), 207, 499
 Mary Magdalene, 63, 297, 554, 557, 736
 Mary of Egypt, 558, 736
 Mary, sister of Martha, 549, 554–555, 557
 Mary, Virgin, 297–298, 555–557
 Anne and, 53–54
 death of, 222
 Dominic and, 238
 gender and, 298, 299
 hereditary holiness and, 357
 Islam and, 555, 558–559
 Joseph of Arimathea and, 446
 miracles and, 588
 purity/pollution and, 704
 veneration of, 555–556, 888
 Maryam (Mary), 558–559
 Mary/Mama, 559–560
 Masaoka Shiki, 482
 Masemola, Manche, 175
 Mashtots, Mesrop, 403
 Masinde, Elijah, 18, 203, 398, 560, 657, 897–898
Masnavi-i Ma'ana (Rumi), 751, 752
 Mason, Charles Harrison, 560–561
 Masowe. See Johane Masowe
 Mas'udi, 388
 Mathesius, Johannes, 519
Mathnavi-i Ma'navi (Celebi), 167
Mathvani (Kharraqani), 472
 Matilda, 11, 561–562
 Matrceta, 233
 Matriarchs, Hebrew, 5, 6, 451, 562, 562–563
 Ma-tsu. See Mazu
 Matsyendranath, 630
 Matthew
 on apostles, 63
 on James, brother of Jesus, 421
 on Jesus of Nazareth, 427, 428
 on John the Baptist, 254, 442
 on John the Evangelist, 443
 on Joseph, 445
 on Joseph of Arimathea, 446
 on Mary Magdalene, 557
 on mission, 591
 on Virgin Mary, 555
 Maturus, 521
 Maubeuge cycle saints, 357, 563
 Maudgalyayana. See Moggallana
 Maurice, 563–564, 849, 911
 Mauritius. See Maurice
 Mawlawiyyah sufism, 14, 100, 167, 309
Mawliids, 2
 Maxentius of Rome, 161
 Maximilla, 299, 598
 Maximus Confessor, 552, 564–565, 658
 Maya people, 262, 593
 Mayer, Rupert, 565, 693
 Maymun al-Qaddah, 'Abdallah b., 612
 Maymun ibn Najib, 473
 Mays, Benjamin, 195
 Mazu, 87, 149, 376, 565–566
 Mbatiany, 19, 392, 566
 Mbona, 505, 567, 630
 McGovern, William, 520
 McKenna, Terence, 202, 567–568
Mean (Confucius), 198
 Mechthild of Magdeburg, 111–112
 Mechtild of Hackeborn, 568, 617
 Mediators. See Intermediary role
 Meditation, 568–569
 awakening/conversion and, 87
 Bodhidharma, 131, 569
 Chinul, 177
 contemporary holy people and, 203

- Dogen, 237
 Hongren, 374
 Merton, 580
 Sayadaw and, 771–772
 Tulsi and, 868–869
 Mediterranean religions of antiquity. See
 Ancient Mediterranean religions
 Mediums. See Divination
 Meher Baba, 316, 573–574
 Meiji Tennō, 65, 574–575, 644, 674
Mein Kampf (Hitler), 798
 Meinrad, 575
 Meir of Rothenburg, 575–576, 773
 Melampus, 321, 576
 Melanchthon, Philipp, 519
 Melanesia, 675, 700
 Melania the Younger, 576–577, 913
 Melchizedek, 695
 Melchizedek, 6
The Memoirs of the Aga Khan: World Enough and Time (Aga Khan III), 22
 Menas, 577–578
 Mencius. See Mengzi
Mencius (Confucius), 198, 199
 Mendelssohn, Moses, 180
 Menezes, Armand, 527
 Mengzi, 196, 578, 692, 758, 942
 Meninha de Gantois, Mãe, 578–579
 Mental illness. See Insanity
 Menzi, 200
 Merici, Angela, 194, 492, 579–580
 Merovingian dynasty, 68, 227, 305
 Merton, Thomas, 203, 569, 580–581, 830
 Mesopotamia, 570, 626–627, 758
 Messiah beliefs, 427, 580–583
 Metalworking, 14, 19
Metaphrasis on Ecclesiastes (Gregory the Thaumaturge), 327
 Metaphrastes, 852
 Methodism, 374–375, 616, 702, 914–916
 Methodius. See Cyril and Methodius
 Mexica people. See Aztec (Mexica) people
 Micah, 699
 Michelangelo, 802
 Michels, Georg, 86
 Middle Way philosophy. See Madhyamaka
 Buddhism
 Midewiwin Brotherhood, 583–584, 630
 Mihr 'Ali Shah, 643
 Mikael, Gebre. See Gebre Mikael
Mikagura-uta (Nakayama Miki), 624
 Miki, Paul, 620
 Milarepa, 584
 awakening/conversion and, 87
 creativity of, 14
 eremitism, 359, 360, 584
 joy and, 448
 Karma reincarnation lineage and, 465
 Marpa and, 548, 584, 736
 repentance and, 736
 Milerepa, 290
 Milindapanha, 720
Milindapañha (Nagasena), 621
 Millenarianism/eschatology authority of holy people and, 85
 Babi faith, 92
 Baha'i faith, 96
 Conselheiro, 201
 Elijah and, 254
 extremists and, 266
 Hong Xiuquan, 85, 266, 373–374, 699
 Jesus of Nazareth and, 427
 Mahdi, al-, 531, 582–583, 692
 Mark and, 546
 messiah beliefs and, 582
 Miller, 584–585, 916
 Nongqawuse, 644
 Southcott, 582, 817
 Zoroaster and, 945
 Miller, William, 584–585, 916
 Minanath, 630
 Miniatus of Florence, 168, 169
 Mipham Rinpoche, 585–586
 Mir Khurd, 178
 Mirabai, 122, 298, 586, 782
 Miracles, 586–588
 Alacoque, 31
 Anastasius the Persian, 50
 Anne, 54
 Antony of Padua, 59
 Apollonius of Tyana, 63
 asceticism and, 70
 authority of holy people and, 85
 Babalola, 94
 Badawi, 95
 Behem, 112, 113
 Benno of Meissen, 117
 Bistami, 128
 Brigid of Ireland, 140
 Buddhism, 147, 587, 588
 Catarina de San Juan, 161, 588
 child prodigies and, 174
 Clare of Assisi, 186
 Daniel the Stylite, 213
 Eugenius of Carthage, 263–264
 Faith, 270
 Felix of Nola, 275–276
 Fotucheng, 277, 588
 Geneviève, 301
 George, 302
 Germanus of Paris, 305
 Gregory the Thaumaturge, 327
 Gutí, 334
 Hanina ben Dosa, 344, 587
 Hernández, 360–361
 intermediary role and, 183
 John of Kronstadt, 440
 Joseph of Copertino, 446–447
 Kazim, 469–470
 Lioba, 511
 Martial of Limoges, 549
 Martin of Tours, 550
 Moggallana, 595
 Ondeto, 656
 Pio of Pietrelcina, 687
 recognition and, 730
 Remigius of Rheims, 734
 Miram, 588–589
 Mirambo, 18, 19
 Miriam, 1–2, 299, 589–590, 700
Le Mirouer de Simples Ames (Marguerite Porete), 112
 Mirra Alfassa, 84
 Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, 583
 Mirza Hasan Shirazi, 500, 590
 Mirza Yahya, 101
Mishkat al-Anwar (Ghazali), 308
 Mishnah, 399, 449
Mishneh Torah (Moses ben Maimon), 604
 Misri, Dhu'n-nun al-, 388, 590–591, 597, 617, 632
 Misri, Niyazi, 933
 Mission, 591–593. See also Missionaries Missionaries
 Adalbert of Prague, 9–10, 86–87, 175, 592, 888
 Aidan, 27, 169
 Amandus of Maastricht, 39
 Amerindian religions and, 45, 129, 591
 asceticism and, 72
 Augustine of Canterbury, 80, 592
 Birech, 125
 Blyden on, 130
 Boniface, 134–135, 511, 553, 592, 692, 906, 919
 Brébeuf, 139–140, 554
 Britto, 141–142
 Catholic Reformation saints, 164
 Claver, 187
 Columbanus, 72, 182, 192, 289, 290, 592
 Confucianism and, 196
 Crowther, 208
 Cyril and Methodius, 210–211, 774
 Denis of Paris, 227
 Eligius, 252
 Emmeram of Regensburg, 257, 552
 Gall, 192, 290
 Gerard of Csanád, 257, 304
 Gregory the Thaumaturge, 327
 Jacobis, 296–297, 414–415
 Kentigern, 79, 470–471
 Kilian of Würzburg, 477–478
 Leander of Seville, 405, 502
 Lioba, 299, 511
 Liudger, 511–512
 Llull, 492, 512
 Martial of Limoges, 549
 martyrdom/persecution and, 181
 Ninian, 642
 Olinga, 591, 655
 Otto of Bamberg, 664–665
 Patrick of Ireland, 70, 218, 399, 592, 672, 673
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674

- Missionaries (continued)
 Pirmin, 688–689
 purity/pollution and, 704
 Remigius of Rheims, 734–735
 Root, 591, 746
 rulers as holy people and, 750
 Rupert of Salzburg, 752–753
 Samson of Dol, 762
 Shoghi Effendi, 799
 Sigfrid of Växjö, 803
 Slessor, 811
 Stephen of Perm, 823
 Tulsi and, 869
 Walburga, 906, 919
 Willibald, 919
 Willibrord, 134, 919–920
 Wolfgang of Regensburg, 920
 Xavier, 164, 592, 925
 Zosima and Savatii of Solovki, 687, 945
See also Paul
- Mitakshara*, 927
Mitzvoth, 451
 Mixcoatl, 176, 593, 849
 Mjantshi, 594
 Mkas sgrub dge legs dpal bzang po. See
 Kaydrub Gelek belsangbo
 Mkhas grub dge legs dpal bzang. See Khedrup
 Jey
 Mnkabayi ka Jama, 593–594
 Mobhi, 401
 Mochaeomhóg, 411
 Moteuczoma Xocoyotzin, 710
 Models, holy people as, 594–595
 Moderatus of Gades, 705
 Modwenna, 218
 Moggallana, 228, 235, 595–596, 790, 881
 Mohammed. See Muhammad
Mohe zhiguan (Zhiyi), 940
 Molaise of Devenish, 401, 498
 Molcho, Solomon, 582
 Molco, Solomon, 466
 Monasticism, 596–597
 Abbo of Fleury, 2–3, 249
 Adelheid, 11
 Aelred of Rievaulx and, 12–13
 Æthelwold, 15, 664
 Albertus Magnus, 31
 Amandus of Maastricht, 39
 Antony of Kiev, 58–59, 852
 Antony of the Desert and, 60, 108, 596
 asceticism and, 70
 Athanasius and, 76, 596
 awakening/conversion and, 87
 Basil the Great, 108–109, 596
 Beguines, 111–112, 545–546
 Benedict of Aniane and, 114–115, 729
 Benedict of Nursia, 60, 115–116, 360, 667, 818
 Benedict the African and, 116
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 117, 119, 228, 394, 555–556
 Bimbisara and, 124
 Brendan the Navigator and, 140
 Caesarius of Arles and, 155
 Catholic Reformation saints and, 165
 Celestine V and, 168
 Ciarán of Clonmacnoise, 185
 Ciarán of Clonmacnoise and, 185
 Clare of Assisi and, 186
 Clare of Montefalco and, 187
 Columbanus and, 192
 compassion and, 193
 Cyril of Beloozero, 211–212
 Darerca and, 218
 Demetrius of Rostov and, 225
 desert saints and, 228
 Dogen and, 236
 Dominic, 165, 193, 238, 592
 Dominic of Silos, 238–239
 Dunstan, 15, 243–244, 664
 Isaac of Armenia, 403
 John Cassian, 74, 192, 436–437
 John Climacus, 438, 776
 John Gualbert, 438–439, 732
 John of Gorze, 439–440
 Joseph of Volotsk, 447, 641, 732, 863
 Leopold III of Austria, 508–509
 mission and, 592
 Nilus of Rossano, 641
 Nilus of Sora, 641, 913
 Odilo of Cluny, 11, 650
 Odo of Cluny, 304, 650–651, 729
 Oswald of Worcester, 2, 664
 Pachomius, 114, 596, 667
 purity/pollution and, 704
 recognition and, 729
 Robert of Arbrissel, 740
 Romuald of Ravenna, 80, 228, 360, 732, 744, 746
 Sergius of Radonezh, 777–778
 Stephen of Muret, 822–823
 teachers as holy people and, 842
 Theodosius of Kiev, 59, 852
 Ward, 912
 warfare and, 911
 wealth/poverty and, 913
 Wolfgang of Regensburg, 920
See also Retreat vs. secular activity; specific monks and nuns
- Mongol Empire, 349, 432, 674
 Monica, 298, 597–598
 Moninne. See Darerca
 Monks. See Monasticism
Monologion (Anselm of Canterbury), 56
 Monophysitism, 507, 559
 Monotheism, 65, 278, 451, 551. See also Christianity; Islam; Judaism
 Monothelitism, 564–565
 Montanism, 299, 598
 Montanus, 598–599, 700
 Montchanin, Jules, 502
 Moon, Sun Myung, 204, 582, 599, 781
 Mopsus, 156, 570–571, 600
 Mora, Francisco, 600
 Moraa Moka Ngiti, 18, 85, 299, 600–601
 Morães, Vincius de, 579
 Morality, 601
 More, Thomas, 277, 601–602, 732, 863
Moreh Nebukhim (Moses ben Maimon), 605
 Morèmi, 602–603
Moriae Encomium (Erasmus), 700
 Mormons. See Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints
 Morocco, 273
 Mortara, Edgardo, 58
 Moses, 603–604
 Aaron and, 1
 Akiba ben Joseph and, 29
 attributes of, 80
 guidance and, 239
 Khidr and, 474–475
 as lawgiver, 500
 miracles, 588
 Miriam and, 589–590
 as religious founder, 278, 603
 Moses ben Maimon, 340–341, 453, 500,
604–605, 727, 773
 Moses ben Nahman, 453, 459, 605, 618
 Moses de Leon, 255, 459, 517
 Moses ibn Hanokh, 279
 Moteuczoma Xocoyotzin, 88
 Mother Ann Lee. See Lee, Ann
 Mother (Meter), 247
 Mother Teresa. See Teresa of Calcutta
 Mothers, 298, 362
 Motoori Norinaga, 797
 Mouride Brotherhood. See Mouridiyyah sufism
 Mouridiyyah sufism, 18, 103–104, 270
 Mozi, 578
 Mu'awiya b. Abu Sufyan, 350
 Mubarak, Haji, 605–606
 Mugeni, Barngatuny, 606
 Mughal Empire, 312, 345–346, 805, 843
 Mugo, Micere, 601
 Mugo wa Kibiro, Cege, 402, 606–607
 Muhak, 868
 Muhammad, 607–610
 'Ali ibn Abi Talib and, 36, 392–393, 608
 attributes of, 78–79
 authority of holy people and, 85
 barakah, 409
 compassion and, 193
 descent from, 2
 disciples of, 235
 Fatima bint Muhammad and, 272
 hagiography, 338, 339
 Hasan b. 'Ali and, 350
 hereditary holiness and, 357
 insanity and, 398
 intermediary role, 400
 Latif on, 498
 on Maryam, 558
 mysticism and, 617

- politics and, 692
 as prophet, 699
 as religious founder, 278
 revelation and, 406
 Salman al-Farisi and, 761
 sexuality and, 781
 veneration of, 888
 warfare and, 911
 Muhammad Ahmad, 354, 583, 611–612, 675
 Muhammad Ali. See Ali, Muhammad
 Muhammad al-Mahdi. See Mahdi, Muhammad al-
 Muhammad b. Isma‘il b. Ja‘far, 612
 Muhammad bin ‘Ali, Sheykh, 9
 Muhammad, Elijah, 194, 271, 534, 610–611,
 676, 700
 Muhammad, Jabril, 272
 Muhammad Shah (King of Iran), 20
 Muhammad, Warith Deen, 611
 Muhaqqiq al-Hilli, 367
 Muhasibi, Harith al-, 590
 Muinuddin Chisti, 591
 Mu‘izz, Abu Tamim Ma‘add al-, 612–613
 Mukhtar, 37
 al-Mukhtar-al Kabir al Kinto, Sidi, 18
 Mukhtar b. ‘Ubayd, 383
 Mukhtar ibn Ahmad, al-, 613
 Muktabai, 432
 Muktananda, Swami, 331
 Mukundadeva, 613–614, 782
Mulamadhya-maka-karika (Nagarjuna), 145, 619
 Mulenga Lubusha. See Lenshina, Alice
 Mumboism, 718
 Mummy bundles, 614–615
Munajat (‘Abdallah al-Ansari), 55
 Mungo. See Kentigern
Al-Munqidh min al-Dalal (Ghazali), 308
 Müntzer, Thomas, 254
 Murabit. See Marabout
 Murata Shuko, 391
 Murrone, Peter. See Celestine V
Musibat Namah (‘Attar), 78
 Music
 Adalbert of Prague and, 9
 Cecilia and, 166
 Christianity, 137
 Coltrane, 14–15, 190–191, 203
 creativity and, 14–15
 Dikshitar, 233, 588, 791
 Gisudaraz, 178, 311
 Haridas, 347
 Hasidism and, 91–92
 Hinduism and, 13, 14, 347
 Islam and, 14, 218
 Macuilxochitl, 88, 525
 Marley, 340, 546–547
 Orpheus, 14, 321, 361, 362, 659, 661
 Purandaradasa, 14, 703–704, 913
 Radharaman Charan Das Dev, 716–717
 Ramadas of Bhadrachalam, 229, 722
 Rastafarian movement and, 340, 547
 Romanos the Melodist, 14, 742–743
 Santería and, 10, 15
 Santo Domingo de Silos Monastery, 239
 Shastri, 791
 Shripadaraya, 801–802
 Tyagaraja, 722, 791, 872–873
 Yared, 14, 928–929
 See also Hymns
 Muslim holy people
 ‘Ad Sheykh, 8–9
 Ahmad al-Ahsa‘i, 25–26, 85, 470, 774, 835
 Ali Ber, 35, 749
 Ali, Muhammad, 34–35
 ‘Ali Shah, 37
 ‘Amili, 46
 Ansari, ‘Abdallah, al-, 54–55, 472
 Murtada Ansari, 55, 500
 Basri, 70, 109–110, 693
 Bauls, 110, 370, 396, 782
 Bihbihani, 123–124, 500
 Burujirdi, 150, 911
 Celebi, Asaf Halet, 14, 167, 618
 contemporary trends, 203
 Fall, 235, 270
 Fard, 221, 270–271, 278, 314, 583, 610
 Farrakhan, 272
 Fatima bint Muhammad, 105, 272, 297–298, 408
 Fatima Ma‘suma, 273
 Fatima of Ourika, 273, 274, 888
 Ghazi, 309–310, 583, 911
 Hafiz, 106, 337, 700
 Hakim, 341
 Hasan-i Sabbah, 349, 351
 Hilli, 367, 500
 Ibrahim, 6
 Idris, 388, 758
 ‘Isa (Jesus), 428–429
 Isma‘il, 6, 411
 Ja‘far as-Sadiq, 415, 500
 Jizzini, 432
 Kazim Rashti, 92, 470, 730, 835
 Khidr, 409, 474–475
 Limamou Laye, 509–510, 734
 Majlisi, 500, 532–533
 Makandal, 65, 533, 675
 Malcolm X, 142, 534, 610
 Mirza Hasan Shirazi, 500, 590
 Muhammad, Elijah, 194, 271, 534, 610, 676,
 700
 Muhammad, Warith Deen, 611
 Nafisa, 221, 357–358, 504, 619
 Nasruddin, 629
 Pir Sultan Abdal, 688, 693
 Salif Taal, 760–761, 911
 Salman al-Farisi, 609, 761
 Sana‘i, 473, 764–765
 Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, 504, 780
 Tayyib, 841
 Tusi, Nasir al-Din at-, 349, 488, 870–871
 Tusi, at- (Shaykh at-Ta‘ifah), 870
 Wafi Ahmad, 905
 Wali Songo, 907–908
 Zahir, 935
 Zaynab, 936–937
 See also ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib; Bab, The; Islam;
 Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi;
 Muhammad; Shi‘i imams; Sufi holy people Muslim poetry
 ‘Amili, 46
 Asma‘u Fodiyo Nana, 75
 ‘Attar, 12, 54, 78, 715–716, 764
 Bullhe Shah, 149–150
 Celebi, Asaf Halet, 14, 167, 618
 Dard, 217–218
 devotion and, 229
 Hafiz, 106, 337, 700
 Ibrahim and, 6
 Kaygusuz Abdal, 14, 469, 933
 Khayyam, 14, 472–474
 Khusrau, 476, 643
 Latif, 498–499
 Pir Sultan Abdal, 688, 693
 Sana‘i, 473, 764–765
 Shabistari, 783–784
 Yunus Emre, 14, 167, 229, 688, 839, 933–934
 See also Rumi, Mevlana Jalaluddin
Musnad Musa al-Kazim (Kazim), 470
 Muso Soseki, 14, 615–616
 Mustansir, Abu Tamim Ma‘add al-, 351, 616
 Mu‘tazila, 110
 Mutilation, 72, 131. See also Asceticism
 Muzorewa, Abel Tendekai, 616–617, 675
 Muzorewa, Gwinyai, 348
 Mwanga (King of Uganda), 462
My Life in Christ (John of Kronstadt), 440
Myayadvarataka-sastra (Dignaga), 232
 Mystery cults, 572, 772
 Mysticism, 617–618
 Adham, 11–12
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24–25
 Ahmad al-Ahsa‘i, 25–26
 ‘Amili, 46
 Ansari, ‘Abdallah al-, 54–55, 472
 anticlericalism and, 697
 asceticism and, 71
 Ba‘al Shem Tov, 91–92
 Banarsidas, 104
 Beguines, 111–112
 Catholic Reformation saints and, 164, 165
 Celebi, Asaf Halet, 167, 618
 Clare of Montefalco, 186–187
 devotion and, 229, 231
 Dov Baer of Mezhirech, 240
 Elijah and, 254–255
 gender and, 299
 Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta, 307, 568
 Gregory of Nyssa, 326
 guidance and, 329
 Hafiz, 106, 337, 700

- Mysticism (continued)
 Hildegard of Bingen, 365, 618
 Ibrahim and, 6
 imitation of Christ, 394
 'Isa (Jesus), 428–429
 Joan of Arc, 162, 433–434
 John of the Cross, 441
 Joseph of Copertino, 446–447
 Judah the Pious, 352, 450, 704
 Kanji Swami, 104, 464–465
 Lalla, 494–495
lamedvavniks, 496–497, 818
 Le Saux, 502
 Lee, 297, 503–504, 582
 Llull, 512
 Mechthild of Magdeburg, 111–112
 Moses ben Nahman, 453, 459, 605, 618
 Muslim poetry and, 14
 Plotinus, 690
 Rolle, 741–742
 Shivanarayan, 797
 Simeon ben Yohai, 807
 Suso, 829–830
 Wesley, 915
See also Hasidism; Kabbalah; Sufi holy people; Sufism
- N
Naal ayira Dhivya prabhandham, 625
 Nabhadas, 724, 728
Nabil's Narrative, 383
 "Nacchiyar Tirumoli" (Andal), 52
 Nachman. See Nahman of Bratslav
 Nadapada. See Naropa
 Nafisa, Sayyida, 221, 357–358, 504, 619
 Nagarjuna, 619–620
 Aryadeva and, 69
 Buddhapalita and, 145
 Kumarajiva and, 487
 Longchenpa and, 512
 Machig Labdrön and, 524
 Santaraksita and, 766
 as scholar, 774
 Tilopa and, 859
 Nagasaki martyrs, 222, 620–621
 Nagasena, 592, 621
Nahj al-Balagha (al-Husayn), 36
 Nahman of Bratslav, 14, 352, 399, 582, 618, 621–622, 817
 Nahmanides. See Moses ben Nahman
 Naipul, V. S., 123
 Nakae Tōju, 487–488, 622–623, 909
 Nakayama Miki, 299, 316, 623–624, 699
 Namawar, Husayni, 348
 Namdev, 40, 190, 624, 806
 Nammalvar, 624–625, 820
 Nanak, 625–626
 bhakti Hinduism and, 121, 370
 as child prodigy, 175
 Dayal and, 220
 as guru, 332, 804
 Hargobind and, 346
 holy people as models and, 595
 intolerance and, 864
 miracles and, 587
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 politics and, 692
 as religious founder, 279, 803
 ritual and, 739
 Tegh Bahadur and, 843
 veneration of, 889
 Nan-chu'uan P'u-yuan, 8
 Nanda, 233
 Nandi people (Kenya), 19, 66–67, 125
 Nanquan, 149
 Naqshbandi sufism, 99, 472, 498
 Narada (rishi), 738
 Narada, U (Theravada teacher), 771
 Naram-Sin (King of Akkad), 570, 626–627
 Naropa, 72, 465, 529, 548, 627–628, 859–860
 Narsi Mehta, 298, 628
 Nasafi, 'Aziz al-Din, 628–629
 Nashintu, 594
 al-Nasir, 420
 Nasir al-Din, Khwaja, 367
 Nasruddin, Khwaja, 629
 Nasser, Gamal Abdul, 717
 Natchez people, 749
Natema, 262, 263
 Nath Siddhas. See Naths
 Nathan of Gaza, 734, 783
 Naths, 317, 369, 370, 629–630, 782
 Nation of Islam (NOI)
 Ali and, 34
 Cone and, 195
 Fard, 221, 270–271, 278, 314, 583, 610, 676
 Farrakhan, 272
 Malcolm X, 142, 534, 610
 messiah beliefs and, 583
 Muhammad, Elijah, 194, 271, 534, 610, 676, 700
 Muhammad, Warith Deen, 611
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 676
 Nationalism. See Patriotism/anticolonial resistance
 Native American religions. See Amerindian holy people; Amerindian religions
 Nature
 Asceticism and, 254
 desert saints and, 227–228
 Greek hero cults and, 356
 Jainism and, 416–420, 630–632
 Kevin of Glendalough and, 471
 shamanism and, 786
Nauka Charitram (Tyagaraja), 873
Navigatio sancti Brendani, 679
Navigatio Sancti Brendani Abbatis, 140
 Nawaz, Khwaja Band. See Gisudaraz, Muhammad Bandanawaz
 Nayanars, 14, 121, 632, 820
 Nazaré, Maria. See Meninha de Gantois, Mãe
 Nazi Germany
 Anti-Semitism and, 57, 58
 Bonhoeffer and, 132, 134, 898
 Gapp and, 889
 Kolbe and, 194, 483
 Luther and, 520
 Mayer and, 565, 693
 Rahner and, 719
 Neale, J. M., 914
 Near East, ancient. See Ancient Mediterranean religions
 Nectarius, 662
 Negus of Abyssinia, 559
 Nehanda, 52
 Nehanda Nyakasikana, 633
 Neihardt, John G., 129
 Nemi, 193, 419, 633–634
 Neo-Confucianism, 197–199, 200
 creativity, 14
 Fujiwara Seika, 287, 354
 Hayashi Razan, 287, 354, 488
 Ōshio Heihachirō, 662–663, 938
 Tokugawa Mitsukuni, 862–863
 Tukt'ong Kihwa, 868
 Wang Yangming, 198, 488, 622, 623, 662, 908–909
 Zhang Zai, 197, 198–199, 938–939
 Zhou Dunyi, 197, 198, 938, 940–941, 942
 See also Zhu Xi
 Neo-Daoism, 779–780
 Neolin, 634, 674
 Neoplatonism, 320–321, 573, 690
 anti-intellectualism, 772
 asceticism, 70
 Augustine of Hippo and, 81
 compassion, 193
 Iamblichus, 193, 321, 385, 588, 705, 706, 740
 miracles, 588
 Origen and, 658
 Plato, 320, 689–690
 Proclus, 247, 321, 698, 706
 Pythagoreanism and, 705
 ritual, 740
 Neopythagoreanism, 573, 705, 706
 Neri, Philip, 72, 329, 448, 634–635
 Nero, 572
 Nero (Roman emperor), 12
 Nestor, 156, 225
 Neumann, Balthasar, 280
 New Age spirituality, 567–568, 786, 787
 Newman, John Henry, 84, 635–636
 Nezahualcoyotl, 636, 910
 Ngorima, Caleb, 334
 Ngubane, Harriett, 594
 Ngugi wa Thiong'o, 601, 607
 Niasse, Ibrahim Kaolack, 636–637, 693, 887
 Nicaea, Council of, 76, 202, 261, 326, 807
 Nichiren, 552–553, 637–638, 674, 732, 864
 Nicholas, 314, 638, 662
 Nicholas I, 389, 696
 Nicholas II (Tsar of Russia), 743
 Nicholas of Flüe, 329, 639

- Nicodemites, 158
 Nicodemus, 446, 639–640
 Nicomachus of Gerasa, 705
 Nigeria
 Braide, 139, 444
 Cherubim and Seraphim Society, 4, 29, 85, 658–659
 Marwa, 889
 Pentacostal movement, 29–30
 Slessor, 811
 Tansi, 837–838
 Uthman dan Fodio, 14, 18, 613, 879–880, 911
 See also African Christianity; African traditional religions
Nihon shoki, 794
 Nikon, 59, 85, 86, 640, 687, 740
 Nilus of Rossano, 641
 Nilus of Sora, 447, 641–642, 732, 776, 863, 913
 Nimrod, 6
The Nine Ways of Prayer, 238
 Ninian, 642
 Ninidh of Inismacsaint, 401
 Nirankari Sikh movement, 220
 Nirenberg, David, 57–58
 Nishida Kitarō, 830
 Nityananda, 331
 Nivrittinath, 432
 Nizami, K. A., 178
 Nizami, Khwaja Hasan, 492, 643
 Nizamuddin Auliya, Khwaja, 178, 271, 408–409, 476, 643–644
 Noah, 873
 Nobel Peace Prize, 730
 Noble, Margaret, 899
 Nogi Maresuke and Shizuko, 65, 644
 Nongqawuse, 18, 644–645
 Nonviolence. See Peace; Violence/nonviolence
 Norbert of Xanten, 645
 Norway, Olaf of, 654, 750, 803
 Notker, 654
 Novak, David, 180
 Novatian heresy, 371
 Noyes, John Humphrey, 812
Nozarashi Kiko (Bashō), 108
 Ntsikana, 645–646
 Nudity, 71. See also Asceticism
 Numenius of Apamea, 706
 Nuns. See Monasticism
 Nuri, Abu al-Husayn al-, 646
 Nxele, 645
 Nyabingi, 18, 19, 65, 646–647, 675
 Nyame, 548
Nyayabindu (Dharmakirti), 231
 Nyungu ya Mawe, 18, 19
- O
 Obatala, 65, 649
Obeah, 548
 Oberammergau passion play, 58
 Oberman, Heiko A., 56
 Oblates of Tor de' Specchi, 282
 Observant Franciscans, 119–120
Occupatio (Odo of Cluny), 651
 Ochieng', William, 600
 Octavian. See Augustus Caesar
 Odile, 649–650
 Odilo of Cluny, 11, 650
 Odo of Cluny, 304, 650–651, 729
 Oduduwa, 651
 Odysseus, 322, 357, 361, 362
Odyssey (Homer), 651, 860. See also Homer
 Oedipus, 362, 363, 651–652
Oedipus at Colonus (Sophocles), 651, 652, 817
Oedipus Tyrannus (Sophocles), 652, 860
 O'Faolin, Julia, 716
Ofudesaki (Nakayama Miki), 624
Ofumi (Rennyō), 735
 Ogún, 18, 652–653, 759
 Oguri Ryun, 404
 O'Hagan, Culdee Imar, 533–534
 Ojibwa people, 583–584
 Ojin, 65, 653–654, 910
 Okada, Kotama, 316
Okina Mondō (Nakae Tōju), 623
 Olaf of Norway, 654, 750, 803
 Olaf Skötkonung (King of Sweden), 803
 Olga, 654–655
 Olga of Kiev, 750
 Olinga, Enoch, 591, 655–656
 Olivi, Peter John, 445
 Ollantay, 656
Om Mani Padme Hum (Celebi), 167
 Omoto-kyō, 699
On Christian Doctrine (Augustine of Hippo), 81
On Free Will (Augustine of Hippo), 81
 "On Nature" (Empedocles), 258
On the Lapsed (Cyprian of Carthage), 210
On the Mysteries of the Egyptians (Iamblichus), 385
On the Nativity I (Romanos the Melodist), 742
On the Problem of Empathy (Stein), 820
On the Trinity (Augustine of Hippo), 81
On the Unity of the Catholic Church (Cyprian of Carthage), 210
On the Utility of Believing (Augustine of Hippo), 81
 Oñate, Juan de, 694
 Ondeto, Simeo, 61, 204, 559–560, 582, 656–657
Oneirocritica (Artemidorus), 68
 Onuphrios, 657
 Orange, Council of, 155
Orations against the Arians (Athanasius), 76
Ordo Virtutum (Hildegard of Bingen), 365
 Orestes, 361, 571
 Organization of African Unity (OAU), 339
 Orgyen Trinley Dorje, 466
 Origen, 188, 437, 445, 658, 774
 Original sin, 781
 Orimolade Tunolase, Moses, 4, 658–659
Orishas, 659–660, 767
 Adechina and, 10
 as ancestors, 52
 apotheosis of, 65
 Babalú Ayé, 94, 193
 compassion and, 193
 as heroes, 362
 Mora and, 600
 Obatala, 65, 649
 Oduduwa, 651
 Ogún, 18, 652–653, 759
 Oyá, 18, 665, 789, 910
 as sages, 759
 Shangó, 65, 665, 788–789
 Oritsajefor, Ayo, 387
Orkneyinga Saga, 527
 Orpheus, 14, 321, 361, 362, 659, 660
 Orphism, 14, 661, 698
 Orseolo, Peter, 746
 Orthodox Christianity, 661–662
 Antony of Kiev, 58–59, 852
 Avvakum, 85–86, 740
 Boris and Gleb, 136, 897
 Caleb, 156
 canonization, 181
 Demetrius of Rostov, 225–226, 339, 776
 discipleship, 236
 Gebre Mikael, 296–297, 414
 George, 303
 Gregory of Sinai, 326–327
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 180
 John Chrysostom, 38, 58, 80, 95, 437–438, 662, 842
 John of Kronstadt, 440, 582
 John the Almsgiver, 441–442, 913
 Joseph of Volotsk, 447, 641, 732, 863
 Lalibela, 493–494, 750
 miracles, 587
 Nikon, 59, 85, 86, 640, 687, 740
 Nilus of Sora, 447, 641, 732, 776, 863, 913
 Parasceva, 662, 669
 Philip of Moscow, 686–687, 693
 recognition, 729
 Romanos the Melodist, 14, 742–743
 scholars as holy people, 774–775
 Seraphim of Sarov, 662, 776–777
 Sergius of Radonezh, 674, 731, 777–778
 Simeon the New Theologian, 231, 618, 808–809
 Stephen of Perm, 823
 Theodore the Studite, 704, 851–852
 Theodosius of Kiev, 59, 852
 veneration of holy people, 887
 Virgin Mary, 555
 Yared, 14, 928–929
 Zosima and Savatii of Solovki, 687, 945
 Orthodox Judaism, 454, 729
Os Sertões (Cunha), 201
 Osbert of Clare, 249–250
Oshashizu (Nakayama Miki), 624
 Ōshio Heihachirō, 662–663, 938
 Osho, 663–664, 914

- Oshún, 789
 Oswald of Northumbria, 249
 Oswald of Worcester, 2, 664
 Oswin (King of England), 27
 Oswiu (King of Northumbria), 169
 Othlo of St. Emmeram's, 920
 Otmar, 290
 O'Toole, Laurence. See Laurence O'Toole
 Otto of Bamberg, 664–665
 Otto of Freising, 508
 Ottoman Empire, 113
 Ottonian dynasty, 11, 120, 561
 Ouen of Rouen, 127, 252
 Our Lady of Guadalupe. See Guadalupe, Virgin of Ouyang Jingwu, 928
 Ovid, 83, 705
 Owen, Nicholas, 260
 Oxford movement, 635–636
 Oyá, 18, 665, 789, 910
 Oyedepo, David, 387
- P
- Pachomius, 114, 596, 667
 Padma Karpo, 859
 Padmasagargani, 371
 Padmasambhava, 667–668
 attributes of, 79, 80
 as buddha, 143
 demons/monsters and, 226 lifespan of, 221
 Pemalingpa and, 682
 reincarnation and, 734
 Trisong de Tsen and, 865
 Padre Pio. See Pio of Pietrelcina
 Pafnutii of Borovsk, 447
 Pai-chang. See Baizhang
 Pain. See Asceticism
 Paiute people, 52, 675, 921–922
 Palafox y Mendoza, Juan de, 161
 Palestrina, Giovanni, 137
 Pali Buddhism, 146–147
 Pan-Africanist movement, 130
 Panchadasi (Vidyaranya), 893
 Pancharatna kirtanas (Tyagaraja), 873
 Panchen Sonam Drakpa, 815
 Pandurangshastri Athavale-Dada, 668–669
 Panegyric to Origen (Gregory the Thaumaturge), 327
 Pang Mipham, 882
 Panini, 773
 Pantaleon, 280, 669
 Pantalewon, 156
 Papacy
 Amandus of Maastricht and, 39
 Bellarmine and, 114
 bishop-saints and, 127
 Catholic Reformation saints and, 164, 165
 Council of Nicaea and, 76, 202, 261, 326, 807
 Gregory VII and, 324–325
 Leo the Great and, 507
 More and, 601–602
 Peter Damian and, 685
 politics and, 692
 rulers as holy people and, 749
 Vincent Ferrer and, 896
 See also Politics; specific popes
 Paphnutius, 657
 Parascvea, 662, 669
 Pariacaca, 669–670
 Paris, Matthew, 378
 Parivarapatha, 878
 Parks, Rosa, 479
 Parmenides, 258, 320
 Parr, Katherine, 73
 Parrinder, Geoffrey, 316
 Parshva, 419, 420, 529, 530, 569, 670
 Paschal I, 696
 Pasenadi, 670–671
Passio sanctorum martyrum Dionysii episcopi, Rustici et Eleutherii, 227
 Passionist Congregation, 678–679
 Patanjali, 671–672
 Patrick of Ireland, 70, 218, 399, 592, 672, 673
 Patrikeev, Vassian, 641
 Patriotism/anticolonial resistance, 672, 674–676
 Akiba ben Joseph, 29, 672, 674, 844
 Alinesitoué Diatta, 38, 675
 Arap Koilegen, 67, 675
 arap Samoei, 19
 Aurobindo Ghose, 84, 675
 Bhave, 122–123
 Black Elk, 129
 Blyden, 130
 Braide, 139
 Chilembwe, 175–176, 595, 675
 contemporary holy people and, 203
 Geronimo, 306
 Hassan, 354
 Joan of Arc, 162, 433–434, 674, 911
 James Johnson, 443–444, 675
 Kinjikitile Ngwale, 18, 19, 480–481, 675
 martyrdom/persecution and, 552
 Masinde, 18, 203, 398, 560, 657, 897–898
 Moraa Moka Ngiti, 600–601
 Nehanda Nyakasikana, 633
 Ondeto, 657
 Sharqawi, Abu 'l-Wafa' al-, 791
 Sitting Bull, 810–811
 Tenskwatawa, 221–222, 630, 675, 700, 730–731, 825, 845–846
 Waiyaki wa Hinga, 18, 19, 675, 905–906
 warfare and, 910, 911
 See also Rulers as holy people
Patrologia Graeca, 437
 Paul, 676–678
 on Abraham, 6
 as apostle, 64
 Aquila and Prisca and, 66
 awakening/conversion, 86
 cephalophores and, 168
 Clement of Rome and, 188
 on imitation of Christ, 393
 Luke and, 517
 Marcion and, 543
 mission and, 591, 592
 mysticism and, 618
 retreat vs. secular activity and, 8
 sexuality and, 182
 Paul I, 696
 Paul of Burgos, 895
 Paul of the Cross, 678–679
 Paul of Thebes. See Paul the Hermit
 Paul the Hermit, 425, 631, 679
 Paula, 72, 269, 425, 679–680, 913
 Paulinus of Milan, 41
 Paulinus of Nola, 14, 276, 680–681
 Paulus Alvarus, 205
 Pawnee people, 205
 Peace, 22, 34, 96, 911–912. See also Violence/nonviolence; Warfare
 Peace Pilgrim, 681, 911
 Pei, 174
 Peires, Jeff, 644
 Peixu, 376
 Pelagianism, 81, 305
 Pelikan, Jaroslav, 559
 Pemalingpa, 682
 Penelope, 363
 Penitence, 736. See also Asceticism
 Pentecostal movement, 203
 Akindayomi, 29–30
 anti-intellectualism, 772
 Babalola, 4, 93–94, 675
 Bonnke, 135–136, 203
 Guti, 203, 334
 Hoover, 374–375, 697, 705, 820
 intermediary role, 399
 Lekganyane, 505
 Mason, 560–561
 miracles, 588
 prophets, 700
 purity/pollution and, 705
 People's Temple, 204, 265, 444–445
 Pepin the Short (Carolingian king), 134–135
Peregrinatio, 72, 140, 182, 192, 762
Periya Puranam, 632
 Periyalvar, 52
 Perpetua and Felicity, 298, 682–683
 Perrin, Michel, 779
 Perseus, 362
 Persian Empire, 181
 Peru
 Pariacaca, 669–670
 Poma de Ayala, 40, 45, 537, 712
 Rose of Lima, 165, 595, 747
 rulers as holy people, 394–395
 See also Inca people
 Peter, 683–684
 Andrew and, 53
 on apostles, 64

- authority of, 85, 236
 Clement of Rome and, 188, 683
 Mark and, 546
 martyrdom/persecution and, 553
 as pope, 695
 Peter Damian, 685, 746
 Peter II of Tarentaise, 684
 Peter the Great (Tsar of Russia), 32
 Peyote cactus, 262
Phaedo (Plato), 74, 689
Phaedrus (Plato), 320
 'Phags pa lha. See Aryadeva
 Pharaohs of Egypt, 685–686
 Akhenaten, 28, 570, 686
 Cleopatra VII, 188
 as gods on earth, 314
 hereditary holiness and, 748
 politics and, 691–692
 Pharisees, 427
The Phenomenon of Man (Teilhard de Chardin), 843
 Philip, 329, 446
 Philip of Macedon, 322, 524
 Philip of Moscow, 686–687, 693
 Philippines, 675
 Philo of Alexandria, 326
 Philodemus, 320
 Philosophers, ancient Greek, 319–321. See also Aristotle; Empedocles; Iamblichus;
 Plato; Plotinus; Porphyry; Pythagoras;
 Socrates
Philosophumena (Hippolytus of Rome), 371
 Philostratus of Lemnos, 63, 706
 Phoenicia, 232
 Photius, 389
 Phyogs-kyi glan-po. See Dignaga
Physica (Hildegard of Bingen), 366
 Piero della Francesca, 355
 Pietist movement, 704
 Pi-hsia yuan-chün. See Bixia Yuanjun Pilgrimages
 asceticism and, 72
 Behem and, 112–113
 bishop-saints and, 127
 Canisius and, 158
 Demetrius and, 225
 desert saints and, 228
 Felix of Nola and, 276, 680
 Geneviève and, 302
 Godeliva and, 313
 Hasidism and, 92
 Judaism, 889
 Lal Shahbaz Qalandar, 493
 Marley, 547
 Martin of Tours, 551
 Menas, 577
 Protestant Reformation and, 701
 Sufism and, 95, 104, 106
 Pindar, 74, 321
 Pio of Pietrelcina, 231, 687–688, 826
 Pir Sultan Abdal, 688, 693
 Pir-i Herat. See Ansari, Abu Isma'il 'Abdallah al-
 Pirmin, 688–689
Pirqa Avot, 366
 Pisa, Council of, 382
 Pisa, Pseudo-Council of, 155
 Pius I, 695
 Pius V, 164, 696
 Pius IX, 58, 696
 Pius X, 696
 Pius XII, 696–697
 Piyadassin. See Ashoka
Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, 379
 Plato, 320, 689–690
 Aiakos and, 26
 hagiography and, 338
 Idris and, 388
 on insanity, 396
 Justin Martyr and, 458
 on martyrdom/persecution, 551
 Neoplatonism and, 690
 on purity/pollution, 704
 Pythagoreanism and, 689, 705, 706
 reincarnation and, 734
 on scholars as holy people, 772
Platonic Theology (Proclus), 698
 Platonism, 81, 319, 690
 Platonov, Sergei, 86
 Plaut, Gunther, 180
 Plotinus, 65, 70, 320, 385, 573, 690–691
 Plummer, Charles, 401
 Plunket, Oliver, 691
 Plutarch, 320, 322, 571, 854
 Pocij, Hipacy, 489
 Poetry
 Amerindian, 88
 ancient Greek, 363, 661
 Buddhist, 108, 391, 477
 Christian, 14, 260, 261, 314, 375, 680
 Daoist, 482
 Jain, 87, 104, 229, 492, 720
 Jewish, 7, 342
 Sikh, 803, 804, 806
 See also Hindu poetry; Hymns; Muslim
 poetry
 Poland, 130–131, 160–161, 414–415, 693, 819
 Politics, 691–693
 Adalbert of Prague, 9
 Aiakos, 26
 Amandus of Maastricht, 39
 Anselm of Canterbury, 56, 692
 Askew, 73–74
 Avvakum, 85–86
 Basil the Great, 108
 Benno of Meissen, 117
 Bernardino of Siena, 119–120
 Birgitta of Sweden, 125
 bishop-saints, 126
 Bonhoeffer, 132, 134
 Burujirdi, 150
 Catherine of Siena, 163–164, 182
 Cato the Younger, 166
 Charlemagne, 172–173, 693
 Clotilde, 188–189
 Colum Cille, 191
 Ephrem the Syrian, 261
 Forty Martyrs of England and Wales,
 259–260, 693
 gender and, 299
 Harris, 348
 Hildegard of Bingen, 365, 366
 Joseph of Volotsk, 447
 Kumazawa Banzan, 487–488, 692
 Lambert of Liège, 496
 Lenshina, 506
 Liguori, 509
 Luwum, 520–521, 693
 Magnus of Orkney, 526–527
 Majlisi, 532–533
 Margaret of Scotland, 545
 martyrdom/persecution and, 553, 691, 692, 693
 Mengzi, 578, 692
 Odo of Cluny, 651
 Otto of Bamberg, 664
 Quakerism and, 281
 Rama, 721
 Remigius of Rheims, 734–735
 retreat vs. secular activity and, 182
 Theseus, 854
 Vincent de Paul, 895
 See also Papacy; Rulers as holy people
 Polycarp, 181, 401, 693–694
 Polygamy, 130, 781
 Polynesian religions, 535–536, 675, 699, 700
 Poma de Ayala, Felipe Guaman, 40, 45, 537, 712
 Pontianus, 371
 Pontiac, 634, 674
 Pontian, 695
 Ponticus, 521
 Pontus, 210
 Poonja-ji, 502
 Poor Clares, 186
 Popé, 674, 694–695
 Pope, Alexander, 166
 Pope-saints, 695–697. See also Papacy; specific popes
Pophwagyong chongyo (Wonhyo), 921
Popol vuh, 710
 Poppo of Trier, 808
 Porphyry, 385, 690, 705
 Pothinus of Lyons, 521
 Potowa, 242
 Pottery, 19–20
 Prabhupada. See Bhaktivedanta, Swami A. C.
 Pracetas, 738
Prahlada Bhakti Vijaya (Tyagaraja), 873
 Prajnadhara, 131
 Prajnendraruci, 241
Pramanasamuccaya (Dignaga), 231, 232
Pramanavarttika (Dharmakirti), 231
Prasanapada (Chandrakirti), 171
Pratyekabuddhas, 132, 143, 147

- Prayer rugs, 410
 Preachers, 842–843
Precatio pastoralis (Aelred of Rievaulx), 13
Preces Gertrudianae (Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta), 307
 Pre-Christian European religions
 All Saints’ Day and, 38
 Boniface and, 134
 Brigid of Ireland and, 141
 Ciarán of Clonmacnoise and, 185
 nature and, 630
 reincarnation, 734
 Roch and, 741
 Roman imperial cult and, 83
 saints and, 701
 “Predanie” (Nilus of Sora), 641
 Preksha Dhyān, 868–869
 Premonstratensian order, 645
 Presidential Medal of Freedom, 730
 Priests, 697–698
 African traditional religions, 18, 697
 Daoism, 215
 Judaism, 1–2, 189–190, 697
 Santería, 10
 Shinto, 794–796
Primary Chronicle, 654–655
Primary Russian Chronicle (Tale of Bygone Years), 59
 Prisca and Aquila, 66
 Priscilla, 299, 598
 Prison reform, 285–286
 Prithi Chand, 312, 804
 Prithu, 748
 Proclus, 247, 321, 698, 706
 Procopius, 228
The Promised Day Is Come (Shoghi Effendi), 799
 Promised Land, 5
 Prophet, Elizabeth Clare, 399, 698–699
 Prophets, 699–700
 ancient Greek, 321–322, 570–571
 gender and, 299
 Maryam as, 558
 See also specific people
Proponimenti (Leonard of Port Maurice), 508
Proslogion (Anselm of Canterbury), 56
 Protestant holy people
 Askew, 73–74
 Bonhoeffer, 132, 134, 182, 394, 898
 Calvin, 157–158, 674, 701, 705, 732, 739
 Chisupe, 179
 Cranmer, 206–207, 499, 674, 732, 737, 781
 Crummell, 208
 Edwards, 250, 394
 Graham, 318–319
 Johnson, Samuel, 444
 Knox, 130, 674
 Latimer, 499
 Lee, Ann, 297, 503–504, 582, 699, 781, 812
 Lekganyane, 505
 Ridley, 499, 737
 Southcott, Joanna, 582, 817
 Sundar Singh, 809–810
 Slessor, 811
 Tillich, 195, 775, 858–859
 Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
 Voes and van Esschen, 552, 901
 Wesley, 87, 593, 914–916
 See also Luther, Martin
 Protestant Protomartyrs. See Esschen, Johannes van; Voes, Hendrik Protestant Reformation
 awakening/conversion and, 87
 Cajetan and, 155
 Calvin, 157–158, 674, 701, 705, 732, 739
 hymns and, 901
 imitation of Christ and, 394
 intermediary role and, 180
 intolerance and, 863
 Jan of Leyden, 265, 266, 423–424, 732
 laity and, 492
 Latimer, 499
 mission and, 592
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 purity/pollution and, 705
 reform and, 732
 ritual and, 739
 saints and, 700–702
 scholars as holy people and, 774
 sexuality and, 781
 veneration of holy people and, 889
 See also Luther, Martin
 Protestantism, 180–181, 700–702
 asceticism, 182
 eremitism and, 360
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 180, 398–399
 martyrdom/persecution, 181, 552
 mission and, 593
 monasticism and, 596, 597
 mysticism and, 617
 Ragot and, 718
 repentance and, 736
 teachers as holy people, 842–843 veneration of holy people and, 888
 Virgin Mary, 556
 Providence Industrial Mission (PIM), 175–176
 Prudentius, 264, 371, 501, 680, 896
 Pseudo-Dionysius, 227, 618
 Psychedelic movement, 567–568
 Ptolemaic ruler cult, 322, 571, 702–703
 P’u-hsien. See Samantabhadra
 Puchanga, 242
 Pueblo people, 674, 694–695
 Pueblo Revolt, 674
Puja, 47
 Pulaha, 738
 Pulastya, 738
 Purandaradasa, 14, 703–704, 913
 Pure Land Buddhism, 46, 47
 anti-intellectualism, 772
 Chinul and, 177
 compassion, 193
 Hakuin and, 342
 Huiyuan, 380, 492, 692
 Ippen, 14, 400, 740
 Kikusha-ni, 477
 Kitamura Sayo and, 481
 laity and, 492
 monasticism and, 597
 politics and, 692
 Rennyō, 492, 735
 Ryonin, 753
 Shinran, 373, 400, 492, 735, 782, 793
 status and, 820
 See also Honen
 Purgatory, 38, 736
 “Purifications” (Empedocles), 258
 Puritanism, 173, 250, 281, 394
 Purity/pollution, 704–705
 Purna, 235
 Purnaprajna. See Madhva
 Pythagoras, 705–706
 Empedocles and, 258
 Idris and, 388
 intermediary role, 400
 monasticism and, 596
 nature and, 630
 as prophet, 321
 See also Pythagoreanism
 Pythagoreanism, 573
 Apollonius of Tyana, 62–63, 78, 222, 706
 asceticism and, 71
 Empedocles, 258
 Plato and, 689, 705, 706
 reincarnation, 734
 See also Neopythagoreanism
 Pythia, 247, 299, 321, 571, 572, 706–707
- Q
 Qadah, ‘Abdallah b. Maymun al-, 840
 Qadi Nu‘man, 612–613
 Qadiriyya sufism, 75, 110, 613, 637, 879–880
 Qalandar, Hamid, 178
 Qasim, Muhammad b. ‘Abdallah al-, 709
Qayyūm al-asmá (The Bab), 93
 Qian Dehong, 908
 Qiu Chuji, 216
 Qiyama, 348–349
 Qonawi. See Kunawi, Sadr al-Din al-
 Quakerism, 194, 281, 285–286, 732
 Quanzhen Daoism, 215–216, 516, 909–910
 Quddus, Ruh al-, 92, 97, 383, 606, 709–710
The Quest of the Historical Jesus (Schweitzer), 425, 427
 Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin, 710–711
 apotheosis of, 65
 Chimalman and, 176, 298, 710
 Christianity and, 45
 death of, 220
 messiah beliefs and, 581
 Mixcoatl and, 593
Quipocamayos, 43, 711–712

- Qunduzi, Ibrahim, 178
 Qur'an, 6, 75, 399, 608. See also Islam; Scholars
 Qurratu'l-'ayn. See Tahiri
 Qurtubi, 558
 Qushayri, Abu'l-Qasim al-, 409, 617, 712–713, 764
 Qushayriyya Hashimiyya sufism, 2
 Qutb, Sayyid, 203, 733
Qutb, 95
- R
- Rabbenu Tam, 715
The Rabbi Travels, the Way Is Getting Short (Bernshtein), 353
 Rabi'a al-Adawiyya, 109, 299, 300, 715–716
 Rabus, Ludwig, 901
 Race, 130, 138–139, 161, 194, 323. See also African American holy people
 Rachel, 562, 887
 Rachungpa, 465
 Radegund, 716
 Radha, 316, 782, 883
 Radharaman Charan Das Dev, 716–717, 842
 Radhasoami tradition, 812–813
Radhasuddanidhi (Harivansh), 347
 Radwan, Ahmad, 194, 398, 717
 Raghunathji, 123
 Ragib, Yusuf, 619, 937
 Raglan, Lord, 362
 Ragot, Mariam, 398, 559, 717–718
 Rahner, Karl, 718–719
 Rahula, 80, 235, 719–720, 818
 Raidas. See Ravidas
 Rainmakers, 18, 588
 Rajacandra, Shrimad, 896
 Rajcandra, Shrimad, 104, 465, 720–721
 Rajimati, 634
 Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shree. See Osho
 Ram Rai, 312, 843
 Rama, 226, 229, 362, 721–722, 899
 Ramadas of Bhadrachalam, 229, 722
 Ramakrishna Paramahansa, 722–723 as avatar, 316
 awakening/conversion, 87
 insanity and, 370, 398
 meditation and, 569
 Sarada Devi and, 767–768
 Vivekananda and, 899
 Ramanand, 460, 674, 705, 723–724, 728
 Ramanuja, 231, 368, 724, 773, 885, 903
 Ramanujan, 527
Ramayana, 226, 368, 369, 569, 721, 738, 899
Ramayana Churnika (Ramadas of Bhadrachalam), 722
 Rambam. See Moses ben Maimon
 Ramban. See Moses ben Nahman
Ramcaritmanas (Tulsidas), 869
 Ramdas, 39, 67, 358, 724–725, 804
 Ramprasad Sen, 122, 462, 485, 725
 Ramses, 686
 Rang Jung Dorje, 465
 Rangjung Rigpe Dorje, 465–466
 Ransom-Kehler, Keith, 554, 725–726
 Raphael, 166
 Ras Tafari. See Haile Selassie
Rasa, 752
 Rasa Lila, 317
Rasa'il Ikhwan al-Safa (Taqi Muhammad), 840
 Rashi, 450, 453, 605, 715, 726–727, 773
 Rasputin, Grigorii, 743
 Rastafarian movement, 339–340, 546–547, 582, 675
 Rationalism, 7
 Ratnakaranda Sutra, 540
 Rattazzi, Urban, 138
 Ravad, 459, 715
 Ravana, 226
 Ravidas, 40, 121, 724, 727–728, 820
 Ray, Krishnacandra, 485
 Raychandbhai Mehta. See Rajcandra, Shrimad
 Raymond of Capua, 24, 164
 Raymond of Peñafort, 238, 500, 728
 Razi, Fakhr al-Din al-, 774
Rebbetzins, 728–729
 Rebecca, 562
 Rechungpa, 584
 Recognition, 729–730
 Reconstructionist Judaism, 454
A Record of Buddhist Practices Sent Home from the Southern Sea, 233
 Red Sticks, 730–731
 “Red Thread Zen,” 391
 Redeemed Christian Church of God (RCCG), 29–30
 Redemptorists, 509
 Reform, 704, 705, 731–733, 739. See also specific religions and people
 Reform Judaism, 303, 454
 Regaldo, Pedro, 165
 Reggae music, 340, 547
 Régis, Jean-François, 164
Regula Pastoralis (Gregory I), 324
Regularis concordia (Æthelwold), 15
 Reincarnation, 733–734
Relación (Titu Cusi Yupanqui), 861
 Relbachen, 750
 Relics, 183, 222, 296, 887, 888. See also Veneration of holy people; specific people
 Religious founders. See Founders of religions; Religious order founders Religious order founders
 Bosco, 137–138, 194, 285
 Bruno of Chartreuse and, 142–143
 Cabrini, 153, 154, 194, 914
 Clare of Assisi, 186
 Dominic, 165, 193, 238, 592
 Drexel, 240–241, 913
 Frances of Rome, 282, 492
 Francis of Sales, 30, 138, 164, 284–285
 Gilbert of Sempringham, 310, 740
 laity and, 492
 Liguori, 509
 Merici, 194, 492, 579
 Norbert of Xanten, 645
 Paul of the Cross, 678–679
 Seton, 778–779
 See also Francis of Assisi; Ignatius of Loyola
 Rembrandt van Rijn, 603
 Remi, Philippe de, 852
 Remigius (also Remy) of Rheims, 508, 734–735
 Remus, 891
 Rennyoo, 492, 735
 Renunciation. See Asceticism; Eremitism; Monasticism; Wealth/poverty
 Repentance, 12, 735–736
Republic (Plato), 689
 Resurrection, 221–222
 Retreat vs. secular activity, 7–8, 60, 182–183, 358–360, 557. See also Asceticism; Eremitism; Monasticism
 Reuveni, David, 582
Revelatio de Sacro Exercitu Virginum Coloniensium (Elizabeth of Schönau), 256
Revelationes Extrauagantes (Birgitta of Sweden), 126
The Revelation(s) of Divine Love (Julian of Norwich), 456
 Rgyal tshab dar ma rin chen. See Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen
 Rial y Marcado, José, 675
 Richard the Lion-Hearted (King of England), 303, 508
 Richard, Timothy, 928
Ricordi (Merici), 579
 Ridley, Nicholas, 499, 737
 Rifa'i, Ahmad ibn 'Ali al-, 95, 219, 410, 587, 737
 Rifa'iyya sufism, 2, 737
 Rig Veda, 359, 368–369, 738, 800–801
 See also Vedas
Rigs pa'i rgya mtsho (Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa), 866 ar-Rijal (at-Tusi), 870 al-Risala fi'ilm al-tasawwuf (Qushayri), 712–713, 764
Risalat al-Nushiyat (Yunus Emre), 933
Rise Up and Walk (Muzorewa), 617
 Rishabadas, 371
 Rishabha, 418, 420, 529, 737–738, 758
 Rishis, 368, 504, 738–739, 758–759
 Ritual, 739–740
The River Between (Ngugi wa Thiong'o), 607
 Robert of Arbrissel, 740
 Robert of St. Edmundsbury, 58
 Roch, 741
 Rohou Laye, Seydina Issa, 510
 Rolle, Richard, 741–742
 Rolpay Dorje, 465
 Roman Catholic holy people
 Alacoque, 30–31, 398
 Bakhita, 103
 Bellarmine, 114
 Benedict the African, 116

Roman Catholic holy people (continued)

Bobola, 130–131
 Borromeo, 136–137, 164
 Bosco, 137–138, 194, 285
 Bowman, 138–139
 Brébeuf, 139–140, 554
 Britto, 141–142
 Cabrini, 153, 154, 194, 914
 Cajetan, 155
 Caleb, 156
 Canisius, 114, 158
 Catarina de San Juan, 161, 588
 Catholic Reformation saints, 164–165, 181
 Claver, 187
 compassion and, 194
 Day, 219–220, 898, 914
 Drexel, 240–241, 913
 Duchesne, 243
 ecumenism and, 203
 Forty Martyrs of England and Wales,
 259–260, 592, 693
 Francis of Sales, 30, 138, 164, 284–285
 Galgani, 289, 825
 Giuliani, 311–312
 Goretti, 317–318, 781
 Griffiths, 123, 327–328, 502
 Hernández, 360–361
 Hopkins, 14, 375
 Jacobis, 296–297, 414–415
 John Baptist de la Salle, 436
 John of the Cross, 14, 86, 165, 328, 440–441, 580
 John XXIII, 203, 434–436, 696, 732–733
 Joseph of Copertino, 165, 231, 398, 446–447,
 569, 818
 Juan Diego, 448–449, 672
 Kateri Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
 Kolbe, 194, 483
 Le Saux, 502
 Leonard of Port Maurice, 508
 Liguori, 509
 Luwum, 18, 19, 204, 520–521, 552, 693
 Martin de Porres, 194, 549–550, 747, 820
 martyrdom/persecution, 553
 Mayer, 565, 693
 Merton, 203, 569, 580, 581, 830
 More, 277, 601–602, 732, 863
 Nagasaki martyrs, 222, 620–621
 Neri, 72, 329, 448, 634–635
 Newman, 84, 635–636
 Paul of the Cross, 678–679
 Pio of Pietrelcina, 687–688
 Plunket, 691
 priests, 697–698
 Rahner, 718–719
 ritual and, 740
 Romero, 194, 204, 552, 693, 744, 745
 Rose of Lima, 165, 595, 747
 Seton, 778–779
 Soubirous, 174, 816
 Stein, 820–821

Tansi, 837–838
 Teilhard de Chardin, 84, 843–844
 Tekakwitha, 45, 448, 468
 Teresa of Calcutta, 85, 183, 204, 848
 Thérèse of Lisieux, 853–854
 Vianney, 329, 892
 Vincent de Paul, 165, 194, 895, 914
 Ward, 912
 Xavier, 164, 592, 925
See also Teresa of Avila
 Roman Catholicism authority of holy people, 84
 discipleship, 236
 eremitism, 360
 guidance, 330
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 180, 398
 miracles, 587, 588
 monasticism, 596, 597
 recognition, 729, 730
 reform, 732–733
 ritual, 740
 Santería and, 10, 767
 teachers as holy people, 842, 843
 veneration of holy people, 887
See also Canonization; Legio Maria
 Roman imperial cult, 12, 34, 65, 83, 572–573, 748
 Roman persecutions of Christians, 181
 Afra of Augsburg, 15–16
 Agatha, 23–24, 182, 516, 781
 Agnes, 24
 Alban, 31
 Apollonia, 62, 183, 553, 818
 Aquila and Prisca, 66
 Babylas of Nicomedia, 94–95
 Catherine of Alexandria, 161–162, 280, 300, 504
 Clement of Rome, 127, 188, 683
 Cosmas and Damian, 205–206
 Cyprian of Carthage, 210
 Demetrius, 225
 Ephrem the Syrian and, 260
 Eulalia of Mérida, 264
 Felix of Nola, 275
 Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, 775
 George, 302
 Gregory the Thaumaturge and, 327
 Lucy, 516
 Pantaleon, 280, 669
 Parasceva, 662, 669
 Perpetua and Felicity, 298, 682–683
 Peter, 683
 popes and, 695
 Sergius and Bacchus, 777, 781
 Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, 504, 780
 Sophia, 815
 Theban Legion, 563–564, 849, 911
 Theodore, 850–851
 Vincent of Saragossa, 501, 896
Romances de los señores, 636

Romanos the Melodist, 14, 742–743
 Romanov, Elizabeth, 743
 Romanov family, 58, 743–744, 749
 Rome. See Ancient Roman religion/culture;
 Papacy
 Romero, Oscar, 194, 204, 552, 693, 744, 745
 Romola (Eliot), 770
 Romuald of Ravenna, 744, 746
 attributes of, 80
 eremitism, 228, 360, 744
 reform and, 732
 Romulus, 572, 891
 Roncalli, Angelo Giuseppe. See John XXIII
 Root, Martha Louise, 591, 746–747
 Rose of Lima, 165, 595, 747
 Rosemont, Henry, 200
 Rosh Hashanah, 453–454
 Roshis, 149
Roznamcha (Nizami), 643
 Ruadán, 401
 Ruan Ji, 779, 780
 Ruan Xian, 779
Ruba'iyat (Khayyam), 472, 473
 Rubenson, Samuel, 60
 Rubenstein, Richard L., 180
 Rublev, Andreas, 14
 Rudolph, 511
 Rufinus, 424
Ruh al-jinan, 106
 Rúhíyyih Khánum, 358, 747–748
 Rule of Benedict, 114, 115–116, 119, 155
Rule of the Master, 116
 Rule, Saint, 53
 Rulers as holy people, 748–751
 Adelheid, 11
 African traditional religions, 19, 400, 749
 Ajatashatru, 28, 124, 228, 736
 Alexander Nevskii, 32, 33, 400, 911
 Alexander the Great, 32, 34, 748
 Ali Ber, 35, 749
 Amerindian religions, 394–395, 399–400,
 691–692, 749, 860–861
 ancient Greece, 322–323, 748
 ancient Mediterranean religions, 570 ancient Rome, 12, 34, 65, 83, 572–573, 748
 apotheosis and, 65
 Arap Koilegen, 66–67, 675
 Axayacatl, 43, 88, 525, 910
 'Aziz-billah, 88–89
 Bimbisara, 124
 Caleb, 156–157, 750, 911
 Casimir of Poland, 160–161
 Charlemagne, 68, 172–173, 310, 511, 654, 693
 Charles I, 173, 749
 Cleopatra VII, 188
 Clotilde, 188–189
 Confucian culture heroes, 195–196, 758,
 932–933
 Confucius and, 199
 Constantine, 201–202, 354, 750

- Edmund of East Anglia, 2–3, 249, 897
Edward the Confessor, 249–250, 750
Egyptian pharaohs, 28, 188, 314, 570, 685–686, 748
Elizabeth of Hungary, 255–256, 492, 545, 781, 822
Emeric, 257
Eric IX Jedvardsson of Sweden, 261–262, 750
Ezana, 18, 266–267, 750
Ferdinand III of Castile, 276, 911
gender and, 300
Ghazi, 309–310, 583, 911
gods on earth and, 314
Haile Selassie, 18, 19, 339–340, 547, 582
Hakim, 341
Hasan-i Sabbah, 349, 351
Henry II, 356, 490, 750, 781
hereditary holiness and, 357, 748
Hong Xiuquan, 85, 266, 373–374, 699
Huangdi, 195, 196, 376–377, 758, 782
intermediary role and, 52, 399–400
Inti Raymi and, 394–395
Judaism, 479
Kunigunde, 490, 750, 781
Ladislav, 491, 750
Lalibela, 493–494, 750
Leopold III of Austria, 508–509, 693
Louis IX, 58, 514–515, 554, 693, 750
Macedonia, 524
Magnus of Orkney, 526–527
Manco Capac, 536–537
mandate of heaven, 537–538
Margaret of Scotland, 545
Matilda, 11, 561–562
Meiji Tennō, 65, 574–575, 644, 674
Mnkabayi ka Jama, 593–594
Muhammad Ahmad, 354, 583, 611–612, 675
Mu'izz, 612–613
Mustansir, 354, 616
Naram-Sin, 570, 626–627
Nezahualcoyotl, 636, 910
Obatala, 65, 649
Oduduwa, 651
Öjin, 65, 653–654, 910
Olaf of Norway, 654, 750, 803
Pasenadi, 670–671
Polynesia, 536
Ptolemaic ruler cult, 322, 571, 702–703
Qasim, 709
Radegund, 716
Romanov family, 58, 743, 749
sages and, 758
Sengsten Gampo, 750, 775–776
Shaka ka Senzangakhona, 400, 784
Shangó, 788–789
Shinto, 748, 795–796
Shōmu, 750, 799–800
Shotoku, 750, 796, 800
Srimala, 818
Stephen of Hungary, 674, 750, 822
Titu Cusi Yupanqui, 860–861
Tokugawa Ieyasu, 65, 287, 354, 796–797, 861
Tokugawa Mitsukuni, 862–863
Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 674, 796, 864–865
Trisong de Tsen, 462, 463, 668, 865, 882
Vladimir, 136, 750, 900–901
Wenceslas, 750, 914
Wu Zhao, 750, 792, 799, 818, 922
Yeshe Od, 929
Yu the Great, 195–196, 758, 932–933
See also Ashoka; Khomeini, Ruhollah
Musavi; Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin
Rumi, Mevlana Jalaluddin, 751–752
Ansari, 'Abdallah al- and, 54
Baha'uddin Walad and, 100
Celebi, Asaf Halet and, 167
Celebi, Husam al-Din and, 167
creativity of, 14
gods on earth and, 314
Ibn al-'Arabi and, 386
Kharaqani and, 472
Sana'i and, 764
Shams-i Tabrizi and, 100, 167, 751–752, 787–788
veneration of, 410
Yunus Emre and, 933
Rupa Goswami, 431, 752
Rupert of Deutz, 445
Rupert of Salzburg, 752–753
Rushdie, Salman, 476
Ruskin, John, 291, 551
Russia
Alexander Nevskii, 32, 33, 400, 911
holy fools, 397–398, 731
Olga, 654–655
patriotism/anticolonial resistance, 674, 676
Romanov family, 58, 743, 749
Vladimir, 136, 750, 900–901
See also Russian Orthodox Church
Russian Orthodox Church holy people
Antony of Kiev, 58–59, 852
Avvakum, 85–86, 740
Boris and Gleb, 136, 897
Cyril of Beloozero, 211–212
Demetrius of Rostov, 225–226, 339, 776
Innocent of Alaska, 396, 397, 593
John of Kronstadt, 440, 582
Joseph of Volotsk, 447, 641, 732, 863
Nikon, 59, 85, 86, 640, 687, 740
Nilus of Sora, 447, 641, 732, 776, 863, 913
Phillip of Moscow, 686–687, 693
Romanov family and, 58, 743
Seraphim of Sarov, 662, 776–777
Sergius of Radonezh, 674, 731, 777–778
Stephen of Perm, 823
Theodosius of Kiev, 59, 852
Zosima and Savatii of Solovki, 687, 945
Rusticius, 252
Rusticus, 168–169, 227
Rutebeuf, 256, 852
Ruth, 303
Rutsky, Welamin, 489
Ruzbihaniyya sufism, 106
Rwanda, 19
Ryonin, 753
S
Sa chen kun dga' snying po. See Kunga Nyingpo
Sa skya khri 'dzin Ngag dbang kun dga', 490
Sa'adatnama (Shabistari), 784
Sabas the Goth, 755
Sabas the Great, 662
Sabir, Ala al-Din, 271
Sacra conversazione, 282
Sacra parallela (John of Damascus), 439
Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints, 159–160
Sacred Heart, 31, 153, 231, 568
Sadashiva Brahmendra, 87, 569, 755–756
Saddhaka Ranjana (Kamalakanta Bhattacharya), 462
Saddharmapundrika (Lotus) Sutra
Devadatta and, 228
Manjushri and, 540
Nichiren, 637, 638
Ryonin and, 753
Saichō and, 759
Samantabhadra, 761–762
Zhiyi and, 940
See also Tendai Buddhism
Sadhus, 70, 368, 756–757, 841–842
Sadiri, 79
Sadra, Mulla, 488
Safar-namah (Mustansir), 616
Sages, 757–759
Sahajananda Swami, 316
Sahajiyas, 882–883
Sai Baba. See Sathya Sai Baba
Saichō, 759
Saints
guidance and, 330
intermediary role and, 180, 183
Orthodox Christianity, 661–662
Protestantism and, 700–702
as spiritual guardians, 817, 818
teachers as holy people and, 842
See also Canonization; Specific saints
Sakawa, 759–760
Sakya Pandita, 242, 760
Sakyasribhadra, 150
Salam, Solichin, 907
Salesians of Don Bosco, 138, 285
Salif Taal, Cerno Bokar, 760–761, 911
Salihiyya sufism, 354
Salima, 567
Salman al-Farisi, 609, 761
Salmoye, al-Hajj, 760–761
Salvation Army, 194
Samantabhadra, 761–762
Samayasara (Kundakunda), 465
Samdrup Rincen, 512
Samguk Yusa (Iryon), 875

- Samnyasis*, 25, 913
 Samson of Dol, 762
 Samthann, 498, 762–763
 Samuel, 174, 479
 Samuel of Waldebbba, 631, 763–764
Samyakasambuddhas, 143
 Samyuktabhidharmahrdya, 275
 Samyuktagama Sutra, 275
Samyutta Nikaya, 877, 881
 San trance dancers, 764
 Sana'i, Abu al-Majd Majdud, 473, 764–765
 Sanapia, 297, 765
Sanapia: Comanche Medicine Woman (Jones), 765
 Sanatana Goswami, 431, 765–766
 Sanctus, 521
 Sande, Abel, 334
 Sanggyay Gyatso, 514
Sanguo zhi yanyi, 328
 Sanka, 221
 Sanlun Buddhism, 431, 487
 Sanno Gongen, 910
Samnyasis, 368
San-pao-lun (Huiyuan), 380
 Santa Claus, 638
 Santaraksita, 585, 766–767, 882
 Santería, 767
 Adechina, 10
 Amerindian religions and, 45
 Babalú Ayé, 94
 Mora, 600 music and, 15
 orishas, 659
 Oyá, 18, 665, 789
 See also African traditional religions
 Santideva, 69, 512, 585
 Santōka, 477
Sants, 13, 332, 433, 739, 812, 813. See also Hindu holy people; Hindu poetry
 Saoshyant, 580
 Sarada Devi, 767–768
 Sarah, 5, 6, 451, 562
 Sarasvati, Bhaktisiddhanta, 122
 Saraswati, Dayanand, 25, 733
 Sari al-Saqati, Abu al-Hasan, 646, 768–769
 Sariputta. See Shariputra
 Sarraj, Abu Nasr al-, 769
Sarvajnabuddhas, 143
Sat-sandarbha (Jiva Gosvamin), 431
Satapancasataka (Matrceta), 233
 Sathya Sai Baba, 316, 573, 734, 769–770
 Satpanthis, 409
Satyagraha, 675
 Saul, 479
 Savatii of Solovki. See Zosima and Savatii of Solovki
 Savonarola, Girolamo, 552, 705, 731, 770–771
Sawanih (Ghazali), 309
 Sawyer, Birgit, 803
 Sayadaw, Mahasi, 203, 569, 771–772
 Sayed, Muhammad Ahmad ibn el-. See
 Muhammad Ahmad
Sayr al-'ibad ila'l-ma'ad (Sana'i), 765 al-Sayyid. See Badawi, Ahmad al-Schimper, Wilhelm, 414
 Scholars, 772–775
 Abbo of Fleury, 2–3, 249
 Abraham ibn Ezra, 7, 605, 773
 Ahmad al-Ahsa'i, 26, 85, 470, 774
 Albertus Magnus, 31–32, 238
 amautas, 40
 'Amili, 46
 An Shigao, 48, 750
 Anan ben David, 49, 732, 773
 Ansari, Murtada, 55, 500
 Askew, 74
 Asma'u Fodiyo Nana, 18, 75
 Baqir, 105
 Beruria, 120–121, 300
 Buddhadasa, 144, 193, 203, 774
 Buddhaghosa, 145, 774
 Buton Rinchenrup, 150–151
 Cajetan, 155
 Catherine of Alexandria, 161–162
 Dharmakirti, 77, 231–232, 774
 Dignaga, 231, 232–233
 Drokmi, 241
 Fatima Ma'suma, 273
 four captives, 279–280
 Gargi, 293, 300, 369, 927
 Gregory of Nyssa, 326, 327, 775, 915
 Hillel, 279, 340, 366
 Hilli, 367, 500
 Hugh of Saint Victor, 378–379, 445
 Ishmael ben Elisha, 29, 404–405, 553,
 772–773
 Isidore of Seville, 405, 502
 Jamgon Kongtrul, 422–423, 774
 Jizzini, 432
 Judah ha-Nasi, 449–450
 Judah Loew ben Bezalel, 450
 Justin Martyr, 457–458
 Kumarajiva, 431, 487, 773
 Majlisi, 500, 532–533
 Malik Sy, 534–535, 911
 Meir of Rothenburg, 575–576, 773
 Miphram Rinpoche, 585–586
 Mirza Hasan Shirazi, 590
 More, 277, 601–602
 Moses ben Maimon, 340–341, 453, 500,
 604–605, 727, 773
 Moses ben Nahman, 453, 459, 605, 618
 Nafisa, 221, 357–358, 504, 619
 Nichiren, 637
 Rabbenu Tam, 715
 Rashi, 450, 453, 605, 715, 726–727, 773
 Shabistari, 783–784
 Sthiramati, 233, 823–824
 Sulami, 128, 339, 713, 715, 828–829
 Tusi, Nasir al-Din at-, 349, 488, 870–871
 Tusi, at- (Shaykh at-Ta'ifah), 870
 Uich'on, 177, 875
 Vyasaraya, 902–903
 Yeshe Tsogyal, 193, 300, 524, 929–930
 Zeno, 937
 Zhisheng, 939
 Zhou Dunyi, 197, 198, 938, 940–941
 Zongmi, 174, 244, 943
See also Akiba ben Joseph; Augustine of Hippo; Bede; Catherine of Siena; Jilani,
 'Abdul al-Qadir; Lawgivers; Zhu Xi
 Schutz, Roger, 203
 Schweitzer, Albert, 425, 427, 730
Science and Health: With a Key to the Scriptures
 (Eddy), 248
 Scientists, 843–844, 930
Scivias (Hildegard of Bingen), 365
SDom gsum rab dbye (Sakya Pandita), 760
 Se ston kun rig, 241, 489
 Sebaste, Forty Martyrs of, 775
 Sebastião, Rei Dom, 201
 Seclusion. See Monasticism
 Second Great Awakening, 812
 Second Vatican Council, 203, 436, 719, 732–733 Secular vatican. See Retreat vs. secular activity Secular Judaism, 454–455
 Seers
 African traditional religions, 17–18
 ancient Greek, 156, 299, 321, 570–571, 576,
 600, 699, 700, 802, 860
 Apollonius of Tyana, 63
 sibyls, 299, 321, 700, 802
Sefer ha-Bahir, 459
Sefer ha-Mizvoth (Moses ben Maimon), 604
Sefer ha-Zohar, 459
Sefer Hasidim, 352, 450
Sefer Or Zarua (Isaac ben Moses), 48
Seferha-Kuzari (Halevi), 342
Seikaron (Ishida Baigan), 404
 Seisho. See Kodōjin
Seisho, 481
Sekitar Wali Songo (Salam), 907
 Seleucid dynasty, 322–323, 571
 Seleukos, 571
 Semele, 363
 Seminole people, 731
 Sendeu, 392
 Seneca, 319, 320, 705
 Seneca people, 205
 Senegal
 Diola prophets, 37–38, 77, 222, 233–234, 675, 699, 740
 Limamou Laye, 509–510, 734
 Malik Sy, 534–535, 911
 Niasse, 636–637, 693, 887
 See also Bamba, Ahmad
 Sengsten Gampo, 750, 775–776
 Seng-ts'an, 553, 631
Senshindō sakki (Ōshio Heihachirō), 663
 Serah bat Asher, 80, 504, 776
 Seraphim of Sarov, 662, 776–777
 Seraphim Society, 4
 Serapion of Thmuis, 76, 539
 Serf, 471

- Sergius and Bacchus, 777, 781
 Sergius I, 696
 Sergius of Radonezh, 674, 731, 777–778
 Servatius of Maastricht, 127
 Servetus, Michael, 158
 Seton, Elizabeth, 778–779
 Setsün, 242
 Setuuma, 779
Seven against Thebes (Aeschylus), 652
 Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove, 601, 779–780
 Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, 504, 780
The Seven Storey Mountain (Merton), 580
 Seventh-Day Adventism, 299, 585, 916
 Severus of Ashmunayn, 88
 Sexism, 194. See also Female holy people; Gender Sexuality, 780–783
 Bauls, 110, 782
 Christian asceticism and, 182
 homosexuality, 13, 119, 777, 780–781 martyrdom and, 23–24
 mysticism and, 617
 Naths and, 630, 782
 Santaraksita and, 766–767
 siddhas and, 149
 Swami Muktananda and, 331
 Vaishnava Sahajiyas and, 614, 883
 Virashaivism and, 527, 898
 See also Tantra; Virginity
Sgom rim thog mtha'bar gsum (Kamalashila), 463
 Shabbetai Zevi, 582, 734, 783
 Shabistari, Mahmud ash-, 783–784
 Shafi'i, Muhammad ibn Idris al-, 619
 Shah Abdul Latif, 149
 Shah Jahan (Mughal Emperor), 346
 Shah Waliullah, 149
Shaha jo risalo (Latif), 498
 Shaheed Baba Dip Singh, 806
 Shahrastani, 388
 Shahrazuri, 388
 Shaivite traditions, 122
 Gorakhnath, 317
 Lalla, 494–495
 Naths, 317, 369, 370, 629–630, 782
 nayanars, 14, 121, 632, 820
 sadhus, 757
 See also Virashaivism
 Shaka, 594
 Shaka ka Senzangakhona, 400, 784–785
 Shakers, 297, 503–504, 582, 781, 812
 Shakra, 785
 Shaku Söen, 785–786
Shaku Söen Zenshū (Shaku Söen), 786
 Shakyamuni Buddha. See Gautama Buddha
 Shamanism, 786–787
 Daoism and, 217
 drug use and, 262–263
 En no Ozunu and, 258
 intermediary role and, 399
 Nakayama Miki and, 623–624
 sadhus and, 756
 Setuuma, 779
 Shammai, 366
 Shams-i Tabrizi, 100, 167, 751–752, 787–788
 Shan Tao, 779
 Shanakavasin, 877
 Shanavasika, 28
 Shangó, 65, 665, 788–789
 Shangqing dao, 215
 Shankara, 368, 369, 789–790
 as child prodigy, 175
 Chinmayananda and, 176
 Krishnamurti and, 485
 Madhva and, 525
 Maharshi and, 528
 monasticism and, 597
 Ramanuja and, 724
 sadhus and, 757
 Shivnarayan and, 797
 Vivekananda and, 899
 Vyasaraya and, 903
 Shankararanya Puri, 717
 Shantarakashita, 462
 Shanti Sena, 122–123
 Shan-tao, 372
 Shao Yong, 197
Shari'a. See Lawgivers
 Shariputra, 228, 235, 595, 719, 790
 Sharqawi, Abu 'l-Wafa' al-, 790, 791
 Sharqawi al-Khalafi, Ahmad, 790–791
 Shastri, Shyama, 791
Shatapatha-Brahmana, 738
Shathiyat, 105
 Shawnee Prophet. See Tenskwtawa
 Shehu. See Uthman dan Fodio
 Sheldon, Charles Monroe, 394
 Shembe, Isaiah, 52, 792
 Shen Nong, 195, 196
 Sheng tipo. See Aryadeva
 Shen-hsiu. See Shenxiu
 Shenhui, 379
Shenxian zhuan (Ge Hong), 215, 296
 Shenxiu, 374, 379, 729, 792
 Sheranvali. See Gumtivala Mata
 Shi Le (Emperor of China), 277, 329
 Shiban Mangen, 339
 al-Shibli of Baghdad, 398
 Shi'i imams, 392–393
 Aga Khan I (Hassan 'Ali), 20–21
 Aga Khan II (Ali Shah), 21, 37
 Aga Khan III (Sultan Muhammad Shah), 21–22, 37
 Aga Khan IV, 22–23
 'Ali ibn al-Husayn, 36–37, 409, 588
 'Aziz-billah, 88–89
 Baqir, 104–105
 Hakim, 341
 Hasan al-'Askari, 349–350, 531
 Hasan b. 'Ali, 350
 Hasan II, 348–349
 Hasan III, 349
 hereditary holiness, 357, 408
 Husayn b. 'Ali, 88, 382–383, 475, 888
 intermediary role and, 399
 Jalal al-Din Hasan III, 348–349, 420–421, 749
 Kazim, 469–470
 Mahdi, al-, 531, 582–583, 692
 Mahdi, 'Abd Allah al-, 530–531
 Mansur, al-, 541
 Muhammad b. Isma'il b. Ja'far, 612
 Mu'izz, 612–613
 Mustansir, 351, 616
 Qasim, 709
 Taqi Muhammad, 839–840
 Wafi Ahmad, 905
 warfare and, 911
 Zahir, 935
 See also 'Ali ibn Abi Talib; Isma'ili Muslims
 Shi'i Islam
 Ahmad al-Ahsa'i, 25–26, 85, 470, 774, 835
 'Amili, 46
 Ansari, Murtada, 55, 500
 authority of holy people, 85
 Bihbihani, 123–124, 500
 Burujirdi, 150, 911
 Fatima Ma'suma, 273
 hagiography, 338
 Hilli, 367, 500
 intermediary role, 399
 Ja'far as-Sadiq, 415, 500
 Jizzini, 432
 Kazim Rashti, 92, 470, 730, 835
 lawgivers, 500
 Majlisi, 500, 532–533
 martyrdom/persecution, 551, 553
 messiah beliefs, 582–583
 Mirza Hasan Shirazi, 500, 590
 Pir Sultan Abdal, 688, 693
 politics and, 691, 692
 reform, 731, 733
 rulers as holy people, 749
 Tusi, Nasir al-Din at-, 349, 488, 870–871
 Tusi, at- (Shaykh at-Ta'ifah), 870
 veneration of holy people, 888
 See also Islam; Isma'ili Muslims; Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi; Muslim holy people; Shi'i imams
 Shi'ia Imami Nizari Isma'ili Muslims. See Isma'ili Muslims
Shindaikan koretari shō (Yoshikawa Koretari), 931
 Shingaku, 403–404
 Shingon (True Word) Buddhism, 486, 759, 882
 Shinran, 373, 400, 492, 735, 782, 793
 Shinto, 793–797
 apotheosis, 65–66, 796–797
 compassion, 194
 Confucianism and, 198, 794, 795
 creativity, 14
 gods on earth, 316

- Shinto (continued)
 patriotism/anticolonial resistance and, 674
 rulers as holy people, 748, 795–796
 Tokugawa Mitsukuni and, 862
 veneration of holy people, 887
See also Shinto holy people
- Shintō daii kōdan* (Yoshikawa Koretari), 931
- Shinto holy people
 Fujiwara no Kamatari, 65, 286
 Kamikaze of World War II, 65, 463, 674
 Meiji Tennō, 65, 574–575, 644, 674
 Nogi Maresuke and Shizuko, 65, 655
 Ōjin, 65, 653–654, 910
 Sugawara no Michizane, 796, 827
 Tokugawa Ieyasu, 65, 287, 354, 796–797, 861
 Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 674, 796, 864–865
 Yoshikawa Koretari, 931
- Shirazi, Sayyid ‘Ali Muhammad. See Bab, The Shiva, 527
- Shivnarayan, 797
- Shoah, 353, 497, 551, 798, 821. See also Nazi Germany
- Shobogenzo* (Dogen), 236
- Shodaiba. See Aryadeva
- Shodaiji, 429
- Shoghi Effendi, 798–799
 appointment of, 97, 98
 Bahíyyih Khánum and, 102, 103
 Gregory, Louis and, 323
 hereditary holiness and, 358
 Olinga and, 655
 Ransom-Kehler and, 726
 Root and, 746
 Rúhíyyih Khánum and, 748
- Shoko Asahara, 266
- Shomangyo gisho*, 818
- Shōmu, 750, 799–800
- Shona people, 434
- Shoshi hatto*, 354
- Shotoku, 750, 796, 800
- Shramanas*, 739, 756, 800–801
- Shripadaraya, 801–802
- Shugendō, 258
- Shuho Myocho, 221
- Shulkhan Arukh* (Karo), 466
- Shun, 195, 196
- Shvetambara Jainism, 418, 419
 Bhikshu, 123, 732
 Haribhadra, 346, 863
 Hemacandra, 355–356
 Kanji Swami and, 464–465
 Mahavira and, 530
 Malli and, 535
 Tulsi, 203, 868–869
- Siberia, 262
- Sibylline Books, 802
- Sibyls, 299, 321, 700, 802–803
- Siddhartha. See Gautama Buddha
- Siddhas*, 148–149, 317, 630
- Sigfrid of Växjö, 803
- Sijzi, Amir Hasan ibn Ala, 643
- Sijzi Dihlawi, Hasan, 476
- Sikh holy people
 Amardas, 39–40, 67, 804
 Arjan, 67, 345, 725, 804–805, 889
 Dayal, 220
 Gobind Singh, 175, 220, 312–313, 595, 803, 805–806, 889
 Har Rai, 345, 805
 Hargobind, 345–346, 805, 911
 Ramdas, 39, 67, 358, 724–725, 804
 Tegh Bahadur, 312, 552, 805, 843
See also Nanak
- Sikhism, 803–806
 authority of holy people, 85
bhakti Hinduism and, 370
 child prodigies, 175
 creativity, 13
 extremists, 266
 Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar and, 271
 founder of, 279
 gurus, 332
 hagiography, 338
 hereditary holiness, 67, 345, 358
 Hinduism and, 370, 803
 holy people as models, 595
 intermediary role, 400
 Kabir and, 460, 806
 martyrdom/persecution, 67, 551, 552, 553, 804–805, 806, 843
 monasticism and, 596
 Namdev and, 40, 624, 806
 purity/pollution and, 705
 Ravidas and, 40, 727
 ritual and, 739
 teachers as holy people, 842
 veneration of holy people, 889
 violence/nonviolence, 897
 warfare, 911
- Silla Kingdom, 170–171
- Silouan, 662
- Silverius, 696
- Silvester I, 695, 807
- Simandhara Swami, 465
- Simeon bar Kokhba (also Simon b. Kochba), 29, 582, 672, 674
- Simeon ben Yohai, 8, 254–255, 807–808
- Simeon of Trier, 808
- Simeon the New Theologian, 231, 618, 808–809
- Simeon the Studite, 808
- Simeon the Stylite, 72, 95, 213, 228, 595, 809
- Simlai, 453
- Simmun hwajaengnon* (Wonhyo), 921
- Simon of Trent, 58
- Simplicius, 696
- Sinan, Rashid-al-din, 348
- Sinell, 401
- Singh, Mann, 220
- Singh, Sundar, 809–810
- Sioux people
 Black Elk, 129
- Crazy Horse, 207, 910
 creation stories, 42
 ritual, 739
 Sitting Bull, 45, 72, 699, 810–811, 922
 Tailfeather Woman, 299, 836, 911
 Wovoka and, 912–913
- Sippure HaMaasiyot shel Rabbi Nahman MiBratislav* (Nahman of Bratslav), 622
- Siricius, 696
- Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, 240, 241
- Sita, 363
- Sitting Bull, 45, 72, 699, 810–811, 922
- Sixtus I, 695
- Sixtus II, 695
- Sixtus III, 696
- Sixtus IV, 38
- Siyar al-Auliya* (Mir Khurd), 178
- Sky Woman, 186, 205
- Slavery
 Brown and, 142, 266
 Claver and, 187
 compassion and, 194
 Delany and, 224
 Eddy and, 248
 Makandal and, 65, 533
 Maroon Nanny and, 547–548
 Santeria and, 767
 Slessor and, 811
 Sojourner Truth and, 814
 Nat Turner and, 79, 869–870
- Slessor, Mary, 811
- Slocum, John, 222
- Smith, Joseph, 279, 553, 699, 812, 932
- Smotrycky, Meletius, 489
- Snefru, 686
- Snorri Sturluson, 654
- Snyder, Gary, 830
- Soamiji, 812–813
- Social activism
 Agnivesh, 25, 693, 733
 Bakhita, 103
 Bhave, 122–123
 Bowman, 138–139
 Brown, 142, 266, 595, 897, 898
 Buddhadasa, 144
 Buddhism and, 193
 contemporary holy people and, 203–204
 Day, 219–220, 898, 914
 Fox, 281
 Fry, 194, 285–286
 Gandhi, 204, 291–292, 693
 Garvey, 294
 Gyogi Bosatsu, 335
 Judaism and, 455
 King, 195, 203–204, 479–480, 693
 Mandela, 538, 693
 Peace Pilgrim, 681, 911
 politics and, 693
 Romero, 194, 204, 552, 693, 744, 745
 Tulsi, 868
 Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872

- Vincent de Paul, 165, 194, 895, 914
 Wesley, 915–916
 Society of Bollandists, 339
 Society of Friends. See Quakerism
 Society of Jesus. See Jesuits
 Society of Muslim Brothers, 194
 Socrates, 319, 320, 813–814
 Asklepios and, 74
 hagiography, 338
 insanity and, 396
 martyrdom/persecution and, 551
 Plato and, 689, 813
 on prophecy, 321
 as scholar, 772
 Söderblom, Nathan, 730
 Soissons, Council of, 645
 Sojourner Truth, 814
 Sol, 395
 Solomon, 479
 Solomon b. Isaac of Troyes. See Rashi
 Soloviev, Sergei, 86
 Soma, 262
 Somalia, 354
 Sonam Gyatso (Dalai Lama III), 729, 814–815
Song of Moses and the Lamb (Southcott), 817
 Songhay Empire, 35, 749
 Sophia, 815–816
 Sophocles, 363, 571, 651, 652, 772, 817, 860
 Sophronius, 564
 Sosan Hyujong, 910
 Soter, 695
 Soubirous, Bernadette, 174, 816–817
 South Africa
 Lekganyane, 505
 Mandela, 204, 538, 693, 730, 872
 Shembe, 52, 792
 Tutu, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
 Southcott, Joanna, 582, 817
 Southwell, Robert, 260
 Spangenberg, Augustus Gottlieb, 519
Speaking of Siva (Ramanujan), 527
Speculum caritatis (Aelred of Rievaulx), 13
 Spener, Jakob, 519
Sphut Vani (Harivansh), 347
 Spirit mediums, 400, 633
 “Spiritual Canticle” (John of the Cross), 441
The Spiritual Exercises (Ignatius of Loyola), 375, 390, 394
 Spiritual Franciscans, 168, 224, 913
 Spiritual friendship, 184
 Spiritual guardians, 817–818
 Spondeva, 432
Spring and Autumn Annals, 198
Sri Bhasya (Ramanuja), 724
 Sri Vaishnavism
 Andal, 52–53
 Nammalvar, 624–625, 820
 Ramanand and, 723–724
 Ramanuja, 231, 368, 724, 773, 885, 903
 Srimala, 818–819
 Srimaladevisimhanada Sutra, 818
 Srong btsan sgam po. See Sengsten Gampo
 Stael-Holstein, A. von, 823
 Stadel, Elspeth, 830
 Stanislaus of Cracow, 693, 819
 Stans, Council of, 639
 Status, 819–820
 Stecher, Reinhold, 58
 Stein, Edith, 820–821
 Stephen, 181, 821–822
 Stephen I, 695
 Stephen of Hungary, 674, 750, 822
 Stephen of Muret, 822–823
 Stephen of Perm, 823
 Sthiramati, 233, 823–824
 Stigmata
 Clare of Montefalco, 187
 devotion and, 231
 Francis of Assisi, 231, 284, 826
 Galgani, 289
 Giuliani, 311, 312
 Marie d’Oignies, 545
 Stobeus, 358
 Stoicism, 166, 320, 321, 458, 690, 704
Store of Precious Treasure, 423
Story of a Soul (Thérèse of Lisieux), 853
The Strange Effects of Faith (Southcott), 817
 Strength, 79
 Stylite saints, 72, 95, 213, 228, 595, 809
 Subhakarasingha, 930
 Subhuti, 235, 824–825
 Subramanyam, 233
 Suda, 322
 Sudan, 18–19, 103, 354, 583, 611–612, 675
 Sudurjaya, 232
 Suetonius, 425
 Suffering, 825–826. See also Asceticism;
 Martyrdom/persecution
 Sufi holy people
 ‘Abata, 2
 Adham, 11–12, 71, 820
 Asma’u Fodiyo Nana, 18, 75
 ‘Attar, 12, 54, 78, 715, 764
 Badawi, 95–96, 219
 Baha’uddin Naqshband, 99, 217, 472, 492
 Baha’uddin Walad, 100
 Baqli, 105–106
 Bektash Wali, 113–114, 410, 933
 Bistami, 105, 128, 229, 472, 590, 617
 Bullhe Shah, 149–150
 Celebi, Husam al-Din, 167, 752
 Chiragh-i Dihli, 177–178, 311, 359, 781, 842
 Chishti, 14, 178
 compassion and, 194
 Dard, 217–218
 Dasuqi, 219
 Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar, 71, 271, 587 al-Ghazali, Abu Hamid, 308–309, 329, 473, 764, 784, 826 al-Ghazali, Ahmad, 309
 Gisudaraz, 178, 311
 Hallaj, 105, 342–343, 388, 398, 493, 552, 617
 Hassan, 354, 675
 Hujwiri, 54, 380–381, 408, 818
 Jili, 430
 Kaygusuz Abdal, 14, 469, 933
 Kharaqani, 54, 471–472
 Khayyam, 14, 472–474
 Khusrau, 476, 643
 Kunawi, 385, 488–489
 Lal Shahbaz Qalandar, 493
 Latif, 498–499
 Malik Sy, 534–535, 911
 al-Misri, Dhu’n-nun, 388, 590–591, 597, 617, 632
 Muhammad Ahmad, 354, 583, 611–612, 675
 Mukhtar ibn Ahmad, 613
 Nasafi, 628–629
 Niasse, 636–637, 693, 887
 Nizami, 492, 643
 Nizamuddin Auliya, 178, 271, 408–409, 476, 643
 Nuri, 646
 Qushayri, 409, 617, 712–713, 764
 Rabi’a al-Adawiyya, 109, 299, 300, 715–716
 Radwan, 194, 398, 717
 Rifa’i, 95, 219, 410, 587, 737
 Sari al-Saqati, 646, 768–769
 Sarraj, 769
 Shabistari, 783–784
 Shams-i Tabrizi, 100, 167, 751–752, 787–788
 al-Sharqawi, Abu ‘l-Wafa’, 791
 Sharqawi al-Khalafi, Ahmad, 790–791
 Suhrawardi, 388, 410, 488, 601, 692, 827–828
 Sulami, 128, 339, 713, 715, 828–829
 Tapduk Emre, 839
 Tijani, 826, 857–858
 Uthman dan Fodio, 14, 18, 613, 879–880, 911
 Yunus Emre, 14, 167, 229, 688, 839, 933–934
 Zakariyya, 493, 558, 559, 740, 935–936
See also Bamba, Ahmad; Ibn al-‘Arabi;
 Jilani, ‘Abdul al-Qadir; Rumi, Mevlana
 Jalaluddin; Sufism
 Sufism, 826–827
 ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib and, 36
 asceticism, 2, 71, 95, 430, 591
 Basri and, 110
 compassion, 193
 creativity, 14
 devotion, 229, 231
 discipleship, 235
 eremitism, 359
 guidance, 329, 330
 hereditary holiness, 2, 358, 790–791
 insanity and, 398
 ‘Isa (Jesus) and, 429
 joy, 448
 lawgivers and, 500
 Majlisi and, 532
 martyrdom/persecution, 552
 miracles, 587

- Sufism (continued)
 monasticism and, 597
 morality, 601
 mysticism, 617
 nature, 631–632
 Radhasoami tradition and, 813
 retreat vs. secular activity, 8
 ritual, 740
 spiritual guardians, 818
 status and, 820
 teachers as holy people, 842
 veneration of holy people, 2, 178, 887, 888
See also Sufi holy people
- Sugawara no Michizane, 796, 827
- Suger of St.-Denis, 227
- Suhbat*, 99
- Suhrawardi, Shihabuddin, 388, 410, 488, 601, 692, 827–828
- Suhrawardi sufism, 498, 936
- Suicide, 897
- Suicide bombers, 675
- Sukhavativyuha Sutras, 47
- Sulami, Abu 'Abd ar-Rahman, 128, 339, 713, 715, 828–829
- Sulpicius Severus, 252, 360, 550
- Sultan Muhammad Shah. See Aga Khan III
- Sultan Walad. See Baha'uddin Walad
- Summa Contra Gentiles* (Thomas Aquinas), 855
- Summa de casibus Poenitentialibus* (Raymund of Peñafort), 728
- Summa Doctrina Christianae* (Canisius), 158
- Summa Theologiae* (Thomas Aquinas), 394, 658, 855
- Sun Bu'er, 216
- Sun dance ritual, 810
- Sung Kao-seng Chuan*, 875
- Sung-yuan, 391
- Sunni Islam
 'Ali ibn al-Husayn and, 36–37
 Basri, 110
 death, 222
 hagiography, 338
 Hasan III and, 349
 Ja'far as-Sadiq, 415, 500
 Jalal al-Din Hasan III and, 420–421, 749
 Majlisi and, 533
 politics and, 692
 reform and, 733
 Tusi, at- (Shaykh at-Ta'ifah) and, 870
See also Islam; Muslim holy people; Sufi holy people; Sufism
- Supernatural powers. See Miracles
- Sur Sagar* (Surdas), 829
- Surb Sahak. See Isaac of Armenia
- Surdas, 122, 829
- Suryavarman II (King of Cambodia), 749
- Suso, Henry, 829–830
- Sustenance. See Economic activities
- Sutra on the Origins of Dizang Bodhisattva*, 486
- Sutramahamudra, 290
- Suzuki, Daisetz Teitarō, 786, 830
- Suzuki Daisetsu Zenshū* (Suzuki), 830
- Sviatopolk, 136
- Swadhyaya*, 668–669
- Sweden
 Birgitta of Sweden, 125–126
 Eric IX Jedvardsson, 261–262, 750
 Sigfrid of Växjö, 803
- Swedenborg, Emanuel, 172, 810
- Sweet Medicine, 630, 759, 831
- Swithin, 831–832
- Sylvester. See Silvester I
- Symeon. See Simeon
- Symmachus, 696
- Symposium* (Plato), 320, 689
- Syncretism, 52
 Bauls, 110, 370, 396, 782
 Coltrane, 14–15, 190–191, 203
 En no Ozunu, 71, 258
 Gnosticism, 401
 Griffiths, 327–328, 502
 Handsome Lake, 343–344
 Le Sauz, 502
 Masinde, 18, 203, 398, 560, 657
 Meher Baba, 316, 574
 Merton, 580
 Moon, 204, 582, 599
 mysticism and, 618
 Neoplatonism, 690
 Ōjin, 654
 Osho, 663
 Pandurangshastri Athavale-Dada, 668–669
 Rajcandra, 720
 Shembe, 52, 792
 Soamiji, 812–813
 Sugawara no Michizane, 827
 Tokugawa Ieyasu and, 861
 Vaishnava Sahajiyas, 883
- Syrianus, 698
- Systematic Theology: The Courage to Be* (Tillich), 858
- T
- Ta Hui, 177
- Tabaqat al-sufiya* (Abdallah al-Ansari), 55
- Tabaqat al-sufiyya* (Sulami), 828
- al-Tabi'un*, 109
- Table-talk* (Luther), 519, 520
- Tabrizi, Jalal al-Din, 271
- Tacitus, 425
- Tadhkirat* (Attar), 715–716
- Tadhkiratu'l-vafa* ('Abdu'l-Baha), 98
- Tagami Michi. See Kikusha-ni
- Taghlib, Aban b., 37
- Tagore, Rabindranath, 110
- Tahdhib al-Wusul* (Hilli), 367
- at-Tahdhib* (at-Tusi), 870
- Tahirih, 92, 97, 98, 100, 300, 835
- Tai Hsü. See Taixu
- Tai Situ Pema Nyinje Wangpo, 423
- Taichi, 940
- Taigiroku* (Kaibara Ekiken), 461
- Tailfeather Woman, 299, 836, 911
- Taiping Rebellion, 85, 373–374, 928
- Taishan niangniang. See Bixia Yuanjun
- Taisho Tripitaka*, 275
- Taitazak, Joseph, 466
- Taixu, 222, 836, 928
- Taizé, 203, 913
- Takla Haymanot, 72, 174, 837, 887
- Tal, al-Haji Umar, 535, 761
- Talmud, 773. See also Judaism; Scholars
- Tambo, Oliver, 538
- Tamoanchan, 176
- Tan Chuduan, 216
- Tansen, 347
- Tansi, Cyprian Michael Iwene, 837–838
- Tantra*
 Asanga and, 69
 Gurumayi Swami Chidvilasananda, 330–331
 gurus, 332
 miracles, 587
 monasticism and, 597
 Santarakshita, 766–767
 sexuality and, 782
 Shinto and, 794, 795
 Vairocana and, 882
 Vaishnava Sahajiyas and, 883
See also Hinduism; Tibetan Buddhism; Vaishnava Hinduism
- Tantrasara* (Krishnananda Agamavagisa), 485
- Tanzania, 19, 480–481
- Tao Hongjing, 329, 399, 838
- T'ao Hung-ching. See Tao Hongjing
- Tao Qian, 482
- Tao Te Ching*. See Daode jing
- Tao-an. See Daoan
- Taorigiku* (Kikusha-ni), 477
- Tapas*, 70, 838–839
- Tapduk Emre, 839
- Tapovanand, 176
- Taqi Muhammad, 839–840
- Taqi Sijistani, Muhammad, 54
- Tara, 77, 840–841
- Taranatha, 28
- Tarkatandava* (Vyasaraya), 903
- Tashi Lhunpo monastery, 301
- Ta-sui Fa-chen, 359
- Tatacharya, 464
- Tatia, Nathmal, 869
- Tattvartha Sutra, 720
- Tauler, Johannes, 830
- Tawahedo Church, 156
- Taymiyyah, Ahmad ibn, 704
- Tayyib, Muhammad al-, 841
- Tazkiratul-awliya'* (Attar), 12
- Teachers as holy people, 8, 841–843
- Tecumseh, 730–731, 845
- Tegh Bahadur, 312, 552, 805, 843
- Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 84, 843–844
- Tekakwitha. See Kateri Tekakwitha
- Telesphorus, 695

- Templeton Prize, 730
 Ten Martyrs, 844
 Tendai Buddhism, 637, 753, 759, 793, 797
 Tenjin, 66
 Tenochtitlan, 43–44
 Tenrikyō, 299, 316, 623–624, 699
 Tenshō Kōtai Jingu Kyō, 481
 Tensho Kotai Jingu kyō, 14
 Tenskwatawa, 221–222, 630, 675, 700, 730–731, 825, 845–846
 Tenzin Gyatso (Dalai Lama XIV), 203, 692, 730, 734, 845–846
 Terapanthi Jainism, 123
 Teresa of Avila, 846–848
 Catholic Reformation and, 165, 618
 gender and, 299
 hagiography and, 339
 John of the Cross and, 441
 scholars as holy people and, 775
 Stein and, 821
 Teresa of Calcutta, 85, 183, 204, 848
 Teresia Benedicta a Cruce. See Stein, Edith Terrorism, 266
 Tertons, 682, 733–734
 Tertullian, 526, 543, 598
 Teshima Toan, 404
 “Testament” (Nilus of Sora), 641
The Testament of the Forty Martyrs of Christ, 775
 Tetta, 511
Tevaram, 632
 Tezcatlipoca, 88, 710, 849
 Thales, 319
 Thaqafi, Muhammad b. Muslim al-, 415
Thar pa rin po chi’i rgyan (Gampopa), 290–291
 Theano, 705
 Theban Legion, 563–564, 849–850, 911
 Thecla of Iconium, 850
 Theodora (Byzantine Empress), 389
 Theodore, 850–851
 Theodore of Canterbury. See Theodore of Tarsus
 Theodore of Tarsus, 50, 169, 851
 Theodore Stratilates, 850, 851
 Theodore the Studite, 704, 851–852
 Theodosius (Emperor), 325
 Theodosius (Fedor) of the Cave Monastery, 59
 Theodosius of Kiev, 59, 852
 Theophilus the Penitent, 852–853
 Theosophical Society, 484
 Theragatha, 720, 881
 Theravada Buddhism
 Ajatashatru, 28
 Buddhadasa, 144, 193, 203, 774
 Buddhaghosa, 145, 774
 buddhas, 143
 compassion, 193
 Devadatta, 228
 hagiography, 338
 meditation, 569
 Moggallana, 228, 235, 595–596, 790, 881
 Nagasena, 621
 Sayadaw, 203, 569, 771–772
 veneration of holy people, 888
 Thérèse of Lisieux, 853–854
 Theseus, 361, 571, 652, 817, 854, 910
 Thich Nhat Hanh, 193
 Thích Quang Đức, 553
 Third Rome theory, 640
 Tholuck, August, 783
 Thomas, 854–855
 Thomas à Kempis, 394, 915
 Thomas Aquinas, 855–856
 Albertus Magnus and, 31, 32
 Cajetan and, 155
 Dominic and, 238
 Hilary of Poitiers and, 364
 on imitation of Christ, 394
 on Joseph, 445
 Merton and, 580
 on mysticism, 617
 Origen and, 658
 as scholar, 774
 Thomas Becket, 254, 692, 856, 913
 Thomas of Cantimpré, 546
 Thomas of Monmouth, 918
 Thong Dorje, 465
 Thoreau, Henry David, 142
 Thorlákur Thórhallsson, 856–857
 Thorn, Lambert von, 901
 Thoth, 358, 388
Thub-pa’i dGongs-gsal (Sakya Pandita), 760
 Thurman, Howard, 195
 Tian, 200
 Tianhou, 857
Tianming, 197
Tianming. See Mandate of heaven
 Tiantai Buddhism, 175, 940. See also Tendai Buddhism Tibetan Buddhism
 authority of holy people, 85
 awakening/conversion, 87
 bodhisattvas, 148
 Buddhapalita and, 146, 733
 child prodigies, 174
 compassion, 193
 ecumenism and, 203
 eremitism, 359
 gods on earth, 316
 gurus, 332
 hereditary holiness, 357
 insanity and, 396
 Karmapa reincarnation lineage, 465–466, 734
 lamas, 148, 495, 513, 749 mahasiddhas and, 529, 859
 Manjushri, 540
 Naropa and, 627
 Padmasambhava and, 667–668, 734, 865
 recognition, 729
 reincarnation, 733–734
 rulers as holy people, 749, 750
 Santaraksita and, 766, 882
 sexuality and, 782
 siddhas, 148–149
 teachers as holy people, 842
 tertons, 682, 733–734
 Vairocana and, 882
 violence/nonviolence, 898
 See also Tibetan Buddhist holy people
 Tibetan Buddhist holy people
 Atisha, 76–77, 174–175, 242, 504, 512, 592, 929
 Buton Rinchendrup, 150–151
 Chandrakirti, 146, 171, 512, 587, 733
 Drokmi, 241
 Drom Tonpa, 242, 316
 Drukpa Kunley, 242, 396, 782
 Gampopa, 87, 290–291, 316, 569, 584
 Gendun drubpa, 79, 301
 Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen, 334–335
 Jamgon Kongtrul, 422–423, 774
 Kamalashila, 85, 87, 462–463, 587, 592, 930
 Khedrup Jey, 474, 774
 Kunga Nyinpo, 241, 357, 489–490
 Longchenpa, 512–513
 Losang Gyatso, 8, 513–514, 682, 749
 Machig Labdrön, 298–299, 524, 774
 Marpa, 465, 492, 548, 584, 736
 Mipham Rinpoche, 585–586
 Pemalingpa, 682
 Sakya Pandita, 242, 760
 Sengsten Gampo, 750, 775–776
 Sonam Gyatso, 729, 814–815
 Tenzin Gyatso, 203, 692, 730, 734, 845–846
 Trisong de Tsen, 462, 463, 668, 865, 882
 Vairotsana, 221, 552, 773, 882
 Yeshe Od, 929
 Yeshe Tsogyal, 193, 300, 524, 929–930
 See also Milarepa; Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa
 Tiburtius, 166
 T’ien-hou. See Tianhou
 Tigre people (Eritrea), 8–9
 Tijani, Ahmad al-, 826, 857–858
 Tijaniyya sufism, 534–535, 636–637, 826, 858
Tikkun olam, 454
 Tillich, Paul, 195, 775, 858–859
 Tilopa, 465, 528–529, 627–628, 859–860
Timaeus (Plato), 689, 705, 706
 Tinga, Maria, 559
 Tiresias, 156, 321, 699, 860
 Tirmidhi, al-Hakim al-, 409
Tirthankaras, 79, 87, 418–420, 733. See also Jain holy people
Tirumurai, 632
 “Tiruppavai” (Andal), 52
Tiruvaymoli (Nammalvar), 625
 Titu Cusi Yupanqui, 860–861
 Titus, 236
 Titus of Bostra, 539
 Tiwari, Ram Chandra, 797
 Tlaccelēl, 525
 Tlaloc, 44

- Tlatoani*, 44, 400, 636
 Tlazoteotl, 44
 Toadaiji temple, 335
 Todarmal, 465
 Todjai Diatta, 234
Tohi mondō (Ishida Baigan), 404
 Tokugawa Ieyasu, 65, 287, 354, 796–797, 861–862
 Tokugawa Mitsukuni, 862–863
Tokugawa Religion (Bellah), 404
 Toledo, Fourth Council of, 405
Toledot Ya'acquov Yosef (Jacob Joseph), 91
 Tolerance. See Intolerance
 Tolstoy, Leo, 291
 Toltec people, 220
Tome (Leo the Great), 507
 Tommaso de Vio. See Cajetan
 Toporkov, Dosifei, 447
 Torah, 451–453, 772–773. See also Jewish holy people; Judaism
 Toral and Jesal, 864
A Torchlight for America (Farrakhan), 272
 Tosh, Peter, 340
 Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 674, 796, 864–865
 Track to Heaven, 4–5
Traite de l'amour de Dieu (Francis of Sales), 285
 Trance, 786. See also Shamanism
Translatio et miracula S. Swithuni (Lantfred), 831–832
 Translators. See Scholars
 Transvestite saints, 298
Trattato (Catherine of Genoa), 162
Treatise on Virginity (Gregory of Nyssa), 326
 Trent, Council of,
 Bellarmine and, 114
 Borromeo and, 136, 137
 Canisius and, 158
 Catholic Reformation saints and, 164, 165
 Francis of Sales and, 285
 monasticism and, 912
 Thomas Aquinas and, 855
The Trial of Dedan Kimathi (Ngugi wa Thiong'o and Micere Mugo), 601
 Tribur, Council of, 393–394
 Trieu Au, 910
Trikala (Jagadbandhu Sundar), 416
 Trinidad, 202
 Trinley Thaye Dorje, 466
 Triprishtha, 529
 Trisong de Tsen, 462, 463, 668, 865, 882
 Triumph (Roman ceremony), 865–866
 Trojan War, 26–27, 571
 Tropu Lotsawa Jampapel, 150
 Trout, The (Ottawa holy man), 630
True Hallucinations (McKenna), 567
 Trung Nhi, 910
 Trung Trac, 910
 Truth, Sojourner, 814
Tschad ma rigs pa'i gter (Sakya Pandita), 760
 Tsetsak, 262–263
 Tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa, 866
 Buddhapalita and, 146
 as child prodigy, 174
 Drukpa Kunley and, 242
 Gendun drubpa and, 301
 as god on earth, 316
 Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen and, 334–335
 iconography, 867
 Khedrup Jey and, 474
 Tsung-mi. See Zongmi
 Tuccia, 891–892
 Tu-shun. See Dushun
Tuhfat ahl al-'irfan, 106
 Tukaram, 867–868
 Tukaram, Marathi sant, 102
 Tukt'ong Kihwa, 868
 Tulsī, 203, 868–869
 Tulsidas, 122, 732, 825, 869
 Tunkashila, 42, 51
 Tunolase. See Orimolade Tunolase, Moses
 Turibio de Mogrobojo, 164
 Turkey
 Bekdash Wali, 113–114, 410, 933
 Celebi, Asaf Halet, 14, 167, 618
 Pir Sultan Abdal, 688, 693
 Yunus Emre, 14, 167, 229, 688, 839, 933–934
 Turner, George, 817
 Turner, Nat, 79, 869–870
Turning the Wheel of Dharma (Gautama Buddha), 295
 Tusi, at- (Shaykh at-Ta'ifah), 870
 Tusi, Nasir al-Din at-, 349, 488, 870–871
 Tustari, Sahl al-, 388, 590, 616
 Tutu, Desmond Mpilo, 194, 204, 693, 730, 871–872
 Twelve Apostles of Ireland, 185, 401
 Tyagaraja, 722, 791, 872–873
Tzaddiqim, 91, 340, 352–353, 595, 621–622, 873–874, 890
 Tzotzil people, 42
 U Ubuntu, 194
Udana, 790, 877
 Uffing, 387
 Uganda, 19, 461–462, 520–521, 552, 655, 693
 Uich'on, 177, 875
 Uisang, 875–876
Ujjvala-nilamani (Rupa Goswami), 752
 Ulrich of Augsburg, 16, 876, 917
 'Umar, Mufaddal b., 415
 Underhill, Evelyn, 394
 Unification Church, 204, 599, 781
 Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), 294
 Upa Losel, 150
Upadeshasahasri (Shankara), 790
 Upagupta, 818, 877
 Upaka, 877–878
 Upali, 7, 235, 820, 878
 Upanishads, 367, 369 on avatars, 314
 Chinmayananda on, 177
 Dikshitar and, 233
 Gargi and, 293, 369
 gender and, 300
 on gurus, 332
 shramanas and, 800
 Vivekananda and, 899
 Yajñavalkya and, 927
 Upasni Maharaj, 737
 Upatissa. See Shariputra
 Urban I, 166, 695
 Urban II, 117, 142, 143, 696
 Urban V, 696
 Ursula, 878–879
 "Ustav" (Nilus of Sora), 641
 Uthman dan Fodio, 14, 18, 613, 879–880, 911
 Utnapishtim, 474
Utopia (More), 601
 V
Vaaran (Bhai Gurdas), 806
 Vacchagotta, 881
Vagvajra (Shripadaraya), 802
 Vahid, 97
 Vairocana, 486, 881–882
 Vairotsana, 221, 552, 773, 882
 Vaishnava Hinduism, 121, 370
 Andal, 52–53
 Bhaktivedanta, 122, 170, 204
 Gangamata Goswami, 71, 292, 750
 Gopis, 170, 229, 316–317, 883
 Haridas, 346–347, 889
 Harivansh, 229, 316, 346–347, 782, 902
 Jagadbandhu Sundar, 79, 359, 415–416, 734
 Jiva Gosvamin, 231, 430–431
 Jnaneshvara, 357, 432–433, 624
 Mukundadeva, 613–614, 782
 Nammalvar, 624–625, 820
 Narsi Mehta, 298, 628
 Radharaman Charan Das Dev, 716–717, 842
 Ramanand, 460, 674, 705, 723–724, 728
 Ramanuja, 231, 368, 724, 773, 885, 903
 Rupa Goswami, 431, 752
 Sahajiyas, 370, 614, 882–883
 Shripadaraya, 801–802
 Surdas, 122, 829
 Vedanta Deshika, 316, 885, 893
 Vijayakrishna Goswamin, 894
 Vyasaraya and, 902
 See also Chaitanya, Krishna
 Vaishnava Sahajiyas, 370, 614, 882–883
 Vajrabodhi, 930
 Vajrasekhara Sutra, 486
 Vajrayana Buddhism, 30, 69, 627, 762, 840
 Valentine, 883–884
 Valentinus, 401
 Valerius, 166
 Vallabha, 121–122, 829
 Vallabhacharya, 370, 732
 Valmiki, 569

- Vamacharis*, 601
Vamadeva, 738
Vamaksepa, 884
Van der Wyden, Rogier, 426
Varinkoshi, 43
Varro, 802
Vasishtha, 738, 899
Vasubandhu, 69, 232, 487, 823, 824, 884–885
 Vatican II. See Second Vatican Council
Vedanta Deshika, 316, 885, 893
Vedanta Hinduism, 368
 Chinmayananda, 176–177, 820
 Krishnamurti and, 485
 Madhva, 525–526, 801
 Maharshi, 528
 Rajcandra and, 720
 Ramanuja and, 724
 Vivekananda, 176, 369, 597, 723, 768, 899–900
 Vyasaraya and, 903
 See also Shankara
Vedanta: A Science of Life (Chinmayananda), 177
Vedas, 368–369
 asceticism in, 359
 Gargi and, 293
 reform and, 733 rishis in, 738
 sadhus in, 756
 shramanas and, 800–801
 tapas and, 838–839
 Vishvamitra and, 898–899
Vega, Lope de, 406
Vegetarianism, 63, 71, 172, 416
Velama Sutra, 50–51
Vemana, 886
Venantius Fortunatus, 264, 716
Venerable Bede. See Bede
Veneration of holy people, 127, 160, 300, 886–889. See also specific holy people
Venkateshvara, 885
Verbermacher, Hannah Rachel, 299, 889–890
Verger, Pierre, 579
Vernazza, Ettore, 162
Veronica, 890–891
Vestal Virgins, 572, 697, 704, 891–892
Vésteinsson, Orri, 857
Vettius Epagathus, 521
Vianney, Jean-Baptiste Marie, 329, 892
Victor I, 695
Victor III, 696
Victor IV, 256
Vidaghda Shakalya, 293
Viditavishesha, 28
Vidyaranya, 892–893
Vieira, Eduardo Duarte, 893
Vietnam, 85, 910
Vijayadasuri, 371
Vijayakrishna Goswamin, 893–894
Vijnanavada Buddhism, 171
Vilayat-i Faqih (Khomeini), 475
Vilayetname (Bektash), 933
 “Village religion” (India), 51
Vilna Gaon. See Elijah ben Solomon
Vimalakirti, 894–895
Vimalakirti Sutra, 540
Vimalakirtinirdesha Sutra, 894
Vimalamitra, 882
Vinaya, 124, 597
Vinaya Buddhism, 429
Vinaya Pitaka, 878
Vincent de Paul, 165, 194, 895, 914
Vincent Ferrer, 895–896
Vincent of Saragossa, 501, 896
Violence/nonviolence, 896–898
 Buddhism, 73, 897, 898, 910
 Gandhi, 675, 896, 898
 Jainism, 123, 416–417, 896
 King, 479, 480
 Lee, 503
 See also Warfare
Virashaivism, 121, 898
 Basavanna, 107, 221, 898
 Mahadeviyakka, 71, 300, 527, 898
Virgil, 83, 232, 802
Virgin Mary. See Mary, Virgin
Virginity, 182
 Afra of Augsburg, 16
 Agatha, 23–24, 182, 516, 781
 Agnes, 24, 182, 781
 Anne and, 54
 Apollonia, 62
 Barbara, 106
 Cecilia, 166
 Christina of Markyate, 183–184
 Eulalia of Mérida, 264
 gender and, 298–299
 Joseph, 445
 Lucy, 516
 martyrdom/persecution and, 553, 781
 See also Celibacy
Vishnu, 52, 229, 314, 362, 625, 721
Vishvamitra, 738, 820, 898–899
Visio de Resurrectione Beate Virginis (Elizabeth of Schönau), 256 Visions
 Æthelwold and, 15
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 24, 25
 Alacoque, 30, 398
 authority of holy people and, 84–85
 Badawi, 95
 Behem, 112
 Birgitta of Sweden, 125–126
 Catherine of Siena, 163
 Chajang, 170
 Cherubim and Seraphim Society, 4, 85
 Constantine, 202
 Crazy Horse, 207
 Daniel the Stylite, 213
 Dominic of Silos, 239
 Elizabeth of Schönau, 256
 Fox, 281
 Galgani, 289
 Guti, 334
 Hubert, 377
 Juan Diego, 449
 Juliana of Liège, 457
 Kunga Nyingpo, 489
 Lalibela, 493
 Llull, 512
 Luria, 517
 Proclus, 698 religious founders and, 279
 Romuald of Ravenna, 744, 746
 Seraphim of Sarov, 776–777
 Sundar Singh, 809, 810
 Smith, 812
 Sonam Gyatso, 815
 Soubirous, 816
Visistadvaita Vedanta, 724
Visitandines, 285
Vistapala, 824
Visual art by holy people
 Bernward of Hildesheim and, 120
 Christianity, 14
 Fra Angelico, 14, 166, 282
 Mani, 13
 Muso Soseki, 615
 Zen Buddhism and, 14
 See also Iconography
Visuddhimagga (Buddhaghosa), 145
Vita Aedwardi Regis, 249
Vita beati Eadwardi regis Anglorum (Osbert of Clare), 249–250
Vita et Actus beati Dionysii, 227
Vita et passio (Yves of St.-Denis), 227
Vita Sancti Edwardi (Aelred of Rievaulx), 250
Vita Sancti Karoli, 173
Vital, Hayyim, 517–518
Vitalian, 696
Vitry, Jacques de, 106
Vitthal, 102, 121, 190
Vitus, 280
Vivarana-prameya-sangraha (Vidyaranya), 893
Vivekananda, 176, 369, 597, 723, 768, 899–900
Vladimir (Prince of Russia), 136, 750, 900–901
Vodun, 45, 65, 265, 533, 659, 660
Voes, Hendrik, 552, 901
Volmar, 365
Volto Santo, 918
Von den Juden und ihren Lügen (Luther), 520
Voodoo. See Vodun
Voragine, Jacobus de. See Legenda Aurea
Vyas, Hariram, 346–347, 902
Vyas Vani (Vyas), 902
Vyasaraya, 464, 703, 801, 802, 902–903
W
Wafi Ahmad, 905
Wahhab, Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-, 704
Wahhabi Islam, 410, 704, 791, 826
Wailer, Bunny, 340
Waiyaki wa Hinga, 18, 19, 675, 905–906

- Walad. See Baha'uddin Walad
Walburga, 906, 919
Walch, Georg, 519
Waldensianism, 906–907
Waldès, Peter, 906–907
Waldetrude, 563
Wali. See Awliya'
Wali Songo, 907–908
Walker, Samuel, 915
Walter, Johann, 901
Wang Che. See Wang Zhe
Wang Chuyi, 216
Wang Fuzhi, 938
Wang Gen, 909
Wang Ji, 909
Wang Longxi, 623
Wang Rong, 779
Wang Tingxiang, 938
Wang Yangming, 198, 488, 622, 623, 662, 908–909
Wang Zhe, 79, 215–216, 909–910
Ward, Mary, 912
Wardley, James, 503
Wardley, Jane, 503
Warfare, 910–911
 Adalbert of Prague, 9
 Adham, 11
 African traditional religions and, 19, 910
 Alexander Nevskii, 32, 911
 'Ali ibn Abi Talib, 36
 Amerindian religions, 43–44, 88, 176, 207, 636, 910
 Ashoka, 73, 897, 910
 attributes of holy people and, 79
 Clovis and, 189
 Constantine and, 202
 Edmund of East Anglia, 249, 897
 George and, 302, 303
 Geronimo, 306
 Gobind Singh, 312, 805
 Greek heroes and, 26–27
 Guandi, 66, 328, 910
 Hargobind, 345, 805, 911
 Hong Xiuquan, 373–374
 Joan of Arc, 162, 433–434, 674, 911
 Kamikaze of World War II, 65, 463, 674
 Krishna, 483–484
 Mansur, al-, 541
 Martin of Tours, 550
 Maurice, 563–564, 849, 911
 Mixcoatl, 176, 593, 849
 Muhammad, 609
 Ogún, 652–653
 Olaf of Norway, 654
 Oyá, 18, 665, 789, 910
 Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 865
 Waiyaki wa Hinga, 18, 19, 675, 905–906
 See also Patriotism/anticolonial resistance;
 Peace; Violence/nonviolence
Wasiteck, 4
Watts, Alan, 830
Way of Complete Perfection. See Quanzhen Daoism
Way of Perfection (Teresa of Avila), 846
Wealth/poverty, 912–914
Webé, Dejjazmach, 414
Weber, Max, 404
Wei, Lady, 215, 217
Weir, J., 784
Wenceslas, 750, 914
Werner of Oberwesel, 58
Wesley, John, 87, 593, 914–916
Western Inscription (Zhang Zai), 199
Weyah of Nyambalang, 234
Wheatley, Phyllis, 533
Whinfield, E. H., 784
“Whirling dervishes,” 14
White Buffalo Woman, 739
White, Ellen Gould Harmon, 299, 916
White Lotus Society, 380
Whitefield, George, 915
Whitehead, A. N., 568
Whittaker, James, 503
Whittier, John Greenleaf, 142
Wiborada, 72, 916–917
Wicca movement, 202, 632
Wilayah, 408
Wilfrid, 169, 917–918
Wilgefortis, 918
William of Norwich, 58, 378, 918–919
William Rufus (King of England), 56
Williams, Duncan, 387
Willibald, 919
Willibrord, 134, 919–920
Wiracocha, 376
Wird, 103–104
Wladislaus II Jagiello (King of Poland), 160
Wolfgang of Regensburg, 920–921
Wolfgang of Herrieden, 906
Wolof people (Senegal), 103
Women. See Female holy people; Gender
Women in the Wall (O'Faolin), 716
Wonhyo, 492, 876, 921
Woods, Richard, 401
Woolman, John, 194
Worms, Conference of, 158
Wovoka, 52, 675, 921–922
“The Wreck of the Deutschland” (Hopkins), 375
Wroe, John, 817
Wu (Emperor of China), 131
Wu Zhao, 750, 792, 799, 818, 922
Wulfric of Haselbury, 922–923
Wulfstan of Winchester, 832
Wulfstan of Worcester, 664, 923
WWJD movement, 394
Wyclif, John, 382, 499
Wyschogrod, Michael, 180
X
Xavier, Francis, 164, 592, 925
Xenophon, 813
Xhosa people, 644, 645–646
Xi Kang, 779, 780
Xiang Xiu, 779
Xici, 940
Ximing (Zhang Zai), 938
Xiwangmu, 128
Xiyuji (Xuan-zang), 69
X'Ob, 42
Xochiyaoyotl, 44
Xuan-zang, 69, 468
Xunzi, 578
Y
Yachaywasi, 40
Yajñavalkya, 293, 369, 927
Yajñavalkya Smriti, 927
Yakini, 346
Yamunashakta (Harivansh), 347
Yang Renshan. See Yang Wenhui
Yang Wenhui, 928
Yang Xi, 215, 838
Yang-shan Hui-chi, 72
Yanguang niangniang, 129
Yanomami people, 43
Yanomamo people, 263
Yao, 195, 196
Yaqui people, 222–223
Yared, 14, 928–929
Yasin, Abdullah b., 732
Yellow Emperor. See Huangdi
“The Yellow Millet Dream,” 516
Yemaya, 10
Yen-t'ou Ch'u'an-ho, 220, 553
Yeshe Od, 929
Yeshe Tsogyal, 193, 300, 524, 929–930
Yijing (Book of Changes), 197–198, 568, 780, 940, 942
Yisrael ben Eliezar. See Ba'al Shem Tov
Yixing, 930
Yoga Sutra, 671
Yogacara-bhumi-sastra (Asanga), 69
Yogacara Buddhism
 Asanga, 69–70, 193, 884
 Dharmakirti, 77, 231–232, 774
 Sthiramati, 823–824
 Vasubandhu, 69, 232, 487, 823, 824, 884–885
Yogananda, Paramahansa, 930–931
Yogeshvari Devi, 370
Yōjōkun (Kaibara Ekiken), 461
Yom Kippur, 453, 454
Yonghuai shi (Ruan Ji), 780
Yoruba religions, 10, 602–603, 658, 697, 767. See also Orishas
Yoshida, 793, 795, 796, 797
Yoshikawa Koretari, 931–932
Young, Brigham, 932
Yu the Great, 195–196, 758, 932–933
Yuanren Lun (Zongmi), 943
Yudra Nyingpo, 882
Yunus Emre, 14, 167, 229, 688, 839, 933–934
Yu-sok chirui ron (Tukt'ong Kihwa), 868
Yusuf Hamdhani, 99

Yves of St.-Denis, 227

Z

Zacharias, 696

Zahir, al-, 935

Zakariyya, Baha' ud-din, 493, 558, 559, 740, 935–936

Zalman of Liadi, Shneur, 240, 352

Zamakhshari, 473

Zambia, 506

Za-Mikael Aragawi, 156

Zarathustra. See Zoroaster

Zarkub, Salah al-Din, 167, 752

“Zaveshchanie” (Nilus of Sora), 641

Zayd b. Thabit, 109

Zayn al-Abidin. See 'Ali ibn al-Husayn, Zayn

Zaynab, Sayyida, 936–937

Zen Buddhism and Its Influence on Japanese Culture (Suzuki), 830

Zen (Chan) Buddhism

asceticism, 72

awakening/conversion, 87

child prodigies, 175

compassion and, 193

creativity, 14, 108

death, 220, 221, 222

eremitism, 359

Fujiwara Seika and, 287

insanity and, 396, 397

martyrdom/persecution, 552

martyrdom/persecution and, 553

meditation, 569

mysticism, 617

nature, 631

patriarchs, 149

recognition, 729

retreat vs. secular activity, 8

status and, 820

teachers as holy people, 842

veneration of holy people, 888

Zhou Dunyi and, 941

Zen (Chan) Buddhist holy people

Chinul, 177

Dogen, 175, 236–237, 338

Eisai, 251–252, 592

Hakuin, 14, 87, 341–342, 736

Hongren, 374

Huangbo Xiyun, 87, 376, 510

Huineng, 374, 379, 739, 792

Ikkyu, 14, 391, 397, 731, 782

Kassapa, 468

Linji, 149, 376, 510–511, 820

Mazu, 87, 149, 376, 565–566

Muso Soseki, 14, 615

Shaku Sōen, 785–786

Shenxiu, 374, 379, 729, 792

Suzuki, 786, 830

Zongmi, 174, 244, 943

See also Bodhidharma

Zen for Americans (Shaku Sōen), 786

Zen gardens, 615

Zen masters. See Zen (Chan) Buddhist holy people

Zeno, 937

Zephyrnus, 695

Zhabs Drung, 569

Zhang Daoling, 215, 399, 735, 937–938

Zhang Guolao, 216, 251, 588

Zhang Ling, 357

Zhang Sanfeng, 216

Zhang ston Chos 'bar, 241, 489–490

Zhang Zai, 197, 198–199, 938–939

Zhaozhou, 149

Zhen'gao, 215

Zhisheng, 939

Zhiyan, 244, 275, 876, 939–940

Zhiyi, 175, 774, 940

Zhongli Quan, 215, 216, 251, 516

Zhongyong, 941

Zhou Dunyi, 197, 198, 938, 940–941, 942

Zhu Xi, 198, 941–942

Fujiwara Seika and, 287

Hayashi Razan and, 354

Kaibara Ekiken and, 461

Nakae Tōju and, 622

Wang Yangming and, 908, 909

Zhang Zai and, 938

Zhou Dunyi and, 940, 941, 942

Zhuangzi, 214–215, 216, 482, 780, 928, 942–943

Zimbabwe, 52, 434, 532, 616–617, 633

Zion Christian Church (ZCC), 505

Zisun niangniang, 129

Zohar, 254–255, 517, 807

Zongli zhongjing mulu (Daoan), 214

Zongmi, 174, 244, 943

Zoroaster, 570, 943–945

authority of, 84

as child prodigy, 174

creativity of, 13

hagiography, 338

martyrdom/persecution and, 551

as prophet, 699

as religious founder, 278, 943–945

ritual and, 739

Zoroastrianism

asceticism and, 70

child prodigies, 174

creativity, 13

founder of, 278

magi, 526

Manicheanism and, 539, 731

messiah beliefs, 580

prophets, 699

ritual and, 739

See also Zoroaster

Zosima and Savatii of Solovki, 687, 945

Zosimos, 388

Zosimus, 696

Zulu people, 52, 400, 593–594, 749, 784, 792

Zuni people, 205

Zutphen, Heinrich von, 901

Zwingli, Huldrych, 701

