Hugh of Lincoln died in 1255, 111 years after the death of young William of Norwich, the first child to be declared a Christian saint because he was thought to be a victim of ritual murder by Jews. In that time, several such accusations against Jews in various parts of England and France had resulted in the sanctification of at least five other murdered boys. Gavin Langmuir defines ritual murder as "the killing of a human, not merely from motives of religious hatred, but in such a way that the form of the killing is at least partly determined by ideas allegedly or actually important in the religion of the killers of the victims" (Langmuir 1972, 462).

Eight-year-old Hugh of Lincoln was such an alleged victim. His body was found in or near a well, perhaps as much as a month after his actual death. The deteriorated condition of the body encouraged the townsfolk to believe that they saw signs of torture that led them to accuse the Jews of Lincoln, England, of crucifying young Hugh. The story of Hugh's alleged martyrdom was told in one ballad and three separate chronicles, including one by Matthew Paris in the thirteenth century. These accounts record that a miracle occurred as the cathedral canons carried the body to the cathedral. They describe in detail the imagined tortures and the mother's grief, alleging that all the Jews in England participated in the macabre ritual. Hugh is pictured as an innocent and suffering martyr.

Despite the lack of evidence to support the accusations, many Jews were arrested. For the first time in England, the king, Henry III, took notice. The result was that nineteen Jews were executed. Had it not been for the interference of the Dominicans or the Franciscans (the records are not clear as to which group), many more might have died. The tale of little St. Hugh became part of a growing body of anti-Semitic myth that led to violence and persecution.

Hugh of Saint Victor

Christian monk, theologian, mystic

Hugh of Saint Victor, born in 1096, came from a noble family, possibly the Blankenburgs of Saxony, and became an Augustinian canon regular at the monastery of Hamersleben. Some of the traditional details about his life have been called into question by historical evidence. Two twelfth-century manuscripts indicate that he was born in Ypres, Flanders; another implies he hailed from Burgundy. Nevertheless, Hugh's Augustinian background was later to influence his reform ideas, which combined strict asceticism with service to the community.

Hugh was particularly devoted to education. He journeyed to Paris in 1115 with his uncle, Archdeacon Reinhard von Halberstadt. There, he joined the monastery of Saint Victor. Soon he began teaching at the abbey's school, and later he was made master, a post he held until his death in 1141. This school was quite influential, as it welcomed students from beyond the local community. Eventually, it was formally recognized as a residential college of the University of Paris. Details of Hugh's later life are scarcely more available than those of his early life. His signature appears on scattered official acts from 1127 to 1140, and he seems to have briefly occupied the office of prior in 1133.

Hugh is best known for his theological and mystical writings; however, he took the unusual position that secular learning was crucial to every individual. No learning was unimportant. Hugh's masterpiece was the Didascalicon, which is essentially an encyclopedia. The work encapsulates the standard medieval education. In it, he identifies four types of knowledge: practical, theoretical, discursive, and mechanical. Hugh also wrote numerous theological texts, including the influential De sacramentis fidei (The sacraments of the Christian faith). This work epitomizes Hugh's theological perspective. As he was heavily influenced by Augustine of Hippo (354–430) and other early church theologians, the work focuses on God's omnipotence and defends the Trinity.

In some of his other works, Hugh provided the basis for standard definitions of theological terms such as sacrament, faith, grace, and hypostatic union (the idea that two natures—one divine and one human—exist within the one person of Christ). Finally, his mystical writings instituted the idea of the three-stage ascent: thought (God in nature), meditation (God in us), and contemplation (God's presence). Other works include exegetical commentaries on the scriptures and philosophical texts on the connection between reason and faith.

Huineng (Hui-neng)

Chan Buddhist master

Called E'no in Japanese, Huineng, a Chan Buddhist master of the seventh and eighth centuries, was the religious successor of Hongren, making him the sixth patriarch of the Chan tradition in China. Huineng was born in 638, and, according to the Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, which was composed by followers after his death, as a child he lost his father to premature death. This forced him and his mother to sell firewood to survive. One day, the young boy heard somebody reciting the Diamond Sutra, which awakened him to religion and motivated him to seek a teacher. When he approached the fifth patriarch, Hongren, for instruction, the master asked him how he could expect to attain buddhahood when he was nothing more than a mere barbarian. To the astonished and impressed patriarch, Huineng replied that there was no difference between a barbarian and a civilized person in the buddha-nature. Thereupon, Huineng was employed as an acolyte to do menial tasks within the monastery.

Desiring to find a worthy successor, in his last years the fifth patriarch instructed his monks to return to their rooms, examine themselves, seek intuitive wisdom, and compose a verse based on their wisdom. The fifth patriarch would review the verses for proof of an enlightened state of mind.

This person would be appointed his successor. The head monk, Shenxiu, composed a verse that depicted the mind like a mirror that was passive and must be continuously wiped clean. Since dust was a metaphor for obscurities and passions caused by desires, images, and thoughts, meditation was a method of purification and restoration of the mind to its original purity. After reading the verses, the fifth patriarch concluded that they were harmless but did not demonstrate true insight. The fifth patriarch told the head monk to think about his composition for a couple of days and then compose another one.

Huineng overheard another acolyte reciting the verses of the head monk, and he concluded that the composer had not attained enlightenment. Huineng, who was illiterate, instructed the other acolyte to write verses on the wall that he would dictate. These verses manifested an enlightened state of mind. After reading them, the fifth patriarch invited Huineng secretly to his quarters, where he expounded on the Diamond Sutra; this discussion triggered a full awakening in Huineng. Thereupon, the fifth patriarch transmitted his authority to him.

Huineng was a pivotal historical figure because his life served as a symbol of a complex historical process that extended over a period of time. After his death in 713, the status of the sixth patriarch was promoted by his chosen successor, Shenhui (684–758), in conjunction with the latter's attack on the northern school of Chan. A major dispute involved the stress on the suddenness of gaining enlightenment by the southern school against the emphasis on gradual awakening by the northern school.

Huitzilopochtli

Huitzilopochtli (Hummingbird on the left) is the warrior who led the Mexica, or "Aztecs," from the caves at Chicomoztoc to the shores of Lake Texcoco in the Valley of Mexico. His historicity cannot be verified, but according to Mexica accounts, Huitzilopochtli led this wandering tribe through the desert in search of their promised homeland. They stopped several places and were unsuccessful in their attempts to settle until they reached the foretold city of Tenochtitlán. In these unsuccessful attempts, the Mexica incurred the wrath of Huitzilopochtli, who chastised them for not heeding his instructions. As a consequence, they lost in battle and became servants to the groups that defeated them. When the Mexica finally encountered the sign that Huitzilopochtli had described, an eagle on a cactus growing from a rock, they established their city, Tenochtitlán (Place where the cactus grows from a stone). Some accounts include a snake in the eagle's beak, the symbol that appears on the Mexican flag, while other accounts illustrate the eagle screaming the Mesoamerican battle cry atl-tlachinolli (mist and blaze).

Huitzilopochtli is always perceived and represented as a human, but like the pan-Mesoamerican warrior divinity Tezcatlipoca, he is often shown with a smoking mirror in the place of his right foot. As the Mexica integrated into the cultures of the Valley of Mexico, they adapted the existing celebrations dedicated to Tezcatlipoca to also include Huitzilopochtli. At the same time, Huitzilopochtli can be linked to Quetzalcoatl because he was reportedly ripped from his mother's womb in full battle array. Huitzilopochtli's mother, Coatlicue (Serpent skirt), had become pregnant while sweeping when a ball of feathers drifted into the bodice of her dress. Like Chimalman, the Mesoamerican heroine, Coatlicue died in childbirth, offering the ultimate sacrifice in providing a warrior for her people. In another story, the Mexica patron once had to defend himself from an attack led by his sister, Coyolxauqui. He defeated her and threw her dismembered body down the pyramid or mountain where his mother lived.

The Templo Mayor in Tenochtitlán was dedicated to both Huitzilopochtli and Quetzalcoatl. The massive stone representation of the defeated and dismembered Coyolxauqui at its base reminded Mesoamericans of this warrior's great might.

Huiyuan (Hui-yuan; Jap.: Eon)

Buddhist Pure Land patriarch

Followers of Pure Land Buddhism in China trace their historical roots to the period when Huiyuan and 123 clerics and literati assembled in 402 on Mount Lu and thereby established the Bailianshe (White Lotus Society). Although he studied Confucian and Daoist works, Huiyuan became a disciple of the famed Buddhist monk Daoan (312–385) at the age of twenty-one.

Huiyuan left Daoan in 378 and moved south to Mount Lu, where he stayed until his death in 416. This was a time of upheaval and renewal for Buddhism in China. The Amitabha cult, also initiated by Huiyuan, had a prominent following. One of Master Huiyuan's most important expositions was one on karma, the San-pao-lun, in which he speaks of the fruition of deeds, meritorious or not, and the immortality of the soul. He is also well known for his statement "Monks do not pay obeisance to kings," which eventually freed the monks from political and worldly duties.

Although Huiyuan was an aristocrat, he was able to reach the masses with the idea of being born in Amitabha's western paradise. Later practices of Pure Land included the repetitive recitation of Amitabha's name as a way to be graced with Amitabha's power so as to gain favor and therefore be reborn in Amitabha's Pure Land paradise. Originally, Huiyuan advocated a meditation practice that employed a contemplation of Amitabha in one's inner mind without the oral recitation that became the common practice.

Recent scholarship traces the beginnings of the modern White Lotus Society to the Chinese monk Mao Ziyuan (twelfth century). But the custom of reciting Amitabha's name was believed by the people to be an original Pure Land teaching. In Chinese religious history, it is common to have different groups that share the same roots and in this way attach themselves to one lineage.

Muslim mystic, hagiographer

'Ali b. Uthman al-Hujwiri was born in a small town near Ghanzi, Afghanistan. He spent some time in Iraq and died in 1073 in Lahore, now in Pakistan, where he was imprisoned for a time. It was his sufi master, Abu al-Fazl al-Khuttali, who ordered him to move to Lahore from Ghazni. Of al-Hujwiri's ten books, only one, the Kashf al-Mahjub (Disclosure of the veiled), is extant. This is an important work and is the first comprehensive Persian work on sufism containing biographies of eminent saints and discussions of the stages and states of spiritual development that reflect personal experience as well as the sayings of previous masters.

In this work, the author quotes Abu al-Hasan of Fushanja as saying that “Sufism in the beginning was a reality without a name but it has become over time a name without a reality.” In fact, the sufi orders (turuq) had not become fully established by the time of al-Hujwiri, although one of the features of his analysis is the paradigm of twelve sufi “families.” This model was evoked by many subsequent authors. A striking feature of the book is the incorporation of anecdotes from the shaykh’s travels and experiences in Iran, central Asia, and the Middle East. For example, once he was traveling through Khorasan after taking a retreat at the tomb of Abu Yazid, and he requested hospitality at a sufi hospice. Because he did not have the regular sufi equipment and dress, the occupants treated him badly. They gave him moldy bread to eat while they feasted, sitting on a roof eating watermelon and throwing the rind down on him. As he patiently bore this humiliation, he felt his spiritual state becoming elevated.

Al-Hujwiri is known as the patron saint of Lahore. He is also known as Data Ganj Bakhsh, “the giver who bestows treasure,” and his shrine is one of the most important in Pakistan. His urs (the anniversary of his death) is held in the Islamic month of Safar and attended by hundreds of thousands of people.

Hus, Jan

Christian reformer, martyr

The Czech reformer Jan Hus was born in Husinec, Bohemia, in 1372 or 1373. He was educated at Charles University in Prague, earning a bachelor’s degree in 1396 and a master’s in

Jan Hus Memorial. Old Town Square, Prague, Czech Republic. (Art Directors)

1399. He was ordained a deacon in 1400 and appointed the rector and preacher of the Czech-speaking Bethlehem Chapel in March 1402. While serving as rector, he taught at Charles University and enrolled in the theological faculty, earning his bachelor's degree in divinity in 1404, but he never attained the doctorate. He did not neglect his duties as rector, however. It is estimated that he preached more than 3,000 sermons during the twelve years of his ministry.

An eloquent preacher and a devoted pastor, Hus genuinely cared for the spiritual welfare of his parishioners. His sermons, preached in Czech but recorded in Latin, reflect his interest in the reform of the church and document his progression from strict orthodoxy. His early sermons are entirely orthodox, addressing the moral reform of his listeners and presenting Catholic doctrine; later sermons denounce sin—notably avarice, fornication, luxury, and pride—and stress the importance of earning salvation through good works. After the scholar Jerome of Prague returned to Bohemia after studying in Oxford, the influence of John Wyclif is clearly seen among Czech reformers. Jan Hus quickly became the leader of this movement, embracing Wyclif's ideals of reform but rejecting—or at least passing over in silence—his heretical positions, refusing to condemn Wyclif without specific and proven cause.

Defining the church in Augustinian terms as “the congregation of the faithful to be saved,” Hus accepted an empirical, legal, and transitory church but also believed in a changeless and eternal “church of the predestined.” He did not reject transubstantiation, nor did he deny the sacramental character of episcopal orders or attack indulgences. His only real heresy was his rejection of the primacy of the bishop of Rome. Hus was excommunicated in 1412, accused by his enemies of denying the existence of the church militant. He was condemned at the Council of Constance in 1415, primarily because he did not renounce heretical doctrines that he neither taught nor held.

Nineteenth-century nationalists saw Hus as a hero, but the dispute between Czechs and Germans in the Prague church during the early fifteenth century was less about Czech nationalism and their support for King Wenceslaus IV at the Council of Pisa than it was about doctrinal schism (for the most part, the Czechs were realists, the Germans nominalists) and the reform of the church (the Czechs favored reform, while the Germans, who held large benefices, did not). Despite a safe conduct (perhaps unwisely) granted by Emperor Sigismund, Hus was burned at the stake in 1415 and his ashes scattered into the Rhine.

Husayn b. 'Ali

Shi'i Muslim imam, martyr

The third Shi'i imam, Husayn b. 'Ali, born in 626, was the grandson of the prophet Muhammad and son of Fatima and 'Ali b. Abi Talib. His death at Karbala, Iraq, in 680 earned him the title of martyr, and he is revered by both Shi'i and Sunni Muslims.

When the Umayyad caliph Mu'awiya died in 680, his son Yazid asked Husayn to pledge allegiance to him. Husayn refused, claiming that, based on an agreement reached between Mu'awiya and Husayn's elder brother, Hasan, he was more entitled to the caliphate. Husayn also argued that Yazid was not fit to rule the Muslim community because of his un-Islamic practices. With his life in danger, Husayn then left Medina for Mecca.

The Shi'is of Kufa, a garrison town in Iraq, wrote several letters to Husayn promising assistance if he would join them. Unsure of their support, Husayn sent his emissary, Muslim b. 'Aqil, to verify their pledges of allegiance. When Muslim assured Husayn of support from the people of Kufa, Husayn left Mecca with a group of about fifty male relatives and friends able to bear arms, along with women and children. In the meantime, Yazid introduced a new governor in Kufa, 'Ubayd Allah b. Ziyad, who established a regime of terror and oppression. Husayn's sympathizers in Kufa, and Muslim b. 'Aqil, were either imprisoned or killed. Husayn was stopped in the desert by the caliph's soldiers and forced to camp at Karbala. For three days, Husayn and his companions were denied access to water and suffered terribly from thirst.

As more troop reinforcements arrived from Kufa to secure Husayn's pledge of allegiance to Yazid, several attempts by Husayn at averting a conflict failed. A battle finally took place on the tenth of Muharram (the first month of the Muslim calendar). Despite putting up strong resistance against a numerically superior and better-equipped force, Husayn and his companions were massacred and their bodies trampled. After pillaging Husayn's tents, Yazid's troops took the women and children as captives to Yazid in Damascus.

Husayn's martyrdom instilled much emotion in Shi'ism at the time, and this reaction is evident in the Shi'i community even today. Shi'is still mourn, flagellate, and even cut their bodies in memory of Husayn and his companions. Others reenact the events in Karbala with annual passion plays. Husayn's death injected a sense of passion for martyrdom into Islamic culture and inspired Shi'is to defy oppressive rulers.

Soon after his death, Husayn's followers in Kufa rose against Yazid. Even though they were defeated, the Penitents, as they came to be called, set the tone for further Shi'i uprisings against unjust rulers. Under Mukhtar b. 'Ubayd's (d. 687) revolt, many of those responsible for Husayn's death were captured and brought to justice. Husayn's death also inspired future Shi'i revolts against both the Umayyad and Abbasid regimes.

Because of the manner of his death and his close connection to the prophet, Husayn has been revered in both Shi'i and Sunni literature. He is exalted because of the motives that led to his sacrifice and for not compromising his principles against the threats of a dictator, preferring to die rather than live in humiliation. Shi'i hagiographic literature is replete with many legends about miracles performed by Husayn. His tomb in Karbala has become a pilgrimage site for the Shi'is, many of whom visit it to benefit from the miracles, blessings, and intercession reportedly available at his shrine.

Husayn Bushru'i

Babi disciple, martyr

Mulla Husayn Bushru'i was the first to believe in the Bab (1819–1850) and a member of the "Letters of the Living," the first and highest-ranking group of the Bab's disciples. As such, he helped to establish the Babi movement, an offshoot of Islam and forerunner of the Baha'i faith.

Mulla Husayn was born in 1813 in a village near the small town of Bushru'iyyih in northeastern Iran. His father was a dyer and his mother a poet. During the course of his education in the cities of Mashhad and Isfahan, he became a follower of the Shaykhi teaching, and in 1835, he set off for Karbala in order to attend the lectures of the Shaykhi leader Sayyid Kazim Rashti. The latter regarded Mulla Husayn highly and chose him when he needed someone to go to Iran and canvass support from some of the senior clerics there for the Shaykhi teachings, which were at this time under attack.

Mulla Husayn returned successfully from his mission in January 1844 only to find that Sayyid Kazim had died shortly before. Mulla Husayn refused all efforts to install him as the new leader of the Shaykhis, and instead set off in search of a new leader, as Sayyid Kazim had suggested. This led him to Shiraz and a meeting with the Bab on May 23, 1844, at which the latter put forward a claim that Mulla Husayn accepted (an event commemorated annually by Baha'is as a holy day). Mulla Husayn thus became the first of the Letters of the Living and was sent off to proclaim the teachings of the Bab. His subsequent journeys and activities brought Baha'u'llah and many others into the Babi fold. After meeting the Bab again in Shiraz in 1845, he returned to Mashhad, where he set up a center for the propagation of the Bab's teaching. In spring 1848, he made a journey to Maku on foot (1,200 miles) to see the Bab, who was imprisoned there.

In July 1848, he raised a Black Standard in Mashhad (a sign of the appearance of the mahdi [messiah] in Islamic prophecy) and set off eastward with some 200 Babis. They were surrounded at Shaykh Tabarsi in October 1848 and besieged by royal troops. Although most of the Babis had regarded Mulla Husayn as the foremost of the disciples of the Bab up to this time, Mulla Husayn deferred to Quddus, another of the Bab's disciples, during this siege. Mulla Husayn was shot during a battle on February 2, 1849, and died later that same day. He was thirty-five. The Bab wrote a eulogy for him to be used when visiting his grave, and Baha'u'llah also praised him highly in his writings. His story as told in the early Baha'i history Nabil's Narrative presents a picture of courage, humility, and intellectual brilliance that has made him a spiritual hero for successive generations of young Baha'is.

Iamblichus

(c. 240–325 C.E.)

Neoplatonist philosopher

Iamblichus was a key figure in the development of Neoplatonism, the philosophical movement that dominated late classical antiquity. Although he was a competent philosopher—as is evident from the surviving fragments of his commentaries on Plato and Aristotle, he argued that philosophy alone could not save the human soul. In addition, one had to take recourse to specific rituals. This theory had implications for the Neoplatonic concept of the holy man.

The basic source for Iamblichus's life is Eunapius's fourth-century Lives of the Philosophers and Sophists. Born in about 240 in Syria, Iamblichus was from a wealthy background but lived a simple life, teaching numerous pupils. He did not show off his holiness—he laughed away rumors that he was able to levitate—but under the pressure of his pupils he demonstrated his holiness by summoning the gods who dwelled in two local springs. The gods embraced him as though he were their father.

In contrast to his contemporary Porphyry and the founder of Neoplatonism, Plotinus (205–270), Iamblichus argued that the human soul, which originates from the divine world, descends entirely into the material world when it is born. As a result, it cannot hope to ascend again to the divine world by itself but needs divine support. In On the Mysteries of the Egyptians, Iamblichus explains that there exists a natural bond of love between the gods and humanity, since we are their creation. This divine love empowers certain rituals that can purify people from the material world, enlighten them, and bring them into contact with the divine. These rituals are known as theurgy, the making of gods out of mortals. Even the souls thus enlightened (not unlike Buddhist bodhisattvas, enlightened beings) will reincarnate, however, in order to lead others to the truth. These people, Iamblichus included, were called “divine” by the Neoplatonists.

Ibn al-‘Arabi, Muhyi al-Din

Muslim mystic, writer

Considered the greatest mystic author in Islam, Muhyi al-Din ibn al-‘Arabi al-Hatimi al-Tai was born in 1165 in Murcia, Spain, where his father was governor. Ibn al-‘Arabi spent his youth in Murcia and studied traditional religious subjects as well as philosophy. While still a boy—with a reputation for having mystical visions—he had a meeting with the peripatetic philosopher Ibn Rushd (Averroes), who advocated discursive reasoning (burhan) against mystical knowledge, or gnosis (irfan). The latter had been prevalent in the Islamic tradition. At the age of thirty, Ibn al-‘Arabi left Spain for Tunisia and then went to Mecca, the holiest city in Islam. This pilgrimage was the first of his lifelong journeys to numerous cities and towns in Egypt, Syria, and Turkey. He finally settled in Damascus, Syria, accompanied by his most famous student, Sadr al-Din al-Qunawi. He was buried in Damascus after his death in 1240.

Ibn al-‘Arabi's influence went beyond the circles of sufism. His ideas, some of which were deemed controversial and heterodox, have been discussed, defended, or refuted by scores of scholars, jurists, theologians, philosophers, and mystics up to the present time. He is the most prolific mystic author in Islam with a corpus of close to 500 books and poems. His fame earned him several titles by which he is most commonly known. “Muhyi al-Din” means “the reviver of the religion,” referring to his role in reinterpreting the entire Islamic tradition from a mystical point of view. His other title, “al-Shaykh al-Akbar,” means “the greatest master” and refers to the respect he has been accorded among his followers. His critics, however, have been no less staunch in their denunciation of him as an innovator, enemy of Islam, heretic, and “the greatest infidel” (al-shaykh al-akfar). In recent decades, together with Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273), Ibn al-‘Arabi has had a deep impact in Europe and the United States. His works have been translated into numerous European languages.

Ibn al-‘Arabi is best known for his two most prominent books. Fusus al-Hikam (The bezels of wisdom) is a mystical treatise on prophetology in which Ibn al-‘Arabi discusses how each of the twenty-seven prophets mentioned in the Qur’an, from Adam, Noah, and Abraham to Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad, represents a particular aspect of wisdom associated with divine names and qualities. Ibn al-‘Arabi’s most voluminous work, al-Futuhat al-Makkiyyah (Meccan revelations), is a mystical encyclopedia comprised of several hundred chapters dealing with a bewilderingly vast range of subjects, from mystical life, rituals, visions, and philosophy to religious history, resurrection, and sanctity.

Several underlying themes can be identified in Ibn al-‘Arabi’s writings. He considers the world of creation to be a stage for the infinite manifestation and interplay of divine names and qualities. The word tajalli, theophany, applies to various degrees of existence, from minerals to angels. In this cosmic symphony of the self-disclosure of God, the divine essence remains unmanifested and untainted. Against anthropomorphism, which assigns humanlike qualities to God, thus blurring the ontological discontinuity between the creator and the created, and against transcendentalism, which turns God into an aloof, unreachable, and abstract principle, thus preempting the possibility of having an intimate relationship with the divine, Ibn al-‘Arabi tries to strike a balance between the two views and sees God as both immanent and transcendent.

By defining the world as a theophany, Ibn al-‘Arabi leans toward a form of natural theology where everything becomes a sign pointing to something beyond itself, that is, the divine. In this context, even evil, personified by Satan, has a place in the ontological scheme of things. Equally important is the idea that ultimately there can be only one being, everything else being derived from it. The Islamic concept of divine unity (tawhid) is thus translated by Ibn al-‘Arabi into the domain of metaphysics as the “oneness of being” (wahdat al-wujud)—his most famous doctrine.

Even though the oneness of being is not as central to Ibn al-‘Arabi’s teachings as many people assume, it has nevertheless been interpreted by his critics as a form of pantheism. The doctrine holds that God is the only real being, necessary and self-subsistent, and everything else is a shadow compared to his being. The oneness of being also underlies one of the central themes of Ibn al-‘Arabi’s metaphysics—the relationship between the one and the many, or God’s absolute unity vis-à-vis the multiplicity of the world. For Ibn al-‘Arabi, existence is generated by the “sacred effusion” (alfayd al-muqaddas) of the divine and by the “breath of the most merciful” (nafas al-rahman). In this scheme, human existence has a special place because it is the “locus of descent” for manifesting God’s names and qualities in the most complete manner possible.

Ibn al-‘Arabi uses the term “perfect” or “universal man” (al-insan al-kamil) to explain the special significance of the human state in God’s creation. The perfect man, which refers to the ontological-metaphysical state of humanity rather than to moral perfection, is ultimately the prophet Muhammad. For Ibn al-‘Arabi, the “Muhammadan grace” (barakah muhammadiyah) functions as the basis of sanctity in Islam.

Ida of Herzfeld

Christian laywoman

A Frankish noblewoman, Ida founded a church at Herzfeld (modern Germany) and later became its patron saint. Her exact genealogy remains obscure, but she is believed to have been either a cousin or half cousin of Charlemagne. Ida was formally canonized roughly 150 years after her death on November 26, 980. The primary information concerning her life and the subsequent miracles that occurred at her grave site comes from her vita, written around this time. The author, Uffing, was a monk from the Benedictine monastery of Werden on the Ruhr, which had incorporated the Herzfeld church properties at the end of the ninth century.

As recorded by Uffing, Ida, born in about 775, was the daughter of a count in Charlemagne's service. Her father took in another of Charlemagne's soldiers, Egbert, who had fallen sick while fighting a campaign against the Gauls. Ida nursed Egbert, and, out of pity, grew to love him. They married, and the king appointed Egbert duke of all Saxony between the Rhine and Weser. On their journey to their new home, they stopped in Herzfeld, or "Hirutfeld" in the Saxon dialect. That night in a dream, Ida saw an angel who had been sent to her by God. The angel commanded her to use her own funds to build a church in which she could worship unhindered. Soon after Ida's vision, in 803 or 804, she commissioned the construction of a stone church at Herzfeld and dedicated it to the Virgin Mary and St. Germanus of Paris (c. 496–576).

According to Uffing, Ida lived an exemplary life. She spent much time in her church in prayer. There, she had a marble coffin in which she would periodically lie in order to remind herself of the transience of life. Uffing lists a number of miracles that occurred at Ida's tomb after her death in 825. With the exception of one miracle involving the discovery of a thief, the stories all deal with the miraculous healing of the blind, crippled, and possessed. St. Ida's feast day is celebrated on September 4, and she is frequently represented in art holding a replica of her church.

Idahosa, Benson

Christian healer, bishop

Perhaps never in African ecclesiastical history has there been a greater charismatic leader, faith healer, and protagonist of Christianity than Archbishop Benson Idahosa, founder of Church of God Mission International, Idahosa World Outreach, and what is known today as Benson Idahosa University in Benin City. In the whole of Africa today, Idahosa is regarded as a man sent from God. He ministered to millions in more than a hundred countries, circling the world six times in his preaching mission.

Benson was born on September 11, 1939, as the fourth child to a non-Christian family of the Bini tribe, what is known today as Edo State in Nigeria. At birth, Benson was thrown on a rubbish heap and left to die as an unwanted child because of his sickly nature. However, by an act of divine providence and against the wish of his father, his mother escaped with baby Benson to her parents' home, where the child grew up.

Idahosa converted to Christianity in 1960 through the ministry of Pastor Okpo, of Igbo extraction. This began a life of evangelism and attacks on non-Christian holy images, which he burned, including those of his parents. He was later to burn many such idols all over Africa. In 1984, when a pan-African witches' convention was scheduled to meet in Benin, the international headquarters of his church, he boldly took to the media in a campaign to stop it from occurring. He challenged, "If I see these witches in Benin, I will invoke the Holy Ghost to break their wrongs so that none of them will fly again." The meeting was rescheduled elsewhere.

In 1968, about eight years after his conversion, Idahosa had a special encounter with God. One night as he slept, a voice woke him, calling him to preach the gospel. God later led Idahosa to an older missionary, Rev. S. G. Elton, a white man who became his primary spiritual mentor. Elton played a very significant role in bringing young Idahosa to a fulfillment of the divine mandate upon his life. Elton not only ordained him to the ministry as the first pastor of the new group that Idahosa founded but also introduced him to another American, Gordon Lindsay, who assisted in his ordination. In 1971, Lindsay offered Idahosa a scholarship for ministerial training at Christ for the Nations Institute in Dallas, Texas.

Idahosa readily accepted and returned with a diploma in divinity. He later received a doctor of divinity degree in 1981 from the Word of Faith College in New Orleans and a doctor of laws degree from Oral Roberts University in 1984. In addition, he held various degrees from the International University in Brussels, Belgium.

Idohosa was a faith healer and transformed the material lives of many Africans with his apostolic inspirational teachings on prosperity. He believed that God's promises and miracles of providence apply to Africans as well as to Americans, and that if Africans planted in God's work, they would reap God's blessings. Though these teachings brought him criticism, many churches and individuals who follow Idahosa's teachings are being saved from poverty.

As a world-renowned Christian leader, Archbishop Benson Idahosa was able to raise other powerful Christian leaders in various African nations through his teachings, mentorship, and encouragement. Among these are the Nigerians Bishop David Oyedepo, Pastor Ayo Oritsajefor, Bishop Duncan Williams, and several others.

At Idahosa's death in 1998, his wife, Dr. Margret Idahosa, a mother of four children, was ordained a bishop (the first female bishop in Africa) to take over the leadership of the Church of God Mission International. The work has since then continued to grow.

Idris (Enoch)

(dates unknown)

Muslim and Manichaean legendary prophet, sage

The Qur'an describes Idris as a prophet (nabi) who was "truthful" (saddiq), "patient" (sabir), and "righteous" (salih). It says, moreover, that God "raised him to a high station" (19:56–57; 21:85–86). In many accounts of the prophet Muhammad's ascension (mi'raj), Idris welcomes Muhammad into the fourth of the seven heavens, the solar sphere. In a canonical hadith, the prophet Muhammad, commenting on the first received verses of the Qur'an (96:1–4), identifies Idris as the first person who wrote with the pen. His dates are unknown.

Idris is popularly depicted as the first to sew clothing and is revered by tailors as the patron of their guild. Popular tales of the prophets narrate that Idris achieved immortality when he tricked the angel of death into letting him step into paradise for just a moment. When the angel asked him to come out, Idris slyly replied that once entering paradise, one cannot return.

By the tenth century, Abu Ma'shar al-Balkhi identified Idris as the biblical Enoch and Hermes Trismegistus (Hirmis al-Muthalath bi'l-Hikma), the legendary Greek figure associated with the Egyptian god Thoth. The historian Mas'udi (d. 956) identified Enoch as "Idris the Prophet" and the Hermes of the Sabaens. These associations were echoed by the bibliographer Ibn Nadim (d. 987) and the polymath al-Biruni (973–1050), who equated Idris with Mercury, the Buddha, and Hermes.

The relationship between the names Idris and Hermes may rest on the name of Hermes' initiatory guide, Poimandres, in the ancient Greek Corpus Hermeticum I.1. Although the form of the name Idris is not a recognized Arabic word, its etymological root (d-r-s) means "to teach." The prophet's mention of Idris as the first to use the pen conforms to Egyptian iconography of Thoth (who, combined with the Greek Hermes, became Hermes Trismegistus). The narrative of Idris's cunning entry into paradise parallels the Homeric "Hymn to Hermes" where Hermes elevates himself into the Olympian pantheon by offering a sacrifice to himself. Idris's direct entry into paradise, and his association with the sun, echoes Enoch (Gen. 5:18–24).

Idris is identified as the first of three Hermeses. The first, Hirmis al-Haramisah, invented the alphabet, writing, tailoring, medicine, and astronomy. This Hermes also built the eponymous pyramids (Ahram). After the flood, the second one, the "Babylonian Hermes," master of Pythagoras, taught math, science, and philosophy. The third, "Egyptian Hermes," was a builder of cities and master of alchemy. In Manichaenism, Hermes was one of the five major prophets before Mani (216–274/277). The oldest extant version of Hermes Trismegistus's Emerald Tablet is ascribed to Jabir ibn Hayyan (d. 776), student of the sixth Shi'a imam Ja'far as-Sadiq (699–765). The historian Shahrastani (1086–1153) reported that the people of Harran (today's Altinbasak, Turkey) achieved "protected peoples" (dhimmi) status under Caliph al-Ma'mun (813–833) when they claimed to be the Sabaens named in the Qur'an (2.26) and identified Idris/Hermes as their prophet.

The hermetic motif of the man of light (phos) articulated by Zosimos and found in the opening of the Corpus Hermeticum appears in the Islamic illuminationist (Ishraqi) writings of Suhrawardi (1154–1191). Ibn Wahshiyah (ninth century), who first used the term "Ishraq," meant a class of priests descended from Hermes' sister. (In the hermetic Kore Kosmou (Virgin of the cosmos), Isis describes herself as Hermes' sister.) Suhrawardi and Ibn Sina (980–1037) present Hermes as the disciple of "perfect Nature," that is, Poimandres. Suhrawardi also constructed a hermetic lineage (the hakim al-'atiqa, "ancient wisdom"), including Hermes, Pythagoras, Plato, Empedocles, and the sufis Dhu'l Nun al-Misri (796–859), Sahl al-Tustari (818–896), and Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj (858–922). Suhrawardi's disciple Shahrazuri proposed that Idris founded the pre-Islamic monotheistic religion of the Hanifs. Suhrawardi's model was reiterated by Marsilio Ficino (1433–1499) as prisca theologia (original theology).

The sufi master and theosophist Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240) identified Idris as the axial prophet (qutb) sharing exclusively with Jesus, Elijah, and al-Khidr (the Green One) the status of immortals. Islamic writers of hermetic, alchemical, and philosophical works, including Ibn al-'Arabi, designated Idris as the "prophet of the philosophers" and the "father of the philosophers" (Abu'l-Hukama') and revered him as the prophetic patron of alchemy and the hermetic arts.

Ignatius of Antioch

Christian bishop, martyr

Ignatius was the Christian bishop of Antioch from about 69 until his martyrdom in roughly 107. Unfortunately, no details of his life have survived outside of what can be gathered from the letters that he wrote after his arrest for being a Christian. There has been much debate as to the authenticity of some of the letters, but scholars have established a corpus of seven that can be attributed to Ignatius with some confidence.

Ignatius addressed six of these to the Christian communities of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, Rome, Philadelphia, and Smyrna and a seventh to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna. The letter to the church in Rome is particularly interesting because in it Ignatius made it very clear how much he relished the idea of being surrendered to the beasts and becoming a martyr. In fact, the letter specifically and poignantly begs his friends in Rome not to intervene with the authorities to secure a pardon. As such, this letter serves as an early example of what would become commonplace within Christian literature regarding martyrdom: the overwhelming desire, on the part of the would-be martyr, for death in the name of Christ.

Ignatius of Constantinople

Christian patriarch

Ignatius, originally named Nicetas, was a patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century. Although his tenure was marked by controversy and his eventual deposition, even Ignatius's opponents recognized his personal holiness, and he was eventually canonized by his main rival for the see of Constantinople, Photius. Ignatius's feast day is October 23.

Nicetas was born in about 798, the son of Byzantine Emperor Michael I Rhangabe (r. 811–813). When his father was deposed, Nicetas and his brothers were forced to become monks. Nicetas took the name Ignatius and later became the abbot of three monasteries that he himself had founded.

In 847, the empress Theodora (r. 842–855) appointed Ignatius patriarch of Constantinople. He inherited a church still suffering the aftereffects of the iconoclast controversy, a conflict between those who felt that icons should be venerated (iconophiles) and those who demanded that they be destroyed (iconoclasts). Ignatius's sympathies lay with the iconophiles, which led him into conflict with members of his clergy who felt that repentant iconoclasts should be treated leniently. In 853, Ignatius suspended several of these clerics, who appealed to Rome. Before the pope could reply, however, Ignatius became involved in the conflict between Empress Theodora and her brother, Caesar Bardas. Ignatius resigned his see in 858, and Bardas appointed Photius patriarch. Ignatius accepted the new patriarch and urged his followers to do the same, but some of his supporters revolted and Ignatius was briefly imprisoned. Pope Nicholas I sent two legates to Constantinople to investigate Photius's election, and while the legates concluded that the election had been valid, Nicholas later rejected their conclusion and excommunicated Photius in 863.

In 867, a new emperor, Basil I (r. 867–886), exiled Photius and reinstated Ignatius. Ignatius, however, did not have the support of the majority of the Byzantine clergy, and when Photius was recalled from exile, the two were reconciled. Ignatius planned to call a synod to recognize the end of the conflict, but he died in 877 before it could meet.

Ignatius of Loyola

Roman Catholic founder, spiritual writer

Ignatius of Loyola, born in 1491, was a native of the Basque region of Spain, author of The Spiritual Exercises, founder of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits), and, since 1622, has been a canonized saint of the Roman Catholic Church. Ignatius embodied several features of holiness within the Roman Catholic tradition that, along with the force of his personality, the relevance of his teachings, and the success of his religious order, established him as one of the most important saints of the Catholic Reformation.

As a young man, Ignatius lived the worldly life of a Spanish nobleman. In his writings he describes himself during his youth as vainly concerned with his appearance and explains his decision to embark on a military career as inspired by the pursuit of fortune and fame. However, at the age of thirty, Ignatius's leg was shattered at the siege of Pampluna. During his extended period of convalescence he underwent a religious conversion. He cast aside his worldly aspirations, in a manner reminiscent of a long tradition of Christian holy men stretching back to Augustine of Hippo (354–430), and dedicated a year of his life to prayer and contemplation in a cavern at Manresa near the abbey of Montserrat. There he experienced both desolation and consolation through contemplation of his life and God. It was during this period of contemplation that he completed the first draft of his Spiritual Exercises.

Although Ignatius immediately recognized his spiritual calling, he found it more difficult to identify what God intended for him. Ignatius first conceived The Spiritual Exercises as a tool in his personal quest to discover God's will for him through meditation and prayer and as a source of inspiration to conform to this divine will. The exercises contained in the work became more than a personal means for contemplation, however. From 1522 Ignatius led others through them and offered advice to followers. The exercises were to remain a central feature of his spiritual thought for the remainder of his life, and they continue to be influential in the Catholic Church today. Ignatius's time in the wilderness, and his willingness to share his personal spiritual insight with others, places Ignatius firmly in the tradition of Catholic holy people.

Like Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226), Ignatius also used the force of his personality and his spiritual message to form a religious institution, the Society of Jesus (Jesuits), dedicated to the active promotion of the faith. In 1528, Ignatius enrolled at the University of Paris, and in 1534 he graduated with a master of arts degree. While in Paris he attracted six disciples, including the future St. Francis Xavier, who all undertook the spiritual exercises. Together, on August 15, 1534, these seven men took vows of poverty and chastity at Montmartre outside of Paris. Their original plan was to travel to the Holy Land to work to convert the local population to the Catholic faith, but when they found it impossible to travel to Palestine because of war they turned to Rome to offer their services to the pope. A papal bull in 1540 formally recognized Ignatius and his followers as a religious order dedicated to the service of the papacy.

Ignatius had a talent for organization, and once he had accepted the task of founding a religious order he worked to define its constitutions and mission. His constitutions established a clear hierarchy with a central headquarters and an explicit oath of obedience to the papacy. Through time, Ignatius also identified the two principal activities of the order: the teaching of boys and missionary activity, both in Catholic Europe and in the non-Catholic world. By the time of his death in 1556, there were more than 1,000 members of the society; the Jesuits remain one of the largest and most influential Catholic religious orders today.

Ignatius, through the founding of the Jesuits, can be seen as following in the footsteps of other holy Christians who founded monastic orders. Nonetheless, his efforts were clearly shaped by the requirements of the sixteenth century. The tight organization of his society as compared to the medieval friars, along with his explicit subjugation of his order to the papacy, reflected the need for effective, centrally directed action during the period of Catholic renewal in response to Protestantism. Ignatius himself described his new order as an army for Christ, a notion with real resonance for supporters of the nascent Catholic Reformation.

Ikkyu

Zen Buddhist monk, scholar, artist

Ikkyu Sojun, an irreverent Zen Buddhist monk, scholar, poet, painter, and calligraphy master who rebuilt Daitokuji temple and influenced the early development of virtually all Zen arts of the Muromachi period (1333–1573), stands out as both the strangest and most human of medieval Zen masters.

Born as the natural son of the Japanese emperor Go-Komatsu and a court noblewoman in 1394, Ikkyu was a victim of court intrigue while still in the womb. As a result, his mother was forced to give birth in the house of a commoner. Raised as a foundling in Ankokuji temple, at sixteen Ikkyu became the disciple of Ken'o Soi, under whom he began a strict Zen training regimen. By the late 1420s, he had settled in the port city of Sakai, where he began to develop his infamous "Crazy Cloud" Zen by frequenting brothels and wineshops and writing sensuous love poetry. Ikkyu soon began to attract the attention of many well-known literary and artistic figures of the day, who enshrined his irreverent ways in poetry and song. Despite his status as a longtime critic of abuses at the temple, in 1474 Ikkyu became Daitokuji's forty-seventh abbot. His waning years were spent at Takigi, between Kyoto and Sakai, and he died in 1481.

Ikkyu was enormously influential on the various Zen arts evolving in the Muromachi period. His disciple Murata Shuko (1422–1490) became Japan's first official tea master, and his aesthetic ideas also had direct impact on Konparu Zenchiku (1405–1467), who developed the bare stage setting of Noh drama. In poetry, his work reflects the movement from renga (linked verse) to haiku, which remains Japan's most distinctive poetic form. Ikkyu's main poetic work, Kyounshu (Crazy Cloud anthology), is a collection of more than 1,000 Chinese poems, many of which are sensuous love poems laced with double entendres. Ikkyu openly espoused Chinese Master Sung-yuan's (1139–1209) "Red Thread Zen," which taught that since man was inescapably connected with woman by birth, eliminating sexual desire was unnatural. He openly kept a mistress, a younger blind singer named Shin (or Mori) with whom he had a son.

Above all, Ikkyu hated the hypocrisy he witnessed among the religious institutions of his day, including most of his fellow priests at Daitokuji. Yet he fought hard for the preservation of Daitokuji's traditions. Not simply a rebel without a cause, Ikkyu aimed to shock others into rethinking their Zen practice (indeed, his adopted name, Sojun, means "essence of purity"). Perhaps fittingly, his legend lives on in modern Japan not through grandiose hagiography but rather as Ikkyu-san—a brilliant and mischievous imp in a popular children's cartoon.

Iloibonok

Maasai prophet-diviners

Iloibonok (oloiboni, singular) are male prophet-diviners believed by Maasai and other related groups in East Africa to be the direct descendants of the Maasai divinity Eng'ai through their mythical apical ancestor Kidongoi. Their special relationship as intermediaries with Eng'ai is evidenced by their array of special powers, which include prophecy, divination, ritual protection, sorcery, and healing.

As one early Western observer has noted, "The efficacy of the lybon [sic], or medicine-man, lies not in any innate ability of his own, but in his power of intercession with Ngai, who works through him, and imparts magical virtues to various objects" (Thomson 1968 [1885], 260). Their main method of divination is to use the complex Maasai numerology of auspicious and inauspicious numbers to analyze stones and other objects shaken in a gourd or horn (called an enkidong') and thrown onto the ground. They also prepare and provide ritual charms, amulets, and medicines to prevent illness, promote conception, curse other people, and ensure the success of cattle raids and other endeavors. Iloibonok prophesy through their dreams and vision, often induced by drinking large amounts of honey-beer. In return for their consultations and charms, they receive gifts of livestock, food, and other products, including a share of the cattle stolen on raids. In turn, they use their wealth to marry well, to form and strengthen their political alliances with other men, and to extend their power and prestige in a variety of other ways. The irony that their spiritual powers provide a significant source of wealth has not been lost on other Maasai, who often both admire and resent their success.

Iloibonok are divided, according to the efficacy of their powers and the size of their following, into major iloibonok (iloibonok kitok) and minor iloibonok (sometimes called ilkuyatik). Major iloibonok supervise and bless certain age-grade ceremonies, represent different territorial sections of Maasai, and are called upon in times of great crisis (such as prolonged drought) to appeal to Eng'ai. Several major iloibonok, including Mbatiany and his sons Lenana and Sendeu, also rose to prominence in the late nineteenth century by leading factions of ilmurran (junior men often called "warriors") in raids and wars against one another. British colonial administrators initially thought they were the "chiefs" of the Maasai, but this misunderstanding was eventually corrected. Most iloibonok, however, are minor, "private practitioners" (Bernsten 1979, 137). They usually do not prophesy but use divination and charms to help individual clients with more mundane problems such as sickness, fertility, and death of humans and livestock. People consult them according to their proximity and reputation.

Iloibonok were originally not Maasai but outsiders who slowly insinuated themselves as prophets and diviners among Maasai (Waller 1995 and Bernsten 1979). Eventually they were incorporated into the Maasai clan system as a new, separate subclan, the Inkidong'i (derived from enkidong', the stone-filled horn or gourd used in divination). Initially, Inkidong'i lived in separate areas; these days, they live interspersed with other Maasai clans. Their spiritual powers were inherited through the male line, although occasional inkoi-bonok (female prophet-diviners) with spiritual gifts and roles, including prophecy, have been reported. There are many accounts of struggles and jealousies among the sons of major and minor iloibonok as they competed for power, prestige, and wealth.

In recent years, the power and prestige of iloibonok has declined. The Maasai have undergone rapid social, political, and economic change. In a time of drastic economic downturn, few Maasai can afford the increasingly steep payments demanded by some iloibonok for their services. Under pressure from first the colonial then the postcolonial state, cattle raiding by ilmurran has all but stopped. Moreover, growing numbers of Maasai are becoming Christians, and most Christian denominations perceive iloibonok as evil and preach to converts against any continuing involvement with them. Nonetheless, some Christian Maasai still consult iloibonok on occasion.

Imams

Shi'i Muslim holy leaders

The word imam has several definitions in Islam. It comes from the Arabic root meaning "in front" and literally means a person who stands in front, thus a leader or guide. It appears in the Qur'an (2:124, 21:73) to describe Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and it has been used extensively in the Muslim world to refer to the person who stands in front and leads the Friday prayers. It has also generally been used by both Sunnis and Shi'is to refer to certain leaders of the community, especially prominent religious scholars. For Shi'i Muslims, however, it has a special meaning, referring to a line of descendants of the prophet Muhammad who were designated by God. Shi'is believe the imams have been the true spiritual guides of humanity and also the lawful leaders of the Islamic community, even though their rightful position was usually usurped by others. Succession is supposedly handed down through each imam as he chooses the one to follow him, but in practice this process has not always been a smooth one.

All Shi'is are agreed that the rightful successor to the prophet Muhammad as both spiritual and temporal leader of the Shi'is was 'Ali ibn Abi Talib (600–661), his cousin and son-in-law. They believe that Muhammad gave a number of indications during his lifetime that he wanted 'Ali to succeed him, but that after the prophet's death in 632, a group of prominent Meccans, led by Umar (r. 634–644), succeeded in having Abu Bakr (r. 632–634) elected as caliph. It was only after the death of the third caliph that 'Ali gained his rightful place at the head of the Islamic community. But by then, according to Shi'is, it was too late. Irreligious people had made their way into the heart of the Islamic community and now rose in revolt.

When 'Ali was assassinated in 661, only five years after becoming caliph, leadership of the Islamic community fell into the hands of the Umayyad dynasty. Shi'is believe that 'Ali had designated his son Hasan (624/625–669) to be the leader of Muslims after him, but Hasan was forced to give up his claims. After Hasan's death, his younger brother Husayn (626–680) tried to assert his claim but was martyred at Karbala in 680.

The main body of Shi'is in the world today believe that there was a chain of twelve imams who were the true successors of the prophet, beginning with 'Ali and ending with the twelfth, who, as a child, is said to have gone into hiding (occultation) in 874. This twelfth imam, it is believed, will return as the mahdi (rightly guided one) just before the Day of Judgment to defeat the enemies of the Shi'is and avenge all of the injustices that the imams and the Shi'is have endured. Shi'is taking this position are called the Twelvers (Ithna-'Ashari) and constitute the majority of the population in Iran, Iraq, Azerbaijan, and Bahrain, as well as forming substantial minorities in Lebanon, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, India, Turkey, and Afghanistan.

The Isma'ilis, another sect of the Shi'ah found mainly in Yemen, India, and East Africa, diverge from the main group because they believe in a different line of imams after the sixth one. One group of Isma'ilis believes that the line of imams remains unbroken to the present one, who is the current holder of the title Aga Khan. Another group of Shi'is, the Zaydis, hold that the true imam is whichever of the descendants of 'Ali and Fatima (Muhammad's daughter) manages to achieve political power. They are mainly to be found in Yemen. Apart from these, there are some groups of Shi'is who are considered by the others as extremists because of certain doctrines that are attributed to them: that they elevate the station of 'Ali to be equal to that of Muhammad or that they regard the imams to be cocreators of the world with God. These groups of Shi'is can be found among the Kurds in Iraq and the Alevis (Alawis) in Syria and Turkey.

Shi'is typically believe that, although anyone can say the declaration of belief (shahada) and be a Muslim, true faith (iman) requires submission to the imam of the age. For Shi'is, the true interpretation and explanation of the Qur'an can only be obtained from the imam, the true traditions (hadith) about the prophet Muhammad are only those authorized and transmitted through the imams, and the imam is protected from error and sin. They argue that much of the text of the Qur'an refers in an allegorical or metaphorical way to the imams and that God's grace flows to earth through the imam. Indeed, they believe that if there is ever a time when there is no imam upon the earth, God will destroy it.

Imitation of Christ

One of the earliest spiritual traditions in Christianity, the imitation of Christ—that is, striving to imitate, or follow, Christ on all levels, both physical and spiritual—dates to the days of the primitive church. One of the earliest written sources is the Epistle to the Ephesians of Ignatius of Antioch (c. 30–107 C.E.).

As noted by several scholars, the verb “imitate” does not appear in the gospels. Nevertheless, the metaphorical phrase of “following Christ,” or walking behind Christ, is of great importance as it indicates the individual's willingness and commitment to Christ and his church. The writings of Paul, however, explicitly prescribe such imitation. For Paul, imitation of Christ begins with the simple but important act of baptism. Ongoing imitation is exemplified in the crucifixion, as in Galatians 2:20: “I have been crucified with Christ; it is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me.” Ultimately, Paul is more interested in contemplating the example of Christ's life than in direct physical imitation. Through such contemplation, the individual would in effect grow closer to the spiritual example of Christ.

The famous passage from Book 7 of Augustine's Confessions, composed in around 400, indicates a strong tradition of imitation of Christ: “Why art thou proud, O man? God for thee became low. Thou wouldst perhaps be ashamed to imitate a lowly man; then at least imitate the lowly God.” For Augustine, Christ is both a sign of grace and an example to be followed. In Augustine's later mystical writings, imitation of Christ leads to a mystical union with Christ.

In the Middle Ages, physical imitation of Christ grew in practice. The Council of Tribur (895) issued a statement that the triple immersion of baptism was performed in imitation of Jesus' three days in the tomb, while the rising from the water imitated the resurrection. It was no longer necessary to be a professional religious figure to engage in imitation; because Christ was indeed human, the "ordinary" human being could imitate Christ just as effectively as the monastic or priest. Perhaps this is nowhere more evident than in the escalation of asceticism for medieval Christians. Essentially the idea that the soul is good and the body evil, asceticism asked that individuals scorn or rebuff the physical body in lieu of edification of the soul. Hair shirts, whipping with chains, and extended fasts were all characteristic practices of the period. Penitents believed that such punishment would bring their souls closer to the perfection of Christ.

Bernard of Clairvaux's (1090–1153) extremely Christocentric mysticism was conducive to imitation on several levels. Bernard's emphasis on the humanity of Christ led him to believe that imitation of Christ is most evident in examples of humility and love, as he makes clear in his De gradibus superbiae et humilitatis (Steps of humility) and De diligendo Deo (On loving God). Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274) contributed a simple but effective formula in the Summa Theologiae (ST) 2.2.186.5: "Religious perfection consists chiefly in the imitation of Christ." In ST 3.65.2, Aquinas writes of the "perfection of the spiritual life," stressing the importance of baptism as a first step in imitation and toward perfection.

Thomas à Kempis's (c. 1379–1471) Imitation of Christ, first issued anonymously in 1418, offered its readers explicit instruction on imitation. Divided into four parts, the book provides detailed spiritual guidelines. Thomas's book became the best-selling devotional work of all time. It continues in print in a variety of translations in many languages. The work's influence on later devotional texts and practices cannot be overstated.

The Reformation era introduced major shifts in the concept of imitation of Christ. In his Enchiridion militis Christiani (Manual of the Christian knight), Erasmus (c. 1466–1536) recommends something akin to imitation of Christ when he prescribes close study of Christ's philosophy. Elsewhere in the work, he recommends keeping Christ always in sight as a model. Martin Luther (1483–1546) made the connection between baptism and imitation of Christ even stronger in his Commentary on Galatians. Commenting on Galatians 3:27, he wrote: "Needless to say, when we have put on the robe of the righteousness of Christ we must not forget to put on also the mantle of the imitation of Christ." However, elsewhere in the same commentary, he said, "We do not deny that Christians ought to imitate the example of Christ; but mere imitation will not satisfy God." Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) expressed a strong sense of being "with Christ" and thus experiencing his humanity. In The Spiritual Exercises, he asks the exercitant to imagine himself at the foot of the cross, communing with the crucified Christ.

In the modern era, Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758) preached imitation as evidence of love. Søren Kierkegaard (1813–1855) felt that imitation of Christ was the truest sign of a Christian—that without imitation, one was not a Christian, for to be a Christian was to be a "follower," or imitator, of Christ. The great scholar of mysticism Evelyn Underhill (1875–1941) focused on the crucifixion as a pattern for perfection. Contemplation on the crucifixion is then emblematic of an imitator of Christ in that the individual enters the space and time of the life of Christ. Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–1945), writing in the shadow of Nazi Germany, wrote that those who follow Christ will bear his image.

Perhaps the most evident imitation of Christ for the late twentieth century has been the proliferation of "WWJD" paraphernalia. "WWJD," which stands for "What Would Jesus Do?" began with a youth group in Michigan. Taking their cue from a late nineteenth-century novel called In His Steps by Charles Monroe Sheldon, the group posed a simple question to their constituents. Some 14 million WWJD bracelets were being worn worldwide by the year 2000. A glance at the bracelet is supposed to compel the wearer to contemplate the question in difficult or unusual situations, thus prompting imitation of Christ and what his possible reaction to the same situation might have been.

Incas

Peruvian rulers

Every year on June 24, the people of Cuzco, Peru, celebrate the festival of Inti Raymi, an ancient Inca religious feast. The festival, which was banned by the Catholic Church for several hundred years until 1942, honors the Sun, the Incas' supreme god. Inti Raymi symbolizes and confirms every year the engagement of the Sun and his children, the Incas. It celebrates the Sun as the father of the first human couple, Inca (king) Manco Capac and Mama Oclla. Manco Capac, as the first Inca, was also the high priest of Inca society.

The whole Inca population was involved in this celebration. The culminating moment of the feast shows the Sapa Inca, or Inca king, offering sacred chicha (a drink made from yellow corn) in keros (sacred vases especially designed for this ceremony) to the Sun. In this way, the Inca, on behalf of his people, thanked the Sun for a fruitful year, confirmed their religious links, and started a new year. Most colonial chroniclers offer descriptions of this spectacular feast, although they tend to point out its idolatrous nature. The continuation of the festival is the best evidence we have that Inca rulers played an important mediating function thanks to the divine descent attributed to them.

Indigetes

Roman local gods/heroes

Indigetes is a collective term used to describe a sect of early Roman gods whose identity and roles are much debated by scholars. One popular belief is that the indigetes were the indigenous or original gods of the Roman state, in contrast to the novensides or novensiles, which are believed to be divinities adopted or adapted later. The great influence of the Greeks and other peoples on Roman religion makes a complete understanding of the indigetes' origins difficult. Yet, those who argue that the indigetes were the original gods of Rome generally see them as serving the functional needs of an early agrarian and warring society, only becoming overshadowed later by foreign cultural influences.

These gods are believed to have been personal forces that did not have human form or act in human ways as the Greek gods, which may make them seem more obscure at present, but not necessarily any less powerful in early Roman society.

Some significantly strong, multifunctional gods, such as Apollo, may have been considered indigetes. However, the multifaceted roles of these gods may have come after contact with the Greeks, whose own gods were more comprehensive and intricately involved in humanlike relationships among each other. The indigetes were not originally associated with any myths and were not anthropomorphized until the Romans were influenced by other cultures.

The religious-minded early Romans conscientiously honored the indigetes with rituals and offerings. A priest, or flamen, was assigned to a specific deity to carry out rituals for the state and to preside over the festivals of that god. In their turn, the divinities were believed to reveal their divine will through natural phenomena, which devout Romans then attempted to interpret. The invocation of the indigetes, each of whom was called by name when his particular help, protection, or worship was desired, was called indigitamenta.

Yet, a consensus regarding the character of the indigetes has never been reached. Although many historians believe that the indigetes were abstract spirits seemingly addressed indifferently as belonging to either sex, some scholars have argued that instead of being native gods of Rome, the indigetes were minor gods of exceedingly narrow function, wielding little power. The exact number of such deities would only be conjecture, but there would have been an exceptionally large number. These divine manifestations would have been known to worshippers as little more than names, always linked with a very specific purpose, or numen, divine power. For instance, an entire series of deities were responsible for the process of harvesting corn, one presiding over the plowing of fallow land, one for planting the seed, and so on. Other functions correlated to indigetes might be guarding over a child who was eating or protecting the doorway.

Yet another theory is that the indigetes were ancestral divinities created from humans, similar to the Greek hero cult. Although this may explain the description of Aeneas as one of the indigetes, other deities, such as Sol, are more problematic. Indeed, the inclusion of such a wide variety of deities under the same term has made it impossible for any current theory to fully explain all instances of its use.

Innocent of Alaska

First Orthodox bishop of Alaska

Innocent of Alaska was born Ivan Evsievich Popov in Anchinskoe, Siberia, in 1797. He was renamed Ioann and later given the surname Veniaminov by the rector of his theological school in Irkutsk to honor a recently deceased bishop, Veniamin, and later known in Alaska as Father Ioann (John) Veniaminov. In 1817, Ioann married, in 1822 he became a priest, and in 1823 he answered the call to go to Alaska as a missionary.

Father Ioann arrived at Unalaska Island near the Alaskan Peninsula in 1824 where he taught Christian doctrine and instructed the local population in masonry. With his pupils' help, he built the first church in the Aleutian Islands. In 1834, Ioann transferred to Sitka. There, he studied the Tlingit language and continued to educate the local population in both Christianity and manual trades. Father Ioann traveled to northern California in that same year, where he visited Fort Ross and wrote down his impressions of Russia's southernmost American colony.

During his time in Alaska, Ioann studied the customs of the local tribes and attempted to understand their cultures even as he attempted to reveal to them the words of Christ and the traditions of the Orthodox religion. Accounts report that he was the most respected of the missionaries thanks to his considerate and gentle ways. Ioann also created a written alphabet and literary language for the Eastern Aleut dialect, which he used in his own writing and for translations. He was committed to the education of the local population and to the instruction of missionary priests in the local languages.

In 1838, Ioann traveled to St. Petersburg and Moscow. When he heard of the death of his wife, he became a monk, taking the name Innocent, and subsequently became bishop of Kamchatka, the Kurile, and the Aleutian Islands. In his diocese for the eastern Siberia region and Alaska, he sent out orders that conversions were to occur only by conviction, not coercion. Innocent became archbishop in 1858 and was transferred to Yakutsk. His onsite missionary work in Alaska ended in 1868, when he became metropolitan of Moscow, a position that he retained until death in 1879.

Innocent was an extraordinary missionary, linguist, and scholar whose works include a grammar for the Aleut-Lisiev language, Notes on the Islands of the Unalaska District; Journals in Alaska, 1823 to 1836; Instruction on the Paths to the Kingdom of Heaven (lessons written in an Aleutian dialect); and other works on ethnography and language as well as translations of Christian texts, such as the Gospel of Matthew. Innocent is commemorated on March 31 and September 23. He was canonized in 1977.

Insanity

Often those who believe in a holy person's message regard them as touched by God, while nonbelievers simply think they're insane. The overlap between holiness and madness is recognized by followers of several religions, who declare that their spiritual heroes suffer from a "divine madness" or are "holy fools," a tradition that goes back at least to Plato, who says that Socrates had a "madness that comes by divine gift," marked by periodic trances and abandonment of social norms. Even with the aid of modern medicine, the line between mental illness and god-inspired ecstasy is not clear; in earlier ages, atypical behavior was often regarded as either divine or demonic in nature.

"Holy fools" are marked by their detachment from the standards of the world around them. They range from the Bauls, wandering mystics of India who reject scriptural authority and pursue an esoteric inner path to the divine, to the idiosyncratic holy people of Daoism, to Christian figures such as Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226). In all these cases, some believed that the practitioner was mad, rather than holy. In time, however, several religions, such as Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism, especially in Tibet and in Zen, accepted an entire category of mad saint. In the Tibetan case, holy fools such as Drukpa Kunley (1455–1529) were ascetic wanderers, turning the monastic norms on their heads by enjoying beer and women and cultivating eccentricity.

Theologians have decided that in such cases the appearance of madness is a matter of intense devotion—the holy person is so focused on the divine that he or she loses all touch with accepted social practices. Whether these mad saints are actually insane or not is a matter of opinion. Certainly they have often had a specific message they were seeking to convey. For the Zen master Ikkyu Sojun (1394–1481), for example, an unconventional lifestyle was an overt critique of the decadent monastic life of his time. There are many tales of how he mocked conventions, going openly to inns and brothels, dancing down streets waving a skull, and the like. This active critical role is especially clear in the case of the Russian holy fools, prominent during the Middle Ages. For example, the Muscovite Basil the Blessed (1469–1552), the “Fool in Christ,” renounced all earthly wisdom and thus could openly criticize those in power. Such people were tolerated as specially touched by God in circumstances where a sane critic would be unlikely to survive, Basil bearding no less terrifying a figure than Ivan the Terrible himself.

Islam includes the belief that too close a contact with God can actually induce insanity. Besides a category of wanderers (qualanders) who neglect social rules, sufi teachings tell of gazzb—when the shock of divine illumination overwhelms the intellect—a state that can be permanent. This can make people behave in manners ordinarily regarded as insane. Ahmad Radwan (1895–1967), for example, could not bear to wear clothes, he was so inflamed by God. A whole class has earned the title “drunk sufis”—so intoxicated with the love of God that they act bizarrely and break social norms. The most famous is Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj (858–922) executed as a heretic. Hindu devotional saints have also sometimes seemed to cross the line between ecstasy and madness. Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886) was a famous “mad saint” who broke purity rules, had hallucinations, danced with Kali’s statue, and in general led the locals to think him mad. His parents tried to cure him with marriage, and finally his holiness was only recognized thanks to the intervention of a holy woman who established that Ramakrishna was ecstatic, not insane.

Others have ended up in insane asylums only to be recognized as holy gradually. The prophet Muhammad (570–632) believed himself to be insane for a time after he began receiving his revelations, even considering committing suicide. His wife Khadija, however, led him to test the truth of his revelations, convincing him in time that he was indeed a prophet. Other holy people have not met so much understanding. The sufi mystic al-Shibli of Baghdad (c. 861–945) was so eccentric in his behavior, including rubbing salt into his eyes to prevent sleep, that he was committed to a lunatic asylum. But once there, he drew visitors from all over the Muslim world, with whom he discoursed on the sufi way—his tomb in Baghdad is still venerated. Such suspicion also fell upon several Christian saints of the seventeenth century, an era noted for its ecstatic religious outpourings. Margaret Mary Alacoque (1647–1690) enjoyed so many visions and ecstasies that many of her fellow nuns thought she was insane or possessed by a demon. Similarly, Joseph of Cupertino’s (1603–1663) brethren thought his continual ecstasies were a sign of insanity or illness, and the saint was afflicted with seventeenth-century medicine at its worst.

One should also not dismiss the charge of insanity as a powerful tool in the hands of opponents of holy people. This is a particularly important theme in modern times, as science uncovers ever more biological reasons for abnormal behavior. But it is a particularly handy way to dismiss a troublemaker, if the followers can be led to believe the accusation. Insanity charges figure especially prominently when “enlightened” governments have faced troublesome holy people from a culture they have not understood. Thus, the Jamaican prophet Alexander Bedward (1859–1930), who proclaimed that he was Christ and that the destruction of whites was imminent, was committed to an insane asylum after his movement was dispersed in 1921. The African American religious leader who took the name “Father Divine” (c. 1870–1965) also declared himself to be God in the early twentieth century. He was arrested, but the declaration that he was insane helped in his case—he was acquitted by a jury by reason of insanity. Even more recently, the Kenyan Elijah Masinde (1908–1987), who led a movement to restore native religion, was committed to a mental hospital by the colonial authorities, while his compatriot Mariam Ragot was accused of “delusions” and “mental illness” and imprisoned for six years, during which she was drugged to treat her insanity—a process that may indeed have broken her sanity. In all these cases, we simply lack the evidence to judge whether the person was insane or holy—or both.

Intermediaries

The role of the holy person as mediator between the divine and the rest of humankind is so central to medieval Christianity and modern Roman Catholicism that it has often been argued that Protestantism has no saints—assuming that mediation is the only necessary attribute of Christian “sainthood.” Christianity very early evolved the notion that saints are able to intercede with God, while ordinary mortals do not dare to do so because of their sinfulness. Although saints do not have the power within themselves to work miracles, they can ask for miracles to be worked on their behalf. This belief expanded early from a focus on living holy people to dead saints, who, after all, are confirmed in their holiness and enjoy the presence of God in heaven. From there it was but a step to the creation of a full system for invoking saints, asking for their help in winning all sorts of favors from a distant God. Christian saints are still believed by the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches (and many Anglicans) to have the power to intercede to help those who treat them respectfully, in favor of a particular locale, or, especially since the early modern period, in cases of particular illnesses or problems.

Other “religions of the book”—Judaism, Islam, and Protestant Christianity—have officially rejected the notion that holy people can intercede with God, and even that such intercession is necessary, believing, in Protestant terms, in the “priesthood of all believers.” Thus the official teaching, but reality blurs the distinction between these religions and traditional Christianity. At the popular level, many people in these religions believe that some people can pray “better” than others, and that therefore their prayers are more likely to be answered. And some people particularly please God, and thus are more likely to be heard. Thus the Qur’an teaches that no one can intercede for human beings but God alone, but nonetheless, the concept of the wali, the holy person—that is, a special person protected by God and given divine permission to intercede for lesser mortals—developed in Islam. This belief has been rejected by some sects of Islam but is particularly held by Shi’i Muslims, who believe that the divinely appointed imam is the only true interpreter of the Qur’an, and that thus one must submit to the imam of the age to be a true Muslim.

Judaism has also rejected for the most part the notion of holy people as necessary mediators between human and divine, except in the case of scholars interpreting the meaning of scripture. But again, in popular religion, mediatory figures appear, especially in early Judaism and in the early modern Hasidic movement. Hebrew scriptures include large numbers of prophets, judges, and kings who conveyed God’s will to the people. Until the firm establishment of rabbinic Judaism, too, there were holy figures who interceded with God for humankind. For example, the Mishna, a rabbinic compilation from the second century C.E., describes Choni the Circle Drawer. He was asked to pray for rain—but God did not grant his request. Choni then drew a circle and stood in it, declaring that he wouldn’t move until God gave the right amount of the right sort of rain. He then got the rain he demanded. As the commentary says, he could presume with God, as a son can be presumptuous with his father. This sort of impertinent demand for God to act is usually more identified with the Christian saints of Ireland, such as St. Patrick (d. c. 493), who fasted until God gave in to his demands.

Similarly, Jewish Hasidic leaders such as Nahman of Bratslav (1772–1810) emphasized God’s transcendence, making the role of the righteous holy man as intermediary especially important. The importance of holy mediators on the fringe of established religion is also significant in Protestant Christianity, especially such branches as Pentecostalism, which emphasize the role of a prophet. To give just one example of many, Elizabeth Clare Prophet (1940–), leader of the Church Universal and Triumphant, has a special role as “Messenger” passed on from her husband Mark Prophet when he died in 1973: She reportedly receives messages from saints and mystics of the past to help her church and its members.

The other major religion that gives an important role to deceased holy people as intermediaries is Daoism. Daoist immortals and perfected people are mediums for communication between heaven and earth, able to ascend or descend, or sometimes to manifest themselves in human form on earth. For example, the Daoist holy woman/goddess Bixia Yuanjun is believed to facilitate the birth of male children; the first celestial master, Zhang Daoling (34–156), was able to communicate between deities and believers; and at a more prosaic level, the Daoist sage Tao Hongjing (456–536) compiled a work on the necessary rituals to send documents to the gods, a practice any trained Daoist believer can carry out, thanks to the original work of holy people in making this information available to a broader public.

One of the most important functions of the holy person in Amerindian and African religions is also to serve as mediator between divine and human. Native American shamans have direct ties to spirits and the powers of the universe, which they can use on behalf of others. Often, rulers especially were venerated as necessary intermediaries. The most important speech of the Aztec tlatoani, “speakers,” was that between gods and the people. This is also true of Africa, where rulers’ most important traditional role was often as intermediary. Zulu chiefs such as Shaka ka Senzangakhona (1787–1828), for example, were able to call on the ancestors. More generally, spirit mediums, common to many of the religions of Africa, are able to heal and protect the people thanks to their contact with the spirits of great ancestors and chiefs, who possess the mediums and speak through them. It is not surprising that many spirit mediums have been regarded as especially holy people with great influence in the community.

Examples of holy people acting as intermediaries with the gods can be found in most, if not all, religions over a great range of time. They appear in Greco-Roman polytheism (for example, the philosopher Pythagoras, c. 570–497 B.C.E.), and they play an important role in many new religions. Such figures range from the Sikh gurus, who are believed to be God’s representatives on earth, to Baha’i guardians of the faith such as ‘Abdu’l-Baha (1844–1921), who was named “Center of the Covenant” and the authorized interpreter of the Baha’i scriptures. They also include the founders of hundreds of Christian cults in America and leaders of new religions in Japan and other countries.

To end on a more prosaic note: Holy people are so often regarded as intermediaries with the divine because of their pious lives, impartiality, love of justice, and charismatic traits—the same qualities make them highly desirable as intermediaries within the human sphere. In all religions, holy people have been called upon to serve as ambassadors, have mediated peace, and have reconciled enemies. For example, Muhammad (570–632) was invited to Medina as arbiter in tribal disputes, a common use of holy men on the Arabian peninsula both before and after his time. Some holy people are even granted holy status in popular esteem especially because of their ability to mediate between earthly enemies. Thus, Alexander Nevskii (1220–1263), prince of Novgorod, was an important negotiator between the Russians and their Mongol overlords, while the Irish Laurence O’Toole (1128–1180) eased the transition to Norman rule of Ireland while serving as archbishop of Dublin.

Ippen

Buddhist monk, founder

Ippen, born in 1239, was a Japanese Tendai Buddhist monk who in 1274 founded the Jisho (Time) sect, a branch of Pure Land Buddhism. Together with Honen (1133–1212) and Shinran (1173–1262), he is recognized as one of the three originators of Japanese Pure Land Buddhism in the Kamakura period (1185–1333). His particular contribution to the Pure Land Buddhist practice was to introduce the nenbutsu odori (chanting Amida Buddha’s name while dancing), a type of Amida worship in which devotees dance in a circle beating drums, ringing bells, and chanting Namu Amida Butsu (hail to the name of Amida Buddha).

Ippen’s initial inspiration was an oracle he received from the Shinto kami (indigenous Japanese deity) at Kumano Shrine in Kii Province. This deity had long been identified in popular Japanese culture as a manifestation of Amida Buddha (Skt.: Amitabha), the central Buddha in Pure Land belief. According to this oracle, rebirth in Amida Buddha’s Pure Land is assured if one merely chants the nenbutsu (Amida’s name) fervently; faith does not matter. Ippen held that the nenbutsu transcends all human intentions. Therefore, people should abandon all religious practices except for the nenbutsu, for then one’s trust in it will be perfect.

Ippen’s teachings stress first and foremost this simple religious practice. Unlike his predecessors, Honen and Shinran, Ippen did not focus on the believer’s mental state but rather emphasized the primacy of religious practice and its power to elicit “single-mindedness without distraction” from the devotee. In order to propagate this belief, Ippen traveled throughout Japan and assembled people to intone the nenbutsu and to dance to its rhythm. This particular faith and practice greatly appealed to the common people because it was an easy path of salvation that was accessible to everyone.

Ippen’s religious travels are depicted in the Ippen Shonin Eden (Pictorial biography of the monk Ippen), also known as the Ippen Hijiri-e (Picture scroll of the wandering monk Ippen), an illustrated handscroll painting dating to the thirteenth century. This handscroll painting, a set of eleven scrolls, was produced in commemoration of Ippen and his teachings and serves as a historical record of his time.

Ireland, Twelve Apostles of

Christian saints

“The Twelve Apostles of Ireland” refers to a group of sixth-century Irish saints as well as to a manuscript of the fourteenth or fifteenth century. The manuscript is part of the Bethada Náem nÉrenn (Lives of the Irish saints), a collection of Irish Lives assembled by Charles Plummer. Richard Woods refers to the twelve saints as “kind of a monastic Knights of the Round Table” (2000, 82). Although the names vary in different accounts, the Twelve Apostles usually include Colum Cille (or Columba) of Iona, Ciarán of Clonmacnoise, Brénainn (or Brendan) the Navigator, Molaise of Daim Inis (Devenish Island), Cainnech (or Canice) of Kilkenny, Colum (or Colmán) of Terryglass, Brendan of Birr, Ruadán (or Rúán), Mobhí, Clárainech of Glas Noiden, Ninidh of Inismacsaint, and Sinell.

The twelve were brought together by Finnian of Clonard (d. c. 549), who is sometimes counted as one of them. Finnian established the monastery of Clúain-Iráird (Clonard), where young men gathered, drawn by Finnian’s reputation as a teacher and holy man, in about 520. According to the Life of Finnian, the average number of students at Clonard was 3,000; the most famous of these students became known as the Twelve Apostles. These men were sent out by Finnian to found Christian monasteries throughout Ireland.

The most well-known of the apostles are Colum Cille (521–597) and Brendan the Navigator (c. 486–575). Ciarán (512–548) was a friend and rival of Colum Cille and became one of Ireland’s most honored Irish saints. He, like Finnian and others of the Clonard school, died during an epidemic in 548–549. He is remembered for having a temper and for his kindness toward animals. His feast day is September 9.

Cainnech (517–600) is the patron of Kilkenny; his feast day is October 11. Colum (d. 549) has his feast day celebrated on December 13. Brendan of Birr (d. c. 571) shares ancestry, as well as name, with Brendan the Navigator. He was the eldest of the twelve, and his school at Birr is famous for the MacRegol Gospels, which are now housed in Oxford’s Bodleian Library. His feast day is November 29. Ruadán (d. c. 584) is thought to have been related to the royal house of Munster and has his feast day on April 15.

There is some speculation whether all these men were actually trained by Finnian. Some seem to have lived before Finnian’s time, and it is thought others were connected to the Clonard circle by later writers to enhance the reputation of that monastery.

Irenaeus

(c. 135–c. 200 C.E.)

Christian bishop, scholar

A church father born sometime around 135, Irenaeus claimed to have known Polycarp of Smyrna and thus probably came from Asia Minor. He studied at Rome, eventually settling in Lyons, where he became a presbyter and ultimately bishop. As bishop, he led the Christian community in Lyons, evangelized the Celts of the region, and sought to establish peace and unity in the church. He died in about 200, possibly martyred.

During the second century, Irenaeus and other fathers of the church wrote treatises defending their faith against heretical doctrines. Although most of these tracts have been lost, including many written by Irenaeus, two of Irenaeus’s have survived: Denunciation and Refutation of the So-Called Gnosis and Demonstration of Apostolic Preaching. The Denunciation, generally known as Against Heresies, is of special note, as it not only details the Christian orthodoxy of the second century but also presents an exhaustive and objective description of Gnosticism. Irenaeus felt that Gnosticism, particularly that of Valentinus and his followers, was especially dangerous, both because of its radical syncretism and because of the tendency of its doctrines to sound so much like those of Christianity while its “sentiments are very different.”

Originally non-Christian, Gnosticism was mainly a Jewish movement that drew upon Hellenistic philosophy, Persian dualism, Babylonian astrology, and other concepts circulating during the first and second centuries. Like Christianity, it was a doctrine of salvation, but it differed fundamentally in that its proponents argued that the spirit must be liberated from the prison house of the material world, a world created not by the eternal God but by an inferior or evil being. For the Gnostics, salvation, or the release of the soul from the body, could only be achieved by the reception of a mystically illuminating knowledge, or gnosis, which would be delivered by a divine messenger. In the case of Christian Gnosticism, the messenger was Christ.

Irenaeus felt that this conceptualization of salvation was a “perverse mirror image” of the “Apostolic faith,” especially because it seemed to call into question the Christian ideas of God as the creator of the world, Christ as both human and divine, and the salvation of both the soul and the body. Because of this, Irenaeus argued the need to exhort true Christians “to avoid such an abyss of madness and of blasphemy against Christ” (Against Heresies, I, Preface, II).

Ireri wa Irugi

(fl. c. 1800 C.E.)

Aembu prophet

Ireri wa Irugi is the most famous, well-remembered, and highly respected prophet of the Aembu people of Kenya. Although his birth and death dates are unknown, he lived long before the Europeans came to Embu, probably in c. 1800. He hailed from Kigumo in Kyeni.

The stories handed down about Ireri wa Irugi contain several remarkable descriptions of him. He was said to be in communion with God, who called him to be his spokesman. He reportedly would sink underground to commune with God and had the special ability of appearing in different places within short periods of time. He was thus known for his abrupt, unexpected appearances. He apparently was able to foresee events by “beating a goat.” For the Aembu, the goat is the sacred animal used for sacrifices. Ireri’s choice was a white goat, which symbolized the purity and the presence of God, just as the snow at the top of Kirinyaga (Mt. Kenya) symbolized the dwelling place of God.

Some of the things Ireri prophesied included the coming of outsiders and the disruptive impact their presence would have on the Aembu peoples. The social order, he predicted, would undergo change because of formal education and its consequences. The economic setup would also change, especially with regard to land ownership. The roles of men, women, and youth would no longer be the same. Even the mode of dress and the dances would not remain the same. He lamented that the invaders would interfere with Aembu culture. He also talked of an animal that would come from the sky with an iron mouth (later understood as the airplane) and an iron snake (the train), both of which would destroy the people by opening them up to foreign influence. Ireri was quick to point out that any resistance against the invaders would be counterproductive because of their superior weapons and their determination to conquer.

Ireri also warned of impending dangers such as the jigger disease, declaring that the people, especially family members, should be prepared to nurse one another. The epidemic of jigger disease came to pass, but the prophecy has also been taken to signify the general disruption caused among the Aembu by the coming of the Europeans. Ireri is also remembered for designating the families from which individuals of outstanding political prowess or material prosperity would emerge, and this, too, came to pass.

To draw the attention of the people, Ireri would blow a horn, and many would gather to listen to him. He has been compared to Cege Mugo wa Kibiro (fl. c. 1890) in Agikuyu culture.

‘Isa

See Jesus (‘Isa)

Isaac

(c. 20th century B.C.E.)

Hebrew patriarch

Dating from possibly the twentieth century B.C.E., Isaac was one of the Hebrew patriarchs, the son of Abraham and Sarah and the father of Esau and Jacob by Rebecca. He is the most elusive of the patriarchs; in his appearance in Genesis 21–28, events usually happen to him, rather than him having an effect on events. His very lack of clear character helps shed light on Jewish notions of relationship with God: No personal qualities earned Isaac a special position with God; he appears as a very ordinary sort of person. What he is, above all, is the transmitter of a lineage: God made promises to Abraham, for which Isaac acts as hereditary bridge.

The primary importance of Isaac was that he existed at all. He was the child born in the great old age of his parents, Sarah and Abraham, as a central part of God’s covenant with Abraham. His position as the deeply longed-for son of old age made Isaac the perfect tool to test the faith of his father. In Genesis 19, Abraham is commanded by God to take his beloved son (Jewish and Christian traditions assume that this must be a reference to Isaac; Muslims attribute the tale to Isaac’s half brother Ishmael), build an altar, and sacrifice the child on it. Abraham does so, only to be stopped by an angel at the last instant. Abraham’s willingness to obey proves the strength of his belief; Isaac's opinion of the matter is not given in Genesis. In Christian exegesis, however, Isaac becomes a mystical forerunner of Christ, serving as willing sacrifice for the world.

Isaac has a final strong appearance before his death at the reported age of 180, when his sons by Rebecca, the twins Esau and Jacob, are in contention. Jacob, the younger twin, manages to deceive his old and blind father into blessing him instead of Esau. As a result, God's promise to the lineage of Abraham is passed on to future generations through Jacob.

Isaac and Rebecca were both buried in the Cave of Machpelah in Hebron, also the burial place of Abraham and Sarah (and, according to tradition, of Adam and Eve). It is still an important pilgrimage site for both Jews and Muslims.

Isaac of Armenia (Surb Sahak)

Christian Armenian patriarch

Isaac of Armenia, or Isaac the Great, was the son of St. Nerses the Great, catholicos (patriarch) of Armenia (d. 373), and a woman of royal heritage. He was born in about 338 and educated in Constantinople, where he was an especially enthusiastic student of languages and literature. Although he married, he was left a widower at a young age and thereupon decided to become a monk. However, it was not long before the piety, devotion, and cultured intelligence of the man became known, and he was appointed catholicos of Armenia in about 388 or 390. As catholicos, Isaac undertook a rigorous program of reform and rejuvenation of the Armenian church, beginning with the establishment of its metropolitan autonomy from the see at Constantinople.

In so doing, Isaac enabled the Armenian church to affirm its own distinct, non-Cappadocian form of Christianity. Never having abandoned completely his affinity for monastic discipline (it was said that he himself lived as a monk even at the patriarchal residence), he reaffirmed the tradition of monasticism within the Armenian church and required a vow of celibacy of its bishops. He established new churches and monasteries throughout Armenia to replace those destroyed by the Persian overlords and to counter the influence of Persian Zoroastrianism, demanded ecclesiastical accountability from all levels of the clergy, and renewed the authority of Byzantine canon law in the particulars of church governance.

However, his most lasting contribution was to help establish an Armenian alphabet and a native Armenian literature. Because of his own schooling, he was especially sensitive to the power of language and literary form in native dialect. Just as he desired the creation of an autonomous and distinct Armenian church, he desired the development of a native liturgical and spiritual literature. Thus, in about 390 he advised and assisted the monk St. Mesrop Mashtots in the development of an Armenian alphabet (the original and archaic form of Armenian and its alphabet having long since been lost, probably since the introduction of Christianity in the second century). The two supervised an assortment of scholars in creating the first translations of the Koine Greek and Syriac Bibles into Armenian. Isaac also requested a translation of the liturgy from the Syrian into Armenian, as well as texts from the Greek and Syrian fathers, including Athanasius, Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and John Chrysostom. It was with those translations and others that Armenian literature is said to have begun, and with it, a firm sense of Armenian identity.

Isaac was able to continue as catholicos until 428, at which time he was asked to resign from his position, not by the Persian rulers but by resentful and threatened Armenian princes. Like his father before him, whose death, it is said, was the result of poisoning at the hands of a willful and bitter King Pap, of whose decadent lifestyle Catholicos Nerses could not approve, Isaac fell victim to court intrigue and withdrew from public life. Nevertheless, as a result of popular demand, Isaac returned to his patriarchal seat c. 430–432 and resumed his pastoral duties, even attending the synod of Ashtishat in 435. He died in Ashtishat in 439. His feast day is September 9 (also September 7, November 20, or two weeks prior to Lent).

Ishida Baigan

Confucian popular leader

Ishida Baigan was the founder of a popular self-cultivation movement in eighteenth-century Japan that was particularly influential among the merchant class. Robert N. Bellah's famous 1957 book Tokugawa Religion even portrayed it as a kind of Japanese equivalent of Max Weber's "Protestant ethic." Baigan's disciple Teshima Toan (1718–1786) organized Baigan's teachings into a nationwide religious movement, naming it Shingaku (lit., "learning of the mind and heart") because it centered on knowing the (original) mind, the ultimate spiritual task that is classically described in Mencius 7A:1.

Born into a farming family in Tanba province near Kyoto in 1685, at ten Baigan was sent to work for a commercial house in Kyoto. At twenty-two he became an apprentice clerk for a kimono merchant there, a job he continued for twenty years. He had no teacher, but he always took books with him to read when he went out on business and liked to attend lectures by Confucian teachers. At first he was also strongly attracted to Shinto and thought of becoming a Shinto preacher. At the age of about thirty-five, he began to feel ill at ease about his understanding of the nature of the self (Jap.: sei; Chin.: xing). He continued listening to lectures by all sorts of teachers, but none was able to settle his doubts.

Finally, Baigan chanced to meet a recluse named Oguri Ryōun who was well versed in Confucian, Buddhist, and Daoist teachings. Impressed by Ryōun's self-assurance, Baigan became his disciple and began practicing contemplation under his direction. When he had an insight that "the nature is the parent of heaven and earth and the ten thousand things," Ryōun objected, saying, "There is still an eye that sees that your own nature is the parent of heaven and earth and the ten thousand things. But the nature has no eye" (Tohi mondō, Ichikawa 1995, 446). This conversation propelled Baigan to bore into the question for another year and a half. One night as he lay in bed exhausted, a sparrow's chirp at daybreak pierced the deep silence, and Baigan had a profound enlightenment experience. From 1725, he began giving free public lectures at his residence. These talks led to the compilation of Tohi mondō (City and country dialogues) and a collection of his sayings. Both books quoted from the basic texts of Neo-Confucianism and philosophical Daoism as well as famous Chinese and Japanese collections of ethical maxims.

In his Seikaron (On ordering one's family), Baigan wrote, "If one is serving a lord, to devote oneself totally to the point of forgetting oneself, to work without regard for hardship, putting all thoughts of personal gain in the background. If one is serving one's parents, to love and cherish them, wearing always a cheerful countenance, managing oneself like a willow bends in the wind, serving them harmoniously and affectionately." When told he was being criticized for teaching Confucianism openly to all, even women, he said that the idea that learning should be restricted to certain classes of people had arisen from an overemphasis on the literary aspects of Confucianism at the expense of its true core, ethical action—that is, from forgetting Analects 1:2, 1:6, and 7:7.

Regarding religious worship, he taught that all reverence for the gods is for the purpose of making the mind clear and pure; to pray or wish for anything other than the will of heaven is a sin. "If one has understood the mind of Heaven, one knows contentment. Holding to one's own place in life, one will follow the will of Heaven with a joyful mind and one's body will be at ease" (Ichikawa 1995, 448–450).

Ishmael

See Isma'īl

Ishmael ben Elisha

(2nd cent. C.E.)

Jewish rabbi

Rabbi Ishmael ben Elisha, generally mentioned without the patronymic, left a significant mark on Mishnaic literature and thereby on later Judaism. A Cohen, that is, a descendant of Moses' brother Aaron, he was taken captive to Rome while still a child after the destruction of the Second Temple; later he was ransomed by Rabbi Joshua and became his student.

With Akiba ben Joseph, another Jewish sage of the second century, Rabbi Ishmael disputed interpretations of the Bible. Each teacher evolved a different system for such expositions that led to a school. Most of the extant halachic Midrashim belong to one of those schools. From Ishmael's school, we have the Mekhilta de-R. Ishmael on Exodus, the Sifrei on Numbers, and part of the Sifrei on Deuteronomy (1–54). Whereas Akiba interpreted every superfluous word and every repetition in the Torah, Ishmael maintained that "the Torah used human language" (Ker. 11a). He consistently sought the literal meaning of biblical texts as well as the poetic meaning within the literal.

Rabbi Ishmael's life and ethical teachings exemplify his love of humankind, especially of every Jew. He is said to have remarked that all Jews are to be regarded as princes (that is, there can be no distinction between Jews). So deep was his concern regarding the survival of the Jews that he believed that it was permissible to violate certain commandments rather than suffer martyrdom.

Some traditions include Ishmael among the sages killed in 135 C.E. after the Bar Kokhba revolt, but it is unlikely that he had survived so long. During the persecutions that followed the revolt, his students fled to Babylonia, where they continued to exert an influence.

Isidore of Seville

Christian bishop, writer, doctor of the church

Isidore was one of the most widely read and revered authors of the European Middle Ages. There are 1,000 surviving manuscripts of his most famous work, the Etymologies, a twenty-book encyclopedia that incorporated knowledge from both Christian and pre-Christian authors of the first through sixth centuries. Isidore wrote several other very popular works, including histories, an anti-Jewish tract, and numerous theological treatises and manuals. He has been credited with preserving classical learning for later scholars and with shaping knowledge and thinking for the entire medieval period. He was canonized in 1598 and named a doctor of the church in 1722. In 1999, he became a front-runner in the search for a patron saint of the Internet, based on the breadth of information compiled in the Etymologies, which his supporters compare to a database.

Most of Isidore's writings were intended for practical purposes, particularly clerical education and discipline, which he saw as necessary for maintaining the church's holy authority. This pragmatism was also reflected in Isidore's involvement in the affairs of his own society, the seventh-century Visigothic kingdom in Spain, beginning in about 600 when he succeeded his brother Leander as bishop of Seville. Isidore and his contemporaries believed that their king's power and their society's stability emanated directly from God, and his favor depended upon enforcing absolute religious and ritual uniformity. Isidore advocated clerical discipline as one means to this end and promoted church councils as another.

Building on the conciliar traditions fostered by his brother Leander, he presided over provincial councils in Seville in 619 and about 624, and in 633 he led the Fourth Council of Toledo, which issued legislation calling for ritual uniformity, clerical discipline, regular councils, an end to rebellions, orderly royal elections, and the regulation and suppression of the kingdom's Jews. Throughout the rest of the century, Isidore was venerated for his learning and teaching, and he and the Fourth Council became unquestionable sources of holy authority for the Iberian clerical writers and legislators who continued to try to implement his ideas and programs. Despite the fall of the kingdom in 711, Isidorian ideas about the holy authority of education and enforced consensus and uniformity were disseminated throughout medieval Europe, not only in Isidore's writings but also in the collections of legislation produced by the seventh-century Visigothic church councils.

His feast day is April 4.

Isidore the Farmer

(c. 1070–c. 1130 C.E.)

Christian layman

A Christian saint born in about 1070 on the outskirts of Madrid, Isidore the Farmer was a man of humble origins who spent his entire adult life working as an agricultural laborer for a local knight. He married a peasant woman named Maria Torribia and had one son, who died as a youth. Though neither his social nor his marital status would suggest that Isidore was a likely candidate for sanctity in the twelfth century, he somehow managed to win a reputation for holiness, based primarily on the fact that he spent more time in the churches of Madrid than he did in the fields.

This choice could have had dire consequences for a person of his low station had it not been for timely divine interventions, the most famous being the appearance of an angel to assist Isidore with his plowing. Beyond this, Isidore was credited with miracles ranging from cursing a wolf to death to filling empty pots with food to feed the poor. Otherwise, Isidore simply lived out his life of farming and prayer, with the added wrinkle that, after the death of his only child, he and his wife decided to live out their lives in continence.

Some forty years after Isidore's death, which had occurred in about 1130, his reputedly incorrupt body was translated from the cemetery to the church of San Andres in Madrid, a clear sign that he was already held in high regard in the area. Indeed, it was reported that Isidore actually appeared to King Alfonso VIII of Castile to assist him at the battle of Las Navas de Tolosa in 1212, the single most decisive campaign of the Christian reconquista of Muslim Spain. In 1265, a deacon at San Andres authored a Life of Isidore out of the bits and pieces of information that he could gather, most of it recounting miraculous healings associated with Isidore's body. In the early sixteenth century, Francis de Vargas petitioned Pope Leo X for permission to build a chapel at San Andres in Isidore's honor.

When Philip II chose to relocate his court to Madrid in 1562, thus elevating it from a provincial town to the capital of a far-flung empire, the status of its humble saint grew accordingly. The famous Spanish poet and playwright Lope de Vega, himself a proud native of Madrid, dedicated one of his earliest literary efforts to Isidore in 1599, apparently in an effort to advance the cause of the saint's beatification. But the biggest push seems to have come from Philip III, who attributed his recovery from an illness in 1620 to the intercession of Isidore. At the king's request, Pope Paul V beatified Isidore that same year, an event that was celebrated in Madrid on May 19, 1620, by a poetry contest hosted by Lope de Vega. Though Philip III had a relapse and died a short time later, in 1621, Isidore's path to sainthood culminated on March 12, 1622, when Pope Gregory XV elevated him alongside three other Spanish luminaries: Ignatius of Loyola, Francis Xavier, and Teresa of Avila. The feast day assigned to him, May 15, has been the principal saint's day in Madrid ever since.

Islam and Holy People

Holiness in Islam

The idea of the holy is most properly applied to divinity (Allah in the Muslim world). However, the notion of God as a Holy Person is understood metaphorically rather than in terms of a corporealized entity. Or, God's personhood is conceived as something beyond the capacity of the human mind to understand. Thus, various scriptural verses that refer to God's hands, or being seated on a throne (Qur'an 89:13), were understood by the Mu'tazilites, an early group of theologians, to be allusions to divine powers rather than as representations of divine corporeality. Other theologians, such as Ibn Hanbal (780–855), took the stance that such verses were to be accepted at face value, "without asking how" (bi-la kayf). For the mystics, allusions to God's person (shakhs) indicated not the physicality of God but aspects of divine ipseity (selfhood), being (huwiyya), or nature or essence (dhat). The monotheism of Islam precludes the incarnation of divinity in human or any other corporeal form, since entering the physical realm would be to greatly compromise divine omnipotence by placing corporeal limits such as death upon it. However, that is not to say that Muslims have not considered whether divinity may manifest or reveal itself in the cosmos and in the world without going so far as to identify either of these with divinity itself. Such questions arose, for instance, in their meditations upon a Qur'anic verse that declared: "For wherever you turn, there is the Face of God" (2:115).

For instance, the noted Spanish mystic Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240) conceived of divinity as revealing itself through a hierarchy of manifestations (tajalli), each veiled by increasing degrees of corporealization, thereby rendering all in creation to be holy at its source. Another allusion to the inherent holiness of everything created is the Qur'anic identification of all things in this world as ayat, signs, of divinity, thereby suggesting that while these may not be rendered identical with divinity, they nevertheless point to it and are representations of it (41:53). The term ayat also characterizes the verses of the Qur'an, in this case pointing to another medium through which divinity manifests or reveals itself.

Revelation to humans, then, occurs in several ways. Scriptural revelation is brought to humans such as Muhammad (570–632), the prophet through whom Islam as a religion was revealed, through the agency of the holy spirit (al-ruh al-quds), traditionally identified with the archangel Gabriel. Such revelation, or wahy, identified as the process through which God addresses prophets, is considered by Muslims to be a continuation of the stream of revelation that began with Adam, the primordial human being, continued with biblical and nonbiblical prophets, and culminated with Muhammad. Muslims consider Muhammad to be the Seal of the Prophets (33:40). That is, with Muhammad, divine scriptural revelation that is religiously binding and intended for the benefit of humankind came to an end.

However, Muslims have not uniformly believed that all communication from God ceased after Muhammad's career as a prophet, although there are some Muslim groups that consider such to be the case. The notion of divine communication includes, in addition to the concept of wahy, the concept of ilham (inspiration), which instructs the individual recipient as a divine gift. Ilham is available especially to those individuals whose souls or hearts are pure, most notably men and women of spiritual discipline and insight. Muslims have debated whether knowledge or insight gained in this manner is an authentic form of divine revelation, whether it could be mistaken for waswas (satanic whisperings), and whether it should be communicated to others as a guide to ethical conduct and inner illumination in the manner of wahy.

Generally, then, the categories of humans considered holy in Muslim circles are those who are recipients of divine communication. The first of these are the prophets, including the pre-Islamic ones, who were recipients of divine revelation, that is, wahy. The second category comprises those individuals among the Muslim faithful who through their spiritual exercises purified their hearts to receive divine guidance in the form of ilham. To these may be added a third category, those who by dint of being the descendants of the prophet Muhammad, primarily but not restricted to the progeny of the prophet's daughter, Fatima, through her marriage to his cousin, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, were considered by their loyalists (termed Shi'a) to be the spiritual heirs of the revelation received by the prophet and thereby authorized to interpret its inner meaning for their own generations. Such persons, termed imams by their community, constitute yet another category of holy people, and each succeeding imam is appointed through a designation termed nass. Within this category, a special place is accorded to 'Ali in his function as the executor (wasi) of prophetic revelation, thereby making his descendants, whether through Fatima or another wife, spiritually authoritative and thereby considered to be endowed with the ability to guide their communities.

Characteristics of Holy People

By and large, a constellation of concepts is attached to the notion of a person considered holy within Muslim communities. Chief of these is the Qur'anic term wali (pl. awliya'), which may be translated as "the friend of God," from the Arabic root waliya, "to be near or close." In legal parlance, the term denotes a manager, a guardian, a protector, and is also generally understood as intercessor. In mystical usage it has most commonly been translated into Western languages as "saint." But the Qur'anic wali both differs from and resonates with the Christian concept of the saint. On the one hand, the awliya' are not canonized by a formal authority, as in Catholicism, nor is public acclamation formalized only after death. On the other, both Muslim and Christian saints enjoy closeness to God, experience rapture, engage in intercession and miracle-working, and have paradigmatic lives. In Qur'anic usage, God alone is the wali of the believers; indeed, none can intercede for humans but God alone (2:48; 74:48; 6:51). However, a reference to the friends of God (awliya') in 10:62 has led to these being understood as a special group of people whom God protects, and who indeed may, through divine permission (10:3), intercede with God on the behalf of other humans.

Thus, the logician and theologian Jurjani (1339–1413) understood the wali to be an 'arif bi'llah, "one possessing mystical knowledge"; others, such as the mystic 'Ali ibn Uthman al-Hujwiri (d. 1073), more popularly known as Data Ganj Bakhsh, whose shrine in Lahore attracts pilgrims to this day, have considered the wali to have influence with God and the ability to perform miracles (karamat). The awliya' are also at some level responsible for governing the universe. (Various hierarchies among the awliya' have been proposed by mystical writers. In the most commonly accepted hierarchy, the fifth rung is occupied by the abdal [pl. of badal, "substitute"], who preserve the universe and remain unknown to their fellow humans.) Wali may also connote anyone in the Muslim world who is considered to be spiritually authoritative, including the pir, shaykh, imam, murshid, salih, murabit, siyyid, agurram, and amghar.

Related to this concept are the two terms wilayah and walayah, both of which have loosely been translated as "sainthood." Although wilayah is a general legal term for any legal authority, and is deployed in specific manners in Islamic law, it is a term that buttresses the concept of holiness among the Muslim faithful. Primarily, it draws its signification as having been divinely delegated from 4:59, "O believers, obey God and obey the Prophet, and obey those in authority amongst you." Thus, in Shi'ite Islam the term wilayah in the Qur'anic context signifies the authority of the imam as the one who knows the ta'wil (signification) of the tanzil (that which is revealed). Put differently, the imam is the divinely authorized interpreter of the inner meaning (batin) of the outer or manifest (zahir) words of the revelation, and in his spiritual status, he embodies many of the characteristics of the wali more generally. The majority of the Shi'ites consider blood lineage to the prophet through Fatima and to 'Ali among the key criteria for holding the office of imam. However, many sufis, whether Shi'a or Sunni, extend such investiture of authority to any descendant of the prophet (sharif) as well as to any Muslim who has been accorded such authority through a mystical unveiling of divine mysteries and who is a recipient of ilham, usually under the guidance of the prophet, a mystical prophetic figure such as Khidr (the "green" prophet), 'Ali and his descendants, or a sufi master.

The terms wilayah and walayah are often used interchangeably to denote authority, whether delegated by God or by the ruler. However, as Vincent J. Cornell (1998) has pointed out, Muslim grammarians themselves have debated which of these terms is the correct verbal noun for wali, and sufis have also engaged in discussions about the subtle differences between the two terms. For instance, the renowned Indian sufi master Khwaja Nizamuddin Auliya (1239–1325) elaborates on the distinction thus:

The saint [wali] possesses both walayat and wilayat at the same time. Walayat is that which masters impart to disciples about God, just as they teach them about the etiquette of the Way. Everything such as this which takes place between the Shaykh and other people is called walayat. But that which takes place between the Shaykh and God is called wilayat. That is a special kind of love, and when the Shaykh leaves the world, he takes his wilayat with him. His walayat, on the other hand, he can confer on someone else, whomever he wishes, and if he does not confer it, then it is suitable for God Almighty to confer that walayat on someone. But the wilayat is the Shaykh's constant companion; he bears it with him (wherever he goes). (Cornell 1998, xix)

By dint of the wali's closeness to God, then, another key concept attached to holiness arises: the wali's possession of barakah (blessing), which often also connotes spiritual power or charisma. A wali, then, is considered to be a charismatic individual endowed with powers that may bring healing and benefit to others while containing also the possibility of harm if the wali is crossed, a potency that of course a wali would never exercise. The prophet Muhammad is considered to possess barakah par excellence because of his closeness to God and in his function as the intercessor for all creatures with God.

When asked, "What are the external signs of the friends of God?" the mystic al-Hakim al-Tirmidhi (d. c. 905–910) enumerated nine signs: (1) When seen, they cause people to think of God; (2) they possess the power of that which is due, such that none can oppose them without being overwhelmed by the power of that which is due to God; (3) they are endowed with clairvoyance; (4) they receive divine inspiration; (5) whoever contends with them is cast down and comes to an evil end; (6) all tongues praise them save those who are jealous of them; (7) their prayers are answered and they are capable of miracles such as traveling distances over the earth and walking on water; (8) they converse with Khidr; and (9) their clearest sign "is what they say about knowledge with regard to its foundations" (Radtke and O'Kane 1996, 124–125).

Closely related to the concept of barakah, spiritual blessing that can be transferred to others as simply as through a glance from the wali, the shaking of a hand, or through a visitation to a wali's tomb, is the ability to perform miracles, or karamat. In his study of the Moroccan wali, Cornell identifies at least eleven types of miracles traditionally reported of various awliya', the majority of which are concerned with what he terms "epistemological capital." That is, more than half the miracles studied involve the ability to read thoughts, while others include foretelling the future, uncovering hidden secrets, and, less common, receiving guidance from the prophets Muhammad or Khidr. His list includes mind reading, spiritual insight, prophecy, power over animals, food miracles, finding treasure, traversing distances, experiencing visions of the prophets Muhammad or Khidr, healing, commanding jinn (fiery spirits), and performing water miracles. The basis of such abilities lies in knowing that which is beyond the ken of ordinary humans, that is, in the "epistemological capital" of the wali (Cornell 1998, 115–116).

Taken together, the wali's ability to perform karamat, or miracles, his or her possession of wilayah, or divine support, through ilham, or nonscriptural revelation, and his or her intrinsic barakah, or blessing, all contribute toward a set of practices undertaken by the faithful so as to benefit from the wali's gifts. The foremost of these is discipleship, for the wali is a godservant ('abd), and his or her disciples are those desirous of spiritual insight (murid). A key component of the master-student relationship is engagement in continual prayer in forms such as dhikr (remembrance), in addition to the required prayers (salat), and in meditations on and the practice of virtues such as repentance, selflessness, gratitude, abstinence, patience, poverty, humility, fear of divine wrath, piety, trust, satisfaction in divine favors, nearness to divinity, love toward divinity, and the striving toward experiencing tawhid, the central tenet of the Islamic faith, in which God is alone the deity. Under the guidance of the wali and through divine grace the seeker may enter any one of a number of states (ahwal). The noted Persian mystic Abu'l-Qasim al-Qushayri (986–1072), author of perhaps the most widely read classical sufi treatise, enumerates a number of these states, ranging from the experience of fear and hope to constriction and expansion, through intimacy and awe onward to ecstasy, union, and separation, passing away and abiding, and nearness and distance, all of which are a few of the many states that could be experienced.

Veneration of Holy People

Instruction in the science of the heart can take place in institutional settings such as a ribat or a khanaqah, usually but not exclusively centered around the wali's living quarters. The specific school of teaching, that is, the religious order or brotherhood that may emerge from a wali of note, or tariqah (lit. "path"), institutionalizes the doctrines and practices of the wali and his disciples. A brief mention, then, must be made of the importance of sacred text emerging from a sacred figure. Although the Qur'an is held by Muslims to be divinely identified as Muhammad's only miracle, and the source of barakah par excellence, writings by wali-type figures have also been considered meritorious for those who perform and meditate upon them. For example, the devotional prayers of Zayn al-Abidin (658–713), great-grandson of the prophet, are thought to bestow merit upon those who recite them, and similarly, in south Asia the Satpanthis considered the writings of their spiritual guides "to possess the power to heal, to protect, to convert, and to enlighten" (Kasam 1995, 90).

Many practices stem from a desire to benefit from the wali's barakah. Common objects utilized by the wali, such as the prayer rug or mat—widely utilized by Muslims for performing the ritual prayer, the salat—are endowed with the power of the wali and cherished for their barakah-yielding powers. The material items associated with the holy person include the prayer mat, the patched mantle, the belt, the staff, the turban, the leather bowl, the rosary, and the robe (khirqah), each of which is endowed with symbolic significance. H. Landolt (cited in Knysh 2001) suggested, for instance, that the prayer rug, more than a ritual space for performing the salat, becomes the locus of a theophanic experience. Often the prayer mat is evoked as the platform from which the wali performs spiritual feats, such as praying in the air or on ocean waves, that testify to his supernatural powers. Prayer rugs, referred to as “the carpet of the Truth” or “the carpet of God,” are also used in initiation ceremonies for novices entering a tariqah or sufi order to indicate the divine presence. In parts of Anatolia and Iran, the sheepskin (pust) takes on the role of the prayer mat and is invested, for instance by the Bektashi order, with symbolic meanings to suggest the seats of God and the angels, or to denote the various stages of a seeker's journey into gnosis.

A popular form of spiritually derived healing consists of prayers, quite often in the form of qur'anic verses, often drawing upon the numerological significance of the letters that are written by the wali on parchment, which may then be washed and the residue drunk in order to cure the supplicant of his or her ailments. A supplicant may also derive barakah from visitations to the tomb of a wali, especially during a mawlid, or birth celebration. Foremost of the mawlid celebrations is that held in honor of the prophet Muhammad on the twelfth day of the Islamic calendar month Rabi' al-Awwal, a festival that is observed by all Muslims save those in Saudi Arabia, where the Wahhabi interpretation of Islam forbids any recognition of the prophet out of fear of competing with the honor due to God. Pilgrims performing the hajj, or visit to Mecca (Makkah), however, often remain for a few days to visit the tombs of Muhammad's youngest wife Amina, his first wife Khadija, various Shi'ite imams, and early Muslim notables. The “tomb of Eve,” another popular pilgrimage site, has been destroyed.

Other mawlid celebrations center around the tomb of a wali; thus, for instance, in Turkey one may visit the tomb of the celebrated mystic poet Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273), founder of the Mevleviyya order (the whirling dervishes); or that of Ahmad ibn 'Ali al-Rifa'i (1106–1182), founder of the “howling” dervishes; or Haji Bektash (thirteenth and fourteenth centuries), founder of the Bektashi order. In Baghdad, assuming these have survived the ravages of war, one may visit the tombs of 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166), Abu 'l-Qasim al-Junayd (d. 910), and Shihabuddin Suhrawardi (1145–1234), and near Damascus lies the tomb of Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240), while Shiraz hosts the tomb of Hafez (1300–1389).

All of these figures have left an illustrious legacy of illuminating mystical and philosophical writings that belong to the treasures of human longing for and experience of the divine. Mawlid celebrations in Egypt form a significant part of the Islamic calendar, and many celebrations in Iran center around the tombs of the Shi'ite imams or members of their families, termed imamzadeh. In North Africa, there are numerous tombs of walis, popularly termed murabit (Fr.: marabout), including several from the early modern and modern period, testifying to sufism as a living tradition. In the south Asian lands, pilgrimages are made to tombs of walis, more familiarly termed pirs, by Hindus and Muslims alike. Their importance to the members of both faiths suggests that reverence for the sacred and its power transgresses nominal boundaries.

Isma‘il (Ishmael)

(c. 20th cent. B.C.E.)

Muslim prophet

According to Muslim tradition, Isma‘il (Ishmael) was the older of two sons of Abraham (Ibrahim), ancestor of the north Arabian tribes. He is sometimes regarded as the co-founder of the city of Mecca. Some, though not all, Muslim exegetes believe him to have been the intended sacrificial victim in the story of God’s call to Abraham to sacrifice his son.

The Qur’an mentions Isma‘il several times, calling him a messenger and a prophet, and says that together with Abraham he was called upon to raise the foundations of the Ka’ba in Mecca, the most holy structure in Islam, and to sanctify it (Qur’an 2:125–127). Later Islamic tradition narrates the life of Isma‘il in more detail, at times in disagreement with the biblical account. According to Muslim tradition, Hagar (Hajar) and Isma‘il traveled to Arabia with Abraham after Abraham’s wife Sarah had given birth to Isaac (Ishaq). Led by divine guidance, the family arrived in the vicinity of Mecca, where Isma‘il and Abraham built, or rebuilt, the Ka’ba. Since the Qur’an refers to the Ka’ba as the “first house” (3:96), later Muslim traditions claim that it had originally been built by Adam but was destroyed in the flood of Noah’s time; the angel Gabriel is said to have rescued the “black stone” of the original shrine and passed it on to Abraham and Isma‘il when they rebuilt the Ka’ba at the same site.

The Qur’an also reports that after Abraham left Hagar and her son behind in the Arabian Desert and returned to his wife Sarah, mother and son were overcome by thirst, as in the Hebrew Bible. When Hagar frantically searched for water, God, according to Muslim tradition, miraculously revealed the well of Zamzam to save the boy and his mother. The frantic search for water is reenacted in a ritual called the sa’y, which is part of the annual pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca. Muslim tradition holds that the city of Mecca gradually arose around the well of Zamzam, and that without this well the city could never have existed. The well still exists, and Isma‘il is sometimes regarded as the founder of the city.

In disagreement with the biblical narratives, later Islamic tradition also identifies Isma‘il as the intended victim in the narrative of the binding of Abraham’s son. Although the Qur’an does not mention the name of the intended victim, and early Islamic tradition is ambivalent about his identity, numerous later accounts not only identify the victim as Isma‘il but furthermore insist that both Isma‘il and his mother knew that he was the intended sacrificial victim, and willingly agreed. Abraham’s almost-sacrifice constitutes a pivotal narrative in Islamic theological discourse, as it is regarded as an example of absolute submission, or islam. Isma‘il, together with his father and mother, thus became an exemplar of what it means to fully submit to the will of God, and all three are considered prototypical Muslims.

Isma‘il is also recognized as progenitor of the north Arabian tribes and ancestor of Muhammad. According to Muslim tradition, Isma‘il is buried, together with his mother, in a place adjacent to the Ka’ba called the hijr.

Íte

(d. c. 570/577 C.E.)

Christian abbess, prophet

Throughout her vita and other medieval sources, Íte is depicted as an exemplary Christian widely respected for her virtue, wisdom, power of prophecy, and healing abilities. She is also shown as a powerful patron and an abbess who tempered her authority with great kindness. She was probably born near Waterford, Ireland, in the early sixth century, but she left her homeland shortly after her consecration to become the patron of the Uí Conaill in their lands southwest of Limerick.

Íte’s monastery, originally known as Cluain Credail, later Cell Íte (Killeedy), seems to have become a double or possibly a male monastery by the ninth century. Judging from the varied references in her own Life and the Lives of other saints, her influence spread throughout Munster, Leinster, and Connacht, and English and continental sources attest that the Irish took their devotion to her with them abroad. She is celebrated as “the foster-mother of the saints of Ireland.” The fosterlings attributed to her include the infant Jesus, Brendan the Navigator (c. 486–575), her nephew Mochaomhóg, and a stag-beetle that devoured her side.

Asceticism, particularly fasting, seems to have played a more prominent role in Íte’s life than in the lives of other Irish women saints. Her self-denial is said to have grown so extreme that an angel came to her and told her not to be so hard on herself. Íte refused to renounce this form of piety, so the angel resorted to force-feeding. Prophecy was also particularly pronounced in Íte’s life, enabling her to serve as an impartial and effective judge, to demand that her faithful accept responsibility for their actions, to help them rectify their mistakes, and even to confront ageist sexism. At times her prophecies were temporarily frustrated, such as when those to whom she had promised certain fates died before her words had been fulfilled. Fortunately, her ability to raise the dead resolved such dilemmas.

A particularly compassionate saint, Íte joyously shared her divine gifts with others, be it a heavenly feast or wisdom acquired through meditation and contemplation. She is portrayed as exercising an active apostolate to the laity, providing for their needs in business, war, and family matters, teaching them about the divine, healing them, restoring them to life, and even converting the odd non-Christian. Her hagiography attributes to her a unique and powerful relationship with the divine, which she encouraged others to realize for themselves. As she told a nun who questioned her special status with the divine, “God is always present with those who exemplify such devotion.”

J

Jacob

(c. 20th cent. B.C.E.)

Jewish patriarch

Jacob, also named Israel, is the ancestor of the people of Israel. His twelve sons were the ancestors of the twelve tribes. Jacob was the son of Rebecca and Isaac, and his story fills most of the second half of the book of Genesis in the Hebrew scriptures. Although the tale as it stands may include a mixture of traditions committed to writing at different times, few modern scholars doubt that a historic person lies at the heart of the legend. Jacob appears in two very different lights in Genesis: On the one hand, he is a devious, conniving figure, stealing his brother Esau's birthright and tricking his father Isaac into blessing him in Esau's place, tricking his uncle Laban out of large flocks of sheep, and so on. On the other hand, though, Jacob is very close to God, even wrestling with God in Genesis 32:28, after which he receives the new name "Israel."

Jacob was a quiet pastoralist, unlike his brother, Esau the hunter. He takes advantage of Esau's hunger one day to buy his birthright for a "mess of pottage." Then he dons an animal skin, masquerading as his brother ("a hairy man"), so the blind Isaac will bless him. He has to flee Esau's wrath, going to his uncle Laban, where he falls in love with his cousin Rachel. Laban agrees to let Jacob work seven years to win her hand, but at the last moment substitutes his elder daughter, Leah. Jacob then has to labor another seven years for Rachel. He eventually wins his brother's forgiveness and produces a large family, including twelve sons. Late in life, however, famine forces him to send his sons to Egypt to buy grain; there it is discovered that his beloved son Joseph, whom the brothers had sold into slavery and claimed had been killed, is alive and a chief servant of the king. Jacob and all his family then move to Egypt. His deathbed blessing, Genesis 49:2–27, is believed to be some of the oldest poetry of the Hebrew scriptures. After his death, Jacob's sons have his body embalmed and take it to Canaan for burial in the Cave of Machpelah, where his parents and grandparents already lay.

For the most part, Jacob's importance to Judaism and Christianity lies in his role as transmitter of a lineage, the descendant of Abraham who passes on God's covenant to the people of Israel. But Genesis also describes two singular encounters Jacob had with the divine that have tantalized religious scholars ever since. In Genesis 32, what appears to be God himself attacks Jacob; they have a wrestling match, and although Jacob is crippled he manages to hang on until he is blessed. And in Genesis 28, when Jacob stops for the night during his flight from Esau, he sees angels ascending and descending from heaven. This is followed by a direct communication from God renewing the covenant he made with Abraham and Isaac. Both events suggest a much more personal position for Jacob in God's eyes than merely purveyor of a lineage. Scholars have suggested that the story of "Jacob's ladder" was invented to explain why the Jews used an old Canaanite altar at Bethel. Clearly, however, very many generations of Jews and Christians have made this part of their legend of the patriarch.

Jacob attracted a considerable body of rabbinic commentary. Hardly surprising for a figure named "Israel," the direct ancestor of the twelve tribes, Jacob was taken to represent the whole people of Israel. His conflict with Esau was understood allegorically, with Esau representing the Romans and Jacob the Jews, or Esau as a type of Christianity and Jacob as the form of Judaism—suggesting both antagonism and ultimate relationship between the two. Jacob, as a dweller in the tents while Esau went out hunting, is also seen as the ideal of Judaism: a man staying apart from society and studying Torah, while Esau represents the active life in the world.

Jacobis, Giustino de

Roman Catholic missionary

Giustino de Jacobis, an Italian born in 1800, was the first influential missionary in Ethiopia and the coastal region of the Red Sea after Ethiopia's leaders had reopened the country to Catholicism following centuries of closure. In local tradition in Tigray and Eritrea he is known as Abune Ya'qob or Qedus Yaqob (St. Jacob).

Jacobis was ordained as a Vincentian priest at the Congregation of the Mission in southern Italy in 1824. In 1839, he left for Ethiopia to establish the Prefecture of Abyssinia. He spent several years traveling through Ethiopia, getting to know the people and their culture and becoming involved in local political affairs. In 1843, he was offered the fiefdom of Amba Ahsa in Inticc'o, near 'Adwa, by Dejjazmach Webé (nicknamed "Ubie"). However, he did not accept but let it be given to the German convert to Catholicism, Dr. Wilhelm Schimper, a natural scientist. He did eventually acquire land, though, with the help of his local collaborators, Takla Haymanot and Gebre Mikael, both former Orthodox priests, in 1844. With it he established a missionary center at Gwal'a in Agame (Tigray). He was helped by members of the ancient Orthodox monastery of Gunde Gundé nearby.

In 1845, however, the Orthodox metropolitan excommunicated anyone who helped Jacobis in any way. Meanwhile, interest for Catholicism was still growing in the borderlands. A Saho subgroup, the Irob-Buknaito in Aliténa, for example, converted at around this time. In 1847, Jacobis's prefecture was raised to the status of an apostolic vicariate. He was appointed bishop and allowed to practice Catholicism following the Ethiopian rite. He was, however, expelled from the country in 1848 on the initiative of the Orthodox metropolitan. His missionary center was raided, and he went to Masawa on the coast, in Ottoman territory, where he was consecrated bishop in the greatest secrecy in January 1849.

Jacobis began a time of wandering, mostly in the borderlands of Akkele-Guzay and Irob, sometimes in disguise, sometimes fleeing from soldiers ordered to kill him. Webé, interested in an alliance with France, however, still protected him. Due to his relations with the northern princes, Jacobis was politically influential. Often he promoted the idea of a closer alliance between Abyssinia and Europe, especially France. His involvement in politics was extensive. He was the inspiration behind several letters written by the princes, and he helped to set up a French protectorate over the northern parts and borderlands of Abyssinia. However, he could not avoid persecution. Arrested and jailed several times, he suffered much from health problems. On July 31, 1860, he died on a caravan journey near the canyons between the lowlands and the borders of Abyssinia.

Jacobis was beatified in 1939 and sanctified in 1975 by Pope Paul VI. The cactus fig (beles), abundant in the mountains of Tigray and Eritrea, is said to have been introduced by him. The plant still today provides some of the basic food needs of the rural populations. Jacobis's methods of conducting missionary work have been held up as a model for other Catholic missionaries.

Jadwiga (Hedwig)

Christian caregiver

Patron saint of Poland, Jadwiga came from an illustrious family of saints, which included her niece, Elizabeth of Hungary. Jadwiga, born in 1174, was one of the eight children of Agnes, daughter of the count of Rotletchs, and Bertold III, whose titles included duke of Croatia, Dalmatia, and Istria and count of Andech. She was reared by the Benedictines at Hitzingen, Franconia. At age twelve, she married Henry, who succeeded his father as duke of Silesia and head of the Polish royal family in 1202 at age thirty-four. They had seven children, but only their daughter, Gertrude, outlived Jadwiga. After the death of Jadwiga's husband in 1238, their son Henry inherited the throne, but he was killed in a battle against the Tartars in 1241.

After the birth of their last child, Henry and Jadwiga led a celibate life, and they pronounced a vow of perpetual continence before the bishop of Breslau in 1209. Henry was tonsured and let his beard grow like the Cistercians. Though she wore the gray habit of the Cistercians, Jadwiga never became a nun. The couple continued to endow and supervise the building of churches and monasteries, as well as hospitals, hospices, and orphanages, also places of prayer and penance. They invited the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Templars to staff those institutions. Moreover, they assured the spread of the German language and customs throughout Silesia.

In 1238, Jadwiga joined her daughter at the Cistercian monastery that the couple had founded in 1202 as the first house for women in Silesia. Blessed Gertrude served as its abbess after 1212. Jadwiga gained renown for her exercises of piety and charity, especially for supervising the healthful development of children. She insisted that they eat a nutritionally sound diet, and she fed, educated, and played with them herself. She died in Trebnitz in October 1243 and was canonized in 1267. Her feast day is celebrated on October 17. She is the patron of widows and of mothers whose children predecease them.

In 1859, a Congregation of the Sisters of St. Jadwiga was instituted in Breslau. They adopted the Rule of St. Augustine and assured the education of orphaned children. Establishments of this order spread throughout northern Europe. Polish immigrants to the United States have further spread the cult of St. Jadwiga.

Ja'far as-Sadiq

Muslim ascetic, jurist, mystic

An erudite jurist of Medina, Ja'far as-Sadiq was associated with a wide range of scholars. The great Muslim jurists Abu Hanifa (d. 767) and Malik b. Anas (d. 795), among other prominent figures, are alleged to have heard traditions from him. As-Sadiq is also credited with the construction of a legal system called the Ja'fari school of law, which Shi'is follow. In sufi circles, he is revered and regarded as an eminent ascetic. Many mystical ideas are narrated from him.

Highly respected in Sunni sources, as-Sadiq is considered by the Shi'is to be the sixth imam. He was reportedly the author of thousands of traditions that were recorded by his disciples and documented in later Shi'i literature by such figures as al-Kulini, Ibn Babuya, and Tusi. These sources also indicate that as-Sadiq was responsible for the formulation and crystallization of the Shi'i doctrine of the imamate, which stipulated that the leader of the community (imam) had to be designated by God through the prophet or another imam. The imam was also believed to be infallible, hence empowered to provide authoritative interpretation of Islamic revelation. Designation and infallibility were complemented by the imam's possession of special knowledge that was either transmitted from the prophet or derived from inherited scrolls. The imams reportedly had access to esoteric knowledge and were able to foretell future events.

As-Sadiq taught coexistence with rather than rebellion against tyrannical rulers. This political stance became the cornerstone of Shi'i political theory. He also preached the doctrine of dissimulation, which meant that the imam did not have to publicly proclaim his leadership. As-Sadiq attracted an intellectual following and was responsible for training thousands of disciples in diverse fields such as theology, jurisprudence, and Arabic grammar. Speculative Shi'i theologians and jurists, including Hisham b. al-Hakam, Zurara b. 'Ayun, Muhammad b. Muslim al-Thaqafi, and Mufaddal b. 'Umar, and even extremists such as Abu al-Khattab, were associated with him. According to some Shi'i sources, some of his prominent disciples are reported to have differed with him on major points of law and theology, for which they were either condemned or excommunicated. As-Sadiq claimed that they had misrepresented his teachings.

Jagadbandhu Sundar, Prabhu

Vaishnava Hindu mystic

Prabhu Jagadbandhu (Friend of the World) Sundar (Beautiful One) was a Hindu saint-mystic belonging to the Bengali Vaishnava tradition. He taught the salvific potency of chanting the holy names of God (Krishna), spreading the message especially among the lower-caste groups of Hindu society. He was believed by his followers to be a reincarnation of the sixteenth-century god-saint Chaitanya who had come to sweep up all in a flood of divine love called the Maha Udharana (Great Deliverance).

Jagadbandhu was born in 1871 in the village of Dahapara in the district of Murshidabad in West Bengal, India. Within a few years of his birth, all of the members of his immediate family passed away, and members of his extended family cared for him in the district of Faridpur (now in Bangladesh). His beauty, skin color, and personal charm attracted numerous admirers from among his acquaintances. He was sent to various schools, including one in Ranchi and another in Pabna (Bangladesh). In Pabna, he began to teach neighborhood boys and family members to practice celibacy and the public chanting of the names of God. By the time he was in the tenth grade, he had begun to experience ever more intense ecstasies, especially while singing Krishna's names. He left the tenth grade without taking the final examination, shaved his head, and went to visit the sacred pilgrimage sites of Vrindavana where Krishna had lived. He eventually settled in a compound called Shri Angan at Goalchamat, Faridpur, where for seventeen years he observed silence and reclusivity. He died there in 1921.

Jagadbandhu wrote several works, mostly collections of Bengali songs about Krishna and Gauranga (Chaitanya). Of special importance to his followers are two very enigmatic Bengali works, Candrapata (Moonfall) and Trikala (Three times). He taught, among other things, that one's mind and body become powerful through the practice of celibacy, that chanting the holy names increases one's good fortune, destroys pain, and brings joy, and that by surrendering oneself at the feet of God (Krishna) one's false pride is destroyed and one is inundated with joy.

Jainism and Holy People

Although it certainly has more ancient roots yet, the south Asian religion known as Jainism, the religion of the Jains, first emerges into historical view in the first half of the first millennium B.C.E. It and Buddhism are the only examples of ancient India's non-Vedic, heterodox traditions surviving today. Doctrinally, however, Jainism and Buddhism are profoundly different. It is hard to say how many Jains currently exist. The 1991 census of India records a Jain population of about 3.4 million, but this is certainly an undercount because Jains sometimes identify themselves as Hindus to census takers. Outside of India itself, the largest concentrations of Jains are in the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States.

Basic Beliefs

In common with other Indian religious traditions, Jains believe in the rebirth of souls. Souls are infinite in number and inhabit not only animate bodies (human, animal, vegetable, and others) but also inanimate objects. Souls were never created nor will they ever cease to be, and individual souls have shifted from one form of bodily existence to another from beginningless time. This means that every soul has already undergone an infinite number of deaths and rebirths and has already occupied every possible type of material body—and indeed has already done so an infinity of times. The Jains view this journey of the soul as one of ceaseless pain and suffering. The object of Jain belief and practice is to liberate the soul from this cycle of death and rebirth.

Jains maintain that the cosmos is made of two constituents: souls and matter. They further say that the soul's bondage within the cycle of death and rebirth is a consequence of its accumulation of layers of karma, which—in Jain belief, but not in other Indian religious systems—is considered to be a type of matter that is attracted to the soul by an individual's actions and sticks to the soul because of the individual's desires and aversions. The accumulation of karmic matter prevents the soul's escape from the cycle of death and rebirth. Liberation, a process that occurs in successive stages, is preceded by the attainment of omniscience, which is an inherent quality of the soul but normally occluded by karmic matter. Liberation is achieved when the last vestiges of karmic matter are shed and the soul rises to the top of the cosmos, where, unaffected by the cycle of death and rebirth, it abides forever in a state of omniscient bliss.

Given the role of karma in the soul's bondage, the first requirement of liberation is to prevent or at least to slow the further buildup of karmic matter on the soul. This necessitates avoiding forms of behavior that, because of their rootedness in desires and aversions, cause such accumulations. Violent behavior is a particularly potent source of karmic accumulations, and for this reason the Jain tradition places great emphasis on nonviolence (ahimsa). Jain texts forbid occupations that involve the deliberate taking of life, and nonviolence is a norm followed in all departments of Jain life. An important focus of nonviolence is diet. Jains are strict vegetarians, and the most orthodox of Jains even avoid eating vegetables that grow underground (such as potatoes), for these are believed to contain multiple souls. Jains are active and vocal supporters of vegetarian and animal welfare causes.

The requirements of nonviolence are particularly stringent for Jain mendicants. The most advanced laity must avoid harming more complex forms of life (those with two or more senses, according to the Jain system of classification), whereas mendicants are required to avoid harming the simplest microscopic forms of life. Jain mendicants carry brooms for the purpose of moving aside small forms of life before sitting or lying down, they may not dig in the earth (for fear of harming small forms of life in the ground), they may not bathe (for fear of harming water-borne life), and so on. Some mendicants wear coverings over their mouths in order to prevent their breath from injuring or killing small airborne forms of life.

But the attainment of liberation must go beyond the avoidance of further karmic accumulations, because it is also necessary to get rid of the karmic matter already adhering to the soul. According to Jain belief, this requires ascetic practices, which are seen as “burning away” the soul’s karmic imprisonment. Jainism is, accordingly, renowned for the severity of the ascetic practices it promotes. Emblematic of this is the fact that death by self-starvation is one of the tradition’s highest ideals. Ascetic practice is a distinctive and nearly ubiquitous feature of Jain life. Among laity, austerities tend to be practiced by women, especially older women, and by men in retirement. Fasting is one of the most important of the ascetic practices of lay Jains, and laywomen, in particular, engage in frequent fasts. The high valuation Jains place on fasting is indicated by the fact that successful fasters are often felicitated in public ceremonies. The ascetic practices of mendicants are more severe than those of the laity, but it should be understood that Jain tradition encourages ascetic practice for laity and mendicants alike.

Jain Society

Other Indians generally stereotype Jains as wealthy merchants, and to some extent this characterization is accurate. Many Jains are indeed traders and merchants, especially in northern and western India, where they are extremely prominent within the regional trading and banking class. Some of India’s richest merchant families are Jains. It is sometimes said that Jains have taken up business because nonviolence prevents them from entering other occupations. Although there is undoubtedly much truth in this, it must also be noted that not all Jains are traders. Although quantitative data are lacking, it is clear that, even in northern India, large numbers of Jains are in the professions or service occupations, and it is likely that a majority of southern Jains are farmers. Jains have even been soldiers.

Jain society is crosscut by many divisions, especially those of caste and region. However, the most basic division in the Jain world is that between its two major sects, the Shvetambaras and Digambaras, a distinction that seems to have crystallized around the fifth century. Shvetambara means “white-clad,” which refers to the fact that mendicants of this branch wear white clothing. Digambara means “space-clad,” referring to the fact that male mendicants of this sect wear no clothing. Shvetambaras are especially prominent in western India, the Digambaras more prominent in southern India. The two sects have different bodies of sacred writings, separate temples and traditions of worship, and few common religious activities. A major difference between them is their attitude toward gender and liberation. The Digambaras believe that liberation cannot be achieved from a female body, whereas the Shvetambaras believe it is possible. At the level of daily life, the sects are quite separate. Their membership is drawn from different castes, which means—because castes do not intermarry—that family connections across the sectarian divide are normally impossible. Subsects that have arisen over issues of textual interpretation and traditions of worship further subdivide both the Shvetambara and Digambara sects.

As idealized within the tradition, the Jain community consists of four sections: monks and nuns, laymen and laywomen. The monks and nuns are initiated, peripatetic mendicants, a small, world-renouncing elite. The mendicants’ way of life ideally incorporates the principles of asceticism and nonviolence to the fullest extent possible by functioning human beings. They are the custodians and transmitters of the tradition, exemplars of its highest ideals, and are physically completely dependent on the laity, on whom, in return for food and other forms of support, they confer teachings, blessings, and merit. Laymen and laywomen, in turn, perform the ordinary chores of life and support the mendicants. During most of the year, Jain mendicants travel from community to community, never remaining at a single place for more than a few days. During the rainy season, however, the mendicants stay in a single place for four months. These rainy season retreats tend to be periods of intense sermonizing and other religious activities among Jains.

Lay Jains regard all mendicants as worship-worthy and in fact treat them as objects of worship in a variety of ways. As a class, however, mendicants are certainly not seen as holy at the same level or in the same sense as the tirthankaras (see below), although specific monks and nuns can acquire special reputations for extraordinary personal sanctity. Some mendicants have achieved posthumous recognition as thinkers, authors of texts, reformers, or exemplars of piety. Distinguished deceased mendicants are worshipped in some Jain traditions.

The Tirthankaras

The idea of holy persons is embedded in the very concept of “Jainism.” The word “Jain” itself means someone who is a follower of a jina. A jina is a “victor” or “conqueror,” meaning someone who has achieved victory over the soul’s worldly bondage. A jina is also called a tirthankara. This term means “ford-maker,” that is, someone who has created a “ford” (tirtha), a crossing place that will enable others to make their way across what is often called “the ocean of existence” to the liberated state. A tirthankara is not a deity but a great teacher—a human being who, by his own efforts, completely subdues his desires and aversions, acquires omniscience, and teaches the path of liberation to others.

According to Jain teachings, there exist many types of deities, but these beings, in their present bodies, are incapable of achieving liberation; they are certainly not worthy of worship in the same sense as the tirthankaras, with whom they are never confused. At the end of a tirthankara’s life on earth, he sheds all remaining traces of karmic matter and becomes a liberated being. The tirthankaras are not unique in achieving liberation, for others attain this state as well. The tirthankara, however, achieves omniscience without the aid of any kind of teacher. On the basis of the authority conferred by his omniscience, he then becomes a teacher to others of the path to liberation. It needs to be clearly understood that the tirthankara is in no way the originator of the truths that he teaches. These truths are eternal and become known to the tirthankara because of his omniscient state.

The significance of the tirthankaras cannot be understood in isolation from the Jain concept of cosmic history. According to Jain teachings, the cosmos undergoes infinitely repeating cycles of physical and moral rise and decline over time. The terrestrial surface is a vast disk consisting of a central continent surrounded by concentric circles of ocean and atoll-like islands. The time-cycles affect the northern and southern parts of the central continent; the middle zone is unaffected. During a rising half-cycle, which takes eons to complete, those parts of the terrestrial surface affected by the cycle gradually change from a condition of physical and moral degeneracy to a state of perfection; the opposite occurs during the ensuing (and equally long) declining half-cycle. Each half-cycle is in turn subdivided into six separate eras. Tirthankaras appear only in the third and fourth eras of each rising and declining half-cycle, and exactly twenty-four tirthankaras appear in each. Given the fact that the cycles of time have no beginning and no end, there has already been an infinity of tirthankaras, and infinite tirthankaras are yet to come.

The world is currently in a declining half-cycle. The first tirthankara of the present half-cycle was Rishabha; the twenty-fourth and last was Mahavira, who, according to Jain teachings, lived and taught during the sixth century B.C.E.

Because Mahavira was the final tirthankara of this half-cycle, and because liberation for others is not possible in the absence of a tirthankara, there is no possibility of liberation for the denizens of the world until the next (and ascending) half-cycle. However, the central zone of the world continent, an area known as Mahavideh, is unaffected by the time cycles, and there are always tirthankaras teaching there. Liberation is therefore possible for those who are reborn in that legendary zone.

Of the twenty-four tirthankaras of the present half-cycle, the historicity of only two is beyond doubt. There is no question that the twenty-fourth tirthankara, Mahavira, lived, taught, and was a contemporary of the Buddha. Although his traditional dating is 599–527 B.C.E., his actual dates are a matter of conjecture and dispute. The twenty-third tirthankara, Parshva, was also a historical figure. He probably lived two or three centuries before Mahavira. None of the others can be said to be historical, although the twenty-second, Nemi, is possibly an exception. But historical or not, the tirthankaras are the heart of Jainism. They exemplify the tradition's highest ideals and are the focus of deep veneration.

In some ways, the tirthankaras are indistinguishable from each other. According to Jain teachings, each and every tirthankara has fragrant breath, has skin that does not accumulate sweat or grime, has milky white blood, and is impervious to illness. No hair grows on his body, and he is surrounded by a sacred aura. Wherever he goes, the weather is pleasant, nature is benign, and there is no unpleasantness of any kind. In his proximity, enemies lose their animosity and there is no illness or death. His intake of food and excretion are, according to the Shvetambara sect, invisible; the Digambaras maintain that he does not eat or excrete at all. Tirthankaras are always male. (The Shvetambaras, however, believe that the nineteenth tirthankara, Malli, was a unique exception to this rule.) Not only are all tirthankaras self-enlightened, but also, unlike ordinary mendicants, who are normally initiated by others, they initiate themselves into the ascetic life. The teachings of all tirthankaras are the same. Indeed, with some minor exceptions, the tirthankaras' images in temples look more or less alike. They are distinguishable primarily by means of small symbols (such as the lion for Mahavira and the snake for Parshva) carved on the base.

All of the tirthankaras, moreover, have very similar careers. The major events in the final lifetime of each and every tirthankara are five in number and are always the same. Known as the pancha kalyana, the "five welfare-producing events," they consist of the tirthankara's descent into the womb, his birth, his initiation as an ascetic, his attainment of omniscience (at which point his teaching career begins), and his liberation. When a tirthankara is conceived, his mother invariably has a series of visions or dreams of the sort that presage the birth of a universal monarch or a universal teacher. A tirthankara is always born into a family belonging to the warrior (kshatriya) class. (According to the Shvetambaras, Mahavira was an exception because he was conceived in a brahmin womb, but the gods then shifted him to the womb of a woman of the warrior class.) The gods and goddesses celebrate the birth of a tirthankara by, among other things, giving the infant his first bath on the summit of (mythical) Mount Meru. The reenactment of the deities' celebration of the infant tirthankara's birth is among the most important rituals in Jain tradition.

Although the predisposition to renounce the world is already part of his nature, a tirthankara takes the decisive step of becoming a homeless mendicant at the urging of certain gods (known as Laukantika). He abandons his possessions, pulls out his hair by hand, and begins a period of severe austerities. After his attainment of omniscience, the gods prepare for each tirthankara a special preaching assembly hall, consisting of a circular arena, where an audience that includes humans, deities, and animals can attend him. A Jain temple is, in essence, a replica of the preaching assembly. Having completed his teaching mission, the tirthankara sheds the last residues of karmic matter and attains the liberated state.

But despite these common features of their careers, tirthankaras do indeed possess individual characteristics. Each tirthankara is associated not only with his own symbol but with a particular color. The tirthankaras are vastly different in height and have varying life spans. Although the five welfare-producing events are the same for every tirthankara, their individual biographies differ greatly in other details. According to Jain hagiographic traditions, a tirthankara's biography is not a matter of one lifetime alone; rather, it usually is presented as a chain of several births culminating in the lifetime in which the individual became a tirthankara and achieved liberation. The point of such a transmigrational biography is to account for the particular manner in which the soul arrived at his tirthankarahood. These accounts often begin with the lifetime in which the tirthankara-to-be first acquired "right belief" (samyaktva), which, according to Jains, guarantees liberation sooner or later. They then trace the several births leading up to the tirthankara-to-be's acquisition of the karmic prerequisites for becoming a tirthankara, which always occurs exactly two births before his final lifetime. The tirthankara-to-be then has a penultimate birth as a god in one of the Jain heavens, after which he is born into the lifetime, his final one, in which he becomes a tirthankara. The highlights of this culminating lifetime are the five welfare-producing events, but the exact circumstances are unique to each tirthankara.

All Jains revere the tirthankaras and consider their teachings to be absolutely authoritative. Many Jain subsects also worship the tirthankaras in the form of images. Of the twenty-four tirthankaras of this half-cycle, the most frequently worshipped in temples are Mahavira, Rishabha, and Parshva. In their liberated condition, the tirthankaras are not only entirely devoid of desires and aversions but also completely disengaged from the world and its affairs. This being so, prayers directed toward them cannot be efficacious in the sense of bringing about the tirthankaras' intervention in one's life and destiny. Some Jains may indeed pray to the tirthankaras for such reasons, but this is contrary to Jain teachings and is viewed as an inferior sort of ritual activity that has nothing fundamentally to do with the tradition's true goal of liberation from the cycle of death and rebirth.

Nor, it must be added, are the tirthankaras seen as savior deities who will in any way assist their devotees in achieving liberation. They are certainly aware of one's devotion, for they are omniscient, but even if they desired to do so—which they do not, since they are desireless—they could not help in the matter of liberation (or any other) because of their disengagement from the world of transmigrating beings. Their teachings, of course, provide a roadmap to liberation, but Jain doctrine avers that the liberation-seeker must rely on his or her own spiritual strength and resolve to achieve this ultimate goal. This does not mean, however, that prayer and devotion to the tirthankaras have no meaning in Jain tradition. Quite to the contrary, Jains treat the tirthankaras as objects of intense devotional feeling. But given the nature of Jain beliefs, the worship of these great teachers is seen as an act of remembrance and reiteration of their qualities and message, and in that sense alone assists the worshipper in his or her journey along the path to liberation.

Jalal al-Din Hasan III

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Jalal al-Din Hasan b. Muhammad was an imam of the Nizari Isma'ili branch of Shi'ite Islam and the sixth ruler of the Nizari Isma'ili state centered at the stronghold of Alamut in northern Iran. Born in 1166, he succeeded to the leadership of the Nizari Isma'ili community and state in 1210 upon the death of his father, Nur al-Din Muhammad (r. 1166–1210). Jalal al-Din Hasan III devoted his brief reign of some eleven years to improving relations between his Nizari Isma'ili followers, who were then concentrated in Iran and Syria, and the broader world of the Sunni Muslims.

As a result of the religious policies of the preceding Isma'ili imams and rulers at Alamut, this particular Shi'ite Muslim community had become increasingly isolated from the rest of the Muslim world. Jalal al-Din Hasan, who had become weary of this isolation, introduced his own religious reform to ameliorate the situation. Upon his accession, he publicly repudiated the earlier Nizari Isma'ili teachings, especially those associated with the declaration of qiyama, or spiritual resurrection, in his community in 1164, and proclaimed his adherence to Sunni Islam. He commanded his followers to observe the shari'a, the sacred law of Islam in its Sunni form. Jalal al-Din Hasan sent messengers to the Abbasid caliph, al-Nasir (r. 1180–1225), and other Sunni Muslim rulers informing them of his reform. At the same time, he invited Sunni jurists of the Shafi'i school of jurisprudence from Iraq and Khorasan to come to the Nizari Isma'ili territories in Iran and Syria to instruct his followers. In 1211, the Abbasid caliph, who acted as the spiritual head of Sunni Islam, acknowledged Jalal al-Din's new dispensation and issued a decree to that effect. Henceforth, Jalal al-Din Hasan became known as the New Muslim, and his rights to the Nizari Isma'ili territories were formally recognized for the first time by the Abbasid caliph and other Muslim rulers.

Jalal al-Din Hasan's daring rapprochement with Sunni Muslims had other advantages in terms of peace and security for his community and state. In particular, the military campaigns of the Ghurid rulers against the Nizari Isma'ilis of eastern Iran ceased. Moreover, in Syria, the Nizari Isma'ilis received timely assistance from their neighboring Ayyubids against renewed attacks by the crusaders. The Nizari Isma'ilis of Iran and Syria accepted Jalal al-Din's reform without any opposition, evidently regarding it as imposition of the Shi'ite principle of taqiyya, or precautionary dissimulation of one's true religious beliefs in times of danger. The observance of taqiyya could be taken to imply any sort of accommodation to the outside world as deemed necessary by the infallible (ma'sum) Nizari imam who guided his community and contextualized the interpretation of the sacred law of Islam.

The improved Isma'ili-Sunni relations also proved beneficial to the Sunni Muslims. Jalal al-Din Hasan joined the Abbasid caliph's alliances, and in 1213 the Nizari Isma'ili imam personally led his army to Azarbayjan, in northwestern Iran, to assist Muzaffar al-Din Özbek, one of the Abbasid caliph's major allies and the last Eldigüzid ruler, against a rebellious subordinate. Later in Jalal al-Din's rule, many Sunni Muslims and scholars who were fleeing from the invading Mongols in central Asia found refuge in the Nizari fortress communities. Jalal al-Din Hasan III died in November 1221 and was succeeded in the leadership of the Nizari Isma'ili Shi'ite Muslims by his sole surviving son, Ala al-Din Muhammad.

Jalaram

Hindu philosopher, poet

Jalaram, also known as Sant Jalaram Bapa (Saint Jalaram, the father of all), is a popular holy person from nineteenth-century Gujarat, India. He was known for his sadavrata philosophy, which involves taking a vow resolving to feed hungry people free of cost. Jalaram's temple is located in the city of Virpur in Saurashtra, where his sadavrat activities are still practiced today. He was a disciple of one Bhojo Bhagat, a poet who wrote chabakha ("lashes" poems) criticizing the social evils of his own days.

There is little information available about Jalaram's life. He was born in Virpur in 1799 and died in the same city in 1878. His father, Pradhan Thakkar, was a businessman, and his mother, Rajbai, was a religiously minded woman. He was the second child of his parents. At the age of sixteen he married Virbai, a woman committed to religious activities and social service. Jalaram's father tried to train him in business, but Jalaram did not do well as he was inclined more toward charity and religious activities. Finally, he separated from his father, and he and his wife started working as laborers. After they collected sufficient grain, they decided to share it with society, and they started sadavrat in Virpur in 1819. Initially, they invested their own earnings, but later they were supported by various sections of the society, including even the local kings—Hindu and Muslim both.

There are various legends about Jalaram that speak about his popularity. One legend says Raghuvardasji Maharaj, a saint from Ayodhya, was pleased with his mother's hospitality and gave her a blessing, saying that her second son would become a great saint. Another legend says that when Jalaram was a child, a sadhu (renunciant) from Girnar came to see him and gave him a Ram-mantra (mantra of the god Rama). That reminded Jalaram of his previous birth, and he decided to serve the people. A third legend says that following a request from a sick, elderly sadhu, Jalaram gave his own wife to him (with her consent) so he would have someone to serve him. However, the same evening the sadhu disappeared, leaving a jholo (long shoulder bag) and a walking stick with Virbai. The jholo and stick are still worshipped today in Jalaram's temple.

James, Brother of Jesus

Christian leader, martyr

There are a number of people named James in the New Testament. One is James, the brother of Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Gal. 1:19), also identified as a "pillar" of the church in Jerusalem by Paul (Gal. 2:9). According to Acts 15, James was one of the participants in the Jerusalem council (see also Gal. 2:1–10). Traditionally, Catholic interpreters have argued that James and Jesus were cousins and not siblings. In recent years, several Catholic writers have eschewed this position and instead argued that James and Jesus were either full siblings, or that James was the older half brother of Jesus, the son of Joseph by a previous marriage. It is evident from the New Testament that James was not among the initial followers of Jesus. Yet in Gal. 1:19, Paul calls James an apostle. Perhaps Paul considered a postresurrection appearance of Jesus to James the necessary qualification for that title, just as Paul argued in his own case.

The status of James as a "pillar" of the Jerusalem church is somewhat enigmatic. The early chapters of Acts present Peter as a commanding presence and the dominant figure within the Jesus movement in Jerusalem during its initial phases. Yet Paul depicts James as a leading authority, and according to Acts 15, James had, by the time of the Jerusalem council, surpassed even Peter as the leader of this church. Quite how James ascended to this preeminent position remains a mystery. In this role he was a staunch advocate of Jewish Christianity but apparently embraced gentile Christians as full members of the movement.

Later Christian tradition emphasized the devotion of James to Jewish law and tradition. Hegesippus claimed that his extreme righteousness earned James the nickname “the Just,” and that he prayed so often in the temple on his knees that they became hard like those of a camel. Both Hegesippus and the Jewish historian Josephus asserted that Jewish authorities executed James.

The New Testament also contains a book that bears the name of James. By common consent it is considered among the most Jewish of all the New Testament books. It teaches that faith without works is dead, a claim that seems to contradict Pauline teaching and that caused Martin Luther (1483–1546) to disparage the book. Several striking similarities to the teaching of Jesus, often appearing in forms simpler than are present in the gospels, have led some scholars to conclude that the New Testament book of James was probably written by a scribe who had heard James preach one or more sermons and recorded them in a slightly harmonized form.

James the Greater

Christian apostle, martyr

James the son of Zebedee and Salome, brother of the apostle John, is portrayed in the gospels as one of three members of the inner circle of Jesus’ twelve disciples. He is sometimes referred to as James the Greater, principally to distinguish him from another James numbered among the twelve, James the Less (Mark 15:40). The designations probably refer to physical stature or perhaps to age, and not to importance.

The brothers James and John were active with their father in the family fishing business on the Sea of Galilee. The business employed other workers (Mark 1:20), suggesting relative wealth. Acts 4:13 famously claims that the disciples were unlearned and ignorant. Many scholars see this as a reference only to a lack of formal rabbinical training, arguing that as Galilean businessmen of some means, James and John would have been familiar with Greek and somewhat acquainted with the wider world. John 1:35–41 seems to suggest that John heard Jesus first, and then went and found his brother James. The synoptic gospels have James and John (the order may indicate that James was the elder brother) busy at work when Jesus found them. Their immediate response to the invitation to follow him suggests not only the urgency of the task but also the radical requirement of faith in Jesus.

James is frequently mentioned as among the foremost disciples. Peter, James, and John regularly are invited by Jesus to accompany him while the others among the twelve are left out. He is also paired with his brother as an example of importunate speech and action. The two make an embarrassing plea for positions of power in the kingdom, causing Jesus to declare that his kingdom is not about power and influence, but about service (Mark 10:35–45). The brothers also forbade a man from casting out demons in the name of Christ, eliciting another rebuke from Jesus (Luke 9:49). In this way, the brothers serve as representatives of human nature and as foils for Jesus, allowing him to proffer correct teaching.

James was martyred in 44 C.E., when Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod the Great, had him executed. He was the first of the disciples to suffer this fate. Acts 12:1–3 indicates that Herod did this to win favor with the Jewish authorities. Church tradition asserts that James traveled to Spain to preach before he returned to Judea and faced his ultimate martyrdom. Tradition also claims that after his death the body of James the Greater was miraculously translated to Iria Flavia in Spain, and then later to Compostela. This tradition made Compostela one of the most famous pilgrimage destinations during the medieval period.

Jamgon Kongtrul

Buddhist polymath

Jamgon Kongtrul was a giant among giants in the 1800s, a century that produced many of the greatest philosophers, saints, and literary geniuses of Tibet. Renowned as the incarnation of Vairotsana, Kongtrul was a mahapandita (great scholar) of the Indian Buddhist philosophical tradition, an unrivaled adept of esoteric tantric meditation and ritual, and also a master of other subjects, including medicine, astrology, and religious art. Most of the great Tibetan masters of the nineteenth century were related to Kongtrul as either teacher or disciple—and in many cases, both.

Kongtrul was born in 1813 to a family of prominent adepts of Tibet's indigenous Bön religion. As a boy, he was thoroughly trained in Bön doctrines. As a young man, he became a fully ordained Buddhist monk and studied the essential texts of Indian Mahayana Buddhism, especially the treatises of Madhyamaka (Middle Way) philosophy, Prajñāparamita (Perfect Wisdom), vinaya (monastic discipline), and abhidharma (psychology and cosmogony) as well as the Five Treatises of Maitreya, a work on the subject of yogic phenomenology and Buddhology. Later in his life, Kongtrul composed commentaries on these and many other subjects and redacted several of the most important textual collections in Tibetan literature. His collected works fill some ninety volumes.

Kongtrul's most important guru was Tai Situ Pema Nyinje Wangpo (1774–1853), one of the greatest masters of the Karma Kagyu lineage. However, Kongtrul's close relationship with Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo (1820–1892)—perhaps the greatest terton, or treasure-finder, in the tradition of Pemalingpa in Tibetan Buddhist history—was crucial in the development of Kongtrul's ecumenical approach to the study of Buddhism, and in fostering Kongtrul's own potential as a terton. From Khyentse and many other teachers, Kongtrul received all of the most important historical termas, or dharma treasures, which he later edited and compiled as the Store of Precious Treasure in 108 volumes. With Khyentse and another important terton, Chogyur Lingpa (1829–1870), Kongtrul was involved in the discovery, decoding, redaction, or transmission of many newly discovered termas. Thus many of Kongtrul's important contributions owe their greatest debt to Khyentse Wangpo.

Jamgon Kongtrul's autobiography, recently published in English (2003), details his extensive activities as a yogi, scholar, teacher, editor, terton, and occasional diplomat. Alongside Kongtrul's rapturous accounts of dreams and visions, and numerous accounts of his studies and teaching activities, are scattered recollections of his efforts to overcome the personal and political challenges faced by a spiritual teacher revered in both religious and secular society. More than just a mystical memoir, Kongtrul's life illustrates how tantric Buddhist meditation, especially as practiced in monasteries, liberates persons and communities from the disturbing effects of political and personal rifts. Kongtrul was an instrument of healing and reconciliation in an era when religion and politics were bound together in a difficult (but not necessarily unholy) union.

Anabaptist prophet, leader

Jan of Leyden was an Anabaptist prophet and "king" of Münster in Westphalia (Germany) in 1534–1535. He was executed in 1536 following a siege by episcopal and imperial armies. The Anabaptists favored polygyny and community of goods (based on Acts 2:44–45, 4:32–37), but these doctrines, along with the violence that accompanied the movement at Münster, engendered long-standing horror of the so-called Radical Reformation among Europeans.

Born in 1509, Jan was an illegitimate son of a Leyden patrician. A well-traveled journeyman tailor, he was working in Leyden as an innkeeper, actor, and poet when he became influenced by the millenarianism of Melchior Hofmann. Dutch prophet Jan Matthijs baptized Jan and sent him to Münster after the introduction of the Reformation to that city in 1532. After February 1534, Matthijs took over the city council, ordered the inhabitants to be rebaptized, and expelled opponents. About 2,500 Anabaptists flooded to Münster, cleansing churches of images and nonbiblical books and intentionally burning records of feudal dues. After Matthijs's suicidal attack on the besieging troops in April, Jan dissolved the elected city council and appointed twelve elders, published a confession of faith, and legislated capital punishment for blasphemy, disobedience, adultery, and gossip. Community of goods really meant wartime rationing. Still, military success strengthened Anabaptist resolve, and 200 opposing soldiers deserted after hearing Anabaptist preaching from the ramparts and succumbing to bribes (which consisted of coins made from episcopal treasures).

Jan introduced biblically supported polygyny in July, perhaps out of lust for Matthijs's widow or to organize the Münster women, who heavily outnumbered the men, into households. Resisters were imprisoned or executed; Jan himself executed one of his seventeen wives. Later, women sought divorces. Opposition to polygyny strengthened the latent resistance, and a dissident faction imprisoned Jan. After his release, however, he had his opponents executed.

Jan enhanced his own personal charisma with ritual, costume, and rhetoric. These were described in eyewitness accounts. Residents were forced to dance, attend spectacles, and participate in communal meals. Jan lacked authority in the larger Anabaptist community, however, and his attempts in October to win external support failed. His messengers were executed; one, Heinrich Graess, became a spy. New embassies to sympathizers at Christmas failed when Graess betrayed the supporters' location, causing widespread persecutions. As hunger intensified in 1535, Jan ordered women, children, and older men out of the city. Besiegers killed many of those who followed his order. Two Anabaptists, John Eck and Heinrich Gresbeck, betrayed one of the gates to the armies on June 25, and the city was taken and its male residents slaughtered after a vicious battle. Jan, along with other Anabaptists, was condemned, publicly tortured, and executed on January 22, 1536. His corpse was suspended from St. Lambert's Church in an iron cage that remains there to this day. About 3,500 women faithful to Anabaptism were expelled from the city.

Jerome

Christian ascetic, scholar

Jerome, a Christian ascetic, biblical translator, and exegete, remains widely regarded as one of the most influential and learned men in early church history. In many ways, he served as a bridge between the East and the West. His travels throughout the Roman Empire extended his thought, and his mastery of Hebrew, Latin, and Greek produced a prolific body of writings, including the Vulgate, the authoritative Latin translation of the Bible. As well, his literary correspondence with a network of male and female spiritual friends attests to a significant form of early Christian community. His own piety was rooted in a call to Christian asceticism that was lived out in a variety of ways during his life.

Jerome was born in Stridon in Dalmatia, a region of the Balkan Peninsula, in 347. He studied in Rome and was baptized a Christian there in 366. Shortly thereafter, he moved to Aquileia in northern Italy, where he joined a group of companions, among them Rufinus, who adopted an ascetic way of life grounded in rigorous physical discipline, prayer, and renunciation in accordance with biblical principles and the life of Jesus Christ. In 372, Jerome left this cenobitic (communal) lifestyle for a more solitary one. After a brief stay in Antioch, he entered the desert in the region of Chalcis in Syria, where he lived as a hermit for several years.

Death of Jerome, his soul carried to heaven by angels. Prominent in the engraving are the lion who befriended him in legend and a cardinal's hat, since later stories made Jerome a member of the College of Cardinals. (Library of Congress)

Jerome left his solitude to attend the Council of Constantinople in 381. After this, he returned to Rome, where he sought ecclesiastical support for the episcopal consecration of his friend Paulinus as bishop of Antioch. In Rome, Jerome also embraced the opportunity to serve as a spiritual adviser to a group of Roman aristocratic women. His letters to Paula and to her daughter, Eustochium, are evidence that he encouraged among these women the cultivation of a form of urban asceticism that included, among other things, the practice of Christian virtues and the reading and recitation of scripture. These women were largely responsible for the financial support that made it possible for Jerome and Paula to travel from Rome to Bethlehem in 386 to establish monastic institutions for women and men. These institutions served the local Christian community and extended their hospitality to weary Christian pilgrims who traveled to the Holy Land from all regions of the empire.

Jerome's writings include a considerable body of translations, of which the most noteworthy is the Vulgate. He also authored biblical commentaries, homilies, ascetical and polemical works, eulogies, letters, and a Christian hagiography on the life of Paul the Hermit (c. 235–345).

Jesus

(c. 6 B.C.E.–30 C.E.)

Christian founder

Jesus of Nazareth was a Jewish prophet and holy man whose life and teachings became the basis of the Christian religion. After his death by crucifixion in about 30 C.E., his followers had experiences that convinced them that he had been resurrected by God. They believed that although he had ascended to heaven, he would soon return as messiah (Greek: Christos, “anointed one”) to reign over a restored Jewish kingdom in Jerusalem. The movement they then founded spread rapidly and soon came to include non-Jews. Especially prominent in the Greco-Roman mission was the apostle Paul, whose reinterpretation of the new faith was especially influential. By the middle of the second century, the new movement, originally a Jewish sect, had achieved a distinct “Christian” identity, and it went on to become a world religion.

Although Jesus is mentioned by early second-century Roman historians (Tacitus, Suetonius, and others) and by the first-century Jewish historian Josephus, the best sources for our knowledge of his life and teachings are the four gospels of the New Testament. (The apocryphal Gospel of Thomas, a collection of sayings attributed to Jesus extant partially in Greek and completely in Coptic, may contain some early traditions.) Since the New Testament gospels were written to promote faith in the resurrected Christ, and reflect situations as they were recalled by disciples some decades after Jesus' time, they must be analyzed critically for information concerning the historical Jesus. Unfortunately, there is no unanimity among scholars about exactly who the historical Jesus was and what he said and did, but ever since the publication of Albert Schweitzer's seminal book, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (2001; 1st German ed. 1906), most scholars (not all—for example, the “Jesus Seminar”) have interpreted Jesus’ teachings and activity against the background of first-century Jewish eschatology.

Jesus (Yeshu’a) was presumably born sometime before the death of King Herod the Great (a client of the Romans, d. 4 B.C.E.). He grew up in a pious Jewish home in Lower Galilee, the son of Mary (Miryam), the wife of a carpenter named Joseph (Yoseph). According to the New Testament, Mary was a virgin who conceived Jesus by the Holy Spirit, so Joseph is not technically considered his father. Jesus had four brothers and at least two sisters (Mark 6:3). As a youth he learned Joseph’s trade. Sometime around 28 C.E., he underwent a ritual “washing of repentance,” or baptism, in the Jordan River by the Jewish prophet John the Baptist and presumably became John’s disciple. John’s message warned of the coming divine judgment, and his ritual washing was intended as a sign of repentance in preparation for that final event. After John the Baptist’s arrest by Herod Antipas, Jesus returned to his home territory and began a mission of his own in the rural towns and villages of Galilee. Sources differ on the length of this mission (in Mark it is a few months, but in John it could be for up to three years).

Jesus’ message is summarized by the earliest gospel: “The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near; repent and believe in the good news” (Mark 1:14). This message reflects an apocalyptic worldview, a dualistic conception of human history and destiny that contrasts “this age,” seen to be dominated by the forces of evil, with “the age to come,” which God would soon inaugurate, when sin, death, and the forces of evil would be brought to an end. Following upon a final judgment, the righteous elect would live with God eternally in a newly constituted world. Jesus’ characteristic designation for “the age to come” is the “kingdom” or (better translated) the “rule” of God.

Jews had for centuries worshipped God as their “Eternal King,” even during the time of the monarchy when the Judahite kings ruled in Jerusalem as God’s regent. Nevertheless, the experience of foreign (Roman) rule and widespread oppression of the powerless by the powerful brought pious Jews to pray for the full realization of God’s rule, as, for example, in the Aramaic Qaddish: “Magnified and hallowed be his great name in the world that he has created according to his good pleasure; may he establish his kingdom in your lifetime and in your days and in the lives of the whole house of Israel, very soon and in a near time.” This ancient prayer is reflected in two of the petitions of the prayer that Jesus taught his disciples (the Lord’s Prayer, Matt. 6:9–10). Jesus understood himself as a special messenger of God’s kingdom, announcing its nearness and challenging people to live according to its norms. In God’s kingdom, the norms of “this age” would be overturned, and the poor and oppressed would receive justice.

Jesus’ teachings and activity aroused the hostility of some of his contemporaries, notably the Pharisees, a party of pious Jews intent on following Torah (the Law) meticulously, and who enjoined purity regulations originally decreed for the temple priests. Jesus’ views were more lenient in terms of ritual purity, but they were more stringent in terms of moral requirements (for example, forbidding divorce). Jesus’ open table fellowship with traditional “sinners” (nonobservant Jews) and other deviants (such as tax collectors) was especially irritating to the Jewish authorities. In Jesus’ view, God rejoices more over repentant sinners than over people who think they do not need repentance. He saw himself as sent especially to the “lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Matt. 15:24).

Although Jesus looked upon the “coming” of God’s kingdom as a future event, he also indicated in certain contexts that the kingdom was already present in his own actions and teachings. He is credited by all the gospels with performing miracles of healing, exemplifying the presence among those healed of God’s saving power. Jesus was also an exorcist. He looked upon his exorcisms as part of God’s final assault upon the kingdom of Satan and signs of the proleptic presence of God’s kingdom: “But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out the demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you” (Luke 11:20 and context).

Who did Jesus think he was? His followers looked upon him as God’s promised messiah who would restore the Davidic kingdom to Israel. The resurrection was taken as a sign of God’s vindication of him as this messiah, but even before his death some of his followers looked upon him as the one who had been foretold. However, there are no authentic pronouncements of Jesus in which he claims to be the messiah. Instead, the self-designation that occurs in many of his sayings is “the Son of Man.” “Son of man,” both in Hebrew and in Aramaic, means essentially “human being” (cf. Ps. 8:4). The prophet Ezekiel is repeatedly addressed by God as “son of man” (Ezek. 2:1, passim). In one of the visions in the book of Daniel, four kingdoms, represented as beasts, are brought to an end by the coming to God of “one like a son of man,” that is, a human being (Dan. 7:14). That passage in Daniel was interpreted by the earliest Christians as a reference to Messiah Jesus, who would come again to establish his kingdom. But Jesus spoke instead of the “coming” of God’s kingdom, and not of his own “coming” (cf. Mark 9:1, reinterpreted in Matt. 16:28). Jesus’ authentic “Son of Man” sayings have to do with his lifestyle (Luke 7:34; 9:58) and other aspects of his ministry, including his authority to heal (Mark 2:10), and (possibly) his role as God’s servant (Mark 10:45). He probably also expected to play a future role as witness for the defense before God’s bar of judgment (Luke 12:8, in contrast to Matt. 25:31 ff.). How many of the “Son of Man” sayings are authentic pronouncements of the historical Jesus is disputed in scholarship. However one decides that, it is clear that Jesus' self-designation as "the Son of Man" is ambiguous, probably deliberately so.

The Gospel of Mark has Jesus predict three times that "the Son of Man" must suffer and die, and after three days rise again (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33 ff.). These sayings are usually taken as prophecies after the event, composed by Mark. Nevertheless, it is probable that Jesus did expect to die in the course of his ministry. Jesus was well aware of what had happened to John the Baptist (beheaded by Herod Antipas) and probably saw in this an indicator of what would happen to him (Matt. 17:12 ff.). When he was warned by some Pharisees that Herod wanted to kill him, he is reputed to have said that he would go about his business as usual, for it is in Jerusalem where they kill prophets (Luke 13:31–34). And to Jerusalem he went.

His last visit to Jerusalem was made with other Galileans on pilgrimage to observe the Passover festival. After his entry to the city, Jesus mounted a demonstration in the Temple against its money changers and merchants, thus incurring the wrath of the Temple priesthood. At night, on the eve of Passover, he was arrested by temple police and turned over to Pontius Pilate (Roman prefect of Judaea, 26–36 C.E.) with an allegation of insurrection. Pilate ordered him scourged and crucified, together with two other insurrectionists. Pilate's contempt for his Jewish subjects, including Jesus, is illustrated by the mocking inscription that he ordered posted on Jesus' cross: "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews."

But that wasn't the end of his story.

Jesus ('Isa)

(1st cent. C.E.)

Muslim prophet

Muslims revere Jesus (Arabic: 'Isa) as second to last in a long line of prophets that culminated in Muhammad (570–632). They thus consider Jesus a man of lofty spiritual estate, but no more than a human being. Born of the Virgin Mary, 'Isa was a specially chosen instrument of divine revelation, but he was not the Son of God, in their view. Muslim texts call Jesus the masih, but the term does not carry the sense of expectation connoted by its nearest English equivalent, messiah. He is "God's word," but not in the sense that Christians understand the term logos. Mary is mentioned more often by name in the Qur'an than in the Bible.

The purely human nature of Jesus is not the only major issue on which Islamic tradition disagrees dramatically with the Christian view. Qur'an 4:157 states that though the Jews boasted they had killed 'Isa, they did not in fact do so. It was, rather, one who looked like Jesus who hung on the cross. Muslim tradition holds, nevertheless, that God did raise Jesus bodily into heaven in the Ascension. Since 'Isa did not die an earthly death, he did not experience resurrection.

'Isa has a significant place in the Qur'an. According to the Islamic sacred text, Mary became pregnant with 'Isa when the angel Gabriel appeared to her in human form to announce the news. Joseph plays no part in the Muslim story of Jesus. After the child was born, Mary brought him to her people. When even they expressed doubt as to Mary's integrity, the infant spoke in her defense and lifted her opprobrium. One of the qur'anic stories not found in the canonical gospels is that the boy 'Isa formed a bird of clay in his hands, and when he breathed on it, it took flight—a story also told in the apocryphal Gospel of James. Principal qur'anic texts on 'Isa (and Mary) are: 3:37–48; 4:169–170; 5:76–79 and 109–117; 19:1–36; 21:91–92; 43:57–65; and 57:26–27.

Hagiographical texts in Islam known collectively as Tales of the Prophets expand further a number of important themes. The tales embellish the accounts of 'Isa's infancy and youth, feature 'Isa as a wandering ascetic with the power to give and restore life, and add to the number of his miracles, emphasizing his sinlessness and the significance of his ascension and the heaven and eventual second coming to earth.

Islam's mystical authors develop the figure of 'Isa in particularly colorful and imaginative ways. 'Isa is for many mystics the image of the near-perfect sufi—only near-perfect because he once carried a needle with him during his desert wanderings, thus falling short of absolute trust in God. But even when storms threatened, 'Isa refrained from seeking shelter, for he epitomized the homeless pilgrim. Sufis also celebrate 'Isa as the prophet who laughed heartily and often, by contrast with Yahya (John the Baptist), who had a penchant for weeping. Sufi poets delight in tales of 'Isa's ability to restore life through the incantation of a powerful name only a select few may utter. Though the Qur'an does not mention Lazarus ('Azar) by name, sufi writers picked up, from popular hagiography, the story of 'Isa's raising him from the dead. Finally, sufis love to describe how Jesus embodies their focus on mystical knowledge through his mastery of the "donkey" of the body, a symbol of ignorance.

Jianzhen (Chien-chen; Jap.: Ganjin)

Buddhist monk, patriarch

A Chinese Buddhist monk responsible for establishing the Vinaya school in Japan, Jianzhen was born in Yangzhou in 688 and tonsured when he was fourteen. Having received bhikus (monastic) and bodhisattva ordination in 707, he traveled extensively as "cloud and water," that is, without possessions or human ties, in a learning tour. Under various masters, he became accomplished in the practices of the Vinaya school founded by Daoxuan (596–667). In 733, he returned to Yangzhou and immediately attracted a large number of learned and capable disciples. In addition to his Buddhist learning, Jianzhen was also proficient in Chinese medicine, literature, architecture, and painting.

In 742, Eiei and Fusho, two Japanese monks, invited Jianzhen to establish the Vinaya school in Japan. Jianzhen accepted the invitation and, together with his twenty-one disciples, prepared for the journey. However, the Chinese government prevented them from leaving the country. For the next eight years, Jianzhen attempted several times to reach Japan by sea, but he was unsuccessful, partly owing to political problems. During his fifth attempt, Eiei died and Jianzhen went blind. Despite all of these setbacks, Jianzhen again set off for Japan in November 733, accompanied by many of his capable disciples, and they arrived in Kyushu in December.

Jianzhen brought with him a large number of Buddhist texts as well as texts on other elements of Chinese culture. In April 734, he presided over an ordination ceremony in accordance with the practice of the Vinaya school at Todaiji in Kyoto. The emperor, empress, and other members of the imperial family received bodhisattva ordination while more than 400 monks were ordained as bhikus. The event marked the beginning of full-fledged Vinaya practice in Japan, and Jianzhen has been regarded as the first patriarch of the Japanese Vinaya school. Under his instruction, Shodaiji, the paradigm of Japanese Buddhist architecture, was constructed in 759. Meanwhile, Jianzhen also educated the Japanese about Chinese culture. He is also honored as the founder of Japanese medicine. He died in 763 at the age of seventy-five.

Jilani, 'Abdul al-Qadir

Muslim sufi, philosopher, ascetic

'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani from the region of the Caspian Sea is probably known in all corners of the Islamic world for his legendary mystical reputation and unyielding scholarly achievements. He won fame in a wide range of subjects, including mysticism, philosophy, theosophy, jurisprudence, and asceticism. He studied law with renowned scholars such as Ibn 'Aqil and al-Mukharrimi, and he led the construction of the first Hanbali seminary college (madrassa) in Baghdad. He was the founder of the Qadiriyyah order in sufism. Buried in Baghdad, 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani's tomb is still a center for sufis to visit and perform pilgrimage.

'Abdul Qadir's veneration goes beyond any one particular sufi order because his spiritual power is widely described and accepted in sufi literature. Accounts of his miracles appear in sufi diaries, biographies, and dictionaries, which credit him with taming animals by raising a hand or through a mere glance. Sufis believe that all creatures praise God in their own voice and that 'Abdul Qadir's purified soul directly spoke to the animals and communicated with them on some level of consciousness. Other miracles attributed to ‘Abdul Qadir include curing illnesses by properly reciting religious formulae for healing. For example, he reportedly whispered into a deaf girl’s ear so that she could hear, touched the stomach of an infertile woman to enable her to bear children, and alleviated the pain of an infant through prayer. Nevertheless, ‘Abdul Qadir did not claim to be better than any other of God’s creatures. He synthesized his knowledge of Islamic theology with popular mystical practices in order to direct people’s attention toward God.

‘Abdul Qadir is revered in the sufi tradition as one of the most important sufi scholars and saints. He did not compromise basic religious practices or use asceticism to escape following the tenets of the faith. He asserted that the five daily ritualistic prayers were essential because it is a divine mandate to surrender oneself to the creator and, moreover, because prayer is a conduit for the believer to communicate with the divine. Although in some of his writings he comes across as a stern jurist, this is because he was concerned about sufis who drifted away from essential religious practices. For example, concerning fasting during the month of Ramadan and other times of the year, Qadir Jilani advocated the inner benefits of self-discipline and self-sacrifice. He viewed periodic fasting—for the more spiritually advanced, daily fasting—as a significant spiritual exercise for contemplation and heightened awareness. He felt this was the time when spiritual aspirants were able to attain the most knowledge.

Muslim sufi, author

Abd al-Karim ibn Ibrahim al-Jili, one of the most popular and influential figures of classical sufism, is the author of the renowned work Al-insan al-kamil (The universal man). He was born in Jil, Baghdad, in 1366 and eventually became well known in much of the Islamic world, from Turkey to Indonesia. Little is known of his life, but his lineage goes back to ‘Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166), the celebrated founder of the Qadiriyyah order of sufism. Certain passages of his spiritual autobiography scattered through his writings indicate that he traveled in India and lived for some time in Yemen. He wrote about two dozen works. Al-insan al-kamil is the most famous of these and one of the classics of sufi metaphysics and spiritual psychology.

In his philosophical orientation, Jili continued the tradition of Ibn al-‘Arabi (1165–1240), perhaps the greatest mystical metaphysician in Islam, expanding and commenting upon Ibn al-‘Arabi’s mystical path of knowledge. The concept of “universal” or “perfect man” was developed first by Ibn al-‘Arabi as a comprehensive account of spiritual anthropology. According to this view, the human state as the microcosm reflects the culmination of the various names and qualities of God. The universal man has reached the highest state of human perfection. In the tradition of Ibn al-‘Arabi and Jili, the universal man is ultimately the prophet of Islam who functions as the pole around which sanctity and prophecy revolve in the Islamic tradition. The title is reserved primarily for the prophet Muhammad.

One of the central themes of Jili’s work is the relationship between God and his creation, on the one hand, and God and the human world, on the other. The first issue pertains to the multiplicity of the world in view of God’s absolute unity, a concept that underlies Islam’s strict monotheism. Jili explains the relationship between divine unity and manifest multiplicity by referring to such concepts as the transcendent unity of being and the theophany, or self-disclosure, of God. With Ibn al-‘Arabi, Jili argues that there is unity-in-diversity and diversity-in-unity, and this leads him to a holistic view of the universe. God’s absolute being and unity, however, transcend all multiplicities and contingencies and are not tainted by them. God’s relationship to humankind is explained through the doctrine of the microcosm, which refers to the human state, and macrocosm, representing the universe. Man is called the “small universe” and the universe the “big man.” This view takes all creation to be an act of God’s unveiling and self-disclosure and establishes an ineluctable bond between man and the universe.

Jiva Gosvamin

(fl. 1555–1592 C.E.)

Hindu theologian

Jiva Gosvamin was one of the six famous theologians responsible for the articulation and development of the Bengal (Gaudiya) school of Vaishnava Hinduism, later known as the Chaitanya movement, in the sixteenth century. Jiva was the most prolific and versatile of the six theologians (including his two uncles, Sanatana and Rupa). More than twenty works in Sanskrit are attributed to him, including commentaries on religious aesthetics, ritual, and philosophy, studies of Sanskrit grammar, and poetry. His major work was the massive Sat-sandarbha (Six compositions), which provides the metaphysical and theological foundations for the Bengal school. His birth and death dates are unknown but he was active from 1555 through 1592.

Basing his works on the mythological dramas involving Krishna as a playful and erotic cowherd in the classical Bhagavata Purana (c. eighth and ninth centuries), Jiva sought to explain the meaning behind Krishna's love trysts with the married milkmaids (gopis) as symbolic of the selfless love (bhakti) of the human soul for the divine. The goal of devotees is identification with one of the characters (especially the milkmaids) in the mythological drama, eventually to develop the divine love and emotions (rasa) that free one from the material world and lead to the eternal paradise of Krishna as bhagavat (full divinity). Jiva's major accomplishment was to articulate a cosmology of being and consciousness that supported this devotional process. With his uncles he also adapted earlier Sanskrit theories of aesthetics (rasa-sastra) to argue for the superiority of the emotional worship of Krishna over merely philosophical approaches. The Gosvamins (masters of cows) were devotees of the great Bengali god-man Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533), who sent them to the northern Indian village of Vrindavana to pursue their work. Jiva's own disciple, Krishnadasa Kaviraja, wrote the influential biography Caitanya-caritamrta (Pastimes of Chaitanya), which held that Chaitanya himself was the incarnation of both Krishna and his favorite milkmaid, Radha.

Jizang (Chi-tsang)

Buddhist monk, scholar

phy in China. His Sanlun (Three Treatises) school is traditionally regarded as a Chinese version of Madhyamaka. The school's name comes from three Madhyamaka treatises that were translated into Chinese by Kumarajiva (344–413), the first to introduce the Madhyamaka teachings to China. Jizang achieved great fame for his great erudition and prolific scholarship, and he was influential in revitalizing the study of Sanlun doctrine after a period of decline. He established Sanlun as a major exegetical tradition in East Asia, although soon after his death in 623 the school became defunct and was superseded by new Sinitic traditions such as Chan and Huayan.

Born in 549 in a Buddhist family that immigrated to China from central Asia, Jizang received a traditional Chinese education. He was still a boy when he entered monastic life and became a disciple of Falang (507–581), a prominent exponent of Madhyamaka philosophy. Early biographies describe Jizang as a precocious youth, capable of mastering complex teachings and lecturing in front of large audiences. As he became widely respected for his extensive learning and intellectual brilliance, he received an invitation from the second emperor of the Sui dynasty (581–618) to take up residence in Chang'an, the capital of the newly reunified empire. Jizang continued to be a recipient of imperial patronage from the first emperor of the succeeding Tang dynasty (618–907), who appointed him as one of ten eminent monks who were in charge of the monastic order.

Jizang was an extremely prolific writer. His major works include Erdi yi (Meaning of the two truths) and Dasheng xuanlun (Treatise on the mysteries of Mahayana). He also wrote numerous commentaries on canonical texts, including the Lotus Scripture and the Vimalakirti Scripture. His major contribution to the doctrinal evolution of Sanlun is his analysis of the two truths (conventional and ultimate), which postulates three phases in the dialectical ascent of the realization of the two truths. Another major feature of Jizang's thought was his assimilation of the buddha-nature theory into his doctrinal system. Because of that, some scholars have suggested that his thought can be interpreted as a synthesis of the doctrines of emptiness and buddha-nature, rather than simply as a Chinese version of Madhyamaka.

Jizzini, Muhammad al- (Ash-Shahid al-Awwal)

Shi'i Muslim scholar, martyr

Ash-Shahid al-Awwal, “the First Martyr,” was the first of the major Shi'i religious leaders to emerge from the Jabal 'Amil region of the Lebanon, and he was thus responsible for starting the shift that moved the center of Shi'i scholarship to Lebanon from Hillah in Iraq. He is mainly remembered by Shi'is for his scholarship in the area of religious jurisprudence and for the fact that, by being executed by the Sunni authorities in 1384, he became a martyr.

Muhammad ibn Makki al-'Amili al-Jizzini was born in 1333 in Jizzin in the Jabal 'Amil area of Lebanon (between Beirut and Damascus). He studied in Hillah in Iraq under the leading Shi'i religious scholars of his time, as well as under some Sunni scholars, and then settled in Damascus. Syria was at this time controlled by Sunni rulers under the authority of the Mamluk sultans of Egypt. Thus ash-Shahid al-Awwal used taqiyyah (dissimulation of one's religious beliefs and practices in times of danger to one's life), a practice allowed under Shi'i law, to establish himself as one of the leading religious scholars of Damascus. He would thus give judgments to Sunnis in accordance with Sunni law, while at the same time being covertly the head of the Shi'i community and giving judgments to the Shi'is in accordance with Shi'i law. Although Hillah was to continue to be a major center for Shi'i scholarship, ash-Shahid al-Awwal started the movement that would put the Lebanon at the center of Shi'i scholarship within the next century.

The second wave of Mongol conquests under Timur (Tamerlane) occurred during ash-Shahid al-Awwal's lifetime. Although Timur was a Sunni, he was well disposed toward Shi'is and allowed the Shi'i rulers of the Sarbardarids in northeastern Iran to remain as his vassals. The Sarbardarid ruler sent an emissary to ash-Shahid al-Awwal inviting him to go there and help to establish Twelver Shi'ism in the area. Unfortunately, shortly before the arrival of this emissary, ash-Shahid al-Awwal had been denounced as a Shi'i, arrested, and put into prison. Nevertheless, while in prison, he did write for the Sarbardarid emissary and ruler his most important book, al-Luma'ah al-Dimashqiyyah (The Damascan gleaming), a work on Shi'i religious jurisprudence that would become the standard on that subject and the textbook used by students for some 250 years.

According to some accounts, ash-Shahid al-Awwal was in prison because he had been betrayed by a Shi'i. Other accounts say his arrest was the result of jealousy on the part of a Sunni religious judge in Damascus. At any rate, he was kept in prison for a year and then executed on the orders of Baydar, the governor of Damascus, and Mamluk sultan Barquq according to fatwas (judgments) issued by Sunni religious judges of Damascus. It is said that his execution was by blows of the sword, followed by crucifixion, stoning, and then being burned.

Jnaneshvara

Hindu writer

Jnaneshvara, a Hindu religious writer (also called Jnanadeva), was born in 1275 in Maharashtra, India, into a brahmin household. His father was a priest who became an ascetic but later changed his mind and returned to the life of a householder, getting married and having a family. Because this represented a violation of caste regulations, his entire family was excommunicated and persecuted. The four children, though denied an education and considered social outcasts, became important religious figures, but all died in their twenties. A brother named Nivrattinath, who gained fame as a poetic saint and yogi as a member of the Natha cult, influenced Jnaneshvara to also become a yogi. All four siblings were eventually considered incarnations of Hindu divine beings. Jnaneshvara was supposedly Vishnu; Nivrattinath was associated with Shiva; their other brother, Spondeva, was said to be Brahma; and their sister, Muktabai, was linked with the goddess Sri Lakshmi.

Jnaneshvara wrote devotional Vaishnavite poetry during his short life. In some of these poems, the more Maharashtran regional deities, Vitthal and Rukmini, often substituted for the deity Krishna and his consort Radha. But Jnaneshvara's greatest claim to fame was as the author of a text entitled Jnaneshvari. This work was both a paraphrase and commentary on the Bhagavad Gita that synthesized devotional philosophy and poetry. It has been highly venerated by the people of Maharashtra, who have tended to treat the book as a sacred object. In this text, Jnaneshvara stresses the importance of the guru (teacher) and the necessity of venerating and serving the guru, explaining the dualistic metaphysical system of Samkhya philosophy, the unknowable nature of God, various virtues and vices, the importance of renouncing the fruits of one's actions, and the devotional path to God. The text also stressed the divine name and its power. Overall, the work brought together the Advaita Vedanta philosophy of Sankara, classical yoga and its Samkhya metaphysics found in the Bhagavad Gita, and tantric thought. Jnaneshvara equates, for instance, the Purusa of Samkhya philosophy with the Brahman of Advaita thought, and he refers to the awakening of the kundalini (spiritual energy) in the heart of a person.

Jnaneshvara was historically considered a member of the sant tradition. Although there is no precise meaning for the term sant, it has evolved to refer to early nonsectarian poet-saints. The sants represented the lower strata of Indian society that even included the untouchables; indeed, they were usually considered social misfits. It was thought, however, that God, through some kind of unexpected miracle, had verified the saintliness of the sant. But the ideal of saintliness was a lay notion. It was open to everyone and transcended sectarian and caste barriers. He brought his own life to an end in 1296 by burying himself alive, following yogic tradition.

Joan of Arc

Christian mystic

Joan of Arc, known only as Jehanne la Pucelle (Joan the Maid) during her lifetime, is the patron saint of France, soldiers, and prisoners of war. She is the only Christian holy woman to have led an army and is unique among Christian female saints in the intense nationalism of her spirituality.

Joan was born in 1412 to a peasant family in the village of Domrémy in Lorraine, surrounded by war. Over the next few years, France lost ground to England in the Hundred Years' War, and in 1420 the Treaty of Troyes gave succession to the French crown to Henry V of England. In 1422, both Henry and Charles VI of France died; it remained to be seen whether the uncrowned Charles VII could recover his realm from the English.

When Joan was about thirteen, she began hearing “voices,” which she later identified as those of the archangel Michael and two saints. In time, they gave her a mission: to liberate France from the English. In 1428, she appeared in the nearby garrison town of Vaucouleurs, where she proclaimed that the kingdom belonged to God, who wished Charles VII to reign. Joan returned in 1429 to insist that she be taken to speak to Charles because she was bringing him divine aid to win back France. In March she met him at Chinon. To test her holiness,

Charles had her questioned by theologians, then examined by women to verify her virginity. Satisfied, he supplied her with armor, horses, and men and sent her to raise the siege of Orléans as she had said she would. This she did in early May. A series of victories followed. Joan's next step was to convey Charles to Rheims for his coronation, which took place on July 17, with Joan dressed in full armor at his side.

Joan's fortunes then changed. Further military victories eluded her, and she was captured at Compiègne by England's Burgundian allies. Following lengthy negotiations, she was sold to the English for £10,000 and then tried for heresy. The trial, conducted by an inquisitorial court in English-held Rouen, lasted from January 9 through May 1431. Unable to establish independent grounds on which to formally charge her, the court questioned Joan directly in order to uncover some heretical offense with which she could be charged. This procedural irregularity later provided the basis for nullifying her conviction. On May 24, worn down by the questioning, Joan denied her voices and promised not to wear men's clothing again on the understanding that she would be removed from the military prison and held in female custody. Three days later, when this condition was not met, she resumed male attire. Condemned as a relapsed heretic, Joan was burned at the stake on May 30. In 1456, a retrial nullified the 1431 proceedings. Joan was canonized in 1920.

Joan's fervor restored French hopes and confidence at a time of low morale and helped bring about a turning point in the Hundred Years' War. Her memory has been invoked in times of national crisis, most notably during World War II, and also by feminists in arguments for female worth. Historians continue to find interest in Joan's spirituality and military ability, the cultural and legal ramifications of her trials, and the impact of her life, while literature and film have carried popular versions of her story to the wider world.

Johane Masowe (John of the Wilderness)

Christian prophet

Johane Masowe was born at about the same time that World War I broke out in 1914. He grew up under the family name Shonhiwa M'tunyane, or Masedza, in an African village called Gandanzara in Zimbabwe. The story of his sainthood begins after he abandoned school and left his village to travel between his home and the capital city of Harare. He tried various menial jobs, including gardening, carpentry, shoe repair, and probably farm labor, until he stopped work on account of chronic headaches that caused him to sleep long hours and have dreams about death.

Believing in the healing power of God, Johane started to preach the gospel during the 1930s. He led some of his followers from Zimbabwe to Botswana, South Africa, Zambia, Tanzania, and Kenya. This journey has been described as an exodus for African people on a quest for a promised land. He died of a cardiovascular disease while in Tanzania in September 1973 in prayerful hope for the return of Christ and en route to the promised land. The forty-year migration created the setting for his saintlike behavior.

Johane's claim to authority began with experiences of marginality. As hinted above, he suffered from acute pain, nightmares about death, and, in other stories, was a victim of colonial oppression and violent abuse. Moreover, his dreams were also filled with the "voice" of God, and he experienced healing through what he believed was the power of the Holy Spirit. As a result, Johane sought his God in places he called masowe (wilderness) to draw attention to the biblical prophetic tradition of voices crying in the wilderness that saints embraced in the wider Christian tradition. Some of this made sense to Shona people. Their own traditional religious heritage used idioms of healers (n'angas) and spirit mediums to explain their suffering and sometimes withdrawal to the margins of society and anointments announced through dreams. Even Johane Masowe's ascetic behavior was meaningful to Shona people, who had a high regard for virginity and sexual abstinence in preparation for ritual.

Today, Johane Masowe's accepted holiness explains the popular use of the word masowe to designate places for prayer that are located on the fringes of landscapes. Today between South Africa and Nairobi, there are approximately 3 million people using the title "Johane Masowe Apostles" to name their churches.

John XXIII (Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli)

Roman Catholic pope, reformer

The future Pope John XXIII was born at Sotto il Monte, Bergamo, Italy, on November 25, 1881. He was pope from October 28, 1958, until his death on June 3, 1963.

Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli was the third of thirteen children, and the first son, of pious Roman Catholic Italian peasants. At age twelve, he entered the diocesan minor seminary at Bergamo. His early training brought him under the influence of the progressive leaders of the Italian Catholic social movement. In 1901, he attended the Roman Seminary (Apollinare), but he interrupted his studies to serve for a year in the 73rd Infantry Regiment of the Italian Army. He was ordained a priest on August 10, 1904, after finishing a doctorate in theology.

Pope John XXIII being carried ceremoniously to St. Peter's Basilica for the inauguration of the Second Vatican Council, October 15, 1962. (Bettmann/CORBIS)

He was appointed secretary of the bishop of Bergamo, Count Giacomo Radini-Tedeschi, whom he served for over nine years. During this time, he gained experience in all forms of Catholic social action and gained an understanding of the problems of the working class. He published several brief monographs during this time. In 1915, during World War I, he served in the Italian chaplains corps. In 1920, he helped to organize the first national Eucharistic Congress to be held in Italy after the war. A year later, he was named director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in Italy and appointed to the General High Council, helping Pope Pius XI write the motu proprio Romanorum Pontificum (May 3, 1922), which raised his society to papal status and transferred the headquarters from Lyons to Rome.

In 1925, Roncalli became titular archbishop of Areopolis and apostolic visitor to Bulgaria. He worked extensively with the problems of Eastern Rite Catholics in this area, who comprised a scattered minority. In 1934, Roncalli was appointed apostolic delegate to Turkey and Greece. He introduced the use of the Turkish language into the Catholic rite and official documents. During World War II, Roncalli supplied much crucial information to the papacy regarding international espionage in Istanbul. In 1944, he was assigned as papal nuncio to France during the difficult political turmoil of that country during and following World War II. He was made a cardinal on January 12, 1953, and granted the titular church of Santa Prisca on the Aventine, and eventually he became patriarch of Venice in the same year.

After Pius XII's death on October 9, 1958, Roncalli was elected pope and took the name John XXIII. Of all the major accomplishments of John XXIII, it was the ecumenical council that he called for the universal church that stands out above everything else. Opening in October 1962 and ending in 1965 after John's death, the Second Vatican Council was the most revolutionary in Christian history: John XXIII challenged the clerics to renew the religious life of Catholics and bring the church up-to-date in its teachings, with the ultimate goal being the unity of all Christians. Vatican II (as it has come to be called) eventually led to the adoption of the vernacular in the Catholic rite, the ability of individual congregations to create and adapt the Roman Catholic liturgy to modern times and musical idioms, and led to greater decentralization of church authority and organization.

John XXIII was a man of lowly origins and background, and he never lost sight of his heritage or the needs and afflictions of the working class. He had strong reservations regarding the bureaucracy of the Roman curia and helped to diminish the cult of the papacy and the pontifical personality. His perceived need for reform in the church marks his pontificate as a turning point in the modern history of the Roman Catholic Church, and he instituted a new age in Catholicism as a result.

John Baptist de la Salle

Roman Catholic priest, educator

John Baptist de la Salle, founder of the Roman Catholic Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools for the education of the poor, was born in Rheims, France, on April 30, 1651. His parents were particularly attentive to his moral and religious development. He attended the College des Bons Enfants and on July 10, 1669, received a masters of arts degree. Though prepared for a career in law, John felt called to service in the church.

In October 1670, he joined the seminary of Saint-Sulpice and attended lectures at the Sorbonne. Both of his parents had died by 1672, and he had to leave Paris to take his place as the head of his family. However, this did not prevent him from continuing in his theological pursuits, and on Holy Saturday of 1678 he was ordained a priest.

After his ordination, John dedicated his life to the education of poor children, formally founding the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in 1684. The institute was to found free primary and elementary schools for Christian education aimed at inculcating positive social and moral values. Its membership was limited to lay brothers so that they could be dedicated entirely to teaching and not be distracted by sacramental ministry. A year later, he founded a normal school in Rheims for the education of teachers.

Most significant in the schools was their pedagogical style, the "Simultaneous Method," which grouped children into classes based on their intellectual capabilities. John used this method across disciplines. He was also dedicated to meeting the needs of the time. To help correct the inadequacy of secondary education, he founded several boarding colleges, including Saint-Yon in 1705. Further, he expanded the concept of the Sunday school, founding in the parish of Saint-Sulpice in 1699 a Sunday school with broad academic offerings. He also wrote numerous publications on pedagogical methods, religious life, and spirituality.

The last years of his life were spent in retirement at Saint-Yon, where he died on Good Friday, April 7, 1719. Before he died he blessed the brothers, leaving them to carry out his teaching mission.

John Cassian

(c. 360–c. 433 C.E.)

Christian monk, author

John Cassian, monk and spiritual author, was the first to introduce the rules of Eastern monasticism into the West. His companion works, The Institutes and The Conferences, were enormously influential for the development of both monasticism and Christian spirituality from the fifth century.

Cassian was born in about 360. After receiving a classical education, Cassian, accompanied by his friend Germanus, joined a monastery at Bethlehem. However, the two spiritual companions, driven by the desire characteristic of the age to perfect ascetic practice in the company of famous masters, also twice journeyed to the Egyptian desert and there met a number of great solitary ascetics, the desert fathers. Cassian and Germanus ultimately left Egypt, most likely fleeing the turbulence resulting from theological controversy that was rife in the area. Arriving in Constantinople, Cassian became a disciple of John Chrysostom, bishop of that city. After Chrysostom was expelled from Constantinople, Cassian was sent by the clergy of the city to Rome in about 405 as an envoy to interest Pope Innocent I in the plight of their bishop. Cassian spent a number of years at Rome, where he was ordained a priest.

The final years of Cassian's life, from about 415 until his death in roughly 433, were spent in Gaul at Marseilles, where he founded monasteries for both men and women and produced his important works on ancient monastic practice. The Conferences, a work devoted, according to Cassian, to the training of the inner man in a manner similar to that of many ancient writings, is cast in dialogue form. The twenty-four dialogues are between fifteen abbas, the desert fathers, and their eager pupils, Cassian and Germanus. In them the abbas provide guidance and impart ascetic wisdom and truth, authority, and tradition. With considerable psychological insight as well as moderation, these characters describe the goals of the monastic life: purity of heart, attainment of the kingdom of heaven, the cultivation of discretion, overcoming the eight principal vices, and winning the conflict between flesh and spirit. Initially extolling the solitary life of the anchorite, Cassian ultimately acknowledges the equality of the cenobitic life of monks living in common. The Institutes is concerned, according to Cassian himself, with the outer man. The first four books establish rules for the monastic life, and the final eight discuss the vices that impede the progress of the monk-athlete.

John Chrysostom

Christian bishop, scholar, father of the Greek church

Born at Antioch, Syria, in about 349, John Chrysostom is considered the most important father in the Greek church. Due to his eloquence, he was dubbed Chrysostomos, or "golden-mouthed." Chrysostom's extant writings are more complete than those of any other Greek father, occupying almost twenty volumes of the Patrologia Graeca, the great nineteenth-century collection of writings of the Greek fathers of the church.

The fourth century saw fast growth in ascetic practices, and John was no exception. He seems to have joined the school of Diodore and Carterius. In an extant sermon, John suggests that this ascetic school renounced marriage and adopted a distinctive style of dress. Once he left home, John pursued his ascetic study, scarcely slept, and committed the Old and New Testaments to memory. An obvious believer in the fundamental principles of asceticism, he engaged in extreme fasting and other practices. Indeed, his stomach and kidneys were damaged after some six years of this, the final two having been spent in isolation in a cave. When he left seclusion, John became a priest at Antioch. He became patriarch of Constantinople in 398.

John proved to be an avid reformer, winning many enemies at the imperial court, including Empress Eudoxia (r. 395–404). When he delivered a sermon scolding the crowd for its adoration and frenzy at the unveiling of a statue of the empress, this became an excuse for her to move against him. The sermon started a firestorm, and when the empress heard about it, John was exiled from Constantinople. Although soon recalled (thanks to the "divine threat" of an earthquake), John was soon in trouble and exiled again. He died while being moved between places of exile on September 14, 407. His final words are supposed to have been "Glory be to God for all things."

John's extant work is only a part of what he actually wrote. Some 900 sermons survive. His writing is defined by an advanced and informed rhetorical style, a stress on literal biblical exegesis, and extensive reference to the ascetic schools. The numerous letters that survive show the care with which John tended to his congregation. His preaching, both in content and style, was unequalled in his lifetime and for years after. He often represented his sermons as having been transmitted to him directly by God, thus thrusting him more into the role of amanuensis than interpreter. His exegesis is on par with that of Origen of Alexandria (c. 185–c. 254), and his homilies on the New Testament serve today as some of the most important writing on the topic.

John's role as theologian is attested to by those who followed him. His name was already being invoked at the Council of Ephesus, not thirty years after his death. It is perhaps his teaching regarding the eucharist that is most important. In his eighty-second homily, on the Gospel of Matthew, he writes, "When the word says, 'This is My Body,' be convinced of it and believe it, and look at it with the eyes of the mind. . . . How many now say, 'I wish I could see His shape, His appearance, His garments, His sandals.' Only look! You see Him! You touch Him! You eat Him!"

John Climacus

(c. 570–c. 649 C.E.)

Christian abbot, writer

John Climacus, a hermit, monk, and abbot of the monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai, is chiefly known for his influential treatise on the monastic life: The Heavenly Ladder, or Ladder of Divine Ascent. Biographical details on his life are scant. He was born in about 570 in the Holy Land, spent forty years as a hermit, became abbot, and then wrote his treatise at the request of an abbot of a nearby monastery.

His handbook, originally written in Greek, is addressed to monks and is divided into thirty chapters (the number chosen to correspond to Christ's age at his baptism). The ladder analogy was derived from the vision of Jacob's Ladder (Gen. 28:12). Although Climacus was by no means the first writer to describe the spiritual life as a ladder stretching from earth to heaven, his development of the analogy is extremely detailed. The thirty chapters, or rungs, primarily describe the virtues to be acquired and the vices to be overcome by those renouncing the world for the life of the spirit.

The text has a tripartite scheme, with the first section (three chapters) devoted to renunciation, the second section (chapters four through twenty-six) to the practice of the virtues (for example, obedience, humility, simplicity) and struggles against vices (such as anger, gluttony, pride), and the final section to the contemplative life and union with God (stillness, prayer, dispassion, love). The steps are not understood to be strictly consecutive but to give an overall description of the ongoing struggles of the soul to reach the enlightened joy of the love of God. John's writing is practical as well as highly mystical and enigmatic at times, and his compassionate tone emphasizes personal experience. He is one of the earliest authors to make reference to the single-phrase "Jesus Prayer," which, translated into English, is "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me, a sinner."

The popularity of the text among both lay and monastic readers is attested by the fact that it was widely translated. Numerous illustrated as well as unillustrated versions survive. Illustrated manuscripts and icons often depict the scene of monks ascending a diagonally positioned ladder toward God in the heavens as John Climacus, standing to one side, exhorts them to continue. While angels guide the monks, demons pull some off the ladder to throw them into the jaws of a dragon (representing hell). John Climacus is also known as John of the Ladder or John the Scholastic. His feast day is March 30.

John Gualbert

Christian abbot, monastic founder

John Gualbert founded the Italian abbey of Vallombrosa and served as its first abbot. He was born in Florence, Italy, in about 995 and died in Passignano on July 12, 1073. He was canonized by Pope Celestine III in 1193, and his feast is celebrated on July 12.

The son of the Florentine noble Gualbert Visdomini, John Gualbert was a knight until the murderer of one of his relatives begged for his forgiveness on Good Friday. After sparing the man's life, John went to pray at the Benedictine church at San Miniato, where Christ on his crucifix bowed his head to him in recognition of his generosity. John soon became a Benedictine monk at San Miniato. However, he discovered that the abbot was a simonist and refused to serve under him. Seeking a more austere and perfect life, he went to Camaldoli sometime before the death of Romuald in 1127. Despite his attraction to the monastic life, he left Camaldoli around 1030 to found a hermitage at Vallombrosa.

The monastery he founded there around 1038 followed the Benedictine Rule but made provisions for lay brothers to perform manual labor and attend to the monastery's business. This modification allowed the choir monks to live an austere and contemplative life. The term conversi (lay brothers) occurs for the first time in Abbot Andrew of Strumi's Life of St. John, which was written at the beginning of the twelfth century. The strict asceticism and the holy lives of the first monks at Vallombrosa attracted considerable attention but few postulants. After John Gualbert's death, however, the order rapidly expanded across Italy. Pope Urban II took Vallombrosa under the protection of the Holy See in 1090.

Christian monk, theologian, father of the church

Father of the church John of Damascus (or John Damascene) was an extremely influential Syrian theologian and hymnographer whose profound writings and eloquent sermons gained him the title “Chrysorrhoeas” (“Golden Flowing” or “Golden Speaker”). Born into a wealthy and prominent Christian family in Damascus in about 675, he received an excellent education and ultimately continued his father's duties in financial administration and as the representative of the Christian community under the Arab (Umayyad) rulers. Perhaps due to the new caliph's hostility toward Christians, he resigned his position around 700 or 715 (sources vary) and retired to the monastery of St. Sabbas (Mar Saba) near Jerusalem, where he lived until his death in about 750. He was ordained a priest, taught in the monastery, gave sermons in Jerusalem, and devoted himself to theological studies and writing.

John's most important theological and philosophical text is the Font of Wisdom (or Fount/Source of Knowledge). It includes an extensive synthesis of Greek philosophy, a history and refutation of heresies (including Islam), and a detailed exposition of the major tenets of the Orthodox faith regarding the creation, the Trinity, the incarnation, and the sacraments. Translated into Latin in the twelfth century, this work was considered a standard text for centuries. Among his other major works is the Sacra parallela (Holy parallels), a vast collection of scriptural and patristic texts on the moral and ascetic aspects of Christianity. Virtues and vices are described as parallels in the third section.

Famed as a composer of numerous hymns and sermons, John also wrote, between 726 and 730, three extremely significant treatises in defense of holy images (Apologetic Discourses against the Attackers of Holy Images). His clear refutation of the contemporary iconoclastic position in Byzantium under the emperor Leo III played an important role in the eventual conclusion of the controversy (in the ninth century) and the reinstatement of holy images in the Byzantine church. His feast day is March 27 in the Roman Catholic Church and December 4 in Greek Orthodoxy.

Christian abbot, reformer

John of Gorze, also known as Jean de Vandières, was born sometime in the late ninth century in Vandières, France; he died in about 975 in the fortieth year of his monastic profession. Although he was never formally canonized, his feast is traditionally celebrated on February 27.

The son of a wealthy landowner, John studied first at Metz and then at the abbey of St. Mihiel. The death of his father and his mother's remarriage interrupted his schooling and forced him to return home to care for the family estate, where he arranged for the education of his younger brothers. During a pilgrimage to Rome that included a visit to the Benedictine monastery at Monte Cassino, he met Archdeacon Einold of Toul, and in 933, John, Einold, and five companions were sent by Bishop Adalbero of Metz to reform the monastery of Gorze. With Einold as the new abbot, John was placed in charge of the renovation of the monastery, both physically and spiritually. He insisted on the literal interpretation of the Benedictine Rule and introduced extremely severe penitential discipline. Gorze quickly spearheaded a tenth-century monastic revival that spread throughout Germany.

In 953, King Otto I sent John to Spain to serve as his envoy to the Umayyad caliph Abd-er-Rahman III. He spent three years in Cordoba, returning to Gorze when he was elected abbot after the death of Einold. Gorze's influence was spread by the patronage of bishops and German princes. Soon both reformed monasteries and new foundations were established in Hesse, Swabia, and Bavaria. Unlike their close contemporaries at Cluny, the abbeys of the Gorzian reform retained their autonomy. Gorze was only the first in a series of “co-equal” monastic establishments linked through common prayer and friendship; no monastery had judicial control over another. Despite attempts to evangelize Hungary in 971, the Gorzian revival was for the most part contained within Germany and never created anything like the kind of influence and centralized control that was exercised by Cluny in France.

John of Kronstadt (Ioann)

Russian Orthodox priest, miracle worker

John of Kronstadt was the miracle-working priest of St. Andrew’s Cathedral in Kronstadt near the city of St. Petersburg in Russia. His followers are called “Ioannites” (Ioannity).

Born Ioann Sergiev to an impoverished family in the Archangel region in 1829, John studied first at home and then in an academy in the city of Archangel. He eventually entered the Archangel seminary, and in 1851 he enrolled in the St. Petersburg religious academy. John hoped to become a monk and travel overseas as a missionary, but in 1855 he received his degree in theology and married Elizabeth, daughter of the archpriest of the Kronstadt St. Andrew’s Cathedral, where John held his first position as a priest. In 1858, John became the religious instructor of Kronstadt’s elementary school, and in 1862 he began teaching in the gymnasium (upper school). As a priest in Kronstadt, Father John became renowned as a charismatic speaker and a miraculous healer. He even began to conduct public healing services, a practice alien to Russian Orthodoxy. In another unusual move, he instituted the ancient tradition of public rather than the more traditional private confession.

John’s ascetic lifestyle was maintained within an urban setting. He campaigned against alcoholism, relieved the poor, and reportedly healed the sick through prayer. By the 1880s, John was famous throughout Russia for his eloquent speech. He attracted many followers to Kronstadt, often women from the lower strata of society. John built structures to house the poor, who came to him for healing and spiritual guidance. Images of John were created during his lifetime, and some Orthodox venerated him as if he were already a saint. Much of John’s own spirituality is recorded in his personal diary, and he authored many essays and pastoral tracts and pamphlets. He also wrote a confessional work entitled My Life in Christ. John’s innovations in Orthodox pastoral leadership were sufficient to appear as a separate sect within Orthodoxy, and after the 1905 revolution his followers formed a religious organization called the Brotherhood of John of Kronstadt, which began to publish a weekly journal, the Kronstadt Beacon. In 1909, the year after John’s death, the Brotherhood began to publish a daily paper entitled The Storm.

Certain of John’s followers considered him to be the incarnate Christ, and after his death many were attracted to the Ioannites as a messianic alternative to the official Orthodox Church. John’s popularity in Russia caused many self-proclaimed spiritual guides and healers to name him as their inspiration, and he was acclaimed by the church even as many of his followers were disciplined for asserting his divinity. John himself was called upon repeatedly to disavow claims that he was Christ, and he did so increasingly after 1905, as did leading members of the Brotherhood.

John spent much of his time administering charities in Kronstadt and beyond. He is remembered in Orthodoxy as a passionate believer, a healer, a father to the poor and suffering, and a charismatic religious figure in a time of increasing secular pressures.

John of the Cross

Roman Catholic mystic, poet, doctor of the church

From a childhood of poverty in the sixteenth century to a final illness that ate away his body, John of the Cross underwent all manner of suffering with a patience born from compassion. He is renowned for his poetry, which describes the “dark night of the soul” and the soul’s mystical union with God.

John was born in 1542 near Avila, Spain. Through the generosity of people who recognized his gifts, the boy was able to attend primary school and the Jesuit school at Medina del Campo, Spain. In 1563, he took the Carmelite habit in Medina, and the following year he entered the University of Salamanca for a three-year course in the arts, followed by a year’s course in theology. In September 1567, he met Teresa of Avila at Medina and agreed to join her Discalced (barefoot) Carmelite reform, taking the reform vows on November 28, 1568. Three years later he went to the university in Alcalá de Henares, where he served as rector of the College of the Reform and directed the Carmelite nuns. From 1572 to 1577, he was confessor to the convent of the Incarnation in Avila, during which time he and Teresa were in close spiritual dialogue.

In the winter of 1575–1576, John was the victim of soured relations between the Calced and Discalced Carmelites: Kidnapped by the Calced, he was imprisoned at Medina del Campo and released only through the intervention of the papal nuncio. In December 1577, he was kidnapped once again, this time imprisoned in the Calced Carmelite priory in Toledo. In the midst of unspeakable physical hardship and cruelty, he composed mystical poetry, including seventeen stanzas of the exquisite “Spiritual Canticle.” John escaped to the convent of the Carmelite nuns in Toledo in August 1578. From that time until his death in 1591, he served primarily in southern Spain, notably at Baeza as rector of the college he founded and prior of the house of Los Martires in Granada. He died at Ubeda in southern Spain on December 14, 1591. He was beatified on January 25, 1675, canonized on December 26, 1726, and declared a doctor of the church on August 24, 1926.

Compassion is the word that best expresses the holiness of John of the Cross. He reached out in compassion to persecutors and supporters alike, celebrating his joy in God and his creation in poems that are treasured as the jewel in the crown of Spanish poetry. At the request of nuns to whom he recited the poems, he wrote prose treatises to explain their meaning. An explication of the first two strophes of “On a Dark Night” became the two-volume Ascent of Mount Carmel (1578–1588) and Dark Night of the Soul (1582–1588). The “Spiritual Canticle” and “Living Flame of Love” were the inspiration for treatises of the same names, the first dating from 1578 to 1588, the second from 1585. The Ascent and Dark Night concentrate on the process of purging the soul of attachments that develop through the five exterior senses, the inner senses of imagination and fancy, and the faculties of understanding, memory, and will, which constitute the spirit. When the soul is aware of guiding the purgation, the process is active; when detachment occurs without direction from the soul, it is passive. The scheme of purgation covers the active night of the senses in Ascent of Mount Carmel, Book I; the passive night of the senses in Dark Night of the Soul, Book I; the active night of the spirit in Ascent of Mount Carmel, Books II and III; and the passive night of the spirit in Dark Night of the Soul, Book II.

John describes two kinds of union between God and soul: substantial union, by which the soul is united by nature, and transforming or mystical union, wherein the soul’s will is conformed to God’s and the soul itself is made like God. The Ascent and Dark Night are maps of the journey to this marriage of wills. In the active night of the senses, the soul endeavors to rid itself of desires that come through the senses, while in the passive night of the senses God continues the purgation in terms of the seven spiritual imperfections. During the passive night of the senses, the soul feels absent from God and devoid of rewards from prayer and devotion. In the active night of the spirit, the soul labors to rid the three higher faculties of attachments. When the support of all specific understandings is removed and the soul is hung in darkness and confusion, the primary awareness is of suffering.

This suffering is epistemological; in the death of knowledge about God and the consequent pain of feeling abandoned, the soul knows God. The darkness of the night of faith is the light of love. In the “Spiritual Canticle” and “Living Flame of Love,” John suggests the nature of divine love, now through the imagery of spiritual betrothal and marriage, now in the transforming power of fire. In the crucible of his love for God, John mixed the ingredients of his poetic and theological talents, his compassion for all of God’s creation, and his desire to love God immediately and unreservedly.

John the Almsgiver

(c. 550–616/619 C.E.)

Christian bishop

John the Almsgiver, a seventh-century patriarch of Alexandria, serves as a remarkable example of the constant cross-fertilization of more spiritual forms of Christianity from East to West throughout the Middle Ages. Typical of Byzantine holy men of the period, and more unusual among their Western counterparts, John was born to the upper bureaucracy (in about 550) and was married before entering into the religious life. After the loss of his family, he became a cleric, and when he was in his fifties he was made patriarch by an influential relative, Nicetas, who was closely associated with the emperor Heraclius. Thus John could easily be assumed to move comfortably among the masters of a sophisticated, highly organized political power; it is no contradiction, however, that he also conformed very much to type by abandoning his wealth entirely, embracing, by way of a dramatic paradigm, radical poverty.

The perpetual dichotomy in the West between the active and contemplative lives was never so pervasive in the East, and John the Almsgiver is an excellent example of the Orthodox attitude. While serving one of the most contentious and intellectually active bishoprics in the Christian world, he nonetheless was known for his extraordinary practical activism: In addition to personally feeding, it is said, 7,500 poor a day, and founding a good number of hospitals, he also saw to the regulation of weights and measures, subsidized indigent merchants, and worked to alleviate taxes, even those imposed by his benefactor Nicetas. He not only adjudicated quarrels, but once left eucharistic services in the basilica to sit among those enjoying themselves outside, saying, "My children, the shepherd must be with his flock."

It was his practice of flamboyant generosity that so endeared him to the Christian imagination. The thirteenth-century Jacobus de Voragine tells the story of a thief stealing John's silver plate and selling it in the market. The purchaser, knowing its quality, then offered it to the patriarch, who bought it and made it available for the thief to steal once again, which he did. John once again purchased it, telling the thief that he could outlast him at this. The thief, repentant, changed his ways. Such stories gained wide currency and characteristically represent a positive and exemplary view of Eastern Orthodoxy that ran counter to a widespread animosity between Eastern and Western Christians.

Interestingly, John's hospitality so impressed the Western crusaders that he became the patron saint of the Order of St. John of the Hospital in Jerusalem. The Ottomans gave his relics to the Hungarian king Mattais Corvinus in the late fifteenth century, and they were eventually deposited in Bratislava. In the East, his feast is celebrated on the day of his death in about 616, November 11; in the West, on the day of his translation, April 9.

John the Baptist

Proto-Christian prophet, reformer

John the Baptist is mentioned in all four gospels of the New Testament, although only Luke records that John and Jesus were cousins. He plays the role of forerunner to Christ, modeled on Isaiah 40:3, a passage that speaks of a voice calling in the wilderness to make straight the way of the Lord. All four gospels record that John the Baptist baptized Jesus, and all four also indicate that this event signaled the beginning of Jesus' ministry. Recent scholarship has endeavored to explore the social and political background to John's activity as well as its theological meaning.

John the Baptist appeared in the wilderness near the Jordan River baptizing Jews with a baptism of repentance. He adopted the behavior patterns of an Old Testament prophet, wearing clothing made of camel hair and eating wild honey. Like the prophets, his message was one of impending doom that could be avoided if swift action were taken. On this basis he urged people to repent and be baptized (Luke 3:1–14). Mark (1:5) and Luke (3:7) explicitly indicate that great crowds went out to John in the wilderness. Josephus mentions this also. He adds that Herod became fearful of John's influence over the crowds, sensing the potential for popular revolt (Antiquities, 18.118), and ordered John's execution.

The Greek word baptizein, usually translated as "to baptize," means to dip or to immerse. The word can refer to ordinary washing or to a ritual cleansing symbolic of spiritual or moral purification. There were many different types of baptism in Judaism, but several features of John's baptism mark it as distinct from the others. The gospels of Luke (3:3) and Matthew (3:11) refer to John's baptism as a baptism of repentance. It is possible that John, like the ancient prophets, intended to convey the idea that the Temple ritual was not sufficient (Jeremiah 7:4–7). Proselyte baptism (baptism of non-Jews who wished to convert to Judaism) was known in Judaism, and some scholars assert that it was this "baptism of repentance" that John had in mind. In both Matthew 3:9 and Luke 3:8, John the Baptist argues that God can make true Israelites out of stone; that is, having Abraham as an ancestor is not enough. Matthew and especially Luke (3:10–14) add a moral component to this baptism, noting that John exhorted tax collectors, who were notorious for their dishonesty, to stop overcharging, the rich to share their wealth with the poor, and soldiers to stop bullying the people.

In the Gospel of John especially, John the Baptist obeys God no matter the consequences. He recognizes that while he has enjoyed notoriety, his true role is to point to Christ, even declaring that Jesus' fame must increase as his own diminishes (3:27–30). In Christian tradition, John is seen as the harbinger of Christ, a model of humility and faithful obedience.

John the Evangelist

Christian apostle, evangelist

According to the gospels, John the son of Zebedee and Salome, brother to James the Greater, enjoyed one of the closest relationships with Jesus among the disciples. Only Peter, James, and John were invited by Jesus to witness the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:37); the transfiguration of Jesus (Matt. 17:1); and Jesus' difficult moments in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:37). Along with his brother, John was a fisherman in the family business on the Sea of Galilee. Mark and Matthew both place emphasis on the call of Jesus to the brothers, pointing out that they immediately followed, even laying aside their work to do so. In this way, James and John are models of radical obedience.

The synoptic gospels also provide evidence that suggests James and John earned their nickname, "the Sons of Thunder" (Mark 3:17), perhaps signaling explosive tempers and impetuous natures. According to the synoptics (Mark 10:35–45; Matt. 20:20–28), James and John so misunderstood the point of Jesus' ministry that they asked him for positions of power in his kingdom. Luke (9:52–56) relates a story in which James and John asked Jesus to call down fire from heaven to destroy a Samaritan village, only to receive Jesus' rebuke. Yet even in Luke, John seems to earn a place of honor and respect among the disciples (Luke 22:8).

The disciple John is never mentioned by name in the Gospel of John, which instead speaks of "the disciple loved by Jesus" or "the other disciple." The gospel claims to have been written by this disciple (21:20–24). Many see this as a hidden claim that John is the author. Modern scholarship in the main dismisses the claim that John was the author of the gospel. Some scholars believe that the memories of John form the basis of the gospel, however.

The Gospel of John has been called the most theologically complex document in the Bible. It presents Jesus as the one who opens heaven (1:51), who does everything he sees the Father doing (5:19–20), and through whose death and resurrection others can enjoy the love shared by God the Father and Jesus the Son (14:17–23; 17:20–21). In John, Jesus asserts both "the Father and I are one" (10:30) and "the Father is greater than I" (14:28). This complexity led John to be a favorite resource of all sides in the great christological controversies of the early church. John is also credited with writing the book of Revelation.

In Christian art John is often pictured as an eagle, highlighting the notion that among the disciples he peered most deeply and accurately into the heart of Jesus' intentions and mission.

Johnny Appleseed

See Chapman, Jonathon

Johnson, James

(c. 1836–1917 C.E.)

Anglican priest, ascetic

An ascetic West African minister of the Church Missionary Society (CMS), James Johnson was born to Yoruba parents in Benguema, Sierra Leone, in about 1836. He verbally professed the Christian faith, but he did not experience a true personal conversion until he was studying at the Fourah Bay Institution. This experience, which occurred while he was reading the Bible, marked a turning point in his religious life and deepened his commitment to the Christian ministry. He was ordained as a deacon of the CMS Anglican Church in 1863. His eleven-year service at Christ Church, Pandeba Road, Freetown, earned him the sobriquet "Wonderful Johnson" and later, for his religious piety, "Holy Johnson."

Transferred to Lagos, Nigeria, in 1874, he became an outspoken defender of African interests in church and society, helping to form the Lagos Native Pastorate. An ardent preacher and an untiring and at times quixotic missionary, Johnson labored to extend and to strengthen the Yoruba mission of the CMS entrusted to his charge as the superintendent. His admirers saw his consecration as a "half-bishop" of the crisis-ridden Niger Delta Church in 1900 as "a gradual and larger fulfillment of the prophecy and promise that

In spite of his unflinching advocacy for African nationalism, however, Johnson was a man of restraint. He demonstrated this twice in the heat of his ministerial vocation. First, he opposed the schismatic United Native African Church that emerged in 1891 in response to the crisis in the Niger Delta Mission. Second, in 1901, when more than half of his congregation at St. Paul’s Church, Lagos, seceded to form the Bethel African Church because of racial discrimination against him, he refrained from joining them. His understanding of what Christianity should be in Africa may have also been tacitly revealed in his opposition to the prophet movement of Garrick Braide in the Niger Delta. An enigmatic character, Johnson embodied the racial struggles of his age. He died on May 18, 1917.

Johnson, Samuel

Protestant pastor, peacemaker

Samuel Johnson, a patriot dedicated to the healing of the Yoruba nation, was born in 1846 in Hastings, Sierra Leone. His father was a freed slave from the prominent family of Abiodun, the last great king of Oyo before the prosperous Yoruba kingdom disintegrated in about 1820. Conscious of the former glory of the defunct kingdom, and consequently burdened by the fratricidal wars that were decimating the Yoruba, Johnson devoted his Christian ministerial opportunities to healing the breaches among his people, sometimes putting his own life in jeopardy.

Significantly influenced by Rev. David Hinderer, a Church Missionary Society minister, and trained at the Abeokuta Training Institution, Johnson developed an interest in classical and biblical histories. This interest became for him an inspiration to write the History of the Yorubas. He was ordained in 1886 and became a pastor at Oyo in 1887. Unlike his fellow returnees from Sierra Leone, he saw beyond his elite status and considered it a reproach that the educated elite of Yorubaland were “well acquainted with the history of England and with that of Rome and Greece, but the history of their own country they [knew] nothing whatever!” (Johnson 1921, vii).

Johnson had a self-effacing personality and hardly hinted about his private life in his writings. He believed that the Christian gospel held the key to the restoration of the Yoruba nation and energetically applied his ministerial influence to broker peace among the warring factions. He expressed the hope “that peace should reign universally, with prosperity and advancement, and that the disjointed units should all be once more welded into one under one head from the Niger to the coast as in the happy days of ABIODUN, so dear to our fathers, that clannish spirit disappear, and above all that Christianity should be the principal religion in the land” (ibid., 642). Johnson died in 1901 believing that his people would one day be restored to wholeness.

Jones, Jim

Protestant Christian radical

James Warren Jones, more popularly known as the Reverend Jim Jones, was born in 1931 in Lynn, Indiana, the son of a construction worker. Jones attended college briefly but left to become a Methodist minister. He soon quit that position, however, to form an independent congregation in Indianapolis, the Community Unity. This religious sect, which changed its name in the late 1950s to People’s Temple, won notoriety and a special page in American religious history on November 18, 1978, when Jones and 913 followers committed suicide rather than face what they saw as the satanic persecution of a governmental investigation.

Jim Jones’s church practiced a Pentecostal style of worship and was notable for its era in crossing racial boundaries and demonstrating a deep commitment to social services. Although Jones was white, most of his followers were poor and black. But Jones came increasingly to focus his ministry on creating a haven safe from the interference of what he saw as a violent and evil world. By the 1960s, he was preaching anxiety about a future nuclear war; he saw Indianapolis as under nuclear threat, so moved his congregation to Ukiah, California. Jones was successful there, winning considerable wealth and positive notice for his social vision. Increasingly, though, his claims got broader, including declarations that he could raise people from the dead, and he came to control the lives of his followers more and more.

By 1977, Jim Jones and his People's Temple had attracted media interest, which made Jones decide to move his community yet again, this time to a colony, "Jonestown," which he had established in Guyana, South America, in 1973. Followers flocked to his promised land in Guyana, anticipating a land free of Satan and his attendant evils, most notably racism. But U.S. attention remained focused on Jones and his activities, and in November 1978 Congressman Leo Ryan visited Jonestown to investigate—where he and most of his attendant staff were shot to death. Then, preferring to die rather than let Satan triumph in the community he had created, Jim Jones led his followers in a vast suicide/murder pact. Most of the church members died after drinking Kool-Aid laced with cyanide; some who were unwilling to commit suicide were hunted down and shot by more zealous followers.

Today Jim Jones is most often cited as an example of a cult "gone wrong," of a leader falling into megalomania and preaching a message of hysterical fear. Unfortunately, we do not have Jones's own words to help us understand his life; it is important to note, however, that he won the allegiance of a large body of followers, even to the point of death, who certainly believed that Jones preached a message sent by God.

Joseph

Christian foster-father of Jesus

Joseph, husband of Mary and adoptive parent of Jesus, appeared problematic in the first twelve centuries of Western Christianity. Scant references to him in the gospels, combined with theological dilemmas posed by his marriage to Mary, confined him to a marginal position in religious writing and ritual. As Christian doctrine solidified, theologians crafted for Joseph a saintly identity based on his chastity, protection of Mary and Jesus, and tender parenting of Jesus. By the sixteenth century, devotion to him abounded, and in 1870 he was declared the patron of the Universal Catholic Church.

The gospels of Matthew and Luke trace Jesus' genealogy through Joseph to David and recount Joseph's betrothal to Mary, his distress when he discovers her premarital pregnancy, his reception of angelic guidance, and his leadership on the Holy Family's journeys to Bethlehem and Egypt. Both gospels describe Jesus' conception by the Holy Spirit, yet Luke's reference to Joseph as Jesus' "father" establishes uncertainty about Joseph's role. The absence of references to Joseph in the canonical gospels' accounts of Jesus' later life typically has been interpreted to mean that he died before the beginning of Jesus' ministry. Apocryphal texts such as the second-century Gospel of James and Pseudo-Matthew, from perhaps the fifth century, challenge the canonical narratives by portraying Joseph as an elderly widower, not a virgin, and limit his image of holiness by depicting him as an incompetent father.

Early Christian and medieval writers focused on the significance of Joseph's genealogy; the nature of his relationship with Mary; his role, or lack thereof, as Jesus' parent; and his virtues. The most debated question about Joseph asked whether his marriage to Mary had been genuine, given the suggestion in the gospels that it was perpetually virginal. Twelfth- and thirteenth-century theologians, such as Hugh of St. Victor (1096–1141) and Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274), fully developed the position that a virginal marriage could be a real marriage. By establishing the goodness of Joseph's sexual purity and unconsummated marriage, they prepared the way for increasing interest in Joseph as a saint. Perceptions of Joseph's holiness were limited among the laity, however, by the tendency in art and vernacular plays and poetry to portray him as an aged, incompetent cuckold who was merely a servant to his wife and her son.

Writers after the twelfth century contributed to Joseph's heightening stature by defending his status as Jesus' parent. Some early Christian writers, such as Origen (c. 185–c. 254) and Augustine (354–430), wrote favorably of Joseph's services to Mary and Jesus and asserted Joseph's status as Jesus' nonbiological parent, yet provided no details about his parental role. The Benedictine Rupert of Deutz (c. 1125–1179) and several Franciscan writers of the thirteenth through fifteenth centuries were the first to describe Joseph's fatherhood in detail, contributing decisively to the blossoming of his cult. Focusing on the protection they surmised Joseph provided to Jesus and Mary during their travels, and the masculine authority they believed he must have held over his spouse, they added the new idea that Joseph must have treated the baby Jesus with great tenderness and delighted in nurturing the child. The influential preacher Bernardino of Siena (1380–1444) followed Peter John Olivi (1247/48–1298) and other earlier Franciscans in presenting Joseph as so perfect in his treatment of Jesus and Mary that he should be the chosen intercessor for Christians who prayed to them, and a model for married men and fathers. A few fourteenth-century Servite and Dominican writers also extolled Joseph.

In 1479, Joseph entered the liturgy of the church with his own feast day (March 19). By the early sixteenth century, a new generation of Franciscan writers had composed sermons on Joseph or hagiographical attestations to his exalted sanctity, which they almost equated with that of Jesus and Mary. Relics such as his betrothal ring and stockings attracted pilgrims. By the mid-1500s, laypeople influenced by Franciscans and Carmelites had established religious societies in Joseph's name, dedicated churches in his honor, and begun more frequent use of his name as a Christian baptismal name, which was nearly unknown before 1500. The early modern centuries saw the global spread of devotion to Joseph. He is the patron of a good death and of families, virgins, and workers.

Joseph of Arimathea

Christian follower of Jesus

According to Matthew 27:57–60, Mark 15:43, Luke 23:50–52, and John 19:38–42, Joseph of Arimathea was a rich but secret follower of Christ. After the crucifixion, he persuaded Pontius Pilate to give him Christ's body, which he and his friend Nicodemus carefully buried.

According to the widespread fourth-century apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, Joseph was imprisoned by the Jews for burying Christ but miraculously released and hidden by Christ himself until the Jews' anger had calmed. Then Joseph and his son Josephes were baptized as Christians. Joseph helped John protect Christ's mother, Mary, until her death. According to Eastern tradition, he became a bishop in Lydda. His feast is celebrated in the East on July 31, and in the West on March 17.

According to later medieval Western traditions, Joseph accompanied the apostle Philip into Gaul. From there he went to Britain, where, in 63 C.E., he founded Glastonbury Abbey in Somerset. His presence and burial there established Glastonbury's claim to be the oldest continually operating church in the West.

Joseph's connection with the Holy Grail, the name given to the chalice used by Christ at the Last Supper, first appears in French Arthurian romances of the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. The Grail is guarded by generations of Joseph's descendants down to Galahad. Versions of this tale survive in Middle English, Portuguese, and Castilian as well as French.

According to late medieval Glastonbury legends, Joseph also brought two cruets with blood and water from Christ's side to Glastonbury. The cruets appear on a rood screen in Plymtree, Devon; in stained glass at Langport, Somerset; and in the coat of arms of the last pre-Reformation abbot, Richard Bere. Cornish legends of uncertain date make Joseph the uncle of the Virgin Mary and active in the tin trade, which brought him and the young Jesus to Britain.

The Lyf of Joseph of Arimathia printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1502 includes Joseph's Glastonbury miracles and the first mention of his miraculously flowering staff.

Joseph of Copertino

Roman Catholic friar, mystic

Joseph of Copertino is known as the "Flying Saint" because of his propensity (attested on seventy occasions, according to the proceedings for his canonization) to fall into ecstasy and float in the air. Born Giuseppe Desa in 1603 in the southern Italian village of Copertino, Saint Joseph was subject to ecstatic trances that rendered him unable to work or study. His childhood nickname was Bocca Aperta Gaper. When these fits prevented his admission to religious life, Joseph accepted a place with the Franciscans as a lay stable hand. However, he displayed such devotion that he was granted ordination as a priest despite his near-illiteracy. According to one of the many stories surrounding him, Joseph passed his clerical examination because he had learned, by rote, the answer to one question. The examiner happened to ask him just that question.

After his ordination in 1628, Joseph's life became a continual series of ecstasies, levitations, and manifestations. He so disrupted communal life in his monastery that he was forbidden to participate in singing the daily office or to eat in the refectory. His behavior led to the application of seventeenth-century medicine at its worst, including bleedings, purges, and beatings. It even brought him before the Inquisition in 1638, accused of "pretense of holiness" (affettata santità), a charge of which he was exonerated.

The pious began to make pilgrimages to Joseph's monastery even during his lifetime. His fellow Franciscans came to believe in his manifestations, including miraculous healings, considering them to be special marks of divine favor. He died in 1663 at the monastery in Ossimo; his body is buried in the church.

Joseph's holiness is of a sort alien to the current sentiment, which views holiness as derivable only from preeminent goodness. But this moralistic conception is a modern one. It fails to account for individuals like Joseph, "seized" by the divine despite their lack of any manifest distinction for which they may claim credit. Religious traditions do not hesitate to attribute holiness to such individuals. His biographers do note his virtues: patient endurance in the face of accusation, humility in the face of public acclaim, his insights as a spiritual guide despite his lack of education. But the case of Giuseppe Desa reveals one of the more unfathomable aspects of holiness.

Saint Joseph of Copertino was canonized in 1767. He is the patron saint of pilots, air travelers, astronauts, and students.

Joseph of Volotsk (Volokolamsk)

Russian Orthodox abbot, writer

Joseph of Volotsk, founder of Volokolamsk Monastery and author of spiritual and polemical texts, was famed for his dedication to the ascetic life and involvement in religio-political issues such as the rooting out of heresy. His texts and letters are standard sources for scholars of pre-Petrine Russian religious history. The church was celebrating pan-Russian services in his honor by 1591. Accounts of his life were written by Dosifei Toporkov, Savva Cherny, and possibly Lev Filologue.

Tonsured in 1460 by Pafnutii of Borovsk, a disciple of Sergius of Radonezh, Joseph became superior of the monastery of Borovsk in 1477. In 1479, he left to found a cenobitic community in Volokolamsk. Joseph traveled in disguise to assess the spiritual life of other monasteries before founding his own. In his later years, he became involved in religious and political disputes with Archbishop Gennadius of Novgorod, with Grand Princes Ivan III and Vasili III over heresies in the north and at court, and with a former patron, Prince Fedor Borisovich of Volotsk.

Joseph outlined his monastic precepts and instructions in two texts: "Discourses," and "Testament." Both stress proper deportment of monks, obedience to the traditions of orthodoxy and the monastery, and adherence to customary prayers. He supports his exhortations with references to the church fathers, previous monastic rules, and hagiography. These texts are often referred to as Joseph's long and short "rules." Another of Joseph's well-known texts is "The Enlightener," written to oppose the so-called Novgorodian heresies. Joseph successfully urged the grand prince and the metropolitan of Russia to burn some heretics who were adherents of a few small sects based around Novgorod.

Traditional historiography has associated Joseph with a dispute regarding the right to monastic landholding. Historians linked Joseph to "possessors," those who defended the right of monasteries to hold land and serfs, and his main adversary, Nilus, to "nonpossessors," those who opposed the concept of an estate monastery, and centered this dispute on a 1503 church council. Yet the two men disagreed more on the relative value of communal versus contemplative monasticism than on the appropriateness of both within the Orthodox tradition—their disagreement was concerned with spiritual life rather than communal property. Landholding issues surfaced later in the century as so-called "Josephans" defended the right to land and upheld the authority of church hierarchs.

Joseph is remembered on February 13, September 9, and October 18.

Joy

People throughout the world and time have rarely chosen joy or happiness as a defining characteristic of a holy person. Instead, the dominant view is that the holy person is one who has been tried in a crucible of suffering, marked by endurance rather than happiness. This hagiographical attitude is especially surprising since the written works of holy people in all the world religions have often beautifully expressed a sense of deep joy at union with the divine, often in terms of a mystical wellspring of happiness at the core of their being. The songs of the Tibetan hermit Milarepa (1052–1135), which express joy, and indeed euphoria, at his enlightenment, are particularly splendid examples. Thus joy appears to be a common attribute of holy people—but only a band of saints would be likely to give it high marks on the spectrum of what defines holiness.

The few Christian saints who have won a reputation for happiness or lightness of heart are so rare that hagiographers do not know what to make of them. The norm in the lives of saints is solemnity, or at most evenness of temper. One of the few medieval saints who had a reputation for happiness was Faith (third or early fourth century), who had a posthumous fame for miraculous jokes and pranks. Her hagiographer seems to have been trying to emphasize Faith's "girlishness"—she was martyred at a young age. A parallel case appears much later, that of Kateri Tekakwitha (1656–1680), the first Amerindian to be canonized as a Roman Catholic saint—also a girl, surprising because she was known for her sense of humor despite the ill-usage she endured. The few joyous male saints, such as Philip Neri (1515–1595), who liked to play practical jokes on the Roman clergy, stand out as eccentrics. Again, it is usually necessary to turn to the saint's own words to see the joyousness of their lives.

The sufis of Islam give more credit to joy as a spiritual state, although they rarely describe their holy people in those terms. But the term bast, a state of exalted joy, is prominent in the writings of Islamic mystics. It also appears sometimes in descriptions of mystics. A notable dividing point from Christianity is that for sufis Jesus is "the joyful prophet," noted for his frequent laughter and happiness, while the Christian New Testament describes Jesus weeping, but never laughing.

Various holy people have added "joyful" elements to worship, such as dance and music. The goal seems rarely to have been just giving joy to followers, however, at least in the eyes of the nonholy people, who describe the process in terms of teaching, separation from the mundane, and the like. The greatest exception to this rule is the extraordinary Ba'al Shem Tov (1698/1700–1760), the founder of Hasidic Judaism, who emphasized the worship of God with joy, with song and dance, and above all with a positive attitude toward the world.

Perhaps that is the key to the problem. For ordinary practitioners of most religions, worship is a solemn matter—the divine seems distant, the world is nearby and tempting but is recognized as a bar to spiritual advancement. It is only the spiritually adept, the holy people, who can regard the divine without an edge of fear, and who can indulge in pleasure without fear of sin.

Juan Diego

Roman Catholic visionary

Juan Diego is a comforting figure for the indigenous people of Mexico. He inspires their faith and veneration more than any other spiritual figure; indeed, veneration of Juan Diego has extended throughout the world. Since his birth as a royal Aztec prince in the Mexican town of Cuautitlán in 1474, he seemed predestined to holiness. His Aztec name, Cuahtlatotzín, means "the lord who speaks like an eagle." Along with his wife, he was among the first indigenous people to be baptized in 1524 after the Spanish conquest. He believed in Jesus Christ and converted to Christianity of his own free will, and he was said to be a kind and humble person. The Spaniards gave him the name Juan Diego during the evangelization process of Mexico.

On December 9, 1531, Juan Diego was on his way to attend daily mass when he saw an apparition of an attractive and celestial lady surrounded by a heavenly ray of light at the top of a hill called Tepeyac. She claimed to be the holy mother of God and spoke to him in his native Nahuatl language about her love for the people of Mexico. She commanded him to go to the local bishop, Juan de Zumárraga, and order him to build a temple at the top of the Tepeyac. Juan Diego notified the bishop about the lady's request, but the bishop initially rejected his story and asked Juan Diego for a sign to confirm that she had indeed appeared to him.

When Juan Diego stopped to visit his uncle, Juan Bernardino, he was dismayed to find him very sick with a deadly fever and set out early the next morning for Mexico City to seek medical help for him. Once again, the miraculous lady appeared to him. The humble man relayed the bishop's request for proof of her visitation, and the lady instructed Juan Diego to gather Castilian roses from the ice-covered, rocky terrain and present them to the bishop. The lady also reassured Juan Diego that his uncle had been cured of his illness. Juan Diego returned to the local authorities and opened his tilma (a traditional Aztec cloak) before the bishop and other local authorities, whereupon dozens of fresh and beautiful roses fell to the floor. Everyone was amazed to see the miraculous image of the mother of God imprinted on the cloak. As requested by the Virgin, a basilica to honor her was built in what is now Mexico City. Many Mexicans consider this site the holiest place in North America. The Virgin, now known by the name of Our Lady of Guadalupe, is usually depicted like the Indians who are native to the region. Juan Diego's tilma remains undamaged and is displayed behind the main altar of the basilica.

Juan Diego died in 1548. He has been credited with hundreds of posthumous miracles, including the healing of a young Mexican student who had suffered massive head injuries. Juan Diego was beatified in the seventeenth century and canonized by Pope John Paul II in July 2002. He is considered the holiest and purest figure of indigenous ancestry in Mexico, and reports of miracles inexplicable to science that are attributed to his intercession continue to this day. Juan Diego is remembered and venerated in Mexico on December 12 each year, the day that commemorates the apparitions of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Judah Halevi

See Halevi, Judah

Judah ha-Nasi

(c. 200 C.E.)

Jewish rabbi, leader

Judah ha-Nasi, the leading rabbinic sage of his generation around 200 C.E., was known in later tradition as Rabbi or Rabbenu ha-Kadosh (Our Holy Rabbi). Nasi (patriarch, prince) is a title indicating that he was the hereditary first among equals of the rabbis in the land of Israel and also political leader of the Jews, appointed by and answerable to the authorities of the Roman Empire. Combining those two roles, Judah represented “Torah and [worldly] greatness in one place,” according to the Babylonian Talmud ([BT], Gittin 59a, Sanhedrin 36a), the first Jewish leader since Moses to have accomplished that feat. A man of wealth and learning, supposedly on terms of intimate friendship with the Roman emperor himself (BT, Shabbat 119a, Avoda Zara 10ab; Jerusalem Talmud, Shevi’it 6:136d, Megilla 1:11, 72b, 3:2, 74a), Judah presided over the Jews’ political and economic recovery from the devastation of repeated wars against Rome and advanced the nascent rabbinic tradition at a key point in its early development.

Despite his epithet, Judah’s “holiness” was not reflected in charismatic healings, rainmaking, or the like. Rather, his greatest contribution to the Jewish tradition was the Mishnah, a massive collection of rabbinic teachings that was compiled under his leadership and that quickly gained acceptance as the central rabbinic text (see Rashi, BT, Bava Metzia 33b). Consisting mostly of legal rulings but not easily usable as an actual code, the Mishnah served instead as a kind of curriculum for the training of rabbinic disciples. Over the next several centuries, rabbinic study of the “oral Torah” took the predominant form of a paragraph-by-paragraph study of this text together with an increasingly complex and sophisticated body of elaboration and exegesis. These further materials eventually crystallized into two still larger bodies of teaching, the Talmuds (Jerusalem, c. 400; Babylonian, sixth century). These, especially the latter, continue to serve as the foundational texts of the rabbinic tradition.

After Judah’s time a certain alienation set in between his heirs in the patriarchate and the collective of rabbinic sages. The “House of the Nasi” increasingly relied on its political stature and its wealth but neglected the rabbinic erudition that had been its earliest distinction. Thus it turned out that Judah's blend of "Torah and greatness" was not preserved. The memory of his own stature as a distinguished leader, however, only grew over time.

Judah Loew ben Bezalel (The Maharal of Prague)

Jewish scholar

One of the most influential postmedieval Jewish thinkers, Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel, the Maharal of Prague, developed a new approach to the Aggadah of the Talmud and had a profound impact on all streams of Judaism. He questioned the educational methods employed in his day and insisted that children must be taught according to their intellectual maturity, with concepts being introduced only when a child is capable of comprehending them. He advocated that religious instruction begin with Torah, then Talmud, moving into more difficult commentaries only as the child is able to understand them. He encouraged group study of the Mishnah to facilitate greater understanding.

His many works include an important treatise on Rashi's commentary on the Torah, volumes on Passover in all its facets, on Torah, and on the development of character, as well as other texts and issues. A respected kabbalist, he was enormously influential in European Jewry, guiding the affairs of prominent communities in sixteenth-century central Europe. Once he was summoned to meet Emperor Rudolph II, but the reason for the meeting remains the subject of speculation.

With an avid interest in science and technology, the Maharal was respected as a learned and pious man by Jew and gentile alike. Unfortunately, he is often most closely associated not with his works of scholarship but with the unsubstantiated legend of the golem, a creature with a body fashioned from clay and reputedly transformed by the Maharal into a living being by kabbalistic (mystical) means. The golem was purportedly meant to protect Jews from persecution; its fantastic nature has insured it and its supposed creator a place in Jewish lore.

Judah the Pious

Jewish rabbi, mystic

Judah ben Samuel ha-Hasid, known as Judah the Pious, was the central figure of the Hasidei Ashkenaz movement. Contemporary sources report little about his life. Born around 1150, he lived in Speyer, Germany, spent some time in Regensburg, and then returned to the Rhineland (Speyer, Worms, and Mainz). He died in 1217. He was a mystic, but few of his mystical and esoteric writings have survived. Some of his teachings can be found as quotations in the writings of his disciples and other authors. He practiced extreme humility and even taught that an author should not sign his work, lest his children take pride in their father's accomplishments. This explains why his writings were circulated anonymously; even his disciples did not quote him by name. His most important disciple was Eleazar of Worms, the last major figure in the Hasidei Ashkenaz movement. His most important writings that still exist are in the areas of ethics and theology.

Judah was the primary author of the Sefer Hasidim (Book of the pious), one of the most influential works on ethics and religious practice for Ashkenazi (central and east European) Jewry. Parts of Sefer Hasidim are homiletical and exegetical, commenting on biblical verses and talmudic sayings. The majority of the book is ethical and addresses all aspects of life. It discusses religious concerns such as how to pray, study, and properly observe the commandments and gives advice on seemingly private matters such as how to dress, how to select friends, and which professions are suitable for a pietist. Its stance is one of uncompromising adherence to the observance of the commandments and the whole realm of religious ethics. No other Hebrew ethical work is so comprehensive in its scope and attention to the details of everyday life. All subsequent authors of ethical works in Ashkenazic culture used the Sefer Hasidim as the basis for their works.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, hagiographic stories about Rabbi Judah the Pious began to circulate. Many of these stories, which attribute magical and miraculous abilities to him that he used to protect the Jewish community, were collected in the Ma'aseh Book (Book of stories).

Judaism and Holy People

Surviving evidence of ancient Middle Eastern religions suggests that early civilizations regarded their gods as both physically and spiritually distant from humankind, though often represented in the material world by a physical object, place, or person. These representatives were considered holy because of their relationship to the gods. Religion was polytheistic, and each region, often each family or tribal group, worshipped its own gods, represented by figures of stone, wood, clay, or metal. In the person of Abraham, ancient Judaism rejected the notion of multiple gods, insisting on one almighty God who cannot be physically contained or represented. However, Judaism retained the idea that places, objects, and persons could be dedicated to God's service and therefore considered holy, set apart for a divine purpose (Heb.: kadosh, "holy;" pl. kedoshim; the noun form, kodesh, means "separation" or the state of being set apart). Scripture refers to God's holy temple and the holy priests who serve therein, the holy Ark of the Covenant, and, of course, the holy land of Israel.

Over time, kadosh came to refer less to the physical separation between God and humankind than to the spiritual gap between human striving and divine perfection. Eventually, these two ideas were held concurrently, suggesting that God and God's holiness could be approached through the performance of ritual action coupled with ethical behavior. In modern times, this entails the performance of mitzvot (acts of righteousness) and observance of halachah (Jewish law). Modern Torah-observant Jews also consider that God, the Holy One of Israel, requires certain practices, though other Jews may place varying emphasis on the ritual and ethical aspects of those requirements.

The definition of "Judaism" is subject to disagreement. The term "Jewish" can refer to religion, culture, historical civilization, ethical principles, ethnic identity, political stance, or combinations of these. Even within the categories, groups disagree about who is a Jew. Halachic Jews regard as Jewish those whose mother is Jewish; more recently, others recognize as Jewish anyone with at least one Jewish parent of either sex. Further, groups disagree about conversion requirements, so one congregation's Jew may be another's non-Jew.

The term "Judaism" derives from Judah, one of the patriarch Jacob's twelve sons whose name was given to the southern kingdom during the divided monarchy (Israel was the northern). However, to understand Jewish concepts of holiness, one must go back to the patriarch Abraham. Genesis explains God's dealings with humankind in the narratives of Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, Noah and the flood, and others, but Abraham is considered the first Hebrew because he listened to the voice of God and traveled to Canaan, physically setting himself apart from his polytheistic neighbors and his former life in Haran to serve God. Abraham trusted God's promise to give him another son even in his old age, to create from him a nation set apart for God's purpose. Ishmael was Abraham's first son, born to Hagar, the servant of Sarah, Abraham's wife. But it is Sarah's son Isaac who passes on the Hebrew lineage. Isaac fathered twin sons; Jacob, the younger twin, produced twelve sons. One of the twelve, Joseph, was sold into slavery but rose to power in Egypt. As the result of famine, his brothers came to Egypt to buy food, met and reconciled with their brother, then moved from Canaan to settle in Egypt, in the land of Goshen. Following Joseph's death, the Hebrews multiplied and were enslaved by the pharaoh of Egypt, who feared their strength. Because the people of the one God dwelt among polytheists and were forced to serve them, the defining moment for Judaism was the Exodus, that moment when God delivered them from the nonbelievers, remembered the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and gave to them the Torah.

The Torah (in the narrowest sense of the word, the five Books of Moses given to the people at Sinai), the holy book of Judaism, contains the history of the Hebrews and their relationship to God in addition to God's commandments concerning a holy life. Because of this, it is the most sacred object in Jewish ritual. Torah scrolls are handwritten by a trained scribe, wrapped around wooden rollers, covered with a mantle of embroidered cloth, and decorated with a silver breastplate. The text must be perfect; any two errors render it unsuitable for public reading. Traditionally, a portion of the Torah is read aloud during the synagogue service each Sabbath so that the entire text is read within the span of each Jewish year. Simchat Torah (The joyfulness of the Torah), the day marking the end of one reading cycle, also marks the beginning of the next: One can never consider oneself finished reading the Torah or no longer in need of its instruction in holy living, for the moment Deuteronomy is finished, the reading returns to Genesis. Orthodox Jews believe that God gave the Torah in its present form to Moses at Sinai; others (both Jews and non-Jews) subscribe rather to the hypothesis that the text was compiled and edited over a long period of time until it reached its final written form.

Traditional Jewish ideas concerning holiness begin with the Torah, which is variously translated as the Teaching, the Path, or the Way. However, the five Books of Moses are not the whole of the scriptures, which also include the Prophets (Nevi'im) and the Writings (Ketuv'im). These are arranged differently than in what Christians call the Old Testament, but many of the same books are included. In a broader sense, Torah can refer not only to the five Books of Moses but also to a much wider body of teachings concerning a holy life lived according to Jewish law, especially the rabbinic law, commentaries, and interpretations known as the oral Torah, which includes the Talmud, the Gemorah, and the Midrash.

The importance of these texts to religious Judaism cannot be overestimated as they explain what is necessary to live a holy life pleasing to God. Chosen to receive the Torah, Jews were charged to conceive of themselves as a holy people, a nation of priests, set apart by God for a specific purpose and belonging to him in a special way. Holiness, therefore, is at the center of what it means to be a Torah-observant Jew. Designated for a special purpose, Jews are expected to live according to the teachings. According to the Torah, Jews are called to be holy because God is holy (Lev. 11:44–45); it is their responsibility to show forth God's holy presence in the world. Further, because they are God's chosen people, Jews traditionally consider themselves charged with protecting the sanctity of God's name.

To sanctify "the Name," kiddush Hashem, means to behave honorably so that people recognize God's greatness through the righteous conduct of God's people. To behave in a manner that brings disrepute or shame upon the individual Jew also brings shame upon the Jewish people and causes chilul Hashem, the profanation of "the Name." This acute sense of Jewish responsibility for the sanctity of God's name explains the centrality of the Torah in the broader sense, for the Torah demonstrates what holiness is and how it may be achieved. Judaism recognizes that human beings can never attain perfection, can never observe all 613 Torah commandments, but their calling is continually to strive. Some observant Jews are so careful about the use of God's name that they substitute the Hebrew Hashem, "the Name," for the name of God, or write the English word without the vowel (G-d) in order to avoid the destruction or use of God's name in vain. Yet holiness is not only a matter of following the commandments to the letter. The Torah itself and later writings make clear that the spirit in which any activity is undertaken can render it holy or profane; one may perform a mundane task in the spirit of kiddush Hashem, or perform a religious practice in such a way as to cause chilul Hashem.

In the Talmud, Rabbi Simlai outlines the ethical principles that underlie the teachings found in the Torah, summarizing them in this way: 613 commandments were revealed to Moses at Sinai; King David summed up the 613 commandments in eleven ethical principles as he described who may dwell in God's holy mountain, that is, who is set apart to be like God. These eleven principles are: They live without blame, do righteous acts, speak the truth in their hearts, speak no deceit, do no harm to their fellows, bear no reproach, find a contemptible person abhorrent, honor those who fear the Lord, stand by their oath even when it is to their disadvantage, never lend money for interest, and never accept a bribe against the innocent (Ps. 15). The rabbi goes on to show how Isaiah summarized the 613 commandments in six principles. That is, holy persons walk in righteousness, speak honestly, spurn profit from fraudulent dealings, refuse bribes, do not listen to malicious words, and shut their eyes against looking at evil. Micah further distills the commandments, saying that the Lord requires only that people behave justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God (Mic. 6:8). Finally, Rabbi Simlai says, Habakkuk based them all on one principle: The righteous shall live by faith (Hab. 2:4) (Babylonian Talmud, Makkot 23b–24a). Faith leads to right action, and right action strengthens faith as it strengthens the relationship of Jews with God through observance of the commandments. The performance of a mitzvah (pl. mitzvot) is not separate from faith, but integral to its expression.

Historically, individual Jews have been considered to exemplify holiness in their lives. Biblical figures such as the patriarchs and matriarchs, Moses, Miriam, and others were called by God and given a specific task or position; they were set apart to perform the work God had for them and are credited in scripture with being responsive to that calling. Others serve God in specific religious offices, such as the Cohanim and Levi'im (priests and Levites), who performed certain tasks in the Temple and still retain specific rights and responsibilities within the community by virtue of their being set apart for such service.

Judaism highly values and encourages extensive study; those teachers and scholars who are dedicated to Torah study and who seek to exemplify the life they find described therein are also considered holy. Sages from the rabbinic period in the first and second centuries B.C.E., such as Akiba ben Joseph, Ishmael ben Elisha, Hillel, and others, were holy because they had a deep understanding of the Torah that they strove to embody in their daily lives. Many of these persons, as well as tzaddiqim (righteous ones) from the medieval and modern periods, were threatened with violence, some martyred, because of their faith and practice. Rabbis such as Amnon of Mainz (c. tenth century) risked their lives by observing the Torah and teaching others to do the same. Regardless of their personal safety, they continued to teach the Torah to students, to write commentaries, to adjudicate disputes, to encourage communities faced with persecution, and to live their own lives according to the Law as a tangible example of what the Torah means. Among the best known of these are Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides) (1135/1138–1204), Moses ben Nahman (Nahmanides) (1194–1270), and Solomon ben Issac of Troyes (Rashi) (1040–1105). As in any tradition, reformers rose to preserve or promote those things they perceived as most important. These include figures such as Rabbi Israel ben Eliezer (the Ba'al Shem Tov, or Besht) (1698/1700–1760), founder of Hasidism, and Abraham Heschel (1907–1972), a professor of Jewish ethics and mysticism whose profound learning, social justice activities, and abiding concern for Judaism and Jews would make him an extraordinary figure in any age.

Judaism recognizes that all human beings, even tzaddiqim, make mistakes; even holiness, because it here describes human beings, can be flawed. Judaism therefore provides observances to remind both the individual and the community of their calling to a holy life. Rosh Hashanah (New Year) and Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement) exemplify the relationship between ritual and holiness in Jewish thought. Rosh Hashanah is considered one of the most solemn days in the Jewish calendar: The first day of the new year signals a ten-day period of reflection and repentance. The shofar, ram's horn, calls the faithful to repent of their sins and to return to God; they are to account for their use of God's gifts during the past year and to ask forgiveness from God and from any they may have wronged, as Judaism holds that only the wronged party may forgive. On Yom Kippur, observant Jews fast and pray, reciting the traditional catalog of sins and asking God's forgiveness. The evening service in the synagogue is introduced by the Kol Nidre, a legal formula chanted by the cantor asking God to forgive and annul unfulfilled vows made to him. The service ends with the sevenfold proclamation of God's unity and the sounding of the shofar to signal the end of the fast and the acceptance of repentance. These observances remind Jews of their calling to live a Torah-observant life, to be holy persons individually, and to be a holy people communally.

Part of what it means to be holy is actively to participate in tikkun olam, healing or perfecting the world. Human beings are called to work in partnership with God to create the best possible world. In this way, people are cocreators with God, in keeping with their creation in God's image (Gen. 1:26). Traditionally, Torah-observant Jews participate in tikkun olam through prayer and meditation; many modern American communities expand the definition to encompass other means to the same end, including but certainly not limited to charity, community service, political activism, and other efforts designed to improve life in this world. Jews who are extraordinarily dedicated to tikkun olam are often considered holy persons, living out the mandate of the Torah in their lives, striving to create a better world.

Within modern Judaism there are widely differing views of the role of the Torah in the experience of individuals, from those who center their lives on the teaching to those who largely ignore it. Within traditions, within communities, within families, individuals may have significantly different beliefs. Almost inescapably, these beliefs about the Torah and its precepts shape their ideas about holiness. Among the most orthodox of Jews there is the belief that the purpose of life is Torah study, free from distraction; they maintain that only total separation from secular society can ensure the survival of Judaism and the fulfillment of its calling in the world. Hasidism, founded in early eighteenth-century Europe by the Ba'al Shem Tov, couples Torah study with the joy to be found in serving God, rather than the fear of infraction. Holiness is sought in joyful performance of mitzvot, including Torah study; it is also safeguarded by the separation of Hasidic Jews from secular society, lest assimilation into the broader culture divert them from their obligation to be a holy, redemptive presence in the world.

Orthodox Judaism views the Torah as the direct revelation of divine teaching, rendering it immutable. The commandments, therefore, are central to Jewish life. To be an Orthodox Jew is to be observant: to study the Torah, to perform mitzvot, and to remain committed to the ritual expression of Judaism as a means to personal and communal holiness and kiddush Hashem. Modern Orthodoxy, however, does not insist on the segregation of Jews from the rest of society and encourages its members to acquire the secular education and skills necessary to function in the wider world in addition to traditional Hebrew education. In this way, modern Orthodox Jews protect their traditions through religious education and observance, but also live in and directly affect the non-Jewish world.

The Reform movement in Judaism began in Germany in the mid-nineteenth century as a response to Enlightenment philosophy. Influenced by scientific discovery and higher criticism, the Reform movement rejected direct divine revelation as the source of the Torah in favor of divinely inspired human authorship. In its early years, Reformists viewed the commandments as instructional and inspirational but nonbinding. Ritual practices were considered less important than ethical behavior, and the liturgy was streamlined and modernized by substituting the vernacular for the Hebrew. In recent years, Reform Judaism has increased the use of Hebrew in services and has reintroduced a number of customs and practices omitted by earlier generations of Reform Jews. Further, the connection between ethics and ritual has been rediscovered, enriching both and leading to an understanding of holiness that seeks to understand that symbiosis.

The Conservative movement grew out of the Reform movement; originally, Conservative Jews felt that early Reform Jews had abandoned too many fundamental Jewish practices. The Conservative movement positions itself as a middle way between Reform and Orthodox Judaism, insisting on the divinity and centrality of the Torah, but recognizing that the world, and with it Judaism, has evolved, necessitating changes in Jewish practice and belief. Although Conservative Judaism believes there is room within the Torah for interpretations and applications that will make it relevant to each generation while retaining the integrity of its vision, like Orthodoxy it stresses the observance of ethical and ritual commandments as the means to holiness.

First articulated by Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan in the early 1920s in the United States, the Reconstructionist movement rejects the idea of a supernatural God and asserts that Judaism is not only a religion, but an evolving civilization. Further, Reconstructionism welcomes many of the newer movements within Jewish spirituality such as feminism, environmentalism, and others, making it suspect to more traditional Jews. Lastly, secular Judaism includes Jews who do not consider themselves religious but continue to self-identify as Jews, whether ethnically, culturally, ethically, or politically. Here, the issue of holiness is vexed, as secular Jews by definition reject the divine source of the Torah and with it the idea that Jews are set apart by God. Yet secular Jews have long held that ethnic Jewish identity is closely connected with social justice movements such as socialism, civil rights, and national self-determination movements like Zionism; rejecting the Torah as divine does not necessitate rejecting the ethical principles it contains, though secular Jews might balk at referring to persons who live according to such principles as holy, per se.

Judaism views holiness as something attained through practice, but diversity of practice makes it difficult to reduce Jewish ideas of holiness to one coherent explanation. What is constant across traditions, however, is that holiness has to do with the way one lives one's life in this world, not necessarily with what one believes. Whether viewed as mitzvot required by the Torah or as acts of social justice or even as simple good deeds, actions are the source of and key to holiness in Jewish tradition.

Judge

Hebrew leader

The term judge (Heb.: shophet) in the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament) refers to a temporary leader of Israel who was appointed by God in response to the cries of the people in order to overcome a military threat. In the biblical conception of history, the judges were the leaders of Israel after the people entered the Promised Land but before the institution of the kingship. Although this office did carry judicial and arbitral functions, these were not the primary duties of an Israelite judge.

Judgeship is central to the Book of Judges in the Hebrew Bible. Within the book, a distinction can be made between major judges and minor judges. The major judges are the leaders about whom stories are told. Samson is an example of this kind of judge. The minor judges are remembered only in lists within the book. The Book of Judges is typified by a pattern of sin, repentance, and salvation. The people of Israel engage in some kind of sinful activity to which God responds with punishment and oppression. The judge is appointed by God to rescue the people from the punishment previously levied upon them once he is convinced that they have learned their lesson.

The Book of Judges was compiled much later than the events it purports to describe. These later authors and editors saw the judges as intermediaries between God and humans.

Julia of Carthage

Christian martyr

Julia of Carthage, also known as Julia of Corsica, was the virgin daughter of a Carthaginian nobleman. During Genseric's attack on Carthage in about 489, the young Christian Julia was taken prisoner and sold as a slave. Her new owner, a non-Christian merchant named Eusebius, took her back to his home in Palestine. Although she was obedient to Eusebius and tried to remain cheerful in her dire situation, she refused to give up her faith—even when threatened. Because of her steadfastness, Eusebius did not harm her in any way or force her to renounce Christianity. As she grew older, Julia became more involved in Eusebius's business matters. However, when she wasn't working, Julia devoted herself to prayer.

Julia became such an asset to Eusebius that he took her with him to Gaul on a business trip. En route, his ship stopped in northern Corsica, where a traditional non-Christian festival was being celebrated, and the passengers, with the exception of Julia, disembarked to join the festivities. When the leader of the island, Felix, discovered Julia on board the ship, he asked Eusebius why she was not taking part. He explained her devotion to her faith and his willingness to let her be because she was such a hard worker. Felix offered to buy her from Eusebius, but he was refused—Eusebius valued her service too much. Felix was unwilling to let things be, so he got Eusebius drunk and approached Julia himself. He even offered to buy her freedom if she would simply worship his gods. She refused. He tortured her, but she still remained true to her faith. In a last fit of rage, Felix had her crucified.

One account of Julia's death states that a dove flew out of her mouth as she died; another says that she was surrounded by angels. Monks on the nearby island of Gorgon were divinely informed of her death and recovered her body. King Desiderius of Lombardy moved her relics to Breseia in about 765. Her relics are today in the basilica of Fausta in Carthage. Her feast day is reported variously as July 15, July 16, and May 23, and she is honored in the Russian Orthodox as well as the Roman Catholic Church. An alternate version of her life has her dying a century later, killed by Saracens.

Julian of Norwich

(c. 1343–after 1419 C.E.)

Christian mystic, recluse

Julian of Norwich was a Christian mystic, anchoress, prophet, and spiritual adviser of the late Middle Ages. She was also the first Englishwoman to write a book, yet her own name does not survive. She is known only by the name she took for herself, that of the saint to whose church she attached her anchorage cell, St. Julian in Conisford at Norwich. She was born in approximately 1343, but the exact date of her enclosure in the cell is unknown. It is likewise unknown whether she was ever married. She may have been a nun, or she may have been a widow who turned to the life of a recluse after her husband's death. Nevertheless, she was revered in her lifetime, and many men and women sought her spiritual counsel. Her work, The Revelation(s) of Divine Love, survives in two versions, the Short Text and the Long Text. It is analyzed and admired today for its religiosity, for its literary value, and for the feminism she explores. Julian was among the first Christian religious writers to examine the notion of the motherhood of God.

Julian tells of two experiences that formed the foundation for her Revelation and her theology. According to her account in the Short Text, in May 1373, during a bout of severe illness, a physical condition that often accompanies mystics' experiences, she received a series of sixteen visions. She describes these as her Shewings (Showings). She writes that the visions lasted for twelve hours. It was not until twenty years later that she received what she called inner understanding enabling her to reflect upon and finally fully grasp the meaning of the early visions. She recorded her lengthy examination of them in her Long Text. Although Julian writes that she is a "symple creature unlettred," her work belies this modest disclaimer.

As with many women of the latter Middle Ages, whether she wrote the texts with her own hand or dictated them is open to debate. Yet her writing reveals a woman of considerable intellect. This intellect is demonstrated in her evolving theology, an area of contemplation considered the purview of men. The church forbade women to teach, let alone preach. This rule complicated the female religious' ability to communicate their ideas and avoid charges of heresy. Julian and Margery Kempe (c. 1373–c. 1440), the contemporary mystic and author of her own religious experiences (The Book of Margery Kempe), who visited Julian for spiritual counsel, skirted the boundaries of heterodoxy by interpreting what came to them in visions. Julian insisted that she was a witness rather than a medium.

She rooted her message in the primacy of love and in the concept of God as father and mother, with the emphasis on mother. She expressed this in terms associated with female space, speaking of the soul "knitted" to God with a secure "knot," and of a God who enjoys being father and mother, with a mother's love that is natural and "most loving." Some of her best-known imagery includes the notion of a hazelnut in the palm of her hand, which serves as a lesson in understanding the all-encompassing quality of God's love. Finally, at the end of her Revelation Julian writes that the "meaning is love." Her gentle language and her compassionate message had great appeal to those who came to visit her in her Norwich cell, as well as those who read her work during her lifetime and well beyond.

Although the medieval Church never formally canonized Julian of Norwich, she is honored by both Catholics and Anglicans on her unofficial feast day of May 13.

Juliana of Liège (or of Mont-Cornillon)(c. 1193–1258 C.E.)Christian nun, visionary

Juliana is one of the many thirteenth-century women saints who best might be described as “rebellious.” Often eschewing the mediation of the clergy, she made enemies within her order. Her devotion to the Real Presence of Christ in the bread and wine of the eucharist led to excessive asceticism, mainly fasting, and to a search for a complete mystical union with the divine. As one component of this piety, she advocated the new feast of Corpus Christi, which encouraged a more active veneration of the eucharist through exhibitions of the consecrated host.

Juliana, born around 1193 and orphaned at the age of five, was placed in the small monastic community of Mont-Cornillon near her home of Liège in Belgium. She became a nun there in 1207, and in 1208 she had her first vision, in which Christ instructed her to institute the new feast. Although the vision was repeated over the next twenty years, Juliana kept it a secret. When she finally revealed the vision to her confessor, he relayed it to the bishop, who began to celebrate Corpus Christi. The feast slowly spread to neighboring dioceses and then throughout northern Europe.

Political problems frequently distracted Juliana during those years. Prioress of her convent since 1222, Juliana’s rebelliousness, combined with her rigid definition of virtue and her own unimpeachable character, sometimes created tensions between her and others. The animosity of Roger, supervisor of her convent, forced Juliana to flee from the community to hide in Liège under the protection of her confessor and Bishop Robert de Thorate. The two men helped Juliana in her successful struggle to remove Roger from office and regain her position. The victory was only temporary, however. When Roger regained his position in 1247, Juliana again fled. She took refuge for a while with the beguines at Namur and then moved to Fosses, where she lived out her life as a recluse.

Her efforts produced similarly mixed results after her death in 1258. Although a number of miracles occurred at her intercession and while she was beatified in 1869, she has yet to be formally canonized. Even so, the feast she promoted was adopted into the Catholic liturgical calendar only six years after her death and today is celebrated throughout the world on the second Thursday (in America, the second Sunday) after Pentecost.

Justin Martyr*(d. c. 165 C.E.)Christian philosopher, apologist, martyr*

Justin Martyr was the first Christian thinker to use Greek philosophical categories and terminology in expressing the content of the gospel and attempting to reconcile faith and reason. His two apologies, literary defenses of the faith, describe Christians as moral and socially responsible citizens deserving of justice rather than persecution from the state. He also wrote a Dialogue with Trypho, an account of a debate with a Jewish intellectual on the question of whether Jesus was truly the messiah promised in the Jewish scriptures. Justin is one of the most important sources on the beliefs and practices of second-century Christians.

Little is known of Justin’s early life. He mentions in his writings that he was born at Flavia Neapolis (modern Nablus) in Palestine. His name, and that of his father, Priscus, a non-Christian, suggest that he may have been of Roman descent. As a young man Justin studied Stoicism, Pythagoreanism, Aristotelianism, and Platonism, but he found none of them satisfying. It was then, he says, that he met a mysterious old man who introduced him to Christianity. The account of his spiritual development in Dialogue 2–8 relates that the stranger’s words set his soul “afire.” Following his conversion, Justin made his way to Rome, where he taught until his martyrdom under Rusticus, prefect of Rome from 163 to 167.

For Justin, Christianity was “the only sure and useful philosophy,” a conviction he illustrated by wearing the pallium, or cloak, of a philosopher. He insisted, however, that the ultimate authority in matters of truth was not human reason, as other philosophers believed, but God’s revelation in Christ, whom he identified, following the Gospel of John (1:1–18), as the incarnate word, or logos (divine reason). Although the logos had been partially grasped before the Incarnation—by Plato, for example, in his description of the World Soul (Timaeus 36b)—it was not fully known until it was made flesh in Christ.

A central theme in Justin's thought is the essential harmony of Christianity and philosophy. Building on the Stoic teaching that human reasoning is a participation in the logos, the source of all reason and order in the universe, he argued that Christ is present whenever people engage in rational thought. This was true even before the Incarnation. In the First Apology (46), he wrote that "those who live in accordance with reason are Christians, although they have been considered atheists." For Justin, philosophers such as Socrates and Heraclitus were Christians before Christ.

Despite his interest in building bridges between Christianity and classical culture, Justin was acutely aware of their differences. He maintained the primacy of scripture over all other repositories of wisdom, claiming in the First Apology (44) that truths described by philosophers and poets concerning such matters as the immortality of the soul and retribution after death were derived from Moses and the prophets. He could be critical of philosophy, which he regarded as inaccessible to most people, and he condemned Greek and Roman mythology as the work of demons. Still, by engaging in dialogue with Greco-Roman culture, Justin helped to encourage the widespread acceptance of a faith that in his day was still new and often misunderstood.

K

Kabbalah

Jewish mysticism

Kabbalah (“that which is received,” “tradition”) is a form of Jewish mysticism emerging from the Jewish community in Spain during the thirteenth century. Its great practitioners won wide recognition as holy people for their deep insight into the hidden ways of God. The term has become the collective reference to modern Jewish mystical and esoteric spirituality.

The spiritual tradition and its written expression that became known as the Kabbalah was inspired by a vibrant revitalization of medieval Jewish culture in the study of Talmud, halakhah (the laws), and biblical exegesis. In a flowering of sacred and secular poetry and music, students and teachers of Torah and Talmud in northern Spain and southern France began to engage in theological and theosophical speculation that sought to move beyond the rationalism of pure philosophy and the legalism of contemporary Judaism. Early teachers of the Kabbalah, such as Rabbis Moses ben Nachmanides (1194–1270), Abraham ben David (Ravad) (c. 1125–1198), and particularly the latter’s son, Isaac Sagi Nahor (“the Blind”) (c. 1160–1235), did not wish necessarily to articulate a “new” form of Judaism but rather to unveil the interior, hidden, core truths of Torah that had remained latent because of the rabbinical emphasis upon law and tradition. The term kabbalah meant for its practitioners “tradition” in the sense that they believed they were simply exploring and revealing spiritual wisdom that was part of the chain of unbroken transmission of the oral Torah given to Moses on Mt. Sinai. Early kabbalistic texts, however, such as the anonymous Sefer ha-Bahir (The book of pure light) and the Sefer ha-Zohar (The book of splendor) of Moses de Leon (c. 1240–1305), do present a considerable departure from the accustomed mores and parameters of Jewish spirituality.

The mystic plunges into the depths of the transcendent, acknowledging the ultimately unknowable mystery that is the divine, and yet, with that very apprehension, attempts to span the chasm that separates humanity from its creator. The kabbalists, perhaps in reaction to the rationalism of contemporary philosophy, embraced the concept of a personal God who is, finally, beyond human ken. They did so by asserting the fundamentally “hidden” nature of God. In texts such as the Zohar, the kabbalists referred to that ultimately unknowable aspect of God as Eyn Sof (“without end,” “infinite”), positing an eternal existence about which nothing can be spoken or described. However, there are aspects of God that can be perceived and are intelligible to human cognition: These “aspects” the kabbalists named the Eser Sefirot (the ten numerals), ten emanations from Eyn Sof that, as divine attributes, manifest the divine in human experience. Scripture, the kabbalists insist, must be read symbolically, and in that symbolic reading Torah reveals each of the divine attributes at various moments. Therefore, most of the narrative of Torah, such as the story of Abraham, and all the Hebrew scriptures, in fact, must be understood to be allegories explicating the dimensions of the Sefirot in the world. The Torah must be read not only as historical report, or as moral instruction, but especially as the self-revelation of Eyn Sof.

Over the centuries, the spiritual potency of the Kabbalah, its teaching of the Eyn Sof and its ten Sefirot, and all that that teaching implies about symbolism and allegory and the secreted potential of the unknowable and the unseen in the realization of religious truth, has not waned since its shadowy emergence in medieval Spain. Later kabbalists, such as the enlightened Isaac Luria (1534–1572) of Safed (along with Moses Cordovero [1552–1570], Joseph Karo [1488–1575], and others), fashioned their own interpretations of the mystical constructs of the Kabbalah. Religious movements in modern Judaism, such as the rise of Hasidism in eighteenth-century Ukraine, were clearly inspired by the rich imagery and interior spirituality presented in the Kabbalah. The Kabbalah took on an especial appeal after the tumultuous expulsion of the entire Jewish community from Spain in 1492, when concerns were raised that the faith had become mired in legalism and ritualistic behavior and was thus too weak to withstand hostile forces in the world.

It was not until the twentieth century that such a sense of disoriented dislocation began to fade from Jewish consciousness, but even then, historical events conspired to perpetuate the ideation of diaspora. The spiritual wisdom of the Kabbalah presents the concept of a transcendental Infinite that will never be fully grasped by human cognition, but can be “glimpsed” by a transformed spirituality. Such spirituality must accept the assurance of the kabbalist truth that the Infinite and “real” do not exist in the coarsely material, but abide eternally, layering upon layering, in the recondite depths of existence. All that is, is that much more than it seems.

Kabir

Hindu syncretic devotee

Kabir, the iconoclastic low-caste Hindu devotee of the “Lord Beyond Form,” as he referred to God, is perhaps the best known of the saints of bhakti (devotional Hinduism). His appeal has reached across time and across religious and linguistic boundaries. Quintessentially a preacher, he spared no one in his caustic critique of hypocrisy and of all social and religious hierarchies. In his songs, the religious leaders of his day, both Hindu and Muslim, are castigated for trying to hold on to privileges of caste and distinctions of purity and for focusing on particulars of religious practice and belief rather than on the one God they both worshipped. Kabir ridiculed reliance on holy books, be they the Qur’an or the Vedas, on mosques and temples, and on images or ritual practices of prayer, instead advocating a path of realization of the One who is beyond all distinctions and limited human categories. And he challenged all to look death squarely in the face, abandoning meaningless pursuits and false sources of security in an uncompromising devotion to God.

According to hagiographic accounts, Kabir was born in about 1450 to a very low caste of weavers in Banaras, India, who had converted en masse to Islam. According to legend, he sought initiation into bhakti and, fearing rejection, tricked the great saint Ramanand (1299–1410?) into accepting him as a disciple by lying down on the steps leading to the Ganges River where he knew Ramanand would pass. Tripping over Kabir’s prone body, the startled Ramanand called out “Ram” (a general name for “God”), and Kabir took this to be his guru-given mantra. This story places Kabir in the lineage of this great saint, however historically unlikely their meeting might be.

Other stories of Kabir report the many ways he was tormented and challenged by brahmin priests and Muslim religious leaders, who rankled under his sharp tongue and his flaunting of traditional religious beliefs and practices and were outraged at this low-caste man exercising religious authority. With the encouragement of Kabir’s enemies, King Sikandar Lodi had Kabir thrown into the river in chains to drown, had him bound and left in a burning house, and let loose a mad elephant to crush him, but Kabir was miraculously unharmed, his saintliness confirmed. Kabir chose not to die in Banaras (though those who die there are said to achieve immediate liberation) but instead in the despised city of Magahar. His Hindu disciples wanted to cremate his body, while his Muslim disciples wanted to bury him, but when they pulled away the cloth covering his body, they found only flowers. Even in death, then, Kabir challenged his disciples to transcend their differences and keep their focus on Ram. He died in 1518.

We find early manuscript sources for songs attributed to Kabir not only in the Bijak, which is dedicated exclusively to his works, but also in the sacred scriptures of the Sikhs, the Guru Granth, and in manuscript collections preserved by the later Dadupanth, another sect founded by the saint Dadu, a cotton-carder living in Rajasthan in the latter half of the sixteenth century. A sect devoted to Kabir, called the Kabirpanth, has been established by others who share his low-caste status.

Kaibara Ekiken (Ekken)

Confucian scholar

Kaibara Ekiken is remembered in Japan for his popularization of Confucianism, his extension of Confucian learning into herbological and naturalistic studies, and his critical reflections on Zhu Xi's (1130–1200) teachings. The most famous of his more than 150 works are Kinshiroku bikō (Notes on Reflections on things at hand); Yamato honzō (Medicinal herbs of Japan); Yōjōkun (Precepts for healthy living); Yamato zokkun (Precepts for daily life in Japan); Onna Daigaku (The Great learning for women); and Taigiroku (Record of great doubts). The last is an intense questioning of the Zhu Xi school from the point of view of Luo Qinshun's (1465–1547) monistic cosmology of material force and the rejection of Buddhist and Daoist influences on Confucian thought.

Ekiken was born into a samurai family in 1630. His mother and stepmother died early in his life, however, and he was raised by a townswoman (chōnin) servant in the commercial town of Hakata, outside of the Kuroda clan's domain castle in Fukuoka City, Kyushu, in close contact with other townspeople. His father was also compelled to move to the countryside several times during his childhood. These circumstances, plus his later experience from 1650 to 1657 as a rōnin (masterless samurai), did much to cultivate his dedication to popular edification. In 1657, he was sent to Kyoto to study at domain expense, remaining until 1664. In addition to studying under scholars of the Zhu Xi school such as Kinoshita Jun'an (1621–1698), he was exposed to the trend toward empirical and practical learning that had arisen within the growing commercial economy in the period preceding the Genroku era (1688–1704).

These youthful experiences exerted much influence on Ekiken's style of thought. For instance, he made a special point of listening to what ordinary chōnin had to say and made inquiries about mundane matters even of people of the most lowly station, believing that "there is nothing in the world that is outside of the sphere of principle." He emphasized that questioning and doubting were essential to progress in learning. In Yōjōkun, he compared the life force within human beings to plants and trees continually sprouting forth new life—naturally peaceful, he said, it makes the heart eternally joyful. It can be made to thrive through the dedicated practice of humaneness (equated with filiality), a practice that unites all things together in one body and thus necessarily leads to concern for the hardships and practical needs of other beings. "Nourishing life and [practicing] humaneness are not two different things," he wrote. "Nourishing life belongs to Heaven and humaneness belongs to humans." In addition to humaneness, the presence or absence of a feeling of gratitude for the blessings one has received was Ekiken's criterion for distinguishing the superior person from the petty-minded.

Kalemba Mulumba (Wante) Matthias

Roman Catholic martyr

Kalemba is believed to have been the oldest of the twenty-two Ugandan Catholic martyrs who have contributed to the rich tradition of African saints. Because African cyclic time does not record dates of birth, Kalemba's age at the time of his death in 1886 is unknown. He was estimated to be between thirty and fifty years old at his baptism in 1882. Kalemba's probable birthplace was Bunya, Busoga. A victim of Baganda raids while still young, he became a servant to Magotto, a Ssinga chief (in Mityana). His uprightness earned him adoption by the chief, a name change from Wante to Kalemba, and promotion to supervisor of the chief's household, with the title "Mulumba."

In his search for religious truth, Kalemba inquired about Islam and Anglicanism; eventually, he was won to Roman Catholicism by missionaries who arrived in Uganda in 1879 under the leadership of Père Simeon Lourdel ("Mapera"). Becoming a catechumen on May 31, 1880, Kalemba was baptized on April 30, 1882, by Père Girault. After his conversion, he divorced all his wives except one and undertook manual labor and cooking. He resigned his position among the Ssinga, renounced bribes, looting of cattle, and slavery, and began to earn his living by making pottery and tanning leather. Legends of Kalemba's bravery report that he rescued a baby elephant from its mother's attack and fended off a buffalo with a stick. Two hundred converts in Mityana—including future martyrs Luke Bannabakintu and Noe Mawagali—regularly met at Kalemba's house. Kalemba resolutely embraced Christianity and put his trust in God's deliverance.

Missionaries expelled by King Mutesa I (r. c. 1857–1884) in November 1882 returned in 1885 only to witness persecution against indigenous Christians. King Mwangi's (r. 1884–1897) anger had been ignited by Christian chiefs and others who opposed idolatry, polygamy, debauchery, war, witchcraft, and especially the king's homosexual advances toward Christian pages. Christians, "the praying ones," who had adhered to a "white man's religion," were considered traitors. At the height of Mwangi's fury, Kalemba was arrested on May 26, 1886, and prosecuted for engaging in behavior unacceptable for a chief—including divorcing his wives, cooking for himself, and having an emaciated physique. He suffered a barbaric death in Old Kampala near Nakivubo Stadium. His hands were cut off at the wrists, his arms and legs at the elbows and knees. His flesh was torn and roasted within his sight; his arteries and veins were tied together. For two days, mutilated, writhing in pain, and crying for water, he bled to death, but with a joyous countenance. As he expired on May 30, 1886, he exclaimed "Katonda, Katonda—my God, my God" (Faupel 1984, 177).

Kamalakanta Bhattacharya

Hindu poet

Kamalakanta Bhattacharya is the second-ranking figure after Ramprasad Sen (c. 1718–1775), in chronology as well as talent, of the genre of Hindu devotional poetry to the goddesses Kali and Uma in Bengal. Born in about 1769, he lived in the Burdwan district of what is now West Bengal, after 1809 under the patronage of the zamindars or rajas of the area, who engaged him as temple priest and supported his poetry writing.

As with Ramprasad, little is known about his life, although legends abound: He charmed a gang of murderous thieves by singing to Kali; the goddess appeared to him twice as a low-caste woman whom he did not at first recognize; he turned wine into milk to confound his patron who had accused him of drunkenness; for this lack of faith he cursed his patron's lineage to be without heirs for several generations; he received initiation in esoteric eroto-yogic rituals, which he practiced with his wife; and as he lay dying, the river Ganges miraculously burst from the ground near his bed to bathe him. In comparison with the legends about Ramprasad, Kamalakanta's have more stories of the miraculous and of the poet's own spiritual powers.

Kamalakanta died in 1821. His poetic corpus contains 269 poems to Kali and Uma and a meditation manual called Sadhaka Ranjana. In form and content, Kamalakanta's compositions are very similar to Ramprasad's, although his descriptions of Kali are sweeter and the tone of his poetry less caustic and more petitionary. Kamalakanta's goddess is less unpredictable and unjust—an indication that the softening process begun by the earlier poet had borne fruit by the time of the later one. Kamalakanta does include, however, many more references to the esoteric tantric path. Several of his most interesting poems focus on the lovemaking of the goddess and her consort in the devotee's own body. Another sign of Kamalakanta's originality is his poetry on Uma, which tells a developed story of her life with Shiva and contributes to the growing tradition of devotion to Uma as the daughter who returns once yearly to Bengal for a reunion with her devotees.

Kamalashila

Buddhist monk, scholar

Kamalashila was an Indian Mahayana Buddhist monk-scholar who greatly influenced the early formation of Buddhism in Tibet through his writings on meditation and philosophy. He is thought to have been an abbot at the famous Indian university of Nalanda before being summoned to Tibet. Kamalashila was invited to Tibet during the reign of the religious king Trisong de Tsen (Tib.: khri srong lde btsan, c. 740–798) to carry on the work of his teacher, Shantarakshita. He played a leading role in the establishment of Buddhism there toward the end of the eighth century.

According to Tibetan accounts, Kamalashila's teacher prophesied that he would come to Tibet to settle the factional divisions between Buddhist schools. This is perhaps from a posthumous legend of the famous part he played at the Council of Tibet, or Samye (bsam yas) Debate, in which he advocated a gradualist theory of attaining enlightenment as opposed to the “simultaneist” teachings associated with the late eighteenth-century Chinese Chan meditation master known as Huashang Moheyan. In the literature associated with this debate, Kamalashila advocated a philosophical theory that utilized teachings of mind-only (cittamatra) as a stepping-stone to the Middle Way (Madhyamaka) philosopher’s goal of realizing the lack of essence, or emptiness (shunyata), of all factors of existence, including the mind itself. He indicated that the process in which this realization occurs is through a sequence of discerning scripture and proofs of reasoning in conjunction with study, reflection, and meditative cultivation. Whatever may be the exact historical events that occurred at this debate in Tibet, if the debate occurred at all, Kamalashila’s articulation of a spiritual path demarcated by progressive meditative realization through a unified combination of quiescence of mind (shamatha) and cognitive insight (vipashyana) had a lasting influence on the Buddhism that was to develop in Tibet.

Among his many writings, Kamalashila provided, at the request of King Trisong de Tsen, an outline of the Mahayana Buddhist spiritual path in his three-part Sgom rim thog mtha’ bar gsum (Stages of meditation). The first section indicates the doctrinal principles that an aspirant must train in to reach omniscient buddhahood for the benefit of all beings, such as great compassion and the spirit of enlightenment (bodhicitta) conjoined with study, reflection, and cultivation. The second section explains how to engage in the practice of these principles, and the third section discusses the profound results of buddhahood that arise from the complete actualization of the practice.

Kami

See Shinto and Holy People

Kamikaze of World War II

(d. 1941–1945 C.E.)

Shinto heroes, kami

Kamikaze, literally “divine wind,” is the name given to Japanese pilots during World War II who volunteered to crash their airplanes into American warships. Contemporary Japanese revered these men as god-like heroes, a view that persists, especially among right-wing apologists for Japan’s role in the war. The term is actually a contraction of Kamikaze (or Shinpû) Tokubetsu Kôgekитай, “The Divine Wind Special Attack Corps,” which in Japan is usually contracted to “Special Attack Corps” (Tokkôtai).

The term “Divine Wind” originally referred to the typhoons that wrecked Mongol fleets attempting to invade Japan in the late thirteenth century. In modern Japan, suicidal attacks were first popularized after the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905), when a Japanese army officer wrote a novel glorifying one example. Later, weapons the Japanese used at Pearl Harbor included miniature submarines that could not have been expected to return safely. The systematic use of suicidal tactics, however, appeared only in October 1944, when the Japanese, suffering repeated defeats, in desperation dispatched five navy pilots to their death in the Philippines. Subsequently, the practice grew and was adopted by the army. Typically, young men were given limited flight training, placed in airplanes loaded with bombs, and instructed to crash into American ships. Other suicidal weapons were also devised.

Japan’s military had no trouble finding enthusiastic volunteers for these missions. They included the elite of Japanese youth, many having been drafted out of universities. Estimates of their number range from approximately 2,000 to 5,000. In modern Japan, until the end of World War II all Japanese killed in action were enshrined as kami (Shinto deities) at Tokyo’s Yasukuni Shrine, established in 1869 by the Japanese government, but the purity of their sacrifice made kamikaze pilots seem particularly holy. After the war, their last writings were published to demonstrate the folly of militarism. These works found a wide audience of readers who admired the kamikaze without necessarily supporting their cause. Today, museums at Yasukuni Shrine and Japan’s naval academy continue to glorify them.

Kanakadasa

Hindu singer-saint, poet

Kanakadasa, a much-revered Hindu singer-saint and poet from the Kuruba shepherd clan, lived during the height of the Vijayanagara Empire in the 1500s. He composed many songs in the Kannada language, and other compositions in Sanskrit. His lower-caste birth status did not hold him back from becoming one of the great singer-saints and poets of southern India. The story of his dramatic conversion experience on a battlefield and the impressive power of his devotion live on in southern India today, as do many of his songs.

In Bada near Dharwad, in what is now Karnataka State, Kanakadasa was born to Bacchama, the wife of Birappa, a feudal chief and revenue collector of a village of herders and hunters. Birappa was the local revenue collector for the Vijayanagara ruler. The pious Kuruba couple prayed to Lord Venkateshvara at the sacred mountaintop pilgrimage shrine Tirupati for a child. When their prayers were answered and a baby was born to them, after twelve days they performed the naming ceremony and put him in the cradle, calling him Timmappa. An energetic child, he grew up enjoying an active boyhood. As a young man in Tirupati, Timmappa came into contact with the saintly teacher Tatacharya, who initiated him into Vishnu devotion.

Timmappa once discovered a treasure while digging a well. He thus came to be known as Kanaka Nayaka, "Golden Chief." Timmappa built a temple in the village of Kaginele (in what is now north Karnataka) to house the image of Lord Adikeshava, a form of Krishna, which he brought from a tumbledown temple in nearby Bada. As a young man, he lived an active life in pursuit of prosperity. Taking over his father's duties, he sometimes went to Hampi in an official capacity as revenue collector. There he heard the Vaishnava guru Vyasaraaya.

Stories of Kanaka's life relate how he repeatedly dreamed of Lord Krishna. Each time, the holy presence, before vanishing, requested him to become his servant. Each time, Kanaka said he did not yet want to renounce the world. Then, during a conflict with a neighboring kingdom, Kanaka Nayaka was wounded. Left for dead, after hours of lying unconscious he recovered awareness. A dark form asked "Are you ready? Will you become my servant now? I saved you from death, you're supposed to be my servant. We have a special relationship. In past lives you were my servant, and you took this birth to serve me too. . . . If with my touch I heal your wounds will you believe and serve me?"

Kanaka agreed and found that he was undamaged by the fray. Revived and enthused, Kanaka ran to the temple, but found it locked. He looked up and realized it was the middle of the night. In his intense mood of spiritual desire he pounded his head against the gate and wept at being kept out: "Open the gate, allow me to serve you, O Lord. Why can't you hear my pleas? When . . . when . . . why not now?" With this song the gate opened, bells rang, and worship flames waved before the sacred image. Kanaka Nayaka wept to see this vision of divine radiance.

He next went to the guru Vyasaraaya. Despite the fact that he was of the shepherd caste and such people were normally not given initiation by royal gurus, Kanaka asked the sage for a mantra. The guru Vyasaraaya, knowing nothing of Kanaka's vision, surrounded by high-caste devotees, impatiently told him: "You can have a mantra—repeat: 'Water buffalo, water buffalo. . .'" Kanaka innocently took the highborn guru's word as a literal instruction and went off to recite his "buffalo mantra" religiously. His faith was such that he was able to move a big boulder blocking a spring. When Vyasaraaya saw this, he gave Kanaka a real initiation, welcoming him into the community of devotees.

The most famous legend about Kanaka recounts how as a low-caste man he could not enter the Krishna temple at Udipi in southwestern Karnataka. He gazed through a hole in the wall with devotion so intense that he provoked the eastward-facing image of Krishna to face west where Kanaka stood.

Besides composing many songs, Kanakadasa wrote four poetic works: Mohana Tarangini (The river waves of enchanting Krishna); Ramadhyaana Caritra (The story of the grain blessed by Rama); Nala Charitra, on the theme of suffering for a worthy cause; and Hari Bhakti Sara, one hundred devotional verses to Krishna. Kanaka lived to the age of ninety-eight. The Haridasas believed that Kanakadasa was the reincarnation of the sage Vidura, whose story is told in the Mahabharata epic.

Kanji Swami

Jain teacher, mystic

Kanji Swami was a Jain teacher and founder of the Kanji Swami Panth, an important Jain mystical movement claiming to represent an authentic revival of Jainism in the tradition of the mystical philosopher Kundakunda (c. second and third centuries). Kanji Swami was born in 1889 in the Gujarat region of northern India into a family of Sthanakvasi Jains (an aniconic subsect of Shvetambaras in which monks wear white robes and facedcloths). He took initiation as a Sthanakvasi monk but became disillusioned with ritualism and increasingly impressed by the mystical philosophy of the Digambara sect (whose monks practice ascetic nudity). Kanji Swami discovered the works of the Digambara philosopher Todarmal (1719–1766), but his main influence was Kundakunda's Samayasara (Essence of the doctrine). This became the key to Kanji Swami's reading of Shvetambara scriptures.

Another major influence was Shrimad Rajcandra (1867–1901), whose teachings integrated Digambara and Shvetambara elements. Kanji Swami first tried to incorporate Digambara mystical teachings into his sermons, living as a Sthanakvasi monk but considering himself a spiritual Digambara. In 1934, on the occasion of Mahavira's (trad. 599–527 B.C.E.) birthday, he threw away his Sthanakvasi facecloth and proclaimed himself a Digambara layman (although he remained celibate throughout his life). The site of this proclamation, the small town of Songadh in the northern Indian state of Gujarat, near the Jain holy mountain Shatrunjaya, is now a major center of the Kanji Swami Panth.

Kanji Swami de-emphasized succession of disciples and ascetic initiation, favoring instead direct mystical apprehension of the soul and right knowledge; this reverses the usual Jain priority. The Kanji Swami Panth has no monks, although its founder maintained respect for initiated renunciants. Kanji Swami claimed to be a restorer of the Jain doctrine, merely repeating the eternal truth that others proclaimed before him. He wrote no books, but his charismatic preaching is available on cassette tapes.

Kanji Swami claimed to have been in the presence of an omniscient Jain sage, Simandhara Swami, in a past life and in another realm. It is there that he personally heard the true Jain teachings imparted to Kundakunda. He and his followers thus claim the authority of direct revelation, if not full omniscience, for Kanji Swami. He died in 1980. Many of his followers believe that in his next birth he will be an omniscient sage, a claim disputed by many Jains. The Kanji Swami Panth is controversial, but it is growing, especially outside India, for example, in East Africa. Kanji Swami himself made a missionary trip to Mombasa, Kenya. In recent years there has been a convergence of the Kanji Swami Panth and the Shrimad Rajcandra movement, part of a trend toward a more ecumenical and less sectarian Jainism among educated, mobile Jains living overseas.

Karmapa Reincarnation Lineage

(1110 C.E.–present)

Tibetan Buddhist lineage

The Gyalwa Karmapas are the spiritual leaders of the Karma subschool of the Kagyu lineage, one of the four major branches of Buddhism from Tibet. The Karma Kagyu lineage originated from the second propagation of Indian Buddhism to Tibet in the tenth to thirteenth centuries. (The first propagation was from the seventh to the ninth centuries.) Central to this second propagation were courageous Tibetan figures such as Marpa (1012–1097), who journeyed to India to gather teachings from great Indian tantric adepts such as Naropa (956–1040). The seventeen incarnations of the Karmapa have primarily served to uphold the instructions from the Indian saints Tilopa (988–1069) and Naropa passed on to the Tibetan saints Marpa, Milarepa (1052–1135), and Gompopa (1079–1153).

Tibetan Buddhist traditions of reincarnated spiritual leaders originated from the rebirth of the first Karmapa (Dus-gsum mkhyen-pa; 1110–1193). The process leading to recognizing an incarnation involves the dying incarnation leaving signs, usually in a letter, to indicate the location of the next birth. The close students of the previous Karmapa can interpret these signs and use various divination procedures to find the new incarnation. According to Tibetan traditions, the Gyalwa Karmapa incarnations are emanations of the bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara coming to the world in order to help alleviate the sufferings of humanity. The coming of the first Karmapa is believed to fulfill a prophecy made by the Buddha Shakyamuni, predicting that 1,600 years after his passing there would be a man of great spiritual attainment and compassion known as Karmapa, “Man of Action.”

The first Karmapa was a disciple of both Gampopa (sGam-po-pa) and Rachungpa (Ras-chung-pa). Dusum Khyenpa established the monastery in Tsur phu (mTshurphu), 50 miles west of Lhasa, which became the official seat in Tibet for the proceeding Karmapa incarnations. His successor, Karma Pakshi (Ka-rma Pak-shi; 1204–1283), was recognized as the second reincarnation. Karma Pakshi was believed to be a descendant of the Tibetan King Trhisong Detsen (Khri-srong Ide-brtsan; 755–c. 797) and was invited to the courts of Kublai and Monge Khan in 1254. The third Karmapa, Rang Jung Dorje (Rang-'byung rdo-rje; 1284–1339), was renowned for his scholarship and was invited to China by Toghon Temur, the last Mongolian emperor. Rang Jung Dorje was followed in the succession of Karmapas by Rolpay Dorje (Rolpa'i rdo-rje; 1340–1383), De Shin Shekpa (De-bzhin-gshegs-pa; 1384–1415), Thong Dorje (mThong-rdo-rje; 1507–1554), and a series of masters to the present day. The sixteenth Karmapa, Rangjung Rigpe Dorje (Rang-byung rig-pa'i rDo-rje; 1924–1981), was recognized and brought up in the manner of his predecessors, but due to the Chinese invasion he took refuge in 1959 in Sikkim, where he founded a large monastic center for the promulgation of the Karma Kagyu order. With the spread of Tibetan Buddhism beyond Tibet since 1959, numerous Karma Kagyu centers outside of the Tibetan cultural region have emerged.

The tradition of spiritual and institutional leadership being passed down through reincarnation has not been without political entanglements. Disagreements about the real incarnation have been a hallmark of the current seventeenth Karmapa. The thirteenth Sharmar Tulku recognizes Trinley Thaye Dorje (1982–), and the twelfth Situ Tulku recognizes Orgyen Trinley Dorje (1985–). Although the first Karmapa, Dusum Khyenpa, stated that even while he was alive there existed several of his incarnations simultaneously as separate emanations of his body, speech, mind, and wisdom, tradition maintains that only one Karmapa at a time may officially function as the lineage holder.

Karo, Joseph

Jewish legal authority, mystic

Joseph Karo was the leading halakhic (legal) authority of the sixteenth century and author of the Shulkhan Arukh (The prepared table), the definitive code of Jewish law accepted as authoritative to the present. He was also a mystic who was visited by a maggid, a heavenly mentor who imparted mystical teachings to him. Born in Spain in 1488, Karo left with his family for Turkey after the expulsion of the Jews in 1492. In Turkey, he met Solomon Molcho, Joseph Taitazak, and Solomon Alkabez, mystics who influenced his path. He left for Safed in 1536, where he was the leading halakhic authority and head of a large yeshiva.

Joseph Karo was associated with the leading kabbalists of Safed, including Moses Cordovero and Isaac Luria. Karo's mystical teachings are preserved in his diary, Maggid Mesharim (The preacher of truth). Only a portion of this diary survived after his death in 1575. Published in Amsterdam in 1708, it is a record of Karo's visitations by his heavenly mentor, the personification of the Mishnah. His colleague, Solomon Alkabez, recounts in a letter that he was present during a Shavuot (Pentecost) night vigil when Karo had a visitation from his maggid. Alkabez reports that Karo was not in a trance when he received this visitation and others present could hear the maggid speaking through Karo, but in a voice that was not his. Karo remembered the messages and subsequently wrote them down.

The messages are a combination of mystical teachings and personal communications encouraging or admonishing Karo in his mystical practices. Although not creating a new kabbalistic system or synthesizing previous ones, they reflect the mystical currents in Safed prior to the kabbalistic innovations of Isaac Luria. Karo had been strongly influenced by the martyr's death of Solomon Molcho in 1532, and he dreamed of being burned at the stake to sanctify God's name as Molcho had.

Karunamayi, Sri

Hindu guru

Karunamayi (She who is permeated with compassion), also known as Bhagavati Sri Sri Sri Vijayeswari Devi (The goddess of victory), is a Hindu woman guru who lives in India and visits the United States regularly. Vijayeswari is her given name; the triple "Sri" (Sacred, Venerable, Auspicious) is an honorific prefix of respect. Disciples consider her to be an incarnation of Sarasvati, the Hindu goddess of knowledge, music, and the arts, and refer to her as Amma, or mother.

Bhagavati Sri Vijayeswari was born on Vijaya Dashami (The victorious tenth day), considered to be one of the most auspicious days in the Hindu calendar, in 1958. This day usually marks the end of nine nights of celebration in the fall festival of Navaratri, when the goddess is worshipped in her multiple forms. In 1980, Sri Vijayeswari is said to have left home to go to the remote forest of Kanva ksendra (Penusila Kshetram) in Andhra Pradesh, southern India. After fourteen years of meditation, she founded a hermitage and charitable institution called Sri Mathru Devi Viswa Shanthi Ashram on the outskirts of the forest at Penusila. Sri Karunamayi gives regular discourses in her native language, Telugu, and in English in many parts of the world. She regularly leads her disciples in ritual worship of Lalitha, a form of the goddess Parvati, with the recitation of a thousand names of the deity. She also initiates some devotees into a special mantra (sacred syllables) for the goddess Saraswati.

Official web pages and brochures of the organization say that the aim of Sri Karunamayi's mission is universal peace and spiritual upliftment of humanity. Her main message is that human beings should achieve higher levels of consciousness through the regular practice of meditation. She conducts regular meditation retreats to help religious seekers on the path to liberation and advises one to two hours of meditation daily. The organization also runs medical and educational programs, especially for the poor. She maintains a meditational and charitable center (ashram), the Karunamayi Shanthi Dhama, in the city of Bangalore, where apparently more than a thousand people per month are fed. Her followers have also started an orphanage, a hospital, and a school for children with special needs.

Kassapa

Buddhist disciple

Also called Mahakassapa in Pali (Kashyapa or Mahakashyapa in Sanskrit), Kassapa was one of the Buddha's chief disciples in the fifth century B.C.E. Known for his austerity and exacting observance of monastic rule, he adhered to strict ascetic practices such as sleeping in the forest, wearing robes of rags, and living on scant alms. He was exemplary in his relations with the laity, often seeking out the poor and despised to offer himself as a recipient for their alms, thereby ensuring them great merit and future beneficial rebirths. He also had a very close relationship with the Buddha; on one occasion they swapped robes, a gesture of high regard that the Buddha conferred on Kassapa alone among his disciples.

Kassapa was born into a brahmin family and from a young age longed to live a religious life. Against his wishes, his parents pressured him to marry. Kassapa finally relented on the condition that they find a woman who equaled in loveliness the image of a maiden fashioned in a golden statue. To his dismay, a woman named Bhadda Kapilani was found who matched the statue, and he was forced to marry her. However, she shared with him a desire to renounce the world. They decided to keep their marriage chaste until they were able to abandon household life and ordain into the Buddha's community. Kassapa obtained enlightenment a week after his ordination.

According to Chan/Zen tradition, once when the Buddha was asked about ultimate truth he smiled and simply held up a single flower. Only Kassapa understood this gesture and received direct mind-to-mind transmission of sudden awakening. He is thus regarded as the first in the lineage of Chan patriarchs.

After the Buddha's passing away, Kassapa, fearing the loss of the dharma (Buddhist doctrine), convened the First Buddhist Council and presided over the recitation of the Buddha's teachings. Although the Buddha did not appoint a successor, Kassapa's important leadership role and seniority made him, in effect, the head of the samgha (monastic community) for the next twenty years.

Kassapa is said to dwell to this day inside a mountain in northern India. In the account of the seventh-century Chinese pilgrim Xuanzang, Kassapa was entrusted by the Buddha with his robe to safeguard until the future Buddha Maitreya appears. Kassapa entered Cock's Foot Mountain and now waits for the ages to pass and Maitreya to arrive. When Maitreya appears, he will retrieve the robe from Kassapa and various fabulous miracles will ensue. Kassapa will at that time reach final enlightenment.

Kateri Tekakwitha

Roman Catholic Native American laywoman

“The most beautiful flower that bloomed among the Indians” is the epitaph on the tombstone of Blessed Kateri Tekakwitha, the first Native American and the first American laywoman proposed for canonization in the Roman Catholic Church. Protector of the environment and patron of ecology, Kateri serves as an enduring testament to the great reverence the Native American people hold for all of creation and for the author of the cosmos. She is a loving witness to personal qualities that help to unite the human family in all its diverse richness: gentleness, kindness, compassion, good humor, and purity. She is called “The Lily of the Mohawks.”

Kateri Tekakwitha was born in Ossernenon (now Auriesville), New York, in 1656, the daughter of a Christian Algonquin woman and a non-Christian Mohawk chief. When she was four, her health was weakened, her face badly scarred, and her eyesight permanently damaged during a smallpox epidemic in which her parents and younger brother died. Some translations of the name “Tekakwitha” are thought to refer to her impaired eyesight: It could mean “She who feels her way with her hands” or “She who bumps into things.” Yet other translations seem to give an indication of her mystical sense of charity, perseverance, and service to others: “She who moves things before her” and “She who puts all in order.”

After the death of her parents, Kateri made her home with her uncle, who had become chief of the tribe, and his family. Jesuit missionaries from France paid visits to their village, and in 1676 Kateri, profoundly influenced by their teachings about Jesus, asked Father Jacques de Lamberville to baptize her. Suspicious of her new faith because it differed in many ways from traditional Iroquois practices, members of her tribe ostracized and physically threatened her. Kateri was forced to leave her village and went to live with Christian Native Americans in Canada. There, she made her first communion in 1677 and took a vow of permanent chastity in 1679.

Kateri Tekakwitha was a woman of innocence, simplicity, faith, and prayer whose intense spirituality and austere lifestyle made a lasting impression on her companions. Her personal suffering and immense faith enabled her to transcend the boundaries of her own traditions. She chose a new way of life that was nonconforming and potentially dangerous, yet richly rewarding. She demonstrates how suffering and pain can be transformed into a spirituality of inner peace, patience, and hope.

Kaygusuz Abdal

Muslim sufi poet, folk hero

Kaygusuz Abdal, one of the well-known figures of Turkish folk literature, was reportedly the son of the governor of Alaiye (present-day Alanya in Antalya, Turkey, along the Mediterranean shore) in the fifteenth century. He is revered particularly in the Baktashi tradition but is also known as a folk hero and bard among the Turkish people. According to some sources, he was well educated and traveled extensively in Anatolia and the Balkans. In keeping with Turkish sufi literature, his poetry conveys messages of love, longing, friendship, and spiritual ecstasy. His poems also contain some descriptions of the life of nomadic Turkish tribes and references to specific places.

The most important feature of Kaygusuz Abdal's work, however, is its depiction of nomadic spirituality. In fact, all poets and sages who are given the title "abdal" exhibit this feature to some extent. The abdal tradition refers to mostly nomadic but occasionally sedentary poets who have traveled long distances from central Asia to Anatolia. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the abdal groups, also known in plural as abdalan, played a key role in the Islamization of Anatolia with their sufi teachings, lodges, and fraternities. After the centralization of the Ottoman Empire at the end of the fifteenth century, the abdalan groups were assimilated into city culture and largely lost their distinctly sufi character. The tradition of traveling poets-bards, however, has continued well into the modern period, with most of the abdals now settled in central Anatolia.

Kaygusuz Abdal is a prototype of this tradition. Considering that he lived in the fifteenth century, when nomadic Turkish tribes were still struggling with their historic transition into a sedentary life in relatively big cities, it is not surprising that his poetry both depicts natural scenery and criticizes the moral decadence and spiritual decline of the cities. Like many of his peers and followers, Kaygusuz used satire as a powerful way of conveying both social criticism and spiritual advice. His function can be described as one of social therapist. Along with his satirical approach, his eloquence of speech, and his poetic and musical skill, he uses his knowledge of religious subjects to achieve this unique social commentary. In spite of references to some specific places and events, the timeless quality of his mystical and social imagery can hardly be contested. This, in part, explains his fame as a living legend.

Kazim, Musa al-

(c. 745–c. 799 C.E.)

Shi'i Muslim imam

Musa al-Kazim, born around 745, was the seventh Twelver Shi'i imam. According to some leading Shi'as, he succeeded his father, Ja'far as-Sadiq, as imam in 765; according to others, the lineage was passed on via his elder brother Isma'il (thus leading to a branching between the two groups).

Quiet and retiring, al-Kazim spent most of his time in prayer and contemplation. Like his father, he presented lectures and spread Shi'i thought to his disciples. He had a difficult life, however, as the Abbasid authorities constantly sought to control and belittle him. On the orders of the Abbasid al-Mahdi, he was brought to Baghdad as prisoner in 780 or shortly thereafter. He was released after a brief imprisonment—and given a gift of 3,000 dinars by the authorities. Al-Mahdi had apparently had a dream in which 'Ali b. Abi Talib (600–661) appeared to him and berated him for imprisoning his progeny. Later, in about 795, during the reign of Harun al-Rashid, he was again arrested and brought to Baghdad. In confinement he continued to meet with and direct the affairs of his followers. He felt that it was permissible and valid to cooperate with the Abbasids, despite his belief that it was an illegitimate rulership, provided the cooperation furthered the Shi'a cause. Al-Rashid grew angry at seeing the relative ease of al-Kazim's imprisonment, however, and now wanted him killed.

Various traditions are presented regarding his death in roughly 799. He died at a prison or mosque near the al-Musayyab or Kufa gate. According to some, he died a natural death; others believe he was poisoned. Some of his followers refused to accept the authority of his son and successor, declaring that the imamate had ended with him. Their opponents called them the al-wakifa, "those who stop." However, this group later merged with the Twelver Shi'as. The Bushariyya, after Muhammad b. Bashir (alternatively Bushayr), the gnostic from Kufa, claim al-Kazim to be divine; they believe he did not die but went into concealment, and that he would return as the mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse). In the interim, Bashir himself claimed to be the imam. Al-Kazim was buried in a prestigious cemetery in northwest Baghdad. His tomb, together with that of his grandson, subsequently became an important center for pilgrimage. Musa al-Kazim apparently had many offspring—estimates range from thirty-three to sixty. His descendants are referred to as the Musawi. In Iran, 70 percent of the sayyids (descendants of Muhammad) are considered to be descended from him. He was succeeded by his son 'Ali al-Rida, the eighth Twelver imam.

Since birth al-Kazim was thought to be endowed with special powers. Several miracles are associated with him. It is said that he was able to speak as an infant, for example, and guide people on various issues. Throughout his life he modeled paradigmatic piety. At the center of his followers as imam, because of his devout demeanor he was also a focus for those on the sufi path. The ascetic sufi Shaiq b. Ibrahim al-Balkhi regarded him as a holy person and a devout worshipper. Other sufis, such as Ma'ruf al-Kharkhi and Bishir al-Hafi, were also affiliated with him.

A gifted polemicist, al-Kazim was able to win over his opponents. For instance, the celebrated Sunni legal scholar Abu Hanifa was silenced by him, and even Christians who came to dispute with him about religion accepted Islam. Sunni scholars have regarded him as a respected traditionalist. A small book of traditions by him called the Musnad Musa al-Kazim is extant, compiled by Abu Bakr Muhammad b. 'Abd Allah al-Shafi'i al-Bazzaz. Al-Kazim's answers to some legal queries are available in a volume called Wasiyya fi al-'akl in two versions, one abridged and one complete.

Kazim Rashti, Sayyid

Shi'i Muslim teacher

Sayyid Kazim Rashti was appointed by Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa'i (1753–1826) to carry on his teaching. He was thus the second leader of the Shaykhi school of Shi'i Islam.

Sayyid Kazim was born in Rasht, Iran, to a family descended from the prophet Muhammad. He had a traditional religious education in his hometown, and in 1815, acting on a dream that involved the daughter of the prophet Muhammad, he moved to Yazd and became a student of Shaykh Ahmad. He was regarded by Shaykh Ahmad as his foremost pupil and appointed by him to take over leadership of his circle of students upon his death in 1826. By this time, Shaykh Ahmad's teachings had provoked a great deal of opposition among some of the prominent Shi'i religious leaders. Sayyid Kazim had several open debates in which he was called upon to defend these teachings, and he thus became a rallying point for students who were disillusioned with the traditional learning and came to study under him in Karbala.

Some 171 works by Sayyid Kazim can be identified over a broad range of subjects including philosophy, mysticism, theology, exegesis, and religious jurisprudence. Many of these were written in answer to specific questions that came to him from all parts of the Shi'i world. In 1843, when the Ottomans sought to reassert their authority over Karbala, the house of Sayyid Kazim was one of only two places the Ottomans designated as safe refuges for the people once the Ottoman army entered the city and began a general massacre.

According to Babi and Baha'i sources, Sayyid Kazim referred frequently in his lectures to the near advent of the day when the hidden Shi'i imam, or mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse), would appear. He declined to appoint a successor to himself but instructed his followers that, after his death, they were to go out and search. Thus it was that after the death of Sayyid Kazim after midnight on the last night of 1843, a group of his students set out on a quest that led them eventually to accept the claims of the Bab, thus boosting the Babi movement. Those followers of Sayyid Kazim who did not become Babis divided into a number of sects, two of which remain to the present day. One of these follows the Ibrahimi Kirmani family centered in Kirman and Basra; the other follows the Usku'i family centered in Kuwait.

Kentigern

Christian missionary, bishop

The Christian saint Kentigern, popularly known as "Mungo," who died in about 612, was the founder of the see of Glasgow and a missionary in the ancient British kingdoms of Cumbria and Strathclyde. His popular veneration in Scotland has enjoyed a long history. The chief sources on Kentigern are the Herbertian Life (c. 1115) and the Life by Jocelyn (c. 1180). There is little in the existing sources that can be corroborated (they are all rather late), but the legends about Kentigern tie him not only to the major kingdoms of early medieval Britain but also to some of the major saints and kings of the period, such as Colum Cille of Iona and King Rhederch. Kentigern is said to have been the son of a British king (later sources name the famous Urien, king of Rheged) and the daughter of a British prince. In the Herbertian Life, Kentigern was the product of a virgin birth, a legend that Jocelyn's sensibilities found heretical and that he left out of his version of Kentigern's life.

Kentigern was born at Culross, in Fife, and was educated by St. Serf. His early life at the monastery was a very ascetic one—he wore a hair shirt and held vigils in cold water. In his mid-twenties, Kentigern began his career as an evangelist in the area around modern Glasgow. He was consecrated bishop while in Strathclyde, is said to have been in Wales for a time (where he met St. David), and then returned to Strathclyde. King Rhederch recognized Kentigern's holiness, and Jocelyn claimed the king submitted himself and his descendants to the see established by Kentigern. The saint remained near Glasgow where he continued his missionary efforts and performed many miracles. He reportedly returned a ring to a queen whose husband had thrown it away. He also produced cheese from jars of milk. Jocelyn writes of a meeting between Columba and Kentigern; the famous Irish saint apparently had wished to meet and share personal concerns with Glasgow's famous holy man. A number of places in Scotland, and a few in England, were associated with the saint. Kentigern's relics reside in Glasgow Cathedral. His feast day is January 13.

Kevin of Glendalough (Coemgen)

Christian abbot

Kevin, who died in about 618, is one of a number of semilegendary saints of the earliest period of Irish Christianity. Like a number of his holy contemporaries, Kevin was reputed to be of royal blood. And like Brendan, Ciarán, and most of the others, his conversion to a spiritual life involved turning from the benefits and obligations of his clan and tribe to seek the rigors of an isolated life in nature. Very much in emulation of the desert saints of the Middle East, he retired to a cell. Tradition locates it beside the upper of the two lakes of Glendalough in County Wicklow; there he practiced physical exercises—ascesis—in order to concentrate his mind. Although these practices often involved pain, the real purpose was to build endurance so that the solitary might wholly contemplate the transcendent. That this contemplation was meant to conform to nature rather than oppose it can be seen in two stories from the life of Kevin.

In one, the saint, praying in his narrow cell with his arms outstretched, extended one hand out the window. A female blackbird landed on his hand and began to build her nest. Rather than disturb her, Kevin continued praying while the bird completed the nest, laid and hatched her eggs, and, when the young were old enough, flew off with them. No matter its credibility, the story affirms that spiritual and natural rhythms can and should conform to each other. In the second, Kevin was in his hermitage when he was approached by an angel, who indicated that a pleased God had promised Kevin a vast monastery and great city in the valley below. Furthermore, no one buried in the monastic cemetery would know the pains of hell. The four mountains surrounding the valley would be leveled to accommodate all these wonders. But Kevin refused, calling the animals of the mountains his housemates, and not wanting to move them on his account.

As Kevin's fame grew, many arrived to emulate him; so Kevin became abbot to a monastery built between the two lakes. Like Antony of the Desert (fl. 300–340), though, he remained a hermit, only occasionally visiting his monks. This may have been the general custom among Irish monasteries of the early period. Ruins survive in Glendalough, and indeed one should be thankful to Kevin, as the site is one of the most beautiful in Ireland. His feast day is June 3.

Muslim mystic

Abu al-Hasan 'Ali al-Kharraqani was an early sufi who came from humble peasant origins and whose views on the mystical tradition in Islam have been frequently quoted over the centuries since his death in 1034. He stated, “A true sufi is he who is not.” This seeming paradox has been the focus of considerable commentary. It illustrates the concern that a designated identity may indeed be the result of empty pretensions, whereas the mystical state does not require defined parameters or terms.

Kharaqani’s influence has been far-reaching. Many prominent sufis were his disciples. These, in turn, influenced subsequent spiritual teachers. Abu Isma’il Abdallah al-Ansari (1006–1089) is regarded as one of his primary disciples. The prominent sufi community of the Naqshbandi that takes its name from Baha’uddin Naqshband (d. 1390) traces its devotional and sacred heritage to Yusuf Hamadani (1048–1140), who in turn acknowledges a spiritual affiliation with Kharaqani and Abu Yazid Bistami (d. c. 875). Kharaqani does not seem to have traveled much; instead, people came to visit him on account of his piety.

For this spiritual master, the weeping and humble devotee was a paragon of the spiritual path. He stated, “God is fond of His servant’s crying.” He experienced intense love for God, and his yearning for the Beloved was proverbial in sufi lore. He declared to God that he would be considered to be included among the martyrs and be resurrected as such, asserting, “I have been killed by the sword of longing for Thee.” Though he has been very popular, he was not a scholar but a zealous servant of God. He has been described as an “illiterate peasant”; his pronunciation of Arabic was faulty at a time when it was used as a primary language for scholarly discourse. According to tradition, he was initiated into the mystical path not by a living guide but rather by the spirit of Bistami, a long-dead spiritual master. Thus the experience of the spiritual path, not textual explication, was important for Kharaqani. He felt that a follower of the prophet should be designated by deeds, not by idle talk or endless literary explications. For Kharaqani, “The heir of the Prophet is he who follows the Prophet with his actions, not he who blackens the face of paper.” The verb he used refers to an action that causes embarrassment or shame. Thus he was emphasizing the futility and even shamefulness of writing useless texts.

Some apocryphal stories present Kharaqani as having a negative view of women. In the sixth volume of his Mathnawi, for example, Mevlanna Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273) presents a story about Kharaqani’s spiritual prowess that exemplifies this. A disciple once arrived at Kharaqani’s house when he was not in. His wife met him and related nasty tales about her “lazy” husband. The saddened disciple went to the forest, where he found that the master was mounted on a lion, riding it with a snake as a whip. His mastery of the animals was his cosmic reward, a sign of divine approval for tolerating an unpleasant wife.

Kharaqani’s tomb is in the village of Kal’a-yi Nav, northeast of Bistam in the vicinity of the city of Shahroud, east of Tehran. It is frequently visited by the devout. The teachings and statements of Kharaqani that were collected by one of his disciples is entitled Kitab Nur al-ulum, of which only an abstracted version is known. This text is at the British Museum.

Khayyam, Omar

Muslim sufi, scholar

Recognized by some as a sufi master and by others as an agnostic hedonist, Omar Khayyam, known for his quatrains (Ruba’iyyat), was a Persian gnostic philosopher, poet, and mathematician. Abu'l Fath Omar ibn Ibrahim Khayyam was born in the district of Shadyakh of the old city of Nayshabur in the province of Khorasan in eastern Iran in about 1048. The title Khayyam, which means "tent maker," in all likelihood was inherited from his father, Ibrahim, a poor, illiterate tent maker who realized the genius of his young son early on. He asked Imam Qadi Muhammad to teach the young Omar qur'anic sciences, Arabic grammar, literature, and other introductory religious sciences.

Khayyam continued his studies with Khawjeh Abu'l-Hasan al-Anbari, with whom he studied branches of mathematics, astronomy, and traditional cosmological doctrines. Khayyam pursued his advanced studies with Imam Muwaffaq Nayshaburi, concentrating on qur'anic sciences and jurisprudence, and finally he immersed himself in philosophy under the direction of Shaykh Muhammad Mansur, who taught Khayyam the writings of Avicenna, particularly the Kitab al-isharet wa at-tanbihat (Directives and treatments). It is also possible that he studied with Bahmanyar, the famous pupil of Avicenna. Khayyam's passionate public defense of Avicenna and the latter's six philosophical treatises clearly indicates that he was an avid supporter of Avicennian philosophy.

Khayyam soon established himself as a one-man university who was given honorary titles such as Hujat al-Haq (The evidence of truth), Ghiyath al-Din (The patron of faith) and Imam, all indicative of the respect he had in the community and his position as a religious authority. He wrote very little, but what he did write was of great significance. He accepted few students but was scrupulous in his teaching. Even though Nayshabur was one of the greatest centers of learning at the time, Khayyam did not participate much in the scholarly debates and circles. It is said that he may have been shy and sensitive, an impatient man with little interest in sharing his knowledge with others. Some have attributed his lack of interest in teaching to a desire not to be intellectually conspicuous.

Despite his withdrawn and somewhat monastic existence, Khayyam associated with a number of well-known scholars, the most famous of whom were the poet Abu al-Majd Majdud Sana'i, the great theologian Zamakhshari, Maymun ibn Najib, Imam Muzaffar Isfizari (with whom he collaborated to produce the jalali calendar, which is still the official calendar of Iran), and finally the most famous of them all, Abu Hamid al-Ghazali, with whom he had a difficult relationship.

Khayyam's contemporaries accused him of heretical tendencies, and others privately questioned his faith. Khayyam performed his pilgrimage to Mecca as a way of demonstrating his faith and exonerating himself of such allegations.

Khayyam wrote on sciences and philosophy and expressed many of his views through poetry. A number of his quatrains have been subject to controversy. Because his Ruba'iyat presents a cynical view of life and human existence, he was accused by some of being an agnostic hedonist; others interpreted the quatrains as the esoteric utterances of a sufi master. His Ruba'iyat became renowned in the West when Edward FitzGerald, an English poet, translated them in the 1850s.

To date, fourteen treatises are attributed to Omar Khayyam. The English translations of the titles are: On the Proposition That Says Genera Are of Four Types; Treatise on the Elaboration of the Problems Concerning the Books of Euclid; Treatise on Dividing the Quarter of a Circle; Treatise on Proofs for Problems Concerning Algebra; Treatise on the Deception of Knowing the Two Quantities of Gold and Silver in a Compound Made of the Two; Treatise of Avicenna's Lucid Discourse; Treatise on Being and Necessity; The Necessity of Contradiction in the World and Determinism and Subsistence; Treatise on the Brightening of the Intellect on the Subject of Universal Knowledge; Treatise on the Knowledge of the Universals of Existence;

Treatise on Existence; Treatise to Respond to Three Problems; Treatise on Discovering the Truth of Noruz; Quatrains and Other Poems.

Khedrup Jey (Tibetan: mkhas grub dge legs dpal bzang)

Buddhist scholar

Khedrup Jey, one of the most important scholar-saints in the history of the Tibetan Buddhist scholastic tradition, is considered the third patriarch of the Gelukpa (Tib.: dge lugs pa), or Gandanpa (dga' ldan pa), school that was founded by Tsong kha pa (tsong kha pa lo zang drak pa (1357–1419).

"Khedrup Jey" is actually a title more than a proper name and literally means "the honorable virtuoso scholar and spiritual adept." This epithet evinces his achievement not only in scholarly pursuits (mkhas pa) but in spiritual realization (grub pa) as well. The Tibetan tradition believes Khedrup Jey, who was born in 1385, to have been the incarnation of Devendrabuddhi, who had been a disciple of the great Indian logician Dharmakirti (c. 600–c. 680), as well as of many other previous Buddhist saints, including the Indian scholar Bhavaviveka (c. 500–c. 570) and the Tibetan savant Sakya Pandita (1182–1251), among others.

Renowned for his great skill in dialectics, Khedrup Jey was a charismatic teacher who wrote eleven volumes containing many excellent commentaries on sutra and tantric lineages. He played an important role in the education of the first dalai lama. He is often depicted in Tibetan works of art in what is known as the Jey Yab Sey Sum (rje yab sras gsum) or "The Trio of the Precious Master and (his two chief) Disciples" in debate posture, with prayer beads brandished at an imaginary opponent. Khedrup Jey was the successor to Tsong kha pa's throne at the Ganden monastery. He was quite close to Tsong kha pa and had five visions of this venerable master (rje gzigs pa lnga ldan).

Before Khedrup Jey passed away in 1419 when he was fifty-four years old, he had a vision of Tsong kha pa and requested to enter final nirvana (parinirvana). Tsong kha pa is said to have consented. Khedrup Jey then had a vision of the six-armed wrathful emanation of compassion Mahakala, who requested that he remain for the benefit of beings, but Khedrup Jey passed away into the "land of the dakinis [female buddhas]."

Khidr

Muslim legendary holy figure

Few characters in popular Islamic religious lore are as enigmatic as Khidr. The name means "Green One," suggesting that this character originated as a generic mythic or folkloric fertility figure. Some scholars connect Khidr with the Gilgamesh epic's sage Utnapishtim, who had survived the Flood. Gilgamesh searches for Utnapishtim in hopes that the sage will guide him to a plant that will provide him with the secret of immortality. Islamic lore attributes to Khidr arcane knowledge of the whereabouts of the fountain of life. Some accounts of his discovery of the fountain pair him with Ilyas (Elijah), since Elijah is another of the few who (along with Jesus and Idris) have attained immortality. Even as Jews often leave a chair and a glass for Elijah on ritual occasions, some Muslims greet the unseen Khidr because they know he is there somewhere.

Khidr's mysteriousness is deepened by the fact that he is one of only three significant figures not specifically identified in the Qur'an to whom later tradition has attached names. The others are Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.), associated with the qur'anic Dhu 'l-Qarnayn—"The One with Two Horns"—and Joshua (c. thirteenth century B.C.E.), who is said to be the anonymous servant of Moses in the qur'anic story now connected with Khidr.

An intriguing narrative in Qur'an 18:61–83 tells how Musa (Moses) and his servant (Joshua) head off in search of the confluence of the two seas (which some interpreters take as a symbol of the juncture between the seen and unseen worlds). The two have brought along a fish to eat, but when Moses looks away momentarily, the fish comes to life and swims away. This they take as a sign that they must retrace their steps, for they have apparently gone too far unawares. Turning back, they meet the figure whom God describes as “one to whom we gave mercy from ourselves and to whom we taught a knowledge from our presence” (Qur’an 18:64). Recognizing this person as a guide, Moses asks to follow him. The guide hesitates, insisting that Moses will be too impatient with the guide’s actions. Moses promises to hold his peace on pain of being left to journey on alone.

As they proceed, Khidr performs three actions that Moses deems morally untenable: He scuttles a ship, murders a boy, and rebuilds a wall for people of questionable character. At each juncture, Moses criticizes Khidr’s actions. Finally, Khidr has had enough; he agrees to explain himself, but then Moses is on his own. He sank the ship because he knew an evil king was planning to do great harm with it; he killed the youth to prevent his parents from having to grieve his inevitable rebelliousness; and he rebuilt the wall so that the owner’s orphaned children would eventually be able to inherit the treasure their father had buried beneath it for them. Exegetes often explain the story by associating Moses with outward knowledge and Khidr with the inward, esoteric knowledge that comes uniquely from the divine presence. Some argue that Khidr must have been a prophet, for Moses would surely not have followed a figure of lesser stature than himself. Special knowledge is without a doubt Khidr’s decisive attribute. It is on this account that he assumes a life of his own beyond his scriptural relationship with Moses. Since he represents esoteric, mystical knowledge, Khidr is of great importance in the history of sufism.

Sufi exegetes and poets transform Khidr into the master of the mystery to which all seekers must surrender themselves in their quest for guidance on the Path. Spiritual aspirants must be willing to endure his apparently draconian authority in view of higher meanings. For sufis, Khidr functions as the spirit-shaykh who appears in dreams and visions to invest seekers with the patched garment of spiritual poverty that is the mark of all duly initiated. He is the symbol of the spiritual “sap”—the water of life—that greens all things in its upward movement through creation. As one who reads hearts and sees with the very eyes of God, Khidr is the epitome of the spiritual guide. Serious seekers must be willing to set out on the very ship (the body) that Khidr scuttled, as a token of authentic spiritual poverty.

Khomeini, Ruhollah Musavi

Shi’i Muslim jurist, mystic, revolutionary leader

Imam Khomeini, as he came to be called, is best known for his revolutionary leadership of the Islamic Republic in Iran. The formal qualifications for this lay in his position as a leading faqih, an expert in Islamic jurisprudence. He was also a practitioner of irfan, a form of philosophical mysticism (drawing on Ibn al-‘Arabi [1165–1240] and others) known in Iran that involves an ascetic lifestyle and that is thought to impart considerable inner certainty and moral courage. Furthermore, he both used and was seen to exemplify the key “myths” of Shi’ism, such as that of Imam Husayn b. ‘Ali (626–680), martyred at Karbala by the tyrant Yazid, and the return of the hidden twelfth imam. There was also a populist element in his ideology and a common touch to his manner, and he had a facility with the classical Persian poetry beloved by Iranians.

Khomeini was born on September 24, 1902, to a clerical family in Khomein, a village in central Iran, and studied under Abd al-Karim Ha’iri Yazdi, who reestablished the center of learning at Qum in the early 1920s. By the 1930s, he had his own circle of students and was giving very popular lectures in ethics as well as private lessons in irfan. In about 1944, he began to lecture in fiqh (jurisprudence).

Khomeini published a book criticizing secularist tendencies, governmental and otherwise, in 1943, but it was in 1963, during bloodily suppressed demonstrations in Qum against the shah of Iran’s policies, that he came to the fore politically. He was arrested and later exiled, settling finally in Najaf, one of the Shi’i holy cities in Iraq. About the same time, he became recognized as one of several grand ayatollahs, the highest interpreters of Shi’i fiqh. From Najaf he continued to criticize the shah and was in contact with nonclerical activists, adopting some of their language and ideas. In a series of lectures in 1970, later published under the title Vilayat-i Faqih (Governance of the jurist), he attacked secularism as a ploy of Western imperialism, called for government by Islamic law, and articulated two novel propositions, that monarchy in principle is un-Islamic, and that *faqih*s should govern. There was a populist aspect, also, since it was the people who were to demand Islamic government.

As the shah eliminated or co-opted his secular opposition, Khomeini’s significance increased. When the revolutionary movement began in January 1978, Khomeini provided leadership and symbolic focus for the disparate oppositional groups. He was variously compared to Husayn b. ‘Ali, ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib, Moses, Abraham, and the prophet Muhammad. Meanwhile, he and others compared the shah to the evil caliph Yazid and the demonstrators to Husayn. Many even thought Khomeini might be the twelfth imam, though the more acceptable view was that he was preparing the way for the imam. Khomeini returned to a massive reception on February 1, 1979, and soon formed a government. Later in the year, plebiscites established the Islamic Republic and its constitution, institutionalizing his doctrine of vilayat-i faqih. The ruling group that emerged out of the power struggles from 1979 to 1983 was dominated by clergy, many of them Khomeini's students. This group was highly factionalized, but Khomeini was able to remain above the factions and arbitrate among them.

In spite of the many problems faced by the government, Khomeini remained popular in Iran and beyond. Events such as his condemnation of novelist Salman Rushdie in 1989 gained him notoriety in the West but support from many Muslims. In his last months, he approved constitutional changes that helped ensure a relatively smooth transition of power. He died on June 3, 1989, and his funeral was marked by a vast outpouring of emotion. He continues to attract popular devotion, and Iranian politicians continue to appeal to his heritage. His mausoleum dominates the martyrs' cemetery in Tehran.

Khusrau, Amir

Muslim poet, composer

Amir Khusrau, born in 1254, is considered one of India's most celebrated Muslim court poets; he was also versatile, witty, and a musical composer. Although he was not officially affiliated with any one sufi order, his closest colleagues were two prominent Chishti sufi masters of his time, Khwaja Nizamuddin Auliya (1239–1325) and Hasan Sijzi Dihlawi (d. 1328). Amir Khusrau is remembered by his epic poems, historical poetic novels, and theories on finding truth in the midst of a chaotic world.

As sufiism became a massive movement in India during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, Amir Khusrau's poetry was obviously influenced by a great many sufi practices and beliefs. Like many of his colleagues, he wrote devotional poetry dedicated to the prophet Muhammad, or na'atiyya, which is still sung in musical sufi concerts. Listeners are easily taken to a state of near ecstasy at these events. In this genre of poetry, Amir Khusrau illuminates how everything revolves around the light of Muhammad. For example, in his famous poem "I Do Not Know Where I Have Gone," he writes:

I do not know which place it was,
The nightly place in which I was
Muhammad was the candle there—
The nightly place in which I was.

Kidongoi

Maasai cultural hero

Kidongoi is believed by Maasai in East Africa to be a direct descendant of their divinity Eng'ai and the first oloiboni (prophet-diviner; pl. iloibonok). Although there are different versions of Maasai myths, the common elements are that Kidongoi was discovered by Maasai on or near a mountain (mountains, because of their proximity to the sky, also called eng'ai in Maa, where Eng'ai resides, are believed to be holy sites and perhaps even the occasional home of Eng'ai); he revealed his special gifts (which ranged from prophecy to the ability to find water in a parched area, shake stones in a calabash, start a fire in a rainstorm, and other miracles); and Maasai then adopted him into their family.

Kidongoi became the apical ancestor of the Inkidong'i subclan, the subclan of the iloibonok. Some myths describe him as part wild animal and part human, which both marks his unique powers and underlines the liminal status of iloibonok in Maasai society. The name Kidongoi (and thus Inkidong'i) is derived from the Maa word ol kidongo (tail) and/or enkidong (the gourd or horn filled with stones that the iloibonok use for divination).

Kikusha-ni (Tagami Michi, Ichijian)

Buddhist nun, aesthete

A Japanese Buddhist nun of Jōdo Shinshū sect, Kikusha-ni was known in her lifetime for poetry, painting, music, and tea ceremony. Born in 1753, until age sixteen she was the only child of Tagami Yoshinaga and Tane, a samurai family of Chōfu in Nagato (Yamaguchi prefecture). When a brother was born she married into the Murata family. After eight years, her husband died; childless, she returned to her parents' home. She set out on a life of travel at age twenty-seven. At her first stop, Seikōji temple in Hagi, she became a nun of the Pure Land sect founded by Nichiren (1222–1282). Her first artistic discipline was haikai (the forerunner of haiku and the type of communal linked poetry practiced by Bashō). She wrote with Kobayashi Issa several times and often worked in the company of Buddhist priests. Her work exemplifies the interpenetration of art and spiritual life.

Kikusha-ni also wrote waka (classical tanka) and kanshi (Chinese poetry by Japanese), and thus she mastered the three major forms of Japanese poetry of her day. She also excelled in calligraphy, painting, the Chinese zither, or qin (ch'in), and chanoyu (tea ceremony). Stopping at times for extended periods in Edo (Tokyo), Kyoto, Mino (home of her haikai master), or at home in Chōfu, she spent most of her life traveling in Honshu and Kyushu.

Kikusha-ni's poems reveal her spiritual mind. For example, during a journey in northern Honshu, she wrote the following hokku while literally lost in the mountains:

amid mountains . . .
only falling-leaf sounds on a straw hat
(Kawada 1937, 24)

This example resembles the mendicant monk Santōka's verses from the early twentieth century. Reading Taorigiku (Hand-picked chrysanthemums), her autobiographical poetry journal published in 1813, one often finds reference to the moon. The image may seem relatively secular, as in this well-known verse:

the moon and I
cooling on the bridge
(Higginson 1996, 71)

However, she also wrote moon-verses deeply imbued with religious meaning, such as the following hokku, which began as a haikai written with others on the death anniversary of Daruma (Bodhidharma, the first Chan/Zen patriarch, fifth century):

To meet and gaze
in the same well of clouds at one moon
(ibid., 70)

"Well of clouds" indicates the world of illusion; the moon represents enlightenment.

Kilian of Würzburg (Killena, Cillíne)

Christian bishop, missionary, martyr, apostle of Franconia

Kilian was one of the many Irish monks who left their homeland and kin to become "pilgrims of Christ," preaching the gospel throughout the European continent. Kilian's mission in the seventh century eventually led him to Franconia and Thuringia; there his activities centered around the castle of Würzburg and his alliance with Duke Gozbert.

Kilian's greatest accomplishment was the conversion of Gozbert. But the two men soon fell into dispute with Gozbert's wife, Geila, since Christian rules about consanguinity made their marriage invalid. Geila, fearing repudiation, hired a killer, who murdered Kilian and his two fellow missionaries in 689. According to tradition, the murderer and Geila herself met swift divine retribution. Both were driven insane before meeting most painful deaths. Spectacular miracles later allegedly occurred at the site where the killer had secreted the bodies, books, vestments, and liturgical vessels of Kilian and his companions.

A delay of more than 200 years between Kilian's death and his first extant biography obscures further details about his career. The evidence is further complicated by subsequent rewritings of Kilian's biography to fit divergent notions of sanctity in the Germanic lands (where Kilian preached) and the Irish church (which formed his lifestyle and mission). Continental legends stress the building of ecclesiastical institutions. They relate, for example, how Kilian undertook his mission only after he traveled to Rome in 686 to obtain permission from Pope Conon and to receive consecration as bishop of Würzburg. Irish legends, by contrast, focus on Kilian's personal holiness and his inspired preaching.

Burchard, a later bishop of Würzburg, encouraged veneration of Kilian, translating his relics first to the church of Our Lady in 743 and then to the cathedral of Our Savior in 752. The vitality of Kilian's cult later in the Middle Ages inspired the construction of a new cathedral at the place of his murder. Today Kilian is the patron saint of the city of Würzburg, where his feast day is lavishly celebrated on July 8 as a civic holiday and where scholarship on the tangled body of evidence about Kilian's life and career is fostered.

Kimbangu, Simon

Christian prophet, healer

Simon Kimbangu was born in N'Kamba, Congo Free State, in 1889 to parents of the Kongo ethnic group. He grew up a devout Protestant and aspired to be an evangelist for his church, the Baptist Missionary Society. As a young man, Kimbangu taught for some time in a mission school, where he was fond of telling the story of David slaying Goliath. In July 1915, he was baptized in a river near Ngomba-Lutete in Lower Congo.

Then under Belgian colonial rule, the Congo of Kimbangu's time was one steeped in misery. Millions of Congolese died under forced labor policies designed to enrich Europe. Because of this grave injustice, in 1908 the Congo Free State was annexed from King Leopold II by the Belgian government and renamed "The Belgian Congo" (1908–1960). Exacerbating the pains of colonial oppression, a sleeping sickness epidemic claimed half of the country's population, soon followed by the Spanish influenza epidemic of 1918–1919, making central Africa ripe for religious revival.

During the flu epidemic, Kimbangu heard a voice that proclaimed to him: "I am Christ. My servants are unfaithful. I have chosen you to bear witness before your brethren and to convert them." For three years, he resisted this call, feeling unworthy and unprepared. Then, in April 1921, he visited a gravely ill woman in his native village of N'Kamba. Kimbangu felt called to pray for her and place his hands on her head. The woman was healed, and word soon spread of his powers as a ngunza (healing prophet). Kimbangu immediately began a healing ministry using the waters of the N'Kamba spring, which transformed the village into New Jerusalem for his followers. Along with his healing, possession by the Holy Spirit, and speaking in tongues, during the several extraordinary weeks of "the N'Kamba revelation" Kimbangu preached against the use of fetishes and added several commandments to the ten in the Bible: no smoking; no drinking; no dancing; no naked bathing or sleeping; no gambling; no fetishes; no eating pork or monkey; no resentment toward others; the confession of sins to witnesses; and the payment of taxes.

Kimbangu's rapidly blossoming movement was so threatening to the Belgians that he was soon imprisoned and sentenced to death—a sentence that was commuted to 120 lashes and life imprisonment. Thousands of his followers were exiled to other parts of the Congo Basin, which only served to spread the movement into an international multiethnic church that today counts some 5 million adherents, making it the largest African-originated church ever.

Kimbangu died in an Elizabethville (Lubumbashi) prison in 1951, and his remains were brought to rest in a mausoleum in N'Kamba. His son, Joseph Diangiende, was then pronounced the leader of the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth through the Prophet Simon Kimbangu (l'Eglise de Jesus Christ sur la Terre par le Prophète Simon Kimbangu, EJCSK). The church was formally recognized by Belgian authorities in 1959, one year before Congolese independence. Since 1970, EJCSK has been a member of the World Council of Churches.

King, Martin Luther, Jr.

Christian civil rights leader

Martin Luther King, Jr., was the icon of the civil rights movement in the United States and an advocate of nonviolent direct action. His emergence signaled an end to Jim Crow society and legalized discrimination against blacks and other minorities. His oratorical and organizing skill endeared him to some and angered those who upheld the status quo. King's love for humanity and willingness to sacrifice for the good of all helped to bring sweeping changes in U.S. race relations in the twentieth century.

King was born in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1929. He attended good schools as a child and later graduated from Morehouse College in Atlanta. He then moved north to attend graduate school and received his doctorate of divinity from Boston University.

King is most noted for his adherence to and propagation of the philosophy of nonviolent direct action. Building on the teachings of Jesus and Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948), King believed that blacks could help solve America's race problem by disobeying unjust laws, voluntarily going to jail, and displaying love toward racists. His first opportunity to test his philosophy came in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1955. After Rosa Parks's arrest for refusing to give up her bus seat to a white man, blacks in Montgomery mobilized for a boycott against the bus line. The Montgomery Improvement Association was formed to coordinate the boycott, and King, as pastor of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, was thrust to the forefront. At the end of an eleven-month boycott, the bus line capitulated, and King became the national spokesman for the growing civil rights movement.

At this point, he left Montgomery and moved to Atlanta. There he organized and became president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), an organization of ministers working together to end segregation. Having broadened his horizons through study and international travel, King returned to the United States in 1959 ready to take on segregation and racial discrimination. Ironically, his tactic of nonviolent direct action worked well only when he convinced his opponent that violence was necessary to stop the protests. This violence, if timed right, would then be captured by newspaper reporters and television cameras that quickly spread the drama throughout the country and the world. Because the Cold War had reached its height by this point, King knew that scenes like these would embarrass America in the eyes of other countries, especially those newly independent ones that had not yet chosen between communism and capitalism.

His strategy usually worked, and before long the federal government intervened to prevent further violence and damage to its image as the defender of freedom and democracy. King proved especially adept at using this type of violence in the now famous Birmingham and Selma, Alabama, marches. The televised scenes of vicious dogs, water hoses, and electric cattle prods being used by police and sheriff's deputies to subdue peaceful and unarmed protesters helped to encourage federal legislation in the guise of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This act outlawed discrimination in all sectors of public life and represented one of the crowning achievements of King's career. His courage and bravery in the face of danger led many people to believe that God had sent him to help the African American people. Because of his efforts and the grassroots work of people on the local level, the Voting Rights Act passed the following year.

Even after achieving these victories, King continued to hammer at the core of America's racism: economic injustice and the violence that perpetuated it. To publicize his efforts, he organized the Poor People's Campaign, a movement designed to put pressure on the White House by having the poor from throughout the country set up camp in Washington, D.C., and stay until Congress passed an economic stimulus package. King, however, did not live to see his idea come to fruition. Having joined forces with labor, black and white radicals, and anti-Vietnam War protesters, he was assassinated on a hotel balcony in Memphis, Tennessee, on April 4, 1968. King's courage and boldness in speaking out against racist oppression, economic inequality, and unjust war has not yet been equaled.

Kings

Hebrew

A king (melek) in the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament) is a person who was granted leadership of a state by God. In the books of Samuel and Kings, the editor (known as the Deuteronomist) interpreted God as the causative force in history. God puts kings on the throne and removes them as he sees fit. The right to rule, in other words, was granted by God. Other books of the Bible depict specific kings as having a special relationship with God. For instance, King David is attributed with authorship of many of the psalms (often songs of praise to God), and King Solomon's divinely granted wisdom is often described.

Kingship in the Bible is seen as both a positive and negative institution. Initially God grants the Hebrews a king based on their request to be like the other nations. He warns them (through the prophet Samuel) that kingship brings with it negative effects as well as positive ones. God's first choice is Saul, who does not follow the Lord's instructions. God then replaces him with David, whose line is granted kingship forever because of the Lord's love for him. But various sins (according to the biblical writers) led to the separation of the northern kingdom (Israel) from the southern kingdom (Judah). David's line retained leadership in the south; the north had a variety of rulers. All of the kings are evaluated in the Bible based on their piety and faithfulness to the Lord.

Kinjikitile Ngwale

Tanzanian spirit medium, revolutionary leader

During the last decade of the nineteenth century, the Rufiji Valley of southeastern Tanganyika (now Tanzania) was conquered and incorporated into the German-African empire. More than twenty nominally independent ethnic groups with various degrees of political systems occupied the region covering some 100,000 square miles. Beginning from 1902, however, the region was forced to implement a colonial compulsory cotton production and tax scheme that diverted people away from food farms. By 1904, farmers began to experience hardships as they were not getting enough income from cotton, and taxation imposed more hardships. These difficulties degenerated into anti-European tension as well as an era of religious revivalism called the Maji-Maji movement led by Kinjikitile Ngwale.

Kinjikitile lived at Ngarambe in southwestern Matumbi. He was virtually unknown until 1904, when, after an absence of several days, he reappeared, claiming to have been possessed with Hongo—a spirit medium through whom Bokero (chief deity at Kibesa) communicated with his adherents. Kinjikitile convinced his followers that he had been instructed by the ancestors to unite the ethnic groups and lead an anti-European revolt. His movement combined local beliefs in divinity, spirit possession, and medicine and merged them into a new idea that encouraged territorial leadership, interethnic unity, and divine protection. These ideas, which earned him wide acceptance in the region, helped galvanize the anticolonial Maji-Maji rebellion of 1905–1907 in Tanganyika. Kinjikitile gave his followers maji (water or war medicine) that was supposed to render them invulnerable to bullets from their German oppressors. He also anointed local leaders with the water and encouraged them to spread his message to every community in the region.

Southeastern Tanzania had historically been subjected to fluctuations in the fortune of the Rufiji River. For instance, high waters could result in flooding and social disruption, and inadequate water affected crop and fish production. Thus with the socioeconomic tensions that were associated with German rule, there was widespread belief that crops would flourish and that plantations would be spared from the ravages of wild pigs and other animals if sprinkled with the maji. Even people outside the cotton and Bokero cult region hoped that the water would protect them against witchcraft attacks and sickness and provide commercial success. The multipurpose utility of the maji enabled Kinjikitile's followers to use it to address problems as they arose, hence a large region was primed to rebel.

Kinjikitile's tactic, which not only recognized the importance of the river but also incorporated war efforts, impacted on adherents of indigenous religion as well as Muslims and Christians. Pilgrims flooded to Ngarambe to collect maji to the point that it became a commodity sold for money and textiles. Because of the diffused state structure in the area, however, Kinjikitile's grip over his followers was weak. Therefore, rather than waiting for him to declare the commencement of the revolt, the people looked to local rulers and priests, who acted as Kinjikitile's deputies and representatives. As the instigator of the revolt, Kinjikitile was arrested very early in the rebellion and hanged on August 4, 1905. Despite this, his message spread, and the revolt continued over the next two years, resulting in the massacre of about 250,000 people.

Kitamura Sayo

Japanese religion founder

Founder of the new Japanese religious movement called Tenshō Kōtai Jingū Kyō (Religion of the shrine of the sun goddess), Kitamura Sayo is venerated by her followers as the incarnation of the Shinto deity Tenshō Kōtai Jingū.

Kitamura Sayo was born in 1900 in the town of Yanai in Yamaguchi prefecture. At the age of twenty-one, she was married to a farmer in the village of Tabuse, where she had to endure various hardships. Consequently, she turned to religious and ascetic practices until, in 1944, she finally experienced a sudden possession (kamigakari) by the absolute god of the universe, who later revealed itself as the deity Tenshō Kōtai Jingū. Tenshō Kōtai Jingū is thought to be identical to the main deity of Shinto, the sun goddess Amaterasu Ōmikami. In the following year, Kitamura Sayo claimed to be chosen by this deity, who took its shrine in her to save the world by promoting world peace and establishing the realm of god on earth.

Thereafter, Kitamura Sayo engaged in proselytizing activities and in preaching the teachings of Tenshō Kōtai Jingū Kyō, which combine mainly elements of Buddhism and Shinto in a syncretistic manner, centering around the notion that this world, which is thought to be in a poor condition as a result of the egoism of humankind, should be transformed into a land of God in which peace prevails and people are able to live as the children of God. It was out of this thinking that Kitamura Sayo developed a highly critical stance against the rulers of Japan, including the tenno (emperor), and against the Shin sect of Pure Land Buddhism, which she criticized openly. She is credited by her followers with various miracles and cases of faith healing. She is also referred to as the dancing goddess (odoru kamisama) because she propagated ecstatic dance as a means of religious practice. Tenshō Kōtai Jingū Kyō is commonly known as the dancing religion (odoru shūkyō).

After Kitamura Sayo's death ("ascension" in the view of her followers) in 1967, her granddaughter Kiyokazu (born 1950) succeeded her as the religious leader of Tenshō Kōtai Jingū Kyō. The life and teachings of Kitamura Sayo are recorded in the Seisho (Book of life), which constitutes the canonical scripture of Tenshō Kōtai Jingū Kyō. Kitamura Sayo is venerated as a living god (ikigami) and referred to as a great goddess (ōgamisama) by a large discipleship, presently including more than 465,000 followers all over Japan. She also has followers in many other countries.

Kivebulaya, Apolo

(c. 1864–1933 C.E.)

Anglican missionary, apostle to Pygmies

Apolo Kivebulaya was a Ugandan missionary to Boga, a territory across the Ruwenzori Mountains that was first considered to be part of Uganda but in 1915 was transferred to the Belgian Congo. His dedication, holiness, suffering, and poverty made him a saint. Born in 1864, he started his life as a Muslim. He became a soldier and a hemp addict and was strongly opposed to Christianity as a young man, but he converted to the Christian faith after reading the Gospel of Matthew under the direction of Anglican missionaries. Like many of the early converts in Uganda, after his baptism he became a church teacher and evangelist.

In 1896, Kivebulaya started his missionary work in Boga, across the Ruwenzori ("Mountains of the Moon"), equipped with only his Bible and his hoe. His message was well received by some, but the king forbade his subjects to give him food. When he was beaten and left for dead, a local woman found him and secretly nursed him back to life. Falsely accused of being involved in the accidental death of the king's sister in 1898, he was sent to Uganda to be tried. While in prison, he had a vision of Christ, who encouraged him to continue his work. With much delay, his innocence was finally proven, and King Tabaro welcomed him back and even became a Christian. Kivebulaya and the king became close friends.

Kivebulaya was ordained a priest in 1903, and after 1915 he settled for good in Boga to strengthen the church there and to reach out to the people of the forest. In 1932, the first Bambuti Pygmies were baptized and Kivebulaya became known as the "apostle to the Pygmies." He died on January 30, 1933.

Kivebulaya is a highly respected figure in the region in which he worked. His dying message was the commission to take the gospel further to those forest people who had not yet been reached. Today Boga has its own bishop and is one of the six dioceses of the Anglican province of Congo. In 1977, the postal service of Uganda honored him with a special stamp, and the worldwide Anglican communion made him a saint. January 30 is his feast day.

Kodōjin (Fukuda Toshiyasu, Seishō, Haritsu)

Daoist aesthete

A Japanese literati painter and poet, Kodōjin balanced modern life and the ideals of Chinese Daoism. Born in Shingū, Wakayama prefecture, in 1865, he was the second son of Nakamura Jun'ichi. Adopted by a childless family, he grew up as Fukuda Toshiyasu. He apparently composed his first haiku at age four, but Chinese poetry dominated his youth. At fifteen, he left home for Osaka, then Kyoto, where he studied kanshi (Chinese poetry written by Japanese) and painting. After a few years of study alone back in Shingū, in the early 1890s he went to Tokyo. There, as a disciple of Masaoka Shiki (1867–1902), the reformer of haiku and tanka, he received his haiku pen name, Haritsu (Bundled Chestnuts). He was also known as Kodōjin (Old Daoist) in literati painting and tanka, and Seishō (Quiet Place) in kanshi. After marrying Yoshiyama Misu, the daughter of a scholar, in 1899, in 1901 he moved to Kyoto, where he lived until his death in 1944. The couple had four children.

Kodōjin lived reclusively and often refused to sell his paintings and calligraphy, which were much prized by those who knew his work. He preferred to make his slim living as a teacher of Chinese poetry and, occasionally, haiku. He spent most of his time studying Chinese classics. Among his friends were prominent haiku poets, painters, classical scholars, and Buddhist monks. To some he seemed a latter-day Han Shan or Shi De (or Shih-te, both fl. 640), and his kanshi often allude to Zhuangzi (Chuang Tzu, c. 369–286) and Tao Qian (or T'ao Ch'ien, 365–427), the prototypical Daoist poet. Kodōjin was known for his voluntary poverty and the Daoist ideals that governed his life. During World War II, he became weak and malnourished but continued to donate to charity and refused to patronize the rampant black market.

Although some haiku from Kodōjin's forties employ radically free form and images of modern life, his kanshi frequently read like classic Chinese poetry in the Daoist or Chan Buddhist tradition. In one kanshi, he summarizes his own way thus (translation by Jonathan Chavez):

Intoxication, sobriety—both suit me fine!

—Truth's flavor savored, serene, forgetting words.

Kōgaku Sōen*See Shaku SōenKolbe, Maximilian(1894–1941 C.E.)Roman Catholic priest, martyr*

The Kolbes were a family of weavers and third-order Franciscans who cultivated ardent piety and patriotism under Russian rule. Under the influence of the Franciscan mission in the parish of Pabianice, three of the Kolbe children entered the seminary of the Conventual Franciscans in Lviv around the turn of the twentieth century. One of these was Raymond Kolbe, born in 1894, who entered the seminary in 1907 along with his brother Francis. Raymond took the name Maximilian on September 4, 1910, as he became a Franciscan novice. The other brother, Joseph, entered the seminary that same year. In 1911, Maximilian professed his first vows. He was soon sent to Rome to study philosophy at the Gregorian University (1912–1915) and theology at the Collegio Serafico, obtaining doctorates in both. In the meantime, as Maximilian Maria, he professed his solemn vows in 1914; he was ordained a priest on April 28, 1918.

Still as a deacon, Maximilian founded a Marian movement called Militia Immaculatae (Militia of the Immaculate One)—a spiritual and educational movement dedicated to apostolic work. In Poland, the Militia opened its own printing press, which circulated periodicals, daily newspapers, and numerous catechetical and devotional writings to more than 1 million people. In the fall of 1927, Father Kolbe obtained land just west of Warsaw from Prince Jan Drucki-Lubecki and there established an evangelization center and soon the largest Catholic religious house of the time (762 members in 1939), which he called Niepokalanow, the “City of the Immaculata.” Mindful of his apostolic mission, he envisioned Marian centers in every country and set out to Asia, where he founded friaries, seminaries, and printing houses in Japan and India. The bold initiative of a worldwide movement, however, was thwarted by lack of funds.

On the eve of the Nazi threat, after Father Maximilian was recalled to Poland in June 1936 to supervise the original Niepokalanow, the center intensified its didactic and apostolic activity within Poland. With the German invasion of September 1939, the friary was dissolved, and its members heeded the call of the Polish authorities to serve the Polish Red Cross. In the same month, the Nazis arrested Father Kolbe along with thirty-seven other brothers who remained in Niepokalanow. After the friars were released in December 1939, they resumed their charitable work. The friary sheltered more than 3,000 displaced Poles during the war until it was closed down in February 1941.

Together with four companions, Maximilian was taken to the Gestapo prison in Warsaw and then transported to Auschwitz, where he was tattooed with the number 16670. While working in the camp, he ministered to other prisoners, secretly heard confessions, held mass, and delivered communion, using smuggled bread and wine. At the end of July, in retribution for an escape from Kolbe’s bunker, Commandant Karl Fritsch sentenced ten prisoners to death by starvation. Father Kolbe offered to die for one of the condemned and was placed together with the other prisoners in starvation chamber number eighteen. After two weeks, four men were still alive, among them Maximilian. They were killed with injections of carbolic acid on August 14, 1941, their bodies cremated the following day. On October 17, 1971, Maximilian was beatified by Pope Paul VI, and on October 10, 1982, he was canonized by Pope John Paul II, who proclaimed him a “martyr of charity.”

Kongzi*See ConfuciusKrishnaHindu god, hero, avatar*

Krishna is a multifaceted figure in Indian mythology. Nowadays, he is—along with Rama—one of the most worshipped deities in northern India. He is mainly known from the great Sanskrit epic Mahabharata (dating in its present form from about the fourth century), which tells the story of the eighteen days of war between two clans of a royal family, the Pandavas and the Kauravas. Several times, Krishna plays decisive roles in this story, influencing the heroes on both sides of the warring parties, more often than not spinning cunning intrigues that serve to increase the enmity and hatred between the parties rather than to pacify them. In fact, in most of these episodes, Krishna appears to be a human hero and not yet deified.

One episode tells, for instance, how Yudhishtira, the eldest of the Pandava brothers, performs a great sacrifice to which all allied kings and chieftains are invited. When at the end of it Yudhishtira wants to give the first gift of honor to Krishna, Shishupala, the king of Cedi, protests—and in the resulting quarrel is killed by Krishna. Another episode describes the five Pandavas in exile after a fateful game of dice in which Yudhishtira loses everything to the Kaurava Duryodhana. Krishna is the first to visit them in the forest. He suggests that they fight Duryodhana and reinstall Yudhishtira in power. On later visits, again and again Krishna tries to instigate Yudhishtira to take up the fight. When war between the Kauravas and the Pandavas finally appears inevitable, both sides try to gain as many allies as possible. The Kaurava Duryodhana even attempts to win Krishna over to his camp, arriving at Krishna's place while Krishna is sleeping. Shortly after Duryodhana's arrival, Arjuna, one of the Pandava brothers, arrives there, too. When Krishna wakes up, he first sees Arjuna, but then realizes that Duryodhana was there first. He decides to extend his help to both the parties and gives Duryodhana a choice: He can get Krishna's advice, or he can receive help from the army of the Yadavas. Duryodhana chooses the army—hence Arjuna qualifies for Krishna's advice. This decision results in the most famous episode of the entire epic: The Bhagavad Gita is Krishna's advice to Arjuna.

The Bhagavad Gita is situated in the text at the point where the Pandava hero Arjuna descends onto the battlefield for the first time. When he sees the opposing forces and recognizes among them his own relatives and former teachers, he lets his weapons sink and becomes reluctant to go into battle because he does not want to kill his kinsmen. At that moment, his charioteer—who is none other than Krishna—steps forth and instructs Arjuna about his duty as a warrior who is engaged in a dharmic (morally justified) war: He must fight the war and not shy away from the action.

The teaching touches upon many topics, probably most important among them being instruction on different possible ways to God. There are three of these. Jnana yoga, the way of knowledge, is the highest and most difficult way, fit only for people who are able to comprehend highly abstract ideas and concepts. Karma yoga is the way toward God through action, but not just any way of acting can lead to God. Karma yoga requires the individual to carry out those actions that are considered one's duty while remaining entirely disinterested in these actions and their results. In other words, one should be fully detached from the action. Bhakti yoga is the way of loving devotion. This is the way most of the common people choose. Bhakti yoga demands that one feels loving devotion toward God. It is the way for more simple minds for people who have not yet developed higher intellectual faculties and gained the ability to understand highly abstract concepts. Bhakti yoga easily combines with ritualistic temple worship.

A later addition to the Mahabharata, the Harivamsha, tells the legendary biography of Krishna, now considered one of the ten incarnations of the god Vishnu. He is considered to have grown up among herdsmen, where he performed a multitude of miraculous and heroic deeds. Later texts (also in vernacular languages) deal with episodes of this mythology. It is difficult to connect this Krishna to the Krishna known from the Mahabharata itself, where—but for the Bhagavad Gita episode—he does not show any divine characteristics but is as human as the human heroes surrounding him.

Krishnamurti, Jiddu

Hindu teacher

Jiddu Krishnamurti was one of numerous Indian teachers of the twentieth century who had a considerable impact on Western audiences. The first third of his life was inextricably linked with the Theosophical Society (TS), a curious amalgam of "Eastern mysticism" and Western esoterica created by the charismatic Russian clairvoyant Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891). The mission of the TS was to weave a synthesis of science, religion, and philosophy by drawing upon an anthropology and metaphysics that assumed latent, occult powers both in the human person and in the universe. Concerning the latter, a host of "Tibetan masters" were said to channel secret wisdom through Blavatsky and other leaders of the TS, including C. W. Leadbeater. It was Leadbeater who discovered Krishnamurti on the Adyar beach in 1909, and, struck by his "aura," immediately suggested to Annie Besant, then the leader of the TS, that this radiant Telegu brahmin boy might be the coming World Teacher. Messianic teaching had been advanced by the Esoteric Section of the TS and later by a group known as the Order of the Star of the East.

The youthful Krishnamurti, who had been born in 1895, came under the care of the TS, being carefully groomed by Leadbeater, Besant, and others. In 1925, Besant formally declared Krishnamurti to be the messiah, but in 1929, Krishnamurti publicly repudiated such claims, rejecting all forms of institutional organization, hierarchy, tradition, scriptures, and even teachers as subtle and not-so-subtle escapes from the hard work of self-realization. Truth, he declared, is a pathless land, demanding personal authenticity and responsibility, which the stultifying program of "religious tradition” betrays. In this appeal to an “inner revolution,” an inward turning to subjective experience and awareness, Krishnamurti’s inspiration recalls the exhortation of the Buddha to his disciples: “Be a lamp unto yourself”; that is, test all teachings by the truth of experience. There is, Krishnamurti often admonished, no “second-hand enlightenment.”

There are further parallels in the teaching of Krishnamurti to other long-standing and even contemporary expressions of Indian thought. The most obvious is that of the Advaita Vedanta, a nondualistic school of philosophy that was systematized by the eighth-century thinker Shankara. Though Krishnamurti rejected the institutional, cultural, and linguistic matrix of all “tradition,” even Hindu traditions, his philosophy clearly has a nondualistic emphasis. Krishnamurti repeatedly drew attention to the “space” between thought, a space in which all distinctions dissolve and that issues in an experience of profound unity and freedom. Distinctions emerging from subject/object dichotomies are the cause of suffering; resolving those distinctions into that quiet space brings freedom. His nondualism, freed from the jargon of Advaita, represents a particularly modern form of classical Indian philosophy, one that shares striking parallels, in substance, if not in style, to that of Ramana Maharshi, a contemporary of Krishnamurti. Both were south Indian brahmins who were profoundly shaped by “mystical” experiences at an early age; the formative experiences in both cases implied a nondual awareness in which the limited ego is surrendered.

Ramana, however, remained at his ashram for his entire life, while Krishnamurti, elegant, urbane, and sophisticated, traveled frequently around the world giving lectures at many universities and cultural centers.

Krishnananda Agamavagisa

(17th cent. C.E.)

Hindu writer

worship in eastern India. His renowned Tantrasara (The essence of the tantras) is a 5,000-verse compendium of ritual and lore culled from various Sanskrit tantras (philosophical and ritual texts on the esoteric worship of goddesses and gods) popular in Bengal, Assam, and Orissa. Although the digest covers a number of deities, male and female, it is likely that Agamavagisa’s reason for writing it was to make public, or to advertise, the goddess traditions that were under threat of extinction in the wave of enthusiasm for Krishna in seventeenth-century Bengal.

Agamavagisa’s success in this venture is indicated not only by the continued influence of the text but also by the large number of Bengali translations from the Sanskrit that have been published since his day. Raja Krishnacandra Ray of Nadia (1728–1782), the most important goddess-worshipping patron of the arts and religion in the eighteenth century, viewed himself in conformity with Agamavagisa’s project. Aside from commissioning Bengali translations of the Tantrasara, he also patronized the poet-saint Ramprasad Sen, an ardent devotee of the goddess Kali, paid for the erection of many goddess temples, and urged people in his districts to celebrate the annual festivals to the goddesses Kali and Durga.

Because of Agamavagisa’s literary importance and key role in popularizing goddess worship, a number of legends have become associated with his name. The most important of these concerns his part in standardizing the now-common iconographic form of the goddess Kali. Kali appears to him in a dream announcing that he should publicize her image exactly as she reveals it to him the next day. Accordingly, when he sees a young servant girl slapping cow dung on a hut wall to dry, her body curved, her arms stretched, and her tongue stuck out in embarrassment at his presence, he realizes that he has seen Kali’s preferred silhouette. Other legends profess his superhuman abilities, gained through tantric meditation and worship—for instance, his ability, when tested, to turn a dark night into one illuminated by a brilliant full moon.

Ksitigarbha

Buddhist bodhisattva

One of the eight great bodhisattvas (enlightened beings) in Buddhism, Ksitigarbha was little known in Indian literature, gaining recognition only later in China. Often referred to as the “bodhisattva of hell” or “savior of the damned,” Ksitigarbha (Dizang in Chinese; Jizo in Japanese) enjoyed increasing popularity in China from the sixth century on, and entire temples came to be devoted to his worship. Textual sources for Ksitigarbha can be traced back to Indian Pali and Sanskrit works, although the cult of Ksitigarbha was unknown in India and central Asia. Yet by the medieval period in China, the predominant works relating to the underworld, or “hell,” involved the worship of Ksitigarbha, usually in conjunction with Buddhist rituals related to the ten kings of hell. The ten kings are Chinese Buddhist interpolations based on apocryphal sutras, perhaps created in response to Chinese concerns for the dead.

One of the most popular representations of Ksitigarbha in China and Japan was that of a monk carrying a six-ringed staff as well as a miraculous jewel, objects used to open up the gates of hell and light the darkness for the suffering souls therein. Others depict Ksitigarbha as overseer of hell with the ten kings in attendance, and Ksitigarbha in princely attire befitting his rank as a bodhisattva. Ksitigarbha swore a vow to save the damned, and because of this he is considered the true ruler of hell, capable of releasing loved ones from their torments, provided their descendants participate in periodic Buddhist rituals. Chapter seven of the Chinese text Sutra on the Origins of Dizang Bodhisattva is devoted to an explanation of blessings to be received by the living who have rituals said for the dead, who make images of Ksitigarbha, or who take refuge in him for but one moment.

Kukai

(774–835 C.E.)

Buddhist school founder

Kukai (posthumously Kôbô Daishi) was the founder of the Japanese Shingon (True Word) school of Buddhism. The Shingon doctrine is based on the Dainichi-kyô (Mahavairocana Sutra, in Sanskrit) and the Kongôcho-kyô (Vajrasekhara Sutra). The basic concept for this esoteric faith is that the Buddha possesses a phenomenal body (nirmanakaya) and an ineffable body (dharmakaya). The buddha Dainichi (Vairocana), the solar buddha of light and truth, is the central deity in Shingon faith. The historical exoteric Buddha Shakyamuni and the esoteric Buddha Dainichi are identical because, according to Shingon doctrine, Dainichi is a manifestation of Shakyamuni idealized as dharmakaya, “who is neither born nor dies.” Shingon’s idea of the nonduality of the Buddha (that is, the idea that the phenomenal and the transcendental bodies are not separate entities but different manifestations of the same absolute principle) found artistic expression under Kukai in the form of two esoteric mandalas (cosmic diagrams of the Buddhist pantheon): the Kongôkai (Diamond world mandala), representing the transcendental aspect, and the Taizôkai (Womb world mandala), representing the phenomenal aspect.

According to Kukai, anyone can attain enlightenment in this very existence through contemplation on these mandalas. The believer visualizes the symbols of the mandalas and in so doing learns the three mysteries of body, word, and thought, which cannot be expressed in words. Through chanting mantras (mystic syllables) and practicing mudras (hand gestures) used in esoteric meditation and ritual, believers communicate with the deities.

In 804, Kukai went to China to study esoteric Shingon Buddhism at its source with the Chinese master, Huiguô (746–805), who is considered the eighth Shingon patriarch. After his return to Japan in 806, Kukai joined the monastery Jingô-ji in Kyoto, where he lectured on the Shingon doctrine and performed Shingon initiation ceremonies for the next fifteen years. In 816, Kukai petitioned Emperor Saga (r. 809–823) for a grant of land on Mount Kôya, south of present-day Osaka in Wakayama prefecture, where he built his monastery Kongôbu-ji. It was only in 823, the year after the death of Saichô (767–822), founder of the Japanese Tendai school of Buddhism, that Kukai was given a temple in the Kyoto capital. He converted Tô-ji, as it is still commonly known today, from traditional Buddhism to a teaching center for the Shingon sect, renaming it Kyôgokoku-ji (Temple for the defense of the nation by means of the king of doctrines). It houses the oldest esoteric mandalas in Japan, the Kongôkai and the Taizôkai, as well as various other works of esoteric Buddhist art designated as national treasures. Kukai died in 835, but Shingon remained the dominant school of Buddhist thought in Japan through the tenth century.

Kumarajiva

Buddhist monk, translator

One of the greatest Buddhist translators of Sanskrit works into Chinese, Kumarajiva became a model for the scholarly, pious, and philosophical monk. He was born in Serindia in the city of Kucha in central Asia in 344. According to legend, his father was an emigrant Indian aristocrat and an ex-monk, whereas his mother was a Kuchean princess who became a nun when he was seven years old. He accompanied his mother for two years at her convent.

The early places at which he studied Buddhism were centers of the Sarvastivadin school of the tradition, but he eventually converted to Mahayana Buddhism. Ordained at twenty years of age, he spent two additional years studying Mahayana scriptures. The Chinese captured him during a military campaign in 383. This afforded him an opportunity to study the Chinese language until he was liberated. By 401, he was in the city of Chang-an, where he spent the remainder of his life teaching and translating. The religious authorities placed him in charge of the entire process of translating Buddhist texts into Chinese in 402. He died in 413.

By the seventh century, Kumarajiva had been credited with translating more than a hundred titles. But a sixth-century catalog attributed only about thirty-five titles to him. The bulk of the works that he was credited with translating were related to the Mahayana philosophy of emptiness, although he was also credited with translating some devotional texts. Five works on meditation were also attributed to him. Moreover, he is given credit for additions made to the monastic literature of the Chinese canon. His various translations demonstrated his primary interest in the philosophy of emptiness and a wide variety of other topics. He was even credited with translating the legendary lives of Nagarjuna (c. 150–250), founder of the Madhyamaka school of thought, and Vasubandhu (fourth and fifth centuries), a great Yogacara philosopher. Many of his translations were begun at the request of a disciple or donor.

The Buddhist tradition gave Kumarajiva credit for founding the classical Chinese Buddhist school of Sanlun (Three Treatise school), even though this was probably not historically accurate. Nonetheless, the Three Treatise school referred to two texts composed by the Madhyamaka philosopher Nagarjuna, the Madhyamika-sastra (Middle stanzas) and the Dvadasadvara (Twelve topics). The third text was attributed to a follower of Nagarjuna named Aryadeva and entitled Satasastra (Hundred treatise).

Kumazawa Banzan

Confucian scholar

Kumazawa Banzan stands out in the history of Japanese Confucian thought for his unusual combination of Mencian moral idealism with political pragmatism and his deep concern for spiritual cultivation along with a flexible, empirical attitude toward the pursuit of knowledge. Though his teachings aroused considerable opposition among the guardians of orthodoxy in the seventeenth century, many who met him or read his works came to regard him as a man of great wisdom.

Born in 1619, at the age of eight Banzan was adopted as heir by his maternal grandfather, a samurai in the service of Mito domain, where Banzan was educated until 1634. He then entered the service of Ikeda Mitsumasa (1609–1682), governor of Okayama domain. Determined to become a model samurai (and to lose weight), he undertook a strict regimen of self-discipline and training in the martial arts. In 1638, after being criticized for disobeying his lord's orders, he resigned his position on the grounds that "in the service of a lord one has no free time at all, so one is not able to practice the literary and martial arts."

It was at this time that Banzan resolved to devote himself to learning, and he soon went to Kyoto in search of a teacher. One day he happened to hear a fellow lodger mention a teacher named Nakae Tōju who lived in Ogawa village in Ōmi, and he immediately set out to pay him a visit. After much imploring, Tōju agreed to meet with him, but it took another visit in the winter before Tōju agreed to give him instruction. The two became very close, but Banzan was only able to study under Tōju for some six months, as he had to return to Kirihara in about 1642 to support his struggling family. They continued, however, to exchange ideas by letter.

In 1644 or 1645, Banzan was again engaged as a personal attendant to Mitsumasa. Around this time he received transmission of Tōju's instruction regarding Wang Yang-ming's (1472–1529) teaching on the innate knowledge of the good, as a result of which, he wrote, he was able to “acquire great strength in the method of mental discipline [shinpō].” Banzan was charged with lecturing to Mitsumasa's family and chief retainers on Tōju's teachings regarding the way of the samurai as articulated in his work Okina Mondō (Questions and answers with an old man). He also advised Mitsumasa in matters of governmental policy. In 1651, Mitsumasa managed to rally his three chief councillors around Banzan's “learning of the mind” (shingaku), giving Banzan's ideas a pivotal role in the domainal government. However, Mitsumasa's hereditary vassals became alarmed at Banzan's rapid rise in rank and his criticisms of domainal administration. Moreover, several plots against officials were uncovered, and Banzan was implicated when two interrogated leaders of the plot reported that they admired his teachings. On this basis, the Neo-Confucian philosopher Razan (1583–1657) argued that Banzan was seducing the ignorant into forming seditious cliques. Mitsumasa, however, did not lose his trust in Banzan, and the two worked hand in hand in directing relief and reconstruction after a serious flood and famine in 1654.

Banzan's early writings exhibited the strong contemplative bent of Tōju's late teachings, but through his hands-on experience in administrative reform and economic reconstruction he came to believe that Tōju's late teachings were not fully mature. He felt that the essence of extending one's innate knowledge of the good lay in distinguishing what sort of action constitutes “perfect goodness” in practical administrative situations based on a grasp of the concrete, objective circumstances of “time, place, and rank”—an idea that Tōju had emphasized in his middle period.

Banzan resigned in 1657, and in 1661 he moved with his family to Kyoto, where he fraternized with court nobles and studied the courtly traditions of music and literature. In time, however, he was accused of leading the nobles astray with his shingaku teachings, and in 1667 the shogunal deputy banished him from Kyoto. In his later years, Banzan remained somewhat of an exile, but he was free to travel to Kyoto and Okayama as he wished—until 1687, when he was confined by the bakufu (military government) to house arrest for his alarming predictions of an impending Manchu invasion. The work that caused suspicion, Daigaku wakumon (Questions on the Great Learning), has been called “probably the most distinguished analysis of Japanese society and economy to come from seventeenth-century Japan” (McMullen 1979, 338).

Banzan's writings were admired by many later Confucian scholars, and his reverence for the traditional culture of the court prefigures some aspects of the later development of the National Learning school and imperial loyalism.

Kunawi, Sadr al-Din al-

Muslim mystic, philosopher

Sadr al-Din Muhammad ibn Ishaq ibn Muhammad ibn Yunus al-Kunawi is the most famous disciple of Ibn al-‘Arabi and the first important figure of the school founded by his master. As a prolific writer of influential works, Kunawi is credited with spreading Ibn al-‘Arabi's teachings and making substantial contributions to the development of a rigorous sufi metaphysics in Islam. Kunawi's relationship with Ibn al-‘Arabi is well recorded. In fact, Ibn al-‘Arabi married Kunawi's widowed mother, and Kunawi stayed with and served his master until the master's death in 1240.

Kunawi was born in 1207—in Konya, as his title “Kunawi” suggests—where he received his early education. It was also here that Kunawi became a madrasa professor, teaching traditional subjects. He was extremely well versed in Islamic studies, and in fact his collection of forty esoteric sayings of the prophet Muhammad is still a widely circulated book. In addition to his meticulous scholarship, Kunawi is also known for his spiritual visions. Compared to other Muslim mystics, Kunawi's style is more vigorous and less ecstatic, and this may partly be due to his philosophical predilection. The fact that Kunawi was a member of the school of Ibn al-‘Arabi as a writer and a devoted disciple does not seem to have deterred him from venturing into purely philosophical and metaphysical subjects. This is clearly shown by his famous correspondence with Nasir al-Din at-Tusi (1201–1274), the philosopher-scientist credited with attempting to revive peripatetic philosophy in the thirteenth century.

Although Kunawi's works follow closely the teaching of Ibn al-‘Arabi, his style ushered in a new genre of metaphysical writing in Islam. While Ibn al-‘Arabi's corpus deals with virtually every aspect of spiritual life, Kunawi appears to be deliberately selective, focusing mostly on philosophical issues. This can be regarded as a step toward combining realized knowledge, or gnosis, with logical-discursive thinking—a tendency that can be seen in the likes of Suhrawardi (d. 1191), the founder of the School of Illumination, and Mulla Sadra (d. 1640), the last great figure of this tradition. In some ways, Kunawi is credited with “sys-tematizing” Ibn al-‘Arabi’s vast body of teachings into a primarily mystical metaphysics. This, however, has not prevented his followers and others from seeing him as a sanctified sage and philosopher.

The central theme of Kunawi’s metaphysics is the question of being (wujud). Like his teacher, Kunawi interprets being as a mercy from God through which one can gain proximity to the divine. The world of existence is construed as hierarchical, based on the various degrees and stations of being. Kunawi’s epistemology is predicated upon what Ibn al-‘Arabi calls unveiling (kashf), which can be interpreted as a subcategory of spiritual hermeneutics. The concept of unveiling assumes that veritable knowledge can be attained only by removing the obstacles that stand between the truth and the self. In this view, knowledge or truth is not constructed but discovered. Spiritual training and purification is essential for knowledge because it is only by refining the soul that one can develop one’s faculties to receive the reality of things as they are. Moreover, knowledge is defined as an alchemical process whereby the knower becomes united with his object of knowledge, whose ultimate reality resides not in the mind or in things themselves but in the world of the eternal archetypes, that is, the Platonic Forms.

Kuncewicz, Josaphat

Uniate Christian monk, archbishop, martyr

Josaphat Kuncewicz was born in Volodymyr in Volyn, Lithuania, around 1580. Baptized Johannes Kunczyc, he grew up in a pious family of Orthodox town-dwellers and received an early education at an Orthodox catechetical school there. For the Ruthenian Church, it was a gloomy period of ignorance, demoralization, divisions, and intolerance. The Union of Berest’ in 1596 had left the schismatic Orthodox clergy hostile and full of hatred toward the proponents of reconciliation with Rome. The few adherents of the union gathered in the Vilnian Church of the Trinity, where in 1599 the young Josaphat, by then an apprentice, was introduced to Catholicism. Under the spiritual direction of such Uniate and Jesuit thinkers as Genady Khmel’nitsky, Peter Arkudiusz, Welamin Rutsky, and Hipacy Pocij, Josaphat entered the Basilian order at the age of twenty-four and after five years of theological study was ordained a priest. Entrusted with superintending the novitiate, where his extraordinary zeal and kindness soon attracted converts, he labored intensely to enkindle enthusiasm for the Catholic faith among the divided Ruthenians.

The esteem that the saint gained for his knowledge, preaching talent, austerity of life, and sacrificial work in the community allowed the Uniate church to grow rapidly. In the position of first bishop (consecrated November 1617) and then archbishop of Polotsk (1618), he was a model administrator and reformer, greatly contributing to the regeneration of religious life in the country. However, the schismatic party, including Josaphat’s particularly active antagonist, Meletius Smotryckyj, confronted this fruitful labor of the Uniates with a growing enmity, manifested after 1621 in riots and rebellions in Ruthenian towns. The accumulated hatred erupted again on November 12, 1623, when with an ax-stroke and two bullets an enraged crowd in Vitebsk, Russia, claimed the saint’s life.

The cult of St. Josaphat, who was beatified in 1642 and canonized by Pope Pius IX in 1867, reinforced the Catholic Church in Rus’ and allowed it to survive the centuries of tsarist persecution. His feast day is November 12.

Kunga Nyingpo (Tibetan: Sa chen kun dga’ snying po)

Buddhist master

The first of the five patriarchs of the Sa skya lineage (Tib.: sa skya gong ma lnga) of Tibetan Buddhism, Kunga Nyingpo was more commonly known as Sa chen kun dga’ snying po, or simply “Sa chen” (The great one from Sa skya). His father, Dkon mchog rgyal po (1034–1102), founded Sa skya monastery in southwestern Tibet in 1073. Sa chen, born in 1092, had a vision of the bodhisattva Manjushri at age twelve. From him he received the verse called “Zhen pa bzhi bral” (Parting from the four attachments).

Sa chen’s teachers were his father, Ba ri lo tsa ba (1040–c. 1111), and especially Se ston kun rig (1029–1116) and Zhang ston Chos 'bar (1053–1135), from whom he received the Lam 'bras (Path and result) teachings. Sa chen's writings on the Lam 'bras were his greatest contribution to Tibetan culture.

From among Sa chen's many students, two of his three sons are the most famous: Bsod nams rtse mo (1142–1182) and Grags pa rgyal mtshan (1147–1216). The present Sa skya khri 'dzin Ngag dbang kun dga' (1945–), known to his students as his holiness Sakya Trizin, is the forty-first throne-holder of Sa skya and a direct descendant of Sa chen.

Kunigunde

Christian empress

Kunigunde was a German empress who has been venerated since her death on March 3, 1033. Wife of emperor and saint Henry II, Kunigunde was known for her exemplary life and her foundation of the Benedictine convent at Kaufungen in Hesse, which she entered after her husband's death. She had no children, and according to her late twelfth-century vita, she and Henry took vows of virginity on their wedding day. Her vita was written in 1199 to accompany a request for her canonization, and Pope Innocent III canonized her in the following year.

Kunigunde's parents, Sigfried, count of Luxembourg, and his wife Hedwig, gave their daughter a religious education as a child. She married Henry, duke of Bavaria, in 999, and he became king of Germany in 1002. In 1013, they went together to Rome to receive the titles of emperor and empress from Pope Benedict VIII. Later legend tells that at some point during their marriage, Kunigunde was accused of scandalous behavior. To Henry's relief, she defended her innocence by surviving an ordeal of walking over red-hot plowshares without injury.

Partly through the encouragement of his wife, Henry founded the monastery and bishopric at Bamberg in 1007. It was lavishly endowed and became important for its close links with the imperial chapel and chancery and for its prestigious schools. Kunigunde's convent at Kaufungen was nearly finished when Henry died in June 1024. His death marked the end of the male Saxon line, and until his successor, Conrad II, was elected, Kunigunde held the reins of the kingdom's government. During the interim, she directed all of her energies into preserving her husband's memory and legacy. Upon the election of Conrad, Kunigunde handed over the royal symbols she had kept and transferred the political power she had held as queen and widow to him.

According to her vita, Kunigunde celebrated the first anniversary of her husband's death by inviting a number of churchmen to the dedication of Kaufungen. When the gospel had been sung at mass, she offered at the altar a piece of the True Cross, a relic believed to be from the cross that Jesus Christ was crucified on. Then, taking off her imperial robes, she took the nun's habit and received the veil. Once she entered the convent, it was reported that she forgot her past rank and spent the rest of her days praying, reading, and comforting the sick. She spent her remaining wealth on the diocese of Bamberg, most likely to support her husband's cult and preserve his memory.

Upon her death in 1033, her body was taken to Bamberg to be buried next to her husband's. Many miracles were reported to have occurred along the way.

Ladislás

(c. 1040–1095 C.E.)

Christian king

One of the most popular Hungarian saints, Ladislás (Hung.: László), king of Hungary (r. 1077–1095), was the embodiment of the ideal Christian knight. He was canonized in 1192; his feast day is June 27.

Ladislás I belonged to the Árpáadian dynasty and was the son of King Béla I and the Polish princess Richeza. He was born in about 1040 in Poland and ascended the throne of Hungary in 1077 after decades of internal power struggle within the newly founded Christian monarchy. The two decades of his rule brought consolidation and relative peace, which was further preserved with the introduction of several new laws regarding the protection of private property and the judiciary system. The new cathedrals (Várad [today Oradea, Romania], Zagreb) and monasteries he founded, along with the canonization of his predecessors, King Stephen I and his son Emeric in 1083, strengthened the position of Christianity in the country. Chronicles and legends report on different aspects of his life. The emerging picture shows Ladislás living a virtuous life and defending his church and country against the invading nomadic peoples.

Ladislás died in 1095 and was buried at the cathedral of Várad. After his death, many healing miracles were associated with him and his burial place. As a result, he was officially canonized in 1192, and shortly thereafter, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, his legend was written. Várad became the center of his cult and his head was put on display there in a marvelous reliquary bust. Apart from individual cult images, the most characteristic medieval depiction of Ladislás shows him in the 1068 battle of Kerlés against the Petchenegs (Cumans), in which Ladislás saved an abducted Hungarian girl. The painted narrative of this heroic struggle is found on the walls of countless Hungarian churches as well as in manuscripts. After the cathedral of Várad was destroyed during the Reformation and the Turkish wars, the relics of Ladislás were transported to Gyor (1607), where they are kept today. A number of popular stories and legends are associated with his name, and László is still a popular given name in Hungary.

Laity

Some religions, most notably Christianity and Buddhism, have clearly defined categories of full-time religious professionals, who are often contrasted strongly to the "laity"—everybody else, from the Greek laicos, "of the people." Laypeople continue to work at trades in the world, marry, and lead normal social lives in the community. In religions that make this distinction, members of the laity rarely win a reputation as holy people, a status more normally reserved to priests, nuns, and monks. Some exceptional people, however, have surmounted this holiness divide, especially martyrs, whose heroic deaths have apparently compensated for any "deficiencies" in their lives. More important is a category of holy people, especially in Buddhism and Christianity but appearing in other religions, who made it their life's work to bridge the gap between the professional religious and the religious commoners, bringing them a higher priestly or monastic ideal of salvation and life.

When laypeople have attained the rank of "holy" in professionalized religions, they usually form a peculiar halfway group—not professed or ordained members of a religious community, but adopting the values system of the religious elite. Best of all, they care for the religious professionals and enjoy holiness by reflection. The wealthy banker Anathapindika (c. fifth century B.C.E.), for example, after he was converted by the Buddha used his wealth to care for monks. At other times, they act like professional religious. One of the rare Buddhist laymen recognized as a holy man is Han-shan, who probably lived in the mid-seventh century. Although he did not follow religious rules, he lived as a hermit on a mountain rather than in a secular community. It is rare, indeed, to find another individual like the Tibetan Marpa (1012–1097), a married holy man who worked as a farmer and paid heed to his worldly obligations while devoting himself at the same time to a spiritual life. Similarly, in Christianity, although Ramon Lull (1232–1316) remained a layman (that is, he was not ordained a priest and did not enter a monastic order), he gave up his possessions and became an evangelical preacher. Very few of the canonized Roman Catholic saints were married, and many of those who were are believed to have lived chastely with their spouses, again crossing the divide from typical lay behavior to adopt the virtues of the religious elite. Also rare are married, sexually active saints, such as Elizabeth of Hungary (1207–1231), who lived a life of astounding self-abnegation that included donning course haircloth under her royal robes.

Some holy people of the religious elite, however, have left their rarefied atmosphere to reach out to the laity. For example, the sufis formed a spiritual elite within Islam, but some sufi leaders, such as Baha'uddin Naqshband (1317–1390), emphasized a practical theology and daily spiritual practices that were accessible to the lay population. Francis of Assisi's (c. 1180–1226) foundation of his third order or Ignatius of Loyola's (1491–1556) propagation of his spiritual exercises were similar. Some holy people have made it their life's work to promote basic knowledge of their religion among the laity. Besides missionaries (treated in a separate article), this includes people such as the Indian Muslim leader Hasan Nizami (1878–1955), who made a simple translation of the Qur'an and reached thousands thanks to the printing press.

The poet-saints of India also worked to make the truths of their religion accessible to householders, rather than only to renunciants, for example, writing in the common language of their region rather than in the religious language of Sanskrit.

Indeed, the Jain layman and reformer Banarsidas (1586–1643) made the radical argument for his time that spiritual development is not reserved for monks only, subordinating ritual and monastic authority and making elite religious practices accessible to the masses. He even went so far as to de-emphasize the need for ascetics as spiritual guides.

The Protestant Reformation in Europe and its precursors similarly presented the view that laypeople could bring God into their everyday lives. The preacher Gerard Groote (1340–1384) attacked ecclesiastical abuses and launched a program to provide religious texts in the vernacular. He also founded an in-between, semiprofessional religious community, the Brothers and Sisters of the Common Life, who, while legally still laypeople, replicated many professional religious ways in their lifestyle. Similarly Frances of Rome (1384–1440) and Angela Merici (1474–1540), laywomen, organized congregations for laywomen to care for others that provided a halfway state between monastic and lay life. Even in regions where Protestantism triumphed and abolished the monastic life, professional clerics have continued to be recognized as "other" from the lay populace (despite loud protestations of a "priesthood of all believers").

Buddhism probably has the largest class of holy people, members of the religious elite themselves, who have rejected the monastic community and worked to spread Buddhism to the common people. Important early examples are the Korean monk Wonhyo (617–686) and the Japanese monk Gyogi Bosatsu (668–749), who both worked to transform Buddhism itself from an elite religion to a religion of the masses among their people. In like fashion, the mahasiddhas (great masters) of eighth- to twelfth-century India opposed the emphasis that Mahayana Buddhism placed on monasticism, for women as well as for men, for all social classes. Most famous, though, are the proponents of variants of the Pure Land school, beginning with Huiyuan, the first Chinese Pure Land patriarch (334–416). The common thread of these religious leaders is that they believed that, in their degenerate age, no human could reach enlightenment by his or her own efforts—not even monks. Instead, they made a real effort to reach the masses, teaching that those who call on Amida Buddha (Amitabha) will be reborn in Amida's western paradise. The most famous teachers of Pure Land philosophy are the Japanese Honen (1133–1212), Shinran (1173–1262), and Rennyo (1415–1499).

Lal Shahbaz Qalandar, Abu 'Ali

Muslim sufi, ascetic

Abu 'Ali Lal Shahbaz Qalandar was originally from Marwand in Sistan and eventually settled in the town of Sehwan, in the Sind province of the Indian subcontinent. His name, Lal Shahbaz (The red falcon) may have been attributed to him because of his alleged miraculous ability to attract a flock of birds to his shrine. Lal Shahbaz falls into a category of sufis called qalandars who wander from region to region and are not concerned with outer religious duties. Many qalandars practiced intense asceticism, begging for their meals and neglecting outer observances and social responsibilities such as wearing clothing, earning an income, seeking shelter, pursuing an education, and getting married.

Sufi thinkers of the medieval period have made categorical differences between the malamatis and the qalandars. The former adhere to the essential religious practices required while at the same time demonstrating outer piety. Although these categories are not fixed, and were meant to identify the varieties in the sufi landscape generally, the evidence of sufi literature attests that Lal Shahbaz Qalandar led an impoverished lifestyle and attracted many sufis to him because of his passionate love for the divine.

There are conflicting narratives regarding whether Lal Shahbaz Qalandar belonged to a particular sufi order. According to Suhrawardi literature, he was a disciple of the eminent sufi master Baha' ud-din Zakariyya of Multan. In addition, Lal Shahbaz Qalandar considered himself in the spiritual lineage of Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj (858–922), the illustrious sufi master who was martyred in 922. Lal Shahbaz's sufi legacy was his ability to be completely immersed in divine union and love, confessing a faith that was intoxicated with divine presence and compassion. He is credited with performing numerous miracles, such as bringing peace to the most hysterical individuals.

In popular belief, Lal Shahbaz Qalandar is thought to have always been connected to God and led by the divine at all times. This would account for some assertions that he was a source of salvation for the forgotten poor and marginalized in society. Today his shrine in Sehwan, Pakistan, attracts millions of pilgrims each year, many of whom believe that he is still capable of interceding in temporal and spiritual affairs.

Lalibela

(Mid–12th cent. to c. 1225 C.E.)

Christian emperor, visionary

Lalibela was a twelfth-century Ethiopian emperor canonized in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. He is reported to have come to the throne reluctantly, at the end abdicating in favor of his nephew. Widely noted for his devotion to the Christian faith, Lalibela is the most famous of the Zagwe rulers. Not claiming direct Solomonic descent, the Zagwe encountered problems of legitimacy, which continue even to this day. His birth name, by which he is most commonly called, "Lalibela" means "the bees recognize his sovereignty." It was said that at his birth a swarm of bees descended on him without harming him, thus the name.

Beginning in his youth, Lalibela had visions. It was in one such vision that he was directed by God to build the series of churches at Roha, the Zagwe capital, now known as Lalibela. The rock-hewn churches of Lalibela were not the first in Ethiopian history, but they are the most famous. These eleven churches, an important pilgrimage and tourist site today, are connected by an extensive and complex subterranean passageway. According to tradition, the churches were built under the direct supervision of the emperor and with the assistance of angels. Every day, when they returned to work, the builders would note and remark that the construction had advanced beyond where they had left it the previous day. According to the Ethiopian Royal Chronicles, "They [the workers] doubted whether angels were doing this work because they could not see them, but Lalibela knew, because the angels, who understood his virtue, did not hide from him; the angels were his companions and for that reason did not hide from his sight" (Pankhurst 1967, 12). The chronicles note, with great pride, that the churches were not built by forced or slave labor. In fact, Lalibela requested each worker to tell him exactly what he wished to be paid, and the emperor did so.

Before becoming emperor, Lalibela spent some time as a hermit in the mountains. He also made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, a major undertaking in the world of the twelfth century.

Although it is widely noted that Ethiopia became a Christian kingdom in the fourth century, Christianity was most likely not practiced by the majority of the population even in the Middle Ages. The conversion of King Ezana to Christianity in the fourth century affected little the lives of the majority of ordinary peasants. The spread of Christianity occurred slowly, though the kings of Ethiopia often sponsored missionary efforts by building churches, encouraging missionaries, and extending the territories under their rule.

Church of St. Lalibela, Ethiopia. (Art Directors)

Compared to earlier and later periods in Ethiopian history, relatively little is known about the Zagwe rulers. Even the dates of Lalibela's reign are in dispute. Much of what we do know about the Zagwe comes from those who considered them usurpers. It is perhaps remarkable, given the hostility to the Zagwe, that Lalibela, as well as two other Zagwe rulers, should have been canonized in the Ethiopian Church.

Lalla

Hindu mystic, renunciant

Lalla, also known as Lal Ded or Lalleshwari, was a fourteenth-century mystic from Kashmir. Her aphoristic verses were orally transmitted for centuries and became part of Kashmiri folk culture. Legends speak of her married life as filled with suffering and her renunciation at a young age to become a wandering ascetic.

Lalla's compositions, originally uttered in old Kashmir, come to us in a form that is fairly modern, except for occasional archaic expressions with obscure or unknown meaning. Collections of Lalla's verses have been compiled from time to time. The first scholarly collection in the West was put together by Sir George Grierson and Lionell D. Barnett in 1920. This collection provides a fairly accurate text of Lalla's verses based on various sources, including meticulous records of oral tradition. Aside from this 109-verse collection, entitled Lalla Vakyani, Pandit Anand Koul collected 75 more verses. These were published in various issues of the Indian Antiquary in the 1930s. Later collections have primarily relied on these two sources.

Lalla's verses reveal her deep knowledge of the esoteric practices of Kashmir Shaivism. She describes Shiva or the self as permeating both the manifest and unmanifest reality, repeatedly stressing the continuity between the self and Shiva, and the self and the world. Lalla is the first woman known to have spoken openly to common people about esoteric Shaiva practices, which were available in her time to only a select few. Some of her verses deal with the means to overcome her limited vision that binds her to the material reality, while others relate her experiences with sustained introspective contemplation. In yet other verses, she turns her attention outward, taking the role of a teacher and instructing others in the nature of limited knowledge and the means to overcome it. She urges people to regard the self and the other as equal and to refrain from religious bigotry and intolerance.

The evocativeness of Lalla's verses arises from vivid and concrete images she uses to convey her experiences. Some examples of her jewels: "using untwisted yarn to pull a boat" or "a grass arrow fitted on a wooden bow" for representing a weak will as she begins her quest; "twisting ropes of sand" for ineffectual efforts; and "water leaking from unbaked clay saucers" for unfocused attention. Lalla employs the imagery and metaphors of daily life in her verses to convey to common people her vision of reality, provoking them to look beyond the veil of inhibitions and constraints imposed by societal institutions. Lalla has left a permanent mark on Kashmiri language and culture, and her legacy has survived innumerable political upheavals and religious conflicts.

Lamas

Tibetan Buddhist teachers

Lama (bla ma), the Tibetan translation of the Sanskrit term "guru," usually refers to advanced spiritual teachers. There are many types. Lamas may be celibate or married, may rise to their positions or be born to them, and may give many public teachings or live in remote hermitages, rarely emerging from retreat.

The two syllables of "lama" are explained in various ways. "La" means "highest" and "ma" means "mother"; the former is indicative of bodhicitta, altruistic compassion, which is the most sublime attitude, and the latter is indicative of wisdom, the mother of enlightenment. Hence, a lama should be someone so advanced in compassion and wisdom, the two "wings" of buddhahood, that he or she could guide students all the way to their own enlightenment. That implies that a lama could serve as initiator and guide even for the esoteric tantric practices, in which case he or she would be the focus of preparatory visualizations that blend the lama with Buddha figures.

Although the ideal lama is a spiritual teacher, not all teachers are lamas and not all lamas are teachers. Normally, a religious teacher is gen (rgan, the abbreviated form of dge rgan, guide of virtue) rather than "lama" unless he or she exhibits special personal qualities and of course has the qualifications to initiate and teach students in the esoteric tradition. Conversely, some lamas rarely, if ever, function as spiritual guides because they remain in meditation retreat.

The designation "lama" is not normally formal; a person is called a lama if students approach him or her as a lama, such as by requesting initiations and spiritual guidance. However, in some places, such as Ladakh, the custom has been to refer to all monks as lamas regardless of their spiritual status. Sometimes the term has been applied to all ritual masters in an area. And the heads of some lineages within the Kagyu and Nyingma monastic orders have begun in recent times to confer the title of lama on the best graduates of three-year meditation retreats.

Tulkus (sprul sku) are almost always called lamas. A tulku is a person recognized as the reincarnation of an advanced practitioner. The followers of such a person ask a great lama about him, and he divines whether the person in question is spiritually advanced and intended to start a line of tulkus. Then a search for the reincarnation occurs within a few years after each death. However, it is well recognized that tulkus do not necessarily, especially in their early lives, exhibit the special qualities that a lama should possess.

Few monks are lamas, and many lamas are not monks. Many are unmarried lay yogis or married householders. Hence, there is also no requirement that a lama live in a monastery or be a solitary hermit, although many are. The late seventeenth-century Manchu rulers of China used the term "Lamaism" (lamajiao) to designate Tibetan Buddhism, which was understood to mean that Tibetans worshipped lamas or that all monks were lamas. The term has been widely used by Western writers as well. Another Manchu convention was the designation of all tulkus as hefo, "living buddhas." Both of these designations are obviously misleading.

Lambert of Liège

Christian bishop, martyr

Bishop Lambert of Tongres/Maastricht, Belgium, was credited for the flourishing growth of the city of Liège when pilgrims visited his site of martyrdom there. Standard hagiography, probably based on Eligius's vita, describes Lambert's aristocratic roots in a Maastricht family (perhaps Christian converts), into which he was born in about 635, and his education by Bishop Theodard, whom he succeeded in episcopal office in 670, after training at royal court—fitting preparation for statesmanship and administration. His sanctity and noble virtues led King Childeric to view him as “dearest of all bishops” (Jacobus II: 159). At Childeric's death in 674, however, palace intrigue and instability resulted in Lambert's exile at Stavelot monastery, which only ended when Pepin II became king in 681.

Known for helping Christianize Toxandria (northern Brabant), Lambert destroyed temples and cult images and established several local churches for the diocese of Tongres, including Maastricht (favored by his predecessors) and his own beloved Liège, where he met his demise at the hands of political enemies in about 705. When attacked, he drew his sword in defense, but quickly discarded it, deciding that reliance upon prayer when threatened with death was a nobler course of action.

His successor, Hubert, carried Lambert's remains to Maastricht for burial alongside his father, but the martyrdom site became a popular cult center where numerous miracles occurred. These, and the remarkable conversion of one of Lambert's assailants to monasticism, soon convinced Hubert not only to return his relics to his dearest domicile but to also move the diocesan seat to Liège by about 718. This translation and popular acclamation were the signs of Lambert's canonization, and a basilica was built at the location where a pilgrim's sight was restored. Commercial enterprises established around the new pilgrimage center prospered and made the city an important regional attraction. In the tenth century, Liège became a principality, with Lambert's relics a palladium—credited for success in battle and carried by military troops on sorties.

Many early cult objects created for Lambert, including reliquaries and battle standards, are now lost. A lavish sixteenth-century bust reliquary and a large nineteenth-century shrine remain in the cathedral treasury, and dissemination of the cult is in evidence throughout Europe, with many church dedications as well as numerous statues and other pictorial remembrances. Lambert is generally shown giving a blessing with his right hand, bearing miter and staff, and wearing a particular cape-like garment (superhumeral) with a crenellated lower edge—symbolizing an elevated episcopal status—with regal bearing and military implications.

Lamedvavniks

Jewish legend

The lamedvavniks are thirty-six righteous men, often referred to as lamedvav tzaddikim (Thirty-six just [righteous] men) or tzaddikim nistarim (Hidden just men), in Jewish legend. The tradition teaches that in each generation the world is maintained by the presence of at least thirty-six righteous people who are so humble that they do not even know their own identity.

The tradition may be traced to the Babylonian Talmudic (BT) passage that teaches: “Abaye has said: ‘There are in the world not less than thirty-six righteous persons in every generation upon whom the Shekinah [spirit of the Lord] rests; for it is written, “Happy are all they that wait for Him” [Isaiah. 30:18]. The last word stands numerically for thirty-six” (BT, Sanhedrin 97b; Sukkoth 45a). It must be understood that each letter of the Hebrew alphabet has a numeric correspondent. In Hebrew, the last word of the verse in Isaiah is lo, which translates as “him.” “Lo” is spelled by the letters “lamed” and “vav,” which, respectively, have the value of 30 and 6 for a total of 36.

Jewish mystical tradition understands that these men bear the sins and the sorrows of the world. It is due to the piety of the “lamedvavniks” that God does not destroy the world even when the sins of humanity are overwhelming. It is felt that the world continues and escapes annihilation by the very virtue of their existence. The presence of these men are so important to the existence world that when one dies another is born so that their number remains constant.

Eastern European literature drew on the theme of the hidden just men and many legends grew around supposed lamedvavniks. In some of the literature, a stranger would come to the village just in time to avert some horrible catastrophe that was about to befall the Jewish community. This stranger, it turns out, is an undisclosed lamedvavnik who fades from the scene once the danger has been thwarted. Traditions grew up around these stories to view all strangers and wayfarers as potential lamedvavniks.

In more recent post-Holocaust thought and literature, the term “lamedvavnik” is frequently applied to a “righteous gentile” who aided the Jews or the Jewish community during the Nazi era. And now the designation is frequently used of any self-effacing person who is generous to the community with time, effort, or other forms of philanthropy.

Laozi (Lao-tzu)

Daoist sage, founder

Laozi, literally “Old Master” and also known as Li Er, is considered the founder of Daoism, China’s oldest indigenous philosophy and religion. He is considered to have been a contemporary of Confucius who lived in the sixth century B.C.E. during the Eastern Zhou dynasty (771–265 B.C.E.). At some point, Laozi, unhappy with China’s political instability, left China for the western lands. At that time, he is believed to have given the Daode jing (Classic of the way and its power) to a frontier official named Yin Xi. The Daode jing subsequently became the earliest and most fundamental text for the teachings of Daoism.

The term dao itself can be translated as the way, road, path, or method, and by extension, “rule of life.” It is thus at once a simple term and yet quite profound. It is the way of all things, the way of the universe, and the source for all reality. Its essential principles are clear: first that there is duality (yin and yang) and balance in all things (that is, without day there is no night, without up there is no down, and so on); second that matter and energy are interchangeable; and finally that change is constant.

Although Laozi is generally considered the author of the Daode jing, there is debate as to authorship as some have argued that the book could not have been written until the fourth to second centuries B.C.E. And for many, there seems to be no doubt that the text had more than one author. Many of the eighty-one “chapters” of the Daode jing are written poetically, but they are more like brief entries in a dictionary of life, or a collection of adages using rhymes, and some sections contain more prose than poetry. The text discusses numerous issues, including statecraft and political alternatives. It teaches that the sage is an individual who understands the natural way (dao) of things and lives in harmony with it; thus changes in society are made through the individual who changes according to the way. The text is also meant to be a kind of guide for relationships and human experience and for living in harmony with the natural world. The first “chapter” may be translated:

The Way (Dao) that can be spoken of (Dao) is not the eternal Way (Dao);

The name that can be named is not the eternal name.

The nameless, is the origin of heaven and earth;

The named is the mother of all things.

Always desireless, one can discern its mystery;

Always desiring, one can discern its outer manifestations.

These two emerge from the same source but differ in name,

Their sameness is called the primordial,

The origins of the primordial,

The gate to all mystery.

(trans. Richard A. Pegg)

In typical fashion, this text begins by plainly stating that words cannot describe the way. They can merely point to, or indicate the way to, the true understanding of the way. And yet, it is often through word play, the rational means of communication, that Daoist texts attempt to convey some meaning. The way is the undivided unity in which the distinctions and contradictions of existence are ultimately resolved. There is an essential truth of the universe that is the essence of this philosophy. The Daode jing is written in a manner that typifies the essence, with wit and paradox, that words, no matter how eloquent or convincing, cannot truly convey principles that can only be understood intrinsically.

Laozi is considered the founder of religious Daoism and as such has been deified. He is venerated as either Old Lord (Lao Jun) or Celestial Noble of the Dao and De (Daode tian-cun). Some consider him a founder, while others consider him just one of several holy men of Daoism; as such, he is known as Most High Lord Lao (Taishang Laojun).

Lasair*(6th cent. C.E.?)Christian abbess*

Over a dozen female Christian holy women named Lasair are commemorated in Irish martyrologies, and several surface in the Lives of other saints, but only one has a Life of her own. This Life, in Irish, of a Lasair from possibly the sixth century, is incomplete and survives only in seventeenth-century copies, probably based on a medieval original. According to this text, she descended from royalty on both sides. She had five sisters and one brother, all of whom her parents ensured were well educated. Lasair was sent to study under the famed ascetic Molaise of Devenish in Lower Lough Erne and within a year outshone all the students who had been training there for seven years, an accomplishment attributed to her tutorials with the Holy Spirit rather than to her teacher Molaise.

More so than the other female Irish saints described in the sources, Lasair reveals the testy side of Irish saints, infamous for their maledictions and the dire punishments they placed upon those who displeased them. She promised those who neglected to pay the tax she had imposed upon her extensive lands that they would be rewarded with hell, then detailed their damnation so there would be no misunderstanding: ill-fortune, poverty, anger, hatred, murder of kinsfolk, weakness, wounds, and war. Those who render Lasair her due, however, shall receive many blessings, including a happy sex life. She had a miraculous bell, Ceolán Lasrach, into which she once poured a healing potion that she then administered to a woman who had been suffering from pregnancy for nearly two years; the woman was immediately delivered of two lizards and a son. By a similar treatment, she cured a man who for four years had endured an alarming illness that had caused him to consume his own waste.

Lasair's name means "flame," and she proves impervious to fire when reavers burned down Devenish; similar miracles are told of Íte, Samthann, and Brigid, but in those cases the fire is presented as an illusion or as an indication that the Holy Spirit burns within them, not an actual physical threat. Lasair founded several communities, one described as composed of male and female scholars, and the center of her cult is Roscommon. Owing to the lateness of the account and the multiplicity of Lasairs, however, little can be said about her with any degree of historical certainty.

Laszlo*See LadislavLatif, Shah Abdul(1689–1752 C.E.)Muslim poet, mystic*

Shah Abdul Latif, one of the most popular sufi poets of all time in south Asia, is revered by both Hindus and Muslims. He was born in Hala, near present-day Hyderabad, Sind, in 1689, and his tomb in Bhit Shah, covered with floral patterns depicting paradise and exuding serenity, stands as one of the most exquisite examples of Muslim funerary architecture. Part of a long line of Sindhi mystical poets, Abdul Latif drew from folktales that everyone knew to describe the qualities of heroes and heroines—hope, fear, ambition, courage, and desire to heal the world—as well as obstacles such as greed, suffering, and injustice.

Influenced by Suhrawardi and Naqshbandi sufi thinkers, Abdul Latif's sufi poetry plays on riddles of lost love and uses the motif of the bridal song. The rain that showers humanity with divine contact is also an important recurring image in his work. His poetry venerates the prophet Muhammad, commonly referred to in sufi poetry as the Perfect Man, a light of divine vision over the darkness of human failures. Abdul Latif portrays the prophet with many honorific symbols, one of which is the veil of light that invites the sufi seeker to become closer to him. Another theme in his work, particularly meaningful for peasants, is that the outer afflictions of suffering are only temporary and are tied to our shortsightedness and neglect; the true way of salvation is to return to the essence of the divine.

Appealing to many Hindu and Muslim classes, Abdul Latif's poetry contained musical modes according to the classical Indian scales (ragas). It was popularly sung in the fields and in the marketplace. In a collection of poems entitled Shaha jo risalo (The book of shah), through mystical syncretism he illustrates the immense importance of such figures as the prophet Muhammad and his grandson Husayn in spiritual development. In other poems, he uses various characters—a washerman's daughter, a prince, a fisherman—as well as creatures such as lions and birds, to illustrate the transformation of the self from the boundaries inherited while living on earth.

Whether it is discussing the restrictions imposed on a prince or the obstacles faced by a peasant girl, Abdul Latif's mystical poetry tackles the complexities of space, time, gender, class, and religious identities to emphasize the pains of the journey toward the divine and to induce in the reader or listener the longing of the soul to break away from exile. Using multiple characters from various cross-sections of society, Abdul Latif appealed to both Muslims and Hindus in the Indian subcontinent because of the ways in which he focused on the inner journey and applied mystical feelings as an expression of reconciliation and healing.

Latimer, Hugh

(c. 1485–1555 C.E.)

Protestant bishop, martyr

The holy people of sixteenth-century England were largely a product of reformist teachings, Henry VIII's break with Rome, and the consequent struggle between Catholicism and what had become known as Protestantism. Hugh Latimer's holiness, perceived by those Protestants who upheld him as a martyr for the cause, was rooted in his continual promulgation of church reform. Latimer was born somewhere between 1485 and 1491. He graduated from Cambridge in 1510 at a time when the works of Erasmus, Martin Luther, and John Wyclif were avidly studied and discussed. The university remained at the center of reform until an abusive sermon preached by Robert Barnes in St. Edward's Church on Christmas Eve, 1525, caused the group of reformers to be taken to London and examined before Cardinal Wolsey. Latimer, however, was allowed to return to Cambridge with a general license to preach.

Latimer now devoted himself to the cause of church reform, and he gradually became an ardent and eloquent preacher. He especially attacked those abuses that Erasmus had satirized, including indulgences, pilgrimages, and the veneration of images. But many of his sermons spoke little of doctrine, and he may not have been such an ardent upholder of Protestantism as his later followers suggested. He preferred to urge men to live the life of Christ and remember their devoutness in prayer, and certainly never created his own conception of the church or attacked the doctrine of the sacraments, as was asserted at his trial in 1555. Yet he was soon summoned again, this time by the bishop of London, who condemned his teachings. He was restored to favor only by appealing to Henry VIII and agreeing to fourteen points of religious practice and worship, including the approval of Lent and the lawfulness of crucifixes and images in the churches.

Through the favor of Anne Boleyn and Thomas Cranmer, Latimer received the bishopric of Worcester and continued to preach reform. But in consequence of the Act of Six Articles (a definition of the faith) being carried in Parliament, he resigned his bishopric in July 1539 and was consequently imprisoned in the Tower of London. Released during the reign of Edward VI, the Catholic Mary reimprisoned him soon after her accession to the throne in 1553. Hugh Latimer, along with the fellow reformers Nicholas Ridley and Cranmer, was transferred to Oxford for trial and sentencing. All were found guilty of heresy, and they were burned at the stake on October 16, 1555.

Laurence O'Toole

Christian archbishop, reformer

Born to the king and queen of a small district in County Kildare in 1128, Laurence O'Toole (Lorcan Ua Tuathail in Irish) survived a dangerous childhood to become the abbot of Glendalough and then archbishop of Dublin during one of the most violent periods in Irish history. At a young age, he was a hostage to Dermot MacMurrough, the king of Leinster who brought the English to Ireland. When he was twelve, he was released and went to meet his father at the great monastic complex at Glendalough, where he decided to remain and become a monk. The boy grew in learning and piety, and eventually Laurence became abbot. An abbacy was a position of great power in Ireland. Demonstrating his holiness and administrative ability, Laurence steered Glendalough through a severe famine and outlaw attacks. He was known for his charity and began to earn a reputation for performing miracles.

Church reform was a saintly endeavor and Laurence rapidly became one of the great reformers of the Irish church. He continued this work when he became archbishop of Dublin, originally a Danish trading town. Laurence was its first Irish archbishop. Bishop-saints had to be both adept at worldly politics and display a holiness that transcended worldly matters. Laurence was the epitome of such a saint. He fed the poor in his own house every day. It was said that he had the healing touch and could see into the hearts of sinners. He lived in a palace but wore a hair shirt and lived a monastic life. Such abstinence in the midst of luxury and power was an important component of his sanctity.

When Dermot MacMurrough brought the English into Ireland to fight for him, they devastated Dublin. Laurence rallied Dublin's priests to stay and help the wounded, bury the dead, house the homeless, and feed the hungry. Afterward, he mediated between the warring factions. On behalf of his oppressed people, he traveled to the court of Henry II in France and England and to the papal court in Rome, where he was appointed papal legate to Ireland. On one such trip, in 1180, he fell ill and died at the French monastery at Eu. Visions and signs accompanied his death. The monks at Eu had been so impressed with his holiness that they, and not the Irish, developed his cult and pressed for his canonization. On December 5, 1225, Laurence became the first Irish saint to be officially recognized by the pope in Rome.

Lawgivers as Holy People

Several religious traditions regard law as a special gift from god(s), and in these religions the human lawgiver who transmits the law from the divine realm to humankind is often accorded holy status. In such traditions, the interpreter of the law is also often honored as a holy person, inspired by the divine. This is a significant theme especially in the beliefs of Judaism and Shi'a Islam, although it appears in other religions. Thus, for example, the ancient Spartan Lycurgus, credited with creating the Spartan legal and moral code, was regarded as an inspired hero. Similarly, much of the Iroquois Deganawida's (c. 1550–c. 1600) status as holy person derived from his function as lawgiver who could draw together the warring nations of the Iroquois.

The most famous holy lawgiver to most readers will doubtless be Moses, the great Jewish leader credited not only with receiving the Ten Commandments directly from God but with communicating the whole Jewish legal code from God to the people of Israel. Since Moses had done his work so thoroughly, later Jewish holy figures were left only with the task of interpreting the prescriptions of the Torah, a role that was at times central to Jewish holy people. The need for inspired figures to interpret the law became especially important after the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, when rabbis emerged as leaders in all aspects of communal existence. The great rabbis who created the Talmud, the massive commentary on especially the legal code of the Torah, were in effect commentators on the law originally transmitted by Moses. Several later Jewish holy people also won their reputation because of their skill in interpreting law. Moses ben Maimon's (1135/1138–1204) greatest life work was a comprehensive code of Jewish law; similarly, Joseph Karo (1488–1575) was the leading legal authority of Judaism in the sixteenth century and author of a definitive code of Jewish law.

Islam, especially in its Shi'a branch, has also recognized the interpreters of shari'a, Islamic law, as inspired holy men (and, very rarely, women). Experts in religious law have a special status that has created a presupposition of special holiness; thus, a disproportionate number of Shi'a holy people have been jurists. For example, the great jurist Mirza Hasan Shirazi (1815–1895) was recognized as his society's sole point of reference on religious law, a position of enormous dignity and responsibility. Much earlier, the Medinan jurist Ja'far as-Sadiq (700–765) constructed the school of law followed by the Shi'i sect. Other great holy jurists in the Shi'a tradition include 'Allamah al-Hilli (1250–1325), Muhammad Baqir al-Majlisi (1628–1700), Muhammad Baqir Bihbihani (1706–1792), Murtada Ansari (1799–1864), and Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989). Emphasis on jurisprudence in both Sunni and Shi'a Islam proved so strong that sufism developed as a movement in opposition to it.

The other religion that has recognized a significant number of lawgivers or law interpreters as holy people is Christianity. With the development of the legal function of church institutions beginning in the eleventh century, ecclesiastical authorities increasingly recognized the utility of those who could make sense out of a large body of often conflicting canon law (church law) as in some way befitting recognition for holiness. Although such men never seem to have had popular cults, they won formal canonization from a grateful papacy. A notable example of this phenomenon is St. Raymond of Peñafort (1180–1275), the great systematizer of canon law, who appears to have had no special attributes of holiness besides a deeply committed and logical mind that could grasp complex legal issues.

Lawrence of Rome

Christian deacon, martyr

Lawrence of Rome died August 10, 258, during the persecutions of the emperor Valerian. His tomb is beneath what is now the church of San Lorenzo Outside the Walls in Rome, part of which was originally dedicated in the early fourth century by the emperor Constantine.

Though Lawrence is listed in the Depositio Martyrum of 354 (a list of martyrs venerated in Rome) and was memorialized by Pope Damasus in the late fourth century with an inscription at his tomb, the earliest extant detailed versions of Lawrence's martyrdom come from Bishop Ambrose of Milan and the Spanish poet Prudentius at the end of the fourth century and beginning of the fifth. According to these narratives—the details of which may derive from an oral, not written, tradition, and are of dubious historicity—Lawrence, grieved by the martyrdom of Pope Sixtus II, was comforted by the pope's prediction that Lawrence would be martyred three days later. Soon thereafter, Lawrence was summoned before the magistrate, who insisted that Lawrence turn over the riches of the church to him. Lawrence agreed to do so, and three days later he presented to the magistrate all of Rome's poor and diseased who depended on the church, wherein lay its true wealth. Lawrence was summarily martyred, placed on a gridiron to die slowly. Before he died, Lawrence prayed for the conversion of Rome, and (according to Prudentius) Lawrence's martyrdom led the people of Rome, ancient families and obscure alike, toward a mass conversion to Christianity.

The cult of Lawrence was exceptionally popular and widespread from the fourth century on, extending from Rome—where alone there were thirty-four churches dedicated to Lawrence, many of which still exist today—throughout Italy, Spain, northern Africa, France, England, and into northern Europe as far as Scandinavia, where the eleventh-century cathedral of Lund (Sweden) was dedicated to him. In keeping with the popularity of his cult, Lawrence and his martyrdom were frequently depicted in art. The earliest representation is thought to be the fifth-century mosaic in the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia in Ravenna, in which the martyr is depicted standing near a gridiron. However, there has been some doubt about the identification, and it is possible that the martyr depicted is actually Vincent of Saragossa, who also suffered on the gridiron.

Christian saint

The evidence for Lazarus is found solely in the Christian Gospel of John (11:1–44). In the East, his feast day is the Saturday before Palm Sunday; in the West, it is December 17. John begins by describing Lazarus as dwelling with his two sisters, Martha and Mary, in the village of Bethany, less than two miles from Jerusalem. (This Mary was identified early on with Mary Magdalene.) In John's narrative, Lazarus sickens, so the two women send for Jesus, who is staying on the other side of the Jordan with his disciples. In a peculiar and potentially disturbing response, Jesus refuses to come, apparently awaiting the time when Lazarus would have died. When Jesus finally announces his intentions to return to Judea, his disciples remonstrate because of the dangers.

Nevertheless, Jesus does return and is greeted by Martha. In an extraordinary exchange, Martha's gentle reproach is answered by Jesus' affirmation that he personally is "the resurrection and the life" (v. 26); a similar interview with Mary follows, and Jesus asks to be brought to the tomb. After weeping, Jesus calls Lazarus forth from his tomb, and as he emerges, Jesus commands that Lazarus's hands and feet be unbound.

In John's narrative, this miracle is presented as precipitating the passion (vv. 47–53), and this explains Lazarus's feast day in the East. In Christian theology and popular religion, however, he seems not to have figured prominently, certainly not as prominently as his putative sister. An Eastern legend relates that Lazarus and his two sisters were later placed in a rudderless boat by Roman persecutors, and after they landed on Cyprus, Lazarus became bishop of Kition (modern Larnaka). In a Western version, he and his sisters landed in Provence, and he became the first bishop of Marseilles.

In medieval literature, Lazarus plays a curious role: Rather than exemplifying the certainty of personal resurrection for Christians, he frequently becomes a witness for the certainty of death and the very real possibility of damnation. In modern literature, the appearance of Lazarus in Nicholas Kazantzakis's Last Temptation of Christ (1960) is entirely ironic: Lazarus is raised, but still clad in flesh four days putrefied.

Le Saux, Henry

Roman Catholic monk, interfaith dialogue leader

Henry Le Saux, born in 1910, was a French Benedictine monk and a leader in the dialogue between Christianity and Hinduism, especially in terms of mysticism, that emerged during the twentieth century. Le Saux actively attempted to develop and to integrate “Christian Vedanta” after visiting, with his priest-colleague Jules Montchanin, the Hindu saint Ramana Maharshi (1878–1950) in 1949. The encounter with Ramana left a profound impact on Le Saux, impressing upon him the truth of the ineffable self (atman). Ramana’s presence, above all, Le Saux later wrote, “enfolded everything, and seemed to penetrate to the core of one’s being, causing one to be recollected at the centre of the self, and drawing one irresistibly within” (Abhishiktananda 1990, 2). Le Saux and Montchanin established Shantivanam ashram on the banks of the Cauvery River in southern India; these pioneering efforts at building a cross-cultural synthesis at Shantivanam were later to be developed and led by the English Benedictine monk Bede Griffiths (1907–1993).

Le Saux’s seminal encounter with Ramana was enhanced by several retreats that he later took in caves on the sacred hill of Arunachala, at the base of which was the ashram of Ramana Maharshi. Later, he encountered other teachers in the tradition of nondualism favored by Ramana. These included Poonja-ji, a disciple of Ramana himself, and Gnanananda Giri of Tapovanam ashram, not far from Shantivanam. Le Saux considered Giri to be his guru and took the name of Abhishiktananda (Bliss of the anointed). Eventually, Le Saux left Shantivanam, wandering about in the traditional manner of a Hindu sannyasi (renunciant).

Leander of Seville

Christian bishop, missionary, scholar

Leander (feast day February 27) was credited by his brother Isidore of Seville (c. 560–636) with having converted the Visigoths in Iberia from Arian to catholic Christianity. In an age of decreasing literacy in Western Europe, Isidore described Leander in his work De viris illustribus (On illustrious men) as being “as eminent in virtues as he was in learning.” The value placed on learning by both Leander and his brother helped lay the basis for a revival of clerical education and writing in the seventh century.

Leander was born in about 564. As bishop of Seville from approximately 579 until his death, he became a central figure in the conflict between the Arian king Leovigild and catholic Iberian leaders during the 580s. In addition to contributing anti-Arian treatises to the polemics of the struggle, Leander became a player on the international stage by traveling to Constantinople, apparently seeking imperial support for Hermenegild, a catholic rebel against Leovigild. The support was not forthcoming, but while there, Leander befriended the future pope Gregory I, with whom he later corresponded. In 589, Leander organized the Third Council of Toledo, called to celebrate the conversion of a new king, Reccared, to catholicism. Leander went on to pursue further conciliar activity in his own province. In promoting conciliar governance, he helped to establish the divine authority of church councils as a central governing belief in the Visigothic kingdom, a catholic principle based on the idea that councils are attended by the Holy Spirit. Leander’s role in the conversion of the Visigoths, the Third Council of Toledo, and the rise of conciliar governance in the kingdom; his international ties, especially to Gregory the Great; and his apparent role in educating his younger, better-known brother Isidore have all contributed to the veneration of Leander for his prominent part in the creation of a unified Visigothic kingdom and culturally eminent church.

Only two of Leander’s writings are extant: his sermon at the Third Council of Toledo (“Sermon of the Triumph of the Church for the Conversion of the Goths”) and a monastic rule (“The Training of Nuns”), written for his sister Florentina (also a Christian saint). Although his anti-Arian tracts and letters to Gregory I have been lost, one of Gregory’s responses is extant as his Epistle I.41. The acta of the provincial council held under Leander, the First Council of Seville, have also been preserved.

Lee, Ann

Christian mystic, Shaker founder

Mother Ann Lee (or Lees) founded the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming (Shaking Quakers; Shakers). Born on February 28 or 29, 1736, in Manchester, England, Ann Lee was one of eight children of John Lee, a blacksmith. The family was extremely poor, and Ann went to work at a cotton mill when she was about eight years old. When she was about twenty-two, sickened by the poverty and despair in which she lived and worked, Ann began to frequent the religious meetings of a group of unusual Quakers in nearby Bolton. There, the nominal Quakers Jane and James Wardley had become part of a community of enthusiasts who were awaiting the second coming of Christ. The Wardleys conducted their services in a manner similar to their Quaker tradition, usually waiting in silence upon the experience of the "inner light"; however, often "Mother" Jane would break the silence with her shouted revelations, and others were observed to shake and tremble as the spirit took possession of each believer.

The "Shaking Quakers," or "Shakers," were continuously persecuted by governmental authorities and local mobs. In 1770, Ann herself was imprisoned in the Manchester Gaol and spent several days there in the summer heat, alone and hungry. As she prayed for deliverance, she was filled with the very real sense of the presence of the Christ, which she understood to be a revelation of the long-awaited second coming. After her release from prison, Ann went at once to the Shaker meeting to testify to her experience. As she spoke, those in attendance began to be conscious of the divine presence, and they also witnessed to the authenticity of the parousia. From then on, Ann Lee was perceived to be not Christ incarnate, but the one chosen by God to bear witness to and welcome in the new age of the parousia.

Thereafter, Ann became more prominent, and thus more visible to the local constables. Ann was arrested several times. Traditional clerics denounced the Shakers, since several times the Shakers employed aggressive strategies to spread their message, such as interrupting church services to testify before the assembled worshippers. Finally, after being tortured and almost stoned to death as a witch, Ann Lee, her husband, and seven other believers sailed for America in 1774. The small group barely survived for two years, then settled in Watervliet (Indian name, Niskeyuna), New York, near Albany, in 1776. After a few years, Ann and her husband would separate permanently. Several factors led to the separation, not the least of which was Ann's decision to lead a celibate life after her visionary experience at Manchester Gaol.

Although small and somewhat isolated, the new religious community of believers did not escape notice, and there are extant accounts that report individuals observing aghast the Shakers' "extravagant postures" and "religious exercises" as they worshipped as a community. Ann Lee, now commonly called "Mother Ann," became the leading member of the Niskeyuna settlement, although James Whittaker became the public voice of the community. Therefore, on May 19, 1780, the "Dark Day" (so named because of the dark, overcast sky), James Whittaker preached the Shaker doctrine for the first time to a public congregation, which day has been referenced in Shaker history as "the Opening of the Gospel." It was not long before spiritual seekers from upstate New York and New England found their way to Niskeyuna to join the new movement.

From 1780 to 1784, Mother Ann Lee and some of the other believers began an itinerant evangelism, establishing communities of converts. However, their English heritage was problematic in New England during the Revolutionary War, and bands of citizens charged the small contingent of Shakers with British sympathy and espionage, especially as one of Mother Ann's most prominent themes was the call to Christian pacifism. Her experiences in Massachusetts were particularly troubled, not only because of her British lineage and encouragement of nonviolence, but also because of her teachings on the necessity of celibacy and the full equality of women and men among the believers. Her radical consciousness of the human condition in the Christlife without gender distinction or sexuality threatened the traditional mores of society, and, more important, conflicted with the natural structure of the family. Moreover, celibacy as an aspect of the religious life was identified with Roman Catholicism. Thus, in Massachusetts, Mother Ann Lee was accused of harlotry, popery, and witchcraft, and in some places she and her band were set upon by mobs, beaten, and driven out of the towns where they went to preach.

Mother Ann Lee was clearly the inspired focus of faith and witness for her believers. As the "mother" of her community, Ann was often depicted maternally: compassionate, loving, and careful of her "children," but also unwilling to allow indifference or carelessness on the part of any believer, including herself, in the quest for spiritual perfection. She remained herself a believer among the believers, a humble penitent before God. On September 8, 1784, Ann died quietly in her bed at Niskeyuna, exhausted by her physical and spiritual exertions. She was forty-eight years old.

Legendary Holy People

It is often hard to discern the dividing line between history and fiction in the lives of holy people; many historic figures have had “pious exaggeration” added to their life stories, especially when the holy person has been held up as an example of a particular type of virtue. There is also a tendency to alter saints’ biographies to make them conform to a given society’s notions of what makes a holy person. Some holy people, however, are purely fictional creations, called into being for a variety of needs. At times these legendary spiritual heroes serve to explain why things are as they are to later worshippers, or provide a sense of community with events of a distant past. At other times, the creation of holy people seems to have sprung from a calculated desire to enhance the importance—or spiritual protection—of a particular community.

Judaism, Christianity, and Islam all have legends of people of surprising longevity, kept alive as witnesses to God’s work in the world. The Jewish Serah bat Asher appears in two biblical books, Genesis and Numbers, creating the impression that she lived a surprisingly long time and was a special witness to the Exodus. Her legend grew: She was thought to have been alive several centuries later, at the time of King David—and to have continued living for still more centuries, as witness to God’s power in saving the Jews. Finally, she either entered paradise living or died well into the Middle Ages. The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, who appear in both Muslim and Christian legend, play a similar function—a group of men who hid in a cave to escape persecution, they slept for 200 years, emerging to give witness to an earlier age.

In the case of Eastern legendary holy people, the emphasis is on even greater continuity, often going back countless eons. For example, Dipamkara, the first of the twenty-four buddhas before the Shakyamuni Buddha, was a giant, with a retinue of 84,000 arahants (fully enlightened ones), and lived for 100,000 years. The Jain tirthankaras (ford-makers) similarly go back to earlier cycles of the world and enjoy incredible majesty and grandeur, emphasizing the link between then and now. In more historic terms, the Hindu rishis, patriarchal poet-sages credited with writing the Vedic hymns, provide a more concrete continuity, since they are believed to be the primary ancestors of the major priestly families. They also hark back to a lost golden age of human achievement, since even the gods are said to have been in awe of their wisdom. The same can be said of the legendary five emperors, or five sages, of China. By the second century B.C.E., it was believed that they had ruled China back in the third millennium—and had brought China every gift of civilization. Such legends may arise and catch on because they emphasize that a culture has the favor of the gods; in this case, depicting Chinese culture as god-given rather than the product of gradual historic development.

This role of legendary holy person as primordial link with the divine also appears in African legend. For example, the Dinka people of Sudan have a legend of a primordial figure named Aweil Longar, one of the first humans to reestablish a link with the divine after humankind was severed from the creator. He had amazing powers given by God, including the power of life over death. And the continuity continues: Important Dinka spiritual leaders still claim descent from Aweil Longar.

The historicity of other saints is not clear. The great reorganization of the Roman Catholic calendar in 1969 led to the deletion of many saints because there was no evidence of their existence, including such popular figures as George, Christopher, and Catherine of Alexandria. In each case, these had become popular saints because they were believed to embody a particularly desirable attribute. George was a paragon of military virtue, Christopher found himself in the enviable position of carrying the Christ child, Catherine was a model of how Christian wisdom could defeat even great philosophers. These saints, even though they were probably invented, had the power to inspire with the stories that were told of them. Similarly, the Muslim Sayyida Nafisa may have been invented as a model woman saint—it is suspicious that the first mention of her does not appear until 150 years after her purported death in 824, and her veneration did not rise in Egypt until the thirteenth century.

The “model saint,” probably not consciously a fraud but rather originally a story created to inspire, also appears in Judaism in the tale of Amnon of Mainz. His legend developed in the twelfth century, reporting that Amnon was pushed to convert to Christianity about 200 years before. He delayed, and finally the persecuting bishop ordered that he be cut apart piece by piece. The gallant Amnon asked that his tongue be cut out first to punish it for not refusing point blank when ordered to abandon his faith. The universality of this tendency to create ideal saints can also be seen in the case of Malawi's mythical martyr, Mbona. He is portrayed as offering himself in a Christlike self-sacrifice that is deeply inspirational. No historic man lies behind the story though: His legend is an adaptation of an earlier cult in a process of centralization in the seventeenth century.

Holy people have also been invented or their biographical details have been altered to add prestige to places associated with them. It is impossible to tell at this remove whether the creators of such stories were gullible or mercenary, or merely wishful thinkers. Many locales have claimed that particularly important holy people visited them or served as parent of their communities, ranging from Glastonbury in England, where a supposed visit from Joseph of Arimathea bolstered the monastery's claim to antiquity, to locales in India that at various times "discovered" a connection to the historic Krishna, to the Buddha, or to another great holy person. A particularly common feature of medieval Christian Europe was to forge fictional connections with figures who appeared in the gospels—dozens of dioceses claimed that the obscure saints buried in their crypts were actually disciples of one of the original twelve apostles. The rediscovered "antiquity" of these churches increased their importance in the Christian world (if the claim won acceptance).

Ultimately, most tales of saints, wherever they lived, contain strong elements of legend, which most likely developed as people strove for absolute certainty that some people, indeed, are especially beloved of the gods.

Lekganyane, Ignatius (Engenas)

(c. 1885–1948 C.E.)

Pentecostal church founder

Ignatius Lekganyane was founder of the Zion Christian Church (ZCC), South Africa's largest and fastest-growing independent church. The ZCC combines strong charismatic elements such as healing, exorcism, baptism, prophecy, and miracles with traditional African beliefs, particularly the intercession of ancestors. It celebrates Easter each year with gatherings of more than a million church members. The church has its origins in the Zionist movement founded by John A. Dowie in Zion City, Illinois, in 1896, which sent missionaries to Africa in 1897. Its headquarters are in Zion City, Moria.

Lekganyane, a rural farm worker born in 1885, was educated by Scottish Presbyterian missionaries, and Presbyterian doctrine is also reflected in some of the church's theology. His ministry began in 1916 following two spiritual experiences, including the healing of an eye disease after baptism. Schisms characterized the early years of the Zionist churches in South Africa, and Lekganyane seceded from the Zion Apostolic Faith Mission in 1925 to form the ZCC.

Following Lekganyane's death in 1948, his son Joseph took over the ZCC; his other son, Edward, founded the St. Engenas Zion Christian Church. The ZCC remains by far the largest branch, with some 2 million to 6 million members. Today it is led by Lekganyane's grandson, Bishop Barnabas Lekganyane.

Lekhraj, Dada

Hindu sect founder

Dada Lekhraj was founder of the Brahma Kumaris World Spiritual Organization, a religious movement rooted in Hinduism and notable for the preeminent role of women in its leadership and membership. Born in a village near Hyderabad in Sind (now in Pakistan) in 1876, Lekhraj spent most of his life as a successful and well-to-do diamond merchant. At the age of sixty, he began to have a series of dramatic visions focused on the nature and history of the cosmos and the coming destruction of the world. As word of his extraordinary experiences spread, he attracted a mainly female following from the wealthy business community of Hyderabad, and a formal organization was established in 1937. Shortly thereafter, controversy concerning the role of women in the movement forced its roughly 300 members to move to Karachi. After the subcontinent's partition between India and Pakistan in 1947, the movement shifted to Mount Abu in India in 1950 and established permanent headquarters there. Members began to proselytize in various Indian cities in 1952.

Lekhraj taught that cosmic history consists of an infinite series of completely identical 5,000-year cycles in which the world repeatedly begins as a paradise and then degenerates into the degraded state that is its current condition. At the end of each cycle, the world is destroyed by a cataclysmic war, after which the paradise returns. Just prior to the destruction, the Supreme Soul (known as Shiva Baba) imparts to humanity knowledge of the true nature of cosmic history and the paradise to come by speaking through the mouth of Dada Lekhraj. Movement members practice a special technique of meditation called raja yoga and pursue a lifestyle characterized by celibacy and other behavioral restrictions in order to become fit to be reborn in the coming paradise.

Lekhraj is believed to have continued to communicate with the movement by means of trances and visions after his death in 1969. In the meantime, the movement has flourished and internationalized, currently claiming more than 3,000 centers in India and abroad.

Lenshina, Alice (Mulenga Lubusha)

Christian church founder

Alice Lenshina founded the Lumpa Church in Zambia (Northern Rhodesia) in 1958. The church became involved in political disputes in the 1960s that led to her arrest and to the death of many of her adherents.

Lenshina, born in 1919, was raised as a Presbyterian. The turning point for her spiritually came in 1953, after she experienced “rising from the dead.” During this experience, she allegedly spoke to Jesus and John the Baptist in Chibemba, her native language. They instructed her to visit the white man, who would give her the rest of God’s message. After her vision, she visited the local missionary, Fergus MacPherson at Lubwa, to recount her experience. MacPherson did not dismiss her or her story. Lenshina was baptized and christened as Alice in the Church of Scotland. She eventually broke away from the Presbyterian Church, however, and began baptizing on her own and accepting those thrown out of the mission orders.

Some write that indigenous churches were able to accommodate aspects of local culture that were incompatible with missionary church teachings. Her church did not accept polygamy, and Lenshina was adamantly opposed to widow cleansing, a practice by which a woman had to have sexual relations with a male relative of a dead husband before she was free to marry outside of that family (her own husband, Petros Chitankwa, was a male relative of her first husband). She stipulated that in marriage, both parties had to make known their intention of willingly entering into the relationship. Lenshina also preached against witchcraft, whereas missionaries chose not to deal with the theme in their teachings. She convinced her followers to turn in their talismans to show their denunciation of the practice. Among these talismans, however, were Catholic rosaries, which strained her relationship with the Catholic Church. Moreover, the Central Church of Africa, with which she was affiliated, expelled Lenshina and her husband for not correcting practices the church felt were incompatible with Christianity.

Lenshina’s followers were loyal, however. With their help, she was able to construct her own church, a grand structure in Kasoma. More than 20,000 attended the opening ceremony for this church in 1958, and it became the mother house of the denomination known as the Lumpa Church. In addition, she had several temples built on the outskirts of villages. After its expansion, the church performed confessions, baptisms, marriages, and ceremonies blessing the seeds before planting. Her deacons and choir members had special status. Between 1953, when she began preaching, and 1960, the Lumpa Church came to boast a million members.

Politically, the church developed at a time when the nationalist and independence movements in Zambia were very active. When Zambia gained its independence in 1964, her followers were considered anarchists and did not pay taxes. The tension between her members and the United National Independence Party (UNIP) proved deadly. Between 1964 and 1968, some 19,000 people were killed in fighting between government forces and church members, and others exiled themselves to the Katanga region of the Congo. Lenshina submitted herself to the authorities to prevent further conflict and lived, under house arrest, at a Mumbwa prison near Lusaka until her natural death in 1978. She requested that no autopsy be performed on her body and left specific details regarding her burial (not all of which were followed). The membership of the Lumpa Church has spread throughout Zambia, Zimbabwe, Nyasaland, and the Congo.

Leo the Great

Christian pope, doctor of the church

Leo I is one of two popes called “the Great” (Gregory I is the other). Leo’s insistence on the primacy of the bishopric of Rome and his active leadership in the church as a whole helped lay the foundations for the authority and power of the medieval papacy. His 143 surviving letters and 96 sermons are important sources for the history of the church in the early Middle Ages. His feast day is November 10 (formerly April 11) for Western Catholics, February 18 in the East.

Leo was born in the late fourth century, probably of Tuscan parents, perhaps in Rome. He served as a deacon under Celestine I and Sixtus III and was an influential adviser to both popes. Leo learned of his election to the papacy in August 440 while in Gaul on a mission on behalf of the imperial court. He returned to Rome and was consecrated on September 29.

An able and energetic pope, Leo was much admired by his contemporaries. He exercised his authority most actively in Italy, but his advice and rulings were also sought by the bishops of Spain and northern Africa. In Gaul, he intervened to limit the ambitions of Bishop Hilarius of Arles, and he maintained a papal vicariate in Illyricum in the southern Balkans. In 448, Leo was approached by a Byzantine abbot named Eutyches who had been deposed by the bishop of Constantinople for teaching monophysitism, the doctrine that Christ’s human nature was completely absorbed by his divine nature at the Incarnation. Leo supported the condemnation of Eutyches in a work known as the Tome, in which he set out the orthodox belief that human and divine natures coexisted in Christ. When the Council of Ephesus upheld Eutyches’ teachings in 449, Leo branded it an “armed robbery” (latrocinium) and called for a new council. In 451, the Council of Chalcedon reversed the decision of Ephesus and accepted Leo’s Tome as containing the correct teaching on Christ’s natures. Leo, however, delayed his approval of the Council of Chalcedon until 453 because one of the canons passed by the council gave the see of Constantinople the same status as Rome in ecclesiastical matters.

Leo lived during a time when the Roman Empire was beginning to collapse in the West, and he stepped in to fill partially the power vacuum left by the ineffectiveness of the Western emperors. In 452, he met with Attila the Hun at Mantua and convinced him to spare Rome and abandon his invasion of Italy. In 455, Leo persuaded the Vandal king Gaiseric to moderate his attack on Rome and spare the lives of the Roman people. Leo’s actions foreshadowed the wider role that later popes would play in the politics of central Italy.

After his death in 461, Leo was buried in the vestibule of St. Peter’s in Rome. His body was moved into the interior of the church in 688. Benedict XIV declared Leo a doctor of the church in 1754.

Leonard

(d. c. 559 C.E.?)

Christian legendary saint

Leonard of Noblac (and of Limousin), patron of prisoners, is a Christian saint widely venerated up to the early twentieth century despite the fact that the earliest account of him, written in the eleventh century, is considered historically worthless. Indeed, some scholars have suggested that this Life was a forgery by Bishop Jordan of Limoges written to foster the local cult. In any case, there are no traces of Leonard in any document preceding this period. Nonetheless, his cult was very popular and hundreds of churches were dedicated to him.

The eleventh-century Life claims that Leonard was the son of nobles at the court of King Clovis (r. 481–511) and that he became a follower of Remigius, renowned missionary to the Franks. His first miracle was performed at Remigius's monastery, where he turned water into wine after giving the sacrificial wine to a beggar in need. Leonard later went into the wilderness around Limousin, a popular hermitage for solitary monks. Here, he heard lamentations for the queen, who was dying nearby. After curing her through prayer, Leonard obtained from King Clovis the right to free any prisoner he considered worthy.

Leonard is supposed to have died around 559, and many of his posthumous miracles involve the release of prisoners, including noteworthy individuals such as King Richard I (r. 1189–1199; "Richard the Lion-Hearted") of England. Bishop Gerland of Naumburg wrote in 1115, "Under his hand the hardest iron melts like wax before the fire [and] the captive's chains are broken" (Arbellot 1910, 64). The broken fetters were often brought to the shrine of Leonard in tribute. Leonard is possibly mythical in origin and so he stands as a reminder of the power of written texts to generate history. The eleventh-century Life inspired several other medieval accounts and these spread throughout Europe, resulting in the hundreds of churches and towns that still bear his name.

Leonard of Port Maurice

Roman Catholic friar, preacher, spiritual writer

Born in Porto Maurizio, Italy, in 1676, Paul Jerome Casanova was educated by Jesuits in Rome. Taking the name Leonard, he joined the Franciscan order at Ponticelli in the Sabine Mountains and was ordained a priest in 1703. After a long illness, he settled at the Florentine friary of San Francesco del Monte and succeeded in restoring the Rule of St. Francis. He later became guardian and established a retreat at Incontro in the mountains near Florence, where friars retired for solitude, fasting, and silence.

Leonard went on to preach in Umbria and Genoa, his missions marked by huge congregations and many extraordinary conversions. He was very often obliged to preach in the open, as churches could not contain the thousands who came to listen. He preached not only the way of the cross, but also the devotion to the sacred heart of Jesus, the perpetual adoration of the eucharist, and devotion to the Immaculate Conception. One of his aspirations was to see the latter defined as a dogma of faith by Rome.

In 1744, Pope Benedict XIV sent Leonard to Corsica in the hope that his energetic preaching would vanquish lawlessness there. He had to be rescued from those angered by his attacks on their morals, however, after six months, and even the papacy, which held him in high esteem for his preaching, recognized that it was inadvisable for him to return to the island. In 1750, he set up the stations of the cross in the Colosseum. But after preaching extensively in Lucca the following year, he returned to Rome to die.

Leonard composed numerous devotional treatises and letters. His most famous work is Proponimenti (Resolutions), a tract for the attainment of higher Christian perfection. He was beatified in 1796 and canonized in 1867. The church of the monastery of St. Bonaventure al Palatino in Rome claims his body.

Leopold III of Austria

Christian ruler

Leopold III, born in Melk in 1073, succeeded his father in the Babenberg line as margrave of Austria in 1096. In 1106, he married Agnes, daughter of Emperor Henry IV. They had eighteen children, of whom eleven survived childhood. Leopold arranged politically strategic marriages for most of those who survived; however, his most accomplished son was Otto of Freising, a Cistercian monk and bishop whose historical writings are still referred to today.

Leopold played several important parts in the politics of central Europe. In 1105, at a crucial moment in the war between the emperor and his son, Leopold withdrew his troops, resulting in Henry IV's defeat. He also participated in the negotiations between the pope and the emperor that resulted in the Concordat of Worms in 1122, which settled the Investiture Contest. In 1125, he declined an offer of the imperial crown from the German princes. Throughout his reign, Leopold was a generous patron of ecclesiastical institutions. He founded the monasteries of Heiligenkreuz, Marizell, and Klosterneuburg, which played important parts in the religious life of Austria through the Middle Ages and are centers of religious activity to this day. He died in 1136 and was buried at Klosterneuburg, outside of Vienna.

The earliest traces of a saintly cult are found in the fourteenth century, when the pope and the bishop of Passau issued letters approving public veneration of Leopold. The wife of the Hapsburg duke of Austria started an annual pilgrimage in 1339 to Leopold's tomb in thanksgiving for the birth of her first child. This marks the beginning of a long and eventful association between that dynasty and Leopold. In the late fourteenth century, the canons of Klosterneuburg composed a new biography of Leopold. This Life emphasized Leopold's good rulership, personal religiosity, and generous patronage of the church. It also gave a prominent role to Agnes as a holy woman and a collaborator in her husband's charitable activities.

In the late fifteenth century, the Hapsburg emperor and duke of Austria, Frederick III, sought a patron saint to enhance the dignity of his dynasty, its claim over Austria, and its significance in the Holy Roman Empire. He settled upon Leopold and petitioned the pope for Leopold's canonization. The Italian humanist and canonist Franciscus de Pavinis led the campaign for canonization at the papal court, and Pope Innocent VIII canonized Leopold in 1485. Frederick then commissioned an elaborate genealogical work that stressed the connection between the Babenberg family and his own. This text can still be found in Klosterneuburg.

Beginning in the sixteenth century, the University of Vienna hosted an annual panegyric to Leopold in which the margrave-saint's rulership and family life were eloquently praised. Since the sixteenth century, St. Leopold has been a symbol of Austria's Catholic identity. Leopold is a patron saint of Austria, and Austrians still celebrate his feast day on November 15 with great pomp.

Liguori, Alphonsus

Roman Catholic monk, order founder

Alphonsus Liguori, founder of the Redemptorists, a Roman Catholic religious order established to serve the poor, was born on September 27, 1696, near Naples. He was not sent to school but tutored under the guidance of his father. He received a law degree at age sixteen and became a successful lawyer. However, in 1723, in a case involving 500,000 ducats of property, he overlooked a significant document and lost the case. He believed that this failure was an act of God, calling him to greater prayer and humility. In August of that same year, he had a vision of light and heard a voice telling him to leave the world and give himself fully to God. He was ordained a priest on April 6, 1726, and quickly dedicated himself to the service of the poor.

On November 9, 1732, Liguori founded the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, also known as the Redemptorists, to serve the country's poor. Though challenged by many divisions between the initial members, Liguori held firm to his vision of the order. Not desiring episcopal power, he avoided being named archbishop of Palermo; instead he was consecrated bishop of St. Agatha of the Goths, a poor diocese in desperate need of reform, in 1762. From May 1768 to June 1769, Liguori suffered from rheumatic fever, leaving him paralyzed until his death. His illness finally led him to resign from his see in 1775.

Unfortunately this was not an end to his travail. The Redemptorist houses in Naples became overly connected to local politics. As a result, other congregations in the papal states, with the support of Pius VI, separated from the original Neapolitan house. Effectively, this severed Liguori from the rest of the order he had founded. He died seven years later on August 1, 1787. In 1793, all branches of the order were formally reunited.

Muslim reformer, mahdi

In 1883 on the peninsula of Cap-Vert in present-day Senegal, Libasse Thiaw, an illiterate fisherman born in 1843, began to preach Islamic virtue and to proclaim himself the mahdi, the special God-sent individual who would come to restore the faith. He took the name Seydina Limamou Laye. Many laughed, but many listened. Thus, a following developed and a new Islamic brotherhood came into existence, the Layennes. Limamou Laye's doctrinal concentration was on purifying Islam through the destruction of the indigenous practices that had filtered into Islamic life. He called for jihad, holy war, but proclaimed that true holy war is jihad al-nafs, the battle to overcome the base passions of the flesh.

According to one tradition, Limamou Laye declared himself a reincarnation of the prophet Muhammad. Another tradition says that he called himself only the shadow of the prophet Muhammad. Whatever the case, he was revered as the mahdi, and immediately an oral tradition of miracles sprang into being to support his claims. He was said to be able to heal any sickness through the simple blowing of his breath onto the infirm. His following multiplied among people from other regions, including adherents from Waalo in northern Senegal. The villages of Yoff and Cambèrene became holy communities similar to Mecca and Medina. The French colonial authorities were paying attention. Limamou Laye's call for jihad led to French fears of rebellion, and the government kept him under surveillance and eventually arrested and imprisoned him for three months in 1887.

The arrest further solidified Limamou Laye's reputation as a holy man, and to some a prophet, owing to the miraculous events reported surrounding the event. Furthermore, his son, Seydina Issa Rohou Laye, came into his own as a man of spiritual stature. Seydina Issa proclaimed himself the reincarnation of 'Isa (the Arabic name for Jesus Christ). This only added to the stature of his father and the importance of the family in the eyes of followers. At the death of Seydina Limamou Laye in 1909, Seydina Issa Rohou Laye headed the group and it grew and expanded under his leadership.

Linji (Huizhao)

Chan Buddhist sect founder

Linji in the ninth century founded his own Chan Buddhist lineage, which became the Rinzai sect in Japan. His name is derived from a small temple called Linji, which means "overlooking the ford." There is a revealing story about how he received the transmission of authority from his master. According to the narrative, some monks were walking to the fields to work. Linji was following his master, Huangbo, who noticed that his disciple was not carrying a hoe. After listening to Linji's feeble excuse about why he did not have it, the master called the disciple nearer, threw his hoe on the ground, and challenged Linji to pick it up. After Linji picked up the hoe, Huangbo announced that it was now unnecessary for Huangbo himself to help in the fields, and he returned to the temple, leaving Linji holding his hoe and the authority of the master.

Linji was famous for his strict and harsh teaching methods, which included beating students and shouting at them. He was convinced that a teacher should not teach or explain anything but instead must force students to experience truth for themselves. This pedagogical emphasis was consistent with his focus on wordless teaching. He also stressed "naturalness" in his method, which included the elements of "no concern" and "no seeking." That is, he felt that if a student was overly concerned about learning or diligently seeking for the truth, taking an "unnatural" approach, the aspirant would only go further astray.

Linji's thought embodied an egalitarian spirit. The true human being, he believed, was someone without rank or title who was freed of all fetters. This was a radical position to take in a society in which social rank was so important. Such a person, he said, existed concretely in the present and was lively, dynamic, attuned to nature, and dependent on nothing. Furthermore, grounded in the transcendent, the true human being was ordinary, simple, natural, and direct and revealed the buddha-nature. He was without face, a solitary and independent figure freely following the way, indefinable, not clinging to motion or its opposite, a marginal figure on the fringes of society. As such, Linji's true human being shares traits in common with Daoist notions of the sage. Such a figure, Linji said, must be willing to destroy all obstacles to liberation. Linji defined these obstacles in terms of opposition to five great sins: killing one's father, mother, or a buddha, destroying the harmony of the monastic community, and burning the scriptures.

Linji devised a four-step technique to open a student's mind, grounded on the four basic propositions of Indian Buddhist logic. The initial step involved taking away a sense of individual selfhood but not one's objective station, with the overall objective of freeing one from attachments. The second step involved taking away the objective situation but not the person, which meant being free from the attachments of objectivity and letting subjectivity remain. Being detached from objectivity, he believed, liberates a person from bondage to what is exterior. The third step involved taking away both the person and objective situation, which represented liberation from both subjective and objective bondage. Finally, the fourth step involved taking away neither the person nor the situation, which allowed both subjectivity and objectivity to become identified with each other. This happened when a person became master of him/herself.

Lioba

(d. c. 780 C.E.)

Christian abbess, missionary

Lioba, or Leoba, an Anglo-Saxon woman from Wessex, was a nun at the monastic community of Wimbourne, under the rule of the virtuous abbess Tetta, when she was called by her relative, St. Boniface, to join him in his missionary work among the unconverted Germanic tribes on the borders of the Frankish kingdom in the eighth century. Such missionary work was dangerous, and the very real possibilities for martyrdom made saints out of many of those who brought Christianity to the region. Boniface put Lioba in charge of the new double monastery of Bischofsheim in Germany, which housed both men and women.

A ninth-century account of her life offers a glimpse of some of the many obstacles she faced in the performance of this enormous administrative task. We see her performing miracles through the power of her prayers, heroically organizing a bucket brigade to fight a fire, and hurling prayers into the teeth of a violent storm to calm it. She not only protected those in her care with the power of her holiness, she also diligently taught them scripture and the beliefs of their new religion. Her reputation for learning and wisdom as well as her manifest concern for the spiritual rather than the material made her much sought after by kings, nobles, princes, and bishops for her good counsel. They all respected and loved her. She was often at the court of Charlemagne, and she had a close friendship with his second wife, Hildegard. Her ability to both act as an effective force in the world of secular politics and maintain her focus on God was a particular sign of her sanctity. She performed one healing miracle while alive, but many such miracles were recorded at her tomb following her death in about 780, providing further proof to people of the Middle Ages that she was a true and powerful saint.

Lioba's hagiographer, the monk Rudolph, had difficulty reconciling the social, political, and administrative activism demanded of a missionary with the expectations of Roman orthodoxy that women religious be passive and cloistered. Rudolph thus spends an unusual amount of time recounting the events of Lioba's early life, when her activities were more conventional. The story of her birth echoes many biblical stories, and her life at Wimbourne was strictly disciplined. She was humble, obedient, and abstemious to the point of asceticism. She steadfastly pursued spiritual perfection, and she was well versed in scripture, church law, and the writings of the church fathers. These attributes alone marked her with a special spirituality, but it was as missionary and abbess that she acquired true sanctity.

Liudger

Christian bishop, missionary

Liudger (Ludger of Münster, Liuger) is patron saint of Münster, the city itself named for the monastery he founded there in 795. He was born in about 744 near Utrecht to noble Christian Frisians, educated at Utrecht and York under the great Anglo-Saxon scholar Alcuin, and ordained c. 777. He returned to the continent as a missionary, and in 758 he built two churches in Frisia, which were destroyed by Saxon invasions but later rebuilt. Liudger evangelized Westphalia and Eastphalia with wide success, and he is said to have converted the Saxons by kindness, whereas the repressive efforts of Charlemagne had failed. Against his own modest protests, he was consecrated bishop in 784. He died in 809 at his monastery at Werden, where his relics remained until 1984, when they were translated to Münster.

Three Lives of Liudger survive, all written by the end of the ninth century. One survives in an eleventh-century illuminated manuscript (Berlin, Preussische Staatsbibliothek, Theol. lat. fol. 323) with twenty-three illuminations depicting scenes from his life, from his birth through his posthumous miracles, including typical images of healing the blind and lame, resurrections, and exorcisms. This Life contains many elements common to numerous contemporary saints (for example, Armand, Cuthbert, Millán, and Maur), including miraculous provisions of fish, resurrections of the dead, and numerous healings of the blind. In one such image, Liudger raises St. Lebuin (Liafwin), an English monk from Ripon and a fellow missionary in Frisia, from the dead. As the popular celebration of the cult of saints grew dramatically in the eleventh century, Liudger's relics were rehoused in a new crypt built in the mid–eleventh century and then elevated to a shrine behind the altar by Abbot Adalwig only a few decades later. This shrine came to be a site of healing, as can be seen in the eleventh-century manuscript depicting a man with gout being healed by lifting the saint's head in his hands.

Lull, Ramon

Christian layman, author, preacher, mystic

Ramon Lull was a founding figure in the creation of vernacular literature in Europe. Patron saint of the Balearic Islands, he was also a missionary and visionary layman. His reputation among mainstream theologians has been as a marginal thinker; indeed, he was condemned in the century after his death by the inquisitor of Aragon for his unorthodox methods, and he was rumored to have been an alchemist. Lull's fame rests chiefly upon his "Art," a complete system of logic and theology that he used in his missionary efforts.

Born into a prominent family of Majorca in 1232, Lull spent his youth composing works in the troubadour style. Around age thirty, he had a series of visions of Christ crucified—his "conversion to penitence." This experience was not unlike that of Francis of Assisi; Lull, too, gave up his possessions and dedicated himself to evangelical preaching and poverty while remaining a layman. He spent the rest of his long life wandering the Western Christian world, attempting to persuade popes and princes of the need to evangelize the Muslims and Jews. To forward this notion, he many times attempted to set up schools for the teaching of Arabic, all the while preaching and writing more than 250 works.

Lull may have remained a more conventional figure had his first mystical experience been his last. But around 1274, while living as a hermit on Mt. Randa, he had another revelation from God. In the midst of contemplation, God illuminated Lull's mind with the method by which he might convince unbelievers to accept Western Christianity. This was the genesis both of Lull's later fame as the "Illuminated Doctor" and of his famous Art, which was to remain the focus of the rest of his career. All knowledge could be represented and explained, he believed, by the techniques of the Art: a series of revolving wheels with symbolic letters that corresponded to all levels of existence. With this system, Lull said, all arguments could be stated and all questions answered; theology became logically explicable, and all logical operations could be recognized as a part of theology.

Lull made several missionary trips to Tunis, disputing religion with learned Muslims. He is reputed to have been martyred there, though scholars believe that he actually died back on Majorca in 1316. Regardless, a cult for the martyr grew up in the Balearic Islands, where he is regarded as the patron saint. His saintly reputation received some formal recognition in 1847, when Lull was beatified by Pope Pius IX.

Longchenpa (Tibetan: Klongchen rab-'byam-pa)

Buddhist scholar

Longchenpa was born in east central Tibet in 1308 and from an early age demonstrated a gift for learning. He quickly mastered most of the systems of philosophy of Tibetan Buddhism and became adept at ritual as well. At nine years old, he memorized The Transcendental Practice of Discriminative Awareness, both in the 25-line and 8,000-line versions. When he was twelve, he became a novice monk, ordained by Samdrup Rincen of Semye and Kunga Oze. At nineteen, he entered the great center of logic and philosophy, Sangpu Neutok. There he mastered literature, yoga, and ritual as well as philosophy. He studied especially the philosophers Nagarjuna (c. 150–250), Chandrakirti (c. 580–660), Santideva (c. 650–750), and Atisha (982–1054), becoming an excellent debater. Philosophically, he accepted Nagarjuna's view that there was an ultimate reality, beyond conception, and that conceptual knowledge was only relative truth. Through tantric practice and meditation one could achieve the correct view, beyond all duality, inner, outer, subject, object, and so on. This was the blissful awareness of the Great Perfection (dzogchen).

There were many cliques and power struggles within the monastery, and Longchenpa, disillusioned and saddened because of all the suffering of sentient beings, left to practice meditation alone. Just before leaving, he posted a comic poem, each line beginning with a letter of the alphabet, lampooning the monks from Kham who had constantly harassed him. Setting off on his journey, he encountered the great saint Kumaraja, who became his teacher. Although he received many offerings, he always used them in the service of the teachings. He was very humble and ate the food given to him by the poor as if it were the greatest delicacy. Yet he never honored the rich and powerful.

At the end of his life, although he was very ill, he continued to teach. After announcing his approaching death, he traveled to Semye Chempu monastery, saying that he would leave his body there. At this place, asking all his students to be silent, he passed away in 1363. Although he died in wintertime, it was said that the earth became warm and flowers burst into bloom.

Longinus

Christian legendary saint

Longinus is the Roman soldier who pierced Christ's side with a spear as he hung on the cross; his name is probably derived from the Greek longche ("lance"). The spear, or lance, went on to become an important relic in its own right and was eventually absorbed into the Arthurian Grail Cycle.

According to tradition, Christ bled onto the spear and the blood found its way into Longinus's eyes, curing him of blindness. After this incident, Longinus converted to Christianity, left the army, and became a monk in Caesarea. His teeth and tongue were removed when he refused to honor non-Christian gods, but he still spoke clearly. Longinus then destroyed the cult statues of the gods, which caused the local governor to go blind and insane. Longinus was beheaded at that point, and some of his blood splattered the governor, curing his blindness.

Longinus's feast day is March 15 in the West and October 16 in the East; his relics are in St. Augustine's Church in Rome. The spear was supposedly discovered in a church in Antioch during the First Crusade. That relic has been split up: The tip is in the Treasure Room of the Hofburg Palace in Vienna, and the shaft is in one of the four pillars over the altar in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

Losang Gyatso (Dalai Lama V)

Buddhist spiritual leader, ruler, monk

The "Great Fifth" is arguably the most important of the fourteen dalai lamas. From his time onward, the dalai lamas have been the symbol of Tibetan nationhood as well as the leading figures of the Buddhist religion in Tibet. He became the secular as well as the religious leader of Tibet, established a strong relationship with the rulers of China, and built one of the world's most remarkable buildings, the Potala Palace of Lhasa.

The child who would be identified as the fifth dalai lama was born in central Tibet in 1617 amidst auspicious signs and dreams. His parents followed the Nyingma traditions, which is notable because he was the dalai lama who did the most to unify the dominant Gelukpa tradition with the older tradition of Nyingma. His mother was related to the powerful king of Tsang, whose military excursions, ironically, led to a minor civil war and a conflict with Mongolian forces that delayed the process whereby he was discovered.

Three candidates were found, but the usual divining instruments—consultation of two oracles and subjecting the boys to the test of recognizing the effects of the previous dalai lama—proved inconclusive. Two prominent lamas performed a divination by placing the names in barley meal balls and rolling them around a bowl until one fell out, and this sealed the choice. The child chosen was taken to Drepung Monastery in 1622 and given the name Losang Gyatso (Tib.: blo bzang rgya mtsho).

When he was seven, Losang Gyatso went on pilgrimage to the Oracle Lake monastery, where a statue miraculously "offered" him an offering scarf (a gust of wind blew it from the statue into his hands). He was trained in the extensive Gelukpa curriculum of philosophy and ritual but still managed to spend five to six hours per day in meditation and to pursue many other subjects. He became an expert in astrology and classical Indian poetry and, even more astonishing, completed the lengthy, complex training required to become a doctor of Tibetan medicine. When he was seventeen, Losang Gyatso began to train in the Nyingma tantric lineages. His interest in Nyingma thought and practice continued to grow, and in later years he became an important bridge between these alienated sects. He is, in fact, considered by the Nyingmas to have been a major holder of one of the Nyingma lineages, which did not sit well with the Gelukpas.

When Losang Gyatso was still in his early twenties, the king of Tsang, intent on wiping out the Gelukpa monasteries of central Tibet and taking their wealth, instead incited the Qoshot Mongols under Gushri Khan to enter Tibet in defense of the dalai lama. They united the splintered kingdoms and principalities of Tibet under one government and named the dalai lama its head, a position the dalai lamas have kept to the present. One of his first acts was to suppress a rebellion of supporters of the imprisoned king of Tsang. He closed thirteen monasteries that had actively backed them, including the great Jonangpa Monastery. He was accused of using this opportunity to solidify Gelukpa dominance.

One of the Great Fifth's achievements was the construction of Potala Palace, residence of the dalai lamas and a monastery and administrative center. The foundations were laid in 1645, but construction was not completed until after Losang Gyatso's death. The Potala dominates the Lhasa skyline and has become one of the world's best-known structures. He also built the national medical college, implemented the first system of taxation, commissioned the first census and land survey, and undertook measures to protect wildlife. He was a prolific writer, his collected works comprising twenty-eight volumes that included accounts of his visionary experiences.

Losang Gyatso was invited to Beijing in 1650 and after much deliberation decided to meet the new Manchurian emperor. He was received with great pomp and devotion. At the emperor's request, he wrote a monastic charter that was used to establish dozens of Tibetan Buddhist centers in Manchuria and China. Tibetan Buddhism became the principal court religion of the Manchu rulers for centuries.

In 1679, soon after installing Sanggyay Gyatso as his "desi," or manager, the Great Fifth went into a meditation retreat from which he never emerged. His death in 1682 was concealed for fourteen years because Sanggyay Gyatso feared that the Potala might otherwise never be finished. This greatly delayed the search for the sixth dalai lama, a layman who proved incapable of the job.

Louis IX

Christian king

Louis IX, king of France, member of the Capetian dynasty, and crusader, was the last important royal saint of the Middle Ages. Born to Louis VIII and Blanche of Castile in 1214, he reigned from his father's death in 1226 until his own death in 1270, although in his youth under the regency of his formidable mother. Despite an early threat to his rule by ambitious barons, France flourished under Louis, and the peace and prosperity the country enjoyed during his reign allowed him to direct his energies toward projects of personal interest and devotion. As king, Louis was sincerely interested in executing true justice and ensuring peace. He outlawed private duels, and he served throughout his reign as an important arbiter of conflicts both within and outside of his kingdom. His governmental reforms of 1254 were designed to safeguard the rights of the poor and disenfranchised against overzealous governmental agents in an effort to institute a level of moral purity within his kingdom.

Deeply pious, Louis spent long hours in prayer, loved sermons and the company of monks, aided the poor and sick, and built hospitals and leper houses. Although he was a devoted patron of the Cistercian abbey of Royaumont, which he and his mother founded, it was the newly formed ideology of the mendicant friars that was particularly attractive to him. Louis spent much time with, and lavished many alms and gifts on, the Franciscan and Dominican orders. It has been said that Louis's kingship and piety was influenced by the mendicant movement, and outward indications, such as the confessors he chose and the foundations he supported, are evidence of this commitment. After purchasing Christ's crown of thorns from Emperor Baldwin II of Constantinople in 1238, Louis built the Ste.-Chapelle to house the relics.

Louis was passionately committed to recovering the Holy Land, and twice he organized and led crusades. The first was the disastrous Seventh Crusade to Egypt (1248–1252), during which he was captured and ransomed, and the second was his crusade to Tunis in 1270, during which he died. Louis's sincere piety and his desire to serve the interests of Christianity did not mean he was a puppet of the church, and he steadfastly defended the prerogatives of the monarchy against French bishops and the papacy.

Louis's saintly life was immediately recognized at his death, and miracles were reported as his bones were transported from Tunis to France for burial at Saint-Denis, where a papal inquiry into his sanctity was held in 1282–1283. Philip III (r. 1270–1285) and in particular Philip IV (“the Fair,” r. 1285–1314) lobbied for papal canonization. This finally occurred in 1297 as a political concession amid a dispute between Philip IV and Pope Boniface VIII.

After his death, Louis's Dominican confessors Geoffrey of Beaulieu and Guillaume of Chartres wrote accounts of his life and virtues. After 1302, the Franciscan Guillaume of Saint-Pathus, his widow's confessor, wrote another vita based on the now lost canonization records of 1282–1283. Primarily clerical in inspiration, these vitas speak little of Louis's rule or kingship. Jean of Joinville, who was a longtime friend of the king and participated in his first crusade, took a distinctly different approach in his memoirs, written before 1309 at the request of Philip IV's wife. Joinville's account broke from traditional saints' vitas and presented a vivid, personal portrait of Louis as king, crusader, family member, and friend. With time, Louis came to be remembered for his ideal rule, in no small part because the Capetian and Valois kings of France often used Louis as an example of good kingship and a symbol of dynastic legitimacy. Louis's cult was revived under Richelieu, Louis XIII, and Louis XIV in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as an authoritative symbol of an absolutist monarchy.

Louis IX's feast day is August 25. In the Middle Ages, the feast of the translation of Louis's head, which was celebrated in the Paris area, fell on the first Tuesday after Ascension.

Louis of Toulouse

Christian bishop

Louis of Toulouse, born in 1274, was the second son of Charles II of Anjou, king of Naples (a nephew of St. Louis IX of France), and Mary of Hungary (a great-niece of St. Elizabeth of Hungary). In 1288, following the imprisonment of his father after he lost a naval battle, Louis and two of his brothers were sent as hostages in exchange for their father's release. During Louis's seven years of captivity, he was educated by Franciscans. In October 1294, Pope Celestine V made Louis the administrator of the archbishopric of Lyon despite the fact that he was still in captivity. Following his release the next year, Louis went to Naples, whereupon he renounced his rights of succession in favor of his brother Robert and entered into a life of great penance and meditation within the family castle.

Shortly after his ordination as subdeacon in Rome, he was made a deacon and a priest in Naples in 1296; the same year, Pope Boniface VIII named him bishop of Toulouse, which Louis accepted after formally joining the Franciscan order. Louis set out in early 1297 for Toulouse, where he soon won the admiration of the locals on account of his virtuous pastoral care. Following a journey to Barcelona, he set out for Rome to attend the canonization of his great-uncle King Louis IX. En route, he went to his sister's house in Brignoles, where his father was also a visitor. Here, weakened by his travels and paying the price for years of punishment inflicted by his imprisonment, as well as by his own self-inflicted penances, he died during the night of August 19–20, 1297. He was only twenty-three years of age.

Louis was buried in the Franciscan church of Marseille following a great funeral procession during which people were already speaking of miracles attributed to his intercession. Several French bishops soon began collecting information in regard to his sanctity, and Pope John XXII—who once had served as a secretary to Louis—canonized him in the cathedral of Avignon on April 7, 1317, in the presence of his mother and his brother Robert. His remains were translated to Marseille in 1318. His feast is celebrated on August 19.

Lü Dongbin (Lü Tung-pin)(c. 8th–9th cent. C.E.)Daoist patriarch

Lü Dongbin was a patriarch of Quanzhen (Perfect realization) Daoism who reputedly lived during the Tang dynasty (618–906), probably in the eighth to ninth centuries. Known as a master of interior alchemy (neidan), a calligrapher, a poet, a sword master, and a soothsayer, Lü served as the patron deity of scholars, ink makers, swordsmen, and the wine trade. His cult initially developed in the tenth century and expanded with the growth of Quanzhen. Lü is also a member of the Daoist assemblage known as the Eight Immortals (baxian), who have been thoroughly integrated into Chinese popular religion. Demonstrating Lü's widespread appeal, he has been worshipped in Buddhist, Daoist, and popular temples as well as in domestic shrines.

One of the best-known stories about Lü, “The Yellow Millet Dream,” describes how he turned to a spiritual life. Lü had journeyed to the capital to pursue a political career. He stopped at a tavern and met a strange man who started to cook some millet for them to eat, but Lü fell asleep. After he awoke, he left the tavern and had a successful career, attaining the rank of prime minister. However, his fortunes changed when the imperial court turned against him and he was accused of a serious crime. As a result, he lost his family and wealth and was sent into exile. Lü ended up in a remote area trapped in a winter storm—on the brink of death. But then he awoke to discover that his whole “life” had been a dream . . . and the millet was still cooking. The strange man turned out to be the immortal Zhongli Quan, who proceeded to teach Lü the ways of inner alchemy.

Lü Dongbin is usually depicted in a traditional Chinese scholar's robe and cap. He often wears a sword on his back, at his waist, or in his sleeve. Called qingshe (green snake), Lü's sword was believed to have the power to ward off calamities. One of the most famous sites associated with Lü is the Daoist temple complex Yongle gong (Palace of Eternal Joy) in Shanxi province. Murals illustrating his life and teachings adorn the temple's walls.

LucumiSee SanteríaLucy (Lucia)(d. c. 310 C.E.)Christian martyr*

Lucy was a virgin martyred during the persecution of Diocletian in about 310. Patron of ophthalmologists, she is the intercessor for eyesight and eye diseases, as Lucia means “light.” Her feast is celebrated on December 13, the winter solstice in the Julian calendar.

Lucy, who converted secretly to Christianity, took her widowed mother to the tomb of St. Agatha (d. c. 250–253) in Catania to obtain a cure for her hemorrhaging. Lucy told her mother that if she believed that Agatha derived her power from Christ, she would be healed. At mass, they heard the gospel story of Jesus healing a woman with the same illness, then Lucy had a vision of St. Agatha, who spoke about her spiritual marriage to Jesus. Furthermore, Agatha announced that she had the power to heal and that she would be patron of Syracuse.

Lucy vowed to remain celibate and to give her dowry to the poor so that she might attain spiritual wealth. With her mother's approval, she carried out her plans, but her thwarted suitor denounced her to the local consul, Paschasius. Before a crowd of spectators, Paschasius ordered her to sacrifice to the gods of the state, but, undaunted, Lucy spoke of her belief in Jesus, which enraged him. He accused Lucy of seducing people with both body and words, but she proclaimed her virtue and incorruptibility. Paschasius ordered his men to take her to a brothel; however, they were unable to lift her. The consul accused her of witchcraft, but she boasted that Jesus was safeguarding her. Her vitae describe different types of physical torture, all ineffective. Finally, the consul's henchman thrust a dagger into her throat, but she continued to speak, foretelling Maximilian's death, Diocletian's downfall, and her victory as patron of Syracuse. Finally, Lucy received the viaticum, and the crowd is converted before her death.

A popular figure in art and literature, St. Lucy represents illuminating grace. Paintings of her martyrdom often depict her carrying a pair of eyes on a tray. The Swedes light candles on her feast day, the beginning of their Christmas season. Some of their customs derive from the legend of her taking bread to the Christians hiding in underground tunnels. Lucy wore a wreath of candles on her head to light the way.

Luke

Christian evangelist

Luke is considered to be the author of both the third gospel and the Acts of the Apostles. His writings, cast in beautiful prose, constitute nearly one-quarter of the New Testament. Second-century church fathers identified him as the "beloved physician" (Col. 4:14) and as the trusted companion of Paul (2 Tim. 4:11), who stayed with Paul during his imprisonment (Phil. 24) and accompanied him on two earlier missionary journeys (Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–21). But based on research that shows that the description of the life of Paul in Acts conflicts with Paul's own accounts, that the speeches in Acts differ significantly from the theology of his epistles, and that the so-called "we" passages of Acts are typical of the "first person style of ancient sea voyage narratives in general" (Perrin and Duling 1982, 244), most contemporary scholars reject the idea that the author of Luke/Acts was the Luke mentioned by Paul in his letters. The anonymous "Luke" is to be found in his two-volume work, with its emphasis on the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple, the delay of the parousia (the "second coming"), and the place of the church and its leadership within the Roman Empire.

In Luke/Acts, the long travel narrative of the gospel, which brings Jesus ever closer to Jerusalem and his passion and ascension, is set over against the description in Acts of Paul's missionary journey, which extends from Jerusalem to Rome. Luke understands the destruction of Jerusalem to be a consequence of the passion of Jesus, and he sees the "savior's" glorious ascension as the beginning of a new, universal mission to the gentiles, which had its origins in the work of Paul. The juxtaposition of the travel narratives of Jesus and Paul in Luke/Acts is instructive for understanding how the author severs the close connection that Mark's gospel had defined between the fall of Jerusalem and the parousia. Unlike Mark, Luke downplays the imminence of Jesus' return, explicitly warning against those who declare that the end of the world is near (Luke 21:8). Although the destruction of the Temple is vastly important, the end will not arrive "until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Luke 21:24b). In Luke/Acts, then, the apocalyptic elements of Mark's gospel are overturned by way of a nonapocalyptic focus on Jesus as a universal savior who offers hope to all.

Luria, Isaac ben Solomon (Isaac Ashkenazi)

Jewish mystic

Isaac ben Solomon Luria was an important kabbalist and creator of the Lurianic version of Kabbalah, a Jewish form of mysticism. Born in Jerusalem in 1534, Isaac Luria was the descendent of Ashkenazi (paternal) and Sephardic (maternal) émigrés. Little can be verified about his childhood. It is documented that in Egypt he was an eager and apt student of halakha (Jewish law) and rabbinical literature. He is said to have married a cousin when he was fifteen, but within seven years he had become so immersed in the mystical aspect of Judaism, particularly after he had discovered the recently published Zohar, the thirteenth-century Spanish kabbalist text by Moses de Leon, that he began to remove himself from common social interaction. Readings from other kabbalists, especially the work of his contemporary, Moses Cordovero, consumed his waking hours, and Luria soon began to write his own commentaries on Kabbalah, most notably a reflective study of the "Book of Concealment" from the Zohar. He also began to experience visions, especially of the prophet Elijah.

In 1569, Luria returned to Jerusalem with his family, but they soon moved to the city of Safed in northern Israel (then Palestine) to study Kabbalah further. Safed was in the process of becoming an important center of Kabbalah. Luria would meet with his circle of kabbalists to lead discussions on mystical themes and sessions on spiritual meditation. With the death of Cordovero in 1570, Rabbi Luria was regarded as his successor, and so the initial circle of kabbalists continued to expand until they formed, as it were, a separate congregation of mystical Judaism in Safed. Some of his disciples even attributed miraculous powers to "the Ari" (Lion). He died during a plague epidemic in 1572, only thirty-eight years old.

Unfortunately, the Ari committed almost none of his teachings and lectures to formal writing. It became the work of his students, notably Hayyim Vital, to collect Luria's own notes, and the notes from those who had attended Luria's lectures, and compile material for publication. All copies of the manuscripts remained in Palestine until the end of the eighteenth century. Luria's teachings on the Kabbalah were not designed to change what was already there, or to refute what had been established. Indeed, he considered all that he taught firmly grounded in tradition and did not approve of "replacing" rabbinical Judaism with the esoteric kabbalistic approach to Jewish teaching (although many of his followers did, eagerly). Luria offers, rather, a new perspective, a new insight, in that every aspect of his Jewish faith and belief was now seen through the lens of mystical interpretation: Everything, from religious behavior to spoken names, possessed deeper and more profound meaning, pointed to something more authentic and divine.

This understanding was based on Luria's mystical theology, which posited that at the very moment of creation, there was a kind of zimzum, or "contraction," when the Almighty (Ein Sof) "withdrew unto Himself" and thereby created tehiru, the first, primordial space, poised in chaotic becoming. Into that remnant space poured out the unutterable Absolute (that is) Light; however, the Light could not be contained in the self-determined vessels (kelim) of the ten Sefirot that constituted the primordial man, Adam Kadmon. Therefore, the kelim shattered, and the Light, as divine "sparks," and the broken shards from the vessels (a kind of dismemberment of Adam Kadmon) tumbled into realms of darkness, into the tumult of creation. Those divine sparks are diffused throughout creation, yet their natural state—and the natural state of the cosmic whole—is to be connected as one within the Divine Light. Thus, human beings are obliged to live lives of moral and spiritual purity so that each individual can "raise the spark" within his or her own soul, and so aid in the "raising of sparks" from throughout this world, back into the primordial divine.

The Lurianic Kabbalah refers to that "raising of sparks" as Tikkun ha-Olam, the "Restoration of the World" to a redemptive order and cohesion. Human beings participate in the Tikkun ha-Olam by, among other things, adhering to the injunctions of the 613 mitzvot, or divine commandments, as presented in the Torah, and especially by engaging in contemplative prayer and meditation. It is perhaps most truly through prayer and meditation that the individual can obliterate the artificially imposed barrier of the self and permit the lighted soul to realize the transformative potential of "raising sparks."

Luther, Martin

Protestant reformer

Martin Luther, a Saxon monk, was the professor credited with provoking the Protestant Reformation, the movement that replaced the illusory medieval vision of united Christendom with the diverse beliefs that characterize modern Christianity.

Luther, born in 1483, attended school at Magdeburg and Eisenach before matriculating at the University of Erfurt and achieving the bachelor's and master's degrees in 1502. He entered the Reformed Augustinian cloister there in 1505, becoming a priest in 1507 and receiving a doctorate in theology in 1512 at Wittenberg, where he lectured on the Bible. In 1517, he published ninety-five theses on indulgences, sparking pan-European controversy with his criticisms. Repeated commands from authorities to recant, formalized in the papal bull "Exsurge domine" (1520), were ignored; Luther immortalized his stance at the 1521 Diet of Worms with the possibly apocryphal words, "Here I stand, I can do no other; God help me," and was placed under imperial ban.

At the Wartburg Fortress, under the protection of Saxon Elector Frederick the Wise, Luther translated the New Testament into German (1522; his translation of the entire Bible was completed in 1534). Popular and elite polemic obscured the changes Luther initiated from those he did not (communion in two kinds, clerical marriage, vernacular services). Luther also enjoys a reputation as a composer of Reformation hymns. His greatest pedagogical achievement was the 1527 Small Catechism, still used by Lutherans. In 1530, the evangelical estates of the Holy Roman Empire codified their beliefs in the Augsburg Confession, which Luther substantially influenced. Later, Luther and his students worked out the details of a theology quickly characterized as "Lutheran." Luther died in 1546. Influential deathbed reports, such as one by Justus Jonas, emphasized the absence of supernatural events at Luther's deathbed, opting to portray an ideal death with similarities to ars moriendi literature intended to counter rumors of Satan's presence.

Although Luther abjured the eponymous naming of the movement, 1519 saw the first use of the word “Lutheran.” Publicity around the 1521 diet occasionally emphasized his supernatural qualities, and propaganda tied perceptions of the Reformation with the figure of Luther. Opponents depicted Luther as a seven-headed monster or an overfilled wineskin, while supporters followed portrait conventions relating to Apollo, Hercules, St. Jerome, or generic saints. Luther may have failed to restrain publicists, some of whom, such as Lucas Cranach, he knew well. Luther’s own self-understanding remains obscure. Although at times he characterized himself as God’s slave and Christ’s faithful servant, at other times he compared his role to that of a biblical prophet. Immediately after his death, contemporaries’ ambivalent opinions did not allow for a thoroughly heroic portrayal, and Philip Melancthon’s funeral oration contained markedly faint praise of his colleague. Funeral sermons by Michael Coelius and Johannes Bugenhagen avoided saintly portrayals, as did the first Luther biography, by Johannes Mathesius (1566).

Compendia of Luther’s remarks, the elite Table-talk and the popular Luther prophecies, as well as the commemorative sermons of Augustus Gottlieb Spangenberg and the Cranach-school altarpieces, however, contributed to a more heroic and possibly hagiographical image. Such developments elicited charges by the Swiss reformer Johann Bullinger that Lutherans elevated Luther above the apostles. Only at the end of the sixteenth century, in connection with the first centennial of the Reformation (1617), and in the tense context of the impending Thirty Years’ War, did elite images of Luther become purely heroic. The seventeenth century inaugurated supernatural Luther-myths, such as the “incombustible Luther,” a portrait of Luther that refused to burn in a catastrophic fire. These myths played on supernatural aspects of the Luther narrative, such as the lightning storm that provoked Luther’s monastic vows, a fit he suffered in Erfurt, anxiety while reading his first mass, many originally spread by Catholic opponents such as Johannes Cochlaeus (1479–1552). They had little relation to a saintly cult of Luther; rather, they were didactic tales fabricated by Lutheran pastors. Simultaneously, the scholarly estimations of Johann Gerhard (1582–1637) and others rooted Luther’s activities in scriptural prophecy; both trends drew from intensification of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century German confessional culture.

Emphasis on Luther’s personal qualities grew even as theologians distanced themselves from his writings as a singular theological authority. Pietists such as Jakob Spener (1635–1705) praised Luther as a liberating hero even as they criticized his teachings. But Luther’s centrality meant that both pietists and orthodox supported their arguments from his writings. Later orthodox Lutherans defended themselves against the inroads of enlightenment philosophers by warning against exaggerated veneration of Luther. Georg Walch (1693–1775) defended Luther on the basis of Lutheranism’s unity with the interests of the developing German state. Even as Enlightenment philosophers such as Gotthold Lessing (1729–1781) reformulated theology as the philosophy of religion, they emphasized Luther’s actions as liberating Germany from the “oppressive yoke” of Catholicism.

Interest in a heroic Luther intensified in the Romantic period, inaugurated in the United States by the writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), usage of Johann Lorenz von Mosheim’s (c. 1694–1755) laudatory church history textbook, and heavy German immigration after the 1820s. Widespread anti-Catholicism in the early republic increased interest in Reformation history. Not until the confessional German immigration of the 1840s, however, did Luther become a central figure in America. Later nineteenth-century Lutheran immigrants frequently left Europe insistent on maintaining “pure” Lutheranism against attempts by rulers such as Frederick William III of Prussia to consolidate confessions. The “old” Lutheran heroic view was augmented by the likelihood of Americans of all denominations to study the theology and history of Germany.

After 1864, the nationalistic Luther became a motif in the ultimately unsuccessful Kulturkampf, a Prussian policy seeking to eradicate Catholicism. The Luther Renaissance (a theological reevaluation of Luther’s importance) and a critical edition of Luther’s works after 1881 stimulated continuing interest. The Table-talk remained a widely disseminated text. In literature of the 1917 German Reformation anniversary, Luther appeared as a pan-German hero. He was mobilized in support of German nationalism in the 1930s; one of his most troublesome texts, Von den Juden und ihren Lügen (On the Jews and their lies, 1543), was cited in support of National Socialist (Nazi) racial propaganda. After World War II, the scholar William McGovern attempted to draw a direct line between Luther’s political ideas and those of Hitler. East German and Soviet Marxist historians in the USSR demonized Luther as a traitor to the German peasantry. Despite the central role of views of Luther within Lutheran culture, the commonplace that Lutherans viewed Luther as an object of saintly veneration is largely overstated.

Luwum, Janani Jakaliya

Roman Catholic martyr

Janani Jakaliya Luwum was one of the most influential leaders of the modern Catholic Church in Africa. Born in 1922 at Mucwini in East Acoli in northern Uganda, he started life as a goat herder before enrolling in a colonial school. He went on to Gulu high school and Boroboro teacher training college and became a schoolteacher. He then converted to Christianity through the East Africa Revival and soon became an evangelist.

In 1949, Luwum attended Buwalusi Theological College in eastern Uganda, and he was ordained a deacon in 1955 and a priest a year later. He later studied in England and returned to become the principal of Buwalasi College. His leadership ability was soon recognized, and he was appointed provincial secretary. In 1969, he was consecrated bishop of northern Uganda. In both posts, Luwum provided needed leadership and commitment.

In 1974, Luwum was elected archbishop of the metropolitan see of Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, and Boga-Zaire (the second African to hold the position). He soon confronted the injustices and atrocities of Idi Amin (1928–2003), who had overthrown the government of Uganda and established a military dictatorship. Luwum’s popular radio broadcasts were censored and often interrupted and taken off the air. Luwum frequently went to the offices of the dreaded State Research Bureau to secure the release of innocent people who had been accused of various offenses against the government.

On February 12, 1976, Luwum delivered a protest letter against Amin’s arbitrary killings of innocent people. In his Christmas message of that year, he attacked the ruthless regime of Idi Amin and threatened a public demonstration against Amin’s government of repression. Amin’s reaction was swift: In February 1977, he ordered his security forces to raid Luwum’s home for alleged hidden arms. Apparently Luwum was falsely accused of treason. In response, Luwum, along with other bishops, sent an open letter of protest to Idi Amin, with copies sent to government ministers and the All African Conference of Churches in Nairobi. A few days later, Luwum was arrested and brought before Idi Amin for questioning. Following that meeting, Luwum was pronounced dead, along with two cabinet ministers. The cause of death was listed by the government as a car accident, but it was clear that they had been shot on orders from Idi Amin. Archbishop Janani Luwum was recognized at once as a hero of resistance to Amin's rule of terror. He became a martyr alongside the Uganda martyrs of a century before.

Lyons, Martyrs of

Christian martyrs

Forty-eight martyrdoms were recorded at Lyons and Vienne in Gaul (modern France) in 177. The martyrs included Bishop Pothinus (also spelled Phothinus) of Lyons; the slave girl Blandina; a fifteen-year-old boy named Ponticus; Deacon Sanctus; a recently baptized physician, Alexander; Attalus of Pergamus; Biblis; Vettius Epagathus; and Maturus, a catechumen. The group was unusual in their variety of status and professions.

Popular sentiment at the time was against Christians in both Lyons and Vienne and in surrounding areas. Prior to specific charges being brought, locals ostracized Christians from markets and baths. As animosity grew, public persecution included threats, beatings, and stonings. Finally, numerous charges were brought against the Christians, some by their own servants. Among the charges were acts of incest and eating their own children. Christians were arrested by magistrates, placed in prison, and tortured in an effort to induce them to confess their crimes.

Various and extreme forms of torture were used. Although ninety years old, Bishop Pothinus of Lyons was escorted through an excited mob to his trial. When asked to explain the Christian God, Pothinus answered, "If you are worthy, you will know." Pothinus was then kicked and beaten until he lost consciousness; he died two days later in prison. Blandina, the slave girl of a Christian, was repeatedly tortured by beatings, torn by iron hooks, and forced to sit on a burning-hot iron chair. Remarkably surviving these tortures, she was then wrapped in a net and gored to death by a bull. Blandina's youth, courage, and endurance were thereafter enhanced by popular stories. Deacon Sanctus and Maturus were also forced to sit in the hot iron chairs until their throats were cut.

Under such brutality, ten did renounce their faith, such as the woman named Biblis; however, when Biblis was then pressured to confess the crime of cannibalism, she refused and instead reaffirmed herself as Christian and thus died a martyr. Others died in prison from damp conditions and from starvation. Many were killed by beasts in the arena to pacify the excited crowd. Some who were Roman citizens died swiftly from beheadings. Christian witnesses recorded these events in letters to other churches; one such missive was carried by Irenaeus to Rome. These letters were preserved by Eusebius, a Church historian of the early fourth century, who wrote at length about persecutions in his Ecclesiastical History. The feast day of the Martyrs of Lyons is June 2

Maccabees

Jewish martyrs

Both Jews and Christians have memorialized the group of saints called Maccabees, also known as the Maccabean martyrs. Thus, although the reasons for honoring them in Judaism and Christianity are not exactly the same, the martyrs serve as rare examples of holy people who are revered in both traditions. The story of the Maccabees probably originated from accounts of Jewish resistance against the Seleucids during the second century B.C.E.

The first preserved text concerning them is 2 Maccabees 6–7. The story has two parts. First, a priest named Eleazar was martyred for refusing to eat pork, giving witness in a speech to his obedience to the law of God. The second part recounts how seven brothers, encouraged by their mother, were martyred for refusing to eat pork as commanded by the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes. The narrative climaxes when the seventh son engages in a long speech stressing obedience to God over Antiochus's unjust command. Though not killed, the mother also dies at the end of the narrative. Other accounts were written about these martyrs around the first century C.E. Notable among them are 4 Maccabees and various Syriac works. Although both Jews and Christians remembered the Maccabees as martyrs, they developed differing traditions about them. In rabbinic Judaism the Maccabees represent the covenant faithfulness of Israel in the face of persecution. In Christianity the Maccabees were considered the first Christian martyrs, despite predating the life of Jesus.

Three versions of the story of the Maccabees exist in rabbinic Judaism. Generally, only the story of the mother and her seven sons is recounted. These versions come from Palestinian and Babylonian sources between the third and fifth centuries and were written as reflections on the Hadrianic persecutions of the 130s. In these traditions, the sons are martyred for resisting imperial orders to commit idolatry. In Ashkenazi Judaism, the tradition of the Maccabees appears in accounts of crusade massacres that occurred in the Rhineland during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. These texts tell stories of women who killed their children rather than have them baptized by crusaders. Such acts are defended by comparing these mothers to the mother who encouraged her sons to martyrdom. The mother and her seven sons are listed as martyrs in liturgies for the fast day of Tish b'Av.

The Maccabees were venerated in early Christian circles. A cult dedicated to them developed at their tomb in Antioch; by the fourth century, their cult is well attested in a variety of sources. The Maccabees form the subject of patristic sermons and treatises on martyrdom, and their commemoration appears in some of the earliest martyrologies. Their cult continued in the medieval Latin west, and their feast was observed in various regions. Most Christian writings on the Maccabees underscore that their martyrdom was Christian because it occurred for the sake of Christ. The relics of the Maccabees were moved from Antioch to Constantinople and then to Rome, where they were deposited at the church of St. Peter in Chains. Other traditions have the relics moving to Cologne and Spain. Their traditional feast was August 1, but it has been removed from most Western Christian calendars.

Macedonian Ruler Cult

Alexander the Great (r. 336–323 B.C.E.) was not the first Macedonian king to receive divine honors. He followed in the footsteps of his father, Philip II (359–336 B.C.E.). At Olympia in the Peloponnese (site of the ancient Olympics), Philip ordered a small round temple to be built for his family cult. Both the style and the use of chryselephantine (wood overlaid with ivory and gold, normally reserved for statues of gods) for the statues of Philip and his family indicate more than the usual heroic honors. And in fact, near the end of Philip's life, the orator Isocrates wrote, "Having united Greece . . . the only thing left you would be to become a God" (Epistles 3.5). On the morning of his assassination in 336, at the grand festival celebrating his planned invasion of Persia, Philip's fateful—and fatal—entrance into the Aegean theater was preceded by thirteen statues on wagon bases: twelve Olympians, and Philip himself, whose statue was no smaller than that of the gods. Naturally, hubris (pride) was named as one cause for Philip's demise.

Yet even before that, in about 404, the Spartan Lysander had been honored as a god on Samos with altars and sacrifice, hymns, and even a renamed festival (the Lysandria). There are other precedents, including Dion of Syracuse in 357, and Brasidas at Amphipolis in 424. These are, essentially, enlargements on the long-established tradition of the hero cult in Greek religious practice. As time passed, Greeks had to stretch further to honor exceptional men who had surpassed the heroes of myth.

In the case of the Macedonian kings, there appears to have been a hero cult traditionally established for them after death. The Greek dead were given certain offerings at their graves, and the founder of a Greek colony enjoyed posthumous heroic honors. Thus, the royal cult of the Macedonian king fit within that tradition. By the time of Alexander the Great, royal cult beliefs and practices were in full swing, and Alexander actively promoted the notion that he was the son of Zeus. That Philip, and later his son, would receive divine honors during their lifetimes was only to be expected, given the changing patterns of worship and honor in the classical Greek world.

Machig Labdron (Tibetan: ma-gcig lab-sgron)

Tibetan Buddhist master

Machig Labdron was a Tibetan Buddhist master of the gChod lineage during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. She is revered by Tibetans as a manifestation of Yeshe Tsogyal, the eighth-century queen of Tibet who was, in turn, a manifestation of the female buddha Prajnaparamita, a reflected image of ultimate reality beyond conception.

Although there are some discrepancies in her biographies, Machig Labdron was said to have been extraordinary from her birth in 1031, intellectually brilliant, and determined not to marry but to live a monastic life. She mastered all the philosophical treatises as well as the rituals and yogic practices. The teacher Dampa Sangye, who was believed to be a form of the great philosopher Kamalashila, initiated her into the practice of gChod. This practice, derived from the Prajnaparamita (perfection of wisdom literature), is a ritualistic visualization that is supposed to break one's attachments to one's own body and mind in order to benefit all sentient beings.

Machig Labdron taught that it is important to interpret gChod within the context of mahamudra (great seal), that is, the understanding of ultimate reality as symbolized by the union of appearance and emptiness. In this sense, the most profound gChod is to see samsara (the phenomenal world) as mere appearance and to give up all attachment to it. This follows the teachings of Nagarjuna, the great second-century philosopher, who found the phenomenal world, when carefully analyzed, to be so full of contradictions that it could not be real. But ultimate reality can be reached through nonconceptual meditation when attachment to the phenomenal world is decreased. The practice of gChod is a technique for becoming less attached.

Later in her life, Machig Labdron gave up monastic life, married a yogi from India, and had at least three children who became yogis and teachers. She is venerated as an enlightened being endowed with miraculous powers, great wisdom, and limitless compassion for all sentient beings.

Macuilxochitl

Aztec singer

Women who participated in the Aztec empire were not frequently named in colonial sources, but Macuilxochitl (Five Flower), the daughter of the great Cihuacoatl (Woman Snake) or her second in command, Tlacaoel, retains a mention as a great singer, or cuicanitl, in the Cantares mexicanos (Mexican songs). Since she was female, she would actually have been a cihuacuicanitl (woman singer). Her presence in the colonial record from the late fifteenth century is particularly interesting because sources indicate that the Mexica singers were very highly trained and dedicated to the proper recitation and composition of texts. It is well known that both civil and military leaders attended schools and underwent rigorous training in all aspects of Mexica life. Although little mention is made of women participating in this schooling, from the presence of Macuilxochitl, their role can be inferred.

Macuilxochitl's text narrates the victory of her uncle, the warrior and tlatoani (speaker) Axayacatl, against the Matlazinca people. In this battle, Axayacatl was mortally wounded. In Macuilxochitl's record, he calls the warrior who wounded him to his court. The women dedicated to this warrior appear and offer their favors to the dying Mexica ruler to save the offending warrior. This text and others contained in the Cantares mexicanos were more than just military history. They were also part of a sacred performance that would have included a sacrifice and an invocation that called the ancestors to bless the narrative offered just as they were called to bless the military campaign narrated in the text.

Madhva

Vedanta Hindu school founder

Madhva, or Madhvacarya (also known as Purnaprajna, or Anandatirtha), was the saint-founder of the Hindu school of Vedanta known as Advaita Vedanta in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The tradition refers to itself as the Tattvavadi (Speakers of the Truth) school. Madhva and his followers have been the most ardent opponents of the non-dualistic form of Vedanta taught by Shankara in the seventh and eighth centuries. Madhva's form of Vedanta is theistic, centering around the deity Vishnu/Krishna, and realistic, insisting on the reality of the world.

Madhva was born Vasudeva in 1239 in the Kanara district of Karnataka in southern India. As a student he was extremely precocious, beginning his education earlier than usual (at the age of five) and exhibiting the extraordinary quickness of mind that served him so well in later debates. As a boy he ran away from home to seek a renunciation guru, finding one in Acyuta Preksha of Udupi. Acyuta Preksha initiated him as Purnaprajna at the age of twelve, according to the traditional accounts. Shortly after his renunciation, Madhva began his lifelong critique of Advaita Vedanta while studying it with his guru. He also showed an uncommon genius in elucidating the text of Bhagavata Purana. In recognition of his advanced abilities, his guru renamed him Anandatirtha. He toured southern India with his guru and later made two long pilgrimages to Badarinath in the Himalayan north.

Madhva wrote thirty-seven works, or thirty-nine according to some, including four commentaries on the Brahma Sutra, commentaries on the ten principal Upanishads, two commentaries on the Bhagavad Gita, and a number of independent, polemical treatises. His main teaching was that there exist two fundamental realities, one independent (God) and the other dependent (the living beings and the world). The relationship between dependent reality and independent reality is like that of a mirror image with respect to its original. Specifically, dependent reality is dependent on independent reality in its essential nature, its awareness, and its motivation. Thus, the living beings and the world are regarded as real, but not independent of Ishvara (God).

Maggid

See Dov Baer of Mezhirech

Magi

Zoroastrian priests, Christian saints

The magi (or “wise men”) who came from the east, guided by a star, to bring gifts to the newborn infant Jesus, are briefly described in the Gospel of Matthew (2:1–12). Although minimal information about these figures is provided in the gospel account, the magi have been the subjects of a vast amount of further stories through the centuries and have figured prominently in art from the early Christian period to modern times.

Perhaps derived from accounts of ancient Near Eastern (Persian/Zoroastrian) priests, astrologers, or magicians, the Christian legends emphasize the “exotic” origins of these first Christian pilgrims as symbolic of the universal acceptance of Christianity by all peoples. In Matthew’s narrative, the magi follow a star from the “east” and journey to Jerusalem to pay homage to the “king of the Jews.” After consultation with King Herod, they travel to Bethlehem to present their gifts to the infant Jesus. They return to their own country after being warned by God in a dream not to verify the child’s existence to Herod. Herod, feeling threatened by the possibility of a rival, orders the massacre of all children two years old and younger in the region of Bethlehem. Joseph and Mary, with the infant Jesus, forewarned by an angel of this upcoming slaughter of the innocents, escape to Egypt.

Matthew does not specify the number of magi and so later texts state their number as two, four, six, or even twelve. The three gifts mentioned in the gospel, however (gold, frankincense, and myrrh), have resulted in the most common tradition of three magi. Their three gifts may be symbolically understood as references to Christ’s kingship and power (gold), his divine nature (frankincense), and his mortality (myrrh). In early Christian and later narratives and commentaries, the magi are described as “kings” (for example, by Tertullian in about 200), and texts from the sixth century give them various names (often Melchior, Balthasar, and Caspar or Gaspar). They are depicted wearing crowns in art from the tenth century onward, and in twelfth- and thirteenth-century art their costumes and crowns increasingly resemble those of European rulers.

Expanded accounts of the magi appeared especially in the Middle Ages, such as the thirteenth-century Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine and the fourteenth-century account of John of Hildesheim, which specifically states that one magus was a black Ethiopian. The representation of the black magus was firmly established in art by the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and the Adoration of the Magi is one of the most frequently represented subjects in medieval and Renaissance art. The subject of late medieval mystery plays and early Renaissance courtly festivals, the magi also became symbolically associated with the ages of man (so may be depicted ranging in age from youthful to elderly) and the three parts of the world (Asia, Africa, and Europe). They are seen as patrons and protectors of pilgrims and travelers. Their supposed relics were transferred from Milan to Cologne in the mid-twelfth century. The Adoration of the Magi is celebrated liturgically in the Feast of the Epiphany (manifestation of God in Jesus) on January 6.

Magnus of Orkney

Christian ruler, martyr

Magnus Erlendsson, a Christian, born in about 1075, was the eldest son of Erlend of Orkney (coruler with his brother Paul) and his wife Thora, and he shared a common ancestor with both Henry I of England (Rognvald, earl of Möre) and Henry’s queen, Matilda (Malcolm II of Scotland). In 1098, Magnus Barefoot (or Barelegs), king of Norway, removed Erlend and Paul from power and ordered them back to Norway. Magnus Erlendsson and his cousin Haakon, Paul’s son, were then forced to accompany the king on his raids along the English coast. When the king’s ships reached Anglesey, Magnus refused to attack people he had no reason to fight. The king accused him of cowardice, but Magnus stayed on board his ship, chanting psalms. Magnus was able to escape when the fleet passed close to Scotland, and he found refuge in the court of Malcolm III of Scotland.

After the death of Magnus Barefoot, Magnus Erlendsson was free to return home to the Orkneys. Magnus did marry, but there is little information about his wife except that her name may have been Ingarth. The two apparently had a chaste marriage. Like his father, Magnus ruled the Orkneys, in Magnus's case with his cousin Haakon, and for a while there were good relations between the two. However, Haakon was jealous of his cousin's popularity and turned against him. On the brink of civil war, the two earls agreed to meet on Easter on the island of Egilsay to discuss a truce in 1116. Haakon violated the terms of the meeting by bringing eight ships instead of the agreed-upon two. Magnus, in an attempt to save his cousin's honor, offered to go into exile, to be imprisoned, or even to accept maiming, but nothing would satisfy Haakon's men except Magnus's death, so he was beheaded. According to the Orkneyinga Saga, Magnus accepted his death and prayed for his killers.

Although the reasons for Magnus's death were more political than spiritual, he was still recognized as a martyr. Miracles were credited to him and he became the chief saint of Orkney, Shetland, and northern Scotland. He is also the patron of fishmongers. His relics were eventually housed in the cathedral that bears his name in Kirkwall, and several other churches throughout the British Isles were dedicated to him as well. Legend has it that he appeared to Robert the Bruce on the eve of the Battle of Bannockburn in 1314 and promised him victory. His feast day is April 16.

Mahadeviyakka (Akkamahadevi)

(fl. 1160 C.E.)

Hindu ascetic

Mahadeviyakka (or Akkamahadevi), a Hindu saint from southern India, is known for her passionate imagery celebrating the immanence and beauty of the god Shiva. She wandered as a naked ascetic to the city of Kalyan during the height of a Hindu reform movement headed by the politician and saint Basavanna in the twelfth century.

Though legends abound, and her life gets reconstructed to match changing cultural expectations, a few stories have universal acceptance. "Akka" or "Sister" Mahadevi was born to a merchant family in Karnataka and as a girl became devoted to a particular form of Shiva, whom she addressed as "lord white as jasmine" (Ramanujan 1973, 111). A local Jain chieftain named Kausika pursued her; she probably married him, though hagiographers later absolved her of abandoning a husband by asserting that she never married.

Married or not, she left Kausika and walked, "air-dressed," to Kalyan. Though nudity was accepted among male ascetics, it was frowned upon for women. At Kalyan, she debated the subject, convincing questioners that she was spiritually advanced. She remained in the city for some time, creating Kannada prose poems (vacanas) that honored the egalitarianism and energy of the reformers and described the indescribable joy of union with Shiva. Eventually she left for a sacred mountain, where she died, still in her twenties.

Some 400 of Mahadeviyakka's vacanas survive. They are used for meditation by Kannadigas who worship Shiva and venerate images of her. In these depictions, she is modestly covered by thick tresses. Like others in her Virashaiva tradition, she views reality as Shiva—immeasurable, immanent, energized bliss—whose presence is covered by layers of illusion (maya). The body, gender, language, and even death are illusory for her. She uses sunlight, fire, wind, perfume, seeds, and erotic union to hint at the power that she knows as most real but least seen. Her imagery is kinesthetic, sexual, arguably tantric.

A complete English translation of her works was made by Armand Menezes and S. M. Angadi in 1973 (Akkamahadevi 1973). However, the selections published in Ramanujan's Speaking of Siva (1973) are more widely read in the West.

MahamoggallanaSee Moggallana*Maharal of PragueSee Judah Loew ben Bezalel*Maharshi, Ramana

Hindu holy person

Ramana Maharshi was one of the greatest Hindu saints in the contemporary era. Born in the southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu into a nominally religious brahmin household in 1879, he directly confronted his fear of death (at the age of sixteen) by visualizing it and “experiencing” it in meditation. The outcome, a liberating state of awareness, was what he took to be a direct and immediate realization of the deathless, ubiquitous self. Ramana almost immediately left for the ancient town of Tiruvannamalai, outside of which is a hill, Arunachala, considered to be a sacred manifestation of the god Shiva. There he remained silent for twenty years, deepening and cultivating his nondual realization, which in the Hindu school of Advaita Vedanta means that all transitory phenomena are unreal in any substantial sense; the only “real” reality is the divine self (atman). For this reason, Ramana has often been considered a modern heir of Shankara, the great eighth-century systemizer (and, undoubtedly, mystic as well) of Advaita philosophy. Ramana, however, tended to minimize or at least relativize traditional Hindu models of religious organization and did not appeal to any external legitimization, such as spiritual lineage or caste, to validate his authority; instead, he spoke of the authority of direct and immediate personal experience.

Ramana’s witness to the nondual self had an enormous impact. He never left Tiruvannamalai, but the world came to him. Seekers, devotees, and scholars from all parts of India came to the ashram that was constructed at the base of Arunachala. Many of these visitors testified to the compelling and calming presence of the saint. Although Ramana’s responses to their queries are collected in numerous volumes, perhaps his most compelling “methodology” was his “silent teaching,” namely, his mindful, compassionate presence, which seemed to calm the mental agitation of visitors. This effect seems to have continued for years after his death in 1950. Klaus Klostermaier noted that “the place where he lived is somehow charged with spiritual power, emanating from him” (1989, 396–397).

Ramana, convinced of the ubiquity of the nondual self in virtue of his own experience, invited all seekers to penetrate the mind-body complex with the fundamental human question, “Who am I?” All mental constructs, he argued, are limitations and projections of the ego; they are transitory and ephemeral and therefore not fundamentally real. Our “deepest,” most real identity is the divine self; realization of this truth issues in a direct experience of our ultimate nature and destiny: unalloyed bliss and freedom.

Mahasiddhas

(8th–12th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist laypeople

The mahasiddhas (the great perfected) were men and, in several cases, women who lived in India from the eighth to the twelfth centuries teaching a form of Buddhism that, in spirit, doctrine, and practice, defied and challenged the traditional, monastically oriented Theravada, Mahayana, and even Vajrayana institutions that dominated the landscape of early medieval Indian Buddhism. Although they did not form a cohesive group, in the sense that the term was an official designation stamped on an individual after specified training, allegiance to a particular doctrine, and so on, the mahasiddhas shared certain defining marks. Their teachings can be succinctly characterized by their emphatic insistence that the surest, if not only, way to the human awakening known as buddhahood is the path of mahamudra siddhi—“the powers of the great seal.”

Power (siddhi) has both a mundane (laukika) and transcendent (lokottara) aspect. In the former sense, it denotes six extrasensory perceptions (such as clairvoyance, clairaudience, and ability to recall one’s past lives) and eight great powers (for example, the ability to pass through matter, to create and destroy at will, and to speed walk). Although such powers may have a pragmatic value for leading others to awakening, they do not constitute the highest goal of mahamudra (great seal). Although the mahasiddhas constantly warned that mahamudra is not subject to word and symbol, it may be briefly defined as signifying the vast, empty, open, sky-like nature of mind and phenomena. Similes of space are, in fact, prevalent in the mahasiddha literature. The mahasiddha Tilopa, for instance, sang this teaching to his disciple, the mahasiddha Naropa:

Is space anywhere supported? Upon what does it rest?
Like space, mahamudra is dependent on nothing.
Relax and settle in the continuum of unalloyed purity,
And, your bonds loosening, release is certain.

Gazing intently into the empty sky, vision ceases.
Likewise, when mind gazes into mind itself,
The train of discursive conceptual thought ends
And supreme enlightenment is gained.
(translation by Kunzang Tenzin)

Such a practice points to certain sociological features of the mahasiddha milieu. A recurring rhetorical undercurrent in the mahasiddha literature is the perceived inadequacy of the monastic establishments for leading the practitioner to an actual, as opposed to a merely conceptual, comprehension of reality. Thus, other features that the mahasiddhas have in common are their unorthodox, antinomian approaches to awakening, innovative use of language, disregard of social convention, high regard for (temporary) insanity, and regard for social outcasts. Among the mahasiddhas we find next to princesses and brahmins, for instance, a prostitute, a compulsive liar, a gambler, a thief, a slutty recluse—and even a musician!

Today, the primary preservers of the medieval mahasiddha traditions are the Tibetan Bka' brgyud (Kagyü) schools. To a lesser extent, the Rnying ma (Nyingma) and the Sa skya (Sakya) also derive teachings and practices from the Indian mahasiddha traditions.

(trad. 599–527 B.C.E.)

Jain tirthankara

According to Jain teachings, Mahavira was the last of the twenty-four tirthankaras (ford makers) of the current declining half-cycle of time. Western writings usually treat him as the founder of Jainism, although the Jains regard him as one of a series of teachers who all enunciated the same basic truths. His historicity is not in doubt, and he is known to have been a contemporary of the Buddha, but his exact dating is uncertain. Jain tradition assigns his dates as 599–527 B.C.E. Although scholars differ as to the nature of the relationship between Mahavira and Parshva, the twenty-third tirthankara and also a historical figure, it seems likely that they renounced the world and taught within the same tradition. Shvetambara and Digambara Jains have different versions of his career, but the main lines of the story are the same.

Jain hagiography traces Mahavira's story through many births prior to the lifetime in which he attained tirthankara status. In one of the most famous of his previous births, he was Marichi, grandson of Rishabha, the first tirthankara of the current half-cycle of time, and it is said that Rishabha predicted his future tirthankara status. Another well-known story is that of his birth as a prince named Triprishtha. Famously, Triprishtha poured molten lead into the ears of a servant in a fit of temper. Many births later, the same servant—now a cowherd—hammered nail-like thorns into Mahavira's ears when he had become a wandering mendicant prior to his attainment of omniscience.

Tradition asserts that Mahavira took his final birth in 599 B.C.E. in Kundagrama, a city in the kingdom of Vaishali, India. His father was a chieftain named Siddhartha, and his mother was Trishala. His parents are said to have been followers of the teachings of Parshva. At the time of his conception, his mother experienced an extraordinary series of dreams or visions that presaged the birth of a universal emperor or a universal teacher (that is, a tirthankara). As is the case with all tirthankaras, both gods and humans celebrated his birth, and the gods gave him his first ritual bath on the summit of Mount Meru. He was named Vardhamana, "bringer of wealth," because his conception and birth had brought great prosperity to his family. Mahavira, meaning "great hero," was an epithet bestowed by the gods.

Shvetambaras and Digambaras agree that Mahavira renounced the world at the age of thirty, but they disagree concerning certain significant details. According to the Shvetambaras, Mahavira married, fathered a daughter, and did not renounce the world until after his parents' deaths because of a vow, made while still in the womb, not to cause them pain. The Digambaras maintain that he never married and that he renounced the world while his parents were still living. According to the Digambaras, at the time of his renunciation he abandoned his possessions, pulled out his hair by hand, and left his clothing behind. The Shvetambaras, however, maintain that he donned a special divine cloth given to him by Indra, the king of the gods. He later gave half of this garment to a greedy brahmin who had begged for it. Then, still later, the remaining half was accidentally pulled off his body by a thorn. The point of the Shvetambara account is that, even if Mahavira was a nude mendicant, his nudity was not intended, thus legitimizing the principle that a full mendicant may be clothed, an idea vehemently rejected by the Digambaras.

Having renounced the world, Mahavira became a homeless mendicant and engaged in the most severe austerities with special emphasis on fasting. According to the Digambaras, he was completely silent during this period. The Shvetambaras, however, maintain that he not only spoke but also took Makkhali Gosala (a famous mendicant of the age and the leader of the Ajivika sect) as a disciple and companion for six years. His attainment of omniscience occurred twelve and a half years after his renunciation of the world, and was the fruit of his relentless dedication to ascetic practice of the harshest sort. According to the Digambaras, from this point forward he did not eat, drink, excrete, or engage in any mundane activities at all. He sat in a trancelike state in the preaching assembly hall created for him by the gods. The Shvetambaras, however, maintain that he did eat and engage in other mundane activities.

Although the two traditions differ on the precise manner in which their initial meeting occurred, both traditions maintain that Mahavira's first mendicant disciples (ganadharas) were a brahmin named Indrabhuti Gautama and his two brothers. Eight other brahmins soon joined them, and these eleven brahmins formed the core of his new mendicant order. Then ensued Mahavira's long teaching mission, which lasted until his seventy-second year. Tradition maintains that in the end his following consisted of 14,000 monks, 36,000 nuns, 159,000 laymen, and 318,000 laywomen.

Mahavira is said to have shed his body and attained liberation at Pavapuri (near Patna in modern Bihar) in 527 B.C.E. It is said that Indrabhuti Gautama attained omniscience only hours later.

Shi'a Muslim imam

'Abd Allah al-Mahdi was the eleventh imam of the Nizari Isma'ili Shi'as. Born in 873 or 874, he was only eight years old when his father passed away. He was then raised by his uncle, Sa'id al-Khayr, whose daughter he later married. Five of 'Abd Allah's immediate predecessors as imam had lived anonymously in Persia and Syria. During these times of secrecy, the message (da'wa) of the imams was spread by their da'is (agents) in various parts of western Asia and North Africa.

Upon reaching maturity, 'Abd Allah decided to travel to Yemen and so proceeded to Egypt. He then had a change of plans and traveled to North Africa. Already the Berber tribe of Kutama had accepted the imam and become his main supporters owing to the effort of the da'i Abu 'Abdallah al-Shi'i. The Kutama under the leadership of al-Shi'i captured large areas of North Africa, making Qairawan their capital. Meanwhile, according to tradition, 'Abd Allah was captured and imprisoned by the governor of Sijilmasa, but al-Shi'i and his Kutama supporters rescued him. Thence the entire entourage traveled to Raqqada, and here the imam was declared as the ruler in January 910. At this time, he also publicly proclaimed his titles of mahdi (the rightly guided) and amir a muminin, “commander of the faithful.” In the edict of his enthronement it was declared that he was a progeny of the prophet Muhammad via his daughter Fatima and that he was establishing a caliphate that had been usurped first by the Umayyads and then by the Abbasids. The meaning and intent behind this assumption of the title al-Mahdi has been the subject of much debate. As his power grew, some of the Kutama tribesmen as well as the kin of al-Shi’i rebelled. Though hitherto deeply attached to al-Mahdi, al-Shi’i joined the protest and was killed with the others when they were subdued. Al-Mahdi, however, acknowledged the services of his past da’i by attending the burial ceremony.

In time, al-Mahdi’s hegemony was also extended over the island of Sicily, and he instituted new cities, including the fortified coastal city of Mahdiya (in present-day Tunisia), which became an important port and the new capital. He ushered in the period of the Fatimid caliphs and an era of learning and culture, and the imams became both spiritual leaders and temporal rulers. Al-Mahdi secured his rule and also ensured the spread of his da’wa. With skill and energy, he was successful in both endeavors. Al-Mahdi died in 934, and he was succeeded by his son al-Qa’im.

Mahdi, Muhammad al-

Shi’i Muslim imam, messiah

Muhammad b. al-Hasan, known as al-Mahdi (the Rightly Guided One), is regarded as the twelfth and final imam by the imami, or Twelver Shi’a. According to the sources, he was born in about 868 in the Abbasid capital of Samarra in Iraq. His father, al-Hasan al-’Askari, the eleventh imam, had been imprisoned. His mother was a Byzantine slave named Narjis or Saqil; some sources claim she was the daughter of the Byzantine emperor.

Muhammad al-Mahdi is the central figure in Shi’i eschatology. He is expected by Muslims to return to earth as an important harbinger of the last times. Some of the epithets conferred on him signal this distinctive status, for example:

al-Imam al-Muntazar (the Expected Leader); al-Qa’im (the One Who Will Arise); and Sahib al-Zaman (the Master of the Age).

When his father, al-Hasan al-’Askari, died in 874, Muhammad would have been about six years old. There was considerable confusion at this time among al-Hasan’s followers, who were not sure whether he had left a son to succeed him. About fifteen to twenty factions emerged, most of whom expressed doubt that there was a twelfth imam. One group, called the Qat’iyya, accepted the existence of a son but did not agree about who he was, his age at the time of his father’s death, and so on. Some belonging to this group maintained that a son called Muhammad had indeed been born to al-Hasan. Because of the danger he faced from the Abbasids, they said, the young Muhammad immediately went into occultation, from which he was (and is) expected to return in the last days to rule the earth in justice and peace. These are the views that eventually prevailed and became part of orthodox Twelver Shi’i belief. The other factions disappeared within a century.

According to the doctrine of occultation (ghayba), the twelfth imam did not die in 874 but remains alive in concealment, protected by God from his enemies. During the period of the Lesser Occultation (874–940), the hidden imam communicated with his followers through four emissaries. When the last emissary died in 940, it was no longer possible to maintain any kind of communication with the imam. This turn marks the onset of the period of the Greater Occultation, which will last until the mahdi’s return. Belief in the existence of the hidden imam and his return at the end of time is part of basic Twelver Shi’i eschatology. It is thought that upon his return to earth, the mahdi will vanquish the forces of evil, inaugurate a reign of justice, and pave the way for the second coming of Jesus Christ.

The occulted imam remains the spiritual and political leader of the Shi’i community in absentia. However, as Shi’i states arose in later centuries, the political realities demanded that temporal rulers exercise some of the functions of the imam. In more recent times, Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989) of Iran promulgated the concept of vilayat-i faqih (the rule of the legist), which allowed the ulema (religious scholars) to assume not only the religious functions of the hidden imam (for example, the collection of certain tithes and leading the Friday prayer) but also his political authority and duties.

Mai Chaza

Christian leader, prophet

Mai Chaza (Mother Savior, Magenga) was the twentieth-century founder, leader, and prophet of the Guta Ra Jehovah (City of God), a widely recognized religious movement based in Zimbabwe. The ministry is famous for its faith healing practice. The prophetess, a member of the Nyamushanya family, was thought to have the power to command even nature. Prior to her call, she was a local preacher in the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Zimbabwe. She was married and had eight children, although later four died. She then developed a chronic illness that led her husband to “return her” to her family; she was received by a brother instead, as she had been orphaned since 1914. The family sought treatment for what appeared to be a family- or culture-oriented illness because the hospitals could not handle the problem effectively. She “died,” but only for one day. After her “resurrection,” she claimed that she had met Jesus, who had given her the ability to minister to the sick through the power of the Holy Spirit.

Mai Chaza’s healing and preaching ministry started in 1949 and lasted until her death in 1960. However, legend has it that by the time the mourners lowered the coffin in the grave, Mai Chaza had departed, fulfilling what she had said during her ministry: “handina guva panyika” (I will not have a grave here on earth). She did not appoint a successor.

Throughout her ministry, she allegedly made many predictions that came true. When she preached, demon-possessed people in the congregation were reportedly unable to resist her message and power and would immediately fall to the floor and acknowledge the authority and presence of the Holy Spirit in the prophetess. Her power was manifested through prayer, song, and preaching. Popularly known as Mai Muponesi (Mother Savior) or Maqenga (Heavens), she transformed and saved numerous lives through her healing ministry.

Mai Chaza established a center at Seke, near Harare, the capital of Zimbabwe, then at Zimunya near Mutare, Zimbabwe’s third-largest city. Here the sick from all over the nation came to be healed. Today, people still visit for spiritual and physical healing. To gain entry, visitors are required to make a confession, a criterion begun during Mai Chaza’s ministry.

Majlisi, Muhammad Baqir al-

Shi'i Muslim scholar

Muhammad Baqir al-Majlisi was the foremost Shi'i scholar of the late Safavid era in Iran. He wrote a number of important books and moved Shi'ism decisively in a pietistic and legalistic direction. Born in Isfahan, then the capital of Iran, in 1628, he was the son of the prominent religious scholar Muhammad Taqi Majlisi. He studied under the foremost religious scholars of his time and was appointed shaykh al-Islam of Isfahan, the leading religious post in the kingdom. He held this position until his death in 1700 and was held in great respect by the Safavid kings, especially Shah Sultan-Husayn.

Majlisi was a great scholar in his own right. His encyclopedic compilation Bihar al-Anwar (Oceans of lights), a source of Shi'i hadith (traditions), is still used today, and he wrote a number of other books that have been widely used in the Islamic world, including biographies of the imams and manuals of religious practice. His writings indicate that he favored the Akhbari school of law in Shi'ism.

Majlisi's most decisive influence, however, came in his social and political role. He had Shah Sultan-Husayn very much under his influence and used this to push for major changes in the religious landscape. The majority of Iranians had only recently become Shi'is after the Safavid dynasty came to power in 1501. For most of the population up to Majlisi's time, adherence to Shi'ism was fairly superficial. Majlisi made it his task to propagate Shi'ism vigorously and to suppress Sunni Islam. Most Shi'i literature had been in Arabic, but Majlisi wrote a number of books in Persian, including theology, manuals of religious practice, and books detailing the sufferings of the imams. He encouraged such specifically Shi'i practices as ritual mourning for the imams and pilgrimages to the shrines of the imams and their descendants. Majlisi also brought to the fore the concept of the imams as saviors who would intercede for true Shi'is on the day of judgment. In these ways, he helped to popularize Shi'i Islam and engage the masses in its practices.

Majlisi propagated a “dry,” formal, pietistic, legalistic style of Shi'ism as the only true form of Shi'ism. Up to Majlisi's time, there had been many styles of Shi'ism. Some Shi'is engaged in mystical practices based on sufi orders. Many Shi'i scholars were engaged in a high mystical philosophy that has come to be known as the school of Isfahan. Majlisi suppressed the sufi orders (which he called “that foul and hellish growth”) and the philosophers (“followers of an infidel Greek”) (Momen 1985, 115).

Paradoxically, Majlisi's activities both strengthened and weakened Shi'ism. His strident anti-Sunnism roused the Sunnis in Afghanistan to action that eventually led to the overthrow of the Safavid dynasty in 1722 and the coming to power of a Sunni Afghan in Iran. But at the same time, his popularization of Shi'ism meant that, despite some persecution of Shi'is in the following decades, Iran did not revert to Sunnism.

Makandal, François

Muslim prophet

Historical sources say little about the origins of François Makandal, an Islamic prophet who led a resistance movement that was a precursor to the Haitian Revolution. Probably he was born and socialized in West Africa during the first half of the eighteenth century and at some point enslaved (perhaps at age twelve) and sold into bondage in the French colony of Saint-Domingue (1697–1804). Some scholars cite evidence, such as his name and the names of his closest conspirators, Mayombe and Teysel, that Makandal hailed from central Africa rather than West Africa. These suggestions, along with others concerning reports of Makandal's orchestration of Vodou rituals derived from central Africa (the Petwo rite, for example) and his adept use of poisons, are tenuous because it is just as likely that he learned Petwo rites in Saint-Domingue and that his knowledge of poison came with him from West Africa.

Makandal's fluent Arabic and Islamic devotion are the strongest evidence of his West African origins (not unlike those of his contemporary, the African American poet Phyllis Wheatley). It is possible that in Africa he had been a Qur'anic scholar and cleric. This is highly significant because the Islamic notion of jihad may have inspired his revolutionary activities in Saint-Domingue, much as this notion helped fuel such resistance among Islamic slaves in Bahia, Brazil, during the following century.

By 1740, Makandal had escaped from the plantation on which he labored to become a leading figure in a Maroon (escaped slave) community in the island's northwestern mountains. Although organized armed uprisings involving small clusters from among the island's half-million slaves occurred as early as 1522, and several others erupted during the twenty-five-year period between 1679 and 1704, such violent insurrections were relatively infrequent in Saint-Domingue. One significant exception was the Makandal conspiracy of the 1740s and 1750s, which spread from plantation to plantation, involving unknown numbers of slaves and Maroons in a network of resistance that aimed to overthrow the French by burning their crops and poisoning them and their livestock.

The impressive longevity (eighteen years) and defiant success of Makandal's movement was due chiefly to its development as a Maroon community. Operating from a Maroon base, Makandal is said to have had the powers to transform himself into a variety of animals in order to evade capture and bring messages to satellite Maroon communities to ferment resistance. Although finally captured and burned at the stake in 1758 (though some believe that he escaped execution by transforming himself into a fly), he set an important precedent as a charismatic leader of resistance to the slave regime and thus, as historian Carolyn Fick puts it, "his memory was sufficient to nourish the long and bitter struggle that would one day lead to emancipation" (1990). Beyond the Haitian Revolution, Makandal's name has been adopted in Haitian Creole to designate a particular class of poisons and other paraphernalia associated with sorcery. He is also one of the few human beings to have been deified as a spirit in Haitian Vodou.

Malachy

Christian archbishop

Malachy was archbishop of Armagh and the first formally canonized Irish saint. Born Maolmhaodhog Ua Morgair in about 1094 in Armagh, Ireland, he took the name Malachy when he entered the religious life. He was ordained deacon in about 1117, advanced to the priesthood two years later, and was made vicar of Armagh by 1120. He received his earliest education from his father, Murgrón Ua Morgair, the chief lecturer at the cathedral school at Armagh during the reign of the reforming archbishop Cellach Ua Sinaig (Celsus of Armagh).

Although the reclusive Culdee Imar O'Hagan, an ardent reformer, was an important influence on his life, Malachy learned the Benedictine way at Lismore monastery before being appointed bishop of Down in 1123 and then abbot of Bangor and bishop of Connor in 1124. After being forced to leave northern Ireland in 1127 or 1128, he established a monastery at Iveragh in County Kerry, serving as its first abbot. Archbishop Celsus of Armagh designated Malachy as his successor shortly before his death in 1129, which broke a long line of hereditary succession to the see of Armagh. After much controversy and violence, Malachy was finally accepted as archbishop in 1137, at which point he promptly resigned to return to his monastery at Bangor.

In 1139, Malachy went to Rome to request the pallium for the two metropolitan sees of Ireland, Armagh and Cashel. He stayed at Clairvaux along the way, where he was befriended by Bernard and greatly impressed by the Cistercian way of life: Malachy was later responsible for the establishment of the first Cistercian monastery in Ireland, Mellifont, in 1142. Pope Innocent II refused Malachy's request for the pallium on the grounds that it had not been requested by a general council of Ireland's clerical and lay leaders; he did, however, appoint Malachy papal legate to Ireland. A synod held in Dublin in 1148 sent Malachy to Rome to request the pallium again, but he died en route at Clairvaux on November 2, 1148.

The so-called "Prophecy of St. Malachy," which identifies the 111 successors of Pope Celestine II, is a sixteenth-century forgery. Malachy's feast is celebrated on November 3. He was canonized in 1190.

Malcolm X

Muslim leader

Malcolm X, born in Omaha, Nebraska, in 1925, became a Muslim leader who integrated racial pride and black nationalism as a member of the Nation of Islam (NOI). By the age of six, Malcolm had already experienced the sting of racism when the Ku Klux Klan burned down his family's home in Lansing, Michigan. Later, his father was brutally murdered and his mother went to a mental institution. In the eighth grade, after spending several years in foster and detention homes, Malcolm dropped out of school. He worked menial jobs and eventually moved to New York, where he discovered the world of drugs, pimping, and gambling. While serving a prison sentence for burglary, he converted to Islam.

Upon his release in 1952, he met with Elijah Muhammad, leader of the NOI. Malcolm X soon became a strong influence within the NOI, and his message of black separatism and self-dependence transformed the organization into a national movement. Indeed, the name of Malcolm X became synonymous with the Black Muslim movement. At this point, however, conflicts between Malcolm X and Elijah Muhammad began to emerge. Upon returning from his pilgrimage to Mecca, where he prayed and ate with Muslims from all over the world, in 1964, Malcolm's ideas of black separatism began to change. This widened the rift between him and the NOI leader.

Following Malcolm's public response to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy in 1963, Elijah Muhammad found reason to silence Malcolm for ninety days. Weeks later, Malcolm discovered a conspiracy within the NOI against him and resigned. On March 8, 1964, he started his own organizations, the Muslim Mosque and the Organization of Afro-American Unity. His extensive travels to Africa and the Middle East brought him closer to the traditional orthodox practices of Islam. In 1965, shortly after his return to the United States from one of his trips, he was assassinated by members of the Muslim movement, who denied being part of any conspiracy.

Malik Sy, Al-Hajj

Muslim intellectual, sufi

Born in Gaé, Senegal, in 1854 Al-Hajj Malik Sy became one of the most significant Islamic thinkers and sufi figures in French West Africa. A recognized leader (muqaddam) of the Tijaniyya sufi order (tariqa), he was an important ally of the French colonial administration. He developed a widely recognized reputation for piety, Islamic learning, and the esoteric sciences and gained a large popular following of both formal students and laypeople. His teachings and growing following culminated in establishing the Malikiyya suborder of the Tijaniyya tradition. The Malikiyya continues today as one of the most important sufi orders in Senegal.

Malik Sy's early years remain obscure, but he came from a poor, ethnically Wolof family in the western Futa Toro region of Senegal. His family established ties to the Tijaniyya sufi order through al-Hajj Umar Tal's proselytization, though they did not join the latter's jihad in the 1850s. Between 1870 and 1895, Malik Sy studied and traveled widely, gradually gaining a reputation as a sober, talented scholar and sufi. He developed close relations with the French administration after settling at the peanut production center at Tivaouane near Dakar in 1902. In 1910, he wrote a crucial sermon denouncing jihad against the colonial government, and in 1912 he issued a circular (republished and distributed by the French) urging his followers and colleagues to support the administration unconditionally. The French, in turn, allowed him to expand his following and teaching activities at a time when the administration severely limited other Muslim leaders, such as Ahmad Bamba and his Muridiyya. Fed by the growing spiritual and social influence of Malik Sy, the Malikiyya became the prominent Tijani-based sufi order in the region. Tivaouane remains an important school and pilgrimage site today.

Malli

(Historicity uncertain)

Jain tirthankara

According to Jain teachings, Malli was the nineteenth tirthankara (ford-maker) in the current declining half-cycle of time. The Shvetambara Jains assert (and the Digambaras deny) that Malli was a woman.

According to the Shvetambaras, the soul that later became Malli once took birth as a prince named Mahabala, who renounced the world with six close friends. Although mutual agreement required them to perform exactly the same ascetic practices, Mahabala cheated by doing more than the others, and because of this he acquired the karma that results in a future birth as a female. But, also because of his ascetic practices, he acquired the karma that results in a future birth as a tirthankara. Mahabala was later reborn as a princess of unparalleled beauty named Malli, and the six friends took birth as princes of six nearby kingdoms.

Knowing of things to come, Malli caused a building to be constructed, consisting of a central room visible from six surrounding rooms through grillwork. In the central room, she had a hollow statue installed that was an exact replica of herself, and each day she deposited a handful of her food into it through a hole in the top. In the meantime, each of the six princes had become inflamed with desire after hearing accounts of her beauty. Each sent a proposal of marriage to her father, but he rejected all of them. At this point, the six frustrated princes made common cause, besieged the capital, and were victorious against her father's army. Malli then instructed her father to invite each of the six suitors to come secretly to spend the night and to ensconce each separately in one of the six rooms surrounding the central chamber. When this was done, all six gazed longingly at the image, thinking that it was Malli. Malli then lifted the cover from the image, and a vile stench of rotten food filled the air, disgusting and repelling the six suitors. The real Malli then gave the six a lecture dealing with the futility of pleasures of the body and also told them about their previous births.

Malli later became a mendicant, achieved omniscience, taught, and ultimately shed her body and attained liberation at Mount Sammeta (in what is now Jharkhand).

Mana

Polynesian holy force

Definition of the Polynesian word "mana" is complex and elusive, and it generally requires more than a few words to describe it adequately. As a word now accepted in the English language, it means “the power of the elemental forces of nature embodied in an object or person.” Other synonyms could be suggested, such as “supernatural or divine power, might, authority, influence, prestige, reputation, and charisma.” Although it might be hard to describe precisely, most Polynesians can recognize persons who possess a great deal of mana. It might be a prestigious leader, who is well respected in his or her community; it might be a grandfather or grandmother whose life exemplifies the finest qualities one can imagine; or, it might be an artist or craftsman whose exquisite work and whose personality set him or her apart from all the others. Once when asked whom I regarded as a Pacific personality who possessed great mana, I responded without hesitation “The king of Tonga and Ratu Sir Kamise Mara, the prime minister of Fiji.” Other names, of course, came to mind immediately thereafter.

Anciently, mana emanated from the gods who possessed it to a superlative degree. A Polynesian legend suggests that when the god Tāne threw his lightning bolt and killed Ātea (space), Ātea’s mana did not die with him but passed down to his earthly descendants, the high chiefs and nobility of Polynesia. One way humans can obtain mana, therefore, is through genealogy or birthright. Chiefs, especially those in the highly structured societies of Tonga, Tahiti, and Hawai’i, were imbued with a kind of supernatural aura or power inherited from their father. The more mana that the father possessed upon his death, the more that could be transmitted to his eldest son. Junior sons as well as daughters could inherit this power, but to a lesser degree, and marriages were frequently arranged between children of high-ranking families—even between brothers and sisters—in order to preserve the family’s unique mana.

Another way of receiving mana was to acquire it during one’s lifetime. A young priest acquired ritual mana through exposure or contact with the supernatural during his training, and as he grew in wisdom and stature, his mana increased exponentially. A craftsman obtained mana as his expertise and skills increased, and as a result, he became well respected in the community. As a brave warrior succeeded in victory after victory over the tribe’s enemy, his reputation (mana) rose accordingly. But acquired mana is volatile. A priest who forgets the proper chants, a craftsman whose skill is lost because of old age or blindness, or a warrior whose victories have turned to defeats may all lose a portion or all of their mana. The common explanation for this loss of mana is that the gods have become displeased and have relinquished this person’s mana; or perhaps, an evil entity has gained power over the individual. If the later is the case, the person may have to resort to religious ceremonies and priestly advice to help alleviate his problem.

Even those born with the potential of great mana may not rise to the expectations of society. The way rulers conduct their lives and carry out their duties determine the actual mana gained during their lifetime. Weak rulers or perhaps those that rule despotically might find themselves without subjects or perhaps the object of a revolution to depose them.

Manco Capac

(c. 1022–c. 1107 C.E.?)

Inca ruler

Manco Capac is a character with historical and mythical features. The Incas trace their ancestry to mythical figures who emerged from holy places that were later regarded as shrines. Manco Capac was the legendary founder of the Inca Empire in Peru and the reputed founder of the capital, Cuzco. Although exact dates are missing, it is generally acknowledged that the establishment of the Inca kingdom in Peru falls roughly within the twelfth century.

According to oral tradition, Manco Capac led a group of fellow tribesman from their homeland near Lake Titicaca in southeastern Peru and headed north. They chose to settle in a fertile valley where they successfully conquered the local people. It was here that Manco Capac founded Cuzco, the center of the future Inca Empire. Manco Capac and his sister, Mama Ocllo, were believed to be the son and daughter of the sun god, Inti. They claimed to have been sent by the sun god to end the struggles and wild life of the people in the Andean region. Some legends state that Manco Capac and Mama Ocllo went out from Lake Titicaca and wandered around the Urubamba Valley until the gold cane they carried sank into the ground. This was the sign to found Cuzco, which means “navel of the world.” Others state that Manco Capac and his three brothers and four sisters, Mama Ocllo among them, went out of Tambotoco Mountain to found Cuzco. On their way, Manco’s brothers showed disrespect toward the huacas (Andean gods) and were transfigured by them into stone figures. Only Manco Capac and his sisters reached their destination and founded Cuzco.

Manco Capac and Mama Ocllo married and established the royal bloodline, which continued with each succeeding emperor, favored son marrying sister. Manco Capac was the original Sapa Inca (highest or first Inca), the first supreme ruler of the empire. He had many wives, but his sister was the principal wife, and it was from the sons of this union that the future emperor would be chosen. This son would marry one of his sisters, and their union would in turn produce the next successor. The royal family, consisting of the many children and relatives of the emperor, assumed the highest position in society.

Over time, Manco Capac established social communities called ayllus to organize the population. Ayllus ranged in size from small farming settlements to large towns. Entire families lived in the same ayllu and shared lands, crops, and animals. In this way, he started the Inca dynasty, which ruled the Peruvian Andes for almost 300 years before the arrival of the Spaniards. Sinchi Roca, his son with Mama Ocllo, was proclaimed Inca emperor after Manco Capac's death. There was little growth in the Inca domain over the next 200 years. However, all this changed during the reign of the eighth and ninth Inca emperors, Viracocha (d. 1440) and Pachacutec (r. 1441–1471). The Inca Empire grew to a great size, encompassing an area estimated at 350,000 square miles.

All Spanish and Indian chroniclers start Inca history with Manco Capac, placing him in the eleventh century, based on the oral accounts of old Quechua speakers of the fifteenth century. Most of them portray Manco Capac as the founder and early organizer of Inca society. However, the Andean chronicler Guaman Poma de Ayala depicts Manco Capac as an idolatrous king who brought disgrace to the Andean race and then died poor at the age of 165.

Mandate of Heaven (Tianming)

Chinese political/religious doctrine

Tianming (t'ien-ming), the “mandate of heaven,” is a notion that grounds Chinese political power in virtue. The “virtue” serves as a legitimization of the holder of power, a challenge to that ruler to maintain an exemplary level of behavior and leadership, and a reason to remove that ruler should the moral quality of his or her rule degrade below acceptable levels.

The mandate of heaven is first mentioned in texts of the Western Zhou period (1045–771 B.C.E.). The concept was seemingly developed to legitimate the Zhou conquest of the Shang, wherein Zhou leaders sought to retain much of the Shang political system. The late Shang rulers were cast as lacking in moral character, thus rendering the conquest a virtuous action intended to ensure governance by those of sufficient merit. The mandate of heaven to rule was seen as hereditary (although finite) for successive “sons of heaven.”

Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.) saw ming (fate), or the will of heaven, as purposeful. Later Confucian writers used the term to refer to the total set of conditions and forces around a specific occurrence. Dong Zhongshu grounded the moral foundation of all post-Zhou dynasties by alleging that Confucius himself had received the mandate of heaven, and thus the Confucian imperial order.

Natural disasters were commonly interpreted as macrocosmic imbalances, signs that the ruler was in heavenly disfavor. Indeed, macrocosmic disturbances, whether natural, political, or social, could function as reasons for the removal of the ruler. A ruler without the mandate of heaven was ultimately considered an impostor to office. This removal, it should be noted, was seen as the duty of the ministers of the court, not of the general populace, a call for replacement and not for revolution.

Mandela, Nelson Rolihlahla

Christian human rights activist, leader

Nelson Mandela was born on July 18, 1918, in the Transkei in South Africa. Raised in the Protestant tradition as a Methodist, he maintains a very private religious pluralist spirituality that embraces the truths and values of all religions. As a product of Christian missionary education, he credits his achievements in life and his place in history to his formative religious education. In 1942, Mandela joined the African National Congress (ANC). Educated as a lawyer, he and ANC president Oliver Tambo started the first black legal firm in the country. After the Sharpeville Massacre in 1960, the ANC was banned, and Mandela was detained until 1961, when he went underground to lead Umkhonto we Sizwe, the military wing of the ANC. Under his leadership, it launched a campaign of sabotage against the government in an effort to put an end to apartheid, or racial segregation, in South Africa.

In 1964, Mandela was sentenced to life imprisonment in Robben Island as one of the accused in a mammoth treason trial. At the trial, he conducted his own defense on the grounds that a judiciary council controlled entirely by whites was an interested party and could not be impartial. Mandela rejected offers made by the Afrikaner government for remission of sentence in exchange for accepting the Bantustan policy by recognizing the independence of the Transkei and agreeing to settle there. Again in the 1980s Mandela rejected President P. W. Botha’s offer for release on condition that he renounce violence.

Throughout twenty-seven years of his life in prison, Mandela never compromised his political principles. Released from prison on February 11, 1990, he plunged into his life’s work, striving to attain the goals he and others had set out to achieve almost four decades earlier. He and his delegation agreed to the suspension of the armed struggle in favor of negotiating an end to apartheid with the white South African leadership. The first multiracial elections were held in 1994, and Mandela was elected president.

Mandela has never wavered in his devotion to democracy, equality, freedom, and education. His life has been an inspiration, in South Africa and throughout the world, to all who are oppressed and deprived. He accepted the 1993 Nobel Peace Prize on behalf of all South Africans who suffered and sacrificed to bring peace. He was inaugurated as the first democratically elected president of South Africa on May 10, 1994, serving until June 1999. He sacrificed his private life and his youth for the freedom of all people and remains South Africa’s best known and loved hero, viewed in South Africa as a religious as well as a political figure. The reward of his sacrifice was attaining freedom and democracy in an open society that respects the rights of all individuals. His life personifies struggle, reconciliation, and forgiveness.

Mani

Manichaean founder

Mani was the third-century Persian prophet who founded Manichaeism after an angel reportedly revealed to him that he was the paraclete and the seal of the prophets. Reconstruction of Manichaean teachings and history used to rely solely on the reports of opponents of the religion, including Titus of Bostra (d. c. 370); Augustine of Hippo (354–430); who was himself a Manichaean for many years before becoming Christian; Ephrem the Syrian (c. 306–373); and Serapion of Thmuis (d. c. 370). But important discoveries in Egypt and China of original Manichaean texts preserved in Coptic, Chinese, Persian, and other middle-Asian languages, as well as the discovery of the Greek Cologne Mani codex during the first half of the twentieth century, greatly expanded scholars' understanding of the religion.

Manichaeism is characterized by a dualistic division of the universe into a kingdom of light—the spiritual world where God reigns—and a kingdom of darkness, which consists of matter—where Satan reigns. Humanity takes part in the conflict between light and darkness in that the human body is matter, while the soul is spiritual, a fragment of light that must be saved. However, the essence of Mani's gospel was the teaching that he was himself the culmination of a prophetic line stretching from Adam and Seth to Jesus in the West, Zoroaster in Persia, and Buddha in the East. During his life, his doctrines were preached in the Roman Empire in the West and as far as India in the East.

Mani was born to an aristocratic Persian family in 216. From the age of four, he was raised in the strict observance of Elkesaism, a Judeo-Christian Baptist sect. When he was twelve, he had his first revelation when his “twin spirit” appeared to him, followed by another appearance when he was twenty-four. This spirit indicated that he was to be the final prophet. An attentive reading of the epistles of Paul, interpreted in the light of this revelation, led Mani to reject Elkesaite rituals and doctrines and to teach that salvation is primarily related to the knowledge of the kingdom of light. Thus, for Mani, salvation comes from divinely revealed knowledge and not from the strict observance of rituals. He affirmed the truth of the original teachings of Jesus and Paul but felt that Christianity had been corrupted and that it was through his revelation that its purity could be restored.

Having gained the protection of the Persian emperor Shapur I, Mani commenced his missionary activities. He made a journey to India in 242, where he learned about Buddhism and incorporated elements of it into his system, having already been influenced by Thomasite Christian communities (communities that claimed to have been founded by the apostle Thomas) with which he had interacted. Mani's openness to other religious traditions gave his teaching a universal character that greatly helped its expansion. He argued that the ancient prophets had limited themselves to one area of the world and one language, whereas his own mission was universal. The success of Manichaeism provoked the hostility of the Zoroastrian religious leaders. Upon the accession of a new Persian emperor, Bahram I, in 273, Mani was arrested as a heretic. He probably died in prison sometime between 274 and 277, although he may have been executed.

After his death, his doctrines reached as far as China in the East and were also successful in the West. Manichaeism survived at least until the eleventh century in China as the “doctrine of light,” and some have claimed that the French Cathar movement of the Middle Ages was a late form of Manichaeism.

Manjushri

Buddhist bodhisattva

Manjushri is the Indian Buddhist personification of wisdom (prajna) and “patron saint” of Buddhist scholasticism. Perhaps the oldest and most significant mythic bodhisattva (enlightenment hero) of the Mahayana Buddhist tradition, Manjushri is generally portrayed as a dazzling, sixteen-year-old crown prince atop a lotus throne. In his right hand, he holds aloft his hallmark emblem: the razor-sharp sword of wisdom that severs the delusive thinking that binds people in a cycle of suffering and rebirth. In his left hand, Manjushri balances a perfection of wisdom text—the source and embodiment of liberated awareness, as is Manjushri himself. Manjushri typically appears as interlocutor in texts expounding Mahayana Buddhism's signature interpretation of voidness (shunyata, the absence of any inherent self-existence), the philosophical cornerstone of twenty centuries of pan-Asian Buddhist scholastic explication. Manjushri thus signals and embodies a landmark in the history of Buddhist thought.

Manjushri emerged in Buddhist texts from the second century C.E. to fulfill a range of pedagogical functions. In the Ajatasatrukaukrtyavinodana Sutra, Manjushri travels effortlessly through universes as numerous as the grains of sand in the river Ganges, demonstrating that perfected wisdom is far more than mere verbal or intellectual acuity. In the Vimalakirti Sutra, the crown prince shows the wisdom of the Mahayana practitioner Vimalakirti to be far superior to that of non-Mahayana monks, tacitly underscoring the superiority of the Mahayana way. Manjushri's manifestation of critical wisdom in the Ratnakaranda Sutra so overwhelms the followers of a competing Jain teacher that they drop to their knees to praise the Buddha. Likewise, Manjushri brings the Buddha's teachings to "incalculable numbers" of beings in the highly influential Lotus (Saddharmapundarika) Sutra, and even converts a prostitute to the Mahayana path in the Manjushrivikridita Sutra.

Manjushri's popularity as an object of devotion and meditation spread well beyond India. Manjushri worship developed into "one of the most important Buddhist cults of Tang China" (Birnbaum 1983, 8) and spread to Korea and Japan. From the eighth century, Manjushri traveled to Tibet, where he became identified with influential religious and political figures who legitimized their teachings around their visions of the crown prince; "to see Manjushri" was tantamount to a direct experience of the most profound nuances of the Buddha's teaching. In Nepalese legend, Manjushri wields his glittering sword to drain the Kathmandu Valley. Manjushri subsequently joined the pantheons of Bhutan and Mongolia, and he continues to be revered by Buddhist practitioners throughout the world.

Mankiller, Wilma

Cherokee chief

As the first woman chief ever elected, Wilma Mankiller led the entire Cherokee nation in fourteen counties of Oklahoma from 1983 to 1995. Founder of the Cherokee Community Development Program, she focused on rebuilding the Cherokee nation, community by community. Her spirituality is reflected in the faith she has in her people and their ability to solve their own problems. Mankiller stresses the interconnectedness of the tribe as one of the most important Cherokee values. She cites an ancient prophecy that states that as long as the Cherokee continue their ancient dances, the world will remain the same, but if the dances cease, the end of the world will come. Mankiller's programs of community self-help encourage the Cherokee to continue to dance. During her tenure as principal chief, tribal membership tripled, health services and services to children greatly expanded, and the annual budget doubled.

Wilma Mankiller blends two worlds as she lives in both the Indian and American mainstreams. She combines the best of Cherokee tradition with the best of Euro-American culture. Her activism began in earnest after the 1969 occupation of Alcatraz by American Indian activists. As a contemporary healer, she is still an important Cherokee spokesperson and leader even though she decided not to run for the position of principal chief in 1995. She is currently writing and consulting. She has been the recipient of more than twenty-five awards, including American Indian Woman of the Year in 1986, Spirit of the People in 1994, and the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1998.

Wilma Mankiller was the sixth of eleven children born into a poor Cherokee family in Oklahoma in 1945. She is the mother of two daughters and three stepsons, and grandmother of seven. Mankiller is an old Cherokee name, Asgayadihi, that signifies someone who safeguards a Cherokee village. Balancing cultures and empowering the Cherokee, Wilma Mankiller continues to preserve the Cherokee traditions and works for equality for all.

Mansur, al-

Shi'i Muslim imam, caliph

Abu Tahir Isma'il al-Mansur bi'llah, hereditary imam of Isma'ili Shi'ite Muslims and third Fatimid caliph, reigned in Ifriqiya in North Africa. He was born in Raqqada, near Kairouan, in January 914. He succeeded his father, Muhammad b. 'Abdallah al-Qasim, and reigned for less than seven years. Known as a pious, generous, and eloquent man, he died before the age of forty on March 18, 953.

Al-Mansur was proclaimed heir apparent on April 12, 946, only five weeks before his father's death. At that time, the Fatimid state was facing a serious armed rebellion led by the Kharijite Abu Yazid, who had stirred up the Berbers against Fatimid rule and quickly conquered southern Ifriqiya. Al-Mansur took over the task of fighting the rebel and showed exemplary bravery and tenacity during the long and dangerous campaign, which he led personally. When his father died, al-Mansur concealed his death lest Abu Yazid gain advantage. Then, on May 24, 946, he began his campaign against the rebel, who was forced to abandon his siege of Sousse and fall back toward Kairouan. Emboldened by this victory, al-Mansur pursued Abu Yazid westward, where he subjugated other Kharijite adherents in the region of the Aures Mountains. Abu Yazid was eventually taken prisoner, and he died of his wounds on August 19, 947. Having suppressed the rebellion, al-Mansur made public his father's death and his own accession to the throne. He founded near Kairouan his new capital city, al-Mansuriyya, which was beautified by palaces in commemoration of his brilliant victory.

Al-Mansur resumed military campaigns in the central Maghrib and contained the influence of his rivals, the Spanish Umayyads, in the farthest Maghrib. He fought against Byzantium in Sicily, where Fatimid rule was reestablished, and its government was entrusted to the faithful family of the Kalbids. In the east, al-Mansur endeavored equally to reestablish Fatimid influence against his Abbasid rivals. It was at his request that in 951 the Carmathians restored to Mecca the Black Stone that they had carried off from the Ka'ba after seizing the Muslim holy city in 929.

Mara, a Buddhist mythological figure, is the archenemy of the Buddha and a symbol of evil. He enters the narrative of the life of Prince Siddhartha when he attempts to thwart the prince from attaining enlightenment under the bodhi tree.

Mara, who perceives the Buddha as a threat to his domain of the afterworld, at first tempts the Buddha by telling him to gain merit in order to be rewarded in heaven. After this fails, he sends his hideous army to destroy the meditating Buddha. The weapons of the army become powerless in the holy aura of the Buddha and are turned into lotus flowers. According to some accounts, Mara uses his considerable powers to create whirlwinds, a great rainstorm, flaming rocks, and darkness, but nothing is able to deter Siddhartha. Finally, Mara attempts to seduce Siddhartha by sending his three daughters, named Discontent, Delight, and Desire, but they, too, are unsuccessful.

At the end of their encounter, Mara and Siddhartha engage in an argument over the seat occupied by Siddhartha, which is symbolic of a royal throne. Mara claims that the seat is his because he has given the most alms. The Buddha calls forth the earth to be a witness to his generosity in his former births. Because the act of generosity is the primary duty of kings in ancient India, the encounter between the Buddha and Mara is a battle over the kingship of the earth.

It is possible to grasp the magnitude of this battle by investigating the name of Mara, which is derived from a Sanskrit root that means “to die.” Thus, Mara, a demonic being, was etymologically connected to death itself. He is known as the deity who slays or causes to die. Moreover, his name connects him to all conditions that are impermanent and subject to death and all defilements, fetters, and interruptions that cause death. From his root meaning, Mara is that which kills or destroys. Mara is thus the symbol of suffering in Buddhism. Moreover, his realm is equated with birth and death in Buddhist scriptures. Mara also represents the wide variety of unenlightened states of mind. He thus serves in Buddhist literature as a metaphor for death and negative states of mind.

Marabout*Muslim holy person*

The term marabout was made popular by the French colonial regime in North Africa and signifies a Muslim holy person, saint, or sufi leader. The word derives from the Arabic murabit (pl. murabitun), which originally referred to men preparing for battle at the frontier. The term is also used in North and West Africa to refer to a Muslim holy person’s shrine or tomb.

From the Arabic root meaning “to tie” or “to adhere,” “murabit” originally designated a voluntary soldier near the frontier of the Islamic world, frequently a lonely outpost requiring watchfulness, vigilance, and religious devotion. The term gradually gained a slightly different meaning in the western Islamic lands, including Spain and North Africa. The frontier settlements (often called ribats) that dotted this region from the 700s became places imbued with holy power and symbols of the strength of Islam not only against non-Muslims but, more broadly, against all the powers of evil. The title “murabit” in the vernacular Arabic of Spain and North Africa gradually came to denote someone exhibiting piety, contemplation, prayer, and holiness rather than the warlike characteristics of frontier soldiers. By 1200, the term had separated from the act of murabata (the military obligation of defending the Islamic frontier) to refer to a pious individual who withdrew from urban centers to a remote spiritual retreat, often attracting other followers. In North Africa during the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries, many murabitun remained in major cities, while many rural ribats, or zawaya, grew into towns—expanding from hermitages to religious, economic, and political centers.

“Murabit” has been a part of Western languages since the late medieval period (Latin: morabiti; Spanish: al morabidin, morabito, moravito; Portuguese: morábita; French: marabout; English: marraboo). Europeans used the term as they heard it used among Muslims at a particular time, but they also frequently extended its meaning to cover any sort of “holy” person, which at times included imams, magicians, cemetery workers, madmen, and beggars.

The formal study of marabouts and maraboutisme came with French colonialism in the nineteenth century. In 1848 in Algeria, the French government established an Académie d’Alger (which in 1909 became the Université d’Alger), which promoted the study of local cultures and languages and became highly influential in shaping French colonial policies in Muslim Africa. Here, the marabout and its related cult of saints became a major focus of study among both civilian social scientists and military intelligence personnel. For French officials, marabouts became a metaphor for what they saw as the peculiar and irrational form of Islam in North and West Africa and explained in part why these societies were so “backward.” Manipulating the popular influence of marabouts and other religious leaders emerged as a central goal in French colonial policy—a goal at which they largely succeeded.

Marcion

Christian teacher

Marcion was a Christian teacher denounced as a heretic by church fathers of the second through the fourth centuries. His writings are not extant, and thus historians must rely upon his catholic opponents for information about him, chiefly Tertullian's five-volume Adversus Marcionem (Against Marcion) written in about 200. Marcion, born in about 85 C.E., grew up in the town of Sinope in Pontus (Asia Minor) as the son of a Christian bishop. He became a wealthy ship owner and migrated to Rome in about 135, contributing to the church there 200,000 sesterces. Finding his teachings unacceptable, the church excommunicated him in 144, returning his gift. Marcion founded his own church and embarked on a series of missions that resulted in Marcionite churches in North Africa, Asia Minor, and Syria.

Marcion produced two basic works: a Bible and Antitheses (Contradictions). His Bible (the first “canon” of New Testament scripture) was in two parts: Evangelikon (Gospel), an edited version of Luke, and Apostolikon (Apostle's book), ten reedited epistles of the apostle Paul (omitting 1–2 Timothy, Titus, and Hebrews). His textual editing had as its purpose the elimination of alleged Jewish “corruptions.” Of the apostles he accepted only Paul. Marcion's Antitheses established the basic contradictions that he saw between the law of the Old Testament and the gospel (good news) of Jesus.

Marcion's teachings consist essentially of an interpretation of Paul's letters. In Rome, he came under the influence of a gnostic heretic named Cerdo, which may account for his radical dualist theology. He posited that there were two gods: the just creator of the world revealed in the Old Testament, and a completely good God, previously unknown and revealed by Jesus Christ. Jesus was not the messiah predicted in the Old Testament but the son of the good God sent to redeem humans from the bondage in which they are held by sin, death, and the law of the creator. Not born of a woman, Christ appeared suddenly in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. His body, Marcion said, was comparable to that of an angel, and he suffered on the cross in order to redeem humanity from bondage to the God of the law. In the end, that God and those who belong to him will be destroyed by fire; those redeemed through faith in the good God will live eternally in heaven.

Marcion made no claims for himself, but his followers regarded him as especially holy and assigned him a special place in heaven. Marcionite churches in the East persisted into the fifth century.

Margaret of Antioch (Marina)

(4th cent. C.E.?)

Christian legendary martyr

Margaret of Antioch (Marina in the Eastern church) was a Christian virgin martyr from the reign of Diocletian (r. 284–305) known for possessing the extraordinary physical fortitude and spiritual resolve of those saints or angels who see evil directly in a visible form. She confronted not only a human tyrant, Olibirus, but also demons. Her best-known adversary was a dragon, the staple of her iconography. Margaret is one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers of the Catholic Church. She triumphs over the threats that surround humanity at its most vulnerable moments of spiritual passage: birth, prayer, and death.

Margaret's historicity is uncertain. She was perhaps known to Greek Christians in the fourth century. She was known to continental Europe and England by the late ninth century, and perhaps to Anglo-Saxon England. She remained popular throughout the Middle Ages in Europe. The various legends agree that Margaret's father was a non-Christian of Antioch in Pisidia who disowned her because she converted to Christianity. She caught the eye of the prefect, Olibrius, but refused to marry him. The angry Olibrius forced Margaret through an array of fantastic tortures. For example, she emerged from a boiling cauldron and the dragon's belly unscathed. Some legends describe her wounds in excruciating detail bordering on the erotic. Such details highlight the synergistic relationship of the body and the soul in traditions of Christian devotional practice. In Margaret's case, they depict the continuity imagined for the Christian soul as it moves into and through this life and into the next with an integrity signified by the body's wholeness.

The accounts also highlight the paradox of the body's vulnerability and durability, an enigma brought into relief at critical moments of passage, such as birth and death, when the workings of spiritual forces on the human individual are thrown into relief. This may explain Margaret's status as the patron of pregnant women and newborn infants. She was an intercessor for the dying and those attacked by demons, especially popular during the crusades. Margaret's speeches and prayers often contain medieval liturgical language, especially from the psalms. Her ability to see evil and confront it may have had a special resonance for medieval monks, nuns, and lay religious whose lives were organized around a constant attention to the spiritual world through prayer, meditation, and liturgical observance. They and others may have found in Margaret a holiness defined by its resilience in adversity and clarity of vision.

Margaret of Cortona

Christian tertiary, caregiver, hermit

Margaret of Cortona, a prominent member of the Third Order of St. Francis, was renowned for her penances, social involvement, and devotion to the suffering Christ. Her lengthy biography by her confessor, Fra Giunta Bevegnati, establishes Margaret as one of the important female penitents in medieval hagiography.

Born in Laviano in Umbria to a peasant family in 1247, she ran off with a young noble, Arsenio, and lived in his castle for some nine years. One day, Arsenio's dog led Margaret to the dead body of Arsenio, who had been the victim of a robbery or feud. But when she returned to her ancestral home in Laviano with her nine-year-old son, her stepmother, her father having remarried, refused to allow her to enter. Abandoned, in about 1275 Margaret and her boy walked to Cortona in Tuscany, where she hoped to find work. When two noble ladies saw her begging by the Berarda Gate, they put her up in one of their small rooms.

Margaret made a living by serving as a midwife. She quickly became a well-known figure about town, respected for her piety and concern for the poor. In about 1278, she was accepted into the Third Order of St. Francis, a loosely knit group engaged in penitential practices and works of charity. Margaret founded a confraternity and a hospital, and she persuaded the bishop of Arezzo not to attack Cortona. People came from throughout the region to seek her advice and prayers; by means of her confessors, her influence on the town's spiritual life was extensive. Her extreme forms of penances and her ecstasies won her numerous admirers. In roughly 1290, she left the vicinity of the church of St. Francis, where she had lived in a cell, and went up the hill to live as a hermit. She remained there until her death in 1297.

Margaret was closely associated with the Franciscans and became a model for tertiary women, who were becoming increasingly numerous in central Italy. Although the town's leading citizens promoted her sainthood, she was in fact not canonized until 1723. Fra Giunta's biography, completed in 1308, reflects many contemporary trends: the devotion to the humanity of Christ in his suffering; penitential spirituality; the desire to visualize and participate in Christ's earthly life as depicted in the gospels; the poverty controversy in the Franciscan Order; the way saints were raised to patronage of towns; apocalyptic expectations; and the activities of laywomen in central Italy who were engaged in charitable works. He wrote the Life in the form of a dialogue, a common device at the time.

Margaret of Hungary

Christian nun

Margaret of Hungary (of the Árpáadian dynasty) was a Hungarian princess and Dominican nun of the thirteenth century. She led a life of extreme asceticism and died young in 1270. Although regarded as holy immediately after her death, she was officially canonized only in the twentieth century. Her feast day is January 18.

Margaret was the daughter of King Béla IV of the Árpáadian dynasty and was born in 1242 during the Mongol invasion of Hungary. Upon Hungary's liberation, Margaret's parents dedicated her to God. She was educated at the Dominican nunnery of Veszprém and from 1252 lived at the nunnery on the Island of Hares (today Margaret Island, Budapest). She quickly became famous for her extreme asceticism and self-inflicted pain. Although her father tried to marry her off to various princes for dynastic purposes, she resisted and lived as a nun until the end of her life. Efforts to canonize her began soon after her death.

Margaret's confessor, Marcellus, wrote the first legend of Margaret, and numerous testimonies regarding her sanctity were also collected. These documents of the thirteenth-century canonization process form a uniquely important group of sources in Hungary. Because of internal strife in Hungary, however, her canonization did not take place at the time. She was officially elected among the saints in 1943. Nevertheless, her cult, centered at her burial place on the island, flourished during the Middle Ages. In Italy, she was venerated primarily within the Dominican order and was thought to have received the stigmata. Margaret's representations are common in Italian and Hungarian art alike, but unlike her aunt, St. Elizabeth, she remained largely unknown in the rest of Europe. Margaret had little effect on postmedieval popular beliefs, but her cult was revived during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, when many romantic images were created of her.

Margaret of Scotland

Christian ruler

Margaret was the granddaughter of the English king Edmund Ironside and the wife of Malcolm III of Scotland and lived during the eleventh century. Historians credit her with a spiritual and cultural influence in Malcolm's work of unifying Scotland and with the foundation of the church of the Holy Trinity at Dumfermline.

Scholars debate whether Agatha, the woman the English prince Edward married in Hungary, was Margaret's mother, but most agree Margaret was probably born in Hungary in about 1046. Although Margaret was drawn to a cloistered Christian religious life, she married the Scottish king as her mother wished. As queen, her spiritual interests found expression in a pious secular life of regular prayer, fasting, and charitable works. Three twelfth-century copies of The Life of St. Margaret are known to exist. This work records the details of Margaret's piety and the example she set as wife, mother, and princely model, roles for which medieval Christians revered her.

The surviving twelfth-century stone chapel within the precincts of Edinburgh Castle in Scotland is associated with the lifetime of Queen Margaret. Margaret was canonized by Pope Innocent IV in 1250. The celebration of her feast day was moved in 1969 to November 16.

Marie d'Oignies

Christian laywoman

Marie d'Oignies was one of the most representative of the beguines from the Low Countries. She was born in Nivelles in about 1177 and married at the age of fourteen. She and her husband converted their house into a leper hospital, where they cared for the sick. Later, she lived as a recluse in a cell at the church of Oignies near Liège and became well known for her severe penances and austere way of life. Marie was one of the earliest saints to manifest something of the stigmata and associated her afflictions with Christ's wounds. As was common among beguines, she made a living by her own labor (weaving) at home, while continuing to serve the poor and give counsel when asked. Her characteristic virtues were her devotion to Christ's passion and the eucharist, her intuitive knowledge of the scriptures, her ecstasies and visions, and her prophetic gifts. She died in 1213.

The famous hagiographer James of Vitry (c. 1160–1240) wrote her biography, which was intended in part to chastise the clergy; promote preaching, regular confession, and communion; and attack heresy, particularly the dualist Catharism. This Life typifies some of the then-current trends in Western Christian teaching and practice and describes the spirituality of the beguine movement.

In about 1230, Thomas of Cantimpré (c. 1201–c. 1270), who, like James of Vitry, was an Augustinian canon regular, wrote a supplement to James's vita of Marie. More than an account of Marie's career and the holy women of Liège, Thomas's biography reprimands James of Vitry for taking focus from Marie's ideal of the vita apostolica (apostolic life). The Lives of Marie by Thomas and James reveal much about the early beguines, the religious life of urban Belgians, the spirituality of the apostolic life, the renewed emphasis on preaching, and the changing demands of hagiography and the canonical process for making saints. They also provide information about the de facto conditions in the Low Countries, as well as the ideals of two of the most important hagiographers of northern Europe. Marie's influence extended even to the Franciscans.

Mark

Christian evangelist, martyr

Identified by second-century church fathers as the anonymous writer of the second gospel, Mark is traditionally linked to the John-Mark mentioned in Acts as the son of Mary who accompanied Barnabas and Paul on their evangelical missions (Acts 12–15). He was also thought by the early church to have been a devoted follower of Peter, perhaps because of the reference in 1 Peter 5:13 to “my son Mark,” who faithfully recorded what he could remember of the apostle's preaching. This understanding may have given rise to the further tradition that the Gospel of Mark was written in Rome, the place of Peter's martyrdom, although internal evidence suggests that it was probably written in southern Syria.

The gospel itself does not identify its author or the time that it was written. But based on its emphasis on nation rising against nation, the faithful undergoing resurrection, and the need for Christians to endure until the end (Mark 13:13), scholars conclude that the gospel was written during the Jewish-Roman War, which extended from 66 to 70 C.E. and culminated in the destruction of the Temple. Thus, Mark is usually considered the earliest of the four gospels, with Matthew, Luke, and John coming later and relying on the Marcan material. Characterized by a rather awkward syntax and narrative construction, the gospel is nonetheless vividly detailed. That the author knew Greek reasonably well is obvious, as scriptural quotations are taken from the Septuagint rather than from Semitic originals. But the author's own Semitic background is also evident because in places Aramaic phrases are quoted and then translated.

The threat to the community represented by the extended conflict of the Jewish-Roman War is what gives rise to the apocalyptic quality of Mark's gospel. Within the unique literary context of the gospel, so different from the letters, chronicles, and apocalypses of other movements, Mark brings together past, present, and future in order to emphasize the point that the “kingdom of God is at hand” (Mark 1:15). Toward this end, he constructs his gospel as a three-part narrative that focuses on the past of Jesus' ministry in Galilee and Judea, the present of Jesus' ministry in relation to the church, and the future ministry that Jesus will exercise when he comes as the Son of Man.

Medieval legend reports that Mark was martyred in Alexandria. In the ninth century, his purported relics were stolen by Venetian merchants, and Mark became the patron saint of the city of Venice. His feast day is April 25.

Marley, Bob

Rastafarian leader, musician

In his short life Bob (Robert Nesta) Marley rose from poverty and obscurity in Kingston, Jamaica, where he was born in 1945, to the status of international superstar because of his Rastafarian faith and the music it inspired: reggae. His transformation poised him to become a heroic figure to poor and oppressed people everywhere because of his passionate articulation of their plight, his relentless calls for political change, and the spiritual solutions he offered that gave people hope.

Marley's adoption of Rastafarianism shaped the ska sound of Kingston into reggae. A complex set of mystical beliefs that held Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia (whose given name was Ras Tafari, r. 1930–1974) as a living god who would lead blacks out of oppression and into an African homeland, Rastafarianism was considered the religion of outcasts and lunatics until Marley represented it as an alternative to the violence and despair experienced by so many Jamaican blacks. Rastafarianism lent dignity to their suffering and offered the hope of eventual relief. Rastafari culture preaches compassion and justice through “one love” and the unification of all humanity. The music of reggae, therefore, is the way to give glory to Jah (God) and to communicate the message.

The dreadlocks, dietary rules, and use of ganja (marijuana) were Marley's external manifestations of a faith that inspired music of peace, love, and justice. Many of his lyrics are based on biblical themes and scripture, and despite his anxiety about the responsibility, he accepted his role as a prophet for his faith. Marley's appeal in Jamaica reached messianic proportions and so challenged the ruling powers that they attempted to assassinate him in 1976. Not long after, his music reached a global audience and inspired others as well.

Marley's appeal succeeded in transcending militant versions of black activism because of his emphasis on spiritual redemption. He believed his music would shine the light of Jah on all who heard. Marley's untimely death in 1981 was the result of his following the strictures of his Rastafarian faith, which disallowed conventional medical treatment. When he died he was given a state funeral in Jamaica and eulogized as an inspiration for freedom fighters worldwide. His homes in Jamaica—Hope Road (where Marley used to hold court and dispense charity, now home to the Bob Marley Foundation and Museum) and Nine Miles (his birthplace and site of his mausoleum)—have become popular sites for pilgrims.

Maroon Nanny

Obeah leader, rebel

To many people the name “nanny” suggests a governess or a contemporary au pair. The word has a different meaning in the history of West Indian resistance to slavery and colonization. On the West Indian island of Jamaica, the name Maroon Nanny, or Granny Nanny, is connected to the military battles that fugitive African slaves had with the British during the eighteenth century and the beginning of England's forced establishment of plantations and slavery in the West Indies.

Before Christopher Columbus's first claim to Jamaica in 1494, the island was inhabited by Arawak Indians. In 1655, the English captured Jamaica from the Spanish. By this time African slavery had been introduced, and a small group of slaves took advantage of the upheaval between the English and the Spanish and fled to the mountainous areas of Jamaica, where they became fugitives known as Maroons in full rebellion against the British and enslavement. Many of them were Coromantees from West Africa. To the British, who wanted to maintain their enslavement, they were known as a fierce Ashanti-Fanti-speaking people.

Maroon Nanny inspired and helped lead the Windward Maroons of Jamaica in their resistance against slavery for a time during the First Maroon War (c. 1655–1739). The Maroons were known for their brutal ambushes, betrayals, and ruthlessness toward the British and often toward other fugitive slaves who were not Maroons. They were practitioners of traditional African religions, or what came to be known in Jamaica as obeah. Because of her religious and military leadership in fighting for freedom, Nanny empowered herself through obeah. As a religious and military leader, she had a special sense of “otherness” that was elevated by the Maroon followers themselves.

According to Maroon oral stories that continue to be told, Nanny had been born in West Africa (possibly around 1700) and had supernatural powers. The Akan name, Nanna, may have become modified in the New World but still signified sacred characteristics of the female force as healer and spiritual progenitor of cultural and religious beliefs. As an extension of West African traditional religions, obeah played a major role in the spiritual lives of the Maroons as well as in their political agendas. Nanny eventually agreed to a treaty with the British in around 1740. In return for cessation of the war, the British deeded 500 acres of land to Nanny and her people. The Maroons had won freedom for themselves even as slavery would continue until its abolition in the nineteenth century.

Nanny’s religious empowerment was a central component of her military strategies against the British. Because of her charisma as a holy woman and a “technician of the unseen,” she was a mediator between her people and their belief in Nyame (Nyankopon), the Ashanti creator god. Surrounded with many legends and supernatural tales, the Nanny icon expresses official national heroism in Jamaica today.

Marpa

Buddhist layman, teacher

Marpa was a famed eleventh-century Tibetan master instrumental in the transmission of Indian Buddhist tantra to Tibet. His search for Buddhist teachings led him on three journeys to India and Nepal. His principal teacher was the Indian master Naropa, who guided him into the practices of esoteric Buddhism. Marpa, a layman, assimilated his teacher’s realization and became one of Naropa’s principal students. After returning to Tibet, he translated the teachings he had received in India and became a major force in the spread of Buddhism. He is regarded as the father of the Tibetan practice lineage known as the Kagyu school.

Marpa was born in 1012 in the southern part of central Tibet during the second wave of the Tibetan importation of Indian Buddhism (eleventh to thirteenth centuries). Having completed his preliminary education in Tibet, he traveled to India to seek out an authentic Buddhist master to guide him in his quest for enlightenment. In India he remained with Naropa for more than sixteen years, during which he received the complete transmission of Naropa’s teachings, learning the Hevajra and Cakrasamvara tantras and the mahamudra (great seal) view.

Back in Tibet, Marpa became known for his mastery of meditation, and his life story speaks of his clairvoyance and supernatural achievements. His great skill in guiding students and the spiritual efficaciousness of his tradition brought many seekers to his residence requesting initiation. Among these disciples the most prominent figure was the ascetic Milarepa (1052–1135), who became Marpa’s spiritual heir and continued the tradition of the Kagyu school after Marpa’s death in 1097. Marpa was an unconventional master who sustained both family and a farm; in the spirit of Naropa’s unorthodox tradition, he successfully mingled spiritual training with the activities of daily life to the extent that he reportedly achieved complete enlightenment within a single lifetime.

Martha

Christian disciple

The New Testament gospels grant significant places to women among the followers of Jesus. This was unusual in Palestine of the first century. Among the closest and most devoted followers of Jesus were Martha and her sister Mary.

Luke 10:38–42 records that Martha (her name is from the Aramaic meaning “lady” or “mistress”) had a sister named Mary. It is left to John’s gospel to reveal that the sisters had a brother named Lazarus (John 11:1–12:11). John indicates that the family lived in Bethany near Jerusalem. Luke does not mention this but places Jesus’ visit to their home directly following the story of the Good Samaritan in which the road from Jerusalem to Jericho figures prominently, suggesting that Luke and John are in agreement.

Luke relates that Martha invited Jesus into the family home, indicating that she was the elder sister. John mentions Martha’s anxiety (11:20–27) and the fact that she served at supper (12:2). This accords nicely with Luke’s portrait of Martha as busy with much serving (10:40), while Mary sat at the feet of Jesus. When Martha expressed concern, Jesus offered a mild rebuke, expressing his belief, revolutionary at the time, that women as well as men are called to be full disciples.

John includes a long discussion between Martha and Jesus that is found nowhere else in the New Testament (John 11:17–37). Unlike the male disciples, Martha has confidence that Jesus can raise her brother from the dead and offers a rather developed statement of faith, claiming that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God (11:27). Martha, in John’s gospel, is a model of belief. She is loved by Jesus, has faith in the face of doubt, receives teaching from Jesus, and tells others about him.

Martial of Limoges

(3rd cent. C.E.?)

Christian missionary

Though little information concerning the life of Martial survives, hagiographers have managed to portray a sense of holiness, largely through his miracles and his works of conversion in a time of interreligious conflict during the third century. Gregory of Tours (538/539–593/594) informs us that the pope sent seven bishops to Gaul to preach the gospel, including Denis to Paris and Martial to Limoges. Martial converted the inhabitants of Limoges to Christianity, erected a shrine to St. Stephen on the site of the present cathedral, and became bishop of Limoges.

As was often the case with medieval hagiography, later additions (probably largely inaccurate) were made to the story of the life of St. Martial. An anonymous life (the vita primitiva) was “discovered” by Abbot Arbellot in the eleventh century. The author claims to be Aurelian, Martial’s successor to the bishopric of Limoges. According to this work, Martial was born in Palestine, was one of the seventy-two disciples of Christ, attended the Last Supper, and was sent on a conversion mission by St. Peter. A controversy has arisen over the date of this biography. C. F. Bellet believes it belongs to the seventh century. L. M. O. Duchesne questions this conclusion and maintains that the vita primitiva is much later.

Martial allegedly performed numerous miracles, many of which were associated with conversion. When a non-Christian priest wished to throw him into prison, Martial struck him dead and later resurrected him as a Christian. After his death, Martial’s tomb became an important place of devotion and pilgrimage. In the ninth century, the Benedictine abbey dedicated to St. Martial was erected on the site. It was rebuilt in the eleventh century, leading to a growth in devotion toward the saint.

Martin de Porres

Roman Catholic layman, healer

Martin de Porres, a Dominican lay brother of Lima, Peru, was renowned and respected during and after his lifetime for his outstanding gift for healing; his ministry to widows, orphans, lepers, and prostitutes; the establishment of hospitals and orphanages; his work with the poor of Lima, especially the indigenous and African population; his love and care of animals; the miracles he worked among people from all walks of life; and the intimate encounters he experienced with God in the eucharist and among the people. The people of Lima considered him a saint long before he died in 1639. Martin de Porres was beatified in 1836 and canonized in 1962, the first black American saint of the Roman Catholic Church.

Martin de Porres, born in 1579, was the natural son of Don Juan de Porres, a Spanish hidalgo (noble), and Ana Velázquez, a freed black slave known for her skills with healing herbs. Don Juan refused to publicly acknowledge Martin as his son, thus forcing on him the status of illegitimacy, a lowly and difficult position in the hierarchical society of Lima. However, he did take responsibility for Martin's education, apprenticing him to a barber when the boy was twelve. At that time, a barber was also an apothecary, knowledgeable about medicines and the healing arts. Martin's natural gift for healing was enhanced by this placement.

At fifteen, Martin joined the Dominican friars as a donado, a member of the third order who ate and lodged with the friars in exchange for menial labor. When he was twenty-four, the friars persuaded him to take vows as a lay brother, and he was given charge of the infirmary. Everyone from slaves to archbishops gave testimony about miraculous healings facilitated by Martin.

Martin de Porres, born of an interracial family, provides a healing presence in the effort to foster an understanding of Christianity that is no longer Eurocentric. Martin is a saint for people from all races and walks of life and acts as a reminder that all people must be treated with equal dignity and respect. Considered an outsider because of his parentage, Martin shows the way to bring the outcasts—the poor, sick, abandoned, rejected, oppressed, and hungry—into a compassionate and hospitable community. He offers a model for humble, true, and faithful witness to Jesus' command to love one another.

Martin of Tours

Christian ascetic, bishop

Martin, bishop of Tours from 371 to 397, was an ascetic wanderer, popular healer, and ex-soldier. The principal source for his life comes from the biography written in 396 by Sulpicius Severus. Born in Pannonia (modern Hungary) in about 336, Martin moved with his family to Italy when he was young. Martin wanted to devote himself to God, but he was forced to join the military because of an imperial edict compelling the sons of veterans to enlist. In the fourth century, the life of a soldier was considered incompatible with Christian belief. Sins committed after baptism were considered “permanent” and thus many early followers of Christianity delayed baptism until the end of their lives. Martin, however, was baptized in his third year of military duty. Severus felt the need to explain why and how Martin remained in the military for another two years and went to great lengths to portray the holy character of the young soldier. He recounts that while spending a cold winter in Amiens, Martin saw a beggar shivering in the cold, took his sword and split his cape, and gave half to the old man. Martin was ridiculed for his tattered cloak, but that night he had a vision of Christ wearing half of his cape. This famous story became an important part of his iconography and the basis of many depictions of Martin.

Martin attempted to leave the army honorably. When confronted by the emperor Julian just before a major battle in Gaul, Martin asked to be released from service. He called himself “Christ’s soldier” and claimed, “I am not allowed to fight” (Noble and Head 1995, 8). Angered, the emperor ordered Martin to face the enemy unarmed, saying that if his god protected him and he survived, he would be released from service. When the enemy “miraculously” surrendered without resistance the next morning, Martin was set free and promptly went to seek out the holy bishop of Poitiers, Hilary. Hilary gave Martin, an uneducated ex-soldier, the lowest position in the church, that of exorcist. Severus transforms this encounter to one showing Martin’s humility, stating that he had declined higher positions offered to him by the bishop.

Martin then decided to travel to his parents’ home, and Severus paints this as a religious journey full of difficulties. Martin lost his way and was robbed, kidnapped, and almost killed, but he began to convert those he met, including his own mother. For a short time, Martin secluded himself on a small island with another holy man, where they practiced asceticism by living in a harsh environment and consuming only roots, including poisonous ones. Hearing that Hilary had been exiled from Poitiers, Martin set off toward Rome to find him, traveling first to Rome and then back into Gaul, where he set up a small monastery.

It was at this time that Martin began working miracles, including bringing the dead back to life, and became a popular holy man. One incident involved a young man who died before he was baptized. Martin so lamented this fact that he secluded himself with the body and prayed for two hours until the man came back to life. The crowd that had gathered around the hut quickly spread word about Martin’s power. He was so loved by the populace that they forced him to accept the bishopric of Tours in 371—a move that was not supported by neighboring bishops, who derided Martin’s lack of education, appearance, and suitability. As bishop, he continued to live an ascetic life, limiting his diet, dressing in ragged clothing, and wearing his hair long—behavior considered odd for a bishop. His monastic cell attracted many followers and soon became a monastery of more than eighty brethren. Martin spent much of his episcopate wandering the countryside destroying temples and shrines, converting people to Christianity, battling demons, and healing the sick.

Martin died an old man in 397, but his cult became one of the most popular in the Middle Ages. His sarcophagus in the basilica of Tours was an important pilgrimage site until its destruction in the sixteenth century.

Martyrdom and Persecution

The Greek root of “martyr” means “witness,” and in normal parlance a martyr is a person willing to die for his or her faith. This is a phenomenon central to the definition of holy people in Judaism, all branches of Christianity, Shi’a Islam, and the Sikh and Baha’i faiths—all religions that have been a minority presence in an antagonistic society during at least part of their history. Death, or at least persecution, for their faith has also formed an undercurrent in the history of holy people in Buddhism and even Daoism, usually when religious thinkers have broken from the dominant paradigms of belief and practice and have suffered for it.

In general, though, martyrdom and persecution have been much more important in the monotheistic religions than in polytheism, since the nature of monotheism itself encourages a confrontational approach to the religious beliefs of others. There is considerable truth in John Ruskin’s (1819–1900) statement that “most martyrs have been made away with less for their faith than their incivility.” People are quite naturally outraged when their cult statues are knocked over and trampled or they are told that they have been worshipping devils. Similarly, many people feel threatened when told that the traditional beliefs of their religion have been misinterpreted and are essentially false. Still, martyrs are admired by their coreligionists as the ultimate witnesses to divine truths, and their steadfastness in the face of death has often inspired people to convert.

Usually central to the definition of martyr is that the would-be martyr has a choice; by foreswearing the faith, she or he can escape death. Instead, they have won a great moral contest, and for many people they express in very straightforward terms the triumph of good over evil. It is not always easy, however, to tell if a person made a choice for martyrdom or was only a victim—a recurring issue in studies of the Holocaust, for example. Also a central concern in the history of martyrdom is the problem of resistance—is a person who tries to fight back rather than relying completely on God a true martyr? What of a person who provokes his or her death, sometimes even committing suicide in a self-proclaimed act of faith? And what of people who accept death in witness to their faith while killing other people in the process, such as kamikaze pilots or suicide bombers? Moreover, is martyrdom compatible with the humility expected of saints, or are they merely putting on a “tragic show” out of egotism, as the Roman emperor Marcus Aurelius accused the early Christian martyrs?

Both martyrdom and persecution that does not reach the point of death have proven to be extremely powerful tools for conversion, presenting a model that in essence declares, “My God is worth this great a sacrifice.” The persistence of the prophetic founders of various religions in the face of persecution shocked and awed their contemporaries, as well as later generations, starting with Zoroaster (c. 1400 B.C.E.), who tells how he was cast out by his kinfolk and rejected by many of his contemporaries. The stories of early Christian martyrdom are replete with examples of martyrs winning others to the faith by their steadfastness in the face of death, and examples continue in modern times among Christian missionaries. For example, when the Ugandan Apolo Kivebulaya (c. 1864–1933) began his Anglican missionary work, the king ordered his subjects to deny Kivebulaya food and soon had him beaten and left for dead. But a sympathizer secretly nursed the near-martyr back to health, and in time he was welcomed back and the king converted to Christianity.

Other persecutions and martyrdoms have served to confirm people in their own faith. The earliest person for whom a true martyrdom account was created was Socrates (c. 470–399 B.C.E.), whom Plato skillfully presented as ready to die for his principles. More influential in the Judeo-Christian-Muslim tradition, however, was the Jewish resistance to King Antiochus IV (r. 175–164 B.C.E.), a tale of civil disobedience for the sake of God that was skillfully told in the books of Maccabees. The account focuses on the old man Eleazar and a mother martyred with her seven sons, the “Maccabean martyrs” of 167 B.C.E. who refused to deny God by eating pig meat that had been sacrificed to Zeus. Jews have made a central virtue of steadfastness to their faith, including a willingness to die for the “sanctification of the divine name” (kiddush ha-shem) rather than allowing themselves to break the laws of idolatry, unchastity, or murder, all of which are crimes that separate one from God. The Hasidei Ashkenaz movement of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries particularly stressed martyrdom as the ultimate sign of love for God. Similarly, the Sikhs venerate Guru Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675), who was arrested by the Mughal authorities of India and tortured for days before being decapitated, but who consistently refused either to convert or to perform miracles to convince or entertain his captors, a stance reminiscent of Jesus of Nazareth before King Herod. A particularly inspiring example is the Baha'i martyr Badí (c. 1852–1869), who at about the age of seventeen agreed to convey Baha'u'llah's message of the new religion to the shah of Iran, despite the near certainty he would be killed for it. Sure enough, "the pride of martyrs" was tortured slowly and killed for daring to present this witness to his faith.

Still other martyrdoms have occurred in defense of a moral paradigm, be it an individual act of conscience or one that could affect a whole state. The twentieth century can boast a significant number of martyrs who spoke out against political corruption or cruelty over much of the world, ranging from Oscar Romero (1917–1980) of El Salvador to Anglican archbishop of Uganda Janani Luwum (1922–1977), an outspoken opponent of Idi Amin's regime who was arrested and shot. At a more personal level, Emmeram of Regensburg (d. c. 700) accepted the blame for a noblewoman's pregnancy to shield the true father, for which he was chopped in pieces by an outraged brother. The great martyrdom of Uganda, which culminated in 1886 with the execution of thirteen Anglicans and thirteen Catholics, was provoked when some of the king's pages, after converting to Christianity, refused to allow the ruler sexual favors. This paradigm extends beyond Christianity; according to legend, the Tibetan scholar Vairotsana (eighth century) refused the queen's sexual advances, whereupon she arranged his exile.

European colonialism produced a rich crop of martyrs whose religious views were regarded as dangerous by colonial authorities. In many cases, persecution—or more properly, the holy person's steadfast resolve in the face of persecution—had the opposite of the desired effect, popularizing movements that might otherwise have remained peripheral. For example, the Baptist missionary Simon Kimbangu (1889–1951), who started a mass religious movement in the lower Congo, was sentenced to death for alleged sedition. The sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment, but his movement fed on his suffering, and Kimbanguism now has about 5 million followers.

Hard to define but perhaps the most inspiring of holy people are those who have accepted persecution and death to defend their own interpretation of their religion. If the views they advocate triumph, such people are hailed as great martyrs and teachers of the faith; if they fail, they are stigmatized as heretics or even lunatics. Surely, at least some of the Christian "heretics" who have been persecuted and killed by Christian authorities merit the title of martyr—or would, if they had left followers to acclaim them. There is perhaps some hope even for these: The Roman Catholic Church is currently considering a case for the canonization of Girolamo Savonarola (1452–1498), burned at the stake as a heretic for his vehement attacks on ecclesiastical corruption. The Christian tradition is filled with tales of men and women martyred by their own coreligionists and entered on the rolls of saints when their cause triumphed, such as Maximus Confessor (c. 580–662), who was mutilated and exiled for defending orthodoxy against monothelite teachings, or, in the Anglican communion, the protomartyrs of Protestantism, such as Jan Hus of Bohemia (1372/1373–1415) and the 288 Protestants burned during the reign of "Bloody" Mary of England (r. 1553–1558). Although not giving them such a large role, other Protestant denominations recognize and honor the thousands of "heretics" executed on the continent of Europe during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The execution of heretics who are later acclaimed as martyrs also occurs in other religions. The Bab (1819–1850), founder of the Baha'i religion, was executed as a heretic Muslim. Several sufis suffered a similar fate, for example Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj (858–922), executed because his religious vision was regarded as blasphemous. Indeed, he aroused such deep hatred that he had his hands and feet hacked off before being decapitated, then his body was burned and the ashes were thrown into the Tigris River—but he is still venerated today as a martyr to a deeper, mystical vision of Islam. In the eighteenth century, mainstream Jewish authorities persecuted followers of Hasidism. And less formally, several accounts exist of Buddhists who were persecuted or killed by rivals from other schools of theology.

For example, the Chan patriarch Bodhidharma (sixth century) was nearly poisoned by rival teachers, at least according to legend. Another tradition tells that the second Chan patriarch, Hui-k'o (487–593), was forced by persecution to flee to southern China, and after his return to the north, influential Buddhist priests got him charged with heresy and executed. A spectacular case of Buddhist rivalry run amok was that of Honen (1133–1212) in Japan. Founder of the Pure Land school in Japan, he alienated the other Buddhist schools by considering his own teaching supreme. In turn, they arranged for Honen's expulsion from the samgha (monastic community) and his exile at the age of seventy-four—a persecution that probably increased his popularity. Similarly, the Japanese reformer Nichiren (1222–1282) criticized all other Buddhist schools as heretical and tried to convince the emperor to suppress them. This backfired, however, and when they failed to murder him, Nichiren's rivals arranged his exile to a remote island—a persecution that convinced Nichiren that he was an incarnate bodhisattva.

The case of Nichiren, however, brings up a problem: Is a person who provokes his or her own fate a legitimate martyr? The only true standard by which to reckon in terms of personal holiness is whether the person involved was indeed venerated as a martyr. Thus, the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith (1805–1844) is a martyr to the Church of Latter-day Saints, although outsiders tend to view his death at the hands of a lynch mob as something he “had coming to him” after his increasingly dictatorial practices, culminating in wrecking the presses of a rival newspaper.

A similar issue is the proper position of a political dissident: Is a person who opposes his or her government for the sake of religion a martyr or just a traitor? Modern belief in much of the world supports the former reading of dissidents. The problem is by no means so easy to resolve in regions and at times when secular and religious government are mingled. The Roman Catholic missionaries executed in Protestant England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were traitors by the standards of Protestant England, rebelling against a legitimate, divinely ordained ruler—but by Catholic standards they died as triumphant witnesses to the faith in a classic struggle of good against evil. Similarly, when several Sikh gurus were executed by order of the Mughal emperors, they died as rebellious and traitorous subjects, but they are acclaimed by Sikhs as martyrs to the faith. As in other types of martyrdom, the way a victim is viewed depends on how well he or she stood firm in the face of persecution; good, heroic suffering is an enormous support to a movement and can sometimes cause the persecution to backfire on the persecutors. A good modern example is the Iranian religious leader Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989), who was attacked, imprisoned, almost killed, and driven into exile; his son was murdered in the aftermath of all this. The Iranian Revolution of 1978–1979 broke out when Khomeini was slandered in a semiofficial newspaper, since by that time he was a popular hero.

Can a person still be holy who avoids persecution? A tale beloved of Christians is the legend that Peter tried to sneak out of Rome to avoid martyrdom, only to meet Jesus going into the city—on his way to be crucified again. Of course, Peter then turned back and won his martyr's crown. Such cases, however, have caused difficulties for theologians of several religions. Is not suicide a way of taking fate into one's own hands, rather than trusting in God? Not to mention the practical problem that if all the leaders of a religion are killed the faith will be thrown into disarray. Thus Shi'a Islam, subject to frequent persecutions as a minority “heresy” throughout its existence, allows pious dissimulation of true religious beliefs (taqiyya) in times of danger. Even God has collaborated in this process, in 874 hiding away the twelfth Shi'a imam, who is expected to return someday to usher in a new world order. Similarly, the Jewish rabbi Ishmael ben Elisha (second century), very concerned about the survival of Judaism, argued that it was acceptable to break certain commandments rather than be martyred. Catholic missionaries to Protestant lands also brought dissimulation to a high art, assuming false names and clothing and pretending to conform for the sake of their greater mission. The third Chan patriarch of China, Seng-ts'an (d. 606), even pretended to be insane to escape execution during a persecution of Buddhism. He went into hiding for ten years. All of these practices are essentially antimartyr in sentiment, arguing that the utility of living people is more important than the example of dead martyrs, although the mainstream of these religions continued to regard martyrs with admiration.

Is any resistance to death acceptable, or does it disqualify a person from martyr status? A Buddhist embarrassment was the great Chan master Yen-t'ou Ch'uan-ho (828–887), who cried out (although with supernatural loudness) when stabbed to death, conduct unbecoming an enlightened being. By the tenth century, Christianity had decided that any resistance at all meant that a person was deficient in trust in God, even removing from the legend of Boniface (c. 675–754) the saint's efforts to fend off the axes of his enemies with the book that, slashed through the middle, is still preserved in the city of Fulda in Germany.

But are those who want martyrdom too much and bring it on themselves indeed martyrs? This has particularly been an issue in Christian theology. For example, Ignatius of Antioch (d. c. 107) makes it clear in the letters written after his arrest that he longs for martyrdom, and he begs his friends in Rome not to intervene to save him from execution. Theologians are similarly exercised by the problem of the martyrs of Cordoba (851–858), who provoked their own executions with provocative behavior against the Muslim authorities. Theologians have debated whether Apollonia (d. c. 249), who threw herself on her funeral pyre rather than give her guards the satisfaction of killing her, was a true martyr. Even more problematic are several early tales of suicide, usually by virgin martyrs who killed themselves not to save themselves from a painful death, but to prevent the preliminary stage of rape. In Christianity, the argument of the early third-century Clement of Alexandria has won, that a person who does not avoid persecution when possible is an “accomplice in the crime of the persecution.” This view does not hold in other religions, however. Judaism recognizes that there is sometimes a need for suicide for the faith, and Vietnamese Buddhist monks, such as Thích Quang Đức, who burned themselves to death in the 1960s in protest at the ill treatment of Buddhists in the country, are honored and credited with helping restore religious freedom to Vietnam.

Belief that a martyr must wait to be attacked rather than taking the initiative tends to blur the lines of free will, especially when denial of one's faith will not win relief from persecution or death. Some people are regarded as martyrs who died of disease because they put themselves in the way of death while witnessing the faith, such as the Christian king Louis IX (r. 1226–1270) or the Baha'i Keith Ransom-Kehler (1876–1933), who died of dysentery and smallpox, respectively, while about the work of their religions. More problematic to define are the great atrocities perpetrated against practitioners of several religions in the twentieth century. Communist Russia in the 1920s and 1930s imprisoned and killed multitudes of bishops, priests, monks, nuns, and pious laypeople, numbering at least in the tens of thousands. Similarly, the Communist triumph in China, and then its annexation of Tibet and the Cultural Revolution, led to the destruction of most monasteries and the execution of thousands of monks and nuns. The Khmer Rouge of Cambodia launched devastating attacks on Buddhism, during which an estimated 60,000 monks disappeared. And 6 million of the Jews of Europe fell victim to the Holocaust. Are these people martyrs? They had no choice in their fate, although many did witness to their religion, dying professing their faith or protecting others.

There is no answer to such questions. In popular estimation, though, it is fair to say that those who are venerated as martyrs have passed the test of popular religion. The human mind finds it hard to grasp the magnitude of these twentieth-century atrocities, however, encouraging believers to find individuals who model in a heroic fashion the virtues of the many who died—a practice that can be seen in the habit of Christian martyrologies to list an individual saint “and companions,” who usually remain unnamed. Tales of martyrdom always emphasize individual steadfastness, individual heroism. Legends magnify the suffering of saints, while, in truth, authorities have often ordained grotesque tortures for dissidents in hope of breaking the courage of the sufferer and thus winning the battle for popular esteem. Many martyrs have as a result died horrible deaths; the ones who persist to the end are regarded as martyrs, those whose courage failed are simply victims. Perhaps the palm is held by the French missionary martyr to Quebec Jean de Brébeuf (1593–1649), who died by being slowly roasted and eaten while still alive.

Tales of the martyrs, of whatever religion, have been among the great inspirations of their respective faiths, winning an emotional response that cannot be matched by any other attribute of holy people.

Mary, Sister of Martha

(1st cent. C.E.)

Christian saint

There are several figures identified by the name Mary in the New Testament. Both Luke and John mention Mary the sister of Martha. John also indicates that the sisters had a brother named Lazarus. The gospels record that Jesus was a close friend of the family, perhaps using their home as a retreat for times of rest and reflection.

Mary the sister of Martha in Luke is a foil for the business of her sister Martha, activity that prevents Martha from focusing on the more important task of hearing the word and learning from Jesus. In John's gospel she is further the model of patient faith, remaining by the grave of her brother Lazarus while Martha goes to find Jesus. Her location at the feet of Jesus while he is teaching (Luke 10:39) is extraordinary. Jesus' association with the sisters must have aroused interest, as there were potent social conventions against unmarried women being visited by a teacher or receiving theological instruction.

John's gospel has Mary anoint Jesus' feet (12:1–8), and Luke (7:36–50) records that an unnamed woman anointed the feet of Jesus. Due in large part to this remarkable parallel, Catholic scholars have traditionally identified Mary of Bethany with not only the unnamed sinful woman of Luke but also Mary Magdalene, claiming that the three are actually the same person. The Greek fathers saw the three as distinct persons, and Protestant scholars generally harbor the same suspicions. In Christian tradition the association of Mary of Bethany with these other figures served to heighten her importance as an example of God's forgiveness.

Mary, Virgin

Christian saint

In the Christian scriptures, Mary is the mother of Jesus Christ, having conceived him by the power of the Holy Spirit when she was a virgin. According to the preponderant traditions of Christianity (the Roman Catholic and Orthodox, as well as the pre-Chalcedonian churches), Mary is the holiest human being who has ever lived, apart from her son, who is God incarnate. In the Orthodox churches, her most common title is Panagia, “All-Holy.” She is the most widely invoked of all the Christian saints, with the greatest number of shrines and church dedications. Her intercession with God is considered to be especially effective. The most visited pilgrim shrine in the world is that of Our Lady of Guadalupe in Mexico City. Mary is also venerated in Islam. Although Muslims do not hold the Christian doctrine of the incarnation, the mother of Jesus is regarded in Islam as a figure of exceptional sanctity. There is an extensive account of her in the Qur’an, and Muslims make pilgrimages to sites traditionally associated with her, such as the house at Ephesus, in modern Turkey, where, according to local belief, she lived and died.

Almost nothing is known of the life of Mary in first-century Palestine. The earliest texts to refer to her by name are the three synoptic gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke), with Luke making the most extensive references to her, and Matthew and Luke both giving accounts of the virginal conception (Matt. 1:18–25; Luke 1:26–38). These gospels also mention her presence during Jesus’ ministry. John’s gospel says that “the mother of Jesus” was present at her son’s crucifixion (19:25–27). The book of Acts recounts that she was also among the first members of the Christian community in Jerusalem when the Holy Spirit descended upon them at Pentecost (1:14) following Christ’s ascension into heaven. The Odes of Solomon and the Protevangelium of James, which probably date from the second century, give more details of Mary’s life, including her birth to a couple who had been believed to be infertile, and her giving birth to Christ without loss of her physical virginity. This seems to indicate that Mary was a focus of pious reflection among Christians at a very early period. Other beliefs arose that, by the seventh century, had come to be generally accepted: that she never committed any sins, that at the end of her earthly life, her soul was taken by Christ to heaven, and that her body was thus preserved from corruption. In the Eastern church this event is celebrated as the Feast of the Dormition, or “falling asleep,” and in the West as her Assumption into heaven.

Mary’s status in Christianity is higher than that of other saints—indeed, she is in a category of her own. Although latria, or adoration, is due only to God, and doulia, or veneration, is due to the saints, Mary is honored with hyperdoulia, an exceptional veneration. This is because of her unique role in the work of salvation. God redeemed the world from human sin and from death by means of the incarnation; that is, he took human flesh, thus uniting himself to the whole creation. His human nature came from his mother Mary. Without her, therefore, the world would not have been redeemed in precisely the way it was. Mary’s contribution to the incarnation is both a moral one, since she accepted God’s word and consented to be the mother of Christ, and a physical one, since she conceived and bore the savior of the world. Her sanctity is manifest in both these aspects: Obedience to the will of God is a primary requirement for Christian holiness, and Mary’s cooperation with God’s will led to her being the uniquely sacred vessel who gave her own substance to God’s incarnation on earth.

If the purpose of the Christian life is to attain union with God, then Mary is the person in whom this purpose is most perfectly accomplished. She is uniquely the godbearer, or mother of God, and was thus fully united to God in the flesh, as well as enjoying the greatest possible spiritual union with him. In Latin Christianity, the union between Christ and Mary has sometimes been expressed as a union of wills, or of hearts. Mary’s office as godbearer has led some authors, such as Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), to refer to her as the “bridge” between God and humanity: As God in Christ chose to come to the world through her, so it is right for people to go through her (to ask her prayers) in their approach to God. Many of the Virgin's shrines embody the principle that, as it was her body in which God and humanity were united in Christ, so she remains the meeting place of heaven and earth. Natural formations, such as caves (Covadonga [Asturias, Spain]), springs (Lourdes [Hautes-Pyrénées, France]), bushes (Arazanuz [Euskadi, Spain]), and the sea (Vailankanni [Tamil Nadu]), are favored sites for her cult, suggesting the meeting of two worlds, either because of their wilderness locations or because they apparently provide an opening into concealed places.

An important aspect of Mary's sanctity is her virginity. Since she conceived and bore her son without loss of her virginity, the conception and birth are miraculous. Moreover, the celibate state was valued as a path to holiness from earliest Christian times, and Mary has been seen as an exemplary figure for both male and female ascetics. An unusual feature of Christianity is its promotion of lifelong virginity as a path to perfection for women as well as men, and Mary provides the primary example of such a path. Mary's perpetual virginity (rejected by Protestants) is an image of heaven on earth, since its changelessness recalls and signifies the state of eternity that is characteristic of heaven.

Closely connected to Mary's virginity is her moral purity. The earliest known prayer to the mother of God, a Greek inscription from Egypt (John Rylands Library, Manchester, Gk. 370; c. late third to mid-fifth centuries), describes her as agnia, a word that means "chaste" and is cognate with the word agia, meaning "holy." Even more than the Ark of the Covenant, or the chalice containing the eucharistic blood of Christ, Mary is the sacred vessel par excellence, having borne and given substance to God incarnate. She must therefore be free of all pollution, both physical and moral. Perpetual virginity is part of this, but in the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church and most of the Eastern churches, Mary is also free of any personal sin. In the Catholic Church it is also taught that she was conceived without original sin. This is the state of sin that, according to Western teaching, pertains to all humanity since the fall of Adam, regardless of a person's actual sins. Normally it is removed through baptismal consecration. In the case of Mary, however, the grace that others receive through baptism was given her in the first instant of her conception, which is therefore described as "immaculate" (lit. "stainless"). Images of inviolability, such as "enclosed garden" and "sealed fountain," taken from the Old Testament Song of Songs, were used in the Middle Ages to refer to Mary's miraculous virginity and in the early modern period to her immaculate conception.

The doctrine of Mary's immaculate conception associates her with the holiness of God's creation from before the fall of humankind. The female figure of Holy Wisdom is portrayed in the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus as being present with God from before the foundations of the world, and these texts have been applied to Mary, in liturgy and preaching, since the high Middle Ages. Mary's conception on earth is understood to be the realization of God's plan from all eternity. Her association with the foundations of creation is a frequently recurring theme in the history of Christian devotion and forms a certain parallel to Muslim mystical ideas concerning the prophet Muhammad. It is possible that "black Madonnas" (images of Mary that are black in places where the native population is white), such as those at Le Puy, France, or Tindari, Sicily, signify the blackness of prime matter, the dark waters out of which the world is formed, and this may have some connection with sacred black figures in other traditions, such as the Hindu Kali.

Although Mary does not have the overwhelmingly fierce aspect of Kali, it should be noted that her holiness can stand to condemn as well as to bless. Thus, if she commands that a chapel be built in her honor, she may strike with illness those who fail to carry out her command. More commonly, however, she has been seen as a helper to sinners of every kind, if only they call upon her name.

In recent decades, Catholic theology of Mary has often focused upon her as the perfect disciple of Christ, since she heard God's word and obeyed his will. However, discipleship is not an end in itself but the pathway to ultimate holiness, and the dominant traditions of Marian devotion present her perfect sanctity as exemplifying the attainment of the journey's end.

Mary Magdalene

Christian disciple

In the New Testament Mary Magdalene is one of Christ's most devoted followers. She is most simply represented as the tearful penitent usually associated with the season of Lent, a period of sorrow for one's sins that precedes Easter. The Magdalene's holiness comes from her penitence and charity, remedies for a soul sickened by sin.

Mary Magdalene is the patron saint of sinners, the laity, the physically ill (particularly those with leprosy), and prostitutes. Early Christian legend begins to identify her as the unnamed woman caught in adultery in the Gospel of John, and then as a reformed prostitute. Even as a penitent, Magdalene's sexuality and sensuality often remain among her signature characteristics, represented iconographically by her flowing red hair and luxurious figure or clothing.

The New Testament provides little information about Mary Magdalene. There are perhaps twelve references in the New Testament that are traditionally interpreted as references to her. However, only a small number of these identify the woman in the narrative as Mary of Magdala. She is the woman out of whom Christ cast seven demons (Luke 8:3). All four gospel accounts name her specifically as a woman at Christ's crucifixion or as one of the first of his followers—all women—who learn of the resurrection (Mark 16, Matthew 28, Luke 24, and John 20). Mary Magdalene is also commemorated as a preacher and "apostle to the apostles" because she is charged in these gospel accounts with informing the eleven remaining (male) disciples of Christ's resurrection.

It is the penitent Magdalene rather than the preaching "apostle to the apostles," however, who fills much of Christian exegesis and Western art, liturgy, and literature. The image of the sorrowing Magdalene is related to another, anonymous Mary. In the gospel narrative of Luke 7, an unnamed woman (later identified in Christian tradition as the Magdalene) washes Christ's feet with her tears and dries them with her hair. This woman's tears came to represent the individual Christian—and also the Christian church as a whole—utterly overcome by penitence. In some late medieval and early Renaissance art, the Magdalene's sorrow is increasingly rendered as ecstatic, further conflating the Magdalene's penitence with her sensuality. Mary Magdalene's penitence highlights one of the most elemental conditions for human sanctity in the tradition of Christian thought: a sorrow that allows one to perceive the difference between the human and the divine, and desire to be in the presence of God above all else.

Mary Magdalene's penitence moved her to embrace an eremitical life, an association that originates in another gospel account. A Mary of Bethany chose to sit at Christ's feet instead of tending to household duties as her sister Martha did. Martha complained, but Christ praised Mary for choosing the better path. Thus both Martha and Mary (later identified as the Magdalene) represent two types of lives Christians may lead: "Martha's" life of active service, concerned with the pressures of everyday life, and "Mary's" contemplative life, in which daily activity is organized around a routine of meditation and prayer. During the Middle Ages, many Christian laypeople began experimenting with ways of expressing piety by using a mixture of these two models. The Magdalene not only presents the possibility that the laity can emulate some aspects of the contemplative life but also suggests that penitence be one of the foci for that life.

Mary Magdalene's own "active" life as a woman preaching to the disciples has traditionally been a more troublesome model of holiness for Christian exegetes and church leaders. Lay and religious people in the Middle Ages and early modern Europe knew not only the gospel and legendary accounts of the Magdalene's eremitical life but also legends that depicted the Magdalene preaching to others besides the disciples after Christ's death. Some lay Christians of the later Middle Ages, especially the Lollards in England, argued that preaching could be a legitimate expression of holiness open to the laity in general, or even to women in particular. Such notions defy doctrines limiting preaching and the administration of the sacraments to authorized, male clergy. The Magdalene's example inspired (and continues to inspire) some Christians to challenge established doctrines on gender, social roles, and the scriptural basis for clerical privileges.

Mary of Egypt

Christian legendary hermit

According to the account of the priest-monk Zosimus, who met Mary of Egypt in the desert east of Palestine shortly before she died in the fifth century, Mary had worked as a prostitute in Alexandria from age twelve. Her life's path took a radical turn when she decided to accompany a shipload of pilgrims bound for Jerusalem, offering her professional services in exchange for the cost of her passage. Upon entering the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, she found that an invisible force prevented her from crossing the threshold into the sanctuary. Seeing an image of Mary, she prayed to it, promising to mend her ways if only she would be allowed to enter the church. Her wish granted, Mary walked into the church, praying for direction. Upon leaving, she left the city, crossed the Jordan, and disappeared into the desert, where no one laid eyes on her for forty-seven years.

By the time Zosimus came upon her, Mary was an old woman whose bare skin—covered only by her long hair—had been ravaged by the sun. Against her better judgment, Mary decided to share her story with the man, knowing that she would need a priest to administer the eucharist to her now that she had atoned for her sins. The two agreed that Zosimus should return to administer the sacrament to her on Holy Thursday of the following year. He did just that. But when he returned another year later, he found Mary dead. With the help of a docile lion, the story goes, he buried the holy woman in the desert. He then returned to his monastery and, for the first time, shared his remarkable story. The account became popular in the West as well as in the East over the course of the Middle Ages.

Maryam/Mary

Islamic perspective on the Virgin Mary

The Virgin Mary is known as Sayyidana Maryam (Our Lady Mary) and Batul (the Virgin) in Islam. She figures in seventy verses in the Qur'an, leaving only Moses, Abraham, Noah, and Jesus more extensively narrated. She is the only woman named in the Qur'an and the only woman among eight people whose names appear as chapter titles (Sura Maryam, Chapter 19). The Qur'an asserts that God "made her [Mary] and her son a sign for all peoples" (21:91, 23:50). Mary is described as a woman of truth (Siddiqa, 5:75) and obedience (Qanut, 66:12). The prophet Muhammad named Mary among the holiest women in Islam along with Khadija (his first wife), Asiya (Pharaoh's wife), and Umm Musa (Moses's mother, Qur'an 28:7). To this list the Shi'a add Fatima, the prophet's daughter, who, like Mary, is both a mother and a virgin (batul) and sometimes referred to as "Maryam al-Kubra" (Mary the Greater).

The Qur'an always refers to Jesus as "Jesus, the son of Mary" (Isa ibn Maryam), an idiom suggesting three implications: (1) Mary was the mother of Jesus rather than the "Mother of God" (theotokos), (2) Jesus had no father (3:59), and (3) Jesus especially embodied Mary's distinguishing characteristics of human piety, purity, and prayerfulness. Mary's giving birth to Jesus without either divine or earthly father is explained by analogy to Adam's fatherless birth (3:59). From the cradle, Jesus explains that God has enjoined him to be dutiful and reverent to his mother (19:32).

Many commentators in Islam give the meaning of Mary's name as "the one who worships." A part of a verse about Mary often frames mosque prayer niches (mihrab): "Every time Zakariya [Mary's uncle] went to her in the prayer chamber (mihrab) he found her provided with sustenance" (3:37).

According to the Qur'an, the angels announced to Mary that God "chose," "purified," and "preferred" her above all the women of creation (3:42). The choice of the verb "preferred" links Mary to the prophet Muhammad's title, al-Mustafa, "the Chosen." Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240) compared Mary and Muhammad as both vessels of God's word. The prophet Muhammad affirmed Mary's immaculateness: According to hadith literature, he said, "Satan touches every son of Adam the day his mother bears him, except only Mary and her son." One popular hadith reports that when the prophet Muhammad cleansed the Ka'ba of idols in 630, he preserved the icon of Jesus and Mary.

Since the angel Gabriel appeared and spoke to her, Mary carries the closest possible ranking of any woman in Islam to that of a prophet. However, only a few commentators (for example, Ibn Hazm [d. 1064], Qurtubi [d. 1272], and al-Asqalani [d. 1449]) identify her as a prophet. The injunction, "Commemorate Mary in the Book" (19:16), which is later repeated of Abraham and Moses, and a summary statement in 19:58, further suggest her likeness to a prophet.

The Qur'an also states that Mary gave birth to Jesus after withdrawing from her family to a prayer chamber in the East under the care of her uncle Zakariya (19:16). God sent his Spirit to Mary in the form of a perfect man bringing tidings of a "pure boy" (19:19). Through the angel Gabriel, God "cast" (4:171) or "breathed" (21:91; 66:12) his Spirit into her. Since Mary was at this time fulfilling a vow of a fast of silence to God Most Merciful (19:26), such a fast is called Sawm Maryam, the eponymous "Fast of Mary." It was in si- lence that Mary gave birth to Jesus, the “Word from God” (3:45), and it was in seclusion that she gave birth to a son who so intimately knows and relates to creation (3:49–50).

The postures of Islamic ritual prayer (salat) are more fully described in Mary’s narrative than in any other except that of Abraham and Isma‘il (2:125–128): Zakariya stood in the mihrab (3:39); Mary fulfilled God’s command to prostrate and bow (3:43). Mary’s title qanut (66:12), the “obedient,” connotes enduring long in prayer. Her devotion was so pure that, during her labor pains, she was provided with sustenance from a date palm (which she was instructed to shake to release its dates) and a stream beneath it (19:23–26). Mary is implicitly compared with Muhammad in sharing the distinction of having reached the “farthest place” of prayer (19:22, cf. 17:1). Jaroslav Pelikan (1996) suggests that the motif of Mary withdrawing from her family during pregnancy links Mary to Hagar, the matron of the Arabs.

Mary’s chapter (19) holds an important role in the early history of Islam. When Muhammad sent many of his followers to seek asylum with the monophysite Negus of Abyssinia, it was hearing Sura Maryam recited that moved the monarch to tears, so that after affirming his resonance with their reverence for Mary and Christ, he granted the Muslims refuge.

Mary’s qur’anic appellations, “daughter of Imran” (derived from 3:34), and “sister of Aaron” (19:28), are honorifics that signify metaphorically that Mary descended from the house of Moses. In the past century, the Catholic Church has identified and restored a site in Ephesus, Turkey, which it believes to be the house where Mary lived her last years. Many Catholic scholars have expressed the hope that Mary might be a “bridge-builder” (pontifex) between Muslims and Christians.

Mary/Mama (Mama Matakafu/Mtakafu, Holy Mother Mary)

(c. 1876–1966 C.E.)

Christian prophet, church founder

Cofounder with Baba Messias (Father Messiah) Simeo Ondeto of Legio Maria, sub-Saharan Africa’s largest African-instituted church (AIC), Mary/Mama is considered by Legios to be the Virgin Mary who came to Africa as an old black woman. Some sources claim she really was Mariam Ragot, who founded the Dini ya Mariam (Religion of Mary) in 1952. Some assert she was Margaret Aduwo (Oduor), regarded by most Legios as Ondeto’s foster mother. Some have sought Legio’s “mysterious” Mary in Gaudencia Aoko, Maria Tinga, or other women. Most Legios contend, however, that these women had links to specific lineages, parents, husbands, and children, while the “true Mary,” born to Joachim and Anne among “the white people,” came to Africa “from God,” independent of specific earthly ties and encumbrances.

Many Legios are ex-Roman Catholics, and some avoid mariolatry. Others claim Mary is greater than her son. Some place Mary at creation as a witness, assistant, or cocreator, citing biblical support (for example, Proverbs 8:22–31), and contend that mothers, in heaven and on earth, have more wisdom and power than their children. Those taking this view argue the Bible has “a bibliography,” further materials from the Holy Spirit, showing that Mary surpasses her son. Legios say Ondeto, Legio’s black messiah, told them to honor Mary “more than even himself.”

For many Legios, the “third secret” of the 1917 Marian apparitions at Fatima, Portugal, concerned the coming of Legio and African independence. Rome’s failure to disclose it in 1960, as promised, moved Mary to tell her son that they had to convey Fatima’s message to Africa in the flesh. Colorless in heaven, Mary and her son came to earth on a rainbow. They arrived in different African eras. Mary dropped off the rainbow into Lake Victoria. She emerged from it as a ninety-year-old black woman moving through the past recounted in Luo oral narratives.

Some Legios link Mary to the old woman of the Nilotic “Spear-Bead Quarrel” migration narratives, who lived in the forest amid elephants and had a role in separating battling brothers. She is also associated with the tale about Nyamgondho, a poor fisherman, where an old woman brings Nyamgondho wealth and wives but returns with everything to Lake Victoria when he forgets his promise not to drink alcohol or verbally abuse her and his wives. Moreover, she is the strange old woman who visits the village in the Simbi Nyaima narratives. The village floods and turns into a lake because its inhabitants fail to accord hospitality to her, unaware she had planned to give them the gift of controlling rain. Some linked her to the independent women of the more recent Min Omolo and Obunga narratives.

Legios say Mary returned to the twentieth century to find her son. Some maintain that she inspired several other AICs before finding him, including Zimbabwean Johane Masowe’s Korsten Basketmakers (1932), and the Dini ya Mariam (1952). They believe that when Mary met Simeo Ondeto at Mount Kwer-Kalafare (Calvary) in the early 1960s, she recognized him as her son. Legio then began as an organized movement in Kenya, and Legios insist it was Mary who “introduced the idea” of Legio. Consulting with Ondeto, Mary appointed Timotheo Atila, Legio’s first pope, and organized and laid groundwork for the movement, though she did not move about extensively. Legio faced government opposition at its start, and some Legios maintain that Mary was briefly hospitalized by the government for a broken rib caused by police brutality in clashes at Mt. Kwer-Kalafare, or for a disease that the government alleged she had.

From Mt. Kwer-Kalafare, Mary/Mama reportedly went to live in the church compound built adjacent to the home of Legio Cardinal Karilus Mumbo in Nzoia. She died, or, in Legio terms, “returned to heaven,” at Legio’s Nzoia-Effeso (Ephesus) Mission Church on December 23, 1966. Legios believe that Mary continues to speak through individual Legios to other Legios via glossolalia. Some glossolalia is semantic, approaching mediumship. Legios say Mary sends “telephone calls” and takes “photographs” of Legios from heaven, and that she is interested in contemporary technology.

Masinde, Elijah

Indigenous African/syncretist leader

Few people in Kenya have aroused more controversy than Elijah Masinde, the twentieth-century politico-religious leader of the Dini ya Msambwa. Both the colonial administration and the Kenyan government treated him with contempt. However, to his followers, Masinde was a messiah sent by God to deliver African people spiritually and politically from colonial rule. He did not think that the Western missionaries had taught them anything they did not already know regarding God.

Masinde, born in 1908, encountered Christianity when he attended the Friends Mission School at Kamusinga. He embraced Christianity, but he left the mission when he took a second wife. After that, he worked on the native tribunal court for a short period until he received a dream to start Msambwa. The dream directed him to Mount Elgon, where he reportedly obtained a special message from God to liberate his people from European political, religious, and cultural subordination. He then denounced Christianity as the religion of the imperialists and castigated the missionaries for being an arm of foreign domination and for having taken African land.

According to Masinde, the missionaries perverted Christian teachings by straying from such Old Testament practices as animal sacrifices, circumcision, and polygamy. He revitalized the African beliefs in the ancestors and elevated the concept of creator spirit to a central position, also adopting selectively Christian symbols and practices. From its inception in 1938, the movement instigated a campaign with an aim to destroy the institutions of colonialism. There were assaults on government employees and rampant destruction of government buildings and settler farms. Such lawlessness led to Masinde’s arrest and subsequent commitment to Mathare Mental Health Hospital.

When Kenya attained independence in 1963, Masinde was hopeful that the new president, Jomo Kenyatta, would support him and his movement, but he was soon disappointed. The new government embarked on the project of building a multiracial society and a liberal economy that allowed foreigners and white settlers to remain in the country. In addition, some of the educated Luhya kept a respectable distance from Masinde. In 1968, Attorney General Charles Njonjo declared Dini ya Msambwa an unlawful society, and once again Masinde was forced to operate illegally. When he died on June 8, 1987, the Bukusu rites were performed. The coverage of the death by all the newspapers in the country attracted major attention, and several national dignitaries attended the burial.

Mason, Charles Harrison

Pentecostal Christian preacher, founder

Charles Harrison Mason was a Holiness-Pentecostal preacher who founded and led the second-largest Pentecostal denomination in the world around the turn of the twentieth century. This short, thin, African American man garnered a grand mystical stature over the years through his rhythmic, sonorous sermons and prayers. He was known for touching the infirm and healing them immediately. Mason also kept alive Afro-Christian spirituality and worship forms. Reminiscent of the West African religions of his ancestors, Mason's theology insisted on a spiritual conversion akin to that described in the second chapter of Acts. This, along with his mystical healing and prophetic powers, served to increase his following among African Americans. His charisma also created an interracial following in a segregated society. Because of persecution from other whites, in 1914 many white ministers left the Church of God in Christ with Mason's blessing to form the Assemblies of God.

Charles Harrison Mason was born on September 8, 1866, to Jerry and Eliza Mason on the Prior Farm in Tennessee. During Mason's childhood, African American churches began a process of assimilating to mainstream American Christianity, shedding many of their worship practices and religious ideas, such as spiritual conversion. In the face of this, Mason prayed fervently with his mother, a woman renowned for her long hours of prayer, and asked "above all things for God to give him a religion like the one he had heard about from the old slaves and seen demonstrated in their lives" (Clemmons 1996, 5).

The focus on retaining Afro-Christian spirituality led Mason to join with Charles Price Jones of Mississippi and others in forming the Church of God in 1897. In petitioning the clergy bureau in Washington, D.C., Mason and Jones discovered that other bodies used the names "Church of God" and "Church of Christ." Mason suggested the name Church of God in Christ, citing divine inspiration, and it was accepted.

After Mason and others attended the Pentecostal Azusa Street Revival in Los Angeles in 1907, Jones and Mason split over Mason's insistence on glossolalia as necessary evidence of the full baptism of the Holy Spirit. Mason won rights to the organization's name. As leader, Mason organized and expanded the denomination. In 1961, thousands mourned Mason's death at the Church of God in Christ headquarters, Mason Temple, located in Memphis, where his remains are housed.

Matilda

Matilda was a holy tenth-century German queen who has been venerated since her death on March 14, 968. Renowned for her virtue and piety, she used her position to found important convents at Quedlinburg and Nordhausen, support the church, dispense royal alms to the poor, and seek pardons on behalf of criminals. She is revered as the patron saint of the Ottonian royal dynasty founded by her husband, King Henry I. Henry supported his wife's pious undertakings and, according to the unknown hagiographer who wrote the later version of Matilda's Life in 1002–1003, God repaid them for their good works with five extraordinary children: Otto I, who succeeded his father and cemented the dynasty's reign as elected king in 936 and emperor in 962; Henry, known as "the quarrelsome," duke of Bavaria; Bruno, venerated archbishop of Cologne; Gerberga, who married King Louis IV of France; and Hedwig, mother of Hugh Capet, king and founder of the Capetian dynasty in France. An earlier Life of Matilda written in 974 also portrays their marriage and dynasty as divinely favored.

Daughter of the Saxon count Theodoric, Matilda could trace her noble lineage back to Widukind, the Saxon duke who surrendered to Charlemagne and converted to Christianity in 785. She was raised by her grandmother in the convent of Herford, where she learned needlework and spent many hours dedicated to prayer. Noted for her beauty and modesty as well as her nobility, Matilda caught Henry's attention and it was love at first sight. They were married in 913. According to the later Life, Matilda and Henry ruled with modesty, reason, and virtue and were very happy. However, she would leave her husband's bed to pray during the night, as St. Radegund, the sixth-century Merovingian queen, had done. Often she appeased Henry's anger and sought pardons on behalf of criminals. Together she and Henry planned the convent of Quedlinburg, but he died in 936 before it was completed. Just after his death, she asked a cleric called Adeldach to say a mass for his soul.

Her first action as widow and dowager queen was to finish the foundation of the convent and establish herself as its abbess. Henry's body was moved to Quedlinburg, and Matilda became the caretaker of his body and memory and continued her pious works while looking after the nuns under her care. She founded Nordhausen to celebrate the memory of her family as well. It was not until the death of Henry, her favorite son, that Matilda fully embraced widowhood and dressed without her royal garments. Before she died, she gave her granddaughter Matilda, abbess of Quedlinburg, the responsibility of commemorating the members of her family who had died and praying for their souls. Matilda was venerated as a saint from the moment she died and was buried next to her husband at Quedlinburg.

Matriarchs, Hebrew

The biblical matriarchs of Genesis—Sarah, Rebecca, Leah, and Rachel—are revered as the mothers of the Jewish people, and their lives became models of holiness for future generations. Each matriarch, linked in the biblical narrative to a particular patriarch by kinship and marriage, played a central part in Israel's unfolding destiny.

Sarah (originally Sarai) is first mentioned as the wife of Abraham (originally Abram) in Genesis 11:29; according to Genesis 20:12, she was also his half sister. Genesis 11:30 relates her infertility. Miraculous births to apparently barren women is a recurring theme in these narratives, indicating God's intervention in human history: Sarah was over ninety when she gave birth to Isaac in fulfillment of divine promises (Gen. 17–18). Isaac's wife, Rebecca, Abraham's great-niece, bore twins, Esau and Jacob. The sisters Leah and Rachel married their first cousin Jacob (Gen. 29–35); Leah, the unloved wife, gave birth to six sons and a daughter; the beloved Rachel, the mother of Joseph and Benjamin, died in her second childbirth. Jacob also fathered another four sons with his wives' maidservants, Bilhah and Zilpah; according to ancient Near Eastern custom, these children were seen as offspring of Leah and Rachel.

The authors of Genesis present the four matriarchs as complex individuals who acted in questionable ways to advance their offsprings' interests. Sarah insisted that Ishmael, Abraham's son by her maidservant Hagar, be expelled with his mother from the household, even though Sarah had initiated their relationship as a remedy for her own childlessness (Gen. 21). Rebecca deceived Isaac to ensure that her younger son, Jacob (later renamed Israel), would receive both the blessing of the firstborn and his brother's birthright from his blind father (Gen. 24–25). The rejected Leah and the long barren Rachel are portrayed as living in an environment of favoritism, envy, and resentment. Nevertheless, in the biblical context these women's actions, however ambiguous, were essential elements in advancing the history of the Jewish people according to divine plan.

Postbiblical rabbinic Judaism celebrates Sarah's virtues as the mother of the Jewish people, praising her modesty, beauty, and prophetic abilities (Babylonian Talmud, Baba Metzia 87a, Yebamot 77a; Megillah 14a, 15a); her ungenerous behavior to Hagar is said to have been justified by Hagar's arrogance (Genesis Rabbah 45:5, 53:15). Similarly, Rebecca is lauded for her loveliness, kindness, and prophetic insight; her preference for Jacob is attributed to her recognition of his piety in contrast to Esau's essential wickedness (Genesis Rabbah 63:10, 65:6). Some interpretive traditions about Rachel and Leah depict these sisters as exemplifying female friendship, despite biblical evidence to the contrary (Genesis Rabbah 71:8). However, the generally affirmative view of Rachel does not always carry over to Leah, the less loved of Jacob's wives, who is criticized for participating in the deception of her husband (Gen. 29) and for her brazenness in sexually soliciting him (Gen. 30). Some traditions suggest that Leah's daughter Dinah's questionable conduct in going out to visit the daughters of Canaan in Genesis 34, which resulted in her ruin, was not surprising given the inappropriate behavior of her mother (Genesis Rabbah 80:1).

In Jewish women's prayers from early modern Europe, the merits of the matriarchs were frequently invoked by female worshippers to hasten the Jewish people's redemption. These vernacular supplications (tkhines in Yiddish) were intended for female use both in synagogue worship and in individual rituals. Prayers to be recited on occasions such as baking sabbath loaves or visiting the ritual bath often imagined the matriarchs as participating in and sanctifying these same activities, a reinforcement of traditional female roles that afforded both dignity and holiness to women's everyday lives.

Traditionally, Judaism understood communal participation in daily prayer as obligatory only for men, and the Hebrew liturgy, oriented toward male worshippers, included numerous references to the patriarchs but not to their wives. In recent decades, with increased female involvement in communal worship and the ordination of women as rabbis and cantors, numerous liturgical changes have been undertaken in all branches of Judaism except for Orthodoxy. Among many gender-sensitive innovations, Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist prayer books now incorporate invocations to the matriarchs along with the patriarchs in the Amidah, or “standing” prayer, the central core of all Jewish religious services. In this way the community of worshippers acknowledges the mothers as well as the fathers of the Jewish people.

Maubeuge Cycle Saints

Christian saintly family

Three generations of noble Frankish landholders in seventh-century Neustria produced a remarkable cluster of eleven Christian saints. They stemmed from St. Waldebert, a royal official in 626–627, and St. Bertilia (sister of Gundeland, mayor of the palace 613–639, and the warrior Landeric). Their younger daughter, St. Aldegunde, rejected marriage to found the abbey of Maubeuge in about 660–665. Their elder daughter, St. Waldetrude, married St. Vincent Madalgar, son of Madalbold and a commoner, Onnoguera (an unusually low status in Frankish hagiography). Madalgar retired to monastic life at Hautmont in about 657 and later founded the abbey of Soignies. Waldetrude founded the convent of Sainte-Waudru around 656–660 at Mons, the capital of Hainaut. Both foundations eventually became collegiate churches.

Hainaut’s medieval rulers revered Waldetrude as the county’s patron saint, believing that she had been their collateral ancestress and “duchess of Lotharingia.” Her children with Madalgar were St. Landeric, who became abbot of Soignies; St. Dentelin, who died in infancy; and Sts. Madaltrude and Aldetrude, who both became abbesses of Maubeuge. Waldetrude’s niece St. Aye later ruled her convent of Sainte-Waudru. Aye’s husband, St. Hidulf, died in 707 after becoming a monk.

The Roman calendar omitted some of these saints because they were canonized locally at a time when Christian bishops sanctified holy people in response to popular devotion simply by raising their relics before an altar. But the Bollandists recognized them all in the Acta Sanctorum. Taken serially, their prose biographies resemble narratives in secular medieval poem cycles, the epic chansons de geste. Therefore, hagiographers often call these saints’ Lives collectively the “Maubeuge Cycle,” after Aldegunde’s abbey. Apart from Aldegunde’s visions, recorded in 684 soon after she died, the cycle’s surviving works were written long after the seventh century. These Lives present their heroes and heroines as loving spouses and parents, saintly children, eminent soldiers, royal officers, holy visionaries, and pious abbots and abbesses, all of whom befriend good kings, caring bishops, and other holy people. Probably first transmitted orally, and often reworked, like epic narratives their biographies blend fact with fiction and myth in a contemporary context.

Church and altar dedications and Internet sites recognize all these saints. But only three Maubeuge Cycle saints are still objects of popular devotion. In Belgium, citizens of Mons honor Waldetrude and parade her relics on Trinity Sunday, while Vincent Madalgar’s devotees are centered in Soignies. Aldegunde’s widespread votaries reverence her in ancient Lotharingian territories in northern France, Belgium, and the Rhine valley.

Maurice (Mauritius)

(d. c. 287 C.E.)

Christian soldier, martyr

Although Maurice has now sunk into relative obscurity, he was the most important military saint in Europe during the early Middle Ages, and he later rather curiously underwent a transformation from Caucasian to African. Maurice was a Roman military commander in charge of the Theban Legion in the third century. He and his men were massacred at Agaune-en-Valais in Switzerland in about 287 because of their Christian beliefs. Little else is known about Maurice, although much later and unlikely elaborations of his legend mention his baptism by St. Erasmus, a meeting with Pope Marcellinus, and a reputed sister, St. Fidis. His cult spread quickly, moving south into Savoy, west into France, and particularly into Germany. The cathedrals of Vienne, Tours, and Angers were all dedicated to him. Agaune became a substantial pilgrimage site, and by 672, St. Maurice was acknowledged as the patron of the Burgundian kingdom and eventually of the Merovingian dynasty. An important monastery of St. Maurice was founded at Niederaltaich in Bavaria by Duke Odilo in 741.

Maurice was regarded as the patron saint of the western imperial army from Carolingian times, invoked before campaigns for protection and victory. In about 960, the German emperor Otto I acquired relics of Maurice and translated them to a new monastery in Magdeburg, which in 967 became the seat of an archbishopric. Otto made Maurice the patron of his whole empire, and Magdeburg became a second focus of his veneration. Maurice's lance became identified with the Holy Lance with which Longinus had pierced Christ's side on the cross, and it became part of the coronation regalia of the Holy Roman emperors, along with the sword with which Maurice was beheaded.

The eleventh century was the high point of imperial interest in Maurice, but he remained an important force in Magdeburg throughout the Middle Ages. The cult declined in France from the eleventh century, but King Louis IX revived interest in it, acquiring relics from Agaune and, in 1264, dedicating a chapel to St. Maurice in his palace at Senlis. In the fifteenth century, two orders of chivalry were dedicated to him: the Order of the Crescent, founded by King René of Anjou, and the Order of St. Maurice in Savoy. Albert of Brandenburg (archbishop of Magdeburg, 1513–1541) propagated spurious legends about Maurice to enhance his monomaniacal relic collection, but interest in Maurice was even then on the decline. His feast day is still celebrated by the Roman church on September 22.

Maurice was particularly venerated by the nobility, and he was also recognized as a patron saint by knights and soldiers, including the papal Swiss guard, and by weavers and dyers, clothiers, launderers, and glass painters. His relics were considered efficacious against gout and demonic possession, and in Venezuela he is still invoked against locusts. A statue in Magdeburg Cathedral, made c.1240, is the first depiction of St. Maurice as a black African. Fanciful etymologies of his name may have been behind this curious change of identity. Black images of St. Maurice were rare before the fifteenth century and were limited to parts of the Holy Roman Empire.

Maximus Confessor (Maximus the Theologian)

Christian monk, theologian, martyr

The "father of Byzantine theology," Maximus was born in about 580 to a prominent family in Constantinople. Maximus clearly had an excellent education, but not until his early thirties is something definitively known about the course of his life. By about 618, Maximus had resigned his position in the imperial chancery and entered the monastery at Chrysopolis (outside Constantinople), eventually to become its abbot. Within a few years of that removal, seeking more ascetical devotion, Maximus joined the monastery of St. George at Cyzicus (modern Erdek).

While at Cyzicus, Maximus began to write, including compositions on the spiritual life such as Centuries on Love. Soon driven to flight by a Persian invasion, Maximus settled in North Africa and soon became the disciple of St. Sophronius, who was elected as patriarch of Jerusalem in 634. While in Carthage, Maximus composed the bulk of his theological writings, at the center of which was his persistent defense of orthodox christology in the face of numerous heterodox teachings on the personhood and true nature of Jesus Christ. Maximus considered the incarnation the pivotal event in human—and universal—history. In this regard, Maximus was especially vocal in his opposition to the heresy of monothelism, which insisted on the singularity of the will and energy of Christ: one person, one will, one nature, joined in a perfect union. Maximus considered strongly that a denial of the duality of the wills and energies of the Christ was untenable because it would necessarily threaten the salvation of the very human will of collective humanity.

Maximus's stand against monothelism won him imperial disapproval, since the emperor forbade all discussion of the topic. Maximus was arrested by imperial command in 653, but he was sent to Constantinople by 655 since he was widely understood to be the spiritual leader of Eastern Christendom. A transcript of his first trial indicates that Maximus was accused of having engaged consistently in rebellion against the imperial will by plotting against the emperor and refusing to be silent concerning the orthodox teachings on the wills and energies of Christ. The trial transcript reads, in part, “Then casting himself upon the ground with tears, the servant of God [i.e., Maximus] said, ‘Let not the good and pious lord be offended by my lowliness. I cannot grieve God by keeping silent about what he ordered us to speak and to confess’” (Maximus Confessor 1985, 24). Maximus also insisted, despite repeated tortures, that the emperor had no authority to address or to direct dogmatic and theological matters.

Maximus was condemned to exile in Bizya, Thrace (now on the border of Turkey and Bulgaria), but with no provisions or means of assistance. At that time, Maximus was seventy-five years old. Cold and hunger plagued Maximus, as well as frequent visits by bishops and consuls sent by command of the emperor to compel the suffering monk to recant his rejection of the imperial will and to cease his defense of the unified church. Maximus refused, and in 662 he was again on trial, along with his disciples, in Constantinople. At this trial, Maximus was anathematized and mutilated: His tongue and his right hand were cut off. Maximus was then sent into exile again, this time to Lazica on the Black Sea, and there he died on August 13, 662. His death went unmourned by any official authority; however, at the sixth ecumenical council in Constantinople in 680, his teaching on the two wills in Christ, the doctrine for which he had been tortured and died, and for which he rightly was accorded the epithet “Confessor” (of the true teachings of the Christian faith), was formally accepted.

Mayer, Rupert

Roman Catholic priest

Rupert Mayer, Jesuit priest, pastor, and opponent of the Nazis, was beatified by the Roman Catholic Church in 1987. Rupert was born in Stuttgart on January 23, 1876. He studied philosophy in Freiburg (Switzerland) and Munich and theology in Tübingen. In 1899, he was ordained a Catholic priest, and in 1900 he entered the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). As a Jesuit he first worked as a traveling preacher in Germany, the Netherlands, and Switzerland. He joined the military chaplaincy in 1914, serving on the fronts in France, Poland, and Romania. He was among the very few military chaplains awarded the Iron Cross. In 1916, his leg was shattered and had to be amputated. For his convalescence he returned to Munich.

In 1921, Mayer was appointed director of the Marian Sodality in Munich, an organization for active Catholic laymen, and under his leadership its membership surpassed 7,000. His sermons from the 1920s and 1930s reveal a passionate concern for the social ills that were giving rise to extremist party politics in Germany. He attended meetings of the Communists and the National Socialists (Nazis) for the sake of debate. Mayer decided more quickly than others that Nazism and Christianity were fundamentally incompatible. Because of his sermons against Nazism, the Gestapo arrested Mayer several times for “misuse of the pulpit” beginning in 1937. He continued preaching despite a government prohibition. The Gestapo decided to remove him from Munich in 1940 and sent him to the concentration camp at Sachsenhausen. The frequent arrests and imprisonments, however, had left the sixty-four-year-old war hero weak, and lest he become a martyr by dying in Nazi custody, the Gestapo put him under house arrest in Kloster Ettal, an isolated monastery in southern Bavaria.

In May 1945, U.S. troops liberated Mayer and the other Kloster Ettal prisoners. He returned to pastoral duties in Munich. While celebrating mass on November 1, 1945, Mayer suffered a fatal heart attack. He was initially buried in the Jesuit cemetery outside of Munich, but with great solemnity his body was transferred in 1948 to the crypt of the Bürger-saal in the center of Munich, the principal church of the Marian Sodality. Pope John Paul II beatified Mayer on November 3, 1987. His tomb has been the most active religious site in Munich ever since.

Mazu (Ma-tsu)

Buddhist monk

As a famous Chan Buddhist monk, Mazu, whose name means “horse,” was a member of the same lineage as the sixth patriarch Huineng (638–713) of the third generation. When his master asked him early in his career why he sat in meditation, Mazu replied that he wanted to become a buddha. Thereupon, his master picked up a tile and started rubbing it on a stone in front of the hermitage. Mazu asked him what he was doing, and the master replied that he was attempting to make a mirror. When Mazu inquired about how this was possible, the master countered with his own question about how it was possible to become a buddha by sitting in meditation. This anecdote suggests that a person cannot purify or polish oneself to create an enlightened being if the buddha-nature is not originally present.

Mazu was later to refine the trigger mechanism for sudden enlightenment by pioneering several unusual teaching methods. He was, for instance, the first master to ask a novice an unanswerable question. While the novice struggled for an answer, Mazu would shout at him in order to jolt the student into a nondualistic state of mind. Mazu also used physical violence, and he encouraged a spirit of violence and fearlessness in his students. He combined the use of such methods with a simplified notion of enlightenment, which he defined as seeing into one's own nature, that is, achieving an intuitive understanding of the self.

In order to gain this type of awareness, a person must master self-control, a process that Mazu often referred to as herding an ox, a metaphor for the uncontrollable aspects of human nature. The herding of the ox did not involve making value judgments or following rules; it meant doing what seemed most rewarding at a particular moment. He was pleased, for example, when a disciple explained how he pulled the figurative ox by its nostrils when it began to overindulge itself. For Mazu, there was nothing abstract about a simple physical action that stressed a natural and simple activity.

This kind of simplicity was turned against Mazu when he returned to his native village for a visit. When he arrived, the villagers welcomed him warmly, with the exception of an old woman, who was his next-door neighbor while he was young. She came to see what all the commotion was about and was disappointed to discover that it was nothing more than the son of what she called the garbage cleaner. Nonetheless, Mazu exerted a strong influence on the Chan tradition.

Mbatiany

Maasai prophet

Mbatiany, born in about 1824, was one of the most renowned Maasai iloibonok (prophet-diviners; oloiboni, singular) in East Africa. He lived in northern Tanzania and is remembered by many Maasai for presiding over the time of their greatest prosperity and unity, attributed, in great part, to his spiritual authority and leadership. After his father Supeet's death in the mid-nineteenth century, Mbatiany became the major oloiboni (oloiboni kitok) of the Purko and Kisongo sections of southern Maasai and led the ilmurran (junior men, usually glossed as "warriors") in the successful defeat of the Laikipiak section of Maasai.

Because of his tremendous spiritual powers and following, Mbatiany was considered by the British to be the "chief" of the Maasai. He is perhaps most famous for his prophecy that accurately foretold the decimation of Maasai cattle herds by disease (rinderpest), followed by the coming of the British: "A disease will destroy the herds of cattle and a civil war between the parties of Lenana and Senteu will thin the ranks of the warriors. Then will a white hawk approach from the coast and settle in our land and deliver us from the edge of ruin. But after this time of testing, the Maasai people will have new blood and their old power" (Bernsten 1979, 289).

According to Maasai traditions, Mbatiany went insane toward the end of his life because of a curse by his brother Mako. He abandoned his family and wandered alone in the plains. His madness only increased his spiritual powers and reputation as a prophet, and people thought of him as a "child of Eng'ai" (a Maasai divinity). Now that he had completely forsaken the secular world around him, he was completely open to Eng'ai's power and visions. Some reported that he could even "infuse dry dust with his power and give that dust to warriors as a charm for their success" (Bernsten 1979, 289).

Unfortunately, upon Mbatiany's death in 1889, two of his sons, Lenana and Sendeu, fought over the right to inherit his position. Their rivalry provoked violent confrontations between their followers, and eventually they became the chief iloibonok for different territorial sections of Maasai.

Mbona

African mythical martyr

In southern Malawi, the mythical martyr Mbona is the object of veneration of a territorial cult possibly going back to the sixteenth century. According to Mang'anja oral tradition, Mbona, which could be translated as "the seer" or "the overseer," was a gifted rainmaker who undermined authority and had to flee for his life. After a number of miraculous events (for example, making a well in a rock and being invulnerable to iron weaponry), he sacrificed himself, leaving directions for the founding of a cult. His story, paralleling the life of Christ, has caused Mbona since the advent of Christianity to be recast as the Black Jesus. At its peak, the cult drew people far into present-day Mozambique and Zambia.

A sacred grove in Khulubvi, Nsanje district, is the center of the cult. Here, a shrine stands where Mbona's decapitated head supposedly lies buried. A number of officials reside in the grove and look after the shrine, bringing offerings at times of drought and other calamities. Living at some distance, the chief of the Tengani presides over the rebuilding of the shrine when the need arises. The ultimate responsibility for the cult lies with the Lundu paramount, who is to provide Mbona with a "wife." This elderly woman, called Salima, lives in Khulubvi and communicates Mbona's wishes received through dreams and possession. An outside medium may also perform this function, and local chiefs have subsidiary shrines.

The Mbona cult is an adaptation of the Chisumphi cult found among related Maravi peoples. Mbona, who was introduced as a mediator to the high God Chisumphi, is a transformation of the beheaded snake of central African mythology. Mbona can appear in the guise of a python. The adaptation was part of the process of centralization under the Lundu in the early seventeenth century. By replacing cult leadership and ritual innovation, the incoming political elite aimed to gain control over the cult, which was a political stronghold for the autochthonous population. The existence of a spirit medium nevertheless left some room for popular critique on leadership.

In the wide corpus of Mbona myths, three distinct traditions can be discerned. These traditions differ with regard to place of initial departure, the identity of Mbona's adversary, Mbona's social status, and the political organization at the time of events. The streams reflect spatial and professional proximity to the Khulubvi shrine. Moreover, the traditions are thought to have originated at various stages of political centralization.

During the course of its existence the cult has shown considerable resilience. After the decline of the Lundu kingdom in the eighteenth century, the shrine was reduced in importance. In the 1860s, the Portuguese slaver Mariano even ransacked Khulubvi. The cult's centralization and Mbona as a Black Jesus contribute to its present-day survival. With the installation of a new Lundu paramount in 2002, the cult is even expected to regain importance.

McKenna, Terence

Psychedelic researcher

An American ethnobotanist, writer, lecturer, and psychedelic researcher, Terence McKenna is a good example of an American holy person of New Age spirituality. Born in Hotchkiss, Colorado, in 1946, he was influenced in his youth by the psychedelic works of English novelist Aldous Huxley, including The Doors of Perception (1954) and its sequel, Heaven and Hell (1956). Matriculating at Berkeley in 1965, he later graduated with a distributed degree in ecology, resource conservation, and shamanism. In 1971, McKenna and his brother Dennis (a neurobiologist) led an expedition to La Chorrera in the Colombian Amazon basin and conducted a series of experiments with psilocybin mushrooms and the psychotropic plant ayahuasca. His discoveries in the Amazon led to a lifelong personal engagement with entheogenic (god-manifesting) plants and laid the foundation for a public career as a spokesman for the psychedelic movement.

In the early 1980s, McKenna acquired a reputation on the West Coast as a spellbinding lecturer, mesmerizing packed auditoriums with eclectic "rants" on mathematics, history, philosophy, and shamanism. In the 1990s, his popularity spread on the basis of an energetic speaking agenda, including appearances on nationally syndicated radio, as well as the publication of a series of books (The Archaic Revival, Food of the Gods, True Hallucinations, The Invisible Landscape) that quickly became cult classics. Pioneer psychedelic guru Timothy Leary, several years before his own death in 1996, referred to McKenna as the "Timothy Leary of the Nineties.” Although never as publicly divisive or politically controversial as Leary, McKenna’s ability to provide articulate explanations of the anthropological, historical, and religious significance of hallucinogenic drugs brought the psychedelic movement to maturity in the 1990s and wedded it to new technologies such as the Internet and virtual reality.

Among McKenna’s original contributions to late twentieth-century consciousness are “Novelty Theory,” an application of A. N. Whitehead’s philosophy of organism to the findings of psychedelic research, and the “Timewave Theory,” a unique and complex interpretation of the Daoist classic I Ching that locates the eschaton (end of history) on December 21, 2012, a date coinciding with the Mayan calendar’s “world age shift.” McKenna also introduced the term “Archaic Revival,” referring to a civilization-wide psychedelic impulse that he believed would bring the modern industrial world back into contact with humanity’s oldest religions. As an ethnobotanist, McKenna was a pioneer in cataloging the medicinal properties of plants of the Amazon basin and helped establish Botanical Dimensions, a Hawaii-based project that rescues and preserves endangered medicinal plants. In 1999, he was diagnosed with brain cancer, and after months of various treatments, he succumbed in April 2000.

Mechtild of Hackeborn

Christian nun, mystic

Mechtild of Hackeborn, born Matilda von Hackeborn-Wippra in 1241, whose mystical visions make up the Liber specialis gratiae (The book of special grace), took up residence in the monastery at Rodarsdorf, Germany, at the age of seven; her sister Gertrude of Hackeborn (1232–1292) was already a nun there. She joined the Cistercian convent at seventeen, about the same time Gertrude became abbess of the community and moved it to Helfta near Eisleben in Saxony. Mechtild of Hackeborn and Gertrude the Great (1256–1302) lived at Helfta during the same period, and they are both remembered for their mystical writings and for the development of the cult of the Sacred Heart at Helfta. Catholics venerate Mechtild as a saint for her visions and for her association with devotion to the Sacred Heart.

Mechtild was a teacher at the convent school as well as a singer and choir mistress. The convent under Abbess Gertrude was recognized for its emphasis on education and on the intellectual and spiritual development of the nuns. Besides her reputation as a teacher and singer, Mechtild’s accessibility to the other women of her community, as well as to friars, priests, and laypeople, added to her renown as a trusted counselor. In her visions and prayers she often asked questions and sought advice for the benefit of and with concern for others.

Mechtild’s association with the cult of the Sacred Heart is also connected with her visions. According to her revelations, contemplation on the wound in Jesus’ side led directly to seeing the Sacred Heart of Christ depicted as a house or shelter and a place of refuge. Although this was not a new idea, Mechtild’s and Gertrude the Great’s visions and writing helped to develop the concept. Some scholars suggest that Mechtild of Hackeborn was the model for Florentine writer Dante Alighieri’s (1265–1321) character Matelda in his Purgatorio, Cantos 26 and 27.

Mechtild of Hackeborn died in around 1298, and her feast day is celebrated on February 26 and 27.

Meditation and Holy People

Meditation or contemplation, focusing of one’s thoughts, is a very powerful tool for spiritual development, one that many holy people have perfected to a high degree. This is especially true of the religions of Asia, which have developed systems to teach meditation and have given it a central position in religious discipline. In a less formalized fashion, however, other religions have recognized the meditative abilities of some of their holy people. In Christianity, this is more likely to take the form of “contemplative prayer,” prayer so focused that the practitioner effectively cancels out all distractions of the surrounding world.

The essential purpose of religious meditation is to link the soul to the divine. The most complete system for doing so is Hindu yoga, which is literally a “yoke” intended to unite these two elements with the use of carefully controlled body positions and breathing techniques while practicing meditation. It should be noted that yoga concentrates on the soul of the practitioner rather than on an external god. Buddhist meditation similarly focuses on liberating the soul from the constraints of this world. It was through meditation under the bodhi tree that the Buddha attained awakening, and meditation has been regarded as the main tool to win awakening ever since. This focus on the soul of the individual marks Hindu and Buddhist meditational practice as essentially different from the Judeo-Christian tradition. In Jewish Kabbalah, as formulated especially by Isaac Luria (1534–1572), the world is full of “divine sparks” that became scattered when the vessels containing primordial divine light were shattered. It is the duty of human beings to help bring the sparks together again, through prayer and meditation as well as by keeping divine law. More generally, Christians, Jews, and Muslims meditate to try to reach a point of contact with God, rather than to change their souls by their own efforts.

Successful meditation by a true adept has been regarded in many religions as an essential separation from the constraints of the body. Especially pervasive are stories that people in deep meditation can levitate, a belief that runs through Europe and Asia. A noted example is the Christian saint Joseph of Copertino (1603–1663), who had so many levitational experiences that he is now the patron saint of astronauts. Belief that such experiences occur is so common in Buddhism that there is a standard list of supernatural results of meditation: (1) magical powers, (2) clairaudience, (3) knowing others’ minds, (4) clairvoyance, (5) ability to recall details of former existences, and (6) “knowledge of the extinction of defilements.” Teachers have warned their disciples not to become puffed up over such paranormal experiences as clairvoyance or other supernatural abilities. They are indeed only the first stage of spiritual development, and in turn have to be eliminated before one can reach true enlightenment. Some of the greatest Buddhist holy people, such as the Tibetan Gampopa (1079–1153), are so regarded because of their ability to guide others in meditation. The Chan/Zen school of Buddhism, established by Bodhidharma in the sixth century, emphasizes motionless seated meditation as the key to enlightenment.

Bodhidharma practiced what he preached. Legend tells that he sat motionless before a wall for nine years to perfect his meditation skills, during which time he not only cut off his eyelids to keep himself from falling asleep but had his legs wither away from disuse. Such superhuman feats of meditation form an important part of Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain legend. The Hindu legendary figure Valmiki, credited with authorship of the Ramayana, was a robber before he devoted himself to Rama. So he did penance, meditating for so long that ants built a hill around him, leaving only his eyes visible; the name Valmiki is derived from the word for an anthill. The twenty-third Jain tirthankara (ford-maker), Parshva, was similarly credited with astonishing powers of concentration. His enemy tried everything to try to keep him from attaining enlightenment, finally creating a great flood. Even then, Parshva did not lose his concentration, continuing to meditate even when the water was up to his nose. In more recent times, it is told of the Hindu Sadashiva Brahmendra (c. 1700) that once a shifting riverbed covered him with sand while he was meditating without disturbing him. Popular belief in the extraordinary staying power of meditation masters can perhaps best be seen in the case of Zhabs Drung, a Buddhist who became political as well as religious leader of Bhutan. He probably died in 1651, but his death was concealed from the public by the claim that he was simply in a meditational trance—until 1705! The Christian tradition, however, maintains that contemplation cannot be maintained for long periods, the divine vision being too great to be sustained while in mortal form. Sometimes criticism of excessive meditation also appears in the Eastern religions, as in the case of Ramakrishna (1836–1886), who was once in a trance for six months, until finally Kali came to him in a vision and ordered him to settle for a more normal state of consciousness.

Several modern holy people are especially noted for their efforts to spread meditation practices to the populace at large. Notable among them are the Christian Thomas Merton (1915–1968), whose central message was the centrality of contemplation in the Christian life, and Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982), the great reviver of meditation in Theravada Buddhism.

Mediterranean Religions of Antiquity and Holy People

The pre-Christian Mediterranean world covered a wide geographical area and a multiplicity of cultures, languages, and religious practices. Therefore it is no surprise that conceptions of individuals thought worthy of veneration or of those thought to be conduits to the divine are equally varied. In general, the major social function of religious practice in this region was the reinforcement of ethnic identity and community solidarity. Thus with rare exceptions, ancient Mediterranean religious traditions tended to discourage living individuals whose special sense of “otherness” set them apart from the group. Nor was holiness a state to be achieved by special study or lifestyle. Particularly in Greek and Roman religious practice, priesthoods were normally civic offices held by elected officials as part of their administrative duties for a specific term; priests were not distinguished by expectations of exemplary conduct.

Certain patterns of individual sanctity can, however, be observed. The institution of kingship tended to be imbued with spiritual authority, and numerous rulers carried a strong aura of personal sanctity, both during their lives and after their death. Certain private individuals were regarded as especially great and powerful because of some extraordinary activity or skill, and their tombs could form a special locus of the divine for an entire community. The rise of philosophy as a guide for living created more abstract notions of the divine not centered on traditional religious cults of deities; as a result, the founders or chief practitioners of influential philosophical schools were much revered as models of an exceptional life. Although there are many ways in which concepts of holiness in the Mediterranean through the 3,000 years of antiquity overlap from one area to another, in general these concepts can be traced separately, by region, in chronological progression. The three main regions are the ancient Near East, Greece, and Rome.

The Ancient Near East

In the ancient Near East, here defined as Egypt and the states of western Asia, the most influential spiritual systems were those rooted in local tradition and local practice; they often predated the power of the ruling state and probably had more impact on the life of the average person. Religious systems could, however, also be an extension of the state, and this encouraged a sense of holiness in the monarchy. This concept was most marked in Egypt, where the institution of divine kingship emerged, along with the development of a central unified Egyptian state, in the late fourth millennium B.C.E. and continued until the absorption of Egypt into the Roman Empire. Each Egyptian king, or pharaoh, was worshipped as a god in his lifetime and, in theory at least, enjoyed perpetual cult after his death. The elaborate burial complexes of the pharaohs, with their provision for continuing worship, are a direct result of this belief.

Although all Egyptian rulers claimed divine status, one New Kingdom pharaoh, Akhenaten (r. 1367–1347 B.C.E.), used this ideology to create his own definition of divinity and reshape the ruler’s position in it. Akhenaten claimed that the only true divinity was the Aten, or sun disk, and that only the divine ruler (i.e., himself) could communicate directly with the Aten. This ideology formed a major challenge to the long-established regional and state cults of Egyptian religion and therefore met with considerable resistance. After Akhen-aten’s death, the cult of the Aten was banned and traditional Egyptian cults were reinstated. Scholarly opinion is still divided on the motives of Akhenaten’s actions—that is, whether he was a serious religious reformer or an egomaniac trying to force all religious attention on himself. It is clear, however, that his efforts were unsuccessful. The tradition of the divine kingship functioning amid a large number of regional cults was maintained until the death of the last Egyptian ruler, Cleopatra VII (r. 51–30 B.C.E.).

In western Asia, the pattern of competing political powers inevitably means that the religious picture is much more varied. Religious practices tended to center on regional loyalties, and only rarely did specific individuals stand out as having a special status with the divine. One who did is the early Mesopotamian king Naram-Sin (r. c. 2250–2220 B.C.E.), fourth king of Akkad, the first state to weld all of Mesopotamia into a unified kingdom. Naram-Sin was the first Mesopotamian ruler to claim the status of divinity and demand personal worship, probably in an effort to enhance his own attempts to consolidate his hegemony. This seems to have been an effort limited to one individual and was rarely repeated. Indeed, the collapse of the Akkadian kingdom at the hands of the Gutis was later ascribed to Naram-Sin’s arrogance in claiming divine rule.

One individual who framed his spiritual identity outside of royal power was Zarathustra (Zoroaster). He is a shadowy figure whose dates (probably during the early first millennium B.C.E.) and place of birth (probably in eastern Iran) remain uncertain. Zarathustra argued that the world was divided into a competitive dualism between good and evil, in which an ethical life was necessary for good to triumph. Good was represented by the principal divinity, Ahura Mazda. Zarathustra also taught that earth, fire, and water were sacred, and he mandated exposure as the means for disposal of the dead. The immediate reaction to his religious system is unknown, although it is likely that acceptance of his teachings meant the abandonment of local polytheistic cults and their influence on regional Iranian groups. Zarathustra’s teachings exercised an enormous influence on the kings of the Persian Empire, sixth through fourth centuries B.C.E., and became even more dominant during the Sassanian Empire, second through sixth centuries C.E.

The Greek World

In the Greek city-state, or polis, the emphasis on religious cult as a means of reinforcing traditional loyalties to families and political groups meant that living individuals rarely sought special veneration. Such status could, however, be given to them through divine selection. Prophets were believed to be able to communicate with the gods because of divinely inspired gifts. The most revered prophets, such as Calchas and Mopsus, belonged to the mythical past, although there were historical examples, including the Pythia, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi. The Pythia priestesses took the position of oracle of Apollo for life and were consulted on a wide range of subjects by many people in the society from the eighth century B.C.E. to the third century C.E. A strong sense of holiness could also be attached to extraordinarily talented or influential individuals after their death, and their presence, usually associated with their tombs or their remains (actual or imputed), exerted a considerable impact on both civic and private religious practice. The cult of the powerful dead, known as hero cult, is one of the key features of Greek religious practice. Despite claims for the great antiquity of this practice, the hero cult does not appear in the Greek world until the development of the polis in the eighth century B.C.E.

Heroes could take many forms. Several of those venerated were prominent figures of Greece's mythical past, including great warriors of the Trojan War and other putative ancestors. Every major athletic festival, including the Olympic Games, was ascribed to the cult of a hero. Other heroes were thought to enhance a city's military or political situation. The kings of Sparta regularly brought the Dioskouroi, the twins Castor and Polydeuces, into battle with them (Herodotos 5.75). When a specific crisis threatened, a hero could be invoked and his remains transported to his ancestral city in order that he might provide benefits. In a telling instance, an oracle ordered the polis of Sparta to seek the bones of Orestes, son of the Trojan War leader Agamemnon, and rebury them in Sparta in order to gain the hero's aid in a war with a neighboring city. After various false moves, a skeleton identified as that of Orestes was located and transported to Sparta, whereupon the Spartans' military position improved substantially (Herodotos 1.67–68). A hero's cult could also be instituted in return for help already rendered. During the battle of Marathon in 490 B.C.E., several Athenians claimed that their cause was aided by the ghost of the much revered early Athenian king Theseus, who led the charge against the Persians. After their victory, the Athenians sought and obtained the bones of Theseus, which they reburied in the city center, making the hero's grave into an important civic shrine (Plutarch, Life of Theseus, 35–36). Several anonymous tombs were identified as the burial places of heroes, and the cult offerings placed there were intended to ensure a hero's continued presence and protection. The relics of a hero were clearly a powerful talisman, a valued aid in a Greek city-state's efforts to assert its identity and independence.

The status of hero could be applied to the recently dead also. Virtually all Greek colonies, that is, newly founded Greek cities outside of Greece, honored the original leader of the colonial expedition, whose tomb formed the locus of both cult worship and of the new city's claim to territory. Literary figures, including the poets Archilochos (mid-seventh century B.C.E.) and Sophocles (c. 496–406 B.C.E.), were honored as heroes and, like prophets, believed to be divinely inspired. Not all heroes were admirable figures; there were several examples of individuals whose violent actions had to be appeased with a hero cult. Nor were all heroes male, for outstanding female figures, or heroines, were also honored with cults. Some of these achieved recognition as close family of male heroes, while others became noteworthy because of independent actions.

The best-known example of the practice of recognizing the recently dead as a hero is the fourth-century general Alexander of Macedon (356–323 B.C.E.). Alexander's impressive military record and personal charisma led to his acquiring near-divine honors during his lifetime, and after his death, he was accorded the status of hero. His tomb, in Alexandria in Egypt, was the locus of ongoing cult worship. Alexander's elevation to a special status was in part the product of the Greek tradition of hero cult, but it was also a continuing example of ruler cult known in the Near East. As Alexander brought western Asia and Egypt under his control, he absorbed the ideology of the divine ruler and demanded such recognition during his lifetime. A visit to the oracle of Zeus Ammon in the Sahara desert convinced Alexander that he was the son of Zeus and therefore deserving of divine honors. Although several of his followers were reluctant to give these honors to a living man, they found it expedient to do so after his death in order to support their own efforts in claiming legitimacy as his heirs. This process led to a new application of the status of venerating individuals in power, ruler cult, a practice unknown in the Greek world before the Hellenistic period (323–31 B.C.E.), but that became a regular feature of Greek cult during that time.

Some of the impetus for Greek ruler cult came from Alexander's successors, who divided his kingdom after his death, and from their heirs, as a means of strengthening their power. These individuals were of Macedonian origin and thus were outsiders in their kingdoms, especially in western Asia and Egypt. In western Asia, ruler cult was first established by Antiochus I (r. 281–261 B.C.E.) in 280 B.C.E. in honor of his deceased father Seleukos, but the practice was soon extended to living kings as well. In Egypt, the Ptolemaic rulers became the heirs of the much older Egyptian practice of acknowledging living kings as divine rulers, and so claimed this special status for themselves. In contrast, the Attalid rulers of Pergamon, in northwestern Asia Minor, were worshipped as gods only after their death.

Although modern reaction to the Hellenistic ruler cult tends to regard the practice as a matter of political expediency mixed with flattery, contemporary sentiments help express its power. A hymn to Demetrios Poliorcetes, the Macedonian ruler of Athens in 293–289 B.C.E., offers a good example. The people of Athens addressed Demetrios as a god in their midst: “The other gods are far away and do not see us . . . but you are present among us” (Athenaios 6.253). This reflects the political realities that acknowledging a living ruler as a divinity could bring more tangible benefits than traditional religious cults.

On a more personal level, private individuals could seek spirituality through participation in mystery cults, including the rites of Demeter, Dionysos, Orpheus, and other Greek divine figures who were thought to communicate direct personal inspiration to their adherents. The sense of sanctity found in a mystery cult was not limited to the famous and powerful, but available to anyone willing to undergo rites of initiation. Participation in mystery cults was limited to initiates, who were then sworn to secrecy; they observed this injunction so faithfully that little is known about mystery rites. It seems certain, though, that mystery cults included ecstatic rites, activities such as song and dance that were designed to induce a sense of spiritual openness to the divine within the participant. Those who completed the initiation rites successfully claimed a greater degree of spiritual purity that could bring comfort: “Blessed is the man who has seen these things,” the Hymn to Demeter records of the Eleusinian Mysteries to the goddess, implying special rewards to the cult’s initiates after death.

The Roman World

Roman religious practice, like the Greek, stressed proper observance of rituals as a means of encouraging membership in the family and social group. Private individuals rarely claimed any special status of holiness, and such status was given to only a handful of individuals from the mythical past—for example, Romulus, traditional founder of Rome. One Roman group with a special status of holiness was the Vestal Virgins, six women chosen in early childhood to tend the state hearth fire in the temple of Vesta in the Roman Forum. Much respected in Roman society, the Vestal Virgins were expected to meet a high standard of personal chastity and were severely punished for breaking it. The very anomaly of the Vestal Virgins’ position, though, tends to emphasize how rare this status of sanctity was.

Divine honors for the recently dead are first noted in the later republic, often for prominent military figures such as Flaminius and Marius (late second and first centuries B.C.E.). Julius Caesar was declared a god after his death in 44 B.C.E. This practice probably laid the groundwork for the institution of the imperial cult, which began with the death of the first Roman emperor, Augustus, in 14 C.E. and continued until the establishment of Christianity as the state religion in 313 C.E. At first, the actual status of divinity was accorded to an emperor only after his death. First-century C.E. exceptions to this practice—for example, Caligula, Nero, and Domitian—seem to be more the product of a deranged mind than an actual belief in the ruler’s divinity. Augustus, however, merged the cult of his Genius (or guiding spirit) with the cult of the Lares, the household gods of Rome, thus making prayers for the safety of the empire and emperor identical. Augustus and his successors also enjoyed divine cults in the provinces during their lifetimes, particularly in the east, where the tradition of ruler worship had been established during the Hellenistic period. The living emperor, moreover, gained status as the son and heir of a god, and by the third century C.E., failure to acknowledge the imperial cult was considered a mark of disloyalty to the state.

During the later third century, the court ceremonials surrounding the imperial presence became more elaborate, designed to enhance the majesty of the emperor’s person and his quasi-divine status. Rites such as the arrival (adventus) and triumph of the emperor served to emphasize the psychological distance between emperor and subject and reinforce the belief that an emperor ruled with and through divine support. While not claiming outright divinity for an emperor, such rituals laid the basis for the emperors to position themselves as representatives of divine right under the Christian church in the fourth century C.E. and later.

Another approach to individual holiness was practiced by the adherents of several major philosophical schools, who advocated spiritual self-examination through philosophical inquiry as a means to a fulfilling life. These started in the Hellenistic period and became more influential under the Roman Empire. Though nominally following the teachings of a school's founder, the practices of such groups often diverged widely from the founder's original thought. Examples include the Neopythagoreans, followers of the sixth-century B.C.E. philosopher Pythagoras, who claimed to find spiritual symbolism in numbers and in the ascetic life of their founder, and the Neoplatonists, who traced their origin to Socrates and Plato. Neoplatonism, the dominant intellectual school in the later Roman Empire, created a new system of spirituality and new definitions of the divine and human relationship to it. Influential Neoplatonist thinkers were highly regarded by their followers, and their lives were held up as moral examples. Chief among these were Plotinus, mid-third century C.E., and Iamblichus, early fourth century C.E. The ongoing influence of philosophers can be noted in a third-century C.E. oracle recording that the holy lives of Pythagoras and Plotinus were rewarded with perpetual happiness among the blessed dead, an honor that they shared with the heroes of the Greek mythical past.

The teachings of philosophy were probably too abstract for many people. A more popular way to seek contact with the divine was the use of spells, charms, and dream interpretations, activities known collectively as magic. Several practitioners of such skills, or magicians, also gained a significant personal following. Although intellectually poles apart, the followers of both philosophy and magic had in common a desire for spiritual awareness and for communication with the divine that often translated into a reverence for those practitioners seen as particularly effective.

One individual holy man whose claim to personal revelation was framed as a challenge to the dominant authority was Mani (216–277 C.E.). A native of Mesopotamia and originally a member of a Christian sect there, Mani based his assertion of holiness on visions sent to him by the divine. He traveled widely, teaching the dualism between good and evil, in which perfection of the good in life was achievable only by those who practiced an extreme form of asceticism. His teachings were originally well received in the Sassanian Persian court, although he was eventually executed there for his beliefs. After his death, his followers, the Manichaeans, continued to proselytize his beliefs. Their efforts exerted considerable influence on Christianity and the religions of India and western China, as well as Iran.

Meher Baba

(1894–1969 C.E.)

Indian prophetic leader

This Indian master and self-proclaimed incarnation of God was born Merwan Sheriar Irani, the second of six children in a middle-class Zoroastrian family, in Pune, India, on February 25, 1894. An intelligent youth, fond of Persian poetry and cricket, he eventually enrolled in Deccan College, but in 1913 an aged Muslim woman, Hazrat Babajan, kissed him on the forehead and initiated him into a lifetime of spiritual experience and activity. His "unveiling" continued through contact with other masters, including the renowned Sai Baba of Shirdi and the Brahman Upasni Maharaj; the latter hailed him, in 1921, as "avatar of the age." The disciples who soon gathered around Merwan began calling him Meher Baba (Compassionate Father), a name he used thereafter.

Settling at an abandoned British military camp near Ahmednagar (now in Maharashtra) that became known as Meherabad, Meher Baba created, at various times, charitable schools, dispensaries, and shelters for the mad and for those he called “masts”—“intoxicated” or “God-mad” seekers. According to Meher Baba, such projects were merely outer “scaffolding” for “inner work” within the consciousness, an explanation that also extended to his enigmatic “New Life” (1949–1951), when he disbanded all centers and took to “hopeless and helpless” wandering with a small band of disciples. Frequent periods of fasting and seclusion were likewise not spiritual practices, he said, but conditions of his work, as was the unbroken silence he maintained from July 10, 1925, communicating (and dictating several books in English) through an alphabet-board and later through gestures.

In the 1930s, Meher Baba made ten visits to England, Europe, and America, where he attracted a small but dedicated group of disciples, most of whom would remain to welcome him again on three trips in the 1950s, when he also visited Australia. He periodically gave public darshan (audience) to thousands, yet more typically traveled incognito, often to remote places to contact “masts,” lepers, and destitute families. He was severely injured in two automobile accidents (in Oklahoma, 1952, and Maharashtra, 1956) that left him crippled and in constant pain. Despite secluding himself increasingly after 1960, he maintained contact with thousands worldwide through letters and telegrams and sent messages warning Western seekers against the use of mind-altering drugs. On January 31, 1969, he “dropped his body” and was buried in a small tomb at Meherabad that has since drawn pilgrims from many countries.

Meher Baba emphasized that he was not a “saint” or holy person; rather, his self-identification as “avatar” was central to his message and work. He defined himself as “the Ancient One” and “the first soul to emerge from the evolutionary and involutory process” and achieve “self-realization” (Meher Baba 1997, 267–268). This soul, he said, takes birth periodically, and he identified Zoroaster, Rama, Krishna, Buddha, Jesus, and Muhammad as earlier advents. Despite the association of these names with major religions, Meher Baba said he came not to establish a new cult but to “awaken” humanity through “a release of love in measureless abundance” (ibid., 8). His intimate circle included people of six major religious backgrounds, and his writings (mostly unexamined by scholars) include terminology from Hindu, Muslim, and Christian traditions. He did not appoint a successor and his followers have avoided large-scale organization, gathering informally to express devotion through storytelling, songs, and plays; they have also produced a sizable literature of biographies and memoirs.

Meiji Tennō

Japanese emperor, kami

Meiji Tennō was the 122nd tennō (emperor) of Japan in the traditional count and considered to be of divine ancestry. During his reign, known as the Meiji period (1868–1912), a rapid modernization of the country took place that resulted in drastic changes in all aspects of life. Meiji Tennō was posthumously enshrined in the Meiji Jingū in Tokyo.

Emperor Meiji was born in 1852 as the son of Emperor Kōmei. His personal name was Mutsuhito. He succeeded to the throne in 1867 and became the rallying point of a movement that intended to overthrow the Tokugawa shogunate, which had ruled the country for more than two and a half centuries. Under the slogan sonnō jōi (revere the emperor, expel the barbarians), advocates of this movement intended to restore direct imperial rule and sought to strengthen Japan against the threatening pressure from the Western nations that tried to end Japan's seclusionist policy. The efforts of the royalists resulted in the so-called Meiji Restoration. In 1867, the shogun handed back his authority to the emperor, who in 1868 moved the capital from Kyoto to Tokyo and proclaimed meiji (enlightened rule) as the motto of his reign.

The main features of the large-scale transformations that were carried out under the reign of Meiji Tennō were the abolition of the feudal system in favor of a new government in the form of a modern state based on a constitution and the authority of the emperor; promotion of the industrialization of the country; political, social, economic, and cultural modernization; and the establishment of Japan as a world power. Although it is not easy to establish the exact degree of Meiji Tennō's personal contribution to the extraordinary changes accomplished during his reign, he without doubt functioned as the symbol of modernization and was closely associated with these achievements by his admiring subjects.

Meiji Tennō, or rather the institution of the tennō, played a crucial role as a source of legitimacy for the Meiji government. The idea of the divine ancestry of the tennō, traced back through an unbroken line of divine ancestors to the mythological Jimmu Tennō and further to the sun goddess Amaterasu Ōmikami, served as one of the key concepts of the ideological foundation of the new government. The Meiji Constitution of 1889 declared the tennō to be “sacred and inviolable” (Lu 1997, 340). Together with the emphasis on the uniqueness of the Japanese national polity (kokutai), this concept of the divinity of the emperor constituted the basis of the endeavors to install Shinto as the state religion. These endeavors had their starting point in the early Meiji period and culminated in what was later referred to as State Shinto.

Upon his death in 1912, Meiji Tennō’s remains were entombed in a mausoleum in Momoyama (part of the city of Kyoto) in accordance with Shinto rites. Further, in the following year the diet approved the construction of a Shinto shrine called Meiji Jingū, in which the spirits of Meiji Tennō and his consort, Empress Shōken (1850–1914), were enshrined in 1920. Located in Tokyo’s Shibuya Ward, the precinct of Meiji Jingū covers (including its outer garden) an area of more than one square kilometer. It is a favorite location for the first shrine visits on New Year (hatsumōde). The birthday of Meiji Tennō, November 3, is the day of the shrine’s annual festival and also a national holiday called Bunka-no hi (Culture Day).

Christian hermit, martyr

Meinrad was martyred in about 861 near Zurich, Switzerland. His story is a classic monastic hagiographical account of martyrdom. The theme of increasing solitude in the quest for God, as well as hospitality to one’s enemies, were popular themes in monastic literature going back to St. Antony of Egypt (fl. 300–340).

Meinrad was the son of Count Berthold von Sulchen, who offered his son as a boy to the monastic life. Young Meinrad advanced quickly and was ordained to the priesthood. His abbot, Hatto, then sent him to a small monastery on the Zuecher See, where Meinrad became schoolmaster and studied music and singing. Meinrad, however, longed for a more solitary life in the Alps beyond the Zuecher. He retreated first to Rapperswyl, where a peasant woman permitted him to build a hermitage. After seven years, he retreated still further to a dark, wooded area surrounding a spring above Zurich. Later this spring (and the saint’s intercession) would be associated with various healings, and the spring is still a focus for pilgrimage.

After twenty-five years in this hermitage, Meinrad was attacked by two intruders, Reinhard (or Richard) and Peter. Stories vary as to their purpose. Some say they were thieves who came to rob the hermitage of gifts given to Meinrad; others suggest they came with the express purpose of killing the monk. Nevertheless, Meinrad welcomed his killers, provided them food and clothing, then asked that they light candles at his head and feet after doing their deed. Enraged by the hermit’s prescience, the two beat and then strangled him, then placed the candles as requested. Returning to light the candles, they found them already burning and fled the scene. Meinrad’s two pet ravens chased the killers into a nearby village, where their deed was discovered and both men were executed. The hermitage remained unoccupied until the mid-tenth century, when clerics associated with the Ottonian dynasty established a monastery (Einsiedeln) on the site. Meinrad’s original chapel is enshrined in the abbey church and houses the famous Black Madonna of Einsiedeln.

Meir of Rothenburg

Jewish scholar

Born in Worms, Germany, in approximately 1220, Meir ben Baruch was the leading talmudic scholar of his day. He studied in Würzburg, Mainz, and France and was present at the Talmud Disputations of 1240, which were a result of Pope Gregory IX’s June 1239 encyclical attacking the Talmud and other rabbinic writings. In 1242, he witnessed the burning of twenty-four cartloads of Talmud parchments at the order of Pope Innocent IV. His moving poem regarding their destruction is still used in Ashkenazic communities on Tisha B’Av.

Returning to Germany after the burning, Meir ben Baruch settled in Rothenburg, where he lived for forty years. A recognized talmudist despite his youth, he wrote almost 1,000 responsa to communities' legal questions, significantly influencing Ashkenazic synagogue and home rituals. His lifestyle likewise had a decisive influence, as his students studied his daily life from morning to night. The most famous of these students, Samson ben Zadok, described in great detail the rabbi's daily practices in the Tashbetz, a popular and influential book that described actions that subsequently became customary for Ashkenazic Jews.

When Emperor Rudolph I (of Hapsburg) declared in 1286 that all Jews were his property (consistent with earlier papal decrees), thousands prepared to emigrate from Germany to Palestine, including Meir ben Baruch, who was betrayed and imprisoned. The Jews of Germany sought his release, offering an enormous ransom, despite his plea that they offer no ransom for him of any kind; he feared that European rulers would blackmail Jewish communities by threatening their rabbis. In this case, what the emperor wanted was not money, but the Jews' admission that they were indeed his property. They refused, and Meir ben Baruch remained imprisoned.

Even without his library, his learning was sufficient to allow him to continue to write responsa, commentaries, and letters of instruction and encouragement to his students while imprisoned in Ensisheim, Alsace. By the end of his life, he had produced eighteen tractates on the Talmud in addition to the responsa and had secured his position as the most influential rabbinic authority of his generation. Meir ben Baruch of Rothenburg died in prison in 1293; his body was ransomed fourteen years later.

Melampus

Ancient Greek seer

One of the greatest seers of Greek mythology, Melampus was said to have come from Thessaly in northern Greece. The legends concerning him report that one day, after migrating with his parents to Pylus in the Peloponnesus, Melampus awoke to discover, to his horror, that baby snakes, whose parents had been killed by a farmer, were licking his ears. Ever after, he could understand the speech of animals.

Melampus was close to his brother Bias, who fell in love with Pero, the daughter of Neleus, king of Pylus. For bride price Neleus demanded the cattle of Phylacus, who lived in Thessaly. An unsleeping dog guarded them. Melampus offered to steal the cattle for his brother, although through his powers he knew that he would spend a year in prison in the process of carrying out the theft. Indeed, Phylacus captured him in the act of rustling and placed him in a small cell. A year later, Melampus, still in the cell, overheard woodworms as they chewed at beams supporting the roof. "Almost there," one said. Phylacus shrieked, and the guard pulled him from the room just as the roof collapsed.

Impressed by his powers, Phylacus now offered to give the cattle to Melampus if he could cure his grown son Iphiclus, swift of foot but impotent. To solve the puzzle of Iphiclus's impotence, Melampus started by killing two bulls. A vulture came to eat and described how Iphiclus, as a child, had watched Phylacus gelding rams and had run away in fear. Phylacus had run after him and stabbed the bloody knife into a tree, which grew around the knife, causing impotence in his son. Melampus found the knife, scraped some rust from it, and made a potion that cured Iphiclus. Phylacus gave the cattle to Melampus, who returned with them to Pylus, and Bias married Pero.

King Proetus of Argos now asked for his help in curing his daughters, who through an offense against Hera or Dionysos imagined they were cows and wandered through the hills mooing. Melampus agreed, so long as he received one-third of the kingdom and Bias the rest. Through herbs and ritual, Melampus cured the girls, and he and Bias married two of them (Pero is forgotten). Numerous prominent seers numbered among their descendants, including Amphiarus, seer of the Seven against Thebes and grandson of Melampus.

As a seer, Melampus's special abilities were understanding animal speech and healing people of various illnesses, features not found in the careers of Tiresias, Calchas, or Mopsus, the other great seers of Greek legend.

Melania the Younger

(c. 383–439 C.E.)

Christian pilgrim, patron

A Christian noblewoman, pilgrim, and patroness of monasticism, Melania was the daughter of Publicola, a prominent Roman senator, and the granddaughter of Melania the Elder, herself a Roman holy woman. Most of what we know concerning Melania comes from the writing of her contemporary Gerontius, author of her hagiography. Melania the Younger, born around 383, fell under the influence of her namesake grandmother when the latter stayed in her house for a brief visit after returning from Jerusalem. Melania the Younger admired her grandmother and wished to lead a monastic life as well, but her father forbade it. Publicola had been left behind as a young boy and was critical of the life his mother led. Instead, at age thirteen, Melania the Younger was forced to marry her cousin Pinianus, the son of the wealthy prefect of Rome. When both children she bore to him suddenly died, Melania convinced her husband that it was a sign that they should lead a monastic life. Their marriage then became a chaste one, and Melania began to give away their property to the poor. When her grandmother returned once more from Jerusalem, Melania fell further under her influence.

The Visigothic invasion of Italy caused Melania, her grandmother, and Pinianus to leave Rome, escaping first to Sicily and later to their family estate in North Africa. They remained there for seven years, befriending bishops, such as Augustine and Alypius, and establishing monasteries. Eventually the group left for the East, but shortly after their arrival in Jerusalem, the elder Melania died. Melania the Younger persisted in her vocation and together with Pinianus traveled to Egypt and visited numerous monks.

Melania the Younger also established monasteries in Jerusalem, including a woman's monastery on the Mount of Olives and, near the Church of the Ascension, one for men. Her traveling did not come to an end with the death of her husband; in 436, she made a journey to Constantinople to see her still-polytheist uncle who was visiting from Rome. There Melania met with Emperor Theodosius II and his new wife Eudocia, and she convinced Eudocia to undertake her own trip to the Holy Land. Melania's final days were spent traveling back and forth between various Eastern shrines and her monastery in Jerusalem. She died in 439 and was buried with many of the items she had collected from the holy people she had visited throughout her life.

Christian martyr

Veneration of Menas, one of the most popular and important saints of early Christian Egypt, continues today. Legends tell that Menas, who served for a time as a soldier in the Roman army, was martyred for his faith during the persecutions of the emperor Diocletian in the late third or early fourth century. Numerous expanded versions of his Life and various miracles of healing associated with this soldier-saint attest to the early popularity and widespread growth of his cult.

His shrine, located southwest of Alexandria and Lake Mareotis (at Karm Abu Mina or Abu Mena), was a major pilgrimage center from the fourth century until the Arab conquest of the region in the mid-seventh century. The extensive complex (with church, monastery buildings, and accommodations for pilgrims) was excavated in the early twentieth century. Archaeological evidence indicates that the church was enlarged several times.

Numerous pilgrimage tokens from the shrine at Abu Mena have been found all over the Mediterranean world. These portable objects are primarily small terra-cotta bottles (ampullae) that were used to contain curative holy water drawn from the shrine's well or oil from the lamps burning over the saint's tomb. These ampullae customarily include an image of St. Menas as an orant figure (standing in a gesture of prayer with arms raised up to either side of the body) and flanked by two kneeling or standing camels. This image was depicted on a sculptural relief in the crypt of his burial place (martyrium) at Abu Mena, and this original cult image appears to have provided the inspiration for this persistent iconography.

The meaning of the camels is still a matter of speculation. They may represent the traditional mode of transportation of pilgrims visiting the saint's shrine. Several legends about Menas also involve camels (they may represent the beasts that refused to transport the saint's relics away from Egypt and/or the ones that attacked a ship carrying away the saint's relics). The depiction has also given rise to the suggestion that Menas may have been a merchant or camel-driver. The patron saint of merchants and desert caravans, his cult was still popular in the West during the medieval period. Churches were dedicated to St. Menas in Egypt, Palestine, Constantinople, Rome, North Africa, and Arles. His feast day is November 11.

Mencius

See Mengzi

Mengzi (Mencius)

(c. 372–289 B.C.E.)

Confucian philosopher

Mengzi, often known by the Latinized name Mencius, is considered the second-greatest philosopher in the ru tradition. Rujia is a Chinese term referring to the tradition or doctrine of scholars and is called “Confucianism” in the West. Mengzi, born in what is now Shantung province in around 372 B.C.E., is highly regarded as a moral and political thinker. His basic teaching was that humans are innately good and that environment and education can enhance or pervert human nature. He lived during the tumultuous Warring States period (403–222 B.C.E.).

Mengzi defended Rujia against its critics, such as Mozi (c. 470–c. 380 B.C.E.), and provided a deeper foundation for the philosophy based in human nature and the way of heaven. Mengzi’s expansion of Confucian thought is seen as an “idealist” form of Confucianism in contrast to its “naturalist” form developed by Xunzi (c. 370–286 B.C.E.), who argued for the opposing thesis that human nature is inherently evil. Mengzi traveled to many kingdoms as a political adviser. A number of his recorded discussions are attempts to explain to rulers the superiority of morality over profit and gain. They should rule with benevolence (ren) and righteousness (yi), which are the two central concepts of Mengzi’s thought, sharing with the people rather than exploiting them in various political and military projects. Like Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.) before him, he failed in his political efforts and became a teacher, and it is in this role that he would become a leading figure of Chinese thought. After his death, students composed the book named after him based on his sayings and dialogues.

Mengzi grounded ethics on virtues rooted in moral feeling. Xin (translated as “heart” or “mind”) constitutes the basic capacity of a person’s intellectual and affective being to morally respond to events and achieve the fundamental Confucian goal of humaneness (ren) in accordance with the way of heaven (tian). This basic moral condition is a fragile “shoot” or “sprout” (duan), which must be neither neglected nor forced to grow (Mencius, Book II, 1, 4). Mengzi argued for the innate benevolence of the human heart by using a thought-experiment: If a child falls into a well, then prior to reflection and calculation of the possible advantage and risk of saving the child, the human heart is moved to save the child (Mencius, Book II, 1, 6). Mengzi broke down this heart/mind nexus into four innate feelings that can be cultivated into corresponding moral virtues. According to Mengzi, “The feeling of compassion is possessed by all alike; likewise the feeling of shame, the feeling of respect, and the feeling of right and wrong to wisdom. Benevolence or compassion (ren), dutifulness or righteousness (yi), observance of rites or propriety (li), and wisdom (zhi) are not welded onto me from the outside; they are in me originally” (Mencius, Book VI, 1, 6; translation modified from Mencius 1998).

Mengzi is also influential in Chinese political thought because of his emphasis on benevolent and righteous rule as well as his development of the theory of the “mandate of heaven,” that is, the notion that the justification of political authority comes from heaven itself. If a ruler acts contrary to the way of heaven and fails to bring about peace, order, prosperity, and welfare among the people, then the people are freed from any loyalty to this ruler and can revolt. This justification of rebellion was repeatedly used and repressed throughout Chinese history. Mengzi insisted that the prince has to act out of the highest benevolence and righteousness in order to secure the happiness of the people and thus be worthy of ruling in heaven’s name.

Meninha de Gantois, Mãe

Candomblé leader

Maria Escolástica da Conceição Nazaré, born in 1894, better known as Mãe Menininha de Gantois, was the most famous iyalorixá (bride of the orisha, cult-house leader) of Brazilian Candomblé. She initiated hundreds of Filhas de Santo (Daughters in the Saint) who now lead Ile Axé (temples of Candomblé worship) throughout Bahia and Brazil. Her extensive connections with political and academic elites were instrumental in the legalization of the Candomblé religion and its rituals in the 1970s. She brought the once secretive religion of Candomblé into the public sphere and helped to do away with hundreds of years of prejudice against Afro-Brazilian religions and their practitioners in Brazil.

Candomblé is a Brazilian religion related to Yoruba and Fon/Ewe religious traditions in West Africa and Congolese and Angolan religions in central and southern Africa. Mãe Menininha was initiated to serve the goddess Oxum, the Yoruba orisha of beauty, gold, and sweet-flowing water, by her aunt Púlcheria at the age of eight. At the age of twenty-eight, having completed all of the ritual foundations of Candomblé priesthood, Menininha succeeded to the leadership of Gantois, or Ile Iyá Omi Axé Iyamassê, one of the oldest and most respected Afro-Brazilian cult houses in Bahia.

Her confirmation as iyalorixá of Gantois marked an innovation in the means of succession to headship of a Candomblé temple. Whereas most priestesses receive their appointment from the priestess who initiated them, Menininha was appointed by three men who were regarded as gods incarnate, Oxossi, Xango, and Oxum. She remained at the helm of Gantois for fifty-four years and achieved seventy-four years of initiation.

Menininha freely admitted whites and Catholics to her temple, and in turn she won approval from a Bahian bishop for followers of Candomblé to enter Catholic churches wearing their traditional dresses and the necklaces that mark their devotion to the orishas. She counted famous politicians, musicians, authors, academics, and artists among her followers and gave spiritual advice and ritual services to such Brazilian luminaries as Jorge Amado (author of Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands, originally published in 1966), Vincius de Morães (composer of The Girl from Ipanema, 1963), Antonio Carlos Magalhães (senator from Bahia and one of the most powerful men in Brazil), the illustrator Carybé, and anthropologists Pierre Verger and Edson Carneiro, two scholars who shaped the trajectory of Afro-Brazilian studies. These connections gave her a powerful voice in advocating for the legal rights and social stature of followers of Afro-Brazilian religions.

But Menininha's greatest legacy was her dissemination of Candomblé. Menininha died in 1986. Her Filhas de Santo now have initiatic daughters and granddaughters of their own. Proud of their lineage to Menininha, they operate Candomblé temples throughout Brazil.

Merici, Angela

Christian laywoman

Angela Merici founded the Company of St. Ursula, a lay community of women living in their own homes and devoting their lives to charity. Born on March 21, 1474, in Desenzano, a town in northeastern Italy, sometime before 1515 she entered the Franciscan tertiary (third) order, which offered an alternative to cloistered life for laymen and laywomen who wanted to devote themselves to the church. During this period, Angela was reported to have lived a pious life dedicated to prayer, contemplation, and charity. She also fasted, confessed, and took communion frequently.

In 1516, Angela went to Brescia, a northeastern Italian city suffering from political, religious, economic, and social turmoil. Here she came into close contact with a number of charitable religious organizations (including the Company of Divino Amore) that administered to the urban inhabitants' physical and spiritual needs. Earlier in her life, Angela had experienced a celestial vision that she was to found a religious company for laywomen, and during the early 1530s she fulfilled this vision by organizing a community of girls, single women, and widows who wanted to live "in the world" (that is, not in the cloister) while dedicating themselves to God's service. In 1535, Angela and her companions founded the Company of St. Ursula, named after the legendary fourth-century virgin saint martyred with 11,000 other virgins in Cologne, Germany. Angela's company was socially diverse and attracted women from very different economic backgrounds. She was elected mother general of the company and held this position until her death.

Angela wrote a rule to guide her company. The women were to remain virgins living in their own homes and were to devote themselves to prayer and charitable acts. They were instructed to fast, confess frequently, attend mass daily, and live a relatively simple lifestyle. Girls could enter the company at the age of twelve with their guardians' permission. Her other works, Legati (Testament) and Ricordi (Counsels), both emphasized the importance of good teaching, and educating children became a focus of the company. In 1566, it was reported that "all the hospitals and all the schools of Christian doctrine for girls are staffed by the Ursulines" (Blaisdell 1994, 111).

After Angela's death in 1540, the growing company underwent a number of significant changes. Several branches developed that take the name "Ursuline," but teaching is still a primary focus of the order. Angela was canonized in 1807.

Merton, Thomas

Roman Catholic monk, writer

Thomas Merton, a Roman Catholic monk, made a widespread appeal to men and women of all walks of life to answer God's call to contemplation. Born in Prades, France, in 1915, he moved with his family to New York in 1916, only to return to France in 1925 to begin his schooling. Three years later he enrolled in school in England, and in 1938 he entered Cambridge. Having suddenly left Cambridge, he enrolled in Columbia University the following year. Bright, radical, and a confirmed atheist, Merton began to change when he wrote a master's thesis on William Blake (1757–1827); consequently, his interest turned to Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274), Augustine (354–430), and the spiritual classics. By 1948, when the best-selling account of his conversion, Seven-Storey Mountain, was published, he had taken solemn vows as a Trappist monk, and in the following year he would be ordained to the priesthood. On December 10, 1968, during a trip to the Far East and India, he was accidentally electrocuted and died.

The monastic lifestyle appealed to Merton's longing for solitude, discipline, and contemplation. In many of his writings, Merton speaks to the centrality of contemplation in the Christian life. He follows in the contemplative path great apophatic mystics such as Meister Eckhart (c. 1260–c. 1327) and John of the Cross (1542–1591). The latter was an especially strong influence on him, as certified by Merton's book on the Spanish mystic, The Ascent to Truth (1951). Like John, Merton lauds the via negativa, the approach to God by defining what God is not, as leading into the divine presence.

One reason for Merton's continuing appeal to all manner of people—Christian or not—is his confirmed interest in social justice and his ecumenical spirit. This spirit embraced Eastern religions and interreligious monastic life. These themes he developed in his writings, which included poetry, essays, and books. Through all his writings, however, runs the thematic thread of contemplation. His Contemplation in a World of Action (1973) speaks to the need for contemplation in a world of increasing busyness and distraction. For Merton, contemplation was no luxury but the vital mode of being ever more present to God. The more Merton opened to other religions of the world, the greater his realization that the contemplative way is cultivated outside of Christianity, albeit differently. Merton was ecumenical in spirit while rooted firmly in the tradition of Christian mysticism and contemplation.

Messiahs

The Hebrew-based word "messiah" means "anointed one." In Jewish belief, it is used specifically to refer to a holy person specially sent by God as a savior, usually with the assumption that he will be a king and create a new world order. In popular idioms, the word is used not just for Judeo-Christian messiahs but for holy figures who have served a similar function in other religions. Belief in a coming messiah, a human being sent from a god who will restore the world to an earlier pristine state, is very widespread in the world's religions. The earliest evidence of such a belief is in Zoroastrianism, which holds that the forces of good will finally be victorious under the leadership of Saoshyant (Future Benefactor), a descendant of Zoroaster himself who will restore the world to its original purity in a great "Making Wonderful." This belief spread to Judaism by the third century B.C.E., and thus to Christianity and Islam. But Chinese belief in a messiah who will create the Taiping, the "heavenly kingdom" on earth, is not clearly linked to these Middle Eastern beliefs and may be an independent development. Hinduism holds that the last avatar of Vishnu, Kalkin, has not yet appeared and will come to bring in the new age of the world—a belief that already appears in the Mahabharata. Buddhism also has a future Buddha—Maitreya—who will come with fabulous miracles and a remaking of the world. Other religions, in Africa and the Americas, appear to have developed belief in a messiah after exposure to Islam or Christianity. Thus, for example, the American Quetzalcoatl legend, one version of which tells that the hero will one day return, later became associated with Christ's second coming.

Belief that the messiah will come is one of the thirteen articles of the Jewish faith. But the form the savior will take has been a subject of controversy since at least the second century B.C.E. Many Jews believed that the messiah did indeed come—and became Christians (followers of the “anointed one”; christos is simply Greek for “messiah”) as a result. The Hebrew scriptures indeed present widely varying views of what the messiah will be—whether king or sufferer, royal or common, and so on. One Jewish tradition tells that the messiah was created at the beginning of time and is waiting with God for the moment of redemption; another suggests that a potential messiah lives in every generation, while yet another presents the eerie image of a leprous messiah sitting begging at the gates of Rome while waiting for the moment.

This uncertainty has led to the rise of many false messiahs who won large numbers of followers but eventually failed to reestablish the world order. For Jews who did not like the image of Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ, someone who better fit their expectations appeared in 132 C.E., Simeon bar Kokhba. His name, which means “son of a star,” was thought to fulfill the prophecy of Numbers 24:17, and his goal to lead the people to freedom and rebuild the Temple led some, including Rabbi Akiba, to proclaim him as the messiah. The other great age of messianic expectations among the Jews was the early modern period, when expulsion and other persecutions led many to believe that God must provide relief for his oppressed people. Among the more important claimants is Solomon Molcho (1500–1532), a Spanish marrano, one of the many Jews forcibly converted to Christianity, who converted back to Judaism and declared himself to be the messiah; although Charles V had him burned alive, many followers refused to believe he was dead. David Reuveni (d. 1583) mysteriously appeared in Venice in 1523, claiming that he was 400 years old and a royal representative from one of the lost tribes of Israel. Although he did not personally claim to be the messiah, in Portugal he was greeted as herald of the messianic age. The Hasidic leader Nahman of Bratslav (1772–1810) also became convinced that he was the messiah.

The most famous of the would-be messiahs of Judaism, though, is Shabbetai Zevi (1626–1676), who declared himself to be the messiah in 1665, sending letters to proclaim himself to the diaspora communities. He generated enormous excitement throughout Europe, including among some Christian millenarians. Longing for a messiah is clear in the persistence of his followers despite all discouragement. Shabbetai himself was soon suppressed by the Ottoman authorities of the Near East—he was arrested in 1666 as a trouble-maker and told to convert to Islam or face execution. Shabbetai then converted. Many of his followers, though, stayed faithful, arguing that his conversion was part of the ongoing battle the messiah had to wage with the forces of evil—and converted to Islam with him. In fact, the last members of the movement have only recently died out.

Christianity separated from Judaism in the belief that the messiah has already come in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, a claim Jesus never made for himself. But that did not end the matter, because it became a central article of faith, included in the main creeds of Christianity, that Christ will come a second time to make the world anew and establish his kingdom on earth. There have been many false claimants to the title throughout the history of Christianity, most relegated to passing mentions in history books. Several holy people in the modern era, however, have successfully won large followings with the claim of messiahhood. Ann Lee (1736–1784), founder of the Shakers, claimed to be the second coming of Christ in the form of a holy “mother wisdom.” Another woman who attracted a large number of disciples was the Anglican-Methodist mystic Joanna Southcott (1750–1814), who believed she would give birth to the second Christ, a child to be named Shiloh. Again, longing for a messiah tided many followers through the failure of their hopes; although Southcott suffered a false pregnancy and finally died without bearing the future savior, many of her disciples continued to wait patiently, and there are still Southcottian communities in England. Similar hopes can be seen among the devotees of the Russian Orthodox John of Kronstadt (1829–1908). Popular belief spread that he was the Christ—although he denied it and repeatedly disavowed any messianic pretensions.

Among the recent Christian messiahs, the most interesting are those of Third World countries who have won multitudes of followers in large part because of the ongoing crisis in these societies. In Africa, the most important has been the “black messiah” Simeon Ondeto of Kenya (c. 1910/1917–1991), who claimed to be Jesus reborn. According to one legend, he was found when as a twelve-year-old boy, and the childhood miracles attributed to him—making clay cattle live, for example—replicate those told of the original Jesus in the apocryphal gospels. He was cofounder of Legio Maria, the largest Catholic-based church in Africa.

A similar case of desperate need leading people to choose a messiah appears in the unique development of Rastafarianism as a significant world religion. The black American leader Marcus Garvey (1887–1940), who was himself hailed as messiah by some, prophesied the coming of an emperor in Africa who would be the messiah. One year after the prophecy, in 1930, Emperor Haile Selassie (1892–1975) came to power in Ethiopia. Soon after his coronation, the Rastafari movement began in Jamaica. Named after Haile Selassie’s name as prince, Ras Tafari, it proclaims the new African leader as either messiah or god (Haile Selassie never accepted this claim). The movement gained strength from its environment of poverty and white oppression and has now spread widely throughout the African diaspora. Similarly, large numbers of Koreans—and then many Americans—were drawn by Sun Myung Moon’s (1920–) claim to be the messiah. Moon proclaims that Jesus’ attempt to restore humanity had been cut short by his execution, so he had to be born again—as Moon—to finish the work.

It is in Shi’i Islam, however, that messiahs have played the most important role in world history. A fundamental teaching of Twelver Shi’ism is that the twelfth imam, Muhammad al-Mahdi, who disappeared in 874, did not die. Instead, he went into hiding (occultation) and will return as the mahdi, the “rightly guided” savior who will come just before judgment day to avenge all the injustices the Shi’is have suffered and to establish a kingdom of peace and justice. Those who have claimed to be the mahdi come again (or those for whom their followers make such a claim) have often been violent, leading a jihad to reestablish true Islam on earth. Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al-Ghazi (c. 1506–1543), who claimed to be the hidden imam as part of the ideological framework that supported a series of wars against Christian Ethiopia, destroyed churches and forced most of the Christian population in that region to accept Islam. The “mahdi of the Sudan,” Muhammad Ahmad ibn el-Sayed (1844–1885), believed himself called to cleanse the world from corruption, targeting especially the Ottoman Empire after his first public appearance as mahdi in 1881, but eventually also taking on the British Empire. As was often the case with Muslim messiah figures, he created an Islamic state, which lasted for thirteen years until its defeat by the British.

To give just a couple of important further examples, the Indian Muslim Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (c. 1835–1908) declared himself to be both mahdi and Christian messiah, as well as the tenth incarnation of Vishnu (!). The Ahmadiyya movement he founded was persecuted, but it still grew. And in recent history, many Iranians believed Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) to be the mahdi, or at least his forerunner. Religions that have grown out of Islam, such as the Nation of Islam and the Baha’i faith, also rose because of their founders’ claims to be the mahdi. W. D. Fard (c. 1891–?) of the Nation of Islam was believed to be either the mahdi or God in person. And the Bab (1819–1850) claimed to be the mahdi, too, declaring the abrogation of Islamic holy law and the institution of a new world order, thus forming a decisive break from Shi’i Islam. His mission began in A.H. 1260 (1844 C.E.), the thousandth anniversary of the twelfth imam’s disappearance. After the Bab was martyred, his successor, Baha’u’llah (1817–1892), also claimed to be a messianic figure who would usher in a golden age that would fulfill the prophecies of all world religions.

Midewiwin Brotherhood

Native American religious society

The Midewiwin Brotherhood, or Grand Medicine Society, began as a secret religious organization that combined moral teaching, codes of conduct, and knowledge of plants and herbs to heal and prolong life. The Midewiwin followed a set of rituals that transferred knowledge to members and initiates. Tribes influenced by this society by the nineteenth century included the Fox, Iowa, Menominee, Miami, Ojibwa or Chippewa, Ponca, and Winnebago.

To join the society, a candidate had to be recommended by a member. If accepted, they paid a fee and were assigned a teacher. Their instruction included the study of origin traditions, ritual procedures, herbs, medicines, prayers, songs, and moral teachings. The society was divided into several degrees, or orders. Each degree had separate initiation rites, myths, songs, herbal remedies, and medicine bags. The central ceremonies, held annually or semiannually in the spring or fall, lasted for several days depending upon the number of initiates. One important feature of these ceremonies was a ritual “shooting” of the candidate with a small, white shell, which was taken from the medicine bag of a member and placed in a candidate’s mouth. The shell was thought to convey supernatural power that at first might shock the recipient into unconsciousness. The candidate’s revival after the shooting represented spiritual renewal, power, and rebirth. Writings and illustrations on scrolls preserve the history and knowledge of the Midewiwin Brotherhood and serve as a mnemonic device for those who can interpret their meaning. The scrolls were made of birch bark, and the writing was done with a bone stylus and red paint.

Early European-American references to Midewiwin practices among the Ojibwa include those of two Northwest Company traders, who wrote accounts of their 1804 observations. More detailed descriptions of the society appeared later in the nineteenth century. The religion is thought to have spread from the Ojibwa to the other tribes. The power of the Midewiwin was considered so great that members resisted Christian conversion. However, the Midewiwin began to decline at the end of the nineteenth century owing to dispersion of Ojibwa bands, missionary and government persecution, the cost of initiation and instruction, and the reduced numbers of priests and successors. The Midewiwin has continued in some locations and has seen a revival in recent decades.

Milarepa

Buddhist hermit

Milarepa, probably the most popular saint in the history of Tibetan Buddhism, was admired for his unwavering commitment to casting aside all worldly aims in the quest for complete awakening. Born in 1052, in his youth Milarepa reportedly did much evil, killing people through sorcery and black magic. Regretting these murders, he turned his mind toward enlightenment and spent the rest of his life meditating in remote mountain regions, where he eventually achieved his goal. His spontaneous songs of realization, offered to disciples and passersby, have remained a most cherished source of inspiration for Tibetan Buddhists throughout the millennium since his passing in 1135.

While Milarepa was still a child his father died. By fraudulent means, his aunt and uncle took possession of Milarepa's inheritance and forced his mother, sister, and Milarepa into a life of poverty and servitude. Seeking revenge, Milarepa learned black magic and eventually killed most of his adversaries through sorcery. Later, while contemplating the principle of karma, he was filled with remorse and decided to practice the Buddhist teachings to purify his sins. He met the renowned master Marpa (1012–1097) and immediately developed a strong bond of fervent devotion. To purify Milarepa from his negative past, and to prepare him for the esoteric teachings, Marpa challenged Milarepa with physical and mental trials before finally offering instruction.

Once Milarepa had received Marpa's teachings, he showed an unflinching resolve to apply their meaning. Throughout his life he remained in the mountains, often meditating in solitude and always focused on Marpa's instructions. Although Milarepa sought seclusion, disciples slowly gathered. To these students, the foremost being Gampopa (1079–1153) and Rechungpa (1084–1161), Milarepa offered his liberating guidance. Milarepa often taught by means of spiritual songs that touched the hearts of his listeners and awakened their minds to the realization of indivisible wisdom and compassion. The penetrating insights and poetic beauty expressed in Milarepa's songs have inspired practitioners from all denominations of Tibetan Buddhism, and to these followers he stands aloft as testimony to the human potential for full awakening within a single life.

Miller, William

Christian millenarian prophet

William Miller was the first millenarian preacher in America to win widespread interest and support. Born in 1782, he spent most of his life in rural Massachusetts. In 1816, he underwent a religious conversion and joined the local Baptist church. After that, he began a course of intensive Bible study. Convinced that the Bible must have a message for ordinary people (he himself was largely self-taught), Miller became increasingly fascinated with the apocalyptic books of Daniel and Revelation. By about 1818, he had decided that the second coming of Christ would take place in or near the year 1843. It was only in 1831, however, that he started publicly proclaiming his belief, and he began publishing pamphlets on the subject in the next year, expressing his conviction that the advent would come sometime between March 1843 and March 1844, based on a series of calculations using the numbers given in the book of Daniel.

Nobody thought Miller a fraud. Even the many people who disagreed with his message described him as a man of transparent goodwill who sincerely believed in what he was teaching. He did not have a particular agenda, except to warn as many people as possible of the coming end of the world; instead of trying to form a church of his own, he visited various denominations, even the Roman Catholics, spreading the message. Miller's rather ineffective preaching only became an organized movement in 1840, when he converted the active and able Joshua Himes to belief in the imminence of Christ's advent. Himes started a periodical, Signs of the Time, and soon had set up a very active lecture circuit for the aging and ill Miller. In this way, Miller attracted thousands of followers. And then March 1844 passed—and Christ had not come, at least not in a form anybody could recognize.

Apocalyptic prophet William Miller, who won thousands of Americans to his belief that Christ would come again in 1843 or 1844. (Hayward Circer, ed., Dictionary of American Portraits, 1967)

Miller's followers were resilient, however, and Miller was persuaded to support a specific new date for the arrival of Christ—October 22, 1844. There was an enormous, fervent, final revival. Many of Miller's adherents closed their businesses or stopped harvesting their crops, and thousands gathered to worship on the prophesied day. Some may even have gathered on hillsides, dressed in white robes, ready to be rapt into the heavens, although such accounts may all be attributable to popular ridicule when that date, too, passed without Jesus making an appearance.

Miller's validity as a religious figure ended that day. He was expelled from his own congregation and retired to private life. He lived another five years, still convinced that the coming of Christ was imminent. Miller died in 1849, but his legacy can still be felt through the activities of some followers who survived what became known as the Great Disappointment, who formed the core of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Mipham Rinpoche

Buddhist scholar

Mipham Rinpoche was a Tibetan Buddhist saint and scholar. Born in mDo Khams, Tibet, in 1846, he was known even in childhood for his compassion and good moral conduct, as well as intellectual brilliance. Ordained as a monk at the age of twelve at mChor Sa-nga Choling (a branch of Zhecen monastery) in the Nyingma tradition of Tibetan Buddhism, he quickly mastered the sciences, mathematics, sutras, and tantras.

His root guru was Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo, who thought of him as a spiritual son and empowered him as master of the doctrine. He said of Mipham Rinpoche that in the present age there was no one more learned than he. Not only did he have full knowledge of the rituals and tantric texts of Tibetan Buddhism, but he was a practitioner as well, having the highest spiritual accomplishments. He also wrote treatises on sculpture, painting, poetry, and dance. In all, he was the author of more than 300 works. He mastered all four traditions of Tibetan Buddhism as well as the Bon religion. He also practiced medicine. He wrote many ritual texts and prayers. He even wrote a treatise on the art of love, a commentary on the Kamashastra (Love's ecstasies).

Mipham Rinpoche's philosophical lineage was Yogacara Madhyamaka. Like Santaraksita in the eighth century, he believed that ultimate reality was beyond conception; relative reality was understood to be mental in nature. Scholars from all four Tibetan lineages rely for interpretation on his commentary on Santaraksita's Madhyamak Alamkara (Engaging in the Middle Way). His commentary on the ninth chapter of Santideva's eighth-century Bodhicaryavatara (Entering the path of the bodhisattva), on wisdom, in Dzogchen terms resulted in a great deal of debate. He pointed out the connection between Santideva's notion of ultimate reality beyond conception and the immediate perspectival shift that enabled the adept to see all things as inherently enlightened, thus overcoming the division between the gradual and sudden enlightenment schools. Of particular value are his thirty-two treatises, usually called "the Cycles" (not yet translated), which are guides to religious practice.

Mipham Rinpoche died in meditation in 1912. Tents of rainbow light miraculously surrounded his funeral pyre.

Mirabai

(b. c. 1500 C.E.)

Hindu devotee

Mirabai, the sixteenth-century royal devotee recognized for her unshakable love for God in the form of Krishna, is the most popular of the women saints of bhakti (devotional) Hinduism. She suffered terribly for her devotion, her life threatened repeatedly because she would not adhere to the restrictions placed on married women of her caste. Undeterred, she eventually became a wandering holy woman. She has come to inspire people of all walks of life, men and women from low to high caste. Songs of love and longing for God attributed to her continue to be sung throughout the Indian subcontinent and beyond, and the compelling story of her life has been told again and again across the centuries in hagiographic literature, epic songs, novels, and comic books and enacted in folk, religious, and dance dramas and film.

According to hagiography, Mirabai was born in Rajasthan in northern India in around 1500. Though devoted to Krishna from childhood, her marriage to a prince of a neighboring kingdom was arranged, by most accounts against her will. She immediately angered her marital family by not behaving as a woman of her status ought to behave. Her devotion would have been acceptable if she had remained within the women's quarters of the palace, but she sang and danced in the public space of the temple and associated with men outside her family, albeit holy men. A series of attempts on her life are recorded, instigated by the ruler, who is most often identified as her husband, though sometimes as her father-in-law or an evil brother-in-law. Poison, a venomous snake, and scorpions were sent to her, but she did not die.

In the end, she left her palace home and traveled to holy cities associated with Krishna. In Vrindavan, she met Jiv Goswami, disciple of Chaitanya. He initially refused to see her because she was a woman, but he welcomed her after she reminded him that all devotees are as women before Lord Krishna. She settled in Dwarka, but priests arrived from her marital home to bring her back. When she refused to go, they vowed to fast unto death. She relented, but when she entered the temple to take leave of Krishna, she reportedly disappeared, merging with his image.

There are no traditional historical sources to corroborate her life story and no early manuscript traditions that could be used to determine which of the songs attributed to Mirabai might have actually been composed by her. Nevertheless, a composite tradition of hagiography and poetry retells her story in multiple ways. Many people of different social, religious, and cultural backgrounds have contributed to this material and composed songs in her name, drawing on her authority and articulating a similar experience of love and devotion.

Those of low caste see in Mirabai one who voluntarily renounced a life of privilege. Women draw inspiration to step out of the normative roles of wife and mother. And in the twentieth century she became one of Mahatma Gandhi's premier examples of a person who practiced nonviolent resistance. Yet her behavior as a woman continues to challenge traditional notions of how women ought to behave and an ambivalence toward her remains.

Miracles

A miracle is usually defined as an extraordinary event that has been caused by divine intervention, unlike magic, which is a manipulation of the natural world by the power of a practitioner. Throughout the world, and over many centuries, people have wanted their holy people to bear witness to divine power through miracles. Sometimes holy people have been credited as miracle workers even when they have emphatically denied it, such as the early sufi Abu Yazid Bis-tami (ninth century). And even when the upper hierarchy of a religion has focused on characteristics other than the ability to channel miracles when defining holiness, popular belief has continued to delight in the miraculous as much-needed signs of the presence of the divine in the world.

Modern Roman Catholicism and its medieval Christian parent have required proof of miracles before formally canonizing a person as a saint; only a miracle (two for martyrs, three for confessors) is proof that the person in question really had conformed with God's will. Although less formalized, though, most of the world's religions at least sometimes regard the working of miracles as evidence that a person is holy.

Holy people are renowned for their ability to work miracles during their lifetimes, but often especially after their deaths. This is a major theme in Islam as well as in Orthodox and Catholic Christianity. There is a natural continuum: The saint showed great benevolence and care for people during life, therefore he or she naturally continues that concern after death, when he or she has been confirmed in holiness and enjoys special closeness to God. Indeed, it is their access to God in the afterlife that makes it possible for saints to intercede and ask for miracles. (It should be noted that Judaism, Christianity, and Islam make a firm distinction: Saints can intervene to request miracles, but actually working the miracle is in the power of God alone.)

Judaism regarded the matter differently, with its emphasis on this-worldly rather than next-worldly religiosity, which made posthumous miracles impossible. Living miracle workers were, however, important in Judaism at the beginning of the Common Era, and several early rabbis were credited with miraculous powers. The last great miracle-working rabbi was Hanina ben Dosa (fl. c. 70 C.E.). After that, with the exception of the modern Hasidic movement, the miracle workers were gradually displaced by the image of the sage as the ideal holy person.

Miracles can take many forms. A common type of miracle among ascetics is the miraculous appearance of food, signaling divine approbation of a marginal life beyond normal human communities and giving the ascetic strength to continue. For example, the Indian sufi Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar (1175–1265) made a forty-day retreat hanging upside down in a well; his fasting was rewarded when the nearby pebbles turned into sugar. Several Irish hermits had food come to them miraculously—a doe coming tamely to be milked, a raven supplying bread, an eagle carrying a fish, and so on—or created it themselves with miraculous divisions reminiscent of Jesus dividing loaves and fishes. Saints have not only turned water into wine; the Hindu devotional poet Kamalakanta Bhattacharya (c. 1769–1821) was accused of drunkenness, to which he responded by turning wine into milk. Among the rabbis credited with miraculous powers, there is even a talmudic story of two rabbis able to create a calf each week, in time to serve it up for Sabbath supper. It is not surprising, in subsistence-level economic systems, that people so often delighted in telling of miraculous provision of food.

It is also hardly surprising to find that many holy people have been credited with a miraculous ability to withstand great physical trials. Many early Christian martyrs are described as enduring horrendous tortures without suffering. Hindu saints, too, sometimes appear in the literature so focused on the divine that they do not notice physical pain. This phenomenon also appears in Islam. For example, the sufi Ahmad ibn 'Ali al-Rifa'i (1106–1182) was able to sit in a hot oven, and his followers have adopted practices such as snake handling, walking on hot coals, and eating broken glass.

In Eastern religions, supernatural abilities are often regarded as a side effect of enlightenment. It is almost a commonplace that arahants, the fully awakened, can hear and understand all the sounds in the universe, can read the thoughts of others, and can remember previous lifetimes. Beyond that, Buddhism recognizes eight standard paranormal abilities in people of outstanding holiness: (1) to project bodily images of one's self, (2) to become invisible, (3) to pass through solid objects, (4) to sink into solid ground, (5) to walk on water, (6) to fly, (7) to touch the sun and moon with one's hand, and (8) to ascend to the home of Brahma in the highest level of heaven. Similarly, Hinduism recognizes supernatural abilities, including mind-reading, clairvoyance, and levitation as a natural result of spiritual development.

But both religions have warned against cultivating or valuing such powers, regarding them as distractions; boasting about special powers is even one of the four traditional grounds for expulsion from the Buddhist samgha (monastic community). Mahayana Buddhism is rather more liberal in accepting the value of displaying powers to ordinary people, especially for teaching purposes. An interesting example is the Silla (Korean) Buddhist monk Chajang (590–658), famed as a wonder worker, who helped spread Buddhism throughout the kingdom especially by performing miraculous signs during his lectures. And supernormal powers are often valued in the tantric traditions of both Buddhism and Hinduism as signs of progress in the spiritual life; it is assumed, though, that the practitioner will eventually grow out of this stage. Although miraculous powers may be regarded warily or even despised by the elite, however, they continue to be loved by ordinary people and play a prominent role in legend. Thus the Buddhist philosopher Chandrakirti (c. 580–660) said that things lack essence and proved it by walking through stone columns, milking a picture of a cow to feed the monks, and even riding a stone lion. The first Sikh guru, Nanak, was also a noted miracle worker.

Other Eastern religions accept the basic view that true bonding with the divine allows one to set aside the illusions that govern the workings of the material world, placing the holy person in a state of transcendence. This is interpreted very realistically by Daoists, who believe that as a Daoist holy figure becomes perfect, his or her body becomes increasingly transparent. The Daoist “immortals” (xian) can multi-locate or change their appearance at will. They also apotheose instead of dying, the best of them rising to heaven in daylight in a chariot pulled by dragons and tigers. (Although even this is perhaps not as spectacular as the two Hindu holy women, Antal and Mirabai, who were absorbed into an image of a god.) Some Daoist stories are decidedly more whimsical. Zhang Guolao, one of the Daoist Eight Immortals, for example, had a magic mule that could be folded and put into a small bag when not being ridden. In general, however, the emphasis is on the holy person transcending the normal laws of nature. A similar transcendence was attributed to some of the Neoplatonist philosophers of Greece. Iamblichus (c. 240–325), for example, was credited with the ability to levitate (although he did his best to laugh it off).

Nothing stands in the way of a holy person, and legendary embellishments of miracles that break the laws of nature cross the boundaries of religion, place, and time. It is very common to discover holy people, in ages before extensive bridge-building, able to cross bodies of water—they part water (Moses, and many imitators in Christian hagiography), walk on water (especially common among Buddhist holy people), or float across water perched on a leaf or reed, a topos that extends from the Christian Irish saint Ia (d. 450) crossing the English Channel to the Buddhist Chan founder Bodhidharma (d. c. 530?), who crossed the Yangtze. Fires ignite themselves (or go out, or change their paths) for saints, trees bow to them, and the black stone of the Ka’aba even spoke at the demand of the Shi’i imam Zayn ‘Ali ibn al-Husayn (658–713).

The two greatest miracles of saints, however, are the ability to control the weather and to heal. Many African and Amerindian holy people are venerated for the ability to bring rain, although tales of this vital function can be found in most religions. The central Asian Buddhist monk Fotucheng (232–348 C.E.) was famous for his rainmaking, which won the ruler of China’s support for the spread of Buddhism. The Talmud tells of the Jewish miracle worker Honi ha-Me’aggel (1st century B.C.E.), who successfully prayed for rain in a time of drought. In Hinduism, miracles are often associated with a holy person’s ability to win the god’s favor through song or poetry. In one legend, the early nineteenth-century devotional composer Muthuswami Dikshitar (1775–1835) ended a drought when he and his son performed their music. Throughout the Christian Middle Ages, saints regularly supplied rain on request; even as late a saint as Catarina de San Juan (d. 1685) can count the turning back of a hurricane among her miracles.

Most recorded miracles of holy people, though, are miracles of healing. Hagiography presents a bleak panorama of human suffering only bearable because of the intervention of saints. Modern theories suggest the great power of the mind to heal the body—holy people have been able to act as important channels throughout history, winning people’s utter conviction that they could indeed be healed. Often such healings take place in highly emotional circumstances, ranging from camp meetings to pilgrimages at the shrine of a saint—and relapses are disappointingly frequent after the excitement has died down. But there is a body of modern scientific evidence that healing miracles do happen, which buttresses many centuries of belief in them.

Is the age of miracles over? Miracles have indeed fallen off in modern times in much of the world. Skepticism, “enlightenment” (in the philosophical sense), and the development of science have led the educated elites of many religions to question or even condemn belief in miracles. But a great many people still want and need miracles, and the miracle-working holy person is still alive and well. In the Christian world this has taken two tracks, in Catholicism focusing on the healing power of the Virgin Mary (for example at Lourdes) and in the rapidly growing Pentecostal communities giving full credit to charismatic “faith healers.” Many of the new religions of Asia and the Americas emphasize the miraculous powers of their leaders.

Miram

Hindu renunciant

Miram is one of the few well-known, contemporary woman renunciants within the Hindu tradition. Born in 1929 in the small village of Mehetpur in Punjab, India, Miram was known by her given name, Kamla, until her formal renunciation of worldly life at the age of fifty. Her mother was a traditional, dutiful Hindu wife who managed the domestic and ritual affairs of the household; her father was a merchant whose entrepreneurial successes never left his family for want of material comfort. They were disheartened that Miram, their eighth child, had not been a boy, but they generously supported the Arya Samaj, a Hindu social reform movement that advocated a return to the simple yet traditional Hindu rituals as espoused in the Vedas (revelatory scripture), the end of caste discrimination, and the improved status of women.

As a young girl, Miram showed academic promise. However, because higher education was not available in her home village, and independent study abroad for most Indian girls of her day was out of the question, Miram received no more than a basic secondary school education. While in her teens, Miram began preaching within her local Arya Samaj chapter, serving the destitute and lower-caste communities. By the age of eighteen, she had resolved, much to the initial disappointment of her family, to remain unmarried and continue undistracted with her religious works.

Miram remained under the guardianship of her father until her late thirties. As she immersed herself more deeply into her spiritual life, she gradually gave away all the gold ornaments and silk saris she had worn as a wealthy man's daughter and adopted instead a simple life of austerity. To purify herself, she would recite the name of God manifold times, read sacred verse from the Vedas, and perform daily puja (devotional worship). If ever she felt she had committed a sinful act, such as lying or speaking poorly to anyone, she would strike herself with a cane, resolving to become a master of her own vices. She also became a well-known preacher, lecturing to Arya Samaj groups throughout the Punjab region.

In 1969, Miram convinced her parents to permit her to move from the family home to an Arya Samaj religious ashram in the holy northern Indian city of Hardwar. Unlike many ancient and modern Hindu renunciants, Miram's basic material needs were met through the generosity of her father. Any fees she earned as a preacher she donated to the poor or used to fund the publication of scriptural verses and commentaries. In 1979, she was permitted by her brother, who was by then her guardian, to take formal initiation as a sannyasini (female renouncer).

Although Miram is not wholly independent like the many male renunciants in the Hindu tradition, her spiritual life and preachings, as Miram has expressed in her own writings, are significant as a testament of the power of human determination and an inspiration for other women who also yearn for the spiritual life.

Miriam

Hebrew prophet

The elder sister of Moses and Aaron, Miriam is cited by name fewer than ten times in the Hebrew scriptures, but those citations indicate that she was a significant leader of the Israelite Exodus from Egypt (cf. Mic. 6:4), notably at a time when her gender would have prevented her participation in civic affairs and assumption of public authority. She is first mentioned as the unnamed sister of Moses when the mother of Moses and Miriam, Yocheved, placed Moses into the river in a basket made of bulrushes (Exod. 2:3–4). The Talmud elaborates the scene to include that as Yocheved placed Moses in the river, the father, Amram, struck Miriam in the head, chiding her for her earlier prophecy that Moses would be the savior of Israel (Mas. Sotah 12b–13a).

Miriam is first mentioned by name in Exodus 15:20, just after the parting of the Red Sea and the drowning of the pharaoh's army as the waters returned to fill the seabed. At the sight of her people safe on dry land, and of the Egyptians lost in the sea, Miriam "the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam sang to them: 'Sing to the Lord for He has triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider he has thrown into the sea'" (Exod. 15:20–21). The song of celebration was not in response to the death of the Egyptians but in gratitude for the fulfillment of the prophecy of deliverance from slavery and persecution. Miriam understood that the redemption of her people was authentic, as the splendid might of Yahweh had made manifest, and she also perceived that her trust in her own prophecy had been rewarded. Historically, it was quite usual for the Israelite women to celebrate a victory with dancing and the striking of the timbrel (tambourine), but her victorious song of public thanksgiving implied broader recognition of her elevated position.

Later, however, as the Israelites continued their Exodus in the desert, Miriam seemed to chafe under Moses' presumption of authority. Numbers 12:1–15 implies that the dispute that arose between Miriam and Aaron and their brother Moses was about the fact that he had married (perhaps for a second time) a "Cushite" (north Arabian or Ethiopian) woman; however, their anger toward Moses likely stemmed from resentment over the preferential status he seemed to enjoy in the estimation of Yahweh and the people. They chided Moses, saying, "Has the Lord indeed spoken only through Moses? Has He not spoken through us also?" (Num.

12:2). Moses was too “meek” to respond to them in kind—so Yahweh spoke for him, summoning Aaron and Miriam to the “tent of meeting” (Num. 12:4). There, as a “pillar of cloud,” Yahweh scolded them, and Miriam was stricken with leprosy (it is of course very curious that Aaron, who had also complained, was not similarly stricken). Midrash accounts suggest that the divine consequence for gossip and jealous slander was commonly an attack of leprosy. Aaron immediately beseeched Moses to remove so terrible a punishment (Num. 12:11–12), and Moses called upon Yahweh to heal his sister. Yahweh would not relent, however, until she had suffered the disease and removal from the camp for seven days. Her people did not resume their journey until she had been returned into the fold, a testimony to her prominence and to the sincere respect with which she was regarded.

Miriam, like Aaron and Moses, would not live to see the Promised Land. She was the first of the three to die, in Kadesh, and was buried there. The exact month and year of her death is not reported.

Mirza Hasan Shirazi

Shi'i Muslim scholar

Hajji Mirza Sayyid Muhammad Hasan Shirazi, known as Mirza-yi Shirazi, was the foremost Shi'i scholar of the last part of the nineteenth century, being recognized as the sole marja' al-taqlid (focal point for emulation in religious law) for some twenty-five years. He reorganized the teaching of religious jurisprudence and temporarily moved the center of Shi'i scholarship from Najaf to Samarra, both in Iraq.

A descendant of the prophet Muhammad, Mirza-yi Shirazi was born in Shiraz, Iran, in 1815 to a family of merchants and religious scholars. He traveled to Najaf, where he studied under Shaykh Murtada Ansari and other leading scholars. Before Shaykh Murtada died in 1864, he nominated Shirazi to replace him, but it was about 1872 before he became acknowledged as the sole point of reference and emulation in matters of religious law (the sole marja' al-taqlid) and even then, there were a few counterclaimants. Strangely enough, Shirazi wrote few works, and none of those he did write achieved any lasting renown. Nevertheless, he is regarded as the mujaddid (renewer) of Shi'i Islam for the fourteenth Islamic century.

Sharazi did not like his position of leadership, and it is said that it was for this reason, hoping to escape it, that in 1874 he transferred his residence from Najaf to the town of Samarra (the place where the Shi'i twelfth imam, Muhammad al-Mahdi, was believed to have gone into occultation in 874). But his students followed him to Samarra and built for him a mosque and religious college there. Thus this town became the international center of Shi'i scholarship until Shirazi's death in 1895, when it reverted to Najaf.

Shirazi is best known for the episode of the Tobacco Regie. When Nasir ad-Din, Shah of Iran, sold a monopoly concession over all aspects of the tobacco trade to a British syndicate in 1890, the whole of Iran was scandalized. A fatwa (legal judgment) from Shirazi appeared in 1891 prohibiting the use of tobacco. There was almost universal compliance with this edict, even in the shah's own harem, and the shah was forced to revoke the monopoly to quell public disturbances. Some have said, however, that this fatwa was not actually by Shirazi but forged in his name. Certainly, at no other time in his life did Shirazi involve himself in political issues.

Misri, Dhu'n-nun al-

Muslim sufi

Abu'l-Fayd Thawban ibn Ibrahim al-Misri is an important figure of early sufism. He was born in 796 in upper Egypt, where he received his early education with some training in medicine, alchemy, and magic. He traveled to Mecca and Damascus, Syria, where he is reported to have met or come to know of some Christian ascetics. He openly opposed the Mutazilite school of theology (kalam) and rejected their doctrine of the “createdness” of the Qur'an. Toward the end of his life, he was imprisoned by the Abbasid rulers but released shortly thereafter by the caliph Mutawakkil. He returned to Egypt and died there in 861.

As a central figure of early sufism, al-Misri is distinguished from his predecessors, such as Harith al-Muhasibi (c. 781–857), Abu Yazid al-Bistami (d. c. 875), and Sahl al-Tustari (818–896), by his open advocacy of sufism as an independent path. He had many students and followers, earning him a title as the head of the sufis. Many of his prayers and sermons were recorded in later sufi sources. Al-Misri is also the first sufi figure to discuss spiritual states (ahwal) and wayfaring (suluk) in a systematic manner.

Asceticism underlies al-Misri's spiritual vocation. Renunciation of the world, detachment, self-discipline, invocation, and solitariness are among the themes to which al-Misri devotes considerable space. This emphasis can be seen as a reaction to the increasing worldliness of the society in al-Misri's time and its deviation from the path of the prophet Muhammad. The message of spiritual discipline and purification, however, has a timeless aspect to it in sufism as in other mystical traditions. Even though Islam opposes strict individualism, al-Misri emphasized solitude as a way of preventing indulgence in worldly affairs. He is reported to have said, "He who is alone sees nothing but God, and if he sees nothing but God, nothing moves him but the Will of God." This view of al-Misri has been accepted and practiced by many later sufis.

Al-Misri is also known for his teachings on metaphysical knowledge, or gnosis (ma'rifah). For the sufis, knowledge functions as a gateway to the mysteries of the divine and, once attained, transforms the soul. Al-Misri's primary interest in knowledge lay not in speculative theology or philosophy but in what may be called spiritual epistemology. In other words, he focused on attaining proximity to the divine in the "here and now" through knowing God. Al-Misri also emphasized love (hubb) as the most intimate mode of relationship with God. For him, loving God meant loving everything that God loves and shying away from everything that God detests.

Mission

The first large-scale religious mission in world history was that of the Buddhists, who believed that the Buddha's message was universal and therefore to be spread to all peoples. The English word "mission" specifically refers to a person "sent out," implying a central organization to do the sending, especially to convert people to the central body's religious beliefs. In reality, though, until the sixteenth century few Christian missionaries were "sent" by any authority besides their own conviction that they were doing God's work. Perhaps the phenomenon of going to win others to one's religion could better be described as "evangelization"—or spreading the "good news"—were it not that these terms have such a specifically Christian connotation.

Not all religions engage in missionary work, and not all that do so regard their missionaries as people of unique holiness. An important precondition is belief that other peoples can adopt one's own religion. Thus practitioners of tribal religions, including most of the religions of Africa and the Americas and to some extent Judaism, are barred from giving a central role to missionaries. If nobody but a fellow member of the tribe can join, it's hardly worth preaching the religion to others. This attitude seems to have been important in shaping Muslim attitudes toward missionaries as holy people. Although there certainly were Muslim missionaries who spent their lives working to convert those of other faiths, they have made little impression on the hagiographical tradition. Islam, when it admires missionaries, has tended to focus on the leaders of internal mission, those who deepen the faith of those already within the fold. This is also a side effect of the nature of Islamic expansion, which in its formative period was a massive military expansion, followed only gradually by an effort to convert those who had been integrated into the caliphate. One of the few Muslim holy people, besides the prophet Muhammad himself, whose missionary work has been a central part of his definition as holy person was the sufi Muinuddin Chisti (1141–1236), who played an important role in converting the native populace of India through his piety, teachings, and miracles, including defeating a court magician in a magic contest.

The great missionary saints are for the most part Buddhist and Christian, although it should be noted that the Bahá'í faith also emphasizes missionary efforts, and several of its holy people, including Martha Root (1872–1939) and Enoch Olinga (1926–1979), are most famous as missionaries. Both religions' attitudes toward missionaries as holy people were shaped by the fact that neither was a state religion in its formative period. Both followed the pattern of converting small groups spread out over wide areas, only later encountering the phenomenon of state-sponsored advocacy of conversion. And both religions regard the need to convert others as both good in itself and as a command by their founder. Indeed, Jesus' last command, according to Matthew's gospel, was "Go forth and teach all peoples . . ." (Matt. 28:18), which the apostles proceeded to do in a fashion that attracted a large body of later legend. Even before those stories developed, the earliest known layer of Christianity, the letters of Paul, were written by a man who devoted his life to winning converts to the new religion. In Buddhism, according to legend, sixty of the Buddha's "perfected" disciples were sent all over India to preach.

Nevertheless, Buddhist and Christian holy missionaries have some interesting differences that reflect the early structure of the two religions. Especially noteworthy is that many of the great missionaries of Buddhism are known for their role in teaching monks rather than the laity. For example, Daoan (312–385) was important in the early spread of Buddhism in China. But his missionary work was of a very erudite sort: He was especially famous for his ability to explicate difficult scriptures; he wrote commentaries; and he changed the principles behind the translation of Indian texts into Chinese. The Japanese monk Gyogi Bosatsu (668–749) stands out for his efforts to spread Buddhism to the common people. After the initial conversion of a monastic population, a second point that marks many Buddhist missionaries is that, rather than being “sent out” to a foreign land to convert others, they are often “sent in” from a marginal land to the heartland of Buddhism, where they study for many years and then take religious knowledge back and spread it in their homeland. A good case is that of the Japanese monk Eisai (1141–1215), who is credited with the establishment of Zen in Japan. Christian missions, by contrast, never focused on creating a religious elite within the host country, except inasmuch as they regarded all Christians as “elite.” Indeed, Christian missionaries have often been criticized in more modern times for their hesitancy in creating a native clergy. And most known Christian missionaries are “sent out,” in the sense of going to foreign lands to preach, rather than natives who return home with a religious message.

The missionaries of both religions were clearly aware that conversion of a king could win them a thousandfold return for their effort, since a convinced ruler could be counted on at least to protect further missionary efforts, if not to add governmental incentives to the process of conversion. Thus, as soon as Buddhists and Christians were in a position to reach royalty, they did so. The first Buddhist Indian king, Ashoka (third century B.C.E.), sent Buddhist missions out, including his own son Mahinda, who led a mission to Ceylon in about 250 B.C.E. Sure enough, Mahinda focused his efforts on the Sinhalese king, converting him and presenting him with a branch of the bodhi tree under which the Shakyamuni Buddha had meditated when he reached enlightenment. In gratitude for his teaching, a meditation hall was built over Mahinda’s remains. Formal missions of religious teaching became a common feature of diplomatic relations, accounting for the early spread of Buddhism to places such as Korea and Japan. The leaders soon became the stuff of legend. The second-century B.C.E. Indian monk Nagasena, known for his discussions on Buddhism with the Indo-Greek king Menander, was believed in legend to have been called onto earth for the specific task of converting the Greek. Similarly, a long line of Christian missionaries, ranging back to the sixth century, focused their efforts on rulers. Augustine of Canterbury (d. c. 604), with his mission to the kingdom of Kent, is just one example.

The great missionary saints, though, have been those whose mission was an expression of their own love of religious truth. Augustine of Canterbury, unwilling victim of Pope Gregory the Great’s missionary zeal, was never a popular saint; Patrick (d. c. 493), drawn to Ireland by, as he put it, the voice of God himself, has caught the imagination of millions of Christians over the centuries. The same is true of Buddhism: Courtier-missionaries such as Nagasena from approximately the second century B.C.E. are overshadowed by figures like the central Asian monk Fotucheng (232–348), who sent himself to the mission field (although with such success that he converted the ruler of China), or Bodhidharma (d. c. 530), an Indian master who traveled to China to spread the teachings of Buddhism, or a series of Indian monks, such as Kamalashila (c. 740–795) or Atisha (982–1054), who made their way to Tibet.

Because of the emphasis in Christianity on “heroic” qualities rather than learning as the prime characteristic of a saint, and especially the great Christian admiration of martyrdom—so much easier to obtain when out preaching to uncooperative natives—missionaries are very prominent in the ranks of the Christian saints, more so than in any other religion. Mission was not consistently emphasized in the Christian tradition until the sixteenth century on, however, when the establishment of missionary orders assured ongoing funding and workers for the missionary field. The apostles and Paul stand out as great missionaries of the early church, but after that the record of missionary work fades until the German encroachment into the Roman Empire. From then until about 850 there was a long series of great missionary saints, ranging from Irish wanderers such as Columbanus (543–615) to practical Anglo-Saxon organizers such as Boniface (c. 675–754). After that, an emphasis on the monastic life as a chief characteristic of holiness de-emphasized the holy credentials of missionaries, unless, like Adalbert of Prague (c. 956–997), they were fortunate enough to be killed in the mission field. What caught the Christian imagination instead was, from the thirteenth century on, the internal mission of preachers, above all followers of Dominic (1170–1223) and Francis (c. 1180–1226), who began preaching to their fellow Christians and soon found themselves engaged in a new external mission.

With the coming of the Reformation movements to sixteenth-century Europe, a new awareness developed especially in the Catholic world that internal and external mission were inextricably connected. Thus Ignatius of Loyola’s (1491–1556) highly successful Society of Jesus (Jesuits) not only sent dramatic secret missionaries to win back Protestant regions within Europe (such as most of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales) but also sponsored highly successful missions to newly explored lands, such as Francis Xavier’s (1506–1552) work in the Far East. The process produced many martyrs, both at home and abroad, encouraging still others to take to the mission field. The process is not as pronounced among Protestants, who in the formative sixteenth century did not engage in any large-scale missionary work, mostly because Protestant lands were not important in the early history of exploration. By the eighteenth century, however, Protestant missionaries such as John Wesley (1703–1791) were actively competing with their Catholic coreligionists. This process has continued to the present.

At times, missionaries have been regarded as the tools of imperialist powers. In many cases, however, they have been recognized as God-motivated people who have done much to help those to whom they have been sent, especially those who have treated the culture they have entered with respect and understanding. Outsiders, such as the Russian Orthodox Innocent of Alaska (1797–1879), or Nicolas Kassatkin (1836–1912), who created an autonomous Orthodox Church in Japan, have won the respect and veneration of the peoples whom they have converted, and many missionaries in Africa, both native and foreign, are recognized as holy people.

Mixcoatl

Amerindian ancestor, warrior

Mixcoatl was the legendary warrior ancestor of the seven tribes of Chicomoztoc. These Chichimecs left what is today northern Mexico and the southwestern United States in search of a better life and were successful at many conquests, as the pre-Columbian Leyenda de los soles (Legend of the suns) narrates. The fifth Aztec sun was inaugurated in the year Ce Acatl (One Reed), or 843, by the birth of Mixcoatl's son, Quetzalcoatl, after the Chichimec warrior battled Chimalman and impregnated her. (Some confusion exists in the sources; one states that Quetzalcoatl's father died in 835 despite the fact that Quetzalcoatl was not born until 845.)

To validate his reign, Quetzalcoatl had to resurrect the bones of his dead father. The ruler priest of Tollan (or Tula), Quetzalcoatl journeyed to the underworld to retrieve Mixcoatl's bones. This ritual was also common among the lowland Maya (250–700) and in Teotihuacan, another important ancient city for the Aztec Empire. All Mexica rulers were required to journey into the otherworld with the help of priests, and through the use of auto-sacrificial techniques and hallucinogens, to retrieve the right of succession from the previous ruler—usually their male relative.

Some of the confusion in the sources stems from the fact that Quetzalcoatl and Mixcoatl were perceived as historical figures as well as divinities who were important to many communities. The Leyenda de los soles seeks to link the Aztec Empire with the ancient Mesoamerican cities that the empire conquered and to legitimate Aztec power as a divine gift. The figures of Quetzalcoatl and Mixcoatl help the Mexica accomplish this. In fact, the Mexica divinity Huitzilopochtli, the patron of the Aztec Empire and Tezcatlipoca, the figure associated with conquest throughout Mesoamerica, have been linked to the ancestor Mixcoatl in various sources.

Mnkabayi ka Jama

Zulu ritual leader, chief

Certain "royal" Zulu women, such as Mnkabayi ka Jama, had significant ritual and religious roles in precolonial Zulu life in various ways and in varying degrees. Such roles were inextricably linked to their other functions in political affairs. Evidence concerning the Zulu "royal" women reveals similar links between ritual, religion, and chiefly power to that of males. The Zulu king had a very important religious role as the intermediary between the people and the ancestors. It is also often assumed that only the male ancestors are significant, but as Henry Callaway (1970 [1885]) pointed out, protection was also sought from women. The Zulu believed that though ancestors had departed the living world, they were ever present.

Mnkabayi (sister of King Shaka's father, Senzangakhona ka Jama, 1757–1816) demonstrated leadership in both ritual and military affairs. Her influence—and that of other powerful women—extended far beyond the household and was not dependent on men. Mnkabayi assumed leadership following the deaths of Jama (her father), Senzangakhona, and Shaka ka Senzangakhona (1787–1828). She seems to have been a reasonably young woman when she became joint chief of the Zulu with her male cousin Mudli. This casts doubt on claims that postmenopausal ritual cleanliness allowed women political and ritual influence.

The ancestors of previous Zulu rulers—including women—were central to social life and to the legitimacy of the leadership. The women's Nobamba and esiKlebheni ikhanda (military establishments) were located near the graves of kings and provided a vital link to Zulu ancestors. This area (Makhosini district) was of great ritual and religious significance where praising of the ancestors and various ceremonies were undertaken. The graves and ancestors of women such as Mnkabayi were also important in rituals, including purification, and as a refuge for those sentenced to execution. The ancestral shade of Mnkabayi was accorded as prominent a place as that of Shaka. She was praised along with kings in a way that recognized both her religious and political authority.

Custodianship of the inkatha (grass coil symbolizing the binding together of the “nation”), the sacred symbol of the office of kingship, seems to have been traditionally in the hands of significant women. Senzangakhona is said to have entrusted the inkatha to his kinsman Langazana. Because the inkatha was kept in the back of the hut, it could be argued that Langazana's custodianship resembles the chief wife's duties in tending to the family ancestors. However, a simple transfer from household to state fails to consider the religious power of royal women. Once again, Langazana's role cannot simply be put down to postmenopausal status or being “permanently ritually clean.”

Other women were also keepers of medicines or played some part in rainmaking rituals. One way in which certain royal women's role in religion and ritual was signified was by their separation from ordinary people and through the processing of medicine in the Zulu isigodlo (the king's private enclosure consisting of the huts of his women and children)—sacredness beyond sexual seclusion. Symbolic celibacy was a particular status among royal women. It separated them from ordinary people and was likely held as sacred. Both Shaka and his successor Dingane (r. 1828–1840) seem to have appropriated the symbolic celibacy of significant women. Neither their father nor grandfather before them practiced this. The implications of transfer of gender have been pinpointed by Harriett Ngubane's (1977) study of the Zulu, which argues that divination is a “woman thing.”

Some male chiefs asked women leaders for their help in combating plagues and making rain. Many women held chiefly positions in southern Africa and demonstrated leadership in both military and ritual affairs. Mjantshi (alias Mjanji, Mochache, Mabelemade), chief of the Venda, was well known for her skill as a rainmaker and in medicines. In 1897, François Coillard also described a woman chief named Nashintu who “exercised power by means of her medicines and her charms. She has a Pandora's box: she dispenses drought and hail, calamities and epidemics, at will.” Ntombazi of the Ndwandwe, in the same period, held some ritual importance, as her hut was deemed sacred. Medicines were kept in her hut, which was also used by chief Zwide to purify himself. Zwide's daughter also held ritual status. She was, according to Bryant (1929), a renowned rainmaker. The activities of these women were exercised publicly and through ritual and their role was not simply ceremonial.

Models

There are two sorts of holy people in the world's religions: those who are exemplary human beings whose lives provide a model for others, and those who appear to their admirers to live lives of such uniquely god-touched virtue that they cannot be imitated. For example, in Christianity the early Irish saints appear as superhuman, heroic figures who are singled out by God even before their births; their hagiographical tradition does not present them as objects to be imitated, but to be marveled at. Similarly, in early Buddhism the life of early monks and nuns was considered admirable, but beyond the reach of normal people. Many of the holy people of African and American indigenous religions also are depicted in this strongly heroic light, as something fundamentally inimitable. However, probably the majority of holy people have acted, intentionally or not, as models for other holy people, and sometimes for a much wider population. This has been an important theme in Daoism and Confucianism; recurs periodically in Christianity, Hinduism, and Buddhism; and appears occasionally in Judaism and Islam.

Even some of the “hero” holy people reached their holy status for characteristics that could be imitated. For example, in Phoenician legend, Dido, the founder of Carthage, was deified for her noble behavior, specifically her decision to kill herself rather than marry against her will and to her people’s detriment. Other holy people have been admired and imitated for a life of virtue rather than for a specific virtuous act. This is especially important in Hasidic Judaism and in Protestant Christianity. In Hasidism, the tzaddiq, head of the community, is subject to constant scrutiny by followers who observe the leader’s behavior to see how God can be worshipped in every detail of life. Although less formally, Christian leaders are often similarly watched, and the pattern of canonization for the past century has emphasized for Roman Catholics the sort of virtues to which any good Christian can aspire, specifically enjoining the faithful to imitate the saint. A less formal practice occurs for Protestant holy people; biographies, sermons, and television all hold the individual up as a model for emulation. Christian Scientists regard Jesus himself as a human being who laid the path to salvation by example, rather than divinity, and in Orthodoxy to be a saint is to identify oneself fully with Christ. Other holy people have provided role models for later saints, such as Simeon the Stylite (c. 390–459), who inspired a number of pillar-sitting saints; Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), who provided a model for Rose of Lima (1586–1617); or even John Brown (1800–1859), the Christian abolitionist who influenced the more problematic case of the Malawian John Chilembwe (1875–1915) in the latter’s attack on colonial oppression. In Sikhism, Gurus Nanak (1469–1539) and Gobind Singh (1666–1708) are regarded as the most important models for Sikhs to follow in their life and worship; ‘Abdu’l-Baha (1844–1921) has held the same position in the Bahá’i faith.

Sometimes, however, holy people are regarded not so much as models of virtue as they are of fulfillment of human potential. This is particularly true of Daoism. The Daoist immortal and perfected holy people are regarded as people who reached their spiritual state by their own efforts. Any human being can theoretically reach such status; thus the Daoist holy person shows what is possible to humankind.

Moggallana (Pali: Mahamoggallana; Skt.: Maudgalyayana)

(5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist disciple

In the lands of Theravada Buddhism especially, the two figures who merit most reverence (besides the Buddha) are the Buddha’s two chief disciples, Shariputra (Sariputta) and Moggallana. Shariputra, the Buddha’s right-hand disciple, is famed as the one foremost in wisdom, and Moggallana, the Buddha’s left-hand disciple, is renowned as the quintessential yogi, foremost in the supernatural powers that rise out of an advanced meditator’s ability to rapidly enter into deep states of meditative absorption.

These two are recognized as ideal exemplars who kept the first monastic order pure. Shariputra is likened to a mother, in that he best “brings forth” the Buddha’s teaching, while Moggallana is likened to a nurse who best protects the teaching. As such, Moggallana was the main monk charged by the Buddha to look after the welfare of other monks, as well as to inspect and set right the behavior of other disciples. The Buddha repeatedly praised Moggallana for his eloquent sermons. As teachers, the difference between Shariputra and Moggallana is that Shariputra taught by means of clear instruction, whereas Moggallana taught through use of supernatural powers.

It is Moggallana’s mastery of supernatural powers, such as mentally creating various bodies and exercising his skills in clairaudience, mind reading, and clairvoyance, that has most contributed to his reputation as a saintly figure. His most famous display of supernatural power is his extraordinarily mighty defeat of a dangerous snake king whose hood had enveloped the world in darkness. This epic feat is so important as to be a main part of blessing verses recited at almost all Theravada ceremonies.

Moggallana, famous for his visits to various heavens and hells, functions as a shaman of sorts by returning to report about these realms to the denizens of earth. These teachings help reinforce the law of karma, or “action” (Pali: kamma), relating to people how they can gain good rebirths as a result of wholesome actions or become reborn in bad destinies because of unwholesome actions. Thus Moggallana can be seen as a key exponent of moral responsibility, a central feature of Buddhist ethics.

Finally, Moggallana was one of the first disciples to realize nirvana (Pali: nibbana), the “extinguishing” of craving, hatred, and delusion.

Monasticism and Holy People

Several of the world's religions, most notably Buddhism and Christianity, have developed the institution of monasticism, the communal life of professional, full-time religious people who support one another in the religious life. The English word "monasticism" derives from a Greek root meaning "alone," specifically "alone with God." In the Christian tradition, this pursuit can take several forms, including especially the eremitical (hermits) and cenobitic (communal) forms. Rather confusingly, though, the term "monasticism" is generally used to describe only the latter form of religion, a practice that will be followed here. Monks are also defined as practitioners of an ascetic life because they give up many of the pleasures of "the world" (most notably sex) in order to devote themselves completely to spiritual development. Especially in Buddhism and medieval and modern Roman Catholic Christianity, the monastic life has traditionally been regarded as the surest spiritual path, so a highly disproportionate number of holy men and women in both traditions have been monks and nuns. Other religious traditions have denounced such renunciation of the world as escapism and even moral cowardice, groups including most Protestant denominations (with the exception of Anglicanism), mainstream Judaism, and the Sikh faith.

Even those religions that reject formal monasticism, though, have often recognized the importance of belonging to a group of like-minded people for support and encouragement in the religious life. Many modern Christian cults, although claiming adherence to the Protestant tradition, separate their members from the "taint" of the world into self-reliant communities of mutual support; thus many modern cult leaders, including figures such as Jim Jones, can be regarded as in an essential sense monastic founders. The ancient Greek Pythagoras (c. 570–497 B.C.E.) similarly founded communities of both men and women who practiced a simple and spiritual communal life. By encouraging one another in a life of asceticism and avoiding the temptations of secular society, such monks and nuns can often propel one another to a life of true religious devotion. In popular esteem, such figures stand out especially as "other-worldly" in the most literal sense, often described as already "dead to the world" and thus in an important liminal space between humankind and the divine.

As liminal figures, monastics have often been able to have a major impact on the affairs of the world, acting as models of the "true" religious life, at times serving as important missionaries of their religions, interceding with secular authorities, and, most important, interceding with heavenly forces on behalf of more earthbound mortals. Abbots of monastic communities and founders of new monasteries or monastic orders have been especially singled out for status as holy people, in part because of their influence in society as a whole. For example, early Christian authorities such as Athanasius (c. 300–373) worked very hard to win the support of monks as well as hermits against the heretics he opposed, knowing that such figures could sway the populace.

Christian cenobitic monasticism took shape in the fourth century, especially thanks to the leadership of figures such as Antony of the Desert (fl. 300–340), Pachomius (c. 290–c. 346), and Basil the Great of Caesarea (330–379). All three recognized the dangers of isolated religious life, but Basil especially stressed community as in itself an ascetic discipline, encouraging humility. The movement soon spread to Western Europe and came to dominate the religious conscience of the Middle Ages. Thousands of boys and girls were turned over to the monastic life as young children, and many developed in that environment into great mystics, spiritual writers, reformers, and leaders of the Christian community. In the case of Christianity, though, the life of the wandering ascetic was regarded as antithetical to monasticism, and until the early modern period engagement with secular society was frowned upon, thanks to a profound conviction that no normal human being, when confronted with serious temptation, can resist it. Thus monasticism in the Christian tradition has waxed and waned in accordance with the broader beliefs of society over time. Perhaps the greatest transformation of all occurred in the sixteenth century, when a series of great Roman Catholic saints redefined monastic values in favor of outreach to the rest of society. Certainly the number of monastics formally canonized by the Roman Catholic church far outstrips any other category of people in society attaining this honor. In part, this can be attributed to the weight of a full monastic institution being thrown behind the canonization of its own members; in part, it certainly reflects the important role monks and nuns have played in the history of Christianity.

The religions that developed in India stress ascetic practices as essential to holiness and also recognize the communal structure, in Buddhism the samgha, as a nearly indispensable tool to enlightenment. Thus, while Buddhism recognizes that a person can attain spiritual awakening without the assistance of any other human being, without a teacher and without being a member of the samgha, this is indeed very rare. Run-of-the-mill holy people require a teacher and a communal structure to guide them along the right path, preventing too much asceticism as well as too little, helping the individual to eliminate the self-will that is the most important impediment to enlightenment. Buddhist monastic discipline, vinaya, is seen as so central to a spiritual life that in some Buddhist lands all boys are sent to reside in a monastery for a year or two. Christianity has similarly emphasized the importance of this structured asceticism that is available only in the monastery. Tantric Buddhism gives a larger role to the solitary holy person, and the Pure Land sect that developed in China and Japan turned against the monastic establishment, but they are exceptions in a religion that otherwise is still dominated by a monastic sensibility. Monasticism has had a rockier path in Christianity, in large part because in this religion withdrawal from the world has always existed in uneasy relationship with gospel precepts that order engagement in the world. Thus Protestantism has by and large denounced monasticism as self-centered—a stand belied by the massive growth of Roman Catholic monastic movements in the early modern and modern periods whose members have devoted their whole lives to service in the world, including thousands of teachers, missionaries, and caregivers, many of whom have received canonization as saints.

Hinduism, which also stresses renunciation of the world as necessary for holy people, has included several monastic leaders, such as Shankara (d. 732 C.E.), a leader of the Vedanta school who established four great monastic centers in India. Similarly, the nineteenth-century Hindu reformer Vivekananda started a large monastic movement as a necessary step for the revival of Hinduism. Some branches of Jainism have similarly formed the supports of community for the mendicant renunciants who form the elite of the religion, including a special initiation for ascetics and a system comparable to the Buddhist samgha.

Islam in general opposes monasticism, which is held to denigrate the goodness of God's creation with vows that keep monks from enjoying what the world has to offer. Still, Islamic mysticism, sufism, has at times taken on many of the attributes of monasticism. The central early sufi figure Dhu'n-nun al-Misri (796–861) was the first to openly advocate sufism as a personal religious path based on renunciation of the world, solitude, and detachment as necessary conditions for closeness to God—a concept very similar to both Buddhist and Christian monasticism. Sufism developed as a permanent religious life, separate from the distractions of the world and often led in communities of like-minded individuals. Sufis sometimes even formalized this monastic impulse, living in khanaqahs, convents in which members of a sufi order could find support and encouragement from their peers.

In both Buddhism and Christianity, men and women who have supported monasticism are often themselves regarded as saints; a look at any list of saints of the Christian Middle Ages suggests that the surest path to recognition as a saint was to found a monastery. Several lay Buddhists are similarly honored for their support and encouragement of the samgha.

Monica

Christian holy woman

Monica was the mother of Augustine of Hippo (354–430) and a saint in the Catholic Church in her own right. Nearly all of what we know of Monica comes from her son's writings. She was born in 331 in Thagaste in North Africa and brought up in a Christian household. She married Patricius, an apparently ill-tempered and unfaithful husband who was not a Christian, at an early age and learned how to deal with him by using her wits to avoid being beaten. She had three children, but Augustine, the eldest, was her favored child, though he caused her great distress at his behavior and initial rejection of Christianity. Monica barred her son from her house while he was a Manichaean, seeking advice from her bishop on how best to handle her wayward son. Though pained by her son's religious rebellion, she never lost faith in him and was comforted by dreams that she believed were messages from God. Monica saw her husband convert before his death, and as a widow she was free to follow Augustine on his journeys, even when he secretly left Africa for Rome. Augustine credited his mother's daily prayers for helping him on his own spiritual journey.

In Milan, where her son had a position as professor of rhetoric, she attended the sermons of Ambrose of Milan and encouraged her son to accompany her. Monica admired Ambrose, certain that he was the kind of educated orator who would appeal to her son. Devoted to Ambrose, she stayed with him in his church when he was besieged by soldiers sent by the Arian empress. She even accepted Ambrose's chastisement for her African Christian practice of holding feasts and drinking wine at the tombs of the martyrs.

Monica's concern about her son's religious beliefs was matched by her desire for an advantageous marriage for Augustine, which she herself eventually arranged, forcing him to abandon his African concubine and mother of his child. The marriage she arranged never took place because the bride-to-be was very young. After Augustine's conversion and baptism by Ambrose in 387, Augustine left his position in Milan for a monastic life of prayer and celibacy, ending Monica's hopes. Monica stayed with her son and lived a monastic life along with her grandson, who had accompanied his father, and a small group of Augustine's friends. Monica fell ill during their return journey to Africa and died in Ostia, the port of Rome, in 387. She was buried in Ostia. A fragment of her epitaph, written by a consul, was accidentally discovered in 1945. The cult of St. Monica only became popular in the thirteenth century when a visiting medieval pilgrim moved some of her relics to France.

Montanus

(d. c. 180 C.E.)

Christian prophet

Montanus founded an early Christian revivalist movement generally referred to as "Montanism," known among his early followers as "the new prophecy." The movement began, probably in the mid-160s, when Montanus began to utter prophetic oracles in ecstasy in a Phrygian village called Ardabau (in western Asia Minor, exact location unknown). What little is known of him comes from his ecclesiastical detractors, who labeled his movement "the Phrygian heresy."

Four of Montanus's oracles, generally regarded as genuine, are preserved by the heresiologist Epiphanius (315–403). It is reported that Montanus was a recent convert to Christianity, but his brand of Christianity seems to reflect a typically Asian emphasis on prophetic activity and eschatological expectation, influenced by the Johannine writings of the New Testament. Montanus was joined by two women prophets, Maximilla and Priscilla, who became cofounders of the movement. Montanus presumably moved from Ardabau to the vicinity of two other Phrygian villages, Pepouza and Tymion (locations only recently established), and these came to be designated by the leaders of the movement as the parameters of the site of the "New Jerusalem" expected to come down from heaven (Revelation 3:12, 21:2).

The nature of Montanus's prophecy can be gleaned from his oracles: He claimed to be the Lord God Almighty dwelling in man and announced that he had come as "the Lord God the Father." He likened the human to a lyre and himself to the plectrum, saying he was able to awaken people from sleep and change their hearts. He prophesied that the righteous would "shine a hundred times brighter than the sun." Prophetic ecstasy cultivated by Montanus and his followers presumably included glossolalia (tongue-speaking). Members of the movement followed a rigorist lifestyle, including special fasts and abstinence from sex (Maximilla and Priscilla were said to have left their husbands), and martyrdom was encouraged. How Montanus died is not known; the report that he and Maximilla committed suicide in about 180 is probably anti-Montanist gossip. A purported tomb of Montanus and the women at Pepouza was destroyed by Bishop John of Ephesus in the sixth century.

The Montanist movement spread rapidly, especially in rural areas, and soon attracted the attention of ecclesiastical authorities, who tried in vain to stamp it out. By the end of the second century, the movement had spread to the west as far as Gaul and into North Africa. The prolific Christian teacher Tertullian (c. 155/160–after 220) became a Montanist convert. But with the Christianization of the Roman Empire, the power of the state was applied against the movement, culminating under Justinian I (r. 527–565).

Moon, Sun Myung

Founder of the Unification Church

Born in 1920 to Confucian peasant parents in what is now North Korea, Yong Myung Moon joined the Presbyterian Church along with his family in 1930. However, when he was sixteen years old, he had a vision of Jesus Christ that started him on a unique religious path that blended elements of Eastern religion with his own interpretation of Christianity. He eventually founded the Unification Church, which at present has some 2 million followers who recognize him as "Father" and "Lord of the Second Advent." Moon, who changed his name to Sun Myung—"one who has clarified Truth"—teaches that he is the second messiah: Jesus' mission on earth had been to save humankind both spiritually and physically, but it was only half successful, effecting only a spiritual salvation; Moon's task is to finish this divine purpose.

Moon's background is obscure until he made his home in the United States in late 1971. He founded the Broad Sea Church in Pyongyang (North Korea) in 1946 but was imprisoned and expelled from the country, either because of his anti-Communist teachings or his sexual promiscuity, depending on whether the account is by friends or enemies. In 1954, Moon went on to found the Unification Church in Seoul. His teaching was fleshed out in the following years, especially marked by his final marriage (his first marriage had ended in divorce) to Hak Ja Han in 1960, which, according to believers, ushered in the "Cosmic Era." The two were recognized as the True Parents, and their union the completion of Jesus' ministry. The theological argument is that humankind fell from grace because Eve had sexual intercourse with Satan, and that humanity's physical salvation can thus only be accomplished by means of perfect marriages that will beget sinless children, marriages that Moon and his wife have the sole power to bless. This has become a central teaching of the Unification Church, which conducts mass weddings of up to 300,000 couples at a time, the couples often meeting for the first time at the wedding.

Sun Myung Moon has been a very controversial figure in recent religious history because of claims that he "brainwashes" his followers. Current research suggests that although the Unification Church puts a great emphasis on group conformity, the charge of brainwashing cannot be supported. Moon has also provoked widespread criticism because of his very active fund-raising program and subsequent investment in a wide variety of enterprises, including ownership of the Washington Times. Moon himself was charged with tax evasion in 1983 and spent thirteen months in prison in 1984–1985, which he interpreted as persecution caused by antireligious and racist prejudice. In the mid-1990s, Moon shifted his focus to South America, and he has developed a "model community" in Brazil.

Mopsus

Greek seer

Known as one of the great seers in Greek myth, Mopsus appears to be the name of a historical man, or perhaps a family. One genealogy said he was the son of Apollo and Manto (Prophetess), the daughter of Tiresias. After founding the oracle of Claros on the coast of Asia Minor, he migrated to Cilicia (in modern southern Turkey), where the town Mopsuetia was named after him. His historicity seems confirmed by the phrase “house of Mopsus” that appears in a Phoenician-Luwian inscription found near Cilicia. In myth he was celebrated as the seer on the ship Argo that transported Jason on his quest for the Golden Fleece. According to the Hellenistic poet of this expedition, Apollonius of Rhodes (third century B.C.E.), Mopsus died in Libya from a snake bite.

The principal story about Mopsus told how in Cilicia he defeated Calchas in a prophecy contest. Calchas asked, “How many figs on that tree?” “Ten thousand,” Mopsus replied, “enough to fill a bushel with one left over.” When Mopsus was proved right, Calchas asked, “How many piglets will that sow give birth to?” “Three, and one female.” Mopsus was right again, and Calchas died of chagrin.

Mora, Francisco (Ifá Moroté)

Santería priest

Francisco Mora was a Cuban American who popularized African religious traditions in the United States. He was initiated into the Lucumi religious tradition, known popularly as Santería (Way of the Saints), in Havana, Cuba, in 1944 and was made a priest of Ifá in a line of priests going back to the famous Adechina, who brought wide knowledge of the tradition from Africa. Ifá is a compendium of Yoruba medical and spiritual knowledge that is made available to devotees through a complex oracular system. A priest of Ifá must memorize thousands of verses in the Yoruba language and be able to apply them to life situations as the oracle dictates. Mora became an Ifá master and in 1946 became the first priest to establish a practice in the United States. He settled in New York. In 1964, he organized what is believed to be the first ceremony in the United States involving the sacred batá drums that call the African orisha spirits.

In the 1970s, Mora presided over a large community of Latino and African American initiates from his home in the Bronx. He was frequently called upon to travel to the Caribbean and South America, where his expertise was required and his generous counsel eagerly sought. By his own estimate, he had more than 6,000 “godchildren” in the Lucumi religious tradition.

Moraa

(fl. early 20th cent. C.E.)

Kenyan visionary, healer

Moraa, like the more famous Tanzanian Kinjikitile, was one of the many seers and indigenous doctors who emerged in Kenya during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in the aftermath of British colonialism. Partly because of the patriarchal nature of the Gusii community of western Kenya of which she was a member, not much is known about her life. However, it is possible to deduce that she was middle-aged by 1900. Sources identify her as Moraa, wife of Ngiti of Bogeka, subclan of Getutu.

Moraa’s knowledge of medicine helped the Abagusii to win wars against the neighboring Luo and Kipsigis. Moreover, she predicted the coming of British colonialism in Gusii country and its effect on the native population. She foresaw and forewarned her people that the British would take away their land and cattle and conscript their children into forced labor.

Consequently, Moraa encouraged and instigated the Abagusii to resist colonial rule. William Ochieng’ (1974) reports that when a white administrator robbed Otenyo (Omogusii) of two of his best cows, Moraa protested harshly. Not only did she condemn the robbery, she also demanded that the young people of her community take the white man down. Moraa’s persistent exposure of the evils of British colonial domination culminated in the 1908 Gusii uprising. Moraa’s activities did not enchant the British. They branded her a witch doctor who was ignorant of the British civilizing mission. This was clearly a misconception of Moraa’s mission. Unfortunately, owing to patriarchy among the Gusii, Moraa was not accorded the recognition she deserved.

Moraa provided a discourse on the basis of which protest action was undertaken against the British. Like all great leaders who lead their people in times of crisis, she gave the Abagusii hope and determination in their hour of need. Ngugi wa Thiong'o and Micere Mugo's play The Trial of Dedan Kimathi (1977) has many passages that dramatize resistance to colonial rule in different Kenyan communities. The Gusii uprising of 1908 was one of many instances of protest against the British. Ngugi and Micere Mugo see the Mau Mau as the latest among a series of such protests.

Morality and Holy People

Most holy people in the world religious traditions have taught moral values, often modeling ethical behavior to others or fighting to raise the ethical awareness of the general populace. This is one of the difficulties of defining holy people at all in Judaism—since all Jews are held to a high ethical standard, it is hard to distinguish between a “good” Jew and a “holy” one. The vast majority of people defined as holy would have agreed with the Persian sufi al-Suhrawardi (1145–1234), who stressed proper moral conduct (abab), that the physical world is related to the spiritual world, so a person's behavior must match his or her inner state. He especially emphasized the necessity of obeying the law completely as a manifestation of divine order. Indeed, Buddhism regards the arahant, the fully awakened person, as actually incapable of certain kinds of moral transgression, essentially equating religious and moral perfection. On the whole, Christians have judged their saints by a higher standard of morality than that used for ordinary mortals, especially emphasizing the “councils of perfection”—poverty, chastity, and obedience.

Nevertheless, ethical conduct has not been regarded as necessary to all holy people. Daoists stand out especially for their amoral notions of what can raise a mortal to the ranks of immortality. For example, the Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove, a group of Daoist poets, scholars, and musicians believed to have gained immortality in the third century, lived what most would regard a rather decadent life, drinking, making music, and taking drugs. They were mostly interested in longevity techniques, a preoccupation of Daoism that makes it hard to classify the holy people of that religion with holy people of most other parts of the world.

Oddly, however, some people have been regarded as holy because they have consciously abandoned the normal rules of ethical behavior. Such people appear in several religions as “holy fools” or “madmen for God's sake.” Although some such people may indeed have been insane, it is clear in several cases that they were performing a profound social commentary, rousing people to awareness of the meaning behind societal rules and precepts. A whole class of Hindu holy persons, the vamacharis (followers of “left-handed” conduct), reverse the rules of what is pure and impure as a necessary part of their path to liberation.

In general, the problem has arisen more commonly of what to do when a person of perceived holiness advocates a practice regarded by his or her society as immoral. Islamic theologians debated whether satanic inspiration could be mistaken for the voice of God, and therefore whether divine inspiration should be passed on to others as a guide to ethical conduct. Many tales of Christian saints tell of demonic temptation posing as divine guidance, encouraging the saints to act in immoral ways—only to be foiled by the purity of the saint.

Particularly difficult is the problem of understanding the moral vision of holy people in a multicultural society, since the ethics of different cultures differ considerably. For example, it is hard for a Christian to recognize a polygamist as a saint, or to accept esoteric Daoist sexual practices as a point of connection to the divine. It serves as an important warning that, for all their similarities, we should not forget that holy people are the products of their own cultural systems.

More, Thomas

Roman Catholic scholar, martyr

Thomas More, author of Utopia (1516), A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation (1533), written during his imprisonment, and many other works, was chancellor of England under Henry VIII from 1529 to 1532. More was executed on a charge of treason in 1535 for having denied King Henry's Act of Royal Supremacy, which, among other things, rejected the pope's supremacy over the English Catholic Church. Catholics acclaimed More a martyr for his faith.

Trained as a lawyer, More was also interested in a formal religious life but eventually married and raised a family. His Chelsea home became a center of intellectual pursuits and pious living. When Henry VIII appointed More chancellor, they worked closely early on, especially in their mutual attack on Lutheranism. However, Henry's pursuit of a divorce from Catherine of Aragon, and the king's subsequent attack on the Catholic Church and the power of the pope, strained their relationship. Eventually More resigned his office and retired from public life. More's desire to avoid a public confrontation with Henry was denied him following Henry's marriage to Anne Boleyn. More refused to swear an oath to the Act of Succession, which declared the king's divorce from Catherine valid. He was arrested on a charge of high treason, along with the bishop of Rochester, John Fisher, who spurned the oath on the same day. During his trial, More acknowledged that although he did not object to the succession, he would not affirm any act that included a repudiation of papal supremacy. More was found guilty and beheaded shortly after Fisher met the same end.

English Catholics' veneration of saints, including More, was driven underground with the establishment of Protestantism in England. Nevertheless, More's hagiography was communicated by a series of sixteenth-century biographies, some written by members of his family. His supporters' versions and the polemics that ensued mirror the struggle between Catholics and Protestants in England and the Reformation and Catholic Reformation both in England and on the European continent.

Thomas More was beatified in 1886 and canonized by Pope Pius XII in 1935. His feast day is celebrated, along with that of John Fisher, on June 22.

Morèmi

Yoruba legendary heroine

The Yoruba people of southwestern Nigeria trace their origin and that of the entire human race to their city of Ile-Ife. According to legend, shortly after creation, the Igbo, who occupied a nearby forest, began repeated attacks against Ife. The invaders appeared as inhuman beings (nicknamed Eluyare), causing such terror that Ife's warriors could not put up any resistance, and each attack resulted in heavy losses in lives and property.

Respite soon came from the heroism of Morèmi, a beautiful woman and the wife of one of Ife's heroes. Fired with patriotism and determined to end the attacks, she resolved to find out what the Igbos really were and how to fight them. She solicited the support of the orisha (goddess) of Esinminrin stream and vowed that if she succeeded in her plans, she would offer the greatest sacrifice she could afford. Her strategy was not to flee from another invasion but to be taken captive so that she could learn the secrets of Igbo military superiority.

Soon after this, there was another attack, and Morèmi was captured. Owing to her beauty, she was taken to the palace of the Igbo king along with other war booty. Before long, she rose to become a favorite wife and palace confidante. From her vantage position, she discovered that what gave Igbo soldiers their unearthly and fearful look was their garments made of raffia fiber, bamboo leaves, and visor-like helmets. She also learned that the greatest antidote to this strategy would be to set fire to the raffia garments. With these secrets, Morèmi escaped to Ife and revealed the secret of Igbo war techniques. Not knowing that Ife now had an answer to the invasions, the Igbo launched another attack. However, rather than running away, Ife soldiers fought with lighted torches, setting fire to the garments, and this forced the Igbo to run for their lives.

After the victory, Morèmi went to express her gratitude to Esinminrin. She offered various gifts, such as lambs, goats, rams, and kolanuts, in sacrifice. Esinminrin, however, rejected the gifts but demanded Olúorogbo, Morèmi's only son. All entreaties to the orisha to accept a substitute for the boy failed; hence Morèmi had no option but to sacrifice her son.

Ife's military victory and Morèmi's personal sacrifice are commemorated in the annual Edi festival. In further recognition of Morèmi's contribution, schools and other public places have also been named after her. Modern scholarship, however, has interpreted the episode both as an encounter between the aboriginal inhabitants of the forest and the newcomers led by a chief named Oduduwa and as a clash between rival factions within the town.

Moses

Hebrew prophet, lawgiver, founder

Above all, Moses was a prophetic redeemer, lawgiver, and founder of Judaism, a religion based on complete monotheism and loyalty to God in a new land of promise (Canaan) and characterized by adherence to the Torah (Law). Israel was to be a holy nation, a model for others. Some consider Abraham the first Jew, but others argue that, although the patriarchs paved the way for the Sinai covenant, Moses first gave the religion its form. According to tradition, the entire Pentateuch was written by Moses, but modern scholarship suggests that the texts that constitute the Pentateuch took their current shape long after the events they describe had occurred; that they incorporate a number of tropes common in other Near Eastern heroic literatures significantly complicates the historicity of the narrative.

Christianity also regards Moses as a central figure, especially in the gospel accounts. Jesus repeatedly adduces Mosaic law, Moses appears as a metonymy for Torah at the transfiguration, he is accounted among the righteous in the book of Hebrews, and his lifting up the brazen serpent in the wilderness to heal the people foreshadows the crucifixion.

Moses Brings the Torah by Rembrandt van Rijn. (Art Directors)

Similarly, Islam venerates Moses as the lawgiver, commemorating him as a man of purity, an apostle, and a prophet.

Precise dates for Moses are impossible to determine, but the Egyptian pharaoh mentioned in Exodus is likely Ramses II, a member of the Nineteenth Dynasty of Egypt who reigned from 1304 to 1237 B.C.E. Born into a Levite family in Egypt, Moses' life was threatened by the pharaoh's decree that all newborn male Hebrews be killed. His family hid him for as long as possible, then made a waterproof basket for him and floated him in the Nile, where he was found by the pharaoh's daughter and raised in her household. When he discovered his heritage, Moses became interested in the plight of his people. He killed an Egyptian overseer for beating a Hebrew slave and consequently fled to Midian. There he became a shepherd laboring for Jethro, whose daughter Zipporah he later married.

Having encountered God in the burning bush at Mt. Horeb, Moses returned to Egypt to lead the Hebrew people out from slavery. Assisted by his brother Aaron, Moses interceded with the pharaoh, who consented to let the Hebrews leave after ten plagues ravaged Egypt. Pharaoh changed his mind and pursued the Hebrews, but his army was drowned in the Reed Sea (or Red Sea), which the Hebrews had successfully crossed.

Moses led the people to Mt. Horeb in the Sinai wilderness (Mt. Sinai), where he received the Ten Commandments from God. He also taught the people an entire legal code (as recorded in the Torah), explained sacrificial practice, gave instructions for the erection of the Tabernacle, and, with the counsel of his father-in-law, Jethro, organized a judicial system for the new nation.

While Moses was on the mountain receiving the law, the people became anxious and persuaded Aaron to construct a golden calf, reminiscent of the Egyptian gods, to serve as a focal point for worship and leadership. When Moses returned, the calf was destroyed and the rebels punished. Disappointed with Israel, God decided to abandon them and begin again to build his chosen people from Moses' family, but Moses dissuaded him from destroying the Hebrews. A new covenant was made between God and the people, though because of their disobedience, another forty years passed before the Israelites crossed the Jordan into the Promised Land.

While at Sinai, Moses wished to see God but was told that such a vision would destroy him; however, God relented and allowed Moses to see his back as he passed by. Though God was later disappointed with him at Meribah, Moses retained the evidence of his vision throughout his life.

Before his death, Moses appointed Joshua as his successor and in a public address summarized the events of the preceding forty years and the main legislation laid down at Sinai. He blessed the people, gave them guidance for their life in Canaan, and died at the age of 120 in Transjordan. Though the specific location is unknown, Islamic tradition has characteristically identified multiple grave sites; one of the most famous is at Nebi Musa.

Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides)

Jewish scholar

Moses ben Maimon, or Maimonides, known in Jewish tradition by the acronym Rambam (for “Rabbi Moses ben Maimon”), was a physician, scientist, philosopher, communal leader, and by most accounts the greatest religious thinker and rabbinic scholar of postclassical Judaism. He was especially influential among the Jewish communities of the Mediterranean and Muslim east, where his writings were kept alive and his figure celebrated and revered. Born in al-Andalus (Muslim Spain) around 1135 during a politically and religiously turbulent age, Maimonides' family sought refuge in North Africa. He eventually made his way to Egypt, where he found a more hospitable society. There, Maimonides lived a hectic but immensely productive life that included serving the sultan as court physician even as he tended to all of his scholarly projects, rabbinic obligations, and Jewish communal duties. His son Abraham and grandson David succeeded him as leaders of the local community and were important scholars in their own right.

Maimonides' principal literary activities embraced Jewish law on the one hand and theology on the other. As a relatively young man, he wrote the Kitab al-Siraj (Commentary on the Mishnah), and over the course of his career he drafted hundreds of responsa to queries sent to him from near and far. He also authored Sefer ha-Mizvoth (The book of the commandments), which defined each of the 613 biblical commandments. But Maimonides' life's work in the field of Jewish law is represented in the Mishneh Torah (The second law), a monumental and comprehensive code of Jewish law, and his only major work written in (rabbinic) Hebrew as opposed to Arabic. In this work intended for the Jewish community worldwide, Maimonides endeavors to systematize, define, and codify the entire body of Jewish law in an accessible, unambiguous Hebrew style. The resultant code would enable many to look up a particular holy law for themselves without recourse to the Babylonian Talmud, subsequent rabbinic discussion and opinion on it, or the guidance of a contemporary scholar. Some authorities thus viewed the project as a dangerous innovation, not a brilliant educational venture and answer to the critical problem of providing wider access to Jewish knowledge.

For Maimonides, the impulse to systematize and define all questions of Jewish law necessarily extended to matters of Jewish belief. Sefer ha-Mada (The book of knowledge), the first book of the entire Mishneh Torah, thus delineates exactly what a Jew may properly believe about God and creation. For all its accessibility to the common folk, the code's articulation of Jewish belief is unrelentingly rational in its presentation, argumentation, and conclusions. It refuses to tolerate folk beliefs and superstitions as Maimonides understood them and is uncompromising on questions such as God's absolute incorporeality and unity. In many respects, Maimonides' rational approach to Judaism reflects his and the Jews' extended and intimate interaction with the Muslim intellectual milieu.

That cultural encounter is even more apparent in Moreh Nebukhim (The guide for the perplexed), Maimonides' major theological work. Unlike The Book of Knowledge, The Guide was written solely for the intellectual elite in a style that is deliberately elliptical and opaque. On the face of it, The Guide is concerned with the problem of theological language and with reading much of the Hebrew Bible allegorically, especially its anthropomorphic representations of God. Several generations of scholars have been debating whether The Guide is a philosophic or apologetic-theological work.

Despite his reputation as a supremely elitist religious intellectual, Maimonides' occasional writings, and documents by him found in the Cairo Genizah, reveal a scholar and leader deeply involved in Jewish communal affairs and concerned for the psychological-religious predicament of the common Jew in Egypt and beyond as far as France and Yemen.

Moses ben Nahman

Jewish scholar, mystic

Rabbi Moses ben Nahman of Gerona, or Nahmanides, known in Jewish history by the acronym Ramban (for “Rabbi Moses ben Nahman”), born in 1194, was the most prominent rabbinic scholar, kabbalist, biblical commentator, and Jewish communal authority of thirteenth-century Spain. His contributions to Jewish culture and society embraced every area of Jewish cultural production and are marked by a nearly unmatched originality. Apart from his many literary accomplishments, Nahmanides' learning, leadership, and savvy enabled the Jews of Catalonia to weather temporarily the acute crisis in Jewish-Christian relations that dominated the middle part of the century. Moses also endeavored to adopt a conciliating stance toward internecine intellectual conflict that rocked the Jewish community, namely the so-called Maimonidean Controversy (1232) over the religious status of the writings of the renowned twelfth-century rationalist Moses Maimonides.

Nahmanides' masterful biblical commentary engages various viewpoints and represents a unique synthesis of the work of prevailing grammatical, philosophical, mystical, and midrashic approaches to biblical exegesis. In particular, Nahmanides' commentary engages the work of his eleventh- and twelfth-century French and Spanish predecessors, the homiletically minded Rashi (1040–1105) and the rationally minded Abraham ibn Ezra (1089–1164). His canonical commentary was also innovative in the way it reflected and elaborated a highly developed, systematic worldview, with God, the Torah, and the people of Israel at the center. Because of his prestige as the most accomplished talmudic scholar of the age, Nahmanides' kabbalistic, that is, mystical approach to Judaism, was also immensely influential. He did not completely eschew the rationalism of his Iberian predecessors. Rather, Moses used great intellectual sophistication to assail most of the rationalist extreme claims regarding the significance of critical elements of Judaism, such as observing the divine commandments, and the truthfulness of biblical and rabbinic lore. And his seminal work in rabbinical scholarship bridged the religious intellectual world of northern France with that of Provence and Spain.

Nahmanides also represented the Jewish community in the Barcelona Disputation of 1263 at which he defended rabbinic Judaism. Because a learned Dominican friar and former Jew mounted the assault on Judaism, especially on talmudic references to the messiah, and since the disputation was held before King James I, the challenge and stakes were unusually high. Nahmanides' forensic skill supposedly impressed the king and appeared to save the day for the Jews of Catalonia. But in due course, missionary efforts to convert Jews would gain strength in such a way as to identify the 1263 disputation as a turning point in their history.

Mubarak, Haji

Babi disciple

Haji Mubarak, the famed “Ethiopian servant” of the Bab (1819–1850; Sayyid ‘Ali-Muhammad Shirazi, founder of Babism), is celebrated in Baha’i literature for his saintliness and loyalty. Born in 1833, he was a slave sold in Iran at the age of five to the Bab's uncle, Haji Mirza Abu'l-Qasim, and educated within the uncle's household. In all probability, he had been castrated when taken captive in Africa and was a eunuch.

At the age of nineteen, the Bab—returning to Shiraz after a six-year absence—purchased Mubarak from his uncle for fourteen tumans (about $28). Mubarak served the Bab and his family for the rest of his life. He was deeply involved in the events surrounding the founding of the Babi religion and was present (in an adjoining room) on May 22, 1844, when the Bab first declared his mission, beginning (for Baha'is) a new era in religious history.

Only two early believers were chosen to accompany the Bab on his subsequent pilgrimage to Mecca (1844–1845), Quddus (Mirza Muhammad-'Ali Barfarushi, the first in rank of the Bab's disciples) and Mubarak. The Bab is recorded to have sacrificed, in accordance with the customs of Islamic pilgrimage, nineteen lambs in Mecca—nine in his own name, seven in the name of Quddus, and three for Mubarak, securing for the latter the full benefits of the hajj to Mecca. When the Bab was arrested and exiled to Isfahan, Mubarak remained in Shiraz to serve and protect the Bab's wife (Khadijih Bagum) and mother. After the Bab's execution in 1850, his mother and grandmother were forced to transfer their residence to Karbala in Iraq. Mubarak accompanied them there and died in their service in around 1873 at about the age of forty.

After 1850, to salvage their respectability, members of the Bab's family maintained that the Bab had not been executed but was still alive on an extended business trip to India. Haji Mubarak helped to uphold this public fiction by vowing to sweep the courtyard around the tomb of Imam Husayn b. 'Ali in Karbala every day until his master should return. He performed this pious duty faithfully every morning until his death.

Mugeni, Barngetuny

(d. c. 1885 C.E.)

Kipsigis prophet

Barngetuny Mugeni was a Kipsigis prophet who is still respected by the Kipsigis community. It is popularly believed that he was the messenger of Asis (God). He was of the age set of Korongoro, which was initiated between 1815 and 1838, and lived where the present-day town of Sotik is located in western Kenya. He was of the Kipkendek clan, and his mother was the daughter of Arap Turugat, from Talai clan, the famous Nandi Orgoiyot.

Mugeni was married to five wives and had five sons and several daughters. He is said to have died approximately four years before the arrival of the first white man to Sotik. The first European to pass Sotik was Fredrick Jackson in 1889. It is therefore likely that Mugeni died in about 1885.

Tradition says that Asis revealed himself to Mugeni on several occasions. These revelations contained instruction on how the Kipsigis people were expected to live a holy life before Asis. Mugeni's visions also foretold future events that were to take place in the Kipsigis country. Among his prophecies was the coming of the white man, the arrival of trains, the development of towns, modern clothing, and the establishment of colonialism and the eventual independence of African nations. Prophecy came to him in visions as he went about his daily activities. These visions could appear while he was talking to friends, when he was at home with his family, or at traditional beer-drinking parties with elders.

One day when Mugeni was drinking beer at a friend's home with the elders, he suddenly stared at the pot of beer as if something were about to emerge from it. Then he said, "Isn't that Mr. Arap Matinyit? And isn't that his wife Tapsabei? What has come of them? Why does Mr. Matinyit look like his wife?" Then the elders asked him, "Mugeni, what are you saying and what does that mean?" He replied, "A time is coming when we are no longer alive, when there will be no difference between male and female."

The Kipsigis community is now seeing the breakdown of traditional gender roles with changes brought about by education and modernity, and many see this as the fulfillment of Mugeni's prophecy, citing the fact that women today have taken roles that were traditionally reserved for men alone, and vice versa.

Mugo wa Kibiro, Cege

(fl. c. 1890 C.E.)

Kikuyu prophet

Cege Mugo wa Kibiro was the most famous Kikuyu Kenyan prophet in the nineteenth century. The precise dates during which he lived are not known. From an anecdote told about Chief Njiri wa Karanja, who lived between 1866 and 1974, however, it appears that Mugo wa Kibiro was an adult by 1888. In that year, Njiri was given special food by the prophet as a sign that he would be a chief in his community.

Mugo wa Kibiro foretold that visitors would come from out of the big water to the east. The big water to the east was the Indian Ocean. These visitors, Mugo predicted, would have strange complexions. Besides the fact that their skins resembled those of small white frogs (white, pale-looking people), they would wear clothes that looked like the wings of butterflies. The strangers, Mugo further said, would construct an iron snake (a train) that would spew fire as it crawled its way from the big water to the east (Indian Ocean) to the big water to the west (Lake Victoria). Moreover, Mugo spoke of the destructive weapons that the strangers would carry. Their weapons would be like sticks (guns); but unlike ordinary sticks, they would spit fire. Mugo warned Kikuyu warriors against attacking these strangers with spears and arrows, for the spears would not match the sticks that spat fire. Through this metaphorical language, Cege Mugo wa Kibiro foresaw the coming of European colonialism to Kenya.

Ngugi wa Thiong'o, in his early novels, especially The River Between (1975), uses the prophecy of Cege Mugo wa Kibiro to construct a narrative of loss and subsequent salvation from the yoke of colonialism not only of the Kikuyu but the entire Kenyan population. Mugo advised his people that the most effective way of dealing with the European power would be to learn the ways through which that power was created and sustained. Ngugi expands wa Kibiro's prophecy by pointing out that the basis of the white man's power is his education. Consequently, like the prophet of yore, Ngugi asserts that the best way of fighting against European colonialism is by acquiring Western education.

As a prophetic figure, Cege Mugo wa Kibiro led the Kikuyu to redefine their identity according to the exigencies of their time. Ngugi's early narratives give Mugo the credit for providing the germ of modern nationalism in Kikuyuland and beyond. During Cege Mugo wa Kibiro's lifetime, other seers from other Kenyan communities were voicing similar messages. Mutonyi wa Nabukelembe (Bukusu) and Sakawa (Gusii) also foretold the coming of the white man and its consequences.

Muhammad

Muslim founder, prophet

Muhammad ibn 'Abdallah Abu'l-Qasim al-Mustafa, the prophet of Islam, is revered as the messenger of God (Rasul Allah), prophet of God (Nabi Allah), and beloved of God (Habib Allah). Muslims believe that as the "Seal of the Prophets" (Khatm al-anbiya), Muhammad culminates the prophetic legacy of Abraham, Moses, David, and Jesus. As a prophet (nabi), Muhammad stands as the last of 124,000 (by Muhammad's own count) called to relay God's guidance to a community. As messenger (Rasul), he is the 313th prophet also designated to perform at least one of these roles: (1) lead a community, (2) bring a revealed book, or (3) introduce a new religion.

The Qur'an describes Muhammad as the "unlettered prophet" (an-nabi al-ummi, 7:157), a "mercy to the worlds" (21:107), a shining lamp (33:46), "caring, . . . kind, and merciful" (9:128). Muhammad is, on the one hand, human, the "best of men," a "jewel among men," and the "perfect human being" (insan al-kamil). On the other, his essence has been described as the "Light of Muhammad" (Nur Muhammad), the primordial cosmic light, the logos within all the prophets.

Muhammad's significance centers around two poles: (1) He received the Qur'an as God's speech; and (2) his life is the exemplary precedent (sunna) for piety, virtue, and everyday living. Muslims send blessings (salawat) and greetings of peace upon the prophet following God and the angels (Qur'an 33:56). Mention of his name is followed with the formula, "God bless him and give him peace" (Salla Allahu 'alayhi wa sallam). The love of the prophet is a cornerstone of Islam, as the prophet said: "Not one of you has faith until I am dearer to him than his son and his father and all men together." Although portraits of the prophet are disallowed, calligraphic ornaments (hilya) describing his physical and spiritual beauty contribute to his veneration, as do relics retained throughout the world, such as his cloak, beard hairs, and sword.

The year of Muhammad's birth, 570, the "Year of the Elephant," marked the miraculous reversal of an elephant-driven Abyssinian attack in which the Ka'ba, the sanctuary attributed to Abraham, was spared. Hagiographies describe the light of Muhammad (nur Muhammad) radiating from the womb of his mother, Amina, to Syria, Iraq, and Egypt—places where later Islam would first spread. Orphaned of his father at birth, Muhammad was raised by his grandfather 'Abd al-Muttalib, who had rediscovered the Ka'ba precinct's Zamzam well, originally discovered by Hagar and Isma'il. A slightly raised oval birthmark between Muhammad's shoulder blades was later identified as his "Seal of Prophethood." The prophet's nursemaid reported that one day, when Muhammad was two years old, two men clothed in white appeared, opened his chest, removed his heart, opened it, and removed from it a small black clot, then washed his heart and chest with snow and closed it seamlessly.

Because of Islam's ban on representational art, no likenesses of the prophet Muhammad exist. His monument is the Qur'an itself, the text of which forms the main ornament of mosques. This example is from the Dome of the Rock, Jerusalem, where Muhammad is believed to have set off on his journey to heaven. (Corel Corp)

At age six, Muhammad was adopted by his uncle Abu Talib and taken on a caravan journey to Syria, where the Christian monk Bahira recognized him as the prophet to the Arabs predicted in one of his manuscripts. Muhammad, who had developed a reputation as the "Trustworthy" (al-Amin), began to conduct trade for a wealthy widowed businesswoman named Khadija, whom he married in 595. They had two sons (who died in infancy) and four daughters.

For fifteen years, Muhammad would often retreat to the cave of Hira to pray. He also regularly gave food to the poor. In 610, on the "Night of Power" (Laylat al-Qadr), the Angel Gabriel appeared and commanded him, "Recite!" Muhammad responded, "I am not a reciter." Gabriel then hugged him tightly. After repeating this sequence three times, the angel again said, "Recite," and Muhammad began to recite the first portion of the Qur'an:

Recite in the name of your Lord who created!
He created man from a clot of blood.
Recite and your Lord is most Generous.

He has taught man by the pen,
Taught man what he did not know. (96:1–5)

With the words written on his heart, Muhammad left the cave and saw the angel everywhere he turned. Muhammad described the ensuing twenty-three years of events, during which he received additional revelation, in three ways: (1) "like the ringing of a bell"; (2) "The Angel comes in the form of a man and I grasp whatever he says"; and (3) "inspirations like dreams become true and bright daylight."

Muhammad's first followers, including Khadija, his cousin 'Ali b. Abi Talib, Zayd (his adopted son), and Abu Bakr (a friend and prosperous merchant), met privately at a wealthy follower's house. Gabriel soon showed Muhammad ritual ablution and the recitation, postures, and movements of salat, ritual prayer. After the prophet first preached Islam publicly in 612, his Qurayshi brethren attacked him and Islam virulently, even for a time banning commerce with Muhammad and his earliest followers. In 617, the prophet sent the less well-connected followers to Abyssinia, where they found refuge with the Monophysite king.

In 620, the “Year of Sadness,” both Khadija and Abu Talib, who had protected Muhammad from Qurayshi persecution, died. One night during that same year, when Muhammad was encamped next to the Ka’ba, Gabriel awoke him and brought him on a night journey (isra’) to Jerusalem, where Muhammad prayed with Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, among other prophets. Vessels of milk and wine were brought and he rightly chose milk. Then Gabriel accompanied the prophet on his ascension (mi’raj) through the seven heavens. At each heaven, Muhammad greeted the prophets: Adam, Jesus and John, Joseph, Idris, Aaron, Moses, and Abraham. Then he passed through paradise and stood before the throne of God, where he found himself “two bows’ lengths or nearer” (53:8–9), and “his eye did not swerve, nor did his gaze overreach” (53:17), a comparison to Moses’ inability to see God.

In 620, six men from Yathrib (later Medina) approached the prophet to invite him to come to Yathrib to serve as the arbiter (hakim) of tribal disputes, following a pattern of seeking holy men well known in Christian Syria. In 621, five men took an oath of fealty (ba’ya) to Muhammad, the “Pledge of ‘Aqaba”; in 622, seventy-three men and two women took a similar oath. Muhammad accepted their invitation to go to Yathrib.

On July 16, 622, Muhammad and the Muslims of Mecca began the emigration (hijra) to Yathrib. Arriving in Medina on September 27, 622, the prophet was greeted with the song (madh) that has become the signature song of praise of the prophet in the Islamic world: Tala’a al-badru alayna (The full moon has risen upon us). To select a mosque site, the prophet released his camel, Qaswa, to roam until she settled. Muhammad then created a covenant of mutual obligation between the Muslims and Jews of Medina, called the “Constitution of Medina.” Jews were bound to the social contract but not required to accept Muhammad’s prophethood. The prophet also instituted the “Pact of Brotherhood,” pairing each Muslim of Medina, the “helpers” (ansar), with a Meccan emigrant (muhajirun). The prophet supported the poor, who lived in the mosque and were known as the “People of the Bench.”

Muhammad often took counsel from his companions. Once one of them dreamed that a man in green showed him a call to prayer. The prophet deemed this a true vision and asked the companion to teach this call to Bilal, an Ethiopian, who became the first muezzin, the person who calls believers to prayer.

The prophet entered into nine marriages after Khadija’s death, in some cases for the welfare of a widow or to build alliances. At Abu Bakr’s request, he was married at age fifty-three to Abu Bakr’s six-year-old daughter, ‘Aishah, who became his favorite wife after Khadija. In no other wife’s presence did he receive revelation. Each wife kept her own apartment in the mosque, and the prophet made it his habit to stay with each wife for a day and a night. Muslims point to the prophet’s capacity to sustain a spiritual life as a married man as one of his marks of excellence.

Muslims also honor the prophet’s prudence and prowess in war. The prophet taught that war is the “lesser jihad,” whereas subduing the animal soul is the “greater jihad.” In Medina, he conducted caravan raids to break the sieges and embargoes levied against the city by the Quraysh, but after returning to Mecca he no longer conducted raids. In the battle of Badr in 624, 1,000 Quraysh troops were defeated by 300 Muslims. The prophet ordered that the captives be well treated. In a second battle, at Uhud in 625, 1,000 Muslims were defeated by a Quraysh army of 3,000. The prophet was wounded on the cheek and lost two teeth. In the battle of Khandaq in 627, the prophet accepted the recommendation of Salman al-Farsi, a Zoroastrian-born Persian, to build an impassable trench around the city. While digging, Muhammad struck a stone that released lightning toward Yemen, Syria, and Persia, which the prophet explained as the directions in which Islam would spread.

For Muslims, Muhammad was a model of just leadership. He reportedly endured betrayal by Medina’s Jews, who had spied for the Quraysh. To arbitrate the matter, he chose a Jew, who handed down a decision that the men be slain and the women and children taken captive. When his follower Ibn Ubayy chastised the prophet that it would have been better had he been enthroned as king instead of ruling as a prophet, Muhammad chose to forbear and nurture companionship with him. And in 629, in Khaybar, a widow who had lost her husband, father, and uncle served poisoned lamb to the prophet and his companions. The prophet spat out the first bite, but the effects of the poison contributed directly to his death in 632. Nonetheless, he pardoned the woman.

In Ramadan 627, Muhammad dreamed that he entered the Ka’ba with its key in his hand. The dream turned out to be prophetic. In March 628, he led 1,000 pilgrims to Mecca until they were stopped by the Quraysh at Hudaibiyya. Muhammad first asked his companions to take an oath of fealty (48:1–18) to him, and then he negotiated with the Quraysh. The treaty was a diplomatic victory: The Quraysh accepted him as a political partner. The treaty stipulated ten years of peace. A Bedouin tribe allied to the Quraysh soon broke the treaty, however, and in January 630 Muhammad, with 10,000 pilgrims, entered Mecca triumphantly. Muhammad destroyed all the idols in the Ka’ba but preserved elsewhere the icons of Mary, Jesus, and Abraham.

In 630, the prophet dispatched emissaries to the nearby rulers, Heraclius of Byzantium, the Muqawqis of Alexandria, Khusrau Parwiz of Persia, and Badhan of Yemen, urging them to embrace Islam and submit to his authority. Only Badhan accepted. Muhammad established treaties with Jews and Christians, thus demonstrating their Qur'anically endorsed status as "People of the Book" and "Protected Peoples" (dhimmi).

In March 632, the prophet led a pilgrimage caravan of 30,000 Muslims and gave his Farewell Sermon at 'Arafat, enjoining brotherhood and compassion among Muslims. Eyewitness reports of Muhammad's character and actions emphasize his humility and kindness. Followers described his friendly, sincere attitude. He laughed infrequently but smiled often and spoke with humor. He loved children and loved to play with children, and he loved and protected animals (especially cats). 'A'ishah compared his character to the Qur'anic ideal. Muhammad lived in relative poverty, of which he is famous for saying, "My poverty is my pride."

Muhammad's biographical image includes diverse roles: husband, businessman, prophet, teacher, statesman, warrior-general, and diplomat. His prophetic mantle covers both the intimate details of a very human man and his extraordinary worldly and spiritual achievements.

Muhammad, Elijah

Muslim leader

Elijah Muhammad was a disciple of W. D. Fard and leader of the Nation of Islam (NOI) in the United States from 1934 to 1975. Under his leadership, the NOI grew from a few thousand members to several hundred thousand. He helped improve the lives of blacks across the nation, partly through the establishment of dozens of businesses that helped to demonstrate to blacks that they could be self-sufficient and operate independently of white largesse.

Elijah Muhammad was born Elijah Poole in October 1897 in Sandersville, Georgia. Because his father was a preacher, by the time he was fifteen Elijah knew the Bible well. After enduring hard times in the South, Elijah, his wife Clara, and their two children migrated north to Detroit, Michigan, where he encountered W. D. Fard. Poole began attending Fard's NOI meetings and converted to Islam. His enthusiasm for Islam made him Fard's favorite, and Poole came to believe that Fard was God. Fard gave Poole "Muhammad" for a last name, and when Fard mysteriously disappeared in 1934 Elijah became the new leader of the Nation of Islam.

Elijah Muhammad used his leadership skills and familiarity with scripture to prove that Fard had fulfilled biblical prophecy by returning as the mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse). He taught that whites had been created by a mad scientist named Yacub who accomplished this feat by genetically engineering recessive genes from blacks. Muhammad subsequently taught his parishioners that separation from whites represented the only viable solution to the centuries-old race problem. He insisted that blacks establish their own nation inside the United States or abroad. Muhammad also alleged that Christianity had been used to subjugate and oppress blacks while at the same time it enriched whites. Because some blacks saw truth in these allegations, Muhammad's message found thousands eager for a religion that ensured their dignity and self-worth.

Before long, Muhammad opened mosques in Chicago, Philadelphia, New York, Washington, D.C., Cleveland, and several other cities where blacks made up large percentages of the population. He increased the organization's business enterprises as well as its membership, overseeing a sprawling network of schools, bakeries, grocery stores, farms, trucking companies, clothing stores, a newspaper, real estate acquisitions, and other moneymaking ventures.

Muhammad recruited excellent ministers to manage his empire. Not least of these was Malcolm X, an ex-felon turned Muslim, who eventually became one of America's most outspoken proponents of justice and equality for all. Elijah Muhammad split with Malcolm over financial discrepancies in the NOI's accounting procedures and Muhammad's desire to keep secret liaisons with young Muslim women. This split represented the beginning of the end for the Muslim leader. Developing diabetes and fighting chronic asthma attacks, Muhammad stepped down from leadership in the early 1970s and moved to Arizona for health reasons. On February 25, 1975, at the age of seventy-seven, he died of heart failure, leaving the NOI to be taken over by his son Wallace D. Muhammad, and later Louis Farrakhan.

Muhammad (Mohammed), Warith Deen

Nation of Islam leader

Imam Warith Deen Mohammad was born Wallace Muhammad on October 30, 1933, in Detroit, Michigan, the sixth of Elijah (Poole) Muhammad's seven children with Clara (Evans) Muhammad. Warith Deen became leader of the Nation of Islam (NOI), built and led by his father from 1934 until February 25, 1975, when Elijah died. Today, he is leader of the largest identifiable constituency of Muslim Americans, especially African Americans. He is recognized worldwide as a scholar, a spiritual leader, and an international humanitarian.

Warith Deen Muhammad was the catalyst for the identification of the Nation of Islam with the worldwide Muslim community. He began by encouraging his members to learn to pray in Arabic—not to become Arabs, but to unite in the universal Muslim language of worship. He encouraged them to fast during the month of Ramadan with other Muslims, and in 1977 he led the largest delegation of Muslim Americans, most former NOI members, on hajj (pilgrimage) to Mecca, Saudi Arabia. Warith Deen encouraged his members in this spiritual journey to Muslim identity while at the same time maintaining their African American heritage. He was eventually given the title of mujeddid (the reformer) for these initiatives.

Since assuming the leadership of his community, Imam Muhammad has sought to contextualize the meanings of the Qur'an and sunnah of the prophet Muhammad for his American followers. He provides a spiritual leadership that seeks to balance their economic, political, and social aspirations within the framework of their Islamic identity. Although members independently operate the various masajids (mosques) under his ministry, there is a shura (council) of imams that coordinates the group's activities. The shura is modeled after the practice of the prophet Muhammad in Medina during the seventh century.

As part of the transformation of the Nation of Islam, Imam Muhammad in 1976 encouraged Muslim Americans to register to vote. His emphasis was on the legacy of the civil rights movement. Muhammad opened up NOI membership to all races of Muslims. He was also the first Muslim invited to deliver the invocation opening the U.S. Senate in Washington, D.C., on February 6, 1992.

Warith Deen Muhammad's publications include As the Light Shineth from the East (1980), Prayer and Al-Islam

(1982), Religion on the Line (1983), Al-Islam: Unity and Leadership (1991), and Islam's Climate for Business Success (1995).

Muhammad Ahmad

Muslim mahdi claimant

Muhammad Ahmad ibn el-Sayed, the mahdi (“rightly guided”) of Sudan, was born in the region of Kordofan in 1844. He became interested in religion at quite an early age. It was while attending an Islamic school that his asceticism and devotion to Islamic learning became apparent to his teachers and the local people. He believed strongly in the virtues of prayer and simplicity that are characteristic features of Muslim holy men. He was only too aware of the oppressive Turko-Egyptian rule, with its heavy taxation and its reliance on non-Muslim governors for the administration of Sudan. He yearned for a free Sudan that would be governed according to the precepts of the Qur'an. His message of living one's life according to God's laws in preparation for the eternal life of spiritual fulfillment had a strong appeal for the ordinary Sudanese, who struggled to make a living with difficulty.

In 1881, el-Sayed, a sufi scholar of the Sammaniyya order, declared himself to be the mahdi, the expected one, the messianic figure in Islam associated with ending chaos and anarchy that will accompany the end of time. The mahdi myth has been alive since early Muslim history and has been invoked by those who seek to challenge or overthrow existing forms of government that they consider to be oppressive, unjust, and not truly guided by Islamic teachings. The timing of el-Sayed's messianic call seemed to have been fitting for his period, as there was a growing sense of messianic expectations in the Sudan. The mahdi led his followers on a “withdrawal” (hijra) for regrouping. He preached that the rulers were impious and oppressive men who had been overtaken by their love of the things of this world and proclaimed a jihad (religious struggle) against the Turks. He quickly won a large following among the people.

The mahdi first called on his followers to refuse paying taxes and to fight the “Turks.” Attempts to arrest the mahdi and quell the uprising did not succeed. By 1883, the mahdi's Ansar (followers) had been transformed into a real army after inflicting a number of defeats on the enemy. The mahdist forces went from victory to victory. The crowning moment of the mahdi victory came in 1885 when his forces seized Khartoum after a long siege, killing the British general Charles Gordon. For the next thirteen years, Sudan was ruled as an Islamic state, first by the mahdi himself (until he died in 1885 of disease) and later by his successor. By 1898, the British had defeated the mahdist forces in the battle of Khartoum, and that meant the end of the mahdist state and the beginning of British colonial rule.

The mahdi unified his people around his own brand of Islam with a social vision rooted in Islamic traditions. He was a remarkable, charismatic force in the shaping of the history of the modern Sudan even when his vast Islamic state was short-lived. The movement that he launched has left an indelible mark on the history of that country. His followers, the Ansar, outlived the mahdist state and went on to constitute the largest single organized group within Sudan. In fact, the last democratically elected president of Sudan, Sadiq al-Mahdi, is a direct descendant of the mahdi.

Muhammad b. Isma'il b. Ja'far

(c. 738–c. 813 C.E.)

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Muhammad b. Isma'il b. Ja'far, born around 738, is considered the seventh imam by the Nizari Isma'ili Shi'a Muslims. According to Isma'ili tradition, he succeeded his father as imam when he was about twenty-two years old. As was the case with his father, hostile political circumstances forced him to remain hidden from the ruling authorities and therefore the general public. Only a few trusted followers knew of his exact whereabouts. As a result of his concealment he was called by the epithet al-Makhtum, the hidden one. After he had to leave Medina he is thought to have lived initially in southern Iraq and then to have traveled to Persia, to the southwestern region of Khuzistan. He is also stated as having gone to Farghana in central Asia, to Isfahan in Iran, and to several other cities. 'Abdallah b. Maymun al-Qaddah served as his chief da'i (agent) and was used as a front for him when necessary. As a result, there arose a confusion between him and al-Qaddah and so he was also designated as al-Maymun, the fortunate one. From his base in Persia, Muhammad b. Isma'il managed to continue to spread his message, and his da'is were sent to various parts of the Islamic world.

In addition to the Isma'ilis other groups were affiliated with him. Some of the non-Isma'ili Shi'a groups regarded him as the seventh imam and considered him to have supreme relevance as the completion of a cycle of spiritual guides. Hence they provide him with cosmic significance. He passed away in Persia in about 813 and was succeeded as imam by his son 'Abdallah, generally referred to as Wafi Ahmad.

Mu'izz, Abu Tamim Ma'add al-

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Abu Tamim Ma'add al-Mu'izz, born in the new Fatimid capital of Mahdiya, became the fourteenth Nizari Isma'ili imam and the fourth Fatimid ruler after his father al-Mansur passed away in 953. He organized his empire with great vision and had a glorious reign, conquering Egypt and founding the city of Cairo (named after the planet Mars, al-Kahira). Travelers such as the poet and philosopher Nasir-i Khusraw (c. 1004–c. 1072) have left glowing accounts of this well-planned city. A few years after its founding, a mosque called the Jamia al-Azhar was constructed, to which was subsequently added a library and a university. Now called Al-Azhar University, it is the oldest university in the world and is still an important center of learning. Al-Mu'izz himself was very learned. He knew several languages besides Arabic, including Nubian, Latin, Spanish, and Slavonic. His libraries were renowned for their rich collection of books. The Fatimid support of all aspects of knowledge led to a new era both in the humanities and the sciences.

Some important texts from al-Mu'izz's era help validate and authenticate the lineage of his family. These include a letter he wrote to Halam (or Jalam) b. Shayban, the chief Isma'ili da'i (Shi'ite missionary agent) in Sindh, as well as the writings of the jurist Qadi Nu'man, who had served the Fatimids since the time of al-Mahdi (c. 868–874) and held great prominence. He conducted “sessions of wisdom” on Fridays after the noon prayer. His juristic and legal writings represent the ideas and philosophy of the Fatimid rulers, especially al-Muʿizz, with whom he worked closely. When he died, al-Muʿizz led the funeral prayers. Though many of his compositions are lost, the few that are extant provide a fascinating glimpse of a dynasty that strove to create a utopian dominion where art, architecture, learning, and culture flourished and where the rights of citizens were regarded. The Court of the Mazalim (victims) was instituted to address the grievances of the public. Al-Muʿizz also ensured that interreligious harmony prevailed. Various communities flourished in his domains, including other Muslim groups as well as Jews and Christians, who were allowed to maintain their own systems of justice and worship.

With all his administrative responsibilities, al-Muʿizz also ensured that the daʿwa (spread of Ismaʿili teachings) was not neglected and appointed Jaʿfar bin Mansur as the chief daʿi (agent). Since the time of al-Mahdi the daʿwa had been spread in various parts of the Indian subcontinent, such as Gujarat and Sindh, where Multan became an important Ismaʿili center. This was in addition to the Ismaʿili centers in Iraq, Syria, Yemen, North Africa, and Iran.

Al-Muʿizz died in 975 and was the first Fatimid ruler to be buried in Egypt. Studious and wise, he is viewed as a brilliant and compassionate ruler, esteemed by his populace.

Mukhtar ibn Ahmad, al-

Muslim leader

Member of a branch of the southern Saharan nomadic tribe called the Kunta, al-Mukhtar ibn Ahmad was born in 1729 in the region of Erg Oralla, a large dune just north of Mabrouk. His father died when he was ten, and he was educated by two of his brothers and his maternal grandfather, Badi b. al-Habib. He also spent time living with and studying among the Kel Inalbash branch of the Kel al-Suq and the Kel Hurma. His principal teacher, however, was Sidi Ali b. al-Najib of Arawan, a leading shaykh of the Qadiriyya branch of sufism in the region. He spent the years 1754–1757 studying in Morocco and on his return married a distant cousin, a pious and learned woman simply known as al-Shaykha (d. January 14, 1810).

On the death of Sidi Ali, al-Mukhtar succeeded him as a local shaykh of the Qadiriyya and established a religious complex in Azawad, some 250 miles northeast of Timbuktu. From there he exercised his intercessory powers over various intertribal disputes, especially those of his own tribe with the Barabish. Relations with the Kel Antasar, however, deteriorated, and hostility remained between them and the Kunta until the early twentieth century. Nevertheless, al-Mukhtar retained good relations with clerical clans such as the Kel Inukundar. He was also a spiritual adviser to Kawa Ag Amma, the amenokal (tribal chief) of the Ullimiden.

In his teaching al-Mukhtar emphasized the role of the shaykh as the exponent of the spiritual way who would lead his disciple from ignorance to knowledge, from covetousness to self-denial, from coarse desire to asceticism, from doubt to certitude, and from a mere glance into divine truth to an acquaintance with it. He said, “Your shaykh is he who cleanses your heart so much that it shines with divine knowledge. He it is who leads you, without ever abandoning you, until together you arrive in the Divine Presence, when he says to you: ‘Here you are near your Creator.’”

Al-Mukhtar maintained a wide range of contacts with other Islamic leaders of the region and a network of discipleship that extended from southern Mauritania to Bornu and southward to the forest zones of Ivory Coast and Guinea. Among the celebrated scholars who traced their Qadiriyya initiation through him are Shaykh Uthman b. Muhammad Fodio of Sokoto (1754–1817) and the mid-nineteenth-century Shaykh Ahmad Lobbo of Masina. He was the author of some sixty prose works and about fifty poems. In 1811, he died at the age of eighty-two. Then his son Muhammad, and later his grandson Ahmad al-Bakkay, became his spiritual successors, continuing the promotion of the Qadiriyya tariqa and his teachings of it.

Mukundadeva

(fl. 1600–1650 C.E.)

Mukundadeva, a seventeenth-century guru and “perfected master” (siddha), was a major figure in the development of the Hindu tantric traditions known as the Vaishnava Sahajiyas. He forged a synthesis of earlier tantric yoga and the Bengali Vaishnava school of bhakti devotionism (also known as the Chaitanya movement), creating a distinctive form of tantric Hinduism.

Historians debate the biography of Mukundadeva. One account holds that he was a wealthy prince who renounced the world to pursue the path of the “innate” (sahaja), leading to his leadership of the Vaishnava Sahajiyas. While on this journey he supposedly met the renowned author Krishnadasa Kaviraja, whose Caitanya Caritamrta (Pastimes of Chaitanya, c. 1575) outlines the story of the great Bengali god-man Krishna Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533). Krishnadasa became Mukundadeva’s guru, passing on to him the “secret” teachings of Chaitanya, including the beliefs that Chaitanya was the dual incarnation (avatara) of the Hindu god Krishna and his consort Radha and that Chaitanya himself was secretly a sahajiya. These claims have been rejected as heretical by orthodox Bengali Vaishnavas for centuries, but there is little doubt that Mukundadeva and his disciples composed numerous texts presenting the Vaishnava Sahajiya synthesis.

Some of the surviving texts attributable to either Mukundadeva or his disciples include Bhrngaratnavali (The garland of bees) and Amrtaratnavali (The necklace of immortality), both of which may have been composed originally in Sanskrit and then translated into Bengali by disciples. The former work is an esoteric manual on the topics of ritual practices (sadhana) and bodily yoga (dehatattva) illustrating the integration of tantra and bhakti that is characteristic of Vaishnava Sahajiyas. Mukundadeva transformed Krishna and Radha from a god and his consort into the inner cosmic principles of each man and woman, arguing that Sahajiyas can discover this inner divinity through a range of practices, including ritual sexual intercourse (rati-sadhana) and intense forms of yoga. This idea reflects a basic worldview of virtually all Asian tantrism that emphasizes a gendered cosmos that can be realized and unified through sexualized ritual.

The yogic system of Mukundadeva consists of an inner “divine body” (deva-deha) composed of four ascending “lotus ponds” (sarovara) and a “crooked river” (bankanadi), rather than the better-known system of seven “centers” (cakras) and “coiled energy” (kundalini) of other tantric schools. The goal is a sort of “inverse intercourse”: to draw the male and female sexual fluids upward along the “river” and “ponds” to the elusive realm of cosmic consciousness and bliss within the head. This is a secret place of primordial immortality. Also distinctive are the emphases upon the transformative power of “passion” (raga) and the need to change lust (kama) into pure love (prema)—all adapted from orthodox systems of aesthetics and devotion. Although the medieval teaching lineages of Mukundadeva may have disappeared by the twentieth century, related beliefs and practices continue today among other Bengali religions such as the Bauls and Karta Bhajas.

Mummy Bundles

Incan ancestor worship

Mummification in South America was practiced before and during Inca times. Along the south coast of Peru, the Paracas people developed a subterranean architecture, particularly burial chambers. There, the bodies of the dead, bundled with magnificent weavings and offerings, were buried. These burials ranged from the modest to the very sumptuous, and so did the mummy bundles. More than 429 human mummy bundles have been found in Paracas, as well as bundles containing parrots, foxes, dogs, cats, frogs, and deer. Paracas mummies, which date from around 400 B.C.E., are the most famous, but they are not the only ones in the Andean and coastal regions of South America.

The bodies were put into “mummy bundles” before they were interred in a large underground necropolis, or burial chamber. They were placed in a seated fetal position and bound tightly with cord. Then they were covered with cotton cloth and wrapped with brightly decorated fabric. Finally, the body was placed in a coiled basket and taken to the necropolis. A lower-status person was wrapped in a rough cotton mantle and surrounded by several simple pieces of ceramics. When the person was important in the community, more layers of fabric were used to wrap the body, and as a result the mummy bundle would reach up to seven feet high. Sacred fabrics were also used for important people, who were buried and wrapped in elaborately woven and embroidered mummy bundles that were meant to accompany the wearer to the next world.

Offerings of gold, feathers, animal skins, and imported shells accompanied the body. Food offerings demonstrate a belief that the body needed sustenance in the afterlife and may have described the deceased as a fertile producer. Imported and hard-won prestige items, such as camelid fiber, shells, a pouch with body paint, and human skulls, demonstrate the power and hierarchy of the deceased. Gravesites were located in the coastal dunes, which are the world's driest coastal desert. This was the main reason that Andean textiles were so well preserved, with some dating back to 3000 B.C.E. Many fabrics were also created for ritual sacrifice and were burned as offerings to the sun, considered the highest of the celestial powers.

The Incas believed in an afterlife, and following the death of an emperor his mummified body was treated as though he were still alive. Servants tended to him in his palace, and he was regularly consulted for advice. On special occasions, the mummies were carried in procession on gilded litters. The mummies of the deceased incas (emperors) were kept in Inca temples and exposed and worshipped on special occasions and religious ceremonies. Mummy bundles containing bodies of probable amautas and quipucamayos (wise men) have been found with quipos, knotted strings that record information, and they are being decoded at this moment.

With the arrival of the Spaniards, the Inca mummy bundles were completely destroyed in the Spanish search for gold. However, most of the pre-Inca mummy bundles, such as those from Paracas, remained untouched until the time of World War I and later excavation in the 1920s. In the past decade, pre-Inca mummy bundles containing children's bodies have been found in the central highlands of Peru. The bodies and artifacts in these bundles have been exceptionally preserved owing to the cold weather in the highlands.

Muso Soseki

Zen Buddhist scholar

Muso Soseki, Zen Buddhist monk, scholar, teacher, poet, and adviser to shoguns and emperors, is revered today as the founder and most representative figure of that quintessential Japanese spiritual creation—the Zen garden.

Born in Ise province in 1275, Muso (whose name means “Dream Window”) began studying Buddhism at the age of six. After some years in Kamakura, the shogun’s capital, Muso returned to Kyoto in 1325 to become abbot of Nanzenji, the powerful head temple of the Rinzaï Zen sect. In 1333, the general Ashikaga Takauji (1305–1358) forced the emperor Go-Daigo out of Kyoto, establishing a rival “northern court” with himself as de facto leader. Muso became Takauji’s chief adviser on matters spiritual and secular, and through their dual influence Rinzaï Zen emerged as the dominant Buddhist sect of the age. Muso himself was responsible for the establishment of thirteen temples and monasteries and is said to have trained more than 13,000 monks and 52 Zen teachers. In order to pay for these ambitious projects, Muso helped to reestablish the lapsed trade link between Japan and China.

For all of his political and institutional accomplishments, Muso is revered today mainly for his contributions to two more subtle and rarefied fields of human activity: poetry and garden design. His poetry, only a small portion of which has been translated into English, is remarkable for its sharp contrasts and pithy elegance (“One grain of dust in the eye will render the three worlds too small to see”). Muso designed gardens at a number of prominent temples in the Kyoto area, including Saihoji (now known as Kokedera) and Tenryuji. His achievement at Saihoji was such a success that the garden became the model for later Zen temples such as Kinkakuji and Ginkakuji. Muso’s gardens were intended not merely to please the eye but as a vehicle toward, as well as a reflection of, Zen enlightenment (satori). His goal, as with the later Zen-influenced arts of haiku, Noh drama, and Zen painting, was to evoke a sense of spontaneous naturalness beyond all artifice and to show that there is no distinction between the sacred and the profane worlds.

Mustansir, Abu Tamim Ma'add al-

Isma'ili Muslim imam, caliph

Abu Tamim Ma'add al-Mustansir was the eighteenth imam for the Nizari Isma'ili Muslims (nineteenth for the Musta'li Isma'ilis) and the eighth Fatimid ruler. Born around 1029, he became both imam and caliph when he was only about seven years old in 1036. His father, al-Zahir, had freed and married a slave from the Sudan who had belonged to a Jewish trader, Abu Sa'd al-Tustari. After al-Mustansir became ruler, his mother, who had been greatly influenced by her former master, became an important presence at court. This background became the source of much intrigue during al-Mustansir's rule.

The vizier, al-Jarjara'i, attempted to curb the influence of al-Tustari. After the vizier's death in 1044, al-Mustansir's mother appointed Sadaqa b. Yusuf (a Muslim convert from Judaism) as vizier. Sadaqa, however, had al-Tustari, the former master of his patron, assassinated. The queen mother, in turn, soon got the vizier assassinated. Then there were almost two dozen viziers in quick succession. Finally, Badr al-Jamali, the governor of Akka in Syria, was invited to Cairo and made vizier. He emerged as a strong personality and with his son al-Afdal gained formidable power.

Al-Mustansir's reign faced significant challenges. After Badr al-Jamali became vizier, a semblance of order prevailed. However, despite the difficulties, the empire still resonated with splendor, and Cairo, the capital city, was still magnificent. Nasir-i Khusraw, a poet and philosopher from central Asia, visited Cairo during al-Mustansir's reign and provides a glowing account of the palaces, art, culture, and learning in his travelogue, the Safar-namah (Book of travels). The most famous da'i (agent) of al-Mustansir's time was al-Mu'ayyad fi al-din al-Shirazi, described as a "prolific writer, a poet, as well as a political organizer and a military strategist," who reached Cairo in 1047 and met al-Mustansir shortly afterward. Al-Mustansir had very cordial relationships with Constantine Monomachus, the Byzantine emperor, who even supplied wheat during the famine of 1054.

When al-Mustansir passed away in 1094 after a reign of almost sixty years, the Isma'ili community split over which of his sons would succeed him. Those who accepted his son Nizar as imam are called the Nizari Isma'ili, and those who accepted Musta'li are called the Musta'li Isma'ili.

Muzorewa, Abel Tendekai

Methodist bishop

Born into an African Christian family in 1925, Abel Tendekai Muzorewa grew up in a religious household. After teaching grade school, he eventually became an ordained minister of the United Methodist Church. He was one of the first Africans of his denomination to study abroad. Upon his return from the United States, where he received a master's degree in religion and psychology, Muzorewa spent a few years serving as the national youth secretary of the Zimbabwe churches, and in 1968, at the age of thirty-eight, he was elected bishop of the Zimbabwe Annual Conference of the United Methodist Church.

Bishop Muzorewa succeeded a white missionary, Bishop Ralph E. Dodge, who was banned from Zimbabwe for political reasons, making Muzorewa the first black bishop in the denomination. As a gifted and inspiring preacher, Muzorewa was considered a spirit-filled man of God. Further, at a time when most people believed that Christians should avoid involvement in politics, he boldly pursued the national liberation struggle, the first member of the clergy to do so. Muzorewa believed that God wanted his people to be free and productive and committed himself to saving the nation. He was motivated by democratic views influenced by Christian principles of justice, peace, and racial equality. Whites, Asians, and Africans felt that in Muzorewa, Zimbabwe could become independent of the colonial powers. Muzorewa's holiness manifested itself in his courage to preach against racial discrimination in a state that was ruled by colonialists who were not prepared to listen to an African preach the gospel, let alone make a political statement on liberation. Muzorewa's doctrine emphasized temperance, cultural identity, and observance of Christian precepts.

In 1972, when the nation had to make a major political decision, Muzorewa was unanimously elected to lead the nation in a referendum regarding the so-called Pierce Commission. The bishop risked his life by participating in politics at a time when the colonial regime was ruthless and callous. At the same time, Muzorewa's denomination grew by leaps and bounds as adherents were excited to identify with a church that took leadership in the liberation of the oppressed of Zimbabwe.

Elected as the first black prime minister of Zimbabwe in 1979, Muzorewa was revered by all Zimbabweans for his commitment to liberation and religion. Muzorewa published his autobiography, entitled Rise Up and Walk, in 1978.

Mysticism and Holy People

A mystic is a person who has experienced a direct union or communion with the divine, or an awakening to realization of the divine, in his or her own lifetime. By definition, such people enjoy a special relationship with divine forces, and therefore, if members of their society accept their claims, they fit automatically into the category of “holy people”—especially if such mystical experiences recur frequently. Mystics are common in many of the world religions, especially if one includes in this category of direct experience with God visions and dreams. Even religions such as Buddhism, in which gods do not play a central role, have saints whose process of “awakening” is similar in many ways to the mysticism of god-based religions. Mystics have not always been accepted, however, especially in religions with a strong institutional structure. Mystics’ claims to direct understanding of the divine, bypassing the normal channels of religious law, priesthood, or sacraments, have sometimes been considered subversive. At times, the leaders of some religions have also regarded mystics as pretentious because they claim a special, unique dispensation from the divine that downplays a sense that god(s) care for everyone equally. Thus several movements in Islam have opposed sufi mysticism, while Protestant Christians have always regarded mystical experience with great suspicion. There have also been significant antimystical currents in Judaism, such as the anti-kabbalistic Hasidic movement.

The great paradox of mysticism in the world religions is that mystics have stressed that their experiences are essentially indescribable and impossible to replicate (in a useful image, a great Zen figure described the experience of awakening as “like a mute who has had a dream”)—but thousands of mystics over the centuries have nevertheless written accounts of their experience and tried to teach others to follow their own spiritual path. Thus a massive body of mystical literature strives at least in part to communicate that which is incommunicable. Mystics have described the touch of the divine using the symbolism of sexuality, or God’s embrace as that of a mother, or a direct vision of light, trying to express an experience for which human language is inadequate. Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274) called mysticism the knowledge of God through experience, which works as well as any definition. For Muslim mystics, the central term is tawhid, a making one, or union of the human with the divine. Some of the great sufis went as far as an absolute identification, at least briefly, between themselves and God. The “drunk sufi” Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj (858–922) said of himself “I am the Truth” in an expression of complete annihilation in God. Hindu mystics have also identified themselves so closely with a god that legend tells of several who were absorbed by cult statues or declared themselves to be brahman—the principle of the cosmos. Christianity and Judaism, however, have hedged away from such complete identification, preferring to write in terms of “abiding in” God. Some mystics in those traditions have nonetheless pushed toward an ideal of self-annihilation in God, such as the Christian Mechtild of Hackeborn (1241–c. 1298), who in visions crawled into the heart of Jesus.

The Muslim tradition is perhaps the most brilliant in terms of influence of the mystics, number of works written by mystics, and the sheer number of mystics. Muslim mysticism, a central element of sufism, focuses on closer contact of the worshipper with God. Much of the success of the movement is due to a structure that enables disciples to train themselves for mystical experience. The several orders of sufism teach the need to reach toward contact with God with the help of a sufi leader, who is able to teach the spiritual seeker to purify himself or herself and establish a channel of contact with the divine. In many ways, this practice is similar to Buddhist monasticism’s stress on the need for a teacher who can ease the way to awakening. Islamic mysticism can be said to go back to Muhammad (570–632), who reached the “farthest place” of prayer and enjoyed a special relationship with God. The process of defining and spreading this ideal to a larger population only really appears in the ninth century, however. The early sufi Abu Yazid Bistami (d. c. 875) may have been the one to originate the concept of fana’, an annihilation of all individualism in divine union. The first of the sufis to systematize the states of mystical attainment and the stages on the path to union with God was Dhu’n-nun al-Misri (796–861). Sufism had a long and difficult road before reaching general acceptance, though. The ecstatic al-Hallaj was executed as a heretic, as were several other early mystics. It was only in the eleventh century, especially thanks to Abu’l-Qasim al-Qushayri (986–1072), that sufism was associated with Muslim hadith and legal theory, winning the movement acceptance as an orthodox practice.

The great golden age of Muslim mysticism was the thirteenth century, when, above all, Ibn al-‘Arabi (1165–1240), Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273), and their disciples expressed in some of the most beautiful language ever crafted the soul’s yearning for God and the triumph of love over reason. The tradition continues to the present, despite several movements over the centuries to suppress sufism. An important modern example is the Turkish mystical poet Asaf Halet Celebi (1907–1958), an important intermediary between Eastern and Western spiritual traditions.

Suggesting strong currents of intercommunication between the religions of Europe and the Near East, Christianity and Judaism also enjoyed a great efflorescence of mysticism in the thirteenth century. Spain during this time gave birth to the Kabbalah, a reaction to the rationalism and legalism of contemporary Jewish practice. Kabbalists emphasized God as unknowable mystery, and the great leaders of the movement, such as Moses ben Nahman (1194–1270), were great mystics as well as scholars. The mystical route of the Kabbalah continued as an important influence for centuries, producing great mystics such as Isaac Luria (1534–1572) and Nahman of Bratslav (1772–1810).

The Christian mystical tradition can be said to originate with Paul (d. c. 65), “caught up to the third heaven” (2 Cor. 12:2). By the sixth century, the author known as Pseudo-Dionysius could systematize mystical understanding, telling how human nature can be “divinized” by a mystical progress that leads from purgation to illumination to eventual union with God. The more sophisticated Eastern churches produced a series of great mystical figures, reaching a height with Simeon the New Theologian (949–1022), the greatest of the Byzantine mystics. It was only in the twelfth century that a comparable line of notable mystics appeared in Western Europe, beginning with Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179). It is of course likely that mystics existed in the West before her, but if they wrote down their experiences their works are no longer extant. The trickle of Western Christian mystics grew to a flood in the thirteenth through fifteenth centuries. These people, both men and women, experienced an identification with Christ so deep that a surprising number of them experienced the very wounds of Christ imprinted on their bodies (the stigmata). The Christian mystics, like the sufis, led much of the Christian population to deeper inner spirituality in manners ranging from propagation of specific devotional practices to Teresa of Avila’s (1515–1582) role in the Catholic Reformation’s emphasis on religion as an interior journey rather than just reciting words.

Although mystics have appeared around the world, special note should be taken of the large number of Hindu mystics who have practiced yoga as a literal “joining” to the divine (as have Daoists). The greatest Hindu mystics are described as ecstasies whose devotions both were grounded in a direct experience of a god and helped perpetuate such a union.

Mysticism can be dangerous in many senses. Loudly proclaimed visions of the divine that disagree with established religious authority are unpopular in any age and religion. The challenge of many mystics has been to make their experience palatable to those with the power to silence them, and the history of mysticism is lined with the corpses of mystics who failed and were killed, persecuted, or condemned as insane. Islam even acknowledges that the shock of divine illumination can overwhelm the human intellect, sometimes with permanent effects.

Nafisa, Sayyida

Muslim holy woman, scholar

Sayyida Nafisa, the great-granddaughter of the prophet Muhammad's grandson Hasan, is credited with great learning as well as the sanctity and piety shared by the prophet's family. Egyptian Muslims believe that she migrated to Egypt from Medina and is buried in Cairo, where she is thought to have died in 824. Her tomb attracts weekly visitations and features the performance of sufi dhikr (the ritualized "remembrance" of the names of God) and a mawlid (annual commemorative festival) that attracts pilgrims from all over the country.

Nafisa's birth in 762 was accompanied by visions of the prophet foretelling her greatness. She memorized the Qur'an at a young age and became an expert in hadith (accounts of what Muhammad said and did, the basis of Islamic law and Qur'an interpretation). She attended study circles with her father, Hasan al-Anwar, and learned law from Malik ibn Anas, founder of the Maliki school of law. She exemplifies the austerity and worship of the early sufi saints, making God the sole focus of all her desire. She married Ishaq, son of the sixth Shi'i imam, Ja'far as-Sadiq.

According to Egyptian tradition, Nafisa came to Egypt with Ishaq and her father, fleeing Abbasid persecution. The Egyptians welcomed them because of their great love for the prophet's family and saw it as a blessing to have his descendants in their midst. Ishaq returned to Medina as governor, but Nafisa and her father remained in Cairo. Many scholars visited her, including the founders of two of the schools of Islamic law, Muhammad ibn Idris al-Shafi'i and Ahmad ibn Hanbal. Al-Shafi'i became a close friend, and she led his funeral prayers, fully veiled. Nafisa mediated between the people and Egypt's ruler and performed miracles to relieve the suffering of Muslims and non-Muslims. Her husband's abandonment and the death of her father grieved her, and she occupied herself with prayer and fasting. She dug her own grave and prayed and recited the Qur'an in it every night. The historian Yusuf Ragib (1976–1977) doubts Nafisa ever existed, noting that none of al-Shafi'i's biographies mention her. He also points out that her name first appears more than 150 years after her death in a Shi'i Fatimid source and that she was not venerated in Egypt until the thirteenth century.

Nagarjuna

(c. 150–250 C.E.)

Buddhist philosopher

Nagarjuna was a major philosophical figure in the Mahayana Buddhist tradition during the second and third centuries. He founded the Madhyamaka school and was author of Mulamadhyamaka-karika (Fundamentals on the Middle Way) and other works. There is no historical mention of the school until the work of Chandrakirti in the seventh century.

According to Buddhist legend, Nagarjuna was born into a brahmin family in southern India in about 150. After a period of renunciant wandering, he decided to become a teacher of Buddhist scriptures. He encountered a great serpent that took pity on him and took him to his palace under the sea. After the serpent gave him scriptures to read and study, Nagarjuna attained the status of a bodhisattva (enlightened being), and the serpent sent him to spread the teachings. This tale helps to explain Nagarjuna's name, naga (serpent) and arjuna, for the tree under which he was born. The subtle and difficult teachings of the Buddha had supposedly been kept secret in the depths of the sea and guarded by the serpent because people were not prepared to hear them; they were finally revealed to humankind via Nagarjuna so that erroneous knowledge could be corrected.

Nagarjuna defined his philosophy as a middle path between two extremes of eternalism and nihilism. He was not advocating that anything like a self or soul could be eternal or enduring; nor was he taking the position that nothing endures. Rather, Nagarjuna suggested that nothing in the world existed absolutely and nothing perished completely. The middle, for Nagarjuna, was not located within the realm of language or concepts; it was transcendental and thus beyond both language and concepts. Nagarjuna's philosophy suggested that no specific philosophical position is ultimate or limitless. Therefore, the ultimate truth is not embodied by a specific philosophical position.

Nagarjuna's path of thought did not lead to a particular type of knowledge. The path that he envisioned represented, rather, the termination of all knowing and therefore all theorizing, which he viewed as the practice of the perfection of wisdom, which is the most important perfection for a bodhisattva because it represents the attainment of enlightenment. The implications of the development of this perfection were evident in his basic distinction between conventional truth and ultimate truth. The former type of truth was useful for everyday life, but when it was pushed too far it became illusory, whereas ultimate truth was a nondual type of knowledge. What Nagarjuna meant was an intuition devoid of content that stood in sharp contrast to the previous level of awareness. This intuition was beyond the state of ordinary knowledge and reason and represented the dissolution of the conceptual function of the human mind. This higher knowledge meant the dawn of freedom and release from the turmoil and ignorance of the world and was equivalent to realizing nirvana, a total transformation of a person's self-awareness and the realization that all distinctions and all entities are empty (sunyata).

Nagasaki Martyrs

Roman Catholic martyrs

In 1862, the Roman Catholic Church canonized the nine regular clergy and seventeen lay members of the church who were crucified in 1597 at Nagasaki by order of the Japanese warlord Hideyoshi. The Nagasaki crucifixions were the first in a series of mass executions of Roman Catholics in Japan after the church's legal proscription in 1587. In part, the persecution was the result of important shifts in political power among Japanese warlords. It also, however, reflected a growing distrust of the Catholic community. The active persecution of Japanese Catholics by the authorities subsided with the death of Hideyoshi in 1599, but the violence was renewed in 1613. By 1640, thousands of Japanese Catholics had been put to death. Although some believers were able to maintain the Christian faith without the benefit of priests or outside contacts until the return of Catholic missionaries in the nineteenth century, the organized church in the kingdom was destroyed by 1640.

The Nagasaki martyrs came from a variety of backgrounds. Among the clergy were six Franciscans of European extraction, Paul Miki (a Japanese Jesuit from an aristocratic family), and two Japanese Jesuit lay brothers. Of the seventeen lay martyrs, one was of Korean extraction while the remainder were Japanese believers. The lay believers were drawn from a variety of occupations, including a soldier, a physician, and three young boys. The method of their execution was particularly resonant to a European audience because of the obvious similarity to the crucifixion of Jesus. Each victim was tied to a cross on the ground, then they were raised up in a long row. Each was then dispatched with a lance by an executioner.

The fate of the Nagasaki martyrs was widely disseminated by the Society of Jesus and the Franciscan order in Europe, and their constancy in the face of persecution was seen as exemplary by contemporaries, but the Catholic Church did not move to formally recognize their holiness through canonization until the nineteenth century. This lack of formal recognition is not surprising, as the Catholic Reformation church, unlike the early church, canonized few martyrs. The decision to canonize all twenty-six martyrs in 1862 reflected an increased readiness to recognize martyrdom as a holy activity in the nineteenth century. There was also renewed interest in the Catholic Church's mission in Japan following the church's return to the kingdom in 1859 as the result of a treaty between the governments of Japan and France.

Nagasena

(c. 2nd cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist monk

An Indian Buddhist monk of approximately the second century B.C.E., Nagasena (Tib.: kLu-yi sDe) is known for his discussions with King Milinda (the Indo-Greek king Menandros/Menander), who ruled from Sagala (Sialkot, Pakistan). According to the Milindapanha (Questions of King Milinda), before his birth Nagasena had been a god named Mahasena living in Tavatimsa (Heaven of the Thirty-Three). He is portrayed as an extraordinary monk who was called from these transcendent realms specifically to banish King Milinda's doubts and win him over to Buddhism.

The Milindapanha recounts how King Milinda confounded monks and laymen alike in his thirst for philosophical knowledge. Sakka and the arhats led by Assagutta approached Nagasena and he agreed to be born as a human so that the principles of religion could be furthered through his bodhisattvic sacrifice. He took birth in the brahmin household of Sonuttara in a village called Kajangala in the Himalayas (Kashmir according to the Chinese text). He entered the Buddhist order under Rohana, then studied under Assagutta at the Vattaniya monastery and attained the first level of enlightenment (shrotapanna). Thereafter, he was sent to Pataliputra, where he studied under Dhammarakkhita and attained arhatship. Subsequently, Nagasena went to the Samkheyya monastery in Sagala, where his historic discussion with Milinda took place.

The discourse, as preserved in the Milindapanha, is doubtless a crafted compendium of Theravada doctrine laid bare by a master of Buddhist thought. Milinda posed eighty-two dilemmas to Nagasena, who responded to each to the satisfaction of the king. At the end of the conversation, Milinda converted to Buddhism, built a monastery named Milindavihara, and handed it over to Nagasena.

Nothing is known of Nagasena after his lengthy encounter with the king. This seems altogether appropriate, for he had been called into mortal existence for the sake of the dharma (Buddhist doctrine), and, having performed his task, vanished from the attention of history. Yet he left behind a method of explicating the teachings of Buddha that became the archetype of subsequent elucidation. His subtle blend of metaphysics and ethics, argument and example, produced a model of useful discourse and an encouragement to practice. The Milindapanha is unique in being revered by Theravada and Mahayana Buddhists alike. Its depictions of the path and the goal have been relevant to every succeeding generation, for it is, above all, a portrait of the arhat.

Nahman of Bratslav (Nachman)

Jewish leader

Nahman of Bratslav was the great-grandson of the Besht (Ba'al Shem Tov), the eighteenth-century founder of Hasidism. Nahman, born in 1772 at a time when the Hasidic movement was gaining in momentum, became a Hasidic moralist and a charismatic tzaddiq, or "righteous holy man." For Nahman's followers—and indeed, eventually in his own mind—he was the fulfillment of the messianic promise. Near the end of his life Rebbe Nahman considered himself to be the one true tzaddiq of God on earth.

His early life remains obscure. It is said that young Nahman spent most of his time alone in contemplation and prayer. He was married at the age of thirteen to a young woman named Soshia, yet he continued his contemplative pursuits. It can be assumed that he was a student of both Torah and Talmud, as well as the Lurianic Kabbalah, and it was not long before he was recognized as the leader of a small but fervent group of Hasidim.

Nahman had contentious relationships with other tzaddikim. One of his more idiosyncratic tenets was the necessity for his followers to confess their sins to him, a requirement so unusual that members of other Hasidic communities would chide the hasidim (followers) of Nahman as vidduiniks, “confessors.” In most other respects, however, Reb Nahman preached a familiar Hasidism, although he accorded the divine a degree of transcendence, and therefore distance, from humanity that was not as prevalent in the teachings of other Hasidic leaders—making the leader’s role as intermediary even more important.

In 1798, over the protests of family and community, Rebbe Nahman decided to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Once there, he traveled to various sites sacred to memory and history, including the holy and mystical city of Safed in northern Palestine, a place synonymous with the beloved kabbalist Isaac Luria (1534–1572) and study of the Kabbalah in general.

By the autumn of 1800, Nahman was settled in the Ukrainian town of Zlatopol. His decision to move there has long puzzled scholars, for the town already had a tzaddiq. Zlatopol’s rebbe became an intractable and relentless foe, hurling invectives such as “heretic” and “arrogant” at Nahman. In 1802, Nahman left Zlatopol and journeyed west with his family to Bratslav, where for a second time he incurred the wrath of the local tzaddiq. Nahman refused to leave Bratslav, although he was becoming more and more isolated from the other tzaddikim and was attracting fewer hasidim than he had anticipated.

It was at this time that Nahman became convinced that he himself was the desperately awaited messiah. His only son to survive infancy died in 1806, and his wife Soshia died of tuberculosis in June 1807; his despondency became greater when he, too, contracted tuberculosis. Until his death in 1810, Nahman dictated to his disciples homilies and stories, later compiled into the definitive collection Sippure HaMaasiyot shel Rabbi Nahman MiBratslav (The tales of Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav). The tales are sacred to Bratslav Hasidim and offer Nahman’s most profound reflections on redemption, righteous faithfulness, and the nature of the cosmos, although the stories are enigmatic and decidedly allegorical.

Nahman’s grave at Uman has become a site of pilgrimage for Bratslav Hasidim throughout the world. Nahman’s sons died before him, yet Nahman did not select a successor from his discipleship. Nevertheless, the community remained (and remains) united and committed to the teachings of their beloved rebbe who remains the tzaddiq of Bratslav Hasidism.

Nakae Tōju

Confucian scholar

Nakae Tōju is revered as the patriarch of Wang Yangming learning in Japan, even though he only acquired Yangming’s original writings four years before his death, after the basic tendencies of his thought had already been formed. Meiji-period nationalists exalted him as one of Japan’s greatest sages, “the sage of Ōmi,” and he was featured as a model of filial piety in school textbooks until 1945. He has continued to attract much attention in postwar studies of the Japanization of Confucian thought.

Tōju was born to a farming family in present-day Shiga prefecture in 1608. At the age of nine, he was entrusted to his samurai grandfather’s care to be trained as his successor. At seventeen, he first read the Four Books with Neo-Confucian commentaries and resolved to devote himself to Zhu Xi learning. At nineteen, he inherited his grandfather’s position of district magistrate. At twenty-seven, however, he resigned his post to care for his aging and widowed mother. This meant relinquishing his samurai status, a serious crime punishable, in theory, by a sentence of seppuku (ritual disembowelment). This courageous act of breaking free from the samurai status system to return to his home village, however, clearly contributed to the growth of the independent spirit for which he later became famous.

Back in Ōmi, he sold his sword and supported his mother by selling sake and making low-interest rice loans to peasants, devoting much time both to his Confucian studies and to instructing young samurai who came to study under him. He also began to produce works on Confucian philosophy. Already he began to focus on the concept of “dwelling in reverence” (Chin.: jujing; Jap.: kyokei), although it did not agree with contemporary scholarly emphasis.

In Jikei zusetu (A diagrammatic explanation of “holding to reverence”), he argues that the essence of “reverence” is “awe.” He explains the need to hold in awe the mandate of heaven, which requires a man to “honor the virtuous nature” within. Although external rules and regulations are to be obeyed, this is not to be done with an attitude of strict adherence to every particular rule. Rather, if the inner attitude of awe and reverence is firmly established, accordance with external norms will follow naturally. To honor the “virtuous nature”—one’s original self—is to yield to it the lordship over all aspects of one’s life. The “heavenly lord” within will then remain permanently at peace.

Tōju’s most famous work, Okina Mondō (Dialogues with an old man) was written in Japanese at age thirty-three. Perhaps the most important task of this book is to distinguish Confucianism from Buddhism and Daoism, presenting the Way of Confucius as answering to the same religious concerns as are addressed by Buddhism, but doing so in a more thorough and comprehensive way not requiring the breaking of one’s ethical bonds with society. This spiritual transformation is to be achieved through the reverent practice of filial piety. But filial piety in its essence is not to be understood as a behavioral norm, as something belonging to the realm of “ought.” The practice of filial piety, rather, begins with the illumination of one’s own original mind. The illumination is to be achieved through “using the innate awareness of the good (Chin.: liangzhi; Jap.: ryōchi) as a mirror while one is in a state of watchful solitude (Chin.: shendu; Jap.: shindoku)” (Question 104, p. 157).

Tōju’s teachings as a whole can be seen as ultimately rooted in his conception of on (debt of gratitude), which consists of two complementary insights: (1) the realization that one’s body and one’s life are not one’s own but have been received as precious gifts through the medium of one’s parents, one’s ancestors, and the divine forces (kami) of the natural world from the ultimate source of the universe itself, and (2) the realization of the debt of gratitude one owes to these sources of one’s life. The attitude of love and respect that arises from these insights is in itself the human being’s true original nature and is rooted in the child’s instinctive love for his or her parents.

Perhaps it is not just coincidence that beginning from the same year he wrote Okina Mondō, 1640, all families in Japan (except families of Shinto priests) were required to register with a Buddhist temple and undergo an annual scrutiny of religious beliefs to ensure the absence of spiritual contamination by Christianity. This was also the year that Tōju first came into contact with the teachings of Wang Yangming through the writings of his disciple Wang Ji (Wang Longxi, 1498–1583). In the following year, he made a pilgrimage to the imperial shrine at Ise, which led him toward a further reconciliation with Shinto as well, combined with an insight into the folly of strict observance of external rules of ritual, which are bound to particular cultural traditions and thus are not the Way itself.

Tōju’s late teachings, however, were markedly more contemplative in orientation than those of Yangming, lacking his activist determination to bring about the moral transformation of society. Tōju came to be much loved not only by his disciples but also by the peasants of Ōmi, and his fame gradually spread throughout the nation. Though his teachings gave rise to no widespread organized religious movement, his books were very widely read by scholars and samurai alike.

Nakayama Miki

Japanese Tenrikyō founder

Nakayama Miki was the shamanistic founder of the Japanese syncretistic religious movement Tenrikyō (Religion of Divine Wisdom) in the nineteenth century. She is venerated by her followers as oyasama (lady mother) and regarded as the bodily shrine of the deity Tenri-ō-no-mikoto (God the Parent).

Born as the eldest daughter of a local squire in 1798, Nakayama Miki was married at the age of thirteen to the headman of the village Shōyashiki (part of the present-day town Tenri, Nara prefecture). It is assumed that she developed a strong spiritual consciousness from an early age, first manifest in her devotion to Pure Land Buddhism and her intention to become a Buddhist nun. She agreed to get married only on the condition that she could keep her habit of chanting the nenbutsu (invocation of the name of Amida Buddha) after the daily work.

The illness of her first-born son brought further impulse to her spiritual life. Using the services of a yamabushi (mountain ascetic), she tried to cure the boy through an exorcist ritual (yosekaji). In one of these rituals, Nakayama Miki took over the role of the medium. According to the depiction of the Tenrikyō, the yamabushi lost control over her and she was seized by the deity Tenri-ō-no-mikoto. She entered a deep state of trance and divine possession for three days while the deity spoke through her demanding her as its shrine. Her family finally gave in to the wish of the deity. This event, which occurred in October 1838, is considered the commencement of Tenrikyô.

Thereafter, Nakayama Miki came to be renowned for acts of faith healing and venerated as a living god of safe childbirth by a growing community. In the 1860s, she composed her first book, Mikagura-uta (Songs for the service), and she finished her second one, Ofudesaki (Tip of the writing brush), in 1882. Both books, together with the Osashizu (Divine directions), are venerated as the three holy scriptures of Tenrikyô. After her death in 1887 she was succeeded by Iburi Izô (1833–1907). The deity was thought to speak through Iburi Izô from then on. At present, Nakayama Miki is believed to reside in her sanctuary in the town of Tenri, where food and hot baths are provided for her daily by her followers. The Tenrikyô, with more than 1.75 million followers, is one of the largest of the new religious movements in contemporary Japan.

Namdev

Hindu poet

Namdev was a Hindu saint and poet from Maharashtra born in Pandharpur, a city heavily influenced by worship of Vishnu, of low-caste origins in about 1270. His father was a tailor, and he learned his father's trade. As a young man, he allegedly associated with criminals and killed and robbed various victims. This unethical pattern of behavior ended when he became influenced by Jnaneshvara, a regional saint and poet, and he shifted his focus to devotion to the deity Vithoba.

As part of his lifelong devotion to his deity, Namdev composed poetry in Marathi and some in Hindi, although few of these poems have survived. Some of his poems have been incorporated into the Sikh tradition. There is even scholarly debate about whether Namdev represents more than a single figure, and thus his authorship of the poems has been questioned. Besides focusing on the deity Vithoba, many of the poems refer to other saints. His references to God reflect the oneness and omnipresence of God, the importance of realizing the nirguna (qualityless) aspect of God, and the necessity of chanting the names of God. Other poems concentrate on the significance of the guru (teacher). The major topics reflect features common to the sant (poet-saint) tradition.

A member of the southern sant tradition, Namdev used the language of Middle Marathi, an archaic form of the language of Maharashtra. Although there is no precise meaning to the term sant, it was a term used to refer to poet-saints of northern India who tended to be nonsectarian and advocated devotion to a deity lacking qualities, invisible, and all-pervading. Namdev learned a lesson when he first met his teacher at a temple. Jnaneshvara was reclining with his feet on a statue of Shiva. Namdev told him to remove his feet from the icon, but the teacher replied that Namdev should place the teacher's feet on a spot not pervaded by God.

The sants lacked a shared body of doctrine, denied the value of brahmin sacrifices, believed that the notion of ritual pollution was artificially constructed, and did not think that sacred books were necessary for salvation. These convictions were often combined with a strong antibrahminical bias. The positive thrust of their poetry focused on devotion to a single, absolute, transcendent, and ineffable deity who possessed the ability to grant salvation to everyone regardless of social status.

Nammalvar

Hindu poet-saint

Nammalvar was perhaps the most important saint of Sri Vaishnavism, a sect of Hinduism found in the Tamil-speaking area of southern India. Sri Vaishnavism was one of many devotional (bhakti) movements that flourished in India beginning as early as the sixth century. Characterized by intense, even passionate love for the divine, whether understood in monotheistic terms as a personal god or in monistic terms as the supreme absolute beyond all qualities, the devotional movement saw the emergence of extraordinary poet-saints, typically expressing sentiments such as the bliss of ecstatic union with God, the pain of a (perceived) separation from God, and a triumphant reunion or communion in God.

The Sri Vaishnava tradition was one of the earliest, if not the first, of the bhakti traditions to emerge in India, and it consequently influenced later regional movements. The twelve Sri Vaishnava poet-saints (alvars), the supreme models of devotion for this tradition, lived between the sixth and ninth centuries. They wandered about the region of present-day Tamil Nadu, singing the praises of Vishnu and his beautiful consort Lakshmi (also called Sri, hence, “Sri Vaishnavism,” the tradition of “Vishnu with Sri”). The term “alvar” itself indicates the depth of divine passion; it means “one who is immersed,” that is, in God; the alvars then were God-intoxicated saints of southern India. Their poems, collected in the Naal ayira Dhivya prabhandham (Sacred collect of four thousand), are considered sacred, equal or superior to the Vedas, the pan-Indian scriptures of Hinduism; thus the Collect has often been called the Tamil Veda to emphasize its value and importance for Sri Vaishnavas. The poems, deeply formative for devotees, convey the most meaningful of human aspirations: the desire to be consumed with love of God. They have been commented upon and used in temple ritual since the tenth century.

Of the alvars, Nammalvar (“Our alvar”; he is also called Shathakopan or Maran) is the most famous, composing nearly half of the poems in the Sacred Collect itself. Nammalvar was of low-caste status, indicating that in the Sri Vaishnava tradition, as in other bhakti traditions, spiritual merit or potential transcended traditional caste boundaries. Nammalvar’s most important work, Tiruvaymoli (Sacred utterance), is written in ten decads, with signature verses, for a total of 1,102 verses. It contains many wide-ranging themes, including sophisticated theological and didactic elements, affirming both the ineffable nature of Vishnu and his most auspicious form and qualities. Above all, the poetry expresses passionate longing for God, the premier sensibility of all bhakti poetry, and indeed, perhaps of all mystics and saints.

Nanak

Sikh guru, founder

Guru Nanak founded the Sikh community in the early sixteenth century. Born into a high-caste Hindu family near Lahore, India, in 1469, Nanak became increasingly disenchanted with the society in which he lived. Eventually, around 1500, he left his householder life to wander the world in search of a better way to live. His twenty years of travel took him far and wide, and the Sikh tradition, as recorded in the Janam Sakhis (The life stories of Guru Nanak), has him visiting many religious centers, as far as Mecca to the west, Dhacca to the east, Sri Lanka to the south, and Kashmir to the north. During his travels, he wrote hymns that commented on the current political situation, engaged in ethical and religious debates with other religious figures, and praised God. In the early 1520s, he returned to his home province of Punjab, acquired a piece of land on the Ravi River, collected his hymns into a book, and established a community where he put the previous two decades of meditation and learning into practice. Before his death in 1539, he appointed a successor, Guru Angad, to carry the flame of the guruship.

Nanak identified three key virtues for living a morally righteous life that were essential to the search for liberation from this world—meditation on the divine name (nam), charity (dan), and purity (ishnan). This search for liberation (moksha or mukati) certainly echoes much of the Indian religious thinking of the time, but Guru Nanak brought a social consciousness to his philosophy that set him apart from other religious thinkers. Although the concepts of nam and ishnan speak to the personal dimension of this process, the emphasis on dan, or charity, puts the search for liberation firmly in the world. The individual is not to seek liberation on his or her own; rather, he or she must actively participate in communal life. Thus the search for liberation and the path that leads to it becomes more collective than personal.

Guru Nanak’s community on the Ravi, named Kartarpur (City of God), reflected these three ideals (nam, dan, ishnan) and their communal orientation. Meditation on the name took on various forms, including individual recitation of hymns to God that Nanak had composed in the early morning, at sunset, and at the end of the day, congregational singing of hymns at the Gurdwara (House of the Guru), and emphasis on hard work as part of a social commitment to keep the society going. The ideal of charity was institutionalized in the form of langar, or the communal meal served to all. Based on the sufi practice of langar, the community at Kartarpur worked to supply food for anyone who wanted to join the meal regardless of social standing or religion. All the food and labor was considered seva, or service, presented before God. Finally, the importance of purity extended to eating and drinking habits as well as to personal hygiene issues, such as bathing regularly.

Nanak presented God as the eternally unchanging formless one. God is beyond time, beyond all human description, and beyond human intellect. He is all-powerful, omnipresent, and omniscient. He is the creator of all and will be the ultimate destroyer of all. However, Guru Nanak broke from his fellow spiritual leaders by insisting that his followers develop a relationship, no matter how imperfect it might be, with God. Thus, it is not by personal effort that liberation is achieved, but by God's grace (nadar, from the Persian nazar, meaning "glance") that one is saved. Only by receiving the "glance" of God can one be released from self-centeredness (haumai), and this release is accompanied by an awe-inspiring experience of God and a resulting bliss (visamad).

Though personal effort is not enough on its own for liberation, he said, it is still absolutely necessary to the process. Since God is the ultimate cause (kartar) of everything, a person's relationship to the world is important. Nanak encouraged his followers to engage the world as it is all God's creation, and even the most mundane parts of life, such as farming or churning the butter, are elevated to spiritual acts. Thus, although God may be ultimately unknowable to the human mind, nevertheless Nanak did attempt to describe him, and that description is often couched in familiar terms. Guru Nanak used language from various avenues of life to describe God: In agrarian language, he is the great farmer (vadda kisan); in the language of artisans, he is the potter; and, most significantly, in the language of politics, he is the patshah, the great king. Thus, Nanak left a legacy of personal meditation on the Name (nam), firm commitment to hard work and service to humanity in the search for liberation, and active participation in worldly affairs such as politics.

It is important to recognize the political dimension of Guru Nanak's life. Although he certainly was a great religious leader, he also had a keen interest in political life. He was insistent on just rule and believed that the right to rule came from moral righteousness, which could only be obtained by following the path set out by God. Even his conception of God was linked to his concern about the legitimacy of rule, as God is called the king of kings and justice is meted out in his divine court.

Naram-Sin

Mesopotamian god-king

Naram-Sin, born in 2254 B.C.E., was an early Mesopotamian king (the fourth king of the first dynasty of Akkad), the first to claim to be divine. Unlike the Egyptians, the Mesopotamians did not have a tradition of divine kingship. His claims thus mark a break from Mesopotamian traditions. More typical claims by Mesopotamian kings were of direct communication with the gods. Earlier texts describe kingship as having been granted by the gods, and most Mesopotamian kings were associated with divine favor. Only after Naram-Sin, however, and even then infrequently, were Mesopotamian kings seen as deities themselves.

Evidence of Naram-Sin's association with divinity is provided by the archaeological record. About halfway through his reign, his name appears written with a dingir prefix. The dingir is a determinative in the Sumerian and Akkadian languages that indicates that the name following is the name of a deity. Furthermore, Naram-Sin is referred to as a god in his titulary. On the Victory Stelae of Naram-Sin, he is depicted wearing a horned headdress; in Mesopotamian art, this headdress is normally worn by a god. And an inscription on a copper statue found in Iraq describes how Naram-Sin became a god. The inscription says that because of his skill in defending the city of Akkad, the inhabitants petitioned a group of gods to make Naram-Sin a god of that city. These people, it is also written, built a temple in which to worship him.

Later traditions of Naram-Sin see the claims of divinity as inherently sacrilegious. Although the first dynasty of Akkad maintained power after the death of Naram-Sin, later Mesopotamian texts attribute the fall of this dynasty to divine retribution against Naram-Sin's blasphemy. From these texts, the Mesopotamian theology of kingship is made clear. The gods had the power to install and remove kings, who in many ways were the intercessors between the human and divine realms. This view seems to have regained prominence after Naram Sin's death in 2218 B.C.E.

Naropa

Buddhist master

Naropa, also known as Nadapada, was an Indian tantric Buddhist master whose life and teachings were highly regarded in Tibet. Indeed, he was considered one of the greatest Indian Buddhist spiritual masters of his time. He is particularly important in the history of Tibetan Buddhism, for his lineages of teaching were transmitted to most Tibet schools within a century of his passing. He is well known for his role in the dissemination of numerous Buddhist tantras, such as the Hevajra and Chakrasamvara traditions, as well as for his synthesis of the highest yoga tantras, as exemplified by his six yogas (Tib.: na ro chos drug).

In Tibetan literature, Naropa is usually referred to as a "perfectly accomplished one" (Tib.: grub chen; Skt.: mahasiddha), that is, one who has attained siddhi, or tantric accomplishment. Tantric accomplishment may be mundane—the acquisition of such abilities as clairvoyance, telepathy, astral travel, and so forth—or supermundane—the attainment of supreme enlightenment itself. Naropa is counted among the eighty-four Indian Vajrayana mahasiddhas and the chief disciple of the siddha Tilopa (928–1009). Siddhas, including Naropa, were always depicted as highly eccentric, nonconventional, and having great spiritual powers and magical abilities.

The life story of Naropa reveals an ordinary, struggling human being seeking spiritual awakening who undergoes miraculous transformation through devotion to the teacher. Every Tibetan knows by heart the many fantastic stories concerning him.

Born in Bengal to a Buddhist family in 956, he was forced into an arranged marriage and later renounced it, together with his worldly position, to become a monk. Naropa studied with numerous Bengali and then Kashmiri teachers in the early part of his life. He became famous as a scholar and eventually attained the position of abbot at the renowned Indian monastic university of Nalanda. He served as abbot for eight years, achieving widespread fame as a scholar and also as a mentor to many Buddhist scholars of India.

However, during his fortieth year Naropa underwent an encounter that profoundly altered the course of his life. One day he was silently studying scriptures when he suddenly noticed a repulsive old woman watching him. The old and ugly woman questioned Naropa, "Do you understand the words or the sense of what you are reading?" Naropa replied, "The words." The old woman laughed and asked, "And do you understand the sense?" Again Naropa replied in the affirmative, whereupon the old ugly woman began to weep and tremble. "Here you are lying," she scolded. Over the following days, the conversation transformed Naropa, and he eventually came to the conclusion that he would have to leave the life of the monastery to search for a tantric teacher, or guru. Thereupon, he gave up his position in the monastery and left in search of a tantric master. After much wandering and many great trials, he encountered Tilopa.

Naropa's search for and then training under Tilopa is a story told in allegorical and mystical language that relates the attitude that an aspirant must generate to properly approach a master teacher. He encounters various people during his search, including a man who is catching and eating lice, a leper woman, and so forth, each offering a new clue on the spiritual attitude to be cultivated in order to become worthy to meet the tantric guru. Eventually, Tilopa appears to Naropa, and a twelve-year training period follows that results in Naropa's enlightenment.

In the later part of his life, Naropa attracted many disciples from India, Nepal, and Tibet. His teaching lineages spread to all schools of Tibetan Buddhism, but most predominantly the Kagyu (bka' brgyud) school, over the next few centuries.

Narsi Mehta

Hindu poet

Narsi Mehta, a fifteenth-century Vaishnava poet of the Hindu religious tradition, composed devotional bhajans (hymns) in Gujarati and Rajasthani, the Indo-Aryan languages spoken in the states of Gujarat and Rajasthan in India. However, he composed his major works in Gujarati; therefore, he is more popular in Gujarat than in Rajasthan. Though he did not create any religious sect, people have constructed a small temple to him close to the Narsino Choroa—a circular platform built in 1808—in Junagadha (Saurashtra region of Gujarat). It is said that Narsi used to preach bhakti (devotional Hindu) while sitting on that platform.

Though Narsi is considered one of the greatest poets of the Gujarati language, not much is known about his life and his works. Scholars are divided on his birth year (probably around 1414), birthplace, the nature of his spiritual training, and also on the authorship of many of his works. Interestingly, some of those works are so popular among the people that even the strongest proof falsifying his authorship would not convince them. However, scholars do unanimously agree on certain facts. They include that Narsi was born in a Nagar community, considered the highest in the Hindu caste hierarchy. He lost his parents in childhood and lived with his uncle or brother until he became an adult. He lived in Junagadha, where he was married with two children, a son and a daughter. He was multilingual, knowing Vraja and Marathi in addition to Gujarati. He sang Krishna bhakti with sakhibhavaa—a state of mind in which a devotee considers himself a woman and Krishna as the only male in the world. Narsi's writings could be divided into autobiographical poems, long narrative poems, philosophical poems, and Krishna love poems, although scholars have challenged the authorship of those in the first three categories.

Popular accounts of Narsi's life mention many miracles that he is said to have performed. Though scholars have challenged those accounts, they indicate Narsi's popularity as a holy person. Narsi was also a social reformer. Defying the rules of his community, he went to Harijan—the lowest community in those days—and sang bhajans. Consequently, he was excommunicated.

Narsi enjoys dual respect as a poet. Vaishnavas respect him as a poet of their own sect, while scholars respect him as a secular poet.

Nasafi, 'Aziz al-Din

(13th cent. C.E.)

Muslim sufi

A prominent member of the Kubrawiyyah sufi order and the disciple of the famous Persian sufi Sa'd al-Din Hamuyah (d. 1252), Aziz al-Din Nasafi is best known for his thirteenth-century work Kitab Insan-i Kamil (The universal/perfect man). Written in Persian and in plain language, the book has become one of the most widely circulated handbooks of sufism. The concept of the perfect man goes back to Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240) and represents the culmination of the human state as the mirror of divine names and qualities. The school of Ibn al-'Arabi considers creation as a manifestation or theophany of these names. This establishes an ontological link between God and his work of art, that is, the cosmos.

Nasafi likens the world of nature to the chapters (surah) of the Qur'an. Human beings, who have been given the unique ability to have an intimate relationship with God, occupy a special place in the great chain of being. Creation of humankind is regarded as the completion of God's design for the world in which humans are guided by revelation and sanctity to find the truth in nature. The universe is thus called the "great human" (insan-i kabir) and the individual human being the small universe (alam-i saghir). Religiously speaking, the perfect man refers primarily to the prophet Muhammad. The scope of the concept, however, has been expanded to include many saints and spiritual masters in an implicit, if not explicit, way.

In addition to articulating a spiritual metaphysics and cosmology, Nasafi also talks about the practical aspects of spiritual life. Master-disciple relationship, manners of following a particular path, invocation (dhikr), and states of ecstasy are among the issues that Nasafi addresses in his works. Nasafi is revered as a spiritual master especially in the Kubrawi tradition.

Nasafi played a significant role in making Ibn al-'Arabi's teachings better known in the Persian-speaking world. By developing an elaborate cosmology of divine names and qualities and addressing the issues of esoteric knowledge and exoteric law, he also influenced a number of later sufis and philosophers, including some Isma'ili thinkers. Nasafi's Insan-i Kamil has been translated into several languages. As a central figure of thirteenth-century sufism, Nasafi's work is likely to attract more attention in the near future.

Nasruddin, Khwaja

Muslim legendary hero

Hundreds of stories about Khwaja Nasruddin's exploits abound in the region that constituted the Ottoman world and beyond it. What makes these stories so appealing is the fact that they deal with real-life issues, including social injustice, selfishness, ignorance, and deceit. Although the stories are set in thirteenth-century teahouses and marketplaces, Nasruddin's observations about human nature are still applicable today.

Nasruddin's character fits into the hero figure who is a trickster or fool. He teaches by his own mistakes, through which he exposes other people's foolishness. Like Juha before him, Nasruddin is considered to be a legendary figure around whom stories have been woven. Yet there are some who insist that he was a real person who was born in a Turkish village in the thirteenth century. It is, however, his humor that lives on in parabolic stories (retold at parties and family gatherings) in many countries, especially in Turkey, where legend reports he was born and buried.

Considerable variations exist in Nasruddin stories (which were handed down orally) precisely because of the way they have been told through time and space. As a religious scholar

(and given that Islam has no professional priesthood), Nasruddin performed many functions in society, including prayer-leader, mosque preacher, magistrate, schoolmaster, farmer on his small plot of land, and so on. When times were hard and he had no money, he passed his time at the tea-house, plowed his small plot of land, or sold whatever he could find to survive. All in all, despite his ups and downs it was his learning that allowed him to maintain a respectable rank in society. In one anecdote, having failed to read a badly written letter, Nasruddin turns to his questioner, who had criticized him for wearing a scholar's turban under false pretenses, and challenges him to put on the turban and see if he can read the letter for himself. It thus gently suggests that external trappings may not always reflect inward qualities.

Naths

(fl. 12th–15th cent. C.E.)

Shaivite Hindu yogis

Naths (Hindi for “masters”) are a diverse confederation of Hindu yogis, ranging from ascetics to householders, connected to traditions involving the god Shiva. They are renowned for practicing intensive forms of yoga in their quest for magical powers and bodily immortality. Historically, they were found predominantly in northern and western India and Nepal, although their pilgrimages and itinerant habits have taken them throughout south Asia. The Naths flourished from the twelfth through fifteenth centuries but there are still small communities and individuals active today.

The precise historical origins of the Naths (often called Yogis or Jogis) are difficult to trace, but it is clear that they developed out of heterodox Shaivite traditions, especially the Kanphatas (Split-Eared Ones), Kapalikas (Users of the Skull), and Pasupatas (Followers of the Lord of Beasts). Naths sought physical immortality through a variety of practices, including alchemy, which involved the manipulation of metals and the ingestion of magical pills to transmute the fleshly body into a vehicle of light and power. Naths claim that one of their founders, Gorakhnath (usually placed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries), developed the famous system of hatha yoga (forceful yoga), which includes psychophysical practices such as bodily stretching, breath control, and the awakening of the mystical energy known as kundalini (coiled power), which then rises through the six “yogic centers” (chakras) of the spiritual body. Some Nathas added practices from tantric yoga, including ritual sexual intercourse and uses of human sexual fluids as “power substances” (White 1996). Such transgressive practices, designed to provide Nathas with access to supernatural powers, also led to their controversial status. In some cases, however, Hindu kings called upon the magical powers of Nathas to establish their kingdoms.

The Nathas have traditionally been linked to a group of legendary demigods known collectively as the siddhas (perfected ones), mythical superheroes who fought evil beings and mediated the human and divine realms. However, it is unlikely that the institutionalized orders of Nathas existed prior to the late twelfth or early thirteenth century. These orders claimed descent from another group of legendary (yet quasi-historical) figures known as the Nine Nathas—a shifting list of great masters including Gorakhnath, Adinath, Matsyendranath, and Minanath. With time, emphasis was given to Gorakhnath as the founder of the Nathas. One result of this complex interweaving of the Nathas with the siddhas and alchemists has been a rich trove of folklore and mythological traditions, which developed along with classic Nath texts on hatha yoga such as the thirteenth-century Goraksa Sataka (Hundred stanzas of Goraksa).

For centuries, Nathas have been visible throughout India as they journeyed on pilgrimages to holy sites and festivals. Some have been easily identified by their large earrings (made of metal, clay, or horn) inserted into the split ear cartilage by their gurus at the final stage of initiation. Some have lived in monastic communities; others have practiced alone in jungles and deserts. With their claims of great spiritual powers, alchemical practices, and connections with hatha yoga, the Nathas represent an important and distinctive type of holy person in the history of south Asian religions.

Native Americans and Holy People

See Amerindian Religions and Holy People

Nature

There is no great consistency in the relationship of holy people with nature, whether natural forces or animals. In some religions, the identification of the holy person with nature is extremely close (as in the indigenous religions of America and Africa), in others the defense of the natural takes on a central role (most notably the Jains, and including also Hinduism and Buddhism), while in still other religions, such as Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, connection to nature is only a secondary theme and often takes the form of dominance over rather than identification with the natural world. Retreat to a natural environment, however, especially for hermits, is a far-reaching theme.

In the indigenous religions of Africa and the Americas there is no clear dividing line between humans and the rest of the animal kingdom. In some legends, such as that of the Maasai, the hero is part wild animal and part human, marking his special powers and liminal status. This idea is widespread in Africa, as can be seen in the belief that the Malawi mythical martyr Mbona can appear as a python. In Amerindian spirituality, “ancestors” can include animals, plants, and even natural phenomena, looking back to a time when all lived together as equals. Thus great holy people, such as the legendary prophet/sage of the Cheyenne, Sweet Medicine, took on different animal forms to escape an attack. In historic times, the Amerindian connection to nature has most often been expressed in terms of care for the environment. For example, an Ottawa holy man called The Trout in 1807 proclaimed a message from God that the people should show respect for animals and never kill more than was necessary for food and clothing—reemphasizing traditional values in the face of the European call for furs for trade and so on. The Shawnee prophet Tenskwatawa (1775–1836) also denounced overhunting. The Midewiwin brotherhood was based on communication with animals who had taken human form.

In other religions that have emphasized the kinship of humans and animals, holy people have also been especially identifiable because of their closeness to or protection of animals. For example, the Greek philosopher Pythagoras (c. 570–497 B.C.E.) taught vegetarianism and advocated gentleness between species. If we could identify pre-Christian holy people among the Celtic peoples, it seems likely that they would also be marked for their closeness to nature, to judge from these elements that have lingered especially in Irish Christian legend. In both cases, an important factor seems to have been belief in reincarnation—if all souls are equal and move freely among animal forms, what right does a human have to take life? This concept is most developed in Jainism, which has an acute consciousness of the natural world. Twenty of the Jain tirthankaras (ford-makers) are believed to have achieved supreme knowledge on Mt. Sammedacala, and the first tirthankara reached fulfillment on another mountain, reflecting an eremitical tendency as an attribute of holy people. The most certain path to holiness, though, lies in “not-harming,” not killing any animal, no matter how small. Devout Jainas show constant mindfulness about the life around them, carrying whisks to brush away small insects before sitting down, even wearing face masks to avoid inhaling small animals. This theme appears in the lives of their holy people, most strikingly in that of Arihtanemi, the twenty-second tirthankara, who was on his way to be married when he heard the cries of the animals waiting to be butchered for the wedding feast. This so roused his heart that he forswore marriage and became an ascetic.

In all of these religions, it is common for a holy person to “prove” him- or herself by exerting authority over the forces of nature, whether animals, rain, plants, or any other part of the natural world. This theme becomes more significant in Buddhism, which combines a respect for nature with spiritual power over it. For example, the third Chan patriarch in China, Seng-ts’an (d. c. 606), went into hiding for ten years on a mountain to escape persecution. His presence there pacified the tigers that had been terrorizing the district. This is more a matter of spiritual status than command, as can be seen in the case of the Chan master Fa-jung (594–657), who had such strong emanations after enlightenment that birds would come and offer him flowers.

In Christianity and Islam, the most important thread is that nature itself proves the special status of a holy person by serving or obeying him or her. Thus early Christian hermits of the desert were often portrayed in “unnatural” proximity with animals, the beasts giving up their savage nature in the presence of holiness. Paul the Hermit (c. 235–c. 345) received daily bread deliveries from a crow, and a lion eventually came to dig his grave, and legend tells that Jerome (347–420) removed a thorn from a lion’s foot. These themes are also very important in Celtic hagiography, as mentioned above; most Irish saints had animals as part of their monastic community, fetching, carrying, caring for the holy person, and in general manifesting the greatness of the saint with their loyal, tame service. A great love of the natural world is also manifest in legends of both desert and Irish saints. Such a deep empathy with nature is unusual in European Christianity outside of these two traditions, until it emerges unexpectedly in thirteenth-century Italy with Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226), although authority over animals also appears in the lives of Ethiopian saints, such as the fourteenth-century Samuel of Waldebbba. Similarly, tales of Muslim sufis describe how their holiness was manifested by the care of animals. For example, when Dhu'n-nun al-Misri (796–861) died, birds flocked above the coffin to give it shade. 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166), according to sufi sources, was able to speak directly to animals, thanks to the purification of his soul—and could tame them at a glance.

No analysis of saints' attitudes toward nature would be complete, though, without some mention of modern "environmentalist saints." Such figures have appeared in several religions, both old and new. For example, the Greek monk Father Amphilochios (d. 970), widely revered as a saint, was an ecologist before environmentalism became fashionable, declaring that "whoever does not love trees, does not love Christ" (Ware 1993, 132). And the founders of many new religions have put a central emphasis on connection to nature, especially in the wiccan movement, which emphasizes a nurturing mother goddess and especially women's power to connect with the forces of the earth.

Nayanars

Shaivite Hindu poets

Nayanars were poetic figures who helped to spread Shaiva devotion throughout southern India by singing the praises of their deity Shiva from the seventh through the tenth centuries. Historically, there were sixty-three such singing poets representing a cross-section of Indian culture devoid of distinctions based on caste, age, or sex. The hymns of the sixty-three Nayanars were preserved in the Tirumurai (Holy books), an anthology arranged in eleven books. These hymns are used in worship services at the present time in temples throughout southern India. The poetry of three of the earliest and most prominent Shaiva poets, Appar and Campantar from the seventh century and Cuntarar from the ninth, were collected into a work entitled the Tevaram (Songs in praise of God) that consists of 796 hymns composed by them.

By means of their itinerant lifestyles, these poet-saints unified many sacred places of southern India and connected many of them directly to their god. In this way, they helped to create a Shaiva sacred geography. The particular locations visited by the saints became associated with the saints and their songs. Therefore, the Nayanars enhanced the prestige of particular locations and contributed to making the temple the center of southern Indian culture. By using the first-person singular voice to express their love of God, these poet-saints gave expression to the personal nature of their experience. If praise of Shiva represented the content of their compositions, it was pilgrimage to various locations that formed the context of their devotional songs. These various saints wanted to visit all the sacred sites of their beloved deity in order to experience his different personas and the different manifestations associated with each location. Hagiographical narratives of these poet-saints were preserved in the Periya Puranam (The great tradition), which many scholars date around 1135 C.E. Their poetry broke out of the genre of the classical Cankam poetry with its division into interior and exterior in order to create something less impersonal. Their poetry evoked Tamil culture and promoted a self-conscious affection for this culture and the sacredness of its language and music, while at the same time uniting the population and land in a common religious viewpoint.

These poet-saints were important to the religiosity of ordinary people. The icons of the Nayanars in temples and their use on festive occasions were vivid expressions of their importance. This scenario suggests that these poet-saints became a vital part of temple devotion. They also played a significant role in the ritual performances of temple life with the recitation of their poetry.

Nehanda Nyakasikana

Zimbabwean ancestral spirit

Nehanda Nyakasikana, an ancestor of unknown historicity, achieved divine status as a mhondoro (lion) spirit in Zimbabwe, where her powers as a leader in war and maker of rain are widely acknowledged. According to popularly held belief, the mhondoro spirits are the spirits of important ancestors, chiefs, or, in modern terms, political rulers who have passed away and have returned to protect their people. They act through mediums, who can be men or women of that nation, and are closely associated with the welfare of whole communities.

The role of spirit mediums in Zimbabwe can be traced back to the sixteenth century. Since then, they have played a very important role in the daily lives of the peasantry. Mhondoro spirits are thought to possess the spirit mediums after residing in the bodies of young lions. The mediums themselves are men and women who lead ordinary lives as members of a village. Their role is to “look after” the welfare of the people. They “protect the crops, protect the wild animals and wild vegetables and send thunder and lightning and the rain. They can cure and as they are the spirits of dead chiefs, they know all there is to know about war” (Lan 1985). The mhondoro mediums are thus quite influential in the eyes of the peasantry. However, some mediums over the years have been more divine than others during trying times, particularly times of war and drought. Nehanda, Chaminuka, and Kagubi, the three most important mhondoro spirits, achieved fame because of the times in which they were active.

The spirit of Nehanda became famous during the 1896 revolt, when she reportedly led the people in the First Chimurenga, or war of liberation, against the colonial state of Southern Rhodesia. According to one participant, the medium of Nehanda “was doing her command work, directing us in Zimbabwe—she led us in the war of liberation.” The mhondoro medium of Nehanda is believed to have had two separate traditions of mediums, one in the Mazoe region near Harare, the capital city, and the other in Dande. It was a medium of the Mazoe Nehanda, a woman named Charwe, who led the First Chimurenga. Nehanda was said to be aided by another mhondoro spirit, Kagubi. In about 1971, the spirit of Nehanda is reported to have possessed an old woman named Kunzaruwa in the northeastern part of Zimbabwe.

The career of a mhondoro medium includes healing and protecting the people against misfortune. Nehanda’s prominence lay in the fact that she came to represent the awaited victory over the oppressors. Such was her historical importance and influence that when the Zimbabwe African National Liberation Army (Zanla) discovered Kunzaruwa in their operational zone, they immediately appealed to her to guide them.

Mhondoro Nehanda is known to have possessed the power of war and also the power of rain. Her reputation as a rainmaker in the nineteenth century is widespread. In 1906, a medium of Nehanda in the Mazoe region is referred to in government reports as a “rain spirit” (Lan 1985). Moreover, a government agency in 1963 recorded that “Nehanda is the spiritual rainmaker” of the Korekore people (ibid.). Nehanda’s purported rainmaking power was therefore also recognized by the British colonial regime.

Nehanda mediums often speak words of guidance to families or to the nation. Besides rainmaking and victory in battle, the mhondoro are attributed powers of prophecy, divination, and healing, and they also function as intermediaries with the high god called Mwari. They perform their duties only as articulators of majority opinion.

During the nineteenth century, another famous mhondoro, Chaminuka, became a center of Shona resistance to Ndebele domination. The identity of the historical Chaminuka is uncertain but is believed to go back several hundred years. The Chaminuka spirit appears first to have entered a medium during the early nineteenth century following the arrival of the invading Ndebele people, who were an offshoot of the Zulu people of KwaZulu/Natal in South Africa. The Chaminuka spirit is not known to have possessed another medium until 1903, so it did not figure into the 1896–1897 revolt. Later twentieth-century mediums have revived the Chaminuka cult and restored the spirit’s reputation as a rainmaker.

It is therefore apparent that the extent to which these ancestors are considered divine depended on their roles in protecting the people, bringing them rain, and driving the oppressors away from the land. In the traditional society they therefore hold the same status as any Roman Catholic pope or Anglican archbishop in the West.

Nemi (Arishtanemi)

Jain tirthankara

According to Jain teachings, Nemi was the twenty-second tirthankara (ford-maker) in the current declining half-cycle of time. Jain hagiography tells of how, in an earlier incarnation as a prince named Shankh, he sought to discover the reason for the strength of his attachment to his wife, which was preventing him from renouncing the world. He asked his father, who was a mendicant, for an explanation. His father informed him that the two of them had been married for six previous births, and that the tie would be broken only in the ninth, when he would become the tirthankara Nemi.

Two births later, he was born as the son of the legendary Queen Shiva Devi and King Samudravijay of Sauripur. Because his mother had happened to see a disc decorated with arishta gems (a black gemstone) in a dream while he was in the womb, he was called Arishtanemi. His paternal first cousin was the Hindu deity Krishna. The entire clan moved from central India to India's west coast, where Krishna founded the city of Dwarka. There, Nemi became betrothed to a princess of Junagadh named Rajimati, who of course had been his spouse in his former lives. When, on the day of the wedding, Nemi was approaching the place where the ceremony was to take place on the back of an elephant, he saw a large enclosure filled with wailing animals. When the elephant driver explained that they were to be slaughtered to feed the wedding guests, the compassionate prince ordered their immediate release. He then renounced his intention to marry and directed the driver to return to Dwarka. The news of these events gave rise to great consternation, and the cancellation of the wedding was a huge blow to his bride-to-be. After a year of giving away his wealth, he became a homeless mendicant, and he ultimately achieved omniscience and began a teaching mission as a tirthankara. Rajimati also renounced the world and, according to Shvetambara tradition, achieved liberation as a result of Nemi's teaching. In the end, Nemi shed his body and achieved liberation at Mount Girnar (in Gujarat).

Neolin

(Mid-18th cent. C.E.)

Delaware prophet, leader

Neolin, a key figure in Pontiac's Rebellion of 1763–1764, was one of the most important of a succession of American Indian prophets in the eighteenth-century Ohio Valley. His preachings of spiritual renewal and resistance to British expansion helped unite thousands of Indians into a multiracial confederacy. Neolin claimed to have had his first vision from the "Master of Life" around 1760, and by 1761 he was gaining converts among the Lenape (Delaware) people.

The key messages of Neolin's teachings reflected a desire on the part of American Indians to regain control over their own destiny after decades of ongoing European intrusion and disruption in their lives. Constant warfare between their French and British neighbors, diseases such as smallpox, and alcohol and other assorted manufactured trade goods had all reduced Indian population numbers and weakened traditional cultural mores. Although claiming to be a mediator between the Master of Life and the Indian people, Neolin called on his countrymen to avoid the vices of Europeans by renouncing alcohol, producing their own tools and cloth, reestablishing their traditional moral standards, purging their bodies of evil influences by drinking herbal emetics, and resisting further European encroachment on their lands. His militant message also contained newer ideas apparently borrowed from Europeans, such as belief in a heaven and hell and condemnation of polygyny.

Neolin's teachings spread quickly throughout the Ohio Valley and Great Lakes area and were taken up by other Indian religious leaders. Coinciding with British victory over the French at the end of the Seven Years' War in the early 1760s, Neolin's message was adopted by the Ottawa war chief Pontiac and others as an inducement to fight against the British. The resulting confederacy temporarily stopped British movement west of the Appalachian Mountains and stands as one of the most successful periods of Indian resistance to European invasion.

Neri, Philip

Roman Catholic preacher, spiritual adviser

One of the most interesting of the many sixteenth-century saints of the Roman Catholic Church, Philip Neri, born in 1515, was a holy man in the medieval fashion, combining street preaching with wide popularity (so that during his lifetime he was called “the apostle of Rome”). But in a sense he was also “modern” because he emphasized the role of the laity and the need for individual conversion. He is most famous, in fact, for giving individual counseling to the people of Rome regardless of their social status. His wisdom in this regard can be summed up in his saying: “Once let a little love find entrance to their hearts, and the rest will follow.” He is also noteworthy for shunning the excessive religious bigotry of the Catholic Reformation. His feast day is May 26.

It was a custom at the time that men would cluster around a charismatic leader. Philip had a habit of inviting men to prayer in his room, which they accepted in such great numbers that eventually a larger accommodation had to be built. This room, called “The Oratory,” after the Latin word orare (to pray), would eventually give Philip’s community a name, the “Oratorians.” Further, this hall came to host the musical form called the “oratorio,” considered by some the immediate antecedent to modern opera.

Philip Neri was celebrated in his own life for his sense of humor. He often dressed in ridiculous outfits and sometimes shaved only one side of his face. In a telling comment on his attitude toward asceticism, he gave a layman permission to wear a hair shirt, but only if he put it on over his clothes. He once commanded a priest to repeat his moving sermon six times in order to give the faithful the impression that this was the only sermon he had. In fact, a number of Philip’s practical jokes involved humbling, and occasionally humiliating, the Roman clergy; for this reason, he seems to have been esteemed by everyone.

Newman, John Henry

Roman Catholic theologian

The Christian intellectual John Henry Newman may rightly be called one of the most powerful and influential figures in modern times. His career ignited a struggle within Christianity that has never disappeared.

Born in 1801, Newman grew up in the Anglican church, founded in the Renaissance to combat the Roman Catholic pope’s claim to sovereignty, on the one hand, and Protestantism’s radical individualism, on the other. As a result, the church was almost from its inception both ritualistic and Theologian and Roman Catholic apologist John Henry Newman.

(Library of Congress)

dogmatic and personal and evangelical. Newman, a brilliant student, entered Oxford University at age sixteen and in 1822 was elected as a fellow at Oriel College. Though Oxford had always served the church by providing leading clergy, there was no interest in theological questions until Liberalism, a philosophy that all faiths are equally genuine, broke upon it. Naturally, there was a reaction divided among those who fought to maintain a stable, morally based church, one fully integrated with and supported by the government, and those who emphasized liturgy and mystery. Newman sought a “middle way,” one that preserved the best of the anti-Liberal camps. Through an emphasis on the unbroken history of Christianity, he was able to preserve the privileges of the first group and validate the sacred aspects of the second. In publishing a pamphlet on this solution, he began a reform impetus that is called the Oxford movement.

Naturally, neither group was satisfied with this compromise. Notably, in stressing the continuity of the bishops’ office all the way back to the first disciples of Christ (“apostolic succession”), Newman was accused of implying that the Roman Catholic Church was also a legitimate form of Christianity. He replied that the Catholic Church had strayed, especially in its emphasis on the pope, but this made no one happy. In 1841, Newman published Tract #90, which was read as vindicating the Roman church, and the subsequent storm forced him to retire. Fighting conversion the whole way, in 1845 he became a Roman Catholic.

This decision did not end his struggle, and Newman's own admitted difficulties were criticized not only by Anglicans but by fellow Roman Catholics. Finally, in 1864, Newman was attacked for lying, and his reply was collected in his most famous work, the Apologia pro vita sua (Defense of his life), a triumphant expression of human conscience. This extraordinarily honest and beautifully written memoir is kind but determined. Newman models his approach on Augustine's Confessions from about 400, but with a very modern understanding of the power of skepticism; his trials are the trials of spirituality in the modern world.

Newman's other great work is The Idea of a University (1852), lectures delivered in Dublin to foster an enlightened higher education, necessary since Catholics had been excluded from English universities.

Newman died on August 11, 1890, having been made a cardinal by Pope Leo XIII the previous year. That act, reversing a history of suspicion on the part of the Vatican and the English Catholic hierarchy, was seen by all Christians, Catholic and Protestant alike, as vindicating a sincere and upright man of God. He was declared venerable by the Roman Catholic Church on January 22, 1991.

Nezahualcoyotl

Aztec ruler

Nezahualcoyotl, who, like the Mexica ruler Axayacatl, was a Nahua-speaking tlatoani (speaker), served as the ruler of an important Mexican city, Tezcoco, during the fifteenth century. In the native-produced sources, Nezahualcoyotl was lauded as a great ruler because of his military prowess, but his poetic texts are also important records of pre-Hispanic thought. The document known as the Romances de los señores (Romances of the lords) is a collection of many of the texts attributed to Nezahualcoyotl. Aztec scholar Miguel León-Portilla (1969) describes this ruler as a "poet-king" who muses on the nature of flower and song. However, the texts are directly related to Mesoamerican sacrificial practice, conquest warfare, and the flowery wars. The flowery wars, which Nezahualcoyotl helped establish, were to produce warrior captives to sacrifice to the sun to assure that it would rise each day. The image of the flower as a sacrifice also metonymically refers to a sacrificial victim.

The fate of this poet-king was foretold early, when Nezahualcoyotl was a child. The pre-Columbian Anales de Cuauhtitlan (Annals of Cuauhtitlan) describe the prophecy that marked Nezahualcoyotl as a tlatoani. While fleeing a neighboring ruler who had assassinated his father, Ixtlilxochitl, Nezahualcoyotl fell out of a boat that was carrying him to his grandfather Izcoatl, the tlatoani of Tenochtitlán. "Sorcerers" lifted the young ruler out of the water and took him to a mountain to "anoint" him with "flood and blaze." "Flood and blaze" is a typical Mesoamerican metaphor for the spirit of warfare, especially conquest warfare. This "unction" would assure Nezahualcoyotl success in conquest. The young ruler reappeared in the water, and his grandfather was very surprised to see him.

Nezahualcoyotl grew quickly and took captives to validate his role as tlatoani. Eventually he became one of the most powerful leaders in the region. His poetic texts reflect his adherence to the auto-sacrifices necessary for retaining the right to rule as well as to serving the ancestors who would bless the military campaigns narrated in the texts. In addition, the texts offer many insights into the philosophical nature of Mesoamerican thought.

Niasse, Ibrahim Kaolack

Muslim sufi

Shaykh Ibrahim Kaolack Niasse, the leader of the Tijaniyyah sufi order in West Africa, was born in Senegal in 1902. He memorized the Qur'an and studied traditional Islamic sciences under his father, Abdullah. Niasse became the Tijaniyyah spiritual leader (khalifah) after his father's death in 1922. He was initiated into the order at a very young age and traveled widely throughout West Africa to spread its teachings.

His visit to Kano, Nigeria, in 1945 on invitation by the emir of Kano was pivotal in the history of Tijaniyyah in West Africa. There, he met new disciples; initiated members, including both men and women; gave lectures; and granted baraka (blessings) to many people. Although the visit enhanced the Tijaniyyah movement and contributed to its growth in Nigeria, it also caused a great havoc because of the order's rivalry with the Qadiriyyah order practiced in the Sokoto area of Nigeria.

Niasse strongly encouraged education for both men and women and insisted that both receive solid instruction in Islamic knowledge and modern sciences. He also advised his members to learn foreign languages. Women are initiated into the Tijaniyyah order and a few of them hold leadership positions as muqaddamah (women's junior leaders). Both male and female junior spiritual leaders (muqaddams) are responsible for spreading the secret prayers (awrad) of the Tijaniyyah leaders among the followers.

On his travels, Niasse met many African leaders, including Abd al-Nasir of Egypt, Nkruma of Ghana, and Ahmad Bello of Nigeria, and developed relationships with them based on mutual understanding and interdependence. He received numerous honorary awards for his contributions to Islam. The Tijaniyyah order is less hierarchical than other Islamic orders, and Niasse played an effective role in Senegalese politics as he pressed for social justice and equality for all Senegalese. His followers vote and hold many political positions in the government up to the present. He required them to be devoted, obedient, attached to a spiritual leader, and responsible and accountable for their actions. Many members believe that their muqaddams possess special blessings and can perform miracles.

Niasse was well educated and wrote some books on Islam. He and those he appointed as his representatives inducted millions of people into the Tijaniyyah order. Niasse died in July 1975 at Kaolack, which became like Mecca for his disciples. They visit Kaolack to serve their current leaders and earn blessings from them.

Nichiren

Buddhist scholar, reformer

Within the context of the tumultuous period of the Kamakura era of Japanese history (1192–1333), the prophetic voice of Nichiren could be heard addressing the spiritual issues of his time. Nichiren, born in 1222, came from a family of modest means. His father was likely a manager or official who administered fishing rights in the village. Nichiren received a Buddhist education and was ordained a monk in the Tendai sect. He also learned to chant nembutsu (the name of Amida [Amitabha]), although he would reject this religious practice later in his life. His teacher also taught him to revere the Lotus Sutra, which would have a lifetime influence upon him. While he was on a twenty-year pilgrimage to various Buddhist centers of learning, he became convinced that the Lotus Sutra represented the true teachings of Buddhism. During his life, he composed more than 500 works that testify to his wide knowledge of not only Buddhist thought but also Confucian classics.

On April 28, 1253, Nichiren spoke to a group of monks about focusing on the Lotus Sutra. There is no evidence that he thought at this time that he was establishing a new doctrine or sect, though he may have believed that he was reforming the Tendai school. A political leader tried to have him arrested for causing dissension, but he escaped with the assistance of his former teacher. Returning to the area eleven years later, he was almost killed in an ambush. This attack did not deter him from attracting followers of the Tendai sect and middle- and lower-ranking samurai warriors. Although his thinking was undeveloped at this point in his career, he began to recommend chanting the title of the Lotus Sutra, which was called daimoku. Nichiren was the first person to define daimoku as an exclusive practice and to give it a doctrinal foundation.

After arriving in Kamakura in 1254, Nichiren witnessed various natural and social calamities, and he came to the conclusion that Honen's pernicious teaching of the chanting of Amida's name was the root cause of the various problems. His vehement criticism triggered a strong response that motivated a mob to attack him. He was arrested finally and exiled to the Izu peninsula for his outspoken criticism. This forced exile enabled him to define more fully his religious path.

On February 22, 1263, Nichiren was pardoned from his exile. After a period of travel, he returned to Kamakura in 1268 at a time when Japan was being threatened by an invasion by the Mongol Empire in China. Nichiren and his community were emboldened by his prior prophecy about a foreign invasion that now appeared imminent. Now, he began to challenge political officials and major temples. On September 12, 1271, his enemies responded by having him arrested and exiled on the island of Sado in the Japan Sea, where he experienced many hardships that he interpreted as karmic retribution for previous transgressions. He compared himself to a figure in chapter twenty of the Lotus Sutra named Bodhisattva Never Despising, who was mocked and tormented when he preached a message of universal buddhahood.

The selection of this bodhisattva suggested that Nichiren viewed himself as the messenger of the Buddha sent to propagate the Lotus Sutra in the final age. Nichiren also began to identify his efforts with the Bodhisattva Superior Conduct from chapter fifteen of the Lotus Sutra. This figure was entrusted with preaching the text in the age after the enlightenment of the Buddha.

On February 14, 1274, Nichiren was pardoned and returned to Kamakura. Authorities asked him when the Mongol attack might occur, and he replied that it would happen within a year. Moreover, he preached that only reliance upon the Lotus Sutra could forestall the disaster. After two months, he left Kamakura for the final time to become a solitary pilgrim. In this last stage of his life, he trained disciples and continued to write during a sojourn of almost nine years near Mount Minobu. He fell ill in 1282 and died en route to the hot springs of Hitachi.

Christian bishop

The bishop of Myra in Asia Minor in the mid-fourth century, Nicholas has accumulated copious legends and has been transformed many times through the centuries. One of the most popular saints in both Western Europe and the Byzantine East throughout the Middle Ages, the metamorphoses of the early Christian bishop Nicholas into the modern "Santa Claus" is a fascinating study in the continued attraction of holy figures as well as the urge to refashion and update them for various purposes.

Very few actual facts are known about Nicholas's life except that he was a bishop of Myra who died in about 342, but his cult appears to have been well established already by the sixth century, when the Byzantine emperor Justinian is said to have founded a chapel partially in his honor in Constantinople. The earliest Greek texts concerning his life date to this same time period, and he became a prominent figure in Greek hagiography thereafter. Legends concerning Nicholas were known in the West by the eighth century at least and continued to be augmented and expanded in both Byzantine and Western hagiographic texts throughout the medieval period. Some of these tales also represent conflation from the life of another Nicholas, cofounder of the monastery of Sion, who lived in the sixth century. Dedication to St. Nicholas by both Western and Byzantine rulers promoted his cult and status greatly, and various miracles were added to his legend in the West, especially after the translation of his relics to Bari in southern Italy in 1087. His shrine at Bari was an important center of pilgrimage throughout the rest of the Middle Ages and was especially famous for the sweet smell of myrrh emitted by his relics.

Among the numerous deeds and miracles credited to Nicholas, several episodes especially stand out: his miraculous intervention in calming a storm at sea and saving three sailors from drowning off the coast of Turkey; his appearance to the fourth-century emperor Constantine to save three army officers who had been unjustly condemned to death; his ability to bring three youths back to life after they had been murdered, cut to pieces, and placed in a brine-tub by an innkeeper; and his gift of gold (coins or golden balls) to the three daughters of a poor man to provide their dowries and prevent them from becoming prostitutes. These charitable and miraculous deeds attributed to Nicholas eventually combined with various European folklore traditions to transform him into the gift-bearing "Father Christmas" or "Santa Claus" of the present day.

During the medieval and Renaissance periods especially, St. Nicholas was one of the most frequently represented saints in art, and narrative cycles of his life are widespread in both Western and Byzantine art. He is also recognizable as an independent figure by his attributes: bishop's garb, crozier, and miter; he is often shown holding a book, a cross, three golden balls, or an anchor. His feast day is December 6.

Nicholas of Flüe

Christian hermit

Nicholas of Flüe, also known as “Bruder Klaus,” was an ascetic and a hermit who became renowned as a spiritual adviser. He was born near Sachseln in Unterwalden, Switzerland, in 1417 to a middle-class family in the Melchthal. The family was affiliated with the Friends of God (Gottesfreunde), a lay movement scattered across Germany, Switzerland, and the Netherlands in the fifteenth century. Members aspired to enter into closer friendship with God through strict ascetic practices and meditation on the passion of Christ. Members could live together in community, dispersed in secular society, or alone as hermits. In his twenties, Nicholas pursued a career as a builder and also served in the local government and militia. With his wife, Dorothea Wyss, he had ten children.

Nicholas became increasingly involved in the Friends of God and joined a circle of mystics at the monastery of Engelberg. In 1467, he resigned his offices, took leave of his wife and family, and became a wandering ascetic. He eventually settled near Ranft, a village in the Melchthal, where the townspeople built him a small hut with a chapel attached. Nicholas lived there nineteen years, praying from midnight to midday and in the afternoon engaging visitors in religious conversation, offering them his spiritual advice. He is said to have consumed only the eucharist for nourishment. His fame as a mystic and wise counselor for all sorts of religious and political problems spread. Prominent visitors reported favorably on his ascetic life. Such was the renown of his counsel that representatives from the Council of Stans, engaged in difficult negotiations between feuding Swiss cantons, went to Bruder Klaus for advice in 1481. A Swiss chronicler reports that within an hour of hearing Nicholas’s response the council unanimously reached an agreement.

Nicholas died on March 21, 1487. Immediately he was honored throughout Switzerland as a patriot and a saint. The pope first sanctioned this veneration in 1669 and canonized Bruder Klaus in 1947. Nicholas’s feast is celebrated in Switzerland on September 25. He is considered the only Swiss mystic saint and the last mystic of the Middle Ages, and he is patron saint of Switzerland.

Nicodemus

Christian saint

A prominent Jewish Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrin, Nicodemus was an important witness of Christ’s passion. According to the Gospel of John (3:1–21; 7:50, 19:39–40), Nicodemus recognized Jesus as “the master” after talking with him, although he is described as being somewhat distant from fear of persecution. His participation in taking down and burying Christ’s body, with the help of Joseph of Aramathea, would restore Nicodemus’s position among Jesus’ followers.

After the burial of Christ, Nicodemus’s life becomes enigmatic. He may have lived with Gamaliel near Jerusalem, but some accounts have him journeying to Rome, where he reportedly tried to save the relics of Petronilla and then was tortured and martyred by drowning in the Tiber. Legendary episodes developed very early around Nicodemus. Between the second and fifth centuries, an anonymous author integrated Nicodemus into an account of Christ’s trial, the Acts of Pilate. The section of the text devoted to Nicodemus, in which Nicodemus was made a mediator close to Pilate, would later appear as an autonomous account entitled the Gospel of Nicodemus. This work would become the most widely disseminated apocryphal text of the Middle Ages, and the thirteenth-century Vincent of Beauvais and Jacobus de Voragine drew from it.

Deposition from the Cross, by Benedetto Antelami, 1178. Nicodemus stands on a ladder, removing the nails from Jesus’ hands, while Joseph of Arimathea supports his body. (David Lees/Corbis)

As he was a witness of the crucifixion, the legend developed that Nicodemus, aided by an angel, carved three crucifixes in the likeness of Christ on the cross. Each crucifix, or Volto Santo, was subsequently thrown into the sea and ran aground between the end of the eleventh century and the middle of the twelfth, one at Lucca (Italy), one at Dives, and the third at Rue (both in northern France); there exist several variations on this legendary account. Recognized as miraculous, each Volto Santo became the object of a significant pilgrimage.

The cultus of Nicodemus achieved its high point in the late Middle Ages. From the thirteenth century, Nicodemus became more and more apparent in the final scenes of Christ's passion. He was most often represented in the descent from the cross and the entombment with his attributes, the four nails and pincers, and also sometimes carving his crucifixes, assisted by the angel in conformity with the legend, which undoubtedly explains why Nicodemus would long be associated with the sculptor's profession. He was also considered a protector of pigs. St. Nicodemus developed a considerable cult in Brittany, where many chapels were dedicated to him, including those of Pluméliau and Saint-Guénin. In the Roman calendar, the feast of St. Nicodemus is celebrated on August 3, the date of the discovery of his relics.

Nikon

Russian Orthodox patriarch

Nikon was a seventeenth-century peasant who rose to power in the Russian Orthodox Church. His spirituality was rooted in his conviction that the church ought to be unified, and the reforms he promulgated aimed to accomplish just that. Nikon's supporters believed in the integrity of his office and admired his faithfulness to his vocation.

Nikon was born of peasant background in 1605 in Vel'demanov. He entered a monastery at age twelve but left—without taking vows—when his father died eight years later. He married, became a deacon, and then was ordained as a priest, receiving a parish in Lyskov. He was quickly transferred to Moscow, for debated reasons, and once there caught the attention of the young, pious tsar, Alexei Mikhailovich. He became a friend and spiritual mentor to the tsar, gradually rising in rank until he became the sixth patriarch of Moscow in 1652. Shortly thereafter, Nikon began to institute his reforms. Archpriest Avvakum led a resistance movement against the reforms and saw them as perversions inspired by Satan. Nikon's supporters affirmed his reforms and believed they were theologically sound and traditionally accurate. Nikon was exiled in 1666, however, for political reasons, and he died in 1681.

Nikon argued that the Russian church deviated from a purer Orthodoxy that the Greek church preserved. His reforms were designed to align the Russian church with the Greek church, for it was the Greeks, after all, who had introduced Orthodoxy to Russia in the tenth century. His reforms included changes in church music, clerical dress, the liturgical and prayer books, and ritual. Most notably, he changed the manner in which one would cross oneself, from two fingers to three, emphasizing the Trinity (three fingers) over the dual nature of Christ (two fingers).

Nikon assumed the doctrine of the Third Rome, which argued that Moscow was the final and true sacred center of Christendom. It followed that since the kingdom of heaven was superior to the kingdom of earth, the church ranked above the state. Tsar Alexei supported Nikon and his mission at first, but later he saw Nikon's religio-political ambitions as a threat, particularly because of Nikon's personality. Nikon could be stubborn, authoritarian, and prideful, though he could also be compassionate and good-natured at times.

Nilus of Rossano (Nilus the Younger)

(c. 905–1005 C.E.)

Christian hermit

A treasury official from a noble family of Rossano, Calabria, Italy, born in about 905, Nilus underwent a profound religious conversion after the death of his wife (or mistress) and daughter. He had also just recovered from serious illness. He first joined a community of Greek monks following the Rule of St. Basil, but seeking greater asceticism, he left his monastery to become a hermit in a secluded cave in imitation of the desert hermits. A series of Saracen attacks forced him to give up his ascetic way of life and seek refuge at the monastery of San Adriano in Calabria near his birthplace. While abbot of San Adriano, he was offered an archbishopric but refused the position. When Saracens again invaded Calabria around 981, he and his monks sought refuge first at Monte Cassino and then on land donated to them nearby at Velluccio, where they lived for fifteen years.

The “greatest ascetic teacher of his age” (Hamilton 1965, 285), he was also known for his virtues and theological learning. Fluent in Latin and Greek, he sought to unite the rules of St. Basil and St. Benedict. Despite supporting Pope Gregory V against the antipope John XVI, he pleaded in vain that the antipope be spared and reproached both Pope Gregory and Emperor Otto III after John was tortured and mutilated in 998. After refusing Otto III’s offer to rebuild the monastery of San Adriano, he moved his community to Grottaferrata in 1004, shortly before his death near Frascati, Italy, on December 29, 1005. Although Nilus died before the monastery was built and the community established there, he is considered to be the first abbot of Grottaferrata, a center of Greek monasticism in Italy even today. His feast day is September 26.

Nilus of Sora

Russian Orthodox hermit, writer

A major religious figure of late fifteenth-century Russia, Nilus of Sora was a renowned hermit and writer who advocated the contemplative form of monasticism.

Born in 1433, Nilus was of peasant background. His monastic career began at Russia’s Kirillov Monastery on the White Lake. After some time at Kirillov, Nilus traveled to Mt. Athos, where he became more familiar with patristic literature. Returning to Russia, he settled along the Sora River in a marshy region near the White Lake and, along with a few students, set up a skete community. In a skete, a few disciples live under one roof with a spiritual father, working and holding property in common, and at most having similar small groups of monastics in the surrounding region. Nilus and his disciples did not follow any specific Orthodox monastic rule but read Greek texts and practiced a contemplative life.

Traditional historiography of the Russian Orthodox Church pits Nilus of Sora against Joseph of Volotsk over the issue of monastic landholding (the “possessor” versus “non-possessor” argument). The crux of the matter was considered at a 1503 church council, where these two monastic leaders and writers supposedly had a confrontation. However, recent scholarship has questioned that church property was an issue in 1503. It appears more likely that the two disputed degrees of monastic property and communal life, Nilus believing the contemplative life was more salutary to the soul, and Joseph convinced that a community bonded by a rule, obedience, humility, and work was the most appropriate form of monasticism.

Nilus’s writings consist of his “Predanie” (Tradition) the “Ustav” or monastic regulations, “Zaveshchanie” (Testament), and a corpus of letters. Though the first three works have been described as versions of monastic instructions, they are more correctly viewed as composites of monastic thought. Among them one finds a creed; discourses on church decoration, profit, the practice of manual labor, and cell prayer; and cogitations on Orthodoxy, passions, wicked thoughts, and the gift of tears. Nilus’s “Testament” is a witness to his ascetic life. These texts show Nilus’s understanding of Orthodox patristic writings as well as his experiential spirituality. Though he shares similarities in content and sources with Joseph of Volotsk, Nilus remained dedicated to skete life. His supporters, such as Vassian Patrikeev (d. 1532), are largely responsible for crafting history’s interpretation of Nilus. Nilus is remembered on May 7.

Ninian

(5th cent. C.E.)

Christian bishop, missionary

Ninian, also known as Nynia, was a British bishop of the fifth century and one of the first missionaries in Scotland. Very little is known about him, but several later legends survive.

The earliest source is Bede (673–735), who relates that Ninian had converted the southern Picts to Christianity long before Columba started his mission to the northern Picts in the sixth century. Ninian also founded an episcopal see and a church dedicated to St. Martin of Tours, modern Whithorn (then known as Candida Casa, or "White House," because of its white paint). Bede also claimed that Ninian had been trained in Rome. Scholars have not reached an agreement about the veracity of Bede's testimony, but modern archaeology has revealed the ruins of a church whose stones were painted white, giving credence to the fact that there was such a church, whether it was associated with Ninian or not. There are also inscribed stones indicating a monastery near the site.

Among the other sources for Ninian are an eighth-century poem and a twelfth-century Life by Aelred of Rievaulx.

Nizami, Khwaja Hasan

Khwaja Hasan Nizami was born in 1878 into the tight inner circle of families who were hereditary custodians of the shrine of Nizamuddin Auliya (1239–1325) in Delhi. His ancestors were said to have come long before from Bukhara. Nizami was given a traditional education in the area around the shrine in Delhi and later at a madrasa. From his childhood he was in close association with prominent sufi teachers of that era. Eventually he became a disciple of Mihr 'Ali Shah (d. 1938), and ultimately he was appointed one of his spiritual successors (khalifas).

Mihr 'Ali Shah would seem in some ways to be an unusual choice of murshid (spiritual teacher) for the young Hasan Nizami. Although a Chishti in the Nizami line, Mihr 'Ali Shah was not the usual ecstatic who remained withdrawn from political controversy. He was, rather, an intellectual and literary figure writing in the fields of Islamic polemic, traditional commentary, and poetry. It seems that the teacher kindled similar interests in the disciple, for in his career Nizami was to follow both literary and political pursuits. Nizami spent the majority of his life pursuing literary and journalistic activities. He frequented intellectual and Muslim political circles and also had many spiritual disciples.

Among his political activities was a campaign to promote essential Islamic knowledge among ordinary Muslims. In this regard, he made a simple translation of the Qur'an and wrote articles on basic Islamic topics. His most famous literary works were historical novels and a long-running serial diary, Roznamcha (Diary), in which he recounted the interesting personages with whom he came into contact and the events of his age, a turbulent one in the history of the Indian subcontinent.

Nizami is significant for understanding the transformations in concepts of holiness in the modern period. He traveled widely, and the emergence of print media allowed him to reach thousands of disciples who could take initiation through mail-in forms placed in the back of his publications. In the later years of his life, Khwaja Hasan Nizami was afflicted with weakening health and loss of eyesight. He lived through the difficult times of partition and in his old age seems to have felt embattled by the political and ideological conflicts raging around him. Nizami died in 1955. His spiritual successor is his son, Khwaja Hasan Nizami Thani (the second) who is also a literary figure and a popular representative of the Indian Muslims.

Nizamuddin Auliya, Khwaja (Muhammad ibn Ahmed 'Ali Bada'uni)

Muslim scholar, sufi

Khwaja Nizamuddin Auliya is also known as Mahbub-ilahi, "the beloved of God." His Turkish ancestors were said to have come from Bukhara, and he became the disciple of Baba Farid Ganj-i Shakar in 1257.

Born in 1239, Nizamuddin was from the Indian city of Bada'un and was said to be a descendant of Muhammad. As a young man he exhibited an ascetic and scholarly temperament. Nizamuddin was learned in the Islamic sciences. In one anecdote about his training under Baba Farid, he comments negatively on the quality of a manuscript from which the shaykh is teaching. After being rebuked for this criticism, Nizamuddin was so distraught that he departed in shame and desolation, but Baba Farid's son brought him back to the khanqah (sufi hostel).

Nizamuddin never married, and the hereditary custodians of his shrine today are descendants of two orphaned nephews whom he raised. His khanqah at Ghiyathpur, then on the outskirts of Delhi, became frequented by spiritual aspirants as well as court and literary figures. He and his disciples wore four-cornered conical caps (kulah) often of a yellow or saffron color. He lived at a turbulent time and outlived seven kings. Like the other Chishti sufis, he preferred to keep his distance from the rulers. A famous anecdote tells that the sultan Ghiyath al-Din Tughluq disliked the saint and threatened to execute him after returning from a campaign in 1325. Nizamuddin cryptically said, "Delhi is still far off." Shortly after, a roof collapsed, killing the ruler.

Nizamuddin's disciple Amir Hasan ibn Ala Sijzi (1275–1336) kept a record of his audiences, or malfuzat, between 1307 and 1321, entitled Fawa'id al-Fu'ad (Morals for the heart). Amir Khusrau (1254–1325), the best-known poet of the early Muslim period in India, was Nizamuddin's close disciple. Some of Khusrau's rhymes in honor of the shaykh are still sung in Qawwali sessions. Nizamuddin's tomb is located in the shrine complex near that of his spiritual master in Delhi.

Nogi Maresuke and Shizuko

Nogi Maresuke (1849–1912) was famed for his military exploits, but he gained a unique place in the history of Shinto when he and his wife, Shizuko (1859–1912), committed suicide on the day of the funeral of the Meiji emperor (1852–1912). In 1923, a Shinto shrine dedicated to their spirits was established next to their former residence in Tokyo, where the double suicide took place.

After fighting for the imperial cause in the Meiji Restoration of 1867, Nogi became an officer in Japan's new, modern army. In 1877, during a civil war, he lost his regimental flag in battle and contemplated suicide. The following year, he married Shizuko, who soon bore him two sons. Subsequently, he spent a year studying in Germany, was promoted to general, and proved an effective leader in the Sino-Japanese War (1894–1895). He was less successful as governor general of Taiwan and resigned in 1898 after serving for less than two years. He was again a leader in the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905), winning key victories but only at great cost. In 1907, he was named director of the Peers' school (Gakushūin), which numbered the future emperor Hirohito among its pupils. When Nogi committed suicide, he left a note referring to the regimental flag he had lost many years earlier.

Japanese response to the suicide was mixed. Some were critical of his decision to die with his lord, a "feudal" practice that already had been banned in 1663 and seemed completely out of touch with the spirit of modern Japan. Others, however, were deeply touched by his loyalty, and Shinto shrines were established at three sites where he had lived, plus one at the tomb of Emperor Meiji. Today, his former home in Tokyo is opened to the public every year on the anniversary of his death. The clothing he and his wife wore when they killed themselves, along with mementos of their lives, are displayed here. Meanwhile, the shrine's wedding hall does a flourishing business. Although some postwar critics complain that Nogi was an inept general whose victories reflect only his willingness to sacrifice the lives of his soldiers, among them his two sons, others continue to revere his memory.

Nongqawuse

Xhosa prophet, millenarian

Nongqawuse, born in 1841, was a Xhosa (South African) prophetess who precipitated a millenarian movement known as the "Great Cattle Killing." In April 1856, she reported that two strangers had come to tell her that Xhosa cattle were rotten and bewitched and must be slaughtered and that Xhosa crops and bewitching materials must be destroyed. Dead ancestors would then rise and help the Xhosa win back their land from colonial invaders, restore tradition, and halt the cattle lung-sickness afflicting their herds. New cattle herds would appear, grain bins would overflow, and sickness and death, poverty, and witchcraft would cease. The paramount Xhosa chief, Sarhili, slaughtered his herds and ordered subordinate chiefs to do likewise.

When nothing occurred on the three separate days of resurrection that Nongqawuse had specified, the entire affair collapsed. The results, however, were catastrophic. More than 400,000 cattle had been slaughtered. In the aftermath, 40,000 Xhosa died of hunger and 150,000 were displaced. The Xhosa lost two-thirds of their land, and their independence.

Jeff Peires (1989) sees this millenarian movement arising from colonial pressure, Christian and Xhosa resurrection and regeneration beliefs, and the preexisting lung-sickness epidemic. He gives much agency to Nongqawuse's uncle, the chiefs, and to subsequent actions by the colonial governor for the event's extreme consequences. Helen Bradford (1996) critically challenges this "androcentric" interpretation, arguing that issues over gender, women's rights, and Xhosa male sexual misconduct led to Nongqawuse's prophecies.

Norbert of Xanten

Christian monk, order founder, archbishop

The son of the count of Gennep, Norbert, born in about 1080, became a canon at Xanten (Germany) and later served at the courts of Archbishop Frederick of Cologne and Emperor Henry IV, his mother's cousin. Norbert accompanied Henry V to Rome, where he was an unwitting accomplice to Henry's attack on Pope Paschal II in 1111. Although he repented his role in Henry's attack, he stayed with the emperor until 1115, when he retired to a cell near Xanten.

Norbert spent three years in this cell living a life of penance and was certainly influenced by the pious hermit Liudolf. After being ordained a priest, he made an unsuccessful attempt to reform the canons of Xanten, resigned his canonry, and assumed a life of apostolic poverty and preaching. Norbert responded to Rupert of Deutz's censure for unauthorized preaching in 1118 by walking barefoot to Saint-Gilles, where Pope Gelasius II licensed him to preach throughout Christendom. He then began a preaching tour of Brabant, Hainault, and northern France. His charismatic preaching quickly attracted a large number of followers, and with the support of Bishop Bartholomew of Laon, Norbert founded a monastery near Laon in the isolated valley of Prémontré in 1120. He participated in the condemnation of Peter Abelard at the Council of Soissons in 1121. With the foundation of a second house at Floreffe near Namur, Norbert decided that his communities should adopt the Rule of St. Augustine, as he and many of his followers had previously been secular canons following that rule. As one scholar writing on monasticism has pointed out, "It was thus a matter of chance rather than of design that Prémontré became canonical and not monastic or eremitical" (Leyser 1984, 92).

Pope Honorius II confirmed the Premonstratensian order in 1125, but Norbert continued to preach throughout France and Germany. At the Diet of Speyer in 1126, he preached a sermon on loyalty and obedience that won him the support of King Lothar III, who was at the time defending his throne against the Hohenstaufens. In Lothar's presence, the canons of Magdeburg cathedral chose Norbert to become archbishop of Magdeburg, a position Norbert accepted only after pressure from Lothar and the papal legates. The still-barefoot Norbert entered Magdeburg in July 1126 and was consecrated archbishop, but his attempts to reform the archdiocese and recover the church's alienated lands led to rebellion and discontent; likewise, the order he had founded was undergoing a leadership crisis. This problem was settled after Norbert summoned the Premonstratensian canons to Magdeburg and bade them select Hugh of Fosse as his successor, but Norbert's attempts to reform Magdeburg by introducing Premonstratensian canons led only to several assassination attempts and temporary exile.

Norbert also supported Innocent II in the schism of 1130, accompanied Lothar to Italy, and joined Bernard of Clairvaux in a vain attempt to persuade the antipope Anacletus II to stand aside. Fever forced his return to Magdeburg, where he died in 1134. He was buried at the Premonstratensian church in Magdeburg until his remains were translated to Strahov, near Prague, in 1627. Norbert's feast day is June 6, but it is celebrated within the Premonstratensian order on June 11.

Ntsikana

Christian prophet, hymn writer

Ntsikana, born in about 1760, was a Xhosa (South African) prophet who became the first Xhosa Christian convert. He proceeded to become a noted hymn writer. Xhosa oral tradition relates that in about 1815 Ntsikana had a mystical experience before having any significant contact with Christian missionaries. Soon thereafter, he learned Christian concepts and spread Christianity among the Xhosa. He is always paired with another Xhosa prophet, Nxele, who turned away from Christianity in favor of a more militant brand of Xhosa nationalism. Although also a Xhosa nationalist, Ntsikana called for nonviolence and gradual change.

Ntsikana wrote the famous hymn "He, the Great God in Heaven," the first Christian hymn in Xhosa set to the tune of a traditional Xhosa song. He preached the sovereignty of God, submission before God, and an apocalyptic vision that included the "Broad-Chested One," a strong messiah figure who would bring peace to the Xhosa people. Ntsikana never joined a mission, never took a Christian name, and continued to reside as an itinerant preacher among his people. His following was never large, but his role in preparing the Xhosa people for Christianity is significant. He and Nxele also ideally represent the two choices (nonviolence or militancy) facing Africans in their response to European invasion in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Nuri, Abu al-Husayn al-

Muslim mystic

Abu al-Husayn al-Nuri was an important mystic from Baghdad, where he was born in about 840. He was called Nuri, meaning "light" or "luminous," because he apparently radiated light when he spoke. Nuri was considered a very pious man. Very austere, he strove for self-denial and declared that true sufism was the abandonment of all physical pleasures. Accordingly, he believed that the true seeker of God relied on God alone. Nuri was one of the disciples of Sari al-Saqati.

Nuri is celebrated for his notions regarding human love for the Transcendent Lord. He referred to himself as the lover ('ashiq) of God who sought to tear the veils of separation. For him, it is the emotion of love centered in the heart that connects the human to the divine. In his Maqamat al-qulub (The stations of the hearts), he provides a metaphorical analysis of the psychological aspects of love. The heart is ruled by a king called Certitude with two ministers called Fear and Hope. Ten other ministers depicting the obligations of a devout Muslim also govern this domain of the heart. Elsewhere, he described the heart as a garden that receives rain from God. While the gentle rain of mercy falls on those who are good, such as those who repent, ascetics, lovers, and gnostics, the harsh rain of retribution falls on those who are wicked, such as the idolators, hypocrites, oppressors, and transgressors of spiritual laws. Nuri foreshadows the later frequent practice of using nature imagery to describe spiritual and mystical experiences. Although these views on the mystical path, especially on the importance of love, made him cherished by the mystics, they incurred the hostility of the dogmatic scholars of tradition. In his own circle, he was criticized for his excessive exuberance and extraordinary disclosures regarding his gnostic and spiritual experiences.

In addition to divinely oriented spiritual love, Nuri considered love for fellow humans an important aspect of the spiritual quest. Indeed, he himself could be regarded as a paragon of this altruistic love. This brotherly empathy was the quality of ithar, or sacrifice for the sake of others. In an incident in 877, the authorities of Baghdad charged the sufis with wrongdoing. Nuri sought to free his fellow mystics from any consequences by offering his life for their safety. The caliph who investigated the case was touched by this selfless gesture and excused all of the other sufis of his circle. After all, a group with such compassion for fellow human beings should be in line with the spirit of the message of Islam.

Nuri constantly tried to elevate his soul and banish negative emotions in creative ways. Thus, because he was afraid of lions, he went to the forests near the Tigris River where they roamed. His end was in conformity with his life of ecstatic involvement with God. One day in 907, "enraptured" when he heard a particular verse, he started to run. In his frenzy, he ran into a reed-bed with freshly cut reeds. The razor-sharp reed edges cut his feet, but in his condition of rapture he did not feel any pain. He soon died from his injuries. When Nuri died, one of his contemporaries, Junaid, stated, "Half of sufism is gone."

Nyabingi

Ndorwa princess, rainmaker, goddess

Tutsi, Hutu, and Kiga folklore asserts that Nyabingi, whose name means "possessing many things," was a princess of Ndorwa in the northern part of present-day Rwanda. She was a renowned rainmaker, also known as Nogukuru, "grandmother"; Biheko, "she who carries us on her back"; and Muyaga, "the wind." Her real name was Kitami, but she was apotheosized as the spirit Nyabingi. Nyabingi became famous in the great lakes region of East Africa between 1750 and 1800. After she died, a strong cult developed around her.

Nyabingi appears as a female spirit who speaks through the living, interceding for the people to Ruhanga, the creator. She lives in the socioreligious memory of the cultivators and pastoral groups of the region. Her mediums, called bagirwa, have exclusive power to invoke her presence and interpret her will to the people. The bagirwa invoke supernatural forces to punish those who anger Nyabingi or fail to give offerings and acknowledge her powers. The ascendancy of Nyabingi over other cults lay in the ability of the bagirwa to organize the cult into a hierarchical power structure, with them wielding power as her representative.

Followers believe that it is through the curses of the bagirwa that Nyabingi demonstrates her power to bring misfortunes upon wrongdoers. In her diverse manifestations, Nyabingi has been concerned with grievances more than solidarity, mediating social disputes arising from demographic imbalance, scarcity of resources, external aggressors, and family tensions. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, when herders and agriculturalists were in fierce competition for land, she intervened to ensure social harmony. The cultivating villagers of the region summoned her spirit to intervene when they encountered the ravages of European colonialism and domination.

During colonial times, Christian missionaries considered the cult to be a satanic force in competition for the souls of the Africans. The missionaries did not allow people who were members of the cult into the churches. Consequently, the Africans continued to practice privately, ensuring that worship of Nyabingi continued. African Christians have now accepted Nyabingi mediumship in their churches, reworking the institutions of the bagirwa into a more Christian form.

O

Obatala

(c. 1000 C.E.)

Yoruba ruler, god

Obatala is one of the first known kings of the West African Yoruba people (from c. 1000) and is a deified god (orisha). The Yoruba traditionally inhabit southeastern Nigeria and parts of Benin and Togo. They consider their city of Ile-Ife to be the birthplace of humankind. Oral history explains that Obatala was one of the original settlers of Ile-Ife. However, he decided to leave Ile-Ife because his power to communicate God's divine words (ase) was not fully appreciated by the other settlers. Obatala then left and founded his own kingdom (oba means "king"). Numerous Yoruba and Igbo kingdoms recognize Obatala as their patron deity; however, the sacred scriptures of the Yoruba traditional religion (the "Ifa Corpus") note that the Ifon-Orolu kingdom is the home of Obatala's lineage.

Obatala worshipped the god Orisa'Nla (Great God). Once deified, he retained Orisa'Nla's attributes, which include social peace, moral purity, and the ability to create life. Obatala eventually became synonymous with Orisa'Nla and is now also known by this name. Obatala/Orisa'Nla is currently one of the most widely worshipped of the Yoruba orishas and has millions of followers in Africa, Europe, South America, the Caribbean, and North America. Known as the deity who sculpted human beings and gave them the breath of life (ase), this orisha is considered guardian of the handicapped. Obatala/Orisa'Nla is usually depicted as an old man or woman because long life is one of the orisha's attributes. The orisha is associated with all things white because it symbolizes purity.

Odile

(c. 660–720 C.E.?)

Christian abbess

Although there is doubt that St. Odile existed at all, her story continues to be very popular. Also known as Odilia, Ottilia, Othilia, and Adilia, Odile was the eldest child of Adalric, the duke of Alsace, and his wife Bereswinde. Odile was born in perhaps 660 with two things against her—she was not a boy, and she was born blind. Angered over this situation, her father wished to get rid of the infant; however, her mother pleaded her case, and Odile was spared—but sent away, first given to a servant and then placed in a Christian convent in Palma. It was in this convent that Odile was baptized at the age of twelve (waiting until children were older to have them baptized was not unusual for the time). St. Erhard of Regensburg performed the sacrament. During the ceremony, the blind Odile's sight was miraculously restored.

Following this miracle, many of the nuns became jealous of Odile, and she contacted her brother Hugh. He told her to come home, but when she arrived and met her father, he flew into a rage and killed his son, blaming the boy for Odile's return. He was instantly repentant. Although a marriage was arranged for Odile, she refused to marry and instead founded a convent in Hohenberg, her family castle; later she founded a second monastery at Niedermunster. She was joined in the cloistered life by three nieces, Eugénie, Attale, and Gundelinde, and Odile remained abbess until her death in possibly 720.

One revelation credited to Odile was the divine assurance that her prayers and good works were able to redeem her father after his death. Her grave is in a chapel near the convent's church, where water that flows beneath her monastery is said to cure eye problems. Her feast day is December 13. She is the patron of the blind and the patron saint of Alsace; consequently, in art she is represented with a book topped with two eyes.

Odile's convent was granted immunity by Charlemagne, and it was later confirmed by Louis the Pious on March 9, 837. Mont Sainte-Odile, at an elevation of 2,496 feet, is one of the most visited sites in Alsace.

There is thought to have been an eighth-century vita of Odile, but it has been lost. The earliest Life that survives is from the tenth century. There is also a shorter text that survives in an eleventh-century manuscript.

Odilo of Cluny

Christian abbot, reformer

Odilo, fifth abbot of the French monastery of Cluny, was born in Auvergne, France, in 962; he died at the Italian abbey of Souvigny on January 1, 1049. In 991, not even a year after joining the celebrated reform abbey of Cluny, he was appointed coadjutor to Abbot Majolus—whose biography he later wrote—and he was made acting abbot in 994. His fifty-year reign as abbot (999–1049) was marked by the dynamic expansion of Cluniac daughter houses, demonstrating his leadership and talent for organization. The formation of this great monastic confederation was a direct consequence of the exemption from aristocratic and episcopal control granted to Cluny by Pope John XI during the reign of Odo, Cluny's second abbot, and confirmed by Popes Gregory V in 998 or 999 and John XIX in 1027. Odilo and the Cluniac monastic reform were instrumental in spreading papal authority and reform—especially the monastic-led fight against simony, the buying and selling of ecclesiastical offices, and clerical marriage.

Odilo was responsible for the commemoration of All Souls' Day at Cluny and its dependencies, and this special day of prayer for all the Christian dead soon spread throughout Western Christendom. Active in the Peace of God movement, he also was especially concerned with the fate of the poor, selling Cluny's treasures to feed those affected by the great famine of 1033. Twice offered the archbishopric of Lyons, he was called the "archangel of the monks" by Fulbert of Chartres because of his reforming zeal.

Odilo was also known for his diplomacy. He served as a counselor to Emperor Henry II from 1002 onward, mediated the dispute between Emperor Conrad II and King Robert II of France in 1025, and was present at the coronation of Emperor Henry III in Rome in 1046. His eleventh-century biographer Jotsaldus stressed his charity, sense of justice, and selfless conduct on behalf of others. Odilo was canonized in 1063, and his feast is celebrated April 29.

Odo of Cluny

Christian abbot, reformer, writer

Odo of Cluny, second abbot of the French monastery of Cluny, was born in Aquitaine in about 879. The son of a noble couple, Odo studied first at the court of Duke William of Aquitaine and then in Tours and Paris under Remigius of Auxerre. Tonsured at the age of nineteen, he became a canon at St. Martin of Tours, to whom his father had dedicated him. Under the influence of Berno, first abbot of Cluny, he later transferred to Berno's monastery at Baume, becoming the master of the abbey school by the age of thirty. Ordained a priest by Berno, he was elected his successor as abbot of Cluny in 927.

It was during Odo's tenure as abbot that Pope John XI granted Cluny exemption from aristocratic and episcopal control and authorized him to expand the Cluniac monastic reforms across France and Italy. Called "the restorer of monasteries," Odo established the Cluniac observance, which became one of the most important models for Benedictine monasticism for more than a century. He made several visits to Italy, where he founded or reformed several monasteries (most notably Subiaco and Monte Cassino). He was also entrusted by Pope Leo VI in 936 and 939 and Pope Stephen VIII in 941 with negotiations for a peace settlement between Prince Alberic of Rome and the Italian king Hugh of Provence. Odo was known for his humility; the biography written by his disciple John of Salerno also stresses his patience, his restoration of monasteries, and his perfect observance of rules. In the end, he is “the specimen of all virtues” (John of Salerno, 49).

Odo's important literary works include vitae (most notably of Gerald of Aurillac from c. 855–909), poetry (including the Occupatio, a meditation on sacred history in seven books), and several hymns (four in honor of St. Martin); his Collationes (PL 133:517–638) clearly shows the influence of St. Augustine. Odo died in Tours on November 18, 942. His feast is celebrated April 29.

Oduduwa

Yoruba king, god

Oduduwa is regarded as the original ancestor of the West African Yoruba people and is a deified god (orisha). The Yoruba people traditionally inhabit southeastern Nigeria and parts of Benin and Togo. Yoruba history explains that Oduduwa, whose name means “Odu exists,” settled in Ile-Ife with others and became the city's first king. This city is considered by its inhabitants as the birthplace of humankind. Being a descendant of Oduduwa was customarily the identifying marker of a “Yoruba” person—at times, more so than speaking the Yoruba language. Yoruba kingdoms were considered “legitimate” if they could claim ancestry to Oduduwa and Ile-Ife. However, many Dahomeans (of modern Benin) also declared that they descended from Oduduwa, while certain Yoruba groups did not claim Oduduwa as an ancestor or Ile-Ife as a place of origin.

Although Oduduwa is considered the progenitor of the Yoruba, archaeological evidence supports the idea that societies have inhabited Ile-Ife since 1000 B.C.E., which was before the time of Oduduwa. Most likely Oduduwa is regarded as the Yoruba's original ancestor because he federated the local population. Oduduwa established or embodied the start of a new dynasty in which traditional religion became the guiding force for the various Yoruba kingdoms, hence “divine kingships.”

Divine kingships had many parallels across Yorubaland. For instance, traditional high priests (babalawos), experts in odu (sacred verses), were top advisers to the king. Oduduwa also licensed Yoruba kings to wear the beaded crown because beads were considered symbolic of the divine covenant between humanity and God. Kings and Yoruba descendants around the world still claim connection to Oduduwa. He is recognized as an orisha, although he is not commonly worshipped. His shrine can still be found in Ile-Ife today.

Oedipus

Ancient Greek hero

Oedipus was a hero of Thebes and the focus of a hero cult that developed in ancient Greece. The early record describes Oedipus as an angry hero who was venerated so that his spirit would refrain from cursing other locales as it had cursed the city of Thebes. In the form of the legend composed by the fifth-century B.C.E. dramatist Sophocles, however, especially in the late play Oedipus at Colonus, the aged Oedipus has taken on a strong element of purification through suffering, and his mysterious death brings blessings to the place that receives his body.

There is no evidence of a historic Oedipus, son of Laius and Jocasta (in earlier legends Epicaste). He first appears in Iliad 23.679, which mentions Oedipus's funeral games. But the Odyssey already relates the horrible tale of how the hero killed his own father and married his mother. The mother committed suicide when their relationship was discovered; Oedipus himself is more negatively described as finishing out his “evil days” in Thebes. At least two epics were written about Oedipus, the Oidipodia and the Thebais, fragments of which show Oedipus as a heroic figure defeating the monstrous sphinx in a riddle contest—and as a powerful figure who cursed his sons, praying that they would fight over their inheritance and kill each other.

Oedipus proved an immensely popular figure for the classical dramatists of Athens. Aeschylus wrote a set of plays on the Oedipus theme in 467, of which the play Seven against Thebes, telling of his sons' fratricidal war, survives. Euripides also wrote an Oedipus. The full tale, however, comes from the pen of Sophocles, who wrote at least two cycles of plays on the theme, of which three plays survive: Oedipus Tyrannus, Oedipus at Colonus, and Antigone. These explore the theme of human pride (hubris) and how it leads to tragic fall. In this developed legend, Oedipus is exposed as an infant by his father Laius because of a prophecy that the infant will grow up to kill his father and marry his mother. It is this attempt to evade prophecy that leads to the whole tragic unfolding of events. The baby is taken in and raised. As an adult, he meets a rude and violent man at a crossroads, whom he kills. He then goes on to Thebes and marries the widowed queen—his mother Jocasta. Oedipus proves to be a model ruler, intelligent and concerned for the welfare of his people, a model hero of the city founder type. It is his concern for his city that leads him to seek advice from the gods when pestilence breaks out, only to be told that the land is failing because of his sin—killing his father and marrying his mother, unwittingly fulfilling the prophecy. Upon hearing this revelation, Jocasta hangs herself and Oedipus tears out his own eyes with his mother's broach.

If the story ended there, it would be hard to see why Oedipus should have received veneration as a hero, which he did at least at Athens and Colonus. But an element of redemption and growing mystical insight was added in the play Oedipus at Colonus, written late in Sophocles' life and telling of the careworn Oedipus, the ceaseless wanderer, who has redeemed himself by suffering and won spiritual power unparalleled in Greek legend. Oedipus's son Polynices and Jocasta's uncle Creon try to bring Oedipus back to Thebes to serve their own selfish purposes—and are comprehensively and effectively cursed, as the play Antigone makes plain. Oedipus himself feels the coming of death and decides its time and place, on the lands of King Theseus, who has treated the stranger in his land with kindness. The play ends with Oedipus's mysterious death, apparently swallowed by the earth in Colonus at a spot only Theseus knows, and the promise that Oedipus's spirit will protect Athens from attack by the Thebans, Oedipus's own people, whose protection he has forsworn thanks to their evil treatment of him.

Ogún, one of the most important Yoruba orishas (deities), is the deity of iron and war. His symbols are anything made of iron and the cudgel or machete, and young palm fronds are used to demarcate his shrine. His worship is universal among the Yoruba and their descendants in other areas of West Africa and the New World. Though he is sometimes depicted as a deified ancestor, Ogún is one of the primordial orishas, that is, one of the sixteen orishas born from the womb of Yemojá—divinity of the waters.

Ogún is the patron deity of all those whose professions involve the use of iron or metal. He protects the blacksmith, the soldier, the hunter, and the butcher, and in modern society, he also watches over the surgeon, the airplane pilot, mechanics, taxi drivers, and all whose profession brings them into contact with his element and metals in general. In Cuba, the train, the railroad, and the sugarcane they were used to transport also become important symbols associated with Ogún. This orisha is also associated with responsibility and hard work. In a myth recounted in Cuba, Ogún cursed himself to work twenty-four hours a day for the benefit of humankind. He thus marks the progression of humankind and its advancement through time. Without Ogún's element, civilization would not have evolved as it has, for the discovery of iron is one of the most important ancestors of modern technological development and accomplishment.

Ogún was given the title of Oshìn Imalè—chief among the divinities—in appreciation for his role in paving the way for the entrance of the other deities to earth. Yoruba mythology recounts that after the creation of the solid earth, when all the orishas came to inhabit the world, Ogún used his cudgel to clear the way through the heavy brush and the land upon which the deities built their houses. In addition, Ogún hunted to provide food for their sustenance, and eventually that of the humans who would later inhabit the earth. The deities and all human beings are therefore indebted to Ogún and must reciprocate with reverence, devotion, and sacrifice.

Though he may be one of the most beloved deities, Ogún's character is respected and feared, as he is believed to be very fiery and explosive. The wicked have no place in his world, and he assures that they receive their due punishment. Ogún is considered a strong symbol of respect, morality, and absolute justice and is often called upon to witness a covenant or pact. Followers of traditional Yoruba religion who testify in modern Nigerian courts may be sworn in with their hand resting upon a piece of iron instead of on the Bible or Qur'an.

Grove of Ogún, god of iron and war, Nigeria. (Art Directors)

Anyone who breaks a covenant or commits perjury will undoubtedly encounter Ogún's ire. In a Yoruba saying, "To know Ogún and be dishonest is an impossibility" (Awolalú 1996, 33; King in Hallgren 1991, 36, 52).

Ōjin

(Late 4th–early 5th cent. C.E.)

Japanese emperor, kami

Ōjin was the fifteenth emperor (tennō) of Japan according to the traditional calculation given in the earliest Japanese chronicles, the Kojiki (Records of ancient matters, 712) and the Nihonshoki (Chronicles of Japan, 720). He was posthumously identified with the popular Shinto deity Hachiman, who is worshipped up to the present day in numerous shrines (hachimangū) throughout Japan.

According to the Nihonshoki, where he is also referred to by the name Homuda or Homuta, Ōjin was supposedly born in 201 as the fourth son of Emperor Chūai and Empress Jingū. His reign is accounted to have lasted from 270 until 310, but scholars generally agree that Ōjin must have reigned at a later time, conceivably in the late fourth and early fifth centuries. Consensus is also established to the fact that Ōjin can be considered as the first of the emperors depicted by the chronicles who was an actual historical figure. Features of his reign are supposed to include the reclamation of farmland on a large scale, the arrival of immigrants from the continent who introduced new cultural acquisitions and technology to Japan, the spread of iron weapons and agricultural tools, and the growth of imperial power and influence in general. Upon his death, Ōjin is said to have been buried in a kofun (keyhole-shaped tomb mound). The kofun associated with Ōjin is situated in the city of Habikino in present-day Ōsaka prefecture and, with its length of more than 400 meters, is the second-largest kofun in Japan.

The origins of the identification of the spirit of the departed Ōjin with the Shinto deity Hachiman, traditionally considered the god of war and archery, are ambiguous. However, one possible foundation of this identification can be found in the myths concerning the birth of Ōjin. The two characters forming the name Hachiman, literally meaning “eight” and “banner,” can be interpreted as a reference to the legend that at the birth of Ōjin eight banners came down from heaven on the birthplace. Further, it is handed down that at the end of the sixth century the deity Hachiman revealed himself as a manifestation of the spirit of Ōjin, but the identification of Ōjin with Hachiman probably did not occur until the Heian period (794–1192). Hachiman is usually thought to be constituted of either the apotheosized Ōjin alone or of the collective deified spirits of Ōjin himself; his wife, Nakatsuhime; and his mother, Empress Jingū, who is credited by the chronicles with a successful invasion of the Korean peninsula.

The veneration of Ōjin as Hachiman is marked to a great extent by its syncretism, embracing elements of Shinto and Buddhism. The worship of Hachiman is assumed to have originated in the veneration of the deity of the Usa clan in Kyūshū from where it expanded to a widespread belief. Since the late eighth century, when an oracle at the shrine Usa Hachimangū disclosed the intention of Hachiman to support the construction of the Daibutsu (Great Buddha) in Nara, Hachiman came also to be venerated as daibosatsu (great bodhisattva) and protector of Buddhism.

Olaf of Norway

Christian ruler, martyr

Olaf, king of Norway (r. 1015–1028), is known mainly from the Heimskringla (History of the kings of Norway) by Snorri Sturluson, composed nearly 200 years after Olaf’s death. Snorri’s biography is in many ways similar to Notker’s Life of Charlemagne, which was also written years following the death of its subject. Indeed, Olaf was supposed to have taken Charlemagne as his model of a Christian statesman, and sections of Snorri’s writing (especially his description of Olaf’s physical appearance) are reminiscent of Notker’s account. He is patron saint of Norway.

Olaf was born in 995. He left Norway as a boy to visit England, France, and Normandy and on reaching adulthood fought on behalf of both Richard of Normandy and Æthelred II of England. According to Snorri, Olaf was feared as especially violent and bloodthirsty in battle. It was during this time that he converted to Christianity; although Snorri claims Olaf was baptized in 998 in Norway, it is more likely that he was baptized in Rouen, France, in c. 1010 by Archbishop Robert. He turned the focus of his zeal from war for the sake of power to war for the sake of Christ, and returned to Norway. After becoming king in 1015, he set himself the task of converting the populace and imposing Christianity as the official religion of the kingdom. Olaf worked to eliminate non-Christian beliefs and customs, often turning violence and bribery, skills learned during years as a Viking raider, into tools of conversion.

In addition to creating a Christian Norway, Olaf was also keenly interested in uniting the country, traditionally a federation of counties under strong local control. Many Norwegian nobles, upset with Olaf’s leadership, supported King Cnut of England and Denmark as overlord. Eventually these powerful factions, with assistance from Cnut, expelled Olaf, and Cnut was made king in his stead.

In 1030, after two years of exile in Novgorod (Russia), Olaf returned to reclaim his kingdom, waging battle against the rebellious factions. Olaf was killed in battle at Stiklestad, and although he did not die in an overtly religious battle, he is counted as a martyr. After his death miracles were attributed to him, and a year later he was removed from his grave and reinterred at the church of St. Clement in Nidaros (now Trondheim). His cult became popular throughout northern Europe, particularly in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway.

Olga

(c. 879–969 C.E.)

Christian princess

Princess Olga, the wife of Great Kievan Prince Igor, is first mentioned in Russia’s Primary Chronicle in 903. The first royal Russian figure to accept Christianity, she converted during her visit to Byzantium in 955. The Chronicle relates an entertaining but most likely apocryphal story about how Olga avoided the subjugation of Rus' to Byzantium yet managed to preserve the political alliance with the Byzantine Empire. The legend has it that the Byzantine emperor wanted to marry Olga, a widow at the time of her visit, in the hope of joining the territories of Rus' to the empire. The clever Russian princess resolved the dilemma by confessing her desire to be baptized and asking the emperor to be her godfather—an honor that the emperor could not refuse. Thus Olga is famous for her shrewdness.

In real life, Olga was an able and often ruthless politician. She started her rule with the execution of a cruel and elaborate revenge on the Dreveliane, the tribe that was responsible for killing her husband, Igor. Olga restored internal order in the Russian territories through a system of laws and taxation and brought them back under the control of Kiev. The princess sought, although unsuccessfully, to consolidate the alliance of Rus' with Constantinople and establish new alliances with the German Empire. She visited Constantinople twice and Germany once during her rule.

The Primary Chronicle describes Olga's manner of life, after her son Sviatoslav replaced her as the ruler, as virtuous and pious. In her old age, Olga led a humble existence and requested to be buried according to the Christian rite. In recognition of Olga's role in the Christianization of Russia, the Russian Orthodox Church venerates her as a saint. Olga died in 969 at the age of about ninety. Her feast day is July 11.

Olinga, Enoch

Baha'i missionary

Enoch Olinga was one of the outstanding twentieth-century African believers of the Baha'i faith, a religion based on the principles of the oneness of humanity and the oneness of God. He was born on June 24, 1926, in the Teso region of northeastern Uganda. His parents were devout Christians and members of the Native Anglican Church of Uganda. The youthful Olinga received his early education in Mbale, Uganda, and later he joined the British Army Education Corps in Nairobi, Kenya. After that tour of duty, he returned to Uganda with a position in government service.

Olinga came into contact with the Baha'i faith in 1951. He was impressed with the new religion. The sincerity and warmth of its believers in East Africa greatly attracted him, and he declared his belief in Baha'u'llah (1817–1892), prophet-founder of the Baha'i faith. An independent world religion, the Baha'i faith was founded in Iran in 1844 and has as its guiding principle the fundamental belief that the purpose of religion is to promote harmony among the peoples of the world. According to Baha'is, in order to attain such a level of social and spiritual oneness, humanity must accept such tenets as the elimination of racism and other social prejudices, the equality of women and men, compulsory education for all children, and the eradication of extremes of wealth and poverty.

Enoch Olinga was responsible for the phenomenally rapid conversion of many Ugandans to the new religion. In 1953, he was asked to relocate to what was then British Cameroon in West Africa to “open up new territories” to the new faith. He traveled extensively throughout the Cameroons and eastern Nigeria for ten years teaching the new religion, converting and transforming entire villages through the force of his own spiritual and social charisma. As an eloquent and dignified “pioneer”—a person who travels to another region or country in order to teach the Baha'i faith—Olinga had the distinction of being the first African Baha'i to introduce the faith into West Africa. Shoghi Effendi (1897–1957), guardian of the Baha'i faith, thus made Olinga a Knight of Baha'u'llah and elevated him to the rank of a Hand of the Cause of God in 1957. The Baha'i faith places emphasis on group leadership as opposed to individual power. There were, however, distinct individuals among the Baha'is who during the twentieth century were recognized for their spiritual capacity, whose personal and public charisma were essential to the holiness attributed to them. The Hands of the Cause of God were the “chief custodians” of the Baha'i faith.

Olinga traveled extensively internationally, meeting heads of state and dignitaries as well as humble individuals, as he proclaimed and put into action the principles of the Baha'i faith. Caught in the midst of political upheaval and a civil war in Uganda, Olinga, his wife, and three of their children were murdered in Kampala, Uganda, on September 17, 1979.

Ollantay

(Mid–15th cent. C.E.)

Inca general

Ollantay is the name of one of the most famous generals of the ninth inca (ruler), Pachacutec. The oral tradition told the story of the tragic love of Ollantay and Cusi Coyllur, daughter of the inca, who was destined to marry one of her brothers or remain chaste the rest of her life. A play entitled Ollantay, performed for the first time in 1780 in Lima, retells the drama of this impossible love. The anonymous play may have been recorded in quipus, knotted strings on which Incas stored information, and then orally transmitted by a quipukeeper (quipucamayoc) to a friar, who elaborated the written version. In any case, it had pre-Hispanic roots dated at least to the mid–fifteenth century. The play was so successful that it was translated into English and French during the nineteenth century.

According to the legend, Pachacutec would not allow a marriage between Cusi Coyllur and Ollantay because Ollantay did not belong to the high Inca nobility; his daughter was expected to marry one of her kind. The angry inca reproached Ollantay for having raised his eyes to his daughter and reminded him that, although he was a good warrior, he was not a noble. But it was too late, since Ollantay and Cusi Coyllur had already produced a child. The inca confined Cusi Coyllur in El Templo de las Vírgenes del Sol, the temple for chaste women. Ollantay started a rebellion in the Antisuyu, one of the four regions of the Tawantinsuyu, the Inca Empire, and fought against Pachacutec in a lengthy war.

Ten years passed, and many things changed. Pachacutec had died, and his son, Tupac Yupanqui, had become the new ruler. Ollantay was defeated by trickery and taken alive in the presence of the young inca, who finally forgave Ollantay. At that moment, Ima Sumac, the daughter of Ollantay and Cusi Coyllur who had been enclosed at the temple with her mother, entered the room and asked the inca for help for her suffering mother. Tupac Yupanqui asked to see the mother of Ima Sumac, realized that she was his sister, and let Ollantay and Cusi Coyllur marry.

Ondeto, Simeo

(c. 1910/1917–1991 C.E.)

Christian Legio Maria founder

Simeo Ondeto, a Luo of Kenya, was spiritual cofounder of Legio Maria, the largest African-instituted church (AIC) to grow out of Roman Catholic influence in Africa. Estimates vary but put total membership in the church today as high as 250,000 to 1.5 million. Conventional history dates Ondeto's birth at around 1910 or 1917, but many Legios believe in a "biomythography" of complex chronology. They believe that the "third secret" of the Fatima Marian apparitions of 1917 in Portugal pertained to the coming of Legio and African independence. Rome's failure to disclose this secret in 1960, as had been promised, allegedly moved the Virgin Mary to tell her son Jesus that they had to bring the message to Africa in person, and they did so, entering into different African eras.

Mary and her son, colorless in heaven, say Legios, came to Africa on a rainbow. Mary slid off, fell into Lake Victoria, and emerged from it as the old, black, miracle-working woman in the deep past of Luo oral narratives. Jesus fell onto land at Angoro village, Kano location, Kisumu District, sometime between 1900 and 1917, when he was born to Ombimbo Misumba, a poor Watombori farmer, and his wife, Margaret Aduwo (Oduor). In other versions, the farmer and his wife foster-parented him after finding him as a lost twelve-year-old boy. Legios say Ondeto performed several childhood miracles, such as turning clay cattle into real ones, or praying to God and receiving food in his hands so the children he was with would have enough to eat. He grew up with three brothers and a sister.

From that point on, non-Legio and Legio biographical accounts concur. In his teens, Ondeto left Angoro to work at a variety of menial jobs (herder, sisal/sugar cane worker, house servant, watchman). Work took him elsewhere in Kisumu District, to the neighboring Rift Valley province, and as far off as south Nyanza and Tanzania. He was employed by Luo, other Africans, and Europeans. Historical records indicate Ondeto was baptized into the Roman Catholic Church in 1952. He joined the Catholic lay apostolate, the Legion of Mary, and became an auxiliary catechist. With only four years of formal education, he could go no higher, however, though he wanted to. He began teaching, preaching, and healing, against church rules. Missionaries repudiated his activities, and he left the Catholic Church.

Legios say that between 1961 and 1963, when living near Mount Kwer, south Nyanza, Ondeto found his "real mother," Mary, who had moved from the past of oral narratives to more recent times and had been searching for her son. She was still old, black, and Luo. Her acknowledgment that he was her son gave Ondeto validation. Legios have maintained that they accept the divinity of the Black Christ and Black Mary because they saw angels bowing before them, experienced other “signs and miracles,” such as healings, in person or in dreams, and received further disclosures from the Holy Spirit. They call Ondeto Baba Messias (Father Messiah). Legios and Ondeto promoted other titles that pointed to divine status, including Melkio/Melchizadek, Immanuel, and Agwenykamery (The one who twists harm away, from Mary’s place). For Legios, Ondeto’s stammer and chronic cough indicated that he was the Son of Man as well as divine.

For some Legios, “signs and miracles” meant Ondeto could be placed at any historical event where issues of political-religious freedom and embattlement commingled. He was placed in the forest with Kenya Land Freedom Army (KLFA/Mau Mau) freedom fighters; identified with KLFA leader Dedan Kimathi; and is said to have instructed Tom Mboya, G. E. M. Argwings-Kodhek, Masinde Muliro, and Oginga Odinga at meetings where they sought Kenyan freedom via political negotiations. He was cited as the one who had energized Elijah Masinde, whose combination of religion, nationalism, economic rights discourse, and support for African practices such as polygyny crystallized in Dini ya Msambwa (Religion of the ancestral spirits/Church adapted to African tradition). Ondeto was even sent into Kahawa barracks, where the Kenyan military plotted the abortive 1982 coup against Daniel arap Moi’s oppressive regime. He was placed at religious confrontations in France, England, and elsewhere. Etymologizing on Ondeto’s Luo name drew out other possible meanings for Legios. According to one analysis, “He says that he was called Ondeto, the son of Ombimbo, who chewed (ndeto) on the meanings of all religions.” Biomythography could have a universalizing impetus: “Jesus has appeared in the world at different times; at places he’s Melchizadek, Mohammed, and Buddha” (Schwartz 1994, 147–148).

Legio is a highly charismatic religion that is rooted in Catholicism. Legios maintain that wherever they were physically in Kenya, Ondeto and Mary could speak through a Legio to other Legios. Their “return to heaven,” in 1966 for Mary and 1991 for Ondeto, only changed the site from which they could speak. Legio has weathered the deaths of its two holy persons and continues today as a thriving religion.

Onuphrios

(c. 400 C.E.?)

Christian hermit

Purportedly of fifth-century origin, the tales about the early Christian Egyptian hermit Onuphrios place his legend firmly within the traditions of extreme asceticism attributed to a number of other Egyptian “desert fathers” and “desert mothers.” Wishing to lead a life of severe abstinence, rigorous self-denial, and intense spirituality, Onuphrios (a monk or former prince—details vary) withdrew from the world and spent seventy years living alone in the Egyptian desert. Suffering many temptations, harsh weather conditions, and near starvation, he survived primarily on dates that God caused to grow on a palm tree near his rough desert shelter (or, in some versions, food brought by a raven).

Toward the end of his life, Onuphrios was discovered by an abbot named Paphnutius who had journeyed into the desert to meet local hermits and learn more about the ascetic life, as he was considering becoming a hermit himself. He found the emaciated Onuphrios covered in fur like an animal (in some versions, walking on all fours), wearing a loincloth of palm fronds, and otherwise covered only with his long hair and beard. Although initially extremely alarmed by the sight, Paphnutius spent the evening conversing with the holy man and sharing a simple meal miraculously provided by God. Onuphrios died the next morning and Paphnutius buried him in a rock cleft, as the hermit had instructed with his last words. The cleft quickly closed upon the holy man and disappeared along with the date palm near his hermit’s abode. Paphnutius, understanding that he was to remain there no longer, returned to his monastery and recounted the tale of his encounter.

Certain motifs and biblical references in the stories of Onuphrios are shared in other accounts of early Christian desert ascetics’ withdrawal from the world and chosen subjection to physical pain and sufferings in order to lead a purely spiritual life.

Onuphrios appears especially in Byzantine medieval art and is easily recognizable by his long hair and beard and his wild and emaciated appearance. Some medieval cloth-making guilds and weavers are said to have adopted Onuphrios as their patron saint, perhaps owing to his “clothing” of matted hair and beard and woven palm fronds. His feast day is June 12.

Origen

(c. 185–c. 254 C.E.)

Christian philosopher

Origen was born of Christian parents, most probably in Alexandria, Egypt, in about 185. His father, Leonidas, was martyred in 202 or 203, and Origen himself survived because his mother hid his clothes so he could not leave the house. After his father's death, Origen supported himself and his family by teaching. At the age of eighteen, he became head of the Alexandrian catechetical school. He had many devoted students, who were attracted not only by his teaching but also by his way of life. During his life he made many friends, but also he had many enemies. After his death in about 254, his enemies and critics encouraged a legend that Origen had castrated himself. Origen learned Hebrew in order to study the Old Testament; later a great deal of his work was devoted to very careful, critical study of the Bible. He also made himself familiar with the non-Christian philosophy of his time. He attended lectures of the famous Neoplatonist Amonius Saccas, teacher of Plotinus.

Origen was the first great teacher and truly speculative intellectual in the long history of the Christian church. In his work De Principiis (On first principles), he produced the first synthesis of Christian philosophy and theology. In that sense, the book was a forerunner to such works as Thomas Aquinas's thirteenth-century Summa Theologiae (Summary of theology). Origen's main apologetic work was Contra Celsum (Against Celsus), a famous treatise dedicated to detailed polemic against Celsus, the well-known Greek philosopher (and doctrinal enemy of Christianity). Origen wrote a great many exegetical works and commentaries about almost all the books of the Old and New Testament, and also some texts that are dedicated to practical aspects of Christian life and worship. His allegorical method of interpreting scripture was well known and highly influential among his successors.

Origen's Christianity is highly speculative, greatly influenced by Neoplatonic ontology, freely intellectual, and deeply authentic. In the Christian East, there was a great controversy about Origen and his doctrinal and spiritual legacy. Disputes that are known as "Origenistic Controversies" started in about 300. Finally in a council at Constantinople in 543, under the emperor Justinian I, Origen's teachings were condemned in the form of fifteen well-known anathemas. Despite this condemnation, he was an inspiration for a great many of the later Christian fathers. The most famous among them were Athanasius of Alexandria, Didimus, Evagrius, the Cappadocian fathers, and Maximus the Confessor.

Orimolade Tunolase, Moses

Christian sect founder

Moses Orimolade Tunolase was a Christian evangelist in colonial Nigeria who toward the end of his life was involved in founding the Cherubim and Seraphim (C&S) indigenous African churches. Through his sermons and actions, Orimolade demonstrated the ways in which Yoruba traditional religious values and forms of worship could be integrated with Christian beliefs in order to serve the needs of early converts. In addition to the miraculous events attributed to him, he was renowned for his biblical knowledge, his effective sermons, and the healing power of his prayers. Although his death soon after the founding of the C&S resulted in a schism in the church, he is regarded as the patron saint of all C&S denominations.

Orimolade was born in Ikare, Ondo State, Nigeria, in 1879 to the family of Tunolase, an Ifa diviner. He allegedly spoke to his mother from the womb advising her how to carry a load of wood. Following this event, Orimolade's parents consulted the Ifa oracle and were told that their child would be a saint who would spread the gospel of the Christian God and his son Jesus Christ. When Orimolade was born, he attempted to walk from the delivery bed. The midwife held him down and his father uttered incantations to stop him, resulting in a physical handicap that would affect Orimolade throughout his life.

Orimolade converted to Christianity in his early childhood and worked with the mission church in Ikare. He soon became frustrated by the lack of response to Christianity. He prayed to God for guidance and received a vision in which an angel appeared and presented him with three objects: a rod, a royal insignia, and a crown. This vision served as a confirmation for Orimolade to persist in his evangelical mission.

Orimolade became an itinerant preacher, traveling throughout Nigeria to spread the gospel. He arrived in Lagos around 1924 and associated with the Holy Trinity Anglican Church. His preaching during this period set the model from which C&S practices would emerge: faith in Jesus Christ, the power of the Holy Spirit, and the use of prayers for healing purposes.

In 1925, a group of Orimolade's followers founded the C&S society based on a vision received by Christiana Abiodun Akinsowon. The C&S started first as a prayer group associated with a mission church, which later broke away owing to conflicts with the church administration. Orimolade died in Lagos on September 14, 1933.

Orishas

West African god-heroess

In the African-derived religions of Santería in Cuba, in Vodun, Vodou, or Voodoo in Haiti, and in Candomblé in Brazil, the orishas are the divine entities that preside over the earth created by the supreme being Olorun (or Olodumare). Orisha literally means "god" or "goddess." In West Africa and Cuba, it is believed that the orishas were human beings who passed on and returned as divinities in disguise who displayed godly powers over certain forces of the universe. Believers consider the orishas to be the holiest members of the pantheon of saints in Santería and other African faiths. Members of the Santería religion are known as santeros.

At feasts given by the santero to honor a particular orisha, known as bembé or tambor, the orisha is praised, saluted, offered food in the form of animal sacrifice, and invited to join the feast by taking possession of one of the priests or priestesses in attendance. During a bembé, male and female santeros wear white pants, shirts, and shoes. Orishas favor the color white because of its strong positive power, known as ashé or aché. Santeros also wear jewelry, bracelets, and col-lares (seashell necklaces strung in a particular pattern identified with each orisha). Drums, known as batá, play an important role in this festivity, and artistic altars are also built for orisha worship. They are usually adorned according to the orisha's favorite food, flowers, beads, fruit, fabrics, and other items associated with the deity.

Since Santería has borrowed many aspects of the Catholic faith, all orishas are identified with a Christian saint. The main orishas in the Santería pantheon are:

- Eshu, Elegba, or Elegua:* The divine messenger between the orishas and Olodumare, the orisha of crossroads, associated with the Holy Child of Atocha and St. Antony of Padua.
- Shangó or Changó:* The most popular of all orishas and god of thunder, fire, drums, and masculinity, associated with St. Barbara.
- Obatalá:* The oldest and purest of all orishas, creator of the human body, associated with Our Lady of Las Mercedes.

Yemayá: The mother figure of all orishas and goddess of the seas and peace at home, associated with the Virgin of Regla.

Oshun or Ochún: The orisha of love and fresh waters, associated with Our Lady of Charity, patron saint of Cuba.

Babaloo, Babaluaye, or Babalú Ayé: The orisha of infectious disease and healing, associated with St. Lazarus.

Ogún: The orisha of war, associated with Sts. Peter and James.

Osain or Osanyin: The orisha of the power of nature, associated with St. Joseph.

Ibeji: The Divine Twins (Taiwo and Kainde) and protector of children, associated with Sts. Cosmas and Damian.

Oshosi or Ochosi: The orisha of hunting and justice, associated with St. Norbert.

Orula or Orúnmila: The orisha of wisdom and destiny, associated with St. Francis of Assisi.

Followers believe that each orisha holds a special ashé or power that is imperative to purify the ritual atmosphere and induce trance in a devotee. Devotees must fit the ashé of a particular orisha in order to obtain what they desire. It is usually accomplished by praise and through offering animal sacrifices to the orisha. Each orisha has a favorite animal for sacrifice, and the blood of the sacrificed animal increases the orisha's ashé so that favors may be granted to devotees.

Orishas also represent compassionate divinities who provide santeros with advice and spiritual and physical healing in times of adversity.

Orpheus and Orphism

Greek hero and cult

Orpheus, the musician of Greek myth, is celebrated in literature and art for the compelling power of his song. Through his music, Orpheus can summon humans, animals, trees, and even rocks. This skill in itself implies his close connection to the divine; often he is identified as a son of the lyre-playing god Apollo and a muse, though he is associated also with Thrace, and sometimes his father is said to be a river god of that region.

Every part of Orpheus's mythology revolves around his musical prowess. He sails with Jason and the Argonauts as a lyre-player to provide the rhythm for the rowers and to overpower the songs of the Sirens so that the Argonauts may pass by safely. The story of his love for Eurydice turns upon his ability to persuade the gods of the underworld through his music; Eurydice dies of a snakebite, Orpheus descends to the underworld to bring her back, and the gods of the underworld are so enchanted by his song that they allow her to return with him so long as he does not look back at her as she follows him. He cannot resist, however, and when he looks back he loses Eurydice forever. Myths of the end of his life describe his violent death at the hands of Thracian women. Some versions present the women as angry because he wants no other woman's company; in others they are Bassarids, Thracian women who follow Dionysos, who punish him for neglecting their god, as he has worshipped only the sun (whom he identifies with Apollo) since his return from the underworld. The power of his song remains immortal; his head continues to sing even after severed from his body.

The name of this powerful musician with intimate knowledge of the underworld was used to give authority to poetry dating from the sixth century B.C.E. until late antiquity. Among the works called "orphyic" are theogonies, poems about eschatology, hymns to various gods, and spells and incantations. Some of these poems' titles refer to the traditional myths of Orpheus's descent to Hades or his travels with the Argonauts. These myths serve as a basis for explanations of the physical world or revelations of the fate of souls after death. Most influential is the orphyic account, preserved most fully in the works of Neoplatonists, of Dionysos's double birth and the birth of humankind. Dionysos is born first to Zeus and Persephone. The Titans consume him, they are destroyed by Zeus, and from their ashes the first human being is born. Zeus rescues part of the remains of Dionysos and together with Semele gives birth to Dionysos once again. This myth, in its fullest development, was used to explain the nature of humanity, wicked in connection to the Titans, but with an inherent divine element, since mingled with the Titans' ashes was the god they had consumed.

Orpheus's name came to be associated also with mystery cults that named him as founder as well as author of the sacred texts. The modern title "orphyism" groups together diverse rites and beliefs from various times and places; one thing they share is a use of written texts, which stands in contrast to traditional Greek religion. Thanks to archaeological excavation, gold leaves and bone plates from sites as widespread as southern Italy, Crete, Thessaly, and the Black Sea region now provide tantalizing glimpses of initiates' hopes for a special afterlife, with the help of Dionysos. Scratched on one, a bone plate from Olbia, is "Life, death, life. Truth. Dio(nysos), Orphyic." Such a spare text, but including the name of Orpheus suggests that the name alone preserves some of the power of the mythic musician's song.

Orthodoxy and Saints

The fundamental theoretical and practical idea of Orthodox Christianity is based on the dogma of incarnation: that God, in the second person of the Trinity, became a man. He took on himself sinful and mortal flesh to make it possible for human beings to become deified. Thanks to the mystery of incarnation there is a possibility of transformation and transfiguration for the mortal and sinful human nature. Deification is an absolute imperative of Orthodoxy. For Orthodoxy, to become deified means to become not just God in some kind of abstract sense. On the contrary, deification means to become a child of God, God-human. To be deified means to start a new kind of life, life in Christ. To start a new life in Christ means to be deeply ontologically identified with Christ himself. The life in mortal and sinful flesh should be radically changed for the life in immortal and nonsinful Christ. The fundamental imperative is, following famous discourse of St. Paul, to become a new creature (Gal. 6:15).

It is not just an imitation of a high ideal (that is, not just imitatio Christi, "imitation of Christ"), it is identification with Christ that matters. In the words of Nicholas Cabasilas (1974), a prominent Orthodox theorist, to be identified with Christ means to live your own personal life in Christ. The Orthodox idea of incarnation implies a special kind of highly sublimated realism, a personal realism. There is no abstract category of sainthood. Also, sainthood is not a juridical category. Incarnation, as identification, is a fundamentally personal category. The same could be said for sainthood. In other words, to be or not to be in accordance with this highly valued christological ideal is a personal decision. The personal question needs a personal answer. An individual must decide whether or not to be a saint.

For the Orthodox, the saints are a special kind of highly valued people who (even during their earthly and mortal life) succeeded in becoming very much identified with Christ himself. They are citizens of heaven who lived on the earth. In the liturgical and axiological context of the Christian community, they function as the living ideals and mediators between common people and the kingdom of heaven. They are spiritual fathers and mothers of all Christians. Their fame is great, their cults survive for centuries. They are represented on holy icons. Their role is charismatic, their place of high importance for the Christian community. Their fame could be local, but in some cases it could be spread around the Christian world. They can heal, they can protect. Their devoted prayer is something mortals desperately seek. During their lifetime, saints provide their community with a paradigmatic ideal of life and religious conduct. They have their festal days and ceremonies. There is a lot of folklore connected with their cults. Even their relics have healing and mystical power.

Historically speaking, the function of saints in Orthodoxy is analogous to the function of heroes in pre-Christian Europe. The saints are, of course, human, but at the same time they are not just ordinary humans. Their idealization is absolute. They are deified. In them is incarnated Christ himself. In the first centuries of Christianity, almost all of them were martyrs; later they were usually highly respected anchorites and ascetics, vocations which made them nearer to God than is possible for other mortals. Active participation in deity made their lives special.

In Orthodoxy there is no really abstract, formal, or administrative regulation of sainthood. On the contrary, somebody can be admitted and celebrated as a saint only if there is a cult among ordinary people who are dedicated to him or her. Deep in its essence, the category of saint has an element of real transcendence. The hagiographic tradition and literature is full of stories about the miracles that were done by saints during their earthly lives or after death. There is a belief that the saint's body is incorruptible, that death cannot destroy it. The Orthodox believe that there is a very fine, mystical scent of holy relics. For them it is a sign of the saint's corruptible body in incorruptibility.

For the Orthodox churches, there is no human institution that could be in charge of assessing and evaluating somebody's sainthood. There is only one real arbiter of possible sainthood among humans: the Holy Spirit. Practically speaking, this means that a cult must spread among believing people (the Holy Spirit is seen as the agent of that spread) for an individual saint to gain recognition. Of course, throughout history there were some dynastic attempts to make sainthood politically useful, and these attempts were more or less explicit during more or less turbulent times. The list of the saints will never be finished up to the last days. There are saints who lived in ancient times, as well as in our times.

Among the most famous saints in Orthodoxy are John Chrysostom (c. 349–407), Seraphim of Sarov (1759–1833), Nicholas (mid-fourth century), Sabas the Great (439–532), two saints named Parasceva (second and eleventh centuries), Nectarius (d. 397), Kosmas (1714–1779), and Silouan (1866–1938).

Ōshio Heihachirō

Confucian philosopher, rebel

Ōshio Heihachirō (Ōshio Chūsai) is remembered in Japanese history as a famous follower of the Wang Yangming school of Confucianism (Jap.: Yōmeigaku) whose philosophical praxis led to a fiery rebellion against the government of Osaka in 1837. He has also been regarded as a precursor of the mode of imperial-loyalist faith and nationalist activism that characterized the anti-Tokugawa movement that culminated in the Meiji Restoration.

Ōshio was born (or possibly adopted) in 1793 into a samurai family with the hereditary position of city police captain (machi yoriki) in the Osaka town-magistrate's office, a position that carried considerable authority but relatively low status. His discovery at age fifteen that he had a heroic ancestor led to shame at "being a petty document writer in the company of jailers and municipal officials," motivating him to take up Neo-Confucian learning. At twenty-four, he chanced to read a book of moral maxims by the Chinese philosopher Lü Kun (1536–1618) that convinced him that his whole approach to learning—seeking moral principles externally—had been misguided. Finding that Lü had been deeply influenced by Wang Yangming (1472–1529), he began his lifelong study of the teachings of Wang and his followers.

Ōshio later won great fame through his resolute prosecution of three difficult legal cases, but in 1830, disturbed over the attention these cases had brought him (and by his patron's retirement), he suddenly resigned his position, hoping to devote himself full-time to teaching Yōmeigaku at the private academy (the Senshindō) that he had set up in his residence. In 1833, he privately published his most famous philosophical work, Senshindō sakki (Reading notes from the cave of mind cleansing), which focuses on the intertwined spiritual practices of "returning to the Great Vacuity" (ki Taikyō) and "extending the inborn knowledge of the good" (to one's outward activities), while enjoining officials to devote themselves wholeheartedly to the welfare of the people.

In the same year, the country was struck by a severe famine, and though Ōshio repeatedly proffered policy advice to the new magistrate through his adopted son, his advice was angrily rejected. Burning with indignation, Ōshio distributed a fiery call-to-arms addressed to "the village headmen, elders, peasants, and tenant farmers in every village," calling for a righteous rebellion against the government he had once served. The mass support he expected did not materialize, and his band was soon defeated. Ōshio went into hiding; in 1837, when he was discovered, he committed suicide with his adopted son. In a time when resentment against the Tokugawa government was growing in many quarters, he lived on in the popular mind as a rebel hero, and his ideas, as well as his tactical errors, were carefully studied by those who led the anti-Tokugawa movement of the late 1850s and 1860s.

Osho

Indian contemporary religious founder

Osho, also known as Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh and Acharya Rajneesh, was the central figure of a contemporary religious movement. His followers were referred to as Rajneeshes and later as Oshos.

Osho was born on December 11, 1931, in Kuchwada, Madhya Pradesh, India; his birth name was Chandra Mohan Jain. He received a bachelor's degree in philosophy from Jabalpur University in 1955 and a master's degree in 1957 from the University of Saugar. He returned to Jabalpur

University as a professor of philosophy, where he taught until 1966. When a small group of followers began to revere him as a divinely inspired teacher, he began to devote himself solely to teaching spiritual matters. He assumed the name Acharya Rajneesh, combining the Sanskrit term for revered teacher, acarya, and a nickname given to him in his youth, Rajneesh. His teachings took on an increasingly syncretic character, combining ideas from Hinduism, Jainism, Zen Buddhism, Daoism, Christianity, ancient Greek and contemporary Western philosophy, European romantic poetry, humanistic psychology, and popular psychology. In Madhya Pradesh, Osho also invented "dynamic meditation," the central practice of his followers. Dynamic meditation consists of five stages of activity: breathing rapidly; dancing "madly"; jumping and yelling "hoo!" as a mantra; standing completely still and "observing"; and finally, celebrating.

In 1968, Osho moved to Bombay, changing his name to Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh. His circle of followers increased, particularly among foreign travelers to India, who were perhaps attracted by his emphasis on the spiritual merits of self-indulgence, sexual freedom, and individual advancement. In 1974, Osho and his followers (called sannyasins) moved to the nearby city of Pune to establish an ashram. In 1981, ostensibly to seek medical treatment, Osho and his followers relocated to the United States, settling in central Oregon near the town of Antelope. There, while Osho sank into a vow of silence and solitude, his followers built a commune around him that they called "Rajneeshpuram" or "Rancho Rajneesh." During this period, Osho acquired great wealth, demonstrated by his vast collection of women's watches and some fifty-five Rolls Royce vehicles.

The members of the commune and its governmental structure soon came into conflict with the nearby residents of Antelope, where reports of threats and poisonings by Rajneesh and his followers grew. Eventually, the U.S. government expelled Osho and his followers after charges of immigration fraud and tax evasion were brought against the organization. Osho sought asylum outside the United States. Twenty-one countries rejected him before he finally returned to India and resettled the commune in Pune in 1986/1987. Upon his return to India, Osho cast off the name "Rajneesh" and adopted his final name, Osho. From 1987 until 1990, the year his followers say he "left the body," Osho reconstituted the ashram in Pune. Following his death, the Osho Commune International, as the ashram is called, has flourished as a "meditation resort" and a place of spiritual education.

Oswald of Worcester

Christian monk, bishop, reformer

Oswald, Benedictine monk, bishop of Worcester, and archbishop of York, was a leader of the reform movement that revived monasticism and renewed the spiritual life of the church in England during the tenth century. Sts. Dunstan and Æthelwold were also prominent in this movement. Oswald's vita, written by Byrhtferth of Ramsey within ten years of his death, describes him as a model monk and bishop who was committed to the reformation of monastic houses in strict accordance with the Benedictine Rule and the ideal of clerical celibacy.

Born of Danish parents in about 925, Oswald was educated by his uncle Oda, the archbishop of Canterbury. After a brief tenure as head of a monastic house in Winchester, where he was dismayed by the lax discipline of the inhabitants, Oswald entered the monastery of Fleury, drawn, perhaps, by its extensive library and the relics of St. Benedict. Oswald was recalled to England by his uncle in 958; by 961, he had been elected bishop of Worcester. In 971, he also became archbishop of York, an office he held while still retaining the bishopric of Worcester.

By the tenth century, most English monastic houses had come under the control of laymen and housed secular priests rather than monks, a situation that King Edgar was determined to rectify with the aid of his reforming bishops. As bishop of Worcester, Oswald established several monastic foundations in his diocese, including Westbury-on-Trym, Winchcombe, and Ramsey, and effected the transformation of Worcester cathedral, where a monastic community eventually supplanted the secular canons.

Oswald was regarded as a saint from the time of his death in 992, and miracles were associated with his relics, including his chasuble and the water used to wash his body in preparation for burial. The translation of the relics to a shrine in Worcester cathedral in 1002 was marked by an increase in miracles. Although King John was especially devoted to St. Oswald and his successor, St. Wulfstan, his cult remained primarily local. He was venerated at Worcester cathedral, where the monks saw him as their special patron, and at Evesham, which boasted an arm-reliquary containing one of his bones. His cult retained a significant local following until the Reformation.

Otto of Bamberg

Christian bishop, missionary

For the modern scholar Stephen Jaeger (1985), Otto of Bamberg epitomized the virtues of the courtier-bishops, a group of churchmen who served the medieval German emperors in their attempt to create and administer a more civilized society. Otto's intellect, his modesty, his ability to befriend even his enemies, and his eloquence all paved his way within the intertwined circles of royal court and highest church office. As did other courtier-bishops, Otto used political means to achieve the ecclesiastical goal of a peaceful society through lawmaking, conflict resolution, and diplomacy.

After he finished his education in Germany, Otto served in the court of Wladislaw, duke of Poland. Chief among Otto's diplomatic missions was facilitating a marriage between Wladislaw and Judith, sister of Emperor Henry IV of Germany (r. 1056–1106). Otto was invited to the imperial court in 1090 and achieved the office of chancellor by 1101. The whole course of Otto's career fell during the so-called Investitures Contest, the rancorous struggle between emperor and pope over the right to appoint bishops. Here Otto took a determinedly moderate position, retaining the alliance (if not always the goodwill) of both emperor and pope. Otto's mediation between the two parties was instrumental in formulating the Concordat of Worms (1122) that brought an end to the dispute.

Although Otto's service as courtier-bishop was exemplary, his piety and pastoral activities in his own diocese of Bamberg and abroad made him a saint. He led a modest, even apostolic, life. He applied his administrative experience as chancellor to consolidate the holdings of his see, to finish building the cathedral, and to reform the cathedral school. Otto founded some twenty monasteries, turning the wealth of his office to spiritual use. He used his skills as a diplomat in a mission to convert Pomerania in 1124–1125 and again in 1128, consciously departing from the military methods of conversion so common in the Middle Ages. Otto instead sought to convert using the peaceful means of preaching, charity, education, and the example of his own holy life. Legend records many miracles during his mission, and even more at his tomb in the monastery of St. Michael in Bamberg following his death in 1139. Pope Clement III canonized Otto in 1189. His feast day is July 2 or September 30 in Germany and October 1 in Pomerania.

Oyá

Yoruba orisha

Oyá is the Yoruba goddess of the wind and storms and is associated with lightning, tornadoes, and the harmattan (wind). She is considered the source of the Niger River, also known as Odó Oyá (Oyá's river), and the orisha (deity) of the marketplace. In addition, Oyá has important relationships with other orishas, such as Ikú (death), Egún (deceased ancestors), and Araorún (spirits). She accompanies the soul to orún (heaven), and in Cuba, the Lucumi insist that Oyá's presence is indispensable in Egún rituals, as she accompanies the dead to the doors of the cemetery. Most of all, Oyá represents change, transformation, and renovation. She is a harbinger of destruction and death but ensures that human life perseveres by clearing the way for rebirth. Like many other orishas, Oyá is believed to have been a human heroine in the distant past. Some sources say that she was from the town of Irá, but in Cuba, the Lucumi associate her with Tapá (Nupé), the birthplace of her husband, Shangó.

Most olorishas (priests or priestesses) insist that Oyá is a very severe and ruthless deity. In fact, although Oyá is a champion of women's causes, she is the least motherly of the female orishas. One devotee refers to her as a "patron of feminine leadership" (Gleason 1987, 1). The Lucumi say that she prefers to dedicate her time to the battlefield and not waste it rearing children. Many olorishas fear Oyá for her relationship with death. This is highlighted by one source's affirmation that Oyá's "face is so terrible that none dare behold it, her wrath so devastating that it must be absolutely avoided" (Idowu 1994, 91). Like a menacing tornado, Oyá is very temperamental, and her wrath is devastating. Afefé (the wind) is one of her servants, and she commands it in whichever way she considers best.

Oyá is also a war deity, feared because of her skillfulness in battle and her fiery and bellicose disposition. Though she does not possess the sensual beauty of her cowife and rival Oshún, she appeals to Shangó by virtue of her incredible likeness to him. Oshún inspires him sexually, but Oyá brings out the unbridled essence of the warrior within him. As such, Shangó taught her how to ride a horse so she would lead his cavalry into war. Nature emulates Oyá's and Shangó's everlasting relationship: At the onset of a battle or storm, Oyá (lightning) will always precede Shangó (thunder). In fact, she works for Shangó when disbursing justice as he sends her to strike the home of the wicked with bolts of lightning. On the battleground, Oyá is defiant and indefatigable. She mounts Shangó's horse, puts on his trousers and the mariwó that she obtained from her first husband, Ogún, and turns into an indomitable Amazon who endures the most exhausting battle. As brawny as any man, in the battlefield Oyá can bear the harshest conditions and come out victorious.

Oyá's symbols are the machete and the iruké (switch). The first, Ogún's symbol, she acquired while she was married to the god of iron. He taught her how to fashion it from the iron in his forge and how to handle it in war. Egún gave her the iruké, with which she guides the soul to heaven. In possession, she uses either or both to cleanse the path of her devotees and strike out against evil and injustice.

(c. 290–c. 346)

Christian abbot

Pachomius, founder of cenobitic monasticism, was born into a non-Christian family in upper Egypt in about 290. He was about twenty years old when he was conscripted into the army of Constantine during the emperor's war against his rival Maxentius. Impressed with the kindness and humility of the Christians he encountered in Thebes while still in the army, Pachomius converted to Christianity upon his discharge. He determined to live the life of an ascetic monk and went to live as a hermit at Tabennisi on the Nile River in Upper Egypt under the direction of the anchorite Palemon.

For several years, the two hermits led lives of piety and devotion. Pachomius then experienced a vision prompting him to found a monastic community at Tabennisi. In the vision, it is said, an angel attired in the robes of a monk assured Pachomius that he would not lack for companions when he established his community. Pachomius built a cell, but at first his only other companion was his elder brother John; soon, many other men joined Pachomius and his brother. Initially, those new companions sought salvation through a commitment to the eremitical, as opposed to communal, life. Thus, Pachomius initially proposed only slight modifications to their solitary manner of living, such as a general agreement to common meals. Nonetheless, the number of those wishing to live according to the cenobitical rule Pachomius developed soon began to increase. The monastery at Tabennisi was continually enlarged until there was need for a second, which was established at Pabau, and a third, at Chenoboskion. By the time of his death in approximately 346, Pachomius had founded at least eight or nine monasteries for men, and two for women. His order lasted in the Eastern church until the eleventh century.

Pachomius designed his monasteries as a group of buildings surrounded by a wall. Each building, or house, would hold about forty monks, and each monastery would contain thirty to forty houses. Each house would be assigned a specific task, such as carpentry or farming, and all offices and spiritual exercises during the week would occur within each house. All monks met as a community on Sundays for mass.

The rule Pachomius devised would have a great influence on Basil the Great (330–379) and Benedict of Nursia (c. 480–c. 547), later founders of Eastern and Western monasticism. The Rule of Pachomius was based upon moderation in all observances: Each monk was free to proceed according to his strength and zeal. Thus, for example, although the rule encouraged monks to eat twice a day (except for fast days), each monk could determine for himself whether he wished to eat two full meals daily within the community, or subsist merely upon bread, salt, and water in the solitude of his cell. Pachomius's feast day is May 9.

Padmasambhava

(8th/9th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist master

Padmasambhava was an Indian Buddhist master credited with introducing tantric Buddhism to Tibet in the eighth and ninth centuries. According to Tibetan hagiographies, he was invited to Tibet by King Trisong de Tsen (740–798) to pacify demonic obstacle-makers preventing the establishment of Buddhism in his realm. Padmasambhava is known for his enlightened wisdom, supernatural abilities, and power to control gods and demons. He occupies a central role on the Tibetan religious scene, where he is portrayed as the founder of Samye, Tibet's first monastery, and the main force behind the official Tibetan adoption of tantric Buddhism. In later Tibetan tradition, Padmasambhava is venerated as "a second Buddha" and appropriated in meditation as the embodiment of the fruition of the tantric path.

Padmasambhava was born in the ancient country of Oddiyana (Swat Valley, Afghanistan). Accounts vary as to his mode of birth. Early hagiographies describe his birth from a lady of that country, but later spiritually revealed Tibetan descriptions credit him with miraculous birth from a lotus—hence his name Padmasambhava (Lotus-Born). Hagiographies describing his existence in India prior to his Tibetan sojourn credit Padmasambhava with a life span of many centuries during which he wandered the Indian subcontinent leading the life of a tantric practitioner (siddha). After pacifying demons in Tibet at the request of King Trisong de Tsen, he reportedly remained for a number of years in Tibet and continued as the driving force in propagating tantric Buddhism there. Although little historical data exist to verify these claims, the historicity of his visit to Tibet is no longer questioned.

Beginning in the eleventh century, the importance of Padmasambhava gradually increased as the followers of the Ancient School (rnying ma) revealed spiritual practices and hagiographies centering on him. Such revelations describe Padmasambhava concealing spiritual instructions (hidden in the mind of his disciples as well as physical locations) to be revealed in subsequent centuries. Such revelations, called "treasure literature" (gter ma), over time became a major literary genre in Tibet. The claims of the treasure teachings to originate with Padmasambhava periodically met with criticism from the members of skeptical communities in Tibet who questioned their veracity. However, in spite of such criticism, Padmasambhava and his legacy have remained of major significance to Tibetan Buddhist consciousness, where his contribution to the conversion of Tibet, as it is cast in his many hagiographies, continues to enjoy the universal respect and appreciation of all Tibetan Buddhist traditions.

Pandurangshastri Athavale-Dada

Hindu/syncretist teacher

Pandurangshastri Vajinath Athavale, popularly known as Dada (elder brother), is a teacher of swadhyaya (understanding self)—a strain of thought that strives to make people conscious of the sanctity of the self and the other in the realization of a commonality. Though he neither proselytizes nor cultivates any particular creedal constituency, he is perhaps the most influential visionary in postindependence India.

Pandurangshastri Athavale was born in Roha, a village in western India, on October 19, 1920. He went through rigorous nonformal education in many fields for eighteen years and educated himself at the Asiatic Society Library in Mumbai. Though Dada's roots in India's scholastic tradition is manifest, his critique of tradition and philosophical accommodations makes him willing to adopt elements of other traditions. His philosophy is based on total and absolute faith in the creator and God's presence in human beings and in all other created things in the universe. The focus of his teaching is that once the idea of an indwelling God is internalized, the level of self-esteem and dignity of the other is raised regardless of economic or social status. Swadhyaya is a process of social transformation through self-transformation.

Today, Swadhyaya has reached nearly 100,000 villages, towns, and cities, affecting the lives of nearly 20 million people. The religion does not have a structured organization; rather, it is called by its members the "Swadhyaya family." Dada has transformed the understanding of bhakti (devotion) into a reason-based, selfless offering of time and creative efficiency by swadhyayees, who engage in various experiments of purposive collective action as an expression of their love and gratitude to God. The experiments cover such diverse areas as farming, forestry, dairy farming, vocational training, social hygiene, education, environmental protection, disaster relief, and the like, cutting across traditional caste and regional barriers.

Dada's ecumenical approach has won him worldwide recognition and appreciation. Swadhyaya is a major fellowship not only in India but also among Indian expatriates on other continents. The United Nations Development Program (UNDP) has recently noted that Swadhyaya communities are indeed more developed economically than traditional Indian villages. Dada received the Ramon Magasaysay Award for Community Leadership in 1996, the Templeton Prize for Progress in Religion in 1997, and the second-highest Indian civil award, the Padma Vibhushan, in 1999.

Pantaleon

(d. early 4th cent. C.E.)

Christian physician, martyr

Legends recount that the Christian martyr Pantaleon (or Panteleimon), whose name means “all merciful” or “all compassionate,” was a physician at the court of Caesar Galerius at Nicomedia in the late third century. Although raised as a Christian by his devout mother, he succumbed to the temptations and excesses of the lavish court life and renounced his faith until he was shown the error of his ways by a Christian friend. His reconversion and renewed dedication to the Christian faith thereafter inspired him in great acts of charity to Christians and non-Christians alike. He gave away his possessions, treated the sick without accepting payment, and performed a number of miracles. During the persecution of Christians by the emperor Diocletian, Pantaleon was tortured in a number of grotesque manners (by burning, attack by wild beasts, and immersion in liquid lead, for example) and eventually was decapitated in perhaps 305. Milk, instead of blood, poured forth from his wounds, and the olive tree to which he had been tied suddenly bore fruit.

Pantaleon’s cult developed initially in the Byzantine Empire; in the sixth century, the emperor Justinian rebuilt a church in his honor in Nicomedia. Pantaleon became very popular in the West during the Middle Ages, and he is included among the Fourteen Holy Helpers. He is the patron saint of doctors and the medical profession generally. Pantaleon appears in art most often with the attributes of his profession, such as vials and ointments.

Relics of his dried blood are located at several shrines, including Madrid and Ravello, and are reported to liquefy on his feast day, which is July 27.

Parasceva

Orthodox saint(s)

There are three Orthodox saints named Parasceva who are often confused with one another: (1) Parasceva of either Iconium or Rome, from the second century, martyred by torture in a time of anti-Christian persecution, remembered on October 28; (2) Parasceva of Bulgaria, often called Parasceva of Trnovo or Parasceva of Serbia, a famous recluse dating from the late tenth to the early eleventh centuries, revered in Bulgaria, Romania, Serbia, and Russia on October 14 (whose remains are now in Jassy, Romania); (3) Parasceva of Polotsk, a Russian princess and nun who died in 1239, a less well-known saint often, though not conclusively, identified with Efrosinia of Polotsk. All three saints are known as Parasceva-Petka or Parasceva-Piatnitsa, but the latter name is more often associated with the second Parasceva.

The first Parasceva, often called Petka, was tortured repeatedly and finally beheaded, but it is unclear whether Parasceva of Iconium visited Rome or is a separate person from Parasceva of Rome. References to a single individual as well as two women can be found in Orthodox literature. A long vita for the second-century saint is included in the Great Menology of Makarii, Metropolitan of Moscow, on October 28. Parasceva of Trnovo was particularly popular in Russia as the patron of household tasks, spinning, and needlework, and of traders. Her association with trade made her cult popular in the Russian Hanseatic town of Novgorod. A vita for this saint was also included in the Great Menology of Makarii, but on October 14. She rejected marriage in order to live a life devoted to God. Her alternate name of Piatnitsa means “Friday” and originally referred to Good Friday, the day of Christ’s passion.

Pariacaca

Peruvian god-hero

Pariacaca was a pre-Hispanic divine hero known through the myths that were collected and written by Father Francisco de Avila in Huarochirí, Peru (1598). These myths were written down in sixteenth-century Quechua so priests would have the necessary information to fight against the so-called “Indian idolatries” that Christian fathers found in Peru. Therefore, they offer a unique account, in Indian language, of the pre-Hispanic world vision in the Americas.

Pariacaca seems to be a creator or an organizer of the world in difficult times. The myth gives information about ancient daily practices related to the sacred. It is set in an ancient time when men’s only occupation was war, and the most courageous and wealthy among them became chieftains (curacas). One day, on Condorcoto Mountain, Pariacaca and his brothers were “born” in the shape of five eggs. A poor man, Huatiacuri, actually Pariacaca’s son, witnessed this birth. At the same time, Tamtañamca, a man who faked being a powerful and wise god among his people, fell ill, and nobody was able to heal him. Huatiacuri came to the village of Tamtañamca and offered to heal him if Tamtañamca would allow him to marry his daughter. Tamtañamca accepted, and Huatiacuri revealed to the chieftain that his disease was due to the infidelity of his wife and his hypocrisy. Once healed, Tamtañamca gave his daughter to Huatiacuri.

However, another son-in-law of Tamtañamca, a wealthy warrior, defied Huatiacuri because he could not bear to become related to such a poor man. Huatiacuri had to go through several tests; Pariacaca, still in his egg shape, gave Huatiacuri specific advice on how to meet each challenge. Huatiacuri succeeded, and the wealthy warrior was turned into a deer. After this, Pariacaca and his brothers went out from the five eggs and became five falcons. The falcons became men, started to walk, then took the shape of rain and became a flood, destroying Tamtañamca’s village. After this, Pariacaca went back to the mountain and remained there.

Parshva

Jain tirthankara

According to Jain teachings, Parshva was the twenty-third of the twenty-four tirthankaras (ford-makers) of the current declining half-cycle of time. Although his dating is uncertain, he was almost certainly a historical figure who probably lived in Banaras in the ninth century B.C.E.

Jain hagiography traces Parshva’s history to an earlier birth as a brahmin named Marubhuti. Marubhuti’s disreputable and envious elder brother, Kamatha, seduced Marubhuti’s wife, and was exiled as punishment. When Marubhuti approached Kamatha to make amends, Kamatha killed him with a blow of a stone to his head. The story then follows Marubhuti through a series of successive rebirths in which he is pursued, harassed, and killed by the ever-enraged Kamatha, himself reborn in a variety of different lethal forms.

In his final birth, Marubhuti was conceived in the womb of Vama Devi, wife of King Ashvasena of Banaras. Having become a handsome and virtuous prince, Parshva, as he was then named, one day noticed a crowd passing by. Upon inquiry, he learned that they were on their way to pay obeisance to an ascetic—in fact his old foe, Kamatha—who was performing the five-fire penance (that is, surrounded by four fires and the blazing sun overhead). When Parshva went there, his special powers enabled him to see two snakes being burnt alive in the firewood. He remonstrated with the ascetic and ordered his attendants to rescue the dying snakes. In their next births, the snakes became the snake god Dharnendra and his consort Padmavati, who are Parshva’s attendant deities. Inspired by some pictures of the life of Nemi, Parshva gave away his wealth and became a homeless mendicant. His final encounter with Kamatha occurred when he was deep in meditation. Having failed to disturb him by other means, Kamatha created a great rainstorm and flood, but even when the water rose to Parshva’s nose, he did not cease his meditation. Then Dharnendra and Padmavati arrived on the scene, lifted him up, and sheltered him from the downpour with their hoods. Faced with this final defeat, Kamatha begged Parshva’s forgiveness.

Parshva achieved omniscience at a garden in Banaras. After thirty years of teaching, at the age of 100, he shed his body and attained liberation at Mount Sammeta (in what is now Jharkhand).

Pasenadi

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist king, follower of the Buddha

Pasenadi, an Indian king, was a contemporary of the Buddha in the fifth century B.C.E. He was the son of Mahakoshala and was educated at Takshashila. His father was so impressed with his qualities that he seems to have abdicated in Pasenadi's favor. As king, Pasenadi enjoyed the company of wise men. Quite early in the Buddha's ministry, Pasenadi became his follower and close friend, and his devotion to the Buddha lasted till his death. He is said to have guarded the reputation of the Buddha and the samgha (monastic community) very zealously. As a true Buddhist, he also extended his favors to other religious orders. It is said that his alms-halls were always kept open to everyone desiring food or drink.

Pasenadi once tried to seduce a married woman by ordering her husband out of the town. The king had a sleepless night and was advised by the brahmins to order an animal sacrifice, but he abandoned the idea on the advice of the Buddha. His devotion to the Buddha has formed the basis of many legends. The Chinese records say that when the Buddha went to Tavatisma, Pasenadi made an image of him in sandalwood so that he could honor him. He is credited with having built monasteries for the Buddha, Prajapati Gautami, and his teacher Bavari. He organized the celebrated almsgiving called Asadisadana (incomparable) and gave four priceless gifts to the Buddha: a white parasol, a couch, a stand, and a footstool. A Buddha is said to receive such gifts only once in his lifetime. Three Jatakas (Birth stories of the Buddha)—Aditta, Dasabrahmana, and Sivi—were preached in reference to Asadisadana.

Pasenadi died under tragic circumstances at the gates of Rajagriha, waiting for help from Ajatashatru against his son Vidudabha, who had captured the throne by deceit. Later, Ajatashatru performed the funeral rites over the king's body with great pomp. The "Kosala Samyutta" (Kosala chapter) of the Samyutta Nikaya (Connected discourses), consisting of twenty-five anecdotes, is devoted to him. The Anagatavamsa declared Pasenadi a bodhisattva (enlightened being) who would be the fourth Buddha.

(3rd cent. C.E.)

Hindu philosopher

Patanjali is the reputed author of the third-century Hindu text called the Yoga Sutra. Although little is known about

Patanjali himself (the name also refers to a famous Indian grammarian of the second century), the Yoga Sutra is unquestionably one of the most important texts in Indian philosophy and spirituality. The terse collection of aphorisms systematizes the theory and practice of yoga, a mental and bodily discipline with a history extending back hundreds of years before the Common Era. The term yoga (discipline) comes from the Sanskrit root yuj (unite) and is cognate to the English word "yoke." In this sense, yoga is the process by which one "unites" or "yokes" oneself to the divine.

The ethics, bodily postures, breathing practices, and meditation of classical yoga are all conducive of an integration or unification of spirit. However, the yoga school operates from a dualistic metaphysics based on the eternal principles of matter and spirit. Matter (or nature) is fundamentally inert and unconscious, though constantly evolving and, over vast cycles of time, devolving finally into a primordial etheric matrix. Spirit (or soul, and in this system there is an infinite number of souls), in a manner that is neither well explained nor persuasive, becomes trapped in the material matrix and is thereby implicated in physical bodies. The human entity is thus a "mind-body complex," fundamentally operating from the principle of consciousness, the soul or spirit.

But a problem emerges that demands not only the yogic program of "uniting" oneself to the divine but also "dis-uniting" oneself; that is, detaching oneself from all that is not one's truest self. And this includes both the mind and the body. Mind, according to this system, is material, inert, and unconscious, yet it "borrows," as it were, consciousness from the soul. The mind then generates egocentric conceptualizations to establish individual identity (for example, I am a man, I am a citizen, I am a professional, I am happy, sad, smart, ignorant, and so on). However, all identifications lead to suffering, owing to the fact of impermanence. So Patanjali, in words that echo the famous First Noble Truth of the Buddha, writes: "All is suffering for the sage."

Addressing the problem of suffering from the Hindu perspective, Patanjali posits that if everything is suffering precisely because of impermanence, then we should seek the one thing that is permanent, complete in itself, and peaceful: the divine self. The method for doing this is yoga, which, through a hyperintense program of concentration, clears the stream of mental fluctuations, allowing the adept to be transparent before the transcendent. Much as cloudy water clears and settles, so, through yoga, one's mind clears, allowing for a direct perception and a felt experience of the divine self, one's true nature.

Patrick

Christian bishop, missionary

Patrick of Ireland is one of the most beloved Christian saints of the English-speaking world. Or at least his legend is beloved; little is known about the historic figure who lies behind the legends. The few historic facts known beyond dispute about Patrick can be summed up briefly. Magonus Succatus Patricius, anglicized to Patrick, was born somewhere on the west coast of Britain in the early fifth century. When he was sixteen, Irish raiders captured him and took him to Ireland, where for six years he was enslaved, set to work herding flocks. As Patrick describes the situation himself in his short Confession, during that period he had a deep religious conversion, which culminated in what he viewed as a miraculous escape from captivity. He made his way to Gaul, where he received some formal religious training, and had another divine encounter, this time a command to return to Ireland and convert the population of the island. Patrick was consecrated as a missionary bishop somewhere in either Gaul or Britain, then returned to Ireland to work in the missionary field for the rest of his life. He enjoyed considerable success, apparently working for the most part in Ulster in the north.

It is a pious exaggeration, though, to suggest that Patrick “converted the Irish.” There were already Christian clerics in Ireland before he arrived there, and a substantial Christian population; moreover, Patrick’s own mission apparently never reached the southern part of the island. His work seems to have been barely tolerated by the established church hierarchy of Britain. Late in his career, Patrick was so bitter at criticism of his methods and lack of learning, and gossip about some undisclosed youthful sin he had committed, that he wrote his Confession to justify himself and save himself from being barred from exercise of his office. He does, however, stand out in the history of the early Middle Ages as a missionary who felt himself to be sent by God, rather than being dispatched by an ecclesiastical authority, and his bravery in going alone to a non-Christian country without even the protection of a sympathetic ruler at the beginning marks him out as singular in any age.

Patrick’s cult began to spread in the seventh century as his foundation at Armagh sought to bolster its own authority by emphasizing the importance of its founder. By about 670, his cult had reached Gaul along with Irish missionaries. A legendary Patrick was created, able to defeat druids in magical contests, so stubborn in his support of the Irish that he fasted for forty days until God granted them a series of great benefits for his sake, and able to resurrect ancient heroes and win them to Christianity. A still later legendary layer tells how Patrick expelled the snakes from Ireland (for geological reasons, Ireland has never had snakes; this legend probably began with an earlier heroic account of Patrick destroying a monster). By the early modern period, he had become a figure of practical benevolence, teaching the doctrine of the Trinity with the aid of a shamrock. Patrick’s feast day is celebrated on March 17.

Patriotism and Holy People

Especially in the past two centuries, many widely acknowledged holy people have played leadership roles in nationalist or patriotic movements, their status as religious leaders helping them win broad support to effect change, especially against European colonial powers. The phenomenon of the “holy patriot” is by no means new, however. Whenever the consciousness of a people is closely identified with their religious beliefs, the possibility exists for holy people to lead political movements of resistance and liberation. This is true not only of living saints; the memory and veneration of holy people of the past can also help rally nationalist sentiment. The cult of Juan Diego of Mexico (1474–1548), for example, provides comfort and encouragement to the indigenous population of the region.

The earliest well-attested nationalist religious revolt is the rebellion of the Jews against the Greek ruler Antiochus IV in the second century B.C.E. The process created clearly defined holy people—not the leaders of the revolt, but the martyrs who inspired it. The so-called “Maccabean martyrs,” seven brothers and their mother, all killed for refusing to betray their faith, are the earliest known case of martyrdom consciously employed to inspire a national movement. Martyrdom also helped to unify the Jews as a people in their unsuccessful wars of independence against the Romans. Rabbi Akiba may have supported Simeon b. Kochba’s rebellion in the early second century, and he certainly taught Torah in public after the rebellion, thus defying Roman edicts. His martyrdom for the cause of continuing the essence of Judaism has resonated over many centuries.

Also deserving of recognition as saints venerated especially for their patriotic qualities are those Christian missionaries who made the religion accessible in the native language of various regions and worked to create autonomous churches free of intrusive cultural influence. An important example of this sort is the Armenian Isaac the Great (c. 338–439), who created written Armenian and translated Christian works and the liturgy, in this way playing a vital role in maintaining Armenian independence. King Stephen of Hungary (c. 975–1038) gave his realm a national church along with its first national identity, resisting German influence while at the same time linking his people to a Europe-wide Christianity.

Other holy people have led movements against the encroachment of foreign religious influence. Two great figures of the thirteenth century exemplify this process: the Buddhist Nichiren (1222–1282) and the Hindu Ramanand (1299–1410?). Ramanand, part of a religious world reeling from the impact of the Muslim conquest of northern India, revived the bhakti (devotional) movement to focus Hindus on their own faith rather than leaving them susceptible to Islam. Nichiren's aspirations were even higher. He founded the Buddhist Nichiren school in Japan as part of a deeply felt desire to bring internal peace to Japan and make Japan the world center of authentic Buddhism. As part of his program, Nichiren was extreme in his criticism of all other Buddhist schools. He came to see himself as the savior of the state, the incarnation of two bodhisattvas (enlightened beings). His influence can still be felt in Japanese Buddhism today, and his example may also have inspired the work of Kitabake Chikafusa (1293–1354), the leading advocate of Shinto revival, who argued for the uniqueness of Japanese religions and advocated Shinto as superior to invading foreign religions.

Some of the greatest holy people of later medieval Christianity rose to greatness because they opposed military invasions of their land. Sergius of Radonezh (1314–1392) became a national symbol of Russian and Orthodox Christian unity because he drew the Russians together to fight the Mongols. He played a leading role in halting the invasion of 1380, a victory that established an independent Russia. His cult inspired the expulsion of the Mongols from conquered areas of Russia, and his tomb at Sergiev Posad near Moscow became a place of national pilgrimage; it is still the residence of the Russian Orthodox patriarch. More flamboyantly, the youthful Joan of Arc (1412–1431) believed herself specially called by God to save France from the English who were rapidly conquering it, and in her meteoric career she may have turned the tide for French reconquest of their country. Indeed, the clearly political execution of Joan by the English authorities as a relapsed heretic probably did more to rally people to the king of France than Joan had done during her life. Only a few years before that, Jan Hus of Bohemia (1372/1373–1415), one of the great forerunners of the Protestant Reformation, rallied his people not just in the cause of religious reform but in their resistance to the foreign domination of the Holy Roman emperor. In Hus's case, nationalist impulse was clearer after his death, when his name became a rallying cry, not just in the fifteenth century but in the twentieth.

The early modern period produced two very different sorts of nationalist holy people: the Protestant reformers of various European states, who created “national churches” through their break with Rome, and more purely political figures who created strongly self-conscious states. Notable in the European history of national identity is the towering figure of Martin Luther (1483–1546)—who translated the Bible into German, encouraged the power of princes against that of the Holy Roman emperor, and articulated a very German model of religious life. Similarly, the history of Switzerland has been shaped by John Calvin (1509–1564), Scotland by John Knox (c. 1514–1572), and England by such great reform leaders as Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556). On the other side of the world, notable patriotic saints included Guru Nanak (1469–1539), creator of the Sikh state in the Punjab, and the Japanese Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1536–1598), who reunified Japan after a century of war and is revered as a kami. A similarly patriotic veneration of holy people is strongly evident in modern Japan, where the great restoring emperor Meiji (1852–1912) and the thousands of kamikaze who sacrificed their lives for the state in World War II are also revered as particularly holy.

The rising tide of European colonialism from the sixteenth century on threatened to destroy indigenous religions, besides its other effects. An important early rising against colonialism was the Pueblo Revolt of the late seventeenth century, led by the charismatic holy man Popé (c. 1630–c. 1690). His effort to save his people from Spanish religion and control was the most successful Amerindian fight ever waged against the European intrusion, driving the Spaniards away for twelve years. A few decades later, the Lenape prophet Neolin incited Pontiac's Rebellion (1763–1764) as part of a spiritual renewal intended to resist British expansion in northeastern America. Neolin united thousands who were attracted by his visions into multitribal confederations. The eighteenth century also saw Kimpa Vita (Dona Beatriz) of Congo (d. 1706), who received a series of revelations intended to restore the kingdom in the face of foreign influence. She won an immense following with her regular mystical experiences (she was said to die each Friday, go to heaven to dine with God and plead the cause of the Africans, then rise again). Foreign missionaries, however, turned the king of Congo against Kimpa Vita, and she and her husband were both burned to death. Nyabingi (fl. 1750–1800), the princess of Ndorwa in present-day Rwanda, enjoyed posthumous success against foreign intrusion. After she was murdered by her foreign husband, her spirit became associated with resistance to foreign intrusion and dominance.

In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, strongly anti-colonial holy people appeared in much of the world, combining religious and nationalist ideology to end imperialism. In Africa, these charismatic leaders were members of several religions. Some, such as Muhammad Ahmad ibn el-Sayed, the mahdi (would-be forerunner of the apocalypse) of Sudan (1844–1885), were Muslim. El-Sayed declared jihad first against oppressive Turkish rule and then against the British—and succeeded for thirteen years in creating an Islamic state. Similarly, sufi leader Muhammad Abdullah Hassan (1856–1920) led Somali resistance to the British. Shaykh Ahmad Bamba (1850–1927) roused Senegal against French colonial power, despite being exiled several times. Celebrations of Bamba's return from exile are still held at his tomb, drawing some 500,000 people annually. Later in the twentieth century, Methodist bishop Abel Muzorewa (1925–) played a major role in the anticolonial movement of Zimbabwe and became the first prime minister of the free state he helped create.

Other notable Christian patriot-saints of Africa are John Chilembwe (1875–1915) of Malawi, Kipchomber arap Koilegen (d. 1916) of Kenya, and the West African James Johnson (c. 1836–1917). The indigenous Kikuyu leader Waiyaki wa Hinga (d. 1892) fought the British invaders of his land after they had broken their agreement with his people. A decade later, the Tanzanian prophet Kinjikitile (d. 1905) led the Maji Maji rebellion (1905–1907), preaching the message that the ancestors will return again and Africans must resist foreign exploitation. Although Kinjikitile himself was quickly arrested and hanged, his influence remained strong in East Africa. Important indigenous prophets also rose in West Africa. Alinesitoué Diatta (1920–1944) is one example; Joseph Ayo Babalola (1904–1959), who created a syncretized African form of Christianity, is another.

The modern Islamic world has produced many people widely regarded as martyrs to the ideal of an Islamic nation. Some of these, such as Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989), who forged Iran into a Muslim state, have been leaders. But to many Muslims, every suicide bomber is a martyr of the faith, striving to save his or her state from a cultural imperialism regarded as even more dangerous than the physical invasion of colonialism.

In Asia, especially the Fiji Islands, a surprising number of millenarian prophets reacted to the colonial occupation of their lands. The movements they created are called by the generic name “cargo cults” because several prophesied the miraculous coming of shiploads of Western goods that would be distributed to the people. The focus of their movements, though, were matters of leadership and authority. The Philippines have also been marked by messianic anti-imperialist leaders. A number of Filipino religious movements regard José Rial y Mercado (d. 1896) as a new messiah. After the Spaniards executed this intellectual, nationalist physician, who was not even particularly religious, in the Philippine revolution, he won acclaim as a national martyr and symbol of Filipino independence. It is India, however, where a holy man played the most astonishing role in liberating a state from European imperialists. Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948) picked up where the anticolonial Hindu Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950) left off when Ghose retired from political business after getting a taste of the British prison system in 1908. Gandhi crafted the most successful anticolonial program in the world, based on the Hindu principles of satyagraha (holding fast to truth) and ahimsa (non-injury), reaching the final accolade of martyrdom at the hands of one of his own coreligionists, who thought he was carrying fairness too far in his dealings with the Muslims of India.

The long defeat of the North American Indians at the hands of U.S. expansion also produced a series of holy people who even in defeat helped preserve their culture. In the early nineteenth century, several Creek prophets preached a militant anti-American, antiwhite rebellion. Handsome Lake of the Iroquois (1735–1815) taught that, rather than rebellion, the Iroquois needed to be responsible for their own spiritual and cultural well-being. The Shawnee prophet Tenskwatawa (1775–1836) similarly advocated a return to traditional lifestyles against white encroachment. A series of other movements throughout the nineteenth century tried to save the Amerindian heritage, most notably in the 1870s through the 1890s. Prophets such as Wovoka (c. 1858–1932) preached salvation to a world gone mad, teaching rituals that would restore contact to the ancestors—and eliminate the white people and their ways.

In a more ambiguous position are the other great nationalist holy people of North America—the black nationalists, who have preached black improvement and sometimes the creation of a state within the United States. One can include here the Muslim/syncretist prophet François Makandal (d. 1758), who led a major resistance movement in Haiti, bringing together escaped slaves against white rule and apparently attempting to create an independent black state in Haiti. In the nineteenth century, black Christian theologian Martin Delany (1812–1885) created a theology of racial destiny, including a call for American blacks to return to Africa and create their own state. The Jamaican Marcus Garvey (1887–1940) advocated rebuilding a black homeland in Africa to bring about a complete separation of blacks from whites; he posthumously inspired the Rastafarian movement. Even more radically, the creators of the Nation of Islam, W. D. Fard (c. 1891–?) and Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975), taught not only that blacks need to separate from whites, but that the white race had been an evil creation designed to oppress the blacks. Although none of these movements has indeed succeeded in creating an independent state or winning liberation, these leaders led many thousands of African Americans to develop a split identity as both Americans and members of a resisting nation within a nation.

Paul

Christian missionary, writer

Paul, the most significant figure in early Christianity after Jesus, was largely responsible for focusing the legacy of Jesus in such a way that Christianity penetrated the Roman world. According to the New Testament, he was born at Tarsus in Asia Minor (Acts 22:3) and inherited Roman citizenship (Acts 22:26–28). Paul claims that he was raised in a pious family and distinguished himself as a Jew and particularly as a member of the Pharisaic party (Phil. 3:5–6). His Jewish name was Saul, but as a Roman citizen he also bore the name Paul.

According to Acts, which offers three accounts of his conversion to Christianity (9:1–19; 22:3–21; 26:9–23), Paul regarded the early Christian movement a dangerous and heretical sect within Judaism and determined to stamp it out. On the road to Damascus, however, he had a mystical encounter with the risen Christ and became convinced of the truth of the Christian message.

After his conversion, Paul preached to the Jews of Damascus and then spent some years in seclusion (Acts 9). Beginning in about 45 C.E., he undertook three missionary journeys to Asia Minor and Greece (Acts 13–21), which resulted in the conversion of both Jews and Greco-Roman polytheists. He founded churches in major cities (Ephesus, Philippi, and Corinth, for example), confident that from these urban centers the gospel would penetrate to the countryside.

The question of non-Jewish converts sparked debate within the Jewish-Christian community. Many thought that non-Jews should be compelled to convert to Judaism before becoming Christians. Paul held the opposite view, believing that in Christ all could be included in the Covenant. At the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15), Paul’s position won the day, and he considered himself the apostle to the gentiles (Gal. 2:7–8).

At the conclusion of his third journey, Paul was arrested and tried on various charges, found innocent, and then, at his request, sent to Rome to have his case heard before the emperor. At this point in his life the New Testament account falls silent. Later Christian tradition holds that he also traveled to Spain and that eventually he was martyred in Rome, perhaps under Nero (r. 54–68).

The Italian artist Caravaggio (1573–1610) has captured the drama of Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus, depicting him stricken blind and fallen from his horse. (Scala/Art Resource, NY)

Thirteen letters in the New Testament are ascribed to Paul. Modern scholarship has cast doubt on the Pauline authorship of many of them, especially Ephesians, 1 and 2 Timothy, and Titus, but several others, such as Romans, 1 Corinthians, and Galatians, are unquestionably of Pauline authorship.

Paul's theology is complex and can only be touched upon here. He argued that all human beings, Jews and polytheists alike, "have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). Unable to save themselves, human beings have been saved by God, who sent his son to suffer and die in their place. Paul believed that by his resurrection Christ proved himself victorious over death, a victory that can be appropriated vicariously by human beings. All that is required is that human beings in faith accept what God has done in Christ. "A person is justified not by works of the law, but through faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal. 2:16). Once slaves to sin, human beings can experience radical freedom and transformation that leads to mystical union with Christ. He urged Christians to avoid conformity to the world and be transformed in Christ (Rom. 12:1–2), claiming: "I have been crucified with Christ, and it is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me" (Gal. 2:20).

Paul came to the conclusion that God was especially present in Jesus Christ, that Christ was somehow a preexistent being, the creator (Col. 1:16–17), the image of the invisible God (2 Cor. 4:4). But Christ was also human, more particularly ideally human. Christ was the second Adam, Adam as he should have been (1 Cor. 15:45–49). Paul believed that after his resurrection Jesus ascended to heaven to occupy a place at the right hand of God the Father (Phil. 2:5–11).

Paul considered himself a practicing Jew and struggled to reconcile Judaism with his faith in Christ. He noted that Abraham, the founder of the Jewish people, had lived hundreds of years before the Mosaic law was given, that Abraham believed God, and "the Lord reckoned it to him as righteousness" (Rom. 4:3). Paul therefore argued that it had always been God's procedure to grant salvation to those who believe (Gal. 3:6–9). This allowed him to write that "A person is not a Jew who is one outwardly, nor is true circumcision something external and physical. Rather, a person is a Jew who is one inwardly, and real circumcision is a matter of the heart" (Rom. 2:28–29).

The complexity of Paul's thought has led to furious debates and unfortunate schism throughout the history of Christianity. Yet his theology of radical freedom and transformation is central to the Christian message and the life of the church.

Paul of the Cross

Roman Catholic monk, preacher

Recognized not only for his extensive preaching but also for his desire to endure the harshest of monastic lifestyles, Paul Danei modeled his life on the example of the early Christian saints. He was born in 1694 at Ovada near Genoa. Brought up in a devout and noble family, Paul received his early education from a priest who kept a school for boys in Cremolino, Lombardy. He made great progress in his studies, spent much time in prayer, heard daily mass, and frequently received the sacraments.

Paul refused both a rich inheritance and an advantageous marriage and spent a year in the Venetian army defending the republic against the encroaching Turks, undoubtedly inspired by the ideals of crusading. After spending several more years in prayer and contemplation, he was finally ordained priest in Rome. In response to a vision, he and his brother John Baptiste founded a new congregation at Monte Argentario in 1727. The monastic rule, drawn up according to the plan made known to him in the vision, combined a severe penitential regime with intense devotion to the passion of Christ.

The first general chapter of the Passionist Congregation (as the group became known) was held at the Retreat of the Presentation on Monte Argentario on April 10, 1747. At this chapter, Paul, against his wishes, was unanimously elected first superior general, an office that he held until his death in 1775. After 1769, he remained in Rome at the Basilica of Sts. John and Paul, which Pope Clement XIV had given the Passionists on the death of John Baptiste. Paul also founded a convent of enclosed Passionist nuns at Corneto in 1771.

The Passionists preached, converted, and cared for the sick and dying. Their ministry was so successful that they were soon in demand all over Italy and began to creep into the rest of Europe. By 1747, three houses had been founded. But the Passionist Rule was so severe that many novices ended up departing, and the papacy insisted that some of the harshest features be mitigated.

Paul himself was renowned for his effective preaching, especially regarding the passion of Christ. Numerous miracles, mainly concerned with the conversion of hardened and hopeless sinners, attested to his sanctity, and he also claimed the gifts of prophecy and healing. Constant personal union with the cross and passion was the prominent feature of Paul's devotion. He became a model of virtue and discipline to his companions.

Much of Paul's written work is concerned with ascetical and mystical theology. He was especially interested in the reconciliation of Rome to England, an aim pursued forcefully in the nineteenth century by his disciples, particularly the Passionist Dominic Barberi, who received John Henry Newman into the Roman Catholic Church. Paul was canonized in 1867 and his body lies in the Basilica of Sts. John and Paul in Rome.

Paul the Hermit

(c. 235–c. 345 C.E.)

Christian hermit

Though a monastery purporting to have been founded by Paul of Thebes exists in the mountains of the Arabian Desert in east-central Egypt, some 30 kilometers southeast of a monastery founded by Antony, the only real evidence of this saint is found in Jerome's Life of Saint Paul of Thebes. This work, composed around 375, describes Paul as a wealthy orphan of Thebes (on the lower Nile) born in about 235 who escaped the persecutions of Decius (r. 249–251) and Valerian (r. 253–260). Menaced by a greedy brother-in-law, the fugitive fifteen-year-old discovered a hidden cell in the desert, where he spent the next ninety-eight years of his life. There he was sustained by a spring, a massive date palm, and—for the last sixty years—bread, delivered each day in half-loaves by an obliging crow. Paul's palm tree has given rise to the charming legend that it provided the rationale for the introit of the mass for a confessor saint: "Justus ut palma" (Psalm 92). He is presumed to have died after 345, and his feast day is celebrated January 15.

Jerome claims that Paul originated the monastic life and uses Antony himself and Antony's disciples Amathas and Macarius as witnesses. The entire narrative is subsumed, in fact, in Antony's realization that Paul's radical eremitism represents the perfect monasticism, and a series of scenes in which Antony is rightly humiliated for his worldliness. It may well be that Jerome had become critical of what he saw as a corruption of monasticism in Egypt, where monasteries were being erected close to population centers. Monks had begun to accept food donations, and Jerome may have felt that this compromised their original prayerful isolation.

Paul the Hermit makes a surprise cameo appearance in the anonymous Navigatio sancti Brendani (Voyage of Saint Brendan the Navigator, eighth century), though in that work the hermit has been a disciple of Patrick and now subsists on nothing. Although shards of Jerome's Latin remain, the author seems consciously to reverse Jerome's message: Brendan complains that his life is nothing like the hermit's, but Paul contradicts him, pronouncing Brendan's particular care of his monastic familia to be the more blessed calling. It almost seems as if the author of the Navigatio were attempting to champion a native Irish community of monks over the eremitic ideal.

Paula

Christian pilgrim, patron

Paula, born in 347, was a Christian holy widow, a pilgrim, a patroness, and a student of Jerome, whose writings are the primary source about Paula and her life. Paula was married to a polytheist, but she raised all five of their children as Christians. Upon the death of her husband, she adopted an ascetic life and Jerome became her spiritual adviser. Two of her daughters, Blesilla and Eustochium, joined her in the pursuit of monastic life. Blesilla died suddenly in 384, and some in Rome blamed her death on the austere life that Jerome had convinced her to lead. Jerome was forced to leave Rome during the scandal, but a few months later, Paula and her daughter Eustochium decided to follow Jerome on a journey to the East. Paula faced much opposition to this decision, primarily from her surviving family members. Her young son, Toxotius, and remaining daughters, Paulina and Rufina, tried in vain to convince her to stay.

Paula and Eustochium's voyage centered around visiting monks and monastic centers. Before arriving in Palestine they went to Egypt to visit monks in Nitria. By 386, they had settled in Bethlehem, where Paula established four monasteries and a large guesthouse catering to the needs of travelers. Paula viewed herself as a permanent sojourner, primarily concerned with visiting and meeting holy people and offering them gifts. The exchange of money, through donations to the monks, was a physical manifestation of the connection between Paula's spiritual experience and those of the monks.

Paula died in Bethlehem in 404, and monks from all over the region attended her funeral. Her legacy continued with her daughter Eustochium, who remained in Bethlehem to run the monastery built by her mother. Even Paula's son Toxotius eventually permitted his own daughter, Paula the younger, to travel to Bethlehem to be raised in a monastic life by her aunt Eustochium.

Paulinus of Nola

Christian bishop, poet

Born into a patrician Roman family at Bordeaux, Gaul, in about 354, Pontius Meropius Anicius Paulinus was the son of the praetorian prefect of Gaul. His aristocratic family was wealthy, and his father provided an exceptional education for him, after which he practiced law. Paulinus was appointed Roman consul in 379, and in 380–381 he served as consular governor of Campania.

During his tenure, the first stirrings of piety began to animate the young Roman lawyer and writer. Nola, Campania, was the site of the tomb of the third-century martyr Felix, and Paulinus observed the steady stream of pilgrims who claimed to have been healed at the saint's tomb, which aroused more than curiosity in his mind. Paulinus was also inspired by the religious revival pervasive throughout southern Gaul, and by the passionate spirituality of such luminaries as Martin of Tours and Ambrose, bishop of Milan. He soon married Therasia, a devoutly Christian Spanish noblewoman, and thereupon found himself more and more unwilling to abandon his emerging spirituality. There is some suggestion that the unexpected death of an infant son sent Paulinus into a period of spiritual discernment, for in 393 he was baptized a Christian by Bishop Delphinus of Bordeaux. Shortly thereafter, he was ordained. Paulinus and Therasia (having taken vows of celibacy) thereupon gave all their worldly possessions to the poor and determined to live lives of Christian piety, devotional asceticism, and true austerity.

By 395, they were helping to finance building projects for the church, such as the basilicas at Nola and Fondi, and a hospital for the destitute near the tomb of St. Felix. In 409/410, Paulinus was consecrated bishop of Nola. For the next two decades, he performed his ecclesiastical and ministerial obligations with charity, grace, and dignity. At his death in 431, he was interred in the basilica at Nola. In the late tenth century, Emperor Otto III disinterred and moved the body of Paulinus to Rome; however, in 1908, Pius X returned Paulinus to his beloved Nola.

Apart from his achievement as a prelate, Paulinus is perhaps best known for his poetry, which, along with that of his Spanish contemporary Prudentius, ushered the genre of Christian lyric poetry into the West. Paulinus's poetry is not full of theological complexities; rather, he took what he had learned from the rhetorician Ausonius about stylistic details and gracefulness of form and adapted those characteristics to matters of the Christian faith. Paulinus composed poems not in honor of warriors or civic leaders but commemorating saints and martyrs or exploring the meaning and emotion of holy festivals. Paulinus has as well the distinction of having composed the first Christian elegy ("Carmen XXXI"), a lament at the death of the youth Celsus. The Christian elegy differed from earlier elegies in that the sorrow for the departed was evenly tempered with a belief in everlasting life.

Paulinus of Nola combined the charming gifts of a poetic heart with the authentic piety of a faithful spirit. In the unfolding of his life and in the composition of his stylized and passionately devout writings, Paulinus offers to the modern world a symbol for the complex era that witnessed the reluctant dying away of one civilization and the robust dawning of a new world. His feast day is June 22.

Peace Pilgrim*(1908–1981 C.E.)Christian peace activist, folk hero*

Peace Pilgrim was a twentieth-century peace activist, a folk hero known for walking across America and speaking out for peace on college campuses and in churches in many states. Her original name is unknown, and her spirituality was nondenominational (though she was insistent that Christians live up to their own teachings). She became a familiar presence, almost like a family member, to many people who welcomed her arrival in their towns. Through walking long distances and speaking her spiritual message of peace, and through the charisma of her friendly personality, Peace Pilgrim called attention to serious problems and possible solutions in situations of human conflict.

Peace Pilgrim was born to a poor family on a small farm in an eastern state in 1908. Her family was not religious, which in her Yankee individualist spiritual outlook meant (as she said) “less to undo later.” She valued the woods and creek of her childhood and appreciated inspiration from within. While still young, repeating the question, “What is God?” she heard a still small voice inside and realized that “there is a creative force beyond us . . . a sustaining power” that gives trees life and planets order, and causes change; she recognized it as love, goodness, and all-pervading spirit. She took from this a new understanding, “You are within God, God is within you” (Peace Pilgrim 1992, 2). As a young woman, she chose freedom from smoking and drinking. Money did not seem important to her. She came to believe that “if you want to make peace, you must be peaceful” (ibid., 3).

A turning point in Peace Pilgrim’s life came during an all-night vigil in the woods when she walked until she felt ready to dedicate her life to God and service. Aware of the suffering in the world, she prayed, “Please use me” (ibid., 7), and experienced a state of peace. Blessed with good health, she wanted to work for peace on all levels—in the world, in groups, and for inner peace. She said that at that time she experienced a conversion from a self-centered existence to a life devoted to inner peace. She began to live with the sole purpose of giving what she could to the world.

According to Peace Pilgrim, the path to peace involves four steps. First, a person who is seeking peace must make preparations, including developing right attitudes toward life and solving problems in accord with the highest light. Second, he or she must bring his or her life into harmony with the laws of the universe: “Evil can only be overcome by good” (ibid., 10). Third, the seeker of peace develops the insight that, like every other individual, he or she has a special place in the world and work to accomplish, and the understanding that guidance will come. Fourth, the individual must simplify his or her life by following a series of purifications that enable the individual to reach freedom, “relinquishments” of problematic desires and compulsions. Peace Pilgrim followed various practices to overcome the fear, anger, and worry that block inner peace. Like Mahatma Gandhi, she developed her own dietary philosophy, choosing to be a vegetarian.

In 1953, Peace Pilgrim vowed to be a wanderer until humanity learned the way of peace. She envisioned a map of the United States with cities marked and a zigzag line across it. She explained, “A pilgrim is a wanderer with purpose. . . . In the middle ages pilgrims went out as the disciples were sent out—without money, without food, without adequate clothing—and I know that tradition. I have no money. I do not accept any money on my pilgrimage. I belong to no organization. . . . There is nothing to tie me down. . . . I own only what I wear and carry. . . . I am as free as a bird soaring in the sky. . . . I walk until given shelter, fast until given food. . . . This is my way of peace—overcome evil with good and falsehood with truth, and hatred with love” (ibid., 25–26). By 1964, Peace Pilgrim had walked 25,000 miles. After that she continued to walk, but speaking became more of a priority. She made seven cross-country trips in all. In 1976, she took her message to Alaska and Hawaii. She also walked 1,000 miles in Canada, and visited Mexico as well.

Sensing that her own harmony was the source of her usefulness, she taught that when people are in harmony with the “Life Pattern,” they can find sustenance in the source of universal energy. Her walks gave her the opportunity to talk with fellow Americans. She considered walking a prayer for peace, an embodiment of the heart of the world, which she felt was pleading for peace. This gentle woman with a radiant smile, grandmotherly white hair, and a blue tunic died in 1981 near Knox, Indiana. People inspired by her example keep her memory alive through publication of her teachings.

Pemalingpa

Buddhist terton

Tertons, or revealers of esoteric texts and holy objects (terma), are considered to be reincarnations of disciples of Padmasambhava, an Indian Buddhist master of the eighth and ninth centuries. Padmasambhava, it is said, entrusted his disciples with the discovery and propagation of his teachings in future generations, when the Buddha's doctrine would be in decline. Thus Padmasambhava's teachings were encoded in symbolic scripts and hidden—typically inside of caves, temple walls, or under water—but also in the subconscious minds of his disciples, where the teachings reside until their memory awakens in a future life. Pemalingpa (1450–1521), a native of the south Himalayan kingdom of Bhutan, was one of Tibetan Buddhism's greatest tertons. Considered the reincarnation of Longchenpa (1308–1363), he was a prolific discoverer of esoteric texts and other sacred objects, such as statues and medicines. Though other Buddhists initially doubted his authenticity, Pemalingpa was later revered by the greatest Tibetan masters of his age, including the fifth dalai lama (Losang Gyatso, 1617–1682).

Pemalingpa's life and writings are remarkable, all the more so for his humble origins and lack of formal education. Born into a family of blacksmiths, Pemalingpa was an unruly youth but an excellent craftsman. In his twenties, he began to have visions and dreams of Padmasambhava and received prophecies of hidden treasures that were his to reveal. Following one of these, he went with some friends to the Mebartso (Burning Lake) gorge. Pemalingpa plunged naked under the cold water and swam into a large cave. There, the protectress of the doctrine, Ekajati, reportedly appeared to Pemalingpa as a cyclops-woman who presented him with a wooden casket. Much to the amazement of his friends, Pemalingpa suddenly appeared next to them, standing above the sheer walls of the gorge. Inside the casket were scrolls of yellow paper containing symbolic script and a decipherment key. Eventually Pemalingpa was able to decode the script and dictate the text to a scribe. Many of his later discoveries were also made in unusual ways: for example, from the side of a high, inaccessible cliff, beneath a stone marked by a naturally occurring swastika.

After his first discovery, the local governor threatened Pemalingpa with punishment unless he could demonstrate some proof of authenticity. Pemalingpa returned to the Mebartso gorge with the governor and a large crowd of people. Shouting "may I perish if I am not genuine," he jumped into the swiftly moving water holding a burning lamp. Then, as before, Pemalingpa emerged miraculously, with a casket, a statue, and the still-burning lamp.

After this incident, Pemalingpa's reputation and career flourished. No less august a personage than Chodrak Gyatso (1454–1506), the seventh Karmapa, requested Pemalingpa's teachings and became his disciple. Today Pemalingpa's treasures are still current among hundreds of thousands of Tibetan Buddhists.

Perpetua and Felicity

(c. 181–203 C.E.)

Christian martyrs

The Christian martyrs Perpetua and Felicity are most remarkable for having their passion recorded in the personal account of Perpetua herself. Another introduces the core narrative and appends a description of their deaths in 203, but Perpetua's calm, straightforward presentation makes it one of the truly moving testimonies to courage and faith.

Perpetua, born around 181, was a young mother in the city of Carthage, perhaps widowed, who had been trained in the liberal arts and was especially loved by her father. At the time of her arrest, she was nursing a son; she had apparently defied her family in seeking to become a Christian and had been arrested in the sporadic persecutions of the early Roman Empire. With her were a number of Christians, including her instructor, Saturus, and two fellow catechumens—initiates, not yet baptized—one of whom was a pregnant slave named Felicity.

Perpetua suffered from her father's reproaches, his begging, and finally his own humiliation as the Roman procurator had him beaten for his daughter's stubbornness. Perpetua had been able to give her son to her family, and, to her mind by God's will, the child survived and she herself did not become feverish from his sudden weaning. In time, Felicity safely gave birth to her child, and she then was able to give the baby to her sister.

While in prison, Perpetua experienced three dreams that enormously comforted her fellow condemned. In the first, Saturus climbs a ladder to heaven and beckons for Perpetua to follow, but attached to the sides of the ladder are weapons, blades, and hooks that Perpetua must climb through. And to even begin the climb, she must step on the head of a huge serpent, which she does, boldly, in the name of Christ. At the top, she is greeted by a distinguished man, milking sheep, who gives her sweet curd. In the second dream, she sees her younger brother, Dinocrates, who died without baptism, across a gulf. He emerges from darkness, hot and thirsty, filthily dressed, and disfigured with the same ulcers on his face that had killed him. There is a fountain above him, but he cannot reach the water. Perpetua awoke and began to pray for her brother and then dreamed of him clean, beautifully clothed, drinking from the font, and then running off to play. The third dream is the most striking. In it, Perpetua finds herself transformed into a male wrestler. She successfully defeats a terrifying Egyptian for the prize, which is a bough with golden apples, and entrance into the Gate of Life.

Perpetua and Felicity and the others were brought out into the amphitheater, where they were ridiculed and mauled by wild animals before their throats were cut.

Perpetua's narrative proved to be enormously popular, in part because it demonstrates a human capacity to overcome concentrated terror—the apparatus of the Roman Empire, senseless evil, and grief. Perpetua's dreams represent not only achievements of spirituality, but more than that, a victory of sanity over evil. The feast day for Perpetua and Felicity is March 7.

Peter

(d. c. 64 C.E.)

Christian follower of Jesus, martyr

Peter, a leader of the apostles, was the brother of Andrew and a native of Bethsaida. He was a married man and a fisherman by profession on Lake Genesareth near the Sea of Galilee. Andrew introduced him to Jesus, who then renamed him Kephias, Aramaic for “rock”; the Greek equivalent translates into “Peter” in English. Peter is especially known for his three-time denial of Christ just before the crucifixion, his return to faith after the resurrection, and his leadership in the early church. He died as a martyr, according to tradition hung upside down on a cross.

After Peter acknowledged Jesus as “the Christ, the Son of the living God” (Matt. 16:16), Jesus stated that Peter would be the rock on which his church would be built and conferred upon him “the keys of the kingdom of heaven: Whatever you bind on earth will be considered bound in heaven” (Matt. 16:18). The power of “binding and loosing” would also be extended to the other apostles. On the basis of these statements, and on Peter as the first pope, Roman Catholics have maintained the primacy of the papacy.

Peter was present when Jesus performed the first miracle at Cana and during many other miracles, such as when Jesus cured Peter's mother-in-law at Capernaum. Peter was also present with James and John at the transfiguration of Jesus (Matt. 17:1–13; Mark 9:1–13). He played a prominent role at the Last Supper, where Jesus predicted his denial (Matt. 26:31–35 and parallels). Peter was among the first to see the risen Christ (after Mary Magdalene and other women). In the Gospel of John, Jesus reinstates Peter (because of his denial) and reiterates Peter's responsibilities to feed the sheep of Christ's flock (John 21:15–19). After the Ascension, Peter designated Judas's successor, preached at Pentecost, worked miracles, admitted gentiles into the church (with Cornelius, Acts 10), converted many with his preaching, and took a leading role at Jerusalem in the council.

The New Testament provides substantial information about Peter; however, his imprisonment in the year 43 by Herod Agrippa and his escape through divine intervention (Acts 12:5–19) is the last mention of him in the New Testament. Early tradition traces Peter to Rome and his subsequent martyrdom under Emperor Nero in 64. Peter was crucified, head downward at his own request, according to Origen, writing more than a century later. Peter's martyrdom by Nero is not questioned; however, his death in Rome remains suspect even though early Christian authors such as Irenaeus, Clement of Rome, and Ignatius of Antioch place him in that city. What also lends credibility to Rome as his place of death, however, is that no city other than Rome ever made the same claim. Catholic tradition further implies that Peter was Rome's first bishop and instituted episcopal succession. As to his burial in St. Peter's Basilica, his tomb below the high altar is most likely authentic, though recent excavations do not prove conclusively that the relics belong to Peter. Most agree today that Peter's relics were originally buried on the Vatican Hill but were moved afterward, allegedly to the catacombs in 258.

Peter's cult spread early and rapidly. He was a universal saint, the heavenly doorkeeper, and patron of the papacy and the church. Many English monasteries were dedicated to him, including Canterbury, Lindisfarne, Malmesbury, and Westminster; cathedral dedications include York and Worcester.

Peter is traditionally attributed authorship of two epistles in the New Testament. No valid reason exists to question Peter's authorship of the first New Testament epistle bearing his name. The book of 2 Peter, however, was likely written much later than Peter's death. Writings that recognize the influence of Peter include the Gospel of Mark, which is generally accepted as representative of Peter's teachings. The Preaching of St. Peter, the Gospel of St. Peter, and the Apocalypse of St. Peter date to the second century and later. Popular but also apocryphal is the Acts of Peter, which tells of his flight from persecution in Rome. In this account, Peter meets Jesus on the road and asks, "Lord, where are you going?" Jesus answers, "I am coming to be crucified again," whereupon Peter returns to Rome and goes through with his martyrdom. Although apocryphal, the stories illustrate the immense significance of Peter in the early church.

In art, St. Peter is often portrayed as square-faced with a curly beard and a tonsured head. He is symbolized by two crossed keys. Artistic representations also show him with fish or a ship, or, in memory of his denial of Jesus, a cock. His portrayal is varied but constant: as a bishop or a pope, or dressed in a toga, or wearing a tiara or miter, or crucified upside down. He was a popular subject in England during the Middle Ages and appears in stained-glass windows, as statuary, in screen paintings, and on frescoes (for example, those at the Carmine church at Florence painted by Masaccio in the early fifteenth century). Peter's life experiences in the gospels and the Acts of the Apostles provide ample artistic subject matter. His feast day is June 29.

Peter II of Tarentaise

Christian bishop, diplomat, reformer

This Peter of Tarentaise should not be confused with an earlier Peter, archbishop of Tarentaise from 1126 to 1140. A third Peter of Tarentaise became Pope Innocent V in 1276.

Peter II of Tarentaise, born in 1102, was archbishop of Tarentaise from 1140 or 1141 until his death in 1174. He was a member of the Cistercian order, new at the time, which emphasized contemplation, simplicity of life, and withdrawal from the upheavals of the secular world. In an ironic twist shared with other members of his order, Peter was drawn out of the monastery into ecclesiastical administration. Cistercian monastic virtues informed his policies as archbishop, made him an effective mediator in the political upheavals of his time, and inspired others to work for reform of the church.

Peter first entered the monastery of Bonnevaux, and in 1132 he became the superior of a new house at Tamié. There, he exhibited the powerful combination of administrative genius and charitable impulses that would mark his later career as archbishop. He built a hospice, installed an innovative irrigation system to increase the yield of the abbey's lands, and established a system of storehouses that fed not only his monks but also people in the surrounding countryside.

After he was elected archbishop of Tarentaise, Peter undertook his new duties with characteristic administrative effectiveness, reorganizing the cathedral and parish clergy, repairing and building churches, and reclaiming church lands from the local nobility. He established a hospice at the Little Saint Bernard Pass between Switzerland and Italy, and he devised a scheme for distributing food, the "May Bread," to feed people whose stores ran out before the next harvest. This practice continued in France down to the time of the Revolution.

Peter's rare blend of holiness and practicality made him a prized arbiter in many of the most intractable political disputes of his day, where he always worked for the peace and unity of Christendom. Peter's reputed ability to work miracles verified for his contemporaries the spiritual goals of his arbitrations. Petitions for Peter's canonization began within days of his death in 1174. These came not only from his fellow Cistercians but also from the clergy of his diocese and the king of France. Such a broad constituency testifies to his evident holiness. Peter's sanctity is also evident in his mentoring of other holy men, especially St. Hugh of Lincoln and St. Anthelme of Belley. Peter was canonized in 1191. His feast day is May 8.

Peter Damian

Christian abbot, reformer, cardinal

An ardent supporter of the papacy, Peter Damian was deeply involved in the eleventh-century movement to reform Western European Christianity, campaigning against simony (the practice of buying and selling church offices) and in favor of a celibate clergy. His feast day is February 21.

Peter was born in Ravenna in 1007. He studied the liberal arts in Faenza and Parma and began a career as a teacher of rhetoric in Ravenna. In 1035/1036 he left Ravenna and entered the eremitical monastic community at Fonte Avellana. Around the same time he was also ordained a priest. In the early 1140s, he traveled throughout Italy, but he returned to Fonte Avellana by 1143, when he was elected prior of that community. As prior, Peter expanded the monastery, drew up a set of constitutions for the brothers, and reformed several monastic communities associated with Fonte Avellana.

In the mid-1140s, Peter became involved with the cause of ecclesiastical reform. As a reformer, he was an early proponent of clerical poverty and an advocate of clerical celibacy. He held a moderate position on simony, arguing that while simoniacs should be punished, the sacraments they performed were valid. He took part in synods held by Popes Clement II and Leo IX, and he corresponded with Emperor Henry III. With the support of Hildebrand (later Pope Gregory VII), Peter was made cardinal bishop of Ostia around 1057. In 1059, he was sent to Milan as papal legate to help settle disputes in that city over simoniacal and married clergy. He proved an able mediator and was also able to promote the primacy of Rome in the religious affairs of Milan. In 1063, Pope Alexander II sent Peter to Cluny to extend papal patronage to that monastery. In 1066–1067, Peter undertook a mission to Florence, and in 1071, he was sent as a legate to Ravenna. He died in 1072 on the return journey to Rome.

During his lifetime, Peter was renowned for his powerful preaching and writing. Many of his writings survive, including sermons, poems, hymns, several saints' lives, a collection of letters, and a number of theological and ascetic treatises. Among his most important works are De divina omnipotentia (On divine omnipotence); the Liber gratissimus (The most gratuitous book), a discussion of simony; and the Liber Gomorrhianus (Book of Gomorrah), a condemnation of homosexuality.

Pharaohs of Egypt

The pharaoh, as the ultimate head of all aspects of the religion and state of ancient Egypt, was regarded as embodying both divine and human elements. While exercising the duties of the office of pharaoh, he was considered to be divine. He also had important roles to perform as a human, serving as the ultimate priest of Egypt and maintaining the cults of the gods. The pharaoh was portrayed in titulary and iconography both as a god and also as the son of a god. (This could be a literal reference—royal conception stories detail the pharaoh's birth as resulting from a god impregnating the pharaoh's mother.) Upon his death, the pharaoh was seen as wholly divine.

According to Egyptian legend, the state of Egypt was always ruled over by a single king. In the earliest times, according to myth, this king was one of the gods of the Egyptian pantheon. In different legends, Re and Osiris are said to have ruled over Egypt. One of the more prominent Egyptian legends, the tale of Horus and Seth, details the struggle between two gods over the kingship. Seth, the brother of Osiris, coveted his brother's position as king and schemed to have it for himself. The matter was settled with kingship being granted to Horus, the son of Osiris. The outcome of the contentions explained the hereditary nature of Egyptian kingship, with the office passing from father to son.

As a god, the king was recognized as a divine being himself (especially true after death) but also had strong associations with specific gods. One of the strongest divine associations that the pharaoh had was his association with the sun god, in particular Re. As early as Dynasty IV (2575–2465 B.C.E.), the titulary of the pharaoh reflects that he was considered to be the son of Re. The king was also considered to be an incarnation of the falcon-headed god Horus, the son of Osiris and Isis. The goddess Ma'at and the king had a unique relationship. Ma'at represented order and stability; while the king was never portrayed as Ma'at, offering to her and keeping her satisfied was a vital component of Egyptian kingship.

Naturally the extensive duties for which the Egyptian pharaoh was responsible would have stretched him beyond what was possible physically. His religious, political, and military responsibilities were all-inclusive; as would be expected, much of the actual burden of maintaining the state fell to his officials. Priests maintained the day-to-day cults, bureaucrats oversaw the administration, and the pharaoh was always depicted as having military success.

Egyptian kingship was not seen as completely flawless but at times as a more human institution. During the Middle Kingdom (2040–1782 B.C.E.), the Egyptian state had just recovered from the First Intermediate Period, wherein the Egyptian state had fragmented beyond the control of a single ruler. Subsequently, art and literature portrays the Middle Kingdom pharaoh as more human. In art historically, Middle Kingdom pharaohs are shown with a very characteristic tired look: Heavy bags under their eyes and drooping cheeks contribute to a very fallible look. One particular literary legend alludes to the pharaoh (perhaps Pepi II) having illicit, after-hours relations with one of his male generals.

The New Kingdom is the period during which the ideology of the pharaoh became its most productive and malleable. The most graphic portrayals of the divine birth date from this period. Pharaohs such as Hatshepsut (r. 1473–1458 B.C.E.) depicted themselves arrayed like the sun god. One interesting, albeit anomalous, situation is found during the reign of Amenhotep III (r. 1390–1352 B.C.E.). From depictions in his mortuary temple, it seems that Amenhotep III was actually considered to be completely deified while still alive. Equally anomalous, it was his son Amenhotep IV (r. 1352–1336 B.C.E.) who later changed his name to Akhenaten and briefly revolutionized Egyptian religion, focusing it on the cult of the god Aten and setting himself up as the exclusive intermediary who controlled all worship of the Aten. Some pharaohs, such as Ramses II (r. 1279–1213 B.C.E.), would stress their appointment as pharaoh rather than their divine conception to add credence to their claim to the throne and disguise their military (rather than royal) lineage.

Egyptian funerary books such as the Pyramid Texts detail what the pharaoh expected to happen after death and provided the pharaoh with in-depth directions. After a lengthy journey, the pharaoh would become a star in the sky and take his place as a divinity. On earth, the tomb of the pharaoh doubled as a cult center for his extended worship. Priests maintained the cult of the dead pharaoh as they would the cult of a god, through daily rituals. It is possible that the Pyramid Texts, recorded inside the pyramids of pharaohs of the Old Kingdom (2686–2181 B.C.E.), may have been used in part as ritual incantations during the worship of the deceased pharaoh.

After the pharaoh had successfully completed the journey to the afterworld and was among the gods, the pharaoh could be worshipped among the pantheon of traditional Egyptian gods. The extent of the worship of these deceased god-pharaohs varied greatly. Some pharaohs, such as Snefru (r. 2613–2589 B.C.E.) of Dynasty III, became important local deities (in this instance, a mining god in the Sinai). Other pharaohs were given a more public role. For example, Amenhotep I (r. 1525–1504 B.C.E.) was worshipped as the patron deity of the town of Deir el-Medina, where extensive records preserve evidence of his worship. He was particularly noted for his oracular abilities and could be consulted by townspeople to give answers similar to legal verdicts. More unusually, mortal nonpharaonic individuals were occasionally deified after their death. Perhaps the best known of these is Imhotep (twenty-seventh century B.C.E.), who was credited as the architect of Djoser's step pyramid at Saqqara (the first pyramid). Imhotep was noted for his scribal and medical abilities and was later associated with the Greek god Asklepios.

The term “pharaoh” derives from the Egyptian phrase pr a'a, and literally means “great house.” In early Egyptian history, it was used exclusively to refer to the palace where the king lived. By the New Kingdom (1570–1070 B.C.E.), it became synonymous with not just the house but also the person of the king. The Egyptians were also careful to use different words to signify the person of the pharaoh versus the office of the pharaoh. This distinction was noticeable in the standard titulary assigned to the king: Each pharaoh had five names, only one of which (the “son of Re” name, or the nomen) was received at birth. The other names were the Horus name, which was received upon coronation; the Two Ladies name, after the two goddesses Wadjet and Nekhbet; the Horus of Gold name; and the “King of Upper and Lower Egypt” name (nsw bjty in Egyptian, or the praenomen). The praenomen was the name used to refer to the pharaoh in his office of king. The praenomen and the nomen were the names encircled in a cartouche.

Philip of Moscow

Russian Orthodox metropolitan, martyr

Philip was metropolitan of Moscow and all Russia from 1566 to 1568. There are two extant vitae for Philip and three miracle tales.

Born Fedor Stepanovich Kolychev to a Novgorod military-service family in 1506 or 1507, Philip became a monk at age thirty and left Moscow in search of a spiritual life. He first served a poor shepherd before making his way to the Solovki Monastery. Philip served as a novice at Solovki for many years before his tonsure, and sometime later he retired to the woods to live as a hermit for ten years. His written Life emphasizes his hard work, virtue, and humility, especially in light of his privileged birth. Philip was consecrated permanently as superior of Solovki around 1548. His legacy was one of hard work and administration. He supervised the acquisition of large donations of land and funds as well as the construction of three stone churches, a refectory, an intricate system of canals that remains in use today, and the beginnings of fortress walls.

Philip became metropolitan of Russia in 1566. His vita indicates conflicts with Tsar Ivan IV (the Terrible) over Ivan's ruthless treatment of his subjects between 1565 and 1572 during the so-called Oprichnina (when the tsar ruled from a private domain under his direct control). Thanks to the heroic moral speeches that appear in his vitae and his incarceration—and strangulation—by the tsar in the Otroch' Monastery, Philip has become a symbol of ecclesiastic righteousness and martyrdom. He died at Otroch' Monastery in 1569, and his remains were transferred to Solovki in 1591. His vitae remain testaments to monastic concerns for the humility, virtue, hard work, and heroic morality expected of a saint in opposition to corrupt temporal power.

There are no theological texts by Philip, but he is credited with having written twelve miracles in the cycle of Sts. Zosima and Savatii of Solovki, and a few of his orders to the Solovki Monastery are extant in manuscript “copy books” or publications. Philip's remains were transferred to Solovki in 1591, but no significant cult developed there. As late as 1640, the donations made at Philip's tomb were minuscule compared to donations made to other local saints. In 1648, metropolitan designate Nikon transferred Philip's remains to the Moscow Kremlin. Philip has since become a symbol of religious and moral opposition to immoral secular leadership. He was first recognized as a saint between 1647 and 1649 and is remembered January 9 and July 3.

Pio of Pietrelcina (Francesco Forgione)

Roman Catholic priest, miracle worker

The man known to most as “Padre Pio” was born Francesco Forgione on May 25, 1887, in Pietrelcina, near Benevento in southern Italy. He was born into a modest family and from early childhood felt a calling for the priesthood. He reported having visions of both God and the devil, and he was known to inflict harsh penances on himself. He began studying at the rather late age of ten because his family needed him to work in the fields from an early age. Five years later, he entered the Capuchin convent at nearby Morcone and finished his studies there. He was ordained a priest when he was twenty-three years old. Owing to his fragile health, he was permitted to live outside the convent, where medical care could be more readily obtained in cases of necessity. At age twenty-nine, he was transferred to the Capuchin house of San Giovanni Rotondo, in the Gargano area of Italy's Adriatic coast. Two years after his arrival, while in prayer before a crucifix on September 20, 1918, he received the stigmata, which remained with him until his death on September 23, 1968, at the age of eighty-one, although they gradually faded over time and completely disappeared when he died.

Throughout his life Padre Pio founded prayer groups and a local hospital; he also took particular care in his offices of confession and the celebration of mass. He was known to hear confessions for many hours on end, and his celebration of the eucharist drew such huge throngs that there was pressure put on him to limit his celebrations to very early morning hours. These crowds grew even larger as Padre Pio's fame as a miracle worker increased. Because of his thaumaturgical reputation Padre Pio became one of the most revered religious figures in Italy today, particularly in the southern part of the country; there, statues and images of him are common, particularly in and around medical centers.

After clearing some initial hurdles, the diocesan process for his canonization began in 1983. He was declared “venerable” in 1997 and beatified in 1999. In near record time (at least by modern standards), St. Pio of Pietrelcina was canonized by Pope John Paul II on June 16, 2002. His feast day is September 23. An enormous church, designed by Renzo Piano, is being built to better handle the crowds of pilgrims visiting the small town of San Giovanni Rotondo.

Pir Sultan Abdal

Shi'i Muslim spiritual poet

The Turkish poet Pir Sultan Abdal was born in Sivas, Turkey, in the sixteenth century. Despite, or perhaps because of, his extreme popularity, very little is known about his life except what has been preserved in his poems, hagiographical sources of much later periods, and folk legends. “Pir Sultan Abdal” is a pen name; his real name remains unknown to this day, though it may have been Haydar (one of the names of ‘Ali b. Abi Talib, the prophet Muhammad’s cousin, son-in-law, and the first imam of Shi’ism). The pen name is a collection of titles: Pir means “sage” or “wise person”; a sultan is a spiritual leader or master; and abdal (lit., “substitute saint”) is the term for a dervish-troubadour. It is commonly believed that he lived during the reigns of the Ottoman sultan Suleyman the Magnificent (r. 1520–1566) and the Safavid ruler Shah Tahmasb (r. 1524–1578), as there are references to these rulers in his poems.

As a prominent poet of the Alawi-Baktashi tradition, Pir Sultan has come to symbolize a number of themes in Turkish culture. His political struggle against Hizir Pasha, the governor of Sivas at the time representing the Sunni-Ottoman authority in central Anatolia, is well known. Along with his powerful poetical imagery and simplicity, perhaps what made Pir Sultan a household name in Turkish culture is his execution for allegedly provoking people against the Ottoman sultan in support of the Safavid state in Iran founded by Shah Ismail (r. 1501–1524), himself a Turk from Anatolia. The precise nature of his relationship with the Safavids, however, remains a mystery and leaves much room for speculation. For instance, Pir Sultan uses the word shah, a title given to Persian kings, profusely as well as vaguely in his poems, but it is never clear if he means actual Safavid rulers such as Shah Ismail or Shah Tahmasb or a spiritual master in the metaphorical sense of the term. In either case, however, Pir Sultan’s work is a synthesis of chivalry and social activism, on the one hand, and sober spirituality, on the other.

Pir Sultan was a folk singer, and his poetry reflects the qualities of Turkish folk music. It combines many elements of traditional sufi Alawi-Baktashi literature, such as love, companionship, communal bonds, spiritual masters, and love for the prophet, his family, and the Shi’ite imams. An epic quality permeates his poetry, which expresses a gallant opposition to injustice and wrongdoing. Considering the fact that the sixteenth century was imbued with communal and tribal difficulties in central Anatolia, partly on account of the rapid expansion of the Ottoman Empire and its westward march toward the Balkans and Europe, it is only natural that Pir Sultan became the spokesman for the discontent of many Turkish groups and nomadic Turkomans.

Along with Yunus Emre (c. 1241–1320/1321), Pir Sultan is celebrated for expressing dense esoteric and spiritual matters in simple, straightforward language. His work highlights the stark contrast between the “external,” or exoteric (zahir), and the “internal,” or esoteric (batin). Although this dichotomy goes back much earlier in Islamic history and points to a long-standing tension between spiritual teachers and doctors of law, Pir Sultan adds meaning to the controversy by interpreting the basic teachings of Islamic-Alawi spirituality in the larger context of his political struggle. Against blindly following the rituals of the religion, Pir Sultan emphasizes such spiritual qualities as sincerity and love. In modern history, some Alawi groups have tended to disregard the religious dimension in Pir Sultan’s legacy, considering him a social(ist) activist and/or proto-Communist. The spiritual message of Pir Sultan’s work, however, has much in common with the sufi tradition.

Pirmin

Christian monk, missionary

An eighth-century Visigothic monk who came to the Frankish court from southern Gaul, Pirmin was sent to Alemannia by Charles Martel, de facto ruler of Francia. Like many saints of this period, Pirmin was an itinerant monk whose sanctity was closely linked to his missionary activities. He was consecrated a bishop, but as was common for missionary monks of this period, he was not assigned to a permanent diocese. With the support of Charles Martel, Pirmin founded a monastery at Reichenau in 724. In doing so, he strengthened Christian and Frankish influence in a region that had been slow to relinquish its old customs and religions. Pirmin served as abbot at Reichenau until 727, when he once again departed to continue his missionary work, spreading the Rule of Benedict in Alsace and the Pfalz. It was around this time that he founded monasteries at Murbach (726/728) and Gegenbach (c. 748), and finally at Hornbach. He was reportedly summoned to Hornbach by the noble Frankish count Wanharius to establish a monastery there. At Hornbach, as at Reichenau, he dedicated the church to the mother of God and to Peter, leader of the apostles.

There is no documentation for the canonization of Pirmin, but within fifty years of his death in 753, he was recognized as a saint in a martyrologium from Metz, the diocese of the monastery at Hornbach, and in a manuscript from Reichenau, the most powerful of his foundations. Reichenau grew to become a major educational and artistic center during the Carolingian and later the Ottonian period—a century after the monastery's founding, its library contained more than 400 codices. Pirmin's saintly status is derived both from the works achieved in his lifetime and from the miracles that occurred at his grave following his death. This perhaps speaks as much to monastic practice during the eighth and ninth centuries as to the miracles of St. Pirmin—it was a common goal during this period for monks to attempt to trace the origin of their foundation back to a saint, thus increasing the worthiness of their institution.

Plato

(427–347 B.C.E.)

Greek philosopher

Plato, the famous Athenian philosopher, was a follower of Socrates, founder of the Academy, and the founding figure of the later philosophical and religious movements of Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism. Set forth with eloquent and sophisticated style in his dialogues, Plato's philosophy encompasses a great many subjects, among them the metaphysical dualism of the perfect, eternal, divine realm of Being and the imperfect, ever-changing physical world (or, in terms of human makeup, dualism of soul and body). The physical world is patterned after the eternal Forms. Philosophy permits access to the divine realm, and in so doing makes possible the good life.

Plato was born into an aristocratic Athenian family in 427 B.C.E. Around the age of twenty, he began to spend time in the company of Socrates and his group of followers. Later Plato would memorialize in his dialogues Socrates' trial (in Apology), death (in Phaedo), and many details of his character and teachings. The effect on Plato of his charismatic teacher was clearly formative and enduring. When a jury sentenced Socrates to death in 399, Plato's disgust with Athenian democracy moved him to withdraw from public life. He spent about the next twelve years traveling to southern Italy and elsewhere, including an influential stay with Pythagorean philosophers. After returning to Athens in about 387, Plato opened a school near the grove sacred to the hero Akademos. He spent the rest of his life teaching and writing, establishing the Academy as an important center of philosophical and mathematical learning.

Plato wrote primarily in the genre of the dialogue, thus mimicking as closely as possible the dialectical teaching style of Socrates. About twenty-five dialogues survive; they can be grouped roughly into three general categories. The Socratic dialogues, such as Euthyphro and Apology, seem to portray Socrates relatively authentically. It is often assumed that they are Plato's earlier works. The so-called "middle" or "middle-period" dialogues include Phaedo, Symposium, and Republic. Socrates is the spokesman for significant new ideas, such as the theory of Forms. In the late dialogues, which include Timaeus and Laws, Plato expounds on such subjects as cosmology and political theory.

Plato taught that human beings could gain access to the divine through philosophy. His doctrine of dualism posits that the physical world, imperfect and constantly in process of becoming, is patterned after the nonphysical, perfect, eternal and unchanging Forms or Ideas, which are of the divine realm of Being. For example, triangles exist only due to the idea of triangle. By coming to know the Forms through abstract thought, the philosopher is able to live based in truth as opposed to mere opinion.

Dualism also informs Plato's view of the human condition. The soul is immortal, of the realm of Being, but it is tarnished through association with the body. To return home, the soul must attain purification. In the meantime, it undergoes reincarnation (or transmigration) from one body to another. Plato's theory of knowledge also follows from this: The soul "recollects" the truths it learned through knowing the Forms before becoming encumbered by a body.

Purification of the soul depends on a life of virtue. Plato posits a correlation between various virtues and three parts of the soul: the intellectual (wisdom), the spirited (courage), and the appetitive (self-control). The harmonious operation of the soul, achieved through philosophy, amounts to a fourth virtue, justice. These became known as the four cardinal virtues (and in the Christian Middle Ages as the four natural virtues, to which were added the three supernatural virtues of faith, hope, and love).

Plato's influence has determined the course of Western philosophy down to the present. His most famous student, Aristotle, studied at the Academy for twenty years and then founded his own school in 335 B.C.E. The Academy continued to elaborate upon Plato's philosophy until it was closed by the emperor Justinian in 529 C.E. During this period, individuals and schools who regarded themselves as followers of Plato combined to make up the loosely defined movements of Middle Platonism (beginning in the first century B.C.E.) and then Neoplatonism, commenced by Plotinus (204/205–270 C.E.). Such Platonism is marked by syncretism, incorporating the influence of Aristotle and the Stoics, but Plato's dialogues remained the foundational source, so much so that Plato acquired a general reputation as revealer of divine truth. He also was held in favor by several important Christian church fathers, culminating in Augustine of Hippo (354–430 C.E.), whose works are pervaded with Plato's philosophy.

Plotinus

(204/205–270 C.E.)

Greek philosopher, holy man, ascetic

Father of Neoplatonism, the dominant philosophy of the later Roman Empire, and one of the last great and original thinkers before the conquest of Christianity, Plotinus is known as a holy man of extraordinary spiritual qualities who practiced extreme asceticism and claimed to have experienced a mystical union with the supreme God ("the One" or "the Good") in his life. Born in Egypt in 204 or 205 C.E., Plotinus studied under Ammonius before settling in Rome and starting a philosophical school. His student Porphyry edited his lectures into six sets of nine treatises called the Enneads, which analyzed various philosophical topics.

Plotinus was influenced by Plato, but Aristotle and other Greek thinkers also left their mark on his thought, which evolved from Middle Platonism, a more dogmatic interpretation of Plato than that of the earlier Academy. His philosophy posited a hierarchy of being in the hypostases of: (1) the One or the Good, the supreme unifying principle of reality incapable of being grasped by thought; (2) intellect, unchanging intelligible reality, of which sensible things are imperfect images; (3) soul, including the world soul and individual souls. By contemplating the Good, purifying the soul, becoming like God, and detaching oneself from the passions and external things of this world, union with the One, though not permanent in this life, is possible. The goal of life for Plotinus was thus to return to the One from whom all life emanates.

In The Life of Plotinus written by Porphyry, Plotinus is depicted as a godlike man who always raised himself to the Transcendent God (23). His motto was "to bring back the god in you to the divine in the All!" (2). Because he was continuously in thought, he was present at once to himself and to others (8). According to Porphyry, Plotinus was a mystic who experienced union with God in this life. By separating the soul from passions and carnal desires, he ascended to the infinite love of the One (or God) and became temporarily united with the supreme unifying principle of reality in an experience that transcended intelligence and was impossible to describe. The return to the divine intellect from which all reality came was always a possibility. After he died in 270, an oracle proclaimed that his soul went to heaven, not to be judged by the gods, but to be their companion.

Plotinus's mystical theology profoundly influenced Western thought, especially Christian spirituality, and his philosophy impacted Islamic and Byzantine as well as Western European medieval, Renaissance, and Enlightenment intellectual traditions.

Plunket, Oliver (Plunkett)

Roman Catholic archbishop, martyr

As a Roman Catholic priest, the Irishman Oliver Plunket worked with the poor in Rome before becoming a professor of theology and being named primate of Ireland in 1669. Plunket worked against the persecution of Catholics by the English government under Oliver Cromwell and Charles II until his execution in 1681.

After his ordination into the priesthood in 1654, Plunket served with the Fathers of Charity in Rome, earned degrees in canon and civil law at the Roman College, and worked as a professor of theology and apologetics until being named archbishop of Armagh in 1669. Plunket's return to Ireland after an absence of almost twenty-five years came at a time of great disorganization of the church in Ireland, a condition exacerbated by the hostile attitude the English government had toward Catholics. Plunket spent much of his time fighting anti-Catholic laws and ministering to his people. Within three months of arriving in Ireland, he had confirmed 10,000 people; by December 1673, the number rose to 48,655. Many of these believers received the sacrament secretly. In addition, during his first years in Ireland Plunket worked to bring education to Irish youth, and he opened a Catholic high school in Drogheda that was later taken over by the Jesuits.

With the passage of the Test Act of 1673, requiring that government officials prove their Anglican religious convictions, increased persecution of Catholics led to the scattering of Irish schools, the closing of chapels, and the dispersion of priests, friars, and monks into the countryside. Masses had to be conducted secretly, and Catholics were eventually forbidden to enter Dublin. Persecutions culminated in 1678 with the Titus Oates plot, which falsely accused Catholics of a plot to violently overthrow the government. On December 6, 1679, Plunket was arrested and imprisoned in Dublin Castle on the charges of remaining in the kingdom despite the edict of expulsion and of plotting to bring a French army into Ireland for the purpose of revolution. Although he was given a trial at Dundalk the following July, the witnesses perjured themselves and a case was established against him. He was sentenced to death at Tyburn, where he was hanged, drawn, and quartered in 1681. After his sentencing, he reportedly responded "Deo Gratias" (Thanks be to God), and his dying speech was a testimony of his faith. His body is buried at Downside Abbey near Bath, England, and his head is preserved at Drogheda. Plunket was beatified by Benedict XV in 1920 and canonized by Paul VI on October 12, 1975. His feast day is July 11.

Politics and Holy People

Can a person win popular esteem as "holy" who is engaged in the political world, or does the interaction of church and state inevitably lead to compromises and corruption of ideals? People in most times, places, and religions have seen no essential divide between "church" and "state," and indeed many people have been regarded as holy because rather than in spite of an active voice in the political world. The form that political interaction has taken has, however, varied greatly depending on time and place, and to some extent on religion. Confucianism more than any other system has stressed the need for a good person to be involved in the life of the state. Islam, especially Shi'a Islam, has also stressed the interconnectedness of government and the will of God in a way that encourages social engagement by saints. Christianity has reached a series of compromises with Jesus' statement, "My kingdom is not of this world," especially focusing on the need of people of goodwill (especially Christian rulers) to work to provide peace so that lesser people have a good environment for their religious practices. Indeed, almost all religions hail as holy certain people who have set themselves against a government that is perceived as wrong or evil. Finally, the goals of religion and politics are often so interconnected (as, for example, when a ruler works to impose a religion or even simple order on his or her state) that Christianity, especially, has a whole category of political martyrs—rulers killed by enemies for political reasons, but nonetheless regarded as in some sort defenders of the faith.

In some religions, or branches of religions, a single leader can serve as political as well as religious ruler. This was especially true of ancient Egyptian and Inca religion, but elements can be found in any region with a concept of divine or divinely inspired kingship. The best-known modern example is the fourteenth dalai lama, Tenzin Gyatso (1933–), the political and religious leader of Tibet. At other times, prophetic figures have claimed secular leadership. The most famous example of this is Muhammad (570–632), the prophet of Islam, but the first Sikh guru, Nanak (1469–1539), also combined the functions of prophet and territorial lord. Whether the secular leader should also hold religious authority was at the heart of the great schism between Sunni and Shi'a Islam: The partisans of Muhammad's kinsman 'Ali b. Abi Talib (600–661), the Shi'a, believe that the imams, descended from the prophet, had not just the right but the fundamental duty to rule the Islamic world. This caused an ongoing problem for the early Sunni caliphs, who feared the imams as a political rallying point against their rule, forcing them to keep imams such as al-Hasan al-'Askari (c. 846–c. 874) under close supervision their entire lives. His successor, Muhammad al-Mahdi (c. 868–874?), went so far as to go into a hiding from which he has yet to emerge—and will only do so to usher in a new age of the world. Islamic history has been enlivened by a number of holy figures who have claimed to be the twelfth imam come again, and who have launched revolutionary movements on the basis of the political position inherent in that claim. In another branch of Shi'a Islam, the Isma'ili imams for centuries ruled a state centered on Alamut in northern Iran. And through history a number of Islamic states have been established by religious leaders demanding political authority to enforce the teachings of Islam, ranging from the Almohad and Almoravid states of medieval North Africa and southern Spain to the Islamic state of modern Iran, established largely through the efforts of a Muslim ayatollah, Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989).

Many more holy people have served a wide array of rulers, recognizing them, as the sufi al-Suhrawardi (1145–1234) did his caliph, as the representatives of God on earth. This very common belief led to theories that it is morally wrong to rebel against even an unjust ruler in Islam, Christianity, and Confucianism, to name only the strongest examples. As noted, support of government is central to Confucianism. Confucians have been actively involved in politics, including many who can be regarded as “holy” for their teachings and way of life. An interesting case is the Japanese Confucian Kumazawa Banzan (1619–1691), who served as adviser to a provincial governor. Banzan was so dedicated to good government that he caused much jealousy and even plots against him by administrators of less integrity, but the governor recognized his quality and continued to trust him. From its beginning, Confucianism perceived the need for educated, good men to bring the rulers to greater morality and benevolence. Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.) himself wandered China giving advice to rulers (which they ignored) before settling down as a minor functionary; the great Confucian philosopher Mengzi (c. 372–289 B.C.E.) also traveled to many of the Chinese kingdoms urging rulers to rule morally. The ideal of Confucian scholarship is that it is an absolute duty for those who are able to ensure good governance to do so. This explains why Confucianism has no eremitical holy people—although some deeply moral Confucians at times withdrew to solitude in the view that the state was impossibly corrupt, instead of being praised they were condemned for not trying to effect a change within the political system.

Both Buddhism and Christianity grew up separate from a political system, and both developed an ecclesiology that emphasized the independence of the clergy from the state. Monks and other members of the religious elite of both religions had good success in freeing themselves from secular taxes; indeed, the Chinese Pure Land patriarch Huiyuan (334–416 C.E.) took the basic stand that “monks don't pay obeisance to kings,” eventually freeing monks from political duties to the state. Both Christian and Buddhist holy people sometimes found themselves in difficulties for refusing political loyalty to the ruler; for example, in England Anselm (1033–1109) was exiled twice for giving more loyalty to the pope than to the king, a problem that also led to the murder of Thomas Becket (c. 1120–1170). Fear that adherence to Christianity would lead to political disloyalty, combined with the tensions of aggressive European imperialism, led to mass executions of Christians in Japan, Korea, China, Uganda, and other places in the early modern and modern periods.

In reality, though, many Buddhist and Christian holy people were politically active, attaining holy status despite or sometimes because of their engagement with secular rulers. Perhaps the most fruitful alliance in the history of Christianity is that of the Anglo-Saxon missionary Boniface (c. 675–754) with the rulers of the kingdom of the Franks, which led to a strong state, large-scale conversions, and the organization of a strong ecclesiastical structure in the state. The Silla (Korean) Buddhist monk Chajang (590–658) both spread his religion and helped his country by convincing his queen to adopt Chinese customs. Successful alliances of church and state can also be seen in Islam, for example in the case of the Persian Safavid dynasty of the sixteenth century, which declared Shi'ism to be the state religion and encouraged Shi'i leaders to resettle in Iran, where they taught loyalty to the state and served the state along with more traditional religious functions.

More holy people than can easily be counted have served as tutors of young rulers, mediated in disputes between states, advised rulers, and sometimes even saved their states from periods of great danger. Sometimes this appears to have been a conscious manipulation by secular authorities, creating a holiness by association through their dealings with people of recognized holiness. This took an interesting twist in Christianity in the later Middle Ages, when “political canonization” became a tool of government—winning canonization of a holy family member or supporter enabled the ruler to bask in the reflected glory. It was good to have a saint in the family, as the descendants of King Louis IX (1214–1270) of France recognized, and the fifteenth-century Hapsburgs clearly engineered or at least encouraged the cult of Leopold III of Austria (1073–1136). Emperor Charlemagne (742–814) was canonized in 1165 as part of the fight between his successor, Emperor Frederick I, and Pope Alexander III. And Celestine V (c. 1210–1296), pope for only six months (July 5–December 13, 1294), was canonized in 1313 as part of a defamation campaign against his own successor, the anti-French Pope Boniface VIII (pope 1294–1303).

Can a holy person become engaged in politics to fight corruption? In general, the historic answer has been yes, although sometimes after much soul-searching. Many Christian bishops, after Christianity was established as the state religion of Rome in the fourth century, suffered exile for fighting against imperial and later royal religious policies, and often only their visible holiness saved them from worse, as in the case of Caesarius of Arles (c. 470–542). It is a simple fact that rulers do not care to be criticized, even when their rule is strong enough that they do not have to fear rebellion. Thus, at times only a saint has been able to offer a political critique. For example, the Muslim al-Hasan al-Basri (642–728) could get away with open criticism of the Umayyad caliphs because of his known sincerity and upright life. The German Rupert Mayer (1876–1945), an active opponent of the Nazis, survived World War II (under house arrest) because the German government did not want to make him a martyr in the eyes of the people. Other holy people were less fortunate, adding the crown of martyrdom to their other holy attributes.

The great Shi’i poet Pir Sultan Abdal (sixteenth century) was executed for provoking people against the injustice of the Ottoman sultan, a case exacerbated by the fact that he was Shi’a and the sultan was Sunni. Similarly, the English and Irish Catholic martyrs of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were executed as traitors for their resistance to the authority of the Protestant ruler in religious affairs. In a more exclusively political case, Stanislas of Cracow (c. 1040–1079) rebuked his king’s cruelty and oppression and was killed for it. And sometimes one holy man could be endured and another couldn’t. Two extremely brave men protested Ivan the Terrible’s bloodshed and injustice in Russia during the sixteenth century. The metropolitan Philip of Moscow (1506/1507–1569) rebuked the tsar to his face during a public celebration of the liturgy—he was imprisoned and soon strangled. But Basil the Blessed (1469–1552) also criticized Ivan and survived the experience because he was a recognized “fool in Christ,” touched by God and not subject to the normal courtesies of political exchange.

In the twentieth century, a new phenomenon has arisen: holy leaders taking a role in democratic politics to advocate reform. The modern Hindu Swami Agnivesh (1939–) is a very strong proponent of social justice and established his own political party, Arya Sabha, to spread his vision. Similarly, the sufi shaykh Ibrahim Niassé of Senegal (1902–1975) was active in Senegal politics, advocating social justice and equality; his followers still hold many political positions. Archbishop Desmond Tutu (1931–) of South Africa has been very active in the struggle against apartheid and the new social ills caused by its end, both from the pulpit and in the political arena. Other important figures are Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948), Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), and Nelson Mandela (1918–).

In lands unresponsive to democratic processes, often still the only way for a holy person to fight an unjust political system is to publicly witness against it. Martyrs are still being created in a ruthless political world, ranging from the self-immolation of Vietnamese Buddhist monks to the martyrdom of Archbishops Janani Jakaliya Luwum (1922–1977) of Uganda and Oscar Romero (1917–1980) of El Salvador, who both dared to denounce the injustice and atrocities of their governments, and who have perhaps served their cause better as martyrs than they were able to during their lives.

Polycarp

Christian bishop, martyr

Polycarp, perhaps the most important Christian leader in western Asia during the second century, was a Christian martyr and bishop of Smyrna (modern Izmir). Born in about 69, he belonged to the first generation of Christians after the apostolic age and exercised considerable influence in shaping the early church. He is known for a letter he wrote to the Christians at Philippi. An account of his martyrdom written by members of the church at Smyrna shortly after his death, a letter written to Polycarp by his friend Ignatius, bishop of Antioch (d. c. 107), and details furnished by other early Christian writers also shed light on this important figure.

Irenaeus (c. 135–200), a native of Smyrna who became bishop of Lyons, claimed to have known Polycarp as a child and said that he had been instructed by St. John and “others who had seen the Lord” and passed down their teachings (Eusebius 4.14, 5.20). The fourth-century church historian Eusebius records that Polycarp once came face to face with the heterodox Christian teacher Marcion, whom he rejected as the “firstborn of Satan,” and describes how he once visited Rome in order to discuss with its bishop, Anicetus (c. 154–c. 166), the conflict between the Eastern and Western churches over the proper date for the observance of Easter (Eusebius 4.14). It was not long after his return to Smyrna that the bishop, then eighty-six years old, was arrested and executed by Roman authorities. The traditional date for his death is February 23, in the year 155 or 156, but Eusebius’s claim that it occurred during the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180) makes it uncertain.

Polycarp is said to have written letters to several churches, but only his Letter to the Philippians survives. Occasioned in part by the misbehavior of one of the presbyters of Philippi, it warns against the love of money and against listening to Docetists, who denied the reality of Christ’s physical nature, and establishes moral standards for both the laity and clergy.

More important for an understanding of early Christian piety is the account of his death by members of the church at Smyrna, the first Christian text devoted entirely to the suffering and death of a believer who died for the faith and the first to use the word martyr (witness) in this sense. Meant to inspire courage in its readers, it relates how Polycarp’s calmness and cheerfulness astonished his captors and how a heavenly voice encouraged the elderly bishop by reminding him that he was not alone as he entered the arena. The account describes Polycarp as joyful in the face of death, and the fire set to burn him alive as unwilling to touch him. Death came only with a dagger thrust that released a dove (the symbol of a Christian soul) and a rush of blood that miraculously extinguished the flames. The account became the model for later martyrologies and contains evidence of beliefs and practices that were standard features of the cult of martyrs by the third century, in particular the veneration of the relics of martyrs and the conviction that in the midst of their suffering they were already in the company of Christ and beginning to experience the bliss of heaven.

Popé

Pueblo religious leader, rebel

Popé was a Pueblo Indian religious leader who led the Pueblo Revolt against the Spanish in 1680 in what is now New Mexico. The details of his early life are hard to come by. Born in about 1630, he was a Tewa Indian living in one of the numerous Indian pueblos of the Rio Grande River Valley. He enters the historical record as a traditional Pueblo Indian religious leader who resisted Spanish efforts to overturn Pueblo Indian religion and culture in the late seventeenth century.

Spain had entered New Mexico to stay in 1598; settlers under Juan de Oñate established a colony among the pueblos and made Santa Fe their capital in 1610. The Spanish forced the various Indian communities to supply them with food and labor or risk military attack. In addition, Catholic priests and other officials erected churches in native villages and worked to convert the Pueblo peoples to Christianity. Conversion also involved the destruction of native religious icons, suppression of their rituals, and efforts to discredit native religious leaders such as Popé. Religious and cultural tensions grew to a head by 1675 when Spanish officials arrested forty-seven Pueblo leaders for “sorcery.” The real issue was Spanish inability to convert significant numbers of Pueblo Indians to Christianity, and the Spanish blamed native leaders for their lack of success. The Spanish hanged four of the detainees and whipped the rest, including Popé.

In the aftermath of his 1675 arrest and the continued overbearing actions by the Spanish, Popé and other Pueblo Indian leaders began organizing open resistance to the Spanish. By 1680, the plans had been made, and runners carried the call for an armed uprising to nearly all of the Pueblo Indian communities. Spanish officials caught wind of the plan and nearly quashed it before it began, but the uprising started on August 10, 1680. The principal targets of Popé and the Indians were the churches and priests in their villages. They killed Catholic representatives, tore down churches, and destroyed Catholic ritual objects. They then laid siege to Santa Fe, where the Spanish survivors had all taken refuge, and managed to cut off the settlement’s water supply. The Spanish, their resolve weakened, fled back to Mexico City, not to return to New Mexico for twelve years.

The 1680 Pueblo Revolt stands as the most successful American Indian resistance action against the European intrusion. Recognition of its religious dimension and the role of its primary organizer, Popé, demonstrates the importance of traditional religion among Indians and their resistance to forced cultural change. When the Spanish returned in 1692, they dramatically lessened their insistence that Pueblo Indians convert to Christianity, and they sought more cooperation with Indian peoples in order to build a new multicultural community. Popé assumed a major leadership position among the Pueblos in the 1680s, but he lost that position before the Spanish returned. There is no record of his eventual circumstances. He may have died in about 1690.

Pope-Saints

Christianity

Of the 262 men who have been bishops of Rome (by the fourth century usually called “popes”), seventy-eight are regarded as saints by the Roman Catholic Church. The majority of these pope-saints reigned during the first through the ninth centuries, including forty-eight of the first fifty popes. By comparison, between the tenth and twentieth centuries there are only five pope-saints. In addition, ten popes have been beatified (the step before formal canonization). Two antipopes, men whose claims to the papacy are considered illegitimate by the church, are also celebrated as saints: Hippolytus (217–235) and Felix II (355–365).

Since the late second or early third century, Western Christians have regarded St. Peter (d. c. 64) as the first bishop of Rome, but whether he actually held this position, either alone or in conjunction with St. Paul, is a matter of conjecture. Very little reliable information is known about the earliest popes beyond their names. Even the order of succession is confused: The traditional list of the early popes, compiled around 180, has Peter followed by Linus (c. 66–c. 78) and Anacletus (c. 79–c. 91), but other early writers claim that Clement I (c. 91–c. 100) was the second pope. Clement left behind an important letter to the Corinthians, but no other early papal writings survive. The early Roman episcopate was a very fluid institution, and as a result nothing certain can be said about most of the first- and early second-century popes—Evaristus (c. 100–c. 109), Alexander I (c. 109–c.

116), Sixtus I (c. 116–c. 125), Telesphorus (c. 125–c. 136), and Hygenius (c. 138–c. 142). Of these early popes, only Peter and Telesphorus can reliably be identified as martyrs.

Starting with the papacy of Pius I (c. 142–c. 155), more reliable information is known about the various popes. Anicetus (c. 155–c. 166) established a shrine to St. Peter on Vatican Hill. Soter (c. 166–c. 174) established a firm date for the celebration of Easter in Rome. Under St. Eleutherius (c. 174–189), a canonical list of the earliest popes was established. Victor I (189–198) attempted to establish the Roman date for Easter as the standard for the entire church. Zephyrinus (198/199–217) was confronted with debates in Rome over the divinity of Christ. These debates continued into the reign of Callistus I (217–222), who also had to deal with the first antipope, Hippolytus. The church appears to have enjoyed a time of relative peace under Urban I (222–230). Pontian (230–235) abdicated the throne after being exiled by the Roman emperor to Sardinia during renewed persecution of Christians, a persecution that also marked the term of his successor Anterus (235–236). Fabian (236–250) reorganized the administration of the church in Rome and died a martyr during the Decian persecution. During his papacy, Cornelius (251–253) was faced with the difficult question of what to do with those who had lapsed during the persecution. Lucius I (253–254) spent most of his papacy in exile.

In the course of bitter debates over the rebaptism of heretics, Stephen I (254–257) was one of the first popes to claim primacy in doctrinal matters as the successor to St. Peter. Sixtus II (257–258) was beheaded while saying mass and became one of the most renowned martyrs of the early church. Dionysius (260–268) restored the organization of the Roman church after the persecutions and took the lead in doctrinal debates over the nature of the Trinity. Popes Felix I (269–274), Eutychian (275–283), and Caius (283–296) lived during a time of peace and prosperity for Christians in Rome, and very little is known about their activities. Marcellinus (296–304) reportedly handed over church goods and sacrificed to the gods during Diocletian's persecution, and for this may have been deposed. Marcellus (306–308) was banished from Rome as a disturber of the peace because of the hard line he took against those who had strayed during the persecution. His immediate successor, Eusebius (310), suffered the same fate. Under Melchiodorus (311–314), properties confiscated from the church during the persecution were returned and Christianity enjoyed the beginnings of imperial favor.

Although the papacy of Silvester I (314–335) saw the church gain unprecedented wealth and prestige, little is known about his activities or those of his immediate successor, Mark (336). Julius I (337–352) was an outspoken supporter of the decisions of the Council of Nicaea and an opponent of the Arians. Damasus I (366–384) took office amid violence and bloodshed but proved an able pope, enjoying the favor of the Roman aristocracy and actively promoting the idea of papal primacy. Siricius (384–399) was the first pope to issue decretals, rulings based on the style of the imperial chancery and theoretically binding on all Christians. Anastasius I (399–401) took part in the efforts to condemn the writings of the Greek theologian Origen. Innocent I (401–417), Anastasius's son, made substantial claims for the primacy of the pope's authority over the churches in Western Europe. The short reign of Zosimus (417–418) saw conflicts with the church in Africa, most of which were smoothed over by his successor, Boniface I (418–422). Celestine I (422–432) claimed unprecedented authority over the church in both the East and the West and became involved in the Eastern christological debates sparked by the teachings of Nestorius. Sixtus III (432–440) undertook a major rebuilding program in Rome to restore damage done during the Visigothic invasion of 410. Leo I, "the Great" (440–461), was one of the strongest of the late antique popes, claiming wide authority in religious matters and partially filling the power vacuum created by a series of weak emperors in the West. Hilarius (461–468) and Simplicius (468–483) intervened frequently in the ecclesiastical affairs of Gaul and Spain and attempted to hold the Western church together in the face of imperial collapse.

As the popes gained power in the West, they increasingly came into conflict with the church in the East. Felix III/II (483–492) excommunicated the patriarch of Constantinople and started a schism that continued through the reigns of Gelasius (492–496), Symmachus (498–514), and Hormisdas (514–523). John I (523–526) visited Constantinople at the behest of the Gothic king Theodoric, and his successor, Felix IV/III (526–530), also enjoyed the patronage of the Gothic court. Agapitus I (535–536) and Silverius (536–537) were caught up in the struggles between the Goths in Italy and the Roman emperors in Constantinople, and the latter was even forced to abdicate by imperial forces. The papacy was considerably weakened for the latter part of the sixth century, until the ascension of Gregory I, "the Great" (590–604), who became in effect the civil as well as religious leader of much of Italy.

The seventh century was a time of hardship for the papacy. Boniface IV (608–615) and Deusdedit/Adeodatus I (615–618) had to contend with plagues and famines, and later popes faced controversies with Constantinople over theological issues. One pope, Martin I (649–653) was even arrested, tried, and beaten at the behest of the emperor and died in exile, becoming the last pope to be recognized as a martyr. Eugenius I (654–657) would have probably suffered the same treatment except for his early death. Vitalian (657–672) was able to restore good relations with the emperor but still proclaimed Roman orthodoxy, an orthodoxy that did not become standard in the East until the reign of Agatho (678–681) and Leo II (682–683).

After this time, popes were more likely to be considered saints because of their personal piety than because of their suffering or activities on behalf of theological orthodoxy. They also gradually separated themselves from the influence of the Eastern emperors. Benedict II (684–685) convinced the emperor to allow his viceroy in Italy to ratify papal elections. Sergius I (687–701) resisted the orders of Emperor Justinian II and was supported by the imperial forces in Italy. Gregory II (715–731) was concerned with missionary work in England and Germany, and Gregory III (731–741) was the first pope to seek protection from the Franks and not Constantinople. The drift away from the East increased after the papacy of Zacharias (741–752), the last Greek pope. At about this time as well, the popes became more heavily involved with civil government, and by the time of Paul I (757–767), the early Papal States had begun to evolve. Both tendencies were noticeable in Leo III's (795–816) coronation of the Frankish king Charlemagne as emperor.

After the beginning of the ninth century, the number of pope-saints drops dramatically. One of them, Paschal I (817–824), has not been considered an official saint since 1963. Leo IV (847–855) defended Rome and Italy against Saracen invaders. Nicholas I (858–864) tried to assert his authority over the Eastern church, but the resulting schism never completely healed. Hadrian II (867–874) tried to end the schism but failed. By the tenth century, the papacy had fallen on hard times, with the papal throne becoming first a plaything in Roman politics and later falling under the influence of the German emperors. This changed in the eleventh century with the advent of the reform papacy. Two reforming popes, Leo IX (1049–1054) and Gregory VII (1073–1085), are considered saints, and another two, Victor III (1086–1087) and Urban II (1088–1099), have been beatified. After the eleventh century, however, there are only three pope-saints: Celestine V (1294), whose personal holiness is unquestioned but who proved ineffectual as pope and eventually resigned; Pius V (1566–1572), whose political astuteness helped to firmly establish the Catholic Reformation; and Pius X (1903–1914), who reformed church law and took a strong stand against modernism and democracy. During this period, there were also several beatified popes: Eugene III (1145–1153), Gregory X (1271–1276), Innocent V (1276), Benedict XI (1303–1304), Urban V (1362–1370), and Innocent XI (1676–1689).

In September 2000, Pope John Paul II beatified two of his predecessors, Pius IX (1846–1878) and John XXIII (1958–1963). Plans to beatify Pius XII (1939–1958), however, drew criticism from some Jewish groups concerned about his perceived inaction in the face of Nazism and the Holocaust, and his beatification proceedings appear to have been suspended indefinitely.

Priests

In anthropological terms, a “priest” is anyone specially trained to conduct rituals that create contact with the supernatural world, so a Protestant pastor is a priest as well as those figures more typically given the actual title “priest” in English. All priests have a certain institutional holiness; they are mediators between the broader populace and the divine. In general, a priest is more likely to be recognized as holy than a layperson is, but the correlation is far from perfect, and it has often been debated whether being a priest can be a help or a hindrance to becoming truly holy. Indeed, holy people have dealt in different ways with the issue of a professional priesthood. Perhaps the religion that focuses most on the priests and priestesses as individual holy people is the Yoruba religion of West Africa and its offshoots in the Americas. In particular, the high expectations placed upon priests in many religions encourages disappointment when they fall from the standards imposed upon them, opening the door to charismatic holy people who as individuals transcend the institutional, impersonal holiness of the priests.

Few priests of the ancient Mediterranean won status as holy people, perhaps because expectations were so low: Most priestesses and priests were laypeople who had a priestly function as a part-time job, otherwise leading normal lives in the community. In Rome, the Vestal Virgins, who performed central rituals to keep Rome at peace with the gods, were a great exception to this rule. They lived lives of ritual segregation that set them aside from the rest of the Roman population. As a result, some Vestals won high esteem for their personal holiness—and those who broke their vows of chastity were buried alive. The situation was also different in the eastern Mediterranean, where the Jewish high priests were held to a high standard of ritual purity that made them visible as personally holy in their daily lives rather than just their office. Aaron, the first high priest, was regarded as a model of a priesthood that at times could focus very much on the individual. Even after the destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem and the end of the high priesthood, the Jews of Israel had a hereditary patriarch (nasi) who was already halfway to being an individual holy person; some, like Judah ha-Nasi (c. 200 C.E.), combined the roles of individual and institutional holy person in popular esteem. Cohens and Levites still have a special role in synagogues and traditionally have abided by ritual restrictions that have tended to put them on the path to personal holiness. Even after the late antique period, rabbis performed some of the functions of priests, through their wisdom enlightening the path to the divine for others. But a real return to the idea of intermediary priests only came in the eighteenth century with the Hasidic movement, which emphasized the transcendent nature of God and therefore the need for spiritual masters who could lead and guide the mass of the population to contact with the divine.

Rural response tends to emphasize the holiness of the priest. For example, rural Thai Buddhist priests are regarded as committed to the highest standard of truth and goodness and are believed to live completely in response to the teachings of the Buddha. The same phenomenon can be found in several branches of Christianity, whether Orthodox, Roman Catholic, or Protestant in modern terms. Members of the clergy are often seen as nearly perfect Christians, living up to a high moral standard in their personal lives and to some extent embodying the teachings of Jesus. This societal expectation can be seen most clearly in the very strong outrage when clerics fall from their pedestals. Indeed, the response has often been the odd phenomenon of anticlerical movements founded by charismatic holy people, such as the Chilean Pentecostal founder Willis Hoover (1858–1937), or many of the Christian mystics.

In traditional Christianity and, since the Protestant and Catholic Reformations, in Roman Catholicism, a disproportionate number of priests are listed among the saints. In part, this certainly reflects historic reality; for example, in the early persecutions Roman authorities usually targeted the Christian clergy. But this imbalance between clerical and lay saints also reflects the prejudice of the religious authorities who declared people to be saints, and the resources of religious organizations to win canonization for their fellows. There also appears to be a common assumption that the professional priesthood (including, speaking broadly, nuns and monks) is a proper stepping-stone to holiness. People of particular piety have tended to present themselves for ordination, and those who live up to the high moral expectations of Christian priesthood have a good foundation upon which they can build to achieve official recognition as holy individuals. As Ignatius of Antioch said, early in the second century, “The bishop of each church presides in place of God.” Although Augustine established the idea of the priest as a conduit of the divine rather than a personally holy person, one has often led to the other.

Proclus

Greek philosopher, miracle worker

Philosopher, theurgist, mathematician, and poet, Proclus was one of the last Greek Neoplatonists. He was born in Constantinople in about 410 and began his studies in Alexandria. He later went to Athens, where he became the pupil of Syrianus, whom he succeeded as the head of the Academy. He was the author of many commentaries on Euclid’s and Plato’s works; his other works include the Platonic Theology, the Elements of Theology, the Chrestomaty, and Hymns, a collection of prayers in honor of Greco-Roman deities.

Proclus’s biographer, Marinus, who portrayed him as a model of holiness and piety, spoke of his numerous fasts and his fervent prayers. The tradition credits him with miraculous cures and prophetic dreams. His piety reportedly earned him the favor of Rhea, the “Mother of the gods to whom he always prayed and in whom he always rejoiced” (Marinus, Life of Proclus, 33), and Rhea was said to have appeared to him several times.

It was after a revelation of Athena that Proclus decided to adopt the philosophical way of life. In addition to the Platonic tradition, he was interested in religious teachings, particularly the Chaldean oracles, to the point where, according to Marinus, the goddess Hecate herself came to discuss these oracles with him. He was also initiated into orphism and the mysteries of Eleusis. Proclus believed that a true philosopher should honor the gods of all nations in order to become “the priest of the entire universe”—although he was always very opposed to Christianity.

Proclus considered that the unification of blessed souls and the intermediate beings (daimons) with the gods, who represent the Good, cannot be achieved through knowledge, which can only be imperfect, but only by means of divine faith (pistis), that is, a complete abandonment of self in the divine light.

Prophet, Elizabeth Clare

Christian denomination leader

Elizabeth Clare Wulf, born in New Jersey in 1940, began having visionary experiences during her childhood, which she understood as a remembering of earlier lifetimes. This personal religious journey became public after she met Mark L. Prophet, her future husband, in 1961. He had already founded the Summit Lighthouse, an organization to publish the works of the “ascended masters.” These masters are spiritual adepts of earlier ages, especially earlier mystics, who the Prophets came to believe are actively guiding the course of the earth today.

When Mark Prophet died in 1973, Elizabeth took leadership of the organization they had begun to form, establishing the Church Universal and Triumphant in 1974. Prophet has taken a central, indeed vital role in this organization as the sole intermediary between the members of the movement and the ascended masters, who now include her dead husband. Dozens of ascended masters are believed to have spoken through her on a total of more than 2,000 occasions. Her followers call her “Mother” or “Guru Ma” and compare her to the prophets of Hebrew scripture.

The messages of the ascended masters became increasingly dark over the ensuing decades, leading Prophet to prophesy the coming of a nuclear holocaust in March 1990. The authority of this vision led the Church Universal and Triumphant to move from their headquarters in Malibu, California, to a large parcel of land near Yellowstone National Park in Montana. There they constructed and provisioned massive bomb shelters and waited for the end, which failed to come.

That was the high point of Elizabeth Clare Prophet’s career as millenarian visionary. After the nuclear holocaust failed to rain down upon the earth, there was widespread disillusionment, and the number of her followers began declining. Prophet herself attracted considerable criticism of her personal life, most notably the fact that three of her marriages following Mark Prophet’s death have ended in divorce. She now suffers from Alzheimer’s disease and lives in semi-seclusion.

Prophets

The Greek-derived word “prophet” means literally “one who speaks for”—in normal usage a person who speaks for a god. Most often, prophecy includes at least an element of foretelling the future, although prophets can also reveal divine teachings (for example, Moses or Muhammad). Prophets form a significant strain in most world religions, except those, like Confucianism or Buddhism, that do not give an important role to deities. Elsewhere, however, founders of religions are typically credited with the gift of prophecy, already visible in Zoroastrianism, the oldest prophetic religion, whose prophet Zoroaster lived in approximately 1400 B.C.E. For those religions that have a god or gods at center stage, prophets are essential links to the divine (although this role has been deemphasized among the holy people of mainstream Christianity). A later Muslim tradition asserts that God sent prophets to every people—124,000 of them—culminating in Muhammad (570–632). And not just Muhammad is claimed as the final prophet; this distinction is claimed for such diverse people as Mani (216–274/277), Baha’u’llah (1817–1892), and Ann Lee (1736–1784).

Some holy people are marked as prophets from birth, some have prophecy thrust upon them (the classic case is the Jew Jonah), and some have made themselves prophets through a process of spiritual preparation. Greek legend reports that the most famous prophet, Tiresias, gained his special insight by spending seven years as a woman, thanks to an accidental encounter with two snakes. The Sioux holy man Sitting Bull (c. 1831–1890) underwent a long process of exploring mysteries and steeping himself in rituals and devotions to become a holy man able to foretell events. Normally, it is the deity who chooses out a prophet, an individual who in some way is particularly open to the divine influence, or the deity may simply send the prophet out from heaven—the early Diola prophets of Senegal were believed to have been sent by God, then carried back to the heavens when their work was done. Most commonly, the gift of prophecy is “found” when a person has been placed in a position of great dependence on God, whether voluntarily or involuntarily. This could be effected by periods of withdrawal. Muhammad’s years of retreats to the desert, for example, set the stage for his revelations. Or there could be a crisis in the holy person’s life, such as a period of isolation in prison. This was the experience of the Liberian William Wade Harris (c. 1850–1929), who believed that the angel Gabriel came to him when he was in prison to anoint him as a prophet. Even more commonly, a grievous illness leading even to death and resurrection has placed the prophet in a special liminal status, a theme that appears in many religions and emphasizes the role of prophet as intermediary between human and divine. Then again, a person may simply start having visions, sometimes at a young age. The Mormon prophet Joseph Smith (1805–1844) began his visionary life at the age of fourteen. Sometimes this can take the intense form of a coma-like state in which the soul supposedly leaves the body and goes up to heaven to receive the god’s word (such as in the case of Taiping founder Hong Xiuquan [1814–1864]).

A variant that casts doubt on the personal holy status of the prophet is the case of possession, whereby the god simply uses a human body as an instrument through which to speak. This concept lowers the significance of the holy person in favor of the power of the god. Some Jewish prophets, such as Amos and Micah, exhibited visible signs of God-possession, going into trances and speaking ecstatically, but in Jewish thought there was a shift from the notion of a God-possessed prophet to a belief in the prophet as a person brave enough to deliver God’s messages to an unwilling people. There is very strong evidence for God-possession in the traditional religions of Africa, which see it as a skill that can be enhanced with special training, and sometimes induced with drugs or rituals. The same can be said of the traditional religions of the Americas and East Asia; for example, in Fiji traditional priests would sit in a ritual space, drink kava, become possessed by a god, and utter prophecy. But few of these figures engendered posthumous reputations as holy people; it is more a matter of institutionalized holy office. Possession is a more personal matter in several of the modern religions of Japan. For example, the founder of the Tenrikyo sect, Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), was possessed by a kami (Shinto deity) in 1838 while nursing her sick son. The spirit taught Nakayama over the next years and chose her to spread heavenly truth. Similarly, Deguchi Nao (1836–1918), who founded the religion Omoto-kyo, was possessed by a deity and inspired to preach a radically millenarian message.

Until recent times, most prophets have been male, because acceptable forms of female piety have not normally included roles that take them outside of the home and family. The most important exceptions come from the Greco-Roman world and early Japan. In both of these regions, women could take on a liminal status that made them more acceptable to the gods than males. Thus there is evidence of female shamans at the heart of early Japanese religion, while the ancient Mediterranean heard its prophecies above all through the medium of oracles such as those at Delphi and the sibyls—all of whom were women. The early Jewish woman Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron, appears as a prophet, but with the settlement of the Jews in Israel a strongly patriarchal society emerged that discouraged women in leadership roles. Similarly, early Christianity was relatively accepting of female leadership, but as the Christian community was established, women as prophets were increasingly frowned upon—a major issue in criticism of the second-century Christian leader Montanus, who worked with two prophetesses. Indeed, Christianity soon looked with suspicion on any new prophecy at all, whether by males or females. In the Middle Ages, church authorities often looked with suspicion especially at female mystics when they claimed a prophetic voice. Islam went one step further: Not only did prophecy end with Muhammad, but the closest thing Islam has to a female prophet is the Virgin Mary.

Prophets have foretold a wide variety of events, and some have continued to prophesy posthumously. The Roman state for centuries consulted the “Sibylline books,” a collection of early prophecies, whenever there was a crisis. And the work of the Persian mystical poet Muhammad Shamsuddin Hafiz (c. 1320–c. 1388) is still used as an oracle, opened at random to reveal the answer to particular questions. In general, less reliance is placed on prophecy in the modern world, at least among the educated. One can get a taste of how prophets must have once dominated religious life in many parts of the world by looking at the recent religious history of Africa, where prophecy has retained a central role to the present. In part, this is a reflection of traditional African religion, but it has been given a greater impulse than ever because of the important role of the prophet as a person who can validate the grievances of afflicted people and give a religious sanction to opposition to tyranny. A series of prophets in much of Africa are credited with foretelling the coming of white colonial powers and helping to prepare the way for them or launch opposition to them (much as a series of Amerindian prophets rose in response to “white ways”). Prophets breed well in times of crisis, which has not been lacking in lands taken over by the European colonial powers. A particularly interesting example of this phenomenon is the hundreds of prophets of Melanesia over the past century, launchers of so-called “cargo cults,” who foretold an imminent return of the ancestors bringing a new era of human fulfillment and equality. Nor is it surprising that black prophets have arisen in America, including Nation of Islam founder Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975) and a number of Pentecostal revivalists who have preached a message of hope to the spiritually desperate.

The ultimate test of a prophet is if the prophecies come true. The Irish, with their gift for religious irony, told how the sixth-century prophetess Íte (d. c. 570/577) sometimes foretold the future—only to have the people concerned die before the prophecies could be fulfilled. So she resurrected them so that her prophecies could come to pass. Most holy people, however, have not had that option, and the pages of the history books are littered with false prophets who have been discredited by their followers—such as the Shawnee prophet Tenskwatawa (1775–1836), who mistakenly foretold an Indian victory at the battle of Tippecanoe. Hope springs eternal in at least some human breasts, though, and the followers of many prophets have been willing to suspend their disillusionment in the face of all evidence that a prophecy has simply been wrong. This, more than anything, suggests how much many humans long for an “authentic” voice from the divine.

Protestantism and Holy People

The cult of saints is typically considered one of the most pronounced differences between Protestants (who allegedly reject it) and Roman Catholics and Greek and Russian Orthodox (who maintain it). This principle must be examined case by case, as some Protestants maintained connections to pre-Reformation views of the saints and rather than rejecting saintly piety, redefined saints’ roles to exclude their veneration. Criticism of the cult of saints was a component of Lollardy, a late medieval reform movement that termed veneration “near akin to idolatry” in 1395. Humanists, too, became skeptical of the cult; Erasmus criticized it in 1509 in Moriae Encomium (In praise of folly).

Martin Luther’s 95 Theses on Indulgences (1517) embodied the fundamental elements of the Reformation critique of the cult of saints, although he was not the first to criticize indulgences; Jan Hus provided a political critique in sermons against the antipope John XXIII’s crusade indulgence in 1411. Indulgences rested on assumptions about saints' activities and rewards for their veneration: Freedom from time in purgatory via indulgences originated in the treasury of merit, a storehouse for the "extra" merit earned and not used by Christ and the saints. Indulgences granted access to this treasury and were associated not only with monetary exchange or crusades but with numerous regional and local traditions. Saintry relics and miraculous objects visible in Mainz under Albrecht of Brandenburg provided 39 million years of remission of temporal punishment; the septennial Aachen pilgrimage permitted glimpses of the Virgin's cloak and the cloth that had held John the Baptist's severed head. In Regensburg, indulgences were granted for visits to the site of a Marian apparition that occurred after townspeople destroyed a synagogue, expelling local Jews, but Protestantism reduced visitors from approximately 115,000 in 1519 to a trickle; the pilgrimage was suppressed by 1537.

A further Reformation attack on saints came with iconoclasm, which included not only violent destruction of images termed idolatrous but also their removal from churches or the general refusal to house visual art there. Violent iconoclasm was largely a lower-class phenomenon, intriguing in light of the centrality of images to illiterates; hence, historians frequently read iconoclasm as evidence of lower-class sympathy for Reformation ideas. Because wealthy people donated religious images as acts of charity, religious sentiments were possibly not the only ones operative in iconoclasm. The pre-Reformation cult of saints and the pursuit of indulgences were not merely occasions for the collection of charity; they also provided sociability and entertainment for all, so that lower-class iconoclasm must be interpreted in comparison to the varying fortunes of popular pilgrimages and devotions throughout Reformation and Catholic Reformation Europe. Poor relief reflected veneration of the patron saints of corporate bodies and had to be reorganized. The results of Protestant attempts to suppress the cult can be glimpsed in visitation or legal records, which suggest that resistance to the attack on this piety varied widely between Germany (low) and England (high). Consistory (courts of church discipline) records also bear witness to the reception of the abolition of the cult of saints. Genevan records suggest that pregnant women continued to call upon the saints in liminal moments.

Reactions may be distinguished according to the type of piety impacted. Organized veneration such as pilgrimages were easier to extinguish—sometimes, by destroying collections of relics, as did Saxon elector Frederick the Wise in the 1520s. Personal manifestations, such as the lighting of wax candles or silent intercessions, were less noticeable and harder to eliminate. Even in Reformation heartlands, Saxon and Bohemian miners continued to invoke patron saints during mine collapses. Protestant authorities most successfully controlled manifestations intersecting with official administration, so that naming children according to the saint's day (when the name was recorded in parish registers) disappeared in favor of Old Testament names, especially in Calvinist areas. Vestiges survive in Protestant Europe in church and place-names, as well as in the popular calendar; Church of England British hope for sun on St. Swithin's Day (July 15), and no German Protestant eats asparagus after Johannistag (June 24, the feast of St. John the Baptist), when the beds are put to rest. This example demonstrates one Reformation objection to saints' festivals; Johannistag (which marked the beginning of haymaking in the Baltic) coincides with the summer solstice, demonstrating the conflation of the cult with natural and pre-Christian phenomena as well as agricultural custom. Worldwide, Masonic commemorations also mark St. John's Day.

Theologically, the earliest Protestant attack on the cult of saints came from Martin Bucer, who forbade saints' festivals as early as 1524, partially because of the accompanying wild celebrations. Luther's thinking became increasingly stringent. First, he included brotherly exchange of divine gifts with the saints as part of his explanation of the creedal "communion of saints"; later, he termed invoking the saints superfluous but tolerated continued reliance on this practice as individual weakness; finally, he rejected the practice entirely as distracting from prayers to Christ. Luther, along with Huldrych Zwingli and John Calvin, preserved saints' days named in the New Testament. Article XXI of the Augsburg Confession (1530) embodied the moderate evangelical position that saints should be remembered as worthy examples, but not invoked for (useless) intercessions. One intended consequence was the reduction of festivals and their transposition to Sundays, but contemporary sermons show that in communities where daily services persisted, pastors still referred to the saints' festivals. Protestant correspondents dated letters with festival names (in contrast to the French Revolution prohibition on Christian names and dating). Protestant congregations continued to celebrate All Saints' Day (November 1), which even previously included the commemoration of saints only remembered by God. Article XXII of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England forbids veneration or invocation of a saint as non-scriptural, but the 1559 Book of Common Prayer exemplifies the diversity of attitudes. It provided in its lectionary a list of Sundays and major festivals, as well as a reduced list of minor festivals associated with a specific collect and scripture reading; however, saints' days not honored with a reading or collect persisted in the calendar following the lectionary. In fact, some (Agnes, Boniface, Catherine) were reintroduced that had been omitted in the 1549 edition, published by the stricter Reformers under Edward VI; the 1559 edition reflected Elizabeth I's more pragmatic leanings.

Protestants came to consider all Christians saints, a notion represented in hymns such as Anglican bishop William How's "For All the Saints" (nineteenth century) and Danish pastor Hans Brorson's eighteenth-century "Den store hvide Flok vi se" ("Who Is This Host Arrayed in White?"). Puritan insistence on "visible sainthood" in this vein engendered intensive church discipline, encouraging saintly behavior on earth, but even Puritan and Congregationalist hostility to Catholic sainthood did not preclude the popularity of John Foxe's Book of Martyrs (final edition, 1583), a compendium of martyr stories that became the second most common book in Puritan homes. So-called radical Protestants maintained a martyrological tradition in Thielemans van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (1660), historical tales intended to revive memories of the persecution of early Anabaptists in a prosperous age, which remains a traditional Mennonite or Amish wedding gift. Other Protestant martyrologies (those of Crespin, Pantaleone, van Haemstede, and Rabus) gradually faded from Protestant awareness. Charges that Lutherans regard Luther as their patron saint are sometimes justified but frequently exaggerated, despite the likelihood of statues of Luther to be displayed in churches decorated during the Kulturkampf (c. 1870–1890). In the mid-nineteenth century, Wilhelm Loehe urged reinstatement of a Protestant saints' calendar, although despite Prussian efforts to institute Ferdinand Piper's calendar, such projects remained unpopular.

Modern Protestant attitudes reflect this diverse heritage of attitudes and practices. The origin of the expression "red-letter day" is found in the Anglican practice of denoting lesser festivals in red letters in the Book of Common Prayer, while noting days of commemoration in black. No Protestant body developed an institution comparable to the Catholic Congregation of Rites, and all use the word "saint" to designate any individual saved by Christ. Some bodies, such as the Independent Church of the Philippines (1947), Protestant in sacramental definition, maintain saintly veneration as long as it does not prevent direct worship of Christ. Others, such as Baptists, reject such a practice as papist. Among formal bodies maintaining a commemorative tradition, liturgical committees determine the figures based on historical tradition and evidence that individuals demonstrated faith in their lives and actions, allowing the inclusion of hymn composers, modern figures (Martin Luther King, Jr., Chief Seattle) as well as Christian scientists and philosophers (Copernicus, Kierkegaard). Such practice, particularly associated with churches of the Anglican communion (including the Episcopal Church, which most recently published a calendar of "Lesser Feasts and Fasts" in 1991), did not reach American Lutherans until the publication of the Lutheran Book of Worship (1978), but is not accepted by all Lutherans. The Australian Uniting Church (a conglomeration of Congregationalist, Methodist, and Presbyterian congregations) published a similar calendar in its Uniting in Worship (1988). In the United States, churches following the Methodist Book of Discipline (1808) reject the cult of saints according to Article XIV, but some members have argued for the institution of a calendar of remembrance in the United Methodist Church owing to Methodist material culture commemoration of worthy individuals. Approximately one hundred names are common to the German Catholic and Lutheran calendars of commemorated individuals. An observable tendency toward conflation of the festivals exists in American Protestant churches observing both All Saints' and Reformation Day.

Ptolemaic Ruler Cult

After the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C.E., the Macedonian Ptolemy family that stepped in to rule over Egypt was forced to reconcile native Egyptian traditions with Greek beliefs and heritage. The multiplicity of customs that they were balancing became quite evident in their treatment of the office of kingship. The Greeks had a long-standing tradition of humanity possessing the ability to gain access to the divine realm, while in the Egyptian tradition it was only the pharaoh who was divine, and then only while he was exercising the duties of pharaoh or after his death. In light of these traditions, the Ptolemies instituted a cult for the divine pharaoh while he was still living.

Alexander, who laid the foundation for Ptolemaic kingship, considered himself to have had three fathers: Philip of Macedonia (his birth father), the Egyptian god Amun, and the Egyptian pharaoh Nectanebo II. By having an Egyptian god and pharaoh as his father, he established both his physical and divine right to the throne and paved the way for easy acceptance of the Ptolemaic rulers. Similarly, the Ptolemaic rulers belied their Greek origins by being careful to portray themselves conforming to Egyptian conventions, artistically and socially. They engaged in an Egyptian coronation and maintained both Egyptian state cults and Greek priesthoods.

Ptolemy I, “Soter,” created an eponymous priesthood dedicated to the cult of Alexander, raising him to the level of a state god. This priesthood was exclusively Greek and was the highest priesthood in the land. During the reign of Ptolemy II, “Philadelphos,” Ptolemy II incorporated his parents (his father Ptolemy I and his mother Berenike) and eventually himself and his sister/wife Arsinoe into the cult. The cult was maintained, in part, by taxation. This set the official precedent for living deification, and the remaining Ptolemies had simply to add their own names to this growing cult in order to achieve deification.

Living deification changed the Greek perception from that of an earned rulership to a hereditary one and replaced the Egyptian duality of the pharaoh (man/god) with exclusive divinity.

Purandaradasa

Hindu devotional saint

Purandaradasa’s songs of devotion to Vishnu have enjoyed popularity in Karnataka and Maharashtra for five centuries, making him one of the best-loved Hindu devotional composers of southern India. Purandaradasa was born in 1485; legends say he lived for twelve years in Pandharpur, Maharashtira, and the rest of his life in Karnataka. His life is one of dramatic conversion and inspired devotion. As one of the great Haridasa voices at the height of southern India’s great Vijayanagara Empire, Purandaradasa is celebrated as a spreader of devotion. His songs are still sung at festivals held in his honor.

In one song, Purandaradasa praises his wife: “May my wife’s family increase a thousandfold—because of her I’ve come to hold the pilgrim’s staff” (Jackson 1998, 70). Legends picture Purandaradasa as learning his deepest lessons in experiences having to do with jewelry and women. The first pictures him as a wealthy but miserly jeweler whose attachment to worldly wealth hardened his heart. When he refused to give a worthy but poor brahmin the wherewithal for a thread ceremony for his son, the poor man implored the gem-dealer’s wife, and she gave him her nose-gem. The brahmin tried to sell it to the jeweler, who recognized the gem and angrily confronted his wife, asking her where her nose-ring was. She could not deny her act, and her husband’s fury made her decide to drink poison. By divine intervention, the story goes, she found the gem in her poison cup and handed it over to her husband. This changed his heart, and a new life began.

Purandaradasa spent time with his guru, Vyasaraya, who lived in the capital city, Hampi. In one composition, Purandaradasa says, “I don’t know how, but thanks to the merit of many previous lifetimes, I found Vyasaraya’s lotus feet. I became a member of the holy order, worshipping God” (ibid., 71). Encouraged by his guru, Purandaradasa composed songs promoting spiritual values and sang them in towns and villages. A composition by Vyasaraya praises Purandaradasa. In the refrain of this song Vyasaraya says, “If you want to see true devotion, watch Purandaradasa” (ibid., 71).

Purandaradasa in one of his songs mentions composing 475,000 songs, saying that his guru Vyasaraya inspired this prolific output. The specific huge number is probably meant to indicate a large number. About 1,500 Purandaradasa songs have survived.

The Dasakuta was a forum of dasas, a school of “servants” of Vishnu, organized by Vyasaraya. Dasas memorized, taught, compiled, and kept Purandaradasa’s songs intact. Purandaradasa for some time was a central point of this forum. In the Dasakuta forum, his songs were sung again and again, and in this fashion Purandaradasa remained popular, even after he passed away, as wandering dasas circulated songs in towns and villages. Singing easy-on-the-ear colloquial lyrics, he mocked hypocrisy, encouraging the highest Hindu ideals. He cried out soulful questions, such as “Pilgrim, why are you snoring away your life today? Your role is to walk the long road, not just to dream your life away!”

The king gave Purandaradasa a stone pavilion, which still stands by the Tungabhadra River. There, the composer taught his songs to others. Purandaradasa has been called “Grandfather of Karnataka music” for many generations. His songs spread throughout rural areas and became performance pieces and illustrations for the greatest musicians and theorists of classical music in southern India.

Purity and Pollution

Most holy people are known for living lives of personal purity in accordance with the rules of their religion, except for a small class of “holy fools” or “mad saints” who break traditional moral codes as part of a severance from the mundane. The more important the saint, in general, the greater the emphasis on personal purity—so, for example, the Virgin Mary is regarded as of necessity free of all pollution, since she was the vessel that contained God. Personal ritual purity is regarded as an important stepping stone to true contact with the divine in cases as widely separated as the Vestal Virgins of ancient Rome and Hindu brahmins. Plato (427–347 B.C.E.) exemplifies this attitude; he taught the need to purify the immortal soul, which has been tarnished by contact with the body, before it can return to pure Being.

There is a stratum of holy people in many world religions who won their reputation for holiness especially because of their efforts to spread their own moral standards to the society around them. These holy people have especially appeared to reform religion that is perceived as “fallen away” from an ethical standard of earlier times. This is the great theme of the Hebrew prophets—return to the covenant with God or suffer destruction. One of the few non-Christian Romans whose reputation makes his inclusion as a “holy” person logical is Cato the Younger (95–46 B.C.E.), who was deeply admired for his old Roman virtues—and his attacks on the corruption of his time. In general, it is those cultures with sophisticated luxuries that tend to emphasize the pollution of the world and the need to force society, willing or not, into conformity with an ideal of purity. Purity can also be a central message of missionaries—who may urge people to turn away from old impurities to embrace the new message. In this form, especially Christian holy people of Africa have stood out as advocates of purity, although some religious leaders in Africa, the Americas, and East Asia have also taught that the true purity is to abandon the newfangled ways and goods that have been brought by imperialist powers, returning to simpler traditional life.

The quest for higher ethical standards, often accompanied by deep aversion to many things of the world, has led to a variety of religious movements, some far-reaching in consequence. The twelfth- and thirteenth-century Jewish German pietist movement tried to raise the ethical level of the Jewish community, several of its leaders winning the title “the pious,” such as Judah the Pious (c. 1150–1217). They stood out from the main Jewish tradition by advocating physical penances for sin, in effect driving the sin from the body. This seems to have arisen as a response to traditional Jewish emphasis on scholarship, in large part as a response to growing anti-Semitism in Europe.

In Islam, holy men were more likely to respond to the luxuries of society. For example, the prophet Muhammad’s (570–632) close companion Abu Dharr al-Ghifari (d. 652/653) has a modern cult following among Muslim reformers for his personal piety and far-reaching condemnation of the wealthy pleasure-lovers—he even argued before the caliph that the great and wealthy should be forced to give up their riches. But among the Muslims, too, puritanical holy people could arise in response to catastrophe. A series of fundamentalist movements developed following the Mongol invasions, the greatest led by Ahmad ibn Taymiyyah (1263–1328), a learned man of Damascus, who pled for a return to the pure teachings of Muhammad and the rightly guided caliphs. Although Taymiyyah died in prison, he was loved by the common people. For the modern world, the most influential Muslim puritanical/fundamentalist movement was that of Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab (1703–1787), who argued the need to meet governmental crisis with a return to the Qur’an and sunna (traditions), rejecting all later innovations. His effort to recreate the Muslim community of the seventh century led him to declare the Ottoman sultans to be apostates and to establish an independent state in central Arabia and the Persian Gulf. Wahhabism is still the accepted form of Islam in modern Saudi Arabia.

These examples, however, pale in comparison with purity and pollution as an obsession and central theme of holy people through most of Christian history. Christian hagiography shows an unrelenting quest for purification by saints, who struggle to suppress the body’s urges for food, rest, comfort, sex, and the like in favor of the soul. Many later Christian leaders have emulated John the Baptist’s cry of “Repent, for the kingdom of God is at hand!” Every monastic founder was trying to create a refuge of purity away from the filth of the world, some going to extremes, such as Theodore the Studite (d. 826), who even banned female animals from monastic property. The two great movements that led holy people to emphasize purification of the lay population, though, are the reformations of the sixteenth century and the rise of Pentecostalism in the nineteenth and twentieth. The friar Girolamo Savonarola (1452–1498) was an early crusader to cleanse the populace, in this case the city of Florence, with his bonfires of sinful luxuries, denunciation of the corruption of the papal court, and advocacy for a return to the primitive church. Savonarola, perhaps too bold too early, was executed, but several of the Protestant reformers, most notably John Calvin (1509–1564), stripped away the outward beauty of the church as pollution and advocated a moral reform of all members of his community. This led, in time, to an emphasis in several branches of Protestantism on living as “visible saints” striving for purity. Several of the great leaders of the Pentecostal movement, such as Willis Hoover (1858–1937), also turned strongly against the lures of the world, in Hoover’s case by trying to wean his followers from dancing, movies, and sport.

It is pleasant, though, to be able to report anti-purity movements led by the world’s holy people. Such a movement appears as a reaction against formalized, ritual notions of purification and pollution. Thus Jesus can be seen as a great crusader against what he perceived as worn-out formalism, and many Protestant reformers—advocating such practices as marriage of clergy—were also fighting what they saw as false teachings about ritual pollution. This theme is most important in India, where many holy people from at least the sixth century B.C.E. have reacted against ritual purity and fear of pollution. A famous case is the holy man Ramanand (1299–c. 1410). He was originally a disciple of Ramanuja but was offended when he returned to the community after years of preaching only to be shunned by his fellow disciples, who feared he might have been polluted by eating with others during his journeys. In his own sect, Ramanand preached against the religious laws of caste, denouncing the notion that association with the wrong people could pollute. Indeed, two of the world’s great religions, Buddhism and Sikhism, broke away from Hinduism at least in part because of the parent religion’s obsession with ritual purity.

Pythagoras and Neopythagoreanism

Pythagoras (c. 570–497 B.C.E.), one of the most influential philosophical and religious thinkers of all time, remains a shadowy figure. Later biographies (such as those by Diogenes Laertius, Porphyry, and Iamblichus) are from nearly a thousand years after Pythagoras’s birth, and so virtually all evidence of his thought is “Neopythagorean” (a term coined later still), in connection with either (1) famous Pythagoreans before Plato; (2) Plato himself, especially in the Timaeus; (3) Aristotle, in his fragment “On Philosophy” about Plato’s “Unwritten doctrines,” and other testimonies in Aristotle (his treatise on Pythagorean beliefs no longer survives, however); (4) the revival of Pythagoreanism from the first century B.C.E. to the first century C.E. (known today as Neopythagoreanism proper), attested to by Latin writers such as Cicero, Ovid, and Seneca, and represented by, among others, Moderatus of Gades and Nicomachus of Gerasa; or (5) Pythagorean elements developed by the Neoplatonists in the third through the sixth centuries C.E.

Pythagoras is a model of the holy person or spiritual guide in antiquity, a mediator between the divine and the human, a magical prophet and healer connected with both Orpheus and Apollo. He leads by his own example and is the discoverer, in some sense, that everything in the universe either is, depends upon, or possesses intelligibility because of number and form. A sacred kinship and universal sympathy binds everything together in friendship—gods, humans, and animals (hence, among other things, Pythagoras’s emphasis on vegetarianism and gentleness between species). Like Empedocles, Pythagoras appears as a divine, shaman-like figure who descends into the world to remind souls of their origin and brings health and craft for the sick from another world.

Born in Samos, Pythagoras traveled extensively in the early part of his life and experienced the ritual wisdom and initiations of Crete, Phoenicia, Babylonia, and Egypt. Perhaps to escape Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos, he emigrated to Croton in southern Italy, where he founded communities of both men and women (his wife, Theano, was also revered) who practiced a simple, “holy,” communal life. These communities came to wield considerable political influence, and after a “Pythagorean revolt,” during which many Pythagoreans were killed or exiled, Pythagoras moved to Metapontum, where he died.

The rules of Pythagoras (akousmata) were orally transmitted; they were short, pithy sayings (taboos, precepts, and the like) that acted as secret passwords and also riddles or symbolic “texts” to be interpreted or conjured into living reality. Like the Chinese Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.), Pythagoras saw philosophy as a path or way of life. For Pythagoras, this path was represented by the letter upsilon, the initial letter of the word hugieia, health or salvation. He claimed superhuman powers and mastery over animals and nature and taught reincarnation. Aelian reports that Pythagoras wore white clothing, a golden crown, and trousers, an indication of Iranian-Scythian influence that suggests that he was “the hierophant of Great Mother mysteries with an Anatolian stamp” (Burkert 1972, 165). The legend that he was the Hyperborean Apollo—with a golden thigh to prove it—supports this larger heritage of esoteric wisdom. He was the first to call the world a cosmos and himself a “lover of wisdom” (philosophos) rather than “wise man” (sophos), that is, a receiver and a seeker of wisdom. He is also associated with number mysticism (like Neo-Confucianism in China) and with the recognition that the principles of mathematics, geometry, astronomy, and music are in some sense the principles of everything. Pythagoras was reputed to have discovered the mathematical basis for music, and he was also reputedly the one who first advanced the theory that the courses of the circling planets sounded a music of the spheres.

Cicero associated the revival of Pythagorean thought in the form of Neopythagoreanism with a learned Roman, Nigidius Figulus (98–45 B.C.E.). Hagiology and wonder-working accounts remain prominent, as is evident in Philostratus’s Life of Apollonius of Tyana, a Neopythagorean of the first century C.E. Plato’s Timaeus becomes more important during this era. A notable commentator, Eudorus of Alexandria of the first century B.C.E., who followed the Pythagorean ideal of “becoming like god” and developed Plato’s unwritten doctrines, posited a Supreme One beyond the Monad and the Dyad from which numbers and the physical world emerge. Other Neopythagoreans developed an elaborate theology. Numenius of Apamea (Syria) gives the clearest sense of the mystical vision of the Good as the source of the practice of what is holy. In his theory, humans cannot grasp the Good except by removing themselves from sense-objects “to be in company alone with the Good alone,” where the Good rides “in peace, benevolence, tranquility, and sovereignty gently upon the surface of Being.” This removal is not easy, but there is need of a “divine method . . . to develop by practice [ekmeletêsai] the learning which is being” (Numenius, fragment 2).

This interpenetration of insight and praxis anticipates the many Pythagorean elements in Plotinus’s thought and the use of Pythagorean symbolism especially in Iamblichus, but also in Proclus. It culminated in the development of a sacred geometry, a geometrical imagination to link the indivisible and the divisible (in Proclus), and a mathematical theology as a form of dialectic, which both goes beyond and yet adapts theologizing mathematics.

Pythia

(8th cent. B.C.E.–3rd cent. C.E.)

Greek prophets

The Pythia was the prophetess of the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, the most important oracular site in ancient Greece. Both individuals and delegations from Greek city-states, beginning in the eighth century B.C.E., came to the temple at Delphi, thought to be the center of the world, to consult the prophetess. The practice continued into the first centuries of the Roman Empire. The Pythia, an adult woman dressed as a girl, was devoted to her position for life. The title is connected with the old name for Delphi, Pytho, where, according to mythology, Apollo killed the dragon Python with a hundred arrows.

Ancient custom prescribed the ritual process climaxing in the prophecy spoken by the Pythia under Apollo’s inspiration. First, the Pythia bathed in the Castalian spring. A goat was then sacrificed, and she entered the temple, where barley meal and laurel leaves burned on a hestia. Descending into the sunken area (Adyton) at the end of the temple, the Pythia, crowned with a laurel, sat upon a tripod situated over a chasm and waved a bay branch. (The omphalos, a stone in the Adyton, marked the center of the world because Zeus had released two eagles in opposite directions, and they met at Delphi.) Male temple personnel called prophets received the questions from the inquirer(s) and submitted them to the prophetess, whereupon she became ecstatically possessed by Apollo and began to utter prophecy probably from a self-induced trance. Her prophecies were thought to be the word of the god, important because the Greeks did not have a written scripture. Oracles were recorded by the prophets, polished into hexameter verse.

The prophecies were often intentionally ambiguous, and from a cultic perspective, very conservative, thus leaving to the inquirer(s) the responsibility for the correct interpretation and application, and ensuring the continued success of the oracle. It is also recorded that the Pythia received bribes.

The Delphic Amphictionic Council controlled the oracle and supervised the temple finances and the pan-Hellenic Pythian Games. The Pythia had far-reaching authority in the classical Mediterranean world, approving the establishment of shrines, temples, sacrifices, and other forms of cult for gods, daimons (spiritual beings), and heroes. For about a millennium, Pythian oracles gave advice on personal, social, political, commercial, military, and cultural issues and played a significant role in founding Greek colonies. With the failure of traditional polytheism and the conquest of Christianity, Delphi was in sharp decline by the third century C.E.

Qasim, Muhammad b. ‘Abdallah al-

(r. 934–946 C.E.)

Isma‘ili Muslim imam, caliph

Muhammad b. ‘Abdallah al-Qasim was the twelfth Isma‘ili Nizari imam (thirteenth imam for the Musta‘li Isma‘ilis) and the second Fatimid ruler. He was born in Salamiya while his father, al-Mahdi, was still living in secrecy to escape Abbasid persecution. His name was similar to that of his ancestor the prophet Muhammad (Muhammad b. ‘Abdallah Abu’l-Qasim al-Mustafa). Since Babylonian times, the number twelve has been of great significance in the traditions of the Near and Middle East. For many, it is no coincidence that there are twelve signs of the zodiac, twelve months of the year, twelve tribes of Israel, and twelve disciples of Jesus. The Ithna Ash‘ari Shi‘as have a total of twelve imams. Thus, al-Qasim’s position as twelfth imam is of great significance in Islam.

Al-Qasim actively participated in the governing of his father’s domains. Toward this end he helped subdue the Berber uprisings and twice attempted to capture Egypt. During his reign he concentrated on his naval strength, which became a formidable Mediterranean power, and made successful raids on the ports of Sardinia, Genoa, and Circassa, among others. Al-Qasim’s reign also ushered in an era of great challenges for the Fatimid dynasty. For several years, his reign was plagued by the Kharijite opposition led by Abu Yazid, who belonged to the Zanata tribe. Al-Qasim was engaged in subduing this rebellion until his death in 946. The rebellion was finally subdued after the succession of al-Mansur, his son, who ruled for seven years. Al-Qasim passed away after twelve years of rule both as imam and as ruler, and he was buried in the capital city of Mahdiyya.

Qonawi

See Kunawi, Sadr al-Din al-

Quddus, Ruh al-

(1821–1849 C.E.)

Babi disciple, martyr

Ruh al-Quddus (the Holy One) was the last of those who joined the ranks of the Bab’s Letters of the Living, the earliest and highest-ranking group of the Bab’s disciples, but the Bab ranked him first spiritually. He led the Babis at the Shaykh Tabarsi upheaval in 1848. The Bab (1819–1850), founder of the Babi faith in Iran, established a following that eventually developed into the Baha’i faith.

Mulla Muhammad ‘Ali Barfurushi, later given the name Ruh al-Quddus by the Bab, was born in Barfurush (Babul in northern Iran) to a farming family in 1821. During the course of his education in Barfurush and Mashhad, he became a shaykh. He set off in about 1837 for Karbala to study under Sayyid Kazim Rashti and returned to Barfurush in 1843. He arrived in Shiraz and accepted the Bab in 1844, becoming the last of the Letters of the Living. He accompanied the Bab on his pilgrimage to Mecca in 1844–1845. Quddus and two other Babis were arrested in Shiraz in 1845 because they had changed the Islamic call to prayer in accordance with the Bab’s instructions. Their captors burned their beards and pierced their noses and paraded them through the streets. After his release, Quddus traveled on to Yazd, Kirman, Isfahan, and Tehran, finally returning to Barfurush. At each place he announced the Bab’s claims.

In early 1848, Quddus joined Mulla Husayn Bushru'i in Mashhad and the two preached the new religion at that shrine city. Later that year, Quddus was one of the main participants at the Conference of Badasht, at which the Bab's inauguration of the new religious dispensation was made clear to all. After this conference, Quddus was arrested and confined in the house of the senior cleric of Sari but was soon freed. He joined the Babis besieged there. Up to this time, Mulla Husayn had been regarded as the foremost disciple of the Bab, but at this time, he showed the other Babis that, following the guidance given him by the Bab, they were to regard Quddus as his spiritual superior. When Mulla Husayn was killed in fighting, Quddus led the Babi forces alone. Eventually, the prince leading the royal army swore on the Qur'an to allow free passage out of the fort to the Babis. Once they emerged, however, he seized and killed all of them. Quddus was handed over to the senior religious leader of Barfurush, who, on May 16, 1849, paraded him through the streets, tortured and killed him, and then instigated the mob to tear him to pieces. He was twenty-eight.

The few writings of Quddus that remain display a close similarity to that of the Bab in both form and content. It is clear that the Bab and Baha'u'llah (1817–1892, the Bab's successor) regarded Quddus as second only to the Bab in importance in the Babi religion. The Bab and Baha'u'llah identified him as “The Last,” a name of God, and Baha'u'llah also referred to him as “The Last Point”—as distinct from the Bab, who was “The First Point.” ‘Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921, Baha'u'llah's son) states that Quddus and the Bab were the two witnesses prophesied in the Book of Revelation (11:6–12; Shoghi Effendi 1974, 49).

Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin

Amerindian god-hero

Though Quetzalcoatl (Feathered Serpent) is an important divinity in the Mesoamerican pantheon, according to Aztec history he also existed in human form as the ruler of the ancient city of Tollan or Tula in the Mexican highlands. Ce Acatl Quetzalcoatl Topiltzin was born in the year One Reed (Ce Acatl), the equivalent of 843 C.E. His father, Mixcoatl, was a valiant warrior who defeated the female warrior Chimalman before impregnating her. She died during Quetzalcoatl's birth. In 873, the Toltecs sought Quetzalcoatl to make him their ruler and their priest, according to the pre-Columbian Anales de Cuauhtitlan (Annals of Cuauhtitlan). To validate his role as ruler of Tollan, Quetzalcoatl sought the bones of his deceased father, an act that reflected the practice of receiving a divine and inherited right to rule from the ancestors. When he retrieved the bones, Quetzalcoatl performed an auto-sacrifice of blood from his genitals to revive the departed warrior. In the pre-Columbian Leyenda de los Soles (Legend of the suns), Quetzalcoatl conquered many cities as ruler of Tollan.

During his rule, Quetzalcoatl reportedly eliminated the practice of human sacrifice and presided over the flourishing of Toltec culture. Under his reign, a cultivation of the arts, including poetry, feather-working, painting, music, and other toltec or civilized activities, gained prestige. By eliminating human sacrifice, Quetzalcoatl also greatly decreased the need for the military complex, which had provided human sacrifices for the city. The military complex was devoted to the divinity Tezcatlipoca, Quetzalcoatl's divine opposition. The warrior classes became dissatisfied with the ruler's choices and sent representatives to end Quetzalcoatl's rule.

Quetzalcoatl, tricked by Tezcatlipoca's magic obsidian mirror into thinking he was ugly, imbibed pulque, an intoxicant made from the maguey cactus. This caused him to seduce his sister, Quetzalpetatl (Feathered Mat). Upon awakening the next morning, the tlatoani (speaker) was so ashamed of his actions that he left Tollan. As a result of this flight, the historical Quetzalcoatl established a link between the Maya and the Mexican highland cultures and became a key figure in the encounter between the Aztec ruler Moctecuzoma Xocoyotzin and the Spanish conquistador Hernán Cortés. Archaeological evidence supports a connection between the Mexican culture at Tollan and the Maya presence in the Yucatan and Chiapas. Textual references in the Quiche Maya creation story, the Popol vuh, explain the arrival of the Quiche from the west, and many of their practices also reflect those of the Mexican groups.

In the Anales de Cuauhtitlan, the ruler fled to the sea (the Gulf Coast), where he set himself on fire to become the morning star (Venus) and the Lord of the Dawn. Quetzalcoatl died in the year Ce Acatl, that is, 895—fifty-two years after his birth. His life span thus corresponded to the fifty-two-year cycle of the Mesoamerican calendar. Because of this coincidence, Ce Acatl became an auspicious date; in some accounts, the ruler vowed to return in the year Ce Acatl at some point in the future.

Ce Acatl occurred in 1519—the same year that the Europeans arrived on the coast of Mexico. When Cortés landed on the Gulf Coast, Montezuma reportedly wondered if the Spaniard was the returning Quetzalcoatl. Although much has been made of the perception that Cortés, as Quetzalcoatl, was “divine,” in Mesoamerican philosophy, so, too, was Montezuma as a tlaotoni of the Aztec Empire. In that sense, he would have seen Cortés as someone of equal stature with himself and treated him accordingly. He sent Quetzalcoatl’s accoutrements to Cortés to see if the Spaniard would accept them.

In postconquest times, the missionary priests and the natives who became Christians celebrated Quetzalcoatl as an aspect of Jesus. In some representations of the crucifixion, native artisans included an image of Quetzalcoatl inside the body of Christ. The poetic texts that also celebrated Axayacatl and Montezuma were adapted; they now narrated the offering of flowers to the Christian “tlaotoni.” The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints supports a connection between Christ and Quetzalcoatl.

Quipocamayos

Inca record-keepers

From Middle Horizon times (600–1000 C.E.) onward, Andean peoples kept records on devices of knotted cords of cotton or (rarely) alpaca wool. These are called quipus in Quechua. A quipu consists, minimally, of a main cord from which pendant cords hang. (Pendants of pendants are called subsidiaries.) Knots tied in the pendant cords and other modifications of the pendant are the commonest data-bearing or significant features. Inca functionaries used cord records for censuses, inventories, tribute records, and documents about transactions. The quipukeepers were called quipocamayos. Since the organizing principle of the empire was “balance” (tinkuy), the quipocamayos’ function was to assure that balance was achieved in every endeavor. More than mere “accountants,” their work was regarded as vital to both spiritual and socioeconomic aspects of Inca life. Spanish courts also accepted quipus as documents of record in early colonial times.

Knots upon the lowest part of the pendant represent units, and successive knot clusters ascending toward the main cord register tens, hundreds, and thousands. The principle is a true decimal system, although it has no explicit symbol matching the zero of Arabic numbers. Some cords contain totals or other arithmetical derivatives of pendant cord numbers. Additional significant properties, such as cord color and the “S” or “Z” directions of twist and knotting, recorded additional variables. In the quipu, the color of the cords was also significant in that it represented the item that was being counted. The color depended upon the nature of the object: yellow for gold, red for the army, and white for peace. As the colors were limited, some colors had different meanings depending on the general purpose of the quipu in question. Objects that people were unable to distinguish by color were ranked according to quality. For example, in a quipu of weaponry inventory, a lance would be first, as it was considered the most honorable weapon by the Inca, then the arrows, bows, axes, and so on.

Many European chroniclers and indigenous writers have compared the quipus with alphabetic writing and statistics. The Andean chronicler Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala offers drawings of both quipus and quipucamayos in his chronicle of 1615. The quipucamayos were responsible for the encoding and decoding of quipus upon the Inca ruler’s request. Well-informed early colonial writers insisted that not all quipus were of this statistical kind. Some reportedly encoded histories or poems. The relation between language and such nonstandard quipus remains controversial and constitutes a research frontier. The use of the quipus changed somewhat during the colonial period, when the Incas used them to record their sins as an aid to confession. During the government of Viceroy Francisco de Toledo in the second half of the sixteenth century, most quipus were destroyed because they were considered the equivalent of idolatrous books.

Qushayri, Abu'l-Qasim al-

Muslim sufi

Abu-'l-Qasim 'Abd al-Karim b. Hawazin al-Qushayri, described by his contemporary 'Ali ibn Uthman al-Hujwiri as “a wonder,” was one of the earliest sufi masters to successfully establish sufism (tasawwuf) as both a valid expression of Islamic piety and a legitimate Islamic discipline ('ilm at-tasawwuf).

Al-Qushayri was at once an influential scholar of hadith and jurisprudence, a sufi master, and a Qur'an commentator. Among the first teachers of sufism in the emerging tenth-century madrasas (schools) of Nishapur, al-Qushayri contributed to the confluence of Shafi'i law, Ash'arite theology, and sufi reflection. By associating sufism with hadith and Shafi'i legal theory, al-Qushayri vested sufism with the legitimacy of the prophet Muhammad's exemplary precedent (sunna). By applying al-Ashari's (873–935) antirationalist theology, al-Qushayri championed sufism's emphasis on divine mystery and transcendence.

In his al-Risala fi 'ilm al-tasawwuf (Epistle on the knowledge of sufism), al-Qushayri defended sufism based on the fundamental principles (usul) of Qur'an and sunna. In this way he represented sufi theory and practice as consistent with the shari'a (Islamic law and guidance). Al-Qushayri asserted the importance of the directing shaykh (shaykh al-tarbiyya), who, because he directly supervises disciples' practice, also maintains their adherence to shari'a.

Al-Qushayri was disciple (murid), son-in-law, and successor to the sufi shaykh Abu 'Ali al-Daqqaq (d. 1015) and also studied under Abu 'Abd ar-Rahman as-Sulami (937–1021), the author of both a comprehensive biographical history of the sufis and a significant sufi Qur'an commentary. Al-Qushayri succeeded al-Daqqaq at his madrasa in Nishapur, where he led assemblies of divine remembrance (majalis al-tadhkir).

Al-Qushayri's Risala, frequently cited in later sufi writings, has been one of the most widely used manuals of sufi practice. It features biographies of early sufis and a sensitive treatment of forty-five stations (maqam) and states (hal) on the sufi path. Al-Qushayri expresses the stations as "earnings" and the states as "gifts." His Qur'an commentary, Lata'if al-Isharat (The subtleties of the allusions), composed sometime before 1019, continued the sufi hermeneutic of interpreting the Qur'an according to the exegete's own mystical experience.

When a minister of the first Saljuq ruler, Tughril Beg (1038–1063), instigated a campaign against both "renegades" (rawafid), that is, Shi'is and "innovators" (Ash'arites), al-Qushayri issued a fatwa (authoritative judgment) in 1044, and an open letter in 1054, in which he defended the orthodoxy of Ash'arite theology and protested the persecutions. The letter triggered his arrest and imprisonment. He was released following an assault on the citadel led by the Shafi'is. After fleeing Nishapur in 1056, al-Qushayri was commissioned by Caliph al-Qa'im bi Amrillah to teach hadith in the palace in Baghdad. At the age of seventy-nine, al-Qushayri returned to Nishapur, where he lived until his death in 1072.

Rabbenu Tam

(c. 1100–1171 C.E.)

Jewish scholar

Jacob ben Meir Tam (Our Perfect Master), or Rabbenu Tam, was a French tosafist (commentator on the Talmud). Born in about 1100, he was a grandson of the talmudic commentator Rashi, the son of Meir ben Samuel (Rashi's son-in-law), and a brother of Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam). After crusaders destroyed his home in Ramerupt in 1147, he settled in Troyes, where he organized the first conference of French rabbis in 1160.

A wealthy grape-grower and money lender in Ramerupt, he frequently clashed with the local nobility and Christian authorities. But he also had disputes with fellow Jews, insisting that his decisions become authoritative in Germany and Provence and alienating many of his contemporaries, including the great Jewish philosopher Rabad (Abraham ibn David, c. 1110–1180). He ignored customs with which he disagreed but otherwise attempted to reconcile French practice with the Talmud.

Thoroughly abrasive to his opponents, he was nevertheless brilliant—indeed, the leading French scholar of his day. He is best known for his explanations (tosafot) and discussions of the Talmud and is considered by many to be one of the boldest and most ingenious of interpreters. Many of his tosafot and responsa were collected in his Sepher ha-Yashur (Book of the upright), which explained apparent textual corruptions in the Talmud. His work is often extremely detailed. In addition to biblical interpretation, he composed liturgical poetry and wrote on grammar, taking part in the famous Hebrew verb debate.

Rabbenu Tam disagreed with his grandfather Rashi regarding the order of the verses inscribed in the tefillin (phylacteries); to this day, some Orthodox Jews alternately wear two pairs of tefillin to ensure correct usage, one according to Rashi and one according to Rabbenu Tam.

Rabi'a al-Adawiyya

Muslim mystic

Rabi'a al-Adawiyya from the eighth century is the most famous woman saint in Islam and a central figure in the early development of the Islamic mystical tradition known as sufism. A former slave who devoted her life to the worship and love of God, Rabi'a came to be known primarily for her love mysticism and teachings on sincere devotion, although some biographers also portray her as a prominent scholar. Besides the poems and teachings attributed to her hundreds of years after her death, no works by Rabi'a have been preserved, making her life and legacy the object of both pious and scholarly debate.

One of the earliest extant biographies of Rabi'a was composed by Abu 'Abd ar-Rahman Sulami (936–1021 C.E.) as the first entry in his work on sufi women. Here Rabi'a appears as an important scholar, spiritual teacher, and legislator, one to whom even the foremost male authorities would bring their questions. Sulami's biography introduces the trope that later became a hallmark of Rabi'a's legacy, the idea that sincere love of God leaves no room for the desire or love of anyone or anything else.

The Persian Tadhkirat (Memorial of the friends of God) by Farid al-Din 'Attar (c. 1117–c. 1230 C.E.) contains the most extensive account of Rabi'a's life and sayings. 'Attar claims that Rabi'a's exalted spiritual status allowed her to transcend the supposed limitations of her sex. His account describes what he considers to be the key aspects of Rabi'a's hagiography: her humble birth, her early years as a slave, her reputation for receiving divinely sent graces and miracles, her rigorous religious devotions, her critical remarks directed to both colleagues and the divinity, and her blessed status in the afterlife. In addition to the theme of sincere devotion, 'Attar associates the themes of poverty and complete trust in God with the life and sayings of this remarkable Muslim woman saint.

Radegund

Christian queen

Radegund was a sixth-century Frankish queen and religious founder. In addition to establishing the double monastery of Our Lady of Poitiers, Radegund is probably best known for bringing a relic of the True Cross from Constantinople to Poitiers and is also famous for the great feats of self-mortification and the numerous miracles to which her vitae attest.

According to contemporary accounts, Radegund, born in about 520, was the daughter of Berthaire, or Berengarius, king of Thuringia. Radegund's father was killed by his own brother, who in turn was killed by the Frankish kings for reneging on an agreement. In 531, Radegund was taken as spoils of war by Clothar, youngest son of Clovis. She was raised as a Christian at Clothar's court at Athies and became one of his several wives when she reached maturity. Radegund continued to live a pious Christian life as Clothar's wife until the murder of her brother precipitated her retreat to religious life. She fled the royal court and was veiled as a deaconess by Bishop Medard of Noyon.

Radegund began her religious vocation by running a hospital out of her country house in Saix. A dramatic late-medieval addition to her life recounts how Clothar, in an attempt to get Radegund back, had her pursued from Saix to Poitiers. She asked a farmer sowing oats to tell any men who were chasing her that he had not seen her since he planted his crop. The oats grew immediately; thus the farmer aided the saint in her escape without lying to Clothar's men. Finally, in about 553, Radegund was released from her marriage with the aid of Bishop Germanus of Paris, enabling her to settle in Poitiers to establish her religious community. Although she was, by choice, never abbess of the community, Radegund was clearly involved in making all major decisions, including the 567 adoption of the Caesarian Rule, which enforced strict enclosure. Radegund died in 587; her feast day is August 13.

The events of Radegund's life were recorded by no fewer than three of her contemporaries: her friend and bishop of Poitiers, Venantius Fortunatus; Baudonivia, one of the women of her community; and Gregory of Tours, who visited her community, conducted her funeral, and included her in his History of the Franks, The Glory of the Martyrs, and The Glory of the Confessors. In the twentieth century, Julia O'Faolain fictionalized Radegund's life in her novel Women in the Wall (1975).

Radharaman Charan Das Dev

Hindu composer, ecstatic

Radharaman Charan Das Dev, or Boro Baba (Big Father), as he was known to his disciples, was a Hindu saint belonging to the Chaitanya tradition of Bengal. His frequent ecstasies and spontaneous composition of songs earned him a wide following among the Bengalis of his time and his community is still a powerful force in Chaitanya Vaishnavism today.

Boro Baba was born as Raicharan Ghosh into a well-to-do family of zamindars (landlords) in the district of Yasohar (now Bangladesh) in 1853. He lost his father at the age of five and three of his brothers over the following four years. As a young man he took over the family occupation. His honesty and trustworthiness brought him to the attention of another, more powerful landlord, who hired him to manage his estates. When he was forced to put down a peasant revolt cruelly, he lost his desire for worldly involvement and decided to renounce the world. Shortly thereafter he left home and walked to the Kali temple in Bhavanipur (Bagura). During a solar eclipse, the goddess appeared to him there and ordered him to go to the banks of the Sarayu, where he would find his hoped-for teacher. He followed her order and met his perfected guru, Shankararanya Puri. He stayed with his guru for a while and received instruction. Then his teacher ordered him to travel from country to country, town to town, and sing the names of Krishna. He followed his teacher's order, and a core of disciples began to gather around him. He soon began to experience ecstasies and trances, in one of which the instructive song was revealed: (bhaja nitai-gaur radhe shyam, (japa) hare krishna hare ram, which translates as "(worship) Nitai and Gaura and Radha and Shyama; (chant) 'hare krishna hare ram.'" This became the theme song of his followers.

Boro Baba taught the importance of congregational singing of the names of Krishna, that one can only attain the favor of Chaitanya by serving his associate Nityananda, and that one can only attain the company of Radha and Krishna by the grace of Chaitanya.

Radwan, Ahmad

Muslim shaykh

Ahmad Radwan, one of the most venerated saints of Upper (southern) Egypt in the twentieth century, was an influential sufi shaykh (teacher of mystical Islam) who lived in al-Baghdadi, a village near Luxor. He was a descendant of the prophet Muhammad, a status that carries both respect and an expectation of piety.

Born in 1895, Ahmad Radwan grew up doing the work of a peasant and devoting himself to religious study and worship. He was famous for his compassion and generosity. During an epidemic of malaria and typhoid in 1944, he visited the homes of the sick, bringing food and medicine. He learned sufism from his father, a shaykh of the Samaniyya order, and from two shaykhs of the Khalwatiyya order, becoming deeply attached to Shaykh Muhammad al-Ramli. Radwan's early mystical opening was marked by occasional gazz (jadhba), when the shock of divine illumination overwhelms the intellect. During this time, he was known to generate such heat that he could not bear to wear clothes and walked naked, unaware of himself. While invoking the names of God, he heard the name of God come from inanimate rocks. Although Radwan resumed sober spirituality, his oral teachings were often thought to be conducted under divine inspiration. Radwan did not establish or lead a named sufi order, but he built a retreat center in al-Baghdadi, with large tables that could feed a hundred people at a time. He was famous for his miracles, especially knowledge of the unseen, and thousands thronged to him. His spirituality was strongly focused on devotion to the prophet Muhammad.

Radwan's most famous admirer was Gamal Abdul Nasser, president of Egypt from 1954 to 1970. Nasser was a socialist who imposed rigid controls on the religious establishment, but he hailed from Upper Egypt, where respect for sufi holy people is deeply ingrained. He built a train station in al-Baghdadi and a mosque in Radwan's retreat center. Sufis say Radwan warned Nasser not to go to war with Israel in June 1967; Nasserites claim Radwan encouraged him to go to war. Radwan died, allegedly from grief, just before the catastrophic Six-Day War ended on June 11, 1967. Thousands attend his mawlid (annual commemorative festival) in al-Baghdadi on the anniversary of his death.

Ragot, Mariam

Christian church founder

Mariam Ragot, a Luo born in South Nyanza, Kenya, sometime around 1900–1910, established Dini ya Mariam, an African-instituted church (AIC) that has been seen as a precursor to Legio Maria, sub-Saharan Africa's largest Roman Catholic-influenced AIC. Ragot started her church in 1952; Legio began in 1962–1963. One narrative strand states that Ragot started Dini ya Mariam (Swahili for "Religion of Mary") after witnessing a Marian apparition. Another strand states that Mary came to Ragot embodied as an old African woman in poor health. Ragot was by herself, as her husband was off herding, and she treated Mary hospitably.

Mary rewarded Ragot with a house-church that appeared “as a miracle” beside Ragot’s marital home. Mary made holy water, prayed at its altar, and provided a model for Ragot to go and baptize as a priest.

In the 1950s, Kenya’s colonial government faced opposition from Mumboism, an anti-Christian, antiwhite, politico-religious movement guided by beliefs surrounding an indigenous rainbow-snake spirit. It also faced Mau Mau freedom fighters. Ragot reportedly prayed for Mau Mau detainees. David Barrett, a writer on African religions, contended that Ragot condemned “the white race” (1968, 11). Most Luo, however, portray Ragot as antimissionary, not antiwhite. Ragot promoted using rosaries made with Melia azedarach (Persian lilac) seeds. She asserted that Mary disliked Roman Catholic clergy charging Africans for baptismal cards. Ragot’s idea that a woman could perform priestly duties did not find favor with male missionary priests or colonial authorities. During her missionizing for Dini ya Mariam, Ragot spoke in tongues.

Ragot and her husband, Paul Adita, were finally arrested for creating disturbances. Ragot’s claims about Mary performing miracles at her home were labeled “delusions,” and her glossolalia was taken as another sign of mental illness. Between 1954 and 1960, Ragot and her husband were jailed, detained, removed from the district where they were living, and placed under house arrest and restriction. During her period in jail, Ragot reportedly received injections that were supposed to treat her “mental instability.” Some narratives portray Ragot’s spirit and sanity as being broken by years of official harassment, making her eventual freedom to move about the smallest of victories.

However, after her release in 1960 Ragot continued religious work. Although she had been an early member of the Roman Catholic lay organization the Legion of Mary and had founded a Catholic AIC, her focus now seemed to change. Ragot preached to congregations of Dini ya Roho Musalaba (Spirit Cross Church), Kendu Roho Mission, and another Spirit-infused Protestant AIC. Ragot’s appeal drew new members to these churches. One rationale offered for her turn toward Protestant AICs was that it was pragmatic. Challenges to the Roman Catholic Church were noticeable in a colony that had hardly faced any controversy before Ragot’s Dini ya Mariam.

Ragot retained a core of women followers who were attracted to her as a person. Sources disagree as to whether she and her husband finally joined Legio when it started, bringing these followers with them. They may have instead joined one of the Protestant AICs. It is her status as a spiritual woman who sought to expand women’s roles and to challenge missionaries that remains memorable to Kenyans who recall Ragot.

Rahner, Karl

Roman Catholic theologian

Called the father of the Catholic Church in the twentieth century, Karl Rahner was born to a middle-class family of Freiburg-im-Breisgau, Germany, in 1904. Although a diffident student, at best, he decided after his secondary school graduation to follow in the footsteps of his elder brother and become a Jesuit. He studied philosophy and Ignatian spirituality in Austria and Germany. Rahner completed his scholasticate in 1927, having studied deeply the works of Immanuel Kant and the Jesuit Thomist Joseph Marechal. From Marechal especially, Rahner was able to begin the formulations of his own theology, based on his youthful assent to Marechal’s insistence on the dynamism of the human mind that has its source in God—that is, the idea that every thought, every desire, and every act of comprehension have their beginning in God.

While studying at Valkenberg, Netherlands, Karl Rahner was ordained a priest, but in 1934 he was sent to the University of Freiburg to complete a doctorate in philosophy. However, his mentor, the Thomist theologian Martin Honecker, eventually rejected Rahner’s dissertation, Geist im Welt (Spirit in the world), because Honecker deemed it “not Catholic enough,” or perhaps too daring an attempt to wed traditional Thomist theology with modern German philosophy. Although the dissertation was never approved for Rahner’s doctorate in philosophy, it was published some years later and has been through several editions in many languages. The text reveals Rahner’s essential understanding of how humans “think about” and “know” God: God is the “mystery,” a reality “known” only indirectly as the pull of the human spirit inexorably moves toward that reality. Humans as spiritual beings “know” God in the only way humans can, by being in the world; thus, God is best understood as a personal reality active in human time, an activity that occurs through “uncreated grace,” free and loving.

After finally receiving his doctorate of theology in 1936, Rahner became an instructor of theology at Innsbruck and quickly gained a reputation as a creative and deeply philosophical theologian. In 1939, the Nazis demanded the closing of the department of theology; Rahner and his brother Jesuits persisted in teaching theology at their residence until those meetings were also forbidden, and the Jesuit theologians expelled. Nevertheless, Karl Rahner made his final profession as a Jesuit on August 15, 1939, and was invited to teach in Vienna. The Gestapo continued to harass him until he was forced to leave Vienna in 1944 and went to the Bavarian village of Mariakirchen to serve the Catholic community there. Rahner was also part of the rescue and relief organization in Munich after the devastation at the end of World War II.

By 1948, Rahner was again in Innsbruck, where he taught until 1964. Yet, at this time, Rahner also became involved in a nascent ecumenical movement emerging from Germany. Rahner also participated in conferences that explored the relationship(s) between science and religion, especially the increasingly difficult problem of the potential conflict between modern technology and articles of faith. Again, such activity on the part of the Jesuit Rahner was viewed disapprovingly by church authorities, accustomed as they were to maintaining religion as a separate (and superior) arena of human experience and discourse.

Rahner's written work was voluminous, concerning topics in theology as distinct as pastoral pragmatics and systematic "investigations." In 1955, Rahner was asked to become the editor of Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Lexicon for theology and the church), a compendium of Roman Catholic theological and ecclesiastical teachings that was intended for the theological education of ordained clergy. From 1957 until 1965, Rahner edited ten volumes of the Lexikon, which included nearly 30,000 articles by prominent Catholic and Protestant theologians and clergy. In his own work, Rahner was particularly concerned with the status of his beloved church in the twentieth century, and he addressed such contemporary issues as ecumenism, technology, and diversity. At times, his efforts met strong resistance, even direct condemnation. For example, his critique of modern Roman Catholic Mariology as potentially excessive and perhaps misdirected in its biological emphasis caused grave concern within the Vatican, which promptly added him to a list of scholars who needed the censor's approval before publication.

Rahner's problematic status notwithstanding, Pope John XXIII appointed him to be among the chief theologians at Vatican II. Rahner was very hopeful that his position at Vatican II could help to persuade more traditional members of the council to accept the need for a less purely Western, and more universal and tolerant, "world" church.

After Vatican II, Rahner resumed his academic career, teaching at the University of Munich (1964–1967) and thereafter at the University of Munster (1967–1971). The time after his retirement in 1971 was notable for a more reflective, more meditative spirituality that seemed to be emerging in his writings: Among his final books were The Courage to Pray (1981) and The Love of Jesus and the Love of Neighbor (1983). In his later years, Rahner's theological reflections were often centered on the cross and the suffering Jesus endured for his people, as well as on the mystical and marvelous dynamism of the Holy Spirit in the world.

Rahula

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist follower

Rahula, the only son of Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha, was born on the day that his father left home in the fifth century B.C.E. (the word rahula means "bond" or "obstruction"). When the Buddha visited Kapilavastu for the first time following his enlightenment, Rahula's mother sent him to the Buddha to ask for his inheritance. The Buddha gave him no answer, but Rahula followed him everywhere until the Buddha asked Shariputra, his chief disciple, to ordain him. When the Buddha's father, King Suddhodana, who had helped to raise Rahula and needed an heir, heard of this, he protested to the Buddha and persuaded him to make a rule that no child should be ordained without the consent of his parents or guardian. Afterward, Rahula went on begging rounds in the company of the Buddha and Shariputra.

Immediately after Rahula's ordination, the Buddha preached many discourses to him for his guidance. Buddhist literature is full of stories that speak of Rahula as a quintessential example of obedience and extreme conscientiousness. Legend tells that when Rahula arrived at Kosambi one evening, he was told that a new rule had been formulated: No novice should sleep under the same roof as a fully ordained monk. Unable to find any suitable place, he spent the night in the Buddha's outhouse. On another occasion when he could not find a sleeping-place for himself, he spent the night in the open. This was eight years after he became an arahant (fully enlightened). Some Jatakas (stories of the birth of the Buddha) show how even in his previous births Rahula had been known for his obedience. In the Udana (Inspired utterances), his name is included among the eleven who were found particularly praiseworthy by the Buddha.

When at the age of eighteen Rahula noticed that he harbored carnal thoughts and was fascinated by his own physical beauty and that of his father, the Buddha preached the Maha Rahulovada Sutra to him. Later, Rahula became an arahant after the Buddha preached the Cula Rahulovada Sutra. Rahula, known to his friends as Rahulabhadrā (Rahula the Lucky), declared that the title was appropriate because he had been twice lucky—in being the son of the Buddha, and in becoming an arahant. The Buddha declared Rahula foremost among those of his disciples who were anxious for training.

In Buddhist lore, Rahula was also associated with the buddhas of earlier ages of the world. In the time of Padumuttara Buddha, Rahula was a rich householder of Hamsavati who gave away all his wealth to the poor. Four verses uttered by Rahula are included in the Theragatha, and the Milindapanha also contains several stanzas attributed to him. In numerous Jatakas, Rahula is mentioned as having been the bodhisattva's son. According to the commentary Digha Nikaya (Collection of long discourses), for twelve years he never slept on a bed. Rahula predeceased the Buddha. Ashoka built a stupa (shrine) in honor of Rahula, and he is especially worshipped by novices.

Rajcandra, Shrimad (Raychandbhai Mehta)

Jain lay teacher, mystic

A Jain lay teacher who was a jeweler by profession, Shrimad Rajcandra founded an intersectarian lay Jain mystical movement in the nineteenth century that was similar to the Adhyatmika (Inner Self) movement, which is associated with the Digambara Jain mystical poet Banarsidas (1586–1643). Shrimad Rajcandra was cited by his contemporary Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) as a major influence. Gandhi regarded Shrimad Rajcandra as a personal friend and spiritual guide and credited him with resolving his doubts about Hinduism.

Born in 1867, Shrimad Rajcandra claimed Hindu as well as Jain heritage. His mother was a Sthanakvasi (aniconic) Jain, but his grandfather worshipped the Hindu god Vishnu. The ashrams (retreats) established by the movement preserve the ecumenical spirit of their founder. In these ashrams, located in the northern Indian state of Gujarat (Koba and Agas), and overseas in East Africa, Britain, and North America, people of all faiths are welcomed. Generally, texts acceptable to all Jains are read, for example, the Tattvartha Sutra (That which is), along with Shrimad Rajcandra's extensive correspondence with his disciples and popular mystical texts by the Digambara philosopher Kundakunda (c. second and third centuries). Shrimad Rajcandra's followers attend their own temples, where they may worship images or not, according to custom. They have no monks of their own, although in recent years some ashrams have instituted lineages of lay gurus. Shrimad Rajcandra's photograph, taken just before his death in 1901 and showing him emaciated from fasting, is venerated at his ashrams, signifying the spiritual elevation of laity in his movement.

Shrimad Rajcandra's philosophy was heavily influenced by Hindu systems, especially nondualistic Vedanta. In his early writings, he claimed to be a second Mahavira (the historical refounder of Jainism traditionally dated from 599 to 527 B.C.E.) and compared himself to Rama and other Hindu deities. For an Orthodox Jain, this is inappropriate, but for nondualistic Vedanta, such language is appropriate to describe a mystical experience of union with God. Shrimad Rajcandra's views were similar, in many respects, to those of the Digambara mystic Banarsidas, for whom advanced stages of consciousness are not limited to the past but are attainable in the present age. He compared himself to an omniscient sage, without quite proclaiming himself omniscient, which would not conform to Jain orthodoxy.

Shrimad Rajcandra never seems fully to have resolved the tension between his Hindu and Jain heritage, although a gradual movement toward a more orthodox Jainism is discernible. Early in life, he felt that being a family man was the greatest spiritual challenge; toward the end of his life, however, he was preparing for renunciation, as prescribed by Jain scripture. He died at age thirty-three, before he could take initiation as a mendicant. His followers generally believe that he was reborn and will be liberated after his current life.

Rama (Ram)

Hindu hero, avatar

Rama is the hero of the Ramayana, one of the two great Indian epics. This epic is best known in its classical Sanskrit version. In the form available today, the text dates to approximately the third century C.E. Besides the classical version, a multitude of popular texts in regional languages and a great variety of folkloristic versions exist.

The basic story of the Ramayana tells that King Dasharatha of Ayodhya had three wives and four sons. The wife named Kausalya gave birth to Rama—the eldest and most brilliant son. Kaikeyi became the mother of Bharata, and Sumitra bore Lakshmana (Rama’s devoted brother) and Shatrughna, who is not very prominent in the story. The king wished to install Rama on the throne as his successor, but Kaikeyi intervened and demanded that the king install her son, Bharata, as his successor, and that Rama be banned from Ayodhya and sent to live in the forests for fourteen years. The king had formerly granted two wishes to Kaikeyi and was now bound by his promise. So Rama departed, accompanied by his half brother Lakshmana and his devoted wife, Sita, who understood it as the duty of a wife to accompany her husband. They went to the forest and set up an eremitical life. In the meantime, in Ayodhya, Bharata refused to take his brother’s place as the king; instead, he installed Rama’s sandals on the throne until his brother could come back to take his rightful place after fourteen years of exile.

In the forest, Rama and his companions went through many adventures, meeting a number of Rakshasas (demons)—including, among others, the demoness Shurpanakha. She fell in love with Rama and tried to seduce him, but he resisted. When the demoness threatened to kill Rama’s wife, Sita, Lakshmana engaged in a fight with Shurpanakha and mutilated her, cutting off her ears and her nose. Shurpanakha then went to Lanka, the kingdom of her brother, the demon Ravana, and complained to him, asking him to take revenge for her mutilation. Ravana immediately traveled to Rama’s forest and succeeded in abducting Sita, Rama’s wife. Rama and Lakshmana roamed through the forests in search of Sita.

They braved a number of adventures and befriended animals of the forest (which are depicted with human characteristics). Sugriva, the leader of a group of monkeys, decided to help Rama if Rama would first help him to subdue his brother and rival Valin. Rama did so and killed Valin—one of the most controversial points of the epic, since Rama, the incarnation of morals and justice, should not kill without a good reason. Now, Hanuman, one of the generals of the monkeys, set out to help Rama, and in fact became Rama’s most devoted friend. Hanuman found Sita in Lanka and was very instrumental in the war that ensued between Rama and Ravana, ruler of Lanka. Finally, Lanka was set on fire, Rama killed Ravana, and Sita was rescued. They all returned to Ayodhya, and Rama was installed as the king. The story has a sequel: Rama banned Sita, since her chastity during her imprisonment in Lanka was questioned—another much-debated point of this epic that has led to criticism of Rama’s character.

Rama, along with Krishna, is perhaps the most venerated deity of Hinduism, at least in the northern half of India. Both of these gods are considered to be avatars (incarnations) of Vishnu, one member of the great trinity of Hindu gods (Vishnu, Shiva, and Brahma). Rama and Krishna are both objects of the bhakti way of worship, in which the devotee approaches the deity with a feeling of loving devotion. Bhakti has been expressed in poetry and songs that are, in fact, love-lyrics, often with a clear erotic aspect. The devotee (regardless of whether male or female) sees himself or herself in the role of the loving girl and the deity in the role of the lover.

The religious cult of Rama has recently acquired a strongly political dimension owing to modern political developments in India. In the early 1990s, Hindu fundamentalist groups claimed a certain place in the city of Ayodhya, on which a Muslim mosque currently stands, as Rama’s birthplace. The controversies reached their peak with the demolition of the mosque in 1992 and ensuing fights between Hindus and Muslims throughout India that claimed many lives. Since 1992, it has become impossible to mention the story of Rama in India without hinting at its misuse by fanatic politicians.

Ramadas of Bhadrachalam

Hindu composer, devotee

Ramadas is remembered as a seventeenth-century Hindu saint, a fervent devotee of Lord Rama, and an inspired composer of many devotional songs in the Telugu language. His songs are still sung all over southern India, and stories of his life of wholehearted faith and dedication still inspire and offer examples of high ideals to people today.

Muslim rulers in southern India employed some Hindus as officials in the seventeenth century. A brahmin official in the Nawab of Hyderabad's court, Madanna, had a sister named Kamamba who was married to Linganna Mantri. Kamamba's son, born in 1620, was named Gopanna. Because of his devotion to Lord Rama, the avatar (incarnation) of Vishnu whom Hindus revere as the perfect ruler, Gopanna became known as Ramadas, meaning "servant of Rama."

Ramadas supported performers (bhagavatars) who sang and told stories of Vishnu's glory and sought a way to earn more money to encourage these religious entertainments. His uncle helped him find a position as a revenue collector of a town named Bhadrachalam. When Ramadas saw that the famous Rama shrine in Bhadrachalam needed repairs, he spent tax money he had collected to pay for repairs and buy new jewels for the image of Rama enshrined there. This offense against the ruler soon brought officials to arrest Ramadas and put him in Golconda prison. Some of his lyrics describe his years in this prison, his ill treatment by guards, and his turning to Rama for consolation and protection. Some lines call to Sita, Rama's consort, to intervene, and others celebrate Rama's greatness.

The most famous episode in the traditional stories about his life describes how Rama and Lakshmana, disguised as two of Ramadas's assistants, appeared to Tani Shah and paid him Ramadas's tax money, getting a receipt. The ruler, astonished by the duo's unusual splendor, marveled even more as he watched them vanish. Wonderstruck, he felt he had seen Rama and Lakshmana and went to the jail cell to tell Ramadas what had happened. Ramadas envied the ruler's good fortune, remarking that the Muslim ruler had seen Rama, while he, the fervent devotee, had not. Tani Shah is said to have given Ramadas gold and released him, dispatching a palanquin to carry him to Bhadrachalam. Ramadas sang a song commemorating how Rama and Lakshmana protected him on the journey. Eventually, Lord Rama appeared to Ramadas to fulfill his wish.

Ramadas wrote Telugu songs that influenced later saintly composers such as Tyagaraja (1767–1847). Indeed, Ramadas's songs are still sung in southern India. He also wrote numerous verses, which are collected in Dasharatha Shataka, and a prose poem entitled Ramayana Churnika. Verses from one song reflect Ramadas's happiness at seeing Rama: "Today I saw my Rama, I was able to find him today! I saw today the harvest of devotees' austerities! Presiding on the crest of Bhadragiri mountain the master archer Rama holding court, along with Sita his beautiful dear partner. I saw today my Rama! I was able to find him today!" (Ramadasa 1967, 225). This song expresses the culmination of years of hope and faith, an exaltation over Ramadas's vision of his beloved Lord Rama.

Ramakrishna Paramahansa

Hindu "mad saint," visionary

Ramakrishna Paramahansa was a Bengali Shakta temple priest who became famous as a "mad saint," that is, an ecstatic visionary, during the nineteenth century. He was also a Vedantin universalist. He was the inspiration for the Ramakrishna Math, a Hindu religious order and social service organization with many schools and medical clinics.

Ramakrishna was born at Kamarpukur, a small village in West Bengal, to brahmin parents in 1836. They named him Gadadhara Chatterji. He was a dramatic child who enjoyed acting and dressing up, and he would memorize religious poems and songs. At the age of seven, he fell into his first trance, at the sight of cranes. When he was seventeen, he moved to Calcutta to study and become a priest. He was soon appointed as priest of the Kali temple at Dakshineswar, which had been built by Rani Rasmani, a low-caste widow who had a hard time finding priests to work for her. Ramakrishna thus began his spiritual practices.

Initiated into a Kali mantra by a Shakta guru, Ramakrishna worshipped in a cluster of five sacred trees. He would fast and cry for long periods of time, meditated on the goddess, and sang hymns to her. Soon, however, he started performing actions that violated traditional Hindu purity rules, such as eating the leftovers of jackals, sharing food with dogs, and cleaning outhouses. He felt burning and paralysis and had hallucinations. At one point, in despair at his inability to see the goddess, he decided to commit suicide. When he held up his sword, the goddess revealed herself as a great ocean of consciousness and bliss.

Ramakrishna identified himself with the goddess, wearing flowers and sandalwood paste. He saw Kali's statue as alive and would laugh and joke and dance with it. He also roamed around naked and threw money into the Ganges River. Local observers thought he was mad. However, attempts at Ayurvedic healing and ritual exorcism did not cure him. His parents thought his celibacy had caused him to go insane and arranged a marriage for him in the effort to cure him. He chose the six-year-old Sarada Devi to be his bride (he was twenty-three years old at the time), left her with her parents, and went back to the Dakshineswar temple, where his symptoms returned. He later took instruction from Bhairavi Brahmani, a tantric holy woman. She declared that his madness was really mahabhava, or religious ecstasy, and convened a group of religious scholars to examine him. They also declared that he was not mad, but ecstatic.

Ramakrishna identified with various mythic characters: He became a handmaiden of the goddess Kali, Radha longing for the god Krishna, and the mother of Ramalala (a small statue). When the sadhu or holy man Totapuri came to visit, he initiated Ramakrishna as a sannyasi, or renunciant, and Ramakrishna had an experience of brahman (ultimate reality). Ramakrishna also practiced Christian and Muslim prayer as well as meditation in several forms of Hinduism. Through all of this, he remained a priest of the goddess Kali, whom he worshipped as the mother of the universe. He died in 1886 of throat cancer.

Ramakrishna came to be recognized as a siddha, or perfected being, during his lifetime, and disciples came to learn from him and follow him as a teacher (guru). One of his major disciples was Vivekananda, who became a force behind the Ramakrishna order after the death of his guru. Vivekananda emphasized Vedanta philosophy rather than the Shaktism or goddess worship of his teacher, and the order followed this emphasis.

During his lifetime, Ramakrishna was understood to be a saint by many of his followers. After his death, and until the present day, there have been followers who claimed to sense his presence, and they say that he comes to them in dreams and visions as a spiritual guide. There have been many books written about him by disciples, and there are also several psychobiographies.

Ramanand

Hindu guru

The Hindu saint Ramanand was probably born in the city of Allahabad (Prayag) to a brahmin family in 1299. His sainthood is predicated upon several factors: his connection with the southern Indian Sri Vaishnava sect, his service as guru to several prominent northern Indian devotional (bhakti) saints, and his founding of the Ramanandi, or Ramavat, sect of the Vaishnava branch of Hindu tradition, which flourishes throughout much of northern India as well as among Hindus of the South Asian diaspora globally. Followers of this sect worship the great god Vishnu in his various incarnations and revere the divine couple, Rama and Sita, as their main deities.

Contemporary scholarship, however, has cast significant doubt upon the claims of Ramanand's association with the prominent Sri Vaishnava sect. Moreover, there is little evidence for the coterie of disciples attributed to Ramanand in the Bhaktamal (Garland of devotees), a text by Nabhadass dating from about 1600, which includes the names of several famous northern Indian bhakti saints, such as Kabir (c. 1450–1518) and Raidas, or Ravidas (c. 1450–1520). The spiritual genealogies appear to have been constructed to enhance Ramanand's status and that of the order he founded by linking him with the Vaishnava sect. The contemporaneity of all the saints named cannot be established on the basis of any reliable historical chronology. The Ramanandi sect, however, remains a vibrant part of the Indian religious landscape.

Ramanuja

Hindu theologian

Ramanuja, born in 1017, was the great medieval theologian of the Sri Vaishnava tradition, a southern Indian Hindu sect devoted to the god Vishnu. He championed a particular form of theistic devotionalism by giving it systematic philosophical formulation, a project masterfully done in his magnum opus, the Sri Bhasya (True commentary), a commentary on the Brahma Sutra, one of the cardinal texts of the Vedanta school of philosophy. The extraordinary combination of Ramanuja's philosophical genius and his own deeply felt devotionalism recalls similar giants in Western religious traditions, such as Thomas Aquinas or Martin Luther in Christianity, Moses Maimonides in Judaism, and Ibn al-'Arabi or al-Ghazali in Islam.

Ramanuja opposed the nondualism of Advaita, a competing school of Vedanta championed by the eighth-century thinker Shankara. Shankara argued that brahman, the Absolute, alone was real and that all phenomenal differences are ultimately illusory. Thus, apparent differences and distinct entities, such as "souls," "persons," or even "god," must be finally canceled out in the economy of liberation. Devotion, while useful as a purifying process, must finally be superseded by knowledge of the supreme Self (atman).

Ramanuja rejected Shankara's philosophy. Criticizing, on various grounds, radical nondualism as incoherent (for example, if reality is one, then the principle of illusion, ignorance, and evil is internal to brahman, which is absurd; if it is "outside" brahman, then reality is plural, not nondual), Ramanuja instead argued that reality is one, unified by the presence of the divine in all beings, but that it is not homogeneous. As a unified whole, reality is nonetheless internally differentiated, just as the body is one, though differentiated by different members or parts, and above all by the presence of the soul, which animates the body. Thus Ramanuja's philosophy is called Visistadvaita Vedanta, the school of qualified nondualism. It posits that though people are ontologically and spiritually dependent on the divine, they also have their own unique personalities or natures. Such a philosophy preserves the fervent devotionalism of the great poet-saints of Sri Vaishnavism as the very pinnacle of religious life, for it includes right knowledge—especially the proper understanding of the soul and God—and the intellectual and emotional surrender that follows from such knowledge.

Ramdass

Sikh guru

In 1574, Guru Amardas nominated his son-in-law, Guru Ramdass (Jeth Chand, born in 1534), as the fourth Sikh guru. In doing so, he passed over his own two sons, Mohan and Mohri. To avoid any opposition, the center of the community was moved from Goindval to a new site given the name Ramdasapur. At the center of the township was a bathing place filled with "the nectar of immortality" (amritsar). The name and location of this new center is significant to Sikh history. For the first time, the central site was not named after God (as in Kartarpur and Goindval) but after the guru himself. Thus the political dimension of Sikhism was highlighted. As for the location, Ramdaspur was built away from the main highway from Delhi to Lahore, indicating the Sikh community's effort to stay away from direct Mughal sight. In addition, Guru Ramdas was the first guru to grow up in the Sikh tradition—he was not a convert like his predecessors. Before his death, Guru Ramdas upheld the principle of nomination and bestowed the guruship to his youngest son, Arjan.

Ramdas, following the tradition of the first three gurus, added his hymns to the growing corpus of sacred Sikh literature. Three main themes run through his writings: the care taken to clearly distinguish Sikhs from dissenters within the community and to repel challenges from without, the emphasis on equality among castes, and the sacred nature of the guru and his community. By 1580, the development of the Sikh community, now a half-century old, was significant, and factions began to develop, prompting the center to clarify and reinforce itself. Furthermore, the community's growing economic and political power also began to attract the attention and ire of the Mughal authorities. Thus, Ramdas wrote about the manmukh (the self-oriented one who does not follow the guru), the bemukh (literally, "without a face," or one who has turned away from God, most likely referring to dissenters within the community), and the nindak (one who opposes the guru, whether dissenting Sikhs or any others) in order to affirm a distinct Sikh identity.

Guru Ramdas's writings also emphasize equality as something sanctified by God. For example, he wrote of the equality before the sanctuary of the holy for all castes, including the most untouchable of the untouchables, and mentions the likes of the saintly Ravidas, the low-caste leather worker, and Kabir, the weaver, among others. It is clear that the Sikh community at this time was made up of many farmers, artisans, traders, and shopkeepers, and the role of women was also highlighted. Guru Ramdas insisted that only the guru had the moral right to rule, however, and that this right was given by God, thus affirming the sacred nature of the guru and his community. To even meet at gursikh (a follower of the guru) was considered a fortunate event for anyone. The word of the guru (gurbani) was likewise revered as the only truth.

Ramprasad Sen

Hindu poet-saint

Ramprasad Sen is considered the best Hindu poet-saint in Bengal to write poetry to the goddesses Kali and Uma. In spite of the awe in which he is held, however, very little is known about him. Born around 1718, he lived in Halisahar, a village north of Calcutta, and after 1758 became the protégé of the most important contemporary popularizer of goddess worship and patron of the arts in Bengal, Raja Krishnacandra Ray. Beyond this, only legends survive. They tell how he impressed his employers with his poetic talent and came to the notice of Krishnacandra and the Mughal governor; how the goddess Kali appeared to him as his daughter to help him fix his garden fence; how he humbled detractors who criticized him for his tantric practices; and how he drowned with the image of Kali as it was being immersed at the conclusion of her annual festival in 1775.

Standardizing Ramprasad's literary corpus is extremely difficult. Current anthologies list about 350 poems, almost five times the number in the first collections from 1855, already nearly a century after his death. Most of his compositions focus on Kali, whom he describes, praises, supplicates, teases, and berates, and whom he exhorts himself to love. His Kali is compassionate, in general, but not always to him; both beautiful and fearful; and capable of saving him from worldly attachments, if she pleases. This recognition of her dual nature—delusive and liberative—is a hallmark of Ramprasad's poetry.

Ramprasad's greatest contribution to the history of Bengali goddess worship is his domestication, maternalization, and softening of a once dread deity. For before Ramprasad's beautiful songs, almost no one had looked upon Kali as a mother goddess to whom one could flee for mercy.

Ransom-Kehler, Keith

Baha'i missionary, martyr

Keith Ransom-Kehler, a wealthy member of the Baha'i faith in the United States, was the first woman to be named Hand of the Cause of God. The title was bestowed upon her shortly after her death in 1933. She died of smallpox while on a mission to alleviate the oppression of the Baha'i community in Iran and is considered the first Baha'i martyr from the United States.

Ransom-Kehler, born in 1876, grew up in Kentucky and Michigan. In 1898, she graduated from Vassar College and decided to pursue graduate studies. She attended several colleges, eventually earning a master's degree. She married her first husband in 1901. They had two children, but only one lived. Ransom-Kehler taught French and English literature at Albion College. Widowed, she moved to Chicago and married a second time in 1910. The family moved to New York City, and through her husband she entered the world of socialites. In 1911, Ransom-Kehler met 'Abdu'l-Baha in London, an event that was pivotal in her spiritual transformation.

Trained as a Christian minister, Ransom-Kehler became a leader in the Chicago liberal Christian community and was active in social reform movements. She affiliated herself as a Baha'i in 1921. Again widowed in 1923, she was able to dedicate more time to her new religion and rapidly became a leading figure in the U.S. Baha'i community. She met the guardian, Shoghi Effendi, during her two pilgrimages to the Baha'i holy shrines in Palestine in 1926 and 1932. Her work to propagate and consolidate Baha'i communities greatly expanded in 1929. She traveled to the West Indies and visited almost all the Baha'i communities with Spiritual Assemblies in the United States. Following this, she left to pursue international missions, never returning to her homeland.

Ransom-Kehler visited and spread the Baha'i message in Japan, China, New Zealand, Australia, and India. While she was in India, Shoghi Effendi called her to Haifa, Palestine, the Baha'i World Center, to propose a special mission to Iran. He personally prepared her for the arduous task of trying to convince the Iranian government to allow the Baha'is to publish and distribute Baha'i books in their country. Ransom-Kehler spent the last year of her life in an exhausting but futile series of meetings with government officials as she attempted to accomplish what turned out to be an impossible goal. At the same time, she traveled around Iran to meet with Baha'i communities, extend support from their Baha'i brothers and sisters in the United States, and help them propagate Baha'i teachings. Her efforts weakened her and she succumbed to smallpox in Isfahan, where she is buried. Shoghi Effendi, in a rare act, requested that a delegation of Persian Baha'is from different cities in Iran go on a pilgrimage to her gravesite on his behalf. The tomb constructed for her serves as a shrine. The year following her death, Shoghi Effendi again asked a delegation of Persian Baha'is to perform a pilgrimage to her shrine on his behalf.

Rashi

Jewish scholar

Rabbi Solomon b. Isaac of Troyes, known by the acronym Rashi and also as “the commentator,” is regarded as the greatest biblical exegete and talmudic commentator of medieval Judaism. During his lifetime, the material and sociopolitical conditions for the Jews of northern France were generally good. Because he demonstrated exceptional intelligence, Rashi, born in 1040, was sent at a young age to study with the great Ashkenazi scholars of the generation, “the sages of Mainz,” in a worldly community of Jewish intelligentsia, merchants, and travelers. Eventually he returned to France to establish his own talmudic academy, earning a living as a vintner to support his family. Almost 400 extant rabbinic responsa testify to Rashi's involvement in public affairs and his understanding attitude when dealing with people's personal and economic problems. Near the end of his life, Rashi and the Jews of northern France were shaken by the crusaders' devastating attacks on the nearby Jewish communities of the Rhineland. A few of Rashi's comments on the Book of Psalms seem to reflect those events.

Both of Rashi's commentaries on the classical works of biblical and rabbinic Judaism certainly became canonical texts in Jewish tradition. Subsequent scholars, especially in Franco-German Jewish communities, could not conceive of either biblical or talmudic study without Rashi's works as a starting point. That is, they would take Rashi's notes, comments, and suggestions as the basis for further reflection on the text. Even some Christian exegetes of the Middle Ages viewed Rashi's commentaries as essential to a proper understanding of scripture. And it is interesting to note that methodologically Rashi's exegetical approach reflects an intellectual milieu similar to that of the Christian exegetes in northern France.

The two poles of Rashi's biblical commentary signal a keen interest in the plain sense of the text based on grammatical and lexical analysis, on the one hand, and a profound concern for the intertextual relationship between the Hebrew Bible and the classical rabbinic interpretation of it, the midrash halakhah (derivation of ritual and legal norms) and midrash aggadah (homiletic literature), on the other. Most remarkable, however, is his characteristically concise and exceptionally clear style, which guided students of diverse intellectual ability in the study of scripture. Rashi's commentary on the Babylonian Talmud presents the student with a study guide, asking questions to lead the reader through the difficult dialectics of the rabbinic discourse. It was even more significant and influential than the Bible commentary, for it provided access for generations of Jews, learned and not so learned, to this document of classical rabbinic Jewish law and lore. Advanced study of Rashi's talmudic commentary was taken up by the "Tosafist school" (supplementary commentators). Rashi's grandsons were especially prominent in establishing and developing this important group of rabbinic scholars in northern France, thereby adding to their grandfather's legacy.

Ravidas (Raidas)

Hindu poet-saint

Ravidas, a poet-saint in the devotional (bhakti) tradition of Hinduism, is widely worshipped by Hindus and Sikhs throughout northern India. His worship has spread globally via the South Asian diaspora, and Ravidas temples are found in England and North America. He belongs to that group of Indian holy people termed sants who worship a nonrepresentational form of God devoid of anthropomorphic attributes. Born in about 1450, Ravidas belonged to the untouchable Chamar caste and earned his livelihood as a cobbler based upon this caste's traditional occupation of leatherworking.

Within Hindu tradition, there is no systematic process for recognizing saints owing to the lack of any centralized religious authority. In the family of saints of devotional Hinduism, however, Ravidas's place is affirmed by several sources. The first is the inclusion of forty of his earliest poems in the Adi Granth, the primary scripture of the Sikh religion. The compilation of this text in 1604 is attributed to Guru Arjun, the fifth in the lineage of the ten Sikh gurus.

Ravidas's name is also included among the disciples of the brahmin guru Ramanand. This list is given in Nabhdas's Bhaktamal (c. 1600), an important anthology of bhakti saints. Recent scholarship has cast doubt on this guru-disciple relationship, as Ramanand's likely period of activity is a century or more earlier than Ravidas's. Nevertheless, the purported relationship demonstrates that in Hinduism claims to sainthood are often legitimated via initiation by a recognized guru belonging to an established spiritual lineage.

As a saint, Ravidas is both a subversive and an ecumenical figure. In Hindu soteriology, the path of devotion ideally creates an egalitarian religious space in which the usual social markers of gender, caste, and the like are leveled in God's presence. Additionally, people from one religious community will often cross such boundaries in worshipping Ravidas and other bhakti saints. Thus, these saints serve an ecumenical function in uniting the disparate traditions and communities that make up the Indian religious mosaic.

Raymund of Peñafort

Christian friar, canon lawyer

A noted canon lawyer and administrator, Raymund of Peñafort helped to form the Dominican order and systematized the canon law of the medieval church. Born in Catalonia in 1180 to a family related to the king of Aragon, Raymund attended the University of Bologna, where he received doctorates in civil and canon law. Afterward, he taught as a master at Bologna. In 1222, while already a priest and archdeacon of Barcelona, he joined the new Dominican order.

His Summa de casibus Poenitentialibus (Summa on penitential matters), a guide for confessors, was popular throughout the Middle Ages. In 1230, he was appointed a papal chaplain and began to compile the Decretals of Gregory

IX, as the collection of papal pronouncements was usually known. The Decretals became the basis of all canon law education, and the Summa was one of the five texts that all Dominican students were required to master. His edition of the Decretals remained part of canon law until 1917, and his Dominican Constitutions were in use until 1924.

In 1238, Raymund became the third master-general of the Dominicans. After only two years, he resigned this position for health reasons. Aside from Dominic, Raymund was the only early master-general to be canonized as a saint. His canonization did not take place until 1601. Raymund maintained Dominic's strict discipline and emphasis on advanced education at a time when some called for reform in these matters.

The remainder of his life was devoted to legal writing and establishing Arabic and Hebrew language schools to aid in the conversion of Jews and Muslims in Spain and Africa. He played a role in the establishment of the Inquisition in Aragon. Raymund quotes Matthew 10:34 in his writings: "I have come to bring not peace but the sword." In his actions, Raymund was not afraid of the conflict brought about by preaching if the reward was more conversions. He lamented how his works kept him from prayer: "Living, as I do, in the whirlwind of the court, I am hardly ever able to reach, or, to be quite honest, even to see from afar, the tranquility of contemplation" (Tugwell 409).

For Raymund, as with Dominic, publishing and preaching were important spiritual work. He believed that education, in the pulpit and the confessional, was the highest calling for any priest. The influence of Raymund's work in spreading this message across medieval Europe should not be underestimated.

Rebbetzin

Rebbetzin, a Jewish honorific term for a rabbi's wife, derives from Yiddish and probably originated in medieval Europe. Although no such title exists in ancient Judaism, its emergence in the vernacular language of Central and East European Jewry indicates that rabbis' wives frequently assumed important if unofficial religious roles in Jewish communities. Rabbis tended to marry women from elite families whose daughters received Jewish educations far superior to those of most women. Many learned rebbetzins led prayers in the women's section of the synagogue and undertook a variety of female community endeavors, including bridal arrangements, burial preparations, and dispensing of charity. Some rebbetzins were regarded as reliable witnesses of their husbands' rulings on ritual matters, particularly related to Jewish dietary laws, and might be consulted for legal opinions. In a social context that honored scholarship above economic success, the rebbetzin frequently supported her family financially by running a business while her husband devoted himself to study. In East European communities, the rebbetzin often had a monopoly on the sale of yeast; she might also cater refreshments following religious events at which her husband officiated.

In North America, the rebbetzin in all denominations of Judaism was expected to fulfill a number of social, communal, and educational functions within her husband's congregation. Prior to the introduction of female ordination in non-Orthodox forms of Judaism beginning in the 1970s, some women who become rebbetzins built on their husbands' positions to achieve their own leadership roles as teachers and representatives of Jewish life within their communities and the larger non-Jewish world. With changing social mores and increased professional opportunities for Jewish women in many fields, it is less common for early twenty-first-century rabbis' spouses to follow these patterns. However, within the Orthodox Jewish community, most rebbetzins continue to fulfill traditional expectations, serving as domestic hostesses to their husbands' congregations and as teachers and counselors to female congregants.

Recognition

The authority of a holy person ultimately comes from his or her connection to the divine. Various religions and regions have, however, come up with specific ways to certify that a person is indeed holy. The most highly developed authenti-cation process is Roman Catholic canonization, which has its roots in the religious hierarchy of later medieval European Christianity. Orthodox Christianity and the Anglican communion have some regulation to recognize a person as a saint, although the process is not as formal as with Catholicism. The Baha'i faith's guardians have also declared the holiness of great martyrs and missionaries. The Chan patriarchs of China designated their successors, the position being of such importance that it carried veneration as a holy person almost automatically. Designation was also an important element in the Sikh religion, as the gurus were named by their predecessors and assumed their mantle of religious authority.

Often the state has taken the most important role in recognizing holiness, especially by granting special names and/or titles to reflect holy status. This is very common in Hinduism, occasional in Buddhism and Islam, and rare in Christianity, but the most important condition is that the ruler have a say in the national religious life. This is a very important theme in China, no matter what religion is represented. Many Chinese emperors sponsored great religious figures, inviting them to court and giving them special authority and titles. The Buddhist monk Jizang (549–623) was appointed as one of ten eminent monks in charge of monastic order; the monk Dushun (557–640) received the honorific "Royal Heart" and lectured at court; Chan patriarch Shenxiu (605–706) was known as the "National Teacher of Three Emperors"; the list could be continued for several pages. The same honor was shown to Confucian and Daoist sages. The Japanese emperors played a similar role in establishing the authority of holy people, receiving noted holy people with special honors and giving them titles such as bosatsu (great priest, first given to Gyogi [668–749]). Also influenced by Chinese practice, Korean rulers did the same, as in the case of the Buddhist monk Chajang (590–658), who was given the rank "Supreme National Cleric" with authority to regulate all Buddhist monasteries.

Similar regulatory power was sometimes given as a sign of spiritual prowess in Christianity. For example, holy men appointed to bishoprics gained considerable authority, as did monastic figures such as Benedict of Aniane (c. 750–821) or Odo of Cluny (c. 879–942) who were charged with regulating several monasteries. The Jain spiritual leader Hiravijayasuri (1527–1595) instructed the Mughal emperor Akbar in Jainism, receiving in return both decrees in favor of the Jain community and the title jaadguru (world teacher). The Asian title with the greatest long-term significance is that given by Mongol leader Altan Khan to the Tibetan holy man Sonam Gyatso (1542–1588)—he was so impressed that he gave him the title ta le, "ocean," to signify that Sonam Gyatso was an ocean of wisdom. This title is given to all of Sonam Gyatso's successors, the dalai lamas. A ruler's recognition that perhaps counted for even more at the time was accorded to the Shi'i teacher Sayyid Kazim Rashti (1798–1844)—the Ottomans had a general massacre in Karbala, but out of respect for the holy man they declared Rashti's home to be a place of sanctuary.

When church and state are separated, such overt recognition of religious excellence is not to be expected. Several awards in the modern world, however, seem to be given especially to people who in earlier times would simply be designated as “holy.” One example is the Presidential Medal of Freedom in the United States. The bold fighters for human rights and dignity who win the award, such as the Cherokee leader Wilma Mankiller (1945–), who was awarded the medal in 1998, are very often recognized as holy people by their own communities. The Templeton Prize is often regarded as a “Nobel Prize for religion.” And the Nobel Peace Prize itself has more often than not been awarded to a person of spiritual stature who has won veneration by a significant population as a holy person. Notable examples are archbishop of Sweden Nathan Söderblom (1930), missionary doctor Albert Schweitzer (1952), Martin Luther King, Jr.

(1964), Zulu chief Albert John Mvumbi Luthuli (1961), Archbishop Desmond Tutu of Capetown (1984), the fourteenth dalai lama (1989), and Nelson Mandela (1993).

Ultimately, however, public recognition of a person as holy stems from a belief that a god has marked someone out. This can especially be seen in miracles, a key element of Roman Catholic canonization. But more informal recognition is also based on miracles in life or after death in many cases. Above all, recognition of a person as holy is based on the belief of a community, either the community in which that individual lived, a specific religious tradition, or some other community of people who have assumed the holy person as a founder or significant contributor after death. Although there are assuredly some saints known to God alone, generally it is only those who have won public recognition who are held up as models in religious practice and other sectors of the public arena.

Red Sticks

Creek religious revival, rebellion

A militant group of Creek Indians (located in present-day Alabama), the Red Sticks led a religious revitalization movement and violent rebellion against other Creek Indians and the United States in 1811–1814.

By the beginning of the second decade of the nineteenth century, several Creek Indian prophets, such as High Head Jim, Josiah Francis, and Hillis Hadjo, had begun preaching a militant message of anti-Americanism and anti-accommodation to white ways. Although they did not preach a complete rejection of all Euro-American wares (guns, for example, remained especially useful), they opposed any cultural adaptation to American customs. They acquired the label Red Sticks for the willingness of some of them to go into battle with only traditional weapons such as red warclubs, red being the color of war. Their message was more spiritual and political, however, than material. They accused Creeks who had accommodated to white ways of witchcraft and sought their destruction.

Constant land encroachment by Americans, selling of Creek lands by chiefs, and adoption of notions of private property and cash-crop farming by many elite Creeks encouraged those of more nativist and traditional beliefs to rebel by the early 1800s. The development of a strong nativist strain among the Creeks coincided with the growing pan-Indian movement under the guidance of the Shawnee prophet Tenskwatawa and his brother Tecumseh. Their mother was Creek, and Tecumseh visited the villages of her people in 1811 to recruit them for the new multiracial movement. Scores of Creek warriors joined the Shawnee militants at Prophetstown in the Ohio Valley, while others employed the militant nativist message in their own villages.

Initially, Red Stick animosity was directed at accommodationist Creeks, with several murders committed by both sides in 1811 and 1812. A civil war had exploded in Creek country at the same time that the United States was beginning a war against Britain and Tecumseh's Indian confederacy in the north. In August 1813, the Red Sticks attacked Fort Mims near Mobile, Alabama, killing about 250 whites. Andrew Jackson then organized a force of 15,000 Americans and anti-Red Stick Indians that conquered the 3,000 or so Red Sticks at the Battle of Horseshoe Bend on the Tallapoosa River in March 1814, killing nearly 900 Red Sticks. Red Stick survivors carried on the fight by joining their Seminole brethren in central Florida and helping them to resist American encroachment for several more decades.

Reform and Reaction

Shi'i Muslims believe that each Islamic century has a mujaddid, a renewer of religious life. The longing to reform seems to be a hazard of all religions that have a written scripture, and many holy people have taken on the role of reformer as the original message of a religion has over time become tainted with other beliefs, has accommodated to local customs, or has simply been forgotten. The need to "reform"—return to the original—is particularly central to the message of holy people who live in times of crisis in world history. But when looked at closely, "reform" is not always as simple as it appears at first glance. Many of the world's reformers have used the label of reform to introduce what in truth have been innovatory beliefs and practices. And not all holy people can be defined by reform; many people have won holiness in the eyes of a broad populace for their resistance to what they perceive as unwarranted innovations in religion, a reaction that is often as strong as the reform tendency. Thus both reformers and reactionaries may exist simultaneously with equal claims to holiness.

Sometimes the case for reform is clear. Sometimes religious institutions are, quite simply, corrupt according to the accepted standards of their own time and place, and holy people have tried, sometimes at the cost of their lives, to end openly dissolute practices. This was the case with the Italian Christian reformer Girolamo Savonarola (1452–1498), who protested the vice of the papal court (the pope of the time lived openly with his mistress, not to mention other abuses) and was eventually executed for it—but many people continued to regard him as a saint, and the Roman Catholic Church is now considering the case for his canonization. "Holy fools," radical, marginal figures who break the established rules of society and are viewed in many religions as touched by God, sometimes show up hypocrisy and point to needed reform. The Zen monk Ikkyu (1394–1481), who exposed the falseness of much monastic life of his time, is a case in point. And sometimes religious institutions are not so much corrupt as in disarray or even missing, thanks to a disaster such as foreign invasion. Thus the Russian reformer Sergius of Radonezh (1314–1392) was central in reviving Russian religious life after the Mongol incursion. And Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.) saw his role as restoration of the ways of the ancient sages in a China torn by internal war and competition.

In other cases, a holy person's call to reform may be based on a new revelation or a personal interpretation of the accepted scripture. An interesting case of this is Mani (216–274/277 C.E.), the prophetic founder of Manichaeism. He accepted the teachings of Jesus and Paul but believed that third-century Christianity had been corrupted, and that he had been sent by God to restore its purity. His contemporary, the Zoroastrian priest Kartir, reformed Zoroastrianism, imposing an intolerant orthodoxy and winning himself the title "soul savior" from the king of Persia; he also succeeded in having Mani killed. In this case, the lines between reform and reaction are very blurred. Was Kartir a reformer, or a reactionary against the reforms of Mani (who claimed that his message incorporated Zoroastrianism)?

Reforming zeal has often led to intolerance. The organizer of Daoism, K'ou Chien-chih (c. 365–c. 448 C.E.), received visions of Laozi urging him to cleanse Daoism. He saw Buddhism as competition, and much of his work was persuading the ruler to have Buddhist monasteries and temples closed. Perhaps harder to condone are the reformers who have fought against the sincere religious interpretations of their coreligionists, a phenomenon that has occurred in all scripture-based religions. Would-be reformers have been condemned as heretics, or, when they have triumphed, followers of tradition have received similar condemnation, sometimes to the point of violence or death. An example is the Japanese Buddhist Nichiren (1222–1282), who taught a new focus on the Lotus Sutra in religious life, apparently regarding this innovation as a reform of the Tendai school. He was nearly arrested as a dissident, and nearly killed in an ambush.

The eleventh and twelfth centuries saw a new flavor of reformers in both Christianity and Islam as innovators tried to impose a new moral standard in the name of return to an idealized past, and were willing to use political mechanisms to support their goals. In Latin Christianity, this was the period when the papacy successfully claimed leadership over the Western Christian world, claiming sweeping secular authority besides religious on the premise that papal independence must be safeguarded from the influence of corrupt secular leaders. A large number of Christian saints of this period, such as John Gualbert, Romuald of Ravenna, and above all Pope Gregory VII, won their reputation for sanctity by fighting simony, the buying and selling of holy offices (a cause that had a clear scriptural foundation), and the marriage of clergy (a cause difficult to support from scriptural sources). North African Islam in the same period saw a series of reform movements with striking parallels. First the Almoravid movement, begun in the first half of the eleventh century by Abdullah b. Yasin, and then the Almohads, under the reformer Ibn Tumart (1107–1130), set out to reform especially the morals of the Muslim population. Both movements regarded force as necessary and even praiseworthy means of obtaining their reforming goals; Ibn Tumart even preached jihad against other Muslims—much as Pope Gregory VII (c. 1020–1085) preached civil disobedience and war against the German emperor Henry IV.

The next great period of reforming holy people in world history began in the fifteenth century. It was a time of rapid change, the beginning of an age of exploration—and exploitation by foreign powers. Also vital in shaping the character of the reformers of this era was the invention of the printing press in approximately 1450 and its rapid dissemination, putting the scriptures of various religions in the hands of a much broader spectrum of the population. This made it possible for movements to become international and for reformers to debate the whole structure of religious hierarchies that had been put in place to mediate between the populace and a scarce scripture. In many cases, what Protestant reformers such as Martin Luther (1483–1546), Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556), or John Calvin (1509–1564) were preaching was a clear return to practices of the early Christian communities; in other cases, their proposed “reforms”—and even more the radical reforms of men such as Jan of Leyden (1509–1536)—were innovations, as they confronted the problem that the Bible simply did not provide complete guidance on how to run a large Christian community over time. It is not surprising that traditional practices and beliefs found their supporters, ranging from antireform martyrs such as Thomas More (1478–1535) and John Fisher (1469–1535) to avid missionaries of a new reform, the Catholic Reformation, such as Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556), who remained closer to the established practices of Christianity than did the Protestants.

It is harder to understand why the sixteenth century was also a reforming period outside of Western Europe. But the Hindu Vallabhacarya (c. 1479–1533) preached the role of grace in salvation and the need for personal revelation. The North African scholar al-Maghili (active c. 1500) militantly urged the purging from Islam of all later accretions, perhaps influenced by the establishment of a Muslim orthodoxy in the Ottoman Empire. And the Russian church was split for twenty years in the early sixteenth century by both the reformer Nilus of Sora’s (1433–1508) campaign to end monastic ownership of land and Joseph of Volotsk’s (1439/1440–1515) vehement defense of the social role of monasticism.

The sixteenth century marks an increase in the complexity of scriptural religions to the point that there has been an almost constant stream of reformers—and reactionaries—throughout the world since that time. The great themes of reformers have been access of the populace to the core areas of faith and a return to scriptural purity without the accretions of time and foreign influence. A series of movements have advocated greater involvement of the laity in religion, ranging from the Hindu reformer Tulsidas (c. 1532–1623), who reformulated devotional piety to the god Rama, to his English contemporary George Fox (1624–1691), who founded the Society of Friends (Quakers). The Jain reformer Acharya Bhikshu (1726–1803) argued that the professional ascetics had created a divide between the people and the divine that was contradictory to the true teaching of Mahavira. Like Fox, Acharya Bhikshu was rejected and persecuted, but he gradually became a spiritual teacher of a reforming sect. Similar in rejecting a religious elite, the eighteenth-century Jewish reform movement led by the Ba’al Shem Tov (1698/1700–1760), Hasidism, was an antirabbinic movement with deep roots in Jewish history, including the Karaite sect founded by Anan ben David in the 760s. Instead, it advocated a more personal religiosity of the laity. One can also see a move to make religion accessible in the work of the Russian Orthodox Filaret of Moscow (1782–1867), who worked to free the church from domination by the state and supported the translation of the scriptures and works of the fathers into modern Russian. A number of other reformers have worked to increase the role of the laity in Christianity, even in religions that strongly support a firm religious hierarchy, such as Roman Catholicism. Pope John XXIII’s (1881–1963) effort to make his church relevant, including adoption of vernacular languages, decentralization of church authority, and diminishment of the cult of the papacy, were all based on a firm belief that the conditions of the modern world called for reforms that were both innovatory and a return to origins.

The Roman Catholic Church is still split over the process of reform instituted by John XXIII at the Second Vatican Council. Was it reform to an earlier Christianity, or a great giving-in to the pressures of modern secular society? Was it an effort to wipe away accretions to Roman Catholicism, or simply the addition of another layer of compromise with the world? These questions apply to many religions today and form part of the matrix of the modern movement of fundamentalism and antifundamentalism. What is the “original” of a language, and can it be regained in a world in which circumstances are very different from those of the founder? Many of the recognized holy people of the twentieth century have been regarded as holy particularly because they have advocated a return to the “fundamentals” of their religion, a stripping away of later additions, an end to compromise with other religions. The process began in the nineteenth century, especially in areas suffering the shocks of colonialism. The Hindu Dayananda Sarasvati (1824–1883) taught that the Vedas, the earliest scriptures, were infallible and that all later additions were corruptions, proclaiming as his goal the need to lead India back to pure Vedic religion. In his case, the movement was socially progressive, rejecting the later caste system, emphasizing social service, and advocating the equality of women. Similarly, the modern Hindu Agnivesh (1939–) argues that untouchability and widow-burning are contrary to the true Hindu tradition. Several African holy people have also advocated a return to ancestral religions as the cure for society’s ills.

In the twentieth century, Judaism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam have all produced religious leaders whose reputation as holy people is based on the need to return to untainted original religion. Often they have bravely suffered persecution for their beliefs, such as Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966), the founder of Sunni fundamentalism who was imprisoned and eventually executed for his proclamations of the religious duty to overthrow the secularizing government of Egypt. The fundamentalist Shi’i leader Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) was persecuted and exiled only to return to Iran to create an Islamic state with the overthrow of the secular government. The numbers of fundamentalist leaders, often willing to resort to holy war to win their goals, seem to be on the increase.

Reincarnation

The theory of reincarnation, the belief that people undergo a cycle of rebirths, developed in India in the sixth century B.C.E. In Eastern religions, it is thought that one’s conduct in the present lifetime decides the conditions of his or her next rebirth. A central quest of Indian religiosity is to end the cycle of rebirths, which is perceived as a tedious and pointless repetition of suffering. The fully enlightened holy person will attain nirvana, escaping from the cycle of reincarnation. Some of the greatest holy people, such as the Jain tirthankaras (ford-makers) or the Shakyamuni Buddha (Gautama), are believed to have won their liberation in this way.

Eastern theories of holiness soon moved beyond this model of ultimate holiness, focused as it is on individual attainment, to embrace the idea of the holy person as someone who could end the cycle of reincarnation but chooses to be reborn out of compassion for the rest of humankind. Many early Buddhists especially came to regard the idea of the arahant, the fully enlightened person who would not be reborn, as ultimately selfish. Thus developed the idea of the bodhisattva, the perfected, liberated soul who chooses to be reborn to help others reach this state. This is a key principle in Mahayana Buddhism, which conceived of the historic Buddha and many other bodhisattvas as constantly reborn through the ages. Mahayana Buddhism even has a place for a bodhisattva vow, a commitment made by a spiritually advanced practitioner to work for enlightenment and then to accept rebirth to teach others. Hinduism also has the concept of ishvarakoti, a free, perfect soul reborn on earth to help the rest of humankind understand spiritual truths.

Thus Buddhism and Hinduism both have a number of holy people who are believed to be reincarnations of earlier holy people, committed to the spread of Buddhist teachings through the cycles of rebirth. This belief is especially prominent in Tibetan Buddhism, which includes a large number of tulku, reincarnations of advanced religious practitioners. These figures, almost always lamas, sometimes appear as individuals who defend a theological stand they had taught in an earlier incarnation. For example, Chandrakirti (c. 580–c. 650) is regarded as a reincarnation of Buddhapalita (c. 470–c. 540). The Tibetan tertons provide an interesting variant on this belief. They are finders of texts that the great sage Padmasambhava hid away in the eighth and ninth centuries to be rediscovered at times when Buddhist doctrine is in decline. Some of these texts are physically hidden, but some were set into the subconscious minds of his disciples, only to awaken to consciousness in a future incarnation of that disciple. Starting in the twelfth century, Tibetans have also recognized reincarnating lineages, whole series of holy leaders who are actually the same great originator, a bodhisattva reincarnated to take the same role again and again. The oldest reincarnating lineage, the Karmapa, have been heads of the Karma Kagyu school through sixteen incarnations; followers believe that the dying leader leaves signs to indicate the location of his next birth. Many of the reincarnating lineages remain today despite the disruptions of Chinese invasion and persecution. Tenzin Gyatso (1933–), the current incarnation of the dalai lama, is one such example.

Hindus also recognize that some holy people are reincarnations of earlier great religious leaders, a belief that seems to be on the upswing in modern times, suggesting a call on traditional authority to buttress religious authority in troubled times. The Hindu Prabhu Jagadbandu Sundar (1871–1921) claimed to be a reincarnation of the sixteenth-century god-saint Chaitanya. The modern charismatic Sathya Sai Baba (1926–) is even more sweeping in his incarnational claims: He is the reincarnation of Sai Baba of Sirdi, who died in 1918, and also an avatara (divine manifestation) of two gods, Shiva and Shakti. He has taught his millions of followers that there will be one more reincarnation after he dies.

Although belief in reincarnation is mostly associated with India, it has appeared in legends of holy people of other parts of the world. An interesting Chinese tradition reports that the sage Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.) traveled to the West, where he was transformed into a pomegranate. Centuries later, he was eaten by an Iranian queen in that guise; she became pregnant as a result and gave birth to the prophet Mani (216–274/277 C.E.). This tale has tantalizing parallels to legends in Celtic folklore, although in the extant Celtic evidence reincarnation is not given as a characteristic of any specifically holy person. In Greece, the Pythagoreans beginning in the sixth century B.C.E. taught belief in reincarnation, a belief adopted by Plato (427–347 B.C.E.). In more modern cases, reincarnation has become connected to holy people in populations that have been exposed to the Eastern teaching. In Judaism, reincarnation is linked especially to Shabbetai Zevi (1626–1676), the most notorious of the would-be messiahs of the early modern period. Thus Nathan of Gaza (1643–1680), a kabbalist and later leader of the Shabbatean movement, claimed to be a prophet of Zevi, and his students believed he was a reincarnation of the kabbalist Isaac Luria (1534–1572). A century later, Jacob Frank (1726–1791) claimed to be a reincarnation of Zevi himself (and also to be the second person of the Trinity). Perhaps most unusual, though, because alien to the tradition from which he came, is the Senegalese Muslim Limamou Laye (1843–1909), who declared himself mahdi (the forerunner of the apocalypse). One tradition says that he also declared himself to be a reincarnation of the prophet Muhammad (570–632). He was succeeded by his son, who in his turn proclaimed himself as a reincarnation of Jesus.

Remigius of Rheims (Rémi)

Christian missionary, bishop

Remigius of Rheims, also known as the apostle to the Franks, was born to an aristocratic Gallo-Roman family from northern France in about 437. He became bishop of Rheims at age twenty-two and, in 498 or 499, following the battle of Tolbiacum (Tolbiac, near Cologne), baptized King Clovis, the king of the Franks, as a Catholic Christian. Although the exact date and location of the king's conversion are not known for sure, most historians agree that it took place in the last years of the fifth century, most probably at Rheims.

When Remigius died at age ninety-six in 533, he was buried in a small chapel outside the city wall, but already in 570 this church was known as St.-Rémi. The saint himself was regarded as the patron saint of Rheims and was credited with numerous miracles, including stopping a plague, extinguishing a fire, refilling empty wine jars, expelling demons, and restoring sight to a blind man. His popularity as a healer was such that his name was popularized as Saint Remedius for his "remedies." His cult flourished in France, Italy, Germany, and Austria. The local liturgy of the monks at his church was the first to argue that Remigius had baptized Clovis using miraculous oil that was brought from heaven by the Holy Spirit.

The Carolingian kings developed a dynastic affinity with St. Remigius, and King Louis the Pious became the first French king anointed at Rheims in 816. Remigius's fame increased when Bishop Hincmar of Rheims transferred his relics to a new reliquary, rebuilt the church (854), and compiled the saint's Life (878). Hincmar, more than any other person, was responsible for the identification of Clovis's baptism with his consecration. Hincmar also invented the tradition according to which all French kings should be consecrated by the bishop of that city, and using oil from the miraculous ampoule that had served for the baptism of the first French king. Following Hincmar, the alliance between Clovis and Remigius became a model for the relations between the French kingdom and the church, and the bishop of Rheims acquired a unique position within the Gallican church. His anointing of the king, using the sacred oil, legitimized the royal family, associating it with David and Samuel as well as with Clovis and Remigius. It was, however, only in 1027, with Henry I, that the consecration took place in the city of Rheims itself. This tradition continued (with only two exceptions) until 1825.

Rennyō

Buddhist monk, reformer

Although it was on the basis of the works of Shinran (1173–1262) that the Japanese True Pure Land Buddhism (Jodo-shin-shu) was founded, it was not until Rennyō (1415–1499) appeared that the True Pure Land Buddhism was interpreted in such a manner that the ordinary people of Japan could participate in its practice. This is not to say that during Shinran’s time there were no lay practitioners of Jodo-shin-shu, but rather that it was Rennyō who made Shinran’s teachings available in colloquial Japanese so that they could be understood by the ordinary people. It is in this sense that Rennyō has been lauded in the Jodo-shin-shu tradition as the restorer of the Jodo-shin-shu piety. He is known as Chuku Shonin (the master who restored [the tradition] in midcourse) or Gosaiko no Shonin (the master who was the restorer [of the tradition]). As a restorer of Shinran’s teaching, Rennyō explained how a follower could practice the single-minded faith of Jodo-shin-shu by giving up all other practices.

In a sense, Rennyō was also a reformer of the True Pure Land Buddhist tradition. Scattered throughout his letters one can find encouragement to continue the practice of reciting the six-letter name of Amida Buddha (Rokuji no Myōgo), procedures for giving up practices that are not conducive to generating a single-minded faith in Amida Buddha (Shinjin Ketsujo), and caution against slandering other religious traditions.

Much of what is known about Rennyō has been derived from memoirs written by his disciples and followers, the letters that he wrote, and writings by others concerning the doctrine and history of Shinran’s teachings. Among the memoirs, the best-known of the collections is the Goichidaiki Kikigaki (Record of words and deeds). The most important source for the reinterpretation of the full expression of Shinran’s life of nembutsu (gratitude) lies in Rennyō’s letters, many of which were compiled by Rennyō’s grandson, Ennyō (1491–1521), into a collection known as Ofumi (Letters), which has become better known within the Nishi-Honganji system as the Gobunsho (another word for “Letters”).

Repentance and Holy People

Many holy people, at least according to popular legend, have been virtually sinless. Some religions, however, have also venerated men and women guilty sometimes of great sins and tragic flaws who have repented their actions. Sometimes it appears that a penitent is holier than a person without fault—as the Japanese Buddhist Shinran (1173–1262) proclaimed: Wicked people are more likely to be reborn in the heaven-like Pure Land because they are more likely than more complacent, ordinary people to throw themselves entirely on divine mercy. A necessary background concept to the idea of penitent as holy person is a clear concept of sin—specific actions or thoughts that make a god angry. It is only Christianity, however, in which saints have been believed to make a specialty of repentance, devoting their entire lives to penitential practices to expiate what sometimes appear to outside observers to be quite small faults.

Sometimes, as in the case of Shinran, holy people have not been repentant sinners themselves but have set their mark on a society by facilitating repentance among the common people. Zhang Daoling (34–156), founder of an important Daoist school, emphasized the connection between sin and human suffering. He introduced repentance and healing ceremonies, attentions so appreciated that when he died it is believed that he ascended visibly to heaven. In Christianity, Zhang’s near-contemporary John the Baptist preached a similar message of repentance and cleansing.

Several great holy people of Buddhism caught the popular imagination because their conversion from a sinful life was so spectacular. For example, legend tells of the Buddhist Ajatashatru, a contemporary of Gautama the Buddha in approximately the fifth century B.C.E., who murdered several people, including his own father. Brought to repentance by the Buddha, Ajatashatru reformed his ways and became a notable supporter of the young Buddhist community. Some tales tell that Ajatashatru spent time in hell to expiate his sins, but Mahayana Buddhists believe that he was reborn among the gods. The need to cleanse one's karma, a longer process than the simple act of repentance, also appears in the legend of the Tibetan Milarepa (1052–1135). He, before becoming a monk, had practiced black magic to win revenge for his dispossessed family (according to his legend). The spell he cast killed many people, which led him to remorse. Afraid of the amount of bad karma he had generated, he sought a teacher to help save him from suffering in his next life. In time, he became a disciple of Marpa (1012–1097), who made Milarepa perform a number of painful and humiliating tasks to wipe the spiritual slate clean. Thus, despite his negative karma, he was able to reach enlightenment. More often, however, Buddhist legend recounts just the fact of conversion from an evil life rather than ongoing penitential practices, even if that conversion was inspired by fear of hell. Thus the Zen Buddhist Hakuin (c. 1685–1768), who as a child took fiendish pleasure in killing and torturing animals, repented when he heard a sermon about hell, became a monk, and afterward lived a normal monastic life. The most famous example of a former sinner among Buddhist holy people is probably the Indian emperor Ashoka, who lived in the third century B.C.E. He himself tells in his inscriptions that he turned to Buddhism after being moved to contrition by all the suffering he had caused in a war. Later legend created a much more lurid past for him, though, saying he committed mass fratricide and that he burned his wives alive after they laughed at his ugliness. But there is little sense that Ashoka's life after becoming a Buddhist was in any way an expiation for his former misdeeds.

It was Christianity that made a specialty of repentance as a category of ongoing behavior for holy people. The gospels specifically assure heaven to the repentant sinner: Jesus told the repentant thief crucified with him: "Today you will be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43). This man, given the name Dismas in Christian legend, served along with the repentant prostitute Mary Magdalene as proof that repentant sinners can be specially blessed. Indeed, this concept was a hallmark of Christianity, and early Christians won ridicule from their detractors because they accepted notorious sinners in their midst.

Perhaps because of this very openness, Christianity later came to emphasize through much of its history the need not only for repentance but for a period of penitence. Penitential practices became the norm as part of a system of repentance and confession (normally in private to a priest by the eighth century). Underlying this development was the belief that God is merciful but also just, willing to forgive all who turn to him but still exacting the penalties of sin; also important was the idea of penitence as medicine, correcting particular sins by a theory of opposites (for example, "curing" gluttony with a period of fasting). By the twelfth century, when the concept of purgatory was firmly defined as a place where repentant sinners were consigned to finish paying off their penitential accounts before reaching heaven, it was normally assumed that each sin required a lot of penitential exercise to clean the slate. In such an environment, in which practically everyone frequently performed at least small penances, a mark of particular holiness lay in overabundance: Naturally, somebody who performed a great deal of very difficult penance was holier than someone who didn't. Legends developed of early saints who repented their misspent youths and spent the rest of their lives expiating their evil deeds. A famous example is Mary of Egypt of the fifth century, whom legend made a repentant prostitute who spent forty-seven years alone in the desert as a hermit, clothed only in her hair, winning through her death-defying asceticism God's forgiveness. Contemporary holy people of the late Middle Ages also spent their lives in penance, sometimes for no known sin. It is not a coincidence that most of the great women saints of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries had short lives: Their penitential ascetic practices were often so rigorous that they could not survive the experience for many years.

The modern branches of Christianity, especially the Protestant churches, have disavowed much of this penitential rigor, and saints are no longer canonized specifically for their penitential lives. A strong sense of the ongoing sinfulness of humankind, and therefore, the need for individuals to repent, remains important, however, in Christian belief and devotion.

Ridley, Nicholas

Anglican theologian, martyr

Like so many sixteenth-century holy people, Englishman Nicholas Ridley, born in about 1503, was largely shaped by the tensions between Roman Catholic and Protestant ideologies. His adherents perceived his holiness in his advocacy and promotion of reform and in his eventual martyrdom for the Protestant cause. A learned Latin and Greek scholar, he became an adherent of the teachings of church reform while a student at Cambridge and the Sorbonne (Paris) in the 1520s. He was an earnest student of the scriptures, and through his beliefs and arguments Cambridge University came to the conclusion that the bishop of Rome had no more authority and jurisdiction from God than any foreign bishop in the kingdom of England.

An active and rising political figure, Ridley became private chaplain first to Archbishop Thomas Cranmer, his great friend, and then to Henry VIII in 1540. The king also presented him with a prebendal stall (for preaching or private prayer) in Canterbury Cathedral. While here, Ridley employed his many talents to expose the abuses of the Roman Catholic Church. Charges were brought against him for these acts, but as the king and Cranmer were his patrons, the charges were never pressed.

Ridley became bishop of Rochester in 1547 and gradually continued to strengthen the reform teachings at Cambridge and other places of learning. He was even part of the committee that drew up the first English Book of Common Prayer during the reign of Edward VI. In 1550, he succeeded Edmund Bonner as bishop of London and did much to improve the condition of the poor, not only by providing food and clothing, but also by preaching these social injustices before the king. He also insisted that the altars in the churches of his diocese should be removed and replaced by simple tables.

Ridley supported Lady Jane Grey's claims to the crown, and in 1553, shortly after the accession of the Catholic Mary Tudor to the throne, he was imprisoned for openly denouncing both the queen and her religion. With Cranmer and Hugh Latimer he took part in the Oxford disputations against a group of Catholic theologians and refused to recant his Protestant faith. He was arrested, tried, and then burned at Oxford on October 16, 1555. By 1559, John Foxe listed him as a martyr for the Protestant church in his famous Book of Martyrs.

Rifa'i, Ahmad ibn 'Ali al-

Muslim sufi

Ahmad ibn 'Ali al-Rifa'i was born in 1106 in a small town in the marshes of southern Iraq; his father died before his birth or when he was a child, according to some authors. It is said that his maternal uncle, Shaykh Mansur, was the head of a sufi order and sponsored his education. Al-Rifa'i was learned in Shafi'i law as well as sufism. In 1145/1146, his uncle bequeathed the leadership of the tariqa (order) to him rather than to his own son.

Although some hagiographies report that al-Rifa'i had huge numbers of disciples, this seems unlikely as he lived in a rural and isolated part of southern Iraq. He is not known as an author, although some of his successors wrote books about him. He is said to have taught poverty, abstinence, and the cultivation of resistance to injury. The practices of his followers became associated with miraculous abilities to undergo physical trials—for example, sitting in hot ovens or riding lions. For this reason, the sufi order bearing his name, the Rifa'iyya, is known in the Middle East and India for espousing practices such as snake handling, walking on hot coals, and eating broken glass. Due to their loud dhikr (litany) they are also called the “howling dervishes.”

This order spread to Egypt, Syria, and Turkey and was one of the best-dispersed sufi movements into the fifteenth century. Ibn Batuta, a famous traveler, visited al-Rifa'i's shrine in Umm 'Ubayda, Iraq, in 1327. Devotion to this tariqa is widespread in Egypt. The great mosque of al-Rifa'i near the Cairo citadel was built in the late nineteenth century.

Rishabha

Jain tirthankara

According to Jain teachings, Rishabha was the first of the twenty-four tirthankaras (ford-makers) of the current declining half-cycle of time. He is also known as Adinatha, “the first lord.”

Jains believe that Rishabha was born at Ayodhya as the son of a chieftain named Nabha. While still a prince, he married two women; by one he had one hundred sons, and by the other a son and a daughter. His birth occurred at a point in the half-cycle at which magical, wish-fulfilling trees, which until then had provided for all human needs, were beginning to run down. In order to make the continuation of human life possible, he invented the arts and institutions of civilization: agriculture, mathematics, writing, the fine arts, and much else. His own marriage was the first such union of our half-cycle. His father nominated him to become the first king of the half-cycle, and as king Rishabha organized society into groups and created the social classes of kshatriya (warrior), vaishya (trader), and shudra (the serving class).

After a long and creative reign, he divided his kingdom among his sons and became a homeless Jain mendicant, the first of the current half-cycle. When he sought alms of food and water, he was initially unsuccessful. People had no idea how to treat him and in their ignorance tried to give him the sort of valuable gifts one might give to a king. After he had wandered about without food for a year, his grandson, Shreyamsa, saw him and immediately went into a meditative state in which he remembered, from a previous birth, the proper method by which laity were to present food and water to mendicants. He offered Rishabha sugarcane juice and Rishabha broke his year-long fast, thus reestablishing the tradition of almsgiving. After 1,000 years of ascetic practice, Rishabha attained the omniscient state and began his teaching mission. At the end of his extremely long and fruitful teaching career, it is said, he shed his body and attained liberation at Mount Kailasa in the Himalayas.

Rishis

Hindu legendary holy men, poets

Rishis, generally speaking, are holy men regarded as patriarchal saints of Hinduism. Their number, names, and characteristics have changed over the course of time and with the development of the Hindu religion and its literature.

The original seven rishis (seers) were the inspired poets who sang the hymns of the Rigveda, the oldest layer of ancient Indian literature (also called Vedic literature), dating back to approximately 1500 B.C.E. Their names (Gritsamada, Bharadvaja, Vishvamisra, Vamadeva, Vasishtha, Kashyapa, and Atri) are first mentioned in early Vedic prose, for example, in the Shatapatha-Brahmana and the Brihadaranyaka-Upanishad (c. 800–500 B.C.E.). These texts, moreover, identify the rishis with the seven stars of the constellation of the Big Dipper (Ursa Major). According to the legends, they “saw” the Vedic hymns in very ancient times and brought the eternal texts to the human world by rendering them into human speech. They are consequently regarded as the forefathers of seven families of Vedic singers.

The identity and number of the rishis appear changed in epic literature. In the Mahabharata, the greatest of the Indian epics (the form available today dates to approximately the fourth century C.E.), ten rishis are known (Marici, Atri, Angiras, Pulaha, Kratu, Pulastya, Vasishtha, Pracetas, Bhrgu, and Narada). They are regarded as ancient holy men who possess great superhuman powers gained through ascetic exercises and meditation. Rishis are generally connected with magic. In the Ramayana (the other great Indian epic, which is slightly earlier than the Mahabharata, dating from about the third century C.E.), a great number of rishis together with their disciples are said to have visited Rama at his court in Ayodhya after he had returned from his exile.

As their number increased over time, the rishis were grouped into different categories. There are devarishis, holy men who reside in the realm of the gods; brahmarishis, thought to be of brahminic descent and characteristics; and rajarishis, who are of royal origin and are thus thought to possess the qualities of kshatriyas (warriors).

Puranic texts (that is, texts that tell “stories of old” and form important sources for mythology and iconography) mention a multitude of rishis spread in groups over different parts of India. One of the remarkable figures among these “later” rishis is Agastya from the south. Regarded as the first teacher of many scientific disciplines, including grammar and medicine, he is a highly venerated saint in Tamil tradition, too.

The common iconography of the rishis in postepic times is that of ascetics wearing the yellow garb and the holy thread, holding in their hands a stick and either a book or a water-vessel.

Ritual

In general, the individual, charismatic holy people of the world, whatever their religion, have deemphasized ritual in favor of teaching themselves and others a more personal mode of conduct with the divine. Some, however, have introduced new rituals, usually in an effort to win the broader populace over to a life of closer contact with divine forces.

The earliest known antiritual movement was that led by the Persian prophet Zoroaster, perhaps as early as 1400 B.C.E. He was a priest who was apparently discontent with “empty ritual” and emphasized human existence as a much more personal and active struggle between good and evil. What Zoroaster reacted against was an Indo-European emphasis on ritual that spread throughout the vast area of Indo-European culture, provoking many responses over many centuries. A great Hindu antiritual movement began in the sixth century B.C.E. with the rise of a class of wandering mendicants, the shramanas, who challenged traditional belief in the value of sacrifice and instead focused on individual responsibility. The power of ritual practice can be seen especially clearly in India, though, as reformer after reformer continued to rise against many of the same rituals. For example, the sants, poet-saints of northern India, denied the value of brahmin sacrifices and found traditional notions of pollution and purity artificial. So did twelfth-century reformers such as Basava, who found that caste and ritual impeded religious progress. So did the bhakti (devotional Hindu) movement of the later medieval period. Even in the twentieth century, religious reformers continued to urge a deritualization of Indian society, most notably trying to break down all or part of the caste system.

Other religions originating in the Indian subcontinent also owe their start to antiritual teaching. For example, the first Sikh guru, Nanak (1469–1539), purposely broke traditional rituals and rules of conduct. A tale is told that when he visited Mecca (Sikhism’s other mother religion is Islam), he lay with his feet toward a mihrab (niche that marks the direction of Mecca). When rebuked, Nanak asked the man who had criticized him to drag his feet toward a place where God was not—making a clear case against consecrated ritual space. Buddhism, too, growing out of the Indian shramana movement, turned strongly against ritual as the way to holiness. In Buddhism, clinging to rules and rituals in the belief that they are sufficient to bring about holiness is one of the four kinds of clinging to existence, one of the ten fetters that bind a person to the cycle of rebirth. Buddhism soon developed its own rituals, and later reformers came to strip them away as useless. Thus the southern Indian Bodhidharma (d.

c. 530?), according to legend, came to China to bring the teaching that rituals, texts, and practices are useless and the true path to holiness is spontaneous enlightenment. This was the beginning of the Chan school, and Bodhidharma’s successors continued this deritualization, one, for example, going so far as to chop up a Buddha image to make a fire. In China, the strong ritual component of Confucianism and Daoism also drew a negative response. For example, Lo Ching (1443–1527), who founded an eclectic religion in China, attacked the emptiness of ritual and prayer—and one branch of his school has brought back a ritual element. Huineng (638–713), who founded Chogye Buddhism in Korea, stripped away most of the formal elements in favor of emphasis on the spiritual life.

Christianity and Judaism, both originally defined in mostly nonritual terms, have also both developed complex systems of ritual that then provoked a reaction by charismatic holy people. Christianity, like Buddhism, owes much of its spread in the Greco-Roman world to the conventional emphasis on sacrifices and rituals rather than personal contact with the divine. In its origins, like other Jewish reform movements at the beginning of the Common Era, Christianity emphasized individual responsibility. But direct contact with God is a frightening thing, and a body of rituals developed to mediate. This, in turn, provoked late medieval responses, culminating in the reformation movements of sixteenth-century Europe. Reformers such as Martin Luther (1483–1546) and John Calvin (1509–1564) condemned “empty” and “useless” ritual in favor of personal, inner change.

Reformers have thus tended to treat ritual in very black-and-white terms, often seeing it as an impediment to personal faith, and tending to ignore that rituals have come into existence in the first place as a channel to the divine. Often reformers have had their way because the particular ritual no longer satisfied the need it was created to fill, but the general populace—and sometimes holy people themselves—sometimes still feel the need for a new, better ritual suited to their own needs. This is the other side of the coin: Although many holy people have condemned ritual, many others have been regarded as holy because they have provided rituals esteemed as beneficial in the quest for the divine. There is no clear breakdown between different religions. Although African and Amerindian indigenous religions put more stress, at least in surviving evidence, on the great creators of ritual, new ritual specialists have grown up in most of the world religions, when time or place has made them necessary.

In Amerindian and African religions, the gods have often helped humankind by providing a specific ritual through the medium of the holy person. For example, the Lakota Sioux have seven sacred rites, given to the people long ago, it is believed, by the ancestral figure White Buffalo Woman. At other times, the ritual has been more specific—as, for example, in the ritual that God supposedly taught the Senegalese prophet Alinesitoué Diatta (1920–1944) to carry out to avert drought. Perhaps the furthest-reaching case of a ritual taught by a holy person, though, comes from Japan, with several variants of a movement sometimes called “Amidism.” Amida Buddha, in essence, promised salvation to all who chanted his name. Holy men such as Ippen (1239–1289) and Honen (1133–1212) developed this into a full ritual structure. Ippen taught people to chant the name of Amida Buddha while dancing in a circle beating drums and ringing bells.

Although Amidism was a popular movement, intellectual holy people have also argued for the efficacy of ritual. The Neoplatonist philosopher Iamblichus (c. 240–325) argued that philosophy alone cannot save the human soul; to do that, one needs specific rituals. The Japanese Zen teacher Bankei Eitaku (1622–1693), founder of the Rinzaï school, taught his disciples to transcend preoccupation by means of ritual. Similarly, the sufi Baha’ ud-din Zakariyya (1183–1262) concentrated on ritual prayer, the salat, as a means to attain union with God, like many other sufis who stressed the need to internalize religious ritual, not to do away with it. Some holy people have even found ritual worth dying for. Many of the early modern Catholic Christian martyrs died in defense of traditional Christian ritual practices at the hands of Protestants. And the Russian patriarch Nikon (1605–1681) launched a massive campaign to purify ritual, making it conform to “correct” Greek usage. He was willing to kill to achieve his goals, and the head of the “Old Believer” resistance, Avvakum (1620/1621–1682), was ultimately willing to die at the stake rather than give up the established rituals of his religion.

Robert of Arbrissel

(c. 1047–1117 C.E.)

Christian preacher, reformer

Robert of Arbrissel was a Breton hermit, an itinerant preacher, a church reformer, and the founder of the abbey of Fontevrault. The abbey was remarkable as an early “double” monastery of men and women.

Born in Brittany in about 1047, Robert studied at Paris then became archdeacon of Rennes. Deeply dedicated to the contemporary movement to reform clerical life, he engendered the hostility of the clergy and in 1093 fled to the forest of Craon, there taking up a rigorous ascetic life in company with a remarkable group of hermits that included Bernard of Tiron and Vitalis of Mortain, both later monastic reformers. He attracted many followers, for whom he founded at La Roé in 1096 a house of “regular canons,” a newer, more flexible style of monastic community than others existing at the time.

Not satisfied with monastic seclusion, Robert took up the commission of Pope Urban II and embarked upon a career as a popular preacher against clerical marriage, purchase of clerical offices, and corruption. Attired in hair shirt and threadbare cloak, his feet unshod, sporting a long, unkempt beard, Robert cut a figure reminiscent of John the Baptist and inspired a contemporary chronicler to quip that he lacked only a club to complete the outfit of a wild madman. His virulent preaching attracted particular admiration among the poor, and he devoted special attention to lepers and prostitutes. He preached reform of life and personal asceticism while at the same time criticizing clerical corruption. These activities earned the hostility of clergy throughout western France. In these respects, commentators have noted, he was difficult to distinguish from other radical preachers of the day whose doctrines and conflict with bishops earned them condemnation and persecution as heretics.

Robert sent many of his followers to take up monastic life, but these provoked the disapproval of the canons at La Roé. Robert consequently resigned as abbot and established a new monastery at Fontevrault to embody his ascetic and reforming ideals. Robert was one of the earliest monastic founders to include women fully into the design of his community, and Fontevrault was one of the earliest “double” monasteries of the high Middle Ages, consisting of two communities, one of women and one of men, governed by the abbess of the women’s community. The pattern was imitated by other orders, most notably that of Gilbert of Sempringham in the twelfth century, and survived until the French Revolution. A community of teaching sisters, some of whom had been members of the old Fontevrault, reconstituted itself in the early 1800s but never included men.

Roch

(c. 1293–c. 1327 C.E.)

Christian caregiver

Montpellier, France, honors its local saint, Roch, who was born there in about 1293. After going on a pilgrimage to Rome and traveling throughout Italy, where he cared for people stricken with the plague, Roch returned home and died there under unusual circumstances in approximately 1327.

Roch's parents died when he was twenty years old. Before setting out on the pilgrimage, Roch distributed two-thirds of his inheritance to the poor and gave the rest to his uncle, the governor. When he returned home several years later, Montpellier was involved in a civil war. Mistaken for an insurgent, he was taken to the governor, who, not recognizing his nephew, condemned him to prison. He died there five years later. Upon his death, his uncle identified him by the cross-shaped birthmark on his chest. Roch incarnates the biblical type who suffers in secret.

Through the ages, painters and sculptors, such as Rubens, Tintoretto, and Louis David, have helped to popularize his image. Represented as a pilgrim with a staff, generally pointing to a wound on his thigh, he is accompanied by a dog, the faithful friend who took food to him in the forest near Piacenza where he was affected by the plague.

Known as the saint of pestilence, Roch is also the patron of travelers and pilgrims.

European cities that consider him their patron, including Patrica, Italy, celebrate his feast day on August 16, the day after the Feast of the Assumption. People who have left home to return to celebrate the last summer holidays, and the Feast of St. Roch is part of this late-summer celebration. Families reunite and renew ties of kinship. As a sign of communal solidarity, they join old friends and neighbors at festivities that underline social cohesion.

In 1925, a group of immigrants from Patrica, Italy, organized the festivities for the Feast of St. Roch, or San Rocco, as he is called in Italy, in Aliquippa, Pennsylvania. Today, the feast lasts for three days. It begins with a mass at St. Titus Roman Catholic Church, which is followed by a procession through the streets of a designated section of town. The procession aims to invoke the blessings of God for a good harvest, as in the past, or for good health and fortune. Besides the religious representatives, the procession includes the statue of the saint, the festival band playing religious and folk songs, and princesses representing various Italian American religious and social clubs. Hometown sports heroes, political dignitaries, and people from other professions who have returned for the celebration might also join the procession. In addition to the parish dinner, there are dances and organized sports. Booths are set up at the park, where people may sample local culinary delicacies or play games of chance. The highlight of the last day is the doll dance, which recalls non-Christian rituals. A fireworks display marks the end of the public celebration of the holiday.

Rolle, Richard

(c. 1300–1349 C.E.)

Christian mystic, author

Richard Rolle of Hampole, a Christian mystic, author, and lay hermit, was the first of a group known as the fourteenth-century English mystics. He is notable for the enormous influence he exerted over popular piety in the next two centuries. Rolle represents those late medieval mystics important for their desire to communicate their experiences in the vernacular as well as in Latin, their preference for the solitary life, and their affective, emotional piety centered on love and on devotion to the humanity and sufferings of Christ and to his holy name. He was part of a new trend in medieval spirituality in which it appeared possible for people living in the world to achieve the highest spiritual perfection, and that revealed itself in the enormous amount of literature produced in this period for spiritual and ethical instruction of laypeople as well as clerics. Rolle and others were concerned with the juxtaposition of the contemplative life with the active life in the world.

Little is known concerning the life of Rolle, who spent some thirty-one years living as a hermit. Originally from Thornton in the diocese of York, where he was born in about 1300, Rolle attended Oxford for a number of years but left at nineteen to become a hermit in a forest near home, fashioning a makeshift hermit's costume from two of his sister's tunics. After his abandonment of a cell within the house of a local squire, there is little evidence for the movements of Rolle until shortly before his death. He died in 1349, possibly of the plague, at the convent of Cistercian nuns at Hampole. He is buried in their graveyard.

Richard Rolle was a prolific author in both Latin and the vernacular and in a number of genres, including scriptural commentaries, mystical treatises, and poetry. These works were written for instruction and spiritual guidance. Emendatio Vitae (The mending of life) calls for adoption of the eremitical life and articulates the value of such practices as poverty, prayer, and meditation in leading one to contemplation and the love of God. It also describes the three stages of love: insuperable, inseparable, and singular. It is the love of Christ, an affective piety, a desire for an intimate union between Jesus and the soul that consumes Rolle, a love articulated in the Incendium Amoris (Fire of love), which describes his spiritual progress first as the opening of heaven's door and then in terms of receiving the gifts of heat, sweetness, and song (calor, dulcor, canor), a characteristic terminology for the author that results in a mystical ecstasy constituting a foretaste of the vision of God to be realized in heaven, the true homeland of the soul.

Rolle also wrote influential works in English. These include commentaries on the Psalms, letters written for women, such as The Form of Perfect Living, and meditations on the passion that concentrate affectively and quite graphically on the sufferings of Jesus in order to stimulate the reader to meditation and penance.

Romanos the Melodist

(c. 490–c. 560 C.E.)

Christian hymn writer

Called the preeminent and most original of the Byzantine hymn writers and religious poets of the Eastern church, Romanos was a Syrian of Jewish origin, born in about 490, who served as a deacon in Beirut before arriving in Constantinople during the reign of Anastasius I (r. 491–518). He is credited with writing more than 1,000 hymns during his lifetime, of which approximately eighty have survived to the present day, none with music. According to legend, the Virgin Mary visited Romanos in a dream one Christmas Eve and gave him a scroll to eat that gave him the ability to write poetry, which he immediately used to write and sing his most famous work, On the Nativity I. His authorship of the monumental Akathistos (The "not sitting") hymn has been suggested but is questionable.

Romanos used and developed the kontakion, a complex verse form of twenty-four stanzas, each a perfect imitation of the first. The metrical system is based on stress-accent closely tied to the text. A short prefatory stanza called the koukoulion, which was independent both metrically and melodically from the rest of the poem, often preceded the kontakion. Romanos's use of the Greek language throughout his works helped to standardize its usage and vocabulary for centuries to come.

Kontakions were sung after the reading of the gospel in the morning office, and their use as verse sermons influenced their themes and functions in the Greek liturgy. Themes from the Old Testament, deeds of martyrs and saints, and the life and ministry of Christ are often woven together by Romanos in his poetry. Romanos brought the direct and indirect influence of his Syrian background into his lyrics, and this had a considerable influence on the Greek language and those hymnodists who followed him. Some scholars regard Romanos as the greatest religious poet of all time. His feast day is celebrated on October 1.

Romanovs

(d. 1918 C.E.)

Russian Orthodox rulers

The last rulers of Russia—Nicholas and Alexandra—and their five children (Olga, Tatiana, Maria, Anastasia, and Alexis) were murdered on July 17, 1918, in Ekaterinburg, Russia, on orders from the local Bolshevik party authority, and ultimately on orders from Vladimir I. Lenin himself. They were unofficially venerated in Russia and among émigrés for decades before the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad canonized them in 1981. The Moscow patriarchate followed in 2000. Categorized as “royal martyrs” by the Church Abroad and as “passion-bearers” by the Moscow church, the Romanovs occupy a special category of saints venerated less for the way they lived than the way they died.

Like the first saints in Russian history—Boris and Gleb, who died in 1015—Nicholas and Alexandra were admired for the Christlike way that they lived after their abdication in March 1917. Their letters, diaries, and servants’ testimony all speak of their calm acceptance of their fate. Their “fatalism” appeared even before the Revolution. Many observers felt that when faced with revolutionary strife in his capital and across Russia in 1905 and 1917, Nicholas failed to respond constructively out of his conviction that Russia’s fate, and his own, were ordained by God alone. This essentially mystical approach to rulership, unique in Europe in the twentieth century, probably began at Nicholas’s coronation. Sources from the time, including the tsar’s own reflections on the event, suggest that he viewed his coronation as a sacrament, and that from that moment on he thought his rule was a sacred trust from heaven.

Similarly, the last empress of Russia had a markedly mystical, some even claim hysterical, approach to Orthodox worship and practice. Born a Lutheran, Alexandra (née Alix) converted to Orthodoxy in 1894 and, by all accounts, embraced her new religion zealously, attending services regularly, fasting, and following a stringent prayer regimen. Both Alexandra and Nicholas became even more devout after the birth in 1904 of their son, Alexis, who was afflicted with hemophilia. This turned disastrous for the royal couple and for Russia when the search for a cure led them to seek out “holy people”—some no more than charlatans—to find a cure for their heir. Both consented to give audiences to healers of various sorts, and even to hold séances. Their obsession with Alexis’s hemophilia best accounts for the appearance of Grigorii Rasputin to the inner circle of the imperial family. His apparent ability to control Alexis’s bleeding episodes—perhaps through hypnosis, perhaps by advising the empress not to permit aspirin to be administered to the boy to relieve the pain during his bouts with the disease (aspirin’s blood-thinning qualities being unknown at the time)—secured his place at court and the empress’s (and to a point, the emperor’s) protection, despite his debauched lifestyle and meddling influence on domestic policies, especially during World War I when Nicholas was away at the front.

Though controversial both as rulers and as “saints,” most observers agreed that their piety was sincere and that, regardless of how poorly the emperor ruled, his and his wife’s behavior after their abdication was dignified and charitable. Even their guards noted their kindness. Their quiet acceptance of imprisonment appears to have been born of Orthodox notions of humility and spirituality; indeed, it seems modeled upon it. Ridiculed as a ruler for his weakness and anachronism, Nicholas II was a modern model of the kind of humility and sacrifice rare for royalty. In this sense, the recent recognition of the royal family as passion-bearers and martyrs seems less a political decision by a Russian church keen to help Russia exonerate itself from its bloody past than an appropriate designation of the Romanovs into a legitimate and ancient category of Orthodox saints.

Other Romanovs were massacred between February 1918 and January 1919 and are likewise regarded as martyrs. Among these is Grand Duchess Elizabeth, Empress Alexandra’s sister. She had become a nun when widowed in 1905 and had founded an order of nuns devoted to charity and social work. Her body was recovered and today is interred at St. Mary Magdalene’s Convent on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem. One of the first new churches constructed in Russia after the fall of Soviet power was dedicated to the Royal Martyr Elizabeth.

Romero, Oscar

Roman Catholic archbishop, martyr

Oscar Romero, the Roman Catholic archbishop of San Salvador who was assassinated in 1980 while celebrating mass, was born on August 15, 1917, in eastern El Salvador. He attended the town school until the age of twelve or thirteen, when he became a carpenter's apprentice. However, the course of his life was changed when he decided that he wanted to be a priest. He was ordained in Rome in 1942. Early in his ecclesiastical career, Romero became famous for his preaching. He was quickly promoted, receiving the title "monsignor" in 1967. He was named auxiliary bishop of San Salvador in 1970 and became bishop of Santiago de María in 1974. Romero became archbishop of San Salvador on February 14, 1977. That same year, in a blatantly fraudulent election, General Carlos Humberto Romero came into power. General Romero was one of a long line of dictators who had ruled El Salvador since 1932, when a popular insurrection had been suppressed by military force.

Before becoming archbishop, Romero had been unwilling to address government-imposed oppression and violence publicly. However, several acts of violence that occurred between his nomination and General Romero's ascendancy on July 1 seem to have been a turning point for him. Most significant was the March 13 shooting of his friend, the Jesuit Rutilio Grande, along with an elderly man and a young boy, while on his way to say mass. In his first act of public protest, the archbishop did not attend the general's inauguration. He explained in a homily that his absence was intended to indicate that the church was open to dialogue but only under certain conditions of governmental openness and sincerity. He followed his protest with a second pastoral letter after the general's inaugural address. As repression and acts of violence continued through 1979, Oscar Romero became known for his support of human rights in his country. On May 8, soldiers fired into a demonstration in front of the cathedral, leaving twenty-five people dead. On May 22 at a demonstration at the Venezuelan embassy, a similar shooting left fourteen dead. It was events such as these that led Archbishop Romero to address violence in his fourth pastoral letter.

In 1979, the government of Humberto Romero was overthrown, and the new regime took the level of oppression to new heights. In response, Romero became increasingly outspoken, calling on the government to put a stop to the injustice. He even wrote a letter to U.S. President Jimmy Carter requesting that the United States cease sending arms to El Salvador. On March 23, he gave a homily in which he ordered the government to "stop the repression." This homily is often considered the catalyst for his assassination, which occurred the next day, March 24, 1980, in a hospital chapel in San Salvador. Almost immediately after his death, the archbishop was hailed a saint by the local people and by many others throughout the world.

Romuald of Ravenna

Christian hermit, reformer

Romuald, who was called "the father of reasonable hermits who live under a rule" by his first biographer, Peter Damian, in the eleventh century, was born to a noble family in the northern Italian city of Ravenna in about 951. Because he was present when his father killed his uncle in a duel, he entered the newly reformed monastery of Sant' Apollinare in Classe in 973 to perform the statutory forty-day penance for participating in homicide. Repeated visions of St. Apollinare compelled him to stay and become a monk.

Romuald embraced the monastic life with fervor, repeatedly criticizing the lax observation of the rule during his novitiate at Sant' Apollinare; after three years, he requested (and was granted) leave to join the cluster of hermits who had gathered around Marinus in the Veneto, an ascetic who followed neither rule nor master in the eremitical life. Romuald spent four years with Marinus and his followers as a wandering hermit in central and northern Italy until, in 978, on the invitation of Abbot Guarinus of Cuxa, they left Italy for a hermitage outside Guarinus's monastery in the Pyrenees. Romuald and Marinus were accompanied on their journey by Peter Orseolo (who had resigned as doge of Venice to enter the religious life) and two Venetian noblemen. In their small hermitage, they led a life of exceptional asceticism, engaging in fasting, manual labor, and agriculture. Romuald devoted himself to the study of the early monastic authors, especially John Cassian (c. 360–c. 433), and from this devised what he saw as the perfect eremitical fast.

Ten years later, Romuald returned to Italy to prevent his father from leaving his monastery. He then took up a peripatetic career as a monastic reformer fighting abuses in existing monasteries and establishing a large number of new hermitages and monasteries. As Romuald traveled, he gathered disciples together and either lived with them for a while as hermits or built a monastery for them while leading a reclusive life himself. According to Peter Damian, Romuald “burned to do good so that he was never content with what he had done and while at work on some project would soon be rushing off to something different, so that it looked as if he wanted to turn the whole world into a hermitage” (ch. 37). In the late 990s, Romuald returned to St. Apollinare as abbot, a position he accepted only after pressure from Emperor Otto III. The uncompromisingly strict way of life that he imposed at St. Apollinare made him unpopular with the community—his vita records the complaints about the appalling conditions he expected his followers to live in—and he soon resigned. The Sacro Eremo (Holy Hermitage) of Camaldoli was founded around 1023 on land where Romuald reportedly had a vision of his white-clad disciples climbing a ladder reaching from earth to heaven, where they were received by Christ. This community eventually became the center of the reform movement he inspired, although there is no evidence to suggest that he or his contemporaries saw Camaldoli as more important than the other houses he founded or reformed.

Although Romuald left no rule of his own, he laid the foundation for the establishment of a new kind of eremitism, one with definite rules and that could easily become institutionalized into a monastic community without losing its austere and eremitical character. The eremitic monastic communities he founded were eventually united into a congregation by Pope Alexander II in 1072. Romuald’s feast day is now celebrated June 19; it was previously celebrated February 7.

Root, Martha Louise

Baha’i missionary

In 1939, soon after her death, Martha Root was called by the guardian of the Baha’i faith the foremost Hand of the Cause of God, the highest spiritual station a Baha’i can attain. Years before, the guardian, Shoghi Effendi, had heralded her as a unique apostle of Baha’u’llah (1817–1892). Although she was no longer young, had limited financial means, had cancer, and was afraid, lonely, and physically frail, she traveled several times around the world during eight lengthy trips to disseminate the Baha’i faith in as many parts of the globe as possible. She is primarily remembered for her intrepid, pioneering, audacious, and persevering spirit.

Martha Root, born in 1872, was raised in Pennsylvania and attended Oberlin College, but she eventually graduated from the University of Chicago in 1895. Her professional career began as a teacher, principal, and then a lecturer. However, in 1900 she was able to establish herself as a journalist. She became a Baha’i in 1909 and met ‘Abdu’l-Baha in 1912. This was a pivotal experience in her spiritual development. In 1915, supporting herself as a journalist supplying stories to U.S. newspapers and magazines, she departed on her first trip for the Baha’i faith, traveling to Europe, Egypt, Asia, and Hawaii. In Egypt, she served as an early foreign correspondent, reporting on the displacement of the Jews from Palestine by the Ottoman Empire. In 1919, she left for South America, the Caribbean, and the southern coast of the United States. After some short travels in Canada and the United States, in 1921 she traveled to Mexico and Guatemala. When her mother died, she remained at home to care for her father. When her father died in 1922, she was free to dedicate herself to traveling to spread her religion, barely supporting herself through journalism and odd jobs.

Root started with a cross-country trip through the United States, and then from 1923 to 1925 went to Australia and New Zealand, Asia, and Africa. During the next four years, she traveled in Palestine, Europe, and Turkey. In Palestine she completed a pilgrimage to the Baha’i holy shrines and met Shoghi Effendi. From the end of 1929 to 1931, starting with Egypt, she crisscrossed the Middle East, Asia, and Hawaii. During this time she was again able to meet Shoghi Effendi. While in Iran, she gathered material and wrote the first book ever published on Tahirih (1817–1852). After spending one year traveling in the United States, from 1932 to 1936 she roamed Europe, including the Balkans, and the European part of Turkey. After a ten-month semi-rest from traveling, which she spent in the United States, the following two years saw her return to Asia, Australia, and New Zealand. Martha Root, soaring in what she called “spiritual skylarking,” braved through strikes, epidemics, illness, extreme fatigue, revolutions, civil strife, bombing, war, and rigorous forms of transportation, including an icy crossing of the Andes by mule, to accomplish her goal of disseminating the Baha’i teachings. She finally succumbed to cancer and died in Hawaii, where a monument was erected in her honor.

Rose of Lima

Roman Catholic visionary, ascetic

Isabella de Flores, known as Rose of Lima, patron saint of the Americas and the Philippines, was the first canonized saint of the New World. Born as one of eleven (or thirteen) children to Caspar del Flores and Maria del Oliva in Lima, Peru, in 1586, Isabella evidenced, at a very young age, a deep and passionate spirituality that was sometimes manifested by intense mortification of the flesh. Although raised in a household of traditional middle-class values, Isabella rejected the social expectations of her parents and the materialism of her Spanish community in Lima and devoted herself instead to continual prayer, deep contemplation, and works. She had a special devotion to the infant Jesus and the Virgin Mary. Isabella’s family fell into economic ruin, and to alleviate their burden, Isabella toiled at sewing and garden work. However, for ten years she refused their urgent request that she marry, insisting that she be allowed to live a life of purity and devotion. She was emboldened in her request by her professed admiration of the life of Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), who would remain her role model for her entire life, and by her mystical visions.

Finally relenting, her parents permitted Isabella to enter the Third Order of St. Dominic as “Rose of St. Mary” when she was twenty years old. Rose remained at her parents’ home (as had Catherine of Siena), living in a garden hut, and continued to help support her family with her exquisite needlework and with her gardening, growing and selling flowers of great beauty. She discovered herbal remedies from the lore of folk medicine and went about the streets of Lima distributing such medicines to the poor, or welcomed the poor to her “infirmary” in the garden. Rose continued to live a pious life, however, submitting herself to grave acts of penance and deep prayer that might last up to three hours a day. She experienced frequent visions and ecstatic revelations, during which she presented her acts of penance as offerings for the salvation of the souls in Purgatory.

Rose devoted herself to the native Peruvian Indians, whose conversion she sought but not at the expense of their physical and emotional well-being; nevertheless, she was constantly countered in her attempts by the Spanish land barons who continued to exploit and persecute the native peoples. By 1614, however, Rose began to suffer greatly from asthma and severe arthritis, and she also began to be haunted by strange and disturbing nightmares. Her only source of comfort came from her close alliance with another Peruvian saint, the Dominican Martin de Porres, who ministered to her spiritual concerns. She died, at age thirty-one, in 1617 after a trying bout of fever and paralysis. She was canonized in 1671, and her feast day is August 23.

Rúhíyyih Khánum

Baha’i leader, missionary

Rúhíyyih Khánum, or Mary Sutherland Maxwell Rabbani, born in 1910, was the last link to Baha’u’llah’s holy family. Her full married name, given to her by her husband, Shoghi Effendi, guardian of the Baha’i faith, was Amatu’l-Bahá Rúhíyyih Khánum. Her parents held eminent positions within the Baha’i community. Her mother, May Bolles Maxwell, played a pivotal role in introducing the Baha’i faith to Europe and Canada. William Sutherland Maxwell, her father, was a well-known architect. In 1951, he was appointed a Hand of the Cause of God, the highest spiritual station that a Baha’i can attain. Popular Baha’i history recounts that Rúhíyyih Khánum’s parents were able to conceive her through a miraculous intervention by ‘Abdu’l-Baha. Amatu’l-Bahá’s formal schooling was erratic; she was primarily educated by her parents to serve the Baha’i faith. In 1923–1924, May Maxwell took her daughter on a year-long trip, making two lengthy pilgrimages to the Baha'i holy shrines in Palestine. These were Rúhíyyih Khánúm's first meetings with Shoghi Effendi. Two years later, she accompanied two of her mother's closest friends on another pilgrimage, again meeting the guardian.

These trips galvanized her into becoming a dynamic Baha'i youth. She began what became a lifelong effort working for peace, and at fifteen years old she was elected treasurer of the executive committee of the Fellowship of Canadian Youth for Peace. By 1928, she was actively involved in interracial activities. This developed into a lifelong passion; Rúhíyyih Khánúm was a tireless champion of the rights of indigenous peoples. By the time she was nineteen, she was an experienced public speaker. She continued to speak to audiences on the Baha'i faith throughout her life, becoming one of the religion's most prominent spokespersons.

From her adolescence, Rúhíyyih Khánúm was trained by her mother to travel with the goal of disseminating the Baha'i faith. In 1935, she began her first major trip to propagate the faith, traveling to Germany with cousins for two years. Eventually, she traveled around the world to teach the Baha'i faith. Her father also had an important impact on her education, especially because she accompanied him when he attended official functions. Eventually, she became the Baha'i faith's premier official representative and met with royalty and rulers around the world. Rúhíyyih Khánúm also fulfilled her lifelong dream of becoming an author and wrote poetry and other works. In 1937, she and her mother were invited by Shoghi Effendi for another pilgrimage. It was during this visit that her marriage to Shoghi Effendi was arranged. Rúhíyyih Khánúm quickly became the guardian's main support and assistant. In 1952, he appointed her a Hand of the Cause of God and began to send her around the world as his personal representative.

In 1957, when Shoghi Effendi and Rúhíyyih Khánúm were in London, the guardian died with no successor and no will and testament. Rúhíyyih Khánúm played a crucial role in maintaining the unity of the Baha'i faith during the years that followed. In 1963, when the Universal House of Justice was elected, she felt free to begin traveling around the world to again propagate the Baha'i faith and consolidate Baha'i communities. She traveled to more than 180 countries. Three of her most memorable trips were those to India in 1964, to Africa from 1969 to 1973, and to the Amazon Basin and the Andes in 1975.

Rulers as Holy People

Throughout the premodern world and in many countries today, the ruler of a territory has often played a decisive role in religion. Subjects have sometimes worshipped kings or queens as gods, for example, acknowledged all of their rulers as mediators to the holy, or recognized only certain rulers as holy owing to particular virtues—or, more often, because of their services in aiding the spread of the religion that they follow. It is often the ruler who has “made things happen,” enabling right religious practice. Thus, Hinduism accepts the idea of a cakravartin, a “wheel turner”—a universal and ideal ruler who in his or her own person creates a union between heaven and earth. This concept was expanded in Buddhism and Jainism to include the ethical sovereign, who is less universal but still makes the practice of right religion possible—figures such as the Indian Buddhist emperor Ashoka in the third century B.C.E. Rulers are also often regarded as the figures who have raised humankind above the beasts in the first place. The sage-emperors of China fit into this category, as does the legendary Hindu Prithu, said to be the first rightful monarch on earth and the one who introduced agriculture. The role of the ruler is central to Confucius's teaching: If a ruler is righteous, the subjects will be also. Indeed, many societies have believed with the Confucians that for harmony in the world society must be hierarchical, with a single ruler at the top.

Several societies have been ruled by god-kings. The ancient Greeks developed a strong ruler cult. It is hard to know how much the average person regarded them as gods in actuality, but certainly the cult helped these rulers to operate in the political sphere at least from the time of Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.). This practice was borrowed by Roman emperors, who received prayers and were regarded as important protectors and intermediaries for the Roman people. These were holy people by fiat, people who claimed the throne and took divine trappings as part of the regalia of office. Greater evidence that typical people did indeed regard rulers as divine in some way comes from regions with a strong pattern of hereditary kingship. In ancient Egypt, for example, the pharaohs were both the direct descendants of the previous ruler and specially begotten by a god. The rulers of Japan are said to be direct descendants of the sun goddess Amaterasu—the current emperor, Akihito (r. 1989–) is the 124th in the line. But he himself is (or was, until 1946, when his father, Emperor Hirohito [r. 1926–1989] forswore his divinity) a “manifest kami,” a part of the realm of the divine.

The Khmer rulers of what is now Cambodia included god-kings such as Suryavarman II (r. 1112–1150), who built the great temple complex of Angkor Wat as his tomb. It should be noted, though, that these are cases of corporate holiness, rather than individual holiness, that is, deriving from a special function held in society rather than personal attributes.

Much more commonly, rulers have authority by right of divine descent. For example, the Inca rulers were believed to be offspring of the sun god, as are the emperors of Japan. Such kinship puts rulers in a special mediatory position, able to intercede between heaven and earth, or between the people and the ancestors, as with Zulu kings and their kinship group. Such rulers often take on the attributes of priest as well as king. For example, this pattern appears in the Amerindian Mississippian cultures of the southeastern United States. As told in eighteenth-century accounts of the Natchez Indians, these groups were ruled by a priest-king called “the great sun” who was the most important access the population had to the gods; the collapse of the great chiefdoms with the Spanish invasion thus caused a spiritual crisis beside which the political crisis of these people paled. Mesoamerican rulers joined their priests in practicing auto-sacrifice in imitation of the gods.

In such cases, it is usually impossible to tell whether the religious or the ruling function came first; most likely, the distinction between the two is a false one in many societies. In more recent cases, however, religious rulers, either as individuals or as part of a lineage, have assumed political power, creating theocracies. The first ruler of this sort and sometimes all his successors are regarded to be particularly holy people. Three examples show the range of this idea: the Shi’a imams, the dalai lamas, and the Christian popes. Shi’a imams claim their religious and political authority by right of descent from Muhammad (570–632); all imams are figures of particular holiness, and all have special rights to decide matters of doctrine. Even when they haven’t actually ruled, they have claimed the right to rule by hereditary descent. This has held true even when the imam seemed to reject the tenets of his own religion. Thus, when the Nazari Isma’ili imam Jalal al-Din Hasan III (1166–1221) of northern Iran proclaimed his adherence to Sunni rather than Shi’i Islam, his people accepted this as a religious dissimulation by their infallible imam. The Buddhist dalai lamas of Tibet have also been secular as well as religious leaders since the time of Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), the “Great Fifth.” In this case, the religious leader moved into a political vacuum, with Mongol help uniting the three provinces of Tibet, and proved able to perpetuate political authority by right of religious authority, at least until the Chinese invasion, and even now in the Tibetan diaspora. The popes, bishops of Rome, similarly moved to fill a political vacuum as the Roman Empire disintegrated in the fifth century, controlling a small but vital area of central Italy, the Papal State, until the late nineteenth century. In this case, the popes usually fought for their rights as ruler of an independent state to preserve their freedom of action, subordinating the needs of the Papal State to their much more central religious role of spiritual authority over a much broader Christian world.

Sometimes, according to popular belief, a god or gods may appoint particular rulers as divine instruments for specific purposes. This is an important theme in early Judaism, including not only the ancient judges—temporary leaders appointed by God to deal with a particular threat—but also the kings and even the sixth-century B.C.E. Persian ruler Cyrus the Great, whom Isaiah calls “messiah” and recognizes as the instrument of God. Such rulers become holy upon divine election—as, for example, when the spirit of God came upon David when he was anointed (1 Sam. 16:13). Sassanian and Abbasid rulers of the Middle East were recognized as the “shadow of God on earth.” But this concept is most developed in China, where the emperor was believed to have special approval of heaven. This “mandate of heaven,” however, could be lost if the ruler fell from a high standard of virtue, just as Israelite rulers could win God’s displeasure. Less critical was the idea of the “divine right of kings” as it developed in Christian Europe. Rulers were anointed by God for their office, and nobody had a right to remove them but God alone, said this doctrine. Thus, even such a thoroughly incompetent ruler as Charles I (r. 1625–1649) of England could be venerated as a martyr after his own subjects rebelled and eventually executed him, because he had been ruling by the will of God. The even more disastrous last rulers of Russia, Nicholas and Alexandra (r. 1895–1917; d. 1918) of the Romanov family, were canonized for a combination of belief that rule was a trust from God and for their Christlike life after the abdication, when they calmly accepted their fate.

The easiest way for a ruler to be recognized as a holy person was and still is to support a particular religion. Examples can be found around the world, ranging from Chinese emperors such as Hui-tsung (1082–1135), a very strong supporter of Daoism throughout his realm, to the founder of the Songhay Empire in West Africa, Sonni ‘Ali Ber (r. 1464–1492). The latter figure is regarded as a charismatic holy man by Muslims, even though he remained syncretist in his beliefs and rose to the throne through “magical” powers. Such matters can be overlooked in the broader picture of religious support.

Buddhism from its beginning recognized as holy rulers who supported the samgha (monastic community). The list of Buddhist holy people includes no fewer than three Indian kings who supported the Buddha himself. Emperor Ashoka of the third century B.C.E. is a model of enlightened rule, both for his personal qualities and for his support of the spread of Buddhism, including sending out missionaries to other realms. The theme of the holy king who spreads the faith is very important in Tibet, which venerates a number of “religious kings,” including Sengsten Gampo (c. 617–698), who converted to Buddhism, founded many holy sites, and spread Buddhist teaching. Success isn’t even required for veneration; the third religious king, Relbachen (r. 815–836), supported Buddhism in his state, causing such widespread resentment that in time he was murdered by two of his ministers, and his successor started persecution of Buddhists. Shotoku of Japan (573–621) is regarded as a bodhisattva (enlightened being): While regent of Japan, he established a purer form of Buddhism, sending priests to study in China and sponsoring temples. Similarly, Emperor Shōmu (701–756) made Buddhism a state religion and gave lavishly to the Buddhist establishment. His achievements include the great monastery of Todai-ji, which has a main hall that is recognized as the largest wooden building in the world, and a sixteen-meter-tall gilt statue of the buddha Birushana. Special holy status is even granted to rulers who were in other ways brutal and not particularly virtuous, as long as they helped in the spread of the faith, such as the controversial Empress Wu (623–705) of China, who used Buddhism to strengthen and legitimize her rule.

Similarly, in Christianity about the holiest thing a ruler can do is to support and protect the “true faith.” Thus Constantine (c. 272–337), who legalized Christianity in the Roman Empire, is regarded as a saint even though his personal life was not particularly virtuous and he had his own son murdered. Kings Ezana (c. 303–c. 350) and Caleb (early sixth century) of Ethiopia are both lauded as great saints for similar protection of Christians. Indeed, this is a major theme in Ethiopian hagiography, which also includes King Lalibela (d. c. 1225), who has a double claim to sanctity—as patron of religion and because he eventually abdicated to become a hermit. Helping in the Christianization of new lands was an extension of such protective and donative functions, and Christianity has a long list of holy rulers who helped spread the faith, including the ruthless and cruel Duchess Olga of Kiev (c. 879–969), her more successful grandson Vladimir (d. 1015), Stephen of Hungary (c. 975–1038), and Olaf of Norway (995–1030). Such a concentration of saintly missionary kings right around the turn of the first millennium emphasizes the political capital that many of these rulers could make from support of Christianity, by which they won international recognition from a strengthening papacy and a strong German state and preserved the independence of their lands from potential invaders who would use the need to evangelize as a justification for attack.

Some rulers, regarded as saints because of particular virtue, have been especially admired in a world that repeatedly shows the truth of the maxim that “absolute power tends to corrupt absolutely.” In Christianity, an important role of royal wives acclaimed as saints has indeed been to pray for their less-than-holy husbands. Ashoka turned from a life of violence and conquest (exaggerated in Buddhist legend to make him an absolute monster) to generosity, compassion, and vegetarianism when he became a Buddhist. The Hindu Ahalya Bai (1735–1795) became ruler of the Indian state of Indore after her husband was killed in battle and won her people’s belief that she was an avatara (a god in human form) through her piety, charity, and righteousness. Ladislav of Hungary (c. 1040–1095) was an ideal Christian knight who both supported the church and gave his land relative peace. Sometimes rulers have been so virtuous that they have not ruled well. Louis IX of France (1214–1270) abandoned his country to go off crusading, although when at home he was an embodiment of Christian virtues; his case is paralleled by the Hindu Gangamata Goswami of eighteenth-century Bengal, who delegated his rule to others and spent his own time on pilgrimages. The Buddhist An Shigao (second century B.C.E.) left the succession to an uncle and himself became a monk and important translator of Buddhist texts into Chinese. Duke Wenceslas (907–929) of Bohemia, says legend, had all the gallows in his land destroyed, but he was eventually killed by his own brother. And royal saints reputed to live in chastity, such as Henry II (973–1024) and Kunigunde (d. 1033) of Germany and Edward the Confessor (c. 1005–1066) of England, did their lands no favor if they did indeed willfully refuse to produce legitimate successors—but an asexual life was a prime mark of holiness in medieval Europe.

It must be admitted, however, that sometimes the veneration of a ruler as a holy person has had more to do with the propagandistic claims of successors than with the actual holiness of the individual involved. It cannot be denied that it is a good thing to have a saint in the family, and rulers for many centuries have capitalized on the veneration of their ancestors. To give just a few examples, when Eric IX (c. 1120–1160) of Sweden was killed in battle, his son promoted his cult as a martyr, and descendants used Eric’s purported holiness to establish a line of hereditary succession, a holy bloodline of descent from a saint.

Rumi, Mevlana Jalaluddin

Muslim sufi, poet

Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi is one of the most widely read and quoted poets in the Islamic world as well as in America. Known in the West as “Rumi,” he is known among Persian speakers as “Mawlawi” and among Turks as “Mevlana.” The name “Rumi” signifies that he lived in Anatolia (Rum, Roman Anatolia); his titles “Mawlawi” or “Mevlana” mean “our master”; and the title “Khudavendigâr” (lord) is often used to express his preeminence. Many have followed Jami (1414–1492) in calling Rumi’s magnum opus, Masnavi-i Ma’ana (Couplets of spiritual meaning), “the Qur’an in Persian.”

Rumi was born on September 30, 1207, in Balkh (modern Afghanistan). His father Bahauddin Valad, a scholar and sufi shaykh, moved the family in 1208 to Samarqand following a dispute with the local qazi (legal administrator). Anticipating the encroaching Mongols, they continued to Baghdad, Mecca, Damascus, and Anatolia. At the invitation of the Seljuk sultan Alauddin Kaykubad, Bahauddin settled in Konya by 1229 and prepared Rumi to succeed him as a teacher. Since Rumi was only twenty-four when Bahauddin died in 1231, he asked one of his father’s students, Burhanuddin, to serve as his spiritual director. After studying Qur’an, hadith, Hanafi law, and theology in Aleppo and Damascus, Rumi returned to Konya in 1237 and taught in Konya’s seminaries (madrasas).

Rumi was transformed by his relationship with Shamsuddin Tabrizi (whose name means “sun of the faith from Tabriz”), who became Rumi’s spiritual guide, intimate friend, and poetic muse. Often represented as an antinomian dervish, Shams was a scholar of Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh), logic, math, and astronomy. Eccentric and iconoclastic, Shams emphasized that following (mutabi’at) the prophet Muhammad’s exemplary precedent (sunna) meant sharing his mystical experiences, including the heavenly ascension (mi’raj).

On November 29, 1244, Shams approached Rumi in the market in Konya and asked who was greater, the prophet Muhammad or the sufi saint Abu Yazid al-Bistami (d. c. 864). Citing Abu Yazid’s ecstatic utterance, “Glory be to Me; How great am I,” Shams asked Rumi why, in comparison, the prophet Muhammad had only said, “Glory be to You; we have not known You in truth as You should be known.” Hearing this question, Rumi felt as if the heavens had opened and crashed to earth, setting his mind ablaze. Rumi answered that while Abu Yazid had quenched his thirst in a single cup, the prophet Muhammad’s limitless thirst reflected his greater spiritual station.

According to another account of their first meeting, Shams came to Rumi in his library, pointed to his books, and asked, “What are these?” Rumi answered, “You wouldn’t understand.” As the books blazed into flames, Rumi asked, “What’s this?” Shams replied, “You wouldn’t understand.” From their first “meeting of the two seas” (marj al-bahrayn), they entered together into prolonged seclusion for spiritual companionship and conversation (sohbet).

Rumi’s passionate love for Shams transformed him from a scholarly shaykh into an ecstatic poet of passionate love (ishq). Rumi experienced Shams as the perfect human being and divine beloved; Shams regarded Rumi as a spiritual guide worthy of sainthood. Either in response to the jealousy of Rumi’s disciples, or as part of their training together, Shams left for Syria in 1246. Though returning briefly in 1247, Shams again disappeared, initiating Rumi’s poetry of intense longing for reunion. In his Divan-i Shams (The poems of Shams), Rumi used Shams’s name as his signature (takhallus), signifying that Shams lived within and wrote through him. Although hagiographic accounts narrate that seven of Rumi’s jealous disciples murdered Shams in 1247, textual and historical evidence suggests that Shams might have died while returning to Tabriz.

Shams taught Rumi a form of “whirling” meditation (sama, “listening,” or devra, “turning”) using poetry, music, and movement to reach ecstasy (wajd), which became for Rumi the perfect expression of love for God. Rumi composed and dictated poetry while engaging in this ecstatic activity, and as he did so the poetry was written down by his scribes, Salahuddin Zarkub (d. 1258) and Husam al-Din Celebi (d. 1284), his successor. From 1260 to 1273, Celebi served as the muse and scribe of Rumi’s six-volume, 24,660-couplet masterpiece, the Masnavi (Poem in rhyming couplets), in which Rumi weaves stories from the Qur’an with commentary, hadith, and popular literature to reflect an intimate and interior sense of their meaning.

In 70,000 lines of verse and a volume of discourses, Rumi evoked the beauty and power of passionate love (ishq) over reason, the heart over intellect, and silence over words. His famous allegory of the reed flute (ney) conveys the soul’s yearning to return to God, the Beloved Friend (Dost), realized through loving the pivotal saint of the age (qutb) in a relationship that accelerates the soul’s progress.

When Rumi died on December 17, 1273, Jews, Greek and Armenian Christians, and Turkish and Arab Muslims followed his funeral procession and honored Rumi in a display of ecumenical spirit that still surrounds Rumi and his order. Husamuddin, along with Rumi’s son Sultan Walad, developed the Mevlevi order. Its center (tekke), the site of Rumi’s mausoleum (mazar), the “Green Dome” in Konya, attracts more than 500,000 visitors every year.

Rupa Goswami

(c. 1470–1558 C.E.)

Hindu poet, scholar

Rupa Goswami was a major disciple of the Hindu god-saint Chaitanya of Bengal and a younger brother of the saint Sanatana Goswami. He was the finest poet of the Chaitanya tradition and its foremost thinker on the subject of sacred rapture (bhakti-rasa). He adapted the insights of Sanskrit aesthetics, centered around the aesthetic experience called rasa, to the elucidation of religious experience.

Rupa was born in about 1470 in what is now Bangladesh and was well educated in all traditional areas of Sanskrit learning, especially literary criticism and literature. He was employed along with Sanatana at the court of the king of Bengal, Nawab Husain Shah. He first met Chaitanya in 1515 in the village of Ramkeli and decided to leave the service of the Nawab and follow the saint. Later, when he heard that the saint was leaving Puri for pilgrimage to Vrindavana, he closed up his affairs, sold his property, gave his money away, and hurried off to try to catch up with him. He met Chaitanya at Prayaga on his way back from Vrindavana and stayed with him for ten days receiving instruction. Chaitanya sent him on to Vrindavana to rediscover the lost sites of Krishna’s divine sports and to describe those sports in works of literature.

Rupa is credited with writing twelve Sanskrit works, including three plays, two poems, and treatises on drama-turgy, theology, and sacred aesthetics. His poetry is intended to evoke the experience of sacred rapture in pious listeners. His masterpiece is the Ujjvala-nilamani (Blazing sapphire), in which he describes and illustrates various aspects and stages of the love for Krishna that is regarded as the highest form of love in the Chaitanya tradition, the “sweet” love in which Krishna becomes the object of erotic attraction.

Rupert of Salzburg (Rupbrecht)

Christian missionary, bishop

Rupert of Salzburg was a bishop of Worms and Salzburg during the late seventh and early eighth centuries and either the brother or the uncle of Ermentrude, abbess of Nonnberg (founded by Rupert). Rupert is believed to have been either Irish or Frankish. He is considered the patron saint of salt-miners and also the patron saint of the diocese of Salzburg.

Called from Worms in 696, where he was renowned for his piety and holiness, he traveled to Regensburg at the request of Theodo II, duke of Bavaria. He was later to baptize Theodo and to spend the remainder of his documented career Christianizing Bavaria. It was on one such journey to the area around Juvavum (Salzburg) that he first visited the city in which he would be based for the rest of his life. Granted the old Roman city of Juvavum by Theodo, he set about the successful restructuring of its buildings and economy. It was here that he founded the first of Salzburg's many churches, the monastery of St. Peter's, which still survives. He placed it and the nunnery at Nonnberg under the Benedictine Rule. Rupert was also responsible for giving the city its new name. This resulted from his development of the salt mines in and around the city, which in turn gave him his attribute in iconography. He died in Salzburg between 710 and 720 and was interred in St. Peter's until 774, when his relics were translated to the cathedral in Salzburg (consecrated to Sts. Virgil and Rupert) at the behest of his successor Bishop Virgil (745–784).

The oldest representation of Rupert is believed to be the half-length portrait in the vestibule of the nunnery at Nonnberg, which dates to perhaps the eighth or the tenth century. The fully vested cleric, usually shown as a bishop, was to be frequently represented in the twelfth century, especially in Bavaria and Salzburg. He is less frequently represented in the later medieval period. One of the best-known images of this venerable saint is found, along with that of Virgil, over the baptismal font in which Mozart was baptized in the cathedral in Salzburg.

Rupert's feast days are March 27 (Roman calendar) and September 24 (Austria).

Ryonin

(1072–1132 C.E.)

Buddhist sect founder

Ryonin, born in 1072, was a Buddhist priest of the Tendai sect who began the first Japanese Amidist sect. His contributions to Buddhism include the building of two temples in the Ohara district, the restoration of the practice of chanting, and the conversion of Emperor Toba in 1124. He is most famous for his popularization of the yuzu-nembutsu, or “circulating nembutsu,” the chanting of the name of Amida Buddha (Amitabha). In 1117, Ryonin had a vision in which Amida Buddha said, “One person is all people, all people are one person; one practice is all practices, all practices are one practice” (Kashiwahara and Sonoda 1968, 262). Through this vision, Ryonin realized that when one chants the nembutsu, all people benefit from the resulting merit.

Ryonin studied Tendai on Mount Hiei and was most interested in chanting and music. There, he had another vision. Amida Buddha appeared to him when he was chanting and told him to gain greater merit by teaching the nembutsu to others. After this experience, Ryonin began to create ways to spread the nembutsu to others on a larger scale. He gathered assemblies where the nembutsu was chanted, later developing chants that became widely popularized.

Although he was of the Tendai order, Ryonin was schooled in Shingon and was thoroughly familiar with the Lotus Sutra and the Flower Wreath Sutra. The doctrine that he molded into yuzu nembutsu is a compilation of these other Buddhist traditions. The adaptation of the nembutsu that followed was mainly practiced during Ryonin's lifetime; it later faded into obscurity, only to be revived later under Honen (1133–1212).

Sabas the Goth

(d. 372 C.E.)

Christian martyr

Sabas, a Goth soldier in the fourth century, was converted to Christianity in his youth by prisoners whom he was guarding. Sabas became a church lector for a priest named Sansala and later became a priest himself in Targoviste in modern Romania. During a series of persecutions by non-Christian Goths, Sabas refused to eat food sacrificed to the gods. He was released unharmed during this first persecution, even though he publicly professed his beliefs, because he was dismissed as insignificant, as one “who can do us neither good nor harm” (Attwater 1986, 291).

During a later persecution, in 372, Sabas was arrested along with Sansala and tortured by the same group of pagan Goths. He was dragged naked through thorns and beaten, but, miraculously, he was unharmed. He was then placed on the wheel to be stretched. Although a woman released him, he refused to leave. He was further tortured, to no avail, until he insulted Atharidus, the leader of the soldiers, who then ordered him to be drowned. Once more, Sabas was offered freedom, this time by the soldiers ordered to execute him, but he chose martyrdom and was tied to a pole and drowned in the Mussovo (Buzau) River along with approximately fifty other Christians in 372. His martyrdom is recorded in a letter written shortly after his death, which declares that “this death by wood and water was an exact symbol of man’s salvation,” in that it recalled both the baptism and crucifixion of Christ (Attwater 1986, 291–292). St. Basil ordered his body to be taken to Caesarea in Cappadocia, and consequently he came to be venerated in the East. Unlike many other Christian saints, Sabas was not a great scholar, ascetic, warrior, or church ruler, but rather, it seems, an ordinary man who became extraordinary through finding the strength to openly proclaim his belief in the face of persecution.

Sadashiva Brahmendra

(b. c. 1675 C.E.)

Hindu writer, renunciant

The Hindu saint Sadashiva Brahmendra is considered to have been liberated from the cycles of birth and death while still alive, a rarity in Hinduism. Self-realization, attaining experiential awareness of the nature of pure infinite consciousness, set him apart from ordinary conventions, and Hindus in southern India remember him for his deep states of meditation, his miraculous powers, and his wisdom and poetic eloquence. His followers preserved his philosophical writings and musical compositions, celebrating him as a great saint of unique attainments.

Sadashiva Brahmendra was born in around 1675. His brahmin father, Moksham Somasundara, was a native of Tiruvisanallur in Tamil Nadu in southern India, though he had been born even farther south, in Madurai. Sadashiva Brahmendra was called Bhikshu Guptan (gift of God) at birth. He married young but did not remain married for long. At the feast held in celebration of his wife’s attainment of puberty, he grew hungry and flew into a rage at having to wait for his wife to serve him. Reflecting on this disturbance caused him to become a renunciant to find peace. He left home and studied with a teacher named Ayyaval, and then with the head of the Kumbakonam math (monastery), who initiated him into the renunciant's life.

During his years of wandering, Sadashiva Brahmendra composed songs to Shiva, Rama, and Krishna and also philosophical verses. An avadhuta (discarder of worldly attachments), he roamed without belongings, naked. He is usually pictured as a full male figure in silhouette, and he is called “the ghost” or “the shadow.” People remember him for his childlike purity and as one who enjoyed the state of transcendent consciousness as an experience more real than his physical life in the material world. He took a vow of silence when his guru criticized him for displaying cleverness in debates. A number of miracle stories are told in Tamil Nadu today about the powers of this follower of the path of spiritual oneness (advaita).

Sadashiva Brahmendra is described as sitting in samadhi for weeks, so deep in meditation that a shifting riverbed covered him with sand without disturbing him. When King Sarabhoji (r. 1712–1729) sought his blessing to have children, the sage gave the king a book of Vedanta, and soon thereafter the king's wife became a mother. A number of miracle stories depict him as able to face violent attacks, emerging unharmed.

One story depicts an encounter in Tiruchirapalli, where village officials were gathered to collect taxes. Fuel was being heaped up to cook food for them. When the naked, silent holy man passed nearby, officials mistook him for an outcast and made him carry a bundle of firewood on his head. When he arrived at the kitchen and dropped the wood, it burst into flames, damaging goods, terrifying people, and causing the tax men to regret their presumption. In other stories, the saint is pictured as the favorite visitor of little children, whom he fed and entertained with wonders, such as treating them to an instant trip to Madurai and back. He is said to have revived a dead bride, and to have taught a ruler, Vijaya Raghunatha Tondaiman, the meaning of the Dakshinamurti mantra by writing it in the sand. The ruler kept the sand in a golden casket and venerated it as a sacred souvenir. Sadashiva Brahmendra's Sanskrit poem Atmavidyavilasa (Play of spiritual wisdom of the self) describes the spiritually enlightened man's life. A painting of Sadashiva Brahmendra in a Kaveri river delta shrine shows him with bearded face and a tigerskin over his shoulder.

His Atmavidyavilasa contains verses describing the sage as shining with light, silent and placid, with the ground under the tree as his resting place. His palm is his begging bowl. He wears no clothes but is adorned only with the jewel of nonattachment. The great recluse who has awakened to the state of perfect Being-Awareness-Bliss is said to rest in his “house”—the wild-growing bush on the riverbank—reclining on a very luxurious “bed” of soft sands. Further verses picture the “king of ascetics” pleasantly surrounded by the flowing river, enjoying the enchanting southern breeze gently blowing, beyond the cares of this world.

Sadhus

Hindu or Jaina ascetics

Sadhu (Sanskrit for “one who has accomplished the goal”) is a general term used throughout South Asia to refer to a holy man or ascetic, typically associated with Hinduism or Jainism. Sadhus (feminine, sadhvi) are renowned for their renunciation of materialism and ordinary household life. They spend years practicing arduous yogic austerities and meditation. Through these practices (sadhana), they are said to develop a range of magical and spiritual powers (siddhi), which they use to attain the final “goal” of cosmic liberation and consciousness (mukti, moksha, samadhi). Some are even said to have accomplished “living liberation” (jivan-mukti). Although sadhus traditionally belong to one of various teaching lineages (parampara) headed by a realized master (guru) and live at hermitages (ashramas), many are completely independent. Some have proven to be impostors.

In South Asia, the ascetic and mystical traditions followed by sadhus may be traced back to the time of the Vedas (c. 1500 B.C.E.), but some scholars, such as Mircea Eliade (1969), believe that such practices go back even further, to ancient techniques of shamanism. Despite this uncertainty regarding their origins, early references to different types of ascetics can be found in the Vedas. These types include the kesins (long-hairs) and munis (silent ones), who seemed to enter ecstatic states, take possible hallucinogens, and travel about naked. However, it is with the emergence of the many shramana (one who quests) movements, beginning as early as the ninth century B.C.E., that the ascetic sadhu lifestyle truly spread throughout India. Although many of the ancient shramana traditions—like sadhus today—were loosely organized, some grew to become grand, institutionalized religions like Buddhism and Jainism. It is likely that these different streams of asceticism (Vedic, non-Vedic, shramana), especially those involving Shiva, Vishnu, and Devi, came together with the rise of the great Indian traditions of theism by the fourth century C.E.

In India today, many sadhus belonging to various orders of Shaivism are dedicated to the worship of the Hindu god Shiva and his consort Shakti. In the mythological traditions of Hinduism, Shiva is the master yogin and ascetic, performing austerities in the mountains and cremation grounds. One order, known as the Aghoris (not-terrible ones), requires the sadhu to be initiated by a guru using a powerful Sanskrit phrase (mantra), after which he uses a human skull in rituals as he lives and practices in cremation grounds. Aghori sadhus embrace such transgressive practices (including drinking wine and eating flesh—even human flesh) as a means of finding purity and holiness amidst impure and polluting things. The Aghoris evolved from the Kapalikas, who were known for their uses of human skulls and ritual sexual intercourse. Other Shaiva sadhus, however, follow the more conservative traditions established by the philosopher Shankara (c. 800 C.E.), typically living in monastic communities in temple complexes such as that at Kanchi in southern India. Within Vaishnava Hinduism, sadhus are usually worshippers of the god Krishna, and their devotional practices include dancing and singing songs regarding Krishna and his consort Radha. Within Jaina traditions, sadhus are ascetics who adhere to rigorous disciplines and live within temple complexes.

Sages

A sage is a person noted for particularly deep wisdom, rather than merely someone who has acquired much knowledge. Among the ranks of holy people, sages are normally male, and those called sages in English are usually not people of superior scholarly attainment. Instead, the sages appear in the earliest layers of legends of peoples as human beings specially inspired by the gods to provide for the essential needs of human life, such as agriculture, or the arts of civilization, such as writing. Other, more historically traceable holy people of great wisdom are sometimes also called sages (especially the early rabbis of Judaism in the first two centuries of the Common Era, the hakham, who played a heroic role saving the Jewish faith despite the loss of the Temple). A legendary early Hindu king was offered a choice of entering heaven with one hundred fools or hell with one sage—he chose hell, saying that “with the help of a sage I can easily turn hell into heaven, but a hundred fools will make even heaven into hell” (Fischer-Schreiber et al. 1994, 27). The term “sage” is sometimes restricted, however, to the early legendary creative geniuses who made human existence itself possible. It is interesting to note that this role is often played by mortals inspired by gods, rather than gods come to earth, although sages tend in legend to enjoy surprising longevity and sometimes win immortality.

The earliest account of sages as agents of civilization comes from ancient Mesopotamia, where it was believed that the god Ea sent seven sages to the early cities to teach the skills of urban life. In the Epic of Gilgamesh, it is these sages who lay the foundations of the city of Uruk. They are not quite typically human—their leader, Oannes-Adapa, was a fish-man who rose from the sea—but clearly they are not gods either.

The religions of China believe that great sage-emperors also appeared at the dawn of civilized life, dating their reigns to early in the third millennium B.C.E. These six enlightened rulers established order in the world. For example, Huangdi, the “Yellow Emperor,” is credited with creating the humanities, writing, the compass, the pottery wheel, and the Chinese social order in about 2000 B.C.E. Yu the Great is credited both with controlling the flooding of the Yellow River (making agriculture possible) and with beginning the practice of hereditary rule at a slightly earlier time. Like the Mesopotamian sages, these figures are regarded as human, but at the same time they transcend humanity. The first of the group, Fu Hsi, who taught the use of the fishing net, domestication of animals, music, and casting oracles, was human—but had the body of a snake. Similarly, Huangdi was human—but came into being spontaneously, and attained immortality at the age of one hundred, ascending to heaven on a dragon’s back.

As Confucianism and Daoism developed in China, both religions accepted the sage-emperors as founding “culture heroes.” They also found a place in their cosmologies for a very few more historical “perfected sages” who shaped religion and right human behavior. Most notable of these are Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.), Mengzi (c. 372–289 B.C.E.), and Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.). Confucianism taught that the ultimate goal of self-cultivation was to become a perfected sage and that the cosmos can only be perfected with the help of such figures. Confucius was recognized in the Han dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.) as the king of sages, the “teacher of 10,000 generations,” and attained nearly divine status early in the Common Era. Mengzi after his death came to be called the “second sage,” taking a role next to that of Confucius in temples. In a rather different category is the Daoist Laozi, who may never have had a historical existence. Like the early sages (and to a lesser extent Confucius and Mengzi), he is credited with giving humankind vital information to improve human existence, in his case the Daode jing (Classic of the way and its power), which teaches the fundamental truths of Daoism. Daoism has also produced other holy figures whose position is usually translated as “sage” in English, people who have attained the Dao, the well-spring of creative power that runs the universe. Not necessarily scholars, they have charismatic power and bring harmony to society. It should also be noted that, while the Confucian would-be sage is a scholar, rising to the heights of sagehood requires more than learning. Also essential are self-discipline and, above all, jen, humaneness. Like Daoist sages, such people can restore the harmony between earth and heaven. They are rare.

The idea of the sage is particularly important in Chinese religions, but it does appear elsewhere. The Muslim legendary prophet Idris appears in the Qur’an as the first person who wrote with a pen, and also the first person to sew, gifts he gave to the rest of humankind. Although called a prophet, he transcends his human nature through his own wisdom in a manner typical of a Chinese sage, tricking the angel of death and thus winning immortality. Jain legend tells of the first tirthankara (ford-maker), Rishabha, back at the beginning of this cycle of the world, who lived at a time when the magical wish-fulfilling trees were dying down. Rishabha made it possible for human life to continue by inventing the arts of civilization, including agriculture, math, writing, the fine arts, and the caste system. The Hindu legendary sage Agastya, who lived in about 10,000 B.C.E., is credited with the gifts of both religion and language—he introduced the Vedic religion to southern India and was also author of the first grammar of the Tamil language. The ten Hindu Prajapatis gave the arts of civilization, including laws and the art of astronomy. Perhaps the most important was Atharvan, the eldest son of Brahma, who was the first to bring fire from heaven, offer soma (an undefined hallucinogenic plant), and recite mantras. The seven rishis, the patriarchal saints of Hinduism, fulfill many of the same roles as Chinese sages. Their name means “seers,” and they were the inspired poets who wrote the Vedas. They are credited in legend with great superhuman powers, gained through asceticism, and some are “first teachers” of human arts. In the version of the great flood story told in the Mahabharata, Manu was told to build a ship, on which he was to keep safe all the different seeds of the earth—and the seven sages.

Although the Asian legends may go back to a common root, it is hard to explain the similarities of Asian sages to those found in Amerindian and African belief systems. The legendary Cheyenne holy man Sweet Medicine brought all good things from the creator god, teaching people how to hunt buffalo, tan skins, make clothes, and so on. And in a surprising juxtaposition of beliefs from far-removed regions, Sweet Medicine also transcended normal human existence, living four lifetimes. The West African orisha (deity) Ogún also, according to legend, cursed himself to work twenty-four hours a day for the benefit of humankind, especially serving as the bringer of ironworking skill to the people.

Saichō

Buddhist sect founder

Saichō (posthumously called Dengyō Daishi) was the founder of the Japanese Tendai school of Buddhism. Tendai originated from Chinese Tiantai as a branch of Mahayana (Greater Vehicle) Buddhism, and its central scripture is the Lotus Sutra (Skt.: Saddharmapundarika). In his doctrine, Saichō focused on the all-embracing concept of Buddhist salvation—a concept expounded by Shakyamuni Buddha in the Lotus Sutra—meaning that all sentient beings possess buddha-nature and can become enlightened by realizing this inherent nature within themselves.

Born in 767 in Furuchi-gō, Ōmi province, Saichō entered the Ōmi kokubun-ji (provincial monastery of Ōmi) at the age of eleven and received his tokudo (initiation as a “novice”) two years later. He was bestowed his jukai (full ordination) at Tōdai-ji in 785. Disenchanted with the corruption of the monasteries in Nara, he moved to Mount Hiei, where he sought enlightenment by undergoing austere meditation.

Emperor Kanmu (r. 781–806), who wanted to curtail the power of the monastic community in Nara because their practices were aimed only at securing material benefits for the state and their aristocratic patrons without any concern for spiritual enlightenment, strongly supported Saichō’s Tendai school. In 804, the emperor sent Saichō on an imperial embassy to China so that he could study Tendai at its source, Mount Tiantai, and bring back various Chinese Buddhist texts to Japan. According to Saichō, without such a formal transmission, Tendai would carry little authority in Japan.

When Saichō returned to Japan in 805, he established the Tendai headquarters, Enryaku-ji, on Mount Hiei northeast of present-day Kyoto. Following his return, he had close contact with Kūkai, the founder of Japanese Shingon (True Word) Buddhism, who had been on the same embassy to China as Saichō in order to bring back esoteric Shingon doctrines to Japan. Kūkai insisted that Shingon was the only “true word” of the Buddha, and that Saichō should give himself up to its study exclusively, while Saichō held to the Tendai understanding that alongside esoteric practices it was also necessary to study meditation and exoteric practices and Buddhist scriptures such as the Lotus Sutra. This rivalry between them made them go separate ways, resulting in the emergence of the distinctive Shingon and Tendai schools. Saichō’s Tendai Buddhist doctrine is syncretic, synthesizing the various doctrines of Buddhism into a unified system, and has been hospitable to new schools of Buddhist thought. Tendai, far more than Shingon, has proven to be fertile ground for the development of later schools.

Sakawa

(fl. mid-19th cent. C.E.)

African prophet

Sakawa was the most outstanding and perhaps the only sage of the Abagusii of western Kenya, where he was a seer and teacher during the mid-nineteenth century. He was of the Bogeka subclan of the larger Getutu/Kitutu clan; the other Gusii clans were the Nyaribari, the Bobasi, the Bonchari, the South and North Mugirango, the Bomachoge, and the Bogisero.

The Abagusii believed that the sun manifested Engoro—the creator and provider—and that their ancestors (chisokoro) had a strong interest and influence in the lives of the living. In Sakawa’s time they were also concerned about their survival, given the turmoil they had endured in their migrations from distant Misri (Egypt) and the constant interethnic conflicts with their Luo, Kipsigis, and Maasai neighbors, mainly over livestock and land boundaries.

Sakawa was respected and attracted large gatherings because of his wide knowledge and wisdom. He shared in the traditions of the Abagusii and foresaw and foretold of the coming of the Europeans, likening them to amandegere, a tiny white variety of mushroom. Sorting out this variety of mushroom requires patience and is time consuming. This was to be the case in the interaction between the Abagusii and the Europeans. Sakawa warned that the Europeans would arrive with lightning-like weapons (guns) and that it would be futile to stage any resistance against them. Indeed, not even the strongest of warriors and the best of strategic measures could withstand the guns of the Europeans. The Abagusii suffered massacres in 1904–1905 and 1908 at the hands of the British.

Sakawa's meetings were held in present-day Kisii Town, the administrative headquarters of Gusiiland. Sakawa had indicated that with the coming of the Europeans the area would see a transformation, new buildings, and changes in the way people lived. He talked of police lines, offices, hospitals, and churches that would greatly impact the lives of the people. In 1911 and 1912, respectively, the Roman Catholics and the Seventh-day Adventists arrived in Gusiiland. Long before this, during the 1904 and 1908 massacres, Abagusii had witnessed the British police force in action and had seen conventional medicine being administered to the injured soldiers.

Sakawa still holds a prominent place in the history of the Abagusii. He is reputed to have been an omobani (prophet/seer) and an omogambi (a wise leader), one who transmitted the history of the Abagusii and sounded a warning of the impending coming of the Europeans and its impact on the society. The Abagusii revere him as one who had special power bestowed upon him by the divine.

Sakya Pandita

Buddhist scholar, mystic, political leader

Sakya Pandita, also known as Kungo Gyalsthen (Kun-dga' rgyal-mtshan), born in 1182, was a founder of the Sakya lineage, one of the four major branches of Tibetan Buddhism, and a renowned Tibetan scholar, mystic, and political leader. During the Mongolian domination of Asia in the thirteenth century, he was able to convince the Mongol ruler, Kodon Khan, not to invade Tibet. He also inspired the khan's devotion to him. With the khan's support, Sakya Pandita was entrusted as the supreme ruling authority of Tibet, combining monastic ordination with political governance. This political positioning initiated a lasting theocratic tradition in Tibet. The Sakya lineage's attainment of political domination lasted until the fall of the Mongol empire in the middle of the fourteenth century, when the Kagyu and Geluk lineages successively became the controlling religious and political powers in Tibet.

Traditional Sakyapa accounts of Sakya Pandita regard him as an emanation of Manjushri, the god of wisdom. His body was believed to have numerous physical marks of a buddha. Furthermore, according to tradition, his linguistic abilities were evident at a very early age: He was reportedly able to speak Sanskrit and write its alphabet with sticks on the ground before being formally taught the language.

Among Sakya Pandita's most famous compositions are sDom gsum rab dbye (The discrimination of the three vows), a clarification of what constitutes virtuous conduct within Buddhist spiritual careers; Legs parbshad po rin po che'i gter (A treasury of aphoristic jewels), a collection of moral maxims in verse; Thub-pa'i dGongs-gsal (Elucidating the thought of the sage), a presentation of the stages of the path to enlightenment; and Tschad ma rigs pa'i gter (Treasury of knowledge concerning valid cognition), an influential work on logic and epistemology.

Salif Taal, Cerno Bokar

(c. 1880–1940 C.E.)

Muslim spiritual leader

Cerno Bokar Salif Taal was born in Segou, Mali, in about 1880 and began his study of the Qur'an with Abdullah Jire, a former student of his maternal grandfather. After Cerno Bokar's father left Segou to escape the French conquest of 1892, and the French installed Agibou, son of al-Hajj Umar, in 1893, Abdullah Jire persuaded Cerno Bokar's mother to take him and his siblings to Bandiagara. Little is known of his teachers after this point, but one of them, Amadu Tafsir Ba, his sufi mentor, was certainly very influential.

Because he had been born into the leading Tijaniyya family of the area, Cerno Bokar was formally appointed a muqaddam (authorized sufi shaykh) through the spiritual line of the Marka shaykh al-Hajj Salmoye of Jenne, though probably not by him personally. Later he received renewals in the 'Umarian spiritual line through the sharif Nyaaro Karamoko, and also through members of his own clan: Muntaqo, the muqaddam of Segu, and Seydou Nourou Taal, the "grand marabout" of Dakar, both grandsons of the celebrated Tijaniyya shaykh al-Hajj Umar. By the 1920s, Cerno Bokar was regarded as a leading muqaddam of the Tijaniyya in the area. In 1937, he formally took Hamallah, leader of a Tijaniyya branch tariqah (sufi order), as his shaykh during a visit to Nioro. French suspicion of "Hamallisme" forced Cerno Bokar to renounce this association, but he continued privately to be an adept, eventually retiring to the seclusion of his compound, where he remained until his death in February 1940.

Cerno Bokar's teachings were spiritual and liberal. He sought cooperation between Muslims and those of other religions seen as spiritual "ancestors" of Islam, that is, Jews and Christians. He also preached against killing non-Muslims through jihad, which he described as "the mutual killing to which the sons of Adam submit in the name of a God whom they pretend to love, but whom they adore poorly by destroying a part of His work," asserting that every human being has been endowed with "a particle of the spirit of God." He came to this conclusion partly because of the many killings that had taken place through jihads in nineteenth-century West Africa. In his spiritual development, he was said to have been "opened" by God, that is, given the ability to comprehend the hidden esoteric "reality" or "truth" (haqiqah) that underlies the manifest, exoteric world of sensual perception.

Cerno Bokar's teachings, given in Fulfulde, were written up in French by his disciple Ahmadou Hampaté Ba, a Malian who served in the French colonial administration.

Salman al-Farisi

(d. c. 650 C.E.)

Muslim convert

Salman al-Farisi, or Salman the Persian, was a contemporary of the prophet Muhammad in the seventh century. An early convert to Islam, in all likelihood of Persian extraction (although his name is of Semitic, not Persian, origin), Salman is a popular figure of legends functioning as an exemplar of Persian conversion to Islam. His search for religious truth, which led him from his supposed Persian ancestral religion of Zoroastrianism via Christianity to Islam, is retold in many versions in early Muslim legend. His contribution to early Muslim defensive military strategy at the Battle of the Trench in 627 is also celebrated in early Muslim historiography.

Salman was born, according to Muslim tradition, the son of either Persian nobility or a Zoroastrian priest, possibly in the vicinity of Isfahan in Persia. Having grown up Zoroastrian, Salman is said to have become attracted to Christianity after passing by a Christian church during a worship service. Against the wishes of his father, he left his hometown and attached himself to a Christian hermit. Studying subsequently under several Christian monks, he made his way to Syria, where he is said to have heard prophecies of a new prophet arising in Arab lands to renew the original religion of Abraham. During his travels in the Arabian peninsula, Salman was enslaved and sold to a Jewish master in the city of Yathrib, which later became Medina. After Muhammad's migration to Medina in the year 622, the two men are said to have met. Salman converted to Islam, and, securing his freedom from slavery with the help of Muhammad, he became a dedicated Muslim. During the siege of Medina in the year 627, Salman is said to have suggested digging a trench around parts of Medina as a defensive measure against the advancing Meccan enemy; the successful defensive measure endeared Salman even more to Muhammad.

Purportedly Muhammad counted Salman as a member of his own household, the ahl al-bayt, which makes Salman a prominent figure in Persian Shi'a discourse. Salman's ascetic lifestyle also renders him a prominent figure in sufi traditions. According to some traditions, Salman became governor of Mada'in, Iraq, where he died in the 640s or 650s. According to some traditionalists, his tomb is located in al-Mada'in; other traditions locate his tomb in Isfahan, Iran, Jerusalem, and elsewhere.

Samantabhadra (Chin.: Bu-xian, P'u-hsien p'usa; Jap.: Fu-gen)

Buddhist bodhisattva

Samantabhadra's name means "He who is all-pervadingly good" or "He whose beneficence is everywhere"; it also translates to "Universal sage" or "Universal kindness." One of the most important bodhisattvas (enlightened beings) of the Mahayana Buddhist tradition, Samantabhadra is the ideal in devotion and action. In the Lotus Sutra, he is described as the protector of those who preach the Buddhist teachings. He is also seen as the embodiment of wisdom (prajña).

Iconographically, Samantabhadra is often depicted riding on a white elephant with six tusks. The elephant symbolizes the power of wisdom to overcome all obstacles, and its tusks represent the six senses (sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and intuition). In China and Japan, he is commonly shown in a triad with Manjushri and Shakyamuni. He often carries a blue lotus, a cintamani (wish-fulfilling jewel), or a scroll on which his meditation text is written. He is highly venerated in China as one of the four great bodhisattvas corresponding to the buddha Vairocana and the four elements. Mount Emei in the province of Sichuan is the legendary sacred mountain where he settled after traveling from India to China on his white elephant.

In the Vajrayana tradition, he is also seen as the embodiment of truth (dharmakaya). This tradition represents him as dark blue in color (symbolic of emptiness, sunyata), and sometimes in sexual union (yabyum) with his female consort. Typical of bodhisattvas, he wears a prince's crown, jewelry, and garments. Samantabhadra is said to have revealed the meditative teachings of the mahamudra (great seal) to the Vajrayana tradition.

In Japan, he is mainly venerated by the Tendai, Shingon, and Nichiren sects. Practitioners of Hokkésammai (ecstatic meditation) claim Samantabhadra as their divine patron. Japanese images often present him seated on a square base with twenty arms or seated on four white elephants.

Samson of Dol

(d. 565 C.E.)

Christian missionary, ascetic

Born in south Wales during the late fifth or early sixth century, the Christian saint Samson of Dol is one of the best-known British missionaries to the continent and a prime example of the Celtic peregrinus (pilgrim), a monk who forsook home and people to seek God and very often to convert non-Christians. His father, Amon, was from Dyfed, and his mother was from Gwynedd. There are several extant Lives. The earliest, that of Mabillon, dating possibly from the seventh century, claims to contain information about the saint provided by contemporaries. Some scholars believe that another, lengthier Life may be even older, but there is no consensus, as the earliest existing manuscript was produced in the eleventh century. The account, however, while it contains much that is miraculous, has information that scholars believe to be credible. For example, it seems very likely that as a boy Samson was sent to St. Illtud at Llanwit (in south Glamorgan, Wales), where he was educated and eventually became a priest. His precocious sanctity became a subject of jealousy for his fellow monks, so he left Llanwit, lived for a time as a hermit by the river Severn, and then became the abbot of a monastery on the island of Caldy. Samson is said to have reformed an Irish monastery and traveled in Cornwall before leaving permanently for Brittany. He was consecrated bishop by St. Dubric, bishop of Llandaff, before leaving Britain.

Samson landed in Dol, Brittany, and there founded his principal monastery. Though Dol was not an official see until the ninth century, Samson exercised episcopal authority. In addition to Dol, various locations in England and France are associated with Samson, including Padstow and St. Kew in England, and Pental in Normandy, France. He is also believed to be the same man who signed the acts of the Council of Paris in 557 as Samson peccator episcopus (Samson, sinner and bishop). St. Samson remains a popular saint in England, Wales, and Brittany. His feast day is July 28.

Samthann

(d. 739 C.E.)

Christian abbess, reformer

Samthann, one of very few post-seventh-century Irish saints with extant medieval hagiography, is the only medieval Irish Christian holy woman whose Life does not credit her with founding a monastery. She is also the only one who was married before entering the religious life, albeit only for a day; according to her Life, she prayed to God that she might preserve her virginity, and with the help of miraculous fire both her foster-father and her husband were persuaded to agree to her vocation. She first entered Urney (County Tyrone), where she faithfully served as storekeeper for a year. She then became abbess of Clonbroney (County Longford) and immediately began developing it. She built an oratory, to which she later added several buildings and further repairs, and provided for the needs of her workers with angelic assistance and miraculous meals.

Samthann is portrayed as exemplifying charity and compassion, but above all protecting and promoting the needs of her monastery. One man who tried to cheat her community over timber was beaten into submission by her in his dreams; the next day he humbly and remorsefully offered himself to her service. When a cleric tried to seduce one of her nuns, he was soon visited by an enormous eel that affixed itself to his loins; it remained until he begged and received the saint's forgiveness and promised never to bother her community again.

Her Life assures her faithful of her assistance even if their opponents were demons, a king, or another saint. It tells of her delivering from hell a warrior who had sought her blessing before every battle, but neglected to do so before the one in which he died. She did not abandon her devotee but at the hour of his death gathered her sisters together and, after a short time of intensive prayer, delivered him from torment. Though kings refused her request to release hostages, Samthann was able to outwit them or otherwise miraculously ensure the hostages' liberation. When two nuns came to her with a son, whom they feared to raise at their home near St. Cainnech's monastery, Samthann provided him with such an excellent upbringing that he later became abbot of the very monastery from which the nuns had fled in fear.

She was co-opted by the Céli Dé, the most significant movement in the eighth- and ninth-century Irish church, which emphasized extreme austerity, and her community, Clonbroney, remained one of the most prominent female monasteries for several centuries.

Samuel of Waldebbba

(fl. 14th cent. C.E.)

Christian monk, hermit

Samuel of Waldebbba, active during the fourteenth century, is one of the most popular saints of Ethiopia. According to his hagiography, he was born in Aksum (northeastern Tigray) to a wealthy family. As a boy, he was consecrated a deacon. His mother, Amata Maryam, embraced monastic life, and when Samuel heard that his father wanted him to marry, he left home and joined the monastery Dabra Bankwal, where he received the monastic habit from Madhanina Egzi, the abbot. Samuel astonished the monks with his asceticism. When his father also became a monk, both moved to another monastery called Wayna. There his father died, and Samuel entered the desert and became a hermit. One day, after a long fast, it came upon him that God had given him authority over the "animals of the desert"; after this, snakes, leopards, lions, and elephants allegedly saluted him and submitted to him. During this time, several disciples gathered around him.

Samuel roamed the desert until he and his disciples reached Wali (Waldebbba) and settled there. Many other saints and monks came to admire his purity and speak to him, and he worked numerous miracles. Animals, especially lions, followed him (a motif often reflected in Ethiopian traditional painting) and took care of him, and he also took care of them. Once he attended a lioness in labor; another time he pulled out a splinter of wood from a lion's paw. On another occasion, Jesus asked him in a vision to celebrate the eucharist, and the eucharistic bread and wine descended to him from heaven. Once he was captured by non-Christians, who, aware of his sanctity, didn't want to let him go, but he was carried away from them on a cloud. It was also on a cloud that, according to his vita, the saint made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where he visited the Coptic patriarch Mathew (1378–1408). King Dawit (r. 1382–1412/1413) revered Samuel and sought his blessing and intercession. Samuel died of illness at the age of one hundred in the presence of many prominent monks and hermits who came to bid him a last farewell. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tawahedo Church commemorates Samuel on 12 Tahsas (December 21/22).

The center of Samuel's cult is Waldebbba, a remote hot lowland in northern Ethiopia southwest of Aksum on the southern bank of the Takkaze. In it is a unique area where Ethiopian monasticism is represented by a number of forms. Among them, the eremitical tradition is particularly ancient, dating back to times long before Samuel. The monks of the largest Waldebban monastery, Dabra Abrentant, hold that Samuel reorganized their community in the fourteenth century when it was in decline. The monks of Dabra Abbey (on the northern side of the Takkaze, in Shire) consider Samuel to be the founder of their monastery and claim to possess his relics. Samuel is also honored in other Waldebban monastic communities. His fame and veneration spread beyond the limits of Waldebbba already in the fifteenth century. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Samuel became a symbol of the Ethiopian monastic movement and its spirituality.

San Trance Dancers

Southern African shamans

One of the most culturally distinctive features of the hunting-gathering San (or Bushmen) of southern Africa is the curing dance. The performer of this elaborate and dramatic ritual is a shaman-like figure who enters trance through the exertion induced by a night-long dance around a fire and a circle of chanting and clapping women. The effects of the trance on the dancers, as explained by them, are varied, ranging from physiological to mystical. As regards the former, practitioners believe that the experience of trance brings a healing potency that is located in the dancer's stomach, which they say comes to a boiling state. Boiling, or n/om, as the !Kung call this potency, is said to enable the dancer to heal people by applying their perspiration, the effusion of n/om, to the body of the individual in need of healing. The mystical effects are transformation into an animal or out-of-body travel. Transformed into either a dangerous feline or a life force-charged eland antelope, the trance dancer becomes either fearsome or beneficent. Soul travel occurs after the trance dancer has collapsed and his spirit leaves his inert body to enter the spirit domain in order to engage capricious spirits to secure health for the treated person.

The experience of trance and the physical and spiritual task of curing are considered to be painful and dangerous undertakings. They require physical stamina and spiritual strength, and people appreciate the spirit-steeped "men of God" who risk it because of the service they provide to the community. A dancer is usually drawn to his career at an early age through an intense encounter with a spirit, frequently in the context of a serious illness he suffered and survived. Highly skilled and experienced trance dancers are esteemed and enjoy a reputation that may survive their deaths. However, in accord with the egalitarian organization and ethos of San band society, most dancers, despite their ritual importance to the community, are not full-time ritual specialists. Their lack of status differentiation renders them accessible to members of the community.

During times of social stress, such as acculturation through settler pressures, social and cultural disintegration, oppression, disease, and poverty, the status of trance dancers may be enhanced. As practitioners of a culturally distinctive ritual that embodies San cultural identity and marshals spiritual power, trance dancers and their dance may come to be seen by their people as a "key to liberating change" (Katz et al. 1997, 136).

Sana'i, Abu al-Majd Majdud

(d. c. 1131 C.E.)

Muslim poet

Abu al-Majd Majdud Sana'i of Ghazna (in modern Afghanistan), a prolific twelfth-century writer, has been celebrated for his religious poetry. He was apparently the son of a mu'allim (religious scholar), which may explain the themes of his later work. Sana'i began his vocation as poet by writing qasidas, poems in praise of the rulers or patrons who supported his literary compositions, both in Ghazna and during his travels. Subsequently, he changed his poetic orientation and wrote mystical, ascetic, and devotional verses suited for a cross-section of people, ranging from commoners to scholars, rulers, and other elites.

Sana'i's lengthy didactic poem Hadiqat al-haqiqa wa shar'i'at tariqa (The garden of the truth and the law of the path) had a tremendous impact on subsequent Persian versification. Both Farid al-Din 'Attar (c. 1117–c. 1231) and Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273) were influenced by his style. Their adaptations, in turn, were emulated by later generations. This poem is in the genre of a mathnawi (spiritual couplet) and is dedicated to a Ghaznavid king, Sultan Bahramshah. It has ten chapters and deals with a variety of spiritual subjects, including didactic morality and sacred lore. With enthusiasm and simplicity, Sana'i delineates his views on God and the spiritual path. Views on the transcendent are juxtaposed with discussions on piety and ethics. Sana'i also criticizes pretenders and hypocrites. His plentiful anecdotes and stories are often adapted from popular sufi tales and stories, many apparently derived from Abu'l-Qasim al-Qushayri's (986–1072) Risalah (Epistle) and Abu Hamid al-Ghazali's (1058–1111) Ihya' ulum al-din (The revival of the religious sciences). Though Sana'i was from the eastern part of the Islamic world, his inclusion of these stories from the western sphere show the uniformity and spread of various significant texts to different parts of the Islamic diaspora.

The goal of spiritual edification is also evident in another poetic composition, entitled Sayr al-'ibad ila'l-ma'ad (The journey of the servants toward the place of return). Here the author presents mystical theories of the return of the soul to the place of its origination as it exists through different stages of human life. A smaller mathnawi, entitled Karnamah-i Balkh, is more satirical and has a secular tone. In it Sana'i lists his patrons, with their characteristics, descriptions, and ranks.

Sana'i considered the Qur'an the eternal word of God and hence the ultimate source of human happiness and guidance. He states that the first and last letters of the sacred text spell bas, "enough," thereby indicating that the Qur'an is enough, or sufficient for all times. Sana'i was ambivalent about women. Though he has praise for pious women, he is not very positive toward females in general. Thus he expressed the opinion that "a single pious woman is better than a thousand bad men," but he also stated that "daughters are better on a bier than alive."

Sana'i had a close relationship with the scholar and preacher Muhammad b. Mansur, known as Sayf al-Haqq, "the sword of the truth," who resided in Sarakhs. Muhammad b. Mansur was a protector as well as a spiritual guide for Sana'i, and Sana'i praised him profusely in the Sayr al-ibad. His mathnawis and other poems are collected in a divan (collection) that includes qasidas (praise poems), zuhdiyyats (ascetic poems), qalandariyyats (antinomian poems), and ghazzaliats (lyrics).

Sanapia

(1895–1984 C.E.)

Comanche medicine woman

Sanapia was a Comanche medicine woman, or "eagle doctor," born in a teepee in 1895 outside Fort Sill, Oklahoma. Her mother was a traditionally oriented Comanche-Arapaho medicine woman, while her Comanche father embraced Christianity and white culture.

Sanapia's maternal grandmother, who stressed the importance of learning and tribal customs, raised her. She attended a mission school in southern Oklahoma for seven years until the age of fourteen, when she returned home. During the summer before her last year of school, her mother and maternal grandmother persuaded her to begin training to become an eagle doctor, a medicine person spiritually assisted by the eagle. During her training under her mother and maternal uncle, she learned the identification, usage, and rituals associated with medicinal plants, how to diagnose and treat illnesses, and the proper conduct of doctors. At seventeen, she completed her training as an eagle doctor, and her mother transferred her own healing power to Sanapia in a series of ceremonies.

Sanapia began practicing her medicine when she passed menopause and her culture allowed it. Her practice included treatment of "ghost sickness," which was believed to come from contact with ghosts. Her healing rituals combined psychiatry, herbal medicine, peyote, songs, and prayers to call upon spirits and her spirit helper, the eagle.

By the 1960s, Sanapia was the last surviving eagle doctor. Anthropologist David E. Jones, whom she adopted as a son, wrote an account of her life to preserve her medical knowledge and practices. The book, Sanapia: Comanche Medicine Woman, was published in 1972.

Sanatana Goswami

(c. 1465–1555 C.E.)

Hindu devotee, scholar

Sanatana Goswami, disciple of the Hindu god-saint Chaitanya of Bengal, was a founding luminary of a learned circle known as the Six Goswami of Vrindavana, which created the foundations of the Chaitanya tradition's theological and devotional literature.

Sanatana was born in what is now Bangladesh in about 1465. As a boy, he dreamed that a brahmin gave him a copy of the Bhagavata Purana. The next day, he met the same brahmin and was indeed given the book. From that time forth he became an ardent student of the Bhagavata and a devotee of Krishna, the deity described therein. He later became a minister of the Nawab Husain Shah, ruler of Bengal. Sometime around 1510, Sanatana began writing letters to Chaitanya, who was living in Orissa, asking the saint for deliverance. When Chaitanya stopped at a nearby town in 1515, Sanatana and his two younger brothers secretly met with him. Impressed, they made plans to leave their positions to follow the saint. Sanatana was imprisoned by the Nawab for failing to execute his duties, but he managed to bribe the guard and escape. He traveled incognito to Varanasi, where he met with Chaitanya. Chaitanya then sent him to Vrindavana to write books and rediscover the places in which Krishna performed his divine acts. Except for a brief stay in Orissa, Sanatana spent the rest of his life in Vrindavana. He died in 1555.

Sanatana wrote four works. The most important of these was the Brihad-bhagavatamrita (The larger ambrosia of the Bhagavata), a fictional work modeled on the Puranas, in which he presents the cream of the teachings of the Bhagavata Purana and other devotional texts. He recognizes there the passionate, self-sacrificing love for Krishna of the cowherd women of Vrindavana as the highest form of love for God. In a second part of the text, Sanatana traces the progress of a fictional devotee, Gopa Kumara (probably Sanatana himself), from the beginnings of spiritual cultivation until the culminating revelation in which Krishna shows himself and his eternal abode to his devotee.

Santaraksita

(fl. 8th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist monk, philosopher

The philosopher Santaraksita, born in Bengal, was the son of a king but renounced worldly honors to become a monk. Eagerly pursuing knowledge, he became the greatest Buddhist philosopher of the eighth century and a great saint. As professor of philosophy at the famous university of Nalanda in northern India, he analyzed and refuted all the important tenets of Buddhist and non-Buddhist schools other than his own. He is also credited with introducing philosophical Buddhism into Tibet. Upon meeting the king of Tibet, and being asked the nature of his doctrine, he said, “To follow what is in accordance with reason, and to reject what is not.”

Santaraksita asserted that nothing is true on the absolute level. But on the relative level, he claimed, all of reality is nothing other than mind. His view resembles the critical idealism of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804). He arrived at his philosophical position by reasoning that there are two possible candidates for the nature of reality—material and mental. If reality is material, it must be made of parts. The smallest of these are said to be atoms. But if they are the smallest, they must be indivisible. However, if they are indivisible, they can have no extension (for the only number that is indivisible is zero). Nor can they have sides to attach to one another, for if they had sides, they would be divisible into those sides. So they cannot combine to make up larger objects.

So it would seem that the only alternative is that reality is mental. It is, after all, impossible to deny awareness without utilizing awareness. But there are problems with the concept of mind and its relation to an object. Mind is either one or many, a unity or a plurality, one with its object or different. If mind is one with its object, that is, the same as its object, there is no way one mind could become aware of a changing world. If it is distinct from its object, the following problems arise: (1) If one and unified, how could a single mental state perceive an entire flowered cup while catching the diversity of its differently colored flowers? (2) But if mind is compounded, other problems arise. How could a diversified mind perceive diversity in a single instant and recognize the different aspects of the cup to be the same? (3) And if the perceptions are a result of sequential and very rapid impressions, as with a torch whirled around, forming a circle of light, then one perceives what is not really there. Further, if mind is claimed to be real, we must ask how we know it. To know one’s mind, we would need a mind to know it, and a mind to know that mind, and so on, generating an infinite regress. The mind cannot be an independent entity, or it would never change. It is dependent on causes to experience a changing world.

Like Nagarjuna (c. 150–250), Santaraksita questioned the coherence of causality. A cause is either the same as an effect or different. If the same, it would lead to the absurd conclusion that when one ate food one would be eating excrement, since food is the cause of excrement. But if the cause precedes the effect when the cause is present, the effect is not, so they cannot contact each other. So the concept of causality is hopelessly paradoxical. This observation leads to the conclusion that, on the absolute level, reality is beyond conception: It is emptiness. In spite of this, Santaraksita was not a nihilist. He believed that through nonconceptual meditation, one could have direct awareness of reality. This experience resulted in great spiritual bliss. It was enlightenment itself.

Santaraksita was also a great tantric master. He believed that certain practices on the relative level, especially sexual ones that were performed with wisdom, compassion, and mantra, could lead to enlightenment because the special causal conditions led to a special effect. He is revered by Tibetan Buddhists as an emanation of Buddha Varjrapani.

Santería

Santería is a religion derived from West Africa that is practiced mainly in Cuba and other coastal areas of Latin America. It promises to its followers divinity, longevity, good health, love, and immortality and is mainly a syncretism of traditional Yoruban beliefs and Roman Catholicism. The term Santería (Way of the Saints) comes from the Spanish word santo, which means “holy.” Santería followers are known as santeros. “Santería” was originally a derogatory term first applied by the Spanish settlers to the religious practices of the slaves. Although it is not offensive to any further extent, believers of this devotion prefer the less controversial name of Lucumi, which means “friend” in the Yoruba language.

The Yoruba peoples of the West African nations of Benin, Togo, and Nigeria were brought to the American continent as slaves between the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries. Upon their arrival, they were forced to practice Catholicism. They were baptized according to Catholic ritual and forbidden from practicing their traditional religious way of life. However, slaves continued to exercise their religious faith by hiding their divinities behind images of Catholic saints. Traditional Santería thus focuses on the worship of deities called orishas who mediate between the Supreme Being and creator of the universe, Olorun (or Olodumare). In the Yoruba language, Olodumare's name means “owner of the sky,” and he is regarded as the center and main source of life and the wielder of the power (ashé) that stimulates and maintains the world.

Lucumis believe that particular orishas protect people. During initiation rites in Santería, the new member chooses a padrino (godfather) or madrina (godmother). These are Spanish terms that are titles of respect. A babalawo or babalao, a high priest or priestess, initiates the new member and determines the identity of his or her orisha.

Lucumis believe that after Olodumare created the universe, he passed on the responsibilities of governing the earth to the orishas. Each orisha in the Santería pantheon is considered holy, and each has a specific duty. The main ones are: Eshu, Elegba, or Eleggua, the divine messenger and link between the orishas and the creator; Shangó, or Changó, the orisha of fire and human energy; Obatalá, who organizes the human body and society; Yemayá, the mother goddess of the orishas who rules over maternity; Oshun, or Ochún, the goddess of fertility and love who keeps order over rivers and waters; Babaloo, or Babalú Ayé, the orisha of illness and disease; Ogún, the deity of war; Osain, or Osanyin, the orisha with power over nature and herbs; Ibeji, the divine twins, protectors of children and messengers of joy; Oshosi, or Ochosi, who rules over hunting and justice; Oyá, gatekeeper of the cemetery; and Orula, or Orúnmila, the orisha of wisdom and destiny.

There are also some 200 minor deities who are part of this highly complicated system, which is known as Ifá in traditional Afro-Cuban Santería. It is characterized for its hereditary richness, rituals, iconography, and fascination with magic and intangible divine beings. Santería followers believe that these particular orishas protect everyone in the world, a concept similar to the notion of having a “guardian angel” in the Catholic faith. Orishas, however, need food in the form of animal sacrifices, music, prepared dishes, and human praise and tribute in order to remain effective. Botánicas are stores where santeros can purchase their Santería supplies, such as herbs, charms, musical instruments, animals destined for sacrifices, and potions. Santería is not limited to believers of African ancestry only; people of all races and walks of life freely practice it throughout Cuba and Latin America.

Sarada Devi

Hindu holy woman, goddess

Sarada Devi is best known as the devoted wife of the Bengali saint Ramakrishna Paramahansa of Dakshineswar, India.

However, she was also considered to be a holy woman in her own right and was worshipped as the mother of the universe by Ramakrishna's disciples after his death in 1886. She is respected today as a guiding force and inspiration in the development of the Ramakrishna Math, a devotional and social-service order based on the teachings of Ramakrishna and his disciple Vivekananda.

Sarada Devi was born in the village of Jayrambati in West Bengal in 1853. Her parents were brahmin and named her Saradamani Mukherji. She was a submissive and obedient child, by all accounts. In 1859, when she was six years old, she was chosen to be the wife of Gadadhara Chatterji, later known as Ramakrishna Paramahansa, who at that time was twenty-three years old. They were betrothed (in those days, child marriage was an accepted practice), and he went back to the temple at Dakshineswar, where he was a priest. In such marriages, the child bride would often continue to live with her parents until she attained puberty, at which time she would live with her husband. However, when Sarada reached thirteen years old, her husband did not send for her. Rumors came to her village that he was a madman.

She waited for him for many years. When she was nineteen years old, she decided to go and visit him. He accepted her as his wife but insisted on a celibate marriage—he felt that sexuality with a human woman would distract him from his meditative focus upon the goddess Kali. Sarada agreed to this arrangement and lived alternately with Ramakrishna in Dakshineswar and in her home village. They were poor, and her husband would fall into trance states and ignore her for days and weeks on end. Yet at one point he stated that she was really an incarnation of a form of the goddess Kali, and he ritually worshipped her as a goddess. He gave her gifts and mantras and offered her the fruits of his austerities as well as everything that was his. He told his disciples to worship her also, and they called her “the divine mother.” She was understood to share in the spiritual results of Ramakrishna's yoga and meditation because of her submission and helpfulness to him.

During Ramakrishna's life, Sarada would help him in his spiritual practices, chant mantras to bring him out of certain states, and dress him as a woman when he identified with being a handmaiden of the goddess. She also did the cooking for him, his disciples, and his visitors, and she cared for his mother. She performed chanting and meditation daily.

After Ramakrishna's death from throat cancer, Sarada went on pilgrimages, had visions, and performed ascetic practices to show her grief at widowhood. These included the “five fires” rite (when a person sits in the midst of four fires, and the hot sun above is the fifth fire). However, she was brought out of this state of grief and chaos through caring for Ramakrishna's disciples. They continued to call her mother, and she cooked and cared for them and began to initiate people in Ramakrishna's name. His disciples offered flowers at her feet, calling her goddess, and they wrote hymns of praise to her. Some disciples said that they preferred her to Ramakrishna, saying that Mother was kinder than Father (Ramakrishna himself had been more erratic toward his disciples and often rejected them for trivial offenses).

As Holy Mother, Sarada gained the respect and worship of a growing number of spiritual practitioners who later became organized into a group known as the Ramakrishna Math, or the Ramakrishna order. However, difficulties with relatives caused Sarada much tension in her later life. She was frequently ill, and she died in 1920.

Sari al-Saqati, Abu al-Hasan

Muslim mystic

Abu al-Hasan Sari al-Saqati is an important early spiritual sage from Baghdad. Born in 772, he came from a humble background and was the son of a peddler. He followed his father's mercantile interests and with his honesty managed to become a respected wholesale trader. He seems to have had the comfort and the interest to devote himself to the study of religious ideas, specifically the hadith literature. He experienced a major spiritual turning point at the age of about forty when he met the mystic teacher Ma'ruf al-Kharki. He then relinquished his profitable trading ventures and sought a life of intense spiritual quest, traveling in search of spiritual guidance and encountering several enlightened teachers.

Among other places, his travels took him to historical cities such as Damascus, Ramla, Jerusalem, and Tarsus. He finally returned to Baghdad about twenty years later, in 833. With this return, the third and most influential period of his life began. His eloquence and wisdom attracted students from far and wide. Students from Iraq, Khorasan, and Syria joined the local students to listen to him. He apparently stopped teaching publicly after one listener made the rude remark, “Abu al-Hasan, you have become the resting place of the idlers.” So ended his public sessions, and the fourth and final phase of his life began. He withdrew from public gaze and spent his time in spiritual contemplation or conversation with a few selected individuals. Among his prominent disciples were his nephew Abu al-Qasim al-Junayd and Abu al-Husayn al-Nuri.

Sari al-Saqati has an important position in the history of Muslim mysticism. He was evidently the first sufi to delineate and describe the mystical states. He was very pious and ethical, constantly concerned with his actions and motives, even fearing that his nose might turn black because of his sins. He believed that mystical love is an essential aspect of the spiritual quest. His opinion, however, that mystical love is “real mutual love between man and God” caused uneasiness with the religious scholars, who regarded the human “love of God” as obedience and sincere servitude. According to a citation from ‘Ali ibn Uthman al-Hujwiri, an eleventh-century exponent of mysticism, it was Sari’s intense longing for God that made him accept suffering. Thus, Sari prayed: “We deem all torments more desirable than to be veiled from Thee. When Thy beauty is revealed to our heart, we take no thought of affliction.”

Sari believed that it is essential to be caring and helpful toward others. Ethics and good manners complement faith and prayers. Knowledge was only useful if it provided the basis for some good work. Austerity and sincerity of motive was essential, while hypocrisy was to be avoided at all costs. He was extremely mindful of the source of his worldly possessions, especially with regard to the food he consumed. He avoided eating anything that might “burden him before God” or “render him indebted to any creature.” He also considered that continuous lamentation in the presence of the Lord is salubrious for the spiritual quest. Tribulations and afflictions he regarded as a sign of divine grace, for God tests his devotees by the hardest possible means. Further, he believed that on the spiritual quest one must have “fear of God alone, hope in God alone, love of God alone, shame before God alone, and intimacy with God alone.”

Sarraj, Abu Nasr al-

(d. 988 C.E.)

Muslim sufi, writer

‘Abd Allah b. ‘Ali b. Muhammad b. Yahya Abu Nasr al-Sarraj al-Tusi was the author of the Kitab al-luma’ fi tasawwuf (Book of flashes), a noted defense of sufism. Born in Tus in Khorasan, Persia, he traveled extensively and returned to Tus before his death in 988.

Little is known about Sarraj’s life from the biographical literature. His reported teachers were Ja’far al-Khuldi (d. 960), Abu Bakr Muhammad al-Duqqi (d. c. 961), and Ahmad b. Muhammad b. Salim (d. 967). From the direct citations in Kitab al-luma’, it is known that Sarraj traveled extensively, but he probably spent extended periods in Baghdad under the guidance of Khuldi, in Damascus under Duqqi, and in Basra under Ibn Salim. Sarraj’s shaykhs were themselves companions of some of the greatest shaykhs of early sufism. Sarraj was reported to go into ecstatic states and to enjoy the ability to fast continuously. Sulami reports that Sarraj was descended from a family known for abstinence (zuhd). He was recognized for his chivalry (futuwwa) and his knowledge of the technical language of the sufis (lisan al-qawm), supported by knowledge of Islamic law.

The Kitab al-luma’ is Sarraj’s only surviving work. Like other treatises and manuals of its type, it demarcates normative sufism out of a more diverse tradition. The text represents the majority position of the early sufis, who saw their path as the science of the inward sunna (tradition). It contains definitions of technical terminology covering the doctrines, practices, and character traits of the sufis, with quotations demonstrating the different positions acceptable to the norm. Sarraj’s own opinion is present in the organization and explanation of the materials—especially valuable in his exposition of the ecstatic and enigmatic sayings—and he is not shy to criticize sufis whose speech he nevertheless defends as normative. The text is also valuable for his descriptions of sufis’ “errors,” thus giving insight into those perspectives marginalized by the boundaries of normative sufism in the tenth century.

Sathya Sai Baba

(1926 C.E.–)

Hindu god-saint

Sathya Sai Baba, considered by millions of followers to be the premier “deity-saint” of India, is an advocate of interreligious harmony, education in many forums, monotheistic devotion, and service to humanity. Best known for his many miracles and his manifestation of sacred ash for his disciples, he has mobilized many educational and medical programs around India. He repeatedly calls on his disciples to “love all, serve all,” to follow their own religions, and to be respectful of other traditions.

Sathya Sai Baba was born into a Hindu family on November 23, 1926, in the village of Puttaparthi, Andhra Pradesh, in southern India. His original name was Sathyanarayana. Hagiographies speak of the many miracles that attended his birth and childhood. When he was thirteen, he is said to have manifested signs of divinity. A skeptical family brought in exorcists to cure him, but Sathyanarayana announced his divine identity, claiming to be an incarnation of another holy man, Sai Baba of Shirdi (b. mid-eighteenth century, d. 1918) from the state of Maharashtra, India. He is also considered to be the incarnation of several Hindu gods and goddesses, especially Shiva and Shakti. The name Sathya Sai Baba incorporates a part of his original first name as well as the name of the famous saint of Shirdi in his public appellation. Sathya Sai Baba has predicted that he will live for ninety-six years and after his death will be born again as a person called Prema Sai Baba in Mandya district, Karnataka. Sathya Sai Baba is well known for his miracles. He is said to manifest sacred ash, a symbol of the Hindu god Shiva, as well as watches and jewelry for his devotees. Disciples across the world also claim that the sacred ash sometimes falls miraculously from his pictures.

The Sai organization is divided into three wings: education, service, and devotion, following the main paths outlined in the Hindu holy text, the Bhagavad Gita. The Sri Sathya Sai Central Trust has set up several free educational institutions, including a school of music in Puttaparthi. Feeding the hungry and visiting hospitals and nursing homes are two of the many recommended service projects. Devotees have also set up methods of supplying clean drinking water to about 750 villages in India. Most of his followers gather together at least once a week to sing bhajans (popular devotional songs). The songs are addressed to the many Hindu deities as well as to Sathya Sai Baba. However, as with many other popular gurus in India, Sathya Sai Baba has also been the object of accusations and controversies.

Sathya Sai Baba spends most of his time traveling between the towns of Puttaparthi, Bangalore, and Kodaikanal in India. The official Sathya Sai website, as well hundreds of other cyber locations, radio stations, and videos, keep devotees informed of his activities and discourses as well as the service projects.

Savonarola, Girolamo

Christian preacher, reformer

Girolamo Savonarola was one of the most important Christian religious and political reformers of fifteenth-century Italy. Born September 21, 1452, Savonarola entered the Dominican order in 1475 and became a charismatic preacher.

Savonarola aimed to reform monastic life, a feat he achieved mostly by his own example: He lived in a very small cell, ate little, and wore hair shirts. Under his watch as vicar-general, the Dominican convent at San Marco grew from fifty monks to 238. Throughout his life Savonarola never really established good relations with the governments of Italy. He denounced the Medici, and he had constant battles with the Florentine government. Nevertheless, he is noted as one of the most important of the Florentine lawmakers. He was the inspiration for George Eliot's Romola and continues to be regarded as one of the most important Dominicans in the history of the order.

Savonarola was opposed to the corrupt papal court of Alexander VI, was not afraid to speak out on the topic, supported Charles VII's French invasion of Italy, and was subsequently excommunicated by Alexander on May 13, 1497. Nevertheless, he continued preaching, and Savonarola's native Florence was split in support and devotion to him. Indeed, Savonarola railed against the excesses of the papacy, referring to the Vatican as “a house of prostitution where harlots sit upon the throne of Solomon and signal to passersby: Whoever can pay enters and does what he wishes” (Manchester 1992, 43). Believing he had God on his side—indeed that he had the ear of God—Savonarola undertook a reform of Florentine life. In the infamous “bonfire of the vanities” of 1498, Savonarola asked the people of Florence to bring their paintings, books, jewelry, soaps, and a myriad of other artifacts of vanity and burn them in a great fire. Savonarola encouraged a new morality, one that was clearly a throwback to the days of the primitive church where devotion to God was the primary function of a human being.

Not surprisingly, Savonarola's ascetic spirituality was very popular in Florence, and his legacy grew to martyrdom when he was burned for heresy on May 23, 1498. The Savonarolian influence was felt far and wide. In Florence, of course, the influence was most clearly felt for the hundred or so years after his death. Some credit Savonarola as an important influence on the young Machiavelli. But the influence is clearer in spiritual circles, where Savonarola's followers abandoned those "vanities" Savonarola had railed against and took up devotional reading and practice in a more serious way. Few English translations exist of his famous sermons, but perhaps the most important was "On the Renovation of the Church" delivered in the Duomo of Florence in 1495. It is in this sermon that Savonarola summarizes, as he put it, "everything that we have been saying and preaching in Florence these past years about the renovation of the Church, which, to be sure, will soon take place" (Savonarola 1969, 4).

Sayadaw, Mahasi

Theravadan Buddhist teacher

Burmese master Mahasi Sayadaw, widely considered an arahant (liberated person), was the most important leader in the great twentieth-century revival of meditation practice in the Theravada Buddhist world. From his main center in Rangoon, Mahasi spread the technique variously known as the Mindfulness, New Burmese, or Bare Insight Method throughout Burma, Thailand, and Sri Lanka. In his career he guided more than 20,000 students, and these students in turn taught at least 200,000 others.

Following the lessons of his teacher, U Narada (1868–1955), and challenging mainstream Theravada tradition, Mahasi thought necessary only one of the two commonly taught meditation methods for attaining nirvana (Pali: nibbana). Eschewing the preliminary method of tranquillity meditation, Mahasi advocated the sole practice of insight meditation. While acknowledging that a pacified, focused mind is needed for progress in practice, Mahasi argued that insight meditation alone not only produces calm concentration but also frees one from mistaken craving for and attachment to the transient things of this world that only cause suffering because they inevitably pass away. It does this by enabling the meditator to mindfully place non-judgmental, nonreactive, and thus bare attention on his or her ever-changing physical and mental processes.

Mahasi, based on certain statements in the Theravada canon and personal experience, taught that through immediate, vigorous engagement in this Bare Insight Method, which leads one to the liberative awareness that one should not futilely seek permanence in a world characterized by complete impermanence, one can achieve nirvana in this very life. This conviction, a radical break from the standard belief that nirvana is, for most, many lifetimes away, has been a popular one that has garnered multitudes of followers. The inclusivist Mahasi also diverged from tradition and created great interest by teaching that insight meditation is not, as is commonly held, a difficult endeavor only suited to monks under proper supervision, but is rather a simple technique, easily learned by monks and the laity alike.

To this day, the number of those practicing insight meditation, promoted most successfully by the clear, straightforward teachings of this great master, continues to rapidly grow.

Scholars as Holy People

Some religions have regarded their great theologians and philosophers as particularly close to the divine, engaged in a profound effort to plumb the mind of God or to reach a special insight denied to the unlearned. But on the issue of scholarship and intellectual attainments more generally, the religions of the world are strongly divided. There are, of course, some religions that have no written tradition. Others have emphasized an emotional connection that holy people have with the divine rather than a connection with its starting point in the intellect. Still other religions have at least at times had strong anti-intellectual movements; the leaders of these reforms often win a great reputation as charismatic holy people. This is a surprisingly common phenomenon, including such diverse movements as Pure Land Buddhism, Jewish Hasidism, Pentecostal Christianity, and a wide array of fundamentalist movements. Much depends on whether a culture itself values intellectuals, a valuation that often waxes and wanes over time. Thus scholarly attainment has been one of the most defining characteristics of holy people in Judaism for two millennia, and it took a central role in Buddhism from an early stage in the development of that religion; in Confucianism it is hard to imagine a holy person who is not a scholar. Islam has often honored its great religious scholars as “holy,” but charismatic, emotive qualities have won more popular veneration. Hinduism and Christianity exist at an even more distant point along this continuum, sometimes honoring scholars as saints but much more often venerating charismatic, devotional holy people or those who play an active role in society at large. Intellectuals, however, rarely win widespread popular veneration; their cult is propagated and institutionalized by fellow intellectuals. Indeed, the number of acknowledged holy people who were scholars is a useful marker of how strongly the elite of a given religion has controlled the process of making saints.

Perhaps the most balanced position on intellectuals as holy people has been that of the ancient Greeks, who recognized great philosophers and other writers as in some special way inspired by the divine. Plato argued that philosophy allows access to the divine realm; thus, a philosopher will be closer to the gods than anyone else. Not only philosophers such as Socrates and Plato, but literary figures like Sophocles were recognized as divinely inspired heroes. This belief in the power of the mind induced reactions in Greek society in the form of mystery religions, the Neoplatonist blend of philosophy and religion, and most notably, a very strong anti-philosophical thread within early Christianity.

Jewish scholarship, unlike that of the Greeks, was connected to a specific body of divinely inspired scripture, preeminently the Torah. To a great extent it is still the case today that Jewish spirituality emphasizes Torah study as the best pathway to personal holiness. This accounts for the very small number of holy women in Judaism, since women did not usually have access to formal education. What is striking, though, is that scholarship was by no means central to early Judaism. The early holy people of the religion—Moses, Abraham, the matriarchs, the kings, the prophets—were emphatically not scholars; they are more notable for their ordinariness than for any hint that they were beloved by God for any intellectual qualities. The transition began with the Jewish diaspora, giving a central role to those—scholars of Torah—who were able to maintain the people’s connection to their ancestral religion even in faraway lands. This turn toward the scholar as the essential transmitter of the faith became central with the catastrophic upheaval of Judaism in the first century C.E. After the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E., rabbis such as Yohanan ben Zakkai saw the key to survival of the religion itself as the transmission of learning. The Jews soon learned to respect scholars as caretakers and protectors of the faith. This emphasis can be seen in a legend about the great second-century scholar Rabbi Akiba ben Joseph. According to tradition, he was illiterate until he reached the age of forty. Then, the woman he desired as his bride absolutely refused to marry him unless he became an educated man. Akiba went off for twenty-four years to study, becoming a great Torah scholar—and then came back to marry his betrothed.

In Judaism, religious scholarship soon developed to the point that laypeople had to depend on the rabbis for understanding of scripture. Thus it is said of Akiba that even Moses could not understand his exposition of the Law. Akiba’s main rival, Ishmael ben Elisha, taught that the Torah is in human language and sought literal meanings that were accessible to all, but in general, Akiba's more obscure interpretations won more esteem. The separation of a scholarly elite took another great stride forward with the compilation of the Talmud, an enormous and often highly erudite commentary on Torah. Few people could hope to encompass its depths; thus lifelong study of the Talmud became an important marker of a "truly religious" person. Although the scholar Anan ben David in the eighth century encouraged people to study for themselves rather than relying on authorities, his was a minority opinion. Throughout the Middle Ages, scholars were regarded as the truly great men of their communities. They included such figures as Gershom ben Judah (c. 960–c. 1030), the talmudic scholar who won renown as the "light of the exile"; his grave in Mainz is still visited by the pious. Similarly, the exegetes and commentators Rashi (1040–1105), Abraham ibn Ezra (1089–1164), and Moses ben Maimon (1135/1138–1204) were greatly revered by later generations. It should be noted, though, that until relatively modern times, even the greatest Jewish scholars normally supported themselves through some sort of secular employment; Rashi, for example, was a vintner.

In Judaism, scholarship alone did not make a person holy, but constant study of the divine will was believed to mold people and make it much more likely that they would indeed become holy people. A "true" scholar would be pure in thought and action, able, like Eleazar of Worms (c. 1165–c. 1230), even to forgive the crusaders who murdered his wife and children. Many rabbis thus became models of behavior to community members who could not hope to approach them in erudition. Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg (c. 1220–1293), for example, was a leading talmudic scholar whose disciples also diligently studied his lifestyle as guidance for their own behavior.

Inasmuch as Confucianism is a religion rather than a philosophy, it, too, is based on a deep belief in the essential union of scholarship and virtue. Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.) would not have recognized the possibility of a true scholar who was not also benevolent and a "gentleman" in the highest sense of right behavior toward all. Indeed, it is hard to find evidence that an uneducated person could be regarded as holy at all in the Confucian system. Even when Confucians had a missionary role, it was through the pen. Thus, Kaibara Ekiken (1630–1714), the great popularizer of Confucianism in Japan, wrote more than 150 works explaining the precepts of this worldview to other members of his learned elite.

It was a similar elitism, both intellectual and ritual, that provoked a series of anti-intellectual movements in Hinduism. The brahmins put a considerable emphasis on erudition from an early stage. For example, the great grammarian Panini of the sixth century B.C.E. has been revered as a sage since ancient times, and his work is considered one of the greatest accomplishments of the human mind. Brahminical learning remained important, but both Buddhism and Jainism broke from it, at first with a strong anti-intellectual flavor. Similarly, remaining within Hinduism, the devotional movement was the side of holiness that really won the hearts and minds of the people. The philosophers who won popular veneration were those who combined scholarship with devotionism, such as Ramanuja (1017–1137), or who rejected learning completely, such as the great god-saint Chaitanya (d. 1533).

Early Buddhism was in its early centuries predominantly an ascetic movement, with little emphasis on scholarship. As monks began to settle in long-term communities and established a body of scriptures, however, this situation began to change. By the beginning of the Common Era, most of the great Buddhist holy people were scholars. The first great impetus toward intellectual attainments as a central trait of holy people came from the missionary nature of Buddhism. As Buddhism spread to other lands, there was a strongly felt need to translate Buddhist texts into host languages to facilitate the adoption of Buddhist teachings. The translators are often described as living truly heroic lives that focused on translation—they went to distant lands to learn languages or to collect texts, often at great personal risk, combining a very high degree of missionary zeal to their scholarly attainments. For example, Kumarajiva (344–413), one of the great translators from Sanskrit into Chinese, was a central Asian who was captured by the Chinese. He then studied their language until he was liberated, afterward settling in the city of Chang-an to become a long-venerated model of the scholarly monk. Kumarajiva so caught the imagination of his time that, according to legend, he had thousands of monks as assistants and won imperial support, along with the title "teacher of the nation." His genius played an important role in adapting Buddhism to Chinese beliefs and structures. Faxian (c. 337–c. 422), the first Chinese monk successfully to fetch Buddhist texts from India, endured enormous hardship in his travels, which culminated in the translation of four works. Sometimes translation was in itself regarded as a task specially sanctioned by the divine. Thus Vairotsana (eighth century), Tibet's greatest translator, was a child prodigy marked for great things nearly from birth. The translator-saints provide an important category of holy people throughout the Buddhist world.

Buddhism usually discouraged philosophy as vain speculation, but the same was not true of scholarly inquiry into the spiritual. By the third century, a central feature of many monasteries was study of the Buddhist scriptures as the monks strove to understand the nature of their religion. Buddhist scholars are divided into dualistic and nondualistic camps, depending on whether they believe that the budha-nature is separate from existence more generally, or that buddha-nature and existence are equivalent. As the focus of scholarship became more esoteric, the scholars who could comprehend such questions became an elite within the elite of the samgha (monastic community). It is not surprising that the legend developed that some Buddhist teachings were so difficult that they were hidden deep in the sea, guarded by a serpent until people were ready to comprehend them. Legend tells that the Buddhist philosopher Nagarjuna (c. 150–250) was taught by a serpent and taken to the palace beneath the sea to read the hidden teachings—such was the esteem in which his learning was held. He seems to have been among the first to systematize the body of canonical writings, a process that reached a high point with the great harmonizer of tradition Buddhaghosa (fifth century), who systematized Theravadan Buddhism. By the sixth century, Buddhist philosophers were dividing into subgroups that advocated the centrality of particular sutras or particular approaches to awakening; thus it is impossible to tell if the Chinese Buddhist philosopher Zhiyi (538–597) was venerated as a scholar or as a meditation master.

Buddhism defined intellectual attainment, like progress on the road to awakening, very much as part of a lineage that transmitted teachings from one generation to the next. Thus Dignana, Dharmapala, and Dharmakirti formed a lineage of great monk-scholars in the seventh century. Access to such learning was available only in the monastic order. Therefore, such scholarly emphasis made it nearly impossible for a layperson—or any woman—to win regard as a holy person. There are exceptions, such as the Tibetan Machig Labdron (1031–1126), a brilliant female philosopher, but they only appear in extraordinary circumstances. Tibet in general emphasized holy scholars, conceiving of ever-higher credentials for great intellectual monks in particular lineages. Several leading philosophers, such as Losang Drukpa (d. 1419), were thought to be able to accomplish as much as they did because they were manifestations of Manjushri, the buddha of wisdom. In the golden age of Tibetan Buddhism, great scholars were believed to be reincarnations of great scholars of the past—sometimes even of several at the same time, such as Khedrup Jey (1385–1419). The Buddhist emphasis on learning has continued to the present. The Tibetan Jamgon Kongtrul (1813–1899) was a polymath who won fame as a terton (treasure finder), an uncoverer of old teachings, which he decoded and transmitted to the Buddhist community. And a recent Theravadan holy man, the monk Buddhadasa (1906–1993), produced the largest body of writing of any Theravadan monk in history.

The need to interpret holy writings also led to an important role for Muslim theologians and philosophers. Especially problematic were the hadith, the sayings attributed to Muhammad and his circle of followers, which called for considerable erudition to categorize and evaluate. Muslims were aided by falling heir to Greek philosophy, leading to centuries of brilliant theologians and philosophers, who sometimes fell foul of religious authorities as heretics, but often won great acclaim as people specially attuned to God's will. Thus the great theologian and philosopher Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (1149–1209) attracted many students with his efforts to reconcile theology and philosophy but was still forced into exile, believed by some to be a traitor to Islam; he may have had his life cut short by poison. A more successful example of a synthesizer who won veneration as a holy person was the Shi'a Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa'i (1753–1826), who combined all the threads of Muslim mysticism and philosophy into a single system. Great mystical philosophers such as Ibn al-Arabi (1165–1240) are still venerated throughout much of the Muslim world.

Christianity has had several periods of great scholar-saints during eras when the definition and exposition of right doctrine was rendered necessary because of some sort of competition. In the fourth and fifth centuries, Christian scholars—some of the highest caliber, such as Augustine of Hippo (354–430)—defined “true” Christianity against both heresy and Greco-Roman polytheism. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the enemies were again heretics—and the revived interest in Greek philosophy. A massive growth in the institutional authority of the church also required its own justification. The last great age of Christian scholars was provoked by the Reformation movements of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. As the leaders of Protestantism strove to define and justify their vision of Christianity, Roman Catholics mustered to repel what they perceived as attacks on their faith.

In general, though, scholars do not play a great role among the holy people of Christianity. In the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox traditions, a certain number have been canonized—but they are for the most part arid, intellectual saints who have never won notable popular veneration. Indeed, Christian history has been much more deeply marked by suspicion of scholarship than by veneration of scholars. Unlike Buddhism, Christianity has only a few saints who won their reputation as translators of holy texts—most notably Cyril (826–869), Methodius (815–885), Jerome (347–420), and Martin Luther (1483–1546). Western European Christianity, in particular, emphasized the essential holiness of scriptures above a need to understand them, instead focusing on ritual as the prime religious tool of the populace. Early Christianity was largely antagonistic to Greek philosophy, greeting such great philosophers as Origen (c. 185–c. 254) with suspicion and eventually condemnation. The tendency continued with later synthesizers of religion and philosophy, with even major saints such as Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274) suspected at times of heresy. Eastern Christianity always had greater enthusiasm for theological speculation than did the West, leading, for example, to the raging controversy over hesychasm in the fourteenth century. But in Western Christianity, even many of the saints who have won the title “doctor of the church,” such as Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) and Teresa of Avila (1515–1582), are much better characterized as spiritual guides or mystics than as scholars. In modern times, several theologians, such as Paul Tillich (1886–1965) and James H. Cone (1938–), have won a level of influence that has gone beyond a small circle of Christian scholars. Such cases are exceptional in Christianity, however.

Sebaste, Forty Martyrs of

(d. c. 320 C.E.)

Christian martyrs

The Forty Martyrs of Sebaste were Christian soldiers of various nationalities who served in the Roman army (Legion XII, the “Thundering Legion”) in Asia Minor in the early fourth century. These heroic and dedicated Christians met their fate in about 320 when the eastern Roman emperor Licinius gave the order that all soldiers in the Roman army were to offer sacrifices to and worship the Roman gods. The forty refused to do so. After making several attempts to sway them from their faith, the local governor of Sebaste (present day Sivas, Turkey) left them to die of exposure on a frozen lake, where they were forced to remain naked all night. In an effort to further test their faith and perseverance, the governor ordered that they be tempted by comforts—a bath of hot water and a fire on the lake shore. Only one man defected, but he was replaced by a soldier who had been inspired by the faith of the others, keeping their number at forty. The few soldiers who did not freeze to death were executed the next day.

While the martyrs were awaiting their sentencing by the governor, they composed a document containing their last messages to their families and friends. This text, known as The Testament of the Forty Martyrs of Christ, is cautiously but generally accepted as roughly contemporary if not actually an authentic historical document. Veneration of these stoic and steadfast martyrs was especially popular in the Byzantine East throughout the Middle Ages. They were praised in sermons by a number of later fourth-century Greek church fathers, including Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nyssa. Their relics were translated to Constantinople by the empress Pulcheria in the early fifth century (as well as to Caesarea).

The Forty Martyrs of Sebaste feature as a subject in Byzantine icons and ivories, where they are shown as a group of nude or seminude male figures huddled together in contorted poses on the frozen lake. Christ and angels appear above them, waiting to welcome their souls into heaven. Their feast day is March 10 in the Roman Catholic Church and March 9 in Greek Orthodoxy.

Sengsten Gampo

(c. 617–698 C.E.)

Buddhist ruler

The earliest credible Tibetan history begins in the late sixth century of the Common Era with Namri Sengsten (c. 570–619) of the Yarlung Valley, a chieftain ruling part of Tibet. His son, Sengsten Gampo (Srong btsan sgam po), born in 617 and later worshipped as an incarnation of the Buddhist deity Lokeshvara, was crowned king in 629. Sengsten Gampo sought to expand Tibetan territory by threatening China's western border during the 630s. His conquests included annexing the Bonpo kingdom of Shanshung in west Tibet, invading northern India, and subjugating Nepal. In an attempt to appease the Tibetans, Emperor Taizong (626–649) of the Tang dynasty (618–907) betrothed his own daughter, Princess Wencheng, to Sengsten Gampo. Both of Sengsten Gampo's chief empresses, Bhirkuti, princess of Nepal, and Wencheng, were later worshipped as incarnations of the Buddhist deity Tara.

Sengsten Gampo was considered the first chogyal, or “religious king,” of Tibet. He was influenced to take up Buddhism through his marriages and is revered for founding multiple holy sites, including Jokhang and Ramoche, which became the most significant temples of Tibet. Under Sengsten Gampo's rule, the Tibetan alphabet was formed by his minister Thonmi Sambhota based on an Indian script, further helping to spread Buddhist teachings in Tibet.

Lay Buddhists of Tibet adhere to two categories of elementary precepts, the “five precepts” and the “ten virtuous deeds.” Both of these were promulgated in Tibet as common law by Sengsten Gampo.

King Sengsten Gampo’s reign is significant for Tibetan imperialism. Although it is disputed whether Buddhism was actually officially adopted under Sengsten Gampo, there is clear evidence that Buddhism did in fact have a presence in Tibet at this time. In legend as well as in religious lore, Sengsten Gampo has become a Tibetan Buddhist symbol of power and sovereignty.

Serah bat Asher

(c. 1300 B.C.E.)

Jewish legendary witness

First mentioned in the genealogies of those who went down to Egypt during Jacob’s lifetime (Gen. 46:17), Serah bat Asher is also the only woman mentioned in the roll of Israelites who left Egypt at the time of the Exodus, a lapse of several centuries (Num. 26:46). Legend holds that she was the adopted daughter of Asher, son of the patriarch Jacob. Rabbinic tradition therefore includes her among those who never died and entered living into paradise, like Elijah.

Legend suggests that Serah told Jacob that Joseph was still alive in Egypt and that her immortality resulted from his blessing. Another legend tells how she received “the secret of redemption,” the ability to identify the one chosen to lead the Israelites out of bondage in Egypt. Not only did she identify Moses, according to several Midrashim, she helped him find the bones of Joseph, without which they would not have been able to leave Egypt: a simple task, since she had been present at his burial centuries before.

The sages believed that Serah bat Asher was also the wise woman who negotiated with King David’s troop commander Jo’av and so saved the town of Avel by coming forward as “one of those who are peaceful and faithful in Israel” (2 Sam. 20:19). Based on her eyewitness testimony, she later corrected various rabbinic misconceptions regarding the Exodus (Pesikta de Rav Kahana 11.13; Shemot Rabbah 5.13). The mystical work called the Zohar assigns Serah pride of place in paradise, where she teaches righteous women Torah.

Some feminist scholars see in her authority as witness and in the legends regarding her continuing life and appearances a role parallel to that of Elijah, who is said to appear when rabbis teach students Talmud. Further, just as Serah bat Asher instructed the Israelites how to recognize the redeemer, Moses, so Elijah will announce the final redemption in the coming of the messiah.

A tradition among the Jews of Persia was that Serah bat Asher had lived among them until she died in a synagogue fire in the twelfth century. Her purported burial site became an important pilgrimage destination for Eastern Jews.

Seraphim of Sarov

(1759–1833 C.E.)

Russian Orthodox monk, hermit, visionary

Seraphim was a saint and miracle-working monk of the Sarov hermitage in Russia. He was officially recognized by the Russian Orthodox Church in 1903.

Born in Kursk, south of Moscow, in 1759, Seraphim was named at birth Prokhor Isidorovich Moshnin. His vita tells that he experienced healing miracles as a child. At age eighteen, he entered a monastery at Sarov, south of Nizhni-Novgorod. As a novice, he zealously practiced an ascetic life, and during an illness he was cured following a vision of the Theotokos (mother of God). Prokhor received tonsure as Seraphim after several years, became a deacon, and finally was consecrated as a monastic priest (hieromonk) at age thirty-four. His devotion to the contemplative life was manifested through his repetition of the Jesus prayer (“Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me, a sinner”) and his reading of great Christian texts, including those by ascetic writers such as Basil the Great (330–379) and John Climacus (c. 570–c. 649) and by Russian fathers such as Nilus of Sora (1433–1508) and Demetrius of Rostov (1651–1709). Eventually, he asked the father superior for permission to withdraw to a hermit’s hut, and his request was granted. Seraphim named the hill on which his hut was located Mt. Athos and dedicated his humble quarters to the Theotokos, whom he was to see in visions a total of twelve times.

As a hermit, Seraphim fasted rigorously and submitted himself to the suffering of sleeplessness and complete silence in the tradition of the desert fathers. His third vision of the Theotokos occurred in 1804 in the monastery hospital after he had been badly beaten by robbers. After spending approximately sixteen years as a hermit, Seraphim returned to the monastery in 1810 in obedience to his superior, but he continued to exercise the life of a hermit within his cell, maintaining complete silence for another ten years, and afterward still confined himself to his cell. In 1825, Seraphim experienced another vision of the Theotokos, who gave him permission to end his confinement. From this point he held the rank of starets (elder, spiritual father) and divided his time between monastery and hermitage. In his remaining years, Seraphim served as spiritual father to members of the nearby Deviyev Convent and to many other people who came to visit him for healing and guidance. N. A. Motovilov left behind a record of his conversation with the holy man.

Seraphim was credited with curing illness through his prayers and was associated with a healing spring that issued near the Sarovka River. Some reported seeing Seraphim in a state of levitation or with a brightly illuminated visage. Thus, Seraphim is credited with miraculous powers in his lifetime as well as after his death. Posthumous miracles include curing the monastic priest of Mt. Athos, Seraphim Sviatogorets. Seraphim's ascetic deeds, including his years of silence, his visions, his study of heroic monastic fathers, and his reputation for miraculous encounters, place him in the company of Russia's great hermit saints and spiritual fathers. He inspired many Orthodox in the nineteenth century who were searching for new meaning within the church. He is remembered on January 2 and July 19.
