FOREWORD

This encyclopedia gathers in a single reference work scattered information about founders, leaders, heroes, shamans, holy people, and many other figures venerated or honored in indigenous traditions and imported religions throughout the world. People with access to the supernatural in African and Native American religious practices are cross-referenced with articles about their counterparts in Buddhism, Judaism, Confucianism, Shinto, Islam, Baha'i, Jainism, Hinduism, the Sikh faith, and Christianity.

In English, individuals intimate with the divine are called holy. The word is distinguished from sacred, and the distinction is an important one. Originally a past participle of a now-archaic verb, sacren, meaning to consecrate, sacred may be used to describe human veneration; whereas holy often refers to an object or a person hallowed by God. A pious Christian refers to the “sacred books of the East,” and calls the Bible holy.

Holiness is often linked to death. A Christian martyr who conquers death reenacts Christ's paradoxical victory on the cross in anticipation of a bodily resurrection: “O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory?” (1 Cor.15:56). Neither the historical Buddha nor Muhammad was a martyr. But the Buddha, like Christ, overcame death. This was not the case for Muhammad; and relic cults had only a minor importance in Sunni Islam—the sanctity ascribed to sufi graves is an exception. Each world religion has a unique attitude toward the body; and in every case the founder defined the body's relation to holiness.

The case of Gautama, the historic Buddha (543–586 B.C.E.), is instructive. He left no writings and his teachings were not written down until near the turn of the millennium. Yet his authority was so great that works attributed to him have been composed in many languages and in many lands over many centuries. The distribution of Gautama's bodily remains at his death set the stage for early Buddhist relic worship. By the third century B.C.E. the Mauryan emperor Ashoka built hundreds, perhaps thousands of stupas (burial mounds) containing the Buddha's relics. Pilgrims believed that veneration caused the Buddha's remains to multiply, while a decline of pilgrims would lead his relics to shrink and gradually disappear. Worship animates the holy person's remains. Miracle stories describe the Buddha's past activities. And arrival of pilgrims at shrines locates these supernatural events in the present, where they can aid the personal faith of the worshipper.

Thus the “life” instantiated by the faithful has both a collective and an individual orientation: one, turned toward the past, seeks the welfare of departed souls; the other looks forward to the devotee's own postmortem deliverance. Reciprocity also governs relations with the personage entombed at the shrine. Even in folk Daoism a god's powers (his ling) lies with patronage—a forgotten god is a disempowered deity. Only pilgrims can instantiate the sanctity ascribed to the deceased—for, as we saw, without pilgrims the Buddha's relics shrink and disappear. Moreover, ritual devotion makes the entombed personage an intermediary. In sum, a multitude of reliquary shrines unites living and departed souls into a community that persists throughout time.

In Ashoka's reign pilgrimage sanctified the rise of voluntary associations, a movement directly opposed to the Vedic enumeration of priestly, ruling, mercantile, and servant castes. Yet Buddhists accepted, in modified form, the Vedic doctrine of karma, a system of rewards and punishments attached to one's actions over several lifetimes. Buddhists see redemption as a release (moksha) from reincarnation. In contrast, Christians believe God himself lived out a human life in Jesus of Nazareth. The Hebrew Bible says, “God created [both male and female] in his own image” (Gen. 1: 27). The imagehood of God in the human being, as described in Genesis, however, offers no theological message. God's incarnation in Jesus, does, however, equate redemption with a bodily resurrection.

This belief distinguishes Christians from Buddhists. Buddhists developed a generic view of the body. A doctrinal belief in the three bodies of the Buddha (the Trikaya), however, cannot be equated with the Christian Trinity. Buddhists saw life as an event in a beginningless cycle of birth, death, and rebirth, composed of the realms of gods, demigods, humans, animals, ghosts, and hell beings. This panoramic view of the body was also expressed in sacred writings called “dharma relics”—alphabetical formulae with no lexical meaning (called mantras and dharani) and sutras—that were inserted in stupas and sacred images with the dissemination of scripture throughout Asia from about 100 B.C.E. to 100 C.E. To help their practitioners escape reincarnation Buddhists abolished sacrifice and made desire the source of karmic consequences. Since desire is common to all living beings it is a faculty consistent with a generic view of the human body. And dharma relics, especially mantras, offer a language free of desire. They are written words representing sacred sounds which, having no lexical meaning, are often understood to be the literal words or sounds of the Buddha.

Mantras—originally sung in Vedic religion to invoke the gods during sacrificial rituals—not only were inserted, sometimes along with sutras, in stupas and images, but these formulae were also chanted in tantric rituals throughout Asia. They acted in the place of the Buddha’s bodily relics. Incantations such as OM MANI PADME HUM (an invocation of the bodhisattva Avalokitesvara) express on the popular plane the Buddhist ideal of holiness or nirvana (a “blowing out”). The sanctity ascribed to writings without lexical meaning was thought to be indescribable in the same sense that cessation of craving is indescribable. Dharma relics preserved essential aspects of Indian oral traditions at a time when vast collections of Buddhist scriptures were disseminated throughout Asia.

Kings, monks, wandering holy people, and itinerant merchants were major figures in the rise of Buddhism and Christianity. They all contributed, albeit in different ways, to transform the sanctified, the memorialized, and the despised or forgotten dead into figures with distinctive cultural traits.

To some extent there was a comparable process in Islam, but cultural fusion was more difficult to attain. Conflicting teachings and dissimilar, often incompatible, burial practices contributed to the rise of Islam in the first half of the seventh century. A century after Muhammad (570–632) died, Islam had reached the Atlantic in one direction and the borders of China in the other. It now counts about a billion adherents, with followers in most countries of the world. Islam’s diffusion is often likened to a flow of water over ground in the sense that the cult tends to take on the ideological hues of the regions of the earth it flows over.

Mortuary practices varied locally and to some extent even the afterlife escaped a uniform definition. Perhaps as a result, Sunni orthodox theology has always been rather wary of the tombs of holy people. As mentioned earlier, Islamic religious experience largely came out of conflict with other monotheistic religions, and this fact is linked to the relative paucity of relic cults. Another contributing factor to the slow development of saints’ shrines in Islam is the lack of a clear distinction between spiritual and temporal realms. Like other cults with ambivalent relations to the dead, Islamic culture is also obsessed with purity. All creatures and things are perceived to be inherently pure or polluted.

In short, different religions have developed varying attitudes toward the remains of the holy dead, attitudes that both reflect and help shape worshippers’ attitudes toward themselves, their communities, and the divine. Even religious expressions that initially rejected the whole notion of a relic cult have often accepted key elements of a cult of “holy people,” especially at the level of popular religion. Around the world, different religions’ positions on holy people have influenced each other, as people across the face of the earth have tried to make sense of their purpose in the universe.

PREFACE

Holy People of the World: A Cross-Cultural Encyclopedia focuses on the relationship between humans and the divine in the world religious traditions. Its particular theme is that most effective intermediary between heaven and earth: the holy human being who has a foot in both realms. It is intended as a contribution to the study of comparative religion, seeking to understand both diversity and similarities in world religions through this aspect of popular religion. The encyclopedia is largely biographical in format and comprises 1,183 entries; more than 1,000 of these are biographies of holy people from around the world—well known and obscure, representatives of many religions, and from all periods from which traditions of holy people survive. A concise selection of articles treats specific types of holy people (for example, Bhakti saints and Imams). In addition, there are major articles on attitudes toward holy people in many religions, ranging from the cult of saints in Christianity to the less familiar role of holy people in African and Amerindian traditions. In an effort to consider some of the common themes of holy people around the world, there are also 64 comparative articles on such issues as miracles, purity and pollution, and sexuality and holy people.

But what is a “holy person”? This encyclopedia has employed a broad definition, seeking to explore the variety of religious experience without privileging the Roman Catholic traditional definition of a “saint.” Even the term “saint” has been avoided except in the case of Christianity, lest the reader be drawn into preconceptions that do not necessarily fit other religious traditions. Instead the encyclopedia examines “holy people”—human beings who have been regarded as efficacious contacts to the holy, who because of a special sense of “otherness” have been held up as objects of veneration as well as paradigms for human behavior. The role of the holy person depends on personal charisma, rather than ecclesiastical office, and exists either in the mainstream or on the margin of most world religions.

What this encyclopedia offers is very much a sampler pack of holy folk from around the world. Adequate biographies of Muslim holy people alone could easily fill many volumes; a compilation of all significant holy people of the world would fill a library rather than a three-volume encyclopedia. Therefore we have attempted to be representative rather than comprehensive. The holy people chosen for inclusion are intended to show major trends in attitudes about the human being as a bridge to God, the gods, the forces of heaven—however the divine or supra-human is defined in a given religion. The advisory board members, experts in the various religious traditions, were asked to suggest a variety of holy people over a wide range of time, in the hope that various “fashions” in holiness would emerge by looking at a broad chronological sweep. We also did our best to allow for the large regional variations of any religion that has moved into a variety of cultural contexts, for example including Muslim holy people not just from the traditional Islamic lands but from India, Africa, and America. The women and men included in this encyclopedia are founders of religions, mystics, healers, sages, reformers, and teachers.

Coverage is uneven, because in the final analysis this project is only a single step in scholarly understanding of the phenomenon of holy people especially as an expression of popular religious belief and practice. In some religious traditions, holy people have been studied for generations and play a central role—in traditional European Christianity, for example, scholarly studies of saints began in the seventeenth century, and the official hierarchy of the church fully embraced the idea of a “communion of saints” as a valued element of religiosity by the second century C.E. It is only much more recently, though, that Protestant Christians have begun to escape the Reformation polemical line that insists that there are no special mediators between God and humans except Jesus and to acknowledge the charismatic role of great churchmen and -women as spiritual guides, even if they are not intercessors in a conventional Roman Catholic sense. Similarly, Judaism has tended to downplay the role of the individual charismatic holy person, some scholars of Judaism even arguing that there are no holy people in the religion.

In other religions, the issue of the holy person has as yet won little study. Sunni Islam has tended to be suspicious of a privileged role of holy people, as a result of which there have been many fewer studies than of a comparable phenomenon in Christianity. The study of popular Buddhism can fairly be said to be in its infancy, again creating what is probably a skewed picture of Buddhist holy people. Buddhist scholars are better covered in this work than more popular sorts of holy people, not necessarily because the latter were rare but because a body of specialized studies has not yet been produced that could underpin their appearance in a reference work. Recent studies of African holy people show enormous promise of providing a wider definition of the holy person, both in the universal religions of Islam and Christianity and in the indigenous religions, whose details are only beginning to come into focus. A project like the present one, undertaken in the year 2020, would probably be very different because of advances in scholarship in many traditionally understudied fields.

In part, this encyclopedia's contents were also determined by the current composition of religion and history departments at universities around the world. There are many people ready and willing to write about fifteenth-century Christian female mystics—many fewer have studied indigenous African religions, or have been willing to explore the issue of holy people in Judaism. Similarly, the editor had twenty-one offers from scholars of ancient philosophy who all wanted to write the article on Plotinus, but finding anyone to write articles on ancient Mediterranean hero cults was much more complicated and at times impossible. A particular challenge was finding Islamic scholars able to commit the time to providing articles because of the disruption to many of their lives and many new calls on their time in the wake of the World Trade Center attack.

This encyclopedia was the product of many hands and minds. First thanks are of course due to the busy scholars who nevertheless agreed to serve as members of the advisory board, providing lists of holy people to be included, coming up with lists of possible authors, and acting as a resource in everything from how to alphabetize Islamic entries to obscure questions of Aztec god-kings. Two hundred and sixty-nine people from over twenty countries wrote articles, some of them providing whole collections of beautifully crafted articles on holy people in their field of expertise. The recruiting process was long and difficult, and would have been impossible had it not been for so many scholars who were generous in opening their own professional contacts to my importunities, whether the referrals were to friends and students or to whole internet discussion lists on religious topics (among whom the H-Buddhism list is surely outstanding in courtesy, kindness, and helpfulness). The ABC-CLIO editorial staff has been consistently helpful and patient with the many delays that seem inevitable in a project of this magnitude, especially Karna Hughes and Martha Whitt. Copyeditor Kathy Streckfus did her uttermost to impose consistency in the face of great diversity. Thanks are also due to Lionel Rothkrug and David Bundy, whose idea this encyclopedia was in the first place. These volumes are dedicated to my colleagues in the History Department at the University of Southern Mississippi, who have made me so welcome and have provided a refuge in an often chaotic world.

(14th cent. B.C.E.)

Hebrew leader, priest

In the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament), Aaron is the brother of both Moses and Miriam, the husband of Elisheba, and the father of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. He is the first biblical high priest and the eponymous ancestor of the Aaronite priesthood, whose members trace themselves not only from the tribe of Levi but specifically through Aaron, who is ordained by God. In the book of Exodus, Aaron is introduced as the eloquent speaker who will assist Moses and act as God's agent to the Israelites and the Egyptians. Prophetic literature states that Aaron was sent by God to liberate the Israelites along with Moses and Miriam (Mic. 6:4).

In the story of the liberation from Egypt and the desert wanderings, Aaron is subordinate to his brother. God speaks to Moses, Moses speaks to Aaron, and Aaron repeats the message, often with associated signs and wonders, to the pharaoh or the people. This chain of command is established in Exodus 4:14–16 and confirmed in Numbers 12. Although Aaron's role is secondary, his actions and responsibilities with regard to the pharaoh are somewhat similar to those of Moses so that during the period of bondage the brothers act in concert with one another. They are together when God or pharaoh speaks to them, especially in the initial phases of the plague account in Exodus. Aaron often performs the actions meant to intimidate the Egyptians. For example, it is his staff that is changed into a serpent, which then swallows those of the Egyptians, and that brings the first three plagues of blood, frogs, and lice. His position as a coleader with Moses during this period is underlined in Exodus 11:10: "Moses and Aaron had performed all these marvels before Pharaoh, but the LORD had stiffened the heart of Pharaoh so that he would not let the Israelites go from his land." Aaron is not as conspicuous in the rest of the plague narrative. He takes his next active role after the liberation once the Israelites have crossed safely into the wilderness.

Aaron's role as coleader with Moses wanes throughout the wilderness sojourn, and to some extent the text begins to show his leadership abilities in a negative light. For example, in Exodus 32 he participates in fashioning the molten calf and building an altar before it, and in Numbers 12 he incites the Lord when he and Miriam overtly show disloyalty to Moses. Aaron's role finally changes from that of coleader to that of high priest.

Aaron and his sons provided the models for the priesthood, and Aaron is seen as the progenitor of the elite priestly class. He and his descendants are charged with the responsibility of administering the sacrificial system in the desert, in the newly entered land, and, ultimately, in the Temple at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 6).

'Abata, Muhammad Hasan

Muslim sufi

Muhammad Hasan 'Abata was an Egyptian sufi of the Rifa'iyya order. He is attested, like most Muslim saints, to be a descendant of the prophet Muhammad. His son Hashim (d. 1985) separated from the Rifa'iyya to establish a separate sufi order, called the Qushayriyya Hashimiyya, in the 1940s. In the 1950s, this group was reincorporated into the Rifa'iyya as a semiautonomous branch known as Bayt 'Abata.

"'Abata," which means "stupidity," is a nickname attached to Muhammad Hasan because of his foolishness during his years of gazz (jadhba in classical Arabic), a mental derangement resulting from the shock of mystical revelation. He wore his hair long and in braids and sometimes wore women's clothes. His father, Hasan, had been an important Rifa'iyya shaykh in Asyut province. Shaykh 'Abata died in 1941 and is buried in a humble shrine in the cemetery opposite the mosque of Sayyida 'A'isha in Cairo, along with his wife, Zaynab, and his teacher, Shaykh Rihani. Hashim is buried nearby, but not in the shrine itself.

Shaykh 'Abata is honored with a weekly visitation on Wednesdays accompanied by performance of sufi dhikr (ritual recitation of the names of God with songs praising the prophet Muhammad). By the 1970s his visiting day was attracting ever-increasing numbers of worshippers. This group was known for its use of the dabbus, a metal ball equipped with small, sharp blades at the end of chains that was swung about during dhikr in order to pierce the body. The ritual was said to prove the blessing of the shaykh upon those who suffered no injury (de Jong 1976, 34). The practice was later abandoned by order of the shaykh of the Rifa'iyya following its denunciation by the head of the supreme council of sufi orders.

After Shaykh Hashim's death in 1985, attendance at the weekly visitation declined dramatically. Shaykh Hashim's son refused to shoulder the burdens of a sufi shaykh, and without a teacher the disciples scattered. The loyal few who remain are mainly illiterate and desperately poor. Nonetheless, mawliids (annual commemorative festivals) are held to honor Shaykhs 'Abata and Hashim on the anniversaries of their deaths.

Abbo of Fleury

Christian monk, reformer, intellectual, martyr

Abbo of Fleury, Benedictine monk, intellectual, educator, hagiographer, and abbot of Fleury, was born near Orléans, France, in about 945–950. Studying at Paris, Rheims, and Orléans, he succeeded in becoming one of the great scholars of the tenth century, producing works on computus (the calendar, especially the problem of movable feasts), logic, canon law, and grammar. He was also one of the most important leaders of tenth-century European monastic reform, a wide-ranging movement to establish spiritual and liturgical discipline and exert independence from external interference among the Benedictine abbeys of England and the continent.

For many years Abbo served as armarius at Fleury, an office that combined the functions of archivist, librarian, and schoolteacher. The monastery at Fleury enjoyed enormous intellectual prestige. Abbo's biographer, Aimoin, claimed that teaching was Abbo's first love, and the fame that he acquired from this activity served as a magnet for students from a number of countries.

In 985, Abbo failed in an attempt to become abbot of Fleury and in the wake of this defeat responded to the request of the Anglo-Saxon archbishop, Oswald, that Fleury send a teacher for the monks of Ramsey Abbey. Despite his lament that the beer of England had made him permanently fat, the years that Abbo spent in England, 985–987, were both personally rewarding and intellectually productive. While at Ramsey, Abbo produced the first literary account of the martyrdom of St. Edmund of East Anglia, a work permeated by the spirit of monastic reform that existed in both England and on the continent. His pupil, Byhrterth, became one of the most prolific writers of the next generation.

Returning to the continent to become abbot of Fleury, Abbo faced considerable difficulties, including both dissension within the ranks of his monks and the territorial and jurisdictional ambitions of the local nobility and the bishop of Orléans. Because of these factors Abbo worked both to safeguard the independence of his abbey (the political aspect of the reform movement) and to strengthen the moral progress of the monks under his care. Thus, the abbot of Fleury appealed to both the pope and to the French monarchy on behalf of his monastery and worked to strengthen that monarchy theoretically. Asked to restore discipline at the Gascon monastery of La Reole, an institution that had frustrated three previous reformers, Abbo became a martyr to reform as he was slain by a recalcitrant monk in 1004 during a riot that resulted from his reform activities.

‘Abdu’l-Baha

Baha’i leader

‘Abdu’l-Baha (‘Abbas Effendi) was appointed by his father, Baha’u’llah, to be his successor as head of the Baha’i faith. He was named as the Center of the Covenant between Baha’u’llah and his followers, the perfect exemplar of the Baha’i teachings, and the authorized interpreter of the Baha’i scriptures. He carried out these functions from the death of his father in 1892 until his own death in 1921.

‘Abdu’l-Baha was named ‘Abbas at his birth in Tehran on May 23, 1844. He grew up during the turbulent years of the Babi upheavals in Iran, in which his father was much involved. In 1852, the whole family was exiled to Baghdad, and subsequently to Istanbul and Edirne in Turkey and finally to Akka (now in Israel). As he grew up, ‘Abdu’l-Baha increasingly assumed responsibility for organizing the household, for supervising and vetting the stream of visitors and pilgrims who came to see his father, and for managing all contacts between the small community of exiles and government officials, thus leaving his father as free as possible to concentrate on dictating the words that would form the Baha’i scriptures. Even as a young man, he came to prominence because of his character, his grasp of mysticism and philosophy, and his ability to attract and inspire those whom he met. In later years, Professor E. G. Browne of Cambridge University described ‘Abdu’l-Baha in this manner: “Seldom have I seen one whose appearance impressed me more. . . . One more eloquent of speech, more ready of argumentation, more apt of illustration, more intimately acquainted with the sacred books of the Jews, the Christians and the Muhammadans, could, I should think, scarcely be found” (1890, quoted in Balyuzi 1987, 4).

When ‘Abdu’l-Baha took over the leadership of the Baha’i faith in 1892, it was still a movement confined to the Middle East and India consisting almost exclusively of Iranians. During his ministry, he expanded the reach of the religion to North and South America, Europe, East Asia, and Australasia. Through his two visits to Europe and North America (in 1911 and 1912–1913), he strengthened these nascent communities, spoke at numerous prestigious venues, and met many prominent persons, including religious leaders, philosophers, and statesmen. The newspapers of the time frequently referred to him as “the Persian prophet.” Wherever there was a sufficiently large Baha’i community, he initiated the establishment of Baha’i administrative institutions.

The writings of ‘Abdu’l-Baha and the texts of the talks that he gave during his journeys to the West have an important place in Baha’i literature. He kept up a voluminous correspondence with people, both Baha’is and others, from all parts of the world and wrote on philosophical, mystical, historical, social, and political themes. ‘Abdu’l-Baha suffered greatly during his life. It was not until he was sixty-four years old, in 1908, that the restrictions that he had been under since going into exile in 1852 were finally lifted. On several occasions, his life was in great danger. He died in Haifa on November 28, 1921, and is buried in the Shrine of the Bab on Mount Carmel in Haifa.

All accounts agree that ‘Abdu’l-Baha had a charismatic personal presence that radiated a serene, majestic, and authoritative air. He was always very kind in his personal dealings and generous to the point that his own family members complained that they were left with nothing. He had a keen sense of humor and frequently used amusing anecdotes to make his point understood. His personal life was very simple and the furnishings of his rooms spartan. He ate and slept little and spent some hours every day in prayer and meditation. He was greatly venerated by the Baha’is and sometimes restrained them from making exaggerated claims about him. He always insisted that his highest station and greatest honor was to be ‘Abdu’l-Baha (“the servant of Baha’[u’llah]”).

Abiodun Akinsowon, Christiana

Christian visionary, church founder

Christiana Abiodun Akinsowon was born to B. A. Akinsowon, a Saro clergyman from Porto Novo in Benin, and Alaketu of Ketu in 1907. She went with two cousins to see an annual Corpus Christi procession in Lagos on June 18, 1925, and there saw an angel and fell into a trance. The details are unclear, but one account reports that the angel followed Christiana home, where she remained in her trance state. When she did not improve, her uncle sent for the miracle worker Moses Orimolade Tunolase. When he arrived, Christiana asked him three questions from the Bible that the angel had told her to ask. Orimolade answered the questions, and she came out of her trance.

Another account holds that when Christiana was in the trance she traveled with the angels to heaven and was taught spiritual mysteries. A new angel took her on a trip that lasted several days. They visited a council of other angels, where she had to take a test from the Bible. They told her that if she answered all the questions she would become conscious again. Since this was a difficult task, an angel who had befriended her from the beginning stood by her and assisted her with the difficult questions. All of this time, she was in a comatose state, and her relatives sent for an evangelist to come. In any case, Christiana and Orimolade later formed a prayer group, which they called the Seraphim Society (later the Cherubim and Seraphim Society) in 1925. This movement became one of the many Aladura churches that emerged in Nigeria as indigenous expressions of Christianity. (Aladura means “owners of prayer.”)

Visions remained an important feature of the meetings and subsequent organization of the Cherubim and Seraphim Society. During services, the leaders often told the congregation their visions, and members were also invited to share their own visions and dreams. They received support from some of the local ministers, but their critics argued that the group had set up Joseph Babalola as “rival authority to the churches” (Peel 1968, 73). Others were concerned that the new group opposed local medicines and indigenous religious ideas. The members of the new group continued their work, picking up a millennial fervor. They held processions with members wearing white uniforms and Orimolade and Captain Abiodun (as Christiana was now called) seated in a go-cart. Eventually, the congregation split because Abiodun wanted recognition as a cofounder. In 1929, Orimolade wrote to Abiodun accusing her of insubordination and suggested that she form her own group of followers. Orimolade then called his group the Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim, while Abiodun called her group the Cherubim and Seraphim Society.

Captain Abiodun was an active evangelist. In 1927, when she was still a young woman of seventeen, she led a tour of western Nigeria, including Abeukuta and Ibadan, preaching and organizing Cherubim and Seraphim groups. She exhorted the people to turn away from idols and juju and depend only upon prayer. Abiodun played a central role in the Cherubim and Seraphim churches. It is believed that she worked for the unity of the Aladura churches before her death.

Native American prophet

Abishabis was a Cree born in the area west of the Hudson Bay who led a Native American religious movement known as the “Track to Heaven.” Between 1842 and 1843, the movement took hold of Native Americans living in the area between Churchill, Manitoba, and Albany, Ontario, Canada. It was influenced by Christian teachings and Native American interpretations of Christian hymns that had been written in the Cree syllabic system by Methodist missionary James Evans.

Abishabis, who took the name “Jesus,” apparently to strengthen his claims to prophetic power by associating himself with Christianity, and his companion Wasiteck, or “Light,” were thought to have visited heaven and returned with teachings and blessings for the people. They declared that they had the ability to draw the “Track to Heaven” on paper or wood and used art to communicate their prophetic message, which included warnings against white ways, promises of game, and assurances of heavenly rewards for those who followed their teachings. Followers sang psalms, observed the Sabbath, and painted books.

As his influence as a prophet grew, Abishabis received gifts of clothing and other goods from his followers. The movement eventually declined because of white opposition and also because of the declining popularity of Abishabis himself. A Hudson's Bay Company officer detained Abishabis in 1843 on suspicion of robbing and killing a York area Indian family. Abishabis was seized from detention and killed by Indians who suspected him of becoming a windingo, a cannibalistic being that would endanger people if not destroyed.

Abraham

(c. 20th cent. B.C.E.)

Patriarch of Judaism and Christianity, prophet of Islam

No single figure plays a more important role in the traditions of Jews, Christians, and Muslims alike than Abraham. In the Hebrew scriptures, known to Christians generally as the Old Testament, the saga of Abraham occurs chiefly in Genesis 11:26–25:10, with further material on his sons Isaac and Ishmael in subsequent chapters. The story begins, arguably not long after 2000 B.C.E., with God calling the already seventy-five-year-old Abram (his original name), son of Terah, to set out from his homeland of Ur in southern Mesopotamia and to journey first to Haran and ultimately to a land where God would establish his descendants. When famine struck the land of Canaan, Abram and his people traveled to Egypt. The bulk of the saga recounts Abram's peregrinations across the region within fifty miles or so of the eastern end of the Mediterranean, his encounters with local rulers and prominent figures, such as Melchizedek, king of Salem, his covenant with God, and the beginnings of his own portentous family life.

Milestones in the biblical version of Abram's life include the covenant (Gen. 15–17), to be symbolized by the new name Abraham (Father of Many Nations) and the sign of circumcision, together with the promise that Abraham's descendants would possess much of what is now the central Middle East; the birth of Ishmael to his wife Sarai's slave girl, Hagar; the divine promise that the ninety-nine-year-old patriarch would have a son (Isaac) by Sarah (his wife's new covenant name) (Gen. 18); Abraham's bargaining with God over the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19); and the early years of Isaac, including the story of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice the boy to God (Gen. 21–22).

Beyond the Torah's accounts of these seminal events in the life of the patriarch, Abraham functions throughout the Hebrew Bible as the paragon of trust in God. It was this divine being who continued to be invoked as the "God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Abraham is above all the man to whom God made the initial promise to establish a particular people in a specific land, though descriptions of that Promised Land would gradually speak of a territory much reduced from the earlier expanse "from the Nile to the Euphrates." A late first-century C.E. extrabiblical Jewish text called the Apocalypse of Abraham—probably written in Hebrew or Aramaic, though the original is now lost—is one of only a few "apocryphal" texts associated with Abraham. It is worth noting that both the genealogy in Genesis 25:1–4, which lists the descendants of Abraham's other wife, Keturah, and that in Genesis 25:12–18, listing Ishmael's descendants, explicitly connect the patriarch with Arab tribes.

Abraham and Sarah, along with Isaac and Jacob and their wives Rebecca and Leah, respectively, are believed to have been buried in a cave at Machpelah in the present-day town of Hebron. David would later choose Hebron as his first royal capital prior to deciding on Jerusalem as the ideal site. Since medieval times, a mosque has marked that spot as sacred to Muslims as well as Jews.

In the Christian New Testament, Abraham's foundational importance is largely presumed rather than described in detail. The patriarch plays a background role and appears only in more "theological" texts rather than in extended narrative. These references are indicative of distinctively Christian reinterpretation of Abraham's significance for the new tradition. Romans 4:1–25 and Galatians 3:6–4:31 contain perhaps the most theologically important Christian texts about Abraham. There, Paul contrasts Abraham's example of faith with the Law and its works, arguing that the true descendants of the patriarch are those who have faith in Christ. In Galatians, Paul sees in Sarah and Hagar an allegory of the two covenants—Hagar representing bondage to the Law, Sarah liberation through Christ. Along a somewhat different line, Hebrews 7:1–28 presents the biblical priest Melchizedek, to whom Abraham offered tribute, as a type of Christ. Abraham was the Father of the Jews (Matt. 3:9), but in John 8:33–59, Jesus claims to be greater than Abraham and cautions that merely tracing one's genealogy back to Abraham means little of itself. Today, in a number of Middle Eastern cities with Christian populations one finds churches dedicated to St. Abraham.

Islam's sacred scripture, the Qur'an, makes numerous references to both biblical and extrabiblical stories about Abraham, whose Arabic name is Ibrahim. For Muslims, Ibrahim's status is that of a prophet, a recipient of God's direct revelation. That he does not function as a patriarch in Islamic tradition is significant, for Ibrahim's primary theological role is not that of the father of a chosen nation, but that of the first "muslim"—the first human being to whom God revealed explicitly the call to be a seeker after divine unity and, therefore, the first to "surrender." The Arabic term muslim means "one who surrenders" to God and who thereby enacts the full meaning of the term islam (submission).

Fundamental to this aspect of Ibrahim's Islamic role is the tradition that the prophet's father, Azar according to the Qur'an, made his living by carving idols. Though Ibrahim grew up in an environment of idol worship, he nevertheless had the spiritual gift of seeking after the one true God. He was thus the first hanif—a term that was also used to describe Muhammad himself as a man driven by a spiritual quest. One account (Qur'an 6:74–82) tells how God revealed his oneness to Ibrahim. One evening Ibrahim came out and beheld a star, and he said, "This is my Lord." But when the star disappeared, he said, "I love not things that set." And when the moon rose, he took that for his Lord; but when it, too, sank from view, he sought divine protection from error.

And when the sun rose, he thought this must surely be his Lord, for it was greater by far. Then even the sun set. And Ibrahim said to God, "I have surrendered" (become a Muslim). Other related texts are Qur'an 19:42–49, 21:52–70, 26:69–104, 29:15–24, and 37:81–96.

Perhaps the most peculiar of all the biblical Abrahamic texts (Gen. 15:8–19) occurs in an intriguingly different version in Qur'an 2:260. In Genesis, Abraham asks God for a sign that he will indeed possess the land promised. God tells him to bring a heifer, a she-goat, a ram, a turtledove, and a pigeon. Abraham then cut the animals—all but the birds—in two and separated the pieces. God then passes between the pieces while Abraham is sleeping to formalize his covenant. In the Qur'an, the prophet wants a sign that God has the power of life. Ibrahim is instructed to take four birds, cut them into pieces, and put a portion on various hills. He must then call to them and they will fly together as proof of God's power.

Unlike the Bible, the Qur'an connects Abraham with Nimrod, whom Genesis mentions only briefly and much earlier than Abraham (Gen. 10:8–10). In Islamic lore, Nimrod functions as the prophet's nemesis. Qur'an 21:68–70 alludes, without naming the evil king explicitly, to Ibrahim's conflict with the unbeliever. According to the important Islamic religious genre called Tales of the Prophets, Nimrod was to the child Ibrahim what pharaoh would be to Moses and Herod to Jesus—a mortal enemy bent on the infant's destruction. Failing in his earlier attempts, Nimrod manages to capture Ibrahim and catapult him into a bonfire. But there in the flames, Gabriel appears to transform them into a pleasant garden for the prophet.

Another distinctively Islamic take on the Abraham story has to do with interpreting the tradition that God commanded the prophet to sacrifice his "first-born son." By Islamic reckoning, Isma'il merits that distinction, since he was indeed born before Isaac. The Qur'an does not specifically name the boy whom Ibrahim is prepared to sacrifice, but the tradition presumes, by this logic, that it was Isma'il. Jewish and Christian tradition discount the son of Hagar as illegitimate and therefore not truly Abraham's son. The Tales of the Prophets devote considerably more attention than the Qur'an (11:72–78, 37:100–113, 51:24–34) to the individual birth stories of the two sons.

Finally, Islam's mystical poets delight in transforming the prophet into a paragon of mystical love. Ibrahim was a "sighful" man (awwāh—the Persian expression for "sigh" means, literally, "heart-smoke") whose heart bubbled over when he thought of God. They say you could hear his heart "bubble" for miles, so intense was his longing.

Abraham ibn Ezra

Jewish poet, philosopher, exegete

Abraham ibn Ezra of Tudela was a polymath whose career spanned the transition in Jewish society and culture from Muslim al-Andalus to the kingdoms of Christian Spain. Born in 1089, ibn Ezra was the first Andalusí Jewish religious and literary intellectual to compose all of his various works in Hebrew. A Hebrew grammarian, literary critic, prolific poet of devotional and social Hebrew verse, a Neoplatonic philosopher, astronomer, and astrologer, and above all a seminal biblical exegete, ibn Ezra abandoned Spain in 1140 and spent the remainder of his adult life traveling through North Africa, Italy, France, and England.

Ibn Ezra originally produced biblical commentaries on all the books of the Hebrew Bible. Some of these texts are no longer extant, whereas others survive in more than one version. His witty and frequently acerbic commentaries (in which other scholars and even authorities are taken to task) are written in an unmistakable style. They reflect a synthesis of the diverse hermeneutical trends prevalent in the "Spanish school" of biblical exegesis and represent the different ways rationally minded Andalusí Jewish literary intellectuals understood the Hebrew Bible in the twelfth century. On the one hand, ibn Ezra's commentaries focus upon the Hebrew grammatical, lexical, and stylistic features of the biblical text and aim to clarify the so-called "plain sense" of scripture. On the other, they are suffused with highly laconic and frequently enigmatic philosophical and scientific observations and contain obscure excursions often designed to suggest esoteric cosmological and theological doctrines ("the wise will understand") that are reserved for religious intellectuals (maskilim) as opposed to common folk. Although he did not apply them as extremely as some other Andalusí exegetes, the methods ibn Ezra typically employs are rationalistic. For instance, ibn Ezra is thought to have been the first to ascribe the second part of the book of Isaiah to an anonymous prophet of the Babylonian exile. He also alludes to the likelihood of post-Mosaic interpolations in the Pentateuch. Many of his textual insights, and certainly his method, anticipate developments in modern biblical criticism.

Abraham ibn Ezra's rationalism coexisted with a devotee's profound longing for restoring the soul's connection to its sublime Source. Indeed, ibn Ezra's verse reflects the poet's apparently strong preference for liturgical over social poetry and reveals him as a passionate advocate of the divinely inspired sacred poetry of ancient Israel. Through ibn Ezra's attempts to promulgate Andalusí Jewish learning and its approach to knowledge, that culture continued to serve as a model for the Jews of other Mediterranean lands even as it exerted an influence over Jewish culture in northern Europe.

Action in the World

Can a holy person be active in secular society, or is "the world" so besmirching that the only true holy person is the monk or hermit who locks himself or herself away from all possible causes of sin? This is a question that has deeply concerned religions such as Buddhism and Christianity, which advocate withdrawal from the world through the institution of monasticism. At its heart, the problem is insoluble: Secular society desperately needs the wisdom and skill of holy people to act as intermediaries with the divine, but in popular estimation at least the world is so dirtying that after long exposure the holy person will no longer be holy. The solution that both Buddhists and many denominations of Christians have reached is a seesaw model of balance—time spent in the world (only advocated for the spiritually advanced) must be counteracted by periods of retreat and meditation. Interestingly, that is the solution reached by many other religions of the world in the first place; in the religions of both America and Africa the holy person is periodically separate in retreats to reinforce contact with the divine, but comes back to minister to the people.

A life of complete retreat is often perceived as selfish. Basil of Caesarea, while formulating a plan for monastic life, warned of the dangers of too much isolation in terms of "Who would you teach? Whose feet would you wash?" The Buddha's disciple Upali similarly asked for permission to become a hermit in the forest, but was refused because in the forest he would learn only meditation; in human company, he would learn the Buddhist teachings, too.

In general, the model is to learn, and then to teach. This concept is central to Confucianism, which advocates inner cultivation of the self—but not as an end in itself. For the Confucian, ultimate self-fulfillment lies in the world of action, and even when statesmanship is not possible the perfected individual can still serve as a living example and teacher to a community. In other traditions the correlation is not so strong: A person who has been perfected may share wisdom with others but does not have to do so. Sometimes holy people have felt the need for a specific period of retreat as preparation for work they intend to undertake in the world. A famous example is the Christian Paul of Tarsus, who was converted, preached in Damascus, then spent several years in seclusion, years that came to an end with three great missionary journeys. Similarly, after his exile from Iran the Baha'i prophet Baha'u'llah spent two years as a hermit in a cave, preparing for the task to come. Similar tales are told of Muslim sufis such as Shaykh 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166), who, after finishing his education, went into retreat for about twelve years before beginning public preaching. The theme also appears occasionally in Judaism, as in the case of the sage Simeon ben Yohai (second century), who is said to have spent thirteen years in a cave studying Torah. He emerged and was so angry when he saw mundane activities all around him that everything he looked at caught fire; he had to retreat to the cave for another year before he was able to be constructive in the world.

Both Christianity and Buddhism have the strong topos of the holy person longing for solitude, study, or self-cultivation only to be forced by a combination of conscience and external pressures to play a role in secular society. A common pattern in Chan/Zen Buddhism is for a person who has reached enlightenment to go into a long retreat—for ten, twenty, or even thirty years. For example, the Chan master Nan-ch'uan P'u-yuan (748–835) lived as a hermit for more than thirty years on a mountain; finally some monks talked him down, and he became a monastic teacher. The modern Hindu Ramana Maharshi (1879–1950) liberated his mind, then spent twenty years in silence; gradually, people forced him into a public role by coming to him from all over India. In a more folkloric example, the Christian Kevin of Glendalough (d. c. 618) hid in a cave, and he was only found when a wandering cow licked his feet and then gave such good milk that her owner went to find out where she had been grazing, then carried the protesting saint out on his back.

Are the protests of these holy men, longing for their solitude with God, to be believed? Probably in some cases the answer is yes. But it is more likely that often popular belief created the image of the reluctant holy person—because if a holy person wants an active role in the world, he or she cannot really be holy. Even so, the world diminishes spiritual potency; as Martin of Tours's biographer said, his hero worked fewer miracles as a bishop than he had while a hermit. Many holy people have, however, reached a balance, and the greatest of them, when forced by circumstance to take on a public role, have been a model to others. The balance is fragile for those in positions of authority. But Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), the great fifth dalai lama, balanced out his role as a very active ruler and writer with five or six hours of meditation daily, strengthening himself for his secular tasks. Even more comprehensively, Gregory the Great, the first monk to become pope, laid out a definitive statement for Christians in his Pastoral Rule, a stand that can effectively be applied in many religious contexts: The need of the world makes it necessary for those who are qualified to take on the burdens of a pastor. But life in such circumstances must be lived in balance between the active and contemplative roles, contemplation strengthening the mind to bear action, and action providing a goal for contemplation.

'Ad Sheykh "Holy Family"

Islamic holy dynasty

The 'Ad Sheykh (lit. "the people [descendants] of the sheykh") is a leading family among the Tigre of Eritrea whose members serve as important Muslim leaders, traditionally assuming posts as religious teachers (sheykhs). The history of the 'Ad Sheykh (or, in their South Semitic language, 'Ad Shek) begins with Sharif Husayn, who migrated from Mecca to the adjacent African coast several centuries ago. Originally speaking Arabic, his descendants and followers bred camels and taught on the Eritrean coast and later, under Ottoman suzerainty, adopted the Tigre language of the local nomads.

These semiarid and arid regions were well traveled by Muslim traders and pilgrims to Mecca from the ports of Sawakin and Massawa. But owing to the proximity of the Christian empire of the Habesha (Abyssinia), which in ancient times had dominated the whole coast, many local ethnic groups, including the Tigre, traced their origins to the ancient Axumite kingdom and followed Christianity. The Tigre regularly migrated, following rainy seasons, from the lowlands to higher-lying plains, thus staying in close cultural connection with the Christian highlanders. When in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the Christian empire disintegrated into several independent states, the Christian influence on the coastal peoples faded. The political changes, and the necessary protection of the trade routes, especially the traditionally Muslim ports and the Muslim kingdoms in northern Sudan, led to a reorientation of the locals, who started to accept Islam in the early nineteenth century.

This change gave the 'Ad Sheykh a crucial role and a new identity as they assumed a central religious role among the Tigre. The late eighteenth-century sheykh al-Amin bin Hamid bin Naf'utay was the key figure during this period of the clan's history. Through his teaching and miracles he gained widespread fame. Marrying the daughter of the chief of the most influential Tigre group of the Bet Asgede, he set the foundation for repeated and complex genealogical connections with the leading clans of the coastal areas. These connections resulted in the conversion of the Bet Asgede in the early nineteenth century.

Al-Amin's group settled in Sahel in today's northern Eritrea and quickly grew with the "adoption" of escaped slaves and Tigre vassals into the family. Because these new members of the community had left their former masters, the enrootment of Islam in the region constituted a social revolution. Through conversion, new alliances were settled and the feudal serf system weakened. Moreover, the 'Ad Sheykh based in the nearby fertile Barka valley, traditionally camping in Bisha, had overwhelming success in converting their whole area to Islam. This was perhaps helped by the hope of the locals, when the mudiriyya of Taka in the Sudan started to claim Barka, that conversion might reduce the threat by Egyptian armies.

In the mid-nineteenth century, virtually all Tigre groups, nomadic and semisedentary alike, had converted to Islam. The veneration of the 'Ad Sheykh, expressed through gifts, led to an amassment of wealth. In Sahel, a saintly cult developed around Sheykh al-Amin, while at the coast his grandson Sheykh Muhammad bin 'Ali (c. 1808–1877) is still venerated as a saint today at his grave in Emberemi in the vicinity of Massawa, which attracts yearly pilgrimages.

Adalbert of Prague

Christian bishop, martyr, apostle of Bohemia and Prussia

Adalbert (Voitech, Voytiekh) was born to a noble family in Bohemia around 956 and died on April 23, 997, in Pomerania, near Danzig, at the hands of Prussians whom he was attempting to convert to Christianity. Educated in Magdeburg by St. Adalbert, he assumed the same name as his teacher at either baptism or confirmation. Upon returning to Bohemia, the youthful Adalbert was elected bishop of Prague, having entered the city barefooted, and was consecrated at Mainz in 983. Balancing his youthful energy, enthusiasm, humility, and zeal, he set about trying to convert Bohemia from its largely pre-Christian beliefs.

It was a task that he abandoned after some five years owing to what may have been a combination of personal and political reasons. He traveled to the monastery of Sts. Boniface and Alessio in Rome, where he became a monk and remained for a number of years before returning to Prague. He then founded the Benedictine monastery at Brevnov, one of the few foundations that he would develop, which was consecrated in 993. He left the city again after excommunicating some of its dignitaries for killing a woman who had been found guilty of adultery and had been given refuge by Adalbert in his church.

Adalbert spent the rest of his life preaching and converting people to Christianity in Hungary, Poland, and Prussia. It was while attempting to convert the Prussians that he was killed. It is claimed that his body was bought back from the Prussians for its weight in gold. Friend and protégé of Pope John XV, Duke Boleslaus, Emperor Otto III, St. Astrik, and St. Bruno of Querfurt, he was a significant figure in the politics of central Europe, and his importance can be seen in his speedy canonization in 999. Originally buried in Gniezno, his body was translated in 1039 to Prague. He is credited with having composed the war song "Boga-Rodzica," which the Poles have often sung before entering battle.

More than eighteen different scenes from Adalbert's life are represented in medieval art, ranging from his birth to his burial and including the appearance of Christ to him, his conversion of the Prussians, and his investiture. The fully vested cleric widely venerated in central Europe is always shown dressed as a bishop with his crosier and book. He was rarely represented before the fourteenth century (only five examples are known, among which is a scene of his martyrdom [Stuttgart, Landesbibliothek, Bible, Fol. 415, fol. 34r]). He is understandably well represented in his native Prague, where all of the images date to the fourteenth century and focus on his close relationship with Christ. These include depictions on the cathedral itself (on the exterior of the southern and eastern sides, as well as on a panel in the interior). The bronze doors of the cathedral of St. Wojciech in Gniezno, which date to the second half of the twelfth century, are among the finest of the memorials.

Adechina (Remigio Herrera)

(c. 1811–1905 C.E.)

Santería high priest

Known universally by his African name, Adechina was an African-born Cuban who established the fundamentals of Yoruba religious practice in the Americas. Born around 1811 and enslaved as a young man in his native Yorubaland (now Nigeria), he was brought to Matanzas, Cuba, around 1830 to labor in the sugar industry. Little is known of his early life, but he was able to achieve freedom and join a growing Afro-Cuban working class. He worked as a mason and before his death in 1905 had become a prosperous property owner in the town of Regla across the harbor from Havana.

Adechina's fame rests upon his becoming one of the most influential figures in the development of Yoruba religious traditions in diaspora. Known as Lucumi, the many thousands of Yoruba men and women who had been taken to Cuba established themselves as an important force in the island's ethnic mosaic. Their religious practices achieved wide recognition by the Spanish term Santería (Way of the Saints). Adechina was a leader of the Lucumi community and a high priest of Santería.

Among his other achievements, Adechina is credited with carving the first set of sacred batá drums in Cuba. The rhythms of the batá are used to praise the orisha spirits of the Lucumi, and the preparation of the drums requires extensive sacred knowledge as well as carving skills. Adechina's drums were said to call the orishas so beautifully that they were called, in Spanish, la voz de oro (the voice of gold).

Adechina was also a founder of one of the most famous of Lucumi religious organizations, El Cabildo Yemaya de Regla (The Yemaya Association of Regla). Yemaya, protector of the seas, one of the most prominent of the orisha spirits, corresponded to the Catholic Virgin of Regla. On her feast day, the Cabildo would honor both the Catholic saint and the African spirit in public processions. Adechina passed on the leadership of the Cabildo to his daughter Josefa "Pepa" Herrera, who built the processions into a national institution famous throughout the island in the 1930s and 1940s.

Perhaps Adechina's greatest contribution to African spirituality was his development of the Ifá priesthood in Cuba. Ifá is a Yoruba oracular system of great subtlety that organizes and makes available the medical and spiritual knowledge of the Yoruba ancestors. Ordination as an Ifá priest takes many years of arduous training. Adechina set a standard of excellence that is recognized today by every practitioner. He trained the majority of the most influential Ifá priests of the next generation, and nearly every practitioner today will claim Adechina as part of his priestly lineage.

Adelheid (Adelaide)

Christian empress

Adelheid, a queen of tenth-century Italy and empress of Germany, has been venerated since her death on December 17, 999. Described as beautiful, virtuous, humble, and compassionate by her biographer Odilo, abbot of the monastery of Cluny, in his Epitaphium Adelheidae (Epitaph of the august lady, Adelheid), written shortly after her death, she was an extremely generous supporter of the church. Despite her political status and wealth, she was well known for her modesty and charity to the poor. Odilo promoted her as worthy of veneration and the reason behind the prosperity in the kingdom and the expansion of its borders. Moreover, she liberally supported Cluny and founded monasteries at Payerne, Pavia, and Selz and endowed them with gifts of land, buildings, gems, and precious vestments. She was canonized a saint by Pope Urban II in 1097.

Adelheid was born in 931, the daughter of King Rudolph II of Burgundy and Bertha of Swabia. She married King Lothar of Italy in 947 and bore a daughter. Upon Lothar's death three years later, Adelheid ruled alone until her kingdom was attacked by Berengar of Ivrea, who took the throne for himself and threw her into prison. Odilo describes her eventual escape to the castle of Canossa in northern Italy as miraculous and ordained by God. Adelheid's appeal for help was answered by King Otto I of Germany, who defeated Berengar and married her in 951, linking both kingdoms under his rule and influence. In 962, Pope John XII crowned the couple emperor and empress, titles of enormous political and even sacred status. They had two children, the future Emperor Otto II and Matilda. The latter would become abbess of the convent of Quedlinburg, which had been founded by Adelheid's mother-in-law, St. Matilda.

Adelheid's political activities as a powerful member of her husband's court were as well known as her pious actions. When Otto II succeeded to the throne upon his father's death in 973, Adelheid retired to her brother's lands in Burgundy, apparently after an estrangement. They reconciled, however, before he died ten years later. His son and successor, Otto III, was only three years old when his father died, and Adelheid served as coregent in his name with her daughter-in-law, Empress Theophanu. She ruled alone as regent after Theophanu's death in 991 until Otto III came of age. At last able to retire, Adelheid devoted her final years to holy and charitable pursuits. She also participated in preserving a cult of remembrance for the Ottonian dynasty. It was her habit to celebrate the memories of her husband and son on the anniversaries of their deaths by making donations in their names for prayers to be said for their souls. She died in 999 at the age of sixty-eight, and, according to Odilo, God revealed her sanctity through the many healing miracles that occurred at her tomb at Selz during the years that followed.

Adham, Ibrahim ibn

(c. 730–777 or 790 C.E.)

Muslim mystic

Ibrahim b. Adham b. Mansur b. Yazid b. Jabir al-'Ijli, a celebrated sufi mystic, has become a symbol of the devout renunciation considered necessary on the sufi path of spiritual elevation. Century after century, the anecdotes regarding his generosity to others, austere habits, simple lifestyle, and earnest prayers have been the lore of Muslim mystics across regions and cultures.

Born in around 730, Ibrahim ibn Adham was descended from an affluent Arab family that had settled in Balkh. In 754 or earlier, he traveled to Syria in search of a spiritual path, leading a quasi-nomadic life and traveling to various parts of the greater Syrian and Palestinian regions. As he sought spiritual transcendence, he maintained himself by engaging in various types of labor, such as reaping or grinding grain or toiling in orchards. He did not believe in begging or in becoming a burden to others. He also engaged in military operations at the Byzantine border. He apparently participated in two land and two naval expeditions, dying in the second naval expedition sometime around 777 or later from an illness of the stomach. A variety of locales have been reported as his place of burial, including a Byzantine island, Egypt, Tyre, Baghdad, Damascus, Jerusalem, and Jabala on the Syrian coast.

Ibrahim's life story is explored in his medieval biography, which is based on plausible historical data, as well as in hagiographical and legendary lore. He has been portrayed as a ruler of Balkh who abdicated to embark on a spiritual quest after meeting with the immortal guide Khidr. It is difficult to determine the circumstances that may have resulted in the creation of this lore, connected as it is with the legend of the Buddha. Alternatively, it is surmised that his migration from Khorasan to Syria could have been due to sociopolitical factors.

Far-flung literature regarding Adham attests to his popularity for more than a millennium. In Persian literature, the figure of Ibrahim takes on many extraordinary features. In Farid al-Din 'Attar's early thirteenth-century Tazkiratul-awliya' (Muslim saints and mystics), he is presented as a good-natured and ardently pious person who was constantly engaged in ameliorating the condition of his fellow humans and was deeply engrossed in a spiritual nexus with God. In the non-Arabic realms of south and Southeast Asia, especially those that were influenced by the Persian literary diaspora, the narrative of Adham has taken on many hyperbolic details. In Turkish, Malay, Javanese, Sundanese, and Bugis, as well as in several languages of the Indian subcontinent, Ibrahim is endowed with fanciful and saintly characteristics. Hence, many anecdotes of Ibrahim's life as well as his opinions have become permanently integrated in the rich tapestry of Muslim spirituality. For instance, one often-repeated didactic tale concerns the idea of repentance, that is, the conscious effort to transform and transcend the mundane self. In the story, one night Ibrahim hears sounds on his roof and, upon investigation, finds a man hunting for his camel. When Ibrahim suggests the absurdity of this action, the man proclaims the utter uselessness of Ibrahim trying to find spiritual elevation while surrounded by luxury. Ibrahim repents, gives up his belongings, and embarks on his quest for transcendence.

who wished to honor and pay homage to him celebrated the moment of his arrival. The event, termed the adventus, was sometimes considered an occasion for miracles, but more often it was a time for oratory, adulation, and a series of religious rites, such as the burning of incense, lighting of altars, and sacrifice.

The motivation, however, for such an outpouring of joy and exultation was not entirely religious. It was also inherently political. Typically notified in advance of the anticipated adventus, the subjects could therefore be expected to arrange elaborate festivities, which sometimes were taken as a reflection of their loyalty. Some emperors appeared to seek and virtually require the attention and accompanying ceremonies practiced in their worship; others would attempt to arrive secretly to avoid the commotion and financial burden such an event would cause. Seemingly, the emperors most anxious to encourage worship and who expected the greatest attention, such as Caligula, Nero, and Commodus, were often the most unpopular.

The roots of the imperial adventus can be found in the earlier provincial tradition of greeting governors and other prominent Romans with a large reception. Moreover, similar receptions and processions were held for the arrival of certain imperial images, a symbolic way of worshipping the emperor in his absence and creating the feel of his presence. Although the solemnity of the adventus of an emperor remained intact, the role of spectators and certain religious rites faded into the background with the later Christian emperors. Sacrifices were no longer part of the event and direct prayer to the emperor was discouraged.

Aelred of Rievaulx

Christian monk, theologian

Aelred, Cistercian monk and abbot in Yorkshire, England, is remembered today especially for his theologically bold statement that “God is friendship.” Aelred believed in the practice and centrality of friendship in monastic and Christian life. His writings Speculum caritatis (The Mirror of charity) and De spirituali amicitia (Spiritual friendship) are some of the finest expressions of a spiritual revolution that took place in western Europe in the twelfth century. Continuing the initial impulses of monks such as Anselm of Canterbury, Aelred welcomed the presence of individual emotional bonds in the monastery as a means to strengthen the life of the community. Ignoring a tradition going back to the Egyptian and Syrian deserts, where friends were considered to be a threat to salvation, Aelred could not imagine life without friends, in whom he found the image of Jesus Christ.

Aelred remained loyal to his Anglo-Saxon roots and celebrated the memory of the local saints of his native area around Hexham and Durham in the north of England. In his youth, however, he was sent farther north, to the court of the Scottish king, where he enjoyed material success but felt guilty and even suicidal because of his attraction to other men and especially because of an attachment to one other youth. In joining the newly founded Cistercian monastery of Rievaulx in Yorkshire in 1134, however, Aelred entered into a way of life in which he could combine his love of other men with his desire to live in chastity and inner harmony.

Aelred was a natural-born leader and in 1143 was sent out to found a new daughter house of Rievaulx in Lincolnshire. In 1147, he was recalled to Rievaulx to become its abbot, a post he enjoyed until his death in 1167, combining spiritual counseling of his monks with political involvement in the society of his day. The portrait of Aelred provided by his biographer, the monk Walter Daniel, points to a man who enjoyed his life in community and insisted that even an abbot can have special friends. Under Aelred, Rievaulx expanded its numbers and founded new daughter houses, which Aelred regularly visited. His most revealing spiritual statement is his Precatio pastoralis (Pastoral prayer), where he summed up the concerns of his spiritual life and his love of the monastic life in friendship and community. He has never officially been canonized but is considered by Cistercians today as one of their fathers and saints. His feast day is January 12.

Aesthetics and Holy People

In many of the world's religions the holy person as creative artist is an occasional theme; it plays a central role, though, in the identification of holiness in the religions of India and Japan. The association of holy people with poetry, song, dance, and the visual arts, whether they are used to convey a religious message or as a mode of self-expression and contact with the divine by holy people, has led to new forms and practices in various cultures.

As far as the sources allow us to see, many founders of world religions were creative geniuses in their ability to express their messages in clear, compelling, attractive terms. For example, the seventeen short hymns attributed to Zoroaster are models of poetic genius, and the works of the Sikh gurus are similarly valued in the Sikh religion. Tales also tell that Mani was renowned as an artist, illustrating accounts of his visions in an effort to make their sense clear to others—he is still remembered in the Muslim world as the greatest painter who ever lived.

In Indian religions, however, poetry, music, and dance have been regarded not simply as a means to convey religious ideas but as acts of worship and paths to enlightenment in their own right. Much of popular Hindu religious practice is the singing of hymns, a practice that helps to explain the great number of poet-saints of Hinduism. Especially important is the belief that music can articulate the order of the cosmos itself, thus making the musician a part of the greater order of the universe. This is central, for example, in the hagiography of Chaitanya (1486–1533), the great Hindu god-saint famed for ecstatic devotion, which he expressed in dance and song, in that way participating in divine creativity itself. The sants, poet-saints, are especially noted for their utter devotion to a particular god, expressed in often-ecstatic poetry and hymns that circulated for centuries in large areas of India. Hundreds of examples can be found of Hindu holy people most clearly defined through their devotion expressed through poetry and music, such as the Alvars, a group of twelve great devotional poets of the sixth through ninth centuries, whose very name means “saintly masters.”

Poetry seems to have taken on a more central role in Hindu religion at about that time as part of the transformation of Hinduism to respond to the Buddhist challenge. For example, the Tamil poet and holy man Manikavacakar, who lived in the eighth or ninth century, was repelled by the impersonality he saw in Buddhism and turned instead to poetry as an expression of his intense devotion to the deity Shiva. Similarly, the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three singing poet-saints of the seventh to ninth centuries, spread devotion to Shiva with their hymns. In general, these holy people seem to have used their hymns for a dual purpose: to experience love for their god in a deeper way than was otherwise possible, and to express that love as a lesson to others. (The Hindu poet Kamalakanta Bhattacarya (c. 1769–1821) even charmed a gang of highway robbers by singing to Kali.) Many were prolific composers, and pious legend has probably increased the numbers of their works. For example, the great female poet-saint Bahinabai (c. 1628–c. 1700) wrote nearly 1,000 devotional songs, while Purandaradasa (1485–1565) proclaims in one of his songs that he had composed 475,000 (of which about 1,500 are extant). This emphasis on music and dance for both the personal journey to God and to instruct others also appears among Muslim holy people of India, such as the sufi Muinuddin Muhammad Chishti, who actively encouraged music and chant as a way to feed the soul.

Similarly, the religions of Japan have defined holy people with a strong stress on aesthetic sensibility as central both to the holy person's own development and as a teaching aid for those less spiritually endowed. Thus, the Japanese Pure Land teacher Ippen created the practice of dancing for joy while chanting the nembutsu (the praise of Amida Buddha). It was in Zen, though, that aesthetics grew to a central holy characteristic. Zen calligraphy is a holy act in which the writer comes to participate in the buddha-nature of everything in the cosmos. Many Zen masters emphasized beauty as a way to the divine. The scholar Muso Soseki (1275–1351) was renowned for his poetry and the creation of the “Zen garden”; Ikkyu (1394–1481) was a great developer of Zen arts and a noted poet; Hakuin Zenji (1685–1769) was an important painter, calligrapher, and sculptor—just to name a few of the many Zen masters best known for their aesthetics. Several of Japan's Neo-Confucian holy people emphasized similar artistic qualities, and beauty is central to Shinto belief; it is an ancient belief that beautifully phrased speech can bring blessings from the kami (sacred powers)—and vice versa.

In other religions, holy people have formed a special connection to the divine through their skill in music or the arts. A particularly famous case is that of the Greek Orpheus, in legend the son of Apollo (god of music) and a muse, whose music was so powerful it could win over the gods of the underworld, and whose head kept singing even after it had been cut off. In Christianity, the Byzantine saint Romanos the Melodist (c. 490–c. 560), the greatest hymn writer of the Eastern church, was reputed to have gained his skill because the Virgin Mary visited him and gave him a scroll to eat; the sixth-century Yared, creator of the Ethiopian liturgy, was said to have been mystically carried to the Garden of Eden to hear the seraphim singing before he took the music back to earth. Relatively few Christian saints are noted for their skill in other arts, but among them are the metalworking saints Bernward and Eligius, the Renaissance artist Fra Angelico (c. 1387–1455), and the great Russian icon painter Andreas Rublev (fifteenth century).

Other poets and hymn writers, although not regarded as creative geniuses, have sought to express their own impressions of the divine and inspire others. Several Christian saints are known for their hymns, such as Ephrem the Syrian (c. 306–373), Paulinus of Nola (c. 354–431), and Godric of Finchale (c. 1065–1170), the author of the first extant lyric poems in English. Poets such as John of the Cross (1542–1591) and Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844–1889) have inspired many with their poetic vision. Similarly, Judah Halevi (c. 1075–1141) was a brilliant poet in Hebrew, and the great Tibetan saint Milarepa (1052–1135) produced a series of spontaneous songs after his enlightenment that are still an important source of inspiration to Tibetan Buddhists.

In Islam, vernacular verse was a powerful tool to convert the countryside, used by reformers such as Uthman dan Fodio in eighteenth-century West Africa; his mystical verses were said to have a hypnotic effect on his followers. Muslim Turkish poetry by such holy men as Yunus Emre (c. 1241–1320/1321), Kaygasuz Abdal (fifteenth century), and the modern mystical poet Asaf Celebi (1907–1958) have been especially central in making mystical Islam comprehensible to a vernacular audience. Indeed, much of the mystical writing of the Muslim sufis is poetic, often of great beauty, and many of the great sufi mystics, such as Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273) and Omar Khayyam (c. 1048–1122), are best known today as poets. But Rumi, especially, went beyond poetry to a complete aesthetic experience as a means to religious expression and enlightenment, leaving typical Muslim practice to give music and dance a central place. He especially instituted a circular dance for his followers to replicate the movement of the heavenly bodies and all of creation dancing with joy around God—his sufi order is known to the West as the “whirling dervishes.” Hasidic Jewish leaders such as Nahman of Bratslav (1772–1811) also encouraged dancing as a religious experience.

Dance is also important to the religious traditions of Africa and the Americas. African spirit mediums often dance to attain a trance state that allows them to speak to spirits of gods, as do practitioners of Native American religions. The power of dance has been adopted by several modern religious leaders, such as Kitamura Sayo (1900–1967), the founder of the Japanese new religion Tensho Kotai Jinguiko. Her movement is known as “the dancing faith” because of the central role of dance to induce ecstatic states. Similarly, churches in America are dedicated to the jazz musician “Saint” John Coltrane (1926–1967), who was possessed by spirits while making music. In Santería, the ability to make the sacred drums that can call the gods is itself regarded as a holy trait.

Æthelwold

Christian monk, bishop, reformer

Born to a prosperous English family sometime during the reign of Edward the Elder (899–924), Æthelwold received an early education in sacred literature. While still a youth, he joined the court of King Athelstan and in time received holy orders. While at court, Æthelwold and Dunstan became interested in the monastic reform movement then emanating from continental centers such as Cluny and Fleury. This became their inspiration for the revival of monasticism, which had virtually disappeared from England after decades of Viking incursions.

When Dunstan became abbot of Glastonbury (c. 939), Æthelwold became a monk there. He also continued his education, reading deeply in the church fathers and acquiring a command of Latin grammar and metrics that was remarkable for his day. His interest in reform continued, and he considered entering the stricter discipline of a monastery overseas. King Eadred (r. 946–955), however, forestalled him, offering him the abbacy of a long-neglected monastery at Abingdon instead. With royal patronage, Æthelwold turned Abingdon into a well-regulated community governed by the Benedictine Rule. To ensure that his household conformed to the highest standards, he dispatched one of his monks to Fleury to observe continental customs firsthand.

When in 963 King Edgar (r. 957–975) made him bishop of Winchester, Æthelwold carried his reforms into the churches of his see. He replaced the cathedral canons with monks from Abingdon, establishing a model of monastic cathedrals replicated elsewhere in England. He then established other monastic communities in Winchester and elsewhere, including formerly Danish East Anglia. He endowed his foundations generously with lands and legal privileges and, when necessary, pursued legal action to protect their rights. To ensure proper knowledge of monastic practice, he translated the Benedictine Rule into Old English, and he compiled the Regularis concordia (Concordance of rules), a set of regulations to promote monastic discipline throughout England.

In many respects, Æthelwold was a model tenth-century churchman, working for reform in concert with his king. An able administrator, he saw his churches prosper: The fame of Winchester’s Old Minster grew when Æthelwold promoted the cult of St. Swithin there and rebuilt the church to accommodate throngs of pilgrims. Although he lived austere and governed his subordinates with strict discipline, he also had a reputation for generosity and compassion, selling church treasures to provide for the poor in times of famine.

Æthelwold died from an illness on August 1, 984, and his tomb became a cult center where miracles reportedly occurred. But his true legacy is illustrated by the vision ascribed to St. Dunstan while he was still at Glastonbury: In the vision, a huge tree spread its limbs over all England, and on every branch hung monks’ cowls. Æthelwold’s own cowl stretched high above the rest, protecting them all. The vision may be legend, but it reflects Æthelwold’s role in the reestablishment of English monasticism. His reforms, supported by a revival of learning, were carried on by his pupils, many of whom occupied places of authority in the English church.

Afra of Augsburg

Christian martyr

Afra, a female Christian martyr of the late Roman Empire, was the original patron saint of Augsburg in southern Germany. Little is known about the historical Afra, although her grave was visited in 565 by the scholar and poet Venantius Fortunatus. Martyred during the Christian persecutions of the Roman emperor Diocletian (284–305), she is first mentioned in the Martyrology of St. Jerome, which was composed around 450 in northern Italy. Centuries later, several accounts of her martyrdom were composed to accompany the solemn celebration of her feast day, August 5.

Written in the eighth century, these earliest narratives portray Afra as a former prostitute in Augsburg who was converted to Christianity by an otherwise unknown Bishop Narcissus from Gerona in Spain. Arrested for being a Christian, she refused to renounce her new faith and was burned at the stake. When her mother and servants, who were also Christians, tried to bury her remains, they were discovered and likewise burned in the tomb where they were hiding. None of these accounts, however, have any historical value and probably arose from the original author's misreading of the Martyrology of St. Jerome. By contrast, three eleventh-century saints' calendars from Augsburg call Afra a "virgin," and given the unreliability of the earlier accounts, this description seems more plausible. Later on, in the twelfth century, crusaders brought the oral tradition of St. Afra's legend with them to the Holy Land, and a version of her life was composed in Armenian.

Through many centuries St. Afra's cult was kept alive by monks of the monastery dedicated to her in Augsburg. During rebuilding of the monastery in 1064, a Roman sarcophagus supposedly containing the charred remains of a female body was discovered, which to this day is preserved under the church's main altar. When the rebuilding was completed in 1071, the monastery was rededicated to Sts. Ulrich and Afra, honoring both its traditional patron and the city's new saint, Ulrich, who was canonized by Pope John XV in 993. In the long run, the cult of the surely historical and well-documented St. Ulrich superseded that of St. Afra, whose veneration remained largely localized within the diocese of Augsburg. In medieval imagery, Afra is often shown with a tree, to which she was supposedly bound before being burned.

African Religions and Holy People

Historically, holy or exceptional persons in the vast area lying south of the Sahara desert (also known as sub-Saharan Africa) have been based in their own ethnic communities, residing among people speaking a common language or dialect. There are diverse linguistic, cultural, ethnic, and religious identities defining the peoples of sub-Saharan Africa.

These identities have emerged under the auspices of holy people who have defined and helped to develop the different ways the inhabitants of the continent have related to religious beliefs over the years.

Suffice it to mention that there are perhaps as many or even more religious practices and systems than the more than 2,000 languages spoken presently in sub-Saharan Africa. Indeed, most indigenous religious and cultural practices in Africa are generally subsumed within the different existing ethnicities among clans and families. Each group has its own religious systems with sets of beliefs and practices that they follow. However, there are exceptions to the rule that wed ethnicity to the practice of religion. In fact, some African communities, such as the Kiga, Hutu, and Tutsi, on the one hand, and the Matumbi, Hehe, and Zaramo, on the other, share deities, spirits, and cults. In sub-Saharan Africa, foreign religions such as Christianity, Islam, Hindu, Baha'i, and Judaism are practiced across ethnic divides without restrictions. Since their importation onto the continent, these religions have attracted adherents from different cultures beyond ethnic and linguistic boundaries, being accommodated into the different linguistic groupings.

Religion in the entire region is imbedded and can be discerned in beliefs, rituals, ceremonies, and the roles of religious officials. The religious officials occupy important positions as mediators between the spiritual realm and the physical world of human experience. Setting themselves apart from the main group of followers as leaders, mediums, priests, and interpreters of the divine order and as social innovators with rare skills in their societies, holy people have led the masses in a wide range of religious and political experiences, in economic development, and in the achievement of general social stability. The leaders of various religions and cultural systems in sub-Saharan Africa have claimed that they possessed natural gifts and exceptional personal qualities of divine kinds. The gifts have provided them with opportunities to occupy positions of privilege above other members of society, and they have used them to extend their influence and power over members of society. In short, holy persons have claimed to possess divine leadership to guide their communities in a wide range of sociocultural and economic activities. These activities include religious, political, military, economic, and technological endeavors. In addition, holy persons in sub-Saharan Africa have been expected to exorcise evil spirits and to heal the sick and the physically afflicted members of their societies.

Those individuals who have led their communities into these different realms, including the divine, have more often than not been held in high esteem and venerated as holy. They have helped in the various aspects of development in their societies by generating new ideas. The aristocracy, medicine people, priests, and other holy people have had leadership responsibilities of managing cults and ensuring that they serve the plebeians. Given that there are different forms of holiness in sub-Saharan Africa, it is imperative to analyze separately the perceptions of holy people within the specific realms in which they have made their contributions: religion and healing; political and military; and economic and technological. Moreover, their activities have been accomplished in five regions of the continent: eastern Africa, the Horn of Africa, western Africa, central Africa, and southern Africa and the Indian Ocean islands.

Even with the above-mentioned categories, one cannot exhaustively tabulate all characteristics that have been used in Africa to define a person as holy. Instead, it is important to adopt an approach that will simplify holiness or sainthood and explain these concepts in generalized yet clear terms. That is, holy people can be defined as exceptional persons believed to possess divine powers of various kinds for the benefit of individuals in society. Some scholars of African religions have correctly argued that indigenous African spirituality permeated the realms of divination, rainmaking, prayer invocations, faith healing, blessings and salutations, sacrifices and offerings, religious mediumship, and custodianship of shrines. The functions of diviners, mediums, oracles, and seers have been to find out hidden secrets or forms of knowledge that are not easily accessible to everyone, to simplify the messages, and then to pass them on to other members of society.

Normally, diviners have worked with both male and female medicine people in the local communities to decipher complex social phenomena and experiences. The main preoccupation of diviners is to identify sources of physical, psychological, and social afflictions troubling people. Diviners are concerned with finding out which spirit may be troubling a possessed person, its intentions, and what ought to be done to stop the malaise associated with it. According to common knowledge, the work of diviners is complemented by that of holy persons with the special gift of communicating with the spirit world at will, known as mediums. Indeed, in their communication with the spirit world, mediums may only be possessed by one spirit, and in such a case they are said to be married to the spirit that supposedly controls them. Priests generally have been responsible for training mediums in the religious ritual of communicating with the spirits.

Seers are people who claim to have natural power to see certain things or symbols not readily comprehensible to ordinary people. They foresee and interpret events before they take place and as such command respect from other members of society because of their high sense of intuition. Unlike other holy people, however, seers do not undergo training of any sort but possess natural gifts that distinguish them from the rest of the people. The work of seers is complemented by the roles ritual elders play in society. The ritual elders perform ceremonies in their villages and for entire communities when needed. Ritual elders hold the office courtesy of exemplary leadership abilities they possess and because of their advanced age and experience compared to other members of the community. These people are versed in the social procedures of ritual and prayer and possess profound knowledge in local customs.

Another group of significant holy persons is the rainmakers, a hereditary position in most African communities. Rainmakers heal the hungry land by undertaking rituals and ceremonies believed to bring rainfall when needed in the cultivation of land and for livestock tending, thus ensuring society's continued reproduction. The son or daughter of a rainmaker takes special training for the position from childhood at the feet of an experienced elder in the art. Because rainmakers are healers of the land, rainmaking has been a highly respected profession that has often been combined with other forms of leadership, such as chieftainship or priesthood. In cases where rainmaking was not hereditary, individuals have claimed to have received the gift through dreams or messages from spirits.

Priests and priestesses constitute the last group of holy people. Their work is to take care of religious places, to lead people into worship, and to receive offerings and sacrifices on behalf of God or the spirits of ancestors. In some instances, they have also acted as seers and mediums. Priests and priestesses have usually received training in temples or religious sanctuaries from other holy persons. All spiritual officials have had the task of ensuring a continuous relationship between the Supreme Being and the people by interpreting the divine order. Thus, they have often become leaders in the wide range of religious ritual as venerated persons in their communities.

Religion and Healing

The most famous holy people in sub-Saharan Africa are those who have reworked local cultural ontology and religious practices in novel ways to create unique or outstanding creolized identities of multiple cultural sheds. Most holy people fall under the categories of mediums, faith healers, and innovators of local religious cultural practices and beliefs. They have reworked the ontological views of indigenous people and their belief systems in ongoing processes that ensured continuity of tradition as well as cultural adaptations and change. By reworking indigenous beliefs, holy persons have accommodated while rejecting at the same time those elements they perceived to be anachronistic in favor of modern ways in consonance with the new socio-economic realities of their communities.

On the one hand, holy people such as Ezana and Haile Selassie of Ethiopia; Ogún and Oyá of Nigeria; Nongqawuse of South Africa; Nyabingi of Rwanda; Mirambo, Nyungu ya Mawe, and Kinjikitile Ngwale of Tanzania; Moraa Moka Ngiti, Koitalel arap Samoei, and Waiyaki wa Hinga of Kenya; and Ayuel Longar of Sudan, among others, led their communities in cultural and spiritual realms by building on indigenous forms of knowledge to bring about continuity and change in cultural practices. They served as protectors of their peoples' interests, conducting rituals and making libations in honor of their ancestors and generally organizing activities to appease local heroes and divinities. On the other hand, however, are those individuals who have synchronized local ideas with new religious concepts from Europe and Asia such as Christianity, Islam, and Judaism to create new communities of religious followers with new ideologies. These synchronizations led to the emergence of various independent churches, Muslim brotherhoods, and sects such as the Bayudaya community (indigenous African Jewish sect) in Uganda.

Christianity and Islam are perhaps the two most important religions that have been adopted and their rituals reworked to suit various African social and political environments. The religious and cultural encounters of indigenous societies with those of these incoming sects have given rise to creolized independent religious movements as a result of negotiation of local and foreign elements in Africa. Some of the independent movements and sects include indigenous religions such as Kimbanguism, led by Simon Kimbangu; Dini ya Musambwa, led by Elijah Masinde; and the Mouride brotherhood, led by Cheikh Ahmad Bamba. Other holy persons who have contributed to religious innovations include Nana Asma'u Fodio, Uthman dan Fodio, and Shaykh Sidi al-Mukhtar-al Kabir al Kintu in western Africa; Semei Kakungulu (the founder of an indigenous African Jewish community in Uganda), Kalemba Mulumba (Wante) Matthias, Charles Lwanga, and Janani Jakaliya Luwum in Uganda; and Alice Lenshina and Johane Masowe in southern Africa, among others. Different communities in sub-Saharan Africa remember such people in praise songs, heroic epics, works of art, legends, and folklore as holy or people of exceptional divine-acquired skills because of the role they played in the social and ideological transformations of the communities.

Among the Dinka of southern Sudan, tales abound of the heroic deeds of a holy person called Ayuel Longar who possessed magical means of getting water for his cattle by pulling up tufts of grass. This mysterious act kept his cattle fat and sleek. In most of central and western Africa, there are revered people such as Mami Wata, a legendary figure venerated as a goddess who heals illness, especially infertility, and brings prosperity to those who make a living from the ocean, rivers, and lagoons through fishing and commerce. In the Sudan, a scholar called Ahmed Baba, a holy man of faith who excelled in theology at a learning center of Timbuktu, is revered. Another man of great reverence was Cheikh Ahmad Bamba of Senegal, who had a great following because of his qur'anic teachings. Others, such as Mbatian, ruled over the Maasai with distinction as a medicine man who not only healed but foretold the future of his people before the onset of British colonialism in Kenya. Kalembe, Lwanga, and Luwum died as Christian martyrs, and Kakungulu founded an independent sect of Judaism in colonial Uganda as a challenge to colonial Christian churches.

Political and Military Leaders

Many communities in sub-Saharan Africa have had political rulers and military leaders who were chiefs, kings, queens, rainmakers, and priests, among others. Because these offices derived their legitimacy from the Supreme Being, people have considered them to be holy, regarding the occupants as mystical and religious heads. In short, they have often served as a divine symbol of their people's health and welfare. Indeed, the sacred nature of the offices explains why religious ceremony and ritual has characterized day-to-day activities. Local folklore and legends in most sub-Saharan African societies have linked kingship or chieftainship with God. In fact, myths of various kinds claim that founder leaders of communities possessed powers emanating from God. In social imagination, therefore, such leaders appeared mysteriously from the sky or from a spiritual world imbued with divine or sacral powers as representatives of God in the universe. People came to regard them as God's earthly viceroys, according them highly elevated positions and titles, such as "savior," "protector," and "chief of divinities."

Given the argument that leadership is divine, kings, chiefs, and queens acquired praise names. For example, Haile Selassie of Ethiopia was named the "Lion of Judah" to denote that he was "the chosen one of God." There are many other instances in Africa that lend credence to the argument about divine leadership. There was an indigenous cult in southwestern Uganda and Rwanda known as Nyabingi that was named after its founder, a formidable woman leader. The Nyabingi cult has had various priests and priestesses who popularized it among the Hutu and Kiga people of the region. According to the Nandi people of Kenya, Koitalel arap Samoei was a distinguished leader who gallantly fought European colonialism. Legend has it that arap Samoei was filled with divine power. The Kikuyu people remember Waiyaki wa Hinga for leading his people in war against the Maasai and the British imperialists in Kenya. Folklore in Tanzania is awash with various charismatic political and military leaders possessing special gifts that are considered to be holy or saints. These persons include Mirambo, Nyungu ya Mawe, and Kinjikitile, among others. They draw a large following because of their special abilities in politics and warfare. Communities in Tanzania believe that war medicine played an important role in the campaigns of these individuals and that their leaders needed the foundation of legitimate ritual chieftainship to rule them. In their campaigns, these people forced the conquered rulers to forfeit their ritual powers to them, thus becoming divine rulers. Using medicine assumed to be divinely acquired, Kinjikitile mobilized the Hehe people in a revolt against colonial German rule in Tanganyika.

Economics and Technology

Holy people in sub-Saharan Africa have often been involved in the day-to-day economic activities in their societies, including metalworking, mining, pottery, fishing, hunting, and weaving and basketry, among others. The field of metalworking—iron smelting and goldsmithing—not only requires specialized skills but historically was couched in esoteric ritual and ceremony, the domain of a few members of the communities who were the experts. Indeed, in most of sub-Saharan Africa, metalworking was a secret trade whose practitioners supposedly possessed magical powers to undertake the profession skillfully and responsibly for the larger society. The professions of metalworking were generally confined within particular families or clans and passed on from parents to their offspring. Metals such as iron and gold were used in the manufacture of ornaments and other paraphernalia for leaders, tools, implements, and weapons, including spears and arrows.

Given the highly specialized functions that metals performed, they were considered sacred—hence a special group of individuals in society was accorded the responsibility of closely controlling and regulating their use. In fact, holy people presided over special rites and ceremonies during the processing of mining, smelting, and manufacturing items from the metals. Because of the significance of metals in the lives of the people of sub-Saharan Africa, most communities believed that there were special deities that controlled the process of producing metals and products made out of them, a belief of which elements remain today. Since metals were used in the day-to-day activities of individuals, such as clearing and farming the land, hunting, and animal husbandry, as well as in initiation ceremonies such as circumcision, metalworkers were honored as holy. Moreover, the metals that were used in war, such as spears, arrows, and swords, required the performance of special rituals, normally by metalworkers themselves.

Similarly, professions such as pottery-making and fishing were considered sacred because of their importance in society—a belief that new religions have not completely eradicated. Society believed that the individuals who made their livelihood from such professions were divinely endowed with the Supreme Being's power and goodwill. For instance, pottery was important in numerous ways—pots were used for cooking food, brewing alcohol, storing water, boiling and cooking herbs, and storing the insignia of medicine people. Holy people also made some special pots for ritual purposes. Consequently, in some sub-Saharan societies, individuals who presided over the production of pottery were revered and considered holy. In communities that practiced hunting, hunters were viewed as exceptional people who braved dangerous grounds full of fierce wild animals of various kinds. Holy people used some animals' parts in healing, in carrying out general medical practices, and in casting spells or exorcising spirits. Fishermen were revered in fishing societies because they sojourned in mysterious, dangerous waters thought to be the abode of spirits. The fact that fishermen brought home fish of various types bore testimony to their mystical powers, especially in sea waters considered to have taken some of their ancestors during the period of slave trade.

Aga Khan I

(1817–1881 C.E.)

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Aga Khan I, Hassan 'Ali Shah, was the hereditary spiritual leader of the Muslim group called the Shi'a Imami Nizari

Isma'ili. He was the forty-sixth in a sequence of spiritual guides who trace their descent to the prophet Muhammad via his daughter Fatima, who was married to 'Ali b. Abi Talib.

The title of Agha Khan (spelled "Aga" by the family) was bestowed upon him by the Iranian king Fateh 'Ali Shah in 1818. This auspicious honor had followed a tragic event. His father, Imam Khalilallah 'Ali, had been assassinated in Yazd. His mother, Bibi Sarcar Mata Salamat, brought Hassan 'Ali with her to Tehran to seek justice from the king. She was successful in the presentation of her grievance. An imperial order was issued whereby the governor of Yazd, Haji Muhammad Zaman Khan, was commanded to arrest Hussain Yazdi, the main culprit, together with his accomplices. To show his special favor, the king bestowed on Hassan 'Ali Shah the title of Aga Khan and designated him governor of Mahallat and Qum. He also presented him his oldest daughter, Sarv-i Jahan Begum, as bride, together with 23,000 tumans to pay for wedding expenses. The investiture as Aga Khan was performed at a beautiful palace called the Qasr-i Qajar. Henceforth the family has used this title.

After the sudden death of Fateh 'Ali Shah in October 1834, his successor, Muhammad Shah, became inimical toward Hassan 'Ali. Hassan 'Ali attended the coronation of the new king in January 1835 and was subsequently appointed governor of Kirman. Twenty months later he was replaced by another governor and recalled to Tehran. Mirza Aghashi, the prime minister, treated Hassan 'Ali with disrespect and attempted to disparage him. Hassan 'Ali decided to make a stand for his rights in Kirman. Eventually, in 1840–1841, he migrated to the province of Sind in India and was welcomed by the Talpur notables. He also developed a firm friendship with Sir Charles Napier, the British governor-general of Sind. Later, as a result of his constant support of the British, he was granted the hereditary right to be called "his highness." Also, the Prince of Wales who later became King Edward VII visited his residence during his tour of India, further honoring him.

From Sind, Hassan 'Ali came to Bombay in 1845. Here, however, the long hostility of Muhammad Shah reached him. He was made a political prisoner in Calcutta when the Qajar ruler suggested to the British government that he was very close to Iran. Finally, in 1848, with the end of Muhammad Shah's reign, Hassan 'Ali returned to Bombay, where he established his main center (Darkhana), and deputations of his followers freely arrived from parts of the subcontinent as well as from remote places such as Central Asia, Iran, Syria, Yeman, and Africa. He devoted himself zealously to uplifting his community in India and elsewhere until his death in 1881. His final resting place is in Mazagon in Bombay. The site of his mausoleum, called Hasanabad, is frequented by many Isma'ili Muslims. Devout and pious, he refrained from strife at all costs, even if migrating was the only option. His legacy of peace and of helping humanity has endeared him to many.

Aga Khan II

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Shah 'Ali Shah, Aga Khan II, was the forty-seventh hereditary imam of the Shi'a Imami Nizari Isma'ili Muslims. He succeeded his father as imam in 1881. Known for his piety, he was referred to as pir (holy elder). He was not only interested in spiritual elevation but also participated in the political process to further assist the Muslims of India and initiated many projects to promote the socioeconomic development of his community. For several years he was the president of the Muhammadan National Association. He also served as a member of the Bombay Council for Making Laws and Regulations.

In Bombay Shah 'Ali instituted the first of many Isma'ili schools with a modern curriculum for children. This was necessary at a time when Muslims lagged behind in “modern” education and hence could not be full participants in British-based opportunities. In addition to his many talents in education, public welfare, and spirituality, he was famed for his interest in the sport of hunting. In his personal life he faced much tragedy, however. After the death of his first wife, Marium Sultan, he remarried. His next wife, who belonged to a family that had come from Shiraz and resided in Bombay, also died. He then married Nawab 'Alia Shams al-mulk, a granddaughter of the Persian shah Fateh 'Ali Shah. The marriage ceremony was in Kirman in 1867. In the early 1880s, his two eldest sons from his first marriage died in quick succession. He was very saddened, and in 1885 he died in the city of Poona in India after serving as imam for only four years. Subsequently he was buried in the city of Najaf in Iraq. He was succeeded as imam by his son, Sultan Muhammad Shah.

Aga Khan III

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Shah Sultan Muhammad Shah, Aga Khan III, was the forty-eighth hereditary imam of the Shi'a Imami Nizari Isma'ili Muslims. He succeeded his father, Shah 'Ali Shah, in 1905 when he was not quite eight years old. As the imam for more than seventy years, Sultan Muhammad Shah directed the affairs of his community with dynamic and charismatic leadership. With vision and zeal, he managed to transform the very ethos of his followers spread over several countries. Within decades, they were changed from the sociophilosophical realm of rural semiliterate farmers to the sophisticated and educated world of industry and commerce. His grandson Aga Khan IV praised him for accomplishing more for the community than could otherwise have been done in many generations.

Aga Khan III received several honors and awards. In 1911, when Emperor George V visited India for his coronation durbar, Aga Khan III was made a Knight Grand Commander of the Star of India (G.C.S.I.). For his positive contribution in World War I, in 1916 he received an eleven-gun salute from the British, a rare diplomatic honor. Subsequently he was accorded the status of a first-class ruling prince of the Bombay Presidency, though he did not possess a territorial principality.

The Aga Khan actively participated in the struggles of the Muslim community. In every way possible he sought to help Muslim nations struggling to gain freedom from colonial control. In 1906, he headed a Muslim delegation that requested the British viceroy to consider the Muslims as a nation within a nation rather than a minority so that they would be entitled to adequate representation in local and national representative councils. In 1907, the Aga Khan helped found the All-India Muslim League, over which he presided until 1912. The aim of this organization was to provide a political forum to the Muslims of India. To provide Muslims with proper education, he spearheaded the plan to make the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh into an academically prestigious university. Aligarh University was established in 1920 with the Aga Khan as first vice-chancellor. In 1928, he presided over the All-India Muslim Conference at Delhi, formulating Muslim policy on future independence for India. With the guidance of the Aga Khan, the interests of the Muslims of India were articulated and a demand was made to the governing authorities that their rights be safeguarded within the context of a federal, self-governing India.

As the struggle for independence continued in the sub-continent, the Aga Khan persisted in ensuring that the British did not ignore Muslim interests. In 1930, he headed the delegation of the Muslims of India at the Round Table conference in London, which discussed the political future of India. The Aga Khan's political activities were not only for Muslims but also for issues of human welfare more generally. Thus, in 1932, he was the representative for India at the World Disarmament Conference. In 1937, he was elected president of the League of Nations. This great honor attests to the international stature of his reputation as a "citizen of the world." Indeed, he was among the founding members of the League of Nations, finding the organization deeply compatible with Islam's revelation of peace. In fact, he considered life per se as a divine gift to be cherished and felt that it is only with peace that the true potential of life may be experienced. He actively promoted world peace and strove consistently for the prosperity of the underprivileged. In his Memoirs, he stated, "Life is a great and noble calling, not a mean and groveling thing to be shuffled through as best we can, but a lofty and exalted destiny." For him, "The spiritual dimension of existence is the defining characteristic of humanity" (Aga Khan III 1954).

His view of the singular sacredness of life led Aga Khan III to work throughout his life for the development of charitable organizations in health, housing, education, and economic activities. He donated substantial personal funds toward charities and social welfare projects and conducted regular fund-raising. In addition, on three occasions the Isma'ili followers of the Aga Khan attempted to raise funds for the imam's welfare projects, thus saluting him for his extraordinary concern for those in need. These occasions were on his fiftieth, sixtieth, and seventieth anniversaries as imam. These events (spread over approximately two decades) have been referred to, respectively, as the Golden, Diamond, and Platinum Jubilees. On each occasion, his followers literally put him on the scale and donated the equivalent of his weight in gold, diamonds, or platinum. The proceeds went toward numerous social welfare projects, including schools and libraries, hospitals, housing societies, vocational centers, banking institutions, industrial and technological development, and scholarships for students. He urged his community to participate in the modern progressive world and encouraged the emancipation of women. He especially encouraged the participation of women in community matters. Because of his leadership, many women were provided with opportunities for secular education and socioeconomic welfare.

In 1905, as imam of the Nizari Isma'ilis, the Aga Khan had instituted a constitution. This reorganized the administration of the community and formulated a hierarchy of councils dealing with various matters such as health, sports, youth, women's issues, welfare, and so on. This constitution was revised in 1926 and then periodically amended to suit the changing times. As imam, he also issued verbal and written directives, called farmans, to guide his community. In addition to numerous treatises and letters to the editors of various Indian and European newspapers, the Aga Khan wrote two very important books that express his views and provide an insight to his times and his sociopolitical milieu. These include India in Transition: A Study in Political Evolution (1918) and The Memoirs of the Aga Khan: World Enough and Time (1954).

This champion of Islam died on July 11, 1957, in his villa near Geneva. He was subsequently buried in a mausoleum in Aswan overlooking the Nile River. He was survived by two sons, Prince Aly Khan and Prince Sadruddin, and two grandsons, Prince Shah Karim al-Husaini and Prince Amyn Muhammad. In his will, he designated his grandson Shah Karim al-Husaini as the forty-ninth imam, directly descended from the prophet Muhammad.

Aga Khan IV

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Shah Karim al-Husaini, Aga Khan IV, is the forty-ninth hereditary imam of the Sh'ia Imami Nizari Isma'ili Muslims. He became imam on July 11, 1957, after his grandfather, Sultan Muhammad Shah, passed away. During World War II, the future Aga Khan and his younger brother spent four years in Kenya, after which he attended Le Rosey School near Geneva and then entered Harvard University. He graduated from Harvard in 1959.

Over the years the Aga Khan has become a dominant philanthropist. He instituted several organizations to consolidate his humanitarian and cultural activities. Subsequently he reorganized his philanthropic work through the establishment of the Aga Khan Development Network (AKDN), which has divisions working on education, economic development, health, and culture, as well as two universities.

Globally, the Aga Khan has made a tremendous global impact in the field of health, especially in the underdeveloped countries of Asia and Africa. His most important contribution is the Aga Khan Hospital and Medical College together with a nursing school in Pakistan. The medical services and educational programs offered here, along with the research conducted into diseases specific to that part of the world, have made this foundation worthy of emulation. Another avant-garde institution established by the Aga Khan is the University of Central Asia with its focus on the mountain people and their society and culture. This university is to have three campuses in the mountain regions of Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan. Additionally, the Institute of Ismaili Studies in London serves to further the academic study of Islam.

The Aga Khan Award for Architecture was established in 1978 to create an awareness of the fine architectural tradition of Muslim civilization. The award serves as a cultural bridge between Islamic lands and the rest of the world. The Aga Khan Trust for Culture also has served to foster various aspects of Muslim culture, including musical instruction, preservation of the ancient Delhi Gardens at the tomb of the second Mughal emperor, Humayun (r. 1508–1556), and construction of a park and garden at al-Azhar University in Cairo. To rebuild war-torn Kabul, the Aga Khan pledged US$75 million, the greatest contribution of any nongovernment organization. His organization also facilitated the building of the Tajik-Afghan bridge. Other important philanthropies of the Aga Khan include the Industrial Promotion Services, which has set up a series of industries in various developing countries, the Tourist Promotion Services, and FOCUS, which provides disaster relief. The Aga Khan has received many prestigious international honors and has met with leaders worldwide who have honored him for his humanitarian work.

The Aga Khan is particularly mindful of the traditional humanistic values of Islam that ought not to be eroded in the rush for material development. He believes there is danger in a “frontier capitalism” whereby the gains and profits are not “recycled” into society. Above all, he has advocated a balance between Western materialism and the Eastern “spiritual, human and cultural traditions,” encouraging both secular and religious elites to preserve the Muslim cultural heritage while leading their lands progressively. Indeed, the nature of Muslim societies is a theme of constant reflection in his speeches. The Aga Khan’s attitude was perhaps best summed up in a March 1976 speech in which he pointed to the example of the prophet Muhammad’s “integrity, loyalty, honesty, generosity both of means and of time, his solicitude for the poor, the weak, and the sick, his steadfastness in friendship, his humility in success, his magnanimity in victory, his simplicity, his wisdom in conceiving new solutions for problems that could not be solved by traditional methods, without affecting the fundamental concepts of Islam.” He added, “Surely all these are foundations which, correctly understood and sincerely interpreted, must enable us to conceive what should be a truly modern and dynamic Islamic Society in the years ahead.”

The Aga Khan focuses, above all, on human contact with the transcendent. As he has stated, “The day we no longer know how, nor have the time nor the faith, to bow in prayer to Allah because the human soul that he has told us is eternal, is no longer of sufficient importance to us to be worthy of an hour of our daily working, profit-seeking time, will be a sunless day of despair.”

Agatha

Christian martyr

According to her legend, the young virgin Agatha suffered mutilation and eventually a martyr’s death in about 250 for her Christian faith at Catania on the island of Sicily. Agatha was one of the most popular of the medieval women saints believed to have been martyred during the persecution of the early Christian church. Evidence of her veneration appears in the late fifth century, and she is named or her story retold in at least forty manuscripts, religious calendars, or martyrologies dating before 1100. Although both Palermo and Catania claim to be her birthplace, no reliable record survives to authenticate her historical existence.

Medieval European Christians believed that during Agatha’s torture both of her breasts were cut off, an act often depicted in her iconography. Such sexually charged physical mutilation was often part of the suffering associated with young female virgin martyrs. In Agatha's case, the punishment was administered on the orders of the polytheist Roman consul Quintianus, who had attempted to seduce her. Like other Christian model maidens impervious to pain, Agatha employed articulate arguments in the defense of her faith and the virginity she believed essential to it. The enduring popularity of Agatha's story is part of a virgin martyr genre especially attractive to women. Her feast day is celebrated on February 5.

Agnes

(d. c. 300 C.E.)

Christian martyr

Agnes, a Christian virgin martyr, is believed to have died in Rome in the late third or early fourth century. A basilica was built on the Via Nomentana around 350 over what was thought to be her remains. This structure and her early cult veneration suggest that the legend of St. Agnes may have been based on the life of a young girl of that name. However, no documentation survives to corroborate the tradition.

Various versions of Agnes's story appear in numerous vitas, inscriptions, and religious calendars dating from the early fourth century. Like other young virgin martyr legends, hers includes a princely, non-Christian persecutor who desires her, her rejection of him, an account of humiliation at the hands of her captors, sexual temptation, and her own eloquent arguments in defense of her virginity as a matter of faith. Most accounts tell of Agnes's incarceration in a Roman brothel and her eventual execution.

Agnes was one of the young virgin heroines whose stories appealed to medieval Christians as exemplars of sacrifice and the triumph over temptation. St. Agnes was sometimes invoked as part of the liturgy when young nuns took their vows of chastity. In her iconography, Agnes appears with a lamb, likely an association with her name—in Latin agnus means “lamb.” Her feast day is celebrated on January 21.

Agnes of Montepulciano

Christian nun, mystic

Agnes of Montepulciano, an Italian nun famous for her visions and miracles, founded a convent and church for Dominican nuns in Montepulciano. Agnes was born around 1268 to the noble Segni family in Gracciano Vecchio (near Montepulciano) in Tuscany, Italy. From an early age, she wished to devote herself to the religious life, and when she was nine she was sent by her parents to a Franciscan convent of the “Sisters of the Sackcloth,” so named for their humble garments. Within several years, Agnes and her teacher, Sister Margarita, moved to a newly founded house in Proceno, where Agnes's pious reputation attracted many girls and women to the new foundation. At the age of fifteen, she was made abbess, an act that required special papal approval because of her young age.

According to her vita, while still in Proceno Agnes received a vision of the Virgin Mary, who told her that she was to found a church in Montepulciano. In 1306, Agnes returned to Montepulciano in order to join a newly founded convent and church, which she placed under the Order of Preachers (Dominicans). She governed the convent until her death on April 20, 1317. She was canonized in 1726.

The events of Agnes's life come to us from the vita written by Raymond of Capua (1330–1399), the Dominican confessor (and later biographer) of St. Catherine of Siena. Raymond of Capua had been the chaplain of the Dominican monastery in Montepulciano in the 1360s, and both he and Catherine were intensely devoted to Agnes. In order to write her vita, he interviewed older nuns who had known Agnes personally.

According to Raymond of Capua's account, Agnes knew from a very early age that she wanted to dedicate herself to a celibate religious life. Having joined the convent, her personal devotions and ascetic practices included long vigils of prayer, during which she was often seen levitating above the ground. She slept on the ground with a rock for a pillow and fasted almost continuously on bread and water. Afflicted with a serious illness at the age of thirty, she had to relent somewhat on her strict dietary regime. She remained in ill health, however, until her death.

Throughout her life she experienced a number of heavenly visions. The Virgin Mary appeared to her several times, once even offering Agnes the opportunity to hold the infant Christ; when Agnes did not want to hand Christ back to his mother, a struggle ensued. Agnes's intercessory powers also brought about a number of miracles recorded in her vita. These miracles include being showered with manna like falling snow, changing water into wine, multiplying loaves of bread, curing illnesses, and expelling demons from local households. When she died, infants previously unable to utter words reportedly spoke of the pious woman and her death. Over fifty years later, when Catherine of Siena came to visit the convent at Montepulciano and kiss the relics of Agnes, Catherine experienced the miracle of Agnes's foot lifting to meet her lips.

Agnivesh

Hindu religious leader, renunciant

Agnivesh, a Hindu religious leader and Indian social activist, was born Vepa Shyam Rao on September 21, 1939, in Shakti, a princely state in what is now known as Madhya Pradesh in central India. He received advanced degrees in business and law but, in 1968, decided to devote himself fully to the Arya Samaj, a Hindu reformist movement founded in the nineteenth century by Dayanand Saraswati. In 1970, Agnivesh took the vow of samnyas, which entailed a complete renunciation of all his worldly possessions. As a samnyasi, Agnivesh is addressed as "Swami-ji" (lord) and wears the saffron-colored robe and turban associated with this fourth and final stage of Hindu life.

Swami Agnivesh often identifies three chief influences upon his life and thought: Mahatma Gandhi, Karl Marx, and the Vedic understanding of dharma (duty). With Gandhi, Agnivesh shares a passionate concern for rearticulating the Hindu tradition to address India's poor. Agnivesh has denounced practices such as untouchability and widow burning as contrary to the Hindu tradition. He is also the founder of the Bandua Mukti Morcha (The Bonded Labor Liberation Front), which seeks to abolish the widespread practice of bonded labor. Swami Agnivesh has argued for the abolition of child labor in India and presently serves as chairperson of the United Nations Trust Fund on Contemporary Forms of Slavery. With Karl Marx, Agnivesh shares a concern for economic justice and redistribution of wealth. Agnivesh advocates a "Vedic socialism" that would nationalize production and provide free education and medical care to India's population. To pursue this economic and political vision, he has established a political party, the Arya Sabha, and has served as a legislative representative and minister of education in the north Indian state of Haryana. In his identification of dharma as the third crucial influence on his life, Agnivesh argues that opportunity to do one's duty is the greatest of all rewards. For him, this duty demands the religious and social reform of Hinduism and Indian society.

Ahmad al-Ahsa'i, Shaykh

Shi'i Muslim mystic, philosopher

Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa'i was a prominent religious leader in the Shi'i world who sought to combine all of the streams of Islamic mysticism and philosophy into a single teaching. After his death, his followers formed a separate school in Shi'i Islam that today has perhaps 300,000 to 400,000 adherents, mainly in Iran, southern Iraq, Kuwait, and the al-Ahsa region of Saudi Arabia.

Shaykh Ahmad ibn Zayn al-Din al-Ahsa'i was born in Rajab 1166/May 1753 in the village of Mutayrafi in the al-Ahsa region (now in Saudi Arabia) into a Shi'i family. He received a full religious education at the shrine cities of Najaf and Karbala in Iraq and was a distinguished scholar, receiving certificates of completion of his studies from leading Shi'i scholars of the time. From 1797 to 1806, he lived in various locations in southern Iraq. Then, in 1806, he traveled to Iran, where he was to remain for most of the rest of his life.

After a pilgrimage to the shrine of Imam Rida in Mashhad in northeastern Iran, he was invited to settle in Yazd. In 1814, he moved to Kirmanshah in eastern Iran at the invitation of the crown prince, Muhammad 'Ali Mirza. He remained there until the death of this prince in 1821, when he was invited to move to Qazvin by Mulla 'Abdu'l-Wahhab, a prominent religious scholar. It was during his residence in this city that he was denounced by Mulla Muhammad Taqi Baraghani as a heretic in about 1824. He left Qazvin and, after another pilgrimage to Mashhad, settled in Karbala. After a short time there, he decided to go on pilgrimage to Mecca, but he died a few stages away from Medina in 1826 and is buried in the al-Baqi' cemetery there.

Shaykh Ahmad was a man of prodigious knowledge and wrote some 160 works on a wide variety of subjects, mostly in the area of mystical philosophy. He himself claimed, however, that the authority for his teaching came from the Shi'i imams whom he met in dreams and visions. His teaching is a synthesis of the various strands of the Islamic sciences, especially mysticism and philosophy, and attempts to reconcile rational and intuitive knowledge. He has been denounced by some clerics because he taught that some of the concepts in the Islamic tradition should be understood as spiritual or metaphorical truths rather than taken literally. This same teaching, however, made him important to the later Babi and Baha'i religions.

Aiakos and Aias

Ancient Greek heroes

Aiakos (Latin: Aeacus) was a mythical hero of ancient Greece whose cult, centered on his tomb, exerted a continuing impact on his community. He was traditionally associated with Aigina, an island lying in the Saronic Gulf of the Aegean Sea not far from Athens, and was considered the protector of the island's population. He was believed to be the mortal son of the god Zeus and the nymph Aigina, for whom the island was named.

The Aiakos cult was an ongoing force in Aigina's efforts to maintain its independence against encroachments by other Greek city-states, particularly Athens. In a late sixth-century B.C.E. military engagement, the sons of Aiakos were invoked as allies by Thebes in a war against Athens. The Athenians then tried to neutralize the influence of Aiakos by dedicating a shrine to him in Athens, thus effectively co-opting the power of his cult (Herodotos 5.81–88). On the eve of the Battle of Salamis, the Athenians enlisted the aid of Aiakos and his grandson Aias to fight on their side against the Persians (Herodotos 8.64). These incidents demonstrate how belief in the presence of a Greek hero could provide a valuable and effective psychological edge to a city-state's identity.

Aiakos, however, was unusual among Greek heroes in that, in addition to his regional following among the people of Aigina, he was much revered by Greeks in general for his personal piousness and high ethical standards. Several legends celebrated these qualities. According to one account, when Greece was threatened by a prolonged drought, the leaders of several cities petitioned Aiakos for help because his piety and his connection with Zeus made him a logical choice for leadership. The story maintains that Aiakos's prayers to Zeus were effective; in any case, a temple dedicated by all Greeks was built for him (Isocrates, Evagoras 14–15). His reputation for fairness apparently caused even the Olympian gods to turn to him for judgment (Pindar, Isthmian 8.50).

After his death, it was said, Aiakos was transported to the underworld, where he served as one of the judges of the dead along with the legendary Minos and Rhadamanthys, an honor he was later to share with Pythagoras, Plato, and Plotinus. Plato reported that Aiakos was responsible for judging the souls of all those from Europe (Plato, Gorgias 523e). His shrine on Aigina, supposedly the site where his prayers to Zeus ended the drought, was venerated as one of the major religious centers on the island and was a center of pilgrimage long after Aigina had ceased to be an independent city-state (Pausanias 2.29.6).

Aiakos's son Telamon was the father of Aias (Latin: Ajax), who belonged to the generation of the Trojan War. He was one of the greatest of the Greek warriors who fought at Troy, second only to his cousin Achilles. Like his grandfather, Aias was revered as a hero by the people of Aigina. He was also the object of cults in Salamis, Athens, and the Troad.

Aias Son of Oileus

Ancient Greek hero

Aias (Latin: Ajax) son of Oileus was a Greek hero from the district of Locris. He bore the same name as the son of Telamon and descendant of Aiakos, and, like him, was one of the Greek warriors who, according to Greek legend, fought at Troy. He was always regarded as inferior in warfare to his namesake and therefore was called Aias the Lesser. Like other Greek heroes, however, he was the object of a cult during the historical period, and his spirit was invoked to protect his region and fight in its defense.

An unusual ritual was assigned to his influence. According to the Iliupersis (Destruction of Troy) by Arctinus, Aias son of Oileus was said to be responsible for the rape of Cassandra, daughter of the Trojan king Priam, and supposedly had committed the act after dragging her away from the altar of Athena where she had taken sanctuary after the capture of Troy. For this sacrilege he was drowned on the voyage home. One of the Olympian gods, either Athena or Apollo, demanded further recompense for his crime and sent a plague to Locris. When the Locrians inquired how they could end the plague, they were told to send two maidens every year to Ilion to serve in the temple of Athena there. The girls supposedly had to avoid hostile capture while making their way to the temple. This tradition, attributed to the prehistory of Greece's mythical past, was still being carried out in the third century B.C.E., when the Locrians finally refused to send any more young women to Ilion. At this point, further calamities fell upon the Locrians, and they were ordered by an oracle to resume sending the human tribute.

This practice, which is not attested before the third century B.C.E., demonstrates the continuing influence that Greek heroes had on the communities that claimed their protection. In this case, however, unlike other examples of the influence of Greek hero cults, the hero's power stemmed not from his bravery, piety, or other exceptional qualities but from his violent actions that transgressed social norms. Scholars are divided on the meaning of the episode. To some, it shows how Greek hero cult beliefs, in this case about pollution extending from the dead for an unatoned crime, could have an ongoing impact on a community's religious practices. Others have seen it as an aetiological myth because it explains the origins of a ritual, that is, the one in which young women were dedicated as priestesses at a local religious shrine, the sanctuary of Athena Ilios in Locris. Connecting this ritual with a figure of Greek epic brought a degree of Pan-Hellenic standing to the local community.

Aidan

(d. 651 C.E.)

Christian monk, bishop, missionary

Aidan was a monk of Iona and founder of the monastery of Lindisfarne, an island off the coast of England, in the seventh century. Nothing about his early life is known for certain apart from the fact that he was from Iona, the famous monastery established by Colum Cille on the coast of Scotland in 565. Bede, the principal source for Aidan, praised his devotion and humility, a depiction of the saint that satirized the more lax clergy in Bede's day. Bede distanced himself from Aidan's retention of the Irish calculation for the date of Easter, however, a system that was considered unorthodox, and with which Bede had been associated.

Aidan came to the kingdom of Bernicia in northern England and the court of King Oswald as the replacement for a monk who held the English in contempt, and whom the English found less than friendly. Oswald's choice of Iona as source for a bishop can be explained in large part by the king's exile among the Irish during the reign of King Edwin. Oswald was converted to Christianity by the Irish and naturally looked to them, rather than to the "Romans" in the south. Oswald gave Aidan the island of Lindisfarne just off the coast from his capital in northern Northumbria, Bamburgh. Though a bishop, Aidan seems to have followed the Irish missionary practice, considering himself more a bishop of the Northumbrians than of any one place. Most of Aidan's missionary efforts seem to have been in Bernicia, that is, northern Northumbria. Great support for these missions, indeed their sanction, came from the king. Oswald even initially acted as interpreter for Aidan. After Oswald's death, Aidan found a good patron in King Oswin.

There are several stories of Aidan's charity and humility while at the king's table. According to Bede, King Oswin once gave the saint a wonderful horse, as he knew that Aidan most often walked wherever he went. Aidan met a beggar not long afterward and gave the horse to him. Upon hearing the news, the king asked Aidan why he had given away such a magnificent horse when there were any number of lesser mounts one might give to the poor. Aidan replied by asking King Oswin whether he cared more about the horse than he cared about a child of God. Later, the king prostrated himself before Aidan and promised never to ask such a question again. In this tale, Bede was able to suggest not only the wisdom of the saint, but also the humility of a good king.

Aidan died in 651 and was buried at Lindisfarne. He is remembered today as one of the most important Irish monks in the conversion of the English.

Ajatashatru (Ajatasattu)

(c. 5th–4th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist ruler

King of Magadha, an ancient kingdom of northeastern India, and a contemporary of the Buddha in the fifth or fourth century B.C.E., Ajatashatru committed many murders (including that of his father), expressed remorse, and attained sainthood. According to some Buddhist texts, he received his name because he was his father's enemy even before he was born. Accounts say that his father, Bimbisara, loved him so much that he abdicated in his favor; Ajatashatru responded by imprisoning and then killing him. Most versions of the story refer to various other murders that he committed. The Theravada tradition portrays him as a cruel and selfish man who helped the Buddha's evil cousin Devadatta in his futile attempts to murder the Buddha.

As the years passed, Ajatashatru developed remorse for his crime and confessed his sins to the Buddha. The Buddha remarked that but for his father's murder, the eye for the truth would have arisen in Ajatashatru. Later, saddened by news of the death of the Buddha, Ajatashatru obtained a one-eighth share in the Buddha's relics and built a stupa, or shrine, over them in Rajagriha in India. He also extended support to the First Buddhist Council and proved to be a good host to the participants.

According to the Vinaya of the Mahasanghikas, Ajatashatru was by far the most preeminent among the lay followers of the Buddha. According to Taranatha, he was reborn in hell for a short period and then reborn among the gods, where, after having heard the teachings of Shanavasika, he attained the first fruit of emancipation (shrotapanna). However, according to Theravada tradition, after spending 60,000 years in one of the hells, he will attain deliverance as a Pratyekabuddha, a "Solitary Buddha," under the name of Viditavishesha (or Vijitavi). Some northern sources mentioned that after receiving help from the great Mahayana bodhisattva Manjushri, Ajatashatru purified his heavy negative karma and achieved the path of seeing.

Akhenaten

(r. 1372–1355 B.C.E.)

Egyptian ruler, religion founder

Akhenaten was a pharaoh of New Kingdom Egypt (eighteenth dynasty, ruling from 1372 to 1355 B.C.E.) who broke with Egyptian traditions by focusing the state cult on the worship of the sun disc Aten to the exclusion of other Egyptian gods. He has often been labeled the world's first monotheist. Although this description is likely not an accurate characterization of the belief system he imposed, his emphasis on the worship of Aten above other gods is unusual in Egyptian traditions.

Early in his reign, Akhenaten changed his name from Amenhotep as a theological statement of his association with Aten. He also moved the Egyptian capital to Akhetaten (modern Amarna), breaking from the prominent cult of Amun and its temple at Thebes. The artistry and iconography of this period also shows a marked difference from the canon that prevailed during other periods of Egyptian history. Artworks often interpreted as depicting a physical illness of Akhenaten's may be simply an increased emphasis on natural curves and lifelike poses. The image of the sun disc is particularly important, with arms radiating out to king and family and hands holding ankhs, which were symbols of life. The unfinished bust (now in the Berlin Museum) of Akhenaten's wife Nefertiti is perhaps the most famous piece of Amarna art.

The theology of Atenism was expressed in a composition that modern scholars call "The Hymn to the Aten." The object of veneration in this hymn is the physical disc of the sun. Similarities between this hymn and Psalm 104 have long been recognized, but how this composition came to be included in the Hebrew Bible is unclear.

Akhenaten's actual role in the worship of the Aten cult is also unclear. It is believed that nonroyal worship of the Aten was mediated through Akhenaten himself—the private individual worshipped the Aten indirectly by worshipping the king. This theory is supported by plaques (found in private residences at Amarna) depicting the royal family and Aten.

Akiba ben Joseph

(2nd cent. C.E.)

The leading rabbinic sage of the early second century, Akiba ben Joseph was born in Palestine and was a shepherd as a young man. According to legend, although illiterate until the age of forty, he was an opponent of the rabbis' claims to leadership. The daughter of his rich employer was attracted by his humility and piety but would not marry him unless he became educated. He went away for twenty-four years and returned a famous master of Torah. When his zealous disciples tried to prevent a woman they did not recognize (the woman who had waited for him all these years) from approaching him, he rebuked them and said that everything he had achieved was due to her.

Akiba is remembered as an important shaper of the early rabbinic tradition. He carried out the first systematic compilation of rabbinic teachings and developed exegetical techniques to extract meaning from every letter of the Torah. His rival, Rabbi Ishmael, taught that "the Torah speaks in human language," but Akiba insisted that in scripture even grammatical particles are laden with significance. One narrative relates that Moses himself was greatly troubled at discovering that he could not follow Akiba's interpretations; his morale improved, however, when he heard Akiba say that everything he taught was tradition going back to Moses at Sinai. In keeping with his exegetical boldness, Akiba also engaged in semisecret mystical speculation. It was said that of the "four who entered the [mystical] Garden," only Rabbi Akiba "entered in peace and emerged in peace," whole in faith and whole in mind (Babylonian Talmud, Hagigah 14b).

In various accounts, Akiba appears at the center of his colleagues' struggles for influence and power; often he seems to play the role of peacemaker or intermediary among opponents. These stories testify to both his colleagues' great respect for his integrity and learning and his own lack of ambition or envy. Akiba's successors revered him so deeply, however, that many stories grew up around him. These use the figure of Akiba to depict the behavior of an ideal sage. There is rarely any basis for determining which accounts portray real events and which do not: The stories about Akiba and his wife fit into this category.

One narrative depicts Akiba as a supporter of the failed rebellion of Simon b. Kochba in 132–135 against Rome, but modern scholarship remains divided as to the accuracy of this report. It seems more certain, however, that after the rebellion failed, Akiba was among those arrested for teaching Torah in public. He was held in prison and finally publicly tortured and killed. Akiba died joyfully, able at last to show his love for God "with all his heart." Thus, even in martyrdom he served as a model for those who came after.

Akindayomi, Josiah

Pentecostal Christian sect founder

Founder of the Redeemed Christian Church of God (RCCG), Josiah Akindayomi was one of the leaders of the Pentecostal movement in Nigeria. Born in 1909 in Ondo town, southwestern Nigeria, Akindayomi received no formal education but was trained as a blacksmith through the traditional Yoruba apprenticeship system. He was baptized into the Anglican Church in 1927. In 1931, he joined the Cherubim and Seraphim (C&S) Church, a brand of the popular Aladura (prayer-marked) movement, and became interested in prayer, fasting, and visions. By 1947, he had moved to Lagos, the capital of colonial Nigeria, where he carved a niche for himself as a man of prayer and a preacher of holiness. He became known as a prophet of God and in 1949 founded the Glory of God Fellowship. He eventually broke away from the C&S, and in 1952 he transformed his fellowship into the RCCG.

The healing miracles of Akindayomi made his fame spread throughout Lagos and beyond. The story is often told of a vision that he had in which the name of the church he was to form was communicated to him in English by God even though he was an illiterate who could barely read or write. According to this tradition, he was supernaturally enabled to write down the words on a piece of paper.

Akindayomi made many prophecies about his church that have been fulfilled. He predicted that the RCCG would spread to all the nations of the world and that mighty miracles and wonders would characterize its growth. He also said his church would be at the forefront of a Pentecostal explosion on the African continent. He chose a successor, E. E. Adeboye, who has actualized most of these predictions since Akindayomi's death in 1980, and this has been applauded as another supernatural feat.

The RCCG now has parishes in more than fifty nations. Akindayomi laid a solid foundation for the church. Indeed, the unprecedented expansion of the church has been attributed to a “divine covenant” due to Akindayomi’s close relationship with God.

Akshobhya Buddha

Buddhist primal buddha

Akshobhya (Tib.: mi-’khrugs-pa) is the buddha who resides and preaches in the eastern Pure Land of Abhirati, according to the early Mahayana texts. Akshobhya means “nonmovement” or “no anger” in Sanskrit. In various Mahayana texts, Akshobhya Buddha appears in conjunction with Amitabha Buddha of the west. In Abhirati, a mythical paradise, men and women live without deprivation of spiritual or material needs. According to the Akshobhyavyuha, one of the earliest Mahayana Buddhist texts, Akshobhya is one of the oldest of the buddhas.

As a bodhisattva (enlightened being), before his attainment of buddhahood Akshobhya took a long list of vows in front of his master, Da-mu, or “Great Eyes.” These included promises not to bring forth anger or ill will toward people, never to shrink from giving away parts of his body, and to go from buddha field to buddha field in one life after another, always making offering to the buddhas there. During many lives, Akshobhya carried out his vows and completed his promises. When he attained buddhahood, the earth shook six times as he touched it with the fingers of his right hand. Akshobhya belongs to one of the present buddha families and is believed to now exist and teach Buddhism in Abhirati. Auspicious signs, such as land shaking and the sound of a great roar, are supposed to occur when he dies. In the manner of a prophecy, the Akshobhyavyuha says that when Akshobhya dies, “he will send out magically produced versions of himself which will appear throughout the worlds, preaching the Dharma and causing sentient beings to attain Arhatship” (Nattier 2000, 85).

Although the land of Akshobhya Buddha apparently resembles Amitabha’s Pure Land, his followers, unlike those of Amitabha, were not encouraged to visualize the buddha himself. Nor were they to chant his names like a mantra. In order to be reborn in the Akshobhya’s land, one has to practice the rigorous bodhisattva path as Akshobhya did, “spending countless eons in the cycle of rebirth” and engaging in self-sacrifice and making offerings to the buddhas (Nattier 2000, 97).

In Vajrayana Buddhism, Akshobhya became one of the five buddhas placed in the vajra realm of the East. His statue is painted gold and characterized by his right fingers touching the earth. Akshobhya often is depicted with a halo around his head and one encircling his body, and sometimes he is riding an elephant. For the memorial rites of the deceased, he is the seventh among the thirteen buddhas allocated to the different phases of the rites.

Alacoque, Margaret Mary

Roman Catholic nun, visionary, founder

A native of Lhautecour, France, from an early age Margaret Mary Alacoque showed a strong devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, which ultimately led her to enter the Visitation Convent at Paray-le-Monial in 1671. There, in response to a series of visions of Christ, she was inspired to begin a devotion to the Sacred Heart and to establish the Feast of the Sacred Heart.

Margaret Mary was born in 1647 to wealth and social status as the daughter of a royal notary. Her childhood was full of illness, but she directed her suffering to heaven and became devoted to contemplative prayer. In addition, as penance for her sins, Margaret engaged in various types of corporal mortification, such as tying cords around her body so tightly that they restricted her breathing and sleeping on sharp sticks. As a child and adolescent, Margaret received visions of Christ during his scourging and crucifixion, and she decided to devote her life to Christ. She took her final vows on November 6, 1672, and continued to self-impose penances to such an extent that she was reprimanded for disobedience of her superior by St. Francis de Sales, the order’s founder.

Between 1673 and 1675, Margaret Mary received three revelations from Christ directing her to honor the Sacred Heart. The first revelation told her to encourage and spread a devotion to the Sacred Heart; the second inspired her to establish an hour of prayer on the eve of the first Friday of every month and to receive Holy Communion on every first Friday; and the third requested a special feast day of the Sacred Heart on the Friday following the octave of the Feast of Corpus Christi. Until her death in 1690, Margaret Mary worked to implement the requests she received in her visions, often in the face of opposition.

Margaret Mary was buried under the altar in the chapel in Paray; in 1830, her tomb was canonically opened, at which time two instantaneous cures took place. She was beatified by Pius IX on September 18, 1864, and canonized by Benedict XV on May 13, 1920. Her feast day is October 17.

Alban

(d. 3rd cent. C.E.)

Christian protomartyr of Britain and the English Church

Tradition says that Alban was a non-Christian soldier in the Roman army assigned to Verulamium (now the city of St. Albans in Hertfordshire in England). The fifth-century Life of St. Germanus of Auxerre and Gildas, writing in the sixth century, provide the core texts describing Alban's martyrdom, which they place during the persecution of Diocletian (302–305). Modern historians doubt this late date, however, and suggest that he was martyred during the persecution of Decius (249–251).

Alban supposedly gave shelter to a fleeing Christian priest and was converted by him. For this, he was then arrested and beheaded. Bede, writing in the eighth century, provides an amplified account of the martyrdom complete with supernatural signs from heaven. Holmhurst Hill is considered the traditional scene of the martyrdom, and the great abbey of St. Alban was later built on the site by King Offa in the seventh century. During the late Anglo-Saxon period, Alban's relics are said to have been translated to the abbey at Ely due to various Danish incursions. St. Canute's in Odense claims to have relics of St. Alban as well, which Canute supposedly stole during his raid on the city of York in 1015. What remained of Alban's relics were destroyed or scattered during the English dissolution of the monasteries in the sixteenth century. Alban's feast day is June 22.

Christian friar, bishop, philosopher, theologian, scientist, doctor of the church

Albertus Magnus is referred to as "the Great" or "Universal Doctor" because of his comprehensive knowledge in all the fields of his day. Proficient in theology and philosophy, he also produced works in botany, physics, logic, astronomy, politics, and other disciplines. In fact, he left no aspect of medieval knowledge unexamined. His scientific erudition is legendary, and he is one of the great figures in the history of medieval thought. He is perhaps best known today for being the teacher of Thomas Aquinas, and he is said to have foretold the greatness of his student. His feast day is celebrated on November 15.

Albert was born around 1200 to a wealthy German family. Against their wishes, he entered the Dominican order in 1223 upon hearing the preaching of Blessed Jordan of Saxony, the second master general of the Order of Preachers. Albert then studied theology in Paris, and there he encountered the newly translated texts of Aristotle as well as the Aristotelian commentaries by the Islamic philosopher Averroës. The rediscovery of these Aristotelian texts in the thirteenth century presented a formidable challenge to the philosophical, theological, and scientific doctrines at the university, for Augustinian and Platonic doctrines had formed the basis of study for many centuries. Albert was one of the first to comment on these new texts and a key figure in incorporating Aristotelian doctrines within a Christian theological and philosophical perspective.

In 1248, Albert moved to Cologne and established the first Dominican house of studies in Germany. He joined Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventure in Rome in defending the cause of the mendicant orders against the opposition of William of St. Amour in 1256. He was appointed bishop of Regensburg in 1260 but soon resigned to return to lecturing. He participated in the council of Lyons in 1274, and as a venerable elderly scholar, he traveled to Paris in 1277 to defend against condemnations the memory and doctrine of his student Thomas Aquinas, who had died in 1274.

By the time of his death in 1280, Albert was widely known for his learning and the wide scope of his works. In 1622, he was beatified by Pope Gregory XV, and he was named a saint and doctor of the universal church by Pius XI in 1931.

Alexander Nevskii

Russian prince

Alexander, son of Prince Jaroslav of Russia, is most famous for his victory over the Swedes in 1240 on the Neva River, for which he got his nickname “Nevskii.” Alexander Nevskii was canonized as a saint largely in recognition of his heroic role as the defender and liberator of Russian territories from the northern invaders. He was so beloved that in 1724 Peter the Great ordered the translation of his relics from Vladimir to the newly built capital, St. Petersburg.

Born in 1220, Alexander grew up in Novgorod, a city known for its strong veche, a citizen council that held regular meetings and had the power to invite and expel princes. He ruled in Novgorod with his older brother Feodor beginning in 1228; in 1236, after his brother’s death and his father’s departure to rule Kiev, Alexander became the sole ruler in Novgorod.

In 1240, the Swedish army marched through Russian territories as part of a papal crusade to the east and reached the delta of the Neva River. With a small retinue, on July 15 Prince Alexander defeated them in a famous battle. This glorious victory did not prevent the Novgorodians from expelling him from the city when he tried to rule single-handedly. However, in 1241, a new Swedish force in alliance with the Teutonic Knights and the Lithuanians threatened Novgorod again. In the same year, the Germans took Pskov and advanced toward Novgorod. When German soldiers started to rob the Novgorodian merchants, the veche asked for Alexander’s return. Alexander immediately took Koporie, the suburb of Novgorod, back from the Germans. In 1242, he freed Pskov and pushed forward to Livonia. On April 5 of that year, Alexander Nevskii fought his second most famous battle, which took place on the ice of Chudskoe Lake. This resulted in the complete defeat of the Teutonic Order and its allies. The Germans asked for a peace treaty and promised to restore all the conquered territories and the captured prisoners to Novgorod.

Alexander’s rule also falls into the period of the Mongolian (Tatar) invasion of Russia. Even though Novgorod was not raided initially and remained an independent territory, it had to pay tribute to the Golden Horde, and the prince was expected to honor the khan of the Golden Horde with visits and receive a jarlik (a certificate that allowed him to rule) from the khan. Alexander Nevskii, who showed himself a strong military leader in the wars with the northern neighbors, adopted a conciliatory policy toward the Mongols, whom he had no hope of defeating. After his father Jaroslav died in 1246, Alexander visited the Golden Horde in hope of promoting his political career. He later made two other visits.

Alexander fulfilled the difficult diplomatic function of mediating between the Mongol rulers and the Russian population. During the uprisings of the citizens of Vladimir, Rostov, Suzdal, Periaslavl, and Iaroslavl against the Tatars in 1262, Alexander traveled to the Golden Horde for a fourth time in order to prevent another bloody raid. His peacemaking mission was a complete success. Alexander not only prevented the raid but also negotiated relief from military duty for the Russians. This was his final achievement: On the way back to Russia in 1263, he died from an illness. The metropolitan of Vladimir informed the citizens of the death of their beloved prince in the following words: “Dear children, may you know that the Sun of the Russian land has set” (Michell and Forbes 1970).

Alexander the Great

(356–323 B.C.E.)

Macedonian king, god

Alexandros III of Macedon, later called Alexander the Great, is best known for his conquest of the Persian Empire. He came to believe himself to be a son of Ammon-Zeus, thus setting a precedent for similar divine claims made by Hellenistic rulers of the eastern Mediterranean successor kingdoms, which in turn created the Roman imperial cult itself. It is often assumed that this divine sonship included a request, even a demand, for divine honors, but that is a separate matter. In Greek religious thinking, to be the son of a god was not the same as being divine or immortal.

Ancient Macedonia buffered Greece's northern frontier and maintained a simple monarchical system with an informal (untitled) aristocracy. Alexander, born in 356 B.C.E., was raised to believe himself a descendant of Herakles on his father's side and Achilles on his mother's, and it would be anachronistic to impose the intellectual cynicism of southern Greece on Macedonia. As part of their royal function, Macedonian kings performed certain religious duties, including daily sacrifices for the health of the Macedonian people and what appears to have been a purification rite for the army each spring. Alexander conducted these duties piously, rising even from what would prove to be his deathbed to do so.

Myth lived for the Macedonians, and it was not past their conception that the gods still acted in the lives of "special" individuals. During his Egyptian campaign in the winter of 332/331, Alexander made a fateful trek through the Egyptian desert to the Oracle of Ammon at Siwah. Ammon was equated by the Greeks with Zeus. There, Alexander received a private oracle, and afterward he began to present himself as Zeus's son, not Philip's—to the increasing irritation of his veterans. Not all accepted it. But after his death in 323, stories of his divine conception were circulated, sacrifices were made, and carved images of the king in semiprecious stone were worn for luck. He had accomplished more in life than either Herakles or Dionysos, who had received apotheosis. If them, why not Alexander?

What precisely Alexander himself thought requires interpretation of events and actions that had political ramifications, as well. No clear evidence exists in the primary sources that he demanded deification during his lifetime, though it was given to him in 324, and though later successor kings did demand it, based on that example. Yet the impact of Alexander's romantic, larger-than-life person so affected the Hellenistic and Roman worlds that his "divinity" became an antecedent for the Roman imperial cult.

Ali, Muhammad

Muslim religious leader, athlete

Three-time world heavyweight boxing champion Muhammad Ali is known for his lyrical charm and spiritual charisma as much as for his athletic accomplishments. Ali enjoys an international reputation not just as an athlete but also as a role model for youth (he is often referred to as "the People's Champion") and as a holy person who preaches an Islamic principle of peace.

Born Cassius Clay in 1942, the boxer's name was changed by Elijah Muhammad, the Nation of Islam leader, in 1964 when he converted. His name means "worthy of all praises, most high." Ali's conversion led him in 1967 to refuse military induction during the Vietnam War; as a result, he lost his boxing titles and his boxing license was suspended. Ali, however, evaluated these events, which devastated his career for nearly four years when he was in his prime as a boxer, as an opportunity to test his religious beliefs. Moreover, his verbal style, which evoked African American traditions, was a powerful assertion of black pride at a crucial time in the civil rights movement in America. Ali claimed he had searched his conscience and found he could not be true to his religion and accept military induction.

When he returned to the ring, Ali brought God with him, concluding each fight with praise to Allah. In recent years, however, this controversy has largely been forgotten, or rather, better understood. Ali has come to be appreciated worldwide as a holy man whose commitment to his Islamic faith, support for diverse charities and causes, and brave struggle with Parkinson's disease have earned him nearly universal respect and admiration. Ali gives countless public addresses and is especially fond of speaking to children, counseling them that love is like a net where hearts are caught like fish. He also believes that his illness is a divine gift, bestowed on him to make him more spiritual and to create a different destiny.

Ali is considered an icon of black pride, a global ambassador of peace, and a symbol of courage. The comedian and activist Dick Gregory remarked of Ali: "If people from outer space came to earth and we had to give them one representative of our species to show them our physical prowess, our spirituality, our decency, our warmth, our kindness, our humor, and most of all our capacity to love—it would be Ali" (Hauser 1996, 157).

Ali Ber, Sonni

Muslim/syncretist ruler

Sonni Ali Ber, founder of the Songhay Empire in West Africa, is considered a particularly holy figure in Mali, Niger, and parts of Nigeria. He reigned from 1464 to 1492, controlling one of the most expansive empires of medieval Africa. His territory covered central Mali and western parts of riverain Niger. Although he was Muslim, his ascent to rule is reputed to have been due to his exo-Islamic magical powers. At present, his spirit is venerated by various West African cults.

Songhay by ethnicity, Sonni Ali Ber was raised “animist” by his mother, who was from Sokoto, Nigeria. She came from the Faru, an ethnic group renowned for their abilities as sorcerers. Ironically, her name was Baraka, which in Arabic refers to “spiritual grace” or “divine blessing.” Indeed, these qualities were readily attributed to Sonni Ali Ber by followers during his reign, and to this day Muslims and non-Muslims alike in West Africa consider him a spiritually powerful, charismatic holy man.

Early in his rule, Sonni Ali Ber realized that the considerable power held by the Muslim scholars in Timbuktu (and in general) came by virtue of their religious authority. As such, he made efforts to couch his rule in Islamic terms despite the fact that his adherence to Islamic dogma was decidedly questionable. Thus, although his adherence to the requisites of Islam was intermittent at best, his status as a powerful and influential holy man was widely appreciated by Muslims and non-Muslims alike throughout the empire.

Upon his death in 1492, Sonni Ali Ber’s son Aboubcar Dao succeeded him, but he was quickly overthrown by Askia Mohammed, Sonni Ali Ber’s nephew and a former commander in his army. Although Askia Mohammed was far more dedicated to Islam than his uncle was, popular sentiment nevertheless attributed his rise to power to the assistance of Sonni Ali Ber’s spirit.

At present, Sonni Ali Ber’s spirit is venerated by spirit possession cults in Mali and Niger. His spirit occupies a distinct place in the cosmological pantheon. Owing to his considerable conquests and expansive reputation while alive, his spirit is considered “noble” and held to be the progenitor of a whole lineage of powerful modern-day Songhay spirits. Songhay nobles hold this lineage of spirits, and his spirit especially, to be particularly influential in their lives.

'Ali ibn Abi Talib

Muslim caliph, imam, martyr

'Ali b. Abi Talib was the cousin and son-in-law of the prophet Muhammad. The fourth caliph of the Muslim ummah (community of Muslims) and the first Shi'i imam (656–661 C.E.), 'Ali was born in Mecca in 600, the son of Abu Talib, a highly esteemed member of the Quraysh tribe. Muhammad received his first revelations in 610, and 'Ali is considered to be one of the first converts to Islam, either second after Muhammad's wife Khadija, or third after Abu Bakr.

As Muhammad was raised by his uncle, 'Ali's father, the boys were more like brothers than cousins. On the night of the Emigration to Medina (hijra) in 622, Muhammad and Abu Bakr escaped from Mecca in order to save themselves from being killed, and 'Ali spent the night in the prophet's bed in order to trick the assassins who kept watch over his residence. 'Ali's actions allowed Muhammad to escape to Medina, where the Muslim community reestablished itself. It was around this time that 'Ali married Fatima, the daughter of Muhammad and Khadija. 'Ali and Fatima had two sons: Hasan, who became the second Shi'i imam, and Husayn, the third imam.

While Muhammad was alive, 'Ali participated in many military campaigns. He often served as the flag bearer, although he was the commander of the army in the battles of Fadak (628) and Yemen (632). After the prophet Muhammad died in 632, 'Ali no longer participated in military expeditions, although he did fight in two significant battles (the Battle of the Camel in 656 and the Battle of Siffin in 657) during his reign as caliph and imam. While Muhammad was alive, 'Ali served as his secretary and companion.

Following Muhammad's death, a debate regarding the succession of leadership in the Muslim community emerged. A group of Muslims devoted to 'Ali (which later became known as the Shi'at 'Ali, or Shi'ites; literally the "partisans of 'Ali") asserted that Muhammad had designated his cousin and son-in-law to become the next leader. It is argued that during Muhammad's final pilgrimage to the Ka'aba in Mecca, which later became known as the Farewell Pilgrimage, Muhammad designated 'Ali to be his successor at a place called Ghadir Khumm. When Muhammad died shortly after the Farewell Pilgrimage, however, the companions of the prophet decided to elect Abu Bakr as caliph of the Muslim community. It was not until 656 that 'Ali was finally elected caliph, following Abu Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Uthman.

'Ali was often at odds with both 'Umar and 'Uthman, whom he considered to have deviated from the Qur'an and Sunnah (the tradition of the prophet Muhammad). 'Ali's piety and strict observance of Islamic law caused him to disagree frequently with them. In 656, the third caliph, 'Uthman, was murdered, the implications of which directly affected 'Ali. On June 17, 656, 'Ali accepted the nomination to the caliphate. Many of his critics were opposed to his nomination, arguing that he had protected 'Uthman's murderers. In 661, 'Ali was stabbed and killed by a Kharijite (a sect that had separated from the Shi'a) named 'Abdu'r-Rahman ibn Muljam, and he died two days later in Najaf, Iraq. 'Ali's shrine in Najaf is one of the most holy pilgrimage sites for the Shi'a.

Many sufi orders trace their lineage back through 'Ali to the prophet Muhammad. 'Ali is revered for his piety and dedication to Islam. In the tenth century, his sermons, letters, and sayings were collected by Muhammad b. al-Husayn al-Radi into the Nahj al-Balagha (Peak of eloquence). There is a rich hagiographic tradition, both Shi'i and sufi, which focuses upon 'Ali's exemplary piety and unique qualities.

'Ali ibn al-Husayn, Zayn

Shi'i Muslim imam

The great-grandson of the prophet Muhammad, Zayn 'Ali ibn al-Husayn was present with his father at the massacre in Karbala in 681 but was spared from death because he was too ill to fight. Born in 658 to the daughter of a Persian king and the grandson of the prophet, 'Ali was known as "the son of two noble parents."

In Sunni circles, 'Ali is highly respected because of his piety, asceticism, and generosity. He is also regarded as a reliable transmitter of traditions and an authority in legal matters. Owing to his intense prayer and devotion, 'Ali was bestowed the honorific title "Zayn al-'Abidin" (ornament of the worshippers) by al-Zuhri, a famous traditionist.

The Shi'is regard Zayn al-'Abidin as the fourth divinely appointed imam. He is also known for his ascetic practices and piety. Many beautiful and moving spiritual discourses preserved in books such as "The Psalms of Islam" have been attributed to him. The famous poet al-Farazdaq composed numerous verses that extolled 'Ali's eminent status, noble lineage, and position as the leader of the Shi'is of his time.

After the events at Karbala, 'Ali led a quiet life in Medina. He refused to back Mukhtar's (d. 687) uprising against those who had killed his father in Karbala, and he remained neutral in other politico-religious movements in Medina, especially in Ibn Zubayr's (d. 692) revolt against Yazid. Due to his neutral stance, many Shi'is decided to join the Kaysaniyya movement associated with his uncle, Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya, who believe that he was the mahdi, or "rightly guided one."

Shi'i hagiographic literature contains numerous anecdotes of his miracles. When his uncle challenged him over the leadership of the community, the dispute was allegedly resolved by the black stone at the Ka'aba, which testified that 'Ali was the legitimate imam of the time. Toward the end of his life, 'Ali was able to gather a small group of disciples, including Aban b. Taghlib, Jabir b. 'Abd Allah al-Ansari, and Abu Hamza Thabit b. Dinar, who saw 'Ali as the legitimate imam of the time. After his death in 713, a struggle for leadership emerged between two of his sons, Muhammad (also called al-Baqir) and Zayd.

'Ali Shah

(d. 1938 C.E.)

Muslim holy woman

Lady 'Ali Shah was the wife of Aga Khan II and a granddaughter of the Persian shah Fateh 'Ali Shah Qajar. After her husband's death, she devotedly cared for her son, Sultan Muhammad Shah, who became imam in 1885 when he was not quite eight years old. Lady 'Ali Shah became very involved in the community and has been celebrated for her wisdom and vision. Endowed with a dynamic personality, she has been described as a "born leader." When her son, the imam, was away from India, she frequently stepped in as a mediator to resolve issues that arose. Her advice was also solicited on a series of matters dealing with personal domestic problems, business, communal resolutions, and health. She was especially accepting of various novel aspects of modern health care, such as inoculations.

Lady 'Ali Shah spent considerable time in prayer and in the study and discussion of spiritual matters. When she visited England in 1932, she was received at Buckingham Palace by King George V and Queen Mary and endowed with the title of the Imperial Order of the Crown of India. In 1937, she began to experience ill health and traveled to Basra by sea in the following year. She died in Najaf in 1938 and was buried next to the tomb of her husband, Shah 'Ali Shah. With her endearing manner and dynamism, she served as a beacon to members of her community, especially the women, who sought to emulate her in words and deeds. She is regarded as the paradigm of the traditional woman who is also progressive and hence bridges two cultures, the East and the West.

Alinesitoué Diatta

Diola prophet

The best known of the Diola prophets of southern Senegal, Alinesitoué Diatta introduced a series of new spirit shrines (ukine) and rituals of supplication of the Supreme Being in 1941 and 1942 before being exiled by the French in 1943. She died in exile at Timbuktu the following year, but that was kept a state secret until 1987. During her two years of teaching, Alinesitoué claimed that the Supreme Being, Emitai, spoke to her and commanded her to instruct the Diola about a new series of rituals to procure rain.

The Diola number over half a million people and include the largest number of practitioners of an indigenous religion in Senegal. They are generally regarded as the finest rice farmers in West Africa. Droughts, however, are common, and this threatened the Diola with severe shortages of food. The term Emitai dabognol, often translated as “prophet,” is an epithet that literally means “the one sent by God.” Before the colonial conquest there were eleven male prophets, including Atta-Essou of Eloudia. Beginning with the French occupation, women prophets became active among the southern Diola. Alinesitoué was the most influential of these but not the first woman prophet.

She was born in the southwestern Senegalese township of Kabrousse around 1920. As a teenager, she worked as a maid in the cities of Ziguinchor and Dakar. Early in 1941, while walking through the crowded Sandaga Market of Dakar, she reportedly heard the voice of Emitai, who told her that she must return home and teach about new spirit shrines that would ensure adequate rainfall and end the drought. Early in 1942, she summoned the elders of her community and taught them about these new rituals, most notably Kasila. This involved the sacrifice of a black bull and other livestock at a shrine created in the public square of each neighborhood of a Diola township. The ritual was described as a “charity” because, in sharp contrast to most Diola rituals, it did not provide the donor of the sacrificial animal with any ritual privileges. Alinesitoué opened the rituals to participation by the entire community: Men and women, young and old, rich and poor all had equal opportunities to become priests. For seven days and six nights, all meals were shared in common. Meals were followed by singing and dancing in honor of the ancestors, and people slept in the public square, reaffirming the strength of Diola communities. The drought came to an end.

Alinesitoué’s rituals attracted interest throughout the Diola areas of Senegal and in the neighboring colonies of Gambia and Portuguese Guinea. She earned the hostility of French authorities, however, by opposing their efforts to spread peanut cultivation, which lured men away from a collective family practice of cultivating rice with the promise of cash from the sale of peanuts, leaving the rice farming to women. She earned the enmity of French missionaries by insisting that Diola observe a day of rest, Huyaye, every sixth day, instead of following the Christian Sunday sabbath. An insecure Vichy colonial government ordered her arrest in late January 1943. She was tried under the Indigénat, the French “native” law code, for the offense of obstructing French colonial initiatives. Alinesitoué limited her defense to a claim that all she had done was to “transmit the directives He [Emitai] had dictated.” After her conviction and banishment, the drought returned. Since her death, there have been many other prophets, mostly women, who have claimed that Emitai sent them to follow in the tradition of Alinesitoué Diatta.

All Saints’ Day

Feast day of the Christian Church celebrated November 1

All Saints’ Day made its first appearance in the Christian church at Antioch in the fourth century as a commemoration of all holy martyrs and saints on the first Sunday after Pentecost. John Chrysostom, who preached in Antioch before he became patriarch of Constantinople, delivered annual sermons on this feast day. The feast spread rapidly through the Eastern Christian Church, and by the seventh century it was kept as a public holy day. When Pope Boniface IV introduced the Feast of All Holy Martyrs in 615, however, May 13 was the date assigned annually to its observance. Pope Gregory IV transferred the feast to November 1 in 844.

Pope Gregory IV also convinced the Frankish emperor Louis the Pious to introduce the feast into his territories. The reason for the date change is unclear, but scholars believe that the Feast of All Saints was meant to substitute for the pagan Celtic celebration of Samhain, when the spirits of the dead were said to be allowed to walk the earth. The early Christian Church often placed major feast days on non-Christian holy days, thereby gradually converting people to Christianity through gradual acceptance and similarity of traditions. This practice can also be seen in the assignment of Christmas, Easter, and Candlemas. Pope Sixtus IV established All Saints’ Day as a liturgical vigil and octave in 1484, but the octave was discontinued in 1955. The purpose of the feast is to remember the merits of all the saints through one celebration.

By the end of the Middle Ages, the merging of pre-Christian and Christian traditions on this date began to emerge as a celebration in England. Known as Hallowtide, the king and his court would celebrate by wearing costumes and ringing church bells. The concept of purgatory, whereby the living could assist the dead by praying for them, and the notion that the saints were intercessors between humans and Christ, boosted the importance of remembering the martyrs and saints working for human souls before God’s throne. The modern practice of Halloween, or All Hallow’s Eve, combines pre-Christian and Christian practices that developed over the centuries on this date.

Amandus of Maastricht

(c. 589–679 C.E.)

Christian monk, missionary, apostle of Belgium

Amandus of Maastricht was arguably the most successful Christian missionary of his day, a period that laid the foundation for the Christianization of Western Europe. His success resulted from his persistence, his personal example of a holy life, and his ability to work miracles.

Born in around 589 into a noble and devoutly Christian family in Aquitania (modern southwestern France), Amandus entered a monastery at the age of twenty and lived the life of a hermit for the next fifteen years. Drawn out of isolation by his desire to preach the Christian gospel, he undertook missions into Belgium and to the Slavs and the Basques. Appointed bishop of Maastricht in 649, Amandus quickly converted the surrounding region. He then resigned his see to take his mission farther afield.

Amandus's earliest biography, written soon after his death, not only recounts the course of his career and his many virtues but also provides insight into the methods that Christian missionaries used in this period. Amandus preached with great force and enthusiasm, but his words had an effect on his audiences only when miracles reinforced his message. For those of his time, he embodied the power of the Christian God. Amandus mediated disputes, spoke out against royal sins and abuses of power, destroyed the sacred sites of the native religion, and reportedly calmed a storm at sea, healed people's infirmities, and even raised the dead. Moreover, Amandus's apostolic fervor manifested itself in a willingness to endure repeated setbacks and even physical danger.

Amandus allied with powerful churchmen (notably Pope Martin I [pope 649–655]) and with Frankish kings (especially Chlothar II [r. 584–629] and Dagobert [r. 623–639]) to advance his missions. In this way, he helped to foster the Frankish/papal alliance so decisive for the future history of both Germany and the papacy. Amandus was also adept at turning the church's growing patrimony to spiritual use, buying up non-Christian slaves, baptizing them, and training them as missionaries to their own people. He used land granted to him by the Frankish kings to build monasteries that encouraged asceticism and educated those newly converted to the Christian faith. Among the monasteries Amandus founded were Mont-Blandin, Nivelles, and Elnon. Amandus retired to Elnon, where he spent his last years as abbot. His feast day is February 6.

Amardas

Sikh guru, hymn writer

Guru Amardas, the third Sikh guru, was a Vaishnava Hindu before joining the Sikh community run by Guru Angad at his center in Khadur. Following the Sikh tradition of nomination established by Guru Nanak (the first Sikh guru), Guru Angad passed over his own two sons, Dasu and Datu, and nominated Amardas to succeed him.

The resulting tension between Guru Amardas and Dasu and Datu forced Guru Amardas to move the center of the community to Goindval. At this new location, Guru Amardas added his own hymns to those of the first two gurus and collected them in a set of four volumes, now known as the Goindval Pothis. During his guruship the number of Sikhs increased significantly, and with these new members Guru Amardas institutionalized some Sikh ritual practices, such as the death, marriage, and birth ceremonies. The growing community also necessitated an administrative expansion, and twenty-two local centers (called manjis) were created to keep the community running smoothly. Guru Amardas continued the tradition of nomination, selecting his son-in-law, Jeth Chand (who became Guru Ramdas), as his successor before his death in 1574.

Guru Amardas's hymns reiterate many of the same themes found in the writings of the first two gurus. The language used to describe God continues to oscillate between a nirguna understanding (that is, describing God as formless and transcendent, "without attributes") and a more concrete understanding of God as royalty, the sovereign lord of the universe. The importance of the community is also emphasized: God protects his worshippers from unjust earthly kings. One who fails to turn to God is self-oriented (manmukh). The path to salvation leads one to the true community (sat sangat), and within this community the singing of and listening to the Word (bani) in the Gurdwara is essential.

Guru Amardas's emphasis on the importance of the Word is significant. In the Goindval Pothis he added the writings of some nirguna saints, including Kabir, Namdev, Ravidas, Beni, and others. However, he did not include all of their writings but chose only those compositions that fit with the overall temperament of the Sikh gurus. For example, the Kabir hymns he included are the ones that emphasize the power and transcendence of God, not those calling for the destruction of institutional forms of religion.

Amautas

Inca sages, recorders

According to colonial chroniclers and historians, amautas and haravicus were Incas who kept a record of historical events and preserved the literary works and traditions of their people. Some scholars make a distinction between the two terms, defining “haravicus” as wise men who recorded in their memory and recited poetry and ritual songs, and “amautas” as wise men who recorded all kinds of technological, scientific, and religious information.

“Amauta” seems to be derived from the Aymara language, rather than Quechua, although Aymara and Quechua are closely related Andean languages (Mignolo and Boone 1994). The amautas were considered highly knowledgeable and were in charge of the yachaywasi, the Inca house of knowledge, equivalent to school. The indigenous chronicler Guaman Poma de Ayala identifies amautas with poets, astrologers, and philosophers. They were responsible for the education of Inca princes and the children of the high nobility.

Although all chroniclers registered the activities of the amautas, their specific functions have not been clearly established. However, amautas were also usually considered quipucamayos and quilcacamayos, individuals who had the capacity to record information and transmit it upon request. Today, the term “amauta” could be translated “maestro,” signifying a teacher, with emphasis on the person’s wisdom and achievement. The original meaning of the word in Inca times has not been sufficiently explained, however.

Ambrose

Christian bishop, father of the church

An eloquent and politically astute bishop of Milan from 374 until his death in 397, mentor to Augustine of Hippo, and one of the Latin church fathers, Ambrose was born in Gaul, where his father was praetorian prefect, in around 339. His family moved to Rome after the death of his father in 354, and it was there that his older sister Marcellina devoted herself to an ascetic life as a consecrated virgin, yet remaining in the family home. Marcellina would have a strong impact on Ambrose, though he pursued a traditional Roman education in law in preparation for a secular career.

Ambrose’s eloquence in arguing cases brought him to the attention of the emperor Valentinian, who appointed him consular governor in Milan, the western capital of the Roman Empire at the time and a city with deep religious divisions between the Arian and orthodox Christians. When the bishop of the city died, Ambrose, known for his integrity and evenhandedness, was raised to the bishopric by acclamation of the people even though he was not yet baptized and held no position in the church.

Ambrose was known for his eloquent sermons, important theological treatises, and promotion of monasticism, and for the introduction of hymns, which he wrote himself, into the liturgy. He was also a powerful political force not only in Milan but also in the empire, frequently standing up to emperors and empresses. Ambrose was instrumental in the removal of the altar of victory from Rome in 382 when he wrote convincingly against the requests of Symmachus, prefect of the city of Rome. Disputes with the Arians erupted in 386, and Ambrose refused to yield and was besieged in his basilica, along with members of his congregation (including Monica, the mother of Augustine), by soldiers sent by the Arian empress Justina, the mother of the child-emperor Valentinian II. Ambrose prevailed and the imperial forces turned away rather than commit a massacre. Later, Ambrose stood up to the powerful emperor Theodosius I, refusing to say mass for him and ordering him to perform public penance for the massacre he ordered of thousands of citizens in Thessalonica. His eulogy for Theodosius, written for his funeral in 395, is a rhetorical masterpiece.

A few months after the near massacre of 386, Ambrose led his congregation to the discovery of the bodies of two early Milanese martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius. Ambrose was thus able to capitalize on the growing cult of the saints by providing Milan with its own powerful links to the divine.

Many works by Ambrose survive, including sermons, eulogies, treatises, and letters. Significant contributions include his treatise on virginity, dedicated to his sister, Marcellina, and his work on widows and widowhood. Accounts of Ambrose by those who knew him personally can be found in Augustine's Confessions and in Paulinus of Milan's hagiography of the holy bishop.

Amerindian Religions and Holy People

Only a very few culture groups in the Americas preserve written records of their cultural practices that narrate events before the arrival of the Europeans. For this reason, it is very difficult to document pre-Christian holy people separate from a European construction of “holy” or of religion. This is not to say that the concept of holiness did not exist in the Americas prior to the arrival of Christian Europeans, just that the construction of holiness and of religion in the Americas can be very different from that of many of the other world religions. What we know and understand about Amerindian religions comes mostly from the records of Christian explorers, settlers, and conquerors intent on eliminating the local religions as “pagan” or from Western scholars who brand Amerindian religions as “primitive” or celebrate them as “utopian.” Charles Darwin once classified the native people of Tierra del Fuego, including the Selknam (Ona) and the Yamana (Yahgan), as people without religion or government because they did not seem to exhibit any practices that corresponded to his own view of what religion should be. Further investigations revealed that these groups did have a rich spiritual life; it was just not easily measured against Darwin's ethnocentric concept of “religion.”

In addition, because of the vast geographical, ethnic, linguistic, and cultural differences, the spiritual practices of the Amerindians cannot be generalized into one or even several identifiable religions. Some culture groups lived and continue to live in small groups of closely related families. In other areas, cosmopolitan cities rose and fell. The inhabitants of these cities practiced many different beliefs and worshipped a vast array of divine and supernatural beings. We have evidence of some of these groups from the archaeological record and from the narratives of European colonizers and mestizo and native chroniclers who learned to write in Spanish, French, or English upon the arrival of the Europeans in the Americas. We know about other groups from social scientists living among various groups doing fieldwork, and we know about several groups through their own written and more recently recorded words.

Because certain characteristics can be identified as trends in Amerindian religious practices, scholars can make connections between the various records to help better understand religious life and holy people in the Americas. From these records, it is clear that Amerindian religious practices and the holy people dedicated to them often serve to connect Amerindian communities with their natural surroundings. Amerindian holy people practice rituals and activities that help express the dangers and joys of life, and they attempt to assure their community's stability and success in providing sustenance, security, and shelter. Amerindian holy people often help the communities keep in contact with or revere ancestors who have passed before them and help connect the community's children with their past and present. An examination of specific examples in the areas of religion and sustenance, religion and ancestors, and religion and warfare will illustrate several important aspects of Amerindian religions and holy people as well as the role of Amerindian religions' influences on the practice of Christianity in the Americas.

Amerindian Religion and Sustenance

As holy people help the community thrive and sustain their members, the means in which communities sustain their people is often directly related to their individual religious practices. In the Americas, as in other areas, two main tendencies can be identified. Amerindian groups were either nomadic gatherers and hunters or settled agrarianists. In many cases, societies developed that were a combination of the two methods of sustenance. These three possibilities allowed for many variations of religious practices, but each emphasized specific talents or behaviors that assured success in providing food for the community.

Nomadic communities would often prize specific talents and activities that would aid successful collection of food. Nomadic gatherers and hunters appreciated talents such as swiftness, prowess with hunting instruments (bow and arrow, spear, atlatl, and so on), bravery, keen eyesight, and strength. In many cases, the strongest and most dominant hunter or the descendants of a legendary hunter led these groups. The religious devotion of this leader was often also very important, since to assure a good hunt, the proper respects would need to be paid to the land and to the animals that were to be the prey. Although nomadic Amerindian groups tended to respect hunting prowess and strength, agrarian groups possessed different priorities. These cultures celebrated fertility, hard work in the field, good planting strategies, weather forecasting, and other characteristics that made the harvest good and food abundant.

The different means of sustenance allow for differing cosmologies as well. Groups dedicated to gathering and hunting are often more dedicated to solar divinities as examples of hunting prowess since successful and less dangerous collecting can be performed during daylight hours. The divinities representing danger were often those of the nighttime since the darkness brings danger for those who do not reside in permanent dwellings. In contrast, groups practicing agriculture would find that rainy and dry season predictions were vital to the success of their crops.

The night sky in many parts of the Americas can be directly related to crop cycles. In many Northern Hemisphere locations, for example, the appearance of the constellation known in the West as the Pleiades corresponds with the planting season. In the Chaco region of South America, the Pleiades are called “Grandfather.” The Milky Way also represented the path of water in the rainy season and the frost in the dry season for Mesoamericans. In the Caribbean and central tropics, a reverence of tropical storms and hurricanes as well as droughts was vital to crop success and the avoidance of starvation. Juraqan (Hurricane) is a powerful ancestor present at the time of the Maya creation in the Popul Vuh, the great Mayan creation epic.

Amerindian Religion and Ancestors

Most of the cultures known throughout the hemisphere venerated their ancestors; contemporary groups continue this practice. Like other aspects of religion, however, “ancestor” can also be perceived differently among Amerindians than in the European tradition. Many Amerindian cultures narrate creation stories and other accounts in which animals, natural phenomena, and people once existed together as equals. Even when people and animals no longer possessed the ability to talk to each other, respect for these animal (and sometimes vegetable and mineral) ancestors as well as human ones was vital to a good and abundant life within the community. In the Americas, holy “people” could also be animals or other natural phenomena.

For example, the Lakota Sioux tell the story of creation in the voice of Tunkashila (Grandfather), who is a stone in a field of grass, speaking to a Lakota medicine man. Coyote, Jaguar, Anaconda, Dolphin, and Peccary often are represented as ancestors in Amerindian narratives. In many cases, no distinction is made between “myth” and “history” in these narratives. From the Arctic Circle to Mesoamerica and from the Amazon basin to Tierra del Fuego, these and many other animals, from condors to opossums, help native peoples establish the order of the cosmos and the connection to the world around them. Like Tunkashila, rocks, mountains, springs, caves, and rivers could be ancestors in the Americas.

Sometimes ancestors would be plants or celestial bodies in addition to animals and natural forces. Corn in its various stages is personified and worshipped in human form in Mesoamerica, for example. The Tzotzil in the Maya area still revere X’Ob the “Mother of Maize,” and if the fields are neglected to weeds she will move in to clean them. The soul of the corn is also personified as “Kox” in Tzotzil. He is linked to Christ and, as the son of the Sun, represents human vitality and blood. The moon and the sun also serve as ancestors throughout the Americas, sometimes even doing battle as a metaphor for day and night.

In addition to revered ancestors, Amerindian holy people were often great leaders who helped the community survive adversity or people who helped make use of a technology to better provide for the community's needs. Although many examples of great leaders in adversity or societal advancement, such as the Mexica Axayacatl, can be identified, examples of the second type are more difficult to find. One such example is Varinkoshi, who is responsible for introducing the peanut to the Shipibo of the Amazon basin. Another example of holy people who use technology for the advancement of the community are the quipucamayos, the people responsible for quantifying the goods and services of the Inca Empire by keeping the quipu, a series of knotted cords. Since this empire was designed in service to the Sun, the quipucamayos kept track of religious and administrative information in a ritualized and very organized manner, reflecting the tinkuy, or balance, vital to Inca spiritual life. Their labor was vital to the success of the empire, and their technology was very elaborate and very precise.

The veneration of ancestors takes as many different forms as there are cultures in the Americas. For the Yanomami of the Amazon jungle, the ancestors are so sacred that no one can repeat the name of a departed family member and no name may ever be used more than once. The Choctaw creation story explains that the ancient Choctaw carried the bones of their departed elders while they searched for a homeland. When they finally arrived in what is today Winston County, Mississippi, they buried the bones in a huge platform mound, which is still considered to be their Great Mother.

Amerindian Religion and Warfare

As cultures in the Americas came into contact with each other, elements of various cultures were shared, adopted, exchanged, or adapted. Nomadic groups that prized hunting skills sometimes also developed superior military prowess, or they cultivated talents as merchants by trading goods collected in their travels for the crops or other products of settled people. Agrarian people could provide stores of food in exchange for luxury items brought to them by nomadic people. In many cases, agrarian groups would cultivate an alliance with nomadic groups for protection, or the nomadic groups would become settled or semisettled for better nutrition or a more stable food supply. Sometimes the militaristic cultures would conquer the less physically able sedentary groups and subjugate them, or agrarian cultures would impress a nomadic group into servitude as guards or defenders. In areas where large cities emerged, such as Mesoamerica, Peru, the East Coast of the United States, and the Mississippi basin, religious practices emerged that indicate that both agrarian and nomadic groups contributed to the spiritual life of these vast cities. As huge trade networks between these prosperous cities became established, this, too, affected religious practices.

The religious life and holy people of the Aztec city of Tenochtitlán (present-day Mexico City) offer one example of the practice of empire as a mediation between "civilized" and "barbarian" societies. Mesoamerica possessed a long tradition of public and private recording of historical and religious information graphically, so pre- and post-Hispanic accounts of Aztec (or better, Mexica) holy people exist. Additionally, the city was still inhabited in 1519 when Cortés arrived, so we have firsthand testimonies from both the Europeans and the Amerindians about religious practices at the time. During colonial times, the conquered Mexica, like many other culture groups of the area, wrote of their own cultural practices before and after the conquest.

At the same time, the European priests compiled vast encyclopedias of information about Mesoamerican religious practices in an attempt to document incidents in which their parishioners "lapsed into pagan ritual," so that future missionaries could be aware of these instances and suppress them. Despite the destructive reasons for the documentation, these encyclopedias provide an incredibly rich source of information about pre-Hispanic Mesoamerica, especially since some priests used native materials to make their encyclopedias and then frequently destroyed native-produced documents in the process.

From the cultural history of the Mexica in Tenochtitlán, we learn that the ethnic Mexica were a nomadic group devoted to a mythical warrior named Huitzilopochtli, "Hummingbird Mirror." This divinity is sometimes portrayed as a hummingbird whose foot is an obsidian mirror, or as a warrior dressed as a hummingbird whose foot is an obsidian mirror. The Mexica arrived in the valley of Mexico during the twelfth century after wandering in the desert on a migration from the northern city of Aztlan. Large cities established by several agrarian cultures already dominated the area. In the Mexica language, Nahuatl, the settled groups were called tolteca, "settled" or "civilized." The Mexica referred to their nomadic ancestors as chichimeca—"barbarian" or "uncivilized."

As with many "barbarian" forces, the Mexica began as servants defending one of the settled cities against the others in the area. As this able military force gained power, the Mexica eventually dominated the entire valley. They founded the strategic island city of Tenochtitlán and developed a vast empire that incorporated many other Mesoamerican cultures. The Mexica of Tenochtitlán called themselves tolteca-chichimeca, establishing their links to both their nomadic ancestors and the settled people whom they had conquered. They also adopted practices of the local dominated groups and of each of the cultures that they conquered.

The religion of the Mexica evolved as they incorporated other divinities and other ethnic groups into the empire.

Although Mexica theology reflected a deep devotion to military divinities like their patron Huitzilopochtli to assure the success in conquest endeavors, many rituals and celebrations also reflected a keen awareness of the agricultural needs of a city of 250,000 people. Mexica religion also reflected a need for the newly arrived conquerors to legitimize their right to rule by connecting to the historical power base. The Mexica ruled from a theocratic position; every political and military decision depended upon consultation with the divine. The leader, the tlaotani, was “he who speaks,” indicating that he communicated with both human and divine beings. Many pre-Hispanic images, and some poetic texts recovered from the colonial era, present the tlaotani preparing for communication with the divine. The first step in preparation for this event was to perform an auto-sacrificial bloodletting. Another method for assuring favor with the divine was the offering of human sacrifices.

The practice of human sacrifice is one of the most important tenets of Mesoamerican religion. The justification for this practice reflects an awareness of agricultural metaphor, yet its most widespread function at the time of the arrival of the Europeans is directly tied to Mexica military prowess. In Mesoamerica, several types of human sacrifice exist: auto-sacrifice, sacrifice to emulate a divinity, and prisoner sacrifice. In each case, the idea that blood is the most precious fluid and that it must be offered to please specific divinities serves to justify the practice. In auto-sacrifice, a person, usually a tlaotani or a priest, lets blood from the earlobe, the hand, the tongue, or the genitals in imitation of the divinity Tlaloc, who offers his precious fluid—water—as the rain. The written records throughout Mesoamerica illustrate auto-sacrificial rituals practiced by warriors preparing for battle and by rulers requesting or receiving counsel from their ancestors.

Many of the rituals based upon the calendar included the practice of human sacrifice to emulate a divinity. The victims, often chosen from the local population, would be dressed as a specific divinity and sacrificed in imitation of that divinity. These sacrifices were often performed by decapitation, and the victim’s skin would be used as the costume of a priest. In the ritual for celebrating the corn harvest dedicated to the divinity Xipe Totec, “The Flayed God,” the victim’s skin served as a metaphor for the dried cornhusks around the ripe ear of corn. Other divinities who received human sacrifices in imitation included Tlazoteotl, “She Who Eats Our Filth” (also known as Inn Tonan, “Our Mother”), and Tlaloc, the patron of rain who received the sacrifice of crying children to assure the proper amounts of rain. These sacrifices lean more to the agrarian focus of the empire than to the militaristic endeavors.

A third form of sacrifice combined both militaristic and fertility images. The practice of prisoner sacrifice became the motivating force behind the Mexica military machine. The Mexica believed that the blood of a sacrificed warrior taken captive in battle would nourish the sun and assure its daily path across the sky. This was performed in emulation of the Aztec sun god Nanahuatl, who sacrificed himself into a bonfire in the ancient city of Teotihuacan to become the sun. After this auto-sacrifice, the new sun then demanded that the other divinities who witnessed the event sacrifice themselves to feed him with enough energy to move across the sky. The Mexica wanted to assure the rising of the sun each day, so daily prisoner sacrifices were instituted. These were usually heart sacrifices.

Prisoner sacrifice also resulted as the product of an alliance between Tenochtitlán and two neighboring states: Texcoco and Tlaxcala. During a severe drought, the rulers of the three states decided to implement the xochiyaoyotl, “Flowery War,” in which warriors would be captured for sacrifice to the divinity Tezcatlipoca, the patron of the military class. The blood of these warriors was supposed to coax the divinity to return a magical obsidian mirror that predicted floods and droughts. Agrarian concerns once again became part of the mechanics of military warfare and conquest. The forces would meet in ritualized battle on a monthly basis for the purpose of taking captives to sacrifice.

On the part of the warrior, the most glorious reward—the right to reside in the paradise of Tamoanchan after death—was reserved for those who died in battle. This honor was also bestowed upon women who died in childbirth. In some ways, the two deaths are similar. Both would usually result from a violent action causing the loss of large amounts of blood, and both would have been activities that furthered the military might of the Mexica Empire.

For the Mexica, warriors and rulers were considered extremely holy people whose success depended upon their celebration of the appropriate rites and rituals. For women, the role of the midwife was also sacred. One of the most powerful female divinities, Tlazoteotl, was the patron of midwives as well as the mother of Cinteotl, the young corn divinity. In the celebrations dedicated to her, the midwives would dress as warriors and run through the streets singing her songs and accompanying her impersonator. The Mexica adopted this divinity from the coastal Huastec culture; but again, images of fertility and agrarian concerns were adapted into the military focus of Mexica society. The celebration to a fertility divinity became the time of year to dedicate new weapons as the season for warfare was literally born during this festival.

Amerindian Religion and Christianity

Upon the arrival of the Europeans, Amerindians encountered serious threats to their lifestyles, their health, and their belief structures. Since one of the principal foci for the Spanish crown was the conversion of new Christians, the “Catholic Kings,” Ferdinand and Isabella, immediately sent an army of missionary priests to their new colonies. In the Spanish colonies, these priests marveled at the fact that some of the groups they sought to convert became very devout Christians. These groups were celebrated and even held up as great models for Christian conduct to be emulated in Europe. Many Amerindians distinguished themselves within the Christian colonization process, but they also marked the Christianity practiced in the Americas with a decidedly different character. A visit to a rural colonial church in Latin America illustrates that the Amerindians brought their own voices and their own images to the new religion they were learning, and the priests allowed some fluidity, often incorporating pre-Christian practices into religious celebrations.

The Amerindians who became devout Catholics did not necessarily abandon their previous practices but adapted them to suit the priests of the new religion. One of the most powerful links between pre-Hispanic and Christianized Mesoamerica was the connection made between Quetzalcoatl and Christ. Colonial crucifixes elaborated by native artisans often contained an image of Quetzalcoatl inside. Pre-Hispanic musical and poetic forms once dedicated to human sacrifice and military prowess were incorporated to sing the praises of Christ, the Virgin Mary, and other important Christian figures. The devotion of the Americas to the Virgin of Guadalupe, for example, can be traced to a combination of pre-Hispanic and colonial religious ideas. In areas where Africans were brought to the Americas, Amerindian, African, and Christian practices became fused into the religious lives of local people. Vodun and Santería in the Caribbean and Candomblé in Brazil are examples of this process.

The children of Amerindian elite families and those of the conquistadors and their Amerindian brides (mestizos) were often educated in the Catholic schools. The narratives of some of these indigenous and “mixed-race” voices have helped contribute to an understanding of American and European religious influences in the Spanish colonies. Fernando Alva Ixtlixochitl, a mestizo educated in the Franciscan university in Texcoco, Mexico, documented the Mexican past in both Spanish and Nahuatl.

In Peru, the chronicles of mestizo Garcilaso de la Vega, “El Inca,” explained the Amerindian religious practices of his mother’s family from his perspective as a Christian educated in the Catholic tradition of his father. Although denouncing the “pagan” practices of his Amerindian heritage, he chronicled much information not otherwise available on pre-Hispanic Peru. Another Peruvian figure left a mark and a deepening intrigue on colonial letters: Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala. This indigenous voice criticized the Catholic presence and the governmental organization of colonial Peru and celebrated the pre-Hispanic past.

Amerindian resistance leaders, from the Inca Atahualpa to Seneca Iroquois leader Handsome Lake and Lakota leader Sitting Bull, are normally considered historical figures in the Americas, but these and many other Amerindian resistance leaders also served as extremely important holy leaders. Resistance, like all other aspects of Amerindian life, was a spiritual endeavor and required the leaders to request and perform the appropriate rituals and blessings to assure the success of their communities. Not all Amerindian groups resisted European ways, however, and in recent years, the canonization of the first Amerindian saint, Kateri Tekakwitha, and the Nahua who witnessed the first appearance of the Virgin of Guadalupe, Juan Diego, have further linked the Amerindian and Christian religious practices of the Americas.

'Amili, al-, Shaykh Baha'i

Shi'i Muslim mystic, poet

Shaykh Baha'i ad-Din Muhammad al-Juba'i al-'Amili was the leading Shi'i cleric in Iran during the reign of Shah 'Abbas (1588–1639), which marked the apogee of the Safavid Empire. He was a gifted polymath as well as a mystic and poet.

Shaykh Baha'i was born in Baalbek in Lebanon in 1547, but in 1558, when the execution of Shahid Thani, the leading Shi'i cleric in Lebanon, took place at the hands of the Ottoman authorities, Baha'i's father joined the large number of Shi'i religious scholars moving to Iran. There, the Safavid dynasty had recently proclaimed Shi'ism to be the state religion and was trying to impose this upon the populace. Baha'i settled in Qazvin, the Safavid capital, and pursued his studies there. Later, he was appointed shaykh al-Islam (religious leader) in the city of Herat, then regarded as part of the Persian province of Khorasan but now in Afghanistan.

In 1576, Shaykh Baha'i was appointed shaykh al-Islam of the new capital that Shah 'Abbas had established in Isfahan. This was the highest religious position in Iran, and over the next few years, Shaykh Baha'i was engaged in teaching students and building up the religious institutions of this Shi'i state. He even played a role in planning the city of Isfahan. By 1583, however, he had grown weary of high office and resigned his post to go on pilgrimage to Mecca. After this, he extended his travels, spending time in Egypt and Jerusalem before returning to Iran in about 1585. Rather than return to official duties, however, he had by this time taken to the life of a penniless wandering dervish, and he continued to wander about Iran, seeking the company of sufis and composing verses with mystical allusions. After thirty years of such a life, he settled in Isfahan, where he spent his last years. He died in 1622 and is buried at Tus near Mashhad in northeastern Iran.

Baha'i wrote some hundred works on an extraordinarily wide range of subjects. Among Shi'i scholars he is best known for his books in the field of religious jurisprudence, which were the standard works on the subject for a long time. He is regarded as the mujaddid (renewer) of Shi'i Islam for the eleventh Islamic century. Among ordinary folk he is better known for his Kashkul (The album), a potpourri of prose and poetry on a variety of subjects, and his poetry in both Arabic and Persian. He also wrote well-respected treatises on a wide range of subjects such as grammar, astronomy, mathematics, and alchemy.

Amitabha (Chin.: Amituo Fo; Jap.: Amida Butsu)Mahayana Buddhist buddha

Amitabha, the buddha of the Pure Land of the west, is one of the most influential and prominent buddhas in the Mahayana tradition. Amitabha's western paradise, Sukhavati, like other mythical paradise lands of Buddhist thought, is not to be understood in terms of locality but rather as a state of consciousness. Amitabha is one of the main focal points in Chinese and Japanese Buddhism and is known as the embodiment of mercy and wisdom.

The word "Amitabha" is of Sanskrit origin: amita, meaning "infinite," and abha, meaning "light." The usual translation is "buddha of infinite light." The Japanese use the words "Amida" and "Amitayus," as well as "Amitabha," to refer to him. The Chinese have their own twofold form: "O-mi-t'o" (transliteration of "Amida") and "Amituo Fo."

Amitabha Buddha is said to be the ruler of the western Pure Land, which is accessible to all who have sincere faith in Amitabha. Pure Lands, by definition, are purified realms created by the buddhas of the six directions out of their unending compassion and great wisdom. The buddhas watch over these lands and teach there to aid other beings who are on the path to enlightenment. Even the commoner who has not had the opportunity to become literate has every possibility of achieving salvation with the simple utterance of Amitabha's name. Everything in this Pure Land is conducive to enlightenment, and once someone is there, nirvana will be obtained without fail in the individual's next lifetime.

Iconography of Amitabha and the Pure Lands is extensive and is especially seen in Japanese, Chinese, and Tibetan art. He is often depicted seated on top of a lotus flower, the symbol of purity. Adorned with precious jewels, he sits in the lotus position with his hands folded in a teaching posture. In representations where he has a shaved head, he is Dharmakara, a buddha whom he is believed to have been in a prior lifetime. Some artists picture Amitabha with a mudra (sign of power), along with the bodhisattvas Avalokiteshvara on his left side and Mahasthamaprapta on his right. Tradition says that Amitabha was a king who came into contact with Buddhist teachings, gave up his throne, and became the monk Dharmakara. His purpose was to create a paradise in which people could come after death to finalize their way to the nirvanic state. He took forty-eight vows, the eighteenth being the most important, to help sustain the followers of this path. The eighteenth vow states that at the time of passing Amitabha would be there to bring beings into his western Pure Land so that they, too, could achieve ultimate nirvana. On his merit alone, through thousands and thousands of years, he was able to create this Pure Land, which is also called the Land of Bliss.

Doctrinally, there are three Chinese sutras that comprise the Pure Land tradition: the Larger Sukhavativyuha, the Smaller Sukhavativyuha, and the less-studied Amitayurdhyana Sutra. They describe the teaching of Amitabha along with an account of what this “heaven” looks like and how it can be achieved.

Ammachi

Hindu guru

Ammachi, or simply “Amma” (mother)—also known as Mata Amritanandamayi (mother of immortal bliss)—is a prominent contemporary Hindu female guru commanding a large following of devotees of all ages, races, religions, and walks of life. Known as the Mother of Compassion and the “Hugging Saint,” since she has literally embraced millions of devotees, she is revered by her followers as the embodiment of the Divine Mother (Devi-Bhava).

Ammachi was born in 1953 as the fourth child of Sugunanandan and Damayanti in a poor, low-caste family in rural Kerala, south India. Her biographies claim that she was a spiritually gifted child endowed with mystical and suprahuman traits who rose from a life of poverty, abuse, and rejection to become a charismatic religious leader. The turning point in her spiritual career is linked to her religious experiences in late 1975, when she claims to have realized personal identification, initially with the Hindu god Krishna, and later with the Divine Mother. Ammachi is said to reveal her true identity in a weekly ritual in which she assumes the mood of the Divine Mother for the spiritual edification of her devotees.

Ammachi's spiritual fame spread throughout India and beyond as moving stories were told about her miraculous powers and the personal transformation she is said to effect through her spiritual embrace. The Amritapuri ashram, established in 1981 in Kollam, Kerala, serves as headquarters for the movement. Following her first spiritual tour to the West in 1987, numerous transnational congregations (satsang) and centers emerged that Ammachi visits during her three-month annual tour. Most important among them is the Mata Amritanandamayi Center in San Ramon, California, which has grown into a full-fledged ashram housing several celibate aspirants. The Ammachi movement has grown today into a global spiritual movement with two dozen fully initiated male and female renunciants and several hundred celibate aspirants. The movement also has a vast network of educational, social welfare, charitable, and medical institutions concentrated mainly in India. Within the movement, religious authority, leadership, and power are hierarchically structured. Although spiritual power resides solely in Ammachi, the temporal administration of her institutions is—at Ammachi's personal choice—exercised by a band of trusted disciples.

Firmly grounded in Hindu philosophical, religious, mystical, and devotional traditions, Ammachi also has introduced several radical innovations to the Hindu ritual tradition, best exemplified in her reformulation of darsan, or spiritual embrace—her trademark—and the empowerment of women's public ritual roles. Ammachi transmits her core spiritual message of unconditional love through the medium of spiritual embrace. Involving intense physical contact in the form of hugging, kissing, and touching, darsan is also the most intimate and personal mode of interaction between Ammachi and her devotees. In redefining the traditional Hindu understanding of darsan from auspicious sight of the divine into an intimate, tactile encounter with the embodied divine, Ammachi defies and redefines orthodox Hindu norms concerning ritual purity, pollution, and bodily contact between the devotee and the embodied divine as well as Hindu social norms governing gender relations. Similarly, despite opposition from some Hindu leaders, she has installed a number of her female renunciants as temple priestesses authorized to perform public rituals (puja).

Ammachi's daring innovations are inspired by the need to acculturate her message to an ever-widening global audience that extends beyond the Indian frontiers as well as by an urge to reject obsolete Hindu ritual norms and practices. In her defiant rejection of orthodox norms and in the radical innovations she has introduced, Ammachi is calling her devotees—in India and abroad—to transcend the cultural constraints of a religious tradition and grasp its central message of god-realization through unconditional love. In her embodied self as guru and in her embodied darsan ritual, Ammachi concretizes and mediates this message of unconditional love. She is the recipient of several national and international awards, including the United Nations' Gandhi-King Award for Non-Violence in 2002.

Amnon of Mainz

Jewish legendary martyr

A legendary martyr, Amnon's story is known mainly through a late thirteenth-century copy of the Sefer Or Zarua (Explanations of talmudic problems) of Rabbi Isaac ben Moses of Vienna (c. 1180–c. 1250), which quotes Rabbi Ephraim of Bonn (1133–post 1197), who wrote a chronicle on the crusades and other anti-Semitic persecutions as well as a collection of liturgical poems, some of which celebrate Jewish martyrs.

The outline of the story is that a ruler in tenth-century Mainz, usually identified as the bishop, continually pressed Rabbi Amnon to convert to Christianity. At length, Amnon requested three days to consider. When he did not appear at the appointed time, he was forcibly brought before the bishop, where he requested that his tongue be cut out for not refusing immediately, since his agreement had led the bishop to believe that he might renounce his faith. Instead, the bishop ordered his limbs mutilated. Dying from these wounds, Amnon asked to be taken to the synagogue on Rosh Hashanah, where, before dying, he recited the “U-Netanneh Tokef Kesushat ha-Yom” (Let us tell the mighty holiness of this day). The prayer is used to this day in Ashkenazic liturgy and has also been adapted for use in Sephardic communities.

Various versions include more details—for example, reporting that the bishop ordered Amnon's feet cut off for having failed to carry Amnon to him. One breathtakingly graphic version says that the bishop had each of Amnon's limbs removed one joint at a time and salt poured on the wounds, then ordered him to be carried home with his severed limbs. Further, the legend says that, though Amnon died immediately after reciting the prayer, he appeared in a dream to Kalonymus ben Meshullam, taught him the prayer, and asked that it be circulated throughout the Diaspora for use on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The prayer, however, is much older, derived from an early Palestinian prayer found in old liturgical manuscripts and genizah fragments and later attributed to Amnon. The legend associating Amnon with the prayer seems to be a response to the increasing persecution of European Jewry and represents the effort to maintain steadfastness even in the face of torture.

An Shigao (An Shih-Kao)

Buddhist monk, translator

An Shigao was a Parthian Buddhist monk of the second century and one of the earliest recorded translators and transmitters of Buddhism into China. His real name was Anqing; An Shigao was a pen name. The son of a Parthian king, he was widely learned, skilled in astronomy and astrology, and especially versed in philosophical treatises (abhidharma). Having surrendered the succession to his uncle, An Shigao aspired to Buddhist scholarship and left his native land to wander about, eventually taking up residence in China during the reign of Emperor Huandi in 147 C.E. He stayed nearly twenty years and devoted his life to the translation of Buddhist scriptures. Around the year 170, An Shigao traveled to southern China and visited numerous places. Many miraculous stories about him were circulated in these places. However, very little is known about his old age.

An Shigao's translations are mainly Theravada texts related to the Buddhist scholastic treatises and meditation. He came to China at a time when Buddhism had already reached the Chinese court as well as society, and with the help of the Chinese he translated many Buddhist texts. The exact number cannot be ascertained, but, according to Daoan's catalog, there were thirty-five texts in forty-one fascicles, many of which are lost; today only twenty-two texts in twenty-six fascicles are extant. At any rate, his translation was a reliable one and it was basic to the further development of early Chinese Buddhism. Thus, An Shigao started the organized translation of coherent texts, which became in more or less uninterrupted sequence a series of Buddhist scriptures in Chinese translation.

Anan ben David

Jewish scholar

Anan ben David is the first figure associated with what eventually became the Karaite challenge to the hegemony of rabbanite Judaism in the Muslim East. Apparently a scholar from an aristocratic Jewish background who flourished in the second half of the eighth century, and possibly claiming descent from the line of King David, Anan seems to have been one of the first to articulate a series of antirabbanite positions and to attempt to consolidate various antiestablishment tendencies among the Jewish communities in Iraq and beyond in an age when rabbanite authorities endeavored to centralize Jewish communities and systematize Jewish practice under their aegis. Followers of “Ananite” Judaism were thus the forerunners of mature Karaite Judaism of the ninth and tenth centuries, even if they were critical of Anan for not going far enough in his critique of rabbanite Judaism. Later sources of both rabbanite and Karaite provenance offer manifestly apocryphal, often fanciful accounts of Anan’s experiences and teachings, leaving us with images of a truly enigmatic historical figure.

Anan’s approach to Judaism is supposedly captured in a pithy saying later Karaites attributed to him: “Search well in the Torah, and do not rely upon my opinion.” This utterance obviously reflects the strict textual basis of Anan’s Judaism; it also captures his apparent distrust of an authoritative rabbanite tradition, his reformist tendencies, and his belief in individual interpretation. Indeed, Anan’s thinking and scriptural interpretations are documented in the Sefer ha-Mitzvot (Book of legal precepts), an Aramaic text (fragments have survived) whose literal approach to the Hebrew Bible stands in contrast to contemporary rabbinic readings.

In particular, Anan advocates ritual practices that became hallmarks of mature Karaism: direct lunar observation for setting the liturgical calendar (as opposed to rabbanite reliance on the astronomical calendar), and the prohibition of lights, sexual intercourse, and circumcision on the Sabbath, which in effect treated Sabbath observance as a day of mourning rather than as a festive holy day. In the main, it appears that Anan’s legal strictures were more rigorous and ascetic minded than the rulings of his rabbanite contemporaries even as they both utilized analogy as the principal tool of hermeneutics.

Ananda

(c. 5th–4th cents. B.C.E.)

Buddhist monk, follower of the Buddha

Ananda is said to have been first cousin and personal attendant of the Shakyamuni Buddha, who personally ordained him in the second year of his ministry in the fifth or fourth century B.C.E. Soon after ordination, Ananda attained the first level of enlightenment (shrotapanna). Legends from different Buddhist traditions indicate that he was one of the greatest personalities in the history of Buddhism. All accounts of Ananda’s life contain the Buddha’s own tribute to his devotion and wisdom.

During the last twenty-five years of Shakyamuni Buddha’s ministry, Ananda worked as his personal attendant and was always by his side. The Mahaparinibbana Sutra gives many examples of his solicitude. Ananda was the Buddha’s equal in age (having been born on the same day), and it is touching to read of this old and most devoted attendant ministering to his eminent cousin. It is said that when the Shakyamuni was ill, Ananda became sympathetically sick. Different texts shower praises on Ananda for the exemplary manner in which he performed his duties as personal attendant. The Samyutta commentary calls him a “wise saint.”

Owing to his reputation as an expert on the dharma (Buddhist doctrine), monks and laypeople alike often approached him for detailed exposition and he became known as Dharma-Treasurer (Dharmabhandagarika). The Buddha is reported to have said that one who wants to honor the dharma should honor Ananda. At the First Buddhist Council, Ananda helped the order led by Maha Kashyapa to rehearse the dharma, and at the end of the council, the doctrine was handed over to Ananda and his pupils to be preserved for posterity. In the first four Nikayas of the Sutra Pitaka, every discourse begins with the words “Thus have I heard,” the “I” referring to Ananda as he had personally heard every discourse from the Buddha. A collection of verses is also ascribed to him in the Theragatha.

It was on Ananda’s insistence that women were allowed entry into the Buddhist samgha (monastic community). This made him very popular with the nuns, much against the Buddha’s own inclination. His concern for the sick and his ability as a peacemaker among monks form the basis of many stories in Buddhist literature. According to the Anguttara Nikaya, the Shakyamuni ranked him the foremost monk in five respects: erudition, good behavior, retentive memory, resoluteness, and personal attention. Despite being the Buddha’s intimate disciple, Ananda attained enlightenment only on the eve of the First Council after the death of the Buddha.

Ananda is said to have lived to the age of 120. He seems to have spent the last years of his life teaching, preaching, and encouraging his younger colleagues. After his death, his relics were divided into two parts and stupas (shrines) were built over them.

Anastasius the Persian

Christian monk, martyr

Anastasius, a seventh-century Persian convert to Christianity, was murdered by adherents of his former religion, Zoroastrianism. His cult was very popular throughout the Mediterranean in the years following his death, largely because he served as a role model for Christian piety in a time of complex religious and political upheavals.

Originally named Magundat, before his conversion Anastasius was a political adherent of King Chosroës II (r. 590–628). He fought with Chosroës in the campaign that captured Jerusalem in 614 and was part of the retinue that carried the True Cross back to Persia as a gift for the Christian queen, Meryem. Encountering this most powerful of all Christian relics led Magundat back to Jerusalem to explore Christianity, and eventually to convert. He took the name Anastasius at his baptism. His earliest years as a Christian were spent in a monastery near Jerusalem, where depictions of the martyrs on the walls of the church inspired him to follow their example. He left the monastery to preach the gospel, hoping to die in the process. He felt that the surest way to achieve both goals was to target his former comrades in the Persian garrison.

His confrontational preaching style led to his capture and torture. Anastasius refused to recant his new religion. Eventually, he was carried off to Bethsaloe in Assyria. There, according to legend, his torturers tried a new tactic: tempting Anastasius with highest honors and wealth if he would return to his former religion. When Anastasius resisted, he was strangled.

Anastasius's body was originally buried close to his place of death. His relics were taken to Palestine in about 631 and then translated to Constantinople after the Arab invasion of Palestine in 638. From there, his head and an icon were brought to a Greek monastery outside Rome sometime after 645. His various tombs were the sites of many miracles. A biography of Anastasius, written in Greek by 630 and widely circulated, was translated into Latin by about 650. Theodore of Tarsus, the Greek monk who became archbishop of Canterbury in 669, spread Anastasius's cult to England. His feast day is January 22.

Anathapindika

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist layman

Anathapindika was a banker of Shravasti in India at the time of the historic Buddha around the fifth century B.C.E. Though his personal name was Sudatta, he became known as Anathapindika (feeder of the destitute) because of his unparalleled munificence. His first meeting with the Buddha took place while he was on a business trip in Rajagha during the first year of the Buddha's ministry. Immediately after this meeting, he was converted and attained the first level of enlightenment (shrotapanna).

Thereafter, he invited the Buddha to spend the rainy season at Shravasti. It is said that, to make the journey comfortable for the Buddha and the monks, he had many monasteries built along the way. At Shravasti, he erected the famous Jetavanarama, the Buddha's favorite rainy season retreat, and then presented it to the samgha (monastic community). This incident is recorded on one of the pillars of the Bharhut stupa. As a result of this and many other benefactions in the cause of the Buddhist order, Anathapindika was recognized by the Buddha as the foremost among all almsgivers. Besides feeding a large number of monks in his house daily, he also provided meals to guests, villagers, the physically challenged, and poor people.

It is said that as a result of his selfless generosity, Anathapindika was gradually reduced to poverty. The Buddha preached the Velama Sutra to encourage Anathapindika, who felt disappointed that he could no longer provide luxuries for the monks. According to legend, a deity, on the advice of the god Sakka, helped him to become rich again. The Buddha is also said to have recognized him as a keen debater and defender of the dharma (Buddhist doctrine).

Anathapindika went regularly to see the Buddha, but we are told that he never asked a question of the Buddha lest he should weary him. He did not wish the Buddha to feel obliged to preach to him in return for his munificence. The Buddha preached to him of his own accord, however, on various occasions. Anathapindika died before the Buddha. When he was on his deathbed, Shariputra preached the Anathapindikovada Sutra to him. He was said to have been reborn in the Tusita heaven, and the Sarabhanga Jataka of the Mahavastu identifies him as Shakra Shacipati, the lord of the deities.

Ancestors

It has been estimated that ancestor worship is a part of religion for about 60 percent of world cultures. Dead ancestors are in many ways the ideal intermediaries between human beings and the divine: They have direct personal experience of the problems of human existence and maintain an interest in the communities and kinship groups of which they were members, but at the same time have transcended human existence. In some cultures, the dead continue as part of a kinship group; most societies, however, have focused on important ancestors—leaders of the community—as holy people worthy of special veneration. This is especially central to many popular religions, such as the “village religion” of India, in which the most important objects of worship are usually local heroes and goddesses who are often former members of the community. And, since only a limited number of people with special characteristics of birth or initiation can communicate with the dead ancestors, these people, too, have been regarded as worthy of veneration by their communities.

Many ancient cultures, including Egypt, the Incan Empire, China, and Rome, worshipped ancestors, especially the spirits of former rulers, who, it was believed, could form a link between living humans and the divine. Today, the practice is most common in sub-Saharan Africa, where ancestors are often venerated as guardians of the lineage of an ethnic group. In some African societies, such as on Madagascar, the ancestors are regarded as central to life, and there are shrines of ancestors in homes. But only leaders of the community or clan can become ancestors; common people simply become ghosts. Ancestors are also venerated in most Amerindian religions, where often a natural phenomenon or animal is regarded as the ancestor of a group. Thus, the ancestor Tunkashila is a stone. Perhaps more common, though, is the belief reflected in the Choctaw legend that the Choctaw brought the bones of their dead elders along with them while questing for a new homeland. On their arrival, they buried the bones in a huge platform mound that is still regarded as the “Great Mother” of the Choctaw.

Reliquary figure in Gabon. Designed to perpetuate the memory of founders of tribes through family or community worship, it expresses forcefully the persistence and authority of ancestors, who thus remain doubly present on a material and symbolic level. (Art Directors)

In other cultures, some ancestral figures have been raised specifically to divine status. Thus, in early Chinese legend, the supreme being Shang-ti was the original ancestor of the people of Shang (second millennium B.C.E.); similarly, many of the divinities of West Africa, the orisha, were especially significant and praiseworthy ancestors raised to divine status. In Zimbabwean belief, the great ancestors, “lion spirits” such as Nehanda, have reached divine status and are able to help in war, make rain, and perform other vital functions, working through spirit mediums. Even religions that have no formal mechanism for veneration of ancestors, such as Judaism, accept that the merits of the “fathers” can secure future blessings for descendants. In the case of Judaism, the good deeds of the patriarchs gained benefits for future generations of Jews.

In general, ancestors are intermediaries to the gods rather than gods themselves, as in the belief system of the Congo. What most differentiates them from Christian saints, who also play an important role as intermediaries, is the fact that only specific people, usually members of the same kinship group, can communicate with an ancestor, while anyone has access to a Christian saint. Thus, much of the authority of the Japanese emperors and empresses was based on the fact that only they could intercede with their ancestress, the sun goddess Amaterasu. A similar special link to the ancestors is important to the idea of leadership or kingship in many communities. For example, the Zulu royal family, both male and female, acted as vital intermediaries between the people and the important ancestors. Aztec rulers had to validate their right to rule by journeying to the otherworld, where they would receive the right to rule from the previous monarch.

Religious leaders have often claimed authority because of their ability to communicate with ancestors, continuing into modern times. For example, the central teaching of the Paiute prophet Wovoka, founder of the North American Ghost Dance movement (1889–1890), was that he had communicated with the ancestors and could teach others to do the same with ritual dance. With the ever-increasing encroachment of Islam and Christianity in sub-Saharan Africa, syncretic movements, such as the AmaNazeretha Church, founded in 1910 by Isaiah Shembe of South Africa, owe much of their popularity to their inclusion of ancestral spirits as an essential part of worship—Shembe claimed to be both king and diviner, and a link to the royal ancestral spirits.

Andal

Hindu poet, avatar

Many Hindus consider Andal (She Who Rules), a ninth-century Hindu saint, to be an incarnation of Bhū Devi, the earth goddess. Andal was the only woman among the twelve Tamil poet-saints known as alvars (those immersed in the love of Vishnu). These poets lived between the eighth and tenth centuries C.E., and two centuries later their works were considered to be divinely inspired. Andal composed two well-known poems in the Tamil language, the “Tiruppavai” (Sacred Lady or Sacred vow) and the “Nacchiyar Tirumoli” (The sacred words of the Lady), in which she vividly depicted her passion for the Hindu god Vishnu. These poems are part of temple and home liturgies.

Hagiographies of Andal were written several centuries after her life. These report that Periyalvar, another of the twelve Tamil poets, found the baby Andal and called her Kotai (a wreath of flowers). Kotai grew up near a Vishnu temple in Srivilliputtur, a small town in southern India. Every morning, she wove flower garlands for the god enshrined in the temple. Refusing to marry a human being and insisting that she would marry only Vishnu, she undertook special rituals in the month of Margali (December 15–January 14). Several rituals highlighting Andal’s importance take place during this month in southern Indian homes and temples today. The biographies say that her father took her to Srirangam, an important temple town in the present Indian state of Tamilnadu. There, according to one version of the story, she merged with the icon of Ranganatha, a manifestation of Lord Vishnu. Other biographies say that she came back to Srivilliputtur, and a few months later, Vishnu came there and married her with due pomp. The wedding of Andal and Vishnu is celebrated every spring in the Srivilliputtur temple with considerable fanfare.

In the Tiruppavai, Andal takes on the role of a cowherd girlfriend (gopi) of Krishna, one of the incarnations of Vishnu. With her friends, she goes to Krishna’s palace and wakes him, asking him to promise that she can be with him forever. The Nacchiyar Tirumoli depicts Andal’s passion and longing for Vishnu and contains a set of songs in which she dreams of her marriage to him. This set of songs is recited or sung in the weddings of Vishnu devotees in southern India, especially in the Sri Vaishnava community.

The Sri Vaishnava community, which became important around the eleventh century, worships Vishnu and the goddess Lakshmi and venerates Andal along with the other alvars. This tradition also considers Andal's Tamil poems to be revelations equivalent to the Sanskrit scriptures called the Vedas. Starting in the thirteenth century, Sri Vaishnava theologians have extensively commented on her poems, both orally and in writing. The poems are recited daily and in annual rituals in Sri Vaishnava homes as well as in temples in India, Singapore, Canada, and the United States. They are also sung in classical music concerts, choreographed and performed in the classical Bharata Natyam style of dance.

Andal is considered both a human saint and an incarnation of the earth goddess. Enshrined and worshipped in Sri Vaishnava temples all over the world, she functions as a theological model for the community, depicting through her passion the ideal relationship that should obtain between the devotee and the deity.

Andrew

(d. c. 60 C.E.)

Christian apostle, martyr

Before meeting Jesus and becoming a disciple, Andrew was a Galilean fisherman whose home was at Capernaum. He was also a disciple of John the Baptist when John baptized Christ. According to the gospels, Andrew was Christ's first follower, and it was Andrew who then brought Simon to the messiah, whereupon Simon was named Peter (rock) (John 1:40–42). Few references to Andrew appear in the gospels; however, some are significant, such as his role in feeding the 5,000 (John 6:8) and his participation in relaying a message to Jesus when visiting Greeks wish to meet him (John 12:22).

Sources other than the gospels, such as the Acts of Andrew, which connect him with Paul and Bartholomew, are unreliable. The Acts and Martyrdom of Andrew is based heavily on legend, and the Gospel of Andrew was condemned in the sixth century. Historically, it remains uncertain whether he became an evangelist, where he may have preached, his place of death, and where he was buried. However, traditional writings from the third to the ninth centuries refer to him as an apostle in several areas, including Epirus in Greece, Thrace, and Asia Minor (southern Russia). A known forgery credits

Andrew with establishing the church of Constantinople. Another traditional story, from Patras in southern Greece, claims that Andrew converted Maximilla, the wife of Aegeates, the Roman proconsul; for this, Andrew was apparently crucified at Patras on an X-shaped cross in about 60 C.E., but he managed to preach for two days before dying as a martyr. This story was used in 357 when Andrew's purported body was moved from Patras to Constantinople. Constantinople's desire to house apostolic relics followed shortly upon Rome's claim of possessing the relics of Peter and Paul.

Andrew's cult later became popular in the West, and churches in England, France, and Italy were dedicated to him. Legend tells that in the fourth century some of his relics were moved from Patras by St. Rule; guided by an angel, Rule traveled to Scotland to build a church for Andrew and then converted the Scots. This account is the basis for Andrew being chosen as the patron of Scotland. He is also the patron of Russia for his preaching and foundation of churches there.

In 1204, crusaders took his remaining relics from Constantinople; these relics reappeared in 1461 when despot Thomas Palaeologus presented Andrew's head to the pope. Although it was treasured by St. Peter's, Pope Paul VI returned the relic to Constantinople. Andrew's feast day is November 30.

Anne

(d. 1st cent. C.E.)

Christian saint

Anne is known as the mother of the Virgin Mary and grandmother of Christ, though there is no historical or biblical evidence for this. Her story is based on the apocryphal Protevangelium of James (written in Greek around 150) and tradition. The Protevangelium holds that Anne and her husband, Joachim, were a pious Jewish couple forbidden from making offerings in the Temple because of their childlessness. In shame, Joachim left Anne to go into the wilderness and fast. Anne lamented her abandonment and infertility and was subsequently visited by an angel, who told her that God had heard her prayer and that she would conceive a child who would be known to the whole world. Soon after, she learned that Joachim was returning, having been visited by an angel himself. Nine months after the angel's visitation and Joachim's return, Anne gave birth to Mary, whose bedchamber Anne made into a sanctuary to keep Mary holy. When Mary was three years old, Anne and Joachim took her to be raised in the Temple because they had dedicated their child to God in thanks.

Concerned with the life of Mary, little more is said about Anne in the Protevangelium, but it is the basis for further development of Anne's life and cult, which first flourished in the Eastern church. The eastern feast of Anne, on July 25, and three Marian feasts involving Anne were being celebrated by the eighth century. In the Western church, the Nativity of Mary was being celebrated by the end of the seventh century, but the feast of Anne, on July 26, was first officially celebrated in England in 1378, though not by the entire church until 1481, when her cult was at its height.

By this time, more stories of Anne's life had developed, primarily in reference to beliefs in Mary's perpetual virginity and her lack of original sin. To explain Jesus' brothers in the Bible as cousins, Anne was said to have been widowed by Joachim and remarried twice, giving birth to a daughter named Mary each time. These daughters were supposedly the mothers of the disciples James the Less, Simon, Jude, James, and John. Anne's family of three daughters and their offspring was called the Holy Kinship, and her threefold marriage termed the trinubium. The concept was popular among the laity. The story that Anne had actually conceived Mary when the angel visited her, instead of after Joachim returned, arose out of the idea that Mary could not have been without original sin if Anne and Joachim had conceived her carnally. This take on the Immaculate Conception was much debated among clergy and laity and was not resolved by the Roman Catholic Church until 1854, when it was officially accepted as Catholic dogma.

Anne was one of the most popular saints in the Middle Ages. Her cult waned after the Reformation, but she retained importance in Roman Catholicism, especially in France and North America. The shrine of Saint Anne d'Auray in Brittany became a pilgrimage site in the early seventeenth century, and French missionaries and settlers brought her cult to North America, where her most popular shrine is Sainte Anne de Beaupré in Quebec. The first church dedicated to Anne in Beaupré was built in 1658, and the shrine has been a pilgrimage site since 1670 when a relic of Anne was first displayed there. Healing miracles are attributed to Anne in Beaupré, and each year thousands of pilgrims visit the shrine.

Anne's vast patronage includes widows, infertile women, pregnant women, and mothers. She is often depicted teaching Mary to read, as matriarch of the Holy Kinship, or in the "St. Anne Trinity" (Anne, Mary, and Jesus).

Ansari, Abu Isma‘il ‘Abdallah al-
(1006–1089 C.E.)

Muslim mystic

Born in 1006 in Herat in present-day Afghanistan, Abu Isma‘il ‘Abdallah al-Ansari, popularly known as Pir-i Herat, was a significant sage of the early mystical tradition in Islam. His contribution to the development of mystical literature has had an enduring influence. He was frequently quoted in the works of didactic and mystical writers such as ‘Ali ibn Uthman al-Hujwiri, Farid al-Din ‘Attar, and Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi, who flourished during the classical pre-Safavid period (1000–1500) in the greater Persian milieu.

‘Abdallah al-Ansari epitomizes the confluence of two streams of Islam, the legalistic and the mystical. He followed the strict Hanbalite legal school, which did not hinder but rather encouraged and complemented his esoteric or spiritual quest. He had two major teachers, the Hanbalite scholar Muhammad Taqi Sijistani and the mystical, quasi-literate Abu al-Hasan Kharraqani. ‘Abdallah al-Ansari's meeting with Kharraqani changed his life, and he embarked on a path of intense spiritualism after 1034. He also received intellectual vibrancy from his native Herat, a pivotal center of scholarship, second in importance only to Nishapur. Here, he participated in and refuted disputes between various theologians and philosophers.

With the fall of the Ghaznavids and the advent of the Saljuqids in eastern Iran, much hardship resulted for al-Ansari after 1041. He was persecuted, became destitute, and endured great suffering. He was exiled from Herat by the vizier Nizam al-mulk in 1066, but called back shortly afterward, and later honored by the caliph al-Qa‘im. By then, he was famous as an orator and preacher not only in Herat but in the surrounding regions as well. ‘Abdallah went blind in around 1081 and died in Herat on March 8, 1089.

‘Abdallah is celebrated for his Persian Munajat (Prayers). In simple flowing language, he proclaimed divine longing and focused on transcendent mysteries. In the Kitab manazil al-sa’irin (Stages for wayfarers), he provided his disciples with a comprehensive guide regarding the salient stages in the quest for transcendence. This concise work made him famous in the mystical tradition, and over the centuries numerous commentaries have been written on it. Al-Ansari is also renowned for his biography of the spiritual masters and sages, called Tabaqat al-sufiya (Biographies of sufis), which he developed from al-Solami’s (d. 1021) Tabaqat (Biographies). This biography has been an important source for later hagiographers; its text was revised and brought up-to-date in the late fifteenth century by Jami, also from Herat, in the Nafahat al-uns (Lives of the saints). ‘Abdallah is also known for several treatises, or rasa’il (singular: risala). For the most part, his writings are direct and simple. His style is unpretentious, imparting wisdom in aphoristic and rhythmical prose intermingled with ruba’is (quatrains), gazals (lyrics), and anecdotes, an effective medium for the wide diffusion of his ideas over the centuries.

Ansari, Shaykh Murtada

Shi’i Muslim scholar

Shaykh Murtada Ansari was the leading Shi’i scholar of the mid–nineteenth century. Perhaps the first to consolidate the position of marja’ al-taqlid (focal point of emulation) in one person, he was famed for his cautious, methodical approach to religious law and his personal piety and abstemiousness.

Shaykh Murtada was born in Dizful in southwestern Iran in 1799. His designation “Ansari” signifies his descent from one of the Medinan companions of the prophet Muhammad. He received his religious education from the prominent religious scholars in Karbala and Najaf and then settled in 1833 in Najaf, where he would live for the rest of his life. Under the Usuli school of law that had triumphed in the previous century, anyone who is not a mujtahid (one who has undertaken a prolonged course of study in religious jurisprudence and is considered competent to give independent rulings in matters of law) must follow a mujtahid in all matters relating to religious law and observances. A person who is a mujtahid and to whom reference is made on points of law is called a marja’ al-taqlid. By the 1840s, Shaykh Murtada was widely regarded as a leading scholar, and when Shaykh Muhammad Hasan al-Najafi died in 1850, within a few years he was regarded as the sole marja’ al-taqlid for the Shi’i world—perhaps the first person to achieve this (although some say that al-Najafi was the first). In the area of religious jurisprudence, Shaykh Murtada formulated a set of principles that enabled judgments to be given in cases where there was doubt as to what the correct legal judgment should be. As a result of the developments he initiated, he is called the mu’assis (founder) of the present system of jurisprudence in Shi’i Islam.

He was also a great teacher, said to have originated masala-sazi (the construction of hypothetical situations) as a method of teaching. He was famed for his memory and his speedy resolution of intellectual problems. An extremely pious and austere man, he was careful never to do anything that might displease God. He was cautious in giving judgments on religious matters and reportedly gave only a handful of ijzas (certificates of completion of religious education) during his entire life. At his death in 1864, it is said, he had assets of only eighty qirans (five dollars) to his name. His books on jurisprudence remain widely used to the present day.

Anselm of Canterbury

Christian monk, archbishop, theologian

Anselm was one of the greatest theological innovators of the Western European Middle Ages but is also today remembered for his renewal of the language of spirituality. After a difficult beginning in finding his vocation as monk and teacher, Anselm came to influence generations of monks participating in the renewal of church life and learning that was well under way by the middle of the eleventh century. As prior and later abbot of Bec in Normandy, Anselm befriended some of his monks and expressed these emotional bonds in letters to them. Later, in the 1070s, he wrote two meditations on the existence of God: the Monologion and the Proslogion. The latter contains the so-called ontological “proof” for God’s existence, attempting to show that the very concept of a “being than which no greater can exist” requires the existence of such a being. The Proslogion, however, needs to be read primarily as a heartfelt prayer to a god whose existence is a necessary fact of being. In 1093, Anselm took office as archbishop of Canterbury and did his best to head the clerical community. His difficulties, especially with the kings of England, brought out another side of his saintliness: his insistence on living according to God’s law, regardless of the requirements of politics and expediency.

Anselm was born at Aosta (northwestern Italy) in 1033 into a family that was probably on its way down in society. After the early death of his mother and a failed attempt to join a local monastery, Anselm found he could not get on with his father and, with a single manservant, left home forever. He journeyed for three years in what today is the south of France and Burgundy but ended up in Normandy at the abbey of Bec, where he was drawn by the reputation of the logician and theologian Lanfranc.

When Lanfranc became archbishop of Canterbury in 1070, he took with him some of the monks of Bec. As we can see from a number of Anselm’s letters, this move was hard for them, especially because of their closeness to Anselm. Here we find one of the greatest medieval expressions of monastic friendship in its depths and limitations. During these same years, Anselm also wrote prayers and meditations. These exemplars of a sublime latinity renewed the language of Christian spirituality, using bold new images for the relationship of the individual Christian to holy men and women.

In 1078, Anselm became abbot of Bec and involved himself more and more with church life, not only in Normandy but also in England. At Lanfranc’s death in 1089, Anselm was the popular choice for his successor as archbishop, but the king, William Rufus, kept the see vacant until 1093. Anselm was apparently reluctant to accept the office and dreaded the commitments and responsibilities it would entail. His letters from these years reflect his doubts and hesitations, but in their literary skill and self-awareness, they manage to provide us with the very journal of his soul.

Anselm found that he could satisfy no one in his ceaseless efforts to do justice to all: The clergy and monks of Canterbury resented what they considered to be his failure to care for their privileges; the English kings, first William II and then Henry I, demanded a political loyalty that Anselm could not give them; the former monks of Bec, some of them now bishops, missed their old friend. Because of his disagreements with royal policy, Anselm twice went into exile. The first absence, from 1097, was spent mostly in Italy, and here Anselm gained time to finish his great statement on the workings of the redemption, the Cur Deus Homo (Why did God become a man?)

After the second exile, 1103–1107, Anselm and the pope worked out the relationship between kings and prelates: From then onward the English king no longer could hand over the symbols of spiritual authority to newly elected bishops. In reality, however, he still maintained great influence over their elections. The English compromise later became standard in the Western church.

Anselm often considered resigning his post, but he remained archbishop until his death in 1109. He becomes visible in an outstanding biography completed after his death by the Canterbury monk Eadmer, who loved his master for Anselm’s sensitivity to the Anglo-Saxon saints and traditions challenged by the Norman takeover. In the years after his death, a cult of Anselm began to develop at Canterbury, but it was submerged by the devotion to Thomas Becket. Anselm was never formally canonized but is today considered a saint in the Roman Catholic Church. His feast day is kept on April 21, and he is especially remembered at both Canterbury and at the abbey of Bec-le-Hellouin, which was refounded in the nineteenth century and to this day attracts visitors seeking the spirit of Anselm, medieval Christian spirituality, and reformed monasticism.

Anti-Semitism and Holy People

An obfuscating nineteenth-century word (linguistically, “Semitic” includes non-Jewish groups) that conflates three distinct attitudes toward Jews, anti-Semitism is usually defined as racist or eliminationist sentiment arising in Europe after 1848 and related to social Darwinist views. A second meaning refers to religious opposition based on supersessionism, the idea that Christians are the “new Israel,” making God’s covenant with Abraham and Judaism superfluous. Such attitudes, dating from Christianity’s inception, are termed “anti-Judaism” by scholars such as Heiko A. Oberman, who note that Jews in premodern Europe could often convert to avoid persecution. Later, conversion no longer removed Jewishness, which became ethnic. National Socialists (Nazis) persecuted Christian or atheist individuals of Jewish heritage. Dating anti-Semitism to the twelfth century, Gavin I. Langmuir (1990) uses a third definition: irrational beliefs about Jews inspired by Christian insecurities.

A 1493 German woodcut showing the "ritual murder" of Simon of Trent by the Jews. (Stapleton Collection/Corbis)

Each position has flaws: Proponents of "anti-Judaism" find it difficult to distinguish the language of racism or supercessionism from that of superstition. But calling all anti-Jewish sentiment anti-Semitism, as Daniel Goldhagen (2002) does, leads to charges that modern eliminationism was foreordained at Christianity's birth. Langmuir's position begs the definition of irrationality: Is belief in transubstantiation more rational than belief in ritual murder? Most recently, David Nirenberg (1998) has contested claims that medieval anti-Jewish violence was irrational, arguing that it served as the tool for religious, kinship, and community debates and was not always popular but often controversial. Many “anti-Semites” demonstrably embrace more than one strain.

Three common associations between saints and anti-Jewish sentiment occur: scholars who held or preached anti-Jewish views (John Chrysostom); crusader saints who also persecuted Jews (Louis IX of France); and alleged victims of Jews (William of Norwich, Hugh of Lincoln, Robert of St. Edmundsbury, Dominic of Val, Werner of Oberwesel, and numerous others). Although explanations (including supercessionism, economic or political resentment, and anxieties about birthrates or Christian doctrine) are proposed to explain why Jews were the focus of violence, lepers, Roma, Sinti, and Muslims received similar treatment. During crusader persecutions after 1095, Jews were vilified as deicides or foreign bodies within Christian society.

Later, superstitions fused to religious belief, as demonstrated by the charge (after 1144) that Jews ritually crucified or circumcised Christian children; the blood libel (after 1235) that Jews took the blood of Christians, especially young males, for ritual use (particularly to make matzah, unleavened bread consumed at Passover); and the charge (common after 1290) that Jews tortured the consecrated host. Anti-Jewish violence did not always accompany such allegations, but distinctions between official and popular violence on such occasions are difficult to sustain. Pope Gregory X (pope 1271–1276) repeated predecessors’ criticisms of the blood libel; elite suspicion explains the difficulties many cults experienced in achieving recognition. Several remained local or did not advance beyond canonization. No theory completely explains the genesis of accusations creating the third group. Monks may have substituted Jews for Greco-Roman persecutors found in traditional martyrs’ tales; local priests promulgated the stories because of apotropaic appeal. Host torture tales bolstered the doctrine of transubstantiation (sanctioned in 1215).

Sainthood and anti-Semitism share an intimate, quirky, and contested connection. William of Norwich’s cult disappeared before 1500; Simon of Trent’s was suppressed by the Sacred Congregation of Rites in 1965. Blood libel accusations against Jews resurfaced in Germany in 1946. The cult of Anderl of Rinn (d. 1462) continued until Innsbruck Bishop Reinhold Stecher ordered his relics buried in 1985, forbidding the cult in 1994. A 1997 Belarussian state television broadcast supported claims that six-year-old Gavril Belatovsky, canonized by the Belarussian Orthodox Church, was ritually murdered in 1690. Observers became concerned about the canonization of the Romanovs, executed in 1918 by Bolsheviks, fearing it would fuel widespread beliefs in the former Soviet Union that the execution was a ritual murder. A 1996 Russian Orthodox Church commission denied that Jews conduct ritual murders or that Jewish participants in the execution were religiously motivated. The beatification of Pius IX in 2000, who called Jews “dogs” and defended the 1858 kidnapping of six-year-old Edgardo Mortara on the grounds that he was secretly baptized, created controversy inside the church. Finally, recent charges of supercessionist anti-Semitism by Jewish groups influenced the content of the famous passion play held since the late seventeenth century in Oberammergau, Germany. The blood libel persists, however, despite scholarly efforts to discredit it, and it has been propagated not only in the West but in Chinese and Muslim groups.

Antony of Kiev

Russian Orthodox hermit, monastic founder

The first monk of the Kievan period of Russia to be described in medieval Russian texts, Antony is revered as the father of Russian Orthodox monasticism. Antony was a hermit who lived in a crypt near the medieval city of Kiev and became the founder of a small hermitage in the eleventh century. He was instrumental in the hermitage’s growth into a full-fledged monastery, though he never lived within its walls. The hermitage became the Kievan Cave Monastery still in existence today, and the saint thus played a role in the first important hermitage (skete) and cenobitic community in Russia. His written Lives emphasize the role of Mt. Athos in his spirituality and leadership.

There are two texts that contain vignettes of Antony's life and deeds: the Primary Russian Chronicle (Tale of Bygone Years) and the Kievan Cave Patericon. Both stress his dedication to the ascetic life and his role as a spiritual father. Antony's life is closely associated with his pupil, St. Theodosius, both of whom were memorialized by Nikon, a monk of the Cave Monastery who wrote the Patericon in the twelfth century. Antony supposedly came from the city of Liubek and traveled to Mt. Athos, where he was tonsured. After he returned to the Kiev region, unwilling to join other monasteries around the city, he finally settled in a small crypt dug by an earlier hermit and lived on donations from the surrounding population. Antony attracted other would-be hermits and appears to have been a spiritual father to Grand Prince Iziaslav, who donated a hill to Antony and his flock when the number of followers grew too large to live entirely in their original underground cell.

Eventually, Antony retired from the direct leadership of his small monastic flock and chose to live the remaining forty years of his life alone in a nearby crypt, only occasionally receiving his former pupils in order to proffer advice. He gave them permission to build a church, for example, helped them to choose their first two superiors, and convinced Prince Iziaslav to donate the land for the monastery. Antony's most notable follower was Theodosius (Fedor) of the Cave Monastery, who became the second father superior (after Varlaam) of the Cave Monastery and turned it into Russia's first cenobitic cloister. Antony died in 1073. Although he was only one of the many hermit-monks living in the region of Kiev, he is the first whose career has been carried down to us in texts. His feast day is commemorated on July 10.

Antony of Padua

Christian friar, preacher, doctor of the church

"Friend of the Poor," "Wonder Worker," and "Repository of Holy Scripture" are some of the titles given to Antony of Padua. He is considered the first teacher of the order of Friars Minor, having received permission from Francis of Assisi himself to instruct his fellow Franciscans in theology. He was respected for his great devotion to the eucharist and the word of God, for his Spirit-inspired preaching, and for his undying commitment to social justice. Antony's complete devotion to the child Jesus was key to his spiritual life and journey of faith.

Antony was born in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1195 and first entered the religious life as an Augustinian canon. He transferred to the order of Friars Minor to devote himself to spreading the faith among African people. Ill health prevented him from fully carrying out his mission, and an unexpected storm at sea brought him to Sicily in 1221. He recovered from his illness in time to attend the last Franciscan chapter held during the lifetime of Francis of Assisi.

In 1224, Antony discerned his vocation as an itinerant preacher. From then on he traveled throughout Italy and southern France, teaching, preaching, and exhorting people to greater charity and devotion to Christ. He spent the last months of his life in Padua, where he died in 1231.

Inspired by the eucharist, Antony challenged people from all walks of life to share their daily bread with the hungry. His own spirit of compassion and generosity made him a staunch supporter of and advocate for the poor. Shortly before his death, for example, he requested that the laws of Padua be changed so that debtors would no longer be imprisoned. Out of their great respect for him, the people of the city complied and rewrote the laws.

Antony's preaching was especially effective among people addicted to drinking and gambling. They were moved by his message to surrender their problems to God and to renew their lives in service to the Lord and one another. Antony is also said to have performed great miracles of physical healing, and he is well known among the people as an intercessor in times of need and adversity.

Antony's deep spiritual connection to God and the human family came out of a profound and prayerful devotion to Jesus. He was able to see the face of Jesus in the lives of the poor and abandoned who surrounded him. Antony's primary mission in life was to imitate and teach others about Jesus. He encouraged the people to embody the teachings of Jesus in their everyday situations. He preached against the sins of greed, arrogance, and hypocrisy, and he did not hesitate to call the church's hierarchy to task for their lack of moral leadership in the church and in society.

Antony of the Desert

(fl. 300–340 C.E.)

Christian hermit

Antony, born an Egyptian of wealth and—though legend has denied it—learning, an early fourth-century monk, has been unquestionably the most authoritative figure in the history of Christian monasticism. Though his actual role in the development of monasticism can be disputed, traditionalists and reformers alike have returned again and again to his example for more than 1,700 years. His feast day is January 17.

Antony's Life, written in Greek shortly after his death by Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria, not only inspired Eastern monasticism but, in an immediate Latin translation by Evagrius of Aquileia, profoundly affected Western Europe. Augustine narrates a famous passage in which two of his fellow Africans suddenly resolve to become monks after casually picking up, and then becoming mesmerized by, Antony's Life. The book was read and treasured by Martin of Tours and by the Irish monks, and it has remained a quintessential volume in every Christian monastic library into the present. It would not be an exaggeration to assert that the whole genre of Christian hagiography would be quite different were it not for Antony's activities as enshrined by Athanasius.

Nowhere is this more dramatically evidenced than in art, where the scene of Antony's temptations in the desert became a favorite motif throughout the Middle Ages and into modern times. Depicted in detail, the scene becomes lurid in the hands of Matthias Grünewald, Peter Breughel, Hieronymus Bosch, Max Ernst, Salvador Dali, and countless others; probably the most famous literary treatment is that of Gustave Flaubert.

That Life also became a template for the Lives of future monastic saints, particularly in terms of process. The pattern begins with a dramatic conversion and is followed by a period of eremitic isolation, the formation of a community of disciples, intermittent engagement with society, including miracles and doctrinal statements, and finally, an edifying death validating the spiritual principles by which the saint lived. Antony's experience of conversion was repeated in many legends: Entering a church, he accidentally heard one of those radical passages in Christian scriptures that have transformed people's lives—"Be not anxious for the morrow" (Matt. 6:34)—and underwent a radical conversion that dramatically changed his life. One sees this same pattern in the life of Benedict, the founder of monasticism in the West, and countless others, including Ignatius of Loyola.

As is typical of such an influential religious figure, the historical Antony is elusive; luckily, a number of his sayings, and—more important—his letters, have survived, newly translated and annotated by Samuel Rubenson (1995). The figure that emerges is educated, sophisticated, and theological. Far from the retiring, small-town devotee depicted by Athanasius, Antony seems genuinely public, and eager to preach to his fellow enthusiasts and curious visitors.

Antony's choice locations for times of meditation were first abandoned tombs and forts, then oases; his monastery in eastern Egypt was spectacularly beautiful, so much so that one might well agree with his reported words, when a visiting Greek philosopher asked to see his books: "My book, O Philosopher, is created nature, and whenever I wish to read God's words, it is within reach" (Sayings of the Fathers, Book 21, 16). This communal and environmental dimension connects, in fact, to the rightful ascription of Antony as the father of desert monasticism. It is certain that isolation had earlier attracted holy men and women in Hellenistic culture, many centuries before Antony's time; the Greek term ascesis, from which we derive "ascetic," has, going back to Plato, strong associations with disciplined, focused physical exercise. The Jewish Essenes designed communities set apart from society even when they were physically juxtaposed. But Athanasius tells of an odd blending of desert and civilization—that Antony's companions "made the wilderness a city," where they became citizens of a higher empire than that of Rome. Although the desert is indeed a fitting venue to combat demons, it more essentially stands as a pure alternative to the city of man.

This was the true revolution that Antony accomplished in Western culture, to realize geographically a powerfully spiritual message of transcendence while remaining completely responsible to human society.

Antony of Uvari

Medieval Christian saint, patron of Indian cult

Situated on the Pearl Fishery Coast, thirty miles north of Kanyakumari in southern India, Uvari is a tiny Catholic fishing village where a local version of the medieval St. Antony of Padua reigns supreme as the powerful patron of the village and its famed shrine. Known as the “Padua of the East,” the Uvari shrine and its patron saint are reputed for various miracles, earning the saint the local title “Million Miracle Saint.” Uvari Antony is the recipient of various vow rituals, collectively known as asanam, that include hair shaving, ear piercing, ritual bathing, animal sacrifice, and communal meals. Thousands of devotees of diverse religious and caste identities offer asanams to Antony for a number of earthly benefits ranging from finding suitable spouses, obtaining release from demonic possession, and gaining healing, fertility, marital stability, and agricultural prosperity to passing exams and securing lucrative jobs in the Gulf countries.

The original St. Antony of Padua—a native of Lisbon, Portugal, where he was born in 1195, but commonly referred to as the saint of Padua because he spent his mature years in the Italian city of Padua—is well known throughout the Catholic world as the “finder of lost articles” and the bestower of fertility. However, Uvari Antony is especially renowned for his powers over demonic spirits, particularly malevolent Hindu spirits that command the religious attention of a vast number of his local Hindu and Catholic devotees. Although his iconography is consistent with Antony of Padua’s typical representation in the Catholic world, where he is portrayed in Franciscan habit holding a book and the infant Jesus in his arms, Uvari Antony’s sacred persona and powers are radically recast to reflect indigenous assumptions concerning sacred figures and the existential human and spiritual needs of his local devotees. This recasting enables Uvari Antony’s religiously pluralistic clientele to embrace the European saint as their chosen clan or family deity (kuladeiyvam) equal in power and attributes to such popular Hindu tutelary deities as Mariamman, the Tamil goddess of disease and healing.

In incorporating indigenous traits, the cult of Uvari Antony represents a compelling case of the reconstruction and transformation of a European Catholic saint into a powerful indigenous tutelary. Uvari Antony’s ability to bring healing to both Hindu and Catholic devotees illustrates the complex negotiations and complicated identities of his devotees and their shared religious universe. The ritual mutuality among his devotees, and Uvari Antony’s supposed sacral powers over religiously diverse clients and disparate supernatural powers, suggest that the saint and his cult also serve as sacred metaphors for the living ritual dialogue among the religious masses as well as for the ecumenism of deities characteristic of the popular Catholicism of southern India.

Aoko, Gaudencia

(c. 1940 C.E.–)

Christian leader, Legio Maria

A Luo from western Kenya born around 1940, Gaudencia Aoko held leadership positions in two African-instituted churches (AICs). Her first involvement was with Legio Maria, Africa’s largest Roman Catholic–influenced AIC, with total membership of between 250,000 and 1.5 million. Aoko joined Legio soon after it started in 1962–1963. Her role was public from the outset. On Aoko’s testimony, she was not Legio’s cofounder, despite many reports saying she was. However, she was largely responsible for the growth of the church in the years after its founding.

When she met founder Simeo Ondeto (called Baba Messias, or “Father Messiah”), he was facing government prosecution. The ninety-year-old woman Legios regard as the “Black Mary,” Legio’s cofounder with Ondeto, was too old to travel widely—a task Aoko undertook. Living in a cultural setting with gerontocratic values, Aoko’s fierce charisma was impressive enough to mitigate the liability of youthfulness. Drawing crowds and converts, Aoko said mass, heard confessions, baptized, exorcised, healed, oversaw the burning of “witchcraft” paraphernalia, and ordained priests.

In its early days, Legio had both male and female priests. When more males joined Legio, men surrounding Ondeto, including Aoko’s ex-brother-in-law, decided to give Legio a male hierarchy. In June 1968, Aoko held a press conference to protest moving Legio from a priesthood open to any adult with a charismatic gift to one open only to men. Legio’s headquarters responded by closing the priesthood to women. Aoko then established a less hierarchical version of Legio, headquartering it adjacent to her natal home. The Kenyan government refused to register it as the Legio Maria Orthodox Catholic Church or the Holy Church of Africa, East Africa. Renamed Communion Church, Aoko’s new church received legal status in 1971.

During her Legio years, Aoko’s photogenic appearance and personal magnetism received much comment. In response, Aoko decided to lead a less public life. She now refuses to be photographed. She has repudiated stories that she went to heaven when her children died; that she died after eating her own placenta, put into a soup made by her co-wife; or that she was taken to heaven in a whirlwind. All these stories have her being returned to earth to work for Legio. Aoko has based her religious work, both before and after Legio, on the more conventional route of visionary experience and divine blessing, claiming that Christ and Mary, white in color, came to her in a vision telling her to take the path for activism in African Christianity. Aoko's decision to remove herself from the public gaze and biomythography has led to reports that she left religion after Legio or even that she has died.

Post-Legio Aoko has engaged in several business ventures. She was successful enough to practice African woman-woman marriage as a "female husband" three times. African woman-woman marriage is asexual.

Aoko has kept the size of Communion Church small. Like Legio, it has a mostly Latin mass. It also uses rosaries and the twenty-four beaded catena, a symbol of devotion to the Roman Catholic Legion of Mary's "Catena Legionis" paean to Mary as a figure of power. It holds praesidium services ("Mary's masses") on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Different from both Legio and Rome, Aoko's church has women priests (who do not celebrate mass on days when they are menstruating). As with Legio, her church uses some Roman Catholic clerical titles. In contradistinction, however, children, adult laity, and clergy all wear the white biretta that Legio restricts to cardinals. For Aoko, the common biretta and communion chalice embroidered on members' religious robes symbolize that "all people are equal" in her church. The East African Standard newspaper contended that Aoko "pioneered a challenge to the discriminatory attitude toward women especially in the Catholic Church" (Gonza 1983). For many Kenyans, and for Aoko herself, this is one of her legacies.

Apollonia

(d. c. 249 C.E.)

Christian martyr

The virgin martyr Apollonia dating from the third century protects against toothache and gum diseases and is the patron of dentists. Her feast day is February 9.

In his letter to Fabius, bishop of Antioch, included in Eusebius's The History of the Church, Dionysios, bishop of Alexandria, recalls Decius's persecution of Christians and describes Apollonia's martyrdom. An elderly deaconess of Alexandria, she was arrested in approximately 249 when she refused to offer to the state gods. They beat the old lady and broke all her teeth when she refused to recite the words they demanded. Upon her refusal to renounce Jesus, they prepared to burn her to death. The deaconess then threw herself on the pyre.

Christian authors embellished this account, most notably making Apollonia a young and beautiful virgin, and stressed sexual advances to show that love for chastity determines heroic behavior. Theologians have also discussed Apollonia's self-immolation: Even though her death seemed certain, is such a suicide acceptable behavior in a martyr, or is it, rather, a failure of trust in God? In art, she is figured with forceps holding a tooth.

Apollonius of Tyana

Pythagorean holy man, sage

Apollonius was born to wealthy Greek parents at Tyana in Cappadocia (present-day Turkey) in the first century C.E. There are reports of favorable portents before and at his birth. His mother saw an apparition of the god Proteus just before Apollonius was born. Even in early youth, Apollonius was "conspicuous for his beauty and great strength of memory." When he reached his fourteenth year, his father took him to Tarsus to further his education under Euthydemus of Phoenicia, known as a teacher of rhetoric. Apollonius soon grew to dislike the city, and with his father's consent he went to the smaller town of Aegae to study at the temple of Asclepius.

Apollonius discovered Pythagorean doctrine in his sixteenth year and clung to it his whole life. The Pythagorean way of life consisted of developing the qualities of sophrosune, or serenity; dikaiosune, sincerity, right-mindedness, and commitment to the search for truth and justice; andreia, courage; and philia, equal active love for all living beings. Those who followed this path abstained from animal foods and products, and so Apollonius became vegetarian. He renounced wine, wore white linen, allowed his hair to grow long, and never let a razor touch his face.

When his parents died, Apollonius gave most of his inheritance to his older brother and the rest to his poorer relations. He trusted in divine providence and spent five years in total silence. During this time he healed people, quelled riots, and was a benevolent influence in his travels. Apollonius claimed to remember some of his former incarnations and shared the Pythagorean understanding of the transmigration of souls from body to body. He traveled extensively in Asia Minor to further his knowledge and training. His visits may have included Babylonia, Persia, and India.

Apollonius attracted many students. He taught them healing, philosophy, and the Pythagorean way of life. Apollonius aspired to divine revelation by ritual means, and he is reported to have had the ability to understand the language of birds and animals. On many occasions, he predicted the future with pinpoint accuracy. He displayed charismatic abilities and was regarded as not merely a philosopher but also, by some, a demigod, half god and half man.

Numerous miracles were attributed to the sage, and his abilities were extraordinary. Some called him a magus. Apollonius is reported to have died during the reign of the emperor Nerva, or perhaps as late as 120 C.E. Popular tradition recorded his bodily ascension to heaven, and even that he appeared after his passing to certain persons who had doubted an afterlife. He may have lived at least eighty to one hundred years.

Temples and shrines to Apollonius were erected in Asia Minor, and the field where his mother gave birth to him in Tyana became the site of one of his cult shrines. Philostratus of Lemnos wrote the most famous biography on Apollonius about a hundred years after his death. Some of Apollonius's letters to his friends and disciples survive. The Arabic name for him is Master Balinas the Wise. He is cited by Geber (722–815) as having written the Emerald Tablet, a hermetic treatise.

Apostles

(1st cent. C.E.)

Christian followers of Jesus

The term "apostle" is an English transliteration of the Greek word apostolos, meaning "one who is sent out." Each of the synoptic gospel writers presents a list of twelve apostles, but the lists do not agree (Matt. 10:2–4; Mark 3:16–19; Luke 6:13–16; Acts 1:13). This would seem to indicate that the number twelve is symbolic, linking the saving activity of apostolic ministry back to the twelve tribes of Israel during the Exodus (Matt. 19:28).

Matthew, Mark, and Luke/Acts identify the apostles as Jesus' chosen few who are to fulfill his commission to spread the Christian message. They are depicted as the core group of his followers, and thus are in a unique position to absorb his teachings and ultimately carry on his work through the ministry of the church after his death. Matthew and Luke follow Mark's description of Jesus passing along the Sea of Galilee and choosing Simon Peter, Andrew, James, and John in order to make them "fishers of men," although Luke's story seems to imply that those who are chosen follow because of the miraculous powers of Jesus rather than because of his authoritative command. Matthew and Luke also follow Mark's description of the more general choosing of the twelve; all three writers suggest that Jesus called to him those who were his "disciples" and from these selected his inner circle (Mark 3:13–15; Matt. 10:1; Luke 6:12–13).

The distinction between the larger group of disciples and the inner circle of the twelve is an important one. Mark, at least, implies that there was a group of followers from whom Jesus chose the twelve when he says that Jesus "called to him those whom he desired; and they came to him. And he appointed twelve" (Mark 3:13–14). Matthew is somewhat vague about how and when the inner circle is defined, as by the time he gives us the apostle list the twelve have already been chosen from the larger group of followers (Matt. 10:1). Luke makes the distinction between the larger group of followers and the inner circle explicit when he tells us that Jesus "called his disciples, and chose from them twelve, whom he named apostles" (Luke 6:13).

Little is said about the larger group of disciples in the gospels, with the interesting exception of the women who followed Jesus during his ministry and who are accorded almost an apostolic status by the gospel writers. Luke, for instance, says that as Jesus went through the cities and villages, the twelve were with him and "also some women": Mary called Magdalene, Joanna, Susanna, and many others (Luke 8:1–3). Mary Magdalene, erroneously connected to the "prostitute" who anointed Jesus by later writers, is given a particularly prominent place among the numerous Marys of the gospels. Although she is with the "other" Mary, the mother of James, when she arrives at the tomb, it is Mary Magdalene whom Matthew, Mark, and Luke feature in their resurrection stories. In John, she actually goes to the tomb alone, holds the resurrected Jesus before his ascension, and reports to the disciples that she has seen the risen Lord.

Apostles at the Last Supper. Nineteenth-century stained glass windows, Madrid Cathedral, Spain. (Art Directors)

The difference between those who were merely followers and those who had been chosen by Jesus to share the more intimate experiences of his ministry becomes even more significant after the crucifixion and resurrection. The first issue that had to be resolved is how the inner circle, which was reduced to eleven after the betrayal and suicide of Judas, would be restored to twelve. In Acts, Peter makes the significance of the number plain when he stands among the brethren and tells them that “scripture had to be fulfilled”: In regard to Judas, “His office, let another take” (Acts 1:16 and 1:20b). Peter is adamant that the one who is to replace Judas must be “one of the men who have accompanied us during the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us” (Acts 1:21). Lots are cast and Matthias is chosen as the one to be “enrolled” as the twelfth apostle.

Peter’s insistence that the twelfth apostle must be someone who was there from the time Jesus was baptized by John until the day “when he was taken up from us” (Acts 1:22) has important implications in regard to Paul’s apostolic standing in the postresurrection community. As eyewitnesses, the twelve, now including Matthias, represent the authentication of the postresurrection proclamation of the teachings of Jesus. Because Paul was not among the followers of Jesus, and in fact was a persecutor of Christians until his experience on the rode to Damascus, he would not fulfill Peter’s criteria for being an apostle.

But Paul defends his own apostleship, claiming that he was set apart by God before he was born to receive the “revelation of Jesus Christ” (Gal. 1:15 and 1:12). Indeed, he claims that his own postresurrection experience of Jesus is more important than the pre-death, eyewitness experiences of the original apostles in that they did not receive their final apostolic confirmation or come to understand the true meaning of the gospel message until after the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus. Thus, at least according to Paul, he was chosen as an apostle, through the grace of God, to fulfill the role of spreading the Christian message to the wider, gentile community.

The destruction of the Temple in the last third of the first century, the nonrealization of the parousia (“second coming”), and the passing of the original apostolic community forced a reassessment of the fate of the early church and made it necessary to rethink how authority was to be understood. In a period when eschatological expectation had declined, the idea of an apostle as one commissioned to spread the message of Jesus before his imminent return was redefined. From the end of the first century forward, the apostolic commission was bestowed upon those who would work to develop the structure of the Christian community.

Apotheosis

Polytheistic religions have a strong tendency to apotheose their holy people—to declare them to be gods. This process of apotheosis or deification can be a formal proceeding, such as the Roman Senate declaring Augustus Caesar to be a god after his death in 14 C.E., or it can be a deification in popular belief, such as the general belief that the Greek hero Herakles was raised to the ranks of the gods after his death. Indeed, the Greek Euhemerus in approximately 320 B.C.E. argued that all gods developed from legends about what were originally historical people who were great leaders. Similarly, the Chinese have traditionally emphasized the human origin of gods, promoted to godhood for their merit. In Christianity, one early sect argued that Jesus of Nazareth was a god “by promotion” in just this way, although this view was later declared to be heretical. With that exception, monotheism—the belief in a single god—does not allow scope for belief in deification as a possible end result of holiness during life.

Greek heroes, often said to be the children of one human parent and one divine one, were often raised to the ranks of the gods. This belief continued well into historical times; for example, when Plotinus, the founder of Neoplatonism, died in 270 C.E., an oracle proclaimed that he had gone to be a companion of the gods. Over time, though, Greco-Roman religion tended to reserve belief in apotheosis for rulers. Pre-existent Greek belief that great rulers joined the gods upon death became much more central after the deification of Alexander the Great after his death in 323 B.C.E. Soon, Hellenistic rulers declared themselves to be state gods while still alive, a practice adopted by Roman emperors soon after the creation of the empire. Most rulers, however, enjoyed a very short-lived cult, as the same process was applied to each of their successors; only Alexander of Macedon and Augustus Caesar had a long career as state gods.

Heroes in other cultures have enjoyed the same process of apotheosis. One version of the legend of the Toltec hero Quetzalcoatl, tells that when he died by setting himself on fire he became the morning star. This apotheosis of heroic figures is especially prevalent in West African belief, where many of the 400 to 600 orisha (deities) are believed to have originally lived on earth as human beings, deified because of their great merits. For example, Shango, now god of thunder and lightning, is believed to have been the king of Old Oyo in what is now western Nigeria. Similarly, the Yoruba ruler Obatala, who lived in about 1000, has become synonymous with the god he represented in his lifetime. Beyond West Africa, the Rwandan princess Nyabingi in the second half of the eighteenth century, a famous rainmaker, was posthumously deified and is believed to speak through an organized system of mediums to her people. This African inclination to deify heroes has also expanded to other religions now practiced by Africans. For example, the Muslim prophet François Makandal of Haiti (d. 1758), leader of a long Haitian resistance movement, has been deified as a spirit in Haitian Vodou—although such a notion would be repellent to most Muslims.

Deification of great souls who served the state or otherwise proved their greatness is more central to Shinto than to any other religion. In part because Shinto was codified as a religion only in the early modern period as a means to strengthen the state and in reaction to foreign religions, veneration of such figures has served political as well as religious goals. Great mortals are apotheosed as kami, protective spirits. Thus Fujiwara no Kamatari (614–669), founder of the Fujiwara family and leader of the Taika reform movement that made Japan a centralized empire, later came to be recognized as a great god. Several emperors have been enshrined as kami, such as Ōjin and Meiji—whose birthday is a national holiday in Japan. The process of ruler deification could be very prosaic; for example, the great shogun Tokugawa Ieyasu (1543–1616) ordered in his will that his body be installed as a deity in a newly built shrine. People of lesser status could be proclaimed kami for special virtues, especially loyalty and courage—all Japanese killed in action in World War II are enshrined as kami at the Yasukuni shrine in Tokyo, and the kamikaze are regarded as particularly holy because of the purity of their sacrifice. Less flamboyantly, Nogi Maresuke and his wife Shizuko committed suicide in 1912 on the day of Emperor Meiji’s funeral and have been enshrined as models of loyalty. There are also cases of spirits enshrined as kami to avert their anger: A famous case is that of Tenjin, an administrator of the ninth century who was falsely accused of misconduct in office and banished. After his death, Kyoto was devastated by fires and pestilence, divine retribution for Tenjin's mistreatment. So a major shrine was built to him, and he became in time an important member of the Shinto pantheon.

China also has often deified servants of the state, such as the third-century general Guandi, now recognized as god of war. Buddhist arahants (fully enlightened people who will not be reborn) have also developed in Chinese belief in the direction of minor deities. But Daoism went the furthest in making apotheosis a central characteristic of holy people. One of the central goals of Daoism is to make oneself immortal. This is not necessarily done by superior virtue; Daoists have spent millennia questing for the alchemical secret of immortality, or practicing special exercises (often sexual) to gain eternal life. In popular belief, though, many Daoist deities were humans who won immortality through their prayers and self-cultivation, such as the Daoist goddess Bixia Yuanjun. Many Daoist holy people were officially granted divine status by emperors, especially in the Tang (618–907) and Ming (1368–1644) dynasties. One of the great goals of Daoism is fei-sheng—ascending to heaven in broad daylight to join the ranks of the gods.

The process of declaring great holy people to be gods either during their lifetimes or afterward has by no means ended. To give just one recent example, Kitamura Sayo, founder of a new Japanese religion, is believed to have ascended to heaven in 1967, and followers of the sect now venerate her as a living god.

Aquila and Prisca (Priscilla)

(1st cent. C.E.)

Christian evangelists, martyrs

A well-born Jewish married couple living during the reign of Claudius (37–54 C.E.), tent makers Aquila and Prisca fled Rome in 49 in response to an edict expelling followers of Judaism from Rome. They settled in Corinth, where they met the Christian apostle Paul, who had lately arrived from Athens (Acts 18:1–3). It is unclear whether Aquila and Prisca had already converted to Christianity by the time they met Paul or were converted under his persuasive direction. Nevertheless, Paul became fast friends with them, having found common ground in a shared heritage and occupation (Acts 18:3).

In 52/53, when Paul left for Syria and Jerusalem, Aquila and Prisca went with him. They did not accompany him on his entire journey, however, but remained at Ephesus, where they gathered about them a small community of Christians (Acts 18:18–21). Aquila and Prisca were certainly involved in Christian evangelization at Ephesus: Acts 18:26 mentions that they instructed a Jewish Alexandrian named Apollos, identified as an eloquent and learned man, explaining to him “the way of God more accurately.” Later, during Paul's more than two-year stay at Ephesus, Aquila and Prisca helped him found a Christian community there: The “church” that was housed in their home is mentioned in 1 Corinthians 19.

The couple eventually returned to Rome: Paul greets Prisca and Aquila in Romans 16:3 as his helpers who, at the risk of their own lives, aided the spread of Christianity and again housed a Christian church in their home. They are believed to have returned to Ephesus again after Rome (2 Tim. 4:19), but little is known of their final fate. Possibly they were martyred by beheading in either Asia Minor or in Rome. Their feast day is July 8.

Arap Koilegen, Kipchomber

Kipsigis prophet, nationalist leader

The Kenyan Kipchomber Arap Koilegen was the son of Kimnyole from the famous Nandi Orgoiyot family. Before his death in 1890, Kimnyole instructed his sons not to accept a leadership position in Nandi. Arap Koilegen took over the spiritual and political leadership of the Kipsigis people, who were cousins to the Nandi. His brother, Koitalel arap Samoei, ruled the Nandi community as his father's successor, despite his father's instructions.

Arap Koilegen was a powerful spiritual and political leader. The Kipsigis believed that his prophetic powers came from Asis (God), and Arap Koilegen is reported to have said that he was Asis's son. He prophesied many things during his lifetime, but only a few of the predictions are remembered today. Very often, people only recall that he said certain things when they see them happening.

When the British colonial powers occupied Kipsigis land in the early 1900s, Arap Koilegen led the resistance to British rule. His leadership and guidance were accepted by the Nandi, the Kisii, and the Luo communities. His influence among the Kipsigis was so strong that at one time British authorities expressed their inability to rule them. Douglas Braumage, the British district commissioner of Kericho, once said that the Kipsigis government was more efficient than the British administration but that it had been effectively dovetailed into British rule. He advised the British government that "If nothing is done to these people in four months to come then I don't see ourselves ruling in this part of the country."

Arap Koilegen's power among the Kipsigis is evident in a report of another district commissioner from 1911. Unhappy with the British use of Kipsigis people to spy for them, Arap Koilegen severely punished those who cooperated. "On one occasion we ourselves were speaking to a young headman who had incurred the displeasure of the Orgoiyot arap Koilegen," wrote the commissioner. Arap Koilegen had told the man that he would die the next day. "The man accepted the decision with fatalistic calm; going to his house, he lay down to die and news of his death reached us the following morning."

The British administration exiled Arap Koilegen to Nyeri in 1913, and he died in 1916. His influence among the Kipsigis is still felt. On March 6, 2003, more than 20,000 Kipsigis met for a cleansing ceremony at the site where his home had been burned down under the influence of the missionaries and British administrators.

Arjan

Sikh guru, hymn writer, martyr

Guru Ramdas nominated his eighteen-year-old son Arjan as the fifth Sikh guru in 1581. The most prolific writer of all the gurus, Arjan added his many compositions to the four volumes created by Guru Amardas, Guru Ramdas, and other Hindu saints of the bhakti (devotional) tradition. His systematic ordering of this mass of material in 1604 is now known as the Kartarpur Pothi. It contains, with the exception of the compositions of Guru Tegh Bahadur, the text of the Adi Granth, also called Guru Granth Sahib.

Under Guru Arjan, the Sikh community continued to flourish at the established center of Ramdaspur (the modern Amritsar, India) and expanded to more towns, including Tarn Taran, Sri Hargobindpur, and Kartarpur. Events in the Mughal Empire would soon affect the community, however, as the death of Emperor Akbar, known for his tolerance of all religions, led to the enthronement of his son Jahangir in October 1605. Less than a year later, in May 1606, Guru Arjan was called to Lahore by the new emperor and asked to swear his loyalty to the empire and the emperor. Guru Arjan refused and was subsequently tortured and killed. For the Sikh community, Guru Arjan had died the death of a martyr, refusing to renounce his faith and give his allegiance to the empire.

Building on the ideas of previous gurus, Arjan saw God as Patshah (emperor) of the Sikhs. The guru is God's representative on earth. Thus, Sikh gurus hold ultimate spiritual and temporal power. In this view, while in the spiritual realm one should give one's prayers and trust to God in return for his protection, so, too, in the worldly realm one should give one's tribute and trust to the guru, who in return gives protection from enemies. Indeed, the guru, according to Arjan, is God (par-brahm), and Sikhs were expected to remember him at all times. Thus, Sikhs were no longer looking to Lahore, the Mughal seat of power in Punjab, as their center, but rather to the Sikh seat of power at Ramdaspur.

The hymns of Guru Arjan also assign new attributes to God. He is the annihilator of the enemy (satr-dahan), the remover of misery (dukh-banjan), and the one who frees people from anxiety (achint). God, for Arjan, takes on the role as protector in both the spiritual and temporal realm, a protection that is dependent on complete submission to him.

Arnulf of Metz

Christian monk, archbishop, statesman

Well educated in letters and in Christian virtue, Arnulf of Metz was one of the few civilizing forces of his time in Western Europe. He contributed to peace within church and state, and his virtue and charity provided a role model for the people around him. His life had long-term political, as well as spiritual, consequences. Arnulf was an ancestor of the Carolingian dynasty of Frankish kings, the most famous of whom is his great-great-grandson Charlemagne.

Arnulf was born into one of the leading families of the Frankish kingdom in 582. His earliest service was at the court of King Theodebert II of Austrasia (r. 595–612), where he became the king's most trusted adviser. The priorities of Arnulf's early career mirrored that of other nobles: military pursuits and the daily tasks of administering his estates. His marriage to a Frankish noblewoman produced two sons.

Arnulf was also dedicated to serving the church and was named archbishop of Metz sometime after 611, although legend suggests that he accepted the honor reluctantly. In that position, he continued to advise the kings and to mediate in the many civil wars of that period. He became the tutor of the young King Dagobert I (r. 621–637). Archbishop Arnulf protected the rights of his flock at the royal court and acted as a conduit of royal justice to the people in his diocese. He exhibited lavish charity toward the sick and the impoverished, even to the point of performing miraculous healings and multiplications of food.

Arnulf became increasingly uneasy in his secular duties. In about 626, he resigned his bishopric and withdrew to a hermitage at Habend (the future monastery of Remiremont) in the Vosges Mountains. There he lived in solitude and prayer until his death in 641.

Having St. Arnulf as a founder of their dynasty allowed the Carolingian kings to claim "holy stock." This gave them a powerful counter (one with ecclesiastical sanction) to the "charisma of blood" on which the previous dynasty, the Merovingians, had staked their claim to the throne. Arnulf's tomb in the basilica of the Holy Apostles at Metz, which eventually took Arnulf's name, became a cult center for the family. Carolingian court historians attributed the success of their patrons in part to the virtues of their saintly ancestor. His feast day is July 18.

Artemidorus

(2nd cent. C.E.)

Ancient Greek interpreter of dreams

The place of Artemidorus in the culture of holiness is connected to the wider Greco-Roman tradition of dream interpretation. Throughout antiquity, many dreams were thought to have been sent by the gods and for this reason to possess an abiding significance for humans. The difficulty, of course, lay in ascertaining precisely which of these dreams were divine and significant. Artemidorus's Oneirocritica (Interpretation of dreams), a five-volume work written in the second century, is a critical manual outlining the nature of dreams.

Unlike the oracular fashion of dream interpretation found in the Hebrew scriptures (as practiced by Joseph and Daniel, for instance), Artemidorus's treatment was systematic. He distinguished between mere nocturnal manifestations of daytime concerns (enhyponia), complex dreams requiring symbolic analysis (oneiroi), and explicit messages from the gods (chrematismata). Furthermore, he emphasized that valid explication must account for the customs of the dreamer's native land as well as for his age, occupation, wealth, and identity. In his scientific schematization and empirical method, Artemidorus anticipated the work of Sigmund Freud and Carl Jung. For ancient readers, the Oneirocritica provided a rational means for understanding the cryptic revelations of the gods.

Aryadeva

(2nd or 3rd cent. C.E.)

In the Buddhist tradition, two Aryadevas are mentioned. One was a contemporary of Nagarjuna in the second or third century and the founder of the Madhyamaka school; the other was a practitioner of tantric Buddhism active around the seventh or the eighth century. The first Aryadeva (Tib.: 'phags pa lha; Chin.: Sheng tip; Jap.: Shodaiba) defended Nagarjuna's Madhyamaka tenets against both Buddhist and non-Buddhist opponents. He is known by such names as Kanadeva, Nilanetra, Pingalanetra, Pingalacaksuh, and Karnaripa, all names referring to the fact that he had blue eyes or was blind in one eye. He is considered to have been a descendant of a brahminical family of southern India.

Dating Aryadeva has been problematic because it is also difficult to date his teacher, Nagarjuna. Aryadeva is said to have been born either in southern India or in Ceylon. Xuanzang's Xiyuji (Travel to the western realm) and Candrakirti's commentary on Aryadeva's Catuhśataka (The four hundred) count him as a native of Ceylon who came to southern India.

Scholars disagree as to which of the works attributed to Aryadeva are authentically his. However, there is little doubt that the Catuhśataka was authored by him. This text is an early explanation of how a student may acquire the two requisites for enlightenment: the equipment (sambhara) of knowledge (jnana) and merit (punya). In this sense, the text can be understood as a precursor to Santideva's acclaimed text, the Bodhicaryavatara, which became famous through the debate of Samye.

Aryadeva, the renowned teacher of the Middle (Madhyamaka), although stabbed by a tirthika (non-Buddhist) and dying, cautioned his disciples not to pursue the murderer. Such an attitude most likely stemmed from his understanding of the nonsubstantiality of existence, that is, the way of emptiness (sunya-vada).

Asanga

(c. 4th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist monk, school founder

According to tradition, Asanga established the Yogacara (Buddhist mentalistic trend), a branch of Mahayana Buddhism in India, when he received teachings from Maitreya, who dwelt in Tushita Heaven. Because this trend focuses on the importance of the mind in human cognition, it is also known as “mind only” (cittamatra) or “consciousness only” (vijnaptimatra).

Asanga, born in the Gandara region of present-day Pakistan in the city of Purusapura (the modern Peshawar) as the third son of Prasannasila (or Prakasasila), was probably active around the fourth or fifth century. Buddhist sources tell the story of his encounter with Maitreya, which reportedly took place after Asanga spent twelve years in a cave meditating on Maitreya in the hope of meeting him. Having no luck, Asanga finally left the cave disgusted and encountered a dog infested with maggots. About to remove the worms with his hands, he saw that if he did so, the worms would perish, and that if the worms were not removed, the dog would perish. Thus, he shut his eyes and was about to remove them by using his tongue when the dog disappeared. It was at this point that Asanga beheld Maitreya. Because of Asanga's great compassion, Maitreya became his spiritual teacher (Maitreya-natha) and rewarded him with the Mahayana doctrines, now called the “Five Treatises of Maitreya.”

By means of such teachings, Asanga systematically presented the teachings of the Yogacara tradition, prescribing a graduated path (marga) of meditative praxis (yogacara), by which one attains the awakened state (bodhi).

Asanga was a prolific writer. The works attributed to him and found in the Tibetan and Chinese Buddhist canons total over twenty-one titles. Among them is a monumental encyclopedic work known as the Yogacara-bhumi-sastra. According to the Tibetan historian Bu-ston, Vasubandhu, his brother, is reported to have said this about it:

Alas, Asanga, residing in the forest
Has practiced meditation for twelve years.
Without having attained anything but this meditation,
He has founded a system so difficult and burdensome,
That it can be carried only by an elephant.
(Bu-ston 1931–1932, 2:143)

By means of these texts, Asanga systematized the Buddha's teachings into eight kinds of cognitions (vijnana), the three defining characteristics of reality (trisvabhava or trilaksana), and a system of praxis made up of the five paths (pancamarga) and the ten bodhisattva stages (dasabhumi). This tradition spread to Tibet, where it became the foundation for the Vajrayana, or Tantric, tradition, and into China, where it became the basis for the Faxiang school (zong) of Buddhism.

Ascetics as Holy People

Almost all the world religions include at least some element of asceticism, originally a Greek term that literally means “exercise.” In religious terms, the dominant element of asceticism is training, disciplining, or subduing the body, thus allowing mind and spirit to focus on higher truths without being distracted by “the world.” The most common ascetic practices are fasting, celibacy, poverty, seclusion, and rejection of home and family. Asceticism is suspect to mainstream modern Western culture, with its firm emphasis on alleviating pain as the highest good—and indeed, ascetic practices sometimes sound more like self-torture than any sort of spiritual exercise. Although abuses of asceticism can occur, stressing pain for the sake of the pain itself, as asceticism occurs among the holy people of the world it is always a tool, rather than an end in itself. Ascetic practices are rather suspect in the religions that most emphasize the goodness of the created world, such as Judaism and Islam, but even in these cases spiritual adepts have explored the value of ascetic disciplines. Perhaps the only exceptions are Zoroastrianism, which emphasizes the human’s duty to care for physical and mental health, and the Baha’i faith. Other religions, such as Jainism, have embraced asceticism as a fundamental part of any religious life, for laypeople as well as professional ascetics.

Religions differ widely over the proper level of asceticism to be allowed. Emphasis on extreme asceticism has sometimes caused reactions in splinter groups. Thus Buddhism rejected a high level of asceticism after Gautama, before becoming the Buddha, passed through six years of extreme self-abuse, nearly dying of it, and finally decided that the ascetic path could not lead him to awakening. This legend was central in creating the Buddhist Middle Path between self-indulgence and self-mortification. Monks are still held to a moderate daily routine that rejects the extremes of both hedonism and asceticism. Similarly, in Christianity cenobitic (communal) monasticism grew up in reaction to the harsh self-discipline of independent hermits of the Egyptian and Syrian deserts.

Throughout the hagiographical tradition, though, holy people have engaged in more ascetic practices than the population at large, usually proceeding two or three degrees beyond what is expected among the merely pious. Thus in Hinduism, a person must move to extremes before his or her ascetic discipline attracts comment, while among modern Protestant Christians a person who merely fasts occasionally will be worthy of note. In all cases, asceticism is based upon separation from the normal, and the goal is to liberate the practitioner from the mundane. In Hinduism, the ideal is that all men should pass through four stages of life, culminating in that of the renunciant who retires from involvement in the world as a precondition for higher spiritual development. This is also the traditional Christian ideal, and that of Neoplatonists such as Plotinus (c. 204/205–270).

Christianity has also stressed ascetic practices as penance for sin, and most notably in late antiquity and the early modern period many saints especially stood out as holy in the consciousness of the time because of their extremely austere lives of penance. Perhaps closest to this in other religions is Jainism’s belief that the soul can only be liberated by asceticism, which literally burns away accumulated karma. Islam emphasizes further than Christianity that the ascetic is opened to divine inspiration—those who purify their hearts with spiritual exercises toward this goal are an important category of holy people in Islam. In all of these traditions, ascetic practices by holy people can be an overt criticism of an overly luxurious society. The great Muslim preacher al-Hasan al-Basri (642–728), who led a frugal life as a criticism of the caliphal court, built a spiritual discipline based on contempt for worldly goods. Asceticism can be an even more direct weapon, as when Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) fasted to end the civil war in postcolonial India, or in the legend that Patrick of Ireland “fasted against God,” refusing to eat for forty days until he had won major concessions for the people of Ireland.

In some religions, extreme asceticism is believed to bring clearly manifest powers to the practitioner. In both Hinduism and Jainism, the sadhus (renunciants) are believed by their austerity and meditation to develop spiritual and even magical powers—a belief in the efficacy of asceticism that goes back to at least 1500 B.C.E. Tapas (Hindu asceticism) literally means “heat,” a creative heat that is generated to elevate the ascetic beyond normal human experience. This force can be stored up, making great ascetics, such as Gorakhnath (c. 1200), great miracle workers. Many Hindu stories tell of gods trying to prevent ascetics from gaining too much power, usually by trying to seduce holy people or make them angry. This is a very different notion from the Christian belief that asceticism, above all, tames the body, and is based on a very different relationship between body and soul that does not reject the world as tempting or evil. Especially striking is that in Hinduism, the intent of temptation is not to damn the subject but to lower him or her to the status of everyday humanity. Japanese legend tells that En no Ozunu (late seventh to early eighth centuries), founder of the Japanese cult of mountain-worship, mastered magical practices by retreating to a mountain and there practicing asceticism. Often the “magical powers” of such ascetic holy people includes access to divine secrets. This linkage of asceticism and hidden knowledge also occurs in an early strand of Jewish mysticism (seventh to eleventh centuries) called markavah (chariot) mysticism. A strict ascetic and contemplative regime, it was believed, could make the practitioner a “chariot rider,” able to ascend like Ezekiel to heaven in a fiery chariot and then return to earth to tell its secrets.

The most common form of asceticism is fasting, either denying oneself food completely for more or less extended periods or restricting oneself to a very limited diet. Often holy people eat only bread and water, or only vegetable products (like the Pythagoreans), or they may reject wine; in the case of Hinduism, advanced yogis live only on milk. Historically, holy people have sometimes practiced fasting to the point of death. Indeed, in Jainism, one of the highest ideals is self-starvation. Christianity also admires such extreme fasting, but with a twist: Hagiographers admire extremely ascetic saints but often introduce an element of divine warning that makes them behave with more moderation. Thus the sixth-century Irish abbess Íte, in legend, practiced extreme fasting and refused to ease her discipline even when an angel told her not to be so hard on herself—finally, the angel forced her. Thus, she was able to have her cake and eat it, too: The spiritual longing was clearly presented for admiration, but the saint was able to survive to play a continuing role in the world. Legends of holy people delighting in astonishing feats of self-denial should be taken more as evidence of popular attitudes toward asceticism than as literal truth. Thus, a number of Christian female mystics of the later Middle Ages are reported to have lived on nothing but the consecrated eucharistic elements. The Indian sufi Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar (1175–1265) practiced a forty-day retreat, fasting—and hanging upside down in a well—for the entire time. And Jain tirthankaras (ford-makers) such as Mahavira (c. 500 B.C.E.) were so attuned to the spiritual world that they no longer needed to eat at all.

Choice of clothing is also recognized as an ascetic discipline. Most notable in this respect are the naked, or “air-clothed” (digambara), ascetics of India, both Hindu and Jain. They are completely subject to the elements, demonstrating in this way their conquest of passion. It should be noted that this has been almost completely a male prerogative. One of the few holy women who went naked was the twelfth-century Mahadeviyakka, who was at first criticized for such unfemale behavior, but she proved her spiritual status to a tribunal of holy men. Lesser Hindu ascetics wear a loincloth as a symbol of renunciation. In societies where clothing marks status, to attire oneself as a beggar is an act of deep renunciation, as in the case of Gangamata Goswami (eighteenth century), who gave up his rule of Bengal, including fine clothes and jewelry. For many holy people, setting themselves apart from secular society with special clothing is the starting point of holiness. For example, the robes of Buddhist monks were originally made of rags sewn together, as was the habit of Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226)—who began his religious life by stripping off all his clothes and returning them to his father. Roman Catholic monks and nuns until the 1960s wore special clothing, and sufis wear a distinctive wool garment, the khirqa (Arabic “rag”), which symbolizes sufi rejection of the world. It should be noted, however, that some holy people have repudiated the idea of special clothing as a path to holiness. As the Indian poet-saint Kabir (c. 1450–1518) said, if it is possible to gain release from the world by going without clothes, the deer in the forest would be the first to attain it.

Filth has a strong attraction for holy ascetics, again as a rejection of the comforts of the world and as a sign that they have indeed managed to rise above the human condition. At least part of the awed admiration in which odoriferous ascetics were held must have arisen from amazement that a person could voluntarily subject himself or herself to such conditions, and even seem to enjoy it. For example, it is said of the Muslim ascetic Ibrahim b. Adham (c. 730–777 or 790) that one of the three times he was really happy was when he looked at the fur cloak he was wearing and couldn’t tell where the fur ended and the lice began, there were so many. Hindu ascetics leave their hair long and matted; Christian saint Benedict of Aniane rejected bathing as an improper luxury. The prevalence of such unhygienic saints incline one to redefine the “odor of sanctity.” Again, though, practice is not consistent. The dirty holy person has no place in Judaism, for example, a religion that places great emphasis on personal hygiene as a reflection of divine purity.

Still other ascetics have deliberately inflicted pain upon themselves through beatings, forced wakefulness, binding and wearing of chains, and even self-mutilation. An important Hindu ascetic practice is the five-fire penance, where one sits in the heat of the sun all day surrounded by four fires. This seems equivalent to the practice, in colder climes, of standing in cold water up to the neck while reciting psalms. In general, though, Christian holy people appear to have specialized more than those of other religions in purposeful infliction of pain. Tales of the desert hermits are replete with accounts of saints who refused to lie down to sleep or who abused themselves in other ways. Such extreme asceticism revived in other periods. For example, the tenth and eleventh centuries saw several saints who wore metal breastplates, or chains wrapped so tightly around their bodies that they grew into the flesh, and so on. The hair shirt, a garment of rough goat- or horsehair that irritates the skin, is a uniquely Christian ascetic device. In all these cases, the purpose of pain was to discipline the body, making it conform to the longings of the soul.

Sometimes the infliction of pain is considered part of a special trial to prove one's ability to enter upon a deeply religious life. This theme is especially common in Buddhism, which tells admiringly of the Chan master Yang-shan Hui-chi (c. 810–c. 887), who chopped off two fingers to prove to his parents how determined he was to become a monk, and the second Chan patriarch Hui-k'ō (487–593), who cut off his left arm to show his serious intent when Bodhidharma at first refused to accept him as a disciple. Bodhidharma (d. 530) himself meditated motionless for so long that his legs fell off, and he is said to have cut off his eyelids so he would not fall asleep—legend says that a tea plant sprang from the ground where he threw his eyelids down, and that tea's ability to prevent sleep is a special gift of this holy man. Similar to Bodhidharma is the tale of the Ethiopian Christian Takla Haymanot (d. 1313), who prayed standing for so many years that one of his legs broke and came loose from his body. Another extreme case of initiatory mutilation is that of Naropa (956–1040), who became a great Buddhist tantric master. His master, Tilopa, was at first unwilling to accept Naropa as a disciple and only agreed after Naropa passed a series of painful tests, including crushing his penis between two rocks. Controlled self-injury is also important to Amerindian religious traditions, ranging from the auto-sacrifice (bleeding oneself from the ears, tongue, or penis) of Mesoamerican rulers and priests to the Plains Indians' practice of scarifying their flesh in ritual prayer, an ascetic method especially pronounced in the visionary Sitting Bull.

Leaving the familiar world as an ascetic practice can take a variety of forms, including leaving home to join a monastic community or become an independent hermit, adopting a permanently wandering lifestyle, or adopting very restricted living conditions. In the last category fall the Christian recluses, walled up in a single cell for life, and the stylite ("pillar-sitting") saints, who practiced the astonishing ascetic feat of living sometimes for decades sitting on top of a pillar. In the Christian case, the more extreme the renunciation, the more fame the practitioner could win in the popular eye. For example, thousands came to the first great pillar-saint, Simeon Stylites (c. 390–459) for advice and blessing, and such great recluses as Wiborada (d. 926) and the fourteenth-century Julian of Norwich (c. 1343–after 1419) won a very high spiritual status even though they were women. Less extreme forms of separation from the familiar can include pilgrimage to holy places or temporary periods of retreat for prayer and contemplation.

Two of the most productive manifestations of the ascetic wandering of holy people in world history have been the Irish practice of peregrinatio in the early Middle Ages and the centuries-long Buddhist quest for holy texts. Irish peregrinatio, ascetic homelessness, was above all an ascetic practice: Like Abraham, the practitioner gave up home and family and, trusting in God, went wherever God might direct them. Starting in the sixth century, accounts tell of zealous monks setting out to sea in small boats with neither oars nor rudders; survivors came to shore in other parts of Ireland, Iceland, England, or on the European Continent. The highest ideal of peregrinatio is expressed in the legend of Brendan the Navigator (c. 486–575), who sailed with a crew of monks on a long quest for the Isles of the Blessed, and may have reached North America in the process. But this ascetic ideal also produced considerable numbers of more practical monks (and a few nuns), who moved with their communities to Scotland, England, and many other countries of Europe. Once they settled, many of these monks, such as Columbanus (543–615) and the followers of Colum Cille (521–597), found themselves increasingly active as missionaries, playing an important role in the spread of Christianity throughout northern Europe. In a reversed case, asceticism was the by-product of Buddhist ventures abroad to find and copy holy texts or to study under the Buddhist masters in more spiritually advanced lands. Buddhist holy men often underwent great hardship, besides the alienation of leaving family, land, and native language for extended periods, in pursuit of this goal.

Usually religious traditions speak in favor even of extreme asceticism, recognizing ascetic practices as something that marks out a person of superior determination, resolve, and closeness to the divine (without which they could never persist in their severe self-discipline). A shocking number of Christian saints appear to have cut their lives short with their austerities; the number of saints who died in young adulthood, especially in the sixteenth through the eighteenth centuries, a period that valued great asceticism, suggests that the rigor of the saints undermined the health of many. This result produced an anti-ascetic reaction. Philip Neri (1515–1595), for example, advocated care for others rather than abuse of self, and once gave a layman permission to wear a hair shirt—but only over his regular clothes. Protestant reformers in general also denounced asceticism. Earlier periods, too, saw statements that asceticism could be carried too far. For example, Paula (347–404) lived such an ascetic life in Rome that one of her daughters died of it. Her spiritual adviser, Jerome, was driven out of town for his advocacy of such rigor. But it should be noted that both Paula and Jerome are venerated as Christian saints—Jerome most often appears in Christian art pummeling his bare chest with a stone. The power of ascetics to astonish the general populace has over the centuries and around the world been an important tool that brings people to listen to the messages of holy people.

Ashoka

(3rd cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist emperor

Ashoka, a famous Buddhist emperor of third-century B.C.E. India, is also known by the names Devanampiya (Darling of the gods) and Piyadassin (Kind-looking). In the history of Buddhism he is generally ranked in importance second only to Shakyamuni Buddha. Ashoka's father, King Bindusara, disliked him because of his ugly appearance. It took a long time for him to win his father's attention. After he proved his statesmanship by quelling a rebellion, he was appointed governor of Avanti province. Later, when Bindusara was dying, Ashoka came to the capital, Pataliputra, and declared himself king. This seems to have resulted in a protracted civil war. But three years later, after killing other claimants to the throne, he managed to get himself anointed as the king.

Initially, he had a malicious and impetuous nature and became notorious as Candashoka (Ashoka the Ferocious). However, as he himself points out in one of his inscriptions, a turning point came in his life after he waged a war against the kingdom of Kalinga. The death and destruction that he witnessed here made him so remorseful that he gave up war. Thereafter, he completely devoted himself to the work of dharma (Buddhist doctrine) and became known as Dharmashoka (Ashoka the Righteous). According to another tradition, his heart changed after he met a young Buddhist monk in his prison where individuals were randomly tortured and killed. He found this monk seemingly immune to all the sufferings inflicted upon him. Tremendously impressed by this, Ashoka converted to Buddhism, destroyed the prison, and undertook the meritorious task of building 84,000 stupas (shrines) across the empire.

Ashoka is also credited with sending Buddhist missionaries to different countries and patronizing the Third Buddhist Council. Some scholars think that he may have even become a Buddhist monk or donned the robe of a monk for some time. Through his edicts and rock inscriptions engraved on cliff faces and stone pillars, he set forth policies of righteous kingship. These policies were based upon active social concern, religious tolerance, nonviolence, ecological awareness, and animal welfare.

According to the Divyavadana (a collection of moral stories), toward the end of Ashoka's life his ministers became so much alarmed by his generosity to the Buddhist samgha (monastic community) that for fear of the state treasury being depleted they deprived him of all powers. He then began to give away his personal wealth, but even that was restricted. Destitute and powerless, in the end he was left with nothing but half of a myrobalan fruit. Even this he sent to the samgha as his final offering. Thereafter, having comprehended the vagaries of kingship, he passed away with a serene mind.

Askew, Anne

Protestant Christian martyr

A Protestant martyr born in 1521, Anne was the youngest daughter of Sir William Askew of Lincolnshire, England. As a young woman, she married the Catholic gentleman Thomas Kyme of Friskney. The pious Anne alienated her husband when she formally converted to Protestantism. Forced to leave his home, she went to London, where she became associated with the court of Katherine Parr (1512–1548), sixth wife of Henry VIII (1509–1547), a known Protestant sympathizer. It was most likely this association that caused Anne to be arrested and interrogated.

Anne was examined regarding her heretical beliefs, particularly regarding the doctrine of transubstantiation (the Catholic belief that the eucharistic bread and wine physically becomes the body and blood of Christ), which Anne refused to accept. She was harshly questioned and released three times. These initial releases may have been due to Anne's influential friends, including the queen's sister and several other suspected Protestants. Anne revealed nothing. On June 29, 1546, Anne was once again arrested and charged with heresy. This time her interrogators tortured her on the rack. Anne refused to recant her beliefs, or to incriminate anyone else, and eventually she was sentenced to death. Shortly before the sentence was to be carried out, several of Anne's fellow prisoners accused her of recanting. She vigorously denied this and spent most of her final days composing a denial of the false reports. On July 16, Anne refused a last-minute pardon from the king. She was burned at the stake along with three other accused heretics. By all accounts, Anne was so weak from prison and torture that she had to be carried to the stake tied to a chair.

Anne's martyrdom is historically significant because she wrote two accounts of her tribulations while imprisoned. These texts, entitled The First Examynacyon and The Lattre Examynacyon, were significant spiritual autobiographies. The Protestant bishop John Bale (1495–1563), who also wrote an extensive and inflammatory commentary, immediately published them as a testimony of faith, and Anne became a centerpiece of his "reformed martyrology." Similarly, John Foxe (1516–1587), in his Actes and Monuments (1563), retold Anne's story. It was in this form that Anne Askew became a household name. By the 1800s, almost every English home possessed a copy of Foxe's work.

Anne is also an important presence in early modern literary scholarship. Of course, her writings portray the state of doctrinal struggles in the mid-sixteenth century. However, her autobiographical writings, in which she details her interrogations, also illustrate the importance of biblical learning for women. In her sessions with the examiners, Anne used her extensive knowledge of scripture to confront the male hierarchy of church and state. Specifically, her rhetorical style reflects her biblical studies and the influence of Protestant sermons. Interestingly, Anne never denies the charges brought against her; rather, she argues against them, incorporating scripture when necessary. The rapid dissemination of her story and the many editions it went through are excellent examples of the impact of the printing press.

Asklepios

Ancient Greek hero, healer, god

An ancient Greek hero renowned for healing arts, eventually worshipped as a god in Greece and later throughout the Roman world, Asklepios (Latin: Aesculapius) was believed to be the son of the god Apollo, also renowned for healing. Details regarding his birth and homeland vary. The chief sanctuary of Asklepios was at Epidaurus, still famous for its theater. Other important sanctuaries were located at Athens, Kos, Knidos, Pergamum, and Rome. Healing usually occurred through a process known as "incubation." Asleep in a special room (the abaton), the devotee was visited in a dream by Asklepios, who would prescribe a cure. His success made him the most popular god of the Hellenistic age, invoked by the epithet "Savior." In artistic representations, Asklepios resembles a kindly version of Zeus. His symbols included the snake, often depicted entwined around a staff, and the dog. The most common sacrifice offered to Asklepios was the cock, famously attested by Socrates at the end of Plato's Phaedo (118a).

Homer referred to Asklepios as a mortal, the "blameless physician" (Iliad 4.405). According to the most popular myth, recounted by Hesiod, Pindar, and others, Asklepios was the offspring of Apollo and Coronis, a mortal woman who proved unfaithful to the god. Enraged, Apollo killed her, but he managed to pull the infant Asklepios from her womb as she lay on her funeral pyre. The boy was raised by the centaur Chiron, who taught him his healing arts. Asklepios became so great a healer that in time he could revive the dead. This Zeus could not tolerate, and so he killed Asklepios with a thunderbolt. Apollo got Zeus to transform him into a constellation, and so Asklepios became a god.

Later tradition attributes to Asklepios a wife, Epione, and five daughters, including Hygieia (a personification of health). His descendants were thought to include the Asklepiades, physicians who practiced primarily at the sanctuaries of Knidos and Kos. The latter was home of Hippocrates, the most famous of the Asklepiades.

Asma'u Fodiyo, Nana

Muslim teacher, scholar, poet

Asma'u bint Uthman dan Fodiyo, born in 1793, was a daughter of Shehu Uthman dan Fodiyo, leader of the Sokoto Jihad of West Africa. Asma'u is known by her honorific, Nana. A teacher, scholar, and poet, Asma'u was a legend in her own time and continues to inspire contemporary Muslim women, who cite her as a positive example of a woman who pursued an education, addressed social issues, and fulfilled her intellectual talents. As a member of the Fulani Fodiyo clan, Asma'u was a Sunni Muslim of the Qadiriyyah sufi order whose precepts defined her life and values.

As a child Asma'u spent time with her mother's co-wives, Aisha and Hauwa, who taught her ascetic practices and devotion to spiritual concerns. Everyone in the family was expected to make something useful, so young Asma'u understood that helping with the domestic tasks was part of her spiritual obligation. She was also trained in the classical canon of Islamic texts, beginning with the Qur'an, which she memorized, earning for her the title hafiza. She learned to speak four languages (Arabic, Fulfulde, Hausa, and Tamchek), and she wrote poetry in the first three of these. Indeed, she eventually became an accomplished poet, scholar, and beloved teacher. Her reputation extended beyond the region and into the scholarly circles of the Maghreb.

Asma'u played a major role in the transformation of the Hausa-Fulani social order following the upheaval wrought by the jihad that her father had led. She accomplished this by organizing female extension teachers known as jajis to instruct rural women students, or 'yan taru. These women memorized Asma'u's poems as aids for teaching Islamic precepts to refugee and rural women and instructing them in how to live pious lives. Asma'u's sixty-one long poetic works address a wide range of topics, including attention to the Qur'an, divine truth, sufi women saints, signs of the day of judgment, the prophet Muhammad, jihad battles, and eulogies for revered individuals. Asma'u died in 1864, but her simple precept, "Go home and instruct your relatives," is still spoken by her descendants, who teach her songs to jajis and 'yan taru today.

As a Qadiriyyah sufi, Asma'u advocated attention to the higher things, aiming to live in the world without becoming attached to it. However, she is remembered as a teacher and friend to rural women living on the margins of society. Her tomb in Sokoto, Nigeria, remains a place of pilgrimage.

Astrology

The heavens were observed and mapped by a wide range of ancient peoples, from the Maya to the Chinese, but astrology as it has come down to the West dates to the Assyrians and Babylonians, and, in particular, to a group of Babylonian priests called Chaldeans. These early Mesopotamian astronomers named seven heavenly bodies that were visible to them without telescopes, determined their courses, and assigned meanings to their placement in the sky. In the Assyrian order, they were the Moon, the Sun, Jupiter, Venus, Saturn, Mercury, and Mars; their Akkadian names, however, were different: For example, Jupiter was Marduk. When the Greeks and Romans adopted and adapted Babylonian astrological practice, they changed these names to reflect their own mythologies, and it is the Greek and Roman names that are still used today.

The West was dimly aware of Chaldean astrology before the conquests of Alexander the Great, but it is afterward, during the Hellenistic age, that astrology moved into the Mediterranean basin as part of an extensive cultural exchange. It was considered a technology—a science—and the same Latin word (mathematicus) meant mathematician, astronomer, and astrologer. Astrologers themselves were viewed as one of two types: the crackpot or the professional. Among their ranks, one might find academicians, priests, members of the aristocracy, and even a Roman emperor or two (Tiberius and Hadrian). Yet for every Tiberius or Claudius Ptolemy who practiced astrology, there was a Cicero or Tacitus who disclaimed it (for example, Cicero's On Divination). Skeptics did exist, but they were typically skeptics of the practitioners, not of the practice itself.

Greco-Roman horoscopes were cast in the square (not round), and their primary function was predictive, not as a tool for psychological insight (a modern perspective). Because of this, ancient astrology came under repeated fire, and astrologers were occasionally expelled from Rome by governmental edict. Knowledge of the future might allow one to gain control over it, or at least to exploit developments by anticipating them, and that could lead to trouble, even treason. Like many forms of divination, astrology was later outlawed by the Christian church. Knowledge of the future, it was believed, should belong to God alone.

Athanasius

Christian bishop, theologian

Bishop of Alexandria from 328 until his death in 373, except for periods of exile from 356 to 361, Athanasius was one of the most influential ecclesiastical leaders and theologians of fourth-century Egyptian Christianity. His written works elucidate the complexities of doctrinal controversies with the Arians, Apollinarians, and Meletians of his day and should be situated further within the broader context of the imperial affairs of Constantine, Constantius, Julian, and Valens. Athanasius's tumultuous episcopal career as overseer of one of the largest Christian communities of the Roman Empire was coupled with a piety shaped by his encounters with urban and desert monasticism.

Little is known about Athanasius's early years. He was born sometime between 295 and 299 in Alexandria to a family of modest means and received a primarily Christian education. In 311, he became deacon to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, a staunch opponent of Arius, a presbyter in the local church who had gained wide support from various bishops in the eastern part of the Roman Empire for his view that, as a created being, Jesus Christ was subordinate to God the Father. Arius and his followers were denounced at the Council of Nicea (325), which produced and effected a creedal statement claiming that Jesus Christ and God the Father were of the same substance or essence (homoousios).

After Alexander's death in 328, Athanasius became bishop of Alexandria in a hotly contested election and emerged as the principal spokesperson for the Nicene position in theological debates fueled by the council. Noteworthy in this regard are his Orations against the Arians (339/340), which impressed upon its audiences the soteriological significance of the incarnation, namely, that the salvation of humanity required the full divinity of Christ, and the challenge posed by the contemporary views of a fellow anti-Arian bishop, Apollinarus of Laodicea, regarding the lack of a human will and intellect in Jesus Christ. In addition, his role in a synod at Alexandria (362), and his correspondence with his colleague and ally Bishop Serapion of Thmuis, are evidence that he extended his views to incorporate the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

Athanasius sought the allegiance of the urban and desert monastic communities in and around Alexandria in his struggles to rid the region of infiltrating Arian and Meletian influences. Sizable in number and in impact on the non-monastic Christian population, both types of monks proved significant allies or foes to these competing theological factions. There is considerable evidence that Athanasius worked hard to ensure that the urban monks in the local churches in Alexandria were brought under his episcopal governance. His Letter to Dracontius and his Letter to Amoun, a lengthy period of exile spent in hiding with groups of desert monks (356–361), and identifiable contact with several prominent monks, such as Antony of Egypt, betray his concern to do the same with those in the desert monastic communities surrounding Alexandria. Athanasius's authorship of the mid-fourth-century Christian hagiography, the Life of Antony, with its emphasis on the salvific end of Christ's incarnation and its strong anti-Arian and anti-Meletian teachings, is often cited as additional support of these efforts.

Athanasius was restored as bishop of Alexandria several years before his death on May 2, 373. His thought continues to inform studies in Christian theology and church history.

Atisha (Dipamkara)

(982–1054 C.E.)

Mahayana Buddhist scholar, reformer

Atisha was an Indian Mahayana Buddhist scholar-saint who revitalized Buddhism in Tibet during the early eleventh century. According to Tibetan tradition, Atisha was born in western Bengal of a royal family in 982. He was considered a prodigy, mastering Sanskrit and other literary skills at a young age. From his youth he was said to be guarded and influenced by the goddess Tara, perhaps an indication of the Tantric practices and affiliations he may have had in his adolescent years. He took monastic vows at the age of twenty-nine in a monastery at Bodhgaya, the site of the Buddha's enlightenment. Atisha mastered the monastic curriculum of his time, studying, among other topics, ethics (vinaya), logic and epistemology (pramaa), and Middle Way philosophy (Madhyamaka).

In addition to these lineages of teaching available in India in the eleventh century, Atisha traveled to Indonesia and studied there for twelve years under the Mahayana Buddhist master Dharmakirti-sri. From this master, he received the quintessential oral transmission lineage known as lojong (Tib.: blo sbyong), "training the mind." This lineage, emphasizing cultivation of love and compassion, fused with his emphasis on cultivating the "thought intent on enlightenment" (Skt.: bodhicitta), would become Atisha's greatest contribution to Indian and Tibetan Buddhism.

Atisha was invited to Tibet to revive and reform the Buddhist teachings that had been diminished by the persecutions of the anti-Buddhist Tibetan king Lang Darma. Although warned by his patron deity, Tara, that traveling to Tibet would shorten his life, Atisha proceeded with the journey. His arrival in western Tibet in 1042 is regarded as one of the greatest events in the history of Tibetan Buddhism.

His contribution to Tibetan Buddhism is best exemplified in his composition of the Bodhi-patha-pradipa (Lamp for the path to enlightenment), a manual that indicates the "gradual stages to enlightenment" (lam-rim), instructional lineages of the profound view of emptiness, and the vast deeds of practice. Atisha indicates that the best religious life is that of a celibate Mahayana monk who diligently adheres to the monastic code and follows the gradual path to enlightenment for the benefit of all beings. His instructions and influence led to the founding of the Kadampa order, the first school of Buddhism in Tibet. Atisha died in 1054 at Nye-thang (snye-thang) just south of Lha-sa, where his relics are enshrined in a temple.

Atta-Essou

Diola legendary prophet

According to Diola oral traditions, Atta-Essou had neither a father nor a mother but was created by the Supreme Being, Emitai, and was the first person to live in the Huluf/Esulalu region of southwestern Senegal. He reportedly founded the Diola township of Eloudia and created a number of spirit shrines (ukine) that are still used by the Diola today. The first in a long line of prophets that includes at least fifty-four followers of the Diola religious path (awasena), he was primarily concerned with praying for rain, fertility, and the general welfare of the community.

The Diola number over half a million people and include the largest number of practitioners of an indigenous religion in Senegal. Rural Diola earn their living largely from the cultivation of rice and are generally regarded as the finest rice farmers in West Africa. Rain is important to them because it brings life to their rice paddies and allows them to survive in a region where droughts are common.

Atta-Essou's home, Eloudia, was initially populated by people known as Koonjaen, a type of Bainouk. When the people known today as the Diola conquered them, Eloudia became a Diola township and its traditions of prophetic revelation became part of a Diola tradition. The Diola believe that Emitai gave Atta-Essou the power to control a number of different spirit shrines for prayer. These included Egol, the primary spirit shrine of the Koonjaen priest-king, and Djoenenandé, an important royal spirit shrine for Huluf and Esulalu.

Atta-Essou had thirty-nine sons. His descendants became the priest-kings (oeyi) of many Diola Esulalu and Huluf communities. It is said that Atta-Essou did not die but fashioned wings out of palm fronds and flew up to Emitai. His name literally means "of bird" or "birdlike" and refers to that event. To this day, it is thought that his descendants do not die but are only "lost."

The Diola believe that Atta-Essou continues to reveal himself to his descendants in their dreams, providing important instruction about the spirit shrines that he left to them. In recognition of these ongoing revelations, they created a spirit shrine, also known as Atta-Essou, that was abandoned after World War I. Two of his descendants, Aberman Manga of Kadjinol and Djemelenecone Diatta of Kolobone, also became prophets of Emitai. These descendants are not "lost" but returned to the heavens to be with Emitai.

'Attar, Farid al-Din

Shi'i Muslim sufi, poet

Farid al-Din Muhammad ibn Ibrahim Ishaq kadhkani, known as Farid al-Din 'Attar, or simply 'Attar (which literally means "pharmacist"), was born in eastern Iran near the modern city of Nayshabur. Although he is believed to have lived a very long life, his attributed birth and death dates (c. 1117–c. 1231) are highly speculative. He lived through the Mongol invasion of Persia but continued his studies in sufism and Islamic sciences with a number of masters. The most notable of his teachers was Najm al-Din Kobra, the founder of the Kubrawiyyah sufi order. Although 'Attar's sufi affiliation is not known, it is most likely this order that he identified with because its spiritual genealogy is traced to the eighth imam of the Shi'ites, who is buried in Mashhad, near the city of Nayshabur.

Although 'Attar was an erudite man who was learned in philosophy, theology, and other Islamic sciences, he was better known for his poetic genius. It was through this mode of expression that he was able to write commentaries upon a wide range of subjects. A number of his works were destroyed during the Mongol invasion of Persia; however, those that have survived provide encyclopedic knowledge of the intellectual sciences of his time. 'Attar's major achievements are his extensive commentaries on the spiritual path, his warnings against the dangers and pitfalls of mysticism, his specific guidance on ascetic practices, and his illustration of the states and stations of wisdom. He treats these themes poetically throughout his numerous works.

Within the context of sufism, 'Attar's work discusses a number of philosophical problems, such as how multiplicity came from unity, the ineffability of the knowledge of God and divine attributes, and the true function of the intellect. 'Attar's ingenious contribution lies in his imaginative use of the symbolism of animals in order to elaborate upon a wide range of philosophical problems. Speaking from the perspective of birds and other animals, he turns the world into a grand theater where humans, animals, and nature interact, with the ultimate purpose being the discovery of the sense of unity.

Twenty-four of 'Attar's works have survived. Of these, the most important is Mantiq al-tayr (Language of the birds), a book of poetry that treats the philosophical problem of how multiplicity came from unity. Relying on allegory, 'Attar speaks through a group of birds who wanted to find the archetypal bird, the griffin (simurgh, literally meaning "thirty birds"). Through a long and arduous journey, they realize that unity was within them and that the search for truth in the external world is futile. Also important is the Musibat Namah (Treatise on tragedy), which gives an account of the spiritual journey of a seeker who ascends to different domains of reality and discusses the mysteries of the spiritual path, with the heavens and the earth, celestial beings, and the inhabitants of hell and heaven. The seeker meets the prophets and discusses the best path toward salvation with them. Written in Persian, it is one of the most exquisite examples of Persian literature.

Attributes of Holy People

Most religions, at least the more popular and folk elements within them, credit holy people with special "marks" that prove their holiness to anyone with the wit to discern the signs. Belief in such significant attributes as markers of holiness has gone in and out of fashion at various times; for example, in the case of Christianity most medieval people assumed visible signs of sanctity, but the Protestant denominations for the most part turned against the notion of such manifest imprints of holiness. Nevertheless, there are examples of such belief in every major world religion—at least in individual cases, and sometimes as a central identifier.

Legends around the world tell of holy people born under specially auspicious circumstances. In Christianity, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam, tales are prominent of mothers of saints who dreamt that they were bearing a star, a flowering tree, a sun, or, in the case of Shakyamuni Buddha, even a white elephant, who entered the mother's womb when she conceived. Jain legend reports that Mahavira's mother, Trisala, had a series of fourteen dreams before his birth, the portents of a great teacher. The mother of the Greek holy man Apollonius of Tyana (d. c. 120 C.E.) had a vision of the god Proteus just before she gave birth. Legends of Muhammad tell that a light radiated from his mother's womb—the first sign of his future greatness. Some holy people are even believed to have been conceived asexually. Not only Jesus but several other Christian holy people, such as Kentigern (d. 612), were believed to be the products of a virgin birth, or at least a nonsexual union similar to that of the Virgin Mary, who conceived “through the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 1:18). The Daoist Wang Zhe (1112–1170) was conceived after his mother had a dream; she finally gave birth after a pregnancy that lasted twenty-four months. And the Buddhist master Padmasambhava (eighth and ninth centuries) was miraculously born from a lotus.

Although most holy people have been born in the usual way, at certain periods various religions have emphasized miraculous qualities attending the process of birth, at least for the greatest holy people. Thus, Irish legend very often describes the birth of saints as painless to their mothers—the baby just slides out unexpectedly. Perhaps most impressive is the birth of Shakyamuni Buddha: According to Buddhist legend, his mother, Maya, gave birth standing up, with her arm against a tree. The baby stepped out of her side, took three steps, and proclaimed his greatness. Holy people are sometimes specially protected after birth, too. For example, the first dalai lama, Gendun drubpa (1391–1474), was protected from robbers on the night of his birth by a miraculous raven. When the future rebel and holy man Nat Turner (c. 1800–1831) was born, his mother tried to strangle him with the umbilical cord—his survival “proved” that he was marked by God for special service.

Most dogmatic in the belief that a holy person is born with certain physical markers of holiness are the Jains and Buddhists. Buddhism has identified eighty features of beauty and birthmarks that signify a buddha, and lesser “superior beings” also have some of the markers. These features vary from list to list, but in general a Buddhist holy person is recognizable thanks to a perfectly formed body, elegance in movement, and a melodic voice. Beyond that, the person will have auspicious signs on their palms and on the soles of their feet. Thus, for example, accounts of the Shakyamuni Buddha at birth vary, but he is supposed to have had thirty-two major marks, and eighty minor ones, always including wheel symbols on his hands and feet, a protuberance on the crown of his head, and a circle of hair between the eyebrows. A wise person can recognize such signs; thus, when a wise old brahmin saw the signs on the infant Siddhartha’s (the future Buddha) body, he predicted that the child would become either a world emperor or a buddha and world savior. Similarly, all Jain tirthankaras (ford-makers) have fragrant breath; their skin doesn’t get dirty, their blood is milky white, they are never ill, they do not need to eat or excrete, and the weather and the people around them are always pleasant. Although these physical attributes are less fixed in other religions, the legend of Muhammad tells that he was born with a raised oval birthmark between his shoulder blades, the “seal of prophethood.”

There are very few ugly saints. Whatever the religion, legends report personal beauty as one of the most common characteristics of the holy person. It is rare to find a saint who is small and unimpressive. Nevertheless, there are a few who stand out, such as Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226); Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) also disappointed many people at first sight. Most Hindu saints are described as beautiful, however; indeed, personal beauty forms a central attribute of holy people in Hinduism. Jagadbandhu (1871–1921), for example, was called Sundar (Beautiful One).

Instead of emphasizing personal beauty, several religions stress extraordinary physical characteristics. A good example of this is the Persian giant Artachaeës, who accompanied Xerxes on his march into Greece in 480 B.C.E. Artachaeës was reputed to be eight feet tall, with the loudest voice in Persia. He died on the march, but by Herodotus’s time the locals where he was buried worshipped him as a demigod. Other physical claims for holy people include invulnerability to injury and pain. This is particularly evident in early Christianity, which produced many stories telling of martyrs who felt no pain while undergoing ghastly tortures. This tradition had an interesting resurgence in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, when a variety of holy people claimed to be immune from bullets. Thus the Fiji holy man Sadiri in 1873 claimed to be immune from the bullets of European attackers and positioned himself in the front line in battle—he was subsequently shot. More successfully, the Amerindian chief and holy man Geronimo (1829–1909) was regarded as invulnerable to bullets thanks to the special protection of spiritual forces.

There are also qualities of mind and spirit that are common to holy people around the world, though the exact standards are less consistent than they are for physical beauty. These include eloquence, intelligence, strength, courage, and longevity. Of these, probably the least important is strength. Although it is an attribute of ancient Greco-Roman heroes, Amerindian legendary figures, and some African rulers, other religions have not usually emphasized physical strength as a characteristic of their holy people—preferring, perhaps, to emphasize qualities of mind over those of body, or the reliance of the human being on God’s strength.

Courage is a particularly universal quality. In Hindu belief, with spiritual enlightenment one has the ability to speak and act without fear. This is an essential feature of the holy person as a teacher of morals and as someone who goes beyond the accepted norms of a society. All religions have their martyrs—who would not be martyrs if they had not stood up courageously for what they believed in, even though they expected to die for it. It is rare in hagiography even to find an admission of fear that the holy person is able to surmount; in general, courage is regarded as a natural corollary of holiness. Similarly, it is rare to find an unintelligent holy person; normally, holy people are noted for quick wits, and often for stupendous learning. They sometimes impress people with their skill in speaking. For example, the Hindu Manikavacakar's (c. 650–715) name means “ruby-worded,” and the Christian John Chrysostom (349–407) was so eloquent that he was given his nickname of “golden-mouthed.” Perhaps less eloquent holy people inspired less veneration. Holy people also model other virtues, such as obedience and conscientiousness. Rahula (c. fifth century B.C.E.), the son of the Buddha, is a good example of this principle.

Another common attribute, especially of the scholar-holy person, is longevity; with surprising frequency, legend credits sages with living 120 years—in such diverse cases as Moses, the Jewish sage Johanan ben Zakkai (first century C.E.), the Christian Romuald of Ravenna (eleventh century C.E.), and the Buddha's cousin Ananda (c. fifth to fourth centuries B.C.E.). Some made it even longer: The Jew Serah Bet Asher (c. 1300 B.C.E.), in legend, lived for millennia, as did the Buddhist Padmasambhava (eighth and ninth centuries C.E.), who played an important role in introducing Buddhism to Tibet—indeed, some believe that both are still alive. Similarly, especially in medieval legend, the evangelist John never died, while the Bible reports that the prophet Elijah (ninth century B.C.E.) was taken up bodily into heaven (2 Kings 2:11–12). The next best thing, if a holy person does die, is that the body never corrupts.

Besides all these marks of the living holy person, religions have developed means to represent saints iconographically. Thus they are often shown emanating light. Buddhist iconography includes halos around the heads of arahants, buddhas, and bodhisattvas, also standard in European iconography for the gods of the Roman Empire and for Christian saints. Daoist and Buddhist great masters are also often shown in Chinese and Japanese art with a ju-i, a scepter, with the end in the form of an immortality mushroom.

Augustine of Canterbury

(d. c. 604 C.E.)

Christian monk, first archbishop of Canterbury

Generally called the apostle of England, Augustine, born in the sixth century, was prior of St. Andrew's on the Coelian Hill in Rome when Pope Gregory I (the Great) sent him with a band of forty monks to preach the gospel to the English in 596. During his seven-year apostolate, Augustine was able to plant the seeds that would eventually bring Christianity to the whole of England.

Gregory's famous incident of seeing English slaves being sold in the Roman marketplace, and relating their name (Angli) with the word “angel,” is considered the genesis for the English mission, although more emphasis should be placed on the needs of the English king, Ethelbert of Kent. Ethelbert had married a Frankish princess, Bertha, who was a Christian, and as part of the marriage arrangement he had promised to construct a Christian place of worship and to install a Christian priest to conduct ceremonies. Ethelbert soon joined the Christian faith, once Augustine arrived in 597, and many of the English followed his example. In 601, Pope Gregory I sent reinforcements, including personnel, books, sacred vessels, and relics, to consecrate altars. Augustine tried twice to work with the local British and Celtic priests, who still practiced Christianity to some degree in the northern and western portions of Britain, but they resisted the updated Roman practices that Augustine wished to bring to British Christianity.

With the help of Pope Gregory I, Augustine at first tried to reestablish the early episcopal structure of the Roman British church, which had supposedly been centered at London in the south and at York in the north. During Augustine's archbishopric, however, London was located in a predominantly non-Christian district that only indirectly paid homage to Ethelbert. So Augustine located his archbishopric in Canterbury, Ethelbert's capital city in Kent. Later attempts to relocate the English archbishopric to London and/or York were unsuccessful. All of the early archbishops of Canterbury came from Rome, and there were strong ties between Canterbury and the Roman Church for centuries.

Augustine's lengthy correspondence with Pope Gregory I survives, and it was extensively quoted and noted by the Venerable Bede in his history of the English race composed in the eighth century. Topics related to the destruction of non-Christian shrines, the adaptation of Gallican and British customs in the Roman liturgy, and the establishment and daily life of monks were some of the issues for which Augustine asked for help from the Roman pontiff. Augustine was able to establish two other episcopal sees during his lifetime, one in London for the East Saxons and one in Rochester. Augustine died in about 604; his feast day is celebrated on May 26 in England and on May 28 elsewhere.

Augustine of Hippo

Christian bishop, doctor of the church

Augustine is the greatest of the patristic fathers and is best known for his spiritual autobiography, the Confessions. He wrote extensively on theological and philosophical issues of his day, and his extant writings number over 100 philosophical, theological, and scriptural exegetical works, 500 sermons, and 200 letters. Augustine's contributions to philosophy and theology have been quite influential, and his views on a number of topics, including the nature of time, just war theory, the nature of lying, marriage, divine foreknowledge and human freedom, original sin, the nature of evil, memory, and the nature of the soul, are still studied today.

As a young man in Thagaste, North Africa, Augustine was trained in classics and studied grammar and rhetoric. At age eighteen, he read Cicero's Hortensius, which he credits with motivating him to pursue a life of seeking wisdom. Early in life he joined the Manicheans, a religious sect that postulated the evil of matter and described the universe as a struggle between the two forces of good and evil. As Augustine matured, he came to find the doctrines of the Manicheans untenable. His spiritual journey took an important turn while he was teaching rhetoric in Milan, for he came to hear the eloquent sermons of Ambrose, who was bishop there. After many prayers said on his behalf by his mother, Monica, he was baptized on Easter in 387. He was ordained a priest in the North African city of Hippo in 391 and became the bishop there several years later.

Much is known about Augustine's life and thought. Of supreme importance in this regard is the spiritual classic the Confessions, which, in addition to being a detailed autobiography, includes philosophical sections on such topics as time and memory, as well as theological investigations regarding the relation of the soul to God. In clear and beautiful prose, Augustine depicts such matters as the saintliness of his mother, his struggles with chastity, his difficulty in learning Greek, and the process of conversion to the Christian faith. The moving account of his conversion in Book VIII of the Confessions is one of the great texts of Western religious spiritual writing. Augustine describes a scene in a Milanese garden where he was weeping under a fig tree, wrestling with the indecision of his will, when he heard a voice saying: "Tolle lege; tolle lege" (take, read; take, read). He received these words as a divine command, and turning to scripture, his eyes alighted upon the text of Romans 13:13: "Not in reveling and drunkenness, not in lust and wantonness, not in quarrels and rivalries. Rather, arm yourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ; spend no more thought on nature and nature's appetites." By the time he reached the end of the passage, Augustine relates, he no longer had any doubts, and the light of confidence had flooded his heart.

After his autobiography, The City of God is perhaps Augustine's most influential work. The tasks of this large book are manifold, but the volume has as its general project the identification of the errors and intellectual deficiency of paganism as well as an account of the place of the Christian in history. In this work, Augustine explores his famous distinction between two kinds of cities: the civitas dei and the civitas terrena. The members of the city of God are marked by love of God (amor dei), whereas members of the earthly city are marked by self-love (amor sui). At the end of history, the members of the two cities will finally be separated. In this book other important Augustinian themes are discussed at length, including the distinction of use versus enjoyment, the providential role of God in history, and the spiritual life of the Christian as a pilgrimage (peregrinatio) to God.

Augustine's intellectual formation was influenced heavily by Platonic and Neoplatonic sources, in addition to the Latin authors who formed the subject matter of his classical education. Augustine believed that Platonic philosophical teachings were closer to the truths of Christianity than the teachings of other sects, and Neoplatonic influences are visible in many aspects of his thought. Among Augustine's other well-known works are On Free Will (where he discusses the origin of evil, divine foreknowledge, and human freedom), On the Utility of Believing (where the relationship of faith and reason is set forth), On Christian Doctrine (a book on scriptural exegesis), and On the Trinity (a monumental presentation of trinitarian theology).

Much of Augustine's literary corpus is composed of polemics against the heresies of his day. His principle targets, in addition to Manichaeism, included Pelagianism (the doctrine that human beings can save themselves by their own efforts), Donatism (a schism that occurred in the North African church), and Arianism (a heresy pertaining to the issue of the divinity of Christ). As well, he wrote extensively against those who defended classical Roman religion.

Augustine's influence on subsequent philosophy and theology was, and continues to be, quite vast. Until the time of Thomas Aquinas he was the greatest of the church's thinkers. His influence on religious figures such as Bonaventure, Martin Luther, and Søren Kierkegaard has been explored by historians and scholars, and others have alleged that modern philosophers such as René Descartes and Martin Heidegger owe a large debt to Augustine.

Augustus

(63 B.C.E.–14 C.E.)

Roman emperor, god

Augustus is the title for Gaius Octavius, born in 63 B.C.E. as the great nephew of Julius Caesar. The first Roman emperor, Octavian was instrumental in creating the imperial cult, which associated living emperors with the gods and enabled the Roman Senate to acknowledge them as gods after their death. The architect of a new political system called the Principate, he was adopted as the son of Julius Caesar, who claimed descent from Venus and the kings of Rome, and he inherited a large fortune when Caesar was assassinated in 44 B.C.E. Caesar was acknowledged as a god, thus making Octavian a divi filius (son of a god).

Octavian, Mark Antony, and Lepidus then formed the Second Triumvirate and ruled the republic until Lepidus retired in 36 B.C.E., after which tensions grew between Octavian, who ruled the west, and Antony, now allied with Cleopatra in a plan to create an eastern dynasty. Octavian won a great victory over them at Actium in 30 B.C.E., and Antony and Cleopatra later committed suicide. This victory changed Roman history forever, ended the republic, initiated the Principate and the Pax Romana, and promoted Octavian to superhuman and eventual divine status beginning with the decree of the Senate in 27 B.C.E. that gave him the title Augustus. This associated him with the gods, acknowledged him as sacred, and laid the foundation for the imperial cult that endured until Constantine became the first Christian emperor in the fourth century.

The historical background to the imperial cult can be traced to ancient Egypt, where for millennia the pharaoh was thought to be a god incarnate. After Alexander the Great created his Macedonian-Greek empire, he conquered Egypt, where an oracle proclaimed him to be a god. The ruler cult was disseminated throughout the kingdoms of the eastern Mediterranean during the Hellenistic Age (323–30 B.C.E.). With the emergence of Rome as the dominant political and military power in the Mediterranean from around 220 until 30 B.C.E., resulting in the fall of Macedonia, Carthage, Corinth, and other victories leading to Actium, the securing of Roman rule was accompanied by establishing the cult of Roma in the eastern provinces. From the time of the general Flamininus (191 B.C.E. onward), Romans of achievement in the east were honored with festivals, games, and sometimes temples (Galinsky 1996, 323).

After Actium, Octavian was increasingly viewed as a superhuman and a godlike being. The Senate decreed that libations be poured to the genius (divine essence) of Augustus at banquets. Eastern provinces promoted the cult of Roma and Augustus by building temples and appointing priests. The Assembly in Asia decreed to start the new year with Augustus's birthday, "the beginning of all things." The Pax Romana had dawned, and Augustus was perceived as its divine founder. Coinage was minted that depicted the new ruler as Neptune, and his statue in the Palatine Library in Rome possessed a striking resemblance to Apollo. In the west, his cult was established in Lyons (12 B.C.E.) and Cologne (9 C.E.) and spread to Spain and the North African provinces. As this was also the golden age of Latin literature, the poets Virgil, Horace, and Ovid contributed to the acceptance of Octavian's superhuman achievements as proof that a deity was present in their emperor, now hailed as Caesar Augustus. The Senate decreed that Augustus was a god after his death (14 C.E.).

The imperial cult begun by Augustus continued throughout the empire: Thirty-six of sixty emperors from Augustus to Constantine were apotheosized (Price 1987, 57). The cult played an important role in spreading Roman civilization, fostering civic pride and allegiance to Roman rule, assimilating traditional polytheism, and competing with the claims of Christianity that Jesus Christ was God incarnate.

Aurobindo Ghose

Hindu nationalist, reformer, spiritual leader

Aurobindo Ghose was a significant leader in the Indian nationalist movement and one of the most important spiritual figures emerging from India in the twentieth century. His early life reveals the tension and promise that was inevitable with British rule in India.

The nineteenth century saw the emergence of various Hindu reform movements in India, many of them in response—often defensive or apologetic—to British domination and Christian criticism of Hinduism. British and French schools in India had acculturated many Indians to Western cultural patterns, which included rationalist and secularist tendencies. Aurobindo, born in 1872, was deeply influenced by this process. Sent to England at the age of seven by his father, who was convinced of the superiority of Western culture, Aurobindo was trained privately as a youth, then attended St. Paul's in London, and finally studied at Cambridge University, where he showed flashes of brilliance. He returned to India at the age of twenty, ostensibly to begin a career in teaching, but soon immersed himself in Indian philosophy, on the one hand, and Indian nationalism, on the other.

In Bengal, he was an outspoken and passionate militant, forcefully arguing for the overthrow of the British. He was charged with sedition in 1908 and imprisoned for a year. During his incarceration, Aurobindo experienced a deepening transformation, which included extensive study of the Bhagavad Gita, the practice of yoga, and mystical experiences of Krishna. When he was released from prison, he left Calcutta and moved to the French enclave in the south of India, Pondicherry, where he remained for the rest of his life.

Aurobindo's intellectual and spiritual prowess was quickly manifest. He wrote voluminously and soon an ashram developed around him, organized and administered by Mirra Alfassa, later known as "The Mother." Aurobindo's thought represents a constructive version of modern Indian philosophy. Drawing upon ancient Indian resources, he nonetheless rejected the illusionism that is at the heart of some versions of Indian philosophy. Instead, he believed that the soul evolves in and through matter to "super-mind" and then is charged with "descending" to the world of matter in order to stimulate and to facilitate the transformation of all. This deeply incarnational philosophy—one that recalls that of the French Jesuit Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955)—is called "integral yoga." Aurobindo died in 1950. His legacy remains strong in Pondicherry. Auroville, an experiment in communal living not far from the city proper, has had considerable positive impact and success.

Authority of Holy People

In many cases, a person who is acknowledged as "holy" claims a special divine authority, a mandate authorizing or demanding that he or she speak or act in the name of the divine. This special seal of approval, or "call," often comes in the form of visions. The next step in expressing that authority is then to win the approbation of at least a sector of the population. Beyond that, in several religions a person can be given special religious authority as "holy" by an official act. This is best known in the case of medieval Christian and modern Roman Catholic canonization, in which saints are officially recognized and placed on a list, a "canon" of the saints, through the authority of the pope. Although this process is carried out posthumously, authority figures of other religions have granted special status to holy people during their lifetimes. Foremost, however, has been the authority given by individual conscience, which is above that of any outside rubber stamp. As John Henry Newman said, "Conscience is the first of all the vicars of Christ," an authority that transcends that of the pope.

The history of holy people throughout the world is a history of visionary experience. Judaism holds that God spoke frequently and openly during the biblical period, but with the end of prophecy the divine voice became much rarer, heard sometimes in dreams but of central importance as the only direct contact between God and humankind. Dreams and visions occur as inspiration and granter of special authority in every religion, and belief that such experiences have occurred is often central to a society's designation of holy people. The earliest known prophet, Zoroaster (c. 1400 B.C.E.) started his career as holy person when he saw the god Ahura Mazda in a vision, after which he believed he had personally been set apart for his mission. Mani (216–c. 276 C.E.) began having visions at age twelve, and in one of them he was called to a special apostolic position. The first Daoist celestial master (fifth century C.E.) was inspired by visions of Laozi. Sometimes, holy people have been inspired by visions to take a new path. According to legend, for example, the Christian apostle Peter turned back to be crucified when he was fleeing Rome after having a vision of Christ. Teresa of Calcutta (1910–1997) dedicated her life to the poor after experiencing a visitation by Christ during a train trip. Visions have persistently given holy people the authority to transcend the normal rules of society, including established religion; a good case is the Kenyan Moraa (early twentieth century), a woman in a patriarchal society who was given authority that transcended gender through her visions. The list could be continued almost indefinitely.

A smaller category is made up of people who claim they have actually been to heaven. This claim was central to the appeal of the leader of China's Taiping Rebellion, Hong Xiuquan (1814–1864). The West African Cherubim and Seraphim Society had its start when Christiana Abiodun Akinsowon (1907–1982) in 1925 lay in a deep trance for several days and awakened to report that she had spent that time in heaven, where she was taught spiritual mysteries.

Especially in Buddhism and Hinduism, most recognized holy people have the authority of a teacher as an important claim to spiritual status; it is acknowledged as next to impossible to be “holy” without the aid of a guru. Thus, in these religions, a spiritual lineage is very important. It is not, however, absolutely necessary. For example, the Hindu Anandamayi Ma (1896–1982) reached spiritual attainment without a guru, despite her marriage at a young age, passing through the stages of yoga to a high spiritual state within six years. And sometimes this earlier authority can be mediated by the spirit of a dead holy person, rather than in living teaching. Thus, the Shi'a Muslim Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa'i (1753–1826) claimed that his authority came from the Shi'a imams—whom he met in dreams and visions.

Perhaps the most irrefutable authority given to a holy person is when a special charisma is passed on by heredity. Shi'a Muslims believe that on the Farewell Pilgrimage Muhammad designated his cousin and son-in-law 'Ali b. Abi Talib (600–661) as his successor. The early guardians of the Baha'i and Sikh faiths also were designated as successors to acknowledged holy men. Aztec rulers won the right to rule by journeying to the otherworld to claim their rights from the previous ruler. And sometimes authority has been passed on by a combination of inheritance and designation. For example, when Kublai Khan granted the Daoist “celestial master” Chang Tsung-yen (d. 1292) his title in 1276, he declared that the title could be passed on by inheritance; before, according to legend, a jade seal and sword had been passed from one celestial master to the next.

Sometimes holy people have won a special authoritative position through their actions, such as working miracles or winning debates with rivals. In Tibet, the Indian scholar Kamalashila (c. 740–795) won not only personal authority but also triumph for his school of Buddhism by defeating a group of Chan Buddhists in debate. More flamboyantly, the Jewish prophet Elijah (ninth century B.C.E.) had a trial of religious authority with the priests of Ba'al to see who could draw fire from heaven; the losers were then killed at Elijah's instigation (1 Kings 18).

Although hereditary succession bears great authority, more spectacular but open to argument is the claim of some holy people (or their followers) to be a great holy figure of the past who has come again. History is littered with people who have claimed to be Jesus or, in Islam, the hidden mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse). Mani preached that he was the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete of John's gospel. David Koresh (1959–1993), the modern American cult leader, identified himself with the Lamb of the book of Revelation. The Vietnamese neo-Buddhist Huyen Phu So (1919–1947) claimed to be a reincarnation of several earlier religious leaders. Such claims tend to lie on the fringes of religious experience, attracting extremists but powerful in showing the sort of authoritative position people want to have from their holy leaders.

Avvakum

Russian Orthodox mystic, healer, dissenter, archpriest

Avvakum charismatically led a mass movement, called Old Belief, against Patriarch Nikon of Russia in the 1650s to protest Nikon's dramatic reforms in the Russian Orthodox Church aligning Russian rituals with Greek and Ukrainian practices. The rebellion led to the Russian schism of 1666–1667. For challenging the authority of the church, Avvakum was beaten, starved, jailed, deported, and finally burned at the stake in 1682.

Born in 1620 or 1621, Avvakum was married at about age seventeen, ordained as a deacon at twenty-one, and ordained as a priest at age twenty-three. He was raised to archpriesthood at age thirty.

The seventeenth century was chaotic in Muscovy, that is, medieval Russia. The Rurikid dynasty died out in 1598 and left Russia politically unstable until Mikhail Romanov rose to power in 1613. Famine and plague struck Russia shortly after the turn of the century and again in the 1650s; Poland invaded Moscow in 1610, and Sweden invaded Novgorod in 1611. These pressures reemerged especially during the 1630s through the 1660s. In the midst of this, Avvakum provoked social and religious unrest with his conservative revolt against Patriarch Nikon.

We know of Avvakum primarily through his autobiography, a literary masterpiece of seventeenth-century Russia, which he wrote during the last years of his life while imprisoned at Pustozersk (Avvakum 1979). The account reads like a motivational speech and is spiritually and emotionally charged with vivid, bizarre, erotic, and mystical imagery. Avvakum strove through this work to motivate his followers to hold on to the sacred rituals handed down by the holy fathers and called them to faithfulness, even in the face of death.

Avvakum was a crude and lively leader full of contradictions. He was passive when persecuted, but at other times he was violent and abusive to others—and to himself. Though he demanded complete obedience to the church, he tearfully admitted his shortcomings. He portrayed himself both as sinner and saint; he argued with divine authority, yet he spoke of himself as “excrement and pus, an accursed man—just plain shit” (Avvakum 1979, 104).

The historiography of the schism may be divided into two basic schools of thought: those who think that the schism was primarily caused by genuine religious belief, and those who emphasize sociohistorical factors over belief. Robert Crummey (1970) offered a balanced view, taking seriously belief as a legitimate motivation. Georg Michels (1999), however, gave much less weight to belief, emphasizing sociopolitical motivations. For other perspectives from Russian historians, see the histories of Sergei Platonov (1929), who emphasized cultural pressures, and Sergei Soloviev (2000), who emphasized church-state politics and generational educational differences.

Awakening and Conversion

The concept of “awakening” (bodhi, often translated as “enlightenment”) is central to the concept of the holy person in the religions of India, especially Buddhism. Gautama Siddhartha is the fully awakened one, “the Buddha”; the goal of all human existence is to become awakened to the reality of the cosmos as the Buddha was, and thus to escape the cycle of rebirth. Although this concept has reached a very high degree of theological elaboration especially in Buddhism, and no holy person in the Buddhist tradition is not an arahant (fully awakened one), it has interesting parallels in other religions, especially to the Christian and Muslim concepts of “conversion.” When used in the context of holy people, conversion is not simply accepting a religious faith: It is an inner transformation to full adherence to that religion, often through a sudden spark of revelation, which many holy people have described as something as abrupt as a thunderbolt, as dramatic as what struck Paul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus (Acts 9). Thus it is useful to discuss these two terms together, exploring their similarities and differences in Eastern and Western religions.

In the cases of both awakening and conversion, holy people have described their experiences as preceded by a period of great spiritual thirst, a “dark night of the soul” in John of the Cross’s (1542–1591) formulation. The Zen term kokushitsu, “a bucket of black paint,” is used to describe the state of total darkness the meditator passes through before the breakthrough to awakening. What marks a true holy person is that he or she does not give up in frustration at this stage but instead remains open to insight or divine aid, depending on the tradition. Then the actual turn of the soul, when ultimate truth can be seen, like the shifting of a kaleidoscope to suddenly create a clear image, can be effected by almost anything. For example, when the Buddha’s follower Kassapa (fifth century B.C.E.) asked the Buddha about ultimate truth, the master responded by holding up a flower—and Kassapa suddenly understood.

In the Christian Middle Ages, the awakening to a true religious life, described by the Latin term conversio, was often de-emphasized in favor of a model of holiness stressing that saints were marked out by God even before their birth and therefore were always completely attuned to the divine. When they are described, conversions most often occur because of a great personal crisis. Illness is the catalyst for many medieval and modern saints—for example, Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) and Julian of Norwich (c. 1343–after 1419). A humiliation—as in the case of Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226)—or even sudden fear of hellfire—as with Adal-bert of Prague (c. 956–997)—may also instigate conversion. Sometimes the conversion is simpler; a common theme is reading or hearing a gospel passage that suddenly brings an inner revelation, as in the cases of Augustine of Hippo (354–430), Antony of the Desert (fl. 300–340), and the Ugandan Apolo Kivebulaya (c. 1864–1933).

Such motivations also have started many Buddhists on the path to awakening, but they are not usually sufficient in themselves to bring about complete enlightenment. For example, in his autobiography, the Japanese Rinzai master Hakuin Zenji (c. 1685–1769) reported that he was drawn to Buddhism when he heard a priest describe the tortures of the eight hot hells. He became a monk, but his final awakening came only after a period of paralyzing doubt; he broke out thanks to the sound of a temple bell. Indeed, Buddhism distinguishes between the “first fruit of emancipation” (shro-tapanna) and full awakening; in many cases, it seems to be the former that Christian saints have experienced in their conversion to religion. Sometimes their spiritual position is unclear even to those undergoing the experience. Mainstream Christianity refuses to accept people as saints while they are still alive; it is only after death that the holy person is fully confirmed in his or her conversion, with no chance of relapse. Similarly, the Tibetan Buddhist Gampopa (1079–1153) was already a master when he met the great teacher Milarepa and realized that his first awakening was actually flawed and that he needed to be more profoundly awakened before he was truly “holy.” At other times, Buddhist tradition teaches that people can be instantly raised from the mundane plane of the laity to full enlightenment. Thus, according to legend, Queen Khema of Magadha (fifth century B.C.E.), who was infatuated with her own beauty, received a visit from the Buddha, who showed her the transitory nature of beauty so clearly that she instantly became an arahant.

In Christianity, there is no recognized mechanism for helping the devout to move to a higher plane of consciousness, marking a clear difference from Buddhism. Although post-Reformation Christianity, beginning with the work of Martin Luther (1483–1546) and continuing with John Wesley (1703–1791) and others, spoke of a process of “sanctification,” which followed conversion, or “justification,” this was thought to be the work of the Holy Spirit being carried out in the believer rather than a specific path or technique. In contrast, Buddhist monastic leaders developed tools to help people be awakened, and the successful development of such a technique has been an adequate ground to regard a Buddhist teacher as particularly holy. Two main attitudes toward awakening have developed, advocating gradual or sudden enlightenment. The missionary figure Kamalashila (c. 740–795) was an important proponent of the gradualist school, advocating meditation and the gradual insight that accompanies it leading to ever-greater realization; this method became very influential in Tibet. More exciting, though still based on a discipline of meditation, are the shock tactics advocated especially by Chan Buddhist masters, who favored sudden enlightenment. They developed a confrontational style, including shouts, blows, and paradoxical questions and responses, all meant to startle a person into awakening. Important early proponents were the Chan masters Mazu (709–788), the first to use the method of asking unanswerable questions—while the disciple was struggling, the master was to shout at or hit him, jolting him into a new state of mind—and Huangbo Xiyun (d. c. 850). Although Buddhism recognizes that even a layperson can be awakened without any assistance, it is regarded as extremely rare, making the position of the master as spiritual guide very central in the spiritual quest.

The Jains emphasize the importance of the spiritual guide, or “ford-maker” (tirthankara), even more, recognizing awakening or “liberation” as the final goal of religious life but arguing that it is impossible except at times when a tirthankara is living on the earth. Since there have been only twenty-four tirthankaras in this cycle of the world, the last one, Mahavira, living in the sixth century B.C.E., the best that people can hope for is to be reborn in a spiritual realm that will make awakening possible in the next incarnation. The tirthankaras themselves attain liberation without the aid of a teacher, an attainment that makes them omniscient. Although this is the standard teaching, it should be noted that the holy Jain lay poet Banarsidas (1586–1643) disagreed and believed that he had been fully awakened.

Hinduism recognizes that a person can be jivanmukta, “one liberated while still alive,” freeing the self from the bonds of ignorance and becoming one with brahman (the supreme being), but regards this as extremely rare. One of the few holy people widely believed to have achieved this was Sadashiva Brahmendra, a renunciant of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886) was also recognized as a perfected being (siddha) during his lifetime, which suggests that he was awakened in the Buddhist sense. For the most part, though, Hindus are content with the less-defined “conversion” of Christianity, taking an important step along the path to religious perfection but not claiming to have fully arrived at the goal. For example, the Hindu singer-saint Kanakadasa (sixteenth century) dramatically converted on a battlefield where he had been left for dead; he regained consciousness to find Krishna there, claiming him as his servant.

Axayacatl

Aztec ruler

Tlatoani (speaker) of the Aztec Empire from 1468 until his death in 1481, Axayacatl, like other Amerindian leaders, enjoyed a divine right to rule, and his successful conquests reflected that divine blessing. The role of tlatoani was that of the highest political, military, and religious leader. The title indicates a person who speaks in both the divine and the human realms and who has received favor from the ancestors. To perform this role, the tlatoani must make auto-sacrifices and assure that the proper human sacrifices are made to the divinities. The Aztec Empire excelled at these tasks, although during the reign of Axayacatl, the distinction between “conquest warfare” and “flower warfare” (designed to provide captives for human sacrifice) became blurred. Conquest was necessary to assert a ruler’s claim to power, but sacrifice was the process that kept the cosmos in order.

Several of Axayacatl’s many campaigns are recorded in the songs, or cuicame, of the colonial document known as the Cantares mexicanos. In these, the tlatoani’s daughter Macuilxochitl and other famous poets of the era composed poetry in his honor, linking Axayacatl to his military hero ancestors and celebrating the great warrior’s dedication to Tezcatlipoca (Ipalnemoani), the divinity who was the patron of the military classes. These records detail the blessings of Aztec ancestors and the performance of the proper sacrifices to Ipalnemoani. At the same time they provided the details of military victories asserting Axayacatl’s right to power. By following these proper sacred rituals, Axayacatl was justly victorious in his accomplishments.

In texts from the conquest era, Axayacatl and other ancestors return from beyond to aid the Aztec forces battling the Europeans and their Tlaxcalan allies against the warriors of Axayacatl’s son Moteuczoma Xocoyotzin. The texts are further adapted in the postconquest era as popes and bishops (the speakers, or “tlatoani,” of the Spanish Empire) are substituted for the warlords and Christ takes the place of Ipalnemoani.

Ismaʿili Muslim imam

Abu Mansur Nizar al-ʿAziz-billah (Al-ʿAziz) was the fifteenth Ismaʿili imam and became the fifth Fatimid caliph of Egypt in 976 after the death of his father, Abu Tamim Maʿadd al-Muʿizz. Al-ʿAziz inherited a successful empire. Soon after his accession, he concentrated his energies on the acquisition of Syria. Subsequently he also succeeded in formulating a treaty with the Byzantine Empire to remove commercial restrictions against the Fatimids. Toward the end of his reign, as a result of much diplomatic and military success, the Fatimid Empire reached its greatest heights. Al-ʿAziz’s power was acknowledged from the Atlantic and the western Mediterranean to the Red Sea, the Hijaz, Yemen, Syria, and Palestine. The ruler of Multan in India also acknowledged his authority.

To define more clearly the place of legal regulations and religious law in his domain, Al-ʿAziz instituted the post of qadi al-qudat (chief justice) and nominated Abuʿl Husayn ʿAli, a son of the famous qadi Nuʿman, to the position. He also consolidated the position of the chief minister, or vizier, appointing Ibn Killis, who had been in charge of finance and public administration under the preceding two rulers. Another first was the employment of Turkish soldiers in the service of the empire. Hitherto most of the troops had been Berbers. As expected, the Berbers disapproved of this policy.

Following in the footsteps of his predecessors, al-ʿAziz had a policy of great religious tolerance in his empire. Like other Fatimids, he assigned important administrative posts to Christians and Jews. Additionally, Al-ʿAziz’s wife, the mother of his surviving heir, al-Hakim-bi amr-allah, was a Christian. He allowed the Christians to rebuild the church of St. Mercurius near Fustat. After the death of Ibn Killis, he appointed a series of chief ministers in quick succession, finally selecting ʿIsa b. Nasturus, a Coptic Christian. It was indeed an interesting development. This degree of openness was rare during that period and is not very common in the contemporary world. Al-ʿAziz also encouraged friendly disputations between Bishop Severus of Ashmunayn and his chief justice ʿAli b. Nuʿman.

Al-'Aziz celebrated two important Shi'a occasions: the feast of al-Ghadir al-Khumm commemorating the occasion when 'Ali b. Abi Talib was declared by the prophet Muhammad to be the patron (mawla) for the entire community, and the commemoration of the 'Ashura in remembrance of the martyrdom of the imam Husayn b. 'Ali at Karbala. Al-'Aziz died in 996. He is remembered as an enlightened patron of learning who was also a proponent of good governance and tolerance.

Ba'al Shem Tov (Yisrael ben Eliezer; the Besht)

Jewish mystic

Yisrael ben Eliezer, spiritual leader and founder of modern Hasidism, was born in 1698 or 1700 in Okop, western Ukraine. Orphaned by the age of eight, he survived through the intercession of concerned villagers. Legendary accounts describe the young Yisrael as a dreamy and introspective child who preferred to wander about alone, inspired by eager communication with God. There are no specific references to his schooling; nevertheless, early on, Yisrael became immersed in the more mystical writings of Judaism as part of a new devotionism that had been emerging from the more conventional form of Judaism since the late fifteenth century. This enthusiastic spirituality did not seek to break with the historical practice of Judaism, but rather to bring a new emphasis to conventional practice and to assert new values in religious life.

As a young man, Yisrael ben Eliezer joined certain rabbis and spiritual leaders in calling for contemplative devotion as an authentic aspect of Jewish life, hopeful joy rather than despair in worship, worship based on an acute recognition of God's loving presence (devekus), and a recognition of daily experience as an appropriate locus of transcendent encounter. Eventually, Yisrael and his second wife, the daughter of a rabbi, journeyed to the Carpathian Mountains, where he worked for a time, but he was mostly immersed in study and prayer. He became proficient in herbal medicine but also gained recognition for his gentle piety and rapturous preaching. By 1734 or 1736, Yisrael ben Eliezer was more commonly recognized as Ba'al Shem Tov (Master of the Good Name, abbreviated as "the Besht"), a designation that clearly indicated his spiritual authority but also distinguished him from those kabbalists who were sometimes declared Ba'al Shem (Master of the Name).

By 1740, the Besht settled in Miedzyboz, Ukraine, where a group of disciples gathered around him. Collectively, they were called hasidim by local Jewish leaders, but at that time the epithet did not carry the more familiar meaning of "pious ones" but instead was used pejoratively, as a play on the word hashudim, "those who are suspicious" (Green 1987, 153). Followers of the Ba'al Shem Tov were especially suspect because he had never officially studied for the rabbinate and was therefore not a formally sanctioned teacher; moreover, the religious practices of the group seemed to neglect (or discount) some of the more legalistic requirements of Jewish practice in the Orthodox community, such as observing fixed time for prayer.

Nonetheless, the charismatic appeal of the Besht was formidable, and his discipleship increased steadily, coming from the ordinary and uneducated as well as the learned. Soon they were indeed known as "Hasidim," but now the name assumed its original meaning of "pious" or "saintly." However, the Besht's followers transformed the term to stress central obedience to a tzaddik, a charismatic holy man of such singular spiritual authority that he stands, as it were, as the mediator between the world and the realms of the divine. Indeed, although he himself never formally assumed the title, the Ba'al Shem Tov became for later generations of Hasidim the exemplar of the tzaddik, also known as a rebbe.

Like so many other holy men, the Besht wrote down very few of his spiritual teachings. What is known of the spiritual direction of the Ba'al Shem Tov is derived primarily from the writings of his closest disciple, Jacob Joseph of Polonoie, whose Toledot Ya'acquov Yosef (The generations of Jacob Joseph) was the first text of Hasidism published. From that and other similar writings, it is apparent that the Besht encouraged his community to experience their faith by means of prayer so deeply meditative and private that the result is hislahavus, or the "bursting into flame," of the soul in exultation of the divine presence, making every daily act an act of worship and praise. The Besht believed that traditional forms of worship should be enriched with dance, song, and revelry, in delight of the real presence of the divine, and he encouraged his followers to perceive the divine immanence in all things.

Near the end of his life, the Ba'al Shem Tov spent longer and longer periods of time in contemplative prayer and ec-static devotion. He died in 1760 after an extended illness and was buried in the town of Miedzyboz. The grave of the Ba'al Shem Tov quickly became, and continues to be, the focus of annual pilgrimages by Hasidim and other spiritual disciples.

Bab, The ("The Gate")

Babi founder, prophet

The Bab was the founder of the Babi faith, a religious movement that shook Iran in the mid-nineteenth century. The Bab claimed to be the mahdi expected by all Muslims and the inaugurator of a new religious dispensation. His religion went on to form the foundation for the Baha'i faith.

Hajji Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad Shirazi was born in Shiraz, Iran (then called Persia), in 1819 to a merchant family that traced its descent from the prophet Muhammad. His father died when he was young and he was raised by his mother and maternal uncle. After a perfunctory primary education, he began to work as a merchant in the businesses of his maternal uncles. In 1841, he traveled to Karbala, where he attended for a short time the lectures of Sayyid Kazim Rashti, the leader of the Shaykhi school. After six months in Karbala, the Bab returned to Shiraz and was married to Khadijih Begum. The couple had one child who died shortly after birth.

In 1844, a number of the students of the recently deceased Sayyid Kazim Rashti, including Mulla Husayn Bushru'i and Ruh al-Quddus, came to Shiraz in search of a successor to their teacher. Here eighteen of them met the Bab and accepted his claim, thus becoming what he called the "Letters of the Living" (they included Tahirih, who had not met the Bab but accepted him through correspondence). The Bab sent these Letters of the Living out to all parts of Iran and beyond to announce his claim. He himself set off for a pilgrimage to Mecca, where he proclaimed his mission, but without any response.

Upon the Bab's return from pilgrimage in 1845, he was arrested by the governor of Shiraz and kept under house arrest. In 1846, the Bab went to Isfahan, Iran, where he managed to gain the support of Manuchihr Khan, the governor. During this time, the number of his followers was growing throughout Iran (the number may have reached 100,000 adherents, out of a probable Iranian population of 5–7 million), and the Islamic religious leaders were becoming alarmed, not least because the Bab severely criticized them in his writings. After the death of Manuchihr Khan in 1847, the prime minister, fearful of the Bab's growing influence, prevented a meeting between the Bab and the shah and tried to isolate the Bab by imprisoning him, first in the fortress of Maku and then (because the Bab had won over his wardens there) in Chihriq, both in northwestern Iran. The prime minister tried to discredit him by putting him on trial in Tabriz, the provincial capital, in April 1848. The trial was a mockery, but the Bab used it to proclaim openly for the first time his claim to be the mahdi expected by both Shi'i and Sunni Muslims (prior to this he had worded his writings in such a way that many thought he was only claiming to be a representative of the mahdi).

After this open proclamation, events moved quickly: A conference of the Bab's followers (called Babis) gathered at Badasht in northeastern Iran in July 1848 and proclaimed the inauguration of a new religious dispensation; the old shah died in September and a new shah came to the throne—his new prime minister proving to be just as antagonistic to the Bab as his predecessor had been; some of the Babis, under Mulla Husayn and Quddus, were besieged and eventually massacred at Shaykh Tabarsi between October 1848 and May 1849; clashes between the royal forces and the Babis at Nayriz in southern Iran in May–June 1850 and in Zanjan in May 1850–January 1851 ended in the massacre of large numbers of Babis; and in other places, including Tehran, leading Babis were executed.

In the end, the prime minister decided to try to put an end to the upheaval caused by the Babi movement by executing the Bab in Tabriz on July 9, 1850. However, even this attempt to quash the Babi movement backfired by giving the Bab, at the hour of his death, an aura of the miraculous. The British minister in Iran reported: "He was killed by a volley of musketry, and his death was on the point of giving his religion a lustre which would have largely increased its proselytes. When the smoke and dust cleared away after the volley, Bab was not to be seen, and the populace proclaimed that he had ascended to the skies. The balls had broken the ropes by which he was bound” (Momen 1981, 78). He was found completing a dictation to his secretary and was then shot by a second volley.

The Bab was mild-mannered and had a very attractive and engaging personality that captivated many of those who met him. The only firsthand account by a westerner was given by Dr. Cormick, an Anglo-Irish physician: “He was a very mild and delicate looking man, rather small in stature and very fair for a Persian, with a melodious soft voice, which struck me much. . . . In fact his whole look and deportment went far to dispose one in his favour” (Momen 1981, 75). One of the most convincing proofs of his station was the rapidity with which he produced his writings. One evening in Isfahan, before a roomful of high-ranking Muslim clerics, he was asked to write a commentary on a chapter of the Qur’an. He immediately proceeded to write a work of some 80–100 pages (depending on which manuscript one consults) rapidly and without pausing or correcting anything.

In addition, in all of his writings his style was remarkable—according to some, “miraculous”—in that he was able to draw together, in new and striking ways, themes and motifs particularly germane to Islamic messianic expectations, enchanting and emboldening the reader through a unique combination of the symbols and sacred vocabulary of the Islamic religious tradition. One of his most important works, the Qayyúm al-asmá (Maintainer of the divine names), was received as nothing less than the “true Qur’an” thought by Shi’is to be held in safekeeping by the hidden imam, who, upon his return, would promulgate it to the faithful. The Bab’s writings had a very powerful effect on those who were attuned to their themes and arguments. His holiness may be thought to reside, in large measure, in the very charismatic quality of these texts. Unfortunately, a large proportion of his writings fell into the hands of his enemies, and most of this has probably been destroyed. What remains, however, is still very extensive and comprises some thirty major works and numerous letters and other writings.

The Bab wrote of his claims that God had sent him with a mission and message in the same way that he had sent Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad in the past and would send others in the future. He stated that his coming was the Day of Judgment mentioned in all of the scriptures of the past. The prophecies concerning that day were to be understood as having been fulfilled spiritually and figuratively—not necessarily only literally. For example, the return of Jesus (prophesied in both the Bible and Qur’an) meant the appearance of a figure who had the same spiritual reality as Jesus—fulfilled the same function of being the representative of God on earth (that is, the Bab himself). The Bab also gave new laws that his followers were to obey, especially in his book the Bayan (Exposition). Above all, the Bab, especially in his later writings such as the Bayan, frequently referred to the future advent of “He whom God will make manifest.”

The religion of the Bab survived despite the intense persecution it suffered and the thousands of its followers who were killed. In 1863–1868, Baha’u’llah claimed to be “He whom God will make manifest,” and most of the Babis accepted this claim and became Baha’is.

Babalola, Joseph Ayo

Christian prophet, church founder

Joseph Ayo Babalola was born in 1904 at Odo Owa in Kwara, Nigeria, into an Anglican family. He had an elementary-school education and thereafter was trained as a mechanic. Receiving the call to preach in his mid-twenties, he abandoned his job as a steamroller operator with the Public Works Department of the colonial government and became a prophet. In the years that followed, he demonstrated extraordinary spiritual powers. In 1930, he joined Faith Tabernacle, one of the earliest independent churches in Nigeria. As an itinerant evangelist, he traveled far and wide in Yorubaland and also among the Akan people in Ghana. He had converts among kings and the masses, and his message permeated both rural and urban communities.

Babalola preached divine healing and emphasized the power of prayer. The rate at which people flocked to his meetings alarmed both the mainline churches and the colonial government, especially as mainline churches lost more and more members to his evangelistic campaigns. He encountered problems with the colonial authorities and was imprisoned for a period of six months in 1932 for launching a campaign against witches in Benin City. He came out of this ordeal even more determined to preach the gospel.

A split in Faith Tabernacle in the mid-1930s led to Babalola's exit, and he founded Christ Apostolic Church (CAC). He led the CAC as its general evangelist, while Isaac Akinyele was made president of the new church. Akinyele became the traditional ruler of Ibadan, the most populous indigenous city in West Africa, in 1955, and this brought additional prestige to the church. Babalola conducted mighty revival meetings that increased his popularity further. After his death in 1959, the CAC spread throughout Nigeria and beyond into other African nations and could also be found in Europe and the United States.

Babalola is remembered today for the great spiritual power he demonstrated through his numerous miracles and the great number of converts that he made. He was a pioneer of the indigenous Pentecostal movement in Nigeria, heralded by the Aladura (prayer-marked) genre, of which the CAC was an epitome. To date, the CAC in Nigeria has been active not only in the religious arena but also in the provision of valuable social services such as education and health care to complement governmental efforts.

Babalú Ayé (Babaloo; St. Lazarus)

African American orisha

One of the holiest and most respected orishas, or divinities, in the Afro-Cuban religion of Santería, Babalú Ayé has been invoked to heal infectious diseases such as smallpox. In recent times, it is believed that he watches over those stricken by Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). In the Yoruba language of West Africa, his name means "father of the world." He is associated with Lazarus, the ailing beggar in the New Testament (Luke 16:19–31), the patron saint of the sick and poor in the Catholic Church.

According to traditional Santería beliefs, Babalú Ayé was originally a human being of the legendary past, the son of Nanú, who is usually depicted as an old grandmotherly woman. Babalú Ayé was married to Ochún, who left him because he was only interested in attracting women and enjoying parties. On a Good Thursday, Orula, the orisha of wisdom, warned him about his aberrant behavior. Babalú Ayé refused to comply, and the next day he awoke with blisters on his body caused by smallpox. People walked away from his ill body with disgust, and only dogs approached him to lick his sores. Olodumare, the Supreme Being, refused to forgive him, and Babalú Ayé died. His former wife, Ochún, mediated for him, and Olodumare showed him pity and restored his life. Babalú Ayé returned to the world as a generous orisha who understood how much ill people suffer.

In West Africa, Babalú Ayé is a divinity feared by believers because he is believed to be the orisha who brings about smallpox. In Cuban Santería, he is portrayed as a kind-hearted and loving old man, dressed in sackcloth and walking on a pair of crutches that support his ill body, accompanied by two dogs. Babalú Ayé is revered as the most charitable, benevolent, and compassionate of all orishas.

In contrast to the rest of the orishas, who prefer the use of water in rituals, Babalú Ayé prefers libations of rum, which are poured on his statue during worship. Shrines to revere him, often built in a corner of the house of the santeros (worship leader), contain all the sacred items and foods associated with him—glasses of rum, bits of tobacco, pebbles, a cowrie-studded staff, grains of corn, rattles, cowbells, and special fabrics in the form of bandages. Doves and hens are the favorite animals offered in sacrifice.

His desired colors are purple and yellow. Festivities to honor Babalú Ayé in Cuba and other parts of Latin America are held every year on December 17. El Rincón, located in the outskirts of the Cuban capital of Havana, is the site of a Catholic sanctuary dedicated to the divinity in the name of St. Lazarus. This shrine is considered by followers of Babalú Ayé to be the residence of their generous orisha, where believers carry out acts of mortification to their deity for favors desired and received.

Babyllas of Nicomedia

Christian bishop, martyr

One can draw only the briefest sketch of Babyllas's career, even though he is among the most famous bishops of Antioch, one of the most important sites of early Christianity. Babyllas was the twelfth bishop of Antioch (c. 237–250 or 251) and died a martyr during the persecutions in the reign of Emperor Decius (249–251). His original tomb in the center of Antioch could not accommodate the crowds that venerated him, so a larger sanctuary was built in Daphne, directly outside the city.

Theological debate and political posturing obscure all but these few facts about Babylas. John Chrysostom (347–407) bears primary responsibility for this, since it was he who shaped legends about Babylas into a polemic directed especially against the policies and writings of Emperor Julian the Apostate (331–363). Julian had destroyed Babylas's sanctuary, claiming that the saint's presence interfered with the oracle of Apollo nearby, then stayed in Antioch to write a scholarly refutation of Christianity. A major point of Julian's argument was that Christian pacifism was cowardice. In response, Chrysostom portrayed Babylas as outspokenly frank and steadfastly courageous. According to legend, Babylas would not allow an emperor (probably Philip the Arab [244–249]) who had murdered a hostage to enter the church on Easter Sunday. Babylas was equally unyielding before his persecutors. Julian also had denounced what he called the Christian "worship of corpses," meaning not only Christ but also the relics of the saints. To counter this, Chrysostom emphasized the miracles at Babylas's tomb and their salutary impact on those who venerated them.

The cult of Babylas, fostered by Chrysostom, survived Julian's persecution. Babylas's relics were translated from Daphne to their original resting place in the city of Antioch, over which Bishop Meletius built a magnificent church in approximately 387. His feast day is January 24 in the Western church and September 4 in the Greek church

Badawi, Ahmad al-

Muslim sufi, ascetic

Ahmad al-Badawi is the most popular holy person of Muslim Egypt. His followers call him simply al-Sayyid (lit. "the master, or lord," but also a descendant of the prophet Muhammad) or Shaykh al-Arab because al-Badawi means "the Bedouin" in Arabic. As a sufi he also reached the qutb (pole or axis), that is, the highest degree in the hierarchy of the saints. A person receives this appellation in the sufi tradition only if he is regarded as an axis around which the world turns.

Ahmad was born in about 1200, probably in Fez (Morocco) to a family tracing its descent from 'Ali b. Abi Talib, the cousin and son-in-law of the prophet. In his youth, Ahmad was distinguished by qualities that won him the nicknames al-Attab and Abu'l-Fitya (intrepid horseman). Later he received the surnames al-Sammāt (the Silent) and Abu Farraj (the liberator [of prisoners]).

In approximately 1230, he seems to have suffered an internal crisis. He refused an offer of marriage and withdrew from life in society. After experiencing visions telling him to go to Iraq, he did so in 1236. There, he visited the tombs of the two axial saints Ahmad ibn 'Ali al-Rifa'i (1106–1182) and 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166). It was while in Iraq that he seduced the indomitable Fatima bint Barri, whom he afterward refused to give up to any man, but also refused to marry. This episode has become a great romantic tale in popular Arabic literature.

Ahmad had another vision adjuring him to go to Tanta on the Egyptian Delta. In this village, he engaged in the most important activity of his life. Like Simeon the Stylite (c. 390–459), the Christian ascetic, on his column, Ahmad retreated to a terrace, where he remained without eating or drinking for forty days. His charisma was so great that it is said that the Mameluke sultan al-Zahir Baybars venerated him and kissed his feet. Ahmad died on August 24, 1276, and was laid to rest in an immense mosque-mausoleum erected in the center of the village.

Three of Ahmad al-Badawi's writings survive: a prayer, a collection of prayers (salawat), and a testament (wasaya). Abd-al-Rahman b. Mustafa al-Aydarusi wrote a commentary on the prayer collection entitled Fath al-Rahman. Many legends circulate about the miracles Ahmad performed both during his life and after his death. It is said that he began to speak at birth and that he was a great eater—and another of his nicknames is Abu al-kirsh (the man with the paunch). He was renowned for restoring prisoners and finding lost people and goods. His spiritual heritage was spread by his close disciples, especially Abd al-Al, who had the mosque built that contains Ahmad's tomb, organized his cult, and founded a mystic order around his teachings, the Ahmadiyya. His popular veneration has never died out. The pilgrimage to Tanta for his mawlid (anniversary festival), in October, draws tens of thousands of Egyptians, not just from the Delta but also from the capital and the south: Indeed, it is the great pilgrimage in Egypt.

Baha'i, Shaykh

See 'Amili, al-, Shaykh Baha'i

Baha'i Faith and Holy People

The Baha'i faith is the religion founded by Baha'u'llah in the nineteenth century. It currently has more than 5 million members, and there are Baha'i communities in every country of the world. As a result of the successive banishments of its founder, culminating in his exile to the Ottoman prison city of Akka and his death and burial there, the spiritual center of the religion is fixed in Akka, now in Israel, while its world administrative center is established in the nearby city of Haifa.

Where Christianity has deified its founder and Islam insists that Muhammad was just a human being, the Baha'i teachings take an intermediate position, stating that the founders of the world's major religions belong to a realm that lies between that of God and humanity. They are the perfect manifestations of all of the names and attributes of God (hence they are referred to in Baha'i terminology as the manifestations of God). Ontologically, they are separate from God's essence, but because human beings can have no access to and no knowledge of God's essence, they are "as God" for human beings. Hence Baha'u'llah (1817–1892) said: "Were any of the all-embracing Manifestations of God to declare: 'I am God!' He verily speaketh the truth, and no doubt attacheth thereto. For it hath been repeatedly demonstrated that through their Revelation, their attributes and names, the Revelation of God, His name and His attributes, are made manifest in the world" (1974 [1862], 178). Baha'u'llah likened these manifestations of God to perfect mirrors reflecting God's qualities to humanity. It is also through these individuals that God acts in the world.

Baha'u'llah's specific claim was that the scriptures of all of the world's religions prophesy the coming of a messianic figure in the future who will usher in a golden age for humanity, and he claimed to be this figure—the fulfillment of these prophecies. The eschatological prophecies relating to the end of the world and the day of judgment and resurrection found in the Bible and the Qur'an were explained by Baha'u'llah as referring to the spiritual upheaval and renewal brought about by his coming. He stated that it was his teachings that would bring about the golden age for humanity—the kingdom of God on earth. Baha'u'llah claimed to be of equal station—and indeed, spiritually the same reality—as the preceding founders of the world's religions. It is merely the fact that his message is the latest, and therefore fullest, revelation of God's will that makes his revelation of greater importance to the people of this age.

A central concept among the teachings of Baha'u'llah is that God has progressively revealed his will through the founders of the world's religions—in other words, that the message brought by each "manifestation of God" builds on what was brought by the previous one. This progressive revelation of God's purpose for humanity has now reached the point that it requires all humanity to unite in one common global family. Humanity must put aside all of the prejudices and hatreds that have caused endless wars in the past and inaugurate a world democratic federal government that will eventually lead to the "Most Great Peace." The nations of the world must set up an international system of collective security and submit their differences to arbitration rather than going to war. Ancillary Baha'i teachings include the need for multilateral disarmament (with the benefits from this going to help the poor), universal education, an international auxiliary language, the equality of women and men, and other such matters.

It is a fundamental Baha'i concept that what appear to be the political and economic problems of the world are at their root spiritual problems related to disunity, and thus that these problems can only be lastingly resolved if this disunity is tackled at the spiritual level, starting with the individual. Human beings must stop seeing themselves as primarily belonging to narrow sectional interests such as tribes, classes, religions, or nations and start thinking of themselves as citizens of the world. Baha'u'llah wrote: "It is not his to boast who loveth his country, but it is his who loveth the world" (1983 [1952], 95). Statesmen, educators, planners, and the generality of the people, he said, need to start thinking in this global way.

Baha'u'llah's desire to see a greater degree of unity among human beings can be discerned in some of the laws in his Kitab-i-Aqdas (The most holy book). He ordained, for example, that marriage can only occur with the consent of both the bride and groom and both sets of parents. He also abolished all laws related to holy war and ritual purity. Compared to religions such as Judaism and Islam, there are few laws in the Baha'i faith. Baha'u'llah considered that humanity had now collectively achieved maturity, and thus his writings tend to contain exhortations to his followers to improve their morals and character and to acquire spiritual qualities rather than giving specific and detailed laws.

Baha'is believe that the Baha'i faith is not just one more religious system to be superimposed on the mosaic of existing ones, but rather a restatement of the eternal verities underlying all the religions of the past. Baha'i teachings maintain that all the great religions of the world are divine in origin, that their basic spiritual principles are in harmony, and that they differ only in the nonessential aspects of their doctrines. Consequently, the Baha'i faith should aim to be a unifying force, instilling into the adherents of other religions a new spiritual vigor, demonstrating to them the fundamental unity of their religious doctrines, and presenting to them a vision of a united and peaceful world in the future. Baha'u'llah did not, moreover, claim any finality to his mission. A further manifestation of God will appear, but this will not be for at least a thousand years.

Apart from Baha'u'llah, the Baha'i faith has a number of other individuals whom it regards as holy. The Bab (1819–1850) is considered to have been not only a forerunner of Baha'u'llah, heralding the advent of one greater than himself, but also to have been endowed with the authority of an independent prophet of God. Several of the major disciples of the Bab also occupy prominent positions in the Baha'i panoply of holy people, in particular his first group of disciples, the eighteen "Letters of the Living." His first disciple, Mulla Husayn Bushru'i; the last to be named a Letter of the Living, Ruh al-Quddus; and the only female Letter of the Living, Tahirih, are perhaps the best known, but Mulla 'Ali Bastami, another Letter of the Living and the first to be martyred for the new religion; Hujjat, the leader of the Babis in Zanjan, Iran; and Vahid, the leader of the Babis in Nayriz, are also held in great esteem. Children are often named after these individuals. All of the above-named fell as martyrs to the new religion, along with many thousand others. The brief and dramatic ministry of the Bab culminated in his own martyrdom and continues to stir the imagination and affect the emotions of Baha'is up to the present day, much as it did when news of it first spread to Europe in the 1860s.

Baha'u'llah's son and successor, 'Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921), occupies a position that is clearly lower than that of the Bab and Baha'u'llah theologically. He is not considered a manifestation of God but still occupies a station above ordinary human beings. Baha'u'llah referred to him as the "mystery of God," instructed the Baha'is to turn to him after his own passing, and made him the sole authorized interpreter of Baha'u'llah's writings. In emphatic terms, Baha'u'llah stated: "Whoso turneth towards Him hath turned towards God, and whoso turneth away from Him hath turned away from My beauty, hath repudiated My Proof, and transgressed against Me. He is the Trust of God amongst you. . . . They who deprive themselves of the shadow of the Branch [Abdu'l-Baha], are lost in the wilderness of error" (quoted in Shoghi Effendi 1991, 135). He is also stated to have been the perfect exemplar of Baha'u'llah's teachings, the embodiment and incarnation of every Baha'i virtue and ideal. The shrines of the Bab, Baha'u'llah, and 'Abdu'l Baha, the three central figures of the Baha'i faith, in the Haifa-Akka area are a focus for Baha'i devotions and pilgrimage. All Baha'is turn to the shrine of Baha'u'llah in prayer every day.

In his will and testament, 'Abdu'l-Baha appointed Shoghi Effendi (1897–1957) as the guardian of the Baha'i faith and the sole authorized interpreter of the Baha'i scriptures. During Shoghi Effendi's ministry (1921–1957), the fact that he did not make public appearances meant that only the comparatively few Baha'is who made the pilgrimage to the Haifa-Akka area were able to meet him. Nevertheless, his powerful writings made a deep impression upon all of the Baha'is. After Shoghi Effendi's death in 1957 (he is buried in London), the Universal House of Justice, elected in 1963, became the supreme authority in the Baha'i faith. This body is elected by the members of all of the national spiritual assemblies at an international convention. It has the function of coordinating and directing the affairs of the Baha'i community and legislating in any areas that are not expressly covered in the scriptures of the Baha'i faith.

Central to understanding the position of 'Abdu'l-Baha and Shoghi Effendi in the Baha'i faith is the concept of the "covenant." This refers to Baha'u'llah's appointment of 'Abdu'l-Baha as his successor, 'Abdu'l-Baha's appointment of Shoghi Effendi, and the central authority of the Universal House of Justice. The words of Baha'u'llah concerning 'Abdu'l-Baha found an echo in 'Abdu'l-Baha's words concerning Shoghi Effendi and the Universal House of Justice: "Whatsoever they decide is of God. Whoso obeyeth him not, neither obeyeth them, hath not obeyed God; whoso rebelleth against him and against them hath rebelled against God" (1971 [1935], 11). Among the highest of Baha'i virtues, and indeed the identifier of being a Baha'i, is loyalty to the covenant, that is, obedience successively toward 'Abdu'l-Baha, Shoghi Effendi, and the Universal House of Justice. This doctrine means that Baha'is are free to hold widely differing theological opinions and interpretations of the scripture (although no Baha'i can claim any authority for these) and still remain within the orbit of the Baha'i faith as long as their focus of loyalty is toward the center of the covenant.

The Baha'i faith has a teaching that in each religious dispensation, there has been a female figure who has outshone the other women in that dispensation and has acted as a paradigm and role model. In the Babi religion, it was Tahiri who played this role. In the Baha'i faith, it is considered to be Bahiyiyih Khánum (1846–1932), the daughter of Baha'u'llah.

Apart from the central figures of the Baha'i faith, the extent to which any individual Baha'i can rise to the position of being regarded as a holy figure is limited by a spirit of egalitarianism within the movement. Although not condemning all religious leaders, Baha'u'llah did nevertheless feel that they often led their flocks astray, especially at the time of the coming of a new manifestation of God. Having called for universal education to enable all to read the scripture for themselves (a major justification for religious leaders in the past), Baha'u'llah abolished individual religious leadership in his religion and stated that all Baha'is should regard themselves as being of one rank and one station. 'Abdu'l-Baha set the tone for the community when, despite the high praise and titles he had received from Baha'u'llah, he chose for himself the title 'Abdu'l-Baha (the servant or slave of Baha'u'llah) and wrote: "My name is 'Abdu'l-Baha. My qualification is 'Abdu'l-Baha. My reality is 'Abdu'l-Baha. My praise is 'Abdu'l-Baha. Thralldom to the Blessed Perfection is my glorious and refulgent diadem, and servitude to all the human race my perpetual religion. . . . No name, no title, no mention, no commendation have I, nor will ever have, except 'Abdu'l-Baha. This is my longing. This is my greatest yearning. This is my eternal life. This is my everlasting glory" (quoted in Shoghi Effendi 1991, 141).

'Abdu'l-Baha may be said to have initiated hagiographic exposition in the Baha'i faith through his authorship of Tadhkiratu'l-vafa (Memorials of the faithful), which included brief descriptions of some seventy-two early Babis and Baha'is. It is perhaps significant for the ethos of equality in the Baha'i faith that most of these individuals were in fact only of minor importance historically and would perhaps have been forgotten if 'Abdu'l-Baha had not written about them in his book. He appears to have chosen what may be termed "ordinary Baha'is"; by writing of the qualities that they manifested, he implied that it is possible for all to strive to manifest such qualities—a democratization of sainthood.

Despite this emphasis on the equality of all Baha'is, a number of individual Baha'is were singled out for special honor by the central figures of the Baha'i faith, mainly because of the services that they performed. For example, they would sometimes write a "tablet of visitation" praising a particular Baha'i to be read at the individual's graveside. Many of those who fell as martyrs had tablets of visitation written for them. Shoghi Effendi, at the beginning of his ministry, posthumously named nineteen Baha'is as "apostles of Baha'u'llah" and nineteen as "disciples of 'Abdu'l-Baha." Later, during a ten-year spiritual crusade to spread the Baha'i faith that he launched in 1953, Shoghi Effendi named those who moved to a country where there were no Baha'is as "knights of Baha'u'llah," and he sometimes referred to other individuals who were the first to open a country to the Baha'i faith as the "father" or "mother" of that country.

During the first 120 years of the Baha'i faith, some fifty individuals were given the title "hand of the cause," some posthumously, in recognition of their services. The hands of the cause were given certain roles in spreading and protecting the Baha'i faith. These individuals are certainly considered holy by some Baha'is, and children are often named after them. Although, with the death of Shoghi Effendi, no further hands of the cause can be named, some of their functions have been carried forward by the institution of the Continental Boards of Counselors. These individuals are appointed by the Universal House of Justice and have auxiliary boards and assistants to help them in their work. Their role is, however, limited to advising and encouraging. They do not have any authority, nor are they generally held to be holy.

Authority in the Baha'i faith now rests with elected local, national, and international institutions (the local and national spiritual assemblies and the Universal House of Justice) as governing bodies—not even the individuals in these institutions have any authority. These elected institutions are responsible for all of the social, administrative, economic, legal, and spiritual affairs of the community, and they act through a process of consultative decision making, which is the hallmark of the Baha'i administrative system.

Despite the determined opposition of such formidable foes as the kings of the Qajar dynasty in Iran, the caliphs of Islam, the Nazi regime in Germany, the Communist governments of Eastern Europe, and the forces of religious fundamentalism, the Baha'i faith has continued to grow and spread. It has been established in every country as well as most of the major territories, colonies, and dependencies in the world. Its elected national councils, the national spiritual assemblies, now number 182. It has gathered within its orbit representatives of most of the races of humanity and converts from most of the religions. Baha'i literature has been translated into more than 800 languages and published and disseminated in more than 500. It enjoys legal and official recognition in most countries, enabling it in many countries to secure exemption from taxation for its endowments and to solemnize Baha'i marriage. It has embarked upon development projects in the fields of education, agriculture, health, literacy, and community development, and it operates a number of Baha'i radio stations. In places around the world, the Baha'i community has taken a lead in healing social divisions, bringing the races together, advancing the role of women in society, and challenging religious leaders to resolve their differences.

Baha'uddin Naqshband

Muslim sufi

Baha'uddin Naqshband's roots are in Central Asia, primarily in the city of Bukhara, in what is now Uzbekistan, where he was born in 1317. His spiritual lineage is from the prominent sufi saints Abdul Khaliq Ghijduwani (d. 1220) and Yusuf Hamdhani (d. 1140). Baha'uddin Naqshband established the Naqshbandi sufi order in Central Asia, which quickly spread to North Africa, the Middle East, the Mediterranean, and south and Southeast Asia. He emphasized adhering closely to Islamic law, following the customs of the prophet Muhammad, and learning to incorporate the wisdom of Muslim saints into one's own inner knowledge. These teachings appealed especially to merchants; indeed, merchants were largely responsible for the order's successful growth.

Naqshband also stressed different stages of divine encounter: a moment of intimacy (uns); longing for the encounter (shauq); reaching proximity with the divine (qurb); and assembling with the saints (qurb an-nawafil). While achieving each stage depended upon the disciple's ability to master gnostic knowledge and perfect his spirituality, Naqshband taught that every individual could access all the levels. For example, to reach the moment of intimacy with the divine was directly connected to realizing the divine beauty and the manifestation of God's compassionate qualities—part of awakening the sufi's heart.

In the area of longing for the encounter with the divine, Naqshband taught sufis to master specific spiritual exercises, such as maintaining awareness of one's breathing, watching over one's movements, concentrating on the inner mystical journey, engaging in constant recollection of God (dhikr), controlling one's thoughts, restraining all thoughts that are negative, and concentrating deeply on God. Generally, these spiritual practices fall under the category of dhikr, or remembrance. However, according to Naqshband, one must pay constant attention to perfecting each one of these exercises to increase gnostic knowledge (irfan) and open the self up to God's self-disclosure. Naqshband's teaching preferred silent dhikr as opposed to loud, communal dhikr accompanied by musical instruments and dancing. One other important contribution by Naqshband to the sufi tradition is the suhbat, the intimate conversations and lessons between the master and disciple. It is within this relationship that the master and disciple connect their lives for spiritual unity, faith healing, transcendence, miracles, and many other phenomena.

Baha'uddin Walad (Sultan Walad)

Muslim sufi, order founder

Baha'addin Muhammad Sultan Walad was the eldest son of Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi, the famous mystic poet and spiritual founder of the Mawlawiyyah order, known in the West as the whirling dervishes. Even though Sultan Walad has been somewhat overshadowed by the presence and fame of his father, he nevertheless played a substantial role in the establishment of the order and its continuation after Rumi's death. He was born in Konya, Turkey, where his grandfather and father had migrated and settled during the Mongol invasion of the Khorasan region, in 1226. Sultan Walad was very close to his father and remained a committed disciple until his own death in 1312. He was falsely implicated in the death of Shams-i Tabrizi, Rumi's most beloved companion, who mysteriously disappeared one day (and to whom Rumi dedicated his book of poetry Diwan-i Shams-i Tabrizi [The poems of Shams-i Tabrizi]). Sultan Walad, who lived a long life, died in Konya and was buried next to his father. Thousands of pilgrims visit their tombs every year.

Sultan Walad wrote a number of books in prose and poetry. His most famous work, Ma'arif (Collection of talks and sermons), is a collection of spiritual counsels and sermons very close in style to his father's Fihī ma fih (Discourses). Written in simple language, the book addresses numerous issues related to the spiritual life and the teachings of the Mawlawiyyah order. Sultan Walad's greatest work, however, was the establishment of the Mawlawiyyah order itself.

Before his death, Rumi had many followers and his fame had already reached many parts of the Islamic world. Rumi, however, did not found the Mawlawiyyah order in its present form. Although Rumi was the first spiritual master (shaykh) of the order, it was Sultan Walad who, upon his appointment to this position at his father's death, gathered his father's followers, sent representatives to various places, and built a mausoleum for his father. The mausoleum quickly became the center of the Mawlawiyyah order. Some of the distinct features of the whirling dervishes also go back to Sultan Walad. He is revered as one of the pillars of the Mawlawiyyah order as well as of Turkish-Anatolian sufism.

Baha'u'llah

(1817–1892 C.E.)

Baha'i founder

Baha'u'llah (lit. "the glory of God") was the founder of the Baha'i faith. He claimed to be the latest in the succession of messengers of God who have founded the world's religions, and indeed, to be the promised one of all religions. He stated that he had brought the teachings necessary to inaugurate the next stage in humanity's development—the unification of the human race.

Baha'u'llah was born Mirza Husayn 'Ali Nuri in Tehran, Iran, on November 12, 1817, into the family of a prominent government dignitary. When the Bab put forward his claim in 1844, Baha'u'llah became an enthusiastic follower and took the new message to his home region of Nur, Mazandaran. He was a leading participant at the Conference of Badashat, where the Bab's claim to inaugurate a new religious dispensation was first proclaimed. When the Babis began to be persecuted, he used his social position to protect individuals such as Tahirih, the only woman among the first disciples of the Bab. As a consequence, he himself became subject to attacks leading to his imprisonment in 1852 in the Siyah-Chal, an underground dungeon in Tehran, where he experienced a vision of a heavenly maid suspended in the air who announced to the world: "By God! This is the Best-Beloved of the worlds, and yet ye comprehend not. This is the Beauty of God amongst you, and the power of His sovereignty within you, could ye but understand. This is the Mystery of God and His Treasure, the Cause of God and His glory unto all who are in the kingdoms of Revelation and of creation, if ye be of them that perceive" (Baha'u'llah 2002, 6). Baha'u'llah marked this event as the start of his ministry.

On his release from the Siyah-Chal, Baha'u'llah was exiled. He chose to go to Baghdad, which was then a provincial capital in the Ottoman Empire. Although he had not as yet made any claim, his natural leadership and charisma meant that the followers of the Bab, the Babis, most of whose leadership had been eliminated in the fierce persecutions in Iran, came to look upon him as a source of guidance and inspiration. This led to much jealousy and resentment, particularly on the part of Baha'u'llah's half-brother Mirza Yahya (Subh-i Azal), who had leadership claims of his own. Not wanting to be the cause of dissension, Baha'u'llah left for the mountains of Kurdistan, where he lived alone as an ascetic for two years (1854–1856). Eventually however, he returned to Baghdad because he saw that the cause of the Bab was in danger of disintegrating. He set about rebuilding the Babi community. At this time, he wrote a number of books, such as Kalimat-i Maknunih (Hidden words), Haft-Vadi (Seven valleys), and Kitab i-Iqan (Book of certitude), which became highly regarded by the Babis in Iran. Baha'u'llah's increasing prestige in Baghdad led to calls by the Iranian government that he either be returned to their custody or sent further away from the borders of Iran.

In 1863, Baha'u'llah received orders from the Ottoman authorities to present himself in Istanbul. After three months in Istanbul, Baha'u'llah was further exiled to Edirne (Adrianople) in European Turkey. Privately, in a place called thereafter the Garden of Ridvan (paradise) just as he left Baghdad, and publicly in Edirne, Baha'u'llah announced his claim to be not only the one prophesied by the Bab (“He whom God will make manifest”) but also the Promised One of all religions. He put forward this claim in a series of letters addressed to the leading monarchs and religious leaders of his time (Baha'u'llah 2002). In his letter to Pope Pius IX, for example, Baha'u'llah asserted that he was Christ returned as the Father (2002, 55, 59). While in Edirne, the split with Mirza Yahya came to a crisis after the latter tried to poison Baha'u'llah. The poison left Baha'u'llah with a tremble in his hand until the end of his life. The false reports that Mirza Yahya sent to the government resulted in the further exile in 1868 of Baha'u'llah and his companions to Akka (Akko), then in the Ottoman province of Syria and now in Israel.

In Akka, Baha'u'llah was imprisoned for two years in the citadel and later subject to house arrest. It was during this period that he wrote his most important book, the Kitab-i-Aqdas (The most holy book), which contains the laws and teachings of his religion. Successive governors, however, fell under the spiritual influence of Baha'u'llah, and in 1877 he was allowed to transfer his residence to a building outside the city. In 1879, he moved to his final residence, the Mansion of Bahji, outside Akka. Here he secluded himself, concentrating on dictating to his secretaries replies to the letters that came to him, meeting with his followers, and allowing his son, 'Abdu'l-Baha, to deal with all other affairs. He provided for the continued evolution of the religion that he had founded by appointing 'Abdu'l-Baha as his successor.

It appears that Baha'u'llah possessed great charisma. There are numerous reports of individuals, some starting from a hostile position and some wanting to judge between him and Mirza Yahya, who were won over by his spiritual power and presence. E. G. Browne, a Cambridge University orientalist who met him in Bahji in 1890, wrote: “The face of Him on Whom I gazed, I can never forget, though I cannot describe it. Those piercing eyes seemed to read one's very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow. . . . No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before one who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain” (quoted in Balyuzi 1980, 371).

When Baha'u'llah passed away on May 29, 1892, he was seventy-four years of age and had spent forty of those years as a prisoner or in exile. In 1844, at the age of twenty-seven, he had voluntarily given up the life of comfort and prestige that he had inherited and entered the ranks of the poor and oppressed of the world. Baha'u'llah knew what it was like to lose home and possessions, to be stripped of all human rights, to be a prisoner and a refugee, to be beaten, to be subjected to unjust legal procedures, and to be the victim of corrupt officials. In Tehran in 1852 he had experienced the anger of a mob whipped into blind and senseless rage; on the road to Baghdad, he and his family had suffered from poverty, hunger, and exposure; during the course of his exiles, he and his wife had watched their children become ill and die; and in the early years in Akka he had experienced overcrowded accommodation, lack of food, unhygienic conditions, and the resultant diseases. When, therefore, Baha'u'llah wrote of the suffering of the masses of the people in our world today and of the need for society to look after the poor and disadvantaged and to guard against injustice and corruption, he was writing of things that he had experienced firsthand and about which he cared deeply. His shrine at Bahji, near Akka, is regarded by Baha'is as the holiest place on earth.

Bahinabai (Bahenabai, Bahini)

Hindu poet-saint

A woman “poet-saint” (sant) and brahmin, born in Devagao (modern Maharashtra), India, in about 1628, Bahinabai composed some 1,000 devotional songs in Marathi. Her chosen deity was the Hindu god Vitthal, and her chosen guru was her fellow Marathi sant Tukaram (c. 1607–1649). Her work is often autobiographical as well as devotional, and it is unique in its emphasis on the difficulties a married, high-caste woman of great devotional sense might have experienced in seventeenth-century India.

Bahinabai’s songs sometimes express a feeling of abandonment by Vitthal and reveal her efforts to remain faithful to her deity while reconciling this faith with her social obligation to her husband. She recalls that her husband disapproved of both her faith and her allegiance to her guru, Tukaram, a resistance that often elicited violent repression from her husband. In one song, she tells us that her husband had a disposition for rage. Upon discovering that Bahinabai had attended a performance of Tukaram’s songs, she reports, he “dragged me by my hair and beat me severely.” She relates that her “body accepted” the beatings, though we are led to believe that her faith remained unbruised. Perhaps due to her husband’s oppressive control, Bahinabai remained at a physical distance from Tukaram, taking spiritual education from him through his public discourses, as well as through visions and dreams.

One also hears in Bahinabai’s songs a striking ambivalence regarding a “woman’s duty” in society. She both attacks gender roles and defends them as necessary for social cohesion. In one song, for example, Bahinabai suggests that “the woman who gives herself to her husband in action, word, and thought finds God waiting at her doorstep.” Yet she also sings, “I’ve abandoned all feelings of shame and public decency; I’ve devoted myself to God. What can people expect from me, now that I have no fear, O Sister?” Bahinabai idealizes the role of the “perfect wife,” or pativrata, one who has made a vow (vrata) of fidelity to her husband, or “master” (pati). However, she also reports that when her husband would abuse her, the cows of the village—sacred to many Hindus—would refuse to eat, as if to protest this dishonorable treatment. Indeed, Bahinabai suggests in one song that the success of a partnership between a man and a woman, and the resulting spiritual elevation of the two together, requires the mutual vow of fidelity by both man and woman.

Bahíyyih Khánum

Baha’i holy woman

In 1932, the Baha’i world community was devastated when Bahíyyih Khánum’s death was announced. Baha’u’llah’s eldest daughter and one of the most important members of the holy family, she is considered the Baha’i faith’s outstanding heroine and exemplar of womanhood. Her great-nephew, Shoghi Effendi, guardian of the Baha’i faith, called her station exalted and her life sublime. Known to Baha’is as the “greatest holy leaf,” Bahíyyih Khánum is the closest person that the Baha’is have to a saint.

Born in 1846, from the age of six, along with the rest of her family, she suffered through the imprisonments and banishments of her father, including the horrendous winter crossing over the Persian mountains to Iraq, the frozen sojourn in Edirne (Turkey) hovels, and the years in the worst of the Ottoman Empire’s prisons. At her mother’s death in 1886, she inherited the heavy charge of the household. With a large and constant flow of visitors, pilgrims, and the poor seeking aid and solace, her responsibility could be likened more to that of an executive manager. Yet, Baha’is who met her remember her primarily for her dignity, gentleness, decorum, loving-kindness, constant service, and silence.

Bahíyyih Khánum’s silence was misleading. Her greatest service to the Baha’i faith was the crucial role she played in the maintenance of the community’s unity. This began before her father died, but it was at his death in 1892 that she fully emerged as a pivotal figure in stopping family members from usurping her brother ‘Abdu’l-Baha’s position as successor. Then, when ‘Abdu’l-Baha died in 1921 and Shoghi Effendi became guardian, she was responsible for his acceptance as successor. Her role in maintaining the unity of the Baha’i community during these crisis periods cannot be overstated. During ‘Abdu’l-Baha’s lengthy trip to Europe, the United States, and Canada in 1911–1913, she was in charge of affairs that ‘Abdu’l-Baha could not take care of while he was abroad. Later, she advised Shoghi Effendi and was his most important supporter. During Shoghi Effendi’s many lengthy absences, she was the acting head of the Baha’i faith.

Revered during her lifetime, in her death she was referred to as having led a saintly life, and her remains are considered to be sacred. There are relics from Bahíyyih Khánum in the Baha’i International Archives at the Baha’i World Center. After her death, Shoghi Effendi and the Baha’is prayed to her for intercession, and miraculous healing was attributed to her. Baha’is who owned one of her relics, such as a gown or a ring, used them to increase the potency of their prayers. In an unusual gesture, Shoghi Effendi designated the nine months after her death as an official period of mourning for the whole Baha'i community. Only administrative and devotional meetings were allowed, and individuals were asked to avoid personal celebrations for a full year. Shoghi Effendi erected a monument for her, and her grave is at the heart of the Baha'i World Center. Pilgrims still visit her shrine to pray.

Bakhita, Josephine

Roman Catholic nun, social activist

Josephine Bakhita was formally recognized as a saint of the Catholic Church on October 1, 2000. Born in Olgossa, a village in Darfur, Sudan, in 1869, she is the first African native to be canonized who did not suffer a martyr's death. Through her life witness, she has become a hopeful symbol of emancipation and reconciliation for the war-torn and persecuted people of Sudan. Her personal history confirms the possibility of the restoration of dignity and rights to all people, especially women, who suffer from oppression and violence. Pope John Paul II named her "Our Universal Sister."

Bakhita was kidnapped from her village when she was about nine years old. "Bakhita"—meaning "the fortunate one"—was the name given to her by her captors. She was sold into slavery and suffered great abuse, including whipping, scourging, and the torture of sixty-six tattoos being carved on her breasts, belly, and arms.

The last family Bakhita was sold into was Italian, and it was in Italy that she encountered the Canossian Daughters of Charity. She later wrote, "The saintly Sisters helped me to know God, whom I had experienced in my heart since childhood. I had contemplated the sun, the moon, the stars, and all the things of nature, asking myself who could be the master of it all. I felt a keen desire to see him, know him, and pay him homage" (Stamwitz 1993, 50). Bakhita determined to join the Canossian community. Although the family she was living with tried to force her to return to Africa with them, it turned out that slavery was illegal in Italy, and she was, in every sense, a free woman. Bakhita was baptized in 1890 and took the name Josephine (Giuseppina). She was fully professed as a Daughter of Charity in 1896.

As a member of the religious community, Sister Josephine performed simple tasks such as cooking, sewing, and serving as sacristan and doorkeeper. The essence of her spirituality was in knowing that God is the master of every human life and that doing God's will means being intentional in our love for others and seeking the way to peace and reconciliation: "If I were to meet those slave traders who captured me, even those who tortured me, I would kneel down and kiss their hands, for if things had not happened so, I would not now be a Christian and a religious" (Stamwitz 1993, 51).

Bamba, Ahmad (Amadou)

Muslim sufi, order founder

Shaykh Ahmad (Amadou) Bamba, a Muslim saint and the founder of the Mouridiyyah order, was born in Senegal in 1850. He received his Islamic education from his father and his uncle, Mouhammadou Bouso. Bamba admired sufism and was initiated into the Qadiriyyah order but established his own order, the Mouridiyyah, in 1905. The order focuses on Qur'anic recitation, long prayers, and the remembrance of God (dhikr). Bamba's disciples claimed that he performed numerous miracles. His order attracted many followers, especially among the Wolof people, who had been dehumanized by French rule and injustices. He refused to work for the Senegalese kings and chiefs, whom he perceived as "the instruments of Satan" for their collaboration with the French colonial rule.

Bamba demanded from his followers a total obedience to him and to other Mouridiyyah leaders. His disciples found in his spiritual teachings a sense of belonging and alignment with African culture. He was a charismatic religious leader whose prayers were believed to be answered. His simple lifestyle, devotion, love, and care for the poor attracted many followers. As his influence grew, the French administrators in Senegal became worried. The French exiled Bamba to Gabon, Congo, and Mauritania. He survived the French persecutions and returned to Senegal to spread his Mouridiyyah movement and unite his people through his sufi spirituality.

Bamba was a devout sufi of high character. He introduced his own special prayer litany (wird) in 1912 while in Mauritania. His litany focuses on intensive prayers and praises of the prophet Muhammad. He initiated many disciples into the Mouridiyyah order, including women. Bamba was a man of peace who spent his time in devotion, reading, writing, and teaching Islam. He wrote a few books on Islam, especially on prayer.

Bamba encouraged his followers to be economically independent, and he considered hard work a religious duty and a means of appreciating God's blessings. Members of the order, then and now, have therefore worked hard and disciplined themselves. They engage in agriculture, produce groundnuts, trade, and network among themselves. They also engage in import and export businesses on local, national, and international levels. This financial independence allowed them to be free from the threat and financial pressure of the French colonial rulers.

Bamba died in 1927 and left behind a legacy that has created a community of loving, hardworking individuals who care for one another. Mouridiyyah members are found today in Africa, Europe, and North America. Those in Europe and North America assist those who are in Senegal by sending money home. They continue to revere Bamba and make pilgrimages to his tomb in Touba, Senegal, for they consider him an intermediary (wasilat) to God.

Banarsidas

Jain lay poet

Banarsidas, a Jain lay poet of the Digambara sect (whose monks practice ascetic nudity), was born in 1586 in Agra, India, to a merchant family. His mystical poetry is comparable to that of Kabir and other northern Indian devotional poet-saints in its use of erotic imagery. Banarsidas became a leading exponent of the Adhyatmika (inner soul) movement, an internally focused mystical Jainism inspired by the Digambara philosopher Kundakunda (c. second–third century), who propounded a doctrine of two levels of truth similar to that of the Hindu Shankara and the Buddhist Nagarjuna. Banarsidas and his followers led Digambara Jains away from ritualism and toward mystical devotionalism and a renewal of interest in Kundakunda's philosophy.

Banarsidas wrote an autobiography at age fifty-five. Called Ardhakathanaka (Half a story), it is the tale of the first half of his life, which he spent as an amorous and bookish youth and undisciplined businessman, then as a pious lay ritualist, and his gradual ascent along the scale of Jain stages of spiritual development until he attained a mystical experience similar to enlightenment. Banarsidas disagreed with the Jain traditions that limited the higher stages of spiritual development to a past age; in this respect, he foreshadowed later Jain mystics such as the nineteenth-century Shrimad Rajcandra. Banarsidas's later poetry reflects his mystical transformation, and unlike his earlier work, is not overtly erotic. Banarsidas, having experienced a "dark night of the soul" in which he lost his moral bearing, was able finally to integrate the two levels of truth, conventional and ultimate, and integrate his youthful eroticism and ritualism into a coherent experience, "half a story."

Except for a brief period of study with a Shvetambara (white-robed) monk, Banarsidas seems to have had little contact with renunciants, nor did he seem to feel the need of their presence to live as a good Jain. Although the Adhyatmika movement survived him by only about a century, Banarsidas is still influential among lay Jains, both Digambara and Shvetambara, notably the intersectorian lay movement founded by Shrimad Rajcandra and the Kanji Swami Panth.

Baqir, Muhammad al-

Shi'a Muslim imam

Muhammad al-Baqir was born in Medina in 676, more than four decades after his great-great-grandfather, the prophet Muhammad, passed away. He is considered the fourth imam by the Nizari Isma'ili Shi'a Muslims and the fifth imam by the Ithna-Ash'ari Shi'a Muslims. He was connected to both of the sons of 'Ali b. Abi Talib and to the prophet's daughter Fatima. His mother was the daughter of Hasan, the elder son, and his father, Zain al-abidin, was the son of 'Ali's second son, Husayn. He was about four years old when his grandfather, Imam Husayn, was brutally assassinated by the troops of the Umayyad caliph, Yazid b. Muawiyah, in 680.

Muhammad was called al-Baqir [al-'ilm], "one who splits knowledge open," because of his learning and wise disposition. This designation was appropriate as he has been credited with systematizing many important aspects of Shi'i Muslim thought as well as the field of fiqh (jurisprudence). The ideas of the infallible imam and the necessity of the natiq (speaker) who would interpret the Qur'an were carefully propounded by him. Accordingly, it was only the imam who could correctly lead the community from the outward and evident meaning of the Qur'an to the inward and concealed meaning. Proficient in various aspects of sacred lore and literature, he was greatly sought after as a teacher. He was the foremost authority on the traditions of the prophet, the sira (history of the prophet), and the early community as well as on the apparent and hidden expositions of the verses of the sacred text of the Qur'an.

His brother Zayd, promising to deliver a Utopian existence to the masses, led a popular insurrection against the Umayyad caliph Hisham. Al-Baqir remained aloof from this movement, which was eventually crushed by the authorities. In fact, during his life he consistently stayed away from active involvement in politics and concentrated instead on scholarly activities. According to a narrative that may be either completely or partially apocryphal, he was once brought into the presence of Hisham. Here he ignored the caliph, who of course was extremely angered by this deliberate gesture and imprisoned him for a short time. The reason for the summons apparently had to do with al-Baqir's teachings. He was very concerned with the poverty of the majority of the population while the ruling elite lived in luxury. He constantly lectured on the need of the people to be fair and not to be extravagant in their lifestyles.

Muhammad al-Baqir was imam for nineteen years. He died about 743 and is buried in the cemetery of al-Baqi in Medina.

Baqli, Ruzbihan

(1128–1209 C.E.)

Muslim sufi, writer

Sadr al-Din Abu Muhammad Ruzbihan b. Abi Nasr al-Fasa'i al-Daylami al-Baqi al-Shirazi, born in 1128, was one of the great Persian sufi writer-teachers who articulated the path of ecstatic passionate love ('ishq). Ruzbihan unabashedly recorded his own ecstatic, visionary, and unitive experiences as evidence of an investiture (iltibas) of autonomous spiritual authority related in its theoretical understanding to the sufi legacy and lineage of Abu Yazid al-Bistami (d. c. 875) and Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj (858–922).

Ruzbihan's significance rests not only on his influence on later sufis but on his dramatic descriptions of his own mystical experiences. Few sufi writers draw one so deeply into their inner world of mystical states. Ruzbihan's colorful and vivid visionary prose and densely symbolic passages infuse his writing with poetic and paradoxical presence. He felt that in the "station of unveiling and witnessing" (maqam al-kashf wa-l mushahada) he experienced what he termed an essential union ('ayn al-jam') and unification (ittihad) in which the borders between human and divine reality dissolved, opening him to witness the presence of God in all phenomena.

At the age of seven, Ruzbihan first experienced divine passionate love ('ishq); at age fifteen, he heard his calling as a "prophet," a claim made intelligible by his dictum that the "oceans of prophethood and sainthood interpenetrate." For fifty years, he preached at the principal mosque in Shiraz and taught students. Ruzbihan boasted of his spiritual visions and engaged in outrageous ecstatic utterances (shathiyat), earning him the sobriquet "ecstatic doctor" (shaykh-i shattah). Although he may have entered into discipleship with three sufi masters and practiced in the Kazaruni lineage, he did not claim this or any other affiliation as the basis of his knowledge and experience.

Explaining that the heart is the mirror of the angelic realm, Ruzbihan rooted his exegesis in experiential knowledge, which distinguishes it from the work of "the people of form" (exoteric exegetes) and scholars and philosophers. In what might be called a "hermeneutic of recognition," Ruzbihan found his own mystical experience mirrored in the Qur'an while also recognizing the Qur'an as a light by which his mystical vision was illuminated. Ruzbihan's visionary diary, Kashf al-Asrar (The unveiling of secrets) features initiatic encounters with God, the angels, the prophets, and saints, including, among other eminent spiritual directors, al-Khidr, the "Green One."

The famous world traveler Ibn Battuta (in 1325) and the geographer Hamd Allah Mustawfi (in 1336) reported Ruzbihan's tomb as a major pilgrimage site. Scholars propose that the Persian poet Muhammad Shamsuddin Hafiz (c. 1320–c. 1388) may have been inspired and guided by Ruzbihan's work, especially his attention to passionate theophanic witness in human form. Ruzbihan's great-grandsons created his two hagiographies, Tuhfat ahl al-'irfan (The Gift of the people of gnosis) and Ruh al-jinan (The Spirit of the gardens) and established the Ruzbihaniyya order and the cult of his tomb.

Barbara

(d. c. 303 C.E.)

Christian martyr

Barbara was venerated as a saint immediately after her death around 303 because of miracles that occurred at her tomb. She was patron of a monastery at Edessa and churches at Constantinople and Cairo before her cult spread throughout Europe, with the translation of relics to Ghent in 985. Numerous groups, including artillerymen, prisoners, architects, and librarians, celebrate her martyrdom on December 4. Considered among the "holy helpers" during the fourteenth-century plague, she has been invoked against fever and death without sacraments.

Her vita, composed of legendary materials, is a source for literary texts. In these sources, Barbara, daughter of the wealthy non-Christian Dioscorus of Nicomedia, now in Turkey, is an intelligent and beautiful girl. Her father imprisons her in a tower to prevent her from inflaming men's hearts. Nevertheless, a priest teaches her about Christianity and baptizes her. While her father is at war against the Christians, his workmen are ordered to build a bathhouse with two windows. Barbara, however, wants three, one for each member of the Trinity. Upon her father's return, she announces her conversion. Furious, he attempts to kill her.

Barbara flees and finds sanctuary in a rock, but a shepherd betrays her. Captured, she is implored by her father to marry and rejoin their community. She refuses, because she has committed herself as the bride of Christ. Her father denounces her to the proconsul, who attempts to break her resolve by subjecting her to persecution that recalls Jesus' crucifixion. Virginitly triumphs; Jesus safeguards her body. Mad with rage, her father raises his sword and beheads her; at the same time, a thunderbolt shoots from the sky and lightning inflames and consumes his body. Artists have illustrated her in several poses: by a triple-lancet tower with palm and book; her beheading; and holding a chalice and viaticum.

Barlaam and Josaphat

(c. 4th cent. C.E.)

Christian legendary holy people, bodhisattva

The most famous Buddha legend in Christianity dates from the seventh century. Attributed to John the Monk, Barlaam and Josaphat was reworked into Greek and Latin by the eleventh century. The Latin text was translated into vernacular languages for all literary genres. Thirteenth-century writers Vincent de Beauvais, Jacques de Vitry, and Jacobus de Voragine include it in their collections, which were among the most important sources for literary works in the later Middle Ages. The 1914 English translation of the text follows the structures of medieval courtly romances. The Roman Catholic Church canonized Barlaam and Josaphat, who might have lived in Ethiopia, called India in the text. Their names are found in the Roman Martyrology for November 27 and in the Greek calendar for August 26.

According to these sources, the Buddha figure, Josaphat, reached enlightenment through his love of Jesus Christ. The story takes place in fourth-century India. By then, many Indians had converted to Christianity and were, according to the legend, being persecuted by King Avenir (Abenner). He and his wife remained childless for many years. Upon the birth of a son, astrologers warned them that he would become a Christian. To thwart that prediction, the king had a palace of pleasure built where the youth was reared. As in the story of the Buddha, the mature Josaphat was granted permission to leave his palace and explore the world. However, the king instructed escorts to prevent the prince from learning about unpleasant aspects of life. Nevertheless, Josaphat encountered a beggar, a leper, a blind man, and a gray-haired, toothless old man, in the process acquiring knowledge about illness and death.

Informed about the prince, the hermit Barlaam, disguised as a merchant, arrived in the capital city. Permitted to speak to the youth about the magical properties of a precious gem, the monk used the opportunity to talk to the prince about biblical matters, thereby offering an apology of Christianity. Impressed by the powers of God, Josaphat asked his mentor to make him a Christian. Barlaam baptized him at the pool in the king's palace garden.

Heartbroken at his conversion, the king wanted Josaphat to denounce Christianity. He organized a debate between one Christian and several pagan orators, but rigged it so that the astrologer Namor (Nachor), disguised as Barlaam, would lose the debate. Father and son agreed to follow the teachings of the victor. However, the trick turned against the king, for Namor and the audience became Christians. King Avenir converted, too, and he divided his kingdom so that both he and his son could rule. They broke idols and gave the pieces of silver and gold to the poor, destroyed temples, and built churches. Later, forty days after his father's death, Josaphat distributed his wealth and abdicated the throne so that he might conclude his life in the desert.

Josaphat left the country in the hands of his kinsman Barachias and set out to live with Barlaam. At Barlaam's death, Josaphat, following Barlaam's instructions, buried his mentor next to their cave. When, after thirty-five years in the desert, Josaphat died at age sixty, a monk buried him in the same grave as his spiritual father, and upon learning of the deaths of the two holy men, King Barachias had their remains transferred to a church in the capital. Healing miracles occurred and the people venerated Barlaam and Josaphat as saints.

Basavanna

Hindu Shaivite reformer

Basavanna (Basava or Basavesvara) led an egalitarian Hindu reform movement, the Virashaiva (energy of Shiva) movement, that flourished in Kalyan, India, during the twelfth century and claims several million followers today. Born in 1106 into a prosperous and scholarly brahmin family, as an adolescent Basava tore off the sacred thread that symbolized his high caste and traveled to a temple near the confluence of three rivers. There, he celebrated his vision of the divine as the energy of river merging with river.

In his late twenties, he left the temple and joined an uncle in the employ of Bijjala, the chieftain who later usurped the Chalukya throne. Basava was made Bijjala's accountant, given two well-connected wives, and promoted to chief treasurer. He moved to the capital city, Kalyan, where he and his wives nourished the Virashaiva movement physically and spiritually, establishing an assembly hall where thousands of mostly low-caste men and women were fed and encouraged to debate subjects ranging from astrology to vernacular education.

Guided by his guru, Allama Prabhu, Basavanna composed several hundred pithy sayings, all addressed to his lord of clashing rivers. In vachanas ranging from didactic to mystical, he taught that the divine is innate, gender illusory, caste meaningless, and work sacred. He promoted Kannada as a proper language for prayer along with Sanskrit, and he argued that priestly rituals are unnecessary, that the human body is all the temple that one needs, and that evil deeds are the only pollutants. Like other Virashaivas, he substituted for temples a small stone linga that he wore as an emblem of the Shiva-permeated world. He worshipped the divine in this linga form, in the form of living humans, and in the form of the guru.

In 1167, the priestly hierarchy, which viewed Basavanna as dangerous, persuaded Bijjala to execute two disciples responsible for arranging an inter-caste marriage. Riots ensued; Bijjala was assassinated by a Virashaiva, and Basavanna left Kalyan. According to hagiographers, soon afterward he merged with his lord in the rivers' confluence.

Basho

Zen Buddhist poet

Matsuo Basho is considered to be the creator of haiku. The poetic form of haiku existed prior to Basho, yet its significance was merely that of a literary pastime until he explored and refined the medium, eventually becoming the most influential Zen Buddhist Japanese poet of his time. The history of haiku can thus be seen as a history of Basho's transformation of haiku.

Basho was born near Ueno in Iga Province, Japan, in 1644. His father died in 1656, at which time Basho most likely had already entered into the service of Todo Yoshitada, a samurai of Iga Province, with the hope of becoming a samurai himself. His earliest known verse was written in 1662. It is probable that the death of Todo Yoshitada drove Basho into his life as a wanderer and a poet. He resigned from the service at this time, moving to Kyoto to take up the study of philosophy, poetry, and calligraphy.

Basho began writing critical commentary for haiku contests such as "The Seashell Game" and settled in the first "Basho hut." He found a striking spiritual resemblance between himself and a basho (banana plant) within the hut, which eventually earned him the nickname he gladly accepted. At approximately the same time that Basho's first hut was destroyed by fire, his mother died in Ueno. With these tragedies occurring in such close proximity in his life, Basho took to travel and produced Nozarashi Kiko (The records of a weathered skeleton). He also began practicing Zen Buddhism under the guidance of the priest Butcho (1642–1715).

Basho had a total of more than 2,000 students and wrote approximately 1,000 verses. His influence on haiku is crucial. It is thanks to Basho that haiku reached the more spiritually mature state in which it has remained.

Basil the Great

Christian monk, bishop, theologian, polemicist

Basil the Great is a unique combination of pastoral sensitivity, theological erudition, and ascetical discipline. His unswerving orthodoxy, administrative skill, and temperate personality earned him the title "the Great" and an enduring legacy. Notable for his writings on monastic and spiritual life and against Arianism, Basil represents a unique milieu in the Christian era.

The fourth century was a period of rapid growth and development for the church. Controversies of profound theological significance combined with freedom from persecution and the increasing social status of Christianity to create a volatile era. Many enrolled as catechumens in order to gain the benefits of the faith now favored even by the emperor. At the same time, imperial involvement in church affairs both benefited and afflicted the struggle to define orthodoxy and retain catholic unity. Basil himself came into conflict with the Arian emperor Valens, ultimately battling to victory.

Basil was a pivotal contributor to the rapidly developing monastic movement. Although the impetus for monasticism in early Christianity had many causes, the end of persecution in 313 seems to have had significant impact. Many, finding the newly approved faith too comfortable, sought a more disciplined and committed approach. Thus, the ascetical life became a form of bloodless martyrdom in which the individual sought to focus on spiritual matters above concerns of the flesh. Although not without extremism, the emphasis was not on the physical body as evil, but rather on the superior importance of the spiritual. Basil, whose grandfather had been a fugitive during the persecution of Maximian, clearly saw monasticism as an expression of the apostolic Christian ideal.

Basil and his close friend Gregory of Nazianzus founded a small monastic community on the banks of the Iris River in 358. In preparing for this life, Basil toured Egypt, the birthplace of Christian monasticism, coming in contact with the huge cenobitical communities of Pachomius and the multitude of hermits following the example of Antony of Egypt. As he formulated his own rules (both a long and short version), Basil moderated many of the more extreme practices of the desert hermits. His communal emphasis is seen in the establishment of his monasteries in cities (rather than in remote desert or wilderness). It was expected that the general population would benefit from daily examples of the monks living in their midst. Another important difference is that he opened up monastic life to women, though in separate communities from those of the men.

Modern Greek icon of Basil the Great, dressed as a bishop and holding a jeweled book to represent his importance as a doctor of the church. (Art Directors)

The communal nature of holiness can also be seen in his emphasis on spiritual direction, common prayer, and humility. For these reasons, there is an antagonism toward eremitism (hermits cannot practice humility, since there is no one to humble oneself before). Charitable giving, hospitality, and mutual support were also part of Basil's ascetical teaching and personal life, the more so since Basil had to leave his monastic community in about 364, first as assistant to the bishop in Caesarea and, from 370, as bishop himself.

Perhaps Basil's most enduring and far-reaching contribution to the life of the Church was the liturgy that bears his name. Although significantly modified by later liturgical organizers, the liturgy of Basil the Great became the backbone of the Byzantine rite and influenced greatly the Syrian, Russian, and Slavic rites.

Moderate, well educated, erudite, compassionate, a leader and defender of orthodox catholic faith, Basil the Great was a defining father of the Church at a critical juncture in history. More important, his legacy endured because his life so manifested those characteristics of a true man of faith.

Basri, al-Hasan al-

(642–728 C.E.)

Muslim ascetic, preacher

Al-Hasan al-Basri was a preacher and one of the most famous among the pious and abstemious second-generation Muslims known as al-Tabi'un (successors). Born in Medina in 642 during the period of the Umayyad dynasty based in Syria, he is said to have been the son of a slave who became a client of Zayd b. Thabit, the prophet Muhammad's secretary. Al-Hasan lived in Medina until about 658, when he moved to Basra in Iraq.

Basra was home to many of the prophet's companions during the time of al-Hasan. Al-Hasan soon acquired a reputation for honesty, scrupulosity, and moral uprightness in an era generally regarded as characterized by worldliness and moral laxity. His sermons exhorting people to righteous behavior and upbraiding tyrannical rulers for their wrongdoing have become justly famous. He was known as a brilliant orator, and many of his sayings have become classic gems of wisdom. Two well-known examples are: "Repolish these hearts [the site of true, religious knowledge] for indeed they quickly incline to rustiness"; and "Make the world a bridge which you cross and not a dwelling-place." Al-Hasan's fearless candor did not always go over well with rulers, however. He criticized some of the policies of al-Hajjaj (d. 714), the powerful and repressive governor of Basra, thereby incurring the latter's wrath, and was forced to go into hiding until the governor's death.

Al-Hasan tended to avoid the company of the wealthy and is said to have turned away a rich suitor for his daughter's hand. He was good friends, however, with the female mystic Rabi'a al-Adawiyya (c. 717–801 C.E.). Many are the stories told of the heartwarming camaraderie between them and of a selfless devotion to God that they shared. Other charming anecdotes point to al-Hasan's self-abnegation, abstemiousness, and self-deprecating wit. Because of his stalwart piety and resolute moral integrity, many later groups have claimed al-Hasan as one of their own, particularly the sufis, the mystical practitioners of Islam, as have Sunni Muslims in general, the Mu'tazila (the rationalists), and chivalrous groups.

Since al-Hasan believed that the sinner was fully responsible for his actions, he has also been claimed by the advocates of free will (Qadariyya) as belonging to their school of thought. He is reported to have written a commentary on the Qur'an and a number of scholarly treatises on theology and political thought. Not much has survived of his writings, except for fragments of a few sermons and theological treatises. Many of his wise and pithy statements have been preserved in collections of anecdotes and homilies. Al-Hasan was also an avid narrator of hadiths (sayings) from the prophet Muhammad but is not universally regarded as a highly reliable transmitter of such.

Bauls

Hindu/Muslim/syncretist mystics

Bauls (bah'ool; Bengali, "mad") are itinerant mystics known for their public performances of esoteric Bengali religious songs, especially in northeastern India and Bangladesh. The term may be derived from the Sanskrit vyakula (confused) or vatula (mad) and refers to the fact that Bauls deny most ordinary worldly conventions and pursue an intense "madness" for an indwelling divinity. Bauls are connected with both Hinduism and Islam, but they are nonsectarian, rejecting religious categories in favor of what they call the one true "religion of man" (Salomon 1995). Distinctively dressed in loose garments and coiffed with a rakishly angled topknot, Bauls sing of spiritual practices and divine love accompanied by a one-stringed drone instrument (ektara), drums, and cymbals.

The historical origins of the Bauls are unclear, although the word appears in Bengali texts from the fifteenth through the seventeenth centuries. Their beliefs and practices reflect the influences of a range of earlier religious traditions, including tantric Buddhism, devotional and tantric Hinduism, and sufi Islam. Bauls came to the attention of outsiders when a selection of songs composed by one of the greatest Bauls, Lalan Fakir (Lalan Shah; c. 1774–1890), was published by Nobel laureate Rabindranath Tagore in 1915–1916. Tagore himself was deeply influenced by the Bauls, and he raised them as a model of Indian religiosity and artistry at a time of rising Indian consciousness and nationalism. Yet Tagore and his followers, primarily intellectuals, the urban elite, and Bengali middle classes, emphasized the humanistic side of Baul songs while overlooking the Baul uses of tantric sexual rituals. This "sanitizing" of the Bauls continues today, yet it overlooks the transgressive core practices of many Bauls.

Bauls reject all forms of scriptural authority, from the Vedas to the Qur'an, in favor of the spiritual guidance of the guru. Their songs are composed in colloquial Bengali, using imagery and metaphors from daily life (for example, fishing, boating, trading) to express their belief in an esoteric inner path to the divine. Using ambiguous, enigmatic language, Bauls sing of their search for the elusive "man of the heart" (moner manus), the sacred being that dwells within the human body. Bauls believe that the human body and sexuality are necessary vehicles to reach the divine, and they employ a variety of sexual rituals, breath control, and devotional techniques to attain liberation. They reject celibacy and asceticism in favor of a form of coitus reservatus, in which the male is believed to draw both his own semen and the menstrual blood of his partner upward through the six "centers" (cakras) of the yogic body to the top of the head. This union of the male and female principles leads to the consciousness of sahaja, the "innate" or "natural" state of cosmic unity and bliss that precedes creation. Yet it is only through devotion (bhakti) and divine love (prema) that ordinary lust (kama) can be purified, leading to cosmic consciousness.

Bauls traditionally maintain their own households and communities, guided by a local guru. They perform in public places, on trains, and at outdoor fairs (mela). With their exotic appearance and enchanting songs, they remind the world of alternative ways of seeing reality.

Bede

Christian monk, theologian, historian, doctor of the church

Bede, or the Venerable Bede, was a monk and priest at the remote Northumbrian monastery of Wearmouth and Jarrow in England. Wearmouth/Jarrow was an oasis of culture and learning in a violent and desperate time. Bede, who entered the monastery at the age of seven, grew up amid the books and objects of art brought there from Rome and elsewhere by the monastery's abbots. By taking advantage of these resources, extraordinary in that time and place, Bede became a scholar greatly revered in his own age and in all ages to come, including our own. Among his writings are fifteen works of biblical commentary, five saints' lives, five educational or scientific works, and two histories. Although he was known best for his biblical commentaries in the Middle Ages, it is his Ecclesiastical History of the English People that is the most important for modern scholars and from which we get most of what we know about early England. His work reveals careful scholarship, attention to objective truth, and a concern for the reliability and identity of his sources that was extremely rare in the early Middle Ages.

Bede's extraordinary abilities as a scholar and a teacher are emphasized most often, but he was also well known for his piety and asceticism. A devout monk, he embodied the saintly qualities of justice, mercy, and fairness. He was steadfast in his devotion to God and demonstrated the important combination of humility and strength. His great concern for precision of language and the correct copying of texts reflects the overall aim of his work, which was to better understand and interpret the Bible. He did not approve of the variant Christian practices, Roman and Irish, that had existed in England, but fully espoused the united and universal church of Rome and all its precepts and doctrine. In fact, he has been criticized by some modern scholars for suppressing knowledge of some of the activities of women in the early Anglo-Saxon church because such activities did not conform to the orthodox Roman insistence that women be restricted and cloistered.

Nevertheless, Bede was an extraordinary man and a great teacher. Born in 673, about seventy-five years after Pope Gregory I sent the first missionary to England, through his work he helped to repair the damage from a return to native religion and disintegration of learning and piety that occurred after the first brilliant bloom of Christianity. Due to Bede's diligent teaching, his pupils were able to help perpetuate his high standards in the dark days that followed his death. He continued teaching and correcting texts up to the last moments of his life, but in 735 he died with a hymn of praise to God on his lips. Although miracles occurred at his tomb after his death, his cult was not long-lived. It was as a scholar that he achieved sainthood and eternal fame: He was named a doctor of the church in 1899.

Beguines

(12th cent. C.E.–present)

Christian religious movement

Arising in the twelfth century, the beguines were never a formal religious order, instead occupying a space somewhere between the secular and the sacred. They took their name from Lambert le Bègue, a priest from Liège who advised women to live in community and to minister to the needy. There was freedom within the movement to form whatever type of community was most appropriate for the women involved. All beguines swore chastity while living in the community, though they were free to leave at any time. They took no vows of obedience or poverty, instead pledging manual work. In this, the beguine movement was totally unique in the world of women's spirituality. Though most groups resided in an urban environment, even that was no prerequisite.

One common feature of the beguines was their predilection toward mysticism. Many of these devotions centered on either the image of the desert or the image of the mystical marriage of soul and Christ, which relied heavily on erotic metaphor. The movement was persecuted as a heretical sect beginning in the late thirteenth century, and troubles plagued the groups for years. Though most beguines were incorporated into the regular orders, there was a brief period of reform in the seventeenth century that resulted in the Belgian beguinages that exist today. Studies about women's spirituality in the late Middle Ages abound now, and many of these works touch on the beguine movement in some way.

During the height of the movement, there were vast numbers of beguines. However, today there are four women in particular who are associated with the movement: Beatrijs of Nazareth (1200–1268), Mechthild of Magdeburg (c. 1207–c.

1282), Hadewijch of Brabant (thirteenth century), and Marguerite Porete (d. 1310).

Beatrijs, a well-educated daughter of wealthy parents, voraciously read theological works. Originally from Tienan (in modern Belgium), she learned copying and illumination from the beguines in Rameia, then entered a convent at Maagden-dael before moving to a convent in Nazareth in the Low Countries. In 1237, she was elected prioress, a position she held until her death. Beatrijs enjoyed numerous spiritual ecstasies throughout her life. She was a prolific writer, compiling detailed spiritual diaries, most of which were destroyed upon her death. The only surviving text is a short prose work in Middle Dutch, De seuen manieren van minne (The seven manners of loving), a speculative mystic piece written using courtly love metaphors. Though not technically a beguine, Beatrijs is considered an associate of the movement because she was beguine educated, and because her particular type of mystic experience was evidenced most often among beguines.

Mechthild was born into a noble family. In 1230, she departed for Magdeburg to become a beguine. After living there forty years, she moved to the convent at Helfta, Germany. Her book, Fliessende Licht der Gottheit (Flowing light of the godhead), was written at the urging of her confessor, Heinrich von Halle. It consists of seven subparts, of which books one and two emphasize minne, the sensual relationship between the soul and God. The entire text consists of interwoven prose and poetry.

Though there is practically no extant information on Hadewijch's life, several of her writings survive. These include fourteen visions, forty-five poems, thirty-one letters, and a miscellaneous collection of poems and lists. Reconstruction of her life from letters indicates that at one time she led a group of mystically inclined beguines, though later she encountered problems that led to her isolation. Hadewijch's belief was that one must "live Love." Her letters and poems outline the process.

Marguerite Porete possibly resided at the beguinage in Valenciennes in France, but nothing is certain about her life. Of her death, we know considerably more. Porete was burned at the stake as a heretic in Paris on June 1, 1310, condemned for the distribution of her book Le Mirouer des Simples Ames (The mirror of simple souls), which had been publicly denounced and burned in 1306. The central idea of Mirouer, which takes the form of a dialogue, is the annihilation of the soul through loving submission. Strikingly, the book is addressed almost exclusively to women.

Behem, Hans (Boehm or Boeheim)

(pejoratively known as the "Drummer [occasionally "Piper"] of Niklashausen")

(d. 1476 C.E.)

Christian preacher, visionary

A youthful Franconian herder and sometime village musician burned at the stake by command of the bishop of Würzburg, Germany, in 1476, Hans Behem was born in nearby Helmstadt, but his age at execution is uncertain. The bishop issued his decree in order to end Behem's popular preaching, which had provoked a pilgrimage and a short-lived rebellion with perhaps 40,000 participants.

In mid-Lent, 1476, the Virgin Mary appeared to Behem, commanding him to burn his pipe and drum and preach against vanity and clerical oppression, which he did with the support of his parish priest. Reports spread that his sermons melted snow and would prevent the crop failures that threatened the area. Behem allegedly raised the dead and healed the lame, blind, and mute. Pilgrims brought giant candles and donations and took away scraps of his clothing. Episcopal attempts to suppress the pilgrimage failed; authorities in Bavaria, Nuremberg, and Wertheim feared rebellious pilgrims. On July 2, 1476, the Feast of the Visitation of Mary, Behem preached to huge crowds. Episcopal spies noted elements of his message, including a command to kill priests and a call to popular uprising on St. Margaret's Day (July 13). Pilgrims invaded Eichstätt cathedral, marching around its altars.

After Behem's arrest on July 12, some 16,000 peasants gathered, under the leadership of a local knight, Conrad von Thunfeld, to march, sing, and carry candles to Frauenberg fortress, the episcopal residence, where they demanded Behem's release. Threatened with cannon fire, some dispersed, and thirty-eight were killed when soldiers fired into the crowd. But some of those present reported witnessing another miracle when the Virgin appeared to protect them from the barrage. Behem recanted his teachings under torture before his execution. The Niklashausen pilgrimage and the sale of relics (ashes from his burning) continued until the parish church was placed under interdict. Conrad von Thunfeld lost his freehold but escaped unscathed; the bishop confiscated pilgrim donations, using them to build a wooden arch in his palace that burned in 1481, an event attributed by some to Behem's continuing power.

Several contemporary chronicles discuss these events, especially that of Benedictine abbot Johannes Trithemius. Contemporaries and historians remain divided on whether to interpret Behem's actions as symptomatic of religious enthusiasm or pre-Reformation Marian piety, influenced by a scheming cleric, or motivated by popular rebellion against the economic conditions of the fifteenth century.

Bektash Wali, Haji

(13th–14th cent. C.E.)

Muslim sufi, order founder

One of the most influential figures of Turkish sufism, the founder of the Baktashiyyah order, and the spiritual father of Turkish Alawism, Haji Bektash Wali, or “Hunkar” Haci Bektas Veli, as he is called in Turkish, was born in Nishapur in northern Iran into a prominent Turkish family. His dates of birth and death vary in the historical and apocryphal sources from 1209–1270 to 1248–1337. His father was governor of Khorasan, where Haji Bektash studied religious sciences, philosophy, and mysticism. He traveled extensively and settled in a village near the city of Kirsehir, Turkey, which carries his name today. His life, especially after he received “permission” (ijazat) from his master to give spiritual guidance and counseling, is shrouded in mystery and mixed with legends, stories of miracles, and oral traditions.

Haji Bektash lived during one of the most troubled periods of Turkish history. He saw the decline of the Saljuqid dynasty and the rise of the Ottoman Empire, as well as the Mongol invasion. After his move to Anatolia, he became the patron saint of Turkmen tribes and played a key role in maintaining the social and moral order of the community. The fact that he wrote most of his works in Turkish must have contributed to the rapid spread and popularity of his teachings in Asia Minor and the Balkans. Some of his Turkish-Alawi followers depict him as a protonationalist against the “Arabism” of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. This portrayal of him as a primarily Turkish figure, however, was a posthumous development. He has also been called by some a crypto-Shi'i owing to the significance that he and the Bektashi tradition attach to 'Ali b. Abi Talib, the prophet Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law and the first imam of Shi'ism. Today, Haji Bektash Wali is the central figure of the Alawis of Turkey.

The Baktashiyyah order played a significant role in the Ottoman army corps known as the Janissaries. After the second half of the fifteenth century, many Janissary soldiers became followers of Baktashism. The Baktashis were known for their lax interpretations of Islamic law and rituals and their emphasis on communal bonds, fraternity, and love as a central theme. Thanks to this close proximity with the low-ranking members of the Ottoman military, the Baktashis were involved in a number of revolts against local rulers and in some cases against the Ottoman sultan. This has led many to describe Baktashism as a prominently antinomian mystical order. The abolishment of the Janissary corps in 1826 by Mahmud II forced the Baktashis to curtail many of their activities. In 1925, with the outlawing of all sufi orders in Turkey, the Baktashiyyah order was officially dissolved. It continues to exist today among the Alawi communities of Turkey and Albanian and Macedonian Baktashis in the Balkans.

Haji Bektash's spiritual teachings are recorded in his writings and spiritual discourses and cover a wide range of issues. However, it is difficult to distinguish between what belongs to Haji Bektash himself and what was developed by later Baktashis. His legacy is therefore open to multiple interpretations by scholars as well as by contemporary followers. Haji Bektash preached the basic teachings of sufism. Like his predecessors, he emphasized the inner dimension of religious life and rituals, focusing on the experience of the divine in the here and now. His esoteric teachings defy the conventional legal interpretations of Islam, which he opposed as a form of religious legalism devoid of spiritual significance.

Haji Bektash's legacy is a comprehensive system of ethical teachings and social manners. His ideas on honesty, trustworthiness, sincerity, and respect for others share the mainstream teachings of traditional sufism but have been interpreted as a code of “humanist” and even secular morality by some of his modern followers.

Bellarmino, Robert

Roman Catholic Jesuit, archbishop, cardinal, theologian, doctor of the church

Born in 1542 in Montepulciano, Italy, Robert Bellarmine joined the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) in 1560 and was ordained as a priest in 1570. Early in the 1570s, he taught theology at the University of Louvain in Belgium, then in 1576 he was appointed to the professorship of controversial theology at the newly established Jesuit Roman College in Rome. His lectures at the Roman College became the foundation for his far-reaching defense of Catholic teaching, the De controversiis (Disputations on the controversies of the Christian faith, 1586–1593). This work established his position as a leading scholar of the scriptures, the church fathers, and Protestant theology. As a leading apologist for the Roman Catholic Church, he sought to defeat through reason and argument opponents of the church including, most famously, King James I of England. Bellarmine also made important contributions to other fields of religious scholarship, including the revision of the vulgate Bible known as the Sixto-Clementine of 1592 and a catechism that remained influential for the next three centuries.

Bellarmino undertook an active career in the church. In 1592, he became rector of the Roman College, and later he was appointed provincial of the Naples province by the Jesuit father general Aquaviva. In 1598, he was named a cardinal, and in 1602 he was appointed archbishop of Capua. He took his responsibilities seriously as archbishop and resigned his see in 1605 when he was appointed prefect of the Vatican Library, as he was no longer able personally to fulfill his pastoral obligations. Upon his return to Rome, he also took an active role in the church's central administration. Bellarmine was noted for his austere lifestyle and exemplary life. His charitable activity, as when he ordered that the curtains in his apartment be taken down and used to clothe the poor, led to a reputation of piety and holiness during his lifetime.

In 1627, Bellarmine's important contributions to the church were recognized when he received the appellation of “venerable,” but he was not canonized until the twentieth century. Bellarmine did have supporters within the curia, however, and his beatification was unsuccessfully proposed in 1675, 1714, 1752, and 1832. The long delay was almost certainly the result of his moderate views on papal authority. Bellarmine consistently maintained throughout his life that the pope had only indirect, not direct, authority in temporal matters. This position brought him into disgrace with Pope Sixtus V and ran counter to the official position of the papacy during the century following the Council of Trent (1545–1563). Even if his views on papal authority had been acceptable, his position as a theologian and controversialist was not ideal for recognition as a holy man during the Catholic Reformation. No theologian or controversialist was canonized in the period between 1588 and 1776. Only in the twentieth century did the Catholic Church formally acknowledge Bellarmine (canonized in 1930) and his Jesuit colleague Canisius (canonized in 1925) as saints for their efforts in defending and renewing the church in the century following the Protestant Reformation.

Benedict of Aniane

Christian monk, reformer

Second only to Benedict of Nursia in importance to the history of the Benedictine order, Benedict of Aniane served as the religious adviser to Louis the Pious (Louis I of France) and worked to reform monasticism throughout the Carolingian realm. Born Witiza, the son of a Visigothic nobleman, in around 750, Benedict was brought up at the Carolingian court. Around the age of twenty, he underwent a conversion to the religious life, practicing austerities in secret for three years. He finally entered the monastery of Saint-Seine in 774 after he witnessed the drowning of his brother while on the Lombard campaign. There he refused to follow the Benedictine Rule, preferring to follow the rigorous rules of Pachomius and Basil.

Benedict left Saint-Seine in 779 and retired to a hermitage on family property near Aniane. In 782, he constructed a monastery and instituted the Rule of Saint Benedict, recognizing it as the best form for monastic life. Benedict's success attracted the attention of Louis the Pious, who moved the abbot to a new abbey in the Inde valley, near Aachen, and charged him with overseeing all monasteries in Francia. Benedict played a leading role in the synods of 816 and 817 that produced a series of decrees known collectively as the Monastic Capitulary, which required strict observance of the Rule of Benedict and standard ritual practices within monasteries. He lived the remainder of his days toiling to ensure the success of these monastic reforms. He died on February 11, 821, without seeing those reforms fully realized.

Benedict's work outside the monastery did not diminish his spiritual and ascetic convictions: He practiced the Benedictine ideal of manual labor, working alongside his monks; never ate the meat of four-legged creatures; and practiced the fullest charity toward others, denying himself worldly comforts. Although his contemporary biographer, Ardo, includes miracles in his vita, they are overshadowed by Benedict's monastic zeal. As a gifted scholar and lover of the monastic ideal, Benedict compiled a collection of monastic rules, the Codex regularum (Code of rules); he also compared the Rule of Benedict to other monastic rules in his Concordia regularum (Concord of rules). Benedict demonstrated his concern for orthodoxy when he joined Alcuin in opposing the Adoptionism of Felix of Urgel at a council in Catalonia in 799. To his contemporaries, Benedict represented the highest expression of the monastic ideal, and his reform effort shaped the future of Benedictine monasticism. His feast is celebrated on February 11.

Benedict of Nursia

(c. 480–c. 547 C.E.)

Christian monk, father of Western Christian monasticism

According to tradition, Benedict was born at Nursia in central Italy in about 480, went to Rome for education as a youth, fled to become a hermit in a cave at Subiaco, and then founded a small community of monks at Monte Cassino, for whom he wrote his famous Rule of Benedict. He is thought to have died around 547. His rule began to circulate through Italy and then across the Alps. Under the Frankish emperor Louis the Pious, the monastic reformer Benedict of Aniane (c. 750–821) promoted it as the standard of monastic observance in the West. Every western European reform of religious life until the eleventh century, and a great many thereafter, took Benedict's Rule as its polestar.

Because Benedict stands among the greatest saints of the Christian West, it is ironic that almost nothing can be known with certainty of his life. The traditional dates of his birth and death are almost impossible to substantiate. Everything we know about the course of his life comes from the sixth-century Dialogues of Pope Gregory the Great (c. 540–604), himself a monk and abbot before assuming the papacy. Benedict is the subject of the second Dialogue, written at the end of the sixth century, which mostly relates stories of his miracles. A monumental text of Western hagiography, it is nonetheless of little value for reconstructing the biography of the saint, and some have even doubted its authorship, suggesting origins a century or more later. Yet it cannot be doubted that a body of oral tradition about the rule's author circulated among Italian

Benedict of Nursia holding a crozier. Below, Benedict gives commands to his model disciples, Placidus and Maurus. Thirteenth-century French massbook. (Erich Lessing/Art Resource) monks from the earliest times, and in any case the rule had an author who was without question a wise and perspicacious leader of monastic communities. It is as author of the rule that Benedict is known and loved.

A fairly brief document of seventy-three short chapters, the Rule of Benedict establishes and regulates the life of a small community living under the authority of an abbot who administers with discretion and moderation. The life prescribed by the rule is one of humility, obedience, and hospitality, tempered at every turn by moderation and steeped in silence. It is a life of prayer balanced by simple manual labor; indeed, “prayer and work” has become a Benedictine motto. The rule’s regimen of communal prayer, the “opus dei” or “work of God,” consisting mostly of Psalms chanted seven times daily, became a model for the divine office in the West.

The author of the rule reveals himself as someone who is not only a wise monastic administrator but an astute student of previous monastic rules, most especially the anonymous and difficult Rule of the Master. After some decades of fierce debate about which was composed first, scholars are now more or less agreed that Benedict’s Rule borrows heavily from this text, often word for word—but there is no question that Benedict’s text comes out briefer, crisper, cleaner, and wiser.

The rule continues to animate Western monastic life and is observed by monasteries of men and women in the Benedictine, Cistercian, and Camaldolese orders. Whatever its biographical value, Gregory’s account of Benedict became one of the three or four most important Latin hagiographies of the Middle Ages, a text of monumental importance.

Benedict is said to have been buried at Monte Cassino, but the monastery of Fleury-sur-Loire in France claims to have stolen Benedict’s body in the ninth century. The dispute is still unresolved.

Benedict the African

Roman Catholic friar

In many ways, Benedict the African’s holiness replicated that of the saints of the early Christian church. He undertook a strict monastic lifestyle, cared for the poor, and offered advice and religious direction to those who sought it. Born of African servile parents in Messina in Sicily in 1526, he was freed at the age of eighteen and at first earned his living as an agricultural worker. Mocked in his early life for his poverty, race, and servile origins, he went on to join a group of hermits who lived in the hills near San Fratello under the direction of Jerome Lanza. When Jerome died, Benedict was immediately chosen as his successor. In 1564, Pope Pius IV disbanded the community of hermits and they were absorbed into the Friars Minor of Strict Observance. Benedict thus became a lay brother and cook at the Franciscan community of Santa Maria de Jesus at Palermo.

Although only a lay brother, Benedict was appointed superior in 1578. He accepted the office with some reluctance and successfully implemented the adoption of a stricter interpretation of the Franciscan rule. He later became novice-master, but his humility caused him to despise the post, and he returned to his former position as cook. He was a model superior, however. His advice and direction were much in demand, and he won the esteem and obedience of his fellow monks.

Benedict’s reputation for holiness and for being a sympathetic and understanding religious counselor brought him many visitors. He was respected for his deep, intuitive understanding of theology and scripture and for his feeding and clothing of the poor and hungry. Although he worked closely with other men and women, there was a sense in which Benedict was viewed as a distinct and more spiritual being, forming a connection between the human and the divine world. During his lifetime he had a reputation as a miracle worker. He even died at the hour he foretold, on April 4, 1589. Posthumously, cures believed to be miraculous followed his intercession. On his death, King Philip II of Spain paid for a special tomb for him in the Friary Church at Palermo. His body was reported incorrupt when exhumed several years later.

Benedict became patron saint of Palermo. His cult swiftly spread through Italy and further afield to Spain and even to South America. Yet he was not beatified until some 154 years after his death, and his canonization came even later, in 1807.

Benno of Meissen

(c. 1010–c. 1106 C.E.)

Christian bishop

Benno was bishop of Meissen (near Dresden in Germany) and is now patron saint of Munich and Bavaria. Though little is known of his life, he was likely born into a noble family in Hildesheim, Saxony, in 1010. He was a canon at the imperial collegiate church of Goslar, and thus a priest, when King Henry IV appointed him bishop of Meissen in 1066.

As bishop, he was one of several prominent Saxon figures during that region's revolts against the German king and throughout the Investiture Contest, a conflict in which the emperor and the pope fought for control of the church in Germany. Benno tended to oppose the king, yet several times he vacillated. Henry dispossessed Benno of his see in 1075, but Benno reconciled with him a year later. Benno turned against Henry again in 1077, supporting Rudolf of Swabia's campaign for the throne. Bishops subservient to Henry, now emperor, deposed Benno in 1085 at the synod of Mainz. By pledging obeisance to the emperor's antipope, Clement III (Guibert of Ravenna), in 1088, Benno regained his see. As the tide turned gradually against the emperor, Benno changed his allegiance in 1097 back to the pope in Rome, Urban II. Benno died in about 1106.

Much more is known about devotion to Benno after his death. Miracles at his tomb in the cathedral of Meissen are credited to his intercession from the thirteenth century on. A monk in Hildesheim wrote a short life story of Benno as a monk there. George the Bearded, duke of Albertine Saxony, took an interest in Benno's canonization and commissioned the humanist scholar Hieronymus Emser to write a new biography in the early sixteenth century. This work, Divi Bennonis vita (The life of St. Benno), first published in 1512, contains many stories about Benno that cannot be verified in older sources, and some are surely false. Emser, for example, described Benno as a persecuted bishop, always true to the pope, an ardent church reformer, and an effective missionary to the Slavs. Stories are told of Benno turning water into wine for the sake of parched field-workers; silencing frogs for disturbing his prayer, but then giving them their voice back once he decided that their croaking could give as much praise to God as his prayers; discovering in a fish served to him for supper the cathedral door key that he had tossed in the river years earlier to prevent the building from being vandalized; and appearing in ghostly form after his own death to an overbearing Meissen official, who consequently died of fright.

Pope Hadrian VI canonized Benno in 1523. In reaction, Martin Luther denounced devotion to Benno, and in particular, Emser's biography. In 1539, Albertine Saxony became officially Protestant, the cathedral of Meissen was sacked, and Benno's tomb was desecrated. In 1576, the duke of Bavaria, as part of a broader strategy to reinvigorate Catholicism in the face of spreading Protestantism, succeeded in obtaining Benno's remains from Saxon officials. These relics were solemnly enshrined in Munich's Church of Our Lady, and Benno became the principal patron saint of Munich and Bavaria. He is also a saintly guardian of fishermen and textile workers and is invoked for protection against drought and bad weather. His feast day is June 16.

Bernard of Clairvaux

Christian monk, spiritual writer

Bernard of Clairvaux is one of the outstanding figures of the medieval Christian church and to this day remains controversial in terms of his sanctity and involvements in the world. His decision in 1113 to join a fledgling new monastery at Cîteaux, France, provided a point of departure for the spread of a reformed monasticism that from 1119 became the Cistercian order, the first monastic order in western Europe. In 1115, Bernard was sent from Cîteaux with some of his brothers and school friends to found the monastery of Clairvaux in Champagne.

Under Bernard's abbacy, Clairvaux founded more than 150 daughter houses and became a spiritual powerhouse of the Cistercian order. From the late 1120s, Bernard began to involve himself in questions of church politics, and the second quarter of the twelfth century has been called "The Age of Bernard" in medieval Europe. At the same time that he was arbitrating the affairs of churches and monasteries, he was composing works of spiritual guidance that are among the greatest achievements of medieval monastic literature. Bernard's eighty-six sermons on the Song of Songs are masterpieces of Latin in terms of style, rhetoric, and depth of thinking.

Bernard was born into a prominent Burgundian family belonging to the lower nobility in 1090. We know little about his early years and education, but his Latin style indicates that he had good teachers, probably some of the secular canons at Châtillon-sur-Seine. Later stories about Bernard indicate that from his teenage years he attracted other men to his circle and at the same time felt strongly attracted to women. When he made his decision to enter a monastery, he looked around for likely candidates and apparently chose Cîteaux because of its reputation for asceticism and distance from worldly concerns. Bernard's abbot at Cîteaux, Stephen Harding, was an administrative genius who provided the foundation for the new Cistercian order. He seems also to have been an excellent judge of people and took the risk of sending Bernard off at the tender age of twenty-five in order to found one of the first daughters of Cîteaux, Clairvaux.

Bernard managed to attract capable young men from near and far, and Clairvaux was soon full of novices, who seldom were allowed to remain long in Bernard's proximity but were sent out to found new daughter houses. At the same time, Bernard was devoted to the spirit and letter of the Rule of Benedict and looked upon himself as both father and mother to his monks. His increasing involvement in church affairs, however, often kept Bernard away from his monastery, and in the 1130s his presence for almost three years in Italy in order to solve a papal schism may have caused some concern. There is at least a later story about how some of the monks of Clairvaux experienced Bernard returning to them at night in a spiritual fashion in order to inspect the monastery and see that all was well.

Bernard is today remembered and criticized especially for two activities: his pursuit of the scholar and teacher Peter Abelard as a heretic and his preaching of the Second Crusade. Bernard claimed that his campaign against Abelard was the result of the appeals of his friends to stop Abelard from spreading new and false teaching on the Trinity. It is an open question, however, whether Bernard understood what Abelard was saying, and it is difficult to defend Bernard's tactics in having Abelard condemned unheard. As for the crusade, Bernard had a much better grasp of the heavenly than the earthly Jerusalem and allowed his vision to convince him that it was time to send men of arms to defend Christian lands in Palestine and elsewhere. The result was a military disaster that shocked Bernard and perhaps drove him back to his monastery for his last years.

Bernard was and is a controversial person, whose holiness has been discussed and debated ever since his own time. He had enemies who temporarily blocked his official canonization as a saint, which did not come, despite Cistercian efforts, until 1174, more than twenty years after his death. But Bernard could also be a loyal and devout friend, and he contributed to an important new literature emphasizing the worth of bonds of friendship in the religious life. A spiritual lover to his friends, a terrible scourge of his enemies, Bernard needs to be seen as representative of the religious passion of the first great medieval reformation of the Christian church. He can perhaps best be approached in his letters, which are works of literary art that still reveal a person. Also to be recommended are some of his treatises, such as De diligendo Deo (On loving God), where he gave advice to his monks and renewed the language of monastic spirituality. Bernard's feast day is still held, especially in the male and female houses of the Cistercian order, on August 20.

Bernardino of Siena

Christian friar, reformer, preacher

Bernardino of Siena, a Franciscan friar, was one of the greatest preachers of the late Middle Ages in western Europe and contributed to the last medieval reformation of the Christian church. Attaching himself to a reformed branch of the Franciscans, known as the Observants, Bernardino in the course of his career drew many men to his order and carried on the work of Francis in bringing the gospel to the byways of Italy. Unlike Francis, however, Bernardino involved himself intimately in political affairs, for he set out to clean up the ethical and moral practices of daily life in the rich and proud cities of the peninsula. He denounced gambling and usury as well as witchcraft and popular superstitions. Unfortunately, he was also an enemy of the Jews and a scourge of homosexuals.

Bernardino at the age of twenty joined with some of his friends in looking after plague victims in Siena and subsequently nursed a dying aunt. Joining the Observant Franciscans in 1402, he spent several years as a solitary in a cell at Fiesole outside of Florence. From 1417, however, he began to preach, and in the coming years he walked up and down the length of Italy with hellfire and damnation sermons that could last for two to three hours. He would regularly hold up a card with the letters “IHS” (a standard abbreviation used to signify the name of Jesus), his attempt to spread devotion to the name of Jesus, as is seen in many fifteenth-century paintings of Bernardino.

At one point, Bernardino was accused of heresy and denounced to Pope Martin V, but eventually he was cleared of the charges against him. He was offered various bishoprics, but like his namesake Bernard of Clairvaux, he refused them, preferring to continue as a preacher. In 1430, however, he did accept the title of vicar general of the Friars of the Strict Observance. In 1442, he was present at the Council of Florence and supported its attempt to heal the schism of the Eastern and Western churches. In the final missionary journey of his life, he is said to have preached fifty days in a row.

In 1444, Bernardino died on the road at Aquila, where he was buried, much to the resentment of the citizens of his native Siena. Miracles were reported at his tomb, and he was canonized in 1450 by Pope Nicholas V. His feast day is May 20. Bernardino has been called the “People’s Preacher,” and in his passion for the imitation of Christ he represents the desire of late medieval Christians to live in harmony with the commands of the gospel. Some have criticized him, however, for the near-fanaticism of his religious enthusiasms.

Bernward of Hildesheim

Christian bishop, politician, patron of arts

Bernward was appointed bishop of Hildesheim (Germany) in 993. A remarkable patron of the arts, this well-traveled cleric was highly esteemed at the imperial courts of the Ottonian rulers Otto II and Otto III. Of noble birth, he served as a notary at the imperial court of Otto II from 977 and acted as tutor to the young Otto III (son of Otto II and the Byzantine princess Theophanu). He traveled extensively with the imperial household and on ecclesiastical business, including several journeys to Rome.

Bernward’s patronage of the arts is still evident today in a number of impressive works associated with the Benedictine abbey church of Saint Michael at Hildesheim, which was built under his direction. With his supervision, the Hildesheim workshops of the late tenth and early eleventh centuries produced several notable works in cast bronze (an art revived at Hildesheim during this period), including candlesticks, a large bronze column for the interior of the church, and monumental bronze doors for the entrance. Perhaps inspired by works of ancient and early Christian art that Bernward had seen at Rome, these objects remain today among the most impressive examples of Ottonian metalwork. The narrative scenes on the column and the complex typological (pairing of Old and New Testament) scenes on the bronze doors have been credited to Bernward’s erudite direction. A number of smaller metalwork objects and manuscripts are also associated with Bernward’s patronage.

Bernward was canonized in 1193, and a vita composed around this period added further and legendary details to the deeds of this illustrious man, including descriptions of his own skills as an artist. His cult grew through the following centuries, and he is frequently depicted in art holding his bishop’s crosier and a cross reliquary, attended by an angel. His feast day is November 20.

Beruria

(2nd cent. C.E.)

Jewish scholar

In rabbinic narratives, Beruria is the wife of Rabbi Meir, an important mid-second-century rabbi. She is described in early rabbinic texts as having been the most learned woman of her time, a person of impressive acuity and erudition. One text reports that Beruria studied 300 texts, with 300 teachers, every day; in context, this appears as a generic description of extreme devotion to the study of Torah, and it is noteworthy that Beruria, a woman, was chosen as the exemplar of such dedication. The only legal ruling ascribed to Beruria, however, is reported in a more widely circulated text in the name of a male authority (Rabbi Judah) who apparently endorsed her view; it seems that later rabbinic editors were more impressed by his endorsement than by Beruria’s having formulated the opinion in question.

Other narratives depict Beruria as a person of wit (sometimes sharp) and gentle sensitivity to others. She rebuked her husband because he prayed for the destruction of evildoers rather than of evil; a famous later story, not found in contemporary materials, relates that she delayed informing him of the simultaneous death of their two sons until the Sabbath was over, and then told him only that precious items that had been entrusted to them had been reclaimed by their owner.

A later commentator recounts that Beruria's femininity was eventually her downfall. When she chided her husband over the prevalent rabbinic opinion that "women are light-headed," he set out to defend his colleagues' view. He instructed one of his disciples to seduce her, and after much resistance on her part the young man succeeded. Beruria then killed herself out of shame, and Rabbi Meir suffered from remorse the rest of his days.

Several of the best-known stories about Beruria cannot be found in materials from her own time. The idea of a learned woman continued to fascinate (and disturb) later teachers, and they developed new materials reflecting their own reactions to this notion; even the story of Beruria's death ultimately serves to justify the patriarchal character of the tradition. It is therefore extremely difficult to assess the accuracy of any of the stories about this woman; she persisted in rabbinic memory as representative of a certain possibility rather than as an actual human being.

Bhakti Saints

Hindu devotees

In bhakti or devotional Hinduism—the most pervasive form of Hinduism practiced today—holy people play a central role, for within bhakti, religious authority is based on religious experience and the quality of a person's relationship with the divine rather than on hereditary priestly status or textual knowledge. The saints of bhakti composed songs of great love for God, which then became the principle texts of the tradition, and the stories of their lives were recorded in vast compendia called bhaktamals (garlands of devotees). It is the depth of their love for God that is the basis for their being treated as saints—a sainthood conferred by the consensus of later devotees rather than by any centralized institutional authority.

The word bhakti comes from the Sanskrit root bhaj, which carries with it a complex set of meanings, including not only to love and adore but also to distribute, to partake of, to put on, to possess, to share, to practice, to choose, and to serve (Ramanujan 1981, 104). "Devotion" offers a shorthand for speaking about this complex relationship of love that exists between human and divine, ranging from humble adoration to an overwhelming and complete possession by the divine, such that only God remains. Every type of human love becomes a training ground and a language for speaking about this deeply personal relationship—the love between parents and children, the fidelity of servant for master, the bond of friendship, and the passionate desire of lovers. This love finds its expression in the mother tongue rather than in the formalized religious language of Sanskrit, and in the face of such love, caste and gender hierarchies appear meaningless and are directly challenged.

These Hindu devotees experience and speak of God in much the way Christians and Muslims might (though they view God as all in all, with the world in all its variation as a manifestation of God rather than God's creation). Recognizing their love of God, Muslims in India have venerated these Hindu saints and sung their songs, even as Hindus have venerated and sung the songs, or pirs, of sufi saints. These Hindu bhaktas (devotees) or sants (those who know the truth) may experience God in a particular form (saguna, or "with form")—as Vishnu or Vishnu's incarnations of Krishna or Rama, as Shiva, or as the Devi or Goddess—or as transcending any manifest form, that is, as nirguna (without form). Those claiming the latter experiences are the ones usually called sants.

These saints have emerged in the context of a series of religious reform movements, each with its own distinctive character and set of saints, in a radical democratizing of religion in Hinduism. Beginning in southern India in the Tamil-speaking region in the sixth to the ninth centuries, we find the Alvars (those "immersed in God"), who were devoted to Vishnu, and the Nayanars, who offered loving service to Shiva. In the Kannada-speaking region from the tenth to twelfth centuries, we find the Virashaivas, who embraced a radically egalitarian devotion to Shiva, and moving north, devotion focusing on Vitthal, a regional form of Krishna, beginning in the thirteenth century in the Marathi-speaking region.

From the fourteenth to the seventeenth centuries, a vast number of saints also appeared in northern India, some practicing a nirguna devotion, such as the weaver Kabir, the leatherworker Ravidas, and the founder of the Sikh tradition, Nanak. Vaishnava devotion to Krishna also flowered, with Vallabha founding the Pushtimarg, "the way of grace";

Surdas lovingly describing Krishna's incarnation; the followers of the ecstatic Bengali saint Chaitanya founding the Gaudiya tradition; and the royal woman devotee Mirabai singing of her great longing for her divine lover. Meanwhile, Tulsidas of Banaras composed a tremendously popular version of the story of Sita and Ram; Shaiva devotion developed in Kashmir; and devotion to the Devi grew in Bengal, epitomized in the songs of Ramprasad Sen. Regardless of sectarian affiliation that might be claimed on behalf of some of these saints, they also collectively constitute a wider family of saints who belong to all devotees of God, whether nirguna or saguna.

Bhaktivedanta, A. C., Swami

Vaishnava Hindu teacher, founder

A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, known to his followers as Prabhupada (lit. "at the feet of the master"), was the founder of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) in 1965 and the most prominent acarya (teacher by means of model behavior) for Hare Krishnas until his death in 1977. Considered by his followers to be a pure devotee of Krishna, he came to the United States from India in 1965 with only $40 and a trunk of books and within a few years built up an international organization with more than sixty centers and about 5,000 followers around the world. He was a representative of the Vaishnava sect of Hinduism founded by the god-saint Chaitanya in the sixteenth century.

Born as Abhaya Caran De into a middle-class family in Calcutta in 1896, he completed his bachelor's degree at Scottish Church's College, but under the influence of Mahatma Gandhi's civil disobedience movement he refused to accept the degree. He met his spiritual teacher, Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati, in 1922 and received formal initiation from him in 1933. In 1959, he was initiated as a sannyasi (renunciant) under the name Bhaktivedanta Swami. Acting on the instructions of his guru, Bhaktivedanta Swami carried the message of Krishna consciousness to the United States, where he found fertile soil among discontented American youth of the 1960s.

Bhaktivedanta Swami was the author of English translations of the Bhagavad Gita, the Bhagavata Purana (in sixty volumes), and the Caitanya-caritamrita (seventeen volumes) and wrote numerous other independent works. His message was that Krishna is the supreme personality of godhead and that all living beings are his eternal servants. The living beings of the material world have forgotten that relationship and thus suffer in the cycle of repeated birth and death. One can reestablish one's relationship with Krishna by chanting the Hare Krishna mantra (Hare Krishna Hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna Hare Hare; Hare Rama Hare Rama, Rama Rama Hare Hare) and engaging with one's body, mind, and speech in the service of Krishna.

Bhave, Vinoba

Hindu religious leader, social activist

Born September 11, 1895, to a brahmin family in the village of Gagode in the Kolaba district near Bombay, Vinoba Bhave became one of the closest associates of Mahatma Gandhi. After hearing a speech by Gandhi at Benaras Hindu University, Bhave began to live in Gandhi's ashram, where he distinguished himself as a teacher and for his willingness to perform any task, however menial or polluting. Bhave was imprisoned several times for speaking against British rule, and in 1940 he was chosen by Gandhi to publicly fast against all war as part of Gandhi's strategy of nonviolent resistance, often known as satyagraha (firmness in truth). The record of numerous correspondences between Gandhi and Bhave testify to their closeness during the course of India's struggle for independence.

After Gandhi was assassinated in 1948, Bhave was seen as his natural successor. In the early 1950s, Bhave began to travel throughout India as part of his Sarvodaya (compassion for all) movement, which emphasized land grants to the poor. He also established the Shanti Sena, or "army of peace," composed of individuals dedicated full-time to the service of the community. Bhave envisioned a social movement in which entire villages would share land, property, and communal responsibilities.

From the 1950s to the 1970s, Vinoba Bhave was a religious figure of international stature. He exerted a formative influence on Bede Griffiths, the English Benedictine who came to live in India as a renunciant. Griffiths (1966) wrote of meeting Bhave and envisioned Sarvodaya as an important ground of encounter between Catholics and Hindus. Although Bhave was for many “India’s walking saint” (Tennyson 1955), for others he was an object of ridicule. V. S. Naipal (1972), for example, lampooned Bhave and Sarvodaya as emblematic of the Indian inability to come to terms with modernity. As the focal point for such contending perceptions of the trajectory of independent India, Vinoba Bhave was indeed the successor to Mahatma Gandhi.

Bhikshu, Acharya

Jain reformer

The Jain reformer Acharya Bhikshu (Bhikanji) was founder of the rigorously ascetic and universalistic Terapanthi subsect of Shvetambara Jainism (whose monks wear white robes). He and his followers practice a radical form of ahimsa (nonviolence), going so far as to discourage, at least in theory, worldly acts of charity on the grounds that these acts bind one to this realm of transmigration. In practice, however, Acharya Bhikshu’s radically world-renouncing stance is complemented by an equally radical world-engaging stance: Terapanthis have become active reformers in India and abroad.

Acharya Bhikshu was born in Rajasthan in northern India into a pious merchant family in 1726. The influence of this upbringing can be seen in his writings, which frequently employ business metaphors, including an emphasis on plain dealing and honesty. He set out to purify his soul under the guidance of the Sthanakvasi (an iconic Shvetambara) teacher Raghunathji, who initiated him in 1751. However, he became increasingly dissatisfied with what he considered the laxity, corruption, and doctrinal ignorance of the Jains of his day. In 1759, Bhikshu finally broke with his teacher over financial issues, especially mandatory almsgiving to monks by laity, which, according to his research, had no scriptural basis. His goal was not to found a new sect but to return to the rigorous reforming spirit of Mahavira (trad. 599–527 B.C.E.), the (re)founder of Jainism.

After a period of rejection and persecution, Bhikshu eventually became the founder and acharya (spiritual teacher) of a reforming sect that grew from an alleged original thirteen members (one possible origin of the name Terapanthi, “the path of the thirteen”) to become a centrally organized sect. Bhikshu considered centralization necessary to prevent dissent and division in the community. Before his death in 1803, he named his own successor, and there have been nine successive acharyas, including the famous Acharya Tulsi.

Acharya Bhikshu drew a sharp distinction between the worldly, or conventional (laukika), realm and the transcendent, or ultimate (lokottara), realm. The former is the ordinary world of transactions, including the pursuit of spiritual merit by good works of charity and devotion. The latter is attained by renunciation of all worldly merit in favor of self-purification, and according to Acharya Bhikshu is the only true goal for a Jain.

Bihbihani, Muhammad Baqir

Shi’i Muslim reformer, legislator

Sayyid Muhammad Baqir Bihbihani, known as Vahid (unique or peerless) Bihbihani, is regarded by Shi’is as the mujaddid (renewer) of Islam for the thirteenth Islamic century. He is also called Ustad-i Akbar (the most great teacher). He swung Shi’i Islam decisively away from the Akhbari school of law and toward the Usuli school, which has predominated up to the present day.

The Akhbaris favor a more cautious approach to jurisprudence, giving legal opinions only where there is a clear precedent for doing so in the traditions (akhbar) from the prophet and the imams. The Usulis widen the areas in which it is possible to give religious judgment through the use of ijtihad, the derivation of legal opinions using rational processes as part of the principles (usul) of jurisprudence.

Bihbihani was born in Isfahan, the capital of the Safavid Empire of Iran, in 1706 and is a descendant of the prophet Muhammad and of Shaykh al-Mufid, a prominent tenth- and eleventh-century Shi'i scholar. His early years were, however, the dying days of that empire, and in 1722 Isfahan was taken by a Sunni Afghan army and the Safavids toppled from power. Bihbihani fled to Karbala in Iraq, where he obtained most of his religious education from the prominent Shi'i scholars in that city. At this time, the Akhbari school of law predominated at Karbala and in most parts of the Shi'i world, and Bihbihani adopted this teaching. By the 1730s, he had completed his education and moved to the small town of Bihbihan in southwest Iran, where he became a local religious leader.

He remained there for some years and at some time during this period changed over to the Usuli school of law. In 1746, he returned to Karbala and began to teach. He found it difficult at first because of the predominance of the Akhbari school; however, after the death of Shaykh Yusuf Bahrani in 1772, Bihbihani was able to secure the triumph of the Usuli school at Karbala. He then spent the next twenty years, until his death in 1792, training the next generation of scholars in the Usuli school. It was this generation that took Usuli teachings to the whole of the Shi'i world and ensured its universal triumph. Bihbihani's writings defined the Usuli school and the role of the mujtahid (one who exercises ijtihad) for succeeding generations of Shi'i religious scholars.

Bimbisara

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist ruler, patron

King of Magadha, an ancient kingdom of India, in the fifth century B.C.E. and a contemporary of the Shakyamuni Buddha, Seniya Bimbisara was one of the first important kings who was a patron of Buddhism. He was five years younger than the Buddha and died eight years before him. They had been childhood friends. When the Buddha returned to Rajagriha after attaining enlightenment, Bimbisara paid him and the Buddha preached to Bimbisara on the value of generosity and morality, heavenly reward, the pitfalls associated with the depravity of sense pleasures, and the Four Noble Truths. It was on this occasion that Bimbisara attained the first level of enlightenment (shrotapanna). On the following day, Bimbisara invited the Buddha along with one thousand monks to a meal and donated the Veluvana, the first dwelling used by the early Buddhist community during the rainy season, to the samgha (monastic community). From this time until his death, Bimbisara was a steadfast devotee of the Buddha.

Bimbisara has been connected to several incidents in the history of Buddhism. He not only showed respect and affection for the Buddha in person but was also known to have been considerate to Buddhist monks. During his lifetime, he received some hairs and nail pairings of the Buddha, and he built a stupa inside the royal palace enshrining these. Bimbisara often consulted with the Buddha, as he was keen to rule according to the dharma (Buddhist doctrine). The Buddha also valued Bimbisara's opinion and at his suggestion made the vinaya (monastic discipline) rule that no one who was in royal service, had committed theft, or escaped from jail should be ordained as a monk. The recital of the rules of discipline (pratimoksha) on the eighth and the last days of each half month was also Bimbisara's idea, and it was Bimbisara who suggested beginning the observance of the retreat during the rainy season (varshavasa) from the second full moon. Another rule—that certain medicines should not be stored for more than seven days—was also made at his suggestion.

Bimbisara was instrumental in motivating many members of his household to take an interest in Buddhism. The story of his queen, Khema, is worth mentioning. She was so infatuated with her own beauty that she refused to see the Buddha, but Bimbisara somehow persuaded her to pay a visit. When she came face-to-face with the Buddha, he showed her the transitoriness of beauty and the vanity of lust. Thereupon she became an arahant (enlightened being) and with the permission of Bimbisara entered the samgha. Later she became one of the most famous nuns in the history of Buddhism and was ranked by the Buddha as foremost among women for her great insight.

Bimbisara suffered very badly at the hands of his son Ajatashatru. Bimbisara loved him so much that he abdicated in his favor; Ajatashatru rewarded him by imprisoning him and then causing his death. According to the Digha Nikaya (Collection of long discourses), he was reborn in the deva-realm of the Four Great Rulers (cattummaharajika) in the retinue of Lord Vessavana, having only one wish: to become a once-returner (sakadagamin) and then to attain the supreme deliverance of nirvana.

Birech, Ezekiel Kiprop

Christian missionary, translator

Bishop Ezekiel Kiprop Birech was born in 1910 in Nandi District, Kenya, where he lived an ordinary boyhood life of herding animals. At an early age, he was employed at a settler's farm at Eldoret to lead the oxen. At the farm he met an African cook, Wanyama, a Christian who knew how to read and write. Wanyama taught Sunday school to the children working on the farm and introduced them to the alphabet. In 1926, when there was an eclipse of the sun, many people believed that the end of the world spoken about by the Christians had come. This marked the turning point for the young Birech, who decided that he needed to read the Bible for himself and teach his own Nandi people about Jesus Christ.

Birech left his job and went to Africa Inland Mission School at Kapsabet, where he started elementary school at the age of sixteen. In 1930, he moved to Moiben and joined the catechism class. He was baptized in 1932 and given the name Ezekiel. He then went to intermediate school at Kapsabet, where he successfully completed his primary education in 1938. It was at this time that he underwent circumcision rites according to Nandi tradition.

In 1939, Birech was employed to teach at Kapsabet Mission School, where he met Milka Cheplel, and they got married in a Christian wedding in 1943. His contribution to the church henceforth was significant. Besides evangelization, he was a teacher, and later he was promoted to supervisor for all Protestant schools of the African-instituted churches (AICs) in the region.

Birech was appointed secretary to the committee that translated the Bible into Kalenjin between 1954 and 1969. He also undertook to revise the Nandi hymnal and translated Pilgrim's Progress into Kalenjin. He decided to go back to secondary school when he was over fifty years old. In 1975, he enrolled at Scott Theological College, and he was ordained as an AIC minister in 1977. He was posted as pastor in Nandi, became assistant bishop in 1978, and became bishop in 1980, a post he held for four terms until 1997.

Bishop Birech's vision of evangelization never left him after 1926. To further fulfill this dream, he was instrumental in establishing an AIC missionary college at Eldoret in the 1980s. This institution, which trains African missionaries to Africa, is the only one of its kind. It is on the grounds of this college, contrary to Nandi tradition, that Bishop Birech was laid to rest on November 30, 2000.

Birgitta of Sweden (Bridget)

(c. 1302–1373 C.E.)

Christian mystic, prophet, order founder

Birgitta was a Swedish noblewoman who was also a mystic, a visionary, a prophetess, a writer, and the founder of the Brigittine (or Bridgettine) order for nuns. Unlike most female religious at the time, she lived out the early years of her adult life as wife and mother to eight children. In an equally unusual role for women in the later Middle Ages, Birgitta exercised considerable public power and influence both within the court of her cousin, King Magnus of Sweden, and beyond, to the residences of the popes in Avignon and in Rome. Both contemplative and activist, as an intellectual and as a controversial figure, Birgitta relentlessly petitioned three popes to return the papacy to Rome. She was also instrumental in instigating a failed crusade aimed at the non-Christians in the south of modern Scandinavia. Well known for her reforming zeal, and not content with ecclesiastical matters alone, she entreated with the kings of France and England in an attempt to end the Hundred Years' War.

According to the vita written by her confessors after her death, Birgitta was born on her father's family estate in the province of Uppland near Stockholm in about 1302. She experienced her first vision at the age of seven. However, she did not take up a religious vocation and instead, at thirteen years old, married a wealthy young nobleman. She engaged in the duties expected of a wife and mother as well as serving for a time as lady-in-waiting to the queen. She also ran a small local hospital for the poor. Following the death of her husband in 1344, Birgitta's visions returned. Now in her forties, she gave up most of her property and possessions, left her home and family, and sought to retire to a life of prayer and penance. Birgitta's life, however, was not to be one of private devotion. Her visions directed her otherwise.

Six hundred of Birgitta's visions survive, first translated into Latin and preserved in an eight-volume work, Revelaciones Extrauagantes (Extravagant revelations). In one of these revelations, she believed, Christ directed her to found a new monastic order, for which she wrote the rule herself. Swedish church officials, convinced of the authenticity of these visions and her prophecies, helped to persuade the king to give her property to carry out the directive at Vadstena. However, Birgitta did not receive papal sanction until 1370. Construction of the convent and monastery did not begin until after her death, when two of her daughters took up the project.

Birgitta's desire to gain papal confirmation for her new order and her concern for returning the papacy to Rome led her to leave Sweden for Italy in 1349. Her daughter Catherine accompanied her. During the next twenty-four years, by petition and prophecy, Birgitta continued to actively involve herself in political and ecclesiastical matters. But as she had done throughout her life, she also continued her charitable work. Birgitta never returned to Sweden; except for pilgrimages, she remained in Rome until her death. She made one last journey to the Holy Land in 1373, the year she died.

Once Birgitta's order was established, it was Catherine who managed it and undertook the first campaign seeking her mother's canonization. Birgitta was finally beatified on October 7, 1392, and canonized in 1484. Now the patron saint of Sweden, Birgitta is honored on her feast day, July 23, and her daughter Catherine is celebrated on March 22.

Bishop-Saints

Christianity

From the fourth century, Christian bishops became significant spiritually and temporally, stepping into a power structure vacated when Roman civil regimes fell into decay. The episcopal office henceforth changed in function and symbolism, remaining so until the late Middle Ages, when papal control supplanted powers once useful for European Christianization. Burgeoning church hierarchical structure paralleled the secular administrative framework, capitalizing on skills and ambitions of aristocratic men groomed for governance roles. The mystique of bishop-saints encompassed ecclesiastical service and temporal leadership during this period.

Crucial links between episcopacy and aristocracy served both church and society, so capable administrators and leaders were most likely to be appointed bishops. Secular and spiritual ideals merged as the bishopric became a central societal institution. Civic strength earned bishops consideration as saints, especially in ineffective civil structures. Many settlements owed their founding or continued prosperity to bishops or venerated bishop-saints as patrons (for example, Maastricht, Liège, and Tournai). Bishops, valuing power and authority above holiness in living persons, emphasized the sanctity of deceased predecessors, thus minimizing challenge to their own command while reinforcing the symbolism of the office. Secular advocacy for cities and flocks fostered regional development, enhancing national awareness and pride. The concept of a bishop-saint as palladium for the populace was potent. The filial connection of bishop and faithful nourished Christian communities, binding them together, as exemplified in processions and yearly offering customs, featuring relics of bishop-saints and homage to the current bishop.

Those credited with regional evangelization were especially honored. By the eleventh and twelfth centuries, emphasis on bishops as noblemen in feudal society was reinterpreted for emergent urban communities. Increasing competition among dioceses, episcopal cities, and their patrons resulted in hierarchical struggle as more prominent bishops were further glorified. Communities capitalized on cults of bishop-saints, who helped give Christian identity to rising cities and regions. Simultaneously, a localized sacred history was reaffirmed.

The primary means of canonization throughout the early and central Middle Ages was elevation of the relics from the grave, instigated by the immediate community of veneration. From the seventh century, the bishops' role and authority increased as they emphasized the value of their acknowledgment and endorsement of a cult. This may explain frequent canonization of bishops from the seventh century on. These illustrious saints could represent the faithful in heaven, but it was current bishops who formulated the definitions. Noteworthy models chosen by their successors in office included Servatius of Maastricht (c. 300–384) in 550(?); Eleutherius of Tournai (d. 531) in 897; Eligius of Noyon-Tournai (588–660) in 661; Ouen of Rouen (c. 600–684) in 688; Lambert of Tongres-Maastricht-Liège (635–705) in 721; and Hubert of Tongres-Maastricht-Liège (d. 727) in 743. Many bishops established monastic foundations that became cult centers (ostensibly for their own burial, to ensure sufficient prayers for their souls).

There is no evidence of papal canonization before the tenth century, and controversy arose when Rome inserted itself into the process. The role of the bishops weakened as Rome claimed jurisdiction. At the 1120 synod of Beauvais, bishops demanded that the elevation of relics, under their control, remain the definitive act for recognition of sanctity, but this protest only accentuated their increasing loss of dominion.

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when many lavish propagandistic reliquaries were created, episcopal office was a maelstrom—with struggles within the church hierarchy and in temporal realms as rulers sought both autonomy and ecclesiastical influence. In the twelfth century, Honorius Augustodunensis defined apostles as primary New Testament teachers, heirs to Old Testament patriarchs and prophets, passing the role to bishops and theologians. The thirteenth-century Legenda Aurea (Golden Legend) by Jacobus de Voragine linked virtuous bishops to the apostles as wise commanders of the Church Militant, powerful members of the eternal Judge's court, and gentle shepherds of Christ's flock—implications emphasized in legendary hagiography of bishop-saints and in the associated pictorial tradition.

Confrontation between episcopacy and papacy escalated. At no other time in church history was there “such intense scrutiny and deep concern” as with the episcopacy in the eleventh and twelfth centuries over such issues as lay investiture, simony, and the dominion with rulers, especially emperors (Benson 1968, 203). Tenth- to twelfth-century gesta episcoporum (deeds of bishops) substantiated cults, further empowering dioceses, in a preoccupation with reinforcing lineages with apostolic origins, by supplying “history” and authority, strengthening links of provincial churches with Rome, and implying political and ecclesiastical unity in the face of heresy and heathenism. Local cult centers for veneration of bishops provided alternative pilgrimage goals to Rome—the trip to St. Servatius in Maastricht was surrogate for visiting St. Peter's grave. Peter, as gatekeeper of Paradise, had passed this role on to bishop-saints. In theological arguments about apostolic legacy, bishops maintained that the pope was not superior to them in orders, only in administrative overview. Claims of apostolic ties had begun in the first century with Clement of Rome, while the second-century Didascalia Apostolorum (Teaching of the apostles) made bishops legatees of apostolic mission and reflections of God—in the priestly role of Christ for liturgical celebrations, significant tenets in cult rituals when bishops' relics were carried in procession, signifying the community as Mystical Body, with Christ/bishop at its head.

This period of church reorganization gradually ended, with the center increasingly definitively placed in Rome, while communities of veneration for bishop-saints were wont to champion the office of their successors. Such cults were often fostered with the support and indulgence of a bishop, whose loss of authority could diminish the devotees' own favored status and potential for preference. Once diocesan authority over canonization was supplanted by papal control, the likelihood of the iconization of the bishop-saint was greatly diminished, as was its useful political function.

By the thirteenth century, cults for bishop-saints reflected a new emphasis on pastoral care and models for clergy; the bishop-saints themselves became exemplars for diocesan and parochial visitation, verbal communication, and preaching—in short, spiritual, moral, virtuous archetypes. This penchant for a more personal relationship between clergy and laity recalled roles of bishops in the early church and led to the development of preaching orders—to fill the void created by the distance of the bishops from their flocks, and to remedy the lack of personal connection, as had, according to the mystique, been possible when these legendary saints had held the episcopacy.

Bistami, Abu Yazid (Bayezid)

Muslim mystic

A famous ecstatic figure from the early period of Islamic sufism, Abu Yazid (or Bayezid) Bistami is said to have spent nearly his entire life in the city of Bistam (or Bestam) in what is now Iran. Although few details about him are known, he is best known for his ecstatic utterances, that is, phrases of divine self-realization expressed in a state of mystical union. Bistami has come to be associated with ascetic practices, saintly miracles, and an "intoxicated" approach to spirituality, although biographies such as that of Abu 'Abd ar-Rahman Sulami (936–1021) portray him as being less antinomian and more concerned with the balance between Islamic law and mystical ways of knowing. As with other early Muslim mystics, no original writings of Bistami have survived, and all that remains are the approximately 500 sayings attributed to him.

Bistami's ecstatic utterances, such as the oft-cited ejaculation subhani (glory to me), were taken by critics to imply that Bistami was claiming divinity for himself. Later sufi commentators, including the pivotal Muslim mystic Abu al-Qasim al-Junayd (d. 910), insisted that the critics misunderstood Bistami and were taking such phrases out of context. Within the mystical state of fana' (passing away), in which all individuated identity becomes annihilated in the presence of divine unity, ecstatic utterances are said to give voice to the experience of union. Although the concept of fana' may not have originated with Bistami, he certainly was one of its earliest Muslim proponents.

A number of the sayings attributed to Bistami deal with the ascetic, devotional, and supererogatory practices that could potentially free one from everything that distracts one from God. Similar ideas appear in Bistami's dream vision of ascending to the heavens, where he ignores all distractions and temptations in order to achieve a type of passing away into union. Though he reportedly denied having ever performed miracles, later hagiographers did not hesitate to attribute a variety of miracles to Bistami.

Bixia Yuanjun (Pi-hsia yuan-chün)

Daoist goddess

Bixia Yuanjun (Sovereign of the clouds of dawn) is a Daoist goddess connected with Mt. Tai in Shandong province. As the easternmost of the five sacred peaks of China, Mt. Tai was considered the gateway to the afterlife throughout Chinese history. Bixia and her main temple located there attained prominence in the early Ming dynasty (1368–1644). Centered in northern China, the goddess's popularity extended from the imperial family to common people. Bixia was granted elevated titles, such as Tianxian shengmu (Heavenly immortal, saintly mother) and Tianxian yünu (Heavenly immortal, jade maiden), but she is commonly known as Taishan niangniang (Our Lady of Mt. Tai) or Lao nainai (Granny) in Chinese popular religion. She was charged with setting human life spans and judging the dead, but her ability to facilitate the birth of male children made her a particularly popular goddess among women.

Several disparate versions of Bixia's hagiography outline her origins. Elite texts preserved in the Daoist canon declare her to be the daughter of the god of Mt. Tai whose history as a judge in the courts of hell extends back to the seventh century. Late Ming popular sectarian scriptures, or baojuan (precious volumes), assert that Bixia was the daughter of a commoner. According to these accounts, her prayers to an ancient Daoist goddess, Xiwangmu (Queen Mother of the West), along with her practice of self-cultivation, helped her to achieve immortality.

Temples throughout northern China include images of Bixia. She is most readily identified by her headdress, which features three or more phoenixes. Bixia usually appears seated with legs pendant and sometimes holds a tablet inscribed with a representation of the Big Dipper as a symbol of her authority. Two goddesses who often attend Bixia are Zisun niangniang (goddess of children) and Yanguang niangniang (goddess of eyesight), but Bixia can also appear within a group of nine goddesses.

Black Elk

Oglala Lakota holy man, healer, visionary

Black Elk, a Lakota Amerindian, lived a remarkable and long life that spanned prereservation days to after World War II (1863–1950). During that time, he witnessed radical changes wrought by the movement of the United States onto the Plains and the increasingly pervasive intrusions into Lakota life by American government officials, missionaries, and the military. He was present at or had firsthand knowledge of major events in Lakota history, such as the defeat of General George Armstrong Custer in 1876, the Wounded Knee massacre in 1890, and the Indian Reorganization Act implemented on his Pine Ridge Reservation after 1934. Throughout all the turmoil, Black Elk retained and refined his traditional Lakota religious beliefs while simultaneously adopting many Catholic beliefs. In 1930, he dictated his account of Lakota history, Lakota religious beliefs, and his life story to writer John G. Neihardt in the hope that his knowledge would be preserved. His effort has succeeded beyond expectations as the resulting books, especially Black Elk Speaks, published in 1932 and reprinted several times since then, are utilized in college courses and by the general public to this day.

The U.S. government forced Black Elk and most Lakotas of his generation and younger to attend Christian missionary schools. Although Black Elk attended Catholic schools, was christened Nicholas Black Elk, and learned English, he also was a leader in an underground effort by traditional Lakotas to preserve their native religious beliefs and practices. He did this at some danger to his person because the United States had banned traditional Lakota religious practices in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Black Elk went a step further than his peers by insisting that his teachings be preserved by non-Indian writers in order that they reach a larger audience. This desire brought him into contact with poet and writer Neihardt in 1930, and he maintained that professional relationship until he died.

Black Elk's message offered an understanding of Lakota history and a vision of hope for the future among Lakotas and humankind generally. He called on the Lakotas to preserve their traditions amid the constant assimilation pressures from the outside world. Otherwise, he warned, they might cease to exist as a unique people and culture, and the loss of Lakota knowledge would also deny all the world's people an understanding of the human role in the universe. Besides being assigned in college religion, sociology, and American Indian studies courses, Black Elk's words have enabled a cultural renaissance among contemporary Lakotas. Using his teachings and the knowledge of other elders, Lakotas are aggressively preserving their language and traditional rituals, seeking to restore their traditional relationship with the land and the natural world. Black Elk succeeded in his mission of preserving a record of the Lakota past while offering a direction for the future.

Blyden, Edward Wilmot

Christian/syncretist theorist, nationalist

Blyden, considered by many the pioneer intellectual of the idea of "African personality," was born in St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, in 1832. He impressed the minister John Knox, who encouraged Blyden to enter the Christian ministry. Blyden traveled to the United States with Knox in May 1850 with the goal of attending Rutgers Theological College, but he was denied admission at Rutgers and two other theological schools because of his race.

Blyden accepted a proposal from the American Colonization Society to settle in Africa, and in December 1850 he left for Liberia, where he became a Presbyterian minister. He also began a writing career in Liberia. The central theme that Blyden addressed was the issue of race and the situation of Africans in the world. He later worked for the Liberian government, eventually serving as president from 1880 to 1884.

Blyden generated controversy. He held what some consider today racist views, arguing that mulattos did not belong to his movement, Africa for the Africans. Blyden also disagreed with the Presbyterian Church and resigned from Presbyterian ministry to become what he called “Minister of Truth.” He married Sarah Yates, who was related to a well-known Liberian businessperson, in 1856, and they had three children. However, in 1877, he started a relationship with Anna Erskine and had five children with her. He argued that polygamy was part of the African tradition, but many in the Presbyterian Church felt he had betrayed his position as a minister.

Blyden was an influential social theorist, especially on the question of race and African identity. Although he championed European education and values early on, he later realized the strengths of African cultures. He argued that Africa was the cradle of civilization and science and that Islam and Christianity were nurtured in Africa. Blyden spelled out the glory of ancient Egypt and argued that some West Africans descended from the builders of the pyramids. He used philology and biblical scholarship to argue that blacks in the past were part of world civilizations and praised early African thinkers such as Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine for shaping Christian theology. Blyden advocated a rigorous system of education and called for the teaching of Arabic and African languages as part of his nationalist project, ideas that were influential in starting the Pan-Africanist movement.

Credited with the notion of “African personality,” Blyden replaced Johann Herder’s views on nationality with race and argued that each race had its own “personality and mission.” The African character, he said, included softness, cheerfulness, sympathy, and a willing spirit to serve. In contrast, the European character was harsh, individualistic, competitive, and combative. Blyden argued that Africa should contribute to civilization through the spiritual realm rather than taking part in the rush toward scientific and industrial development.

Blyden’s nationalist spirituality was grounded on the belief that Africans were religious beings. He noted that Africans believed in a “common creator,” although he qualified this by indicating that there was no one central organized religion on the continent. He thought Islam was superior to paganism, and that Islam had done a better job in Africa than Christianity because it had made the African a master in his own home while Christianity had taken over and ruled over the people “with oppressive rigour” (Blyden 1994 [1888], 309). Blyden did not rule out African Christianity, but he argued that Christianity could grow in Africa only if Africans themselves decided to promote it. Blyden was highly critical of Western missionaries for disparaging African customs and imposing a “thin varnish of European civilization” (ibid., 64). Ironically, despite his criticism of European ideas and practices in slave trading and colonialism, Blyden interpreted the partition of Africa in providential terms. It has been difficult for many to understand why Blyden used divine providence to justify what clearly was a terrible misadventure in Africa.

Bobola, Andrew

Roman Catholic monk, martyr

A descendant of one of the oldest and most illustrious Polish families, Andrew Bobola was a zealous preacher, confessor, missionary, educator of youth, and priest in Vilna, Bobruisk, Plock, Warsaw, Lomza, and Pinsk during the thirty-four fruitful years of his intensive apostolic work as a Jesuit missionary from 1623 to 1657.

Born in 1591, Bobola grew up in an atmosphere of ardent Catholicism. Before entering the Society of Jesus at Vilna on July 31, 1611, he was educated in a humanist spirit by Jesuit teachers, acquiring excellent rhetorical and linguistic skills as well as a direction for his religious fervor. Having concluded his two-year novitiate by taking lower vows and tonsure on July 31, 1613, he undertook philosophical study at the Academy of Vilna (1613–1616) and then continued his education, following an obligatory pedagogical practice, by studying theology (1618–1622). Andrew was ordained on March 12, 1622, and after a year of the strict “third probation,” he began his work in the Jesuit missions in Poland and Lithuania. However, his rich and difficult individuality, a field of a continual moral battle, led his superiors to postpone his four solemn vows, a confirmation of his spiritual readiness for his holy duty, until June 2, 1630.

His devotion to the poor and to the spiritually neglected people of the prisons and shelters greatly contributed to a rapprochement of the Catholics and the schismatics in a Poland torn by religious strife and ravaged by Cossacks, Russians, Swedes, and Tartars. However, this fertile labor of reconciliation and conversion enraged Orthodox authorities and the Cossacks, who, during their war with Poland, turned with hatred against the Roman and the Uniate Catholics. The Jesuits, in particular, had to endure the hostility of the dogmatic schismatics for their missionary work. In May 1657, the Cossacks attacked Janow Poleski and massacred local Jews and Catholics. Among the victims was Andrew, severely beaten and subjected to barbarous tortures before being relieved from suffering by a saber stroke.

The cult of Father Bobola began when his relics were found incorrupt forty-five years after being first interred in a common grave in the Collegiate Church of the Society at Pinsk. The complex and painstaking investigation into the life of the martyr led to his beatification by Pius IX on October 30, 1853. His canonization, which proclaimed Andrew a patron of the unity of the Eastern and Western churches, took place during the pontificate of Pius XI on April 17, 1938. He is patron of Warsaw. His feast day is May 16.

Bodhidharma

(d. c. 530 C.E.?)

Buddhist Chan founder

Bodhidharma, the legendary sixth-century founder of Chan/Zen Buddhism, may be a composite figure representing several earlier monks. According to legend, he was a member of the brahmin caste or a prince from southern India. His teacher, Prajnadhara, the twenty-seventh Indian ancestor of the Chan lineage, encouraged him to travel to China, and so Bodhidharma spent several years in southern China and eventually traveled northward.

Bodhidharma's legend relates that on these travels he had an audience with Emperor Wu (502–550), who asked him how much merit he had earned through his generosity toward Buddhism. Wu was not pleased when Bodhidharma replied that the emperor had not earned any merit through these actions but needed to have inner humility and respect for others. Leaving the capital, Bodhidharma crossed the Yangtze River on a reed. On the other side, he discovered a cave, where he sat facing a wall for nine years in meditation until his legs withered away from lack of use.

Bodhidharma is said to have passed the Chan tradition to a former student of Daoism named Huike. While Bodhidharma was meditating in his cave, Huike came and tried to win acceptance as a disciple, but without success. In order to prove his sincerity and determination to learn the path of Chan Buddhism, Huike cut off his own left arm at the elbow and presented it to Bodhidharma. Finally convinced of the aspirant's seriousness, Bodhidharma accepted him as a student, and Huike eventually became a patriarch of the tradition. The self-sacrificial action of Huike was to serve as a model for future generations of aspiring students. Likewise, the strict and demanding relationship between master and student can be traced to this legendary encounter.

The Chan tradition attributes to Bodhidharma an emphasis on motionless, seated meditation and transmission of the tradition outside of the scriptures by means of techniques enabling one to see into one's nature and attain awakening. The rigor of this spiritual regimen is expressed in paintings of Bodhidharma depicted with a face of fierce concentration and a menacing guise. He has become a folk, religious icon throughout eastern Asia. For individuals who achieve a goal by means of perseverance, it has become common to give them a Daruma doll to mark their successful effort.

Bodhidharma is thought to have died in about 530. According to his legend, however, a Chinese official on his way to India to collect texts a few years later met Bodhidharma in Central Asia. Bodhidharma was wearing a single sandal. After returning to China from India, the official related the story of his encounter with Bodhidharma to the followers of the master. They proceeded to open the grave of the patriarch, which they found empty, with the exception of a lone sandal. There were also legends of rival teachers attempting to poison him, although these types of narratives were likely spread for dramatic effect and to enhance the importance and stature of Bodhidharma. The Buddhist tradition attributes several treatises to Bodhidharma, but their historical authenticity is open to doubt.

Bodhisattva

Mahayana Buddhism

The bodhisattva (enlightened being) represents a new paradigm of religiosity within Mahayana Buddhism by at least the second century B.C.E. From the Mahayana Buddhist perspective, the bodhisattva must be distinguished from the arahant (fully enlightened being or worthy one) and the pratyekabuddha (a person who is self-enlightened and does not teach). The Mahayana school views both arahants and pratyekabuddhas as selfish, egotistical, cloistered, placid, and inert. In contrast, the bodhisattva works not just for his or her own liberation but also for the liberation of others. He or she strives to help others gain happiness and welfare in the world. In other words, the bodhisattva goes to the brink of liberation but refuses to enter because he/she is committed to helping others attain the same enlightenment. Thus, the basic orientation of the bodhisattva is both within the world and beyond it.

The path to liberation for the bodhisattva is marked with the development of various perfections. There were originally six perfections, but another four were added at a later and undetermined date. The initial perfection is generosity (dana), which can take many forms. An extreme form of generosity is giving one's life or limbs for the good of others. When performing generosity, it is important that it be done in a disinterested manner without thinking about gaining any type of reward. By giving in an unselfish, disinterested, and detached manner, a person accumulates merit because it is an automatic result of a righteous act. This excess of merit can be transferred to another person.

The second, third, and fourth perfections are morality (sila), forbearance and endurance (ksanti), and energy (virya). Morality is grounded in self-control, examining oneself to discover faults and shortcomings, and extinguishing passions. It is conceived as an active doing rather than something passive, that is, acting out of the knowledge that what one does morally affects others. Forbearance is defined as freedom from anger and excitement. And since being a bodhisattva is a full-time commitment, it is absolutely necessary to be energetic to avoid giving in to physical and mental weaknesses and feelings of disappointment if one fails.

The fifth perfection is meditation (dhyana), which happens within the context of a complex social web. This perfection is connected to meditating on the divine states of mind and involves cultivating four feelings: loving-kindness (maitri), compassion (karuna), sympathetic joy (mudita), and equanimity (upeksa). This perfection forms the support of the sixth perfection of wisdom (prajnaparamita), which is the supreme Mahayana Buddhist virtue. The complete possession of this perfection is equivalent to attaining nirvana and liberation. The perfection of wisdom represents a direct insight into reality, or seeing things as they really are. Wisdom is an understanding that derives from analysis, and it is also described as a meditative absorption that is directly connected to the results of analysis. Wisdom is related to a nonconceptual experience because it involves an awareness of emptiness.

The four perfections that were historically added later are skillful means (upaya), vow of resolution (parindhana), power or strength (bala), and knowledge (jnana). Skillful means refers to the ability to teach according to the needs of others. Resolution is manifested by a willingness to help others to gain salvation, whereas power refers to striving to increase one's virtues. Finally, knowledge is similar to the perfection of wisdom, although it represents a more intellectual kind of ability. In addition to these perfections, there is also a series of ten stages (bhumis) that are related to cultivating each of the perfections.

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich

Protestant spiritual writer, martyr

Dietrich Bonhoeffer was born in 1906 into a large and influential family of intellectuals and professionals in Berlin, Germany, and was a successful theological student and academician. He frequently traveled as a young man, experiencing the intellectual cultures in New York, Barcelona, Rome, and elsewhere. He quickly adopted the Christ-centered theology of Karl Barth, which put him at opposition with the Lutheran Church in Germany for much of his life. He is best known today for his opposition to Adolf Hitler and Nazism during the 1930s and 1940s. He also helped to found the Confessing Church, a Protestant underground church that arose out of its members' abhorrence of Hitler's domination of the Lutheran Church in World War II Germany.

Bonhoeffer was a vibrant and active member of the Confessing Church, both before its official founding date of 1934 and afterward, until his death in 1945. Before this, however, he was active in the Lutheran Church. He was appointed in

Bodhisattva and other deities. (Corel Corp)

1931 as one of three part-time youth secretaries for the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches and the Ecumenical Council for Life and Work. From 1933 to 1935, he was pastor of one of the German congregations in London, where Bishop George Bell of Chichester influenced his thought and conviction on the ultimate evil of Nazism. Early in 1935, he was accused of running an illegal seminary of the Confessing Church in Pomerania, although the charges were later dropped. In June 1939, he was invited to escape the growing presence of Nazism in Germany by his friends in America, which he accepted. His growing unhappiness with American culture and his strong roots in Germany, however, made him return there the same year to face the growing threat.

Family members invited Bonhoeffer into the double life of a secret agent in the counterespionage service, where a plot against Hitler was being planned. During this time, he visited with many church leaders in various countries, especially Switzerland and Norway, who supported his efforts. He was arrested in April 1943 and spent the next two years fooling his interrogators and impressing his guards and fellow prisoners with his deeply Christian faith. In prison, he wrote extensively, producing poems and letters that illustrated his deep faith in Christ and provided comfort and strength to family and friends. His Letters and Papers from Prison is a lasting memorial to his faith and resolve and one of the many examples of survival above suffering that were a result of Nazism's oppression and domination.

Bonhoeffer was executed in the last days of World War II in a vengeful act by a declining and defeated regime. His biography, by his close friend Eberhard Bethge (1970), brought his writings and letters a worldwide audience and illustrated immense growth and maturity for a man of less than forty years in his Christian walk and life during difficult times and circumstances.

Boniface

(c. 675–754 C.E.)

Christian missionary, archbishop, martyr, apostle of Germany

Boniface served as an example to his time as well as to ours of a man who gave up everything he had in order to follow

Christ. Originally named Winfrith, he set aside the opportunity for a secular career in order to enter the religious life. He then shunned a religious and political career in England in order to devote himself to preaching the gospel to the tribes of Germany. On June 5, 754, Boniface was killed while on his final mission.

According to tradition, Winfrith was born near Exeter sometime between 672 and 680. As a child, he showed interest in piety and holy living, desiring against his father's wishes to enter a monastery. Winfrith's father, who had envisioned a secular career for his son, relented in the face of Winfrith's determination, and the boy entered the monastery at Adescanastre. He progressed as far as possible in his education there, then removed for further education to the monastery of Nursling, where he gained a reputation as a gifted teacher and served as head of the abbey school.

Winfrith was foremost a monk, however. He was self-disciplined, ascetic, and devoted to prayer throughout his life. At the age of thirty, he was ordained a priest. Shortly thereafter, he asked permission to go preach to the Germanic tribes across the Channel. Winfrith's abbot at Nursling initially denied the monk's request, but later he supported Winfrith on his first missionary journey in 716. The conditions were not favorable, however, for the local king had driven the Christians underground. Winfrith returned to England for a time but never lost sight of his goal to preach to the Germans. While in England, he refused election to an abbacy in order to pursue his mission. In 718, he left England for Rome in order to seek a commission from Pope Gregory II.

On May 15, 719, Gregory II gave Winfrith a commission as missionary and also the new name of Boniface. The new missionary spent a few years in Frisia with his fellow Anglo-Saxon who was preaching in that region, Willibrord, before moving on to the region of Hesse in Thuringia, where many responded to his preaching and instruction. In 722, Boniface traveled again to Rome, where he was consecrated bishop. Upon his return to Germany, he became involved in the most famous incident of his career: the felling of the oak at Geismar.

The ancient oak tree of Geismar long had been considered a holy tree by the native tribes. Upon the advice of converts from the area, Boniface felled the tree while a crowd of locals looked on. When they saw that their god did nothing to Boniface in retribution, many converted to Christianity. The new bishop used the wood of the tree to build a chapel on the same site.

Throughout the next thirty years, Boniface's influence was felt by the Carolingian mayors of the palace in Francia, under whose protection Boniface's mission prospered, and he established many monasteries. By 751, Boniface had become archbishop, and in that same year perhaps it was he who crowned Pepin the Short as the first king of the new Carolingian dynasty. But even the might of the new king could not protect Boniface from the tribesmen who attacked him and his party on June 5, 754. Unarmed, the missionary archbishop faced the swords of his attackers and was killed, along with numerous companions.

Following his martyrdom, Boniface was quickly proclaimed to be a saint. He is commemorated on June 5. Boniface is still revered as patron of England and Germany.

Bonnke, Reinhard

(1940 C.E.–)

Pentecostal preacher, healer

Reinhard Bonnke is a German Pentecostal preacher and faith healer who is best known for his major crusades throughout Africa, where open-air revival meetings attract hundreds of thousands of participants. He is also the founder and director of Christ for All Nations, now a worldwide organization with several office locations in Europe, the United States, and Africa.

Bonnke was born in Germany in 1940 as the son of a Pentecostal minister and claims to have received his personal salvation and spiritual baptism at the age of eleven. From 1959 to 1961, he studied at the Bible College of Wales, Swansea. He then served as a pastor in West Germany until 1967, when he moved to Leshoto to work as a pastor for the Apostolic Faith Mission. He began his crusade ministry in 1975, first in a giant tent and later on open-air platforms.

Bonnke's revival meetings start with performances by choirs and instrumental groups from local participating churches. Bonnke's sermon is then conducted in English with an interpreter. The preaching is simple and full of anecdotes, including stories of Bonnke's victorious encounters with atheists, mainline Christians, or witch doctors. Part of Bonnke's appeal in Africa lies in his confrontations with witchcraft and traditional spirit world traditions, which he interprets as satanic instruments that can be combatted by divine intervention. He emphasizes in his sermons that the only way of eternal redemption is to be saved by Jesus.

Reinhard Bonnke, German evangelist. (Art Directors)

After the sermon, Bonnke turns his attention to healing people. He prays for all evil spirits responsible for illness to leave afflicted people in the crowd and calls for them to be replaced by the power of the Holy Spirit. Some of those who claim to be healed are then asked to come forward to the platform and testify. Though God is, in principle, always the one who cures, the divine power of healing is sometimes conflated with Bonnke's own power as a faith healer. In Bonnke's own words: "When I step on a platform, often without any touch of mine, the blind begin to see, the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak and the cripples to walk. . . . Miracles happen as if copied from the Gospels and the Book of Acts" (Arnold 2002).

Serious doubts about the authenticity of Bonnke's healings are frequently expressed by mainline Protestants, doctors, researchers, and the media. His most-debated miracle is the awakening of a dead pastor in Nigeria in December 2001. Ironically, Bonnke has also been sued in Nigeria for the deaths of fourteen people who were crushed in human stampedes during a revival meeting in October 2001 (none of these were ever raised from the dead).

Boris and Gleb

Russian Orthodox martyrs

Boris and Gleb, early Russian Orthodox martyrs, were sons of Great Prince Vladimir. They were deceived and brutally murdered at the secret order of their brother Sviatopolk, who usurped the rule in Kievan Rus' upon Vladimir's death in 1015. The names of Vladimir and his sons Boris and Gleb are firmly associated with the process of Christianization in Russia, while Sviatopolk's revolt may represent opposition to the new religion. The cult of the two royal martyrs spread immediately after their death in approximately 1015, when healing miracles and military victories were attributed to the intercession of the martyred princes. In 1071, the Russian Orthodox Church canonized Boris and Gleb and named May 2 as their feast day. Their relics were lost, however, during the Mongol invasion of 1240.

Especially gruesome was the murder of Boris, Vladimir's favorite son. When Vladimir fell sick, Boris was summoned to Kiev. Vladimir sent Boris off to fight the Pechenegs, a nomadic tribe that frequently raided Russian territories. On his way back, Boris and his army stopped at the river Alta. There, the sad news of Vladimir's death reached Boris. The army tried to convince Boris, who was very popular in Kiev, to march against Sviatopolk, but Boris refused to betray his older brother. In the meantime, Sviatopolk sent emissaries to Boris, assuring him of his love and promising to enlarge Boris's fief. The secret mission of the emissaries, however, was to kill prince Boris—Sviatopolk's dangerously popular political opponent. Putsha, the head of the embassy, and his men stabbed Boris with spears, but they failed to finish him off. The murderers brought Boris to Kiev, still alive. Here, Boris was killed by two Varangians from Sviatopolk's retinue, who put a sword through his heart.

Gleb was murdered in a similarly brutal fashion. Sviatopolk summoned Gleb to Kiev under the false pretense of Vladimir's sickness. Gleb stopped in Smolensk and there received a message from his brother Jaroslav about the death of Vladimir, the murder of Boris, and the plot to murder him. While praying for his deceased father and brother, Gleb was attacked by the gang sent by Sviatopolk. Goriasser, the head of the conspiracy to kill Gleb, ordered Gleb's own cook to slaughter his master.

Boro Baba

See Radharaman Charan Das Dev

Borromeo, Charles

(1538–1584 C.E.)

Roman Catholic archbishop, theologian

Archbishop Charles Borromeo of Milan was a leading Roman Catholic theologian of the Catholic Reformation and a central figure at the Council of Trent. His feast day is November 4 (formerly November 5).

A descendant of Lombard nobility, Charles (Carlo) Borromeo was born in Arona, near Lake Maggiore in northern Italy, in 1538. His father was Count Giberto Borromeo and his mother, Margherita, was a Medici. Charles spent time at the monastery in Arona while still a young man; however, in 1552 he left Arona for the University of Pavia. There, he received a doctorate in canon law in 1559. When his uncle, Giovanni de' Medici, was elected pope in December 1559, Charles was called to Rome, named cardinal, and entrusted with the position of papal secretary of state. In February 1560, the pope named Borromeo administrator of the see of Milan. In this position, he weathered many responsibilities, perhaps none so critical as that of negotiating the papal correspondence to reconvene the Council of Trent from 1560 to 1562. The council did indeed reconvene in 1562 and, thanks in no small measure to the efforts of Borromeo, remained in session until December 1563. Borromeo was especially committed to the reformation of the pastoral episcopate.

During the council, Borromeo experienced a personal conversion to a more devout and spiritual life. He decided to be ordained a priest, and was soon consecrated bishop. Even then, he was torn between living out his calling in a more contemplative setting or maintaining his rather familiar public profile, but he soon determined that his private calling could find some fulfillment in the continuation of his more worldly episcopacy. Borromeo worked tirelessly to institute the reforms of Trent: revising the liturgy, restoring ecclesiastical discipline, and founding hospitals and schools. Borromeo also labored for artistic excellence and spiritual sincerity in church music, and, as part of this reform, requested that the luminous Giovanni Palestrina, arguably the premier composer of liturgical music, compose new music for the mass. Borromeo was indefatigable in his support of local pious societies, which he considered a valuable resource for the daily affirmation of the Roman Catholic faith.

When Pius IV died in 1565, Borromeo sought permission to leave Rome and return to his home and his flock in Milan. There he remained until his premature death at age forty-six in 1584. In this last stage of his life, he gave away most of his personal possessions to the poor and spent many hours in prayer; his frequent fasting permanently weakened him and probably hastened his demise. He became particularly vigilant in punishing ecclesiastical corruption and recommended that his court become a model for other sees. Upon some occasions, such as during his confrontation with the Order of the Humiliati, at the time of his admonishments to various Swiss clergy, and at his censuring and excommunication of secular authorities in Milan, Borromeo found himself in mortal danger. Yet, he never relented in his insistence that the conciliar program of reform and reconciliation must be observed.

By 1584, Charles Borromeo was weak in body but still quite active in spirit. Having suffered fevers and other illnesses for years, as well as having sustained himself on very little food and even less rest, he desired to found a convalescent hospital for his flock, understanding full well the struggles of chronic illness and the difficulties of rehabilitation, especially for the poor. He also continued his regimen of contemplative prayer and ecclesiastical direction of the clergy in Milan. He died on November 3, 1584. Almost immediately, the Milanese separately, and then the community of the church throughout Europe, both princes and paupers, regarded Borromeo as a saint and memorialized him. Very quickly, by 1604, his cause made its way to Rome, and on November 1, 1610, Pope Paul V canonized Charles Borromeo.

Bosco, John (Giovanni; Don)

(1815–1888 C.E.)

Roman Catholic priest, educator, founder

Founder of the Salesians of Don Bosco, John Bosco was born in Piedmont, Italy, in 1815. Ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic Church in 1841, he spent his life caring for poor and neglected children. He died January 31, 1888, at Turin, Italy, and was canonized in 1934.

When John was nine years old, he began having dreams that he eventually interpreted as indicative of his vocation. In these dreams, he was in the midst of a group of unruly children, whom he tried to threaten and then beat into submission, until a figure of light in a flowing mantle recommended gentleness. He related this dream and others like it to his family, who greeted the tales with derision. Nevertheless, as a child he began teaching religion to the boys of his village, using juggling and magic tricks to catch their attention, then teaching them catechism and coaxing them to mass.

He entered the seminary at Chieri when he was sixteen, in such dire straits that money for his upkeep and wardrobe had to be provided by friends and his parish church. While he was at the theological college of Turin, he began again his apostolate of teaching religion to poor boys. Prisons and slums became the locus of his activity. He had great difficulty finding a place in which to conduct his ministry since his flock was usually composed of rough characters and no one wanted ruffians on the premises. Funding for his projects was a constant worry, and the anxiety caused by these persistent concerns aggravated an attack of pneumonia that nearly killed him. He also needed volunteer workers; his method of gentle persuasion with young toughs at times exasperated and frustrated those working with him, as did the chronic shortage of funds. In 1850, Don Bosco decided to train young men to help him in his endeavors.

With the aid of his mother, Mamma Margaret, Don Bosco opened his home to destitute children and to apprentices in trades; he also opened lodgings in various quarters of Turin to house young workers. In 1853, he decided to open workshops to train shoemakers and tailors. He constructed a church for his growing flock under the patronage of Francis de Sales, his favorite saint, and began building a larger home for his growing “family,” in which Mamma Margaret played a vital role. By this time, his flock included boys and young men of two sorts: apprentices to the trades and those with possible vocations to Don Bosco’s ministry.

On January 26, 1854, the men who would form the nucleus of the Salesians of Don Bosco gathered in his room and the order was born. This was a particularly inauspicious time to launch a new congregation; Piedmont was in the throes of anticlericalism. Nevertheless, an Italian statesman, Urban Rattazzi, urged Don Bosco to persevere. By 1856, there were 150 resident boys with four workshops, four Latin classes with ten young priests, and oratories for 500 children. In 1874, the constitutions of the order received final approbation.

Don Bosco was in constant demand as a preacher; because of his success in the building of churches, the pope asked him to complete the construction of Sacred Heart Church in Rome. Don Bosco was convinced of the great power of the press and wrote books, a practice ended in later life by failing eyesight. In 1872, he founded an order for women, the Daughters of Our Lady, Help of Christians, to serve poor girls. A third order, the Union of Cooperator Salesians, followed in 1875. Before Don Bosco died in 1888, he wrote down his dreams upon the request of Pope Pius IX.

Bowman, Thea

Roman Catholic nun, social activist

Sister Thea Bowman, a black Roman Catholic nun in the United States, confirmed and championed a way of being Catholic that drew upon her heritage as an African American. Drawing upon the spiritual traditions of a people who through their deep and abiding faith in God have survived the dehumanization of slavery, Sister Thea used song, dance, poetry, drama, and story to celebrate her belief that all people are gifted and beloved children of God.

Bertha Bowman was born in Yazoo City, Mississippi, in 1937 and was baptized as a Roman Catholic in 1947. In 1949, she was sent to a Catholic school run by the Franciscan Sisters of Perpetual Adoration. Wanting to be “part of the effort to help feed the hungry, find shelter for the homeless, and teach the children” (Bowman 1993, 18), in 1953 she decided to join this religious community. In 1956, she took the name Thea, “of God.” She received a doctoral degree in English language, literature, and linguistics in 1972 from the Catholic University of America. A believer in the liberating power of education, she taught classes at the elementary, high school, and college levels and helped to found the Institute of Black Catholic Studies at Xavier University in Louisiana.

In her otherwise all-white community of religious sisters, Sister Thea took a stand against conforming to the spirituality of the white Euro-American Catholic Church. On being black and Catholic, she wrote: “I bring my whole history, my traditions, my experience, my culture, my African-American song and dance and gesture and movement and teaching and preaching and healing and responsibility as a gift to the Church” (Bowman 1993, 32). She emphasized a black spirituality of survival and resistance—as reflected in the traditional spirituals—and with the importance of family, community, celebration, and remembrance of ancestors as essential components. Sister Thea pointed out that the Catholic Church as an institution was contributing to the evil of racism by refusing to welcome the rich traditions and experiences of various peoples and cultures.

Sister Thea was an extraordinarily gifted singer and speaker who was invited to appear before hundreds of groups. In response to a church that does not allow women preachers, she urged women to preach the Word of God “day by day—in our homes, in our families, in our neighborhood—to bear witness, to testify, to shout it from the rooftops with our lives” (Bowman 1993, 78).

Diagnosed with breast cancer in 1984, Sister Thea created a new prayer: “Lord, let me live until I die,” explaining, “By that I mean I want to live, love, and serve fully until death comes” (Bowman 1993, 127). She continued to speak, travel, and conduct workshops on racism despite her cancer, received ten honorary doctorates in 1988, and in 1989 addressed the annual meeting of the U.S. Catholic bishops. In 1989, she also received awards for furthering the cause of women and promoting peace and justice. Sister Thea died in 1990, and was posthumously awarded the Laetare Medal from Notre Dame University that same year.

Braide, Garrick Sokari

(c. 1882–1918 C.E.)

Christian prophet, evangelist

Garrick Sokari Braide, an evangelist and miracle worker, was born of Kalabari parentage around 1882 and grew up in the town of Bakana in the Niger Delta area of Nigeria. It is not certain when he became a Christian, but by the closing years of the 1800s he had enrolled to learn the catechism in Bakana under the pastoral supervision of Moses Kemmer, the Church Missionary Society (CMS) minister stationed at Brass. Here he learned the basics of the Christian faith. Following his confirmation in 1910, his religious ingenuity unfolded swiftly, enabling him to become a prophet with a mission.

Braide was initially despised because of his lowly upbringing, but Kemmer's public acknowledgment of Braide's gift soon earned him the attention of his audience. Thereafter, he began to have tremendous influence on them, leading evangelistic crusades and healing services and enjoining the people to burn their fetishes (holy objects). His spontaneous worship in his mother tongue resonated with the aspiration of his followers and brought many into the church. The effectiveness of his prayers and ecstatic visions soon earned him the title Prophet Elijah II.

Braide's essential tool was prayer. It is said of him that he would "slip in secretly into St. Andrew's Church [Bakana] on week days and here prostrate himself in prayer to Almighty God imploring forgiveness for sin" (Tasie 1982, 104). At other times, he would "spend the whole night in prayer in the Church with his Bible and prayer book" (ibid.). His fame, patriotism, and the excesses of his followers, however, began to generate concerns and brought him on a collision course with the mission and the colonial government. Tried and jailed for subversion in November 1916, Braide served his term, but the movement he had launched never regained its vitality, although it later assumed the name Christ Army Church. Garrick Braide died on November 18, 1918. His movement was a significant precursor of the effervescent Christian spirituality that soon swept Africa in the aftermath of the influenza epidemic of 1918–1920.

Brébeuf, Jean de

Roman Catholic missionary, martyr

Jean de Brébeuf, a French Roman Catholic missionary, "first apostle of the Hurons," and martyr, was born on March 25, 1593, near Lisieux, Normandy, and martyred by the Iroquois on March 16, 1649. Virtually nothing is known of Jean de Brébeuf's life, other than the fact that he was born into a noble Norman family, until he joined the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) in November 1617 at the age of twenty-four. Marked by humility, he asked to become a lay brother of the society, but his superiors convinced him to become a priest. After taking his initial vows in November 1619, he was assigned to teach at the College of Rouen, where his health eventually failed.

Ordained in February 1622, he volunteered to join the Jesuit Charles Lalemant (whose nephew Gabriel was eventually martyred alongside Brébeuf) on a mission to what was then New France, leaving Dieppe in April 1625. After the commander of Quebec, the Protestant Emery de Caen, refused them entrance, they were taken under the wing of Joseph Le Caron, a Franciscan, and accompanied the Montagnais Indians on a hunting party into the forest of New France in October 1625, returning the following March. It was on Brébeuf's second trip the following year that the Hurons nicknamed him "Echon," "the one who carries the load." Forced to leave Quebec during the English occupation, he returned to France in 1629. Returning to his mission in 1633, he was joined by his fellow Jesuit Gabriel Lalemant in 1648.

An Ursuline nun in Quebec, Marie de l'Incarnation, wrote to her son that Brébeuf had had a vision of his future martyrdom. The vision came to pass on March 16, 1649, when a band of Iroquois attacked the missionaries' settlement. They captured Brébeuf and Lalemant, whom they tied to stakes to be burned alive. In one of the most gruesome martyrdoms of the modern era, Brébeuf suffered in silence for three hours before dying, and Lalemant died the next morning. According to the Jesuit Relations, "Before their death both their hearts were torn out through an opening in their chest; these barbarians feasted on them inhumanly, drinking their warm blood which they drew from its source with a sacrilegious hand. While still full of life, pieces of their thighs, calves, and arms were removed by the butchers who roasted them on coals and ate them in their sight." Their remains were collected shortly thereafter, and Brébeuf's head is preserved as a relic in the Hôtel-Dieu in Quebec. Brébeuf was beatified on June 21, 1925, and canonized on June 29, 1930. His feast day is celebrated on September 26 along with other North American martyrs.

Brendan the Navigator

Christian abbot, monastic founder

Brendan was an Irish monastic founder and a noted sailor. He established Clonfert monastery in about 559 and at least three other monasteries during his lifetime. Medieval sources claim that he founded monasteries in Wales, Scotland, and Brittany. His cult was certainly active in these areas. Brendan is perhaps best known for the fictional Navigatio Sancti Brendani Abbatis (The voyage of St. Brendan), a work composed by a ninth- or tenth-century Irish monk. The Navigatio turned the real Brendan's seafaring travels into an adventure tale involving a journey across the Atlantic Ocean to an undiscovered island of the saints. Little reference is made to the historical Brendan in the Navigatio. The popularity of this book, translated into seven languages, made the real Brendan one of the best-known Irish saints in medieval Europe.

Brendan, born in about 486, was raised by a foster mother, Íte (d. c. 570), and later by Bishop Erc. Brendan's voyages and numerous foundations fit the mold of the Irish peregrini pro christi, or "pilgrims for Christ." In Irish society and law, one's legal protections ended when one left the home of his or her kin. So, venturing far afield in a small boat, as Brendan did, was considered a form of martyrdom. Great emphasis was placed on these acts of extreme hardship and on prayer, charity, and martyrdom in Brendan's hagiography, and also in the Lives of other early monastic founders. Accounts of St. Brendan were produced in both Gaelic and Latin. Particular focus was placed on his desire to avoid worldly comforts by engaging in constant travel.

The Life of Brendan goes into great detail about his boat building, and Brendan is considered a patron saint of sailors. He is sometimes confused in the hagiography with St. Brendan of Birr.

Brigid of Ireland

(c. 450–c. 525 C.E.)

Christian abbess, founder

Brigid of Ireland, or of Kildare, has been venerated since the early Middle Ages, along with Patrick and Columba, as one of the three national Christian patron saints of Ireland. Born, according to the Irish annals, between 439 and 456, she is reputed to have died between 522 and 526. At least two Latin Lives had been composed by the end of the seventh century describing her as a nobleman's daughter who chose to consecrate her virginity to God, took the veil as a Christian nun, and became the leader of a community of religious women, or perhaps of both women and men—certainly by the seventh century there was an important double monastery at Kildare that regarded her as its founder.

According to the medieval Lives, Brigid's sanctity was manifest even before she was born in apparitions of light and fire emanating from the places where she and her mother slept. Her holiness was most apparent, however, in miracles of compassion, many having to do with the provision of food for the poor and for her own community, and others with healing and the prevention of injustice. She had strong connections with the province of Leinster, home to her people, the Fothairt, and was said by one medieval text to have been seen hovering over the armies of Leinster as it marched into battle. However, her cult spread throughout Ireland and was carried abroad by Irish monks in the Carolingian era, so that there came to be churches dedicated to her as far afield as Italy and Spain. As early as the seventh century, Brigid was identified as "the Mary of the Gael,” a powerful and compassionate female advocate like the Virgin, but one exclusively dedicated to the needs of the Irish.

Brigid’s name connects her with a shadowy figure called Brig, “the Exalted One,” who is associated with a British people of the Roman period, the Brigantes, and who appears in several medieval texts in association with legendary supernatural figures. Furthermore, a tenth-century text, Cormac’s Glossary, claims that “Brigit” was the name of three goddesses, one of poetry, one of healing, and one of smithcraft, “so that Brigit is a name for a goddess.” Since the beginning of the twentieth century, it has been thought by some that the cult of St. Brigid is simply a Christianized version of the cult of this goddess, and indeed that the fifth-century woman may never have existed. A twelfth-century report by Gerald of Wales that there was in her monastery at Kildare a perpetual fire tended only by women, which it was forbidden to men even to approach, has been taken as evidence of this transfer of the goddess cult to a Christian saint.

The feast of St. Brigid is observed on February 1, the date of the pre-Christian Irish festival of Imbolc. Well into the twentieth century, a wide array of customs was connected with Brigid’s day in various parts of Ireland; these invoke protection of the holy woman on cattle and the butter made from their milk, on the health and fertility of women and animals, and against ailments of all kinds, especially headache and disorders of childbirth. These customs included processions through villages with a doll called a “brideóg,” leaving pieces of cloth outside overnight to be touched and made potent against illness and spiritual harm by the saint, and the weaving of crosses made of rush to be hung on houses and byres for protection. There are a number of springs, known as holy wells, in Ireland that are associated with Brigid and whose waters have been believed to have healing and protective properties.

A contemporary cult of Brigid draws upon traditions connected with a goddess as well as those connected with a fifth-century Christian holy woman to celebrate her mercy and power within a feminist context.

Britto, John de

(1647–1693 C.E.)

Roman Catholic missionary

John de Britto, a Portuguese noble born in 1647 who became a Jesuit missionary of the Madura Mission in India, is a popular Catholic saint in southern Tamil Nadu. He spearheaded a mass conversion movement in a portion of southeast Tamil Nadu, known as the Marava country, that has a heavy concentration of Marava caste groups. Oral and written traditions maintain that soon after arriving at the Madura Mission, Britto—better known locally as Arul Anandar—earned a reputation as a holy man of great power and became a threat to the Hindu king of Ramnad, who had him beheaded and impaled on a stake on February 4, 1693.

After Britto was beheaded, Oriyur became the center of a Britto cult in which Hindu and Catholic pilgrims execute a wide array of vow rituals (nerccai), including ear piercing, hair shaving, animal sacrifices, and other fertility rites. A rich collection of legends and folk songs celebrate the sacral powers of the saint and the shrine. One legend holds that the martyr’s blood turned the soil red, transforming the saint and the site into extraordinary sources of fertility with life-giving powers. Because of his intimate association with the Marava converts and the red sand at Oriyur, the Portuguese Jesuit earned the titles “Marava saint,” “apostle of the Maravas,” and “red sand saint.”

The cult of this European saint in Tamil Nadu, and the images used to depict him, reflect a sense of liminality. Britto’s Catholic devotees dedicate to the saint a series of rituals adopted from popular Hinduism that reflect their own cultural and religious stance as neither Hindu nor Catholic, defying the normative and ritual boundaries of official Catholicism. Similarly, though Britto is represented in iconography as a European saint wearing a European cape, the powers and qualities attributed to him by his native devotees transform him into an indigenous figure resembling Hindu tutelary deities. Additionally, like his caste-conscious Catholic pilgrims, the European saint enshrined at Oriyur both supports and confounds the social status quo. As the Marava saint, he supports caste identity; he is a Catholic saint who “acts” like a Hindu tutelary deity.

Located at the juncture between European and Tamil, Catholic and Hindu, high caste and low caste, Britto is a pre-eminent liminal figure, and this is reflected in his personality and powers as they are commemorated today. As such, he functions as a sacred metaphor reflecting the religious and cultural liminality of his Catholic pilgrims. The Tamil representation of St. John de Britto reveals a convert community's attempt to construct a local identity and cult for the European saint.

Brown, John

Christian abolitionist

Abolitionist John Brown's opposition to slavery in America was fueled by his religious belief, rooted in a strict Calvinist interpretation of the punishment God would inflict on those who strayed from righteousness. Although Brown's personal life was distinguished by poverty, family deaths, and failed business ventures, he believed that as an abolitionist he carried out the will of God. Brown died convinced that he was a martyr to his faith.

Brown's militant opposition to slavery first arose while defending the free-soil settlers in Kansas and culminated in October 1859 when he led his followers on a raid of the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry. Convicted of treason, Brown was hanged on December 2, 1859, a day that became holy for many. The Sunday following his death, his witness to Christ was acclaimed in hundreds of churches where preachers eulogized him from their pulpits.

Perceived by many as part saint and part devil, part prophet and part madman, John Brown nonetheless drew tributes from Henry David Thoreau, William Lloyd Garrison, and others who published defenses of his actions and character. Ralph Waldo Emerson claimed that Brown had made the gallows as glorious as the cross. He was also the subject of poetry by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, William Dean Howells, and John Greenleaf Whittier. The song "John Brown's Body" was created and sung in tribute to him by Union soldiers, and eventually inspired Julia Ward Howe to compose "Battle Hymn of the Republic" as a national psalm. In subsequent years, Brown's reputation as a holy figure persisted in the African American community. Leaders such as W. E. B. DuBois and Malcolm X took note of his example.

At his trial, Brown made explicit his sense of religious destiny: "The Bible . . . teaches me that all things whatsoever I would that men should do to me, I should do even so to them. It teaches me further to remember them that are in bonds as bound with them. . . . Now if it is deemed necessary that I should forfeit my life for the furtherance of the ends of justice, and mingle my blood further with the blood of my children and with the blood of millions of this Slave-country, whose rights are disregarded by wicked, cruel, and unjust enactments, I say let it be done" (Peterson 2002, 14).

Brown never joined a specific religious denomination or an antislavery movement, but his commitment to the Bible and the abolition of slavery was unwavering. His personal charisma charmed less militant supporters and extracted support from wealthy abolitionists. Although white, he was distinguished by his extraordinary identification with the blacks among whom he lived and worked.

Bruno of Chartreuse

Christian hermit, abbot, monastic founder

Bruno of Chartreuse, founder of the Carthusian monastic order, was born in approximately 1030 in Cologne. Little is known about his early life, however, until he became a canon of Rheims cathedral, where he taught arts and theology. He became master of the school in 1056 and chancellor of the archdiocese in 1075; one of his students was the future Pope Urban II. As chancellor, he fought the simoniacal archbishop Manasses I; although Bruno was forced to flee for his life, when Manasses was finally removed from office in 1080 Bruno was offered the see. Bruno refused, instead becoming a hermit in about 1082.

Bruno's first hermitage was near Molesme, but in 1084 he sought greater solitude, eventually settling in Chartreuse, where another former student, Bishop Hugh of Grenoble, helped establish a small hermitage for Bruno and his followers. Six years later, Pope Urban II summoned his former teacher to Rome to serve as his adviser. Bruno reluctantly left Chartreuse, to which he never returned. Forced to flee Rome for Norman-controlled southern Italy when imperial forces took the city, Bruno was offered a second archbishopric—which he refused—and soon established a small hermitage in the mountains of Calabria, where he died on October 6, 1101.

Bruno had no intention of founding a monastic order when he retired to his hermitage at La Grande Chartreuse, nor did he write a rule for his followers. The Carthusian way of life is a unique blend of the solitary and the cenobitic: Monks and nuns live as hermits in individual cells within the monastic community, leaving only to worship in the monastic church and for communal meals on Sundays and feast days. Devoted to contemplation, no monastic order is more austere: Their customs, compiled by Prior Guigo I, call for strict fasting on bread, water, and salt three days a week throughout the year and only one meal a day from September to Easter. Until 1164, Carthusian monasteries were autonomous and not subject to any mother house; a privilege granted by Alexander III transformed the Carthusian monasteries into an order subject to the prior of La Grande Chartreuse with a general chapter modeled on that of Cîteaux. By the late Middle Ages, they became famous for retaining much of their original austerity and rigor. Bruno's feast day is October 6; he was canonized in 1623.

Buddha

Buddha is a Sanskrit/Pali word that etymologically means "one who has wakened." In the context of Buddhism it is used as an appellative term of one who has attained enlightenment. Many buddhas of different times and places are mentioned in Buddhist literature. For instance, the Digha Nikaya (Collection of long discourses) mentions seven buddhas before Shakyamuni, the historic Buddha, and the Buddhavamsa (Chronicle of buddhas) mentions twenty-four. The Lalitavistara (Detailed narration of the sport [of the Buddha]) mentions fifty-four buddhas, and the Mahavastu (Great story) mentions more than a hundred. The number of buddhas that could exist in the future became countless with the development of the idea in Mahayana that everyone has to become a buddha before attaining nirvana. The number of buddhas, in principle, is infinite in Mahayana. A number of them, such as Amitabha, Vajradhara, Vairocana, Avalokiteshvara, and Akshobhya, are mentioned by name in literature. In esoteric Buddhism, the concept of living buddhas exists; thus, Padmasambhava (eighth and ninth centuries) and Kukai (774–835) are recognized as buddhas. The Mahayana schools advocate the simultaneous existence of numerous buddhas who can provide assistance beyond their own worlds. The Theravada schools, however, admit the appearance of only one buddha in any given period. No buddha can arise until the complete disappearance of the previous buddha's teachings. Moreover, a buddha is not born at the beginning of a cosmic aeon when human beings live long and do not fear sickness, aging, and death.

The earliest texts mention two kinds of buddhas: pratyekabuddhas (buddhas who attain enlightenment but do not preach the way of deliverance to the world) and samyakasambuddhas (buddhas who are omniscient and are teachers of the way of deliverance). The Pali commentaries, however, mention four classes: sarvajnabuddhas (who practice ten perfections for a certain number of aeons), pratyekabuddhas (who practice ten perfections that lead to enlightenment for a certain number of aeons), catusaccabuddhas (all arahants who have realized the Four Truths), bahusutabuddhas (all learned men fall into this category). In the later stages of Mahayana Buddhism, other buddhas are mentioned, for example, dhyanibuddhas (transcendent buddhas) together with adibuddhas (primordial buddhas).

Though the buddhas are superior to all other beings in seven matters—body, living, wisdom, virtue, practice, mystery, and deliverance—they are not equal among themselves. Some, such as pratyekabuddhas, attain enlightenment only for themselves, while others, such as samyakasambuddhas, attain enlightenment for the good of others. The enlightened insight of some is less than that of others. Some achieve their goals through the creation of buddha fields in which their devotees seek rebirth, and others work through their earthly existence. They also differ from each other in terms of lifespan, body height, social rank, length of austerities, body aura, conveyance used for renunciation, the Bodhi tree (under which the Buddha received enlightenment), and the size of the seat under it. In the case of the historic Buddha, there are four fixed spots—the site of the seat under the Bodhi tree, the Deer Park, where the first sermon is preached, the spot where the Buddha first steps onto the ground at Samkasya after descending from heaven, and the spots marked by the four posts of the bed in his perfumed chamber in Jeta Grove, the rainy season retreat.

It is also said that the Buddha's power of love is so great that no evil action can show its results in his presence. A Buddha never asks for praise and prefers to accept the invitation of poor people to a meal. According to some Pali texts, a Buddha in his last life is conscious at the time of his conception; remains cross-legged in his mother's womb, who delivers him while standing in a forest grove and dies seven days later; takes seven steps to the north after being born and roars the "lion's roar"; renounces the world after the birth of a son and upon seeing the four omens (an old man, a sick man, a dead man, and a recluse); practices austerities for at least a week after renunciation; has a meal of milk-rice on the day of enlightenment; attains omniscience seated on a grass carpet; defeats the forces of the demon Mara; attains supreme perfection in all knowledge and virtue at the foot of the Bodhi tree; preaches the dharma (Buddhist doctrine) at the request of the creator god Mahabrahma; founds an order; and spends his time traveling and preaching for the good of humanity.

A Buddha is not completely immune from disease. Every Buddha has the power to live for an aeon (kalpa), but no Buddha does so, his term of life being shortened by reason of climate and the food he takes. It is said that on the night on which he attains enlightenment, and on the night during which he dies, his skin becomes exceedingly bright. When a Buddha dies, his body receives the honors due to a monarch.

Buddhadasa

Buddhist monk, scholar

Bhikkhu Buddhadasa, a modern Thai master scholar and practitioner, was a highly regarded and controversial figure in Southeast Asia owing to his innovative interpretations of Buddhist teachings. He strove to make traditional Theravada Buddhist ideas and practices relevant to contemporary issues and problems, such as war, social inequity, and ecology, and influenced many Buddhist intellectuals and activists. Buddhadasa's publications amount to the largest corpus of thought ever produced by a single figure in the history of Theravada, and the titles of these many works, such as A Socialism Capable of Benefitting the World and Till the World Is with Peace, reflect Buddhadasa's main concerns.

Buddhadasa was ordained as a monk at age twenty but soon became disillusioned with traditional monastic life. His way of practicing Buddhism is manifest in the forest retreat center that he established, Suan Mokkh, where both monks and laity engage in a program of study and meditation while living in an atmosphere of harmonious balance with nature. In recognizing their common humanity, practitioners there act out of mutual concern and respect for the good of the whole.

In Buddhadasa's view, fundamental questions about the good of the individual lead to concerns about the world and the natural environment, of which the individual is a part. Based on the Buddhist teaching of the interrelatedness of all phenomena, Buddhadasa taught that the pursuit of enlightenment is not just for the individual good, because the good of individual parts is predicated on the good of the whole, and vice versa. Because of this, humans, as social creatures, should focus on helping others. For Buddhadasa, a just, equitable, peaceful, and happy society balances the good of the individual and the good of the whole in what he called a "fellowship of restraint" (Buddhadasa 1989, 6). By restraint, he meant subduing one's egocentricity so that selfless compassion for others' welfare may arise. Thus, in opposition to what he considered selfish capitalist and Communist systems, he called for a dhammic (righteous) society in which attachment to self would be transformed to selflessness, love of all, and an understanding of the equality of all beings. In such a society, people, by ethically and meditatively cultivating greater awareness, would be free from the greed, ignorance, and moral defilement that poison both individuals and human societies.

Buddhaghosa

(5th cent. C.E.)

Theravada Buddhist monk, scholar

The works of Buddhaghosa, an Indian brahmin convert of the fifth century, have dominated Theravada Buddhist thought from his time to the present. Although most details of his life are found in legendary accounts, some events are generally accepted as historical. Interested in studying commentaries on canonical Theravada texts, Buddhaghosa traveled to Sri Lanka to study with great scholar-practitioners of the predominant monastic fraternity, the Mahavihara. Although already a learned, accomplished commentator, Buddhaghosa was tested as to his fitness to be entrusted with their books when these scholars asked him to compose a commentary on one verse of the Buddha. The result was a magnum opus, the Visuddhimagga (Path of purification). More of an encyclopedic treatise than a commentary, this work masterfully presents Buddhist thought and practice in systematic fashion according to the three trainings of the path: morality, meditation, and liberative insight. It has served both as a detailed manual for practitioners and a major normative source of reference for Theravadins.

Perhaps more impressive is Buddhaghosa's accomplishment of writing commentaries on most of the Theravada canonical corpus. Theravadins after Buddhaghosa typically have turned to his Visuddhimagga and commentaries as the sources of truly reliable interpretation of the Buddha's teachings; in some ways, Buddhaghosa, living up to the meaning of his name, "Voice of Buddha," has become more authoritative than the Buddha himself. If the treatises of Nagarjuna have made him the "second Buddha" for many Mahayana Buddhists, then one could say that Buddhaghosa occupies the same place for Theravadins.

Opinion varies on how much Buddhaghosa simply translated ideas from the then extant (now lost) commentaries in the Sinhalese language into the canonical Pali language and how much of it was original thought. Buddhaghosa presented himself mostly as a reproducer of the earlier commentaries, but other sources say that he found those commentaries so corrupt that he was compelled to write his own. Furthermore, scholars have revealed developments and changes in Buddhaghosa's thought from text to text. His work has also been shown to be markedly influenced by earlier Buddhist thinkers and schools, as well as by certain Hindu teachings.

Whatever the case, Theravadins have revered Buddhaghosa as a harmonizer who, in his voluminous body of work, best clarified what was complex, and best compiled ideas scattered throughout the canon into systematic form. His enduring authority as a commentator-philosopher of Theravada makes his influence more than equal to that of Thomas Aquinas on Catholic Christianity.

Buddhapalita

(c. 470–c. 540 C.E.)

Buddhist philosopher

Buddhapalita was one of the key figures in the history of the Indian Buddhist philosophical school known as Madhyamaka (Middle Way school), which began with Nagarjuna in the first through the third centuries. The details of Buddhapalita's life, from approximately 470 to 540, are not well known, but his commentary on Nagarjuna's primary text, Mulamadhyamaka-karika (The treatise on the Middle Way), which is simply entitled Mulamadhyamaka-vrtti (Commentary on "The treatise on the Middle Way"), sparked one of the most spirited debates in the intellectual history of Madhyamaka.

The central issue of the debate concerned the appropriate form of reasoning and argumentation to be utilized by holders of Madhyamaka tenets. This was an issue that found key Madhyamaka thinkers both in India and among Tibetan inheritors of the Indian Madhyamaka tradition fully engaged. In fact, the debate became so central to Tibetan discourse on Madhyamaka thought that by the late twelfth century, Tibetan philosophers and doxographers were retroactively dividing Indian Madhyamaka thinkers into subschools and nominally designating them in part on the basis of the form of logical reasoning they each employed.

The crux of the debate emerged out of Buddhapalita's commentary because in his explanation of Nagarjuna's text, he relied exclusively on the use of prasanga (consequentialist arguments) that demonstrated the absurdity of the opponent's views without necessitating commitment to a counterposition. The controversy arose when Bhavaviveka (c. 500–c. 570), a major Madhyamaka thinker in India at the time, came forth with sharp criticism of Buddhapalita's method. He argued that Madhyamikas need to do more than simply criticize the views of their opponents; they need to establish a Madhyamaka position as well. To do this, Bhavaviveka argued that Madhyamikas must use a form of logical argumentation known as svatantranuma (autonomous inference), something Buddhapalita failed to do.

The debate does not end here, however. Chandrakirti (c. 600–650), a figure whom Tibetans traditionally regard as a reincarnation of Buddhapalita, came to Buddhapalita's defense. He argued that Buddhapalita was absolutely correct in the method he utilized and that Bhavaviveka's insistence on the use of autonomous inference was flawed. The reason, according to Chandrakirti, is that proper use of autonomous inference requires both the proponent and opponent of the argument to accept the inherent existence of the subject of the debate. This is a position Chandrakirti considered to be fundamentally incompatible with the Madhyamaka view, since its central tenet is that all phenomena are empty of any inherent, unchanging nature, or essence. Most major Tibetan Madhyamikas, such as Tsong kha pa (1357–1419), have claimed to be followers of Buddhapalita and Chandrakirti, and this debate remains a central topic in the various Tibetan curricula on Madhyamaka thought today.

Buddhism and Holy People

Buddhism encompasses many different types of holy people, beginning with the historical Buddha (Siddhartha Gautama) in the fifth century B.C.E. A review of this rich religious background follows the major divisions of Buddhism into the Theravada and Mahayana traditions. These are spread across a wide geographical area, including Tibet, China, and Japan, each having its own take on holiness and enlightenment.

Within the context of the formative Buddhist tradition, the figure of the Buddha is the primary paradigm of the holy person. The historical Buddha discovered the path to liberation by means of his own efforts, and he invited others to follow his discovered path to freedom and verify the truth of his teaching for themselves. The term buddha, “awakened one,” possesses important implications for the rest of humanity because it implies that most people are spiritually asleep. But built into this notion is the conviction that becoming a buddha does not just occur in a single lifetime. Rather, it takes many rebirths and lives of virtuous conduct to reach the point of buddhahood. It also involves the renunciation of the world in order to be able to focus one's energy on achieving liberation. Overall, becoming a buddha is a unique experience. Being a buddha is not simply about having an experience, however, but about sharing what one has learned with others, as the historical Buddha did.

The path that leads to buddhahood involves wisdom, moral and ethical behavior, and meditation. The Buddha summarizes these in the eight steps of the Noble Eightfold Path: (1) right understanding, (2) right thought, (3) right speech, (4) right behavior, (5) right livelihood, (6) right effort, (7) right mindfulness, and (8) right concentration. The initial two steps represent wisdom because they embody the Four Noble Truths that all life is suffering, the cause of suffering, its extinction, and the path to achieve that extinction. Steps three through five are concerned with moral and ethical action, whereas the final three steps focus on meditation.

Besides the path to liberation, the formative tradition makes a distinction between levels of attainment. The first level is that of the “stream-enterer,” which implies someone who enters the path to liberation and gains progressive insight into the Four Noble Truths, abandons belief in the self, does not believe in the efficacy of rituals, and possesses no doubts about the three jewels, that is, Buddha, dhamma (teaching), and sangha (monastic order). This type of person is assured of no bad rebirths. The second level of attainment is the “once-returned,” who overcomes the impurities associated with the outflows, or cankers (for example, sense-pleasure, desire for becoming, false views, and ignorance) and is assured nirvana (release) within one more lifetime. The third level of attainment is the “non-returned,” who progresses further and is assured of attaining enlightenment during his or her current lifetime. The final level of attainment is the arahant (Sanskrit: arhat; worthy one), the fully enlightened being. The arahant overcomes the five remaining fetters (desire for life in the realm of form, desire for life in the formless realm, pride, restlessness, and ignorance).

As the genuine awakened figure in the Pali tradition, the arahant possesses a dual nature because he/she is fully a human being and yet distinct from other people. From one perspective, this awakened being transcends the ordinary human mode of existence by reaching a higher level of perfection, but this transcendence does not mean that he/she can act immorally and unethically. Because the awakened one destroys the roots of immoral action, his/her actions are morally wholesome. Being fully endowed with the four Buddhist virtues (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity), the arahant is incapable of committing a violent act. The fully awakened individual's moral and ethical actions arise completely spontaneously because he/she lacks negative traits that could resist them. Due to his/her liberation from the cycle of cause and effect, the arahant's actions no longer possess positive or negative karmic results. The arahant is not merely a holy person to imitate and venerate; he/she can also be useful as a field of merit—that is, the arahant’s merit may be transferred to another individual. Venerating an arahant involves both meditation and merit making.

In addition to the arahant, the Pali tradition recognizes the pratyekabuddha (the self-enlightened one), a solitary figure living in remote regions meditating alone. Unlike the historical Buddha, who provided a model of selfless teaching, the pratyekabuddha does not teach. One literary tradition claims that this type of figure is born at a time when no buddha exists in the world. Generally speaking, someone who attains enlightenment during a buddha period becomes an arahant, but one who attains enlightenment during a non-buddha period becomes a pratyekabuddha.

The early holy people of the Buddhist tradition, like the yogis and ascetics of the Hindu tradition, are associated with various types of miraculous powers. In Buddhist literature, for example, various holy figures demonstrate the ability to fly, to know their former births, to see the births and deaths of other beings, to know the minds of others, to become invisible, to walk on water, to travel to distant places, to heal various forms of illness, and to hear sounds in the heavens or on earth with a divine ear. Even though the Buddha is credited with many types of powers, he is depicted as very reluctant to display them. In fact, there is a monastic regulation against displaying one’s powers to ordinary people or claiming to have powers that one does not in fact possess. The Mahayana Sanskrit tradition is more liberal than the Pali tradition in its attitude toward the display of power. It is common in the Pali tradition for a layperson to make a gift, for instance, to a monk and then witness his powers, but the display of power does not precede the gift giving and is not thought to facilitate the gift giver’s salvation. Rather, the mere sight of a monk generates devotion. The display of power in the Mahayana tradition tends to precede the act of giving; it is understood as a way to arouse the faith of a potential donor and as capable of transforming the donor.

The primary paradigm of the holy person in Mahayana Buddhism is the bodhisattva, “enlightened being.” This figure is distinct from both the arahant and the pratyekabuddha. In Mahayana, the self-enlightened, nonteaching pratyekabuddha is considered selfish and narrow-minded. The arahant may teach, but he/she is not really thinking of others either, but primarily working for his/her own liberation. Like the pratyekabuddha, the arahant is viewed as selfish, egotistical, cloistered, placid, and inert. In contrast to both of these, the bodhisattva works for his/her own liberation and that of others, striving to help others gain happiness and welfare in the world. When working for his/her own salvation, the bodhisattva goes to the brink of nirvana but refuses to enter full liberation because he/she is committed to helping others attain the same goal. Thus, the bodhisattva finds him/herself in a dilemma: indicating the path to liberation, but also remaining in the world to assist. From one perspective, the bodhisattva’s basic orientation is both within the world and beyond it.

The theoretical background for the notion of the bodhisattva is the Mahayana philosophical conviction that all beings are tied together and interrelated as part of one reality, which is defined as emptiness, consciousness-only, no-mind, or buddha-nature, depending on the school. Because humans are joined together and interrelated, it is essential for them to help each other. This fundamental philosophical background also forms the context for the basic four vows of the bodhisattva: (1) to save all beings, (2) to destroy all evil passions, (3) to learn the truth and teach it to others, and (4) to lead all beings toward buddhahood and liberation.

After taking these vows, the bodhisattva sets out to develop several perfections, which are conceived in a hierarchical order in the sense that one must be cultivated before preceding to the next one. Originally, the tradition specified six perfections, with the final and most important one being the perfection of wisdom. Subsequent Mahayana historical development added four more perfections.

The initial perfection is giving, an ancient Indian cultural virtue. An aspiring bodhisattva can give materially, educationally, through scholarly work, or by showing sympathetic joy toward others. Giving can even involve an act of self-sacrifice to save another person. Whatever form giving assumes, it must be performed in a selfless and disinterested manner. This method of giving leads inexorably to the generation and accumulation of merit, which results automatically from righteous action. This type of result is important because excess merit can be utilized by the bodhisattva and transferred to another person for his/her benefit.

The next four perfections are morality, forbearance and endurance, energy, and meditation. The perfection of forbearance and endurance is the exact opposite of hatred, repugnance, anger, and malice. To develop it, one must become free from anger and excitement and learn to endure and pardon injuries and insults committed by benighted people, practicing patient endurance in the face of pain and hardship. The bodhisattva does not retaliate against harm inflicted by others, instead absorbing pain and suffering in quiet solitude. The perfection of energy, or vigor, reflects a more proactive aspect of the path of the bodhisattva. To be energetic means to avoid succumbing to physical and mental weakness, weariness, or simple disappointment.

The sixth perfection is that of wisdom (prajnaparamita), which is a major Mahayana virtue. It is equivalent to the attainment of nirvana. Attaining this perfection means having a direct insight into reality, or seeing things as they really are. This mental event is a state of consciousness that involves analysis and investigation of things. It is also described as a meditative absorption that is directly connected to the results of analysis. Thus the wisdom perfected is a nonconceptual experience because it is impossible to conceptualize emptiness. Moreover, the content of the experience (that is, emptiness) is nondualistic.

The perfections that are products of later historical addition are skillful means, vow of resolution, power (or strength), and knowledge. Skillful means refers to using various methods of teaching according to the ability and need of others. The vow of resolution involves making a vow to help others achieve salvation, and power refers to strengthening virtues such as wisdom and patience. Knowledge is different from wisdom because it involves intellectual ability rather than intuitive insight.

These ten perfections represent a path that parallels the ten stages (bhumis) of the way of the bodhisattva. The initial stage is “the joyful,” which a person enters after the thought of enlightenment dawns, and it involves practicing charity and self-sacrifice. “The pure” and “the luminous” are the second and third stages. The pure stage suggests becoming free from the pollution of evil conduct, whereas in the luminous stage thoughts are pure, constant, unworldly, dispassionate, and resolute. The fourth through the sixth stages are, respectively, “the radiant,” “the difficult to conquer,” and “the face-to-face.” In part, the fourth stage reflects perfecting knowledge and faith, the fifth means regarding all principles of buddhahood with pure thought and equanimity, and the sixth marks an understanding of the ten aspects of the equality and sameness of all things. “The far-going” and “the immovable” are the names of the seventh and eighth stages. These signify that the bodhisattva acquires great wisdom in determining how to help others, cultivates skillful means, and progresses to an irreversible point. By the eighth stage, the bodhisattva is beyond the law of causation and false concepts. The ninth stage is marked by insight, that is, knowledge of the hearts and minds of others, and “the cloud of doctrine,” the tenth stage, represents the experience of trance states and the perfection of knowledge. According to some accounts, the bodhisattva acquires at this time a glorious body, which emits rays that destroy the pain and misery of others, and can perform various types of miracles.

The notion of the bodhisattva was developed in a new way in Tibet around the thirteenth century. Originally, the bodhisattva was a person who vowed to save all beings, but he/she died before this was accomplished, and thus his/her mission was incomplete. But in the theory developed by the Tibetans, the bodhisattva could not die as long as his/her work remained incomplete. If the bodhisattva did die and leave unfinished work, he/she would be reincarnated in a new body in order to continue his/her mission. This incarnation was called a lama; the most famous lineage is that of the dalai lama. The term dalai means “great ocean”; lama was equivalent to guru or teacher in India. The term la has a pre-Buddhist Tibetan meaning of “soul,” and it also means “high.” The term ma was connected to the sun and signified a protector or mother.

Tibetan Buddhists believe that when a dalai lama dies, he returns to a heavenly field but will reincarnate to continue his mission on earth in a new human body. The task of Tibetan Buddhist sect leaders was to determine the identity of this lama with each new incarnation. Gathering a party to look for signs of the new incarnation, they would then test possible candidates, enthrone the chosen infant, supervise his education, and help to run the country until the child was mature enough to assume the mantle of leadership. In addition to the dalai lama, Tibetan Buddhism accepts the notion of other incarnate lamas (teachers, spiritual guides) who are enlightened beings. Because a lama is free from the cycle of time and rebirth, his/her rebirth is a completely voluntary act of compassion. A lama is believed to be able to control rebirth fully and to choose his parents, type of body, mental ability, place, and time of birth in advance. A particular lama represents both a Buddha emanation and a reincarnation of the preceding lama. Such a reincarnated lama was also called a tulkus (emanated body). After the death of a lama, a search is instituted to discover the new incarnation. The institution of the incarnate lama provided Tibetan Buddhism with a method by which the religious authority and charisma of a holy person could be passed to future generations.

The notion of the lama was preceded in Tibetan Buddhist history by the figure of the siddhas (perfected ones), who date to the early decades of the eighth century. The siddhas derived from Hindu Shaiva movements such as the Kapalikas and the Pasupatas. By practicing yoga, the siddhas were said to gain powers that they could use to provide services to kings. Their services included prophecy, spirit possession, demonic control, love potions, generation of wealth, and various types of unethical practices. Their secret language and literature used sexual and erotic imagery to convey its destabilizing message and tantric influence.

Chan/Zen Buddhism in China and Japan went in a different direction, developing the notion of the patriarch as a holy person. The patriarch, or Zen master, was highly revered. Beginning with the legendary Bodhidharma and including figures such as Linji (d. 866/867), Zhaozhou (c. 778–897), Mazu (709–788), Baizhang (720–814), and numerous others, many of these memorable and colorful figures devised new teaching methods that were sometimes harsh and violent, using, for example, shouts and beatings to achieve their goal. In a famous example, the master Nanquan (748–835) seized a cat that two monks were arguing over and challenged the monks to say the right word to save the life of the cat, hoping in this way to shock them into enlightenment. When no one answered, he ruthlessly cut the cat in half. When the monk Zhaozhou returned in the evening, the master told him about the incident. Without saying a word, Zhaozhou removed his sandals from his feet, placed them on his head, and walked out of the room. In response, Nanquan acknowledged that Zhaozhou would have saved the cat if he had been present.

In Japan, the teacher is called the roshi (master). The roshi gives the aspirant for enlightenment a koan (a puzzle phrase) on which to concentrate. He functions much like a midwife by helping the aspiring monk to give birth to his buddha-nature, which is actually already present. In other words, he allows the student to awaken. From another perspective, the roshi is like a mother hen: The crucial turning point in the relationship occurs when the roshi pecks on the shell of the egg from the outside, and the monk pecks like a baby chick on the shell of the egg from the inside. When both parties perform their picking precisely in perfect accord, the baby chick (that is, an enlightened monk) will hatch.

Bullhe Shah

Muslim sufi poet

Bullhe Shah is viewed as one of the greatest Panjabi sufi poets of the Indian subcontinent. He lived near the vibrant Mughal city of Lahore and, like many of his sufi contemporaries, was able to transcend to an inner world of tranquillity through poetry and music when the outer world knew only political unrest. His deep yearning for a peaceful world within which humanity would coexist and work toward eliminating suffering and poverty earned him the affectionate name of "the Rumi of Punjab."

Distinct in Bullhe Shah's mystical poetry is the longing for annihilation in the divine. Bullhe Shah's poetry centers on mystical feelings of endless yearning of the soul to be relieved of the pain of loss, and the longing to be blessed by God's encounter. Like many of his sufi colleagues—including Shah Waliullah (d. 1762), Khawaja Mir Dard (1721–1785), and Shah Abdul Latif (1689–1752)—Bullhe Shah was an adamant defender of the unity of being, seeing the presence of the divine in each and every thing manifested on earth. He believed that the primary weakness of humanity was not a lack of understanding of the self in relation to the divine; rather, it was not feeling God's disclosure in every moment and in every place. According to Bullhe Shah, a person's shortcomings are due to being consumed with one's desires and immediate needs. Since many of these desires alter with emotions and external circumstances, he focused not on eliminating them but on building upon what we already know. His poetry highlights the benefits of remembrance of the divine, the prophets, and the saints. These repetitive symbols are used over and over in order to show the advantages of real remembrance.

Bullhe Shah's poetry is not about mystical theories of practice or theology, however. Instead, it is closely linked with folktales and was used by peasants and the lower classes in dance and song. His work expresses the tension between not having material things and wanting to fulfill material desires, a tension that can be satisfied by acknowledging all the blessings one has at every moment. It conveys Bullhe Shah's feelings of all-embracing unity with awesome audacity, where the sufi seeker does not belong to any one ethnic group, tribe, or nationality—essentially, every individual is a manifestation of one divine reality.

Burujirdi, Ayatullah

Shi'i Muslim leader

Ayatullah Husayn Tabataba'i Burujirdi was the religious leader of Twelver Shi'i Islam from 1947 until his death in 1962. He is remembered principally for his political quietism and for building up Qumm as a center for Shi'i scholarship in Iran such that it overtook Najaf during his leadership.

Burujirdi was born in Burujird in western Iran in 1875 to a family of clerics who traced their ancestry back to the prophet Muhammad and his grandson Hasan b. 'Ali (624/625–669). Having completed his initial studies in Isfahan, Burujirdi went to Najaf in about 1901, where he studied under the leading religious scholars of his time. Having completed his education, he returned to his hometown, where he remained for the next thirty-five years, gradually building a widespread reputation as a scholar.

In 1944, Burujirdi accepted an invitation to move to Qumm and take up leadership of the religious establishment there. In 1922, Ayatullah Ha'iri-Yazdi had settled in Qumm and revived it as a center for religious scholarship. But this revival was in danger of petering out with the Ha'iri-Yazdi's death in 1937. A little more than two years after Burujirdi's move to Qumm, Ayatullah Sayyid Husayn Qummi died in Najaf in 1947; shortly thereafter, Burujirdi emerged as the chief marja' al-taqlid, an expert on Islamic law worthy of emulation, in the Shi'i world. For the next twenty-five years, Burujirdi concentrated on strengthening the teaching establishment at Qumm. The number of students increased from 2,500 in 1944 to 6,000 by the time of Burujirdi's death, and Qumm replaced Najaf as the leading center for Shi'i scholarship. Burujirdi also systematized the collection of religious taxes, thus assuring the revenue needed for the expansion of Qumm.

Burujirdi was scrupulous in avoiding involvement in political affairs, except where the interests of the clerical class or Islam were directly involved. He forced, for example, the withdrawal of a parliamentary bill for the enfranchisement of women in 1952, gave support to the anti-Baha'i campaign that had been launched by a minor cleric in 1955, and opposed land reform in 1960. He kept a tight rein on those junior clerics, such as Khomeini, who wanted to stir up opposition to the shah of Iran. Burujirdi also promoted a reconciliation between Sunni and Shi'i Islam.

Buton Rinchenrup

Buddhist scholar, translator

Buton Rinchenrup (bu ston rin chen grub) was born to Gyaltzen Pelzangpo (rgyal mtshan dpal bzang po) and Sonam Bum (bsod nam 'bum) in 1290 in Tibet. During her pregnancy, Sonam Bum experienced a number of auspicious dreams, and Buton was considered to be a reincarnation of the Kashmiri saint Sakyasribhadra (1140–1225). His initial ordination at age seven was officiated by Tropu Lotsawa Jampapel (khro phu lo tsa ba byams pa dpal). Tropu Lotsawa had been a close associate of Sakyasri's, responsible for his invitation to Tibet. Buton received the second level of ordination in 1307 and full ordination in 1312.

Buton is one of the most important figures in Tibetan intellectual history. He studied Buddhism with many eminent teachers, learned Sanskrit, and was abbot of Zhalu from 1320 until his retirement in 1356. A prolific scholar, he wrote on many subjects and translated a number of Sanskrit treatises into Tibetan. In particular, he is known for his interest and promotion of the Kalacakra and Guhyasamaja tantras. In contrast to Dolpopa Sherab Gyaltzen (dol po pa shes rab rgyal mtshan) (1292–1361), Buton held that budha-nature (de bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po) is a provisional teaching and does not truly exist. He contributed significantly to editorial work on the canonical materials (bka' gyur and bstan gyur) collected at Narthang Monastery (snar thang) by Upa Losel (dbus pa blo gsal), acquiring copies, editing them, removing duplicated material, and adding a thousand titles. Buton wrote a catalog to this collection that is an important source on the history of the Buddhist canon in Tibet. He also authored one of Tibet's most famous works of history, chos-hbyung (The history of Buddhism in Tibet).

Though primarily a scholar, Buton did become involved in the politics of his day. His clairvoyance, however, enabled him to avoid an invitation to the Yuan court. At the age of sixty-two, he mediated a dispute between the heads of the Yazang (g.ya' bzang) and Pagmodru (phag mo gru) schools. He is credited with a number of miracles and supernatural powers, including enabling a dumb man to speak, seeing the future, and reading minds.

Buton's health rapidly deteriorated in 1364, accompanied by the ominous omen of a lunar eclipse, and he died, surrounded by his disciples, in the same year. A propitious earthquake and a canopy of rainbows accompanied his funeral rites.

C

Cabrini, Frances

(1850–1917 C.E.)

Roman Catholic abbess, educator, founder

Maria Francesca Cabrini, the first U.S. citizen to be canonized as a saint by the Roman Catholic Church, was born on July 15, 1850, in Sant'Angelo Lodigiano, Italy, to Agostino and Stella Cabrini. Raised in a devout Roman Catholic family, from childhood she desired to be a missionary. She attended a teacher training school run by the Daughters of the Sacred Heart in Arluno, and in 1874 she was asked by Bishop Gelmini of Lodi to help run an orphanage mismanaged by the Sisters of Providence in Codogno. Cabrini joined this order, but despite her efforts, the orphanage had to be closed and the order disbanded. She then started the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart, which was officially founded on November 14, 1880. In March 1889, however, she and six missionary sisters left Italy for New York, following the advice of bishops and Pope Leo XIII, to answer the request of Archbishop Michael Corrigan that she help the Italian immigrants in his city. Over the next twenty-eight years, Cabrini founded or was asked to run numerous schools, orphanages, or hospitals in various cities, including New York, Newark, Scranton, Philadelphia, Chicago, New Orleans, Denver, Los Angeles, and Seattle, as well as in Argentina, Brazil, and England. She became an American citizen in Seattle on October 9, 1909, and died in Chicago on December 22, 1917.

During her schooling, Cabrini learned a devotion for the Sacred Heart of Jesus that infused her work. She required her sisters to respect their students, forbidding the common practice of corporal punishment. She sought to bring people to love Jesus through the teachings of the Catholic Church, and much of her education of immigrants focused on teaching them proper Catholic doctrine, which many of them had never learned. Her fervent desire to help needy Italians and her strong resolve allowed her to persevere in the face of hardships, including objections to the term “missionary” being applied to an order of nuns; racism against Italians; opposition from male religious orders; and the sisters being reduced to begging to support themselves and their endeavors. Her reputation elicited more requests for her to create establishments than she could meet.

Frances Xavier Cabrini was beatified on November 13, 1938, and canonized on July 7, 1946. In 1950, Pope Pius XII declared her the patron saint of immigrants, and in 1952 the American Committee on Italian Migration named her the Italian Immigrant of the Century. Her feast day is December 22, but it is celebrated on November 13 in America.

Caesarius of Arles

(c. 470–542 C.E.)

Christian monk, bishop

As an officeholder in the Christian church, Caesarius’s holiness was perceived through his great authority, wisdom, and power in a time of political and religious unrest. He became a monk at Lérins in Gaul in 489 and was quickly embraced by Eonus, bishop of Arles, who ordained him as priest and appointed him abbot. He presided over the monastery for three years, reforming it and compiling a rule that was an important predecessor of the Rule of St. Benedict. He also founded a nunnery in Arles (run by his sister St. Caesaria), for which he compiled a second rule focusing upon the importance of the cloistered life. When Eonus died, Caesarius was immediately chosen as his successor.

During the sixth century following the end of the Roman Empire in the West, Gaul was a region of disruption and profound change. As a devoted bishop and pastor, Caesarius did much to confirm papal authority not only in his own province, but also throughout the rest of Gaul. He was praised for his remarkable preaching, teaching, and scholarship, as well as for his role as a pastor. He regulated the liturgy and ordered it to be celebrated on a daily basis rather than simply on Sundays and feast days. He also insisted that participants in the liturgy should raise their minds and hearts to God.

Caesarius utilized his office to initiate a number of important councils. As archbishop of Arles he presided over the Council of Orange in 529, which asserted that those who denied God's inspiration to the first acts of faith and love should be condemned. He also published the famous adaptation of Roman law known as the Breviarium Alarici, which eventually became the civil code of Gaul.

Under the Visigoth king, Alaric II, Caesarius was accused of treason and exiled to Bordeaux without trial. He was released, but later he was recaptured by Theodoric, king of Italy, who seized Languedoc. When the king saw Caesarius, however, he recognized his sanctity and gave him 300 pieces of gold, much of which he used to liberate captives. For this act he received the papal pallium giving him archiepiscopal status. When the Franks took Arles in 536, Caesarius retired to the nunnery he had founded until his death in 542. He left an endowment for its upkeep in his will.

Caesarius's biographers record lifetime and posthumous miracles, including cures, the extinguishing of fires, and the extermination of devils and wicked spirits.

Cajetan (Tommaso de Vio)

(1469–1534 C.E.)

Roman Catholic friar, cardinal, philosopher, theologian

Cajetan, a Thomistic philosopher and theologian, the counselor of four popes, a master general of the Dominican order, and a cardinal, was an important figure in the history of Christianity, both for his academic contributions to philosophy and theology and for the role he played in central ecclesiastical affairs of his time.

As an academic, Cajetan was influential in the resurgence of the thought of Thomas Aquinas in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. As a diplomat of the Holy See, he is best known for being the first official church representative sent to Augsburg in 1518 to attempt a reconciliation with Martin Luther prior to the latter's formal break with the church of Rome. He served also as a key defender of the authority of the papacy over that of councils in the often-heated debates of conciliarism. At the request of Pope Clement VII, he investigated and then defended in a treatise the validity of Henry VIII's marriage to Catherine of Aragon, thus making himself an important individual in the early history of the Anglican Church. As an adviser to Pope Julius II, he helped oppose the renegade cardinals of the Pseudo-Council of Pisa of 1511.

Although Cajetan was baptized with the name James de Vio after his birth in Gaeta, Italy, in 1469, at the age of sixteen he entered the Dominican order and took the name Thomas, though he is regularly referred to by his city of birth (Caieta, in Latin). By the age of twenty-five, he was a master of sacred theology at the University of Padua. In his academic career he produced more than 150 works, including commentaries on Aristotle, Aquinas, and scripture, small moral treatises, and letters. His polemical works include treatises against Lutheran teachings, refutations of views of the soul held by the Averroists, and defenses of the teachings of Thomas Aquinas against attacks by Scotists. His most influential works include an important treatise on analogy and his massive commentary on the Summa Theologiae of Aquinas. At the age of forty, he was appointed master general of the Dominican order, and by 1517 he was installed as a cardinal. He is said to have played a prominent role in the conclave of 1522 that elected Pope Hadrian VI.

During the sack of Rome in 1527, Cajetan was captured and ransomed for 5,000 ducats. When he fell ill and died in 1534, his burial request was honored and he was buried at the entrance of Santa Maria sopra Minerva in Rome. For his legendary erudition and his role in important political and ecclesiastical events, Cajetan is regarded as one of the foremost scholars of his day as well as an important public figure.

Calchas

Ancient Greek seer

Calchas was a type of seer in the Greek epic tradition, not blind and mysterious like Tiresias, but trained in the profession of explaining what omens mean, a family trade. His father and brother were seers, too, and his sister was a priestess of Apollo, god of prophecy. To calm the Greek assembly, the wise Nestor remembers how Calchas interpreted the omen of a snake who ate eight fledgling birds as well as the mother: Nine years to fight at Troy, and the city would fall in the tenth.

In the Iliad by Homer, Calchas stands forth as the power of religion against the secular power when he explains that Agamemnon must surrender his woman to relieve a plague. With greater infamy, Calchas had instructed Agamemnon to sacrifice his daughter Iphigenia so that fair winds would blow. About this incident, the Roman atheist Epicurean poet Lucretius declared, Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum: "Of such evil was religion capable" (Lucretius, De rerum natura 1.101).

Calchas thus became the type of the false prophet. In one play, Achilles declares with contempt: "Calchas the seer shall be sorry about beginning the sacrifice with barley-meal and sacred water. What is a seer? A man who gets lucky with the truth sometimes, with plenty of lies, and when he loses his luck, he goes down fast" (Euripides, Iphigenia at Aulis 955).

Calchas was undone by his own art when Mopsus, another Greek seer, outdivined him and Calchas fell dead.

Caleb

(d. before 549 C.E.)

Christian ruler

Caleb, or Kaleb Ella Asbeha (in Greek sources Ellasbaan or Ellasbaas, with variants), was one of the most powerful kings of the northeast African state of Aksum in the sixth century. He succeeded his father, King Tazena, and by the beginning of his reign Christianity had been the official religion of Aksum for about 150 years. Aksum reached the apex of its political and economic power during his reign. Besides expanding within Africa, Aksum increased its influence in Himyar in southern Arabia. This occurred in the context of the long war between the Byzantine Empire and Persia.

In the early sixth century, Aksum sent an expedition to Himyar, responding to the plea of the local Christians for protection, and established a garrison in Zafar, its capital. However, in 517/518 (or 522/523), Yusuf As'ar Yat'ar (Dhunuwas), a Himyarite king who embraced Judaism, arose against both the Aksumite presence and Christianity. The garrison of Zafar was massacred, and the Aksumite fortresses in Himyar were destroyed. Christians were persecuted everywhere, and in Nagran many of them were executed, together with their chief, Aretha. These events caused great agitation in the Christian world. Caleb took over the role of protector of south Arabian Christians, and the confrontation rose to the status of a religious war.

In his intention to reconquer southern Arabia, Caleb was supported by Justinian I of Byzantium, and this alliance put Aksum in the center of big politics for a while. In around 525, Caleb launched a large-scale campaign. Yusuf As'ar Yat'ar was killed, and Christianity and Aksumite influence in Himyar were protected. The region was put under the jurisdiction of the Alexandrian patriarchate, and a Christian tribal leader, Sumyafa' Ashwa', was installed as vassal king, but this king was soon overthrown by Caleb's rebellious general Abraha, who put an end to the effective Aksumite control over Yemen.

Caleb died sometime before 549, but Christian traditions in both the East and the West honor him as a great protector. His deeds are known from the Martyrium of Aretha (existing in Syriac, Greek, Arabic, Ethiopic, Georgian, and Armenian versions) and a number of other sources. He is venerated as a saint in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tawahedo Church (commemorated on Genbot 20—May 28), and also in the Roman Catholic Church (as St. Elesbaan, on October 27) and the Greek Orthodox Church. In the Ethiopian tradition, the remembrance of the unique joint action of the Ethiopians and Byzantium was preserved in the Kebra Nagast (Glory of the kings), an ancient text that formed the ideological foundation of the Ethiopian monarchy, which contains an eschatological prophecy about a pious Ethiopian and "Roman" king who would reign over the entire world.

The figure of Caleb contributed to the notion of the ideal Christian monarch. His military campaign is praised as a pious and heroic act in which he was assisted by other key Ethiopian saints (Pantalewon, Za-Mikael Aragawi). It is also related that, sometime after his campaigns, Caleb abdicated the throne and spent the rest of his life in the hermitage of St. Pantalewon. One of the ancient monuments in the vicinity of Aksum is believed to be a tomb where he and his son Gabra Maskal are buried.

Calvin, John (Jean Cauvin)

(1509–1564 C.E.)

Protestant theologian, founder

A French humanist and prominent Protestant theologian, John Calvin successfully established a reformed theocracy in the Swiss city of Geneva during the sixteenth century. An extremely prolific writer, he had a profound influence on Protestant thinking on key subjects such as predestination and the nature of salvation.

Calvin was born in Noyon, Picardy, in northern France in 1509. His mother, known for her piety, died when Calvin was young; his father, Gérard Cauvin, held various notarial positions serving the local bishop and cathedral chapter. The young Calvin had a reputation for brilliance. In 1523, as Lutheran ideas were permeating French intellectual circles, he enrolled as a theology student in the Collège de la Marche at the University of Paris. He studied under the noted humanist Mathurin Cordier, who became a lifelong friend. But Calvin soon transferred to the austere Collège de Montaigu, where he was taught by Noël Beda, syndic of the Sorbonne and famed champion of Catholic orthodoxy. In 1528, Calvin received his master's degree in theology. Meanwhile, reacting to a quarrel with the Noyon cathedral canons, Gérard Cauvin had reconsidered his son's career: Calvin was to abandon theology and take up law. Though unenthusiastic, Calvin obeyed this paternal direction and studied law at Orléans and Bourges.

His father's death in May 1531 liberated Calvin from a legal career. Although he received his doctorate in law by January 1532, he soon returned to Paris to pursue his humanistic interests. He learned Greek and Hebrew, publishing a commentary on Seneca. Increasingly disenchanted with conservative Catholic theology, Calvin experienced a “sudden conversion” to Protestantism, although he subsequently revealed little about the event that transformed his life. The exact date of his conversion is thus impossible to establish, but it probably occurred between August 1533 and May 1534.

Calvin's conversion roughly coincided with a crackdown on Protestantism by the French government, which until then had maintained a relatively lenient policy toward religious reform. Calvin was sufficiently identified with the reformers that he had to flee Paris in 1533; for the next three years, he led an itinerant life in France, Switzerland, and Italy. In 1536, the French reformer Guillaume Farel persuaded a reluctant Calvin to help him reform Geneva, where a sizable contingent of French Protestant exiles had gathered. The Genevans initially resisted the austere reforms prescribed by Farel and Calvin, expelling them from the city in 1538. Calvin went to Strasbourg, where he remained for three years, preaching and writing reformed theology. In 1541, however, he was invited back to Geneva. He remained there until his death, working with considerable success to turn that city into a model theocratic city-state.

Calvin's sermons, correspondence, and scriptural commentaries alone would have earned him a prominent place among reformed authors. His magnum opus was the Institutes of the Christian Religion (originally published in 1536), which he revised and expanded several times throughout his life. Although initially written in Latin, a French edition soon appeared (1541) and was instrumental in spreading Calvinism in France. The Institutes quickly became the single most influential work by any Protestant reformer. It gave Calvinism a decided advantage, since no other Protestant sect had a comparably authoritative work to define religious doctrine and practice.

A fundamental premise of Calvinism was that from the beginning of time, God had decreed everything that was to happen until the end of the world. All human beings were predestined by God for salvation or damnation. Only a few elect were to be saved; the vast majority of people were reprobates, doomed to eternal hellfire. Although no one was worthy of salvation based on personal merit, God freely chose to save certain individuals to demonstrate the extent of his power. Calvin believed that Christian society has a duty to shape itself in a way that would be pleasing to God; all people, whether destined to be saved or not, had an obligation to lead lives worthy of the elect, or the “invisible saints.” Calvinism thus emphasized the notion of the godly community rather than individual sanctity. The foremost expression of this godly community was the visible church, where perfection was sought in the invisible “communion of saints.” The importance of the visible church to Calvin can be seen in his repeated excommunications of Nicodemites in his native France, who veiled their reformed sympathies under a pose of Catholic orthodoxy. Threats to the godly community were to be summarily quashed. The burning of the anti-Trinitarian Michael Servetus as a heretic in 1553 exemplified Calvin's determination to protect the Genevan faithful.

Calvin's theology emphasized the absolute authority of God and the powerlessness of humans, and his organization of church and society stressed the primacy of scripture and an austere style of worship that was stripped of the ritual and decoration of Catholic practice. His notion of the godly community, however, meant that approached as a proper vocation or calling, any human action could be sanctified. This conception of the holy marked a sharp break with previous Christian ideas and doctrines.

Canisius, Peter

Roman Catholic theologian, doctor of the church

“Second Apostle to Germany,” Peter Canisius was a leading Roman Catholic theologian of the Catholic Reformation in the sixteenth century. The son of a prosperous townsman and burgomeister, he was born on May 8, 1521, in Nimwegen, the Netherlands. He studied at the University of Cologne and the University of Louvain, intending to become a canon lawyer; however, his passion for theology never left him, and in 1540, after having received a master's degree at the University of Cologne, Canisius took a vow of celibacy, much to the chagrin of his father. In 1543, while on retreat in Mainz, he became acquainted with Peter Faber, companion to and confidant of Ignatius Loyola, founder of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). Faber directed Canisius through the Ignatian Spiritual Exercises, and in 1543, Canisius entered the Society of Jesus. He devoted himself to the poor, to preaching and religious instruction, and to the establishment in Cologne of the first Jesuit community in Germany. Ordained in 1546, he collaborated in Rome with Ignatius Loyola.

As the influence of the Protestant reformers seeped even into loyal Catholic strongholds, Canisius found himself summoned to various colleges and universities in Sicily, Bavaria, Austria, and Switzerland to defend Catholic doctrine. He became a close if contentious ally to Ferdinand I and his son, and later to Maximilian II of Austria, in their efforts to sustain the Roman Catholic faith in their state. Ignatius Loyola also took advantage of Canisius's talents by having him open Jesuit colleges in Prague and Ingolstadt, and appointed him as the first provincial general of Upper Germany in 1556.

Canisius also trekked across Europe, teaching children of the villages and towns, instructing students in universities and colleges, and delivering sermons in chapels and cathedrals. At a time when Protestantism was gaining ground rapidly, Canisius was committed to a defense of traditional Catholic liturgy and doctrine, including such contested topics as the efficacy of the sacraments, the necessity for acts of penance, and traditional scriptural exegesis. At the request of popes and Catholic princes, Canisius attended various ecclesiastical councils, such as the Council of Trent (1545–1563), the Diet of Augsburg (1555), and the Conference of Worms (1557), in various attempts both to codify Catholic teaching and practice and to articulate a program for religious unification.

Canisius's most important work was Summa Doctrinae Christianae (Handbook of Christian doctrine), the first definitive catechism of Roman Catholic doctrine. So popular did the catechism become that by the end of the century it had been translated into fifteen languages in more than 200 editions. Canisius was a prolific writer whose many theological writings provided the Roman Catholic Church with language and arguments that it would find helpful in its struggle against Protestantism. A staunch advocate for papal primacy, Marian devotion, and the fundamental role of prayer in religious life, Canisius was also the target of Protestant condemnation and assault, although several contemporary Protestant theologians grudgingly praised him for his virtuous life and the purity of his devotion.

By 1584, Peter Canisius had settled in the enclave of Fribourg, Switzerland, to build a college and devote himself to preaching to the Catholic population and writing texts of religious instruction. He suffered a stroke in 1591 and died in 1597. He was initially buried at the high altar in the church of St. Nicolas in Fribourg, but in 1625 the Jesuit community translated his remains to their church of St. Michael at the college. His tomb quickly became a locus for pilgrims, who declared miraculous happenings at the site or by invocations of his name. Peter Canisius was beatified on November 20, 1869. His feast day is December 21.

Canonization

Canonization is the procedure in the Roman Catholic Church whereby the pope declares a member of the faithful to have entered heaven and authorizes the public veneration of the new saint in the church's worship. The judgment is considered a part of the "ordinary papal magisterium" and is thus infallible, that is, free from theological error. As a consequence of this declaration, the name of the canonized is inscribed in the catalog of saints, the saint is invoked in the liturgies of the church, churches may be dedicated to God in the saint's memory, festival days are celebrated in the saint's memory, in iconography the saint's head may be surrounded by a halo, and the saint's remains are preserved in precious vessels (reliquaries) and honored. There are two basic kinds of canonized saints: martyrs and confessors. Martyrs were killed because of their Catholic faith, and confessors exercised Christian virtues to a "heroic degree."

The first papal canonization, recognized as such, was that of Ulrich of Augsburg by Pope John XV in 993. In the following centuries, bishops continued to authorize and regulate the veneration of saints within their own dioceses. Since the mid-sixteenth century, the pope has exercised the exclusive right to name saints. In 1588, an office was established, called the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints since 1969, to review petitions for canonization, which originate all over the world, and to make recommendations to the pope. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, this congregation reviewed thousands of medieval saints who had never been canonized but were venerated, approving most but also rejecting many as spurious. The procedure for canonization was most recently simplified in 1983 by the Apostolic Constitution "Divinus perfectionis Magister" (The divine teacher and model of perfection).

The process leading to canonization can be lengthy, difficult, and expensive. It starts with an individual or group, known as the "petitioner," who seeks the canonization of a deceased Catholic and, to this end, organizes financial and popular support. The first phase of the investigation involves various "inquiries" made at the local level. These local inquiries ordinarily may not begin until the candidate for canonization, called the "servant of God," is at least five years deceased. Supervision of the local inquiries is ordinarily the responsibility of the bishop of the place where the servant of God lived and worked. The petitioner appoints, with the approval of this bishop, a "postulator." The postulator conducts a thorough investigation into the servant of God's life, compiling all possible evidence of his or her sanctity. The postulator drafts a report (relationes) for the local bishop and is responsible for administering financial matters related to the petition. The postulator's report includes a thorough investigation of the candidate's life, a justification for his or her canonization (based on the heroic exercise of virtue or martyrdom), and a review of any miracles accredited to the servant of God.

On the basis of this report and in consultation with other bishops of the region, the local bishop may decide to "open the cause," that is, to support and participate in further investigations. The local bishop then compiles the "acts" (acta), a document that includes the postulator's report; evaluations of the evidence and justification for canonization by theological, historical, and canonical experts; and an evaluation by two theologians of the servant of God's writings. The bishop then entrusts these documents to a "promoter of justice," who is responsible for further testing their contents and interviewing any living witnesses. The Christian faithful with pertinent evidence are encouraged to give testimony to the promoter of justice, including when their evidence speaks against canonization. The bishop also sends a summary of the petition to the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints to ascertain whether there is any obstacle on the part of the Holy See to the cause. Factors such as the political or ecumenical climate at the time of the process—reasons extrinsic to the holiness of the candidate—may justify the postponement of a cause. If the bishop decides after this round of investigations that the case still has merit, a transcript (transumptum) of the entire case is drafted, including separate sections on the servant of God's life and on his or her miracles. The original is kept in the diocesan archives, and two notarized copies are sent to the congregation in Rome.

After reviewing the transcript, the Sacred Congregation may decide to continue investigating the cause itself. If so, the cardinal-prefect of the congregation entrusts the acts to a "relator," who tests the materials once again, relying on the advice of historical, theological, and medical experts. The cardinal-prefect also appoints a "promoter of the faith." The promoter of the faith was once charged with uncovering reasons not to canonize the saint and was popularly known as the "devil's advocate." Now, however, the promoter of the faith, also called the prelate-theologian, is responsible for further evaluating the religious significance and orthodoxy of the servant of God. The relator supervises the drafting of two reports bearing on the life (the heroic virtue or martyrdom) of the servant of God and another on the miracles. These are called positiones and are submitted to the members of the congregation, who are cardinals and bishops. The congregation evaluates the positiones with the aid of expert advisers.

If the candidate's justification for canonization is based on virtue rather than martyrdom, a miracle must now be verified. A miracle, usually a healing of incurable illness, is verified if the medical advisers determine that there is no reasonable scientific explanation for the healing and if it is judged to inspire deeper faith in God. At this point, the Sacred Congregation may recommend to the pope that the candidate be "beatified." If the pope accepts this recommendation, there is a decree to that effect. Catholics are allowed to venerate publicly a beatified person, called a "blessed." Before a blessed may be canonized as a saint, there must be another verified miracle, or, in the case of a martyr, a first miracle. The congregation then makes a final recommendation to the pope, who alone decides whether to canonize the blessed. The ceremony of canonization is an elaborate and festive ceremony, generally held in Rome. Once canonization is complete, veneration of the saint is permitted and encouraged among all Catholics.

Casimir of Poland

Christian prince

Casimir, a prince of Poland, was born in the royal palace at Kraków on October 3, 1458. As a young man he ruled the country in his father's absence and was known for his piety. Later, he was canonized as a Roman Catholic saint, and his feast day is March 4.

The marriage of King Casimir Jagiellonian and Queen Elizabeth of Hapsburg was blessed with twelve children, of whom Casimir was the second. Casimir grew up in a tradition of unparalleled piety and devotion: His grandfather King Wladislaus II Jagiello brought Christianity to Lithuania; contemporary sources considered the prince's father the "most pious monarch of his time"; and his mother, renowned for her generosity and acts of mercy, was for her subjects a saint. Casimir acquired his humanist and religious education first in the school of the great Polish historian Jan Dlugosz, and later under the direction of Filippo Buonaccorsi, called Callimachus. As well as cultivating his extraordinary piety, the scholars prepared the young prince for a future role in public affairs, which called him as early as 1471, when, after his elder brother Wladislaus's ascension to the Bohemian throne, Casimir was put in charge of a military expedition to Hungary. This politically unprepared expedition to support the rebellion of a Hungarian faction and claim the Hapsburgs' crown ended in failure, and Casimir returned as a fugitive to Poland. In 1475, he left the school of Dlugosz in order to attend again to the demands of the state and follow his father to Vilna. The constant menace from Moscow called the king more and more often to Lithuania until in 1481, having discovered a dangerous conspiracy against his family, he entrusted the country to the charge of Casimir.

As an administrator, the prince gained renown for his prudence, mercy, justice, and a particular care for safety in Poland, troubled at that time by brigands. He reconciled this public duty with an exceptionally rich and active spiritual life marked by prayer, modesty, pilgrimage, fasting, mortification, and the pledge of chastity (bound by his vows, he refused to marry Kunegund, the daughter of the German emperor Frederick III). His two-year administration ended when, in unknown circumstances, the king called his son to Lithuania. Casimir, however, never reached his father, as he suffered a severe attack of a recurring lung illness and died at Grodno on March 4, 1484.

Casimir's body was interred in the cathedral of Vilna, where it became an object of great adoration. The cult of Prince Casimir began very early. He was venerated as a model ruler, the patron of Polish chivalry, the guardian of the Jagiellonian dynasty, and the patron of Poland and Lithuania. A petition for canonization was sent by the Polish king Sigismund I to Pope Leo X in 1515, but although the inquiry was completed before the death of the pope in 1521, it is not clear whether Leo X, or even his successor Hadrian VI, managed to acquaint themselves with the materials. King Sigismund's renewed request from 1539 is a reliable sign that the canonization took place only later, when in 1602 Pope Clement VIII named March 4 as the feast of St. Casimir.

Catarina de San Juan

(d. 1685 C.E.)

Roman Catholic laywoman, visionary

Catarina de San Juan, originally called Mirrah, was brought as a slave from the Moghul Empire in India to Puebla, Mexico. Jesuit priests baptized her in a slave camp in the Philippines and she became a devout Roman Catholic. The sisters of the Immaculate Conception convent in Puebla furthered her religious education. Catarina de San Juan desired to become a part of their order, but she was denied admission, reportedly because she was raped in the slave enclosure, but at least one of her confessors maintains that she was a virgin throughout her life. Another possible reason for the denial was that many convents required their postulantes to be of pure European blood. Her Asian origin would not have been acceptable to most colonial orders.

Despite the denial of entry into the religious order, Catarina de San Juan dressed as a Carmelite nun and devoted herself to a life of piety and good works for the less fortunate. As an adult, she became well known for her charity and piety. Several Jesuit priests wrote about her exemplary life. One Jesuit compiled a biography of her life and works that eventually drew the wrath of the Inquisition.

In this biography, the largest work composed in the colonial Americas, the priest outlined Catarina's many visions. Like Maria de Agreda, a famous Spanish religious figure, it appears that Catarina could bilocate and perform miracles. Once she reportedly turned back a hurricane in the Gulf of Mexico. In a spiritual visit to Japan, she catechized the emperor of Japan. She also visited China and predicted success for the embattled Jesuits in both China and Japan. In other visions, Catarina witnessed the rebellion of the Pueblo people in Santa Fe, New Mexico, and stated that Jesus had told her that the Franciscans in charge there had made mistakes in their ministry. She also witnessed the martyrdom of several Jesuit missionaries among the Tarahumara people, another difficult region for the Jesuit forces, and predicted eventual success. The Inquisition eventually banned this very popular three-volume text.

The devotion to Catarina de San Juan by the citizens of Mexico caused additional problems with the Inquisition for this holy figure. Because local adoration of Catarina was so strong, her followers began to place her image on altars in the local churches well before the beatification process had begun. She was also linked to the extremely popular bishop Juan de Palafox y Mendoza, and the images of both were banned by the Inquisition. Interestingly, after the wrath of the Inquisition waned, Catarina emerged as the "True China Poblana." She is depicted as a rural Mexican girl wearing a traditional costume of a white blouse, a green skirt, and a red shawl. This image is often used to invoke traditional Mexico, especially Mexican cuisine.

Catherine of Alexandria

(4th cent. C.E.?)

Christian legendary martyr

A Christian virgin martyr of the fourth century who bested fifty Greco-Roman philosophers in public debate, Catherine of Alexandria is often depicted holding a spiked wheel, the instrument of her torture, and a book, the instrument of her power.

Her legend tells that Catherine came to the aid of Christians who were forced to observe non-Christian rituals by the tyrant Maxentius of Rome. When Maxentius and his clerics were unable to defeat Catherine in debate, Maxentius tried unsuccessfully to make her his concubine. She responded by converting the emperor's wife and the captain of his guard to Christianity. Maxentius then tried to torture

Catherine using a special wheel lined with sharp blades, but divine intervention destroyed the wheel. Catherine was then beheaded. The inspiration for the passion of St. Catherine may be the plight of an Alexandrian Christian noblewoman deprived of her wealth and exiled by Emperor Maximinus in the early fourth century during his persecution of Christians. However, this link remains speculative.

Catherine was celebrated as the patron of teachers and students throughout the Middle Ages and well into the Renaissance. Her passion is included in many medieval manuscript collections with materials used for the early education of children. Catherine enjoyed a special renown among women. Since the task of a child's earliest education often fell to the mother from antiquity through the Renaissance, Catherine was a rare, sanctioned example of a woman teaching. Since she was learned and eloquent (and perhaps because she was too wise to be coerced or coaxed into complying with a tyrant's wishes), Catherine was often an icon for queens, women regents, and other noblewomen. Her legend also appealed to women of the merchant and middle classes of medieval and early modern Europe as they gained access to devotional literature. Catherine's is reputed to have been one of the holy voices that inspired Joan of Arc. She defended the divine mysteries central to Christianity (such as Christ's incarnation) and is thus the patron of theologians. Poets and lawyers have sought her as a guide for their own forms of eloquence. Wheel and wagon makers, and other craftsman of mechanical devices, including potters' wheels, have regarded her as their guardian as well, contributing to her place as one of the fourteen "helper" saints of the Catholic Church.

In late antiquity, Christian theologians tried to define the value and limitations of Greco-Roman learning for Christianity. By uniting Greco-Roman philosophy with the Christian religion, St. Catherine represents a holiness through which the superiority of Christian theology over that of non-Christian religions is asserted. Yet, by doing so, she also represents another ideal for the European Middle Ages and Renaissance: a bride of Christ who masters a classical education in the service of Christianity.

Catherine of Genoa

Christian mystic, caregiver

Catherine Fieschi Adorno was a lay mystic/visionary of the late Middle Ages who devoted her life to caring for the ill. She worked in a hospital in Pammatone, Genoa, for more than thirty years and was widely known for her spirituality and charitable works.

Catherine was born into an aristocratic family in Genoa in 1447. Although she wanted to join a convent when she was thirteen, she was married instead in 1463 to Giuliano Adorno. They had no children. Afflicted with depression and an unhappy marriage, in 1473 she experienced a double vision and was overwhelmed with love for God; after this point, she adopted a rigid ascetic discipline. Giuliano later turned to religion as well and became a member of the tertiary (third) order of the Franciscans. Catherine and her husband continued to live in a chaste marriage until his death in 1497.

Caring for the ill became the primary focus of Catherine's life. In 1473, the year of her conversion experience, she and her husband moved to the Pammatone Hospital, where they spent the rest of their lives caring for the very sick, including lepers and plague victims. They both worked as nurses without pay and covered their own expenses. In 1490, Catherine became the director of the female side of the hospital, supervising staff while continuing to nurse women and abandoned babies.

During the 1490s, Catherine came under the guidance of a spiritual director, Don Cattaneo Marabotto, director of the Pammatone. She related her experiences to him and to Ettore Vernazza, future cofounder of the Oratory of Divine Love. These men compiled Catherine's teachings after her death in 1510; in addition to her vita, they produced the Trattato (The Treatise of Purgatory) and the Dialogo (The spiritual dialogue). These works are made up of her sayings, but there is some controversy over how much is Catherine's own work and how much is due to the editing of the redactors and scribes.

Catherine engaged in many saintly practices. She was devoted to caring for the sick and poor, like a number of pious women in Italy during this time who wanted to follow Christ's example. She went to daily mass, received daily communion, and experienced spiritual ecstasies. She was a vegetarian, wore a hair shirt, and fasted. After her death, a number of miracles were attributed to her and are recorded in her vita. Her remains were placed in the chapel adjoining the hospital, and she was canonized in 1737.

Catherine of Siena

Christian mystic, spiritual adviser, doctor of the church

Although Catherine of Siena—a fourteenth-century mystic, a devoted nurse to the poor and the ill, and a much-sought-after spiritual and secular adviser—had no formal education, she dictated nearly four hundred letters, twenty-six prayers, and four treatises during her life. This collection of her work is known as Il libro della divina dottrina (Divine dialogue). As a result of her many writings and letters, together with the example of holiness she presented by way of her severe asceticism, she had a great influence upon important religious and secular figures of her time. It is Catherine of Siena who was credited with helping to persuade the pope to leave Avignon and return the papacy to Rome in 1377. As the exercising of any real authority was unusual for women, Catherine's interest and actions toward realizing peace within the church, the Italian city-states, and between France and England, as well as her desire to initiate a crusade against the Muslims, are all the more remarkable.

Catherine, born Catherine Benincasa in Tuscany in 1347, and her twin sister were the twenty-third and twenty-fourth children in a family of twenty-five. At the age of six, she experienced her first vision. Sworn to remain a virgin by the time she was seven, at sixteen she convinced a group of women, all widows, to allow her to join them in a tertiary Dominican order. A lay religious group, these women lived and cared for the city's poor and ill outside the walls of a convent. However, Catherine did not immediately join them in this work. Instead she withdrew to one room of her father's home, regarding the room as the cell of an anchorage, and herself a recluse; there she shunned all comfort and company while she prayed in seclusion. Eventually Catherine's contemplation led her to reenter the outside world, where she rejoined her family and took up charitable labor. The central idea that Catherine took away from her time of self-imposed confinement, and that underscored her spirituality and her writings, was the idea of the "cell" where all Christians should reside, a place she styled the "cell of self-knowledge."

Known during her lifetime as a person of great personal charm, when Catherine traveled she was often accompanied by a large entourage of men and women, many calling themselves her disciples. Her natural aptitude toward conciliation and persuasion, coupled with her own desire to act as intermediary, are largely responsible for the pope's eventual heeding of her advice to move the papacy back to Rome. Although this restoration did not cure all the ills of the church—in fact, the Great Schism followed—Catherine nevertheless continued to write and speak with authority in favor of the popes in Rome. She also persisted in writing letters to secular sovereigns, including rulers of the Italian republics and continental kings, and to military leaders underscoring her dedication to facilitating an end to all war.

Although Catherine garnered respect and admiration for her work as mediator and counselor, it was her uncompromising asceticism that ultimately convinced her contemporaries of her sincerity and authority. According to her confessor and biographer Raymond of Capua (d. 1377) in his Life of St. Catherine, Catherine shunned most worldly nourishment and lived, for the most part, on the eucharist, the communion bread. This likely resulted in her somewhat early death in 1380 at the age of thirty-two. Anecdotal accounts also tell of her drinking the pus from the wounds of the most ill among those she attended. She also is said to have received the stigmata, the wounds of Christ, although they were not outwardly apparent.

Catherine of Siena is recognized today as the patron saint of Italy. She was canonized in 1461 and named a doctor of the Roman Catholic Church in 1970. Her principal feast day is celebrated on April 29. However, honoring Catherine on the following Sunday is popular in Siena, the city of her birth.

Catholic Reformation Saints

(16th cent. C.E.)

The fifty-five saints canonized by the Roman Catholic Church between 1588 and 1776 can usefully be grouped together under the heading Catholic Reformation saints. This period of relatively frequent canonizations was both preceded and followed by lengthy periods in which no candidates were elevated to sainthood. Moreover, the figures canonized during these years reflect a distinctive conception of holiness inspired by the Catholic Reformation.

Most of the Catholic Reformation saints represent the ideals and aspirations of a renewed and combative church energized by the Protestant challenge and the rapid expansion of Catholicism into the New World and Asia. The church recognized as holy those who were active in the strengthening of the Catholic community or in missionary enterprises. The church also canonized individuals who promoted and put into effect the decrees of the Council of Trent (1543–1565). Finally, despite some apprehension among church authorities, a number of mystics from Spain and Italy were also recognized as holy by the church. In some respects, the absence of several traditional categories of holy people, such as theologians, and the relatively small numbers of others, such as martyrs, also distinguishes Catholic Reformation saints from those of other periods. To a greater extent than any earlier period, during this time holiness and sainthood were defined and controlled by the Roman hierarchy of the church, and this resulted in a group of saints who reflected the values and concerns of the church's leadership.

The Catholic Reformation church chose to canonize five main types of holy people. The largest group can be classified as heroic saints, almost exclusively drawn from the clergy, who spread, strengthened, or renewed the church. Some worked to spread the faith through missionary endeavor abroad, such as Francis Xavier in the Far East and Luis Bertrán in the New World, who worked to convert non-Christian societies to the Catholic faith. Others, such as Jean-François Régis, who focused his efforts on the Huguenots in the south of France, worked to strengthen the faith of the Christian communities of Europe. Missionary saints both reflected the priorities of the Catholic Church during this period of expansion and advertised the active defense of the faith that played an important role in the revival of the church during the decades following the Council of Trent. However, these missionary saints also drew upon a long-standing tradition, dating back to the apostles, that associated the conversion of souls to the faith with holiness. The canonization of those active in society reflected the priorities of the church leadership in this period of expansion and renewal.

The church also recognized as holy those who worked to renew older church institutions and build new ones in promotion of the church's goals as defined at the Council of Trent. This in part explains why forty-nine saints canonized during the period were clerics. The decrees of Trent placed great importance upon bishops and parish priests as shepherds of their flocks, supervisors of the clergy, and teachers of the laity. The renewed importance of the episcopacy in the church was reflected in the canonization of seven bishops during the period, including Charles Borromeo of Milan, Francis de Sales of Geneva, Turibio de Mogrobejo of Lima, and Pope Pius V. There was a long tradition of bishop-saints in the Catholic Church, but those canonized during the era of Catholic renewal were perhaps more administrators, legislators, and defenders of papal authority than the charismatic bishops of the early church and Middle Ages.

The founders and reformers of religious orders who dedicated themselves to the service of the Catholic Reformation church fall under this same heading. Thirty-eight Catholic Reformation saints were full members of religious orders, while several others were either lay brothers or in some other way closely associated with a religious order. Of these, new religious orders founded during the period of Catholic renewal produced proportionally more saints than already-established orders. Twelve saints founded or reformed religious orders, including Ignatius Loyola, founder of the Jesuits (Society of Jesus) and his associate Francisco Borgia, the third general of the society. Others include Vincent de Paul, founder of both the Congregation of the Mission and the Daughters of Charity; Jeanne de Chantal, founder of the Visitation nuns; and Teresa of Avila, founder of the discolored branch of the Carmelites. These figures both represented the aspirations of the Catholic Reformation church and belong to a long tradition of holy people in the Catholic tradition, including Dominic and Francis of Assisi, who had actively promoted the faith by organizing their brethren into monastic orders.

The heroic missionary and reforming saints were the largest groups, but three other distinctive categories are also present among the cohort of Catholic Reformation saints—healing saints and saints recognized for their Christian charity, most of whom were canonized in the eighteenth century, and mystics. There are six clear cases of charitable activity being rewarded by the church through sainthood: three women (Elizabeth of Portugal, Margarita of Cortona, and Catherine of Genoa) and four men (Vincent de Paul, John of Granada, Camillo de Lelis, and José de Calansanz). Their activities varied from care of the sick or galley slaves to the setting up of schools and other institutions, but they all shared a pious devotion to charitable activity in the community. The final category reflected the flowering of mysticism during the period of the Catholic Reformation.

Although many mystics were treated with suspicion by the Catholic hierarchy, several, such as Rose of Lima, Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi, Caterina de Ricci, Pedro Regaldo, and Joseph of Copertino, found strong support in Rome. Mystics granted sainthood came primarily from the regions of Spain and Italy, where the mystical tradition was strong, and their canonizations were in part due to the influence within the Roman hierarchy of Spanish and Italian churchmen, who viewed the piety and devotion of their mystical compatriots in terms of the mystic saints of the early church. The importance of Spanish and Italian churchmen in Rome during this period is reflected more widely in the cohort of Catholic Reformation saints: Forty-three came from one of these two geographic regions. Nevertheless, mystics during this period were generally canonized for their heroic virtue and complete union with Christ—two orthodox endeavors that could be accommodated by the church—not the extraordinary phenomena that often accompanied their mystical experiences. Moreover, some mystics who were canonized were also active in other endeavors, such as Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross, who both renewed religious organizations.

These categories are neither exclusive nor exhaustive. Several saints, such as Vincent de Paul and Teresa of Avila, fit well under more than one heading, while others, such as Aloysius Gonzaga and Stanislas Kostka, both ascetic Jesuit novices who died young, do not fit neatly into any of the categories. Nevertheless, the ability to classify most of the saints into a relatively few categories is a distinctive feature of the period that can best be explained by the unprecedented control that the Catholic Reformation papacy established over the canonization of saints after 1588.

During the Middle Ages, saints were most often the product of local initiative. Popular devotion to a holy figure was spontaneous and occasionally formed around fraudulent miracles promoted by churchmen with a direct interest in establishing a new pilgrimage site. Aware of past excesses and the effective attacks of Protestant critics on the worst excesses of saint cults, the early modern papacy was cautious in its approach to canonization. It sought, as with other aspects of the church, to bring the canonization process under its direct supervision. It did this both by prohibiting unauthorized saint cults and by establishing stringent criteria for the proof of holiness, which included the careful examination of each candidate by special church commissions.

The development of a clear path to sainthood was officially codified by Benedict XIV in the early eighteenth century. The control exerted over the canonization process by the papacy in large part explains the dominance of certain types of holy people among the cohort of Catholic Reformation saints. These men and women reflected the values of the Catholic Reformation as defined by the Council of Trent and the influence of important Catholic regions, such as Spain, or institutions, such as the new religious orders, over the papacy during this period.

Cato the Younger

(95–46 B.C.E.)

Ancient Roman Stoic

Marcus Porcius Cato, an influential statesman in the late Roman republic of the first century B.C.E., was legendary for his honesty, righteousness, and adherence to the tenets of early Stoicism. He inherited his firm belief in the Stoic ideals from his well-respected great-grandfather, Cato the Censor. The younger Cato, born in 95 B.C.E., was reputed as one of the greatest men of his time and hailed as a martyr of the republic after his suicide in 46 B.C.E. Tirelessly pursuing those he considered corrupt or tyrannical, he was unswerving in his beliefs and morality. He never reached the same political heights as many of his ambitious contemporaries, however. In fact, he was quite unpopular among his fellow politicians, many of whom were corrupt, because of his austere morality and watchful eye.

Despite his desire for an unchanging republic, Cato is often implicated in its downfall. He was unwilling to align his family with the great general Pompey by marriage; the refusal not only virtually ended Cato's political career but also resulted in Pompey's marriage to Caesar's daughter, creating an alliance that would increasingly gain power and eventually result in the first triumvirate of Pompey, Caesar, and Crassus. Later, Cato chose to support Pompey after his break with Caesar. In command of a small remainder of troops in Utica after Pompey's death and the defeat of Scipio at Thapsus, he gave his men a choice of action. When they decided that fighting was useless, Cato helped to smuggle away as many of them as possible and told the rest to try to make peace with Caesar. Cato preferred to take his own life in the tradition of the Stoics, who found it nobler to die by one's own hand than live dishonorably. In many ways, he became a greater foe to his enemies after his death, becoming a celebrated figure of moral rectitude, Roman virtue, and resistance to tyranny.

Cecilia

(d. 3rd cent. C.E.)

Christian martyr

Cecilia, a Christian martyr of the third century, is the patron saint of music and musicians and is commonly pictured with a small organ or viola. The Christian daughter of a Roman patrician family, she desired perpetual virginity. Over her protests, she was betrothed to the non-Christian Valerius. After their wedding, Cecilia informed Valerius that an angel guarded her virtue and that, unless he swore to remain chaste and converted to Christianity, he would suffer harm. Accordingly, Valerius sought out the future Pope Urban I (pope 222–230) and was baptized. Cecilia also convinced Valerius's brother, Tiburtius, to convert. Both men, along with their companion Maximus, were martyred for professing Christianity and burying the bodies of martyrs. Cecilia was soon arrested for the same crime, as she buried their bodies, and was dragged into court, where she was sentenced to be suffocated in her own bath. Though seven times the normal amount of fuel was piled into the furnace, Cecilia miraculously survived. The furious prefect then sentenced her to be beheaded. The executioner, struck by her youth and beauty, failed to decapitate her within the prescribed three blows and fled. Cecilia lingered for three days with her neck partially severed, during which time she converted an additional 400 people.

Upon her death, Cecilia's body was buried in the papal crypt near Pope Callistus (d. 222). Later, a church was consecrated within the confines of her home. In 822, Pope Paschal I ordered her body moved to the site of the basilica in Rome dedicated in her name. In October 1599, under the direction of Pope Clement VIII, Cecilia's body was exhumed and found to be incorrupt. Stefano Maderna (1576–1636) was then commissioned to create a sculpture based on her body. The resulting statue was installed below the high altar in her church and remains one of the most celebrated works of Italian art.

Though many of the details passed down about Cecilia's life are purely legendary, she is a popular saint and has been immortalized in literature, art, and music. Perhaps the most famous version of her hagiography is Geoffrey Chaucer's "Second Nun's Tale" (part of his Canterbury Tales composed in the fourteenth century). Other notable pieces include W. H. Auden's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" (c. 1940), which was set to music by Britten in 1942, and Fra Angelico's painting Forerunners of Christ with Saints and Martyrs (1423–1424). She has also been the subject of works by Raphael, George Frideric Handel, Alexander Pope, and John Dryden, among others. Her feast day is November 22.

Celebi, Asaf Halet

Muslim mystic, poet

One of the important figures of modern Turkish poetry, Asaf Halet Celebi is best known for his mystical poems written in simple Turkish with a modern style. He was born in Istanbul in 1907 and attended the famous Galatasaray Lyce, a French school known for its secular and modernist influences on several generations of Turkish writers, intellectuals, and leaders. He worked in various government offices and was a librarian when he died in 1958. Although he published only a few books of poetry, he gained a reputation for the simplicity of his language and his ability to express the traditional themes of classical sufism in a modern form.

Celebi saw the emergence of modern Turkey as a secular state and witnessed the historic transformation of Turkish society into a nation-state. With his background in European and particularly French culture, on the one hand, and training in Islamic-Ottoman tradition, on the other, he acted as a mediator between East and West. He was a follower of the school of poetry begun by Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273), and the traces of Rumi's influence can be found in many of his poems. Even though Celebi wrote about nonreligious issues as well, he is best remembered for his poems that describe the subtleties of the mystical path, longing, love, and spiritual resurrection. Spiritual solitude is a constant theme in his poetical imagery.

The period in which Celebi produced his work makes him particularly important in recent Turkish history because the intellectual atmosphere of the new Turkish Republic was notoriously antireligious and secular. It was during this time that sufi orders in Turkey were abolished and traditional Islamic themes were suppressed in favor of importing modern Western culture. Although responding in a subtle language to the erosion of traditional Islamic culture in Turkey, Celebi's poetical work continues the mystical tradition of Rumi as well as of the folk-poet and saint Yunus Emre (c. 1241–1320/1321). His published books include He (1942), Lâmelif (1945), and Om Mani Padme Hum (1953).

Celebi, Husam al-Din

Muslim mystic

Husam al-Din Celebi, Hasan b. Muhammad b. al-Hasan b. Akhi Turk (d. 1284), was a famous mystic affiliated with the globally celebrated sufi mystic and poet Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273). He became a disciple, or murid, of Rumi's at a young age and was well acquainted with Rumi's mentor Shams-i Tabrizi (c. 1180–c. 1247). When he became acquainted with Rumi he gave up his life of comfort, no longer allowing his servants to serve him, and presented his worldly possessions to Rumi and his affiliated circle. Under the guidance of Rumi he lived a simple life of prayer and devotion. Rumi entrusted to him the management and suitable distribution of the group's properties and gifts and subsequently made him the head of two subsidiary circles.

Celebi's importance in Rumi's poetic and spiritual life was significant. He could be considered the third muse and alter ego after Shams-i Tabrizi and Salah al-din Zarkub (d. 1261). At the death of Salah al-Din in 1258, Rumi proclaimed Celebi as his successor. Although other verses were the result of Rumi's association with the preceding two muses, the celebrated Mathnavi-i Ma'navi (The poem in rhyming couplets) was compiled by Rumi at Celebi's prompting. Celebi would grasp the master's words and commit them to writing, then read the text back to him for corrections. His active engagement as Rumi's muse cum scribe earned him high praise, as attested in the Mathnavi. This six-volume work, regarded by sufis as the epitome of spiritual and moral wisdom, combines folktales and lore with quasi-historical events. Rumi acknowledges Celebi's dominant role in the creation of this work in the verse: "Where are you Chelebi? Where are you? . . . I have thrown away pride and scruples, comfort my heart!"

In practical terms, Celebi also set rules and regulations for the Mawlawiyyah order. He established the etiquette, or adab, for the proper comportment of disciples before the master and also set the sequence of events in collective gatherings. Thus the sama' (a gathering for making and listening to music) was organized after the main Friday prayer at his initiative, and he also determined that in any gathering the Mathnavi would be read after the Qur'an had been recited. After Rumi's death, Celebi succeeded him and oversaw construction of his mausoleum. Celebi in turn passed away in 1284. He was followed by Rumi's son Sultan Walad ((1226–1312). Rumi considered Salah al-Din Zarkub and Husam-al-Din Celebi, like Shams-i Tabrizi, as paradigmatic reflections of divine grace.

Celestine V

Christian hermit, pope

Called the “hermit pope,” Peter Murrone (later Pope Celestine V) was associated with the Spiritual Franciscan movement of the thirteenth century. As a young man, he withdrew into solitude in the mountains of the Abruzzi. His austere piety attracted many followers, whom he organized into a hermit order, later called the Celestines, who were affiliated with the Benedictines. Peter became well known in Rome and southern Italy as an ascetic and monastic organizer. During the papal conclave of 1292–1294, the cardinals, split between the Orsini and Colonna families of Rome, could not agree on a pope. When the dean of the College of Cardinals announced a prophecy from Peter Murrone that God would punish the cardinals for failing to elect a pontiff, he declared he would vote for Peter himself. Thus, as a compromise candidate, the college selected the elderly Peter, who reluctantly agreed to leave his cave and become pope. The Spiritual Franciscans, some of whom wanted to separate from the Franciscan order to live in absolute poverty according to the Rule and Testament of St. Francis, hailed Celestine as the “angelic pope” who would usher in the Age of the Holy Spirit. Celestine lived up to their confidence by giving official approval to their establishment of a new order.

Charles II, king of Sicily, escorted Peter, riding on a donkey, to L’Aquila, where he took the name of Pope Celestine V. But the new pope became a virtual prisoner in Naples, where King Charles manipulated him to his political advantage. The naive Celestine, who did not know Latin and issued decrees in Italian, resigned after only six months in office (July 5–December 13, 1294) and determined to return to his cave in the mountains. When he tried to flee Italy, however, the next pope, Boniface VIII (pope 1294–1303), had him imprisoned until his death; Boniface nullified Celestine V’s privileges, including those that were granted to the new religious order. Celestine’s resignation touched off a furious debate concerning the legality of a papal resignation and the rectitude of Celestine’s behavior. Dante’s condemnation of the Great Refusal (Inferno 3:59) is generally considered to refer to this event. Clement V, however, declared Celestine a saint on May 5, 1313.

His bizarre career illustrates the widespread belief of his contemporaries in apocalyptic expectations and in the depth of an ascetic spirituality founded in the poverty and detachment of Jesus Christ during his sojourn on earth.

Cephalophores

Christian legendary martyrs

Head carrying might seem to be the domain of Green Knights, Anne Boleyn, or the Headless Horseman, but in fact the notion of a martyred saint bearing his head had a serious purpose in medieval Christianity. The most famous cephalophores were Denis of Paris and Miniatus of Florence (who both died c. 250) and, from the early fourth century, the three martyred soldier-saints of the Theban legion, Felix, Regula, and Exuperantius. In each case, there were two principal matters: the means and the place of execution itself. Following a tradition that the apostle Paul was taken outside the walls of the city of Rome and there decapitated with a sword, as befitting a Roman citizen condemned to death, countless martyrs in the early Christian period were dispatched by swords, often—in legend—after suffering violent tortures. But in spite of the brutality of the sentence, there were miraculous, comforting signs: Paul’s severed head was said to have spoken, just as the little clergion of Geoffrey Chaucer’s prioress sang though his throat was cut. Thus the martyrdom becomes a dual testimony to sacrifice and the ongoing vital force of spirituality.

This twin emphasis could mean that the place of martyrdom, if outside the walls of the city, might not be the place where the saint’s relics were to be venerated. Denis, a Roman citizen and according to legend a disciple of Paul, would be executed on Montmartre, but his cult had developed in a chapel north of the city. Therefore, according to the Legenda Aurea (Golden legend), Denis personally chose (and God approved) this new location by taking up his head and marching the two miles over to Saint-Denis. His companions Rusticus and Eleutherius, also beheaded, made their way in a similar if less spectacular fashion: Their bodies were thrown into the Seine, but they were recovered by a pious noblewoman and eventually placed beside Denis. Miniatus, similarly, climbed to his chosen home, now one of the most precious churches in Florence. Felix, Regula, and Exuperantius all took up their heads and made their way to their current resting place in the cathedral at Zürich.

This series of legends allows for the multiplication of sacred sites, commemorating both a violent death and a new life in a positive setting made sacred by custom from the earliest eras. At Saint-Denis, the Legenda contends, Denis remained at peace, and the miraculous event was blessed by a “great dulcet angelic song.”

Chad

(c. 620–672 C.E.)

Christian monk, bishop, missionary

Chad, Christian bishop of Mercia (now in central England), was renowned for his humility and for the posthumous healing power of the dust from his tomb. A devout ascetic with little personal ambition, he was born in about 620 and trained with his brother Cedd at Lindisfarne, an island off the coast of England, under St. Aidan. He may have worked alongside Cedd when in 653 the latter converted Mercia to Christianity. On Cedd’s death, in 664, Chad succeeded him as abbot of Lastingham, a monastery in Yorkshire.

Although Chad would have been happy to remain in Yorkshire, when the nominated bishop of York, St. Wilfrid, had gone to Gaul to be consecrated and did not return, Oswiu, the king of Northumbria, had Chad consecrated in 663/664 using an uncanonical ceremony with two British bishops. When Wilfrid returned in 666, Chad gave up claim to the episcopal see. However, in 669, Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, upon discovering two bishops of York, deposed Chad on the basis of his invalid consecration. Chad humbly replied, “If you know I have not duly received episcopal ordination, I willingly resign the office, for I never thought myself worthy of it; but, though unworthy, in obedience submitted to undertake it” (Bede III, iv, 3).

Moved by Chad’s humility, Theodore correctly reconsecrated him as new bishop of the Mercians according to Roman rites. During the three years in which he was bishop, Chad laid the foundation of the see of Lichfield. He engaged in pastoral and missionary work, traveling by foot like an apostle. Only after Theodore bodily lifted Chad onto a horse would he consent to travel in such a luxurious manner.

Later, Chad reported a visitation of singing angels who informed him that he would soon die. A monk overheard the angelic voices, but the humble Chad asked him not to tell anyone until after his imminent death. Chad died on March 2, 672. Almost immediately, he was venerated as a saint. Pilgrims were cured by taking dust from his tomb, mixing it with water, and drinking it, whereupon they were eased of their infirmity and restored to health. Sick cattle were also reportedly cured after drinking a mixture of the dust and water. Chad’s relics were moved to a shrine in Lichfield Cathedral in 1296.

Why this humble bishop became the focus of such faith is difficult to ascertain. It is possible that his life was conflated with that of his prominent brother Cedd; in any case, in the Middle Ages it was Chad who garnered the attention and devotion of thousands of pilgrims.

Chaitanya, Krishna (Caitanya)

(c. 1486–1533 C.E.)

Hindu god saint

Krishna Chaitanya was born to a brahmin family in Bengal in approximately 1486 and named Vishvambhara Mishra. Legends surround his early life, but it is generally accepted by scholars that the defining moment in his young adulthood occurred on a trip to the sacred place of Gaya. There he met a holy man who turned the young man’s attention to the love and constant worship of Krishna. Returning home, Vishvambhara spoke of nothing but Krishna, fell into ecstasies at the name of the lord, and sang and enthusiastically chanted the names of Krishna. He soon decided to become a renunciant of the material world and changed his name to Krishna Chaitanya (He whose consciousness is Krishna). He was not the founder of the Bengali Vaishnava bhakti (devotion) movement, which had been under way for several centuries in the area, but he did become its best-known practitioner and promoter.

Chaitanya relocated to Puri, in Orissa, site of a major temple to Vishnu. His career as the devotee of Krishna continued there, but he also traveled the subcontinent, promoting the practice of emotional and visible devotion to his lord. According to the legends, during a pilgrimage to Brindavan, the fabled area of Krishna's youth, he experienced incredible ecstasies at the holy sites. Chaitanya was always a demonstrative devotee: He led processions of chanting and singing, organized dramatic presentations of the Krishna lore, and led night-long recitations of the exploits of Krishna. Chaitanya so embodied the bhakti he professed that he himself became an object of worship in his own lifetime.

The main features of the Bengali Vaishnavism promoted by Chaitanya were based in bhakti and in the history of Krishna as first related in the Mahabharata (c. 200 B.C.E.–200 C.E.) and the Bhagavata Purana (c. 900 C.E.). Later Bengali poets embellished on these teachings and stories, dwelling especially on episodes chronicling the birth and maturation of the god in the countryside of Brindavan. As a handsome youth, Krishna played his flute on a riverbank while gopis (female cowherders) rushed headlong to him in an ecstasy of longing. They gave up everything to join with him, but were then separated from him. During this separation from the lord Krishna, the women experienced unbearable pain and longing, and he finally returned to them. Chaitanya, like many of his contemporaries, sought to imitate such devotion to Krishna: a complete emotional, even physical surrender to the love of Krishna. Chaitanya promised his followers that such constant worship and devotion would result in permanent union with Krishna in the eternal paradise of the cosmic Brindavan.

Although Chaitanya himself wrote little, after his death in 1533 his disciples wrote biographies, detailed his theology, and spread word of his teachings. The Chaitanya movement rose and fell in popularity in Bengal, but in the nineteenth century it was revived. A twentieth-century disciple of the movement, Swami A. C. Bhaktivedanta, founded the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) in New York in 1966. This society is often referred to by the two names of the lord that group members chant over and again, "Hare Krishna." ISKCON continues to spread the Chaitanya-based practices of emotive devotion to Krishna throughout the world.

Chajang

(590–658 C.E.)

Buddhist monk

Chajang was an eminent Buddhist monk of the Silla kingdom (57 B.C.E.–668 C.E.) in Korea. Though born into the Silla royal family in 590 C.E., Chajang renounced all worldly privileges due his status and lived the life of a highly disciplined Buddhist hermit. His meditative and ascetic powers led him to a series of ecstatic visions of the bodhisattva (enlightened being) Manjushri, from whom he received esoteric instructions. These instructions led him to take up the life of a Buddhist preacher and wonder worker.

Like many of his contemporaries, Chajang became dissatisfied with the fact that Buddhism had only been partially transmitted to Silla. In 636, he traveled with ten disciples to China, visited Chinese holy mountains, and finally took up residence in a small hermitage outside the Tang capital of Chang-an. His reputation in China grew, and many Chinese monks sought to study with him. He was also asked to give lectures at the court of Emperor T'ai-tsung (629–649) and was presented with many gifts by the emperor and the crown prince. After seven years in China, he returned to Silla, where Queen Chindok (r. 647–654) awarded him the rank of Supreme National Cleric (t'aeguk t'ong) with the power to establish regulations for the governance of all Buddhist monasteries. His regulations raised the level of discipline among Silla clergy and led to the establishment of Silla's first Buddhist lineage dedicated to the study of the vinaya (monastic discipline). Because of his standing in both China and Silla, Chajang also advised Queen Chindok to adopt the dress and calendar of Tang China. It is recorded that by accepting Chajang's advice, Silla's standing in the Tang court rose and Silla was awarded the title of "little China" by the Tang emperors. Such favor was to prove helpful in the years ahead when Silla sought and received the aid of Tang troops in her unification of the peninsula.

Chajang's contributions to the reformation and reorganization of Silla Buddhism, as well as his advancement of Silla's cultural and diplomatic standing, was matched by his representation of the growing amalgamation of Buddhism and Silla adherence to ritualistic magic. The Manjushri visions he received, the miraculous signs and wonders that attended his lectures, and the visits to him by dragon spirits and heavenly maidens helped in the spreading of Buddhism throughout the kingdom and established the pattern of as-simulation of local beliefs that became the hallmark of Unified Silla Buddhism.

Chandrakirti

(c. 580–660 C.E.)

Buddhist philosopher

An Indian Buddhist philosopher renowned for his use of reasoning in articulating a subtle vision of Middle Way philosophy (Madhyamaka) and an outline of the path of Mahayana Buddhism, Chandrakirti was most likely born in the latter part of the sixth century in India at a place called Samanta, according to Tibetan sources. He was ordained as a Buddhist monk (bhikṣu) under the Middle Way philosopher Buddhāpālita's disciple Kamalabuddhi. Chandrakirti became a great Middle Way philosopher himself, went to the famous Indian university of Nalanda in northeastern India, and eventually became abbot there.

Over the years, Chandrakirti had a famous debate with the master Sanskrit grammarian Chandragomin, who supported the mind-only position of the Vijñānavāda (doctrine of consciousness) school. Other legendary events in his life are that he walked through a stone column, milked the picture of a cow to feed the monks of Nalanda during a time of famine, and rode a stone lion to deter a Turkish army that was threatening the university. These miraculous stories depict in dramatic fashion the Middle Way philosophical position that things lack essence and have no intrinsic nature of their own. This experience of the lack of essence, emptiness (śūnyata), fused with compassionate, skillful activity (upāya), such as feeding the starving monastic community, exemplify the life of one striving for buddhahood for the sake of others—the ideal of the bodhisattva (enlightened being). Chandrakirti's philosophy is set forth most vividly in his two greatest works, Madhyamakavatara (Encountering the Middle Way) and Prasannapada (Clear words).

Prasannapada utilizes dialectical techniques to indicate the philosophical Middle Way (madhyamamarga) between the extremes of permanence and annihilation. In this text, Chandrakirti thoroughly demonstrates the doctrine of the emptiness of intrinsic existence in order to eradicate the habitual tendency of conceptual thought to fabricate reified notions of existence (bhava) and nonexistence (abhava). Madhyamakavatara charts the progressive progress of a bodhisattva on the way to buddhahood according to ten productions of the “thought of enlightenment” (bodhicitta), each of which is linked with ten stages (bhūmi) and corresponding perfections (paramita). Chandrakirti's teachings became popular in Tibet after the twelfth century and have remained popular among Tibetan Buddhist philosophers up to the present day.

Chapman, Jonathon (Johnny Appleseed)

Christian idealist

American pioneer Jonathon (or John) Chapman was a Christian who received the nickname “Johnny Appleseed” for his tireless planting of orchards for the benefit of frontier settlers. His life has become part of the American imagination, standing for visionary idealism and generosity to improve the lives of others, including future generations. Besides planting apple trees, he gave gifts to settlers and won the respect of Native Americans. He is remembered for treating all the creatures he encountered with love.

Chapman was born in Leominster, Massachusetts, in 1774. In 1801, at the age of twenty-seven, he planted a horse-load of apple seeds—his first orchard, at Licking Creek, Ohio. In 1805, in canoes lashed together, he paddled down the Ohio River, stopping at beautiful spots to plant orchards. His life was one of constant motion, impelled by the mission of planting orchards in remote places. The picture we form by considering the stories told of him is that of a wiry little bearded man wandering the frontier, traveling mostly on foot, carrying leather bags filled with Pennsylvania apple seeds. Often he followed an old Indian trail from Fort Duquesne, located at the site of present-day Pittsburgh, to Detroit.

It is said that Chapman would never eat with a family unless he was assured there was plenty for the children, and he planted the orchards to ensure the perennial harvest of food for future generations of children. He accepted promissory notes in exchange for the planting, but if the debt was not paid, he would not pursue it. He was also a vegetarian by philosophical choice.

Apples could be used to make cider, and cider vinegar could be useful for pickling fruits and vegetables. Apples could be dried or eaten in pies, sauce, butter, and other forms. Chapman planted trees in Indian villages as well as in areas settled by pioneers. During the War of 1812, he traveled fearlessly in areas where other white men could not go. In 1815, lost in the forest and suffering from typhoid or malaria, he cured himself and survived.

A settler gave Chapman shoes one November and later noticed that he was barefoot. When the donor grew angry, Chapman explained, "I met a barefoot man in greater need" (Jones 2000). Chapman salvaged cast-off homespun and buckskin, wearing them in layers. During part of his life he wore a big cloth coffee sack. Though he looked odd, he was respected. He gave spiritual books to settlers, and ribbons and calico to their children.

Once, a missionary preaching in Ohio cited the New Testament, "Take one coat, one pair of shoes, one staff," and then asked listeners, "Where now is there a man like the primitive Christians of old, traveling to heaven barefoot and clad in coarse raiment?" Chapman approached and said, "Here's your primitive Christian" (Jones 2000). Chapman was inspired by Christian mystic Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), who taught that everything in the world exists from a divine origin, that the souls of living beings are clothed with natural forms that enable them to exist here and perform their roles, and that these forms correspond to higher realities in an ideal realm.

If Chapman saw an animal being abused, he'd buy it and give it to a kinder settler. When settlers turned out lame horses to die, Chapman fed them in the winter then found them good summer pastures. He was known for gentleness and reverence toward all forms of life, including bees, snakes, and bears. Helping a settler make a road, he once accidentally destroyed a hornets' nest; gently removing a hornet that had stung him, he asked his companions not to kill it.

Native Americans treated Chapman as a great medicine man because of his healing powers, his eccentricities, and his ability to withstand pain. Once, when chased by a war party, he submerged himself in a swamp with his mouth out of the water, becoming an unseen part of nature. "America's St. Francis" died in Fort Wayne, Indiana, in 1845. Anyone today who freely distributes goods in America is likely to be called a "Johnny Appleseed."

Charlemagne

(742–814 C.E.)

Christian king, emperor

Charlemagne, king of the Franks from 768 until his death in 814 and founder of the Carolingian Empire, was canonized in 1165 by the antipope Pascal III as a favor to the German king and emperor Frederick I ("Barbarossa," 1123–1190), who had elected him in a schism against the legitimate pope, Alexander III.

Charlemagne and his brother Carloman inherited the Frankish throne from their father, Pepin III ("the Short"), who had usurped the position from the Merovingian dynasty in 751. After Carloman's death in 771 and Charlemagne's accession as sole ruler, he consolidated and enlarged the territory of his kingdom through military victories in Italian Lombardy, the Spanish March, Bavaria, and Saxony, this last a land whose people he forcibly converted to Christianity. He subjected further territories, making them tributary states. Charlemagne was committed to learning and letters, gathered scholars and artists at his court at Aachen in present-day western Germany, and instituted moral and religious reforms throughout his kingdom. On Christmas Day in the year 800, Charlemagne was crowned emperor by Pope Leo III in Rome, making a decisive break with Byzantium and founding the Western Empire. At his death in 814, Charlemagne bequeathed his empire to his son, Louis the Pious, whose own death in 840 ultimately resulted in its dissolution. Charlemagne was often remembered as an exemplar of ideal rulership and was for centuries invoked by French and German rulers to legitimize political claims or policies.

Although memory of Charlemagne never waned and his reputation as an extraordinary ruler was overwhelming, his sainthood was more a matter of practical politics than of sincere piety. Charlemagne's canonization in 1165 occurred during the empire's struggle with the papacy when Barbarossa (the first to employ the term "Holy Empire") prevailed upon Pascal III to canonize Charlemagne as part of a program to underscore the sacral character of his imperial office. Barbarossa had Charlemagne's corpse solemnly translated on December 29, 1165. A document emanating from Barbarossa's court the following year that recorded the event speaks of St. Charlemagne as a lawgiver and praises him for his piety, foundation of churches, conversion of Saxons and other non-Christians, and expansion of Christianity. With a total disregard for historical veracity, the Vita Sancti Karoli (Life of St. Charles), composed by 1179, praised him for his so-called pilgrimage to the Holy Land, establishing historical precedent for the Crusades.

The church at Aachen, which Charlemagne had built and where he was buried, became the center of his cult, though his relics were disseminated and his cult spread throughout the empire. In the fourteenth century, his feast was adopted by the Valois kings of France as they, too, sought to claim Charlemagne as forefather. However, Charlemagne's feast day (first on December 29, the day of the translation, but soon thereafter changed to January 28, the anniversary of his death) was never incorporated into the Roman calendar, and Pascal's canonization was never officially recognized by the Roman church.

Charles I

(1600–1649 C.E.)

Anglican king, martyr

The reputation of King Charles I of England for sanctity is entirely posthumous. Reserved and inflexible, Charles Stuart, born in 1600, came to the throne in 1625 convinced, like his father James I before him, of his divine right to rule. His reign was plagued by political conflicts, financial crises, and religious tensions. Constitutional questions about the relationship between king and Parliament caused mounting pressures, which were exacerbated by financial problems engendered by wars with Spain and France. In addition, religious issues loomed large between those, including Charles, who favored a "high church" form of Anglicanism and more radical reformers who hoped to eliminate what they saw as residual Catholic elements in the Church of England. The most radical of these reformers, the Puritans, hoped for a complete reorganization of the church, including the elimination of bishops and the sacraments. These tensions erupted in civil war between king and Parliament in 1642. Ultimately, Charles was captured, charged with high treason, tried, and, on January 30, 1649, executed.

Royalist accounts portrayed Charles's execution as the martyrdom of a divinely appointed ruler who chose to die rather than disobey God's will by renouncing his sacred kingship. Handkerchiefs dipped in the king's blood at the scene of the execution were reported to effect miraculous cures. Charles's scaffold speech, in which he described monarchy as a trust from God that he would not betray, and the publication a month later of Eikon Basilike: The Portraiture of His Sacred Majesty in His Solitudes and Sufferings, which claimed the king as its author, solidified the image of Charles as a martyr whose trial and imprisonment mirrored the passion of Christ.

It is likely that Charles was venerated annually in secret on January 30 even during the Commonwealth. In any case, with the restoration of the monarchy, the cult of Charles the Martyr became official, and his feast day was entered into the Book of Common Prayer in 1662. Even after the concept of sacred kingship lost favor, Charles was still regarded as a martyr, with emphasis placed on his support of the traditional Anglican Church structure, particularly his defense of the episcopacy, as the cause of his martyrdom. Although his feast was temporarily dropped in 1859, it reentered the Anglican calendar in 1980. Charles was the last saint officially canonized by the Anglican Church.

Chengguan (Ch'eng-kuan)

(738–839 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, patriarch

Chengguan, born in 738, was a Chinese Buddhist monk of the Tang dynasty (618–907) who was later honored as the fourth patriarch of the Huayan school (named after the Buddhist text Huayan Jing [The garland of Buddha]) because of his dedicated work to further Huayan teaching. He entered the monastic order at the age of eleven under the Chan master Pei at Baolin monastery. Having received his full precepts at the age of twenty, he traveled widely and studied the teachings of other schools (traditionally there are eight schools in China).

In 776, Chengguan visited Wutai, Emei, and other holy mountains on pilgrimage. It seems that he loved Mt. Wutai so much that he returned there and stayed in Huayan monastery, where he started his research on Huayan Jing, dedicating his long life to the exhaustive study of this particular text. He became well known as the Huayan Commentator. In 796, the emperor invited him to Changan (today Xian), the capital, to assist Prajna, a Kashmir monk, in his translation of the latter part of the Huayan Jing, which is known as the Huayan in Forty Fascicles. Under imperial order, Chengguan wrote a commentary on the new translation and also lectured to the emperor on Huayan Jing. Thus he was given the title of National Teacher Qingliang by the emperor, since Qingliang is another name for Mt. Wutai where he stayed. He died at the age of 101 in 839; according to another source he lived seventy-two years.

Chengguan had more than a hundred disciples, among whom four were eminent, and Zongmi became his successor in the transmission of dharma (Buddhist doctrine). Chengguan wrote more than thirty works, mostly commentaries on the Huayan Jing. Although his main task was to spread the teaching of Huayan school, he also showed the elements of Chan and Tiantai teachings in his thought, since he had gained a thorough understanding of them through his comprehensive study of different schools.

Child Prodigies

The Christian gospels emphasize the closeness of children to God, a belief that is replayed in legends of holy people in many religious traditions. It is a theme common to most religions that holy people are marked out from youth (or even before) as uniquely close to God. Some are given specially by God in response to prayer, such as the Jewish prophet Samuel, the proto-Christian John the Baptist, or the sixteenth-century Hindu saint Kanakadasa. Sometimes births are miraculous, without pain to the mother, for example.

More often, a particularly great holy infant displays his or her separateness from the normal rules of human development: Shakyamuni Buddha (Siddhartha Gautama, fifth century B.C.E.), for example, is supposed to have taken seven steps immediately after his birth, declaring, "This is my final rebirth." A lotus flower bloomed under each step, after which the infant was washed by two dragons. The newborn Herakles of ancient Greek mythology strangled two snakes that had been sent to kill him. The infant Zoroaster (c. 1400 B.C.E.) laughed at birth, and in boyhood he was defended from harm by animals. In the Christian apocrypha and Muslim tradition, the infant Jesus spoke in his mother Mary's defense when she was reproached for bearing a bastard. These sources also report that as a child, he made a clay bird come to life and that he once struck a playmate dead with a curse, after which he performed his first resurrection.

Numerous Christian saints have reportedly worked miracles in childhood. The Ethiopian Takla Haymanot (d. 1313) was said to have performed miracles before he could walk, and Ciarán of Clonmacnoise (512–548), while helping his foster mother with her dyeing, succeeded in turning everything in her house blue. Such childhood miracles, however, are mostly limited in Christian tradition to the border areas of the religion rather than its historic core. In Buddhism, too, miraculous activity by youngsters is mostly limited to the very top rank of holy people or to the saints of border areas, such as the Tibetan Tsong kha pa (1357–1419), who was already famous for supernatural portents when he began his spiritual education at age two. Miraculous childhoods also appear in Amerindian and African religions, such as the Maasai legend of Kidongoi, the first prophet, found as a child wandering on the hills and already endowed with powers of prophecy and miracle working. In general, children are thought to be particularly open to visions and prophecy, perhaps most notably in recent Christianity. To site just three famous examples, Bernadette Soubirous was fourteen when she had her vision of the Virgin Mary at Lourdes in 1858; the Virgin's apparition at Fatima, Portugal, in 1917 was to three illiterate children; and Mary's first appearance at Medjugorje in 1981 was to six Croatians, aged ten to seventeen.

Child prodigies are a major theme in Hinduism and Buddhism. The Buddhist Atisha (982–1054), to give just one example, mastered Sanskrit and literary skills at a young age. The Indian predilection for precocious child-saints extends also to the Sikh faith: Nanak (1469–1539), the founder of Sikhism, could write verse within days of starting school. The theme of the learned child prodigy is by no means limited to India, though. Legends report that the great Zen master Dogen Zenji (1200–1253) could read Chinese poetry by the age of four; Zhiyi (538–597), the founder of Tiantai Buddhism, as a child could repeat a sutra after hearing it a single time—he could also see events in the past; the Jewish leader Elijah ben Solomon (1720–1797), the Vilna Gaon, gave a learned sermon in the great synagogue of Vilna at the age of three and had mastered the Talmud and Kabbala by age thirteen. In such company, Jesus’ discourse in the Temple when he was twelve years old (Luke 2:47) seems modest.

More important is precocity in religious development. So many holy people have been portrayed as precocious in devotion that it is a relief to find somebody like the Christian Adalbert of Prague (c. 956–997), who led a frivolous youth until scared onto the right path by attending a particularly harrowing deathbed. Much more often, Christian hagiography emphasizes that saints, while still children, had the mind and manners “of old men,” and rejoices to tell of young children passing their lives in prayer while their contemporaries are out playing. Nanak, the first Sikh guru, took his first important religious stand at the age of eleven when he refused to don the Hindu sacred thread. Other children stated a firm preference for monastic life, even against their parents’ wishes, even before they reached adolescence. For example, the Hindu Shankara (d. 820) renounced the world when he was eight years old and began his ascetic wanderings around India. The Zen master Basui Zenji (1327–1387), when only seven, was driven on a religious quest by his father’s death.

When these children were drawn to a minority religion, they often proved as steadfast as their elders. Christianity especially, perhaps moved by Jesus’ scriptural proclamation “Suffer the children to come to me, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 19:14 and parallels), has encouraged legends of patient suffering for the faith by children. A surprising number of early martyrs were children or teenagers; the theme continues today with figures such as the South African girl Manche Masemola (1912–1928), who was attracted to the Anglican mission against her parents’ wishes, abused, and finally killed for her faith. Examples can be found in other faiths as well. A particularly moving case of child martyrdom is that of the four sons of Sikh guru Gobind Singh (1666–1708), aged seven to eighteen years, who were all killed by Mughal authorities in 1704. Two died defending their father. The other two escaped with their grandmother but were later betrayed. When they refused to accept Islam, they were bricked up alive behind a wall. Similarly, several Shi’a Muslim imams are credited as models of perseverance in the faith while still children.

Chilembwe, John

(1875–1915 C.E.)

Baptist minister, rebel, martyr

John Chilembwe, Malawi’s national hero, became the first Malawian Baptist minister in 1900 and led the only armed uprising against British rule in Africa in the 1910s. He was born in 1875 to a Mang’anya mother who had been captured by his Yao father in a slave raid. He may have received some education at the Presbyterian Blantyre Mission, but his life changed when he started to work as a cook for Joseph Booth, an evangelical missionary from Australia who was one of the first proponents of the idea of “Africa for the African.”

Chilembwe soon advanced from cook to translator, and he and Booth became friends. In 1897, Booth took him to America, where Chilembwe trained at the Virginia Theological Seminary of the (black) National Baptists. Chilembwe returned to Malawi in 1900 as a National Baptist missionary to open the first African-instituted mission in Malawi, the Providence Industrial Mission (PIM), or First African Baptist Church.

Being the first ordained black minister in southern Malawi and a black missionary presented challenges. The settlers, and even some missionaries, were not sympathetic to him. He gained some respect by establishing a good English school, and by building—with very little outside help—an impressive church. PIM expanded into several areas of southern and central Malawi, with its stronghold in the Migowi area to the east, close to the Mozambique border. By 1914, the African Baptist Church had 1,275 baptized members.

In 1914, Chilembwe and his associates from his own and other churches started to prepare an armed uprising against colonial rule to address the grievances of white racist behavior. Chilembwe wrote to the governor to protest the recruitment (and mistreatment) of Malawian soldiers for World War I. When the answer seemed to be his impending arrest, the uprising was started; on January 23, 1915, there was a failed night attack on the Blantyre armory and a successful attack on Bruce Estate at Magomero. There had been much mistreatment of Africans there, and two white men were killed (although their wives were spared). The colonial army struck back. Chilembwe's force was able to repel the first army attack but soon had to give up the fight. The uprising never had any real chance of success. It seems that Chilembwe, with his poor eyesight, and in no way a military man, was aware of this, and that he was willing to strike a blow for justice and die.

Chilembwe fled to Migowi and was soon killed while trying to escape to Mozambique. The army dynamited PIM's impressive church building, and the church was outlawed, only to be allowed again in 1924. In 1926, Dr. Daniel Malekebu (with his wife Flora)—who had been in America during the uprising—reopened the mission, and he spent his life there working as pastor and physician.

The fact that Chilembwe's grave cannot be identified gave birth to the myth that he had escaped to America and would return one day. Democratic Malawi sees Chilembwe as its national hero: His portrait is printed on all banknotes, and January 15 is Chilembwe Day. His congregation at PIM sings: "John Chilembwe is lying in the grave, but his story marches on."

Chimalman

(Early 9th cent. C.E.)

Mesoamerican heroine

In Aztec mythology dating from at least the early ninth century, Chimalman was a female warrior from the region of Huitznahuac who battled the Chichimec warrior Mixcoatl before bearing his son, Quetzalcoatl. The battle between the Chichimec warrior and his consort was telling. Chimalman appeared to Mixcoatl naked and he shot four atlatl darts at her. The first went over her head and she ducked, the second went to her side and she avoided it. Chimalman caught the third dart in her hand, and she allowed the fourth one to pass between her legs. Mixcoatl fled but returned to look for her another day. He shot four more darts at her with the same result. Then he slept with her and she became pregnant.

After four days of great pain, the infant Quetzalcoatl ripped his way out of Chimalman's womb, causing Chimalman to die in childbirth. This ultimate sacrifice on the part of the female warrior assured her an afterlife in Tamoanchan, the most revered paradise reserved for those given the highest honors in Mesoamerica—warriors who died in battle and women who died in childbirth. The story marks the infant Quetzalcoatl as the son of two warriors and also as the son of a mother who sacrificed herself so that he could be born. The Mesoamerican predilection for military power with divine sanction was thus doubly reinforced. The story also reveals the important role that women played in the war machine as childbearers.

Chinmayananda

Hindu teacher

Swami Chinmayananda, a modern-day guru (teacher), sought to reclaim the spirituality of Advaita Vedanta, the philosophy of nondualism set forth by the Indian poet and scholar Sankara (eighth century), to reinvigorate what he saw as the waning of Hinduism. This attempt to bring about a renaissance in Hinduism was characteristic of previous neo-Hindu social reformers such as Swami Vivekananda. A spiritual guide for sadhakas (seekers) and a champion of social and cultural reform, Chinmayananda also set up the Chinmaya Mission in India, which now has branches worldwide.

Chinmayananda was born Balakrishna Menon on April 11, 1916, in Ernakulam, Kerala, India, and as a young man pursued a career in journalism. An investigative article on the topic of sadhus (holy men) eventually led him to become a disciple of Swami Sivanand of the Divine Life Society in Haridwar, India. He also spent eight years studying with Swami Tapovanand of the Adi Sankaracarya order, where he was initiated as a sannyasin (renunciant) and took the name Swami Chinmayananda.

Subsequently, he toured India giving lectures and spreading the word of Vedanta. He interpreted Vedanta as a science of life, a logical and rational process through which one could come to realize the ultimate reality underlying all differences. Accepting sadhakas irrespective of their caste and gender and owing allegiance to Hinduism rather than to any one of its many sectarian divisions, he was an advocate of progressive Hinduism typical of other neo-Hindu reformers. In addition, he wrote commentaries on the Upanishads such as the Prasna, Aitareya, Isa, Mundaka, Mandukya, Kaivalya, and Taittiriya and commented on the Bhagavad Gita and on some of Sankara's works. His seminal work, where he delineates his interpretation of Vedanta in three volumes, is Vedanta: Science of Life (1979–1980). He passed away on August 4, 1993.

Chinul

Buddhist writer, reformer

A Korean Buddhist writer and philosopher-reformer of the Koryo period (918–1392), Chinul was an ordained monk in the Son or Zen tradition and held the rank of National Teacher (kuksa) during the period of Ch'oe military rule (1170–1258). This same military had promoted and supported Son Buddhism over the teaching sects that had been supported by the monarchy it had displaced and the aristocracy and civil bureaucracy that it had oppressed. Because of the emphasis in Son Buddhism on meditation and austere discipline, the promotion of this tradition allowed the military rulers to effectively eliminate Buddhist interference in the Koryo government and its draining of wealth from the economy.

Chinul is most noted for his incorporation of Huayen Buddhism as explicated by Li T'ung-hsüan (635–730) into Son Buddhist practice and for his attempt to unite all the sects of Korea (teaching and meditation) into a single sect (the Chogye sect). Half a century earlier, the royal monk Uich'on, with the backing of the throne of his father and three brothers, had decimated the ranks of the meditation sects by establishing a meditative Ch'ontae sect with a primary emphasis on Ch'ontae scholasticism and ritual. Chinul's response was to reverse that synthesis by placing primary emphasis on instantaneous enlightenment achieved through meditation as the basis for understanding Buddhist doctrines.

Chinul's view of Buddhist sectarian unity rested on the notion that instantaneous enlightenment should be followed by study of the scriptures and the practice of rituals of the Pure Land cult. He based his understanding of enlightenment on the writings of the Northern Sung monk Ta Hui (1089–1163), especially Ta Hui's understanding of how to use the living phrases (hwadu) or koans of Chan teachers.

Chinul's reform of Buddhism was important for the period because it defined Buddhism primarily as a practical tradition for the enlightenment of people, eliminating reference to the state-sponsored paradigm of Buddhism as an institution for obtaining blessings and warding off disasters. The new philosophy was also important as a reform of meditative Buddhism, which previously had sponsored geomantic and prognostication services to the state. Finally, in line with his emphasis on meditation as the primary focus of Buddhism, Chinul also established lay meditation and scripture study societies. It was these societies that were to preserve Buddhism in the centuries to follow, when the new Choson kingdom replaced Buddhism with Confucian orthodoxy.

Chiragh-i Dihli, Nasiruddin

Muslim sufi

Nasiruddin Mahmud Chiragh-i Dihli, whose name means the "lamp of Delhi," was the last in the line of the five great Indian Chishti saints. He was born in 1276 or 1277 at Ayodhya, India, and after a traditional madrasa education went through a long period of renunciation and spiritual training. During this time he is said to have lived in the wilderness by consuming leaves and lemons. After this, he went to Delhi in search of further spiritual training. He became a disciple of Nizamuddin Auliya, and the aged shaykh soon asked him to carry on his work in Delhi.

Like his shaykh, Nasiruddin remained celibate. Now a sufi master, he continued his work of spiritual training despite difficulties with the eccentric Tughluq rulers. Sultan Muhammad ibn Tughluq at one point forced most of Delhi's Muslim population south in order to populate a new capital in the Deccan region of India. The next sultan, Muhammad's cousin, Firuz Sah Tighluq, according to a famous anecdote was once left standing in the rain outside Nasiruddin's khanqah (hostel for sufis) while the saint was completing his prayers. The sultan is said to have remarked to a companion, "We are not kings. They [the saints] are the real kings."

K. A. Nizami (1991), who wrote a biography of Nasiruddin, sees Nasiruddin's role as mediating the conflict between the mystics and the Muslim jurists, who in that age were condemning excesses in sufi practice and heretical elements in doctrine. Nasiruddin ended such customs as the use of musical instruments in sama' (periods of performing and listening to music) and prostration before the shaykh. Records of Nasiruddin's spiritual sessions were recorded by his disciple, Hamid Qalandar, under the title Khayr al-Majalis (The best assemblies). Another disciple, Mir Khurd, recorded the history of the Chishtis in his Siyar al-Auliya (Lives of the saints). In it he wrote that "among the disciples of Shaykh Nizamuddin Auliya', Shaykh Nasiruddin was like the moon among the stars." Nasiruddin's most notable spiritual successor was Muhammad Bandanawaz Gisudaraz (1321–1422).

It is said that on Nasiruddin's death in 1356, the relics (tabarrukat) he had received from previous shaykhs in the line were buried with him, symbolizing the end of the first lineage of great Indian Chishti shaykhs.

Chishti, Muinuddin

(1141–1236 C.E.)

Muslim sufi

Khwaja Muinuddin Chishti is the saint credited with bringing the Chishti sufi order to India in the twelfth century. He is known as Sultan al-Hind (the sultan of India) and as Khwaja Gharib Nawaz (helper of the poor).

Muinuddin was born in 1141 in the province of Sijistan in Iran and is said to have set out in search of spiritual training after receiving an inheritance, including a garden, in his late teens. According to legend, he was moved to pursue this path after eating a piece of cake given to him by a wandering ascetic, Ibrahim Qunduzi, in the garden. He studied in Samarkand and Bukhara. In northern Iran, he became the disciple of a sufi known as Uthman Haruni, whom he accompanied and served diligently for more than twenty years.

On pilgrimage to Mecca, he received in a vision a spiritual command from the prophet Muhammad to travel to India. On his way, he stopped at Lahore, where he undertook a forty-day chilla, or retreat, at the tomb of the eleventh-century Persian mystic al-Hujwiri. Today an area of that shrine commemorates this event. He then traveled to Rajasthan, India, and settled at Ajmer, which is today the site of his shrine, the most important sufi site in India. At that time, Ajmer was the capital of the Chauhan dynasty under the Rajput king Prithviraj. Hagiography stresses Muinuddin's role in converting the indigenous population through his piety, teachings, and miracles, which include the famous story of his besting the Rajput court magician, Jaipal, in a duel of magical powers.

In the Indian environment, the saint is said to have adapted Hindu practices such as the use of devotional music (qawwali) and yogic-type breathing and concentration exercises. He is credited with laying out the basic principles of the Chishti order, including universal love, malice toward none, simplicity, and generosity. After marrying late in life, he had three sons and one daughter, Bibi Jamal, who was later recognized as a powerful mystic who received spiritual authority (khilafat) from her father. A book of sayings attributed to Muinuddin is believed by scholars to be a pious forgery of a later period.

Muinuddin's shrine is famous for its huge urs, or annual commemoration of the death anniversary of the saint. Hindus and members of other faiths, as well as Muslims, revere it. The facilities for langar (food distribution) include a huge pair of cooking pots bestowed by the Mughal ruler Akbar and his son, Jehangir, in the sixteenth century. Indeed, the Mughals were great devotees of the shrine.

Chisupe, Billy Goodson

(1916 C.E.–)

Protestant prophet, healer

The home of Billy Goodson Chisupe in Malawi became the object of a nationwide pilgrimage in 1995 when this elderly Malawian village farmer started handing out, free of charge, an alleged cure for AIDS/HIV that he said was obtained through spiritual intervention. A few months earlier, in the context of the terrifying AIDS pandemic in this central African country and immediately following the installation of the first democratic government, the Protestant Chisupe (born in 1916) had emerged as a prophet. Without a history in healing or herbalism, on August 22, 1994, he claimed that his long-since-deceased maternal uncle had revealed a cure for AIDS/HIV to him in a dream. Later, he touted it as multipurpose. Chisupe explained, “God speaks to me and I act on what He says. I was told to heal, so I heal” (De Gabriele 1998, 3).

The medicine consisted of a reddish drink reminiscent of the infusion that was distributed in the mchape witch eradication movement of the 1930s, and it was soon given this same name. Chisupe claimed the medicine would only be efficacious if people reverted to ancestral ways and abstained from further sexual promiscuity. Moreover, the cure had to be obtained in person from his homestead at Chikamana village (Mangochi district). As a result of profuse media coverage, between February and June 1995 Chisupe drew an estimated crowd of 300,000, including people from all over the country, from all walks of life, all seeking healing from AIDS and modernity’s malcontents. Chisupe’s homestead became a liminal space of national unity and morality in the face of struggle and suffering.

The Malawi government responded halfheartedly. Biomedical testing of mchape faltered. In the end, Chisupe refused collaboration, claiming that he doubted the objectivity of the government and, more important, that “white,” Western medicine would never accept his African achievement, which would upset the recurrent racial politic hierarchy. With time, however, Chisupe lost his general appeal. In 2004, Chisupe could still be found in his compound with a small number of patients.

Chosen People

The religion of ancient Israel rested on the understanding that a nation and a God had entered into a covenant, a contractual bond with one another. It was also widely understood (though alternatives were possible) that no other such covenant existed, that is, that Israel’s relationship with God was unique, that Israel had become the “special treasure” (Heb.: segula) of God (Deut. 7:6; 14:2; 26:18; Ps. 135:4).

Once it was accepted that the God of all creation had chosen a single group of people and allowed them to form an unmatched intimacy with him, then a question inevitably arose: Why these people rather than others? The earliest books of the Bible already reveal anxiety over this issue and provide several quite diverse attempts to resolve it. Perhaps Abraham, the progenitor of the Jews, was somehow more worthy than others (see Gen. 18:19), perhaps other nations were somehow more corrupt (see Lev. 18:3), or perhaps the creator of the world could just do as he saw fit (see Deut. 10:14). Thus it was not clear whether the choice of Israel for intimacy with God was a sign of any superiority on their part. (The medieval poet and philosopher Judah Halevi wrote in the Kuzari that the Jews received the Torah on account of an inherited receptivity to the divine, but this was not typical of later Jewish thought.)

Biblical writers were similarly divided in their understanding of the consequences of divine election. The prophet Isaiah promised (see 37:35) that God would never allow his holy city to be captured by foreigners, but a century later the prophet Jeremiah denounced (7:4) his contemporaries for smugly relying on such assurances; most dramatically, the prophet Amos declared (3:2) that Israel’s very intimacy with God meant that she would be punished for her every transgression.

In later times this diversity of interpretation persisted. Certain Jewish writings from the Greco-Roman period anticipate that when the other great empires had fallen it would be the Jews’ turn to rule the world, but other authors expect only that Israel would finally be left alone to follow her own sacred heritage. Some writers expected that the other nations would finally become followers of the God of Israel, but others dismissed this possibility; the early rabbis seem generally to have belonged to the latter group. Even the very concept of election was reconceived: A well-known rabbinic narrative (see, for example, Avoda Zara 2b–3a) proposed that Israel accepted the Torah only after every other nation had spurned it, and that in fact even Israel only accepted it under threat of immediate obliteration.

In the course of its emergence out of Judaism, Christianity took over the concept of Chosen People but stripped it of its ethnic component: The church was the New Israel, but chosenness was now a function of belief, not descent. In defense of this new understanding, the Jews were often accused of “particularism” and of believing in their own innate superiority. Jewish denials of these imputations often became somewhat frantic but were usually in vain. Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), the first modern Jewish philosopher, tried to historicize election: In response to events in their history, the Jews had undertaken to maintain a certain way of life. Rumors that Jews were engaged in a secret conspiracy to take over the world persisted into the twentieth century, however. More recent Jewish thinkers, such as Mordecai M. Kaplan and Richard L. Rubenstein, have sought to renounce chosenness as an obsolete, offensive, and even dangerous notion, and others, such as Gunther Plaut, Michael Wyschogrod, and David Novak, have proposed various means for preserving and rehabilitating the idea.

Christianity and Holy People

Early Christians proclaimed that all members of their community were “saints” (from the Latin sanctus, “holy person”). They were self-selected both by Christian baptism and by conscious effort to live a life in alignment with God, “holy and without blame” (Eph. 1:4). These early Christians set themselves apart from important elements of the culture in which they lived and firmly believed that only people who accepted the message of Jesus Christ would eventually come to true union with God. Outside of rhetorical flourishes, however, it soon became obvious to all that some Christians lived up to their baptismal vows better than others. Some were willing to suffer persecution for their faith, others clearly gave up all the advantages of secular society for God, and yet others seemed specially inspired by God with understanding or grace. As Christianity became a legal religion (early fourth century in the Roman Empire, rather later in the Persian Empire and other regions of Asia), many people accepted Christianity but were not willing to give up “business as usual.”

This contrast between “perfect” and “ordinary” Christian gave rise to the Christian cult of saints. Christians soon came to recognize some of their fellows as especially close to God, as “saints” in the accepted modern sense of the word. Several elements combined to form this Christian image of sanctity: (1) martyrdom—a willingness to die as a witness (in Greek martyros) to Christian beliefs; (2) a commitment to give up the illusory pleasures of the world, the better to focus on God, especially by following ascetic practices; and (3) a life of exemplary service to God in service to the broader Christian community. All of these factors include an important element of saint as role model, as one whose example encourages others to align their lives more closely to God.

A final element of the Christian image of sainthood became a major bone of contention between the Christian sects when the Protestant Reformation erupted in the sixteenth century: the believed ability of saints to mediate between Christians and God, serving as special intercessors willing to help those who call upon them. All major branches of Protestantism, with the partial exception of the Anglican communion, rejected this intercessory role of saints, which is still upheld in modern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism.

Nevertheless, all branches of modern Christianity acknowledge that some people are closer to God and more dedicated than others. These people are marked out in some way—whether they are labeled as “saints” or just remembered as role models, founders, and exemplary witnesses. Protestantism has reverted to an early Christian model of unofficial local esteem of its holy people based on the estimation of a particular community rather than a universal seal of approval. At most, a widely acknowledged holy person can be added to a list of those worthy of special veneration, literally “canonized,” by vote of a denomination, as is the case in the Anglican communion. This semiformal canonization is also typical of the Orthodox churches. Modern Roman Catholicism follows a process begun in the late tenth century and made mandatory in the thirteenth of testing a prospective saint’s holiness through a lengthy process that, if successful, culminates in canonization by the pope declaring that a person is indeed a saint.

Christian Martyrdom

In the early centuries of Christianity, the only people recognized as particularly holy were martyrs. The Christian ideal of the holy person was deeply shaped by the fact of persecution in the early centuries of the religion. Jesus of Nazareth, the founder of Christianity, suffered a slow death by torture because he refused to disavow his teachings, setting himself on a collision course with both Roman and Jewish authorities. This central fact of Christ’s passion was the single most important element in creating the idea of the Christian saint: a truly holy person, one whose life is centered on submission to God’s will, is, above all, a person willing to suffer or die for the faith. For its first three centuries, Christianity was an illegal religion in the Roman Empire, and Christians were also heavily persecuted in the Persian Empire in the fourth and fifth centuries. Thus, the emphasis on martyrdom had ample opportunity to take deep root in Christian consciousness. Remaining steadfast in the face of persecution became the ideal. In all branches of modern Christianity, people who die for the faith—whether Russian Orthodox monks killed in Stalin’s purges, Baptist missionaries in Africa, or Roman Catholic victims of Nazi repression—are in general regarded as in at least some sense the best exemplars of the faith, in some particular way close to God, because they gave up everything for their beliefs.

The Christian martyrs of the first three centuries were victims either of outraged mob violence or of civic authorities (both Roman and Persian). Often they brought attack upon themselves by disrupting religious ceremonies or otherwise insulting the religious beliefs of the majority population. Indeed, so many Christians threw themselves headlong into martyrdom in this way that church authorities by the third century had to take a firm stand that it was incompatible with true belief to court death. What continued to mark out early martyrs, though, was a willingness to die when they could be reprieved by disavowing their faith. Already in the early second century, Christians were sharing accounts of heroic martyrdoms, such as that of Stephen (d. c. 36 C.E.), the first martyr, or Polycarp (c. 69–c. 155 C.E.), bishop of Smyrna, and going to great risk to collect the remains of those who died for proper burial, often holding Christian ceremonies at martyrs’ tombs to join the whole community together, both living and dead. Belief that the righteous dead enjoy the immediate presence of God made the shrine a liminal space, a point of particularly efficacious contact with heaven.

After the triumph of Christianity in Europe, there were fewer opportunities to display heroic virtue by dying for the faith, but internal squabbles kept up the supply of martyrs for a time. In the fourth and fifth centuries, hundreds, if not thousands, were still able to win martyrdom as Christianity defined its doctrines in a process often deeply scarred by persecution and violence against any who disagreed. After that, however, a normative Christianity was only rarely successfully challenged until the end of the Middle Ages. A rare exception is the Iconoclast Controversy of the eighth and ninth centuries, when the image-destroying policies of the Byzantine emperors led to the death of many protesting monks and priests. But once doctrine was fixed, until the end of the Middle Ages people who challenged established belief structures were declared “heretics” rather than martyrs by the large majority of Christians. It was the winners who decided which people were saints. A few missionaries were still martyred as northern and eastern Europe converted to Christianity, but in general, martyrdom in the ancient sense became rare.

Although the number of martyrs slowed to a trickle by the ninth century, it is possible to see that Christians still regarded martyrdom as the most perfect form of sanctity; the modern Roman Catholic Church even requires fewer miracles as proof of sanctity from martyrs than from other saints. Veneration of early Christian martyrs continued. Especially English and Scandinavian authorities also were eager to hail any death at the hands of non-Christians as martyrdom, even when the victims were not killed specifically because of their beliefs. Monks killed by marauding Vikings, kings stricken down in battle against pagan foes, even simple murder victims won popular acclaim as martyrs.

The sixteenth century, with its revival of bitter doctrinal disputes between rival Christian factions, saw a recrudescence of martyrdom. Especially the Protestant sects used the fact that hundreds of their own were willing to die for the reformed faith as proof that their teaching was true. Roman Catholic propagandists were slow to give official recognition to their own new martyrs—many saints of the Catholic Reformation were only canonized in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The Catholics soon regained lost ground, though, with the many missionaries who were martyred as new lands were opened to Christianity.

Martyrdom has not gone out of fashion. Since the sixteenth century, thousands of Christians of many denominations have been killed because they resisted movements ranging from the secularization of the French Revolution to the rise of communism and fundamentalist Islam. The end is not yet in sight.

Asceticism as the Bloodless Martyrdom of Peacetime

Not every Christian holy person is fortunate enough to die for the faith, although many have longed for martyrdom. Especially because of the long periods of Christian history with few martyrs, religious authorities came to acknowledge a new category of holy person, the “confessor.” This is a person whose whole life professes the Christian religion—but who dies peacefully. The ranks of the confessors can include any exemplary Christian, but in practice most formally canonized confessors have been ascetics. Asceticism in the Christian tradition can take many forms, ranging from a general refusal to wallow in luxury at the expense of a life focused on the soul to self-inflicted disciplinary practices that could cripple or even kill the practitioner. In general, Protestantism turned from the ancient and medieval model of “contempt for the world,” but many modern Protestants considered holy people have been marked by a special life of self-abnegation in some way.

The ascetic trains his or her body, taming it so the soul is free to focus on the things of God. Ascetic practices became a mark of particularly devout Christians in the course of the third century, when a movement began of flight “to the desert”—away from the temptations of normal society, where the ascetic could be alone with God. This movement gained strength in the fourth century, when Christianity became legal and politically encouraged, and when large numbers began to make superficial conversions; just being a Christian was no longer enough to mark a person out as especially holy. Asceticism was thus surrogate martyrdom: Some great hermits of the Egyptian desert indeed mortified their flesh to the point of living death.

An especially widespread form of asceticism through much of Christian history has been rejection of sexual relations. Already by the time of Paul (d. c. 65 C.E.), Christians singled out the chaste for special reverence. By the third century, it was expected that men elected as bishops live apart from their wives. Monks and hermits, at least those with any pretensions to holiness, also rejected human sexuality, and since the eleventh century official chastity was also imposed on western European priests. A very large body of legends about young virgin martyrs such as Agnes (d. c. 300) and Agatha (d. c. 250–253) bears witness to what was especially a late medieval fascination with those who gave up ordinary human patterns of life for God. Martin Luther (1483–1546) and those he inspired rejected this emphasis on chastity along with many other Christian ascetic practices, but it continued until very recently as almost a sine qua non for Roman Catholic and Orthodox saints. It has only been since 1978, with the pontificate of John Paul II, that a significant number of married people have been canonized as saints, and even so they remain a very small fraction of the whole.

Service of God and Neighbor

Large numbers of medieval Irish monastic saints adopted a predominantly Celtic form of asceticism, voluntary exile from all that was familiar to them (peregrinatio). They traveled to England and the continent of Europe, where the greatest of them, such as Columbanus (543–615), led very active lives as missionaries. This presents what has been a great quandary in much of the history of Christian sainthood: Should the pious person seeking God live a life of withdrawal from the world, or follow the precept to love one’s neighbor by working to help others in the world, thus risking, at best, a distraction, and, at worst, pollution? It was generally accepted in late antique and medieval Christianity that it was nearly impossible for a person in active contact with the world to be a saint. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) did his best to avoid becoming a bishop; it was said of Martin of Tours (c. 336–397) that he worked many fewer miracles after being forced into the cares of the episcopate. At the same time, however, the world has many needs, and Jesus specifically commanded the first Christians to “go forth into the world and teach” (Matt. 28:19). The official solution was paradoxical: The ideal saint should embrace wholeheartedly any service to the community that was demanded, whether it meant serving as an administrator, spiritual counselor, or missionary—but should never seek such office and should accept it only unwillingly.

In reality, the large majority of Christian saints have been extremely active in the affairs of the world. Medieval and early modern saints are most likely to have been founders or other leaders of religious communities. The simple fact is that a saint cannot win general recognition unless other people know about him or her. The faith of many saints is clearly known to God alone, but such people do not make their way into books. Most saints in the premodern, Roman Catholic, and Orthodox traditions have been professional religious, mostly playing very public roles.

When nonprofessionals have won recognition as holy people, it is because they have lived extraordinary lives of the spirit, either as theologians or as mystics. In both cases, special religious insight has typically led such people to play an active role in secular society. An extreme case is that of the Lutheran Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–1945), driven by his convictions to join an attempt to assassinate Hitler. There are, however, hundreds of saints who have intervened in public affairs because of visionary experience of God, including the great women mystics of the late Middle Ages, such as Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), who were only allowed a public voice because of their visionary role.

As in so many cases, the sixteenth century marked an important turning point in this issue of separation from the world as a desirable quality for saints. Since that time, both Catholicism and the Protestant denominations have seen an enormous outpouring of caritative agencies. Nuns and monks made teaching and care for the underprivileged a central part of their vocation; devout men and women have founded and devoted their lives to institutions as far removed as Mother Teresa's Missionaries of Charity and the Salvation Army. They are among the most beloved of Christianity's holy people.

The Christian Saint as Intercessor

"The Ave Maria" (in English "The Hail Mary"), one of the most famous of all Christian prayers, invoking the Virgin Mary, includes the line "pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our deaths." The idea that saints can pray effectively for sinners, rejected by all Protestant denominations but the Anglicans as unbiblical, was central to mainstream Christianity from at least the fourth century to the sixteenth and is still very important to Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism. Two basic premises lie behind the notion that saints can intercede with God: the clearly expressed New Testament belief that souls of the righteous dead are in heaven and enjoy the presence of God, and a deep sense that God is distant and rather quick to anger—so a "professional" on speaking terms with God is the best person to present a penitent's case.

The role of the saint as intercessor appears to have two roots. On the one hand, centuries of pre-Christian Greek religion emphasized that semidivine heroes continued to protect their people after death. On the other hand, by the fourth century living holy people, normally men, ascetics considered awesome in their spiritual renunciation, had become spokespeople for the common people around them. They could speak to distant powers, whether imperial officials or God. It was not a great jump to believe that such dedicated holy people would continue to look with benevolent interest on the communities they had aided in life. Saints were therefore invoked to help people with all the intractable problems of life, whether illness, poverty, or any other kind of trouble. In early centuries likely to be the patrons of specific communities, by the late Middle Ages some saints were regarded as "specialists" able to deal with particular difficulties, such as Apollonia (d. c. 249), invoked for toothache. Although sometimes lost in popular belief, it is a central theological point that saints have no power to work miracles. They can only ask God to work miracles. Thanks, however, to their lives of service to God, they are particularly likely to receive a favorable reception.

Because of the Christian belief that at the Last Judgment souls will be reunited with bodies, the cast-off shells of dead saints retain importance. The veneration of relics is a very characteristically Christian practice. Ordinary Christians would seek burial near saints, often in the literal hope that they would be swept up to heaven along with them at the Second Coming. More common was a simple quid pro quo: Like any other possible intercessor, it was assumed that a saint would intervene to help somebody who showed them proper respect. Thus respect to the saint's tangible remains was likely to move the saint to kindness. The tombs of saints were the ultimate liminal spaces, providing a bridge to the divine. Throughout medieval Europe, churches and individuals collected relics as a way of being close to a saint, who in turn is close to God.

Christina of Markyate

(c. 1097–c. 1161 C.E.)

Christian recluse

Christina of Markyate is only known to modern scholars through an account written by a twelfth-century monk, but here she emerges as one of the most fascinating holy women of the Middle Ages in western Europe. Born around 1097 to a prosperous Anglo-Saxon family, she insisted on being a “bride of Christ” and so refused the marriage that her parents had arranged for her. In order to get her way, Christina had to cope with a physically abusive mother and finally fled her home. She took refuge with various male hermits, relationships that were not always happy for her. Finally, she found a champion in the powerful Anglo-Norman abbot of St. Albans, Geoffrey. The two of them forged a bond of spiritual friendship that enabled Christina to settle down into a hermitage with like-minded women in the vicinity. In providing advice and criticism for the abbot and for other male clerics, Christina can be seen as a harbinger of a new practice of spiritual friendship between men and women in the medieval Christian church, a phenomenon that in the decades after her death in about 1161 became much more evident.

Already as a teenager Christina was handed over by her parents to the violent bishop Ralph Flambard, who was allowed to try to seduce or rape her. Escaping his clutches, she was given in marriage but refused to give her consent and remained a virgin. She appealed to the church for assistance and, after being let down by the bishop of Lincoln, finally gained the support of the archbishop of York, who respected the vow of virginity she had taken. After years of controversy, she was able to make her home at Markyate north of the prosperous abbey of Saint Albans. Her hermitage eventually became a priory for nuns and was visited by people looking for spiritual advice and counsel.

The anonymous biographer describes Christina’s visions, which often brought her closer to the people who sought her out and provided her with the guidance she needed to give them. After her death there may have emerged a local cult, but she was all but forgotten until a historian published the biography on the basis of the single surviving manuscript, badly damaged in a fire and long thought to be unreadable. Thanks to a new interest in holy women and their place in the history of medieval Christianity, Christina is better known today than ever before, and her biography has contributed to dozens of studies of medieval women.

Christopher

(3rd century C.E.?)

Christian legendary martyr

Christopher is one of the most popular and frequently depicted Christian saints in the modern era, in Western art through the late medieval/Renaissance period, and in Byzantine icons. His cult was established in the East by the fifth century, and the colorful legends about the gigantic Canaanite Christopher were elaborated in the West through the Middle Ages and appear in especially detailed form in the thirteenth-century Legenda Aurea (Golden Legend) by Jacobus de Voragine.

Said to have been an early Christian martyr in mid-third-century Asia Minor, Christopher (the “Christ-bearer”) had a series of adventures and disappointments in his search for the greatest king to whom he might offer his services. He served a mighty ruler, then the devil, and eventually met a Christian hermit who instructed him to serve the great king Christ by carrying people on his shoulders across a swift and treacherous river. After struggling enormously to carry a small child, who became increasingly heavy, across the river, Christopher was informed by the child (Christ) that he had successfully carried the weight of the world and the creator of the world on his shoulders. The child instructed him to plant his walking staff by the river, and the next day the staff miraculously sprouted flowers—symbolic of the truth and triumph of Christianity. Additional narratives in Christopher’s legends include many typically hagiographic motifs: tests of faith, endurance, miracles, and tortures, resulting in his eventual martyrdom by decapitation.

The patron saint of travelers and one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, St. Christopher is generally depicted carrying the infant Jesus on his shoulders while holding a pole or a flowering staff. Large mural paintings and statues of Christopher were often positioned in Western medieval churches, reflective of the belief that seeing his image would protect viewers from harm. An important variant image (especially in Byzantine art) shows Christopher with a dog’s head (cynocephalic) with a long snout and pointed ears. This is perhaps due to a confusion of “Canaanite” with “canine.” Similarity with the ancient Egyptian jackal-headed god Anubis may be noted, as well as with other animal-headed figures in ancient and medieval art.

In the early twentieth century, with increased air and car travel, Christopher’s role as patron of safe journeys made his image again popular in pendants, medallions, and car badges. Despite this, his feast was reduced to the status of a local cult in 1969 because of its dubious historicity. Christopher’s feast day is July 25 in the Roman Catholic Church and May 9 in Greek Orthodoxy.

Ciarán of Clonmacnoise

(512–548 C.E.)

Christian monk, educator

Ciarán of Clonmacnoise is considered one of the "Twelve Apostles of Ireland," the great monastic founders of the sixth century. After studying with Finian of Clonard and Enda of Aran, two of the most important early Celtic monks, he founded several monasteries. The most famous of these institutions was at Clonmacnoise. Soon after this foundation, while still in his early thirties, he died. The foundation at Clonmacnoise, although victimized in raids and battles for a thousand years, became second only to Iona as a center of Christian learning in the Celtic world. On the banks of the river Shannon, Clonmacnoise became a very wealthy center of monastic learning. The site was supposedly connected to a pre-Christian holy well and became a center of pilgrimage because Ciarán promised that many souls would go to heaven from this site.

Information on Ciarán is scant, mostly reliant on hagiographies compiled by the monks at Clonmacnoise long after the founder had died in 548. His notoriety seems to depend on his connection to Kevin of Glendalough, Finian, Enda, and other famous monastic leaders, along with his foundation at Clonmacnoise. Here, even more so than at other Celtic monasteries, a great deal of effort was put into learning and the production of books. The pre-Christian Celtic respect for learning allowed men such as Ciarán, from humble backgrounds, to rise to positions of great repute in the Celtic world. Ciarán had been born in 512. His father was a carpenter, and this made Ciarán the only nonnoble founder of one of the major sixth-century monasteries in Ireland.

The importance of education and the natural world occurs again and again in the stories about Ciarán. It is written that a stag wandered up to Ciarán to hold his books in his antlers and returned daily without ever getting the books wet. Many of the traditional topoi of Celtic hagiography hold true for Ciarán. Hagiographical accounts include the tale of a fox that carried Ciarán's books back and forth to his tutor, as well as of miracles related to hospitality and the provision of food for guests. It is in the works of Ciarán and the other Irish monastic founders of the sixth century that the centrality of education to Celtic spirituality first appears. Christian learning was considered essential to the conversion of pagans, and so Ciarán's "monastic university" stood as a tribute to its founder for centuries after his death.

Clan Mothers of the Iroquois

Amerindian ancestors

As with all storied experiences, the Clan Mothers have many names. Clan Mothers to the Iroquois, they are also the Beloved Women of the Cherokee and the Grandmothers or Wisdom Keepers of the Kiowa and the Choctaw. Clan Mother stories tell of women's medicine and the female and male roles for humankind, which are said to stem from aspects of Grandmother Moon and Earth Mother.

Haudenosaunee means "People of the Longhouse" and refers to the united nations of the Iroquois. The original five peoples were the Mohawk, the Oneida, the Onondaga, the Cayuga, and the Seneca. According to their traditions, Sky Woman was the First Clan Mother. The Great Law of the Haudenosaunee is spiritually based and the source for the Jigonsaseh, or Head Clan Mothers of the League.

Following the oral tradition, most Haudenosaunee traditions divide history into the Sky, League, and Handsome Lake epochs. The Clan Mothers fall within the pre-European contact epoch of the League. The first precontact epoch is Sky Woman's cycle and begins in a place among the stars. Next is the League Epoch of the Great Law, the Constitution of the Five Nations, where Jigonsaseh is the head Clan Mother.

According to Iroquois legend, Sky Woman brought seeds with her to earth from Sky World, and some of her traditional names relate to corn plants. Agricultural practice for growing maize is encoded into the Great Law. The Green Corn festival of many tribes is more than a harvest feast and celebrates the survival of these female traditions.

Clare of Assisi

Christian nun, founder

Clare was founder of the Poor Clares, a Christian women's monastic order, in the thirteenth century. She was born on July 11, 1194, to Faverone Offreduccio and Ortolana di Fiumi, both nobles, in Assisi. At the age of twelve, she was betrothed against her will, but the contract seems to have dissolved upon the death of her father. Little more is known of her childhood and adolescence. When she was eighteen, she heard Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226) preach the Lenten sermons at the church of San Giorgio. Clare was so moved by his words that she ran away from home to follow Francis. Though he received her graciously, Francis had not yet established a house for women, so he installed her at the Benedictine convent of St. Paul near Bastia. Her family attempted to remove her by force, but Francis secretly aided her escape to the convent of Sant' Angelo di Panzo, where she was joined by her sister, Agnes, drawing renewed attacks by their family.

Perseverance paid off. In 1215, Francis placed Clare and Agnes in a small convent, a "poor house," adjoining the church of San Damiano near Assisi, and appointed Clare the superior, a position she held for forty years. Later, they were joined by their mother and their other sister, Beatrice. The convent became the motherhouse of the Poor Clares, an order that espoused rigid rules, including self-mortification, strict fasting, vows of silence, and profound poverty. The extrema poverty was the first of its kind for women, as the Poor Clares subsisted solely on donations and always went barefoot. Fearing male interference, Clare persuaded Pope Innocent III to guarantee their absolute poverty. Yet, in 1228, Pope Gregory IX tried to rescind this condition, citing women's "frailty." Clare succeeded in winning him over, however, and he issued the Privilegium paupertatis ceding the Poor Clares freedom from possessions for eternity. After Gregory's death, Pope Innocent IV again attempted to rescind the directive, yet he, too, accepted Clare's steadfast refusal of modifications. She only convinced him to grant her wish two days before her death in 1253.

Besides founding the Poor Clares, Clare was responsible for spreading the Franciscan movement and for tenaciously establishing poverty as an acceptable choice for religious women. Many miracles have been attributed to her, including the rout of German Emperor Frederick II's army in 1244. In art, she is usually depicted carrying a monstrosity. Her feast day is August 11.

Clare of Montefalco

(c. 1268–1308 C.E.)

Christian abbess, mystic

Clare of Montefalco, abbess of the Augustinian monastery of the Holy Cross, gained special renown shortly after her death in 1308 when it was discovered that an image of the cross was imprinted on her heart. She was also known for her confrontation with the Free Spirit, a heretical movement of the time.

Born in Montefalco, Italy, in 1268, Clare at the age of six began to visit her sister Giovanna at a hermitage on the edge of town. Here she adopted a life of penance and devotion to Christ's passion. Such small communities of reclusive women were common in central Italy after 1250. Clare seems to have been a Third Order Franciscan for a time, and she always retained something of a Franciscan outlook. In 1290, the community of sisters accepted the Augustinian Rule, and made Giovanna its first abbess. Upon Giovanna's death the following year, Clare was elected abbess and quickly became well known for her piety, penances, and ecstatic prayer. Such was her fame that some prominent friars attempted to win her over to their heretical beliefs. The members of this sect, called the Free Spirit, did not believe in the existence of hell and held that their superior attainments in contemplative prayer and closeness to God permitted them to ignore the usual commandments; they claimed that the elect soul can lose all desire.

Clare's role as a mystical teacher-prophet who defended Catholic doctrine and refuted dangerous errors reflects much of the influence of the marginal communities of women in central Italy during this period. Many of her attributes are found in thirteenth-century hagiography, such as the spirit of prophecy (she could see into the past, present, and future and could detect people's thoughts) and her love of the poor. More original is the focus on her gratitude for her spiritual gifts, and her prediction of the cross inside her heart. The emphasis in the sources—in particular a contemporary biography by Berengar of Saint-Affrique, and during an exceptionally long process of canonization in 1318–1319—on her “miracle of the heart,” a quasi-“stigmata,” reveals the extent of contemporary passion-centered devotion. Her Life is of exceptional interest because it was written by a non-Augustinian who had no interest in the poverty controversy related to the Franciscan order. Clare's family, her monastery, and the history of Montefalco are well documented. For unknown reasons, her canonization became stalled, and she was not declared a saint until 1881 by Pope Leo XIII.

Claver, Peter

Roman Catholic priest, caregiver, missionary

Peter Claver, a canonized saint of the Roman Catholic Church born in 1580, spent more than forty years ministering to the African people who were brought as slaves to Cartagena in present-day Colombia. Claver, a Jesuit priest from Spain, was a missionary in one of the New World's notorious ports of entry for slaves from West Africa. Chained together, imprisoned in the dark holds of ships with little to eat, and stuck in filth, more than 10,000 Africans arrived each year in Cartagena. Claver worked to alleviate the horror of slavery by meeting each ship as it docked, giving food to the captive African people, attending to their sick and dying, and making sure that the few rights they had as slaves were upheld. He was a champion of the oppressed, calling himself the “slave of Africans.” In addition, Claver instructed the African people in the Catholic faith, and it is reported that he baptized more than 300,000 people during his years of ministry. Even in the midst of their tremendous suffering, the African people responded to the Word of God as heard through the teaching and preaching of Peter Claver and accepted the Christian faith.

The underlying motivation of Claver's ministry to the African slaves was to reaffirm their dignity as human beings by attending to their human and spiritual needs. He brought them food, took care of their physical wounds, and instilled in them a sense of their place in the world as precious people of God. He fought for the enforcement of a law that forbade the separation of slave families and allowed Christian marriages between slaves, and he maintained contact with the African people after they had been sold by holding yearly missions around the country.

Claver's active spirituality was to look for the image of God in each and every person and to treat each person as a living icon of God. His apostolic ministry was based in sincere loving-kindness and compassion, and the people recognized that he was trustworthy and committed to them and their needs.

Claver fell sick during an outbreak of the plague in 1650. He spent the last four years of his life ill and neglected, yet when he was at the point of death, people flocked to his room to grab a memento of this man who had proved to be one of God's holy witnesses among them.

Clement

(1st cent. C.E.)

Christian bishop, martyr

Clement (Clemens Romanus), third bishop of Rome in the first century, may have been appointed by Peter as his successor. Little is known of Clement's early life or death, though fourth-century legends recount his martyrdom by drowning at the order of Trajan, Roman emperor from 98 to 117. Origen and Eusebius connected Clement with the companion mentioned by Paul in Philippians 4:3: "And I ask you . . . together with Clement and the rest of my fellow workers, whose names are in the book of life."

Clement's most notable contribution to Christian history is his Letter to the Corinthians, written in around 96, demanding a return to obedience. Using military hierarchy as his model, Clement explains the inviolable nature of the chain of command, making one of the first declarations of the supremacy of the Roman church. This letter was so popular that it was being read publicly in Corinth in the sixth century.

The twelfth-century church of San Clemente in Rome was built above a fourth-century Christian basilica, which was built above a first-century temple of Mithras, indicating the reuse of traditional Roman holy sites by early Christians. The church and temple briefly coexisted until the cult was outlawed in 395. The fourth-century building was referred to by St. Jerome, who wrote that "a church in Rome preserves the memory of St. Clement to this day" (Boyle 1989, 8).

Cleopatra VII

(69–30 B.C.E.)

Egyptian queen, goddess

Cleopatra VII, a ruler of the Ptolemaic dynasty (r. 51–30 B.C.E.), was the last pharaoh to rule over the ancient Egyptian state before it fell to the Roman Empire. During her reign, she was promulgated as the Egyptian goddess Isis. Although she is perhaps best remembered for her love affairs with both Julius Caesar and Mark Antony (she had a son with Caesar, two children with Antony, and is alleged to have killed herself upon learning of Antony's death), she was unique in her own right and was renowned as a highly motivated and educated woman.

Cleopatra set herself apart from the rest of the Ptolemaic dynasty through her knowledge of the ancient Egyptian language—Egyptian administration at that time was conducted in Greek, but she was said to be proficient in several languages, including Egyptian. Her identification with the goddess Isis was commemorated during her lifetime in coinage. According to legend, she made a practice of appearing in public dressed as Isis.

In Egyptian tradition, the goddess Isis was the wife of Osiris. Their union produced the god Horus. All three deities have a strong association with kingship, and the anthropomorphic embodiment of Isis was a woman with a throne on her head. Isis's association with the asp has also led some to conclude that by dying at the hands of an asp in 30 B.C.E., Cleopatra was furthering her association with Isis and ensuring her divinity. The cult of Isis was embraced outside of Egypt and spread rampantly through the classical world, with Roman-period cults as far distant as Britain.

Clotilde

(c. 474–548 C.E.)

Christian queen

Clotilde (Clotilda; Chrotechildis), the wife and queen of Clovis I, king of the Franks from 481 to 511, persuaded her husband to convert to Catholic (Athanasian) Christianity.

Clotilde, the daughter of the Burgundian king Chilperic, was a Catholic Christian at a time when most of the Germanic peoples occupying the Roman Empire adhered to the Arian creed. According to the legend recorded by Gregory of Tours later in the sixth century, Clotilde's uncle Gundobad murdered both her parents and drove the young girl and her sister into exile. The sister eventually entered a convent; but Clotilde attracted the interest of the neighboring Frankish king, Clovis, who married her with Gundobad's reluctant consent. Clovis was not a Christian, and Clotilde tried to convert him, but her efforts met with little initial success.

She persevered, however, and when she gave birth to a son, she had the baby baptized as a Christian. Unfortunately, the child died, leaving Clovis understandably skeptical of the merits of the new religion. Undaunted, Clotilde argued that the child had achieved eternal bliss, and when a second son was born to them, she had him baptized, too. This time, the baby, though sickly, lived—clear proof, claimed Clotilde, of the power of her religion. Clovis still hesitated to become Christian himself, and it was not until he prepared to face a formidable army of enemies in battle that he decided to cast his lot in with his wife's god, promising to accept the new religion if the battle fell his way. His victory brought him to the baptismal font and the Frankish people with him.

Gregory of Tours portrays Clotilde as a proud and aggressive figure who remained influential in Frankish affairs even after Clovis's death in 511. When her sons assumed power, she incited them to avenge her parents' murder by waging war on her kinsmen, the Burgundians. Gregory also relates that when Clotilde's young grandsons were caught in a power struggle, she was told to choose their fate: scissors (representing the tonsure and their seclusion in a monastery) or a sword (the children's death). Anguished, she chose the sword, unwilling to see them survive the loss of their birthright.

Modern scholars have challenged much in Gregory's account. Some evidence suggests that Clovis may actually have been Christian but inclined toward Arianism before his baptism. It also seems doubtful that Gundobad committed fratricide; therefore, Clotilde's pursuit of vengeance—a vengeance supposedly postponed for decades—could not have prompted her sons' war on the Burgundians. Yet there seems no reason to doubt that Clotilde influenced her husband's conversion, which was an important step in breaking down the religious barriers between the Catholic Romans of Gaul and the Germanic tribes. Nor is it improbable that Clotilde played a role in political affairs after Clovis's death. The death of her grandsons ended her public life. She retired to Tours, devoting herself to good works until her death in 548.

Cohen and Levite

Judaic priests

In ancient Judaism, the priest was the chosen intercessor between God and humankind. Although the first-born son of every Israelite family was originally consecrated to God, at Sinai the tribe of Levi was selected to fulfill the priestly function. Most Levites (Heb.: Levi, pl. Levi'im) had offices connected with the Tabernacle; the Levite family of Aaron (Moses' brother) became the actual priests (Heb.: Cohen, pl. Cohenim), responsible for sacrifice and the instruction of the people in Mosaic law. Because their services were required throughout Israel, Levites did not have their own tracts of land; consequently, their support came from tithes. After the Temple was built and the Tabernacle installed, the descendants of Aaron were concentrated in Jerusalem.

From the time of Hezekiah, all worship was centralized in the Temple, strengthening the priesthood. In the absence of secular authority, the high priest was regarded as the leader of the community; during occupation, the high priest often worked in consort with the provincial government. Such contact with gentile rulers led to assimilation; however, some Jews maintained their religious zeal. The Hasmoneans, for example, fought against the Greek occupiers, and the Essenes left Temple service and founded ascetic communities.

Many wealthy and powerful priestly families joined the aristocratic, Hellenized Sadducees. With the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E., most duties and privileges of the priests and Levites were lost.

However, Cohenim and Levi'im retain specific functions in modern Orthodox and Conservative Judaism despite the destruction of the Temple. The paternal line determines inclusion, in contrast to identification as a Jew, which is matrilineal. A significant right of the Cohenim is to be the first invited to read the Torah on the Sabbath or during a weekday service; the second reader is to be a Levite; the third an Israel (a Jew who is neither a Cohen nor a Levite). Further, it is customary to select a Cohen or Levite to lead the prayer after meals.

During certain seasons, the Cohenim of a synagogue act as priests and bless the congregation after ritual hand washing, assisted by the Levi'im present. Cohenim are still subject to a number of restrictions: They may not marry a divorcee or a convert, they are prohibited from any contact with the dead, and they are forbidden to enter a cemetery.

Cokhamela (Cokha)

Hindu poet-saint

Cokhamela, a fourteenth-century native of Mangalvedha, Maharashtra, India, is remembered as an early poet-saint (sant) of the Varkari religious and literary community of western India. Numerous devotional songs in Marathi are attributed to him. Most of these sing the praises of a Hindu deity of the region, Vitthal or Vithoba, or recount related stories from the lives of Cokhamela's contemporary sants, such as Namdev. Cokhamela is perhaps most famous for his very low social status. He was a Mahar by caste (jati), a socioreligious designation that conferred upon him "untouchability" within the brahminical social order.

The songs attributed to Cokhamela that deal with social and religious inequality tend to fluctuate between a lamentation of his lowly status, cries of abandonment by Vitthal, and a passive acceptance of his fate prescribed by the caste system. For example, following a popular understanding of the effects of karma, Cokhamela ascribes his low status to retribution for bad deeds in earlier lives and asserts that by faithfully fulfilling his dharma (duty) as an untouchable in this life, he will proceed to better lives in the future. However, in popular etymology, Cokhamela's very name (cokha, meaning "pure," and mela, for "collection"; thus, a pure collection of attributes) presents a contradiction, because Cokhamela's low caste implies an "impure" religiosocial status.

A famous biographical story recalls that Cokhamela was born miraculously from a half-eaten mango. Vitthal, disguised as a brahmin, is said to have taken a bite of the mango and then given it to Cokhamela's future mother, and from this fruit came a baby boy. Another story recalls that a coterie of Hindu deities entreated Cokhamela to purify the "nectar of heaven." Understandably, some later interpreters have felt that such stories and songs were composed in Cokhamela's name by interlopers into the tradition.

But others have taken Cokhamela at his word, so to speak. B. R. Ambedkar, the twentieth-century social reformer, nationalist, and architect of the Indian constitution, was of the same jati (sub-caste) as Cokhamela. In his writings, Ambedkar rejected Cokhamela's pronouncements on religious and social justice as not useful to the upliftment of members of downtrodden communities in south Asia. Yet the biographical and literary materials preserved in his name unequivocally assert Cokhamela's utter devotion to his deity, Vitthal, so much so that the songs he composed for his God are said to have emanated from his very bones.

Syncretic musician, composer

Jazz saxophonist and composer John William Coltrane was one of the most influential figures in jazz not only because of his virtuosity and creativity but also because of his spirituality. His pious manner and passionate intensity while playing was legendary. Coltrane brought together disparate musical and cultural elements that combined with his spiritual consciousness to distinguish him among jazz performers.

The African Methodist Episcopal faith of his clergy grandfathers influenced him, as did the music of the black church, including gospels and spirituals. The Muslim faith of first wife, Naima, furthered his religious growth. Inspired by the music of Africa, India, and Asia, Coltrane's musical explorations coincided with an increasing interest in world religious and spiritual consciousness.

In the liner notes to A Love Supreme, a 1964 album, Coltrane wrote that in 1957 he had experienced, "by the grace of God, a spiritual awakening which led me to a richer, fuller, more productive life." He subsequently dedicated his life to offering up his music as praise to God. Described by his peers as an angel on earth, a spiritual genius, and one who spoke to people's souls, Coltrane believed that his ultimate creative purpose was to make the world a better place and to point people to the divine in a musical language that transcends words. Religion, to Coltrane, was not a creed, a dogma, or an institution but a perception of all life as sacred. He sought a spiritual level of communication with his audience.

Coltrane achieved his aspirations most explicitly when a religious society in his name was founded after his death. Established by Bishop Franzo King (who, upon hearing Coltrane, had a Pentecostal-like experience), the organization in 1982 affiliated with the African Orthodox Church. The Saint John Coltrane African Orthodox Church in San Francisco derives its liturgy from Coltrane compositions and takes its inspiration from Coltrane's triumph over many obstacles, including addiction, and his conversion to righteousness and a global consciousness. Adherents of this faith see Coltrane as their "messenger of Sound Praise" and have canonized him as their patron saint: St. John Will-I-Am Coltrane. The church displays painted icons of a haloed Coltrane holding in one hand a saxophone, its bell spouting flames, and in the other hand a scroll with lines from A Love Supreme.

Colum Cille (Columba)

(521–597 C.E.)

Christian abbot, missionary

Colum Cille ("dove of the church" in Irish), one of the three patron saints of Ireland, was a sixth-century abbot and a missionary who brought Christianity to Scotland and northern England. His hagiographer, Adomnán, portrays his hero as a Christlike figure who multiplies fishes, in size if not in number, and changes water into wine.

Born in 521, Colum Cille was an offspring of the Cenél Conall branch of the royal Uí Néill dynasty. His sacrifice of the trappings of his royal background to embrace his monastic profession with saintly humility represents a strong claim to sanctity. He was a monk, a priest, and a founder of monasteries, the most famous being Iona on the coast of Scotland. Derry and Kells in Ireland were very influential as well. He comes down to us above all, however, as a saint of prophecies, visions, and miracles tempered with a healthy dose of political savvy. As a prince of the most powerful dynasty in Ireland, Colum Cille would have been aware from an early age of what it took to build a strong and influential hegemony even in the ecclesiastical sphere. He drew on that knowledge to create a strong federation of affiliated monasteries that achieved international prominence. His foundations were successful on both sides of the north Irish Sea, which may go a long way toward explaining the continued significance of Colum Cille as a national patron saint.

Another important dimension of his sanctity was his relationships with kings. Adomnán consistently shows him traveling to the courts of kings in Scotland, northern England, and Ireland. Colum Cille makes prediction after prediction regarding the fate of these kings and their lineages. Not only can the saint see the future, but he can also affect the future in powerful ways that are beneficial to the church, to his own community, and to international relations between the Irish, Scots, and Anglo-Saxon kingdoms. In one scene he is shown as conferring, against his own will, the office of king on a local ruler at the behest of God. Being forced to follow the will of God places Colum Cille above suspicion of political favoritism. It also puts him in a liminal position between God and the king, between heaven and earth. The saint is established both as a key figure in the legitimation of secular power and as a transcendent figure serving as a mere conduit of divine power and grace. This presents a memorable image of power and humility, the quintessence of Christian sainthood. His feast day is June 9.

Columbanus

Christian abbot, missionary

Columbanus was the most famous of the Irish missionaries to travel to continental Europe in the early Middle Ages. Born in 543 and from a noble background, he was well educated before entering the monastic life. Primarily a disciple of Comgall of Bangor, with whom he trained for about thirty years, he left in about 590 for voluntary exile in Gaul. During his time at Bangor he had become the principal lecturer in the monastic school. Columbanus is the most famous exemplar of the Celtic tradition of peregrinatio (voluntary exile), and also a fine example of the Latin learning that was taking place in Celtic monasteries. Owing to his correspondence with continental church leaders and his travels across Europe, he is often cited when comparisons are made between Celtic and Roman Christianity.

Voluntary exile consisted in leaving behind family and comforts as a form of martyrdom; while it was not essential to the practice, many of these wanderers became missionaries. The purpose of the journey was not to find a particular destination, but to avoid becoming too comfortable in this world. Columbanus left Bangor with twelve followers, including Bishop Aid and St. Gall. They founded monasteries at Annegray and Luxueil in Gaul. The Celtic practice of private confession was far easier for the warrior aristocracy to accept than the strict confessional discipline of the continental church, and so Columbanus developed important friendships with Germanic nobles. The strict ascetical discipline that drew so many also led him to be highly critical of anyone whom he found in conflict with his vision of Christianity. His travels continued and included monastic foundations at what is now St. Gall (Switzerland) and Bobbio (Italy). These were the most famous Celtic centers of learning and spirituality on the continent.

Ironically, while Columbanus was attempting to flee this earthly world, his form of Celtic Christianity attracted followers wherever he established new monasteries. For Columbanus and other Celtic Christians, there was no conflict between the life of a missionary and the life of a monk.

Columbanus was the earliest Irish saint to leave a prodigious body of literature. His writings include a monastic rule, a penitential, poetry, letters to popes, and other writings, all of which exhibit excellent skills in Latin. A later Life of the saint by Jonas of Bobbio (written in 640–643) also helped to establish his reputation. The correspondence with Popes Gregory the Great and Boniface IV make clear that his allegiance was to Rome, although he was sure that the Irish dating of Easter, along with other matters, showed the Celtic church to be more faithful to the early church than was Rome.

His use of classical allusions in his poetry and other works show that he was not afraid to use non-Christian knowledge and images to praise the world that God had created around him. The penitential called for a harsh system of ascetical practices and corporal punishment, coupled with frequent private confession. This work showed the influence of Cassian (c. 360–c. 433), Basil the Great (c. 330–379), and the monks of the Egyptian desert. The establishment of so many Irish monasteries on the continent spread the ideas in this penitential far and wide. Columbanus's penitential played a significant role in the acceptance of private and regular confession by the rest of the Christian world. More than thirty writings are attributed to Columbanus. The authorship of many of these remains in doubt, which is to be expected for such a large body of work from this period. The penitential, the rule, many of the letters, and most of the sermons, however, are firmly ascribed to him.

Compassion and Holy People

Compassion, a deep emotional sympathy with others who are in distress and a desire to alleviate their suffering, is an essential element in world attitudes toward holy people. For the major religions, compassion, more often than any other characteristic, provides the clearest evidence of holiness, and those people who have tried to care for their fellow human beings and other living things have earned special recognition and veneration. The stronger the communal element of the religion, the stronger this emphasis, to the point that even cruelty is often justified in religious terms as “tough love” that is for the good of the person being injured. A rather rarefied compassion is a leading premise of Confucianism: the need to teach others to help them realize the essential goodness of their human nature. More concretely, the Jewish prophets made compassion a central teaching: Since all Jews have a covenant with God, an offense against a fellow human being is an offense against God. Christianity and Islam have gone still further, making compassion the most defining characteristic of God himself. Essential to Christianity is the principle that “God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son” (John 3:16). The lesson that God’s love should be imitated by his creation is also explicit in Islam, in which “God the all-merciful, the all-compassionate” is invoked at every hand, while the pillars of the prophet Muhammad’s message are belief in God and compassion for fellow human beings. Many of Muhammad’s revelations dealt with the great problem of social injustice, endemic in the Arabian Peninsula in his time.

The association between holy people and compassion has been perhaps most developed in Buddhism among the world religions. In the beliefs of all branches of Buddhism, Gautama the Buddha made his great renunciation of the world because of his deep empathy with human suffering. Original Buddhism put more emphasis on individual enlightenment than on compassion toward those still trapped in the cycle of rebirth. This led to the great reaction of Mahayana Buddhism, the most widespread form of Buddhism today. Central to Mahayana is the idea of the holy person who consciously decides to become a buddha. He or she does so by taking the vow of the bodhisattva, or enlightened being, a resolution to become a buddha for the sake of all sentient beings, giving up nirvana and enduring rebirth after rebirth until all have reached enlightenment. This belief reached its fullest extent in the branches of Pure Land Buddhism, which hold that Amitabha Buddha is just such a bodhisattva, who will help anyone, and invocation of whom will lead to rebirth in the Pure Land in the west. In China, the bodhisattva of compassion, known as Guanyin, increasingly took on feminine characteristics, perhaps in the belief that female nurturing is more expressive of compassion. Notions similar to the Buddhist concept appear in other religions. For example, the Neoplatonist philosopher Iamblichus (d. 325) taught that humans can be purified and raised to the divine, but that pure souls will still reincarnate to lead others to the truth. The West African god/hero Babalú Ayé also provides an interesting example: According to legend, he died of smallpox and came back as an orisha, generous and able to understand the suffering of others because of his own pain.

While legends of Buddhist holy people tend to emphasize characteristics other than compassion, care for others forms a backdrop even in the lives of those mostly defined as scholars and teachers. A marked case is that of the Tibetan Buddhist Yeshe Tsogyal (757–817), a rare example of a female teacher in that tradition. Yeshe Tsogyal is credited with many students but even more with a compassionate nature that would lead her to help anyone. Legend tells that she even helped her worst enemies: When a gang of men raped her, they all instantly attained realization of dharma (Buddhist doctrine) thanks to their contact with the holy woman. In the modern world, all branches of Buddhism provide notable examples of holy people above all noted for compassion. An interesting case is the Thai Theravada monk Buddhadasa (1906–1993), who emphasized how essential it is to work for the good of the whole community and world, rather than just for individual religious advancement. Buddhist political activism has also centered on compassion, as with the Vietnamese Zen monk Thich Nhat Hanh (1926–), who helped found the Engaged Buddhism Movement, leading antiwar agitation and nonviolent protests while also founding a large organization to aid war victims.

The religions of Asia have also stressed compassion to other living creatures besides humans, a path that the religions of the West have been very slow to follow, on the whole. Compassion toward animals is particularly important to Jainism. The twenty-second Jain tirthankara (ford-maker), Nemi, is said to have been on his way to his marriage when he passed a pen full of wailing animals awaiting slaughter for his own wedding feast. This sight effected Nemi’s awakening: Moved by compassion, he released the animals and renounced his marriage plans, becoming a mendicant. Stories abound in all religions, though, of holy people who show deep compassion toward animals, including even such extremes as the Buddhist Asanga in the fourth century, who wanted to help a maggot-infested dog but was unwilling to harm either maggots or canine, so he set out to remove the maggots one by one with his tongue. And there is a tale of Muhammad (570–632) climbing down a well and drawing water with his boot to bring relief to a dog dying of thirst.

Holy people usually, in the world’s legends, have exercised compassion at least one-on-one in their daily lives. A surprising number have also engaged in acts of “mass compassion,” dedicating their lives to care, improvement, nursing, and the like for large numbers of the needy in efforts that range from serving a single community to outreach to people around the world. A notable early Christian example is that of the Roman deacon Lawrence (d. 258): Ordered by a magistrate to turn over the riches of the Roman church, he presented to the official (who was not amused) all the diseased and poor who depended on church support. Lawrence was martyred very soon afterward. Medieval Christian saints repeatedly sold altar equipment to ransom captives or feed the poor in famines. Muslim sufis during the same period pressured rulers to care for the indigent. An important Christian movement in the thirteenth century inspired large numbers to stay in the world to help the poor rather than retiring to a monastery—thus the orders of friars inspired by Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226) and Dominic (1170–1223) came into existence.

The deep needs of the modern world have called into being much more large-scale, organized programs of care for others, a movement toward compassion that has been spearheaded in every part of the world by people recognized as particularly close to the divine. Fifteenth-century Christianity witnessed a great upsurge of care for the poor, exemplified by Catherine of Genoa (1447–1510), who devoted her life to care of the sick. Similarly, the members of the Company of St. Ursula, founded by the laywoman Angela Merici (1474–1540), are dedicated to charitable activities. Martin de Porres (1579–1639), widely regarded in his time as a living saint, dedicated his life to a remarkably effective care of widows, orphans, the sick, and especially the deeply ravaged native and African populations of his city of Lima, Peru. Vincent de Paul (1576–1660), working in France at about the same time, was a great social reformer whose goal was to redirect France’s churches to care for the needy. Such “saints of compassion,” by their acts and their model, played a massive role in changing European perceptions of care for others.

Complete devotion to the needy as a centerpiece of the life dedicated to God was, by the nineteenth century, common to many religions. Roman Catholics such as John Bosco (1815–1888) or Frances Cabrini (1850–1917) continued to found caritative religious orders in large numbers. Protestants also got in on the act. Already in the 1750s, John Woolman inspired the Quakers of America to denounce slavery, and continuing a long heritage of Quaker care for the poor, Elizabeth Fry (1780–1845) became a great prison reformer. Individuals such as Jonathon Chapman (“Johnny Appleseed”) (1774–1845) planted apple orchards and gave everything he received to the poor, and the evangelical William Booth (1829–1912) institutionalized and internationalized his assault on urban poverty by creating the Salvation Army. Jalarum (1799–1878) and other Hindus followed similar paths, laboring and giving their proceeds to the poor, or collecting from others for distribution. Bunjiro Kawate (1814–1883) founded an important branch of the Shinto religion that emphasized social concerns. And a central message of the Baha’i faith, established in the latter nineteenth century, was the need for global social and religious reform in which service to others is a devotional act. In the early twentieth century, the Egyptian schoolteacher Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) founded the Society of Muslim Brothers, which developed into a mass movement in the Middle East. The society’s goal was to reform political and social institutions as a means to spiritual reform, and al-Banna to that end advocated social justice and education, built clinics, and did much to raise the standard of living.

An important element of compassion in the modern world has been to provide a voice for the lowly, those who would not otherwise be heard by indifferent and massive governments. A harbinger of this development was the Spaniard Bartolomé de las Casas (1484–1566) in the sixteenth century, who launched a personal crusade to halt

Spanish abuse of the native peoples of the Americas. Since then, hundreds of holy men and women have spoken for those without a voice. An important twentieth-century example is Oscar Romero (1917–1980), martyred archbishop of El Salvador, who stood up for the concerns of the “little people” against an indifferent and corrupt government and died for it.

People recognized by their societies as “holy” have provided a voice of conscience with the moral force to effect change in traditional practices deeply prejudiced against parts of the population. It was religious leaders who most effectively marshaled public support behind the twentieth-century world’s fight for the dignity of all human beings, and who continue to do so today. Hindu holy men, of whom Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948) is only the most famous, fought not only for independence from British rule but for women’s rights and an end to at least the most oppressive elements of the caste system. A large number of American religious leaders, both black and white, Protestant, Catholic, and Muslim, have fought and still continue the struggle against racism and sexism. They have often defined the struggle in religious terms, as did the leaders of South Africa’s antiapartheid movement. Desmond Tutu (1931–) of South Africa defined the religious basis of the struggle for equality clearly as ubuntu, a concept of human dignity in which all human beings are defined as created in God’s image. The list of religious leaders taking this direction is long and varied, ranging from Nation of Islam leader Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975) to Cherokee chief Wilma Mankiller (1945–).

The most moving stories, though, tell not of the creators of institutions but of individuals who have shown compassion at enormous personal cost because of their love of God. In popular devotion, a high order of sanctity is attributed to individuals such as the sufi Ahmad Radwan (1895–1967) of Egypt, who nursed the sick in an epidemic, or Maximilian Kolbe (1894–1941), who as a prisoner in Auschwitz volunteered to take the place of a fellow prisoner condemned to be starved to death. Such saints are widely regarded as a “proof” of their faith, practicing what the religion preaches and dedicating their lives to an image of a loving God.

Cone, James H.

Christian theologian

James H. Cone is one of the most respected interpreters of African American Christianity. He has published extensively in the area of black theology. Cone was born on August 5, 1938, in Arkansas in the United States. Like many black religious thinkers before him, Cone credits his parents and church for instilling in him vibrant faith and self-esteem in a context of racism. Such lessons were further reinforced at the Macedonia African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Cone's commitment to justice and academic excellence was influenced by the ideas of earlier black thinkers such as Benjamin Mays, Howard Thurman, and Martin Luther King, Jr. He graduated with the doctoral degree in theology in 1965 having mastered the theology of Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, and Paul Tillich. However, when he returned to teach at his alma mater, Smith College in Arkansas, he had difficulties relating European theology to his students. Furthermore, the emergence of the black power movement and the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1968 intensified his identity crisis as a theologian. In fact, he credits the Nation of Islam and not the church with having demonstrated the need to make faith relevant to black suffering.

In 1969, Cone published Black Theology and Black Power, in which he related Christianity to the more radical elements of the black liberation struggle and expressed the rage and grief felt by many young people. He took the themes of blackness and liberation and made them essential ingredients of Christian theology, accentuating liberation as the basic essence of the Christian message. Indeed, his theological interpretation of these concepts distinguishes him from his predecessors. In 1970, Cone joined the prestigious faculty of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, where he relishes the opportunity to articulate his scathing critique of Euro-American theology before some of the most respected theological minds. In many respects, Cone's prophetic theology critiques the Euro-American theological traditions and the black church for failing to make suffering and liberation of the black oppressed an integral part of its understanding of the gospel. When his second book, A Black Theology of Liberation, appeared in 1970, Cone's status as a black theologian had been recognized.

In his writings, Cone draws fully on the resources of African American religion and culture to address the importance of sociohistorical contexts in framing the questions that have to do with theology.

Confucian Culture Heroes

(3rd millennium B.C.E.)

The culture heroes of Confucianism are the six sage-kings: Fu Xi (Fu-hsi), Shen Nong (Shen-nung, also known as the Divine Farmer), the Yellow Emperor Huangdi (Huang-ti), Yao, Shun, and Yu (Yü). Their dates are the matter of much conjecture but may be approximated as ranging from the twenty-ninth to twenty-second centuries B.C.E. The kings are upheld as clan ancestors, bringers of order to the world, exemplars of virtuous character and rule, and inventors of core aspects of civilization.

Each of the Chinese clans posited one or more of these kings as the founder of their line. Huangdi was claimed as an ancestor by all clans. Additionally, Fu Xi was claimed as an ancestor by the Feng clan, Yao by the Du (Tu) and Fang clans, and Shun by the Gui (Kuei) clan. Patriarchs of the clans, and the families within these clans, would derive their te (t'ê), virtue, from that of their earliest ancestor.

One feature common to the legends of these kings is that they were establishers of order. Fu Xi, with the help of his sister Nu Gua (Nü-kua), used the legs of a giant sea turtle to prop up the sky, ordering the cosmos. Shen Nong (who is described as being ox-headed) developed farming, ordering the land. Huangdi defeated the earth-monster Chi Yu (Ch'ih-yu), bringing order to the countryside. Yao's virtue was so great that it transformed all those around him, ordering society. Shun matched his actions to the cues of the world, serving as an example of ordered conduct. Yu (who is described as being able to transform into a bear) tamed the Yellow River, bringing order to the surrounding territory.

These early kings were valorized for their enlightened rule. Yao and Shun, in particular, were described as exemplars of a familial mode of rule, winning the allegiance of the people instead of conquering them. What is more, they were viewed as sages because they were noble of their own nature, having cultivated their conducts in the absence of formalized philosophies. The sage-kings transferred power to each other, recognizing in each other the necessary virtue. Yu ended this meritocratic system, however, transferring power to his son, Qi (Ch'i), and beginning the practice of hereditary rule.

The six kings are credited with originating various cultural practices. Fu Xi's chief contributions were the Eight Trigrams and hunting; Shen Nong, the plough, animal husbandry, and pharmacology; Huangdi, ritual and music; Yao, the palace; Shun, pottery; Yu, the start of hereditary rule. Whether they invented these things or not is less important than that these things are legitimated and given cachet through their association with these figures. The sage-kings were also used competitively to legitimate philosophical schools. Although Confucius referred to Zhou-era figures for authority, Mengzi (Mencius) referred to Yao and Shun, and Daoists (Taoists) to Fu Xi and Shen Nong, suggesting that, for all of these traditions, perfection was held to reside in the past.

Confucianism and Holy People

The debate about whether Confucianism is even a religion, and thus whether the great teachers of the tradition may be considered “holy people,” can be traced at least as far back as the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. At that time, writings originating with the Jesuit missions in Japan and China (including extensive studies of Confucianism) exerted great influence on ideas in Europe, even helping pave the way for the Enlightenment. The word Rujiao (Jap.: Jukyô)—“the Confucian religion” (or “teaching”)—only came into common use in the modern period, particularly in Japan, probably under the influence of the Western concept of “religion,” which did not exist per se in traditional East Asian thought. Even then, though, the term tended to mean “Confucian moral teachings” rather than “religion” in the Western sense. What is now called “Confucianism” was traditionally referred to in East Asia by the word Rujia, meaning the Confucian school of philosophy, or Ruxue, “Confucian learning” or “the learning of the scholars.”

All the other great religions of the world, even when they were centered in cloistered communities of learned monks, gradually developed a widespread following among the masses. This was achieved both through missionary efforts and through their mobilization in the cause of the spiritual-political unification of large and diverse human communities by astute administrative and military leaders, such as Moses in Sinai and Canaan; Constantine in Rome; Ashoka in India; Muhammad in Mecca and Yathrib/Medina; Umar in Syria, Jerusalem, Egypt, and North Africa; Liang Wudi, Sui Yangdi, and Tang Gaozu in China; and Soga no Umako and Emperors Shōmu and Kanmu in Japan. These unifiers, institution builders, and founders of state religions, with the aid of their successors, created the “universal communities” wherein the holy men and women of the cloth could carry out their missions of proselytization, scriptural translation and explication, spiritual and educational ministry, and social welfare work, eventually reaching right down to the grassroots level of society.

Confucianism, as well, became institutionalized in China, Korea, Japan, Vietnam, and the Ryukyu kingdom (present-day Okinawa) in the service of political unification, but the bulk of its practitioners have always remained an elite community centered in the higher social strata, while the masses below them with whose administration and moral edification the educated elite were entrusted usually followed various popular religious teachings of non-Confucian origin. As Martina Deuchler wrote in describing the antishamanist, anti-Buddhist Confucianization of Korean society undertaken from the beginning of the Choson dynasty (1392–1910), “Models for perfect ritual behavior and a sound sociopolitical order are contained in ancient China’s canonical works that constituted the inexhaustible source of inspiration for generations of Confucians. . . . The sheer weight of its canonical literature makes Neo-Confucianism an elitist enterprise. . . . A group apart and above general society, the ju [Confucian-educated scholars] adduced their special moral qualities as justification for taking on a leadership role within and without the government. In the widest sense of the word, they were professionals who with their moral endowment, learning, and skills were indispensable functionaries of state and society” (Deuchler 1992, 25, 26).

True, there were attempts in Han dynasty China (209 B.C.E.–220 C.E.) to make Confucianism into a state religion with mass appeal, with Confucius as the divine mediator between heaven and humanity, and since the fall of the Qing dynasty in 1911 there have been attempts in China, Taiwan, and other countries with Chinese populations to make Confucianism into a religion of collective worship on the model of Christianity, Buddhism, or Islam. But these attempts were repeatedly thwarted by the this-worldly, rationalistic nature of the original Confucian teachings, the skepticism and pragmatism of the scholar-official class that transmitted the classical tradition, and, in the modern period, by the inexorable spread of modernism and scientific thought, which, especially in China and Korea, found themselves in an antagonistic relationship with the reactionary weight of Confucian patriarchy. It appears that the only country where an active “Confucian Church” exists today is Indonesia, but it exists in a somewhat tense relationship with the surrounding Islamic society and has strong competition from Buddhism and Christianity among the ethnically Chinese community (only about 3 percent of the population).

Nevertheless, there is no question that the Confucian tradition contains many elements that can legitimately be called religious in nature, including its emphasis on ritual and sacrificial rites; its concept of heaven (or the “commands of heaven,” tianming) as the author and guarantor of human morality; and its path for achieving wisdom, strength of character, and sageliness through a lifelong discipline of socially committed spiritual self-cultivation. Confucius may have rejected many of the religious practices of his age by de-emphasizing the importance of spiritual beings and focusing attention on people’s inner moral intentionality, valuing traditional rituals more for their efficacy in cultivating reverence and uprightness within and social order and decorum without than for their traditional role in appeasing spiritual beings believed to hold sway over the welfare of the human community.

But another way to describe his humanistic sublimation of the ancient tradition of shamanistic or mantic religion is as the creation of a new type of “ethico-political religion” based on the cultivation of an inwardly directed subjectivity appropriate to a more sophisticated and fluid type of society than that known by his aristocratic forebears, a society in which educated people had to depend much more on their own wits and their own good judgment to achieve social status and success. Believing that the people of his own age had lost the sincerity, straightforwardness, and single-mindedness of the ancients, however, Confucius looked resolutely to the ancient books for the ideal models of how people should think and behave and for the foundational principles of the way of learning. This approach led him to conclusions that both drew on and rejected tradition. This is why Analects, for example, includes such seemingly contradictory statements as: “Those who studied in ancient times did it for themselves; people who study today do it for others” (Analects 14:28); “In conducting ceremonies, it is better to be economical than extravagant. In performing funerals, one should pay more attention to the inner feelings of grief than to the external details of ritual propriety” (3:4); and “Fan Chi asked about wisdom. Confucius said, ‘devote yourself wholeheartedly to what is proper for people to do. Respect ancestral spirits and spiritual beings but keep them at a distance. That can be called wisdom’” (6:20).

Since the wise know the commands of heaven (like Confucius at age fifty) and are able to follow them (like Confucius at age sixty), they know that many things are beyond the control of man, and yet they also know that heaven has its own purpose and laws in determining the way the world unfolds. Thus they gain an ability to accept whatever occurs with equanimity, neither “begrudging Heaven nor blaming other people” for their misfortunes or difficulties. Able to put themselves subjectively in the position of others and empathize with their sufferings, avoiding doing to others what they would not have others do unto them, they are able to let go of egoism and stubbornness and manage those under their charge with a proper balance between benevolent concern and insistence on matters of principle. Remaining free from resentments and blame, they are able to sustain an unwavering commitment to the Dao (Way) while enjoying recreation and relaxation in the arts. Even the Daoists, with all their yogic and alchemical disciplines, could ultimately come up with no better formula for health and long life, but Confucians were able to pursue the Dao without abandoning their commitments to family, kin, and society at large—except for periods of deliberate retreat from society to restore, through quietness, study, contemplation, and artistic creation, their inner wholeness, balance, and communion with the rhythms of nature.

This concept of the Confucian path of learning as a total program of self-cultivation combining intellectual training, ethical introspection, quiet sitting, experience in practical affairs, and aesthetic cultivation in the polite arts reached its highest degree of development in the Neo-Confucian movement of the Song dynasty (960–1279), under the deep influence of some seven centuries of the dominance of Chinese spiritual culture by Buddhism and Daoism. Particularly in the Song and Ming dynasties, there existed a long line of great Confucian teachers with great concern for the moral welfare and enlightenment of society. In spite of the importance of their intellectual as well as their spiritual accomplishments, many of them were highly revered by their disciples and certainly deserve to be regarded as Confucian “holy men.”

The thinkers who initiated this line of great teachers and laid down the basic conceptual parameters of the Neo-Confucian Way are known as the five masters of eleventh-century Chinese philosophy: the ethicist-metaphysician Zhou Dunyi (1017–1073); the mathematician-numerologist Shao Yong (1011–1077); the monistic philosopher of qi (material force) Zhang Zai (1020–1077); the idealist philosopher of principle (li) Cheng Hao (1032–1085); and his brother, the rationalist philosopher of principle Cheng Yi (1033–1107). The Cheng brothers were students of Zhou Dunyi, friends of Shao Yong, and nephews of Zhang Zai. All of the five masters based a large part of their philosophy on the Yijing (Book of changes); all spent part of their early years avidly studying Buddhism and Daoism; all shared a strong concern with ethics, the moral health of society, and self-cultivation; and all were immortalized as the “founders” of Neo-Confucianism, or Daoxue (the learning of the Way), singled out as such by Zhu Xi in his great synthesis of Neo-Confucian ideas in the Southern Song period (1127–1279).

There were also many great masters in Ming dynasty Confucianism. Wang Yangming (1472–1529) and his disciples, for example, led a movement against the elitism of Confucian learning that made the pursuit of sagehood open to ordinary man and women, and Luo Qinshun (1465–1547) rejected the Cheng-Zhu school’s dualism of li and qi in favor of a monism of qi (often translated as “material force”). In Japan in the Edo period (1603–1867), quite a few Confucian teachers combined a Shintoist or Confucianist religiosity with the pursuit of wisdom through scholarship. Of course, there were many great teachers in Korea as well, but most of them have more the character of great scholars than “holy men.” All of the Confucian masters of China, Korea, Japan, and Vietnam, however, studied the same core Confucian texts, which for Neo-Confucians meant first and foremost the Four Books—the Analects, the Mencius, the Great Learning, and the Mean, the latter two of which are chapters extracted from the Book of Ritual.

Next in importance was a collection of the writings of the five masters of the Northern Song put together by Zhu Xi under the title Jinsilu (Reflections on things at hand), as well as other compendia of Neo-Confucian writings and commentaries, plus the ancient Five Classics themselves—the Book of Songs, the Book of Documents, the Book of Changes, the Spring and Autumn Annals, and the Book of Ritual—the “Old Testament” of the Confucian tradition. The Classic of Filial Piety was also widely revered and studied, so it must be considered another of the core classics of the tradition. The core ideas found in these seminal texts, especially those ideas with clearly religious overtones, shed light on concepts of holiness in Confucian thought.

The Great Learning, which laid out the basic methodology and progression of Confucian learning, emphasized “clarifying illustrious virtue, cherishing the people, and abiding in the highest good,” through which the mind will become settled and tranquil. Tranquillity itself was not defined as the final goal, however, but the ability of the mind when it is tranquil to reflect clearly and thus to achieve the aims of one’s deliberations. The Mean (also called The Doctrine of the Mean) expounds the truth of the oneness of heaven and man, the mean between excessive effort and insufficient effort, the practice of remaining watchful over oneself in solitude when no one is observing one’s behavior, and “sincerity” as both the Way of heaven and the practice by which one fully develops one’s own heaven-endowed virtuous nature, thus impelling others to do the same. This process of moral self-realization leads, in turn, beyond the merely human realm to the development of the nature of things, so that people become able to “assist in the transforming and nourishing process of heaven and earth, thus forming a trinity with heaven and earth” (ch. 22).

This is essentially a religious quest, and ritual plays a very important part in its achievement: “The sacrifices at the altars of heaven and earth are the means whereby we serve the Lord on High (Shangdi). The rituals performed in the ancestral temple are the means whereby we offer sacrifice to one’s ancestors. For one who clearly understands the rituals for making sacrifices to Heaven and Earth as well as the meaning of the grand sacrifice every fifth year and the annual autumn sacrifice, ruling the state is as easy as looking at the lines on the palm of one’s hand” (Mean, ch. 19).

The Mencius was especially important for its teaching of the original goodness of human nature: “If people do evil, it is not the fault of their original nature. The sense of commiseration is found in all men; the sense of shame and disgust is found in all men; the sense of respectfulness and reverence is found in all men; and the sense of right and wrong is found in all men. The sense of commiseration is humaneness (ren); the sense of shame and disgust is rightness (yi); the sense of respectfulness and reverence is ritual propriety (li); and the sense of right and wrong is wisdom (zhi). Humanity, righteousness, propriety, and wisdom are not branded into us from the outside. We originally have them within us. We just fail to direct our thought to them. Therefore it is said, ‘Seek it and you will find it, neglect it and you will lose it’” (Mencius 6A:6).

The Mencius also emphasized that people should stand up for their principles even at the risk of their life, and that an uncompromising commitment to the Way, sustained over a long period of time, would lead to the growth of an irresistible power of character called the “great, flood-like qi”: “The will is the leader of the vital force [qi], and the vital force fills the body. Where the will leads, the vital force will follow. Therefore I say, ‘Hold your will firm and never do violence to your vital force.’ . . . If the will is single, it will move the vital force. If the vital force is concentrated, it will move the will” (Mencius 2A:2).

Neo-Confucians built on ideas from the Four Books and the Book of Changes to develop the concept that man’s original nature transcends the distinction between self and other and extends to encompass the entire universe. Zhou Dunyi taught that “the state of absolute quiet and inactivity” referred to in the Changes is itself sincerity, which is infinitely pure, and that the state of “subtle incipient activation” spoken of in the same classic is “the undifferentiated state between existence and nonexistence when activity has started but has not manifested itself in physical form.” Zhang Zai, in his Western Inscription, wrote, “Heaven is my father and earth is my mother, and even such a small creature as I finds an intimate place in their midst. Therefore that which fills the universe I regard as my body and that which directs the universe I regard as my nature. All people are my brothers and sisters, and all things are my companions.” Cheng Yi echoed the Mencius in teaching that “the way to make the self sincere lies in having firm faith in the Way. As there is firm faith in the Way, one will put it into practice with determination. When one puts it into practice with determination, he will keep it securely. Then humanity, righteousness, loyalty, and faithfulness will never depart from his heart. In moments of haste, he acts according to them. In times of difficulty or confusion, he acts according to them.”

It should be clear that underlying all of these core Confucian ideas was a religious quest for the full realization of the human capacities for goodness, self-transcendence, tranquillity, wisdom, and holiness—a quest that was capable of inspiring large numbers of people in East Asia to live lives ennobled by self-discipline, meditation, and sacrifice of self-interest for the welfare of the wider human community.

Confucius (Kongzi)

(551–479 B.C.E.)

Founder of Confucianism

“Confucius” is a Latinized name for the “founder” of Confucianism devised by the Jesuits in China in the sixteenth century. In Chinese he is known as Kongzi or Kong Fuzi (Master Kong). The influence of his thought is so great in traditional East Asian civilization that that civilization is often described as “Confucian” in nature.

Kongzi was born in the state of Lu, in modern Shandong province, in 551 B.C.E. At the beginning of the Zhou dynasty (1066–256 B.C.E.), Lu had been the fief of Bo Qin, eldest son of the duke of Zhou. The duke of Zhou—Confucius’s greatest culture hero—had assisted his older brother, King Wu (son of King Wen), in overthrowing the Shang and founding the Zhou dynasty, and when Wu became sick, and during the minority of Wu’s son and successor, he took over the reins of government. The Book of Documents contains records of the duke’s words and deeds and gives him the chief credit for establishing the rituals, music, and political institutions of the Zhou dynasty. For Confucius, he was the last in a series of sage-rulers (after Yao, Shun, Yu, King Wen, and King Wu) who had laid down the basic patterns and norms of true civilization. Although Lu was not a powerful state, its historical connection with the Zhou ruling house had assured that the Zhou ritual traditions and the texts that recorded them were well preserved, and as a child Confucius liked to practice these rituals as a kind of game.

Although Confucius’s father died when he was young and he grew up in rather straitened circumstances, he was descended from a noble family of the state of Song, where the ritual traditions of the Shang or Yin dynasty (1711–1066 B.C.E.) had been preserved among the descendants of the Shang aristocracy. In ancient times in China, worship and government were tightly intertwined, and the sacrificial rites performed seasonally by the ruler were believed indispensable to preserving the harmony between heaven and the human community that is particularly essential in an agriculture-based society. Confucius retained the ancient belief in the importance of sacrificial rites, but he was much more concerned with their influence on the human heart and the community than with their supposed efficacy in appeasing and winning the blessings of spiritual beings.

Although deeply aware of his ancestral connectedness to the ritual traditions of the Zhou and the Shang royal houses, Confucius was compelled until age thirty-six to serve as a low-ranking official with mundane responsibilities. This contradiction gave him both the motivation and the opportunity to immerse himself in the writings and rituals that had been passed down in Lu, and, though he was unsuccessful in obtaining a position that would allow him to put his beliefs into practice in the political realm, his knowledge of this heritage (and his personal charisma) eventually attracted disciples with similar hopes of obtaining official positions with real responsibility for the welfare of society. In spite of his view of himself as a transmitter, not an innovator, by extending education beyond the aristocracy, accepting students no matter what their economic means, and becoming the first itinerant professional teacher, Confucius initiated a veritable intellectual revolution, becoming the model for the type of “unattached intellectual” in search of employment who in the following two and a half centuries would give birth to the “Hundred Schools” of ancient Chinese thought.

Yet Confucius can also be seen as a “holy person” because his entire teaching and sense of mission were rooted in his own personal relationship with tian (heaven), a word that referred originally in China to the infinite expanse of the sky and the gods and ancestral spirits believed to reside there, particularly the anthropomorphic supreme god, called Shang Di in the Yin dynasty but usually Tian in the Zhou. In the Shang and early Zhou, this supreme heavenly god was believed to reward good and punish evil, issue commands directing human actions, determine the length of people’s lives, receive offerings, and hear prayers. By Confucius’s time, many of the old religious beliefs associated with Tian (such as the belief that it was possible to find out the will of Tian through divination) were fading, and while clear traces of the old beliefs remain in Confucius’s teachings, his emphasis is on Tian as the source and protector of human morality and of the “chosen” individual’s civilizing mission. For instance, “When the Master was surrounded in Kuang [when mistaken for a rebel], he said, ‘Since King Wen is no longer with us, does not the Culture [wen] now reside with me? If Heaven were going to allow this Culture to perish, it would not have allowed a latecomer like me to participate in it.

Since Heaven has not allowed this Culture to perish, what can the people of Kuang do to me?’” (*Analec*s 9.5). And again, “The man of noble character [junzi] holds three things in awe: the commands of Heaven, persons of great virtue, and the words of the sages” (16.8).

The culture that Confucius believed heaven had chosen him to preserve centered on the observance of ritual propriety (li)—the behavioral norms, rituals, and etiquette laid down by the founders of the Zhou dynasty to bring about civility, order, peace, and harmony in the community from the top of society on down. To rectify society through ritual, however, required the rectification of names—the clarification of the meanings of words and the responsibilities incumbent upon each social role as defined by its title. This meant restoring the original hierarchical order of society, where the ultimate authority in ritual, governmental, and military affairs rested with one ruler at the top of the hierarchy, the “Son of Heaven” descended from the original Zhou rulers, not with the rulers of the separate states who had originally been merely his vassals. Accordingly, Confucianism has always had great appeal to authoritarian rulers endeavoring to unify and pacify their states with the aid of an obedient, literate, and conscientious official bureaucracy.

Yet Confucianism was adopted as the state ideology by Emperor Wu of the Han dynasty (141–87 B.C.E.) as a middle path between the hard authoritarianism of legalism and the more laissez-faire policies inspired by early Han Huang-Lao Daoism, both of which had been tried and found wanting. What distinguished Confucius’s path was the teaching that sociopolitical order ultimately rested neither on the external coercion of law nor on a mystical Daoistic “return to nature,” but on the inward moral cultivation and moral commitment of the ruler, and eventually of all of his officials as well. The aim of this inward cultivation, also used to characterize the “benevolent government” it would bring about, is the achievement of ren, usually translated as “humaneness” or “humanity.” As Roger T. Ames and Henry Rosemont have emphasized, however, in suggesting an alternate translation as “authoritative personhood,” “ren is one’s entire person: one’s cultivated cognitive, aesthetic, moral, and religious sensibilities as they are expressed in one’s ritualized roles and relationships. . . . [Ren] is foremost the process of ‘growing’ (sheng) these relationships into vital, robust, and healthy participation in the human community” (Confucius 1998, 49).

It was this understanding of the way of the sages as a path of inward- and outward-directed self-cultivation aimed at the full realization of the heaven-endowed moral capacities of the individual that was picked up by Menzi (372–289 B.C.E.), and later by the Neo-Confucians of the Song (960–1279) and Ming (1368–1644) dynasties, and developed into a methodology of intellectual and spiritual discipline as sophisticated (and as plagued by sectarian argumentation regarding the definition of orthodoxy and heterodoxy) as that developed in any other religious tradition.

Conselheiro, Antonio

(1842–1897 C.E.)

Christian millenarian, rebel

Born Antonio Vicente Mendes Maciel in 1842, Antonio Conselheiro (Antonio the Counselor) founded a millenarian community that withstood three Brazilian government expeditions to destroy it. He began his religious career as a wanderer in the high desert (sertão) of northeastern Brazil. The Conselheiro attracted a large following by preaching asceticism, condemning the Brazilian republican government, and prophesying the end of the world and the return of Rei Dom Sebastião, a sixteenth-century Portuguese prince who had died in North Africa. His army of backland cowboys (jagunços) defeated thousands of soldiers, succumbing only in 1897. The story of Antonio Conselheiro and his jagunços became a parable of Brazilian nationality when he was immortalized in Euclides da Cunha's Os Sertões (translated into English as Rebellion in the Backlands in 1944).

Antonio Conselheiro's asceticism and outlandish appearance won him a following among disenfranchised denizens of the sertão. He wore a blue cotton robe and a wide-brimmed hat, grew his hair and beard long, and always carried a pilgrim's staff. He first came to the attention of the authorities in 1866, when he was arrested for the murder of his wife and mother, but he was released when both were found alive. His return to the sertão in 1867 seemed miraculous to his followers, and his fame increased. He traveled through the desert with his increasing following, repairing churches and cemeteries. In 1882, he was condemned by the archbishop of Bahia for his rigid moral tone.

In 1889, the Brazilian republic was established by the abdication of Emperor Dom Pedro II. The republicans instituted a separation of church and state and denied legal recognition to church marriages. This led Antonio Conselheiro to believe that the republican government and the Catholic Church were, or were in league with, the Antichrist.

He prophesied that in 1896 the sertão would become the beach and the beach would become the sertão; that in 1898 there would be many hats and few heads; and that in 1899 water would turn to blood and falling stars would destroy the world. The shade of a tree where he rested became a panacea for the residents of Chorrobó, and a statue of the Virgin cried blood tears for his followers at Monte Santo.

In 1893, the Conselheiro burned a bulletin board announcing taxes and began his flight to Canudos, his desert redoubt. On the way, he had his first confrontation with government forces. His jagunços (armed cowboys, mercenaries, and bandits) defeated the few hundred ill-trained police. Upon arriving in Canudos, he and his followers began construction of a stone church and many miles of trenches. Believing that Canudos would be spared in the imminent eschaton, they prepared to defend it with their lives.

The government sent four military expeditions against Canudos in 1896–1897. All were plagued by the harsh terrain, the difficulty of maintaining supply lines, and the hubris of their commanders. The jagunços captured rifles, artillery, and ammunition from their enemies and lined the road to Canudos with their heads. Each victory brought Antonio Conselheiro more fame and followers. The city fell after the fourth expedition, in which the Brazilian army fielded more than 12,000 troops. Antonio Conselheiro died of dysentery and voluntary starvation in 1897 during the final siege.

The commander brought the Conselheiro's head to the anthropological museum in the Bahian capital. It was to serve as a warning to fanatics and as a specimen for phrenological research. However, it was removed from display after it became an object of popular veneration.

Constantine

(c. 272–337 C.E.)

Christian emperor

Constantine, the Roman emperor who legalized, promoted, and patronized Christianity, is often considered the first Christian emperor, though he was only baptized on his deathbed. Born in about 272, he came to power in the western empire upon the death of his father, Constantius

Chlorus, in 306. Constantine was the only child from Chlorus's union with Helena, a lowborn concubine. He was very close to his mother, and when his father died he summoned her to live with him in Trier. The religious turning point in Constantine's life occurred in 312 while he was preparing for a battle against Maxentius, a usurper and the brother of Constantine's wife Fausta. Constantine had a vision, called a dream in some accounts, that he would be victorious if he displayed the Christian chi-rho symbol, the first two letters of Christos (Christ) in Greek. Constantine had the symbol painted on his soldiers' shields and banners and went into battle the next morning at the Milvian Bridge, just to the north of the city of Rome. Maxentius's forces, which had prepared for battle in the traditional Roman way of blood sacrifice at the temples, outnumbered those of Constantine, and yet the young emperor was victorious.

Constantine, now the undisputed leader of the Roman west, issued the Edict of Milan, both promoting religious toleration, thus legalizing Christianity, and proclaiming that the Christian god was favored by the emperor. He also convened the first ecumenical church council at Nicaea in 325 in the hopes of clarification of church doctrine, particularly concerning Arianism. He built many impressive basilicas, including St. Peter's and St. John Lateran in Rome, the church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem, and Hagia Sophia in Constantinople.

By 324, Constantine was the sole ruler of Rome and proclaimed both his mother, Helena, and his wife, Fausta, empresses (Augustae). In 326, after accusations of an affair between his son Crispus, child of his first marriage, and his wife, Fausta, Constantine ordered them both executed. Shortly after these events, Helena was dispatched on a journey of imperial patronage and pilgrimage to the Holy Land. She is now venerated as a saint.

Contemporary Holy People

It is perhaps premature to designate anybody who has lived within the past two generations as “holy.” Those still living or recently dead have not yet withstood the test of time. Is their revelation a passing fad, which will make later generations yawn in boredom or recoil in horror? Worse, will ruthless biographers reveal that recent religious heroes in reality had feet of clay? It is with good cause that the modern Roman Catholic process of canonization cannot begin until three years after a purported holy person's death and that there is such a rigorous investigation into the prospective saint's life and faith. Any attempt to lay out some of the most recent trends in world beliefs about holy people must therefore be speculative.

That said, in general, it is fair to say that there is currently more diversity in belief about what constitutes “holiness” than at any time in human history. People who have been recognized as particularly close to the divine in the period since approximately 1960 are strongly divided between ecumenicists and fundamentalists of a particular faith tradition, proponents of violence and nonviolence, affirmers of tradition and progressives—with countless variants on each theme. Add to that a particular interest of some holy people in the environment and a strong belief of more holy people than ever before that the world has reached such a depth of depravity that it will soon end, and one begins to get a sense of the diversity of modern constructs of holiness. If there is a common theme, it is probably the general sense of acknowledged holy people that the world today is in a state of crisis greater than in any earlier age: Their solutions to the problem, however, differ.

Many modern holy people strike a common societal chord that leads to their veneration by advocating a return to either a pure early form of a particular religion or to a primal, earth-centered spirituality. Especially interesting in the latter regard is the rise of modern witchcraft. Gerald Gardner (1884–1964), founder of the Wicca movement, proclaimed that he was bringing to light a living spiritual tradition (while actually inventing the rituals and many of the beliefs himself). While his position as uniquely holy soon faded in the popular consciousness, other “nature lovers” seem to have a more enduring appeal. A particularly common trend in the 1960s was a turn to healing plants or psychedelic drugs, which were thought by some to be able to “reconnect” people of this modern materialistic age to the divine. The prophets and popularizers of this movement, such as Timothy Leary (1920–1996) and Terence McKenna (1946–2000), won wide regard as restorers of the holy. A woman named Jeanette MacDonald (1934–1984), who preempted the rather grandiose name “Mother Earth,” founded the Earth People movement of Trinidad. She advocated a return to the worship of a primordial Mother, proclaiming that the way of the Mother is a return to the simplicity of nature. Her movement was one of many such, and she was one of many people acclaimed by followers as an extraordinary channel to the divine. More moderate in their aims, there are holy people in several established religions who have taught an ecological message. An interesting example is the Greek monk Amphilochios (1888–1970), widely revered as a saint, who said, “Whoever does not love trees does not love Christ.” Even more recently, the Jain acharya (spiritual teacher) Tulsi (1914–1997) led a major revival of his sect of Jainism with a message that was pro-environmental, antinuclear, and especially stressed animal rights as a return to traditional Jain values.

Return to historically attested religious forms can take many shapes. At times it has been peaceful and even ecumenical, as, for example, in the modern revival of meditation practices spearheaded by men such as the Christian Thomas Merton (1915–1968) and the Theravada Buddhist Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982). More often, however, the theme of return to “pure” religion has been linked with nationalist movements, many of which are still active in the twenty-first century. Several African holy people have won devoted followings with their vigorous denunciations of imperialist powers, often coupled with impassioned efforts to restore native religion. A good example of this is the Kenyan Elijah Masinde (1908–1987). Revivals of ancestral religion led by charismatic holy people can also be found among the African-descended population of the Americas and in Native American communities. Often the message to restore true religion has been coupled with loud acclaim of a particular group as God’s “true” chosen people. A variant of this movement that has been wildly popular in Africa is the spread of Pentecostal Christianity, proclaimed as a return to the original, spirit-led faith of the first century. A wave of Pentecostal leaders, such as the German Reinhard Bonnke (1940–) and Ezekiel Guti (1923–) of Zimbabwe, have won enormous personal followings in Africa and elsewhere in the world. These leaders have been credited with the ability to work miracles and the ability to change the lives of multitudes.

The fundamentalist movements, advocating return to the original purity of given religions, have spread around the world thanks to charismatic preachers widely accepted as being in some way the messengers of God. Fundamentalist holy people, ranging from the Christian Jerry Falwell (1933–) to the Shi’a Muslim revolutionary Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989), have often preached intolerance of all faiths but their own, blaming the ills of the world on a falling away from the “old time religion.” Fundamentalist holy people also exist in Judaism and Buddhism. For instance, the Thai Buddhist monk Buddhadasa (1906–1993) proposed stripping Buddhism of all later accretions—including most popular religious practices. Such leaders have often been persecuted by governments (Sayyid Qutb [1906–1966], founder of Sunni Muslim fundamentalism, was executed in Egypt) for the simple reason that they tend to oppose the secular state, adding the luster of martyrdom in the eyes of their followers.

Recent generations have also seen a number of ecumenical holy people unprecedented in world history. Some saints have always been open toward those of other faiths, and some religions have been more accepting of diverse traditions than others. Some of the most intransigent have recently begun to embrace a universalist worldview, however. Roman Catholicism has produced a number of great ecumenicists, surprising many by leading the way toward greater understanding of other religions. While many traditional Catholics still denounce Pope John XXIII (1881–1963), pope from 1958 to 1963, and his “updating” of the church during Vatican II (which included a strong element of rapprochement with other religions), their coreligionists have led a vigorous movement to declare John a saint. Catholic ecumenism dates from before John XXIII’s pontificate, though, receiving a major forward momentum from the trials of World War II. Thus, in 1943, the Italian Chiara Lubich (1920–), while huddled in an air-raid shelter, founded the Focolare (hearth) movement, which grew into a worldwide ecumenical cause devoted to love and unity. Similarly, Brother Roger (Roger Schutz, 1915–) founded the Protestant/Catholic religious order of Taizé in 1940, which has expanded into a massive religious revival movement especially directed toward the world’s youth. A series of associated ecumenical movements have welcomed Muslims, Buddhists, and Jews besides all varieties of Christians. One of the most powerful voices in this Catholic ecumenical drive was the Trappist monk Thomas Merton, a major spiritual writer and speaker who encouraged interreligious exchange, especially in the monastic life.

More and more religious leaders have won large popular followings to their universalist messages that contain elements of several religions. Interesting modern cases are the jazz musician and spiritual leader John Coltrane (1926–1967), who blended Christian, Muslim, Asian, and African religion, or the Hindu eclectic holy man Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986), who turned against all religious tradition as useless. Certainly high on any list of great modern holy figures is Tenzin Gyatso (1933–), the fourteenth dalai lama, who has brought the spiritual insights of Buddhism to a worldwide audience, become a major proponent of interreligious dialogue, and lived a life of personal integrity in the face of hardship impressive in any age.

One of the most attractive paths that modern holy people have taken is the quest for social justice, employing spiritual prestige and charisma to question traditional inequities. Many people, whether coreligionists or not, have recognized the greatest twentieth-century warriors for the dignity of all human beings as inspired by God; often it has been the sense of religious mission they radiated that won general recognition for their causes. Among the civil rights leaders of the United States, Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), has won something as close as Protestants come to a cult of a saint, as has Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948) in India among Hindus. The Christian motivation of antiapartheid leaders such as Nelson Mandela (1918–) and Desmond Tutu (1931–) has also been widely recognized. Roman Catholicism has produced martyrs for social justice, most notably the archbishops Janani Luwum (1922–1977) of Uganda and Oscar Romero (1917–1980) of El Salvador. On a less spectacular level, religious figures around the world have focused their spiritual lives on assistance for the poor and dispossessed of the world; Mother Teresa of Calcutta (1910–1997) is perhaps the most famous of these.

As in many other ages, the modern world seems to have more than a reasonable share of charismatic holy people who decry the evil of the age and proclaim an imminent dissolution and recreation of a more godly society. Many such prophets of doom are ephemeral, building up large cult followings that soon dissolve in disillusionment or disaster. It seems likely that figures such as Jim Jones (1931–1978) and David Koresh (1959–1993) will be remembered, if at all, as curiosities rather than as holy people, and thousands of similar cult leaders have won and lost devoted followers by means of their unrealized millennial messages. Some recent figures, however, have inspired mass movements that may withstand the test of time and validate their prophets—men such as Simeo Ondeto (c. 1910/1917–1991) the cofounder of Legio Maria in Africa; Sun Myung Moon (1920–), who has won millions to the Unification Church; and Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977), who established the Hare Krishna movement.

It is impossible to guess who, a hundred years from now, will be regarded as the great holy people of the late twentieth century. Some have won official recognition, in the form of canonization or even public holidays declared in their honor, making it unlikely they will be forgotten. Perhaps some of the greatest names, however, will be people who lived and died in obscurity, only to have their contribution discovered by the people of a later age.

Cordoba, Martyrs of Christian martyrs, 851–858 C.E.

“Martyrs of Cordoba” is a collective term referring to the Christians who were executed by Muslim authorities for blasphemy or apostasy in Cordoba, Spain, between the years 851 and 858. Despite the fact that the Christian population of al-Andalus (Muslim Spain) had, by the mid-ninth century, achieved a viable modus vivendi with the dominant Muslim regime, some Christians found the idea of living under Muslim rule so intolerable that they sought their own deaths by publicly blaspheming Muhammad.

The first of these was a man named Isaac, a former minister in the Umayyad government, who had since retired to a monastery outside of the city. One day Isaac approached a Muslim qadi (judge), as if wanting to convert to Islam. But no sooner had the qadi begun to expound on his faith than Isaac launched into a verbal assault on the religion. He was arrested and, on June 3, 851, executed for blasphemy. Over the course of the next week, seven more Christians followed Isaac's example. By the end of July, the number of executions for blasphemy had grown to eleven. The next two victims—Flora and Maria, who died in November 851—were products of mixed marriages. In fact, Flora was ultimately decapitated not for blasphemy but for apostasy, because although her widowed mother had raised her as a Christian, her father had been a Muslim. Over the course of the next six and a half years, Cordoba witnessed the execution of thirty-two more Christians who died either as blasphemers or apostates or both. These events were a source of great concern for the Umayyad emirs, who, already facing resistance to their rule in the provinces, were especially leery of displays of dissent within their own capital.

But the executions also divided the Christian community. By and large, the Christians who were punished for violating Muslim law saw themselves as martyrs. By voluntarily sacrificing their lives in witness to Christianity, they imagined that they were acting in accordance with martyrrial traditions dating back to the times of Roman persecution (up to the year 313, when Constantine issued the Edict of Milan).

But many of the Christians living in Cordoba at the time, especially those who had adjusted to Muslim rule and assimilated to the dominant Arab secular culture, regarded the sacrifices of Isaac and the rest as inappropriate. From their perspective, the “radical” actions of the executed Christians threatened to undermine the niche that the Christian community as a whole had carved out within Andalusian society. They took issue with the notion that the executed Christians were martyrs of the ancient Roman type, pointing not only to the lack of miracles associated with their deaths, but to the fact that the Muslims were (in marked contrast to the Romans of a bygone era) neither pagans nor persecutors.

A Cordoban priest named Eulogius and his lay friend Paulus Alvarus took it upon themselves to defend the “martyrs” from their Christian detractors by writing a martyrology and two apologetic treatises on their behalf. Their works provide a fascinating window into the world of a Christian community living under Muslim rule, revealing information about everyday interaction between Christians and Muslims as well as providing evidence for some of the very earliest Latin Christian views of Islam as a religion. Though there is some question as to the precise role that Eulogius and Alvarus played in promoting the martyrdoms, it is clear that their writings—the only real evidence that has survived—were instrumental in constructing the idea of a “martyrs’ movement.” Eulogius himself suffered decapitation on March 11, 859, for harboring a fugitive apostate named Leocritia.

Corn Maidens/Mothers

Native American holy women/goddesses

In all of the agricultural Native American tribes of the United States, corn plays a key role in rituals, cosmologies, and religion. Mythologically, corn is usually personified as a woman. For the Cherokee, she is Selu; for the Seneca, Kanenahagenat. There were also Corn Maidens celebrated among the Zuni, and among the Pawnee, Corn Woman is revered. The corn maidens and mothers were focal points for Green Corn Dances and other festivals.

The Great Law of the Haudenosaunee, the Iroquois law code, is spiritually based, and the Green Corn Festival, a celebration of the survival of women’s maize agriculture, was encoded into the Great Law. The Haudenosaunee naming practice is a very complex process, with multiple names running between and through both precontact epochs. Sky Woman is also called the Corn Mother, Otsitsa. During the first epoch, according to legend, she brought seeds to the earth along with her younger sisters Beans and Squash.

Zuni tradition tells of six Corn Maidens who stay in the plaza in a shelter of boughs during the Corn Dance. A priest, desiring the eldest sister, attempts to touch her; offended, all of the Corn Maidens depart and go to the ocean. Since they take all of the corn with them, famine occurs for seven years, with the priests holding council every night. Newekwe Youth decides to search for the Corn Maidens, demanding that the priests go into a retreat and make prayer sticks in his absence. He gains power when the priests retreat and returns with the Corn Maidens, and all enter the Zuni Village. Among the Zuni, in early December the Corn Maidens arrive in the Molawai ceremony, “a ritual dramatization of the loss and recovery of the Corn Maidens” (Gill and Sullivan 1992, 362).

Corn Woman is depicted in many stories. The Pawnee tell that, when she was murdered (sometimes decapitated), and her body was dragged around in a field, her blood became the origin for the first corn plants. In other stories, she is a beautiful female who appears as a single green stalk of corn. Before she disappears, she teaches about the importance of being generous as well as revealing hunting secrets.

Cosmas and Damian

(d. c. 303 C.E.)

Christian martyrs

There were three sets of martyred brothers named Cosmas and Damian, all of whom died in the early fourth century. The first pair was decapitated in Arabia, either in Syria or in Cilicia, under Diocletian along with three other brothers. The second pair was stoned to death in Rome. The third pair, sons of Theodotus from Asia, died after being tortured.

In the first case, the consul Lysias had five Arab brothers (Cosmas, Damian, Leonce, Euprepius, and Antheme) whipped because they refused to sacrifice to the gods of the state. Tied up in chains, they uttered pious words. Then, thrown into the sea, they sang songs honoring Jesus, and an angel saved them from drowning. When Lysias accused them of being magicians, Cosmas replied with an hour-long speech on Christian virtues, during which time two men socked him in the jaw, but this failed to break his resolve. Enraged, Lysias incarcerated them, and the brothers spent the night praying and singing hymns. The following day, Lysias ordered them burned. In the fire, they raised their eyes to God; there was an earthquake, and the fire spread to burn the crowd, while the brothers were unscathed. Next, they were tied up and taken before the consul, but their faces radiated joy. They were crucified, whipped, and stoned by the crowd, but the stones reversed their course and struck those who threw them. Four soldiers shot arrows, which flew back and killed the soldiers. Decapitated, the brothers still sang songs of thanksgiving to God. With hands raised, they chanted "Amen," rendered their souls to God, and acquired the crowns of victory. A camel then miraculously spoke, ordering that the five brothers be buried in the same sepulcher.

Before their arrest, the Arab brothers were famous for treating the infirm in Nicomedia (in modern Turkey) in the name of Jesus Christ: They asked their patients to denounce other gods and to believe in Jesus, and they refused payment for their work. Patron saints of physicians and surgeons, as well as pharmacists, their feast day is celebrated on September 26.

The portraits of Cosmas and Damian were already engraved on coins and seals and painted on sanctuaries in the fourth century, and as their cult spread throughout Asia Minor and westward, churches were built in their honor. The Roman church used a Latin translation of their original Greek legend, and their names were inscribed in the Roman liturgy. An oratory was built as early as 498, and Pope Felix IV (pope 525–530) had a basilica built in their honor at the Forum.

During the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, Cosmas and Damian were painted as physicians with the dress and instruments of the area and the period (a box of ointment, a lancet or some other surgical instrument, and a mortar and pestle). Cosimo de Medici adopted Cosmas and Damian as his patrons, and he commissioned Fra Angelico to paint scenes of their lives in about 1440.

Cranmer, Thomas

Protestant archbishop, martyr

English churchman under Henry VIII, Thomas Cranmer was born in Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, on July 2, 1489. He was ordained before 1520 and received his Doctor of Divinity degree in 1526 from the University of Cambridge, where he was a lecturer and public examiner in divinity. He came to the attention of Henry in 1529 during the time of the king's fight with Rome over his divorce from Catherine of Aragon. Henry, who desperately wanted an heir to the throne, had prevailed upon Pope Clement VII to annul his marriage to Catherine, who had yet to produce a male child. Not wishing to offend Catherine's nephew, Holy Roman Emperor Charles V, who exerted powerful control over the papacy, Clement delayed responding to Henry's request. Cranmer suggested that Henry need not rely upon Rome to dissolve the marriage but should turn the matter over to the university scholars. Realizing the power of this suggestion, Henry had a treatise prepared on the issue and sent Cranmer along with an embassy that would present it to the pope and emperor.

Although nothing was resolved concerning the divorce until Henry had himself declared "supreme head" of the newly formulated Church of England, the king rewarded Cranmer by appointing him archdeacon of Taunton and in 1532 made him ambassador to the emperor. When the archbishopric of Canterbury became vacant, Henry appointed Cranmer to the position. He was consecrated on March 30, 1533. In April, Cranmer asked the king's leave to proceed with the case of Catherine. He convened his court in May, and by the twenty-third of the month pronounced sentence, declaring that the marriage between Henry and Catherine had never been valid. By the end of May, Cranmer declared the marriage of Henry and Anne Bolyn valid, crowning her queen on June 1, 1533.

Because Henry's remaking of the Church of England into a Protestant entity had been politically motivated instead of religiously based, Cranmer and other churchmen found it difficult to effect the theological and liturgical reforms in the church that they sought until after the king's death in 1547. Although Cranmer, along with his friend and colleague Thomas Cromwell, endorsed the translation of the Bible into English in 1538, something that the Catholic Church had always vehemently resisted, it was not until Henry's son, Edward VI, came to power that Cranmer and others found a more receptive atmosphere for their ideas. Believing that lay people should be able to participate more fully in the experience of worship, Cranmer worked almost nonstop during the reign of Edward to define a new religious order for the Church of England. Toward this end, he produced, mainly by himself, two editions of the Book of Common Prayer, in which he adapted the medieval mass into English and altered its character to reflect Protestant concern with the centrality of scripture and the importance of the liturgical structure of the early church. He also revised the canon law known as Reformatio legum ecclesiasticarum and produced the Forty-Two Articles (afterward reduced to thirty-nine), which defined the doctrines of the Anglican Church.

Upon Edward's death, his half sister, Mary I, came to power and attempted to restore England to Catholicism. This had dire consequences for churchmen, many of whom were arrested and tried for heresy or treason. Cranmer's own difficulties began with his refusal to reject the second edition of the Book of Common Prayer, which represented his clearest articulation of the correctness of Protestantism. Based on a manifesto he had written to defend his position and his support of Lady Jane Grey for queen, he was arrested in September 1553 and tried for treason two months later. He was condemned to death but languished in prison for months before he was taken to Oxford in 1555.

There, he was subjected to an examination by a court holding papal jurisdiction. Excommunicated by the pope, and knowing that his position was truly precarious, he signed a series of "recantations," some of which were probably "submissions to authority" that Cranmer's own political integrity impelled him to make. The last of these, though, was a humiliating confession of his own wrongdoings, which ironically had no effect on his death sentence. Realizing that his fate had been decided, he publicly recanted his previous recantations and died a martyr's death in 1556.

Crazy Horse

(1840–1877 C.E.)

Oglala and Miniconjou Lakota warrior, political leader, mystic

Few Lakota warriors of the nineteenth century are better known in popular consciousness than Crazy Horse. He led warriors in several major battles against the U.S. Army, including the defeat of General George Armstrong Custer in 1876, and he enjoyed a reputation as an invincible warrior who never suffered injury. His war powers derived from an intimate relationship with the spiritual world.

Like all Lakota men of his time, Crazy Horse trained from an early age to become a warrior. This preparation included seeking a vision in order to communicate with a spiritual protector. Crazy Horse accomplished this feat as a boy when he saw a warrior mounted on a horse that changed colors and rode through hail and lightning. The enemy's bullets and arrows did not affect the warrior in the vision, even as the warrior's people tried to hold him back. Crazy Horse had found his life's mission: to fight against his people's enemies with no fear. In the mid-1850s, Crazy Horse witnessed the U.S. Army's destruction of a Lakota village of men, women, and children with little cause, and from that moment on he militantly opposed American expansion onto the plains.

Because of his ability to taunt and confront the enemy without risk of harm, Crazy Horse rose quickly in status and became one of the youngest war leaders in the history of his people. Nevertheless, he remained a shy, introspective man who rarely talked in councils or bragged about his numerous war exploits. Frequently, he entered battle alone, as when he single-handedly killed scores of white miners and prospectors in the early 1870s who had invaded the Lakota's sacred Black Hills looking for gold. These solitary actions contributed to his reputation as a mystical and invincible warrior. His place in American memory was secured by his leading role in the Battle of the Rosebud and in crushing Custer in 1876. Hounded by the U.S. Army after Custer's defeat, Crazy Horse and his people surrendered at Fort Robinson, Nebraska, in early 1877. In September, he was killed by a guard as the commanding general tried to arrest him. His followers secreted his body and buried it in an unmarked grave, known only to few people, if any, living today.

Crowther, Samuel Ajayi

(c. 1808–1891 C.E.)

Anglican bishop, missionary, scholar

Samuel Ajayi Crowther was the first African to become bishop of the Anglican Church. This pioneering missionary and revered scholar transcribed Yoruba from an oral to a written language. According to Crowther, a Yoruba religion priest told his parents that he was destined to worship only the “god of heaven” (McKenzie 1976, 14). Although Islam had been practiced for centuries in West Africa, Christianity was virtually unknown. Crowther was captured and sold into slavery as a teenager. He was released in 1822 when a British abolitionist squadron seized the Brazil-bound ship he was on (slave ownership was outlawed in 1807). At his new home in Freetown, Sierra Leone, Crowther attended missionaries’ schools, and by 1827 he was the first student of Fourah Bay College.

Crowther began his career as a schoolteacher in 1830. He went on to help establish the British missionary movement in the Niger River region. He paved the way for numerous African and European missionaries to operate in West Africa. After travels and further studies in both Europe and Africa, Crowther became a deacon, then priest, and finally a bishop in 1864. Although his published chronicles inspired his contemporaries, his writings had an even wider impact because he was the first to inscribe the grammar of the Yoruba and Nupe languages, thereby establishing them as written languages. Crowther’s translation of the Bible into the Yoruba language helped spread Christianity in the twentieth century. Furthermore, Crowther helped to establish numerous churches in West Africa. Although he was forced to retire in 1890 because of racial conflicts and died the next year, today Crowther is well known to many English and African people. He retains an honorable position among millions as a pioneer for Western education and Christianity in West Africa.

Crummell, Alexander

Episcopalian missionary, social activist

Alexander Crummell was born in 1819 in New York City to free blacks who insured that he received a good education.

His vision of a better future for Africa and its people eventually led him to engage in missionary work and other activities designed to promote Africa’s development and Christianization.

Crummell attended high school with Henry Highland Garnet, who would become a lifelong friend. After obtaining an ordination in the Episcopal Church, Crummell began missionary work in New York. In 1848, he traveled to England in an effort to raise funds for his mission work. There, he was accepted at Cambridge University and earned his final degree. During Crummell’s Cambridge years he matured as a scholar and began to formulate his ideas for the advancement of the African American people.

In 1853, Crummell left England after graduation from Cambridge and traveled to Liberia, where he labored for twenty years as a missionary. Crummell’s father claimed descent from the Temne chiefs of West Africa, and Crummell had grown up hearing stories about Africa and his father’s burning love for “home.” So it is not surprising that Crummell’s royal African blood, sense of dignity, and intellect drove him to champion the call for African Americans to return to Africa and to bring with them the best of what they had learned of white Western civilization, Christianity, and commerce. Crummell believed that Christianity had produced within the Western world the most advanced and developed civilization that had ever existed. For that reason, he advocated an elite leadership to deliver Jesus Christ and Western civilization to the “heathen” tribes of Africa. For Crummell this was how African Americans would achieve racial uplift. Only as the world could see the black race making a contribution to the development of all people could blacks expect to receive the world’s respect.

Crummell served for two decades as an educator and missionary in Africa. During this period, he traveled on several occasions to America with Edward Blyden, a missionary in Liberia and later a government official and president of Liberia (1880–1884). The purpose of their trips was to encourage African American participation in the Christianization and development of Africa. Many blacks, discouraged by their status in America, received the message of emigration for racial uplift.

In 1873, Crummell abandoned his efforts in Africa and permanently returned to the United States. Upon his return, he was appointed by the Episcopal Church to serve as missionary to Washington, D.C. In 1897, a year before his death, Crummell founded and served as first president of the American Negro Academy. This academy was established for the purpose of promoting black intellectual excellence and combating racist propaganda against blacks by the dominant society.

Cuniraya Huiracocha

Peruvian hero-god

A pre-Hispanic god related to agriculture on the Peruvian central coast, Cuniraya Huiracocha appears in myths collected by Father Francisco de Avila in 1598, which were written in sixteenth-century Quechua to support the Christian struggle against Indian idolatries found in Peru. Therefore, they offer a unique account of the pre-Hispanic world vision in the Americas.

The myths explain human attitudes toward several wild animals of the Huarochiri region (condor, fox, parrot, puma, and falcon), natural features of the Peruvian coast, and the development of agriculture. The country's god, Cuniraya, took the shape of a beggar and walked among human beings with his dirty clothes. He fell in love with Cahuillaca, a beautiful goddess, but she always rejected him. One day, Cahuillaca was weaving below a tree of Lucumo, and Cuniraya, who was watching her from afar, tried to approach the goddess. He changed into a bird and flew to the top of the Lucumo, where he found a mature fruit and introduced his semen. Cahuillaca ate the fruit and got pregnant.

After nine months, Cahuillaca had a child, but she did not know who his father was. So she called all the gods (huacas and huillcas) to answer her question. When they arrived, Cahuillaca showed her son and asked who was his father. But nobody recognized the boy. Cuniraya Huiracocha was there, too, but he was not asked since he looked like a beggar. Then the goddess put the boy on the ground, hoping that he would recognize his father, which he did. When Cahuillaca realized that she had had a son with a beggar, she was ashamed. She took her child and ran to the ocean. Cuniraya put on a gold cloth and followed her. When Cahuillaca reached the shoreline, she and her son went into the ocean, where they became two islands that can be seen today.

While Cuniraya was running after Cahuillaca, he found several animals in his way and asked them for help. Each animal that gave the wrong answer was cursed by Cuniraya. Only the falcon assured Cuniraya that he would reach Cahuillaca, and the bird was blessed. But Cuniraya came too late and, angry, he threw all the fishes of Urpayhuachac, a goddess who did not help him, into the ocean. And because of this, now the ocean has many fishes.

Cuthbert

Christian bishop, ascetic

Cuthbert has become one of the most beloved Christian saints by reason of his humility and simplicity. His tomb in Durham Cathedral, England, has been an object of pilgrimage since the tenth century. The main source for the life of Cuthbert is Bede; in 716 and 720, not many years after Cuthbert's death in 687, Bede wrote two separate Lives, and he also devoted a number of chapters in his History of the English Church and People to the saint (Book 4, 26–32).

Although Cuthbert's name is English, a number of sources suggest he was Celtic. Born around 634, he was trained entirely in Celtic monasteries, and his practice of spirituality was more nearly Celtic than English. The distinction is immaterial, however, since a good number of English monks followed Celtic practice, and many even fled to Ireland with their Celtic brothers when the balance of custom tipped in favor of English (Roman) practice. Cuthbert accepted these changes gracefully, and throughout his career he managed to gain everyone's admiration.

Like many of his Celtic contemporaries, Cuthbert wished for the life of a hermit, but in fact his life began and ended in public service: preaching, healing, and extensive communal prayer. Even when he prayed alone, there was a sense of community. There is a charming story that, leaving the monastery at night, he would often enter the North Sea up to his arms and neck to pray. When he left the sea at dawn, otters would warm his feet with their breath and dry him with their fur. After receiving his blessing, they would return to the sea.

In time, Cuthbert was able to abandon his church position to become a solitary on the island of Inner Farne on the east coast of Northumbria. There, following his spiritual forebears from among the desert and Irish saints, he lived a life in which God provided for him. His need for fresh water was met by a miraculous spring; like Antony (which Bede was quick to point out), he planted cereals, and, again like Antony, he had to remonstrate with animals—in his case, birds—for harvesting what they did not sow. Like Antony, too, his hermitage attracted a number of visitors, who were able to report on his sanctity.

These reports convinced King Egfrith of Northumbria in 685 to appoint Cuthbert, against his will, as bishop. According to Bede, he was a model bishop, living frugally, visiting the remote regions of his diocese, and performing healing and other miracles. Some of the latter were pleasant: Visiting a convent, he chose water over the proffered wine or beer, but a priest, later tasting the cup, exclaimed that it had the flavor of the best wine he had ever had. Bede's Life gives a very emotional and stirring account of Cuthbert's death in 687. His feast day is March 20.

Cyprian of Carthage

(c. 200–258 C.E.)

Christian bishop, martyr

Christian bishop of Carthage from about 248 until his martyrdom in 258, Cyprian was already approximately forty-five years old and an orator in Carthage when he converted to Christianity in approximately 246. As was often the case when someone of such high social standing converted, Cyprian found himself rising quickly through the local ecclesiastical ranks, being named bishop within only two years of his conversion. When the Roman emperor Decius launched his systematic persecution of Christians in late 249, Cyprian left the city and tried to direct the afflicted Christian community in absentia. As a result, a large collection of letters have survived that, among other things, reveal the strains of a church under imperial pressure.

In particular, Cyprian had to deal with the large number of "lapsed" Christians who, fearing for their lives, had participated in mandatory acts of sacrifice to the Roman state gods to prove their allegiance to Rome. In their search for spiritual consolation, the lapsed sought the intercession of those Christians who had refused to sacrifice and were awaiting execution. As far as the lapsed were concerned, these "confessors," who would soon be martyrs, were in an optimal position to intercede for them in the presence of Christ. From Cyprian's episcopal perspective, however, such recourse to the confessors was a breach of church policy with regard to sinners, who, he contended, must go through the proper channels (which involved a long period of penance) if they were ever to be allowed entry back into the community of the faithful.

Part of the difficulties that Cyprian experienced during his exile and after his return to Carthage were a direct result of the fact that, while many Christians were being forced to make difficult choices about the relative importance of their religious and political affiliations, Cyprian avoided the problem altogether by going into exile. Indeed, the contemporary Life of Cyprian by Pontus is dedicated, in part, to an apologia explaining why Cyprian did not offer himself up when the opportunity first presented itself. Pontus's task was greatly facilitated by the fact that Cyprian did ultimately die as a martyr, thanks to the emperor Valerian's decision to issue his own persecution edict in 258. Though Cyprian's initial impulse was, once again, to go into hiding, he ultimately gave himself up and was executed on September 14, 258.

Cyprian's letters and treatises (in particular his On the Unity of the Catholic Church and On the Lapsed) were very influential within the Latin church, though his corpus lacks the sophistication of the work of either Tertullian (c. 155–c. 225) or Augustine (354–430), two other products of the Roman African church. Interestingly enough, given Cyprian's initial hesitation to become a martyr, he was revered by Christians involved in the Donatist movement and, indeed, by the Carthaginian church as a whole until it was suppressed by the Arian Vandals, who took over the city in 439.

Cyril and Methodius

(826–869, 815–885 C.E.)

Christian missionaries, linguists, apostles to the Slavs

Cyril was born in 826 in Thessalonica and died on February 14, 869, in Rome; Methodius was born in 815 in Thessalonica and died on April 6, 885, in Velehrad, Moravia. The feast day for both is February 14 in the Western calendar and 24 May or 11 May by the Eastern calendar.

The brothers Constantine (who adopted the name Cyril toward the end of his life) and Methodius (also an adopted name, but the original one is unknown) lived in the century that witnessed the breakdown of Slavonic cultural and linguistic unity. They probably learned the language that they called Slavonic, and that after the tenth century was no longer common to the Slavs, while still in Thessalonica, an archaic Slavonic territory. Though belonging to a politically prominent family, first Methodius and then Cyril renounced their worldly careers of civil official and scholar, respectively, and they retired to a monastery. After their successful mission to the Khazars of the Caucasian tribe northeast of the Black Sea, they were dispatched to Moravia in 863 in response to the request by Prince Rotislav to Emperor Michael III and Patriarch Photius for Christian missionaries familiar with Slavonic.

In preparation for their apostolic work, Cyril constructed an original script for the previously unwritten Slavonic vernacular—in an alphabet known as glagolitic, which, based on Greek and Hebrew letters, in a genial way reflected even the most subtle phonemes of the language. The mission to preach and perform the service in the native tongue of the people became possible with Cyril's translation of liturgy and much of the scriptures from Greek into Slavonic. His prelude to the gospels in Old Church Slavonic is also the oldest poetic composition in the Slavic tradition. The circulation of this material in the vernacular provided a counter to the German mission that, representing Western political interests and committed to religious, linguistic and cultural uniformity, attempted to quell schismatic tendencies in this region.

When the hostility of the German secular and ecclesiastical leaders toward their apostolic work compelled Cyril and Methodius to defend themselves in Rome in 868, Pope Hadrian II, hoping for conciliation of the churches, established its orthodoxy and approved the use of Slavonic in liturgy. Cyril's wish to return to Moravia was thwarted by his death only a few weeks after his arrival in Rome. Methodius, however, having received from the hands of the pope the title of archbishop of Sirmium, a historic see near Belgrade, together with jurisdiction over the newly formed archdiocese of Moravia and Pannonia, continued the mission for fifteen more years despite both internal and foreign opposition. The papal sanction did not prevent his deposition and subsequent imprisonment by the Frankish king, Louis, and his bishops at the synod in Regensburg in 870. Through the intervention of Pope John VIII, the saint was released almost three years later; nevertheless, after his release the use of Slavonic in liturgy was restricted.

Methodius spent his last years completing his translations of biblical and ecclesiastical writing, adapting Byzantine canon law, the Nomocanon, to the needs of the Slavonic church, and probably composing the literary masterpiece Life of Saint Constantine-Cyril. Within twenty years after Methodius's death, it seemed that the Magyar invasions of Moravia and the ban on the celebration of the liturgy in the vernacular had destroyed the accomplishment of Cyril and Methodius. However, their disciples and followers spread the revolutionary mission into other Slavic countries (Bulgaria, Serbia, and Russia), greatly contributing to the religious, cultural, and social advancement of this region. The message of the work of St. Cyril and St. Methodius continues to be an ecumenical call for a unity of the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches.

Cyril of Beloozero (Kirill)

Russian Orthodox abbot, founder

Founder of the Kirillov Monastery on the White Lake in northern Russia and one of the most important monastic founders to colonize Russia's far north, Cyril of Beloozero was locally recognized as a saint by the last quarter of the fifteenth century. His vita was written by Pachomius the Serb (Logofet) in the 1460s, largely based on conversations with monks who had known the saint. Cyril has been venerated for his asceticism and humility, for his miraculous powers, as the creator of a monastic rule for daily life, and as an adherent of the cult of the Theotokos (Mother of God).

Cyril (born Cosmo in 1337) began his spiritual life secretly, living in a monastic fashion while in the house of his kinsman Timothy. At first angered, Timothy eventually supported Cosmo's aspirations. Cosmo received tonsure as Cyril at the Simonov Monastery, where he met and conversed with Sergius of Radonezh, engaged in lengthy fasts, worked in the kitchen, and, desiring the silence of his cell, prayed to the Theotokos. When the superior of Simonov instructed Cyril to remain in his cell and copy manuscripts, Cyril's faith in the Theotokos was confirmed. Cyril eventually became superior of Simonov, but he soon gave up that position and returned to the silence of his cell. One night, while praying to the Theotokos, he heard a voice commanding him to go to the White Lake.

Cyril settled by the lake, attracted followers, struggled against demons, and was rewarded for his faith in the Theotokos: Though he was beset by hostile neighbors, according to his written Life, the intercession of the Theotokos repeatedly saved the monastery from an arsonist. Miraculous activity also preserved the cloister from brigands.

Cyril's administrative legacy was preserved in the code for monastic life that he created and that is briefly outlined in his vita. His rule maintains the ascetic values of obedience, reverence in church, humility, and long periods of silence. According to the narrative of Pachomius, Cyril's personal piety revolved around the disciplines of fasting, silence, the gift of tears, and adherence to the cult of the Theotokos. After Cyril's death in 1427, the Kirillov Monastery became a center of culture and economic activity in the far north, growing into one of Russia's largest and most important monasteries. The cloister remained active until the twentieth century. Cyril's feast day is June 9.

Daniel the Stylite

(c. 409–493 C.E.)

Christian ascetic

Daniel the Stylite was a fifth-century Christian holy man who spent much of his life standing on a high column outside of Constantinople. Information about him comes from a work of hagiography written by one of his disciples. Born in about 409, Daniel was from Syria and at age twelve went to live in a local monastery. In 452, he set out on a journey with the intention of visiting Simeon the Stylite near Aleppo and then proceeding to Jerusalem. Simeon, a Syrian holy man, lived on a column for thirty years as part of his asceticism and thus became the center of a vast and popular pilgrimage complex.

Daniel visited Simeon on his pillar and received his blessing. He then attempted to continue his journey to Jerusalem but was stopped by an apparition of a man resembling Simeon who commanded him to go to Constantinople, “the second Jerusalem,” instead of Jerusalem. He turned around and traveled toward Constantinople. Near the city, he found a Greco-Roman temple full of dangerous demons, “who often sank ships and had injured . . . many of the passers-by” (Dawes and Baynes 1977, 14). He shut himself up in the temple and did battle in the manner of Antony, and soon was victorious. The author of the vita blames these same demons for setting local priests against Daniel, causing the bishop to have him brought to his palace in the city and questioned. Daniel passed this examination, with the help of an interpreter (he spoke Syriac rather than Greek), miraculously cured the bishop of an illness, and was eventually permitted to return to his cell in the temple.

After nine years, Daniel had another vision of Simeon, this time standing on a high column between two angels. Simeon ordered the angels to bring Daniel up to the small platform on top of the column, and as they did so, Simeon kissed him before being taken up into heaven, leaving Daniel in his place on the column. Daniel’s supporters interpreted the vision as a call for him to mount a column. A few days later, a disciple of Simeon came to deliver news of the holy man’s death and offered Daniel the leather tunic worn by Simeon. After more visions, Daniel decided to ascend a tall column, taking the place of the now dead holy man, but outside Constantinople. The new bishop of Constantinople ordered Daniel to descend, since the monk had not sought his permission, but after the bishop witnessed Daniel’s miracle-working abilities he offered the holy man an even taller column. Daniel soon became a popular healer, political adviser, and miracle worker. He came off of his column only once, in 475–476, in order to march into Constantinople and confront the imperial usurper, Basiliscus.

Daoan (Tao-an)

Buddhist monk, teacher, commentator

A Chinese Buddhist monk of the Eastern Jin dynasty who was greatly responsible for the spread of Buddhism in China in its early stages, Daoan was born in 312 and entered the monastic order at the age of twelve, but his teacher did not appreciate him because of his dark complexion. However, his good memory won his teacher's recognition, and he was sent out to study, initially under Fo Tucheng, an Indian monk who came to China in about 310. Fo Tucheng assisted Daoan for around thirteen years, and Daoan became well known for his ability to explain difficult passages in Buddhist scriptures.

After the death of Fo Tucheng, northern China fell into chaos. Daoan left Changan, the capital, and traveled south with his disciples to Xiangyang (today in Hubei province), where he spent fifteen years studying Buddhist scriptures and writing commentaries. On the invitation of Fujian, the emperor of Qianqin, Daoan returned to Changan in 379. He stayed there until his death in 385 organizing the translation of Buddhist scripture and other works.

Daoan made numerous contributions to the development of early Chinese Buddhism: (1) He was an early developer of precepts in China in the absence of Indian vinaya. (2) He was the first commentator on Chinese translations of Indian Buddhist works in China and a prolific author. (3) He was one of the first to acknowledge the need to break dependence on the translation method of matching the meanings of Buddhist philosophical concepts with preexisting Daoist terms, desiring instead the establishment of an independent Buddhist system of terminology. (4) He established three rules for the standards of quality for Chinese translations of Indian works. (5) He created one of the earliest catalogs of Chinese Buddhist scriptures, entitled the Zongli zhongjing mulu (Comprehensive catalog of sutras). (6) He started a tradition that all Chinese Buddhist monks should have Shi (from the first syllable of Sakyamuni) as a surname.

Daoism and Holy People

The lives of sages, immortals, and perfected people take center stage in the religion and literature of Daoism, the higher indigenous religion of China. As Daoism spreads throughout the world, the slight and superficial knowledge of these figures in the West has begun to be replaced by sustained historical and theoretical analysis. This work has concentrated chiefly on translating and analyzing the numerous hagiographies of Daoist sages and immortals, many of which are located in Chinese-language compilations dating from the fourth century onward. The secondary, but equally necessary, task of understanding the role played by these figures and their lore in Daoist religion from the theoretical perspective of comparative religions has only recently begun to be undertaken in any serious way. This article first outlines the history of the wide variety of figures who might fall under the general category of "Daoist holy people" and then offers a tentative theoretical analysis of this data. One must, however, begin by noting that our knowledge of Daoist holy figures is limited by our access to written historical records. In Daoism this is a significant problem as many of these records indicate the existence of recluses and hermits who dwell in mountain caverns and generally avoid contact with ordinary mortals. The records thus bear the imprint of religious phenomena that are ultimately incapable of being recorded in any systematic or scientific way, but they do reveal a great deal about the types of figures whom ordinary Daoists revered and whose stories were preserved and handed down throughout the ages.

Historical Development

The earliest discussion of Daoist sages is located in the Daode jing (Classic of the way and its power), attributed to the legendary Daoist immortal Laozi in approximately the sixth century B.C.E. According to this classic text, a Daoist sage (sheng) is one who has obtained the Dao, the wellspring of creative power that impels the constant transformation and evolution of the universe. Such a person is thus imbued with de, a charismatic power that brings harmony to society. This earliest Daoist sage is thus a political leader who achieves success in the world through a type of action, wuwei, translated literally as "nonaction," but which means action that seems as though it does not take place.

Another early Daoist text, the Zhuangzi, composed by Zhuangzi and his disciples in approximately the third century B.C.E., offers a quite different perspective on Daoist sagehood. In this classic text, sages are those who generally eschew the conventional Confucian world of bureaucracy, morality, and government and instead attain a mystical transcendence of the world characterized as "free and easy wandering." Such sages are frequently depicted as unconventional figures, such as the deformed, the crippled, and the lunatic. The Zhuangzi also introduces the category of the perfected person (zhen), which plays a significant role in later Daoist religion.

During the Han dynasty (206 B.C.E.–210 C.E.), stories of sages and perfected people were supplemented by an increased interest in immortality, and there developed a class of people known as fangshi (“magico-technicians”; see De Woskin 1983) who claimed to be versed in the arts of immortality and who circulated stories of immortals and the methods they found to attain immortality. It was even suggested that a kind of “postmortem” immortality could be arranged for those whose bodies were sufficiently prepared to attain this transcendent state. Such people were said to be “liberated from their corpses”; though dead in a conventional sense, they were regarded as immortal beings who attained vast powers in a celestial paradise presided over by supreme deities including the legendary Laozi, the Yellow Emperor, or the Queen Mother of the West.

Daoism, as a formalized, institutional religion, was established in Sichuan province by the first celestial master, Zhang Daoling, in 142 C.E. Zhang claimed to offer a systematic approach to these various methods of attaining transcendence, immortality, or sagehood. By virtue of a covenant with Laozi himself, Zhang offered to his followers healing from sickness, a stable communal life, and initiation into the ranks of heaven while still in human form. Although Zhang’s theocratic movement lasted only until 215 C.E., the principles and powers of his priestly covenant remain to this day in the hands of Daoist priests, who function as celestial bureaucrats, regulating the interaction of heaven and earth.

Alongside this communal, bureaucratic religious institution, Daoists continued to deal in the currency of sagehood, perfection, and immortality, and a tradition of laboratory alchemy emerged in which alchemists, most notably Ge Hong (283–343/363 C.E.), sought to formulate an elixir of immortality decocted from cinnabar, the mineral form of mercury sulfide. Ge was also responsible for compiling the massive compendium of hagiographies known as the Shenxian zhuan (Traditions of divine transcendents). This volume details the lives and methods of over one hundred figures who attained various states of transcendence. These figures, known as xian (conventionally translated “immortals,” or, in earlier works, “fairies,” sometimes “wizards”), attain supernatural powers such as the ability to multilocate and transform their appearance at will, and, ideally, are summoned to heaven in broad daylight by Laozi himself, riding a chariot pulled by dragons and tigers. The stories of such figures are preserved and circulated widely among Daoists to this day.

In 364 C.E., one such transcendent figure, Lady Wei, initiated a series of revelations through the medium Yang Xi, who was a retainer in a noble family surnamed Xu who lived near present-day Nanjing. These revelations, subsequently collected and recorded in the Zhen’gao (Declarations of the perfected), contain hagiographic accounts of those who attained perfection and the methods that they used to attain this status. Methods include visualizing deities associated with the stars of the Big Dipper (Ursa Major) descending from the sky and entering the various organs of the body. Each organ (which in traditional Chinese medicine is a system for processing qi energy) is associated with a particular deity. Through this visualization, the energy of the body is transformed and the person attains a more and more diaphanous form in which the distinctions between self and world become increasingly transparent. In some cases, the bodies are literally as well as figuratively transparent, and the viscera of such immortal bodies are said to show through the flesh.

Lady Wei’s revelations led to the formation of the Shangqing dao (Way of Highest Clarity), a Daoist movement that no longer exists in a separate institutional form, but that was historically important in the development of Daoist sages and holy figures. The hagiographies preserved by this movement display a preoccupation with the various ranks and classes of immortality that one can attain. Highest among these were the ranks of the perfected themselves (zhenren), followed by celestial immortals (tianxian), and earthly immortals (dixian), each divided into higher, middle, and lower ranks. Each class of perfected person had its own heavenly realm, one of thirty-six in total, the highest being the heaven of Highest Clarity. Immortals and perfected function in the literature as mediums of communication between the heavens and the earth. They are those who have attained the methods for ascending to heaven and who descend to earth or are manifest in human form from time to time to give instruction on Daoist methods of immortality to those few individuals who truly deserve it.

The fifth to sixth centuries saw the increasing spread and influence of Buddhism in China and the development of complex layers of heavens and hells and processes of judgment to regulate the karmic destiny of living beings. Daoist immortals and Buddhist bodhisattvas (enlightened beings) increasingly take on a common set of characteristics as cosmic beings with supernatural powers whose mission is to bring enlightenment and salvation to the world. Daoism and Buddhism also propose a series of levels of perfection that the individual practitioner can gradually attain.

The increasingly common goals of Buddhist and Daoist spiritual practice converge in the establishment of the Way of Complete Perfection founded by Wang Zhe (1130–1200). Wang received a visit from two Daoist immortals, Lü Dongbin and Zhongli Quan, whereupon he left his family and built himself a “living grave” in which he lived and meditated. Upon his emergence from this “tomb,” or “womb,” he gathered seven disciples and began teaching his techniques of internal alchemy. Unlike the laboratory alchemy of Ge

Hong and his immortals, internal alchemy takes the energies of the body as its ingredients, and the body itself as a cauldron. Instead of decocting an elixir of immortality, the energies are manipulated and transformed through exercise and meditation into an immortal embryo that is nurtured in the body, finally exiting through the crown of the skull in an inversion of the physical birth process. This tradition thus reveres those holy people who have left their families, entered into Daoist monasteries, and dedicated themselves to this cultivation process.

Daoist literature is replete with examples of such figures. Chief among them are the Eight Immortals: Lü Dongbin, Zhongli Quan (a.k.a. Han Zhongli), Li Tieguai, Cao Guoqiu (a woman), He Xiangu, Han Xiangzi, Zhang Guolao, and Lan Caihe (who appears in either male or female form), all of whom figure prominently in Daoist temples. Second are the seven perfected ones, the disciples of Wang Zhe who initially formed and received the Way of Complete Perfection: Ma Yu, Tan Chuduan, Qiu Chuji, Liu Chuxuan, Wang Chuyi, Hao Datong, and Sun Bu'er, the wife of Ma Yu and the only woman disciple. Of the Eight Immortals, the most important is Lü Dongbin (b. c. 798?), who, combining motifs found in Buddhism and also in the Zhuangzi, famously experienced his life as a dream and then woke up to his transcendent status. Lü is venerated in many temples throughout China, including especially the Palace of Eternal Joy (Yongle Gong) in Shanxi province, founded as a popular shrine in the tenth century, and now an important Complete Perfection monastery.

Lü, like many figures in Chinese mythology, plays a variety of religious roles, depending upon the historical and social circumstance, and was subject to a variety of interpretations before becoming a "Daoist patriarch" with the spread of Complete Perfection teachings. He is also the focus of Patriarch Lü (Lüzü) cults that exist today in southeast China. Through the use of mediums, Patriarch Lü makes himself available for consultation on a wide variety of matters, but especially to traditional Chinese herbalists who seek his secret recipes for health and longevity.

Of the seven disciples who formed the nucleus of the original Complete Perfection tradition, two figures stand out: Qiu Chuji (1148–1227) founded the Dragon Gate (Longmen) branch whose headquarters today is the White Cloud Monastery (Baiyun guan) in Beijing. Sun Bu'er (1119–1182), the only woman of the group, is widely revered as a role model for Daoist women.

Complete Perfection monastics, like Daoists before them, devoted much time to compiling hagiographies of those who attained the Dao. Such stories also circulated in popular fictional form, including, especially, stories of the seven original followers of Wang Zhe. The lives of Daoist immortals thus entered a wider Chinese cultural imagination and became the subjects of plays, poems, and paintings. Given the process of diffusion and syncretism that has taken place in Chinese religious history over the past millennium, it is not surprising that Daoists today venerate a wide variety of figures whose origins are shadowy to say the least. One example is the widely revered figure Zhang Sanfeng (c. thirteenth-fourteenth centuries?), who is credited with the development of Taiji quan (T'ai Chi). Zhang is said to have lived on Mount Wudang, the center for Daoist martial arts fictionalized in the popular film Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon (2000). Others include universal figures such as the Buddhist bodhisattva Guanyin, or figures who are specific to particular localities. In all cases their statues are venerated in temples and they receive the people's prayers for good fortune, health, and prosperity.

In addition to this class of widespread and widely known sages, there are also stories of recluses who live alone in mountains, feeding off wild herbs and fungi or even living on breath alone. Such wandering ascetics devote their time to the energy practices and "biospiritual" cultivation techniques at a more advanced level than is taught in monasteries, living in damp mountain grottoes where the stones themselves seem to breathe a liquid vitality through their pores. Such figures may seem to ordinary people to have adopted an extreme ascetic lifestyle, but their aim is not to be cut off from society, but rather to nourish themselves on the essence of life itself that floods around them.

Theoretical Analysis

In what sense are these Daoist figures "holy people"? Clearly the Jewish category of holiness (and its Christian and Muslim interpretations) does not apply straightforwardly to the Daoist case. The Chinese terms sheng (saint), xian (immortal), and zhen (perfected) indicate human beings who, through their own efforts, have attained a remarkable status and are venerated by the common people for their influence over the continuing evolution of the Dao. Such powers are in principle available to all human beings: Daoist saints are not supernatural, transcendent figures, though they may attain seemingly supernatural powers, for they never transcend the continuing evolution of the Dao. Instead, like worthy ancestors, they are venerated as examples of the possibility of human perfection. Although such people are set apart by the quantity and quality of their religious efforts, they are not completely removed from the human world, and the literature records that they continue to be manifest in human form long after they attain their immortal status.

The question of how to translate these Chinese terms is clearly vexing. "Immortals" are not really immortal, either because they have died already and have attained some transcendent state, or because they are simply mortal humans who have extended their life and their powers beyond normal. However, the concept that lies at the heart of the quest for “immortality” remains constant: Life is a continuous process of transformation, and when transformation ceases, so does life. “Immortals” are thus not those who have attained some final perfect state, but those who have learned to embody the continuous transformation of the universe within themselves. In this sense, the metaphor of transparency or porosity is key to understanding the Daoist saint. Such transfigured beings are those who are ever continuous with their environment, not being bound by the conventional distinctions between self and world, but rather embodying the macrocosm within the cosmic landscape of the body.

From the perspective of the human religious appropriation of these figures, the role of women practitioners and women saints deserves mention. Although the study of women Daoists is in its infancy, it is clear that Daoism was open to women in a far more positive way than seems to have been the case in Confucian or Buddhist society. Absent in Daoism are the tales of women as hated objects of male lust: The problem of (male) desire is tempered by Daoist notions of sexual harmony, and the denomination of the Dao itself is in largely female imagery. Though Daoist hagiographic collections do not contain as many stories of women as they do of men, they certainly do figure in such collections as the Daoxue zhuan (Biographies of students of the Dao) and attain equal status to that of male immortals.

In addition to serving as role models for those dedicated to the pursuit of self-cultivation, Daoist immortals are also communicators, facilitating the flow of energy and knowledge between the human and the celestial realms. In this regard, the figure of Lady Wei, the revealer of the corpus of Highest Clarity texts, is particularly important. Such figures and their tales of spirit journeys and vision quests clearly bear the influence of shamanism, though the extent to which shamanism influences Daoism is still being debated. No matter the origin of such religious phenomena, the fact remains that Daoists thought fit to record the lives and teachings of those whose self-identity extended beyond the confines of their ordinary physical bodies while not dissolving completely into mystical abstraction. Daoist holy people are not those who have been liberated from sin or sense-desire or from the prison of the flesh, but those who have learned to cultivate the creative vitality of the Dao itself within their human bodies. They remain highly influential in the continuing evolution of the Daoist spirit today.

Dard, Khawaja Mir

Muslim sufi

An Indian sufi poet from Delhi born in 1721, Khawaja Mir Dard was descended from a prestigious lineage. His father, Muhammad Nasir 'Andalib, was a sayyid (descendant of Muhammad) of Turkish ancestry and from the ancestry of Baha'uddin Naqshband (1317–1390), a prominent sufi. His mother was descended from 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166), another celebrated sufi. As an adult, Muhammad Nasir had a spiritual awakening, sought a master, Sa'dullah Gulshan, and became a dervish. He also took on the sobriquet of 'Andalib, “nightingale.” He became convinced of the truth of the Muhammadan path when he experienced a vision of the prophet's grandson, Hasan b. 'Ali (624/625–669). Dard was deeply influenced by his father and became his disciple; he later propagated his father's theological views when he succeeded him in 1758.

Dard's house became a focal center for mystical discussions and for poetry assemblies called musha'iras. By 1770, Dard had completed his magnum opus, the voluminous Ilm al-kitab (Knowledge of the book), which contains the sum of his religious views. In this text, theological and spiritual opinions are presented together with personal devotional and mystical experiences. The book has 111 chapters, each beginning with the words Ya Nasir (Oh Helper). Nasir here is God the Helper, but also a pun on his father's name, who had almost become an alter ego for Dard. His other major book with a spiritual message, composed between 1775 and his death in 1785, is titled Chahar Risala. It has four parts, each with 341 sections, in accordance with the numerical value of “Nasir” (his father’s name).

Indeed, Dard’s identification with his father was so strong that his attachment to him only increased after his father’s death. Dard venerated Nasir and believed that he was to resemble his father in every way, including the duration of life. Muhammad Nasir died when he was sixty-six lunar years old, and Dard was correct in his supposition that he would pass away at the same age. Both are buried in a cemetery near the Turkomam Gate, which is now converted into a park. The tombs, attached to a mosque, are still visited by local Muslims.

Dard led an austere existence. He fasted for prolonged periods of time and even persuaded his family to join him in these fasts. He rarely, if ever, left his ancestral compound in Delhi, which had been granted to him and his father by a daughter of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb. He lived during a time of great distress in Delhi. The citizens underwent much hardship as their civic and physical structures were destroyed by successive waves of invading armies. He believed that people could only get respite and inner peace if they sincerely followed the Muslim path.

Though he was serious in his piety and concerned about the elevation of his soul, Dard also loved poetry and music. His poetry is soulful and tender. He believed lucid, coherent speech to be the special gift of God. He enjoyed writing and wrote frequently and well. He believed that “a gnostic without a book is like a man without children, and a work that is absurdly unconnected is like a child of bad character.” For his love of music he was chastened by both the scholars of religion and by the other sufis. Nevertheless, his meetings, arranged approximately every two weeks, were very popular and were sometimes even attended by the Mughal emperor in Delhi, Shah ‘Alam II. Dard referred to his penchant for music and the mystical sama’, musical assembly, as an “affliction” for which he had no remedy. Several of his treatises deal with the necessity of devotional music. His verses are collected in his Divan (Assembly).

Darerca (Moninne/Monenna)

(d. 517/519)

Christian nun, founder

Darerca was a pioneer for the rights of women to pursue the religious life in early Christian Ireland (fifth and sixth centuries), and the accounts of her life reveal the wide range of possibilities she helped to create. She is said to have been baptized and consecrated by Patrick himself, whose first words of advice to her included an exhortation to enter into community with other virgins whom he had previously taught, so that they might mutually inspire and support one another with their friendship.

Patrick arranged for Darerca to train with a priest who lived nearby, and she quickly proved herself an outstanding student. A community sprang up around her that soon outgrew her parents’ home, but there were no monasteries for women in her homeland (northern County Louth and southern County Armagh) and she feared that living in the world would jeopardize their devotion. So, according to her hagiography, she and her disciples traveled throughout Ireland, studying alternative approaches to the religious life under various teachers, most prominently Brigid at Kildare and Bishop Ibar in the western isles and also in Wexford, before returning to her homeland. Here she founded her main monastic community, Killeevy, one of the most enduring Irish religious communities; it became an Augustinian convent, possibly in the twelfth century, and lasted until the dissolution of the monasteries in the sixteenth century.

Throughout Darerca’s travels, women of all backgrounds flocked to join her, including wives and mothers as well as widows and virgins. Men are also counted among her disciples, including bandits whom she converted to Christianity, training them so well that they went on to become bishops. Hailed as another Mary of Bethany as well as the daughter of John the Baptist and the prophet Elijah, she integrated solitude with community, both in her own spiritual life and in that of others, although her constant contemplation brought her community to the brink of starvation several times. She is particularly celebrated for her arduous manual labor; her community preserved her hoe and spade as relics. Her Lives emphasize her intellectual abilities and portray the women of her group as students, teachers, and scribes. Like her Irish sisters with extant medieval Lives (Brigid, Íte, and Samthann), she offered protection in war, released hostages, performed great miracles, acted as a foster mother, and was a powerful and capable abbess. She has been conflated with other holy women of Ireland, Scotland, and England, most famously Modwenna, though one of her Lives evinces little of this conflation and seems the more faithful to her original now-lost Life, which may have been written in the first quarter of the seventh century.

Dasuqi, Ibrahim al-

(c. 1235–1296/1297 C.E.)

Muslim sufi

Ibrahim al-Dasuqi is the second-greatest holy person of the Egyptian Delta after Ahmad al-Badawi (1199/1200–1276). For Egyptian Muslims, he is one of the four "poles" or "axes" who reign over Egypt; the other three are Ahmad al-Badawi, Ahmad b. 'Ali al-Rifa'i (1106–1182), and 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani (1088–1166). The "pole" is also called the gawth (aid). According to sufi tradition it is the axis around which the world turns. Ibrahim al-Dasuqi is called Abul'-Aynan, "the man with two eyes"—the eye of divine law (shari'a) and the eye of spiritual realization (haqiqqa).

Dasuqi was born at Marqus, a village in the province of Gharbiyya on the Egyptian Delta, in about 1235, but he passed his life in the neighboring village of Dasuq. Since his death in 1296 or 1297, villagers have believed that Dasuq has prospered thanks to the baraka (blessing) of its saint, who is enshrined in a large mosque in the center of the village. Ibrahim's father was a local holy man; his maternal grandfather was none other than Abu'l-Fath al-Wasiti, a close disciple of the great Iraqi holy man Ahmad b. 'Ali al-Rifa'i, who introduced the Rifa'iyya sufi order to Egypt.

Ibrahim had mystical experiences his whole life. He left several writings: Al-Jawahir (Necklace of gems) includes his instructions for novices; Al-Jawhara tells of his miracles; and Al-Haqa'iq (Divine realities) presents his intimate conversations with God. He was also the author of poems, a prayer (salat), and a litany (hizb). The litany has become very popular because it is reported to have magical properties: Reciting it is said to be effective in chasing away evil spirits (djinns) or in providing protection and healing. It is also used as an accompaniment for votive prayers.

The key points of Dasuqi's teaching are interior purity, the application of shari'a, and absolute obedience to the holy person because of his intimacy with God. Dasuqi himself affirmed that he had reached the highest degree in the hierarchy of saints, surpassing even 'Abdul al-Qadir Jilani, the greatest saint of the Muslim world (entombed in Baghdad), and his rival in Egypt, Ahmad al-Badawi. Dasuqi was also the founder of the Burhaniyya (or Burhamiyya) sufi order, widespread especially in the Delta. The adepts of this order are recognizable by their processions with their green banner. They can be seen especially at the anniversary festival of their saint, which takes place in November, two weeks after that of Ahmad al-Badawi.

Day, Dorothy

Roman Catholic activist

Dorothy Day was a Roman Catholic convert from Marxism, writer, founder of the Catholic Worker hospitality and nonviolent resistance movement, social critic, mother, grandmother, and nominee for official sainthood in the Catholic Church. In the autobiographical From Union Square to Rome (1938) and The Long Loneliness (1952), Day attributes discovery of the divine to several personal experiences: reading the Bible, love for her common-law husband, giving birth to her daughter, Tamar, prison solitude, and living among the poor.

Day found that her employment as a journalist left her discontent with the state of the world around her, and from her first arrest—for joining a women's suffrage protest in 1917—she actively sought religious solutions to the problems of American society. What became her life's work began in 1933, when she founded a newspaper, The Catholic Worker. In this work, she advocated the peaceful transformation of society and care of the poor. This hit a responsive chord in the Great Depression, and by 1936 the Catholic Workers were a national movement, with shelters and food kitchens open across much of the country. This movement became the platform for Day's social concerns, especially pacifism and the dignity of all human beings. She mobilized her organization against popular opinion by publicly avowing pacifism during World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War, a stand that led to the arrest and imprisonment of Day and many of her followers. She also helped mobilize Catholic support behind the Civil Rights Movement.

Solitude in prison, following actions of civil disobedience, also deepened Day's awareness of God, as did working with the poor in New York City. She wrote, "Always the glimpses of God came most when I was alone. . . . Yet how can I say that either? Better let it be said that I found Him through His poor, and in a moment of joy I turned to Him" (Day 1978 [1938], 10). When told that she would be declared a saint some day, Day reportedly said, "I don't want to be dismissed so easily," and "I'd rather they spend that money on the poor."

The canonization process was initiated for Day in 2000; however, there are numerous hurdles to clear before she can be declared a saint and the success of the case is not yet assured.

Dayal, Baba

(1783–1855 C.E.)

Sikh leader

Active in Rawalpindi, a town now located in northwestern Pakistan but at the time clearly within the greater Punjab, Baba Dayal, born in 1783, founded the Nirankari sect of the Sikhs. The name of the group derives from the words nir-akar or nir-ankar, meaning "without form," or "the Formless One," and indicates Baba Dayal's belief that God should only be worshipped as formless. Founded during the rule of Maharaja Ranjit Singh, who ruled the Punjab as a Sikh state from 1799 until his death in 1839, Baba Dayal's Nirankaris believed that brahminical influences had corrupted Guru Nanak's true intentions. For Baba Dayal, Guru Nanak's focus was solely on nam simran, or meditation on the Name, and that was his true religious message. Baba Dayal rejected all external aids to meditation, and even saw most Sikh external symbols as not only superfluous, but actually obstructing the path to liberation. At his death in 1855, his son Baba Darbara Singh took over the leadership of the community that continues to this day.

The core Sikh community rejected the Nirankari movement not for its interpretation of Guru Nanak's mission, nor for its emphasis on a formless God, but rather because Baba Dayal reestablished the line of gurus, starting with himself, and then revived the tradition of nomination by appointing his son as the next guru. Thus, it is the belief in a living guru, a doctrine that the core Sikh community believes ended when Guru Gobind Singh declared the Khalsa and the Guru Granth Sahib rather than a living person as the only guru, which creates so much tension between the Nirankaris and other Sikhs.

After the partition of India and Pakistan, there was a schism in the Nirankari community, and as they left Rawalpindi two centers were established, at Chandigarh and Delhi. At the center in Chandigarh, the line of gurus continues, the current one being Dr. Mann Singh.

Death

Around the world, the rules of death work differently for holy people than for the common run of mortals. They do not fear death, and a mark of holiness is that saints accept the coming of death with fortitude or joy. Martyrs die stoically, no matter what the religion or how great their suffering. Indeed, a holy person who does not face death calmly seems a contradiction in terms: When the Chan master Yen-t'ou Ch'uan-ho (828–887) was stabbed by robbers in 887 and he cried out (a miraculous cry that could be heard for ten leagues), he created a problem for Zen students because his death did not fit the notion of how a Zen master should perish. Beyond that basic common ground, however, there is a great deal of variety in the relationship that holy people of various religions have with death.

Christian saints are often given advance notice of their demise, such as Chad (620–672), whose death was foretold by singing angels. This is less common in other religions, but often holy people are depicted making special gestures to welcome death. Although most religions condemn the ideal pious passing of a Jaina, such as Hemacandra (1089–1172), by voluntary starvation, other cases of pious self-destruction, such as the Greek Herakles or the Toltec Quetzalcoatl, do occur. The Christian hagiographical tradition is full of cases of saints who had themselves laid on the ground on ashes as their end approached, or who had their tombs made and lay in them regularly to remind themselves of the transience of life. Ida of Herzfeld (c. 775–825) chose the latter, but the Muslim Sayyida Nafisa (762–824) did the same. The Zen master Shuho Myocho (1282–1338) had an even more pronounced view of proper behavior in the face of death: When the end was near, he forced himself into the lotus position, although his leg was so brittle from his austerities that it broke and blood soaked his robe; he then composed a farewell poem while seated in this perfect position.

In traditional Jewish belief, the gentlest death, likened to a hair being removed from milk, is reserved for the righteous. This theme appears in early Christian hagiography, as saints are subjected to more and more horrendous torment without suffering. Similarly hard to kill are holy figures such as the Bab (1819–1850), who was executed in 1850—twice—because the first time the firing squad shot, the Bab vanished, to be discovered nearby talking to a disciple; he was only successfully killed the next day. When a holy person was successfully killed, his or her final breath was often accompanied by miraculous signs, although this has become less common in recent centuries. Thus when the Korean Buddhist official Ich’adon (503–529) was martyred by decapitation in 529, his blood flowed white as milk, while the head flew through the air and settled on a mountain peak. Several Christian saints also bled milk, and some, the “cephalophore” saints, even carried their own severed heads to the places they had selected for burial.

Some holy people are believed to have lived an astonishingly long time, sometimes millennia. For example, the Jewish miracle worker Honi ha-Me’aggel (first century B.C.E.) is supposed to have slept seventy years before his death; the Buddhist master Padmasambhava wandered around India for many centuries before coming to Tibet (eighth and ninth centuries C.E.), and a surprising number of holy people have lived to the age of 120. Even more surprising is the large number of holy people in a wide array of religions who have never died at all. Several Hindu saints have left an earthly existence by merging with the divine, such as Basavanna in the twelfth century, who merged with Shiva in the confluence of rivers where he lived, or Andal in the ninth, who merged with a statue of the god she adored; the great Buddhist scholar Vairotsana of the eighth century dissolved into a rainbow of light, leaving no remains. Other Eastern holy people have simply wandered away and never been seen again, such as the Hindu saint Sanka (eighth and ninth centuries C.E.) and the Daoist sage Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.). The theme is not limited to the east or to ancient times, though; W. D. Fard, founder of the Nation of Islam (born in 1891), disappeared in 1934, and some believe he never died.

An anthropomorphic reliquary, created in 1374 by the artist Donadino da Brugnone to contain the skull of St. Donatus. (Elio Ciol/Corbis)

Some holy people have been hidden away for a special purpose, especially to herald a coming messiah. The Japanese Buddhist Kukai (774–835), despite a legend that he chose to be burned alive while in a meditational trance in 835, is popularly believed to have never died and to be meditating still, from which state he will arise at the coming of the future buddha Maitreya. Similarly, Hebrew scriptures tell that Elijah was taken living to heaven in a whirlwind accompanied by a fiery chariot (2 Kings 2:11) and that he will return to usher in the messianic age. And most important to date in shaping world history, the twelfth Shi’a imam is believed to have gone into hiding, occultation, to save his life, and will return to bring an era of justice.

Another important symbol of liberation from the power of death is the number of holy people who have died, only to be resurrected with a special message for their followers, a miracle by no means limited to Jesus of Nazareth (although in Muslim belief, Jesus never died, so could not be resurrected). It should be noted that this is not an important theme in Buddhism, Jainism, or Hinduism, where the ultimate goal of holiness is to break the cycle of rebirths, although the Hindu mystic Ramana Maharshi (1879–1950) is said to have experienced death at the age of fourteen as a step in his personal enlightenment. Much more commonly, a taste of death gives a person prophetic powers, a phenomenon especially significant in the recent history of African and Amerindian religions. The Shawnee prophet Tenskawatawa (1775–1836) “came back” from a death experience with a series of revelations that he preached to his people. Similarly, the Amerindian John Slocum (d. c. 1897), the founder of the Indian Shaker movement in Washington State, fell ill, apparently died, and awakened just before his funeral reporting that he had indeed died but had been sent back to make amends for his sins. In Africa, the prophetesses Alice Lenshina (1919–1978) and Marie Awa both began preaching in the 1950s after apparently rising from the dead. Fear of followers' claims that a resurrection has taken place is attested as early as the synoptic gospels, when guards were placed at Jesus' tomb. For a truly devoted follower, though, even the clearest evidence of their leader's death can be ignored, as in the case of the prophet Mani (216–274/277); the Persian king had the prophet's corpse flayed, the skin stuffed with straw, and set it on a pole by the city gate—to show to everyone that Mani had really died. But his followers refused to believe it, and their rallying cry became “Mani Lives!”

Other saints have been taken up to heaven, living or dead. This is a common theme in Daoism, where a mark of a great holy person is to ascend living to heaven in daylight; lesser figures have to make do with mysterious disappearances. Sunni Muslims believe that the prophet Jesus was rescued from the cross and entered heaven still living. Similarly, the Greek Apollonius of Tyana (d. c. 120 C.E.) ascended bodily into heaven. The legendary Diola prophet Atta-Essou took matters into his own hands by making himself wings and flying to heaven. The most famous case of a holy body taken up to heaven is the doctrine accepted by several branches of Christianity that the Virgin Mary was bodily taken up, which is the subject of the Roman Catholic papacy's only statement that claims infallibility. Other bodies have vanished under mysterious circumstances. For example, the Indian poet-saint Kabir's (c. 1450–1518) body became a subject of argument among his followers after his death. But when they pulled off the cloth covering the body, nothing was there but flowers—half of which were cremated, half buried. A legend tells that after Chan patriarch Bodhidharma had died (c. 530?), a monk met him on the road, but he was wearing only one sandal. When the monk returned home and told the story, his fellows opened the patriarch's grave and found nothing in it but a single sandal. Legend also reports that, although Zimbabwean prophetess Mai Chaza died in 1960, by the time the coffin was put in the grave her body had vanished.

When a holy person dies and the body remains, it still does not behave like the remains of ordinary mortals. This is an especially important identifier of holy Christians, although there are cases in other religions, such as the Buddhist reformer Taixu (1890–1947) of China, whose heart remained intact after cremation. In Christianity, a very common theme is that the bodies of holy people give off a sweet scent, “the odor of sanctity,” instead of the smell of corruption. And the bodies themselves are very often incorrupt, even after centuries (although in modern Roman Catholicism an incorrupt body is no longer taken as proof of sanctity). From the early persecutions to the present, there have been tales of the bodies of Christian martyrs left for the vultures (such as Cholomann [d. 1013] and the martyrs of Nagasaki [d. 1597] only to be left untouched and unrotted for months.

A final important element of popular belief in Islam and Christianity, which believe in the bodily resurrection of the dead, is that the saints will be resurrected first at the end of time. Therefore, from an early age cemeteries developed around holy tombs in both religions, so that lesser mortals could rise on the “coattails” of the saints.

Deer Dancers

Amerindian intermediaries

The people of the Yaqui (or Yoeme) culture of northwestern Mexico and Arizona ritually reunite themselves with the “natural world,” or “wilderness world” (huya ania), through the figure of the Deer Dancer and his assistants, the pahkolam (sometimes pascolas), or “old men,” at Easter. The huya ania is performed to reaffirm the Yaqui principles and moral codes. It is an exhausting ceremony involving long periods of arduous dancing, poetry recitation, and music. Those who participate do so as an offering to God for favors granted, such as recovery from serious illness. Participation is also a way to ensure personal salvation.

Prior to the influence of Christianity, the huya ania was manipulated with this visit to the supernatural world, where through imitative magic (acting out of the deer hunt) the Yaqui could commune with the supernatural to ensure a successful hunt. The altered states induced by sleep deprivation and temperature extremes were thought to facilitate access to the supernatural—be it in the natural world, the enchanted world (yo ania), the flower world (sea ania), or one of the many other worlds that the Yaqui could visit to receive power from the supernatural. In the modern world, the Deer Dancer successfully crosses through three cultures—the Native American, the American, and the Mexican—to participate in many traditional religious dance celebrations, or matachines.

The Deer Dancer character is found in many Native American groups. Members of the Central Uto-Azteca culture, including the Yaqui, share some common features in their deer-dance traditions. These include night-long dancing, singing, and playing of music on percussion instruments, a ritual deer hunt, and east-facing altars. The events are male dominated. The Deer Dancer is a common figure in numerous ritual contexts but must unite with the pahkolam if the huya ania is sought for the ceremony. This is done during Easter Holy Week.

The Yaqui Deer Dancer wears a deer headdress, a deer-hoof rattle belt, and cocoon rattles on his ankles. He carries gourds to shake and is accompanied by three singers. The pahkolam are his assistants, who ultimately convince the deer to give himself over to the humans so they might eat. The pahkolam have masks decorated with long, coarse hairs for eyebrows and beards. They tend to be generalized helpers during the ceremony, passing out drinks, telling stories, and being generally inappropriate to make everyone laugh. The pahkolam have three musicians that accompany them. One of the instruments played is a water drum, representing the water the deer drinks, and at the end of the ceremony it becomes sanctified. Another is a rasp made from deer antlers. Beating the drum represents the deer heartbeat, and the rasp reproduces the sound of the deer breathing. Deer songs are sung that guide the viewer through the story. Since the ceremony became conflated with Holy Week, these songs have also been used to defeat the Pharisees so that Christ can rise on Easter morning.

The Deer Dancer is first observed on Palm Sunday. As the Easter Passion is acted out, the Deer Dancer becomes an intricate part of the story. Holy Saturday and Easter morning are when he is most needed. On Holy Saturday, beginning at noon, he and the pahkolam are to dance all night until the next morning, about eighteen hours later. Many of the Deer Dancer's steps are imitations of deer movements, but such dances can get quite complex, with more than 340 steps per minute occurring at various times throughout the night.

Deganawida

(c. 1550–c. 1600 C.E.)

Huron prophet, statesman

Deganawida was a Huron prophet, statesman, lawgiver, and cultural hero of the Iroquois people in the sixteenth century.

He was the leader who, with Hiawatha, founded the League of the Iroquois that included the Cayuga, Mohawk, Oneida, Onondaga, and Seneca. The story of Deganawida's life is based mostly on legend, but accounts of the league's formation credit Deganawida for his efforts.

The period before Deganawida's birth was one of constant warfare between the Iroquois tribes. According to legend, the Creator sent Deganawida to resolve these conflicts and to deliver a message of peace and unity. He is believed to have been born to Huron parents around the 1550s in Ontario, Canada. Before his birth, his mother had a vision that her son would have miraculous powers, undertake a divine mission, and be indirectly responsible for the destruction of the Huron people. When Deganawida reached adulthood, he traveled east to bring his message of peace to the Iroquois. He met Hiawatha, a Mohawk, who joined him in his efforts to create an alliance of friendship among the Iroquois. Deganawida relied on Hiawatha to be his spokesperson owing to his own speech impediment. His message to the Iroquois was that all men are brothers and they should stop their infighting. Deganawida and Hiawatha convinced the five tribes to make peace and join in an alliance instead of trying to destroy each other. The last holdout was the powerful Onondaga chief Atotarho, who had been strongly opposed to the alliance. Deganawida offered him the role of confederacy spokesperson and established the central fire of the league at Onondaga, and Atotarho accepted and joined the alliance. After convincing Atotarho of his message, Deganawida founded the Iroquois League.

The League of the Iroquois, or the Iroquois Five Nation Confederacy, as it was also called, sought to bring peace, to build strength, and to protect the five nations from external attack and internal divisions. A Grand Council of all the chiefs of the five tribes gathered at Onondaga, where they established the laws and customs of the league. Over time, the council became involved in diplomacy, including war and peace, established associations with other tribes, and made treaties with European settlers. Deganawida is credited with development of the league's political system, including its principles, laws, and regulations. Although the focus of the league has changed over time, its organization and rituals as set forth by Deganawida still exist in Canada and the United States.

Delany, Martin

Christian theologian, social activist

Martin Delany was born the son of free blacks in Charles Town, West Virginia, in 1812. He received a good education in medicine and in 1851 finished his training at the Harvard Medical School. In addition to his medical career, Delany worked with Frederick Douglass, helping him publish the North Star newsletter. Delany's experiences with Douglass helped shape his thoughts about slavery and the providence of God in permitting African Americans to suffer under its abuses. Delany conceived God as the liberator of the oppressed and within that construction developed a theology of racial destiny that continues to impact the religious development of black America.

Delany had a deep love for black people and often expressed praise for “unmixed” blackness. This should not be surprising: Delany's father claimed descent from a Golah chieftain and his mother from a Mandingo prince. Delany saw black people as a religious people given to artistry and kindness. But he was also critical of the black masses for being too passive. In fact, Delany developed the often-cited principle, “God helps those who help themselves.” He sought through his teaching to encourage the slaves to begin a process that would result in their own freedom, rather than waiting for God to providentially deliver them.

In theological terms, Delany also sought to instruct African Americans to properly understand how God works. Delany reasoned that God had constructed the universe to function according to three basic laws—moral law, spiritual law, and physical law. Delany observed that justice could be accessed only through the application of the moral law. A spiritual end could be obtained only through the application of prayer, and a physical end obtained only through the application of muscle and might. For Delany, it was only by the proper exercise of those laws that one could hope to accomplish a desired end.

As one of the leading voices among elitist black leadership of his day, Delany encouraged blacks to leave the United States, return to their native continent, roll up their shirt-sleeves, and help to redeem “mother” Africa. Working with Henry Highland Garnet to establish the African Civilization Society, in 1858 Delany traveled to Africa and met with various African dignitaries who were willing to entertain the notion of providing land for African Americans who wished to return to Africa as missionaries and emigrants.

Though Martin Delany died in January 1885, leaving no money, papers, or fashionable ideas, he has inspired generations of blacks as the symbol of elevation and black Christian nationalism.

Delphine of Provence (Puimichel, Glandenes, Sabran)

(1284–1360 C.E.)

Christian laywoman, recluse

Delphine of Provence was a Third Order Franciscan renowned for her poverty and chastity. Born in Provence, France, in 1284, she was raised by nuns after the death of her parents in 1291. At sixteen, she married Elzear (1286–1323), count of Sabran, who later agreed to live with her in celibacy.

In 1310, Elzear went to Naples, where he fought on behalf of King Charles II of Anjou. Delphine joined him seven years later and became a lady-in-waiting and confidante of Queen Sanchia. From 1326 to 1343, Delphine stayed at the court of Naples, where she was exposed to the influence of some Franciscans who were in conflict with Pope John XXII (the court of Naples after 1323 was a place of refuge for Spiritual Franciscans and beguines from Provence). After the death of Elzear she sold her vast possessions and became a Poor Clare with Queen Sanchia in Naples. Returning to Provence, Delphine lived as a recluse at Cambrieres and then at Apt (Vaucluse), where she died in 1360. She was buried next to her husband. Her canonization process was started in 1363, but she never attained sainthood, perhaps because of her alleged relationship with the Spiritual Franciscans. Elzear, however, was canonized in 1369.

People in Naples and Apt were amazed to see this high-born, illustrious noblewoman beg in the streets. The canonization proceedings and the Life composed shortly thereafter testify to her service to the poor, her commitment to chastity (living in virginal marriage), and her voluntary poverty. These sources reveal a great deal about the political circumstances in Provence, Avignon, and Naples, not to mention the church's struggles with the radical Franciscans. The careers of Delphine and Elzear reflect something of the then-current ideals of chaste marriage and absolute poverty. Delphine's biography was written, in part, to promote some Franciscan views of Christlike poverty.

Demetrius

(d. c. 300 C.E.)

Christian saint

Demetrius (Demetrios) is one of the most powerful and renowned of Byzantine soldier-saints. His cult appears to have originated in Thessalonika, where a large church was established in his honor in the middle of the fifth century. Early collections of miracle stories associated with the saint date from the seventh century, and texts from the ninth century and later describe his life and martyrdom in the late third or early fourth century.

A Roman soldier who refused to kill Christians, he was imprisoned in the Baths at Thessalonika by order of the emperor Maximian, who later had him stabbed to death with lances after his favorite gladiator, Lyaeus, was defeated by Demetrius's friend Nestor. Variations to the legend include the subsequent decapitation of Nestor as well as Demetrius's destruction of the poisonous scorpion that attacked him in prison. Further legends attribute the protection of the city of Thessalonika during the seventh-century invasions of the Slavs and Bulgars to the miraculous intervention of St. Demetrius. Byzantine imperial and aristocratic devotion throughout the medieval period expanded the cult of Demetrius beyond the Balkan regions—where eventually more than 200 churches were dedicated to the saint. He was also adopted as a patron of the army in Russia.

The shrine of Demetrius at Thessalonika was a significant pilgrimage site throughout the Middle Ages. It contained a hexagonal, domed silver ciborium (altar canopy) in the central area of the church that included a representation of the recumbent saint on a silver bier. This structure was destroyed during the Arab occupation of the city in the early tenth century and was eventually replaced by one of marble (also no longer extant). The saint's powers to effect healings and ward off demons were said to be especially facilitated by the sweet-smelling oil (or myron) that was collected in basins in the lower area of the church. (The relics of several other Eastern and Western saints are also credited with exuding miraculous myron; these saints are known as myroblytoi.) Pilgrims collected the myron in little vials (or ampullae) and small containers that were worn like necklaces or amulets. This practice is mentioned in texts from the thirteenth century. A fifteenth-century text describes how even the walls and columns of the church dripped with myron on the saint's feast day.

In spite of much remodeling and a disastrous fire in 1917, important early mosaics survive in the church at Thessalonika. St. Demetrius is frequently depicted in Byzantine and Russian icons, sometimes on horseback, wearing armor and carrying a shield, sword, or lance. His feast day is October 8 in the Roman Catholic Church and October 26 in Greek Orthodoxy.

Demetrius of Rostov (Dimitrius)

Russian Orthodox monk, bishop, writer

Demetrius was born in the Ukraine region of the Russian Empire in 1651 and educated first in Kiev. In 1668, he took the habit at the Kirillov Monastery on the White Lake, and in 1669 he was sent to Chernigov to begin his work as a sermonizer at the Dormition Cathedral. His reputation for sermons spread and he traveled widely throughout Russia and Ukraine. Though from the Ukraine region, Demetrius sided with Moscow in political and religious disputes.

In 1681, Demetrius became superior of the Maksanov Monastery, and in 1682 of the Baturin Monastery. While at the Kievan Cave Monastery in 1684, he began work on a comprehensive menology of Orthodox saints' Lives, for which he is best known, and which became an important guide for Orthodox monastic and lay readings in the modern period. Demetrius's work was interrupted while he provided leadership as the superior of several monasteries. He eventually was appointed archimandrite of the Elets Monastery in Chernigov and was later consecrated as metropolitan of Rostov in 1700, in which position he continued his literary activity. As metropolitan, Demetrius became an advocate of education for priests and their sons.

In 1752, four decades after his death, his remains were discovered uncorrupted, and he was recognized as a saint by the Orthodox Church after an investigation carried out in 1757. He is known for other works, such as his "Cell Chronicle," a diary, an "Inquiry" into the Old Believer faith (considered schismatic by the official church), and various texts on Orthodox Church history. Demetrius remains best known for his work on the menology, which became a standard for Orthodox saints' Lives, largely replacing the previous Great Menology of Metropolitan Makarii of Moscow. Demetrius is remembered on September 21 and October 28.

Demons and Monsters

An important part of the definition of holiness is the ability to fight evil, whether perceived as concrete or abstract. Almost all religions include rituals for exorcism—driving out demons—although different religions have emphasized this at different times. In many African and Amerindian religions, and in the first millennium of Christianity, this ability to drive away evil has been highly prized in holy people and is taken as a sign of their special closeness to God. Especially noteworthy in this regard is Jesus of Nazareth, to whose career the exorcism of demons was central.

The faithful of most religions believe that demons get in the way of proper spiritual practice and must be confronted. This is an important element of the foundation myth of both Buddhism and Christianity. Gautama (c. fifth century B.C.E.), in his quest for enlightenment, was bitterly tempted by his archenemy Mara, who tried to distract the soon-to-be Buddha while he was sitting under the bodhi tree. (Mara saw Gautama as a threat to his own dominion over the afterworld.) When temptation did not work, Mara sent an army to try to destroy Gautama, then natural forces, and finally sent his own daughters to attempt seduction of the holy man. The purpose here was to distract Gautama rather than causing him to “sin.” A similar need to fight distracting evil spirits appears in Hindu literature, where demons are portrayed threatening the early sages in their forest retreats.

Religions with a strong moral element often depict their holy people valiantly resisting the blandishments of demons who want to lead them away from their godly resolve. Christian legend tells of Jesus resisting and finally defeating Satan, first in the forty days Jesus spent in the desert, being tempted with dreams of power, pride, and simple satisfaction of his needs, and after his death in the “harrowing of hell,” when Jesus descended to hell, defeated and bound Satan, and freed the souls of the righteous dead from his control. In imitation of Christ, and to emphasize the ethical imperatives of Christianity, the first eight centuries of Christian hagiographers repeatedly emphasized their heroes' and heroines' abilities to resist demonic temptation and even physical attack.

Especially in ancient legends and in the folkloric elements of more recent accounts, the holy person (usually a man) comes into greater prominence as a fighter of actual, concrete evil forces that trouble a region—monsters. This is an important theme in early Hinduism, where Rama's defeat of the evil demon Ravana is central to the Ramayana (third century). Battles against monsters are also prominent in Irish Christian hagiography. Early Buddhism similarly tells stories about demonic forces, such as a battle of one of the Buddha's disciples against a snake king whose hood had covered the world in darkness, or the eighth-century Buddhist Padmasambhava, who was invited to Tibet to pacify the demons who were preventing the spread of Buddhism.

Over time more learned religious practitioners in most cultures have come to reject tales of struggles with demons and monsters as objective reality. Not so with popular belief, which has continued all over the world to credit holy heroes with the ability to fight demons and monsters. For example, the Hindu guru Gorakhnath (c. 1200) battled demons, according to popular stories. Similarly, in the more popular cult of Antony of Padua that developed in India, Antony (1195–1231) became especially known for his abilities over demons and spirits. Within Europe, later folklore credited the Icelandic bishop Guthmundr Arason (1161–1237) with the ability to defeat trolls and other monsters. Indeed, in Christianity new tales of the potency of saints against demonic forces spread even as intellectual culture rejected them, as with the cult of St. George (third century), who only came to be credited with slaying a dragon in the twelfth century.

Denis of Paris (Denys, Dionysius)

(d. 251 C.E.)

Christian bishop, missionary

Denis, an early bishop of Paris, became a widely revered saint by dint of his patronage of the Abbey of St.-Denis, the important Benedictine monastery north of Paris, and because of the devotion of the kings of France to him. First mentioned by Gregory of Tours in the sixth century (History of the Franks, 1.30), Denis was probably one of the early evangelizing bishops who brought Christianity to Gaul in the third century and perhaps the first bishop of Paris. Gregory relates his martyrdom by decapitation during the persecution of Decius or Gratus in 251.

The best-known features of his legend, however, date to the late fifth-century Passio sanctorum martyrum Dionysii episcopi, Rustici et Eleutherii (Passion of the holy martyrs Bishop Denis, Rusticus, and Eleutherius), which pushed Denis's mission back to the first century as part of the evangelizing program of Pope Clement I, thus making it apostolic. This Passio also gave Denis two companions, Rusticus and Eleutherius, and told the tale of how, after his decapitation, Denis carried his own head down from Montmartre to the site of the Benedictine abbey, St.-Denis, which was subsequently erected on his burial site. Consequently, in art he is usually depicted as a bishop carrying his own severed head.

In the ninth century, Abbot Hilduin of St.-Denis intentionally conflated the patron of his monastery with two other "Denis" figures of Christian history. The first, Dionysius the Aeropagite, mentioned in Acts 17:34 as one of St. Paul's early followers, gave Hilduin's patron saint scriptural origin. The second, the so-called Pseudo-Dionysius, was the fifth- or early sixth-century author of the influential treatise of Neoplatonic theology, The Celestial Hierarchies. In the twelfth century, Abelard raised doubts about the conflation of these three figures, although the monks continued to claim their unity.

The monastery was often favored by royalty, starting with the Merovingian king Dagobert (r. 622–638), and ultimately became the burial site for the kings of France. Starting in the twelfth century, the monks of St.-Denis, and Abbot Suger (1081–1155) in particular, fostered the notion that Denis was the patron and protector of the French monarchy, and ultimately of the entire kingdom. New versions of the legend, the Vita et Actus beati Dionysii (Life and acts of the blessed Denis), written in 1223, and the Vita et passio (Life and passion), written in 1317 by Yves of St.-Denis, further underscored the close relationship between the saint and the monarchy and marked the increasing importance of Denis's cult in the later Middle Ages. Denis consequently emerged as the "national saint of France" (Spiegel 1975, 52). His feast day is October 9.

Desert Saints

(3rd–7th cent. C.E.)

Christian hermits, monks

The Christian desert saint phenomenon began in the third century and gathered momentum in the fourth in the desert regions of Syria, Judea, and Egypt and was characterized by the influx of thousands, and perhaps tens of thousands, of men (and, in smaller numbers, women) seeking a more spiritually pure life. They practiced a form of asceticism that, at that time, was balanced by a creative regimen of prayer and good works. Only later did the disciplined exercises of asceticism come to have the negative, self-denying connotations common today.

Early on, these individuals were called "monks," implying a kind of separation from secular society, though not a divorce from it. The first surviving reference to a monk, in fact, describes him, accompanied by a deacon, as happening on an assault and rendering aid.

A few monks did remove themselves to the far desert (hence they were called "hermits"—from the Greek word for desert, eremia, or "anchorites"—from the word to withdraw); but for the most part even they lived in communities of several hundred, because of the requirements of a liturgy in common and the pragmatic need for water. In general, the desert saints lived close to, and frequently interacted with, rural society throughout the Middle East. This was determined in part by geography: For example, the Nile Valley cuts a narrow (40 km wide) swath through the desert, so monasteries could be considered isolated and still remain within a day's journey of secular society. The custom of monks volunteering to participate in the harvest, moreover, in order to feed the poor and themselves, meant further interaction; and there is evidence, early on, of the pious donating fertile land to monasteries.

Nevertheless, the most common explanation for this phenomenon is that monks desired to escape a corrupt and sinful Roman culture; further elaborations mention the need for some new form of martyrdom, once the persecutions ceased. In other words, some argue that the church, denied the possibility of more martyrs, created a new sort of martyrdom, that of denial in the harsh conditions of the desert; there is even the theory that men fled to the monasteries to avoid military conscription. Although there is naturally some evidence for all of these approaches, a careful examination of the lives of the desert saints shows an appreciation for the serenity and natural holiness found in the wilderness. Antony, when asked by visiting Greek philosophers where his library was, threw open his window to show the out-of-doors. There are dozens of legends of the close and friendly relationship between saints and the wild beasts of the desert—notably lions. There is, in general, a positive awareness of the environment in this culture that cannot be otherwise identified in the entire Roman Empire.

There was the matter, too, of pilgrims. It might not be an exaggeration to say that the desert saints encouraged visitors. This is most true of monks in the eastern parts of Syria, who were famous for the practice of “austerities”—the subjecting of flesh to extreme conditions. Notable is Simeon the Stylite (c. 390–459) and his successors starting with Daniel (c. 409–493), who over the course of six centuries gathered crowds by placing themselves atop pillars for years at a time. The showy theatricality of such practice is not to the modern taste, but it did have a profound influence on popular morals. And there were practical benefits; Procopius reported in the sixth century that a village suffering under a burden of taxation sent a local hermit to intercede to the emperor on their behalf.

Paradoxically, the literature concerning the desert saints, though in general balanced and rational in regard to excesses such as fasting, contained enough examples of extraordinary acts to convey a sense of perfection about them. This literature, presented in the form of short Lives, edifying stories, or gnomic wisdom, flourished from late antiquity into early modern times. There is direct evidence that early Celtic hermits and monks based their spirituality on that of the desert fathers. Later in the Middle Ages, religious reformers such as Romuald of Ravenna (c. 951–1027), founder of the Camaldolese Order, and Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) sought to reinvigorate monasticism through the example of the desert saints; both Francis of Assisi (c. 1180–1226) and Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) almost certainly ruined their health in emulating extreme ascetic practice. In a further paradox, the Lives of the Fathers was one of the most popular books of the early period of printing, apparently in demand by the newly literate middle class. Unfortunately, the reputation of the desert saints suffered at the hands of the eighteenth-century historian Edward Gibbon, who popularized the theory that the spiritual experiences of the fathers can be attributed to near-insanity resulting from their lifestyle.

Devadatta

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Buddhist monk

Devadatta, cousin of the Shakyamuni Buddha in around the fifth century B.C.E., is portrayed in Buddhist texts as having two contradictory sides to his personality: saintly and devilish. After having personally been ordained by the Buddha, he obtained supernatural power (ridhhi) within one year. Thereafter, he received recognition as an impeccable saint whose achievements were not only acknowledged by Shariputra and Ananda but also by the Buddha, who included his name in the list of saints. In the Saddharmapundrika Sutra, the Buddha acknowledges Devadatta as his teacher in a previous life, under whom he was able to perfect the qualities by which he eventually became a buddha.

According to the Theravada tradition, however, after initially engaging in good behavior Devadatta began to entertain ambitions to assume leadership of the samgha (order of monks). When he failed, he became very hostile toward the Buddha. He even unsuccessfully tried to kill him, especially with the help of Ajatashatru. Thereafter, he requested from the Buddha the imposition of five austerities on the samgha: that monks should dwell in the forest, not accept invitations for meals, not accept robes from the laity, not dwell under a roof, and abstain from meat. When the Buddha refused and left the decision on these matters open to monks, Devadatta accused him of being prone to luxury and departed with 500 supporting monks. Later, Shariputra and Maudgalyayana went to Devadatta's camp and appeared to sympathize with him, but in his absence they successfully convinced the dissident monks to return to the Buddha. When Devadatta found out what had happened, he died, having declared that he still was the Buddha's disciple.

The Buddha subsequently remarked that Devadatta would go to Niraya Hell for an aeon and thereafter would be born as a pratyekabuddha (solitary buddha) by the name of Atthissara. Scholars have suggested two issues underlying the conflicts between the Buddha and Devadatta: the issue of succession to leadership of the samgha, and the issue of forest-austerities versus settled monasticism.

Devotion

The Turkish sufi Yunus Emre (c. 1241–1320/1321) argued that the core of all spirituality is ardent and humble love for God, with an emphasis on deep and reciprocal love between God and the devotee. Devotion in the sense of being marked by religious fervor and set aside for the special function of serving a god or gods is an underlying precondition of holiness for most world religions, the only real exception being some Daoist and Confucian sects, which do not fit neatly into deity-centered descriptions. But although devotion can be assumed, it is only occasionally that intense personal attachment to a god has been central to the definition of a holy person, characterized often in terms of a divine "madness" that is demonstrated with intense emotion and even ecstatic states. It is especially marked as an aspect of mystical movements, in "baroque" Christianity of the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, and above all in much of the later history of Hinduism. In most cases, such focus on devotion as a key element of personal holiness has at least begun with a reaction against excessive formalism or intellectualism in a religion. This is especially marked in Jewish devotional offshoots, such as the Hasidic movement launched by the Ba'al Shem Tov (1698/1700–1760).

Absolute devotion to God is a very important thread in Hinduism, whether that god is identified as Krishna, Shiva, or another of the pantheon. The greatest models of loving service are the Gopis, legendary female cowherders who were devotees of Krishna. In legend, these women abandon everything, even their physical bodies, to run off and be with Krishna in an ecstatic and joyful dance with God. Several great Hindu movements have produced devotional saints on this model. The alvars, twelve great poet-saints of southern India active from the sixth to the ninth centuries, are models of devotion. They wandered, singing the praises of Vishnu and his consort Lakshmi. Their title literally means "one who is immersed," in the sense of being completely intoxicated with God. The bhakti (devotional) movement was similarly devotional, producing holy people celebrated for their love of God, rather than for wisdom or virtue. Many of these saints, for example, Hit Hari-vansh (c. 1502–c. 1552), are described as so absorbed in their devotion that they failed to observe the rules of conventional religion—clearly less important than focus on loving union with God. Krishna Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533), the great god-saint, exemplifies the Hindu bhakti movement especially well: Accounts tell of his emotional outpourings, visible devotion, ecstasies, and spontaneous outbursts of song, suggesting that he was so filled with the divine that it erupted from him.

These holy people emphasized the infinite love of the god for his or her devotees, repaying the followers for their loyalty. Thus, legend tells that Ramadas of Bhadrachalam (1620–1680), a devotee of Rama, was a revenue collector who got in trouble because he gave away his collections to repair Rama's shrine. He was imprisoned for several years, and many of the songs he wrote while imprisoned tell of the consolation he received from Rama during this period. Legend makes divine care even more explicit—Rama and Lakshmana are supposed to have come in person to the ruler from whom Ramadas had stolen, paid over the missing money, and then vanished. When the ruler ran to free Ramadas, he is said to have been jealous because it was the ruler, not himself, who saw the incarnate gods. Other Hindu devotional saints were granted visions of their gods, and the legend of one, Andal (ninth century), even reports that she eventually merged with an image of Vishnu—or in an alternative version, he came and married her. This Hindu devotional emphasis spread to Jainism, such as the Jaina Banarsidas (1586–1643), who turned his followers from ritualism toward mystical devotionalism, even writing some very erotic poetry of union with God that was reminiscent of some Hindu devotional poetry.

Devotionalism and mysticism walk hand in hand, since the focus of mysticism is to seek union with the divine. Thus, while Islam has always acknowledged special devotion to God as a characteristic of holy people (for example, in legend, the Virgin Mary's devotion to God was so pure that God provided her dates and a fresh stream to help her through her labor pains), devotion really became dominant in the mystical sufi movement. The emphasis on emotional ecstasy among some sufis has caused serious concern to mainstream Muslims. A notorious case is the early sufi Abu Yazid Bistami, active in the ninth century. He was famous for his ecstatic utterances while in a state of mystical union with God and became known for his "intoxicated" approach to spirituality. Most famous was his cry, "Glory to me," taken by some to mean that he was claiming divinity; more likely, he was claiming a complete union between himself and the divine. Most sufis, though, were not so controversial, and the large body of devotional poetry they created, to both God and Muhammad, spread widely.

Although early Christianity had saints who experienced visions, or who could be so lost in contemplation of God that they became unaware of their surroundings—Kevin of Glendalough (d. c. 618), for example, didn't notice a bird building a nest in his hands—the great era of Christian devotionism can be said to begin with the spread of mysticism in the second half of the Middle Ages. A wide body of literature describes the yearning of these mystical saints to attain union with God, including mystical marriages with God (for example, Catherine of Siena in the fourteenth century), the favor of holding the infant Jesus (Íte in the sixth century), and experiences of crawling into the wound in Christ's side, to name just a few of the emotional outpourings of the mystics.

Identification with God, however, was nowhere so pronounced as in the several hundred cases in which Christian holy people have claimed (or their followers have claimed for them) to have received the stigmata, the impression of Christ's wounds on their own bodies. Perhaps the earliest of these stigmatists was Marie d'Oignies (c. 1177–1213), although her case has been overshadowed by the fame of Francis of Assisi's (c. 1180–1226) stigmata. The phenomenon continues to the present, most recently acknowledged in the case of Padre Pio (1887–1968), canonized in 2002. The spirituality of the later Middle Ages in Christian Europe is marked by saints whose emotional devotion to God bears striking similarities to the bhakti movement among the Hindus. Many of these saints were famous for their penances, for their devotion to the suffering Christ (including, especially, the development of a cult of the Sacred Heart of Jesus), and for the paranormal experiences they had while in rapture. There were seventy attested cases, for example, of the “flying saint,” Joseph of Copertino (1603–1663), floating in the air while in ecstasy. This devotional emphasis continued until the Enlightenment. It is important to note that, while much devotionism began as “elite” religion, accessible to holy people, the very nature of their devotion caused Christian and Hindu saints to try to spread their teachings to as wide an audience as possible. This is also true in Islam, where sufi movements such as that of Ahmad Bamba of Senegal (1850–1927) reached a wide popular audience.

Although devotionism is often seen as an alternative to intellectual or ritual emphases in religion, examples of the two coexisting can be found in several religions. Thus, for example, the Byzantine theologian Simeon the New Theologian (949–1022) was both learned and ecstatic, although in his case this brought him to grief with the authorities. More successful were the Hindu theologians Ramanuja (1017–1137) and Jiva Gosvamin (fl. 1555–1592), who combined philosophy with devotionism, the latter especially articulating the bhakti movement. Similarly, sufi scholars made their devotion acceptable to the learned communities of their time.

Dharmakirti (Tibetan: Chos-kyi-grags-pa)

(c. 600–c. 680 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar

Born to a brahmin family in the Cola country of southern India in about 600, Dharmakirti was a successor of Dignaga (c. 480–c. 540). Part of the Yogacara school of Indian Buddhism, he became a logician of unsurpassed genius. As a young man he studied brahminic scriptures for eighteen years, but later he converted to Buddhism as a lay disciple. In Kalinga, he became a monk under Dignaga's disciple Dharmapala; before long he followed another disciple, Isvarasena, to delve into Dignaga's Pramanasamuccaya (Compendium of the means of true knowledge), copiously annotating it. This is Dharmakirti's famous Pramanavarttika (Explanation of evidence).

Dharmakirti modified Dignaga's definition of perception to embrace the condition “infallible” and in his Nyayabindu (The drop of logic) distinguished between four sorts of perception: that by the mind, that by the five senses, self-consciousness, and perception of the yogis. He argued that the sole valid types of knowledge are direct perception and inference and that, in the progresses of the mind, the cognized and cognition belong to distinct moments.

According to Dharmakirti, the object of perception—which may be perceived by the mind, by the five senses, by self-consciousness, and by the practice of yoga—is the pure particular, and the object of inference, either synthetic or analytical, is the universal. Dharmakirti persistently asserted that each and every single person is an ephemeral being and, in his turn, assumes the perpetual existence of an individual, and the individual as a succession of moments, gathered by discriminative and imaginative thinking. He also ushered in the threefold dissimilitude of valid middle terms: The middle must be related to the major either by identity or as cause and effect, or the cause is a nonperception out of which the absence of the major could be inferred.

Composed as comprehensive commentaries on the earlier work by Dignaga, Dharmakirti's seven treatises in turn inspired a great number of commentaries and have developed into the standard works in their field, particularly in Tibet.

When Buddhism itself was losing ground in India, Dharmakirti seemed to have foretold that it would happen; however, none of his pupils could fully comprehend his unique teachings so as to widely spread the dharma (Buddhist doctrine). Dharmapala and Isvarasena were not able to grasp Dharmakirti's doctrines, just as they had not been able to grasp Dignaga's. After Dharmakirti's death in about 680, it was to Dharmottara, rather than to Dharmakirti's direct disciple Devendrabuddhi, that his teachings were passed down. In their metaphysical positions, Dharmakirti and Dignaga embody a moderate form of idealism.

Dido (Elissa)

Phoenician heroine-goddess

Dido (also known as Elissa) was the legendary founder of the Phoenician city of Carthage and according to some sources was worshipped as a deity by the citizens of that city after her death. The accounts of her death (which appear in the writings of Justin and Virgil) agree that it was a suicide, but they differ on Dido's motivations and character. Since Phoenician texts about Dido do not survive to the present, our understanding of her is based on Roman perceptions. Elissa is a derivation of a real, Semitic name; Dido (which is likely an epithet) is of unknown derivation and meaning.

Dido appears in Virgil's Aeneid (first century B.C.E.). His retelling of Dido's story is arguably the best known, but it is fundamentally influenced by Augustan sensibilities. Justin's account from the second or third century C.E. reflects earlier traditions, possibly Phoenician, and is more important in understanding Dido's perceived relationship with the divine. Dido fled from her brother Pygmalion and eventually ended up at Carthage leading a large population. After founding the city, she was pressured to marry a local king. She refused, killed herself, and let her body fall on a funeral pyre. After her death, the citizens deified her (on account of her noble behavior), and she was presumably worshipped at Carthage.

The story reflects the sensibility that proper or outstanding behavior can create a bridge to the divine.

It is unclear whether there is any historicity to these traditions. Justin's description of Dido's death is similar to descriptions of Phoenician child sacrifice. Although scholars are divided on the issue of whether the Phoenicians actually engaged in child sacrifice, it is suggested in Roman writings and there is archaeological evidence to support it. It is quite possible that the ancient Roman writers saw a connection between the Dido cult and child sacrifice.

Dignaga (Pali: Dinnaga; Tibetan: Phyogs-kyi glan-po)

(c. 480–c. 540 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, scholar

Born into a brahmin family near Kanci in southern India in approximately 480, Dignaga became known as the father of medieval Nyaya (one of the six sects of Indian philosophy). He was first a Theravadan Buddhist and later devoted himself to the teachings of Mahayanist Buddhism in the dharma (Buddhist doctrine) lineage of Vasubandhu (one of the main founders of the Indian Yogacara school in the fourth and fifth centuries).

Dignaga is believed to have practiced meditation inside a cave of Orissa for quite a few years. He reportedly defeated heretical dialecticians, for example, a brahmin logician named Sudurjaya, at the Nalanda monastery, where he also composed some of his many treatises. Among these, the Pramanasamuccaya (Compendium of the means of true knowledge)—a work that reexplains causation and logic through the consciousness-only theory—is the most popular.

As the founder of the school of Hetu-vidya (logic), Dignaga wrote eight treatises. Among these, the Nyayadvarataka-sastra (Treatise on entering the true principle of causal logic) is the fundamental one. He also changed Buddhist logic from the analogical method to the deductive one by establishing the three characteristics of cause in the nine possible combinations of like and unlike and converting the old five-part syllogism into a three-part one, giving it a totally different logical basis. Also, in the field of epistemology, he developed the theory of the three aspects of consciousness: subjective, objective, and self-witnessing, as compared with Sthiramati's one aspect, Nanda's two aspects, and Dharmapala's four aspects. In effect, he not merely regarded only the pure sensation as perception but laid down a whole new definition of "perception": a knowledge that is free from all conceptual constructions.

Dignaga is credited with the authorship of roughly one hundred treatises on logic, most of them still preserved in Chinese and Tibetan translations. I-tsing (seventh century) once spoke of them as his textbooks at the time of his pilgrimage to India. Kuiji's Commentary on Nyayapravesa of the same century claims that there are up to forty treatises written by him, while A Record of Buddhist Practices Sent Home from the Southern Sea puts forward only seven treatises. Dignaga went beyond being simply a salient logician; according to the fourth chapter of the latter work, he also excelled at literary creation by adding a gatha (verse) to Matrceta's first-century C.E. Satapancasataka. The drama Kundamala was also allegedly produced by Dignaga.

Dikshitar, Muthuswami

Hindu composer

Muthuswami Dikshitar was a saintly composer contemporary to Tyagaraja; he was born in 1775 in Tiruvarur, India, the son of a prominent musician and composer, Ramaswamy Dikshitar. When his father-to-be prayed for a son, the goddess Devi Balambika gave him a pearl necklace in a dream. Within a year a son was born to his wife. The child learned music from his father, both vocal and vina (an Indian stringed instrument), and also studied Sanskrit. His father was invited to work as a musician in Manali, and the family moved there.

Visiting Fort St. George while still a youth, Muthuswami Dikshitar heard English band music. (Later he included some of these melodic patterns in fifty of his compositions, though most of his music was traditional.) A sannyasin (renunciant) about to set out for the ancient holy city Banaras on the Ganges heard young Muthuswami play and asked if the boy might accompany him as his pupil; in this way the boy learned worship of the goddess Shri, yoga, and wisdom literature (Upanishads). He also listened to northern Indian music. For six years he studied in the north. According to legends, his teacher told him to stand in the Ganges; there he mysteriously received a vina with the name "Rama" on it, and the teacher vanished.

Dikshitar then returned south, visiting shrines and repeating mantras. He had a vision of Subramanyam, the deity of beauty and eternal youthful vigor, who gave him wisdom. He sang in Tiruttani, and in Tirupati, Kalahasti, Kanchipuram, and Chidambaram he composed songs to the deities in temples. After these travels, he lived with his father until 1817 in Tiruvarur, where the great Shiva temple stood. He then married and spent years as a householder, immersed in devotion, doing yoga and puja (veneration), singing in temples, and teaching students. He composed about 400 songs, all in Sanskrit. He embraced poverty, and when his wife asked him if he would sing the king's praises, he said he would sing to worship the goddess Lakshmi, but would not praise mere mortals. One legend said he brought down rain with music during a drought. His songs are known for their dignified solemnity and erudition.

Diola Prophets

Indigenous African holy people

The Diola of southwestern Senegal, Gambia, and Guinea-Bissau have a long-standing prophetic tradition stretching back to the foundation myths of many Diola communities and continuing to the present day. Before the French occupation of Senegal, there were eleven male prophets, but since the beginning of the twentieth century there have been forty-three, most of whom are women. The term translated as “prophet,” Emitai dabognol, is an epithet that literally means “who was sent by the Supreme Being, Emitai.” This is a prophetic tradition within the indigenous Diola religious path (awasena) and is not primarily a product of contact with Islam or Christianity. The prophets are associated with rain rituals in which Emitai, the Supreme Being, is invoked as the source of rainfall. The harshness of colonial rule and the difficult political and ecological changes of the postcolonial era have led to both an intensification and a feminization of this tradition. The Diola number more than 500,000 people and include the largest number of practitioners of an indigenous religion in Senegal.

Prophets can be grouped into three categories: precolonial prophets, before 1850; colonial prophets, who were active in the early twentieth century; and postcolonial prophets, active since the 1960s. Like Atta-Essou, the founder of Eloudia, the early prophets were often said to have originated with Emitai and to have flown or been carried up to Emitai in the heavens when their earthly existences came to an end. They are associated with the introduction of a series of rain shrines and the institution of the priest-king (oeyi). In the eighteenth century, a new type of prophet emerged in the Diola-Esulalu communities. These men emphasized the experience of the soul leaving the body in a deep sleep and traveling to the heavens to receive revelation from Emitai. Kooliny Djabune of Kadjinol introduced a powerful new war shrine known as Cabai as a result of such revelations.

As Europeans occupied Diola territories in the late nineteenth century, women prophets became active for the first time. Detailed oral traditions focus on three women in the Huluf area of southwestern Senegal before World War I. Shortly after the military occupation of Huluf and the exile (and death) of the Huluf priest-king, three women claimed that Emitai spoke to them and commanded them to create a new spirit shrine, Emit or Emitai, which was to be used to pray directly to the Supreme Being, both for healing and for rain. These women were Weyah of Nyambalang, Djitabeh of Karouate, and Ayimpene of Siganar.

Although there were other prophets after the three women of Huluf, the most famous was Alinesitoué Diatta (1920–1944), who introduced a series of spirit shrines (ukine) associated with the procurement of rain, beginning in 1941. Her first revelations came to her as she walked through the crowded Sandaga market in the capital city of Dakar. Early in 1942, she summoned the elders of her community and taught them about a new ritual known as Kasila.

This involved the sacrifice of a black bull and other livestock at a shrine created in each neighborhood of a Diola township. For a week, the community came together and feasted as a way of reaffirming the importance of their community. She earned the hostility of French authorities by opposing their efforts to spread peanut cultivation, which disrupted a family mode of farming by luring men into the sale of peanuts and relegating the arduous task of rice cultivation exclusively to women. In 1943, she was arrested, tried for obstructing French colonial initiatives, and exiled to Timbuktu, where she died a year later. Immediately after her arrest, other women came forward and proclaimed themselves to be prophets of Emitai.

In the 1980s, Todjai Diatta of Djivent gained a following comparable to Alinesitoué's. Todjai had been diagnosed and unsuccessfully treated as an epileptic, until a Muslim healer claimed that her problem came from her refusal to fulfill her obligations to Diola religion. When she began teaching about her revelations from Emitai, the seizures stopped. She introduced a new form of Kasila that required the exclusion of items of European manufacture from her rituals. Although initially successful, the drought quickly returned, and her following diminished.

Dioskouroi

Greek heroes, demigods

Castor and Polydeuces (Pollux), the twin sons of Zeus and Leda, or Nemesis, are referred to as the Dioskouroi, “children of Zeus.” The twins, also called “children of the sky,” are connected with the evening and morning star and the constellation Gemini. Known in Greek legend as the most loving of all brothers, they gained distinction through their sense of duty, and neither argued about the kingship or engaged in any act without first consulting the other.

According to legend, Zeus, in the form of a swan, had intercourse with Leda, and Leda gave birth to two eggs. Each contained a brother and a sister (Polydeuces and Helen, and Castor and Clytemnestra). In the Homeric version, Castor and Polydeuces are sons of Leda and King Tyndareus of Sparta. Polydeuces is the immortal twin and Castor is mortal. Polydeuces became a well-known boxer, and Castor was a famous horse trainer. They sailed with Jason and the Argonauts in search of the Golden Fleece and took part in the Calydonian Boar Hunt and many other adventures. Poseidon rewarded them with horses and the power to save the shipwrecked and assist sailors. St. Elmo's fire was associated with the twins and interpreted as a favorable omen when it appeared with two flames.

Castor was slain in battle, killed in the town of Aphidnae when the Spartans were waging war against the Athenians. Others point to his death in the war waged by Lynceus and Ida against Sparta. Upon Castor's death, Polydeuces conceded half of his immortality to his brother so that they both shared life and death. A variation in Homer says that Polydeuces granted his brother half of his own life, giving them each the ability to shine in the heavens on alternate days. In Livy's History of Rome (2.19), the Dioskouroi came to the aid of the Roman legions at the Battle of Lake Regillus in 496 B.C.E. They are depicted on Roman and Hellenic coinage, and their cult existed in Magna Graecia, Delphi, and throughout Greece. The heroes were connected with commerce as well as with weights and measures. The Babylonians recognized the Great Twins as a constellation and represented them in art as situated head to head or feet together.

Disciples

The followers of great holy people are often regarded as holy people in their own right. They are often seen as people who, having the authentic teaching straight from its source, can convey that teaching to the rest of the world. The charisma of the leader often seems to rub off onto such disciples so that they shine with a reflected luster. One must also recognize that a truly great holy person seems able to inspire followers to a very high degree of spiritual perfection. Thus, in religions that emphasize the passing down of “true teaching,” the disciple is often regarded as a holy person, as in Islamic sufism, where sometimes a person's claim to holiness in popular estimation is based on the fact that he or she has passed on accurately the teachings of a master. For example, the West African Cheikh Ibra Fall (1860–1930) is above all known as a very devoted follower of the great sufi master Ahmad Bamba (1850–1927). But the holiness of disciples is most central when the master they followed was the founder of a religion. Thus they appear most centrally in the religions that claim historic founders with special divine authority, such as Christianity and Buddhism.

The ten great disciples of the Buddha from the fifth century B.C.E.—Kassapa, Ananda, Shariputra, Subhuti, Purna, Maudgalyayana, Katyayana, Aniruddha, Upali, and Rahula—play a central role in the scriptural canon of Buddhism that developed in the centuries after the death of Shakyamuni Buddha. They are used in hagiography to model the teachings of the Buddha, and each is credited with a special wisdom or skill. Thus Shariputra has a great reputation for wisdom, while Maudgalyayana is the disciple with the most power in defeating demons. Kassapa took charge of the samgha (monastic community) after the Buddha's death, summoned the first Buddhist council to establish the true teachings, and continued to head the Buddhist community for the next twenty years. They are also spiritual patrons (for example, Rahula is the “patron saint” of monastic novices). They did not pass on their authority to their own disciples, however. Similarly, in Jainism, tirthankaras (ford-makers) are believed to have had chief disciples, ganadharas (leaders of the assembly), who continued teaching after a tirthankara's death. Thus Jain tradition names the eleven chief disciples of Mahavira (trad. 599–527 B.C.E.) who are supposed to have had great yogic powers. And the sahaba, the companions of Muhammad (570–632), have high status in Muslim belief because it was they who established the traditions (hadith).

The position of Jesus' followers, especially the inner circle of twelve apostles, developed rather differently because of the different organization of early Christianity. The Buddhist samgha did not for some time establish fixed centers, while the apostles were sent out specifically to form Christian communities in different regions. Thus, not only were they the transmitters of “true teaching” (an importance exploited by Christian writers for centuries, who fathered a wide array of gospel narratives on various apostles), they were intended (at least by the time the gospels were written down) to be the leaders of communities and propagators of the Christian faith. By the second century at the latest, it was believed that the apostles passed on not just true teaching but special authority from God; they were the “rocks” upon which the Christian church was built. Their successors, the bishops, were believed to receive Jesus' own authority, passed on through the laying-on of hands, forming an “apostolic succession” that remains unbroken in the Orthodox Church, Roman Catholicism, and the Anglican communion to the present. Apostolic authority extended even to sitting in judgment over the twelve tribes of Israel at the Second Coming, according to the synoptic gospels. The bishops of churches founded by apostles—Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Rome—were believed to have access to the most complete and most authentic teachings. It is little wonder that Europe is dotted with bishoprics that in the Middle Ages claimed that they, too, had been founded by an apostle, one of the larger group of seventy-two disciples, or at least a disciple of an apostle. The church founded by Peter, Rome, especially claimed authority because of the New Testament accounts that single Peter out as the head of the apostles.

Other religious leaders have named chief disciples authorized to transmit the “true teaching,” or legend has given such disciples authority afterward. For example, the first six disciples of the Hindu god-saint Chaitanya were given the title gosvami (lord of cows), marking their authority as teachers. The Jewish Hasidic leader Dov Baer of Mezhirech (d. 1772) gathered a group of elite disciples whom he taught and then sent out to spread Hasidism. The first eighteen disciples of the Bab (1819–1850), as the first believers and first teachers of the religion that became Bah’ai, have the title “Letters of the Living.” Similarly, nineteen prominent early Baha’is were officially designated “apostles of Baha’u’llah” and “pillars of the faith” to emphasize their role in conveying the true religion to others.

Dismas

(d. c. 30 C.E.)

Christian penitent

Also known as the “Good/Penitent Thief,” Dismas (or Desmas) was one of two thieves crucified with Christ on Calvary in about 30 C.E. Dismas rebuked the other thief, Gestas (or Gesmas), for ridiculing Christ and asked for Christ’s blessing. Christ responded, “Today you will be with me in Paradise” (Luke 23:39–43). That declaration has been interpreted as guaranteeing Dismas’s salvation and authorizing his sainthood. The date of his feast day, March 25, is derived from an old tradition that this was the date of Christ’s crucifixion. Dismas’s name means “dying” in Greek (dysme), and he is the patron saint of prisoners (particularly those condemned to death), reformed thieves, funeral directors, and undertakers. He is usually represented with a tall cross.

An apocryphal text, the Arabic Infancy Gospel, describes an encounter between the Holy Family and a band of thieves during the Flight into Egypt. The leaders of this band were Titus and Dumachus. Titus wanted to leave the trio alone and paid Dumachus forty drachmae to comply with his wishes. Mary blessed Titus, and Jesus predicted that the two men would be crucified with him and that Titus would go with him to Paradise. Christ’s prophecy draws a distinct connection between Titus and Dismas. This story was particularly popular in the Middle Ages.

Dogen

(1200–1253 C.E.)

Zen Buddhist school founder, philosopher

Dogen is historically the most significant figure of the thirteenth century in Japanese Buddhism. Born in 1200, he established the Soto school of Japanese Zen Buddhism after a successful trip to China. He composed important works on Zen monastic discipline and philosophy, especially the seventy-five volumes of the Shobogenzo (The eye and treasury of the true law), before his death in 1253.

Dogen advocated a pure Zen that was devoid of elements of esoteric Buddhism common in the Tendai and especially the Shingon schools. He was deeply concerned about monastic rules and regulations, and he opened the monastic community to everyone regardless of intelligence, social status, sex, or profession. He also abolished the separation between laity and monks and adopted only the Mahayana religious precepts as necessary.

Unlike Zen Buddhists of some schools, Dogen accepted scriptures, reasoning that they were not the source of deception, which he traced to the individual. He argued that an enlightened mind was free to elucidate and appropriate the scriptures. He accorded a secondary importance to koans

A Zen monk, follower of the Japanese Buddhist school established by Dogen, with alms bowl and prayer beads. (Art Directors)

(enigmatic statements made by past masters that were used in meditation), although he did not reject them. For Dogen, the primary mode of practice was zazen (seated meditation), which he interpreted in a nondualistic way. His writings on seated meditation contained a spirit of urgency because he believed that, since human beings have had the luck to be born with a human body necessary to achieve liberation, it was foolish to waste one's life.

According to Dogen's nondualistic philosophical position, buddha-nature is equivalent to all existence, which in turn is equated with sentient beings, including plant and animal life along with the inanimate world. This position represented something radical with respect to the notion of the buddha-nature because of its absolutely inclusive meaning. Dogen further defined this central notion in terms of beings and being itself, nonexistence, and emptiness. Moreover, buddha-nature was impermanent, which reflected its dynamic and creative aspects. For the Japanese Zen tradition, Dogen's holy personage was tied to his role as a founder, as a reformer of monastic discipline, and as a creative thinker.

Dolce of Worms

Jewish holy woman

Known for her piety, this daughter of a cantor and wife of Rabbi Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (1165–1230) came from the learned elite class of medieval German Jewry and was born in 1165. Among her husband's surviving writings are two accounts of Dolce's life and death, and those of her daughters Bellette and Hannah, all of whom were murdered by intruders in 1196. In both the prose narrative, which delineates the attack and its aftermath, and the poetic elegy, which recounts Dolce's daily routines, Rabbi Eleazar consistently describes his wife as "pious" or "saintly" (hasidah). These Hebrew documents reveal that Dolce supported her family economically as a moneylender and managed a large household while also attending synagogue frequently. As the rabbi's wife, she used her unusually extensive Jewish education to teach and lead prayers for other women and took on communal religious responsibilities, including preparing holy books and objects, distributing alms, adorning brides, and preparing the dead for burial. Described as knowledgeable in Jewish law and eager to learn from her husband's words, Dolce was teaching her daughters Hebrew prayers and melodies as well as domestic skills at the time they were killed.

Rabbi Eleazar's final words of praise for his wife, that she rejoiced to perform her husband's will, express his fundamental agreement with the rabbinic view that a woman earns divine merit by facilitating the study and prayer of male relatives. In the last phrase of his poetic lament, Rabbi Eleazar envisions his beloved wife wrapped in the eternal life of paradise, a worthy reward for her deeds upon which so many were dependent. Although this memorialization of Dolce is framed by male assumptions about what constitutes female sanctity, it also provides important insights about Jewish women's lives in an era from which independent Jewish female voices do not survive.

Dominic

Christian friar, founder

Founder of the Dominican order of priests, also known as the Order of Friars Preachers or the Black Friars, Dominic was born in Castile, Spain, in 1170 and became an Augustinian canon and priest. While traveling from Denmark in 1204 he encountered the Albigensian heresy. A central element of his order would be to reconcile those involved in this and other heresies. The Dominican order began with Dominic's attempts to found houses of learning to train priests to study and preach in order to combat heretical movements. The order was officially confirmed by Pope Honorius III in 1216.

Often in the shadow of Francis of Assisi, a contemporary but more dramatic figure, Dominic structured his order carefully to maintain focus on this preaching mission. The Dominicans, like the Franciscans, were friars, mobile preachers who maintained a devotion to poverty. This apostolic life was meant to provide an example for the laity and to win back heretics who criticized the wealth and majesty of the church. For Dominic, preaching was the highest charitable calling for a priest, even more important than prayer. Teaching people how to attain salvation was considered the greatest charitable gift one could give to another. For himself, Dominic maintained many elements of traditional monasticism, such as long prayer vigils and fasting. When traveling, he went by foot and maintained a great humility in all of his actions. Wherever his journeys took him, Dominic was a zealous preacher and missionary.

The Dominicans called for great discipline in the mission to confront heresy. Still, the poverty of the order was never as extreme as that demanded by Francis. The Dominican order, as created by Dominic, kept a central focus on education. Each house was to have a lector who instructed all members of the house, no matter how advanced their training. Students were given exemptions from attending prayer services and the mass if their studies required it. Years were spent in training before a friar was allowed to preach, and especially before he was allowed to preach outside of his own friary.

Although Dominic had to accept the Rule of St. Augustine to get papal approval for the order, the Dominican Constitution was revolutionary in Christian history. It called for elections of all officials and regular general chapter meetings. These annual chapter meetings drew the leaders of each province together to vote on policy for the entire order. Each and every Dominican novice pledged direct obedience to the master general of the order.

Although Dominic and his followers were highly educated, the spirituality that they promoted was traditional. Great emphasis was placed on using existing prayers and simple devotions, and perhaps it is for this reason that the invention of the rosary is often wrongly attributed to Dominic. The spirituality of Dominic and his followers was focused on preaching and teaching others, rather than the development of an elaborate interior prayer life. If there was a special focus of devotion for Dominic, it was Mary, the mother of Jesus. In prayers he composed for the order, Dominic gave Mary a special place as an intercessor for their mission.

The hagiographical literature on Dominic is far smaller than that produced for his contemporary, Francis. Those around him wrote of his humility and simplicity in all things. The Nine Ways of Prayer, an anonymous work purporting to be based on Dominic's prayer life, is a guide to prayer using different bodily motions such as kneeling and outstretched arms.

The works of Dominican scholars such as Albert the Great (c. 1200–1280), Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274), and Raymund of Peñafort (1180–1275) brought Dominic's ideals to fruition. Dominic created the means by which his friars could receive a thorough education and devote themselves to teaching others.

Dominic of Silos (Domingo)

(c. 1000–1073 C.E.)

Christian monk, dissident, reformer

As a political dissident, Dominic of Silos exhibited the courage of his convictions; as a refugee, he embodied grace under pressure. The monastery he reformed at Silos in Burgos, Spain, which now bears his name, is still a vibrant community. Parts of his monastic complex stand as a lasting monument to the religious values that inspired him. The church he built there is now destroyed, although intriguing pieces of it have emerged from excavations.

In his early career, Dominic was prior of San Millán de la Cogolla in the kingdom of Navarre. He was exiled in about 1040 for refusing to surrender monastic property to King Sancho Garcia III (r. 1035–1054). Sancho Garcia's brother Ferdinand (Fernando) I, king of Castile-León (r. 1037–1065), gave Dominic refuge. Dominic played a key role in Ferdinand's program to bring Christianity in his kingdom into line with that practiced throughout the rest of Western Europe. Dominic helped to institute the Benedictine form of monasticism in Castile, and through it, to introduce Roman forms of worship that would eventually replace the old Mozarabic liturgy.

Ferdinand granted Dominic the dilapidated and lax monastery of St. Sebastian at Silos. Reform and rebuilding assumed equal importance for Dominic, as is clear from a vision recorded by his contemporary and biographer, Grimaldus. Angels appeared to Dominic carrying three crowns, two small and the other larger and more magnificent. The smaller two, he was told, he had already earned through his defense of Christian doctrine and through his devotion to the Virgin Mary, in whose honor he had rebuilt the church of Santa Maria de Cañas. The third would be his only after he restored the monastery of St. Sebastian both physically and spiritually. Dominic earned that third crown. The monastic buildings and the church were among the grandest in medieval Spain; the lives of the monks who lived there were exemplary.

The current monks of Santo Domingo de Silos Monastery still follow the example of their patron saint, but with a modern twist. A compact disc of their chants, recorded to raise money for repairs to the monastic complex, met with astounding worldwide success in 1994. The resulting wealth not only has allowed them to repair the buildings at Silos but also to renovate a number of Spanish convents. Their music is so inspiring that they draw flocks of pilgrims to the monastery, many of whom seek to undertake the monastic life Dominic established there so many centuries before. Dominic's feast day is December 20.

Dorado, El

Amerindian intermediary ritual

"El Dorado" is literally the Spanish term for the "The Golden Man" or "The Gilded Man," a person who links the spiritual and secular world in a renewal ceremony. It is also the term used to identify the fantasized city of gold that sparked the conquest of Latin America by Spanish conquistadors beginning in the 1500s. The myth of the city of El Dorado is probably based on the gilded man ritual enacted by one of the Chibcha language peoples, the Muisca, in the Andes of Colombia around Lake Guatavita, or "Laguna de Guatavita." The ritual associated with El Dorado was enacted to spiritually legitimize the ruler's authority as leader and possibly as a purification ceremony to ensure the blessings of the deities. In Muisca culture, religion focuses on nature and celestial deities. No city of El Dorado with paved streets and walls of gold has yet been found.

The details of the religious ritual suggest that astonishing riches lie at the bottom of Lake Guatavita. Once a year, the chief of the village would coat his body with sticky clay, resin, or honey and have gold dust applied to him. He would then stand, or sit depending on which version of the legend is being told, in the center of a raft, naked and coated in gold, as the raft was floated into the middle of the lake by four of the elite of the village. These elite would bear head-dresses of elaborate plumes and wear gold breastplates decorated in emeralds. The raft would carry gold and emerald necklaces and bracelets, flowers and food, ceramic vessels, and spindle whorls—the riches of the society. Along the edges of the lake, the townsfolk would be singing and playing music. As the full moon rose (or the sun rose, depending on the version of the legend) with the light reflecting off the chief's glistening, golden body, a banner would be raised from the raft. The voices and music would silence and he would jump into the lake. The oarsmen who guided the raft would then cast the offerings into the lake. When the chief emerged cleansed of the gold dust, music from flutes, trumpets, drums, and whistles would loudly announce the offerings. Those standing along the edge of the crater lake bed would throw in their offerings at this point. Incense burners on the boat and shore and bonfires on the shore would be burning all around, providing clouds of aromatic fog to alert the deity of the lake to the sacrifice. Having thus proved his generosity to the god of the lake and the village, the chief was reaffirmed as leader of the people.

The ceremony's origins are attributed to the drowning of Queen Guatavita and her daughter in this same lake. The ruby-eyed serpent deity of the lake who claimed the queen and her daughter spoke to the mourning king through the priest. If the king ruled his people wisely, he would be allowed to join his family one day. The king returned to the lake yearly bearing elaborate gifts to remind the serpent of his promise. The entire village would participate through fasting, preparing wonderful food and drink to feast upon, cleaning their musical instruments in preparation for the event, and preparing their outfits and offerings for presentation to the god. After years of wise rule, one year, when the king dove into the water, the serpent god was waiting for him and brought him to his family.

The ceremony was publicly reenacted by subsequent kings until the Spanish conquest interrupted the traditions of the high Andes peoples. Drainage has been attempted various times since 1500 through the use of bucket lines, notches cut into the edge of the crater, and tunnels under the lake. The attempts have failed because of the stickiness of the mud or the hardness of the clay that formed at the surface within hours of exposure. A few items have been recovered along the lake shore with each attempt, but the interior has never been penetrated. Currently the lake is protected by the Colombian government from further attempts to extract its treasures. The majority of the treasures of El Dorado are thus still locked in the heart of the Andes.

Dov Baer of Mezhirech

(d. 1772 C.E.)

Jewish rabbi, Hasidic leader

Dov Baer, known in Hasidic tradition as the Maggid (preacher) of Mezhirech, succeeded Israel Ba'al Shem Tov (the Besht) as leader of Hasidism after the Besht's death in 1760. Before assuming the mantle of Hasidic leadership, Dov Baer served as maggid in Korets, Rovno, and Mezhirech in the Ukraine. He became a follower of the Besht relatively late in life when he approached him for a cure for the illness that had confined him to his bed. According to Hasidic tradition, he only spent a total of six months under the Besht's tutelage.

Dov Baer was very different from the Besht in temperament and personality and moved Hasidism in a different direction socially and theologically. Rather than traveling and meeting ordinary people to disseminate the teachings of Hasidism, Dov Baer gathered a group of elite disciples around him who were then sent out to all parts of Eastern Europe to spread Hasidic teachings. After the Maggid's death in 1772, these disciples became the leaders of many Hasidic groups (zaddiqim), which meant that Hasidism no longer had one universally recognized leader.

Dov Baer's mystical teachings emphasized the doctrine of devekut (communion with God) from a perspective of pantheism and acosmism. They are monistic and depart from the classical kabbalistic dualistic worldview. The human being's role is to recognize that God exists everywhere in the universe. Dov Baer's mystical contemplative experience is not of a personal God but of a divine life force that pervades all existence. As a result, one can worship God with every human act. Once having recognized this basic truth, man's mystic task is to return the material world (yesh) back to the mystical "nothingness" (ayin) that preceded God's creation of the world. One result of these teachings was to de-emphasize the centrality of the tzaddiq, the Hasidic master, in the spiritual life of the hasid (disciple). Dov Baer's teachings, like those of most Hasidic masters, are not systematic treatises but homiletical observations on biblical verses or rabbinic texts. Dov Baer's theology was most fully developed by his disciple Shneur Zalman of Liadi (1745–1813), founder of the Habad school of Hasidism.

Drexel, Katharine (Catherine Marie)

(1858–1955 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun, founder, educator

Roman Catholic founder of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, Katharine Drexel was born in 1858 in Philadelphia. She spent her life and the vast fortune she inherited caring for Native Americans and African Americans. She died in 1955 at Cornwell Heights (now Bensalem), Pennsylvania, and was canonized in October 2000.

Katharine and her sister, Elizabeth, were the daughters of Francis and Hannah Drexel. Her father was a wealthy banker; her mother died one month after Katharine's birth. Two years later, Francis married Emma Bouvier, and together they had another daughter, Louise. In 1870, Francis bought a summer home in Torresdale, Pennsylvania, called Saint Michel. Emma opened a Sunday school for neighbors and employees, and Katharine was one of the teachers there. Father James O'Connor, later bishop of Omaha, Nebraska, was their pastor, a family friend, and a valued adviser to Katharine. During her extensive travels in the United States and Europe, Katharine was touched by the plight of the poor, particularly blacks and Native Americans, and she resolved to spend her life and inherited wealth improving their living conditions. Her father and stepmother had instilled in all three daughters a sense that good fortune was to be shared, not hoarded, and all three were devoted to care of the needy. In 1885, Katharine established a school for Native Americans in Santa Fe, New Mexico. Around this time, she began to discern a vocation to the religious life.

Pope Leo XIII suggested that Katharine herself become a missionary, and in 1889 she entered the novitiate of the Sisters of Mercy in Pittsburgh with that in mind. In 1891, she left the novitiate to found her own order, called, at the time, Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Colored People. Devotion to the Blessed Sacrament and concern for victims of discrimination and poverty were the driving forces in her life. During her lifetime, the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament opened approximately sixty schools, Xavier University in New Orleans being the most famous. It is the only predominantly black Catholic institution of higher learning in the United States.

In 1935, Katharine suffered a severe heart attack and thus was able to indulge her preference for a cloistered, contemplative life. For twenty years, until her death in 1955, she devoted her life to prayerful meditation and adoration of Christ in the eucharist. She is buried in the crypt of the Motherhouse Chapel, known as the Shrine of Saint Katharine Drexel, in Bensalem, Pennsylvania. John Cardinal Krol of Philadelphia championed the cause of her canonization in 1964. In 1993, a child born with nerve deafness was cured after the family prayed to Katharine; the pope determined that the cure could not be attributed to natural causes and announced that Katharine would be canonized in October 2000.

Drokmi (Tibetan: 'Brog mi Lo tsa ba Shakya ye shes)

(c. 992–c. 1072 C.E.)

Buddhist translator

Born c. 992, Drokmi was a translator during the early phyi dar (second diffusion) period of Buddhism into Tibet. He was a member of the Ban subclan of the 'Brog mi clan. He traveled to India and Nepal, learned Sanskrit, and then studied grammar, epistemology, writing, astrology, and tantra. In Tibet and Nepal, he translated nearly seventy tantric texts with south Asian Buddhist masters such as Gayadhara, Prajnendraruci (also known as Viravajra), the Ceylonese yogini Candramala, Ratnavajra, Ratnashrimitra, and possibly Prajnagupta. When he returned to Tibet, he stayed at the Mu gu lung cave complex with his students and his consort Lha lcam gcig, also known as Mdzes ldan 'od chags, a princess of Lha rtse.

Drokmi's two most important teachers were Gayadhara and Prajnendraruci, under whom he studied the Lam 'bras (Path and result) teachings and the Kye rdor rgyud gsum (The Hevajra trilogy), which includes the Hevajra Tantra and its explanatory tantras, the Vajrapanjara and the Samputa. For the Lam 'bras lineage, Drokmi's most important disciple was the shepherd Se ston kun rig (1029–1116), through whom both the Zha ma and Sa skya lineages of the Lam 'bras were transmitted. One of Se ston kun rig's students was Zhang ston Chos 'bar (1053–1135), who later taught the Lam 'bras to Sa chen Kun dga' snying po (1092–1158). After a long career of study and teaching, Drokmi spent the last twenty years of his life in solitary meditation. He passed away in around 1072. Little work has been done on this important figure.

Drom Tonpa

Buddhist master, Kadampa order founder

Drom Tonpa, born in 1005, became an important Tibetan Buddhist master and founder of the Kadampa order, which, with its emphasis on direct, practical application of the Buddha's teachings, has remained an inspiration for all schools of Tibetan Buddhism. Drom Tonpa is depicted as the foremost Tibetan disciple of the Indian saint Atisha (982–1054) and is said to have been instrumental in persuading Atisha to remain in Tibet and continue his extensive teaching activity.

Drom Tonpa is traditionally considered an emanation of Avalokiteshvara, the buddha of compassion. Before meeting Atisha, he had studied Buddhist doctrine with the Tibetan master Setsün, but eager to receive teachings directly from Indian masters he began to study Sanskrit. When, at the age of thirty-eight, he heard about Atisha's arrival in western Tibet, Drom Tonpa immediately felt the urge to meet him and received permission from Setsün to do so. Atisha accepted him as a disciple, having already received word of his arrival through a prophesy from the goddess Tara. When Atisha wanted to return to India, Drom Tonpa persuaded him to continue his spiritual work in Tibet.

After Atisha's death, Drom Tonpa retreated to Reting, where in 1056 he founded the Reting Monastery, which was to remain the center of the Kadampa order until the fifteenth century. The Kadampa order—often depicted as a reformist tradition—emphasized compassionate conduct based on monastic discipline. Although during the fifteenth century it was absorbed into the emerging Gelug order, its influence on the Tibetan monastic tradition can hardly be overestimated. It is said that all major Tibetan traditions emulated the monastic model provided by the Kadampa school. The Kadampa tradition is, moreover, well known for its use of stories and analogies to make complex religious issues accessible to a wider audience. This direct and experiential approach found classical expression in the teachings of Mind Training, which were to become a cherished element of all Tibetan traditions.

Drom Tonpa's most outstanding students—who, because of their close spiritual kinship, were known as “the three brothers”—were Puchunga (1031–1106), Jen Ngawa (1033–1103), and Potowa (1027–1105).

Drukpa Kunley

(1455–1529 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, holy fool

The Tibetan Buddhist Drukpa Kunley (‘brug pa kun legs) was born in 1455 and trained as a monk while still a child. He quickly attained such high spiritual achievement, however, that he was able to abandon the niceties of conventional ethics. He became an itinerant mendicant and devoted the rest of his days to wine, women, and song. He is reported to have had 5,000 paramours, particularly favoring the young and beautiful. Often, he barely introduced himself to the young lady in question before he had her in bed. Drukpa Kunley is not remembered as a drunkard or a womanizer, however, but for his belief that his eccentric behavior drew attention to the fallacies of conventional reality and pointed toward the ultimate truth. Drukpa Kunley himself routinely stressed his sanctity and spiritual achievement. Anyone who saw Drukpa Kunley's behavior as reprehensible showed how he himself was ignorant of ultimate truth. Drukpa Kunley was said to be able to magically transport himself from place to place. He also pacified a number of demons, frightening them with his penis.

Drukpa Kunley was extremely critical of the religious establishment of his day. According to his “secret” biography, he is supposed to have met, and made fun of, the leaders of all the major schools of Tibetan Buddhism. In a meeting with Tsongkapa (tsong kha pa) (1357–1419), the founder of the Gelug (dge lugs) school currently headed by the Dalai Lama, Drukpa Kunley was given a blessing cord, which he tied around his penis and showed to passersby in the marketplace. He also met with Tibet's preeminent scholar Sakya Pandita Kunga Gyaltsan (sa skya pandi ta kun dga' rgyal mtshan) (1182–1251), and the two of them played word games together. These meetings testify to Drukpa Kunley's importance to later Tibetans, but an examination of dates shows they could not possibly have happened.

In addition to mocking established religious authorities, Drukpa Kunley criticized folk traditions. In the Terma (gter ma) tradition of Tibetan Buddhism, figures “rediscover” teachings hidden by the legendary eighth-century saint Padmasambhava. Drukpa Kunley said of these practices: “The doctrines of those people are a great pretense” (Aris 1989, 86).

In Bhutan, Drukpa Kunley is an extremely popular saint, and images of his phallus decorate Bhutanese houses in order to ward off demons.

Duchesne, Rose Philippine

(1769–1852 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun

“The woman who prays always,” as she was called by the American Indians she educated, Rose Philippine Duchesne was born in Grenoble, France, in 1769 to a wealthy family. Against the wishes of her parents, she became a nun of the Visitation; however, her community was dispersed during the Terror. She and a few of her fellow religious tried unsuccessfully to revive their convent but eventually joined the Society of the Sacred Heart. Mother Madeleine Sophie Barat evidently recognized Philippine’s organizational skills. She sent her to Paris and then to America to establish foundations. Philippine died in 1852 at the age of eighty-three in Saint Charles, Missouri. She was canonized by John Paul II in 1988.

Philippine’s father was a prosperous attorney and merchant; her mother, Rose Périer, came from a prominent family that would eventually produce a president of France. Primarily because of the political situation, Philippine’s family was adamantly opposed to her desire for the life of a religious and had marriage in mind for her. But in 1788, Philippine joined the Visitation community where she had been educated. Like all other religious congregations, hers was dissolved in the political turmoil of the times, and the conventual buildings were expropriated by the state in 1792. Philippine returned to live with her family. She attempted to retain her life as a nun, devoting herself to charitable works; the family sheltered priests when the need arose. At the end of the Terror, Philippine acquired the conventual buildings and attempted to reorganize her community of Sainte-Marie-d’en-Haut. But with only four fellow nuns, she was unsuccessful, and the group made final vows in 1805 as members of the Society of the Sacred Heart. Sainte-Marie-d’en-Haut thus became the second house of the society.

In 1815, Mother Barat sent Philippine to Paris to found a house there, and then in 1818 Philippine and four sisters were sent to the Louisiana Territory to establish the Society of the Sacred Heart in the New World. The voyage to America left Philippine very ill, but after recuperating in New Orleans she undertook the arduous journey up the Mississippi River, landing in Saint Louis, Missouri. Her group established four foundations by 1826, the first of which, at Saint Charles, was the first free school west of the Mississippi.

At age seventy-one, Philippine set up a school for Indians at Sugar Creek, Kansas; however, her age and her inability to communicate adequately in either English or the Indian languages forced her to return to Saint Charles, where she lived out her remaining ten years in extreme personal poverty. Her devotion to the Indians and her love for the American West were unflagging, as is evidenced by her words offered by the Patron Saints Index: “I live now in solitude and am able to use my time reflecting on the past and preparing for death. I cannot put away the thought of the Indians and in my ambition I fly to the Rockies.” She died on November 18, 1852.

Dunstan

(909–988 C.E.)

Christian abbot, archbishop, reformer

Abbot, confessor, and archbishop, Dunstan was a great Anglo-Saxon saint and an important influence in tenth-century England. His maintenance of an ascetic way of life while surrounded by the temptations of a royal court was a major component of his sanctity. He also had the puissant authority necessary for an effective bishop that both derived from and contributed to his holiness.

Dunstan was often depicted rebuking kings and warning them to modify their behavior to conform to Christian values. He built churches, acted as a judge, took care of the weak and vulnerable, established schools, and wrote a monastic rule. When he was made abbot of Glastonbury, he began to institute religious reforms that increased his reputation for sanctity and reflected his lifelong love of learning and dedication to living a godly life. He spent his youth with Irish scholars at Glastonbury, where he fell ill and nearly died. Here he began having visions that also contributed to his reputation for sanctity.

He was also revered as a music maker and maker of bells and organs. In an attempt to give him the dimension of sanctity that noble parentage conferred, his hagiographer claimed that Dunstan came from the highest nobility; however, most scholars believe this to be untrue. Nevertheless he had influential friends who sponsored his ecclesiastical career.

Eventually Dunstan came to the attention of King Eadmund (r. 939–946), who brought him into the royal household where his piety earned him both admiration and resentment. This pattern would recur throughout his life: He would live among the powerful of the world but reject worldly values and the lifestyle of the court to live piously; by doing so, he would make enemies who would have him turned out and then at some point thereafter he would be miraculously reinstated. On one such occasion, he was exiled from England by King Eadwig (r. 946–959) and spent time at a monastery in Ghent, where he led an exemplary life. Here he experienced the strict monastic reforms sweeping the continent. A new king, Edgar (r. 959–975), brought Dunstan home, where he eventually became archbishop and gained the sees of Worcester, London, and Canterbury.

Dunstan continued to initiate reforms that reflected his dedication to learning, celibacy, and consistent religious observance. These monastic values marked him out as holy, and his holiness brought donations of land and other resources to the church. He spent the last years before his death in 988 in retreat at Canterbury. His relics were preserved, and his cult lasted into the fifteenth century.

Dushun (Tu-shun)

(557–640 C.E.)

Buddhist patriarch

Dushun, also known as Fashun, was the putative first patriarch of the Huayan school of Chinese Buddhism. According to his earliest biography, Dushun's contemporaries admired him as a holy monk with thaumaturgic prowess and meditative expertise. Passing references in other sources suggest that he was a charismatic leader of a local cultic movement in northern China that centered on the Huayan Scripture (Avatamsaka Sutra; also known as the Flower Garland Scripture). He was recognized as a Huayan patriarch some two centuries after his death, at the time of Zongmi (780–841), the fifth and last Huayan patriarch. Such retroactive recognition had less to do with Dushun's actual role in the establishment of Huayan as a distinct tradition than with the fact that he was a teacher of Zhiyan (602–668), the second patriarch, and the reputed author of Fajie guanmen (Discernment of the realm of reality), a seminal text that formulates some of the basic principles of the Huayan doctrinal system.

Dushun was ordained as a Buddhist monk at the age of eighteen, after which he dedicated himself to the practice of meditation. As a result of his practice, he was able to perform miracles and cure the sick, which made him a popular religious figure. He was invited to lecture at the court of Taizong (r. 627–645), the second emperor of the Tang dynasty (618–907), who gave him the honorific appellation Royal Heart (Dixin). Following Dushun's death, popular lore identified him as an incarnation of Manjushri, the bodhisattva (enlightened being) of wisdom.

Dushun's historical position in the evolution of Huayan philosophy is based on his reputed authorship of Fajie guanmen. The text explicates the modes of causal relationship between principle (li) and phenomena (shi), which are analyzed under the threefold general rubric of: (1) true emptiness, (2) mutual unobstruction of principle and phenomena, and (3) total pervasion and accommodation. Recent scholarship has raised serious reservations about Dushun's authorship of this text, but there is no categorical evidence for ascertaining its provenance. Later sources identify Dushun as the author of a dozen or so other texts, but virtually all of those attributions are spurious.

Dymphna

(d. c. 600 C.E.)

Christian legendary martyr

The cult of the martyred seventh-century Irish princess Dymphna originated in the 1200s at her shrine, which became a pilgrimage site. She is considered an intercessor for people with psychological problems.

The vita of Dymphna, which Pierre de Cambrai composed before her canonization in 1233, incorporates popular narrative motifs and is a source for medieval literary texts on the unjustly accused virtuous woman. According to this account, Dymphna was the daughter of an old king and his beautiful queen in the sixth century. With the guidance of the priest Gerebernus, mother and daughter practiced Christianity in secret. The queen died, and the girl's beauty awakened her non-Christian father's passions. When his counselors advised him to marry in order to have a son, he agreed, but he stipulated that the woman must resemble the dead queen.

Only Dymphna was suitable, and he proposed marriage to her. Horrified, she gained a delay but left Ireland with Gerebernus. They sailed to Antwerp and traveled inland, finding lodging near Geel, Belgium, where the king, later following in pursuit, then spent the night. As Dymphna's party had made payment with Irish coins, the innkeeper could direct the king to the fugitives' retreat. The king repeated his marriage proposal, but Dymphna rejected incest, pleading the law of Jesus. Enraged, he ordered his men to kill both the priest and the girl. One of them slew the priest, but only the insane father could behold Dymphna. The two were buried with stones bearing their names, which permitted the identification of their remains six centuries later.

Dymphna's death is thought to have occurred in about 600. The relics of Dymphna and Gerebernus are venerated at St. Dymphna Church, built at the site of her execution. Geel is renowned for its psychiatric services for the mentally ill. Dymphna's feast day is May 15.

E

Ecstatic Cults

For the ancient Greeks, someone experiencing ekstasis, being “displaced from” his or her normal senses, could see or hear things invisible to others through a heightened perception of the divine. Such a person was said to be suffering from a form of mania, or madness, imposed upon human beings by divine forces; the ecstatic was entheos, that is, experiencing “a god within.” Possessed by a god, the person could perceive a reality beyond the normal limits of human senses.

Under special circumstances, someone susceptible to divine perception could serve as a conduit of divine vision to the human community. Usually it was a priestess who acted as a prophet in this way, such as the Pythia at Apollo’s shrine at Delphi, or the priestesses called “Doves” at Zeus’s sanctuary at Dodona in northwestern Greece. Recent examinations of the rocks underlying the temple at Delphi support the ancient tradition that the Pythia, at least, was assisted in her ecstasy by vapors rising from the earth at this spot. Usually there is no such influence, however. Another related kind of ecstasy was the madness that enabled ordinary people to become poets, an effect of being possessed by the nymphs.

To reach such a heightened level of divine contact usually required leaving the ordered space of the city for the wild. Mountains, in particular, were thought to be conducive to ecstasy. There the best-known examples of ecstatic worship took place, the group experiences of worshippers of Dionysos (Bacchos), powerfully exhibited in Euripides’ tragedy Bacchae. The other god often connected to ecstatic cult, called by the Greeks “Mother” (Meter), was also associated with mountains. The cults of these gods shared a heavily rhythmic music at home in the world of nature amid the “baying of wolves and spirited lions and the echoing hills and the wooded haunts” (Homeric Hymn 14). Among its powerful effects were the capacity to heal; the Mother’s cymbals roared out a “wise and healing singing” in a fragment of the tragedian Diogenes. These cymbals and drums appear in paradisiacal scenes on Greek vases.

In the Greek view, however, divine influence was not necessarily for human good, and ecstatic worship was never fully at home in Greece. Dionysos and the Mother both came to Greece from outside, according to Greek accounts. Euripides’ play shows the potential for violence in this kind of cult. The Bacchae, female followers of Bacchos, their name reflecting identification with the god, tear apart living animals. One group cursed with extreme madness goes even further, wreaking destruction on a divine scale; a mother participates in destroying her own son. This is mythic exaggeration; to what extent the ecstasy in Euripides had a counterpart in reality is unknown. Scattered references attest that Bacchae, or “Maenads,” the “maddened” female followers of Dionysos, were sent out by some cities as part of their regular schedule of worship, but there is no evidence as to what these officially delegated Maenads experienced.

Ecstatic experience was more likely outside of civic rituals. Dionysos, the Mother, and other deities were also worshipped by individuals who elected to participate in mystery cults, which furnished men and women with opportunities for intense contact with the divine. Proclus, the head of Plato’s Academy in the fifth century, described the effects of such cults on some initiates: “They share the experience of the sacred symbols and step out of themselves (in ekstasis) and are completely at one with the gods and become entheoi, “divinely possessed” (Commentary on Plato’s Republic ii:108.22–24). This description is consistent with brief allusions to the experience of the mysteries in earlier authors. Nothing is said of revelation or gaining special insight; the experience itself suffices to effect the initiate’s profound transformation.

Eddy, Mary Baker

Christian healer, founder

The founder of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, Mary Baker Eddy, was born in 1821 in Bow, New Hampshire. She had severe health problems all of her childhood, the exact cause of which remains undetermined. Owing to her health problems, she had to receive most of her education at home from her brother, but she did eventually go on to study at two different academies. She reported having many unique spiritual encounters throughout her childhood.

Mary Baker (her maiden name) married George Glover from Charleston, South Carolina, in 1843. At his home she first encountered slavery and was morally outraged by it. During a trip to Wilmington, North Carolina, her husband contracted yellow fever, dying less than a year after their marriage. Mary promptly set his slaves free, then returned to her father's home to give birth to a son, naming him after his father.

In 1849, Mary's mother died. Because of her own health problems, she had to leave her son in the care of a nurse. In 1853, she married Dr. Daniel Patterson, primarily in hopes of bringing her son back into her home. However, Dr. Patterson was not willing to allow it.

In 1862, her husband advised her to see Phineas Quimby, whom she considered to be a spiritual healer. She did receive relief from Quimby, and she was able to move in 1864 with her husband to Lynn, Massachusetts, where she led an active social life. Then, in 1866, she received serious internal injuries by falling on ice. While reading a scripture account of one of the healings of Christ, she experienced healing. Her reflection on this event led her to believe that disease is an illusion and that healing is offered through the science of Christianity, or, as she would name it, Christian Science. In the same year, her husband, whom she would finally divorce in 1873, deserted her.

From 1866 on, Mary began developing the doctrine of her new religion, even in opposition to her family. Family members refused to allow her to live with them unless she renounced her newfound beliefs. So she lived in poverty, teaching and healing people. Slowly she began to develop a following. In 1870, she finished a manuscript of the "Science of Man," which would be used as a chapter in the 1875 publication Science and Health: With a Key to Scriptures. She made constant revisions to the book until her death.

It was in 1877 that she married for the third and final time. Asa Gilbert Eddy had been sent to her for healing and embraced her doctrine. The two worked together to build up the new religion until he died in 1882. The state of Massachusetts allowed the first incorporation of the Church of Christ, Scientist, prior to his death, in 1879.

In 1892, Mary reorganized the church and renamed it the First Church of Christ, Scientist. She published many books and founded the Christian Science Journal, the Christian Science Quarterly, and the Christian Science Monitor. Throughout her career, she received a lot of criticism about her views on Jesus and her business acumen, but she managed to gain a large following and to accumulate a $3 million fortune. Mary Baker Eddy died in 1910.

Edmund of East Anglia

(c. 841–c. 870 C.E.)

Christian king, martyr

Edmund of East Anglia, born around 841, represents an important group of saints: those kings venerated as Christian martyrs in medieval England. Royalty figured very prominently in early English spirituality, in part because the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons under the guidance of Pope Gregory the Great began with Aethelbert (r. 560–616), king of the ancient realm of Kent in southeastern England, and spread northward through the royal houses of the various kingdoms. Aethelbert himself seems never to have been regarded as a saint, but many members of his immediate family were, as were members of most of the royal houses of early England. The group of royal English saints was very large, but the number of saints designated “king and martyr” remained much smaller, and of this smaller group, only Edmund of East Anglia (r. 855–870), Oswald of Northumbria (r. 634–642), and Edwin of Deira (r. c. 616–c. 633) died in connection with a martial struggle against non-Christian or “pagan” enemies, the others having been murdered in internecine or dynastic struggles with fellow Christians.

Edmund stands out, however, even within this narrowly defined group of martyred warrior-kings. The most influential account of his death in about 870 portrays him as a willing martyr who died after renouncing violent resistance to his enemies. According to Abbo of Fleury, writing some seventy years after Edmund’s death, a band of Vikings ravaged East Anglia and slaughtered many of Edmund’s followers, but they offered to spare the king himself if he would accept their leader Hinguar’s overlordship. Edmund rejected the offer, choosing to imitate Christ and die as an unresisting martyr. Hinguar had the king beaten, tied to a tree, and then riddled with arrows. Edmund did not immediately succumb, so eventually Hinguar had him decapitated. In contrast to this account of Edmund’s willing death, Oswald and Edwin both died while resisting their enemies in battle.

The historicity of Edmund’s pacifistic martyrdom does stand open to question. The earliest extant accounts of his death indicate that he may have actually fallen in battle. Nonetheless, Edmund’s elevation to sainthood was virtually immediate, and unlike many other Anglo-Saxon saints, his veneration has persisted into the present era. Edmund remained an important figure of royal sainthood for successive generations, and his sanctity found reinforcement in the image of a king who imitated Christ’s sacrifice on the cross.

Edward the Confessor

Christian king

Edward the Confessor was the last Anglo-Saxon king from the legitimate royal line before the Norman Conquest in 1066. Born in about 1005, he was the son of King Aethelred II and Emma, the daughter of Richard, duke of Normandy. Emma was later married to the Danish conqueror and Aethelred’s successor, King Cnut. Upon his father’s death and Cnut’s ascendancy in 1016, Edward went into exile in Normandy. In 1041, he was invited back to England by his half brother Harthacnut (son of Emma and Cnut), by then on the throne, and recognized as his heir. Edward became king upon Harthacnut’s death in 1042.

Edward was a competent though unspectacular king. His reign from 1042 to 1066 was largely characterized by his fluctuating relationship with the powerful family of Earl Godwin, whose daughter Edith Edward married in 1045. The lack of issue from this marriage led others to seek the succession, and it is alleged that in this diplomatic maneuvering Edward first promised the throne to his cousin Duke William of Normandy, and then, on his deathbed, to his brother-in-law Harold Godwinson. According to his earliest (anonymous) biography, the Vita Aedwardi Regis (The life of King Edward), Edward’s later years were dominated by a passion for hunting. He was conventionally pious throughout his life, and in his final years he founded Westminster Abbey. Edward’s death in 1066 paved the way for William of Normandy to claim his putative right to the throne through conquest.

The move to have Edward canonized came in the 1130s when Osbert of Clare, a monk of Westminster Abbey, sought to promote a cult of the church’s founder and wrote the Vita beati Eadwardi regis Anglorum (Life of the blessed Edward, king of the English). Edward's childlessness provided the opportunity to laud Edward as committed to a chaste life of virginity. He was also praised for the gift of prophecy, based on an obscure line in the first vita, and for putative miracles that occurred at his tomb. Pope Innocent II did not respond to Osbert's entreaty, but in 1161 Pope Alexander III canonized Edward in return for Henry II's support during a papal schism. Edward was solemnly translated on October 13, 1163, in a ceremony attended by Henry II and Thomas Becket. Aelred of Rievaulx composed the Vita sancti Edwardi (Life of St. Edward) for the occasion. Edward was a favorite of later English kings, in particular Henry III, who in the 1240s had Westminster rebuilt in Edward's honor, and Richard II, who had himself portrayed with the Confessor on the Wilton Diptych. Edward's feast day is January 5; translation October 13.

Edwards, Jonathan

Protestant Christian theologian

Jonathan Edwards is perhaps the most important Christian religious figure in American history. Born in East Windsor, Connecticut, in 1703, he was the only son among eleven children of a pastor and a pastor's daughter. He grew up in a rigorously Puritan but happy environment, after which he attended Yale and studied divinity following a personal conversion experience. Edwards then became the colleague of his pastor grandfather in the ministry of Northampton, Massachusetts, at the same time beginning a highly fruitful life of theological writing. His writing and preaching made him the most important figure in the development of Christianity at this time and, in truth, the instigator of the "Great Awakening," the great revival of religion that swept the northern colonies of America in the years 1734–1742.

Edwards's first published sermon, preached in 1731, laid out the basic teaching of the Great Awakening: that the churches of New England had fallen into moral degeneracy because of their emphasis on self-sufficiency and the ability of individuals to work toward their own salvation. This teaching reached a new level in 1734 with a series of sermons on the doctrine of justification by faith alone, which sparked a major revival in Northampton, spreading to nearby colonies. Edwards taught that a great new age of God's work was beginning in America and became the pre-eminent evangelist of the movement. At least in part, his views were influenced by belief that the millennium was approaching; certainly he saw much in the revival to encourage belief that a major turning point in religious history was at hand. In 1737, Edwards published an account of the revival, A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God, that had a very deep impact on both American and European religious thought. Especially important in long-term significance was Edwards's emphasis on a personal, "born again" experience of God as the mark of the only true Christian.

Despite Jonathan Edwards's international reputation, he had growing difficulties with his own congregation. This culminated in 1749 when he tried to exclude the "unsaved" (those without a born-again experience) from participation in the eucharist in his church. His pronouncement was greeted with outrage, and soon Edwards found himself dismissed from his position. Edwards then went on to serve as pastor of a church on the frontier, where he worked as a missionary among the Indians. It was during this period that, despite Indian wars and illness, he wrote his major treatise, Freedom of Will, and went on to engage in a theological debate on the doctrine of original sin (which he strongly defended). In 1758, Edwards was named president of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton), but he died of the side effects of a smallpox inoculation almost immediately after taking office.

The teaching of Jonathan Edwards shaped American Protestantism for more than a century, spreading a "Puritan" ethic widely beyond New England and paving the way for the great Protestant missionary spread of the next century.

Eight Immortals

Daoist holy people

The Eight Immortals (Baxian) have long been the most famous group of Daoist adepts in China. They are Zhongli Quan, Lü Dongbin, Li Tieguai, Zhang Guolao, Cao Guoqiu, Lan Caihe, Han Xiangzi, and He Xian'gu, all of whom are reputed to have lived during the Tang dynasty (618–906). Each of these revered individuals is said to have begun life as a human being and subsequently undergone a spiritual and physical transformation. Known for their characteristic eccentric behavior, unconventional appearance, and rejection of norms, they are thought to demonstrate a transcendent state of being, serving as role models for humanity in their cultivation of spiritual, moral, and physical perfection. They have long been considered divine saints and are looked to for intercession on behalf of mortals with the gods and the Dao.

Each of the Eight Immortals carries or wears a unique attribute and each has a unique story associated with his or her ascent to immortal sainthood. Zhongli Quan, who carries a fan, is generally considered the leader of the group. Some sources say he lived during the Han dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.), making him the earliest of the group. Lü Dongbin is his most famous student. Lü is usually depicted as a handsome scholar who wears a sword or carries a fly whisk. In the story known as the Huangliang meng (Yellow-millet dream), Lü falls asleep at an inn while Zhongli prepares some millet for a meal. While asleep, Lü has a dream in which he experiences his entire official career, which ends in failure and disgrace. Upon awakening, Lü realizes that Zhongli is an enlightened teacher and becomes his student. Lü is also worshipped as the patron saint of merchants, pharmacists, ink-makers, and scholars.

Li Tieguai (Iron-crutch Li), who sometimes carries a gourd, was a promising Daoist adept whose body was cremated by his disciple while Li's ethereal body was visiting the deified Laozi. The story goes that Li said to his disciple, "My physical body will remain here; if my ethereal soul does not return in seven days, you may cremate my body." On the sixth day, the disciple's mother fell ill and he had to rush home, so he cremated the body. On the seventh day, Li's spirit returned, but his body was gone. He then possessed the corpse of a crippled man who had starved to death. As a result, Li is always depicted with his crutch.

Zhang Guolao, who carries a bamboo tube with two rods, was a talented magician already several hundred years old when Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756) summoned him to the imperial court in the eighth century. Zhang was often accompanied by his magic mule, which could be folded up like a piece of paper and kept in a small bag when not being ridden by his master. Cao Guoqiu lived in the tenth century as an aristocrat, possibly the younger brother of the empress Cao, and became the patron saint of actors. He is often seen holding castanets. Lan Caihe is depicted as a young man or woman holding percussive clappers or carrying a basket of flowers. Han Xiangzi, the nephew of the famous poet Han Yu, is usually depicted as a young boy holding a flute or "fish-drum." He Xian'gu, the only female of the group, is often depicted holding a basket of magic fungus called lingzhi, peaches, or a lotus flower.

The Eight Immortals appear to have emerged as a distinctive group during the Jin dynasty (1115–1234). Their stories all appear in the Liexian zhuan (Biographies of immortals) compiled during the Song dynasty (960–1279). Of the seventy immortals listed, these eight are considered representative, as they are old and young, male and female, and rich and honored as well as poor and humble. Today the Eight Immortals also appear in popular religion and folklore, viewed as symbols of good luck.

Eisai

Buddhist monk

Eisai has been given credit for establishing Chan/Zen Buddhism in Japan in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, even though Zen was likely present in Japan during the seventh century and his efforts did not lay the foundation for the sect. He was born in 1141 into a family that practiced Shinto. His father entrusted his education to a Buddhist priest, and at age fourteen, Eisai began his career as a member of the Tendai sect at Mount Hiei.

Eisai traveled to China in 1168, where he studied Chan Buddhism according to the Linji lineage, and brought back texts from the Tiantai school. He went on a second trip to China in 1187, with intentions of traveling to India and its holy sites connected to Buddhist history, but ended up staying in China. There, he studied Chan and gained a seal of recognition for spiritual attainment and approval to teach it. In 1191, he returned to Japan and constructed the first Zen temple in the Rinzai lineage. In spite of vigorous opposition from the entrenched Tendai sect on Mount Hiei and its complex, ritually based tradition, he was able to establish a monastery called Kenninji in Kyoto and another in the city of Kamakura. Due to the initial strong opposition to Zen, Eisai was forced to present it within a context that included Tendai and esoteric practices. To those that opposed its introduction to Japan, Eisai argued that Zen was not something new and innovative because it had been taught by the founder of the Tendai sect. To other objections to his identification of Zen with the true teaching of Buddhism, Eisai argued that Zen agreed with Tendai, it corresponded to its spirit, and it could contribute to its renewal. In addition to his adherence to Tendai throughout his life, Eisai also practiced Tantric forms of Buddhism for twenty years.

Ironically, Eisai called for a purified, independent Zen devoid of such extraneous and esoteric elements but, in seeming contradiction, taught a synthesis of Tendai thought, esotericism, and Zen. In his work entitled Kozen gokoku ron (Treatise on the spread of Zen for the protection of the nation), he argued that a sound moral life was necessary to assure the continuation of Buddhist doctrine.

Eisai has been given credit for the introduction of tea cultivation into Japan. When he returned from China, he brought seeds with him and began to cultivate tea gardens on temple grounds. He has also been credited with composing the first book advocating the health benefits of tea drinking. He praised it as a stimulant that was helpful for the practice of meditation and claimed that it had healing properties. Later in his career, his interest and practice of Zen meditation declined and his activities became more devoted to the practice of esoteric rites.

Eligius (Eloi, Loy)

Christian bishop, missionary

Bishop Eligius of Noyon is best known as patron of goldsmiths and metalworkers. Born in Châtelet, Francia, in about 588, he trained in nearby Limoges under mintmaster Abbo, then worked as a goldsmith in Paris. Ordained a priest by Deodatus of LeMans, he was consecrated bishop of Noyon in 640 or 641. Eligius was highly esteemed throughout the Middle Ages. His sanctity is attested even by Geoffrey Chaucer, who makes his prioress's strongest oath "by St. Eloi" in the fourteenth-century Canterbury Tales (Farmer 1987, 140).

Commissioned to create a throne for King Clothar II of France, his skill and honesty led to the fabrication of two royal chairs out of material allotted for one. The favor he earned from this led to his appointment as court goldsmith and mintmaster. At court, when asked to swear allegiance, he balked, reluctant to abuse a sacred practice for insufficient cause, and his conscience in the matter impressed the king. Known for simplicity and humility, Eligius was reported to have worn sackcloth under his fine, courtly garb. Palace duties required skillful diplomacy, and he was an intimate of others destined for sainthood in those days—Ouen, Sulpicius, Desiderius, Rusticius, and others credited with Christianizing Europe. Known as a powerful preacher, he railed against pre-Christian practices and superstitions, recommending they be replaced by prayer, the eucharist, and the sign of the cross. He was active in Tournai, Antwerp, Ghent, and Courtrai, and his many conversions won him a reputation as the "pioneer apostle" to Flanders.

Royal favors to Eligius continued under Dagobert, who granted his request for land at Solignac, where he founded a monastery that quickly attracted 150 monks. The monastery became known for its good discipline. Several other monastery and church foundations were also credited to him. Known for piety, prayer, wisdom, honesty, alms, and charity, Eligius showed a particular interest in freeing slaves and securing better treatment for them, especially in cooperation with Queen Bathildis—who had been abducted as a child in England herself. Those liberated became his disciples and contributed to his evangelization campaign.

Eligius's penchant for seeking martyrs' relics helped to promote local saints' cults and resulted in the dispersal of relics to numerous churches. He is credited with creating numerous lavish shrines (usually spuriously), precious liturgical items, and royal goods (though only some coins are extant bearing his signature). He is generally depicted at work as a goldsmith, as a farrier, or performing some other type of metalwork. The horseshoe and tongs are his emblems. His cult was widespread in continental Europe and England.

Elijah (Christianity)

(9th cent. B.C.E.)

Hebrew prophet, ascetic, dissident recognized in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam

Elijah was a militantly monotheistic prophet of the ninth century B.C.E. who defended the exclusive worship of the Hebrew God against the syncretistic practices of King Ahab and his wife Jezebel. Elijah's earthly career is recounted toward the end of 1 Kings (chapters 17 ff.) and at the beginning of 2 Kings (chapters 1 and 2) of the Hebrew Bible.

Elijah withdrew from society to achieve a purer experience of the divine, a vantage point from which he saw clearly, and critiqued, the evils of his time. He is greatly venerated in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, where he serves as a model for a wide variety of spiritual virtues and obligations. Elijah's political dissent justified later Jewish political insurgency, especially against the Romans. It also inspired Christian churchmen, such as Athanasius (c. 300–373), Thomas Becket (c. 1120–1170), and Thomas Müntzer (c. 1490–1525), to resist tyranny. Elijah's vehement defense of monotheism, which protects the central plank of God's covenant with Israel, also made Elijah the paradigm of the devout Muslim (Qur'an, Surah 36:125). Elijah's massacre of Baal's prophets justifies in all three traditions the extermination of heretics and infidels. Moreover, Elijah's vision of God as a "still small voice" shaped later monastic practices, particularly the Christian order of the Carmelites. In Jewish and Islamic folklore, Elijah guides scholars and mystics. Elijah's asceticism, that is, his control over himself, also gave him control over nature. He was fed miraculously by ravens in the desert; he predicted drought and could also call for rain.

Elijah's bodily ascension into heaven in a whirlwind accompanied by a fiery chariot (2 Kings 2:11) gives him a central place in eschatological speculation. The belief that he would return to announce the Day of the Lord was inspired by Malachi 3:1 and 4:5–6 (also Eccles. 48:6–12). The Christian gospels explicitly identify John the Baptist with Elijah (Matt. 11:10, 14 and 17:10–13; Mark 1:2 and 9:10–12; Luke 1:16–17, 76 and 7:27). Elijah also appeared with Moses at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:3, Mark 9:4). Elijah's despair in the desert, his resurrection of a widow's son, and his ascension are also thought to prefigure the career of Jesus. Elijah is often identified by Christians as one of the two witnesses of Revelation 11.

The cup of Elijah, placed in the center of the Seder table at Passover, instantiates the prophet's central significance, equivalent to that of Moses, in Judaism. The cup retains many of the political overtones of Elijah's career and celebrates his guardianship of the covenant. At the same time, and as all-powerful symbols, the cup blends past, present, and future, linking the historical accomplishments of the prophet with the present faith of those awaiting the messiah and with belief in Elijah's role in the coming deliverance.

Elijah (Judaism)

(9th cent. B.C.E.)

Hebrew prophet

Elijah was a biblical prophet active during the reigns of Ahab and Ahaziah in the ninth century B.C.E. The highlight of his prophetic activity was his struggle against the worship of Baal, culminating in the confrontation on Mt. Carmel with the prophets of Baal where a heavenly fire came down to signify acceptance of his sacrifice and the rejection of theirs (1 Kings 18). He was also concerned with the poor, bringing back to life the son of the widow who had offered him water (1 Kings 17) and redressing social injustice (1 Kings 21). Elijah did not die but ascended to heaven in a whirlwind accompanied by a fiery chariot drawn by fiery horses. His mantle fell to the ground and his disciple, Elisha, put it on and performed miracles with it (2 Kings 2).

Elijah is a popular figure in rabbinic (Talmudic and Midrashic) literature. His immortality is presupposed, and there are many reports of Talmudic rabbis who met Elijah in a wide variety of places and circumstances. Elijah is also concerned with the study of Torah. He explains difficulties to scholars, and a number of rabbinic discussions end with the term teku, an acronym for "The Tishbyite (Elijah) will resolve the questions and difficulties" (when he returns along with the messiah). In the rabbinic period and throughout Jewish history, a visit from Elijah was seen as a sign of grace and spiritual attainment. This was known as giluy Eliyahu, "the revelation of Elijah." There are also traditions that Elijah will come to announce the advent of the messianic age. Recent scholarship has shown that this belief originated in the New Testament traditions about John the Baptist.

Elijah plays a central role in the Jewish mystical tradition. He is the source of mystical teachings and the imprimatur for Jewish mystics. Virtually all major figures in the medieval kabbalistic schools claimed visitations from Elijah as the source of validation for their mystical teachings. The Zohar (Book of splendor), the central text of medieval Jewish mysticism, attributed to the second-century Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai, claimed that the source of its mystical teachings was Elijah, who reportedly taught Rabbi Simeon while he was in hiding from the Romans for twelve years. (Modern scholarship attributes the authorship of the Zohar to Rabbi Moses de Leon in late thirteenth-century Spain.) In sixteenth-century Safed in Palestine (now northern Israel), the revolutionary teachings of Rabbi Isaac ben Solomon Luria (1534–1572) were validated by the claim of his disciples that they had been transmitted to Luria by Elijah himself. Elijah, the Gaon of Vilna (1720–1797), rejected the validity of Luria's teachings on the basis that he did not accept the truth of Elijah's visitation to him.

In Jewish folklore, Elijah is the protector of the Jewish people and the guarantor of the covenant between God and Israel. At the Passover Seder, a fifth cup of wine, called the cup of Elijah, is set aside for Elijah and the door is opened to invite him to join the meal. At every circumcision, a special chair is designated for Elijah and he is invited to attend the ceremony.

Elizabeth of Hungary (Elizabeth of Thuringia)

Christian ruler, ascetic

Elizabeth of Hungary is one of the more intriguing and significant saints of the thirteenth century. Born in 1207 as the daughter of King Andreas II of Hungary and his consort Gertrude of Andachs, Elizabeth spent most of her life in Thuringia (now in Germany), where she arrived at the age of seven as the bride of Ludwig, the son and heir of the Landgrave of Thuringia. Both of her vitae (by Caesarius of Heisterbach and Dietrich von Apolda) present Elizabeth as a pious child with a special gift of converting childhood games into acts of Christian devotion. As an adult, Elizabeth successfully balanced her devotional practices with the obligations imposed on her, practicing Franciscan piety at the opulent and refined Thuringian court.

Elizabeth's marriage to Landgrave Ludwig in 1221 and the tender relationship between husband and wife, acknowledged by both hagiographers, is perhaps the most unorthodox feature of this saint's life. Caesarius and Dietrich relate a touching episode that illustrates Ludwig's acceptance of his wife's exceptional piety. Elizabeth had a habit of flagellating herself and praying at night. In order that her husband might rest while she prayed, Elizabeth ordered her maidservant to wake her up by tickling her feet. Once, in the dark of the night, the servant mistakenly tickled Ludwig's feet. Without a word of reproach, he got up and joined his wife in prayer. In turn, Elizabeth showed great concern for her husband. She had a custom of wearing a widow's dress as a sign of humility whenever her husband went away from the court. However, when the news of his return reached her, she would change into her best attire, so that her husband would not fall into the sin of desiring any other woman outside of the marriage bond through her fault.

When Ludwig died on a crusade in 1227, Elizabeth was banished from her land. She went to Marburg with her three children, where she started to build a hospital for the poor. During this period, she also became subject to extremely harsh discipline imposed on her by her confessor, Conrad of Marburg, who was assigned to her by Pope Gregory IX. Elizabeth spent her last years taking care of the sick at the hospital and leading a life of extreme poverty. She died in Marburg in 1231.

At her death, Elizabeth's cult became so popular that her reputation as a saint quickly matched the renown of Sts. Margaret, Nicholas, and Martin. The swiftness of the process for her canonization is second only to that of St. Francis. Elizabeth was canonized in 1235, only four years after her death. A great testament to her popularity is the number of posthumous miracles recognized as authentic by the committee of her canonization. They included 129 miracles validated in the process documents. A third-order Franciscan herself, Elizabeth had a Dominican confessor and was later claimed as a patron saint by the Cistercian order (1236), the Dominicans (1244), and the Teutonic Knights.

A favorite of Pope Gregory IX even during her lifetime, Elizabeth was also extremely important for the imperial cause of Frederick II, who was personally present at her exhumation in 1236 and who later donated a reliquary for her head. A rich tradition of vernacular texts dedicated to St. Elizabeth speaks to the wide popularity of the saint throughout the Middle Ages. A large number of popular vernacular songs were composed about St. Elizabeth, and thirteenth-century French poet Rutebeuf wrote a verse account of her life.

Elizabeth of Schönau

Christian nun, mystic

Little is known of Elizabeth of Schönau's early life. Born in 1129, she had at least one sister and two brothers—Ruotgar, prior of the Praemonstratensian house in Pöhlde, and Ekbert, who became abbot of Schönau (a double monastery) in 1167. Elizabeth joined the monastery at Schönau, Germany, at age twelve and tendered her vows at eighteen. When she was twenty-three, she suffered from a serious illness, after which she began receiving visions. First, an angel appeared to her and warned of an impending disaster. Though Elizabeth initially kept the vision to herself, the angel reappeared and demanded that she reveal his words. Suitably chastised, Elizabeth told the abbot, Hildelin, about the visions. Hildelin suggested that she pray for a sign; meanwhile, he embarked on a penitential campaign. At first, people were moved by his sermons.

Unfortunately, when her predictions failed, Elizabeth's reputation and Hildelin's life were jeopardized. However, Hildelin remained closely involved with her mystical experiences, saying masses for her requests and administering sacraments during her ecstasies. Ekbert, too, influenced her greatly. It was he who insisted that Elizabeth record her experiences in detail. Four major works were the result: Liber Visionum Primus, Secundus, and Tertius (Book of visions 1, 2, and 3), a chronological account of her visions, with a preface by Ekbert; Revelatio de Sacro Exercitu Virginum Coloniensium (Revelation concerning the sacred band of virgins of Cologne), a group of visions about St. Ursula and the 11,000 virgins; Liber Viarum Dei (Book of the ways of God), meditations written in the style of Scivias by her contemporary Hildegard of Bingen; and Visio de Resurrectione Beate Virginis (Vision regarding the resurrection of the blessed Virgin), a collection of revelations about the Virgin Mary's assumption into heaven. Elizabeth asserted that when she was enraptured, her body fell away while her soul journeyed to heaven. After body and soul reunited, she always experienced great pain.

At Ekbert's urging, Elizabeth began to see herself as a prophet. Though some people, including Hildegard, grew suspicious of Elizabeth's veracity, she was appointed superior of the Schönau convent in 1157. She was also a zealous enemy of heretics, a vigorous proponent of the antipope Victor IV (pope 1159–1164), and a stern voice against ecclesiastical abuses. Many of her contemporaries believed her to be a sincerely pious woman, and her Revelatio was extremely popular. After her death in 1164, Ekbert wrote a small commentary on her life, De obitu Elisabeth. Though she was never formally canonized, Pope Gregory XIII added her to the Roman Martyrology in 1584. Her feast is celebrated June 18.

Emeric (Imre)

(c. 1000–1031 C.E.)

Christian prince

The only son of King Stephen I of Hungary to reach adulthood, Emeric was regarded as a paragon of youthful virtue and chastity. He died in a hunting accident in 1031, however, and thus never ascended the throne (King Stephen died in 1038). Emeric was canonized, along with his father, in 1083; his feast days are September 2 (death) and November 5 (elevation).

Emeric was born in either 1000 or 1007 as the son of Hungary's first Christian king, Stephen, and his Bavarian wife, Gisela. He got his name from his maternal grandfather, Emperor Henry II (Henricus-Emericus-Imre). What little we know of his life we can infer from his legend, written by an unknown Benedictine monk in the early twelfth century. As a prince and heir to the throne, he received a good education, from, among others, the Venetian Benedictine monk Gerard of Csanád. It is widely believed that King Stephen wrote his Libellus de institutione morum (Institutions) for Emeric. Although Emeric was married, according to his legend he led a chaste life, and later he became a model of virginity and chastity.

Emeric was buried at the royal basilica of Székesfehérvár, where numerous miracles were recorded at his tomb. He was often depicted in Hungarian medieval art, usually as one of the three holy kings, with Stephen and Ladislas, and occasionally in a narrative cycle (Hungarian Angevin Legendary). During the eighteenth-century Catholic revival in Hungary, his cult was revived, but very few popular beliefs are associated with his person or feast day.

Christian monk, missionary

Emmeram of Regensburg was an itinerant monk and member of the second wave of Frankish missionaries who traveled eastward in the seventh century. A native of Poitiers, he stopped in Bavaria while traveling to Pannonia, where the Avars continued to resist conversion to Christianity. The monk Arbeo of Freising wrote the saint's vita two generations after his death. According to this work, Emmeram decided to remain in Regensburg when offered the position of bishop by the Bavarian duke Theodo IV. Emmeram's office in Regensburg and years of service cannot be verified through contemporary historical records. The community tradition of St. Emmeram's monastery in Regensburg holds 649 as the year of his arrival in Regensburg and 651 as the year of his death. More recent research places the duration and time of Emmeram's activity in Bavaria to a ten-year span between the years 660 and 700.

Emmeram became a martyr through the actions of Lantpert, the son of Duke Theodo. When Theodo's daughter Ota was discovered to be pregnant, Emmeram shielded the true father, a nobleman in Theodo's court, by claiming to have fathered the child himself. He then left Regensburg to travel on to Rome. Lantpert followed Emmeram, and in Kleinhelfendorf he captured him, tied him to a ladder, and cut off every bodily appendage. According to legend, through a miracle the site of Emmeram's death remained springlike and free of snow in winter. After forty days, Emmeram's body was returned to Regensburg via the Danube—a passage against the current that was made effortless by miraculous intervention—and he was buried in the cemetery of St. George's Church. Emmeram is often represented in art with his attribute, the ladder. He was venerated both as a local Regensburg saint and in the diocese of Freising, and he became the patron saint of the important monastic foundation St. Emmeram's of Regensburg.

Empedocles

(5th cent. B.C.E.)

Greek philosopher

Empedocles was a Greek philosopher and native of Sicily best known for his contributions to natural philosophy, but he is also significant in the history of healing and in the development of Pythagorean religious philosophy. Fragments of his writings, including “On Nature” and a religious and magical book called “Purifications,” survive.

Empedocles was born in Acragas, a Greek colony, early in the fifth century B.C.E. Sicily was then dotted with Greek colonies. Greek cities were also common in southern Italy. These included Croton, where a generation earlier Pythagoras had founded his school, and Elea, where Parmenides had written at about the same time. Empedocles was attentive to both. He followed Parmenides on many philosophical points, and in writing hexameter verse. With Pythagoras he shared interests spanning the theoretical, practical, and spiritual. Reportedly brilliant in rhetoric, he perhaps played political roles. But his self-announced roles as healer and teacher of esoteric religious doctrines, including reincarnation and the identification of human beings as fallen divinities seeking restoration, pose the hardest problems for understanding him.

There is no doubt that he introduced into Greek philosophy the doctrine of what Aristotle called the “four elements”: earth, air, fire, and water. His cosmology also incorporated two dynamic principles, love and strife. The problem is that Aristotle, and conventional scholarly opinion ever since, regarded him as a scientific physicist in Aristotle’s sense, indeed a materialist. This has made it difficult to grasp the unity of his work “On Nature” with the religious themes of “Purifications.”

Peter Kingsley (1995) has made major contributions to resolving this problem, pointing out that Empedocles introduced “roots” in mythical, not scientific, terms: the names of four gods—Zeus, Hera, Aidoneus, and Nestis. Since antiquity it has been unclear which god goes with fire. By showing how the volcanic geology of Sicily led Empedocles to associate fire with Aidoneus (Hades) and the underworld, Kingsley resolved this ancient uncertainty and went on to restore Empedocles to the alchemical, astrological, magical, and hermetic traditions to which his teachings contributed.

En no Ozunu

(late 7th–early 8th cent. C.E.)

Buddhist/syncretic cult founder

En no Ozunu is revered in Japan as the founder of Shugendō, a cult of mountain worship dating from the seventh and eighth centuries that continues to flourish. His life is shrouded in legend to the extent that some even question his historicity. Popularly known as En no Gyōja (En the Ascetic) or En no Ubasoku (En the Buddhist lay believer), according to tradition he was born in the province of Yamato, then the site of Japan’s capital, and as a young man engaged in religious austerities at various holy mountains. At the age of thirty-two, he entered a cave on Mt. Katsuragi, a sacred mountain near his birthplace. There he remained for thirty years, mastering magical practices associated with Chinese Yin-Yang teachings and Tantric Buddhism. He was particularly noted for his ability to make demons do his will. His name appears only once in a reliable source, which states that in 699 he was exiled when one of his disciples, jealous of his skills, falsely accused him of casting evil spells to create havoc in the world. He is said to have been pardoned in 701 at the age of sixty-eight. Sources offer various accounts of his death, including that he ascended to heaven from a holy mountain or that he crossed the sea to China.

Although facts concerning En are few, stories are numerous. They began appearing in collections of tales at the beginning of the ninth century. Despite the fantastic nature of these stories, Japanese treated him as a historical figure. In 1322, when a Zen monk compiled the first comprehensive history of Japanese Buddhism, he included a biography of En along with those of other key Buddhists. An imperial edict of 1799 named him “The Great Bodhisattva Shinpen” (lit. “Divine Transformation”). Modern scholars are more critical and see him, or at least stories about him, as representing an early stage in Japan’s assimilation of religious traditions from continental Asia. Indigenous Japanese religion, the ancestor of modern Shinto, probably included shamanism and reverence for holy mountains. To this were added magical practices from Chinese and Indian religions. The result was Shugendō, a cult practiced by yamabushi, meaning something like “men who dwell in the mountains,” mendicants known for practicing extreme austerities on holy mountains and thereby acquiring magical powers in the manner of En.

Engelbert of Cologne

(c. 1185–1225 C.E.)

Christian bishop, political leader

Engelbert, archbishop of Cologne, was a powerful civic leader, second only to the emperor, and the victim of a grisly murder in 1225. Though preoccupied by secular pursuits during his life, his violent end redeemed all his previous failings and enabled him to be considered a martyr by many, though he was never officially canonized.

Engelbert, born around 1185, had a rambunctious youth and was even briefly excommunicated. Caesarius of Heisterbach, his biographer, describes Engelbert as a young man absorbed in “the glories of worldly things.” Yet at age thirty, Engelbert was anointed archbishop of Cologne, and in this position he discovered his natural ability for civic reform. He orchestrated peace both on a large scale, holding synods to pacify feuding clerical orders, and on an individual scale, aiding paupers in the street. Emperor Frederick II (r. 1215–1250) made him regent of the empire and guardian to his son Henry in 1220 during the Sicilian campaign.

Engelbert’s zeal, however, also earned him enemies. Among these was Count Frederick of Isenberg, whom Engelbert rebuked for stealing from the nuns of Essen. Frederick together with other robber knights chastised by Engelbert’s reforms organized a plot to kill the archbishop. Feigning reconciliation, Frederick accompanied Engelbert on a trip on November 7, 1225, and ambushed him with a posse near the town of Gevelsberg. Engelbert was repeatedly stabbed so that “not a single part of his body remained free of wounds” (Caesarius of Heisterbach 1955).

It was the savageness of this attack and the following miracles that inspired recognition of Engelbert’s holiness, since he lacked the customary piety or asceticism of a saint. Engelbert was not even particularly devout. Caesarius admits this and asserts that his murder made him holy. He argues that Engelbert attained a second baptism of blood that washed clean any sins he accrued after his initial baptism of water. Since Engelbert made a full confession prior to his death, he was a pure, Christlike sacrifice. Furthermore, Caesarius points to prolific miraculous visions and cures that happened after the murder. He calls these “signals of sanctity,” claiming that it was precisely because Engelbert’s mortal life was flawed that the miracles after his death were so numerous. Caesarius’s struggle in his biography, written a year after Engelbert’s death, suggests that many at the time doubted Engelbert’s saintly status.

Engelbert’s cult peaked four centuries later during the Catholic Reformation, when he was presented as a defender of the church. During this time, his feast was publicly celebrated and a new shrine was built for his relics, which remains in the treasury of Cologne.

England and Wales, Forty Martyrs of

(16th–17th cent. C.E.)

Roman Catholic martyrs

The Forty Martyrs were chosen and canonized by the Roman Catholic Church in 1970 to represent perhaps as many as 300 men and women executed in England and Wales from 1535 to 1679 for their refusal to recognize the English ruler as supreme head of the church. Ten Jesuits, three Benedictines, three Carthusians, two Franciscans, one Augustinian, one Brigittine, and thirteen secular priests, together with four men and three women of the laity, make up the group pursued, prosecuted, and executed for allegiance to their faith.

Faith, and therefore religion, became a matter of politics when Henry VIII, in a failed attempt to obtain papal dispensation to divorce his first wife, declared himself supreme head of the Anglican Church (1532) in place of the pope in Rome. Those who refused to acknowledge Henry and the Protestant rulers who followed him to the English throne paid with their lives for the next nearly 150 years. This was further complicated by that fact that England’s official faith changed from Protestant to Catholic and back again with each successive ruler. The forty Catholic martyrs represent all of those who died during this time for matters of conscience. In this, the Roman Catholic Church acknowledges and reflects the practice common among these martyrs who, at the time of their execution, prayed for all faithful men and women, even their executioners.

These forty, some of whom were canonized earlier in their own right, are the best known among those who died, and while their stories are varied, most met their death by hanging. Nearly all of the priests were also drawn and quartered, most before they were dead. The majority were tortured before their execution in an attempt to force them to reveal the names of others who practiced as they did as well as of those who assisted in hiding priests from the authorities. Arrests often followed betrayal as to the location of the priests' hiding places. One of the martyrs, Nicholas Owen, a Jesuit lay brother killed in 1606, is credited with devising "priests' holes," the spaces behind walls or under staircases and floors where the priests secreted themselves and their mass kits whenever the houses were searched.

Robert Southwell, born in Horsham St. Faith in Norfolk and educated as a Jesuit in Rome, is one such priest who, betrayed by a woman under torture, was discovered in a priest hole. Southwell, distantly related to the nineteenth-century poet Percy Bysshe Shelley, is remembered for conducting his priestly duties during this dangerous time, for his martyrdom, and for his poetry. Upon returning to England at his own request to tend to the Catholic faithful, the Arundel family offered the young priest a place in their London home and he became the confessor to Anne, countess of Arundel, whose husband was imprisoned in the Tower of London for practicing Catholicism. Southwell traveled from London to other area Catholic homes for secret meetings and masses whenever he was called to do so. There were numerous close calls when he escaped the sovereign's agents, but when they did finally arrest him, he spent three years in prison. It was during these years that he wrote his poetry, which reflects his ardent piety. Southwell endured torture many times during his imprisonment and when called before the court defended himself eloquently, though not successfully. He was condemned as a traitor. Nevertheless, he retained the respect of many Catholics and Protestants alike and so the government hoped to keep the date of execution secret. However, a large crowd gathered at Tyburn on March 5, 1595, and, in an unusual turn of events, Southwell was not beheaded, drawn, and quartered until after he was dead. A gentleman in the crowd is said to have dissuaded the executioners from cutting the priest down before he died. Robert Southwell was canonized in 1929 and then again with the Forty Martyrs. His feast day was formerly February 21.

Margaret Clitherow (1556–1586), daughter of the mayor of York, was one of the three laywomen executed for crimes against the crown. Clitherow, a wife and mother, helped her husband to run a butcher shop in the area known even today as the York Shambles. Like so many other practicing Catholics, Clitherow employed deceit in order to attend religious meetings secretly, attend mass, and take part in communion. In her case, she claimed to be a midwife often called to attend patients during the night. She was arrested, fined, and released several times before her final imprisonment for housing Catholic gatherings and for harboring a priest. Fearing that they would call her children to testify against her, she refused to plead. The punishment for this refusal was especially cruel. On March 25, 1586, the court sentenced Clitherow to be pressed to death under the weight of a large stone.

When Pope Paul VI recognized the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales as saints, those formerly canonized retained their previous feast days but are also remembered along with the others on October 25.

Ephrem the Syrian (Ephraim)

(c. 306–373 C.E.)

Christian scholar, hymn writer, doctor of the church

Ephrem the Syrian was born in approximately 306 in Nisibis (modern northeastern Iraq), a prosperous city and a significant political center for the Middle Eastern holdings of the Roman Empire. The Christians of Nisibis had suffered sorely from persecution at the hands of the Roman emperor Diocletian (r. 284–305), but during Ephrem's childhood the Christian community began slowly to recover. There is ample suggestion that Ephrem became a youthful catechumen as Christianity assumed a more secure footing after Diocletian's death. The installation in 309 of Jacob as bishop of Nisibis (d. c. 338) implied a more proximate link to Rome, and thus to the more prominent centers of church governance, than had existed before; Jacob was a signatory among the "318" at the Council of Nicea in 325. Upon his return from the council, Bishop Jacob appointed Ephrem as the official exegete of Nisibis, a position that required a sure understanding of ecclesiastical and theological matters.

It was at that time, in his appointed position, that Ephrem began his prolific composition of hymns and theological works. Both his verse and prose works were grounded in a stern Christian orthodoxy, a robust disdain for Christian heresies, and an unfortunately scathing rejection of Judaism. He wrote also on the benefits of the ascetical life and of Christian virginity. However, it was not only religious concerns that absorbed his attention, but social and political troubles as well: Ephrem's Carmina Nisibena (CN, Songs of Nisibis) took frequent notice of the seemingly endless conflict between the Roman and Persian empires. The Persian army besieged Nisibis in 338, 346, and 350: The siege of 350 was of particular fascination to Ephrem. Shapur II (r. 309–379) had dammed the local river, Mygdonius, with the help of a platoon of elephants, in order to flood the city and thereby seize control of it. Nisibis did not fall, and Ephrem was inspired to compose a hymn (CN 11) in which Nisibis speaks, comparing herself to Noah's ark. Over the next decade, Ephrem retained his position as hymnodist and leading teacher of Christian orthodoxy in Nisibis. He also founded choirs of women, to whom he gave personal instruction.

Emperor Jovian (r. 363–364) yielded Nisibis, without its inhabitants, to the Persian Empire, and Shapur allowed the Christian population to leave the city. Ephrem then made his way about 100 miles west to Edessa. Edessa was the ostensible site of the relics of Thomas the Apostle, yet heterodoxy was prominent. Ephrem determined to counter heresy in Edessa, as he had in Nisibis, in verse. He was especially keen to refute the teachings of Arianism, which enjoyed a particularly vigorous following. Moreover, Ephrem most likely put into final version the significant portion of the corpus of his hymns at Edessa. It is possible that Ephrem was ordained as a deacon there as well. He died in June 373, tending to victims of the plague in the city. Although he was buried without ceremony, the monastery of St. Sergius (Armenian) in Edessa claims possession of his remains.

Although Ephrem wrote exclusively in Syriac, his works were translated widely, including into Greek, Armenian, Arabic, Ethiopian, Old Church Slavonic, and Latin. Although many of his exegetical works have been lost, his readings of Genesis and part of Exodus survive. His poetical works may be divided between homiletic writings (memre) and religious hymns (madrashé), composed expressly to be chanted, not read. Later editors of St. Ephrem's corpus arranged most of the hymns into functional sets, or "cycles," according to common themes. Included among the more popularized cycles are Hymns on the Nativity, Hymns on Paradise, and Hymns on Virginity and on the Symbols of the Lord.

Eric IX Jedvardsson of Sweden

(c. 1120–1160 C.E.)

Christian king

Verifiable historical facts about the career of Eric IX Jedvardsson of Sweden are scarce. Born in about 1120, he was elected king of Sweden in the late 1150s. In 1160, however, the Danish prince Magnus Henriksson, a rival for the Swedish throne, killed Eric in battle, or possibly assassinated him.

The facts about Eric are perhaps less important than the idealized picture of his character and policies that the church promoted as a model for later kings. His biography, written in the late thirteenth century, defined Eric as the perfect Christian king. Within his kingdom, Eric gave just judgments and protected the poor. He supported the mission of the church, listening to clerical advice, building sanctuaries, and outlawing the lingering traces of pre-Christian religion. King and churchmen, in this way, allied to counter strongly centripetal tendencies among the Swedish nobles, whose resistance often took the form of vehement reaction against Christianity. Eric defended the borders of his kingdom by launching an expedition against the Finns, whose ships were harrying Sweden's coastline. He then sponsored a mission to convert the Finns to Christianity.

Kings of this period were often considered saints, especially those like Eric who cooperated with the church to promote internal peace and to spread Christianity. In legend, Eric's centralizing policies became spiritual virtue, his expedition to Finland a crusade, and his violent death a martyrdom.

Eric's son Cnut actively promoted his father's cult, largely as a hedge against rivals for the throne. Kings of Eric's dynasty, especially in the thirteenth century, used his sanctity to claim a "holy bloodline" and to advocate on that basis a hereditary, rather than elective, accession to the throne. As a consequence, and throughout the Middle Ages, holding the sites of Eric's cult (especially Uppsala) became a prerequisite for acquiring the Swedish throne. Eric is the patron saint of Sweden.

Ethnopharmacology

Ethnopharmacology is the study of the culturally embedded uses of the various drugs available to a particular society. In many societies, a variety of drugs serve as catalysts for holy people to contact with or entry into the supernatural world. Although the sociocultural implications for drug-induced states in modern Western culture generally fall within the categories of healing, secular entertainment, or escapism, many societies interpret such experiences as contact with the divine. Such contact serves a variety of purposes, including foretelling the future, locating lost objects, diagnosing and healing illness, and assisting the individual in making a shift from one social status to another during rites of passage. It is the meanings and uses of such drugs as understood by local practitioners that is of interest to the ethnopharmacologist.

The archaeological record and ensuing ethnohistoric reconstructions suggest that such drug use is by no means a new human behavior. Pottery of the classic Maya phase, dating between the third and early seventh centuries, depicts people administering enemas of what is believed to be balche, a fermented beverage generally limited to sacred occasions. In the East, ancient Vedic hymns memorialize the use of soma, a plant whose identity is still debated, but which was esteemed as a divinity.

The induction of trance, whether through chemicals, trauma, drumbeats, or any other form of self-hypnosis, is commonly associated with divine revelations. The physiological effects of psychotropic drugs are a subjective experience and are interpreted within the context of an individual's expectations and belief system. Many societies, particularly though not limited to the New World, suggest that the altered perceptions and sensations produced through drug ingestion are indicative of contact with divine beings. In some cases, it is only shamans, or spiritually gifted individuals, who make contact with the divine through these sacred drugs. In other cases, these chemical gateways to the supernatural are available to all members of the group, reflecting the egalitarian belief systems of such societies.

Amanita muscaria, or fly agaric, are mushrooms traditionally used by native Siberian peoples to induce supernatural trance states. During these ecstatic states, shamans are able to contact supernatural powers. The Koryak of Siberia, for example, used fly agaric to communicate with and control harmful spirits called nimvits. The Chukchee, also of Siberia, believed the mushrooms themselves to be a type of supernatural being, a tribe unto themselves who were personified through the visions induced by their ingestion. These "mushroom men" would take their consumers on a spiritual voyage while in trance. The word "shaman" is in fact of Siberian origin, taken from the Evenki language.

The sun-dried peyote cactus, Lophophora williamsii, is eaten by the Huichol of western Mexico at the end of a strenuous pilgrimage in order to induce visions of deities and ancestors. During their peyote hunt, the Huichol Indians "become" these divine beings. This religious practice gives an example of a group that experiences communitas, or the ritual transcendence of normal social boundaries between group members of differing status, with the assistance of drugs.

According to the Jivaro (also called the Untsuri Shuar), the altered consciousness achieved by shamans through the consumption of natema (called ayahuasca, yage, or caapi by other, nearby tribes) reveals the supernatural causes of daily events. The quotidian world is mere illusion. Indeed, throughout the Amazon and Orinoco river basins, the beverage is consumed to induce supernatural visions. It would be a mistake to assume that the ethnopharmacological systems of such groups are simplistic—this mixture can contain any of more than twenty identified psychoactive botanicals in addition to the main ingredients, alkaloids from the vine Banisteriopsis caapi. While under the influence of this powerful drug, shamans can perceive tsentsak, spirits that can penetrate the bodies of enemies and cause illness. Shamans control their own tsentsak, who shield them from supernatural harm, and cure illness by looking into the bodies of patients with the aid of natema and sucking out invading tsentsak spirits. Drinking tobacco juice during the process is necessary to “feed” the tsentsak. Indeed, tobacco juice is the first hallucinogen consumed by apprentice shaman, as well as by young boys who hope for arutam, or spirit visions. A milder hallucinogen is given to newborn babies and young girls to achieve arutam.

Ritual drug use is a cornerstone of religion and healing for the Yanomamo of Venezuela and Brazil. Yanomamo men become shamans through extensive training, which includes over a year of fasting and celibacy. During this time, they attempt to entice one or more of the fickle hekura to take up residence inside their chests. It is only through the painful use of the hallucinogenic powder ebene as a snuff that one can contact these hekura spirits. The production and consumption of ebene is part of daily life for the Yanomamo. During intoxication, hekura become visible. The thousands of beautiful hekura, the spirits of the first humans, are believed to consume their own drug, braki aiama uku, in order to facilitate such encounters. It is the hekura of one’s enemies that cause illness, and the hekura of the shaman in one’s own village that provides cure and counterattack.

Modern Western classification systems tend to separate one’s physical and spiritual health into two relatively unrelated categories, with drug use appropriate and even necessary to our belief in the healing efficacy of physical illness. Cross-culturally, it is the case that medicine and religion are generally closely related categories. Western belief in naturalistic, impersonal causes of disease is not universally accepted by any means. Instead, in many societies people believe that some forms of physical illness have supernatural causes. Such a belief renders the modern Western system, which encourages drug use for physical ills but not ritual use, as incoherent—the two processes are inseparable, as are the cures.

Eugenius of Carthage

Christian bishop

As a bishop, Eugenius of Carthage was hailed as a man of wisdom among his followers. Yet his holiness was largely manifested in his defense of the Christian faith in the face of persecution and exile. Eugenius was unanimously elected bishop of Carthage, North Africa, in 480 when the Arian king Huneric (r. 477–484) decided to allow Catholics to fill the position. The election was deferred because of the growing opposition of the Arian Vandal kings to Catholicism, but it was eventually allowed by Huneric at the insistence of Zeno and Placidia, into whose family the Vandals had married.

At first, the bishop’s wise government and charisma, coupled with an austere life, charity to the poor, and courage under persecution, won the admiration of the Arians. But the differences between the Arians and the Catholics (both sides claiming this latter label) steadily grew and culminated in the Council of Carthage in 484. The withdrawal of the Arian bishop on the plea that he could not speak Latin enraged Huneric. Eugenius had already contravened a royal edict and admitted Vandals into the Catholic Church. He was exiled, churches were closed, and the followers of Eugenius, including bishops, priests, laymen, and even nuns, were cruelly tortured and exterminated. Under the custody of a ruffian named Antonius, Eugenius was sent to live in the desert of Tripoli.

Gunthamund (r. 484–496) succeeded Huneric as king and allowed Eugenius to return to Carthage and to reopen Catholic churches. But the persecution was revived after eight years, when Thrasamund (r. 496–523) came to the throne. Eugenius was arrested and condemned to death, although his sentence was finally commuted into exile at Vienne in Languedoc. Eugenius built a monastery there (over the tomb of St. Amaranthus the martyr) and led a penitential life till his death.

Eugenius wrote a number of texts, including Expositio Fidei Catholicae (Exposition of the catholic faith), demonstrating the divinity of the Holy Spirit, and Apologeticus pro Fide (Defense of the faith). He also compiled Altercatio cum Arianis (An altercation with the Arians), fragments of which are quoted by Bishop Victor of Vita in his History of the Vandal Persecution (1992, 489).

The holiness of Eugenius was also presented through his miraculous works. During his lifetime, he is said to have cured blind men and women; similarly, Gregory of Tours (538–594) tells of numerous posthumous miracles associated with him. On his own feast day, for example, the saint reportedly punished a young girl who stole an ornament from a merchant by temporarily paralyzing her. Many more miracles, mainly cures, were performed at his tomb.

Eulalia of Mérida

(d. 303 C.E.)

Christian martyr

A Spanish Christian virgin martyr, Eulalia of Mérida died on January 10, 303, in the persecution of Emperor Diocletian (r. 284–305). The earliest account of her martyrdom was provided by the Spanish poet Prudentius in about 400 (Peristephanon 3). Eulalia, a strong-willed thirteen-year-old girl devoted to Christ, ran away from home and her concerned parents to castigate the persecuting magistrate, who had her tortured and killed. Upon her death, according to Prudentius, her soul exited through her mouth in the form of a white dove, and her body was protected by a covering of snow. Eulalia became the patron saint of Mérida (called Emerita by the Romans); the seventh-century chronicle Lives of the Holy Fathers of Emerita records several instances of Eulalia's patronage and protection.

Literary and epigraphical evidence indicate that the cult of Eulalia of Mérida spread throughout Spain into northern Africa, France, Italy, and Britain. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) preached a sermon for Eulalia's feast day; Gregory of Tours (538–594), Venantius Fortunatus (c. 530–610), and the Venerable Bede (673–735) all cited her as an exemplar of virginity. Eulalia's martyrdom is the subject of the ninth-century Cantilène de Sainte-Eulalie (Song of St. Eulalia), the oldest extant French vernacular poem. Two medieval prose Lives, most likely written in Spain, embellish considerably upon the details presented by Prudentius and later authors.

From around the seventh century onward, the cult of Eulalia of Mérida existed simultaneously with the cult of Eulalia of Barcelona (feast day February 12), a saint first mentioned in a seventh-century hymn by Quiricus, bishop of Barcelona, and later in prose acts. The details of Eulalia of Barcelona are virtually identical to those of Mérida's saint. Despite the existence of an independent cult for Eulalia of Barcelona, the historicity of this saint is doubtful, and it is likely that she came to exist through appropriation of Eulalia of Mérida's legend.

Eustace

(2nd cent. C.E.)

Christian legendary martyr

Eustace was popular during the Middle Ages both among the knightly classes, since he had been a soldier himself, and more generally, as a rare example of a married saint. According to legend, Eustace, originally called Placidus, became a general in the Roman army under Emperor Trajan (r. 98–117). Although wealthy non-Christians, he and his wife were pious and charitable. One day while hunting, Placidus chased down a stag, which stopped and turned to reveal a miraculous apparition of the crucified Christ between its antlers. Placidus was immediately converted to the Christian faith, and he and his family were subsequently baptized. He took the name Eustace, his wife Theospis (Theopista), and their two sons Agapetus (Agapius) and Theospitus (Theopistus).

Christ had told Eustace that he would have to undergo many trials and would become another Job in this life, before finding beatitude in the next. His troubles soon began. After being ruined through plague and robbery, Eustace decided to go to Egypt, and the family embarked without enough money for passage. The ship's lustful captain took Theospis in payment and left Eustace and his young sons on the shore. As Eustace was ferrying his sons, one by one, across a river, they were carried off by a lion and a wolf, respectively. Believing that his family had perished, Eustace humbly served as an agricultural laborer for the next fifteen years. Theospis had never been ravished by the captain, however, and their sons, too, had been rescued by local villagers. Eventually, Eustace was reinstated to his post in the army and reunited with his wife and children. But the emperor, now Hadrian (r. 117–138), then demanded that they all sacrifice to Apollo. As Christians, they adamantly refused, and after being thrown to lions that became miraculously meek, they were martyred by being roasted in a large bronze cauldron in the shape of a bull. After three days, their bodies were removed, miraculously intact, and given honorable burial.

The earliest certain evidence of Eustace dates only from the sixth or seventh century. He became popular in the East—first in Georgia, in Cappadocia during the tenth and eleventh centuries, in Greece and the Balkans—and in Western Europe. In Rome, where a church dedicated to St. Eustachio existed at least as early as the eighth century and claimed to possess the relics of the whole family, the location of Eustace's conversion was thought to be on Monte Vulturella near Tivoli. The high point of his popularity in the West coincided with the Crusades during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and was particularly focused on northern France. The abbey of St.-Denis held important relics, and a parish church in Paris was dedicated to him in 1223.

Eustace, however, was more popular as an object of private devotion than of pilgrimage. Knights invoked him for aid and protection in battle, and he was also popular among the working classes. He was mentioned in homilies, sermons, and the liturgy, and his life inspired a considerable number of medieval romances and poems. Eustace's wife and sons were also sometimes regarded as martyred saints. His conversion through the stag hunt and vision—an archetypal image of great antiquity—was widely represented, often in combination with prayers to the saint, and in the East, images of it were considered to have apotropaic powers.

Eustace has been regarded as a patron by hunters and gamekeepers, because of the circumstances of his conversion, and was also considered one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers. Devotion to Eustace has dwindled since the early modern period. His feast is celebrated by the Orthodox Church on November 2 and was celebrated by the Catholic Church on September 20 until 1969 when it was suppressed for lack of historicity.

Expeditus

Mythical Christian saint

Saint Expeditus is an interesting example of how early modern Roman Catholicism increasingly focused on specific patronage by saints, each saint serving a specific purpose. In this case, Expeditus's popularity seems to be based entirely on his name. There was an obscure saint, of unknown date, who shares a feast day, April 19, with five other saints—Hermogenes, Caius, Aristonique, Rufus, and Galatas—who were martyred in Metilene, Armenia, on the same day sometime during the fourth century. The Parisian Benedictines note in their Lives of the Saints that a copyist might have incorrectly written “Elpidius,” a name found in several manuscripts.

Nothing more is known of this historical Expeditus/Elpidius. Because his name suggests “expedite,” however, at some point it was decided that he must be the patron saint of procrastinators and people who need work done quickly. Therefore, this saint is invoked for the prompt conclusion of business or legal affairs. In seventeenth-century Germany, artists drew him as a lawyer crushing a crow with his foot. The crow symbolizes interminable adjournments, for its cry “Cra! Cra!” is the Latin for “tomorrow.”

The cult of Expeditus made its way to the southern United States, most notably New Orleans, where he entered vodun as a “saint” who can bring about quick resolutions. A major cult of a hybrid saint Expeditus is also important on the island of Réunion in the Indian Ocean.

Extremists as Holy People

An important issue in contemporary religious debate is whether a radical, especially a person willing to kill others in service of his or her religion, can legitimately be considered as a holy person. Indeed, the answer to this question depends on how one defines holiness. Until God starts publishing an authorized list of “true” holy people, one method might be to deem someone holy if a significant population has believed this to be the case. Under these broad parameters, selected extremists would be included in the list, including Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989), Jim Jones (1931–1978), and the sixteenth-century Anabaptist leader Jan of Leyden (1509–1536).

The closer one looks at the issue of extremists as potential holy people, the more commonly accepted notions of holiness become blurred. In general, for example, Jews and Christians pride themselves on their rationality and tout compassion and love as the cornerstone of their faiths. But it is truer to say that the modern fashion of holiness in these religions emphasizes these characteristics, rather than that holy men of the past (it should be noted that the vast majority of religious extremists have been male) have never been venerated for behaviors that would be considered radical today. One need only consider the biblical account of Elijah gleefully ordering the slaughter of priests of Ba'al, or medieval Christian saints who were warriors in holy causes such as the Crusades, for it to be plain that no simple definition is possible. And there are, of course, branches of modern Judaism and Christianity with similarly extremist views. To cite a single example, a Jewish settler named Baruch Goldstein launched a sniper attack on a mosque in Hebron in 1994, killing 29 people and wounding another 125 before being killed himself. He is buried nearby, and the grave has become a shrine for militant Jewish settlers.

In general, extremists—people who defended their faith not only by dying but by killing—have been venerated in many religions as holy people. But this is one of the least consistent categories of holiness, varying widely according to belief structures of very particular times and places. Thus the monk who assassinated King Henry IV of France in 1610 was never regarded as a saint by most of the population of his time, even though some felt that Henry's toleration of Protestants amounted to a betrayal of the faith. Nor was the Hindu fundamentalist who assassinated Gandhi in 1948. In both cases, the dominant view of their societies was that assassination was not an appropriate religious tool (although war was). Even worse was the backlash in 1984 when a Sikh extremist assassinated Indira Gandhi, an action that led to rioting and large-scale massacres of his fellow Sikhs—even though the assassination was not condoned by most of the Sikh community.

Key to understanding this phenomenon seems to be the level of dislocation or crisis being experienced by a particular faith community. Historically, it has been societies under particularly great stress that have most often venerated warriors who fought for their religious values, and have occasionally established cults of individuals who, without the sanction of a state, have taken the cause of religious justice into their own hands. Modern Americans are not free of this tendency: The most famous extremist holy man in the United States, John Brown, is still lauded in history textbooks for his bold stand against slavery at Harper's Ferry in 1859. Clearly the cause of freeing the slaves was more important than the soldiers Brown and his men killed, or the local civilians who were taken as hostages.

Apocalyptic groups seem especially likely to produce extremist holy people, a phenomenon by no means limited to modern "cults." Two great examples from early modern Europe are Hans Behem (d. 1476), who provoked a large-scale apocalyptic rebellion that included killing all the priests his followers could lay hands on, and the Anabaptist takeover of Münster, Germany, in 1534–1535 led by Jan of Leyden, who intended to start the kingdom of God on earth. Nor is this phenomenon limited to Christianity: The apocalyptic purge of China inaugurated by Hong Xiuquan (1814–1864) killed more people than any war in history except World War II—although many people today regard Hong's effort to establish the heavenly kingdom on earth as terrorism on a massive scale. The modern Japanese Shoko Asahara (1955–), founder of the apocalyptic AUM Shinrikyo, was responsible for an infamous poison gas attack on the Tokyo subway in March 1995. Such examples could easily be multiplied.

In the early twenty-first century, it is impossible to avoid the linkage of "Islam" and "extremism." The Islamic radical movements that plague the world today hail those who die in the cause, including especially suicide bombers, as martyrs of the faith. Such figures have won widespread veneration, as have Islamic fundamentalists such as Ruhollah Khomeini who have restored (or attempted to restore) states to Islamic purity, killing thousands in the process. Perhaps the case of Islam is the strongest evidence that the veneration of extremists as holy people depends very much on a sense of deep crisis in the society that produces such deadly martyrs. In the centuries of Islamic ascendancy, such attacks on civilian populations would have been soundly condemned at nearly every level of Muslim society, as indeed they are condemned in the Qur'an. It is only when other means to defend their religion have appeared to be cut off that small minorities of Muslims have turned to extremists as models of a pure faith, willing to kill as well as to die.

Ezana (Abreha)

(c. 303–c. 350 C.E.)

Christian ruler

Ezana, an Aksumite emperor of the fourth century, is most famous for being the monarch who made Ethiopia Christian. The state of Aksum, acknowledged as the precursor to Ethiopia, was one of ancient Africa's most important states.

By the time Ezana came to the throne, the empire, with Aksum as its capital, was already flourishing, perhaps for as long as six centuries. It is not known when exactly the state came into being or its precise boundaries through its history. There are reports of important trade activities in the region from the first century C.E. Writing in the third century C.E., the prophet Mani noted: "There are four great kingdoms on earth: the first is the Kingdom of Babylon and Persia; the second is the Kingdom of Rome; the third is the Kingdom of the Aksumites; the fourth is the kingdom of the Chinese" (Henze 2000, 22). Thus it was a significant event when Ezana converted to Christianity in the fourth century. Following his conversion, he put the Christian cross on Aksumite coinage, the first head of state in the world to do so. Much of our knowledge of Ezana comes from the coinage minted during his reign as well as the stone inscriptions he had made to serve for posterity as a testament to his exploits.

When Ezana defeated the kingdom of Meroe in about 325, it left Ethiopia the uncontested dominant force in that part of Africa for many centuries. The wealth of Aksum derived in large part from international trade, an activity for which its location ideally suited it. Ethiopia's geographical location has made it a crossroads for influences to and from Asia as well as to and from other parts of Africa. The histories of the Ethiopian regions and southern Arabia were for centuries inextricably intertwined, with invasions occurring in both directions.

Ezana was the son of the Aksumite king Ella Amida. When the king died, Ezana's mother ruled as regent until Ezana (or he and his brother, Saizana/Asbeha) could assume the throne. According to some traditions, Ezana and his brother jointly ruled over the kingdom. Both are saints in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church.

Ezana was born in approximately 303, and he and his brother were educated by two Syrians who had been shipwrecked off the coast of the Red Sea and subsequently served King Ella Amida at the royal court. These Syrians enjoyed the favor of the king and were appointed tutors to his sons. It was one of these Syrians who later converted Ezana to Christianity.

Ezana was not the first Aksumite to convert to Christianity; there were Christians, Aksumites as well as foreign merchants, living in Aksum, as in nearby Nubia. But Ezana was the first Aksumite emperor to proclaim himself a Christian and declare the state Christian.

F

Fabiola

(d. c. 400 C.E.)

Christian pilgrim, patron

Fabiola, a Roman holy woman, pilgrim, traveler, and patroness, like her friends Paula, Eustochium, and Jerome, undertook a life of travel and monastic practices in the fourth century. Fabiola had divorced her first husband and married another, events that greatly upset Jerome, who disapproved of her remarriage. After her second husband died, Fabiola made a public profession of her religious transformation in the Lateran basilica in Rome and embarked on a life of charity, kindness, and asceticism. She supported the poor, the sick, clergy, and, of course, monks, both male and female, with generous donations. Eventually Fabiola began a life of travel and monastic pursuits. Jerome wrote, "Rome was not large enough for her compassionate kindness" (Jerome, Letter 77).

Fabiola sailed to Jerusalem and spent some time with Paula and Jerome in Bethlehem. While Jerome looked for a suitable place for her to stay, she decided to return to Rome. Jerome explained that she had wished to continue traveling, saying she had lived out of her "traveling baggage and was a stranger (peregrina) in every land" (Jerome, Letter 77). Fabiola appears to have traveled as a form of religious and ascetic expression, voluntarily living a religious life of homelessness and exile. Jerome advised her to stay in Bethlehem, but she insisted on continuing her travels, resuming them again in 394, and eventually she returned several years later to Rome, where she remained until her death in about 400 a few years later.

Faith

(3rd or early 4th cent. C.E.)

Christian martyr

Little is known about the historical person variously called "Faith," "Fides," "Foy," and "Foi." Indeed, although "there is some scholarly agreement that there was a historical person named Fides who was martyred in Agen," even the century of her martyrdom cannot be firmly established. It was, however, "probably in the third century, rather than the early fourth, as the texts generated by her cult insist" (Sheingorn 1995, 287). The earliest textual reference to her is a late sixth-century addition to a list of martyrs placing her death on October 6 in the city of Agen in what is now France; the earliest extant account of her passio, or passion, dates from the tenth century. Nevertheless, the Benedictine abbey at Conques, located on one of the major pilgrimage roads to Santiago de Compostela in Spain, and home to her relics, was one of the most important pilgrimage sites in medieval Europe.

According to her legend, Faith was a Christian girl (perhaps as young as twelve) from a noble family; a Roman prefect martyred her for refusing to renounce Christianity and worship the goddess Diana. She was first tortured by being stretched on a grill and burned, and then beheaded. Her remains, initially hidden away, were later installed in a church built in Agen especially to house them. There they remained until the ninth century, when the monks of Conques stole her relics, enshrining them in an elaborate gold- and jewel-encrusted statue-reliquary known as the “Golden Majesty,” which still exists.

Spectacular miracles, including the complete restoration of the eyeballs of an unjustly mutilated man, attracted a significant cult following to Conques, among them Bernard of Angers, who began a collection of her miracles between 1013 and 1020. In addition to healing the sick and punishing evildoers and doubters, Faith was particularly famous for miraculously freeing prisoners and reviving dead animals. She was also known for her fondness for jewelry and for her miraculous jokes or pranks, which earned her a reputation as a trickster. By the middle of the eleventh century, wealthy and powerful secular and ecclesiastical figures throughout Christendom were attracted to her shrine.

Fall, Cheikh Ibra

Muslim holy man

Cheikh Ibra Fall was born a noble in the village of Ndiambay Fall in present-day Senegal in 1860. He spent much of his adult life in search of a spiritual leader in response to a vision he had instructing him to find a master named Bamba and submit himself to him. He searched high and low. His searches took him to a village named Bamba and then to a religious leader named Bamba Sylla, under whom he studied for a while. Eventually, however, he met Cheikh Ahmad Bamba Mbacké (1850–1927), leader of the Mourides, and bowed in submission, vowing to dedicate his life to spiritual renewal. It is because of his remarkable commitment to Islam and his marabout that Cheikh Ibra is considered a holy man. His passionate devotion led to the creation of a branch of the Mouride Brotherhood called Baye Fall.

Western scholars have not given Cheikh Ibra justice in their scholarship, but this remarkable man and his life are noted among the Islamic leaders of West Africa. His fame is compounded not only because of his devotion to the teachings of Cheikh Ahmad Bamba but also because of the miracles attributed to him. The oral tradition reports one man being healed of a terminal condition simply because Cheikh Ibra told the sickness “be gone.” Another oral tradition notes him as being so devoted to Ramadan that even his animals were forced to observe the month of fasting.

Cheikh Ibra’s devotion to his faith and his spiritual master led him to follow one of the central tenets of Mouridism, which is that work is a form of worship. Because of his work and that of his talibes (students), Cheikh Ibra became a successful peanut farmer. His influence with the French colonial government was helpful to Cheikh Ahmad Bamba, whom the French exiled twice. Cheikh Ibra died in 1930 and was succeeded as leader of his talibes by his son Serigne Modou Moustapha Fall. Today, the Baye Fall is a significant branch of Mouridism and its members still consider themselves Mourides.

Fard, W. D.

Muslim founder of the Nation of Islam

The followers of W. D. Fard, founder of the Nation of Islam (NOI), believe that he was God in person. Fard’s teaching helped a segment of the black population in the United States to cope with the debilitating effects of poverty, discrimination, and racism at a time when the world had plunged into the Great Depression. His version of Islam, radically different from orthodox Islam, has continued to influence black culture and black protest to the present day.

Fard’s origins are uncertain at best. Some claim he was Pakistani. Others insist he was born in Mecca, Saudi Arabia. Others claim he was born in New Zealand; Portland, Oregon; or India. In any case, it is thought that 1891 was the year of his birth. Making his living as a salesman peddling silks and other artifacts that he claimed had been made in the Holy Land, Fard began introducing his clients to the religion of Islam, saying that Islam had been blacks’ original religion and that blacks had been the original race. He taught that white slave masters had used Christianity as a tool to control blacks’ minds and that whites were devils, and he urged blacks to recognize that their only hope was to separate totally from the white race, regain knowledge of their own heritage, and become totally self-reliant. Fard provided a curious explanation of how the white race came about. He explained that thousands of years ago a mad scientist named Yacub had created whites through genetic manipulation of recessive genes found in black people. After generations of this activity, and after he had created brown, red, and yellow peoples, Yacub had finally created whites. Their purpose was to wreak havoc on earth for 6,000 years. Then, the mahdi (messiah) would come and save the blacks, bring them home to Saudi Arabia, and restore them to their rightful place as rulers and leaders of humanity.

Fard claimed he was the mahdi and that he was God in person. Because he looked both black and white (mulatto), and because his teachings coincided with qur'anic and biblical scripture and prophecy, he succeeded in attracting hundreds of black Detroiters. From 1930 to 1933, Fard amassed some 8,000 converts. He established his first mosque in 1930 in Detroit. He also organized the Fruit of Islam (FOI), a paramilitary organization that maintained order and protected the organization. Because blacks were some of the hardest hit by the Great Depression, and because lynching, segregation, and racial discrimination flourished, blacks found it easy to believe that whites were devils.

After organizing the Nation of Islam in 1930 in Detroit and setting up a second chapter in Chicago, Fard appointed the Georgia-born Elijah Muhammad to be NOI's chief spokesperson and organizer. Fard then told Elijah that the time had come for him to leave. In 1934, Fard disappeared. He left behind an organization that eventually became one of the largest black religious sects in the United States. Fard's whereabouts during the last stage of his life are still unknown, at least publicly.

Fariduddin Ganj-i Shakar

(1175–1265 C.E.)

Muslim sufi

Ganj-i Shakar Fariduddin was a major saint of the Indian Chishti sufi order in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries whose shrine is located at Pakpattan (Ferry of the Pure), Pakistan. He is popularly known as Baba Farid. His ancestors were said to be from Kabul, Afghanistan, but they later migrated to a place called Khotwal, near Multan, Pakistan, where Fariduddin was born in 1175. His youth was influenced by his pious and saintly mother, Qarsum Bibi.

Legend has it that a visiting saint, Jalal al-Din Tabrizi, presented the young Fariduddin with a pomegranate seed. Eating this gave him powerful enlightenment. After receiving a traditional Islamic education in Multan, in 1235 Fariduddin became a disciple of the Chishti saint Qutbuddin Bakhtiyar Kaki, who passed through Multan on his way from Farghana, Afghanistan, to Delhi, where he would settle. Qutbuddin is said to have died in ecstasy provoked by poetry sung during a session of religious music at his khanqah (hostel for sufis), now the location of his shrine in Mehrawli, Delhi, near the Qutb Minar.

Baba Farid visited his master in Delhi but decided to settle in the Punjab, first at Hansi and later at Ajodhan on the Sutlej River. He is known for his austerities and disregard for worldly matters, in particular for performing a special spiritual practice of spending a forty-day retreat (chilla) suspended upside down in a well. It was said in the hagiographic tradition that his continuous fasting was rewarded by pebbles turning into sugar, hence his title, Ganj-i Shakar (treasure of sugar). His practice involved teaching his pupils the Qur'an and the sufi regimen of the Awarif al-Ma'arif (The benefits of the spiritually learned) of Shihab al-Din Abu Hafis Umar al-Suhrawardi. One legend about his life involves a boatload of pilgrims who were rescued after calling upon his name, hence he is sometimes depicted in popular iconography with a boat and a river in the background.

Fariduddin is credited with strengthening the Chishti order in the Indian subcontinent. His most prominent disciples were Nizamuddin Auliya (1239–1325) and Ala al-Din Sabir (d. 1291), founders of the Nizami and Sabiri branches of the order. He is also credited with attracting Punjabi Hindu tribes to Islam. Some of his mystical sayings were incorporated into the Sikh holy book, the Granth Sahib.

Fariduddin died in 1265. His urs (death anniversary) attracts great throngs. It became especially popular after the partition of the Indian subcontinent because since then most Pakistanis have not been able to get permission to travel to Ajmer, India, for the urs of Khwaja Muinuddin Chishti. A famous feature of Fariduddin's shrine is the heavenly door (bihisti darwaza) that is only opened for a certain period during the urs. Legend has it that passing through it at that time guarantees removal of sin.

Farrakhan, Louis

Nation of Islam leader

Louis Farrakhan follows in the footsteps of Elijah Muhammad, leader of the Nation of Islam (NOI) from 1934 to 1975, to whom he refers as the “man who taught me what I know” (Haskins 1996). Born Louis Eugene Walcott on May 11, 1933, in Roxbury, Massachusetts, Minister Farrakhan and his late brother, Alvin, were raised by his mother, a native of Saint Kitts. He never knew his father, a Jamaican native.

To his followers, Farrakhan is God’s instrument for a “New World Order of Peace and Righteousness on the foundation of Truth and Justice; to put down tyrants and to change the world into a Heaven on Earth” (ibid.). Elijah Muhammad is the Moses, while Farrakhan is the Aaron who will lead black America to the Promised Land. His ministers often introduce him as “our divine leader and guide.” In 1997, Muslim scholars and spiritual leaders from Africa, Asia, Australia, the Middle East, and the Americas, converging in Chicago, turbaned and acknowledged him as an imam of the Muslim world.

Farrakhan’s mission is expressed by the title of the Nation of Islam’s official newspaper, The Final Call. The paper’s logo is a trumpet, which signifies the end of time and the beginning of God’s judgment. This mission is best articulated in Farrakhan, The Traveler, one of the longest-running columns since the paper’s inception in 1979. The columnist, Jabril Muhammad, describes Farrakhan as the fulfillment of Jesus’ predictions of the signs of the end of this world and of his return, hailing him as the long-awaited mahdi (messiah) of Islam.

In 1993, Minister Farrakhan published his first book, A Torchlight for America, to provide a guide to the nation’s spiritual abyss.

Fatima bint Muhammad

(c. 605–632 C.E.)

Muslim holy woman

Fatima bint Muhammad, born in about 605, was the sole child of the prophet Muhammad to bear offspring. She was the wife of ‘Ali b. Abi Talib (600–661), the mother of Husayn b. ‘Ali (626–680) and Hasan b. ‘Ali (624/625–669), and the link between the prophet and the imamate for Shi’i Muslims. Though accounts of Fatima’s life vary, Sunnis and Shi’is acknowledge her importance in the role of Islam. She shared a unique relationship with her father that defied pre-Islamic standards. According to hadith literature, Muhammad is understood to have said, “Fatima is a part of my body. Whosoever hurts her, has hurt me, and whosoever hurts me has hurt God” (Shariati 1996, 161–162).

Fatima’s importance to Islam increased after her marriage to her second cousin, ‘Ali, the fourth rightly guided caliph of Sunni Islam as well as the first imam of Shi’i Islam. During her lifetime, Fatima reportedly lived in extreme poverty, struggling like the rest of the Muslim community for survival. In addition to the two boys, Hasan and Husayn, who eventually became the second and third Shi’i imams, respectively, she bore two girls, Sayyida Zaynab and Umm Khulthum. Shi’i discourse attributes another son to her as well. On his deathbed in 632, Muhammad purportedly told Fatima that she would be the first of his family to join him in paradise; ninety-five days later, in the same year, Fatima died.

Although there is limited historical information on Fatima, the pious, who remember her as “the shining” and al-batul (the virgin) do so in accordance with later hagiographic accounts. In 1056–1057, al-Wahhab wrote that Fatima bore Hasan and Husayn from her left thigh. Thus, al-batul was an honorific title referring to Fatima’s purity from menses, signifying that she was above the natural, biological limitations of other women. Today, both Shi’i and Sunni Muslims remember Fatima for her compassion, suffering, and fight against oppression. The prophet Muhammad is said to have affirmed that Fatima was one of the four highest women in Islam, along with Mary (the mother of Jesus), ‘Asiyah (Pharaoh’s wife), and Khadijiah (the wife of the prophet). Thus, Fatima is held as the paradigm for all Islamic women, particularly by Shi’i Muslims.

Fatima Ma'suma

Shi'i Muslim scholar, holy woman

Fatima Ma'suma was the daughter of the seventh Shi'i imam, Musa al-Kazim (c. 745–799), and the sister of the eighth imam, 'Ali b. Musa ar-Reza (765–818). She was born in the Arabian city of Medina on the first day of the Islamic month of Dhu-l-Qa'dah around the year 790. Fatima Ma'suma is best known for the shrine built at her tomb in the Shi'i holy city of Qum in Iran.

Fatima Ma'suma, whose epithet means “the immaculate” or “the infallible,” is revered as a scholar of the religious arts and for her piety. In the biographical traditions, she is frequently compared to Fatima bint Muhammad (c. 605–632), the daughter of the prophet Muhammad and the wife of the first Shi'i imam, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, because she always performed prayers and kept the fast (sawm) in remembrance of God (Allah). For the Shi'a, Fatima Ma'suma is revered as a saint possessing both intercessory powers and the ability to perform miracles, such as granting wishes and healing those with incurable illnesses.

In 816, Fatima Ma'suma set off from Medina to visit her brother, Imam Reza, in Marv (located in the province of Khorasan). She never saw her brother, however, as she fell ill at the Sunni town of Sawa, where she asked to be taken to the nearby town of Qum, which had been settled as a Shi'i outpost in 712. Shortly after arriving in Qum, Fatima Ma'suma died. In 1519, Shah Bigum, the daughter of the Safavid leader Shah Isma'il I, built a shrine around her grave. In the seventeenth century, Shah 'Abbas I (r. 1588–1629) further expanded the shrine complex, adding a school and facilities for pilgrims. Since then, Qum and the shrine of Fatima Ma'suma have been important sites of pilgrimage for Shi'i Muslims.

Fatima of Ourika

(c. 1000/1200 C.E.)

Muslim healer, miracle worker

Morocco is the Muslim country known as the land of a thousand saints, many of whom are women. One of these is Setti (Ar.: sitt, “lady”) Fatima of Ourika, a saint revered for her piety and extraordinary healing capabilities. She is said to have arrived from Egypt in the Moroccan valley of Ourika, southeast of Marrakesh, sometime between the eleventh and thirteenth centuries. Legend says that she came to Morocco at age seven and stayed with a local family until she married a man named L'Oussaine at age twelve. Setti Fatima had two daughters, Fatima Zahara and Aisha, who predeceased her. They are buried with her in her tomb.

It is said that when gathering wood in the mountains, Fatima pushed a stick into the ground to get water, creating a spring. This is known as the origin of the seven waterfalls in the Ourika Valley. At another place in the mountains where she hit the ground with a stick, five liters of water flowed out. The water is said to have had medicinal qualities; drinking it is also purported to have helped people solve their marital and fertility problems. After Fatima died, people would take water from the waterfall named for her and bathe in it, then spend the night at her grave, praying for a remedy for their marital or fertility problems.

Setti Fatima is buried high up on the mountainside overlooking the village. A three-room building of orange stucco with a green tile roof protects her tomb. Her elevated grave is in the middle of the largest room, with those of her daughters on each side. The graves are covered with green cloths, in keeping with the traditional covering for the grave of a sufi saint. Woven mats cover the floors, and daily offerings of couscous are placed at the head and foot of each grave by one of the women overseeing the tomb. Two other rooms allow for overnight vigils by supplicants who seek intercession through Setti Fatima. The local graveyard has developed around the tomb area.

The village houses a zawiya (religious hostel) complex that bears Fatima's name. Its date of origin is unconfirmed: Some say it was established 400–500 years ago, while others insist it was built 800 years ago, right after Setti Fatima's time. Three times a week, the zawiya provides food for the poor, who are welcome to stay there overnight. Other visitors to the zawiya are also welcomed. A simple traditional meal of corn and potato chowder is served, and visitors may leave a small donation.

Faxian (Fa-hsien)

(c. 337–c. 422 C.E.)

Buddhist pilgrim, writer

Faxian was born in Wuyang (Pingyang) in the present-day Shanxi region of China in about 337. From the fourth century to the beginning of the fifth century, northern China was divided into many small states that were ruled by Asian nomadic peoples. Southern China, however, was united under the eastern Jin dynasty (317–419). Faxian originated from this southern state when Chinese Buddhism was still in a preliminary stage of development both institutionally and philosophically. Faxian is his ordination name; his family name is Gong. He entered a Buddhist temple when he was three years old and was fully ordained at twenty.

According to the Bibliographies of the Eminent Monks and other similar records in Chinese, Faxian's main contribution to Buddhism resulted from his trip to India. Although the trip took fourteen years altogether, starting in 399, he successfully returned with many Buddhist texts that had a significant influence on the development of Chinese Buddhism. During the trip, he lost ten companion monks who had joined him at various places in China. These monks died or abandoned the initial mission because of the severe traveling conditions. They encountered snowstorms in the Karakorum mountains and contracted diseases in India. Faxian was about sixty years old when he began the expedition with a burning desire to acquire vinaya (monastic rules) and sila (precepts) texts, which were lacking in China at that time. He stayed for three years in Pataliputra in central India studying Indic languages (presumably Sanskrit but maybe also Prakrit languages). Among the many places he went, he stayed in Tamluk (Tamalipiti) near present-day Calcutta for two years and in Sri Lanka for two years in order to visit Buddhist sanctuaries and acquire Buddhist scriptures.

Faxian came back to China in 412 by a sea route in a merchant ship. At one point, when the ship became lost in a heavy storm, Faxian meditated and prayed to Avalokitesvara and the ship managed to reach the shore of Shandong province in China. Among the Buddhist scriptures he brought back, the following are well known: Dirghagama Sutra, Samyuktagama Sutra, Mahasanghika vinaya, Mahaparinirvana Sutra, and Samyuktabhidharmahrdaya. Faxian was already seventy-four years old when he came back to China, but he translated the last four texts mentioned above with Buddhahadra, a monk from India, in the Daochang temple in Jiankang (present-day Nanjing), before he died about ten years later.

Faxian's travel journal, Fu-kuo chi (Record of the Buddhist kingdoms), a rare record of Central Asia, India, and Sri Lanka in the fourth century, covers the geography, history, and customs of more than thirty countries. It was included in the Chinese Taisho Tripitaka, a collection of authoritative Buddhist texts, and translated into French and English in the nineteenth century.

Fazang (Fa-tsang)

(643–712 C.E.)

Buddhist patriarch

According to the tradition of the Huayan school of Buddhism in China, Fazang was the third patriarch, following the second patriarch, Zhiyan (602–668). In fact, many scholars give Fazang credit for founding the school, which has referred to itself as the “one vehicle” to signify the belief that there is only one path leading to liberation, not many incomplete and separate paths. Fazang's most famous essay was entitled the “Essay on the Golden Lion.” The gold of the lion symbolized the noumenon or principle of li, whereas the figure of the lion itself symbolized phenomenon. The former principle was by nature clear, pure, all-perfect, and brilliant. It was the primary cause of the lion, while the latter represented the realm of things (shih).

According to Fazang, the doctrine of emptiness signified the interdependent and interpenetrative nature of things. This position stressed that the identical nature of things signified their static nature, whereas their interpenetration indicated their dynamic nature. What made interpenetration possible without obstruction was the nonsubstantiality of things. For Fazang, what he called the “jewel net” of the Hindu deity Indra illustrated this theory. If one could imagine the heavenly abode of the god, in which there was a net that stretched out infinitely in all directions, there was hanging in each eye of the net a glittering jewel. By examining a single jewel, one noticed that it reflected all the other jewels in the net, and each of the jewels reflected in that single jewel reflected all the other jewels. This infinitely reflecting process symbolized a universe in which there was an infinitely repeated interrelationship among all the aspects of it.

Fazang theorized that things were both alike and different. Fire and ice, for example, were alike because of their emptiness, but also different. Thus his philosophical position embraced identity, or sameness, in difference. Since things shared an identical essence by virtue of being empty, one cause was identical with other causes and yet also different. In summary, Fazang argued that all things were coexistent, interwoven, interrelated, interpenetrating, mutually inclusive, and reflective of each other.

Felix of Nola

Christian priest

Like many other saints of the early Christian period, Felix's holiness was expressed through his simple monastic way of life, his conversion of nonbelievers to Christianity, and his distribution of wealth among the poor. Born at Nola near Naples, he was tortured during the Decian persecution in the mid-third century and cast into prison. One night an angel appeared to him and bade him go to the aid of Maximus, bishop of Nola. His chains fell off, the doors opened, and the saint was enabled to bring relief to the bishop, who was speechless from cold and hunger. When the persecutors made a second attempt to secure Felix, his escape was miraculously disguised by a spider weaving her web over the opening of a hole into which he had just crept. After Maximus's death, Felix was chosen for the bishopric of Nola, but he declined, favoring Quintus, a priest with slightly more experience. This rejection of office was common among holy Christians in this period.

Felix performed numerous miracles and conversions to Christianity during his lifetime. After his death in about 260, crowds of people came from all over Europe to visit his tomb. Five churches were built in his honor outside Nola, and some relics were deposited at Rome and Benevento. St. Paulinus (c. 354–431), who resided near one of these churches, testifies to numerous pilgrimages made in honor of Felix. The poems and letters of Paulinus on Felix are the source from which Gregory of Tours (538–594) and the Venerable Bede (673–735) drew their biographies.

There are sixty-six saints named Felix listed in the Roman Martyrology, and there was another bishop of Nola known as Felix. Thus the hagiographers have tended to confuse the exact identification of Felix of Nola. His feast day is January 14.

Ferdinand III of Castile (Fernando)

Christian king, lawgiver, crusader

King Ferdinand (Fernando) III of Castile-León (modern Spain) was, above all, a crusader. He conquered more Muslim-held territory than any other medieval king, and his military successes drove the Muslims to the fringes of the Spanish peninsula. Ferdinand's victories at the same time united most of the once-independent provinces of Spain under the control of one king. His rule was a just one, dedicated to promoting law, education, and religious piety.

Ferdinand, born in about 1198, was the son of Alfonso IX, king of León, and of Berenguela, daughter of Alfonso III, king of Castile. Berenguela was the sister of Blanche, mother of St. Louis IX of France, whose career and virtues closely paralleled those of his cousin Ferdinand. At his accessions to his thrones (Castile in 1217; León in 1230), Ferdinand faced many challenges to his authority, both from the Christian nobility within the kingdoms and from Muslim leaders who held the surrounding territories.

Ferdinand allied with the church to counter both threats. Casting his campaigns against the Muslims as crusades, he encouraged his nobles to join him. The Franciscans and the Dominicans, new monastic orders in the church, served as Ferdinand's military chaplains and taught his troops to value virtue over brute force. Ferdinand himself acted as a role model, spending the night before battle in prayer. Most glorious among Ferdinand's many impressive victories was the capture in 1248 of Seville, the city he chose as his place of burial.

Ferdinand was not simply interested in conquering territories and controlling his nobility. He sought to rule them in peace and cooperation. He had the law code translated from Latin into the vernacular language to provide a common law for his territories, sought mediation over warfare whenever possible, and encouraged the growth of parliamentary institutions. He also founded the University of Salamanca to produce administrators learned in law, and he encouraged Christians to study Islam in order to better understand their Muslim neighbors. He founded bishoprics, established mendicant convents, endowed hospitals, and built churches throughout his realms. Even his former enemies, the Muslims in his conquered territories, revered him as a kind man who had good political sense.

Ferdinand learned much from his association with the Mendicants, whose values he admired so much that he joined a lay branch of the Franciscans. After his death in 1252, a popular cult grew up around this kindly crusader. He was formally canonized in 1671, and his feast day is May 30.

Fisher, John

Christian bishop, martyr

John Fisher, an English priest born in 1469 who was educated at Cambridge, served as confessor to Lady Margaret Beaufort, the mother of Henry VII of England. In 1504, he was elevated to the post of bishop of Rochester and chancellor of Cambridge University. However, during the reign of Henry VIII, when he refused to swear to Henry's Act of Succession, an oath that denied the supremacy of the Roman Catholic pope in England, he was found guilty of treason and executed. Because Fisher chose to die rather than recognize Henry as head of the church in England, Catholics consider his death in 1535 an act of martyrdom.

John Fisher was considered a model bishop, even during his own lifetime, and he worked for more than thirty years in that office. He focused on improving preparation for priesthood and the service of parochial clergy. He was also recognized as a scholar and is thought to have had the foremost library in England at the time. In his appreciation and concern for education, he persuaded Lady Margaret to found Christ's College in 1505 and St. John's College at Cambridge in 1511. When Lutheranism and similar new doctrines threatened the Catholic Church's hegemony, Fisher spoke and wrote against them. In this, he and King Henry agreed. However, in Henry's pursuit of a divorce from his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, Fisher defended the queen and the Catholic Church, incurring the king's wrath. When the bishop refused the oath of succession, he was arrested and jailed on a charge of high treason. While Fisher was in prison, the pope made him a cardinal, further angering the king. Fisher was also accused of unlawfully exchanging letters with Sir Thomas More, a fellow prisoner in the Tower of London. After a year in prison, Fisher was tricked into denying the king's supremacy, was tried, found guilty, and beheaded.

Catholics in England and the European continent mourned the execution of Fisher and, within days, the execution of More as well. The two men were venerated for what was seen as their martyred deaths. Fisher was canonized in 1935. His feast day is celebrated on June 22, the same as that of Thomas More.

Fotucheng (Fo-t'ü-ch'eng)

(232–348 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, wonder worker

A Buddhist monk well known for his supernatural power, Fotucheng was born at Kucha in central Asia in 232. After tonsure at the age of nine, he visited Kashmir and arrived in Luoyang in 310 in the hope of spreading Buddhism. Fotucheng was highly respected by contemporary Confucian scholars even though he had not been schooled in Chinese philosophy and religion. Unfortunately, his arrival coincided with warfare raging in the north and he had to enter into seclusion when Luoyang was savaged by the troops of General Liu Yao of the Former Zhao dynasty in 311.

In the following year, Fotucheng was introduced to Shi Le, who became the emperor of the Later Zhao dynasty in 319, and served as his imperial adviser. Shi Le was one of the most tyrannical rulers in Chinese history, yet he showed Fotucheng great respect by conferring on him the title Dahe-shang (Great Master). Fotucheng, having realized that Shi Le could not be transformed through ordinary ways, demonstrated supernatural power on numerous occasions to gradually convince him of the Buddhist teaching of ahimsa (non-harming). He produced a lotus from a bowl of water and cured the incurable malady of Shi Le's grandson with magic. His exceptional occult power in reading omens and predicting the outcome of warfare helped Shi Le in battle. As emperor, Shi Le continued to show reverence to Fotucheng and regarded him as the "treasure of the country."

As a military adviser, Fotucheng was able to "tame" Shi Le and to inculcate him with Buddhist teachings. He tried by skillful means to minimize the suffering of people and saved countless lives. Meanwhile, generously supported by the imperial court, Fotucheng was able to spread Buddhism in society and had 893 temples built around Luoyang. He also trained numerous capable disciples, including Daoan and Senglan, and laid down a sound foundation for future Buddhist development in the north. Fotucheng died in 348 at the age of 116.

Founders of Religions as Holy People

The founders of religions have traditionally been the recipients of special veneration by loyal disciples, a veneration based on the belief that these individuals enjoyed a special and often unique connection with the divine. Thus a religious founder is a channel of the holy par excellence, but especially because of his or her role as a teacher, passing on a special insight to disciples over many generations. Founders are also usually hailed as particularly valiant witnesses to a faith. Because authority figures the world over have rarely enjoyed radical religious innovation, founders of new religions have more often than not faced persecution, accusations of insanity, and even martyrdom for their faith.

Seven figures, all men, are usually listed as the “great” religion founders: Moses, Zoroaster, Gautama the Buddha, Confucius, Laozi, Jesus, and Muhammad. Some interesting patterns can be discerned among the members of this list. Only one of the great founders, Zoroaster, was a priest of the religion from which he parted ways. The others were all in some ways outsiders from traditional wisdom—most notably Gautama, who was not even a member of the brahmin caste, and Jesus, a member of the working class rather than of the educated elite. All were in some way religious “seekers,” whether retreating to a cave to meditate (as in the case of Muhammad) or sampling in turn every known means of access to the divine (Gautama before his enlightenment).

All the great founders, with the possible exception of Laozi, found that their religious quest culminated in an experience of enlightenment, whether perceived as a fundamental insight into the nature of the universe (Gautama and Laozi) or as a revelation granted by a divine figure. Thus both Moses and Jesus received a progressive enlightenment as God became manifest to them and instructed them. Zoroaster had his first revelation at the age of thirty while at a ritual when he saw an angel who led him to the god Ahura Mazda; the god then told Zoroaster to preach the true religion. Similarly, the angel Gabriel visited Muhammad, ordering him to recite the words of God to the populace.

Despite the boldness of the message, though, the great religion founders did not regard themselves as innovators, at least according to the later accounts by their followers. Confucius, in particular, saw his teaching as a restoration of past wisdom rather than anything new. Zoroaster, Jesus, and Muhammad were all given a prophetic role to correct religious abuse, rather than to produce novelties. Perhaps the most novel departure made by one of the founders was the path of the Buddha, although even he existed within a larger ascetic movement in Hinduism.

Perhaps the most striking similarity between the major founders of religions is the tendency of followers to deify these revered figures. In many religions, the founder is either acknowledged to be a god or is the closest admissible figure to a god on earth. The process was least advanced in Islam and Judaism, in which belief that the founder was unique came into conflict with an emphasis on absolute monotheism. Even in the cases of Moses and Muhammad, though, popular religion has sometimes balanced precariously on a narrow path between veneration and worship. Going a step further, Confucianism gradually elevated the stature of its founder from simple humanity to the fitting recipient of shrines and prayer. In a similar tradition, the founder of Daoism, Laozi, was raised to the ranks of the immortals—although he may not even have existed as a human being on earth. Certainly his veneration as founder of Daoism only developed in the sixth century B.C.E., and he was credited with producing a great religious text that in reality had more than one author. Popular Zoroastrianism raised that religion’s founder from the ranks of mortals to a status somewhere between that of gods and humans. The process, of course, was most fully developed in Christianity and Mahayana Buddhism, to the point that all mainstream Christians and the large majority of Buddhists now believe their founder to be a god.

The general patterns that can be discerned among the great founders are also visible in the ranks of later religious founders and those founders whose religions have been limited to a particular region or have not gained general acceptance. Even when a new religion develops out of a series of wide-reaching social and cultural changes, historically it has been channeled through an individual who has taken on a special role as bridge to the divine. This is quite literally true in the case of Jainism, whose tirthankaras are literally “ford-makers” to the holy. Westerners accept the tirthankara Mahavira as the founder of that religion, although the Jains themselves believe that he was only the twenty-fourth in a series of holy leaders that stretches back to the dawn of this age of the world. In the case of Jainism, a new tirthankara appears when the needs of society become particularly great. Other religious founders have won widespread support for the same reason; thus, religious founders (as opposed to religious cranks, who can live at any time but fail either to gain a wide following or withstand the test of time) have usually lived at crisis times in their society. A particularly striking case is that of W. D. Fard, founder of the Nation of Islam, whose message was so powerful because of the deep needs of America’s black communities in the early twentieth century. The ongoing crisis of modernity has called a plethora of religious founders into being; only time will tell if their religions will survive the test of time by surviving past a particular societal crisis.

Founders of religions historically have had most, if not all, of the following characteristics: (1) They are not part of the religious “establishment”; (2) they suffer through a period of spiritual quest; (3) they have a special revelation that includes specific orders to preach a reform of old religion rather than a new religion; (4) they manifest their closeness to the divine, especially through miracles; (5) they suffer persecution; (6) they do not die in an ordinary way; and, most important, (7) their message resonates with the needs of the particular society in such a way that they win acceptance from a significant part of the populace.

The case of Guru Nanak, the founder of the Sikh religion, is a particularly clear example of how a founder's life usually unfolds. He was the son of an accountant who started life as a perfectly ordinary Hindu. But then he experienced a religious crisis that led him to renounce his family and wander around India looking for truth. This search culminated in a divine call—a three-day mystical experience, after which he devoted his life to preaching. Although Nanak suffered some persecution, this is more visible in the life story of Baha'u'llah, the codifier of the Baha'i faith, who spent forty years either imprisoned or in exile, a process that seems to have enriched his mystical experiences. His forerunner, the Bab, had a similar life course, culminating in a death with mystical overtones: The first time a firing squad attempted to execute him, the Bab vanished, to be found nearby calmly talking to several disciples. In all of these cases, followers regard the founder as unique in important ways; the Baha'is have defined their founders as perfect manifestations of God, occupying a middle place between human and divine.

Founders of religions are also notable for the extent to which they “hear God,” whether in the form of angelic messengers, dreams, or visions. During these experiences they are often given specific instructions or a unique position. Thus the Persian prophet Mani was told in a vision that he was the Paraclete and the seal of the prophets. Joseph Smith, founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, was given directions that led him to discover an ancient hidden text. Especially flamboyant and moving are the messages from God granted to founders of new religions and new branches of Christianity in sub-Saharan Africa.

The religious founders of the past two centuries have been particularly notable for two factors that raise fundamental questions about the nature of this most wide-reaching form of contact with the divine: They are not normally very well educated, and they have experienced some sort of “dark night of the soul” process, whether attributable to depression, alcoholism, imprisonment, or illness, during which revelation has come to them. To give only one example, the Iroquois Handsome Lake was an alcoholic suffering from severe depression who went into a coma in 1799—during which he had a series of visions. After that he revived and founded a new religion.

What could be the significance of this pattern? Cynics might argue that modern religions (or indeed all religions) were founded by and for anti-intellectuals, reflecting the basically ecstatic and emotional quality of religion in contrast to the rule of reason. This, however, seems to be too simple an answer. Perhaps the two phenomena—lack of education and “black night” experience—are related. At the most fundamental level, religious founders have succeeded in letting go of a crucial part of their own human self-will (or at least their followers have claimed this for them), becoming in a special way servants of the divine. Nothing can lessen belief in one's own powers as effectively as a deep crisis of helplessness, and perhaps nothing can enhance a feeling of self-sufficiency and tendency to critique, rather than to just experience, traces of the divine in the world as much as a good education.

Four Captives

Jewish legendary scholars

The twelfth-century Jewish historian Abraham ibn Daud attributed a shift in power in medieval Jewish society to the capture by pirates of four Jewish scholars. His story recounts how they were sold into slavery in Egypt, Kairawan (North Africa), and Cordoba, focusing on Moses ibn Hanokh, who was sold in Cordoba. According to this account, Moses ibn Hanokh was redeemed by the Jewish community in Cordoba and revealed as a scholar whose legal knowledge surpassed that of all the local scholars. Under his leadership, claims ibn Daud, Spain not only became independent of the academies in Baghdad but came to replace them as the preeminent center of Jewish scholarship.

Scholars have long recognized this story as a carefully constructed fiction. In particular, attributing the establishment of the Spanish communities as independent centers of scholarly authority to the hand of God justified their independence. Ibn Daud also sought to glorify his own Spanish community in a variety of ways. For example, he modeled Moses ibn Hanokh on the Talmudic sage Hillel (first century B.C.E.).

The story's historical kernel is that Moses ibn Hanokh did come to Spain, probably at the invitation of the Jewish courtier Hasdai ibn Shaprut, and did help to establish the intellectual independence of Spanish Jewry, although not its complete dissociation from the Geonic academies, as ibn Daud would claim. The simultaneous rise of independent centers in Spain and North Africa reflects not the providential arrival of three scholars but a gradual process of decentralization that paralleled the decline of the authority of the Abbasid caliphate in the ninth and tenth centuries. More generally, this story shows that by the turn of the millennium, Talmudic scholarship—knowledge of the law—had become a key to power and authority within medieval Jewish society.

Fourteen Holy Helpers

(13th cent.)

Christian saints

Veneration of the Fourteen Holy Helpers (Fourteen Auxiliary Saints, Vierzehn Nothelfer, Vierzehnheiligen) developed in Germany in the late thirteenth century and was especially prevalent during the fourteenth-century period of the bubonic plague (Black Death). The cult, which may have originated in Regensburg, was supported and promoted by the Dominicans, the Cistercians, and the Benedictines and spread widely in Germany, Hungary, and Sweden in the fifteenth century. It was eventually chiefly centered on the Bavarian pilgrimage chapel originally constructed in the mid-fifteenth century to mark the site where a shepherd received a vision of the infant Jesus surrounded by fourteen children (the Holy Helpers). The present chapel of Vierzehnheiligen, on the site of this miraculous apparition, is a masterpiece of late eighteenth-century German rococo architecture by the prominent architect Balthasar Neumann. The chapel was dedicated in 1772.

The fourteen “Helpers in Need,” invoked as a group for their assistance against illness and disease and for their intercession for salvation upon death, represent a powerful and efficacious collaboration of saints who were individually venerated as well. As a collective group of protectors, their strength was believed to be magnified by their alliance. Although the names vary somewhat and local substitutions can be found, the core group generally consists of both male and female saints, including bishops, virgins, martyrs, soldiers, and monks. These saints are mostly from the early Christian period and hence had well-developed cults already before their grouping in the thirteenth century.

The three female saints are Barbara, Margaret, and Catherine of Alexandria, often invoked against lightning, fires, sudden death, and demonic possession. Margaret is also the patron of pregnant women and Catherine the patron of students and philosophers. The bishop-saints include Denis, Erasmus (or Elmo), and Blaise, all of whose legends also involve particularly gruesome tortures and impressive miracles. The soldier-saints George, Achatius (or Acacius), and Eustace, as well as the physician Pantaleon and the hermit/monk Giles, are also included. These saints were variously invoked against headaches, rabies, colic, sore throats, tuberculosis, and epilepsy. The deacon saint Cyriac (or Cyriacus) was invoked against eye diseases and demonic possession. St. Vitus (invoked against nervous disorders, for example “Saint Vitus’s Dance”) and St. Christopher (the patron of safe journeys) complete the list, although sometimes Nicholas, Sebastian, Sixtus, Oswald, and Wolfgang are substituted for others above.

The Fourteen Holy Helpers are a frequent subject in German devotional art of the late Middle Ages. They are generally depicted as a group of figures, identifiable individually by their symbolic attributes. For example, Giles is accompanied by the doe that fed him in the forest; Denis carries his severed head; George is shown with the dragon he conquered; Barbara holds a chalice and eucharistic wafer and stands by the tower in which she was imprisoned; Catherine stands atop the broken wheel on which she was tortured and holds the sword with which she was decapitated; and Erasmus carries the crank on which his entrails were wound. All of these traditional pictorial details derive from salient episodes in the individual saints’ legends and serve to identify them in single as well as collective presentation.

The Fourteen Holy Helpers are often illustrated surrounding an image of the Virgin Mary or the scene of the crucifixion of Jesus. Sometimes Christopher bearing the infant Jesus appears leading them or is placed in the center of the group. They are also shown seated or standing on the branches of a tree. They appear in sculpture, fresco, panel painting, and prints, primarily of German origin, especially during the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries. Their feast day is August 8.

Fox, George

Christian mystic, founder of Society of Friends (Quakers)

George Fox was born in 1624 in Leicestershire, England, and grew up in a strict Puritan household. He embraced the life of Puritan austerity so sincerely that when his cousin and a friend invited him, nineteen years old at the time, to join them in their rather inebriated festivity, Fox walked away and spent a sleepless night, aggrieved at the “vanity of youth” (Fox 1998). He thereupon decided to leave his familiar surroundings and commence a personal quest for spiritual enlightenment and salvation.

It was during this time, from about 1643 to 1646, that Fox became increasingly convinced of the superfluity of ordained clergy and the archaic structures of institutionalized religion. During the years 1646–1647, he was frequently affected by divine visions or spiritual “openings” that made him begin to articulate a fresh Christian theology, a reflection on the more traditional teachings of the Christian faith in England at the time. Fox spoke about the brilliant light of God that, unbidden as an act of grace, had suffused his very soul, compelling him to pull away the veil of earthly understanding in order to discriminate authentically between falsehood and truth. Moreover, the “truth” of Christianity is the individual experience of that inner light, he said, insisting that all those who believe in Christ are indeed “the children of light.”

Fox began to preach actively in Nottinghamshire and other districts and inspired many disaffected Christians to join with him, even though Puritan as well as Anglican and Presbyterian leaders all rejected and condemned his teachings. Over the next few years, Fox was imprisoned several times, particularly as his itinerant preaching turned more and more to themes of social justice and ecclesiastical accountability. He was also accused and tried for blasphemy: His persecutors were under the mistaken impression that Fox regarded himself as Christ when he spoke of experiencing the inner light of God. Nevertheless, by 1652, the Religious Society of Friends was officially organized in North Yorkshire. The term “Quaker” began to enter the common parlance, at first pejoratively, yet Fox himself spoke of the necessity to quake and tremble before God, and so he also adopted the name.

As the Society of Friends gained converts, Fox endured increasing persecution at the hands of clerical and civil authorities. The death of Oliver Cromwell in 1658 left England in disarray, and with the return of Charles II to the throne in 1660, fear of political intrigue held the government in its grip. Dissenters such as the Quakers were immediately and obviously under suspicion, and despite their petitioning for freedom from religious persecution and for general tolerance, the “Quaker Act” of 1662 forbade their meeting for worship. In 1664, Parliament passed the Conventicle Act, which made illegal any gathering of more than five people; as most Quakers refused not to meet, many, including women and children, were imprisoned in harsh conditions. Fox and his followers were released and jailed several other times as well for refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, as oath taking had been rejected by Christ and the apostles. As soon as Fox was released from his prison, he would begin his travels again, preaching throughout the English countryside. From May until August 1669, Fox traveled about and preached in Ireland, and in October that same year he married his follower Margaret Fell. In 1670, the Second Conventicle Act was passed; Fox was arrested and jailed in London, as Margaret was in Lancaster.

Thereafter, in 1671–1673, Fox evangelized in the Americas, with some success. He returned to England in May 1673 and was again imprisoned by the end of the year, with other Friends, for gathering and refusing to take the oath. When he was released in 1674, Fox retired to Swarthmoor Hall with Margaret until 1677, when he and his companions went to preach in Holland and Germany. Political and social unrest continued to plague Britain, and all such conflicts only served to make the situation of the Friends more difficult. However, with the accession to the throne of James II in 1685, greater tolerance in forms of worship was encouraged, first by the first Declaration of Indulgence in 1687, and again with the Second Declaration in 1688.

Fox, though in failing health, was then able, along with his company of Friends, to bear witness and to move about more openly and less fearfully, and a Quaker meetinghouse was built that year at Swarthmoor Hall. In 1689, along with the accession to the throne of William and Mary, the Society of Friends welcomed the establishment of the Toleration Act, which set free all prisoners of conscience and religious conviction and permitted complete tolerance for all religious practices, Christian and non-Christian. Happily, George Fox lived to see his movement not merely established, but vindicated. He died in London on January 13, 1691, breathing his last with the words, “All is well; the Seed of God reigns over all, and over death itself.”

Fra Angelico (Guido di Piero)

(c. 1387–1455 C.E.)

Christian friar, artist

One of the greatest Christian artists of the Italian Renaissance, Fra Angelico was born Guido di Piero in about 1387. In 1407, at the age of nineteen, he entered the Dominican order at Fiesole. Other evidence, however, points to a birth date between 1395 and 1400, and entrance to the order between 1418 and 1421. The name Angelico is not documented until fourteen years after the artist's death on February 18, 1455. Although many of Angelico's greatest pieces follow the iconographic rules of the Middle Ages, he most certainly established a new school in religious painting, choosing alternate styles over the traditional polyptych altarpieces.

Perhaps Angelico's most important works are the frescoes for San Marco in Florence and for St. Peter's and the Vatican Palace in Rome. The fifty frescoes assembled for the convent at San Marco are the largest group of related works that survive for any single Renaissance painter. The church's altarpiece, possibly begun in 1440–1441, melds iconography and aesthetics from both the Dominicans and the Medici. Fra Angelico placed the Medicean patron saints Francis, Peter Martyr, Lawrence, and John the Evangelist cloaked in Dominican conventions. The infant Christ holds the orb that symbolizes the world, a motif common in Dominican art. Some scholars have suggested that Angelico was offered an archbishopric in 1446, but exact evidence is lacking.

Angelico stands as a great example of the genius of quattrocento Florence. His influence is felt in his pioneering work with linear and geometric perspective. Perhaps one of his most important innovations was the sacra conversazione (sacred conversation) in which the Virgin, the Infant Christ, and the saints are posed in natural positions and gestures. Angelico's beatification was not made official by the Vatican until 1984.

Frances of Rome

(1384–1440 C.E.)

Christian laywoman, caregiver, mystic

Francesca Busa dei Ponziani, a lay wife and mother, founded a religious congregation called the Oblates of Tor de'

Specchi in Rome. Also called Santa Francesca Romana or Francesca da Roma, she was well known for her visions, private devotions, and charitable work in hospitals.

Francesca, who was born into a wealthy Roman family in 1384, wanted to devote herself to the religious life at an early age. At the age of eleven or twelve, however, she was married to a wealthy noble, Lorenzo Ponziani. They had at least three children. In addition to caring for her family, Francesca lived a life full of prayer and ascetic practices. According to her vita, she experienced a great number of miraculous visions, including visions of Christ, Mary, many saints, and even demons. Francesca is best known for her acts of charity. She begged for alms on behalf of the poor and devoted herself to nursing patients in several Roman hospitals and hospices. Through her dedicated nursing, she gained a reputation for miraculous healing. She is credited through her intercession with healing victims of plague, fever, damaged limbs, leprosy, and many other afflictions.

After receiving a vision that she was to organize a congregation for laywomen, in 1425 Francesca and eight or nine other noble Roman women (including her sister-in-law Vannozza, with whom she was very close) founded a religious congregation of female oblates attached to the Benedictine monks of Monte Oliveto at Santa Maria Nova. The oblates remained in their own homes until 1433, when they moved to a house at Tor de' Specchi in Campitelli. Francesca nursed her husband in their family home until his death in 1436, at which time she became an oblate at Tor de' Specchi and was made the superior. Francesca died on March 9, 1440. Her body is preserved in the church of Santa Francesca Romana (formerly Santa Maria Nova) in the Forum. The congregation continued to grow after her death, and the order is still housed at Tor de' Specchi.

Francesca's life and visions were compiled soon after her death by her confessor. The papal curia began her canonization process immediately, and the accounts of three separate inquests are extant (1440, 1443, and 1451). She was finally canonized in 1608. Several paintings and frescoes illustrating her visions also survive from the mid-fifteenth century at Tor de' Specchi.

Francis of Assisi

(c. 1180–1226 C.E.)

Christian friar, founder, mystic

Celebrated by a vast cross section of medieval society for living a life based on the gospels, Francis of Assisi still ranks among the most revered saints in the history of the Christian church. At first given the name Giovanni, which was later changed to Francesco owing to his father's fondness for France, he was born around 1180 in Assisi, Italy, to Pietro

Bernardone, a wealthy cloth merchant, and his wife, Pica. Although Francis enjoyed a privileged childhood and adolescence, his life took a dramatic turn around 1205 when, while on a military campaign, he had a vision urging him to head back to Assisi. Francis returned home a changed man; he renounced the socializing and materialism of his former life and declared his intention to marry "Lady Poverty."

Soon after this he made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he exchanged clothes with a mendicant and begged for alms. Later, while praying at San Damiano in Assisi, Francis heard a voice speak to him from a crucifix, urging him to restore the decrepit church. A conflict developed when his father discovered that Francis was selling his cloth to finance the project. The denouement remains one of the most famous scenes of Francis's life. In a public act witnessed by the bishop of Assisi, Francis severed ties with his father and gave up all claims to his inheritance. He punctuated the act of renunciation by stripping himself of his clothes, returning them to his father.

In about 1208, Francis received new direction in life. While attending church, he was struck by a reading from the tenth chapter of the Gospel of Matthew in which Jesus asks his disciples to renounce all their possessions, exhort people to repent of their sins, and announce to the world the kingdom of God. The experience compelled him to embrace a life of extreme poverty, living in a hut and begging for his food. Before long, Francis began to attract disciples, for whom he wrote the nonextant Primitive Rule, which was probably a simple gloss of gospel passages. He traveled to Rome in 1209 to receive oral approval for the rule from Pope Innocent III, and in this year the Franciscan order was established. Francis's disciples called themselves the Friars Minor (Little Brothers), emphasizing their humility. Their daily lives revolved around preaching to the concerns of everyday people, engaging in liturgical and private prayer, performing manual labor, and begging. Inspired by the model of Francis and his brothers, Clare of Assisi petitioned Francis to establish a similar society for women, and together they cofounded the Order of the Poor Clares.

Francis's desire to preach to a wider audience encouraged him to set his sights across the Mediterranean Sea. He reached Egypt in 1219 and was present at the sack of Damietta during the Fifth Crusade. While there, Francis managed to arrange a meeting with al-Kamil, the Egyptian vizier. Francis's preaching impressed al-Kamil, but the vizier did not convert. Francis then traveled as a pilgrim to the Holy Land and remained there until affairs at home forced him to return; the expanding order had become a victim of mismanagement and of its own success. In response, in 1221 Francis drew up the Regula prima (First rule), a more distinct rule. After some modification, Pope Honorius III approved a second rule, known as the Regula secunda (Second rule) or Regula bullata (Approved rule), in 1223. During these years, a Third Order developed among the Franciscans. This order incorporated laypeople who lived by Franciscan ideals but remained with their families, pledging obedience but not continence. Francis drew up instructions for these Tertiaries, as they came to be known, around 1221.

Francis is well known for having received the stigmata, the wounds of the passion of Christ, which were given to him in 1224 during an ecstatic trance on Mount La Verna. His health began to decline after this experience, and by 1225 Francis had lost his vision. He died on October 3, 1226. In a final act of humility, he had asked to be buried on the Colle d'Inferno, a notorious hill outside of Assisi where criminals were executed, but instead he was laid to rest at the church of St. George in Assisi. There Pope Gregory IX canonized him on July 16, 1228; on May 25, 1230, his relics were translated to the great double church of St. Francis, which had been erected in his honor in the city.

Francis has continued to appeal to people of all faiths throughout the centuries, especially thanks to legends that express his deep affinity with animals, most famously his sermon to the birds. Yet, in spite of many twentieth-century writers' anachronistic attempts to fashion him into a hippie, nature-lover, and proto-environmentalist, it should be kept in mind that Francis was, above all, a disciple of Christ and an obedient son of the Roman church, which celebrates his feast on October 4.

Francis of Sales

Roman Catholic bishop, founder, missionary, reformer

Francis of Sales, bishop of Geneva and founder (with Jane Frances de Chantal) of the Order of the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin (Visitandines), was instrumental in the revival of Catholicism in seventeenth-century France. He was beatified in 1661 and canonized in 1665 by Pope Alexander VII; in 1877, he was proclaimed a doctor of the church by Pope Pius IX. His feast day is January 24.

Born in Savoy of noble lineage in 1567, Francis was groomed for a legal career. After studying philosophy under the Jesuits at the University of Paris, he received his law degree from Padua in 1591. Against his father's wishes, Francis aspired to the priesthood. Through family connections he was nominated provost of Geneva by the pope, a prestigious position that led his father to relent. Francis was ordained a priest in 1593. He soon became active in missionary efforts in the heavily Calvinist Savoyard region of Chablais. He persevered in this dangerous work and won many converts to Catholicism through his eloquent preaching.

In 1599, Francis was named coadjutor bishop of Geneva, succeeding to the bishopric in 1602. Since he could not reside in Calvinist-controlled Geneva, he took up residence in nearby Annecy. While striving to restore Catholicism throughout his diocese, he began to implement the reforms of the Council of Trent (1545–1563), holding clerics and monastic establishments to rigorous standards of morality and behavior. An able administrator, he also dedicated himself to pastoral care; he preached regularly, emphasizing the need for all Catholics, whatever their station, to embrace a life of devotion to Jesus Christ. Francis was a voluminous correspondent and also wrote many influential spiritual treatises, including Introduction à la vie devote (Introduction to the devout life, 1609) and Traite de l'amour de Dieu (Treatise on the love of God, 1616). In his lifetime he was celebrated for his devotional writings and vigorous reforming efforts.

His friendship with Jane Frances de Chantal (1572–1641), a widowed French noblewoman whom he met in 1604, led to the foundation in 1610 of the Visitandines, envisioned as an order for women who could not bear the austerities of the cloister yet wanted to embrace a religious life through charitable works. The Visitandines grew rapidly throughout France. Contemporary opposition moderated the founding vision, however, and the Visitandines became primarily a contemplative order.

Francis's influence proved long-lasting. In the mid-nineteenth century, future saint John Bosco founded the Society of St. Francis de Sales (Salesians), dedicated to the Christian education of poor boys. The Salesians now educate needy children of both sexes.

Fry, Elizabeth

Quaker social reformer

Elizabeth Gurney Fry was a Quaker social reformer. Her organized efforts to improve the lives of the poor and imprisoned set new standards and inspired others in England to engage in charitable activities of social uplift, helping the ill, the institutionalized, the homeless, and others in need. She influenced the treatment of the disadvantaged in her own era, and groups associated with her name and ideals are still active today.

Elizabeth Fry, Quaker philanthropist and prison reformer. (Perry Castaneda library)

Born May 21, 1780, in Norwich, England, she grew up in a pious family. Her father, John Gurney, a businessman, and her mother, Catherine, were devout Quakers. Her mother devoted a part of each day to improving the lives of the poor, and she raised her children to worship silently two hours each day. Elizabeth, the eldest of twelve children, helped raise her brothers and sisters. At eighteen, she heard American Quaker William Savery preach in Norwich. This experience changed her life. From then on she involved herself more in social service. She gathered clothes for the poor, taught Sunday school in her home, helped children learn to read, and visited the sick.

Elizabeth married Joseph Fry in 1800, and they eventually had eleven children. Balancing mothering and ministering to others, she started her preaching ministry in the Society of Friends (Quakers) in 1811. At thirty-two, she heard about the deplorable conditions in Newgate Prison. Visiting Newgate, she found 300 women and their children crowded together in cramped quarters. Women already sentenced for crimes and others awaiting trial were all mixed together, sane and insane, ill and well, innocent and hardened offenders. Many slept without bedding or clothes for sleeping. She saw two women prisoners taking clothes from a dead child to clothe their own children. The indignities of such chaotic conditions moved Fry to work for change.

Despite officials' initial resistance, Fry furnished clothing for needy prisoners and set up a school and a chapel in the jail. In 1817, she and other Quakers organized the Association for the Improvement of the Female Prisoners in Newgate and involved other concerned Friends. Fry's idea of giving prisoners uniforms and numbers was meant to ensure warmth and to make it easier to identify and reward good behavior. Fry was also outspoken on capital punishment, calling it an evil generating evil results. She campaigned for lesser sentences for women condemned to death for offenses such as forgery.

Fry also began small libraries for men stationed in the 500 Coast Guard posts in England in the 1820s. Encountering many beggars in Brighton, she responded to their plight, forming the Brighton District Visiting Society, a service organization to help the poor. She also devoted time to help the homeless of London, patients in mental institutions, and those in workhouses and hospitals. She organized a school for nurses, training the women to comfort patients both spiritually and physically. This work influenced Florence Nightingale (1820–1910).

Tirelessly active on behalf of the disadvantaged, Fry left a legacy inspiring to service workers. She wrote that she rejoiced to see the day when so many women of every rank, instead of spending their time in trifling and unprofitable pursuits, were engaged in works of usefulness and charity. In England and Canada there are still Elizabeth Fry Societies dedicated to serving prisoners and others. She died in 1845.

Fujiwara no Kamatari

Shinto leader, reformer

Fujiwara no Kamatari was a leading proponent of the Taika reforms in seventh-century Japan and founder of the Fujiwara family, which dominated the imperial court during much of the Heian period (794–1192). He was posthumously deified as a daimyōjin (great god) and enshrined in Danzan Jinja.

Kamatari was born in 614 into the Nakatomi family, which served the court by performing Shinto rituals, an assignment that was deprived of its former status since the introduction of Buddhism (traditionally dated 552). By the early seventh century, the Soga family, which had been the main advocate of the introduction of Buddhism and therefore a long-standing opponent of the Nakatomi family, had established itself as the dominant clan. In the 640s, Kamatari associated himself with Prince Naka no Ōe (626–671), who feared that the growing ambitions of the Soga family could usurp the imperial sovereignty. With Kamatari as one of the leading figures, a coup d'état was successfully carried out in 645. The Soga family was defeated, Naka no Ōe was designated heir to the throne, and Kamatari was appointed to the highest administrative office. Subsequently, Kamatari and Naka no Ōe initiated a program of social, political, and economic reforms known as the Taika reforms, taking Tang China for their model. Naka no Ōe bestowed the new family name of Fujiwara upon Kamatari shortly before the latter's demise in 669.

Kamatari's remains were initially entombed in the province of Settsu (part of present-day prefectures Osaka and Hyōgo). They were reburied on Mt. Danzan (located in the present-day city of Sakurai, Nara prefecture) by Kamatari's eldest son, Jōe (645–714), a Buddhist monk. Jōe built a thirteen-story pagoda in 678, and later, in 701, a sanctuary in which a statue of Kamatari was erected. It was not until the separation of Shinto and Buddhism (shinbutsu bunri) during the Meiji period (1868–1912) that the complex was declared to be a jinja (Shinto shrine), although the syncretistic amalgamation of Shinto and Buddhist elements had hitherto characterized the history of the veneration of Kamatari's spirit.

The statue of Kamatari allegedly started to crack and the mountain began to rumble whenever the spirit of Kamatari wanted to warn the political leaders against potential threat, whereupon the court would dispatch messengers, whose prayers and offerings restored the statue and averted the threat. In the fourteenth century, the title danzan gongen (Mt. Danzan avatar, or manifestation) was bestowed by Emperor Godaigo, and in the fifteenth century, Emperor Go-hanazono conferred upon Kamatari the title danzan daimyōjin (Mt. Danzan great godhead).

Fujiwara Seika

Confucian scholar

As the first Zen monk to abandon Buddhist orders and become a professional Neo-Confucian scholar, Fujiwara Seika marks an important turning point in the history of Japanese spirituality. Born in 1561, he first entered a monastery at the age of seven. After his father and elder brother were killed and the family estate destroyed in a military conflict in 1578, he entered Sōkokuji, one of the Gozan Zen temples in Kyoto. Distinguishing himself in both Zen practice and Confucian studies, he soon rose to the position of chief seat, second in rank only to the abbot. In 1590, Hideyoshi (1538–1598), the country's military overlord, ordered him to meet with envoys from Korea, and in 1593 he was granted an audience with the Ming ambassadors. In 1591, at Hideyoshi's base in Kyushu, he met Tokugawa Ieyasu (1542–1616), the future founder of the Tokugawa shogunate (1600–1868), and Ieyasu invited him to Edo to lecture on the great Tang dynasty work Zhen-guan zhengyao (The essentials of government of the Zhen-guan period [627–649]). The task of unifying and pacifying Japan after more than a century of warfare had created a great need for Chinese works on military strategy and the art of government.

It was probably in 1598 that Seika withdrew from the monastic order, inspired in part by his meetings with visiting Korean Confucian scholars in 1590. From 1598 to 1600, he enjoyed a close relationship with another Korean Confucian, Kang Hang (1568–1618), brought back as a captive by Hideyoshi, and the two worked on preparing Neo-Confucian editions of the Confucian classics. In 1600, Ieyasu summoned Seika to an audience in Kyoto, where, clad in the robe of a Confucian scholar, Seika engaged in a vehement debate with some representatives of the Buddhist establishment. Seika declined Ieyasu's subsequent invitation to enter government service, but in 1604 he met Hayashi Razan (1583–1657) and accepted him as a disciple. In 1607, Razan entered Ieyasu's service as an expert on Chinese books and the composition of legal and diplomatic documents. He continued to serve the next two shoguns for another fifty years, gradually establishing a position for himself and his descendants as the leading Confucian teacher and historian in direct shogunal service. Seika remained inclined toward a reclusive life, but he was avidly sought out as a teacher by a number of powerful men.

Seika refused to condemn the Lu-Wang intuitional school in the name of the rationalist Cheng-Zhu orthodoxy, emphasizing in his early correspondence with Razan the extent of the agreement between the original teachings of Lu Xiangshan (1139–1193) and Zhu Xi (1130–1200) against Razan's insistence on the need to reject the former for its affinities with Buddhism and Daoism. He counseled Razan, "Once the student breaks through to the fundamental unitive insight, he will know for himself without doubt whether they are the same or different, and not by a knowledge based on seeing and hearing" (SGT 1975, 13: 523). This emphasis on unity over difference was influenced by the Zen idea that different doors lead ultimately to the same truth, by the Lu-Wang school's tolerant attitude toward other teachings, and by Lin Zhaoen's (1517–1598) insistence on "the unity of the three teachings."

In his late work, Daigaku yōryaku (Epitome of the great learning), Seika, under Lin's influence, explains the key Neo-Confucian practice of gewu (the method by which knowledge is extended) as meaning to "eliminate" the "things" (or desires) from the mind so that the luminous awareness innate to the mind will naturally shine forth. This luminous awareness is an awareness of "perfect goodness," an undifferentiated state that exists primordially before the splitting of reality into yin and yang, so its "extension" can only be something achieved without effort. Seika laid a broad and solid foundation for Japan's Edo-period turn to Confucian learning, presenting Confucianism as something fully capable of competing with Zen in the realm of spirituality but also as something much more capable than Zen of development in the direction of political philosophy and practical learning.

G

Galgani, Gemma

(1878–1903 C.E.)

Roman Catholic visionary, mystic

Born to a middle-class family in Camigliano near Lucca, Tuscany, in 1878, at a very early age Gemma Galgani exhibited an unusually heightened spirituality. She was said to enter deeply into prayer as young as age five. When she was eight years old, her mother died, and Gemma thereupon attended a local convent school run by the sisters of St. Zita, where she was a diligent student. However, chronic illness and a dwindling family fortune caused her to leave the school after seven years. In 1896, Gemma's father died, leaving Gemma and her six remaining siblings in poverty. By 1899, Gemma had gone to live with the Giannini, a prominent family in Lucca who knew her family and were also benefactors of the Passionist order. However, chronic illness continued to haunt Gemma, and she died of tuberculosis on April 11, 1903. Best known for exhibiting stigmata over the course of four years from 1899 to 1903, Gemma Galgani was beatified in 1933 and canonized as the "Daughter of the Passion" in 1940. She is buried in the chapel of the Passionist convent in Lucca, Italy, and her feast day is April 11.

From an early age, Gemma Galgani had manifested an unusual sensitivity to the passion of Christ. At her first eucharist when she was nine years old, she is said to have experienced a mystical vision of the crucified Christ. Throughout her short life, she had numerous other visions of Jesus, transforming her spiritual consciousness into a mystical apprehension of Christ as the suffering servant, as well as visions of angels, of the Trinity, and of the Virgin Mary. Gemma also experienced what, in her words, were apparitions and torments of a demonic nature. However, Gemma's devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and her oft-stated desire to imitate Christ completely in suffering in order to expiate the sins of the world, caused her to receive the grace of the stigmata during Holy Week in June 1899, and thereafter on different occasions over the next three years.

The claim of stigmata, even if witnessed, has always stirred loud controversy as well as deep devotion, and none more so than the case of Gemma Galgani. Nevertheless, official and nonclerically verified documentation records that on the backs and palms of Gemma's hands, as well as on the tops and soles of her feet, there appeared deep lacerations, partly flowing with blood; additionally, the wounds of the hands seemed to be accompanied by a fleshy swelling in the shape and size of large nails. There was a laceration as if made by a sword or a lance on her side, and there were instances of her experiencing, along with the wounds, the bloodshed of the crown of thorns, the scars of the scourges, and severe pains in her left shoulder (on which Jesus bore the cross). At all times, Gemma demanded that her experiences not become publicly exposed, and it was only after her death that her extraordinary life became known outside the walls of her Italian town.

Gall

(c. 560–c. 650 C.E.)

Christian monk, missionary

A companion of the Irish missionary Columbanus (543–615), Gall settled as a hermit with a group of disciples in what is now Switzerland, where his cult gave rise to the monastic center bearing his name. Gall was born around 560 and given to the monastery of Bangor as a youth. Instructed by Comgall and Columbanus, he excelled in his studies and was most likely ordained a priest before leaving for the continent with Columbanus in 590. Gall assisted Columbanus in the monastic foundations of Annegray, Luxeuil, and Fontaine and traveled with him in exile as far as Arbon.

Gall refused to accompany Columbanus to Italy, however, most likely on account of illness. As punishment for his disobedience, his superior forbade him to celebrate mass. Settling in the wilderness near the Stienbach River in 612, Gall attracted a small number of disciples. The community maintained Irish monastic tradition, living in separate cells with a common house of prayer, following the strict Rule of Columbanus and occupying their time with prayer, work, fasting, and reading. Gall's gifts of counsel and conversion increased his spiritual authority in the region. He preferred the contemplative life of a hermit and preacher and obeyed Columbanus's prohibition, refusing the bishopric of Constance and turning down the abbacy of the monastery of Luxeuil. He died in about 650 while visiting Arbon. His body was returned to the hermitage, where it was buried behind the altar.

Shortly after his death, Gall's settlement disbanded. Considered an exceptionally sacred spot because of his relics, the site attracted pilgrims, was used as a secure deposit for treasure, and served as a place of refuge. Although he received no formal canonization, Gall was referred to as sanc-tus within a few years of his death, and his name is included in ninth-century martyrologies. The establishment of a formal monastic community named for the saint on the site in 720 by Otmar further promoted his cult. The monastery grew into a center of monastic spirituality and literary production, and over time, St. Gall's cult spread to 231 places of veneration, primarily in Switzerland, Germany, and northern Italy. Many miracles are associated with the saint, including the exorcism of Duke Gunzo's daughter and the prescience of Columbanus's death in 615. St. Gall is most often depicted with a bear, which, according to legend, brought a log for his fire at his command. His feast is celebrated on October 16.

Gampopa

Buddhist master

Gampopa, born in 1079, was a Tibetan Buddhist master famed for his great literary knowledge, his accomplishment in meditation, and his unification of monasticism and the esoteric teachings of Buddhist tantra. Originally trained in the monastic environment of the Kadampa order, Gampopa met with the tantric master Milarepa (1052–1135) and became his principal student. He established a monastic community at the Gampo Mountain and gained fame for his spiritual insights and ability to guide his students in the practice of meditation.

Gampopa's tradition hails him as an emanation of the bodhisattva Candrakumara prophesied by the Buddha. As a youth he studied medicine, became a doctor, and led a married life. When his wife and children died prematurely, Gampopa was ordained into the monastic Kadampa tradition, where he quickly became learned and skilled in meditation. He heard of the master Milarepa and set out to request guidance from this accomplished yogi of the mountains. Although Gampopa already was a master in his own right, his meeting with Milarepa led to a profound awakening that exposed Gampopa's previous realization as flawed. Gampopa did not stay long with Milarepa but nevertheless became Milarepa's foremost student and lineage holder. On Milarepa's advice, he went to the Gampo Mountain and established a center for the ordained Buddhist community—the first of its kind for the Kagyu School to which Milarepa belonged.

Gampopa was known for his great accomplishment in meditation, which he often demonstrated with his clairvoyant powers and supernatural abilities, as well as his great erudition in the classic Indian Mahayana scriptures. He successfully combined the Kadampa and Kagyu schools into a single stream of spiritual practice. This tradition was later to become known as Sutramahamudra, indicating Gampopa's synthesis of the Kadampa (sutra) and Kagyu (mahamudra) traditions. Gampopa's greatest legacy for the future was perhaps his classic treatise Thar pa rin po che'i rgyan (The jewel ornament of liberation). This text, which beautifully exemplifies his ability to unify two great Buddhist traditions, was the first indigenous Tibetan treatise in the later-popular genre of scriptures elucidating a graded path to enlightenment.

In The Jewel Ornament of Liberation, Gampopa lays out the entire Mahayana path and explains in great detail about the potential for enlightenment, the value of a religious life, the benefits of following a spiritual guide, the way to apply the Buddha's message, the ultimate achievement of buddhahood, and, finally, the ability of enlightened beings to benefit anyone caught up in the trouble of cyclic existence. The treatise is a most influential scripture and continues to be studied in great detail at all Kagyu institutions of higher learning.

Gandhi, Mohandas K.

Hindu political leader, holy man

Mohandas K. Gandhi was a prolific author, a political leader for the independence of India from British colonial domination, a major international figure, and a religious inspiration to many. This type of status seemed unlikely for a young man who was admittedly shy, bookish, diminutive, and self-conscious. He was held by his contemporaries, however, in high esteem, as is evident by his title Mahatma (great soul) and the affectionate name of Bapu (father). Gandhi's political prestige was enhanced by the meager dress and humble lifestyle that accompanied his transformation into a Hindu holy man later in his life.

Gandhi was born in 1869 into a caste of grocers in an area heavily influenced by the Jain religion and its philosophy of nonviolence. Although married at an early age, he would later condemn the practice of child marriage. While a student, he read the Bible, but he was more influenced by the Bhagavad Gita of his own culture. The works of Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910) and John Ruskin (1819–1900) also influenced him.

After completing his education in England, Gandhi returned to India to discover that his mother had died. His legal career began awkwardly, but in 1893 he secured a position in South Africa, where he became aware of legal restrictions on Indian immigrants. He experienced discrimination personally when he was thrown off a train. In South Africa, Gandhi became a champion of indentured laborers, led a protest that resulted in a small victory against a poll tax, and played an instrumental role in establishing the Natal Indian Congress, which aimed to promote goodwill among European and Indian communities. He exposed the problems of Indians in South Africa with his “Green Pamphlet,” composed on a visit to India. Upon his return to South Africa, he was falsely accused of smuggling workers into the country and condemning political authorities in the press.

In South Africa, Gandhi established the Phoenix Settlement, a self-supporting community intended to produce a new kind of human being, along with a weekly journal called Indian Opinion, in 1904. He also started another experiment in communal living called the Tolstoy Farm. During 1906, Gandhi led a struggle to oppose the Black Act, which required all Indians wishing to reside or trade in the colony to register. In 1909, he published a work of political theory entitled Hind Swaraj (Indian Home Rule) about the detrimental effects of modern civilization in India.

In Europe, Gandhi volunteered his services for ambulance work during World War I. After returning to India, he established the Satyagraha Ashram in Ahmadabad. During 1916, he worked to abolish the system of indentured labor in India, and the following year he was elected president of the Gujarat Sabha. He later became involved politically in the Khilafat Incident, which involved the internment of two Muslim brothers for their journalistic opinions, and called for a work stoppage to protest the Rowlatt Bills, laws giving the government greater leeway in fighting terrorism.

Gandhi's arrest for opposition to the government precipitated communal violence that led to many casualties. Although Gandhi was devastated by the violence and the lack of success of the work stoppage, he had become an all-India public figure through the publicity surrounding this event. In 1919, he began to advocate widespread noncooperation with the British; the following year, he became president of the Home Rule League. Gandhi was forced to abandon his campaign of civil disobedience when it resulted in violence. Soon, he was arrested and pleaded guilty to inciting disaffection toward the government, but he was released from prison early for an emergency appendectomy.

By 1925, Gandhi began to devote his attention to the cause of khadi, the spinning and weaving of clothing to help India become more self-sufficient. As part of a program of civil disobedience, he made his famous march to the sea to make salt in protest of the salt tax. Further incarceration awaited Gandhi. After 1937, he withdrew from politics and administration to pursue his utopian vision of nonviolence and home rule through work centered in the village of Sevagram in central India. He also wrote for a paper called Harijan (Children of God), which was named after the untouchables of India. In the 1940s, Gandhi was involved in the “Quit India” movement. But although India won independence in 1947, he lamented the division of India and the communal carnage that resulted during 1946 and 1947. Finally, in 1948 a Hindu fundamentalist assassinated Gandhi, whose last uttered word was the name of Rama, his personal deity. Gandhi was a charismatic figure and an ascetic who had an aura of saintliness as well as an active and worldly persona.

Gangamata Goswamini

(18th cent. C.E.)

Hindu Vaishnava ruler, renunciant

A renounced female Vaishnava saint from the eastern province of Bengal, India, Gangamata Goswamini is celebrated by Hindu Vaishnavas of the Chaitanya school even to the present. Born to King Naresh Narayana in the state of Bengal in the eighteenth century, she was given the name Saci (pronounced shu [“u” as in “sun”] -chee). It is said that from early childhood, she constantly absorbed herself in literature and the sacred texts of Vaishnavism. Although her royal parents desired a marriage for their exceptional daughter, Saci refused. Shortly after the rule of the kingdom fell to her following the death of her parents, she delegated her royal responsibilities to others and went on pilgrimage to the holy places.

Saci's travels took her to the Jagannatha (Krishna) temple of Puri in the neighboring southern state of Orissa. From there, she was further inspired to travel to Vrindaban, the holiest land for worshippers of the deity Krishna, found within the rural sacred area known as Vraja, about 80 miles south of Delhi. In the holy village, she found her spiritual preceptor, Haridasa Pundit, a teacher in the Vaishnava lineage beginning with Krishna Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533), the devotional revivalist. Haridasa's spiritual master was Ananta Acharya, whose master was Gadadhara Pundit, a close associate of Chaitanya's.

Saci proved her intense desire to become absorbed in spiritual life by renouncing her fine dress and jewelry, along with her identity as a princess, and adopting the simple dress of a beggar. She became immersed in a humble life of service and devotion under the tutelage of her spiritual guide, who initiated her with the Krishna mantra, formally establishing her as his disciple. Because of Saci's great strides in renunciation and dedicated practices with other saintly female Vaishnavas, Haridasa Pundit charged her with a mission—returning to Puri in Orissa in order to further the teachings of Chaitanya and his immediate disciples, the six goswamis of Vrindaban. She quickly established herself as a spiritual authority in Puri, so much so that the presiding king, Mukunda Deva, became her disciple and even insisted that others accept her as a spiritual preceptor. It was in Puri that Saci became known as Gangamata Goswamini. Her succession of disciples continues to this day, with the disciples of her lineage residing primarily in the eastern province of Orissa.

Gangasati (Gangabai)

(dates unknown)

Hindu poet

Gangasati, a medieval Hindu Gujarati saint-poet of the nijiyā tradition, composed about fifty-one bhajans (hymns) on various themes, such as the importance of a guru, the foundation of spiritual practice, the everyday life of a devotee, the nature of bhakti (devotion), words and their mystic nature, yoga, spiritual training, and the grace of the guru. Her bhajans are very popular, particularly among the bhajaniks (hymn singers) of the Saurashtra region of India.

Not much is authentically known about this woman poet. However, traditional accounts say that she was born in a Vaghela Rajput (warrior) community and that she married a man named Kahalbha, or Kahalsang, who was also a follower of the nijiyi path. The couple had a son, Ajobha, who was married to one Paanbai. According to legend, Gangasati decided to take samadhi (the final stage of yogic renunciation) after her husband decided to do so, following an event in which he resurrected a cow to prove his spiritual power (though he felt guilty at reversing the wishes of the gods). He asked Gangasati to delay taking samadhi in order to give spiritual knowledge to their daughter-in-law first. Gangasati agreed. She composed one bhajan a day on a spiritual theme to sing to Paanbai. After fifty-one days of this, she took samadhi.

In one bhajan, Gangasati contrasts abhayaas (practice) with imagination and argues that a devotee should perceive a higher level of reality only through abhayasa. Once that level is actualized, he or she must live in total solitude, which she defines as being devoid of everything, even spiritual practice. In another bhajan, she says that vacan, “a word,” “a promise,” or “a vow,” has created fourteen lokas (worlds), the sun, the moon, and maya (illusion), and therefore one must try to know the vacan.

Gangasati was one of the few medieval poets who recognized the spiritual importance of language and the need to practice spirituality through language. Yet in another bhajan, she reflects on the relationship between vacan and time and says that time cannot devour things that are in vacana, as it is in the later entity that things acquire their perfection. Time, in other words, can devour only imperfect things. The idea of the guru as a perfected teacher is central in the nijiyi tradition, and therefore it is not surprising that many of Gangasati's bhajans deal with various aspects of guru.

Gargi

(8th century B.C.E.?)

Hindu sage

Gargi is one of only two women who engage the great sage, Yajñavalkya (eighth century B.C.E.?), in philosophical debate in the Brihadara Ayaka Upanishad (c. 600 B.C.E.). She herself thus appears as a sage, a rare example of such a type in Hinduism.

Gargi Vacaknavi appears in this work as the only female member of a group of brahmins present at the sacrifice sponsored by a king named Janaka. At this brahmodya (theological discussion), each of the brahmins questions Yajñavalkya on some aspect of ritual in an attempt to defeat him and obtains the sacrificial gift of one thousand cows. Very little is said about Gargi's personality or her marital status, and it is not directly said that she is a brahmin.

Gargi's qualifications to be a participant in the brahmodya are indicated by two facts. First, her name, Gargi, labels her as a member of the Garga clan, which is mentioned along with other ancient ritualistic authorities already in Kathaka Samhita 13.12. Second, Yajñavalkya's warning, “Don't ask too many questions, Gargi, or your head will shatter apart!” parallels warnings found in several Vedic texts in the context of debates about the meaning of ritual. The case of Vidagdha Shakalya losing his head in a brahmodya suggests the fate that may fall upon someone who is not aware of correct debating procedures. This seemingly real threat survives in the Upanishads as a threat in ritual and theological debates. The fact that Gargi's head remains intact when the debate continues confirms her status as a person knowledgeable about the Veda and about the procedures. In addition, the style of her questions, systematically interrogating Yajñavalkya as to “what the world is woven back and forth upon,” also suggests that she is qualified to engage the great sage in debates about cosmological and metaphysical issues.

Gargi continues to press Yajñavalkya for the answer to her question. Yajñavalkya finally answers and reveals that the world is woven back and forth on brahman, the imperishable. Upon realizing Yajñavalkya's superior knowledge, Gargi, as a qualified colleague, judges that, indeed, Yajñavalkya is the wisest of the brahmins present.

Gargi's active participation in the Upanishadic dialogues suggests that women in the Vedic period must have had access to the study of the sacred texts, the Vedas. They may have been more active in the religious sphere during this period than they were in the later Hindu tradition, when, along with the shudras (members of the lowest caste), they were barred from studying the sacred texts.

Garvey, Marcus Moziah

Christian social activist

Marcus Moziah Garvey was a black Jamaican born to parents of unmixed African ancestry in 1887. His early years were spent in England, where he developed a sense of duty for the plight of blacks throughout the world. He returned to Jamaica in 1914, establishing the Universal Negro Improvement and Conservation Association (UNIA).

In 1916, Garvey traveled to the United States to raise funds to establish an industrial school in Jamaica. However, after finding in the American black a hunger for his message of self-determination and racial pride, he established a base for UNIA in Harlem and stayed. Using the slogans "Africa for the Africans at home and abroad," and "Up you mighty race, you can accomplish what you will," Garvey stirred the black masses as no one before him had ever done. Garvey's UNIA staged elaborate parades and gatherings while dressing its followers in colorful uniforms and encouraging them to announce that they were members of a new republic. Garvey preached a new gospel of black racial pride and a united Africa under the rule of black men. He even negotiated with the United Nations and Liberia for a way to resettle blacks of the diaspora back to their native Africa. In this way, Garvey pointed the black masses toward Africa as the land of their hope and future.

By also preaching that God was black and had created the black man to be the equal of all humanity, and by encouraging comparisons between himself and the suffering Christ, Garvey was embraced as a messianic figure—his followers often referring to him as the "Black Moses." Blacks of the diaspora recognized that God had gifted Garvey to lead the black masses into deeper levels of self-acceptance, economic self-sufficiency, and racial revitalization. Through Garvey, "mother Africa" became the focal point of black hope, and blacks throughout the world enjoyed a season of renewal. Thus, although he had nothing to do with the movement directly, Garvey deeply influenced the nascent Rastafarian movement.

The UNIA reached its zenith in 1921, boasting a membership of more than 6 million blacks from throughout the United States, the West Indies, and Africa. In 1927, Garvey was deported from the United States and sent back to his native Jamaica as an undesirable alien. In 1935, he relocated permanently to London, where he died a pauper and in silent isolation in 1940.

Gautama (Pali: Gotama)

(c. 5th cent. B.C.E.)

Founder of Buddhism

Siddhartha Gautama was the Shakyamuni Buddha of the present cosmic era. His given name was Siddhartha; Gautama was the name of the kshatriya clan to which his community of Shakyas belonged. To the Buddhists, he is known as a tathagata (thus gone), mahasamana (great ascetic), and jina (conqueror). Most Buddhists honor him as the fifth century B.C.E. founder of the existing Buddhist community. He was generally addressed by his disciples as Bhagava (Lord). Various epithets used for him define him as having attained perfection in all domains. His wisdom is considered perfect, as are his physical form and manner. As a perfectly enlightened being, Gautama is understood to have perfected various virtues (paramitas) over the course of numerous lifetimes. These prodigious efforts prepared him to awake fully to the true nature of reality just as other buddhas had awakened before him.

Siddhartha was born in the Lumbini Grove near Kapilavastu (now identified variously with Piprahwa in Uttar Pradesh, India; and Tilaurakot, Nepal). His father, Shuddhodana, was the chief ruler of Kapilavastu. His mother, Mahamaya, died seven days after giving birth to him. He was brought up by his aunt and stepmother, Gautami Prajapati. On the basis of his bodily marks, it was predicted by brahmins gathered at the naming ceremony that he would either become a universal king or a buddha. The young Gautama enjoyed a life of great ease and luxury and got married at age sixteen to Yashodhara (also known as Rahulamata), the daughter of Suppabuddha.

When Gautama was twenty-nine, he saw the four omens (an old man, a sick man, a dead man, and a recluse), was blessed with a son (named Rahula), and left home on the same day in search of higher truth, as he found the birth of a child another form of worldly attachment. Away from the palace of his father, he cut off his own hair and put on the garments of a forest-dweller. He wandered around in the forests for six years, meeting different renunciants and practicing severe austerities that no human being had previously undertaken. But after realizing the folly of extreme asceticism, he decided to abandon these practices. Finally, he attained enlightenment (buddhahood) under the bodhi tree near Gaya in India. He became an embodiment of human nature perfected and came to possess supernatural powers. Following his enlightenment, Gautama became a teacher and delivered his first sermon, known as Turning the Wheel of Dharma, in the Deer Park at Sarnath near Varanasi. He started his own monastic order and preached in the Gangetic basin of northern India for forty-five years.

The ultimate goal of the Buddha's teachings was to lead people to nirvana, freedom from the cycle of birth and death. Through his Four Noble Truths, he taught that the world is full of suffering; that suffering is caused by desire, ignorance, and attachment; that this suffering can be removed by destroying its cause; and that in order to end suffering, one must follow the Eightfold Path (right view, right aim, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration). Through his doctrine of karma, he taught that every individual is the maker of his or her own destiny. The theme of universal compassion "for the good of the world" appears recurrently in his teachings. Many fascinating stories in Buddhist literature talk about the Buddha's love for animals, children, and the downtrodden. He also believed that an individual should avoid the extremes of both severe asceticism and luxury. Because he felt that everything is impermanent, he did not believe in the existence of any immortal soul or god. Meditation formed the basis both of his teachings and of his spiritual quest for the attainment of enlightenment. He also opened the doors of his order to women, though after some initial reluctance. He refused to acknowledge the sanctity of the Indian caste system and accepted disciples from the lowest untouchable communities.

Very little information as to the personality of Gautama is available. In the legends, he is described as a golden-hued man whose voice had eight qualities (fluency, intelligibility, sweetness, audibility, continuity, distinctness, depth, and resonance). He was endowed with the thirty-two marks of a Great Man. He had a fascinating quality and was described as seductive by his opponents. Texts describe him as handsome, perfect in complexion and stature. He loved solitude and often spent long periods of time away from human haunts, allowing only one monk to bring him his meals. According to one account, it was his practice to spend part of the day in seclusion, but he was always ready to see anyone who urgently desired his spiritual counsel. He often declared that he was among the happy ones of this earth, and he remained unmoved by opposition or abuse.

The Buddha was extremely devoted to his disciples. Sometimes he attended to the sick himself, thus setting an example to his followers. In return for his devotion, his disciples adored him. Many stories in Buddhist literature point toward his keen interest in the spiritual growth and development of his disciples. He readily encouraged them to achieve their goals. He was never overanxious to get converts: Whenever a visitor declared himself his follower, he would urge him to take time to consider. It was his regular habit to greet with a smile anyone who visited him, inquiring after his well-being and thus putting him at his ease, and when anyone sought permission to question him, he made no conditions as to the topic of discussion.

Gautama was an innovator and a charismatic personality. He had a unique reputation among his contemporaries as a teacher and trainer of the human heart and an accomplished human being. Within his own lifetime, people attributed to him the status of a saint, and a large proportion of the population of northern India converted to Buddhism because of him. He predicted his own death, which took place at Kushinagara after he ate at the house of Cunda the

Smith, apparently of food poisoning. He died (or attained nirvana) at the age of eighty. He admonished his monks for the last time with these words: “Decay is inherent in all component things; work out your salvation with diligence.” His mortal remains were divided into eight equal parts and stupas (shrines) were built over them.

Ge Hong (Ke Hung)

Daoist alchemist

Ge Hong was the first Daoist practitioner to proclaim the search for immortality a serious endeavor and thus became China's first great alchemist. Born in 283, Ge was originally from Tanyang in Jiangsu province. During his lifetime he held several high military and civil positions in Canton in southern China. He is also remembered as a prominent physician. A strong proponent of Confucian sociopolitical thinking, he was considered an expert in Confucian thought. Ge saw himself as a Daoist in his inner being and a Confucian in his social life. His doctrine combines Daoism with Confucian virtues. He was opposed to the Neo-Daoist “pure talk” (pingdan) techniques of the School of Mystery (Xu-anxue) of some of his contemporaries, a practice he considered devoid of religious value. He felt that physical exercises and sexual practices were merely methods for prolonging life, and one needed to find and imbibe the true elixir for immortality.

The compendium entitled Shenxian zhuan (Biographies of the divine immortals), dated 320, is traditionally attributed to Ge. Ge's most famous work, Baopuzi (Master who embraces simplicity), was written in about 310 or 317. This second work contains seventy chapters dealing with Daoism, immortals, medical prescriptions, self-cultivation practices, Confucianism, and Ge's social and political views. Written like an encyclopedia, it focuses on external alchemy and self-cultivation practices to achieve immortality. There are formulas, lists of ingredients, and alchemical procedures as well as advice on calming the mind, breath control techniques, and various calisthenics. Many of the visualization exercises are focused on Laozi, whom Ge credited with originating techniques for guiding energy through the body as well as with techniques of alchemy and dietetics.

Unlike European alchemists, who sought to produce gold, Chinese alchemists sought immortality. Chinese alchemists attempted to create an elixir, or pill, that could be imbibed that would re-create the cosmic processes of change from yin to yang and thus cause one to live forever. It was hoped that through the manipulation of specific minerals such as cinnabar and mercury, clues to immortality would be revealed.

Gebre Mikael

Roman Catholic monk

Gebre Mikael (or Gäbrä Mika'el, lit. “the servant of [archangel] Michael”) was a nineteenth-century Christian Orthodox monk in Ethiopia who broke with his church's century-old condemnation of Roman Catholicism. After the first, almost successful trial of the Portuguese in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to attach the Ethiopian Church to Rome, which ended in bloodshed, Catholics were banned from the country. The arrival, however, of Catholic missionary Giustino de Jacobis (1800–1860) in Ethiopia in 1839, and the interest of Ethiopian leaders in allying with European powers, changed the situation. Gebre Mikael was converted in 1844 and became one of de Jacobis's most devoted collaborators when he built up missionary stations throughout Ethiopia and the northern borderlands at the coast.

By 1841, Gebre Mikael, a renowned traditional theologian of Gonder, a center of learning because of its theological high school, had been a member of a delegation to the Coptic patriarch of Egypt. The delegation had been sent by the governor of the quasi-independent northern Ethiopian kingdom of Tigray to get a new metropolitan for Ethiopia. Invited by de Jacobis, who had, oddly, also been appointed as a member of this delegation, Gebre Mikael continued his journey to Rome. In 1843, devoting months to reflections over the faith in Gonder, he decided to convert to Catholicism. Together with de Jacobis, he visited several monastic libraries. Their journey ended with de Jacobis receiving Gebre Mikael into the Catholic Church in February 1844. He was followed by a number of monks of the ancient monastery of Gunde Gundé. Gebre Mikael on his journeys through Ethiopia continued Catholic evangelization; he even made his former student, the former puppet emperor Yohannes III, embrace his faith.

Fearing arrest, he was secretly ordained in Aliténa, at the border of Tigray, in early 1851 by de Jacobis. A raid by Tigray against Aliténa a few months later led to Gebre Mikael's imprisonment. Subsequently he suffered from detention, even torture, and was tried several times by the Ethiopian emperor and the metropolitan. He finally died in Wollo of his sufferings on August 29, 1855. Gebre Mikael's conversion was crucial for the further success of Catholic mission especially in Akkele-Guzay (Eritrea) and Agamé (Tigray); he was later regarded in local Catholic tradition as a holy man, and was beatified by the Catholic Church in 1926.

Gender and Holy People

In most of the world's religions for most of history, men have been much more likely than women to be regarded as holy. To a great extent, this can be attributed to the distinction, nearly worldwide, that makes the "proper" sphere of women the family and home, while the work of men takes them into the broader world. Female leadership, especially over men, has been rare and suspect throughout the world, a serious handicap for sanctity in religions that are dominated by a professional priesthood, such as Christianity. Women also rarely had access to formal education before the twentieth century, a nearly insuperable barrier to holy status in religions such as Judaism and Confucianism that express scholarship as a central "holy" value. Women have very often been banned even from an active role as worshippers, viewed as a distraction to male worshippers, or regarded as ritually unclean especially thanks to menses.

Nevertheless, a number of extraordinary holy women have had a significant impact on the world and received acknowledgment from the practitioners of their religion. Some, such as Shaker founder Ann Lee (1736–1784), have made special claims to divine appointment as leaders of a new revelation—in Lee's case, a revelation that included the shocking suggestion that women and men are equals. Sometimes religious leaders have de-emphasized gender as a significant aspect of spirituality, most notably the Daoists, who recognize that women can reach equal spiritual status to men. Other groups qualify this, notably by allowing holy status to women past the age of menopause, as in the case of the Comanche medicine woman Sanapia (1895–1984), or by propagating legends that certain women have been freed of this "taint." For example, both Muhammad's daughter Fatima and the Virgin Mary were, it is believed, free of menses, and free of normal intercourse (in legend, Hasan and Husayn were born of Fatima's left thigh, while a common medieval belief proclaimed that the Virgin Mary was impregnated through her ear).

This wooden statue of Mary Magdalene, carved by Donatello in 1453, presents an "un-sexed" image of female sanctity. (Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY)

Other women have won a place for themselves in the established, institutionalized world of the holy through their powers of persuasion or even dissimulation. Thus Christianity boasts a number of "transvestite saints," women who, disguised as men, joined and excelled in monastic communities. Women have sometimes had spiritual paths laid out as appropriate for them to follow, often with restrictions unheard-of for male monasticism. For example, legend tells that the order of Buddhist nuns was founded in about the fifth century B.C.E. after the Buddha's aunt Mahaprajapati and 500 other women asked to join the renunciant life—only to be refused three times. But then the Buddha's follower Ananda argued that since women could indeed attain enlightenment (no mean concession in itself), they would benefit from the life of renunciation. So the order of nuns was founded, with eight special rules emphasizing the subordination of these women to their male counterparts. And the Buddha is said to have predicted that the creation of this order would shorten the survival of his teaching by at least 500, and perhaps even 1,000, years.

Women have best been able to win holy status when a religion values as essentially holy a characteristic that traditionally falls in the women's sphere. Of these, probably the most important is devotion. Women are supposed to be good at this. This is a trait women should display toward their husbands and families, emphasizing emotional attachment rather than intellectualizing—in short, loving. An important reason for the number of female martyrs in early Christianity is that little was demanded of a Christian but stubborn love of God, a trait of which women were believed to be fully capable. From an early age, Christian theologians often portrayed the soul's love for God as that of a woman for her lover, encouraging a belief that devout women could be spiritually adept.

An important spiritual trend in Hinduism similarly emphasized the ungendered quality of devotion. For example, the male Hindu devotional poet Narsi Mehta (c. 1414–1480) sang of a state of mind in which the devotee thinks of him- or herself as a woman and Krishna as the only man in the world. Similarly, the great mystic Krishna Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533) often dressed as a woman, acting the part of Radha, the wife of Krishna. The Hindu bhakti (devotional) movement did not only speak in similes; women were indeed able to take a full part in passionate devotional worship, transferring to a deity their expected devotion to husband. The female sixteenth-century bhakti saint Mirabai even declared, when she was widowed, that she was now the wife of Krishna. The path of such women devotees was sometimes harder than that of men; for example, the holy poet Bahinabai (c. 1628–c. 1700) tells in her songs how difficult it was to reconcile duty to her god and to her husband, since her often-violent husband disapproved of her allegiance to a guru. But the framework of the movement supported Bahinabai rather than her annoyed husband; legend even tells that the cows of the village would refuse to eat when he had abused her.

Mothering a great saint has also been a good way for a female to attain saintly status. Greek heroines were often simply the mothers of heroes, with no particular independent role. Indigenous Mesoamerican belief stressed the special liminal status of giving birth—the only people to reach the highest paradise are warriors who die in battle or women who die in childbirth. In this environment, the woman warrior Chimalman dating from the early ninth century won a double status, dying giving birth to Quetzalcoatl. Other female saints are credited with raising their children to holiness—or, in the Christian Monica's (331–387) case, nagging her son Augustine of Hippo until he finally converted. And much of the reverence paid to Fatima bint Muhammad (c. 605–632) by Shi'i Muslims rests on her special role as the mother of the line of imams.

Holy women also often win to their position because of their traditional role as supporting cast to a holy husband, brother, or father, or as deputies who act in the name of a man. The Baha'i holy woman Bahiyyih Khanum (1846–1932), daughter of Baha'u'llah, is remembered mostly for her service as she cared for the constant flow of visitors to the family home, the poor, and so on. Similarly, the Jewish holy woman Dolce of Worms (c. 1165–1196) won her position especially because of her solicitude in enabling her husband's life of prayer and study. Muhammad's wife Khadija (d. 619) encouraged the prophet when he had his first visions. This is a recognition and elevation of women's traditional role as caregivers within the family.

More likely to confer holy status, though, is virginity. The Virgin Mary won a very special status in Christianity and Islam as mother of Jesus—while a virgin. Christianity, with its strong ascetic impulse, stressed chastity as a central virtue. Thus, almost all early female saints are declared to be virgins, and very often hagiography emphasizes that they met their end because they refused to marry, preferring instead to have Christ as a bridegroom. A particularly potent saint in Christian tradition is the virgin martyr. The early account of the deaths of Sts. Perpetua and Felicity (d. 203) demonstrates how female martyrs could cross the gender divide, including even visionary accounts of the heroine of the tale changing sex in the arena. Only truly unusual saints can combine all roles. A notable case is that of the Tibetan female master Machig Labdrön (1031–1126), who succeeded in becoming a monk instead of marrying. She became a great philosopher—and later married an Indian yogi, bearing at least three children who became important religious figures in their own right.

For some Muslims, the Virgin Mary has special status as a prophet. It is with the gift of prophecy that gender distinctions fade to insignificance in many religions, even those that are normally very repressive toward women. God, unlike men, quite simply seems to be blind to distinctions of gender, or sometimes even prefers women for a prophetic role—in the ancient Mediterranean world, the Pythia and sibyls were women. Religions that have a prophetic tradition enjoy prophets of both genders and have often elaborated a theology that specifically gives to female prophets an authority as “spokesperson for God” that transcends gender, making them honorary men, even including a public role. Sometimes this gender reidentification is quite literal, as with the East African kubandwa spiritual mediums: Until recently, while the women were possessed by the spirits, they were often dressed in men’s clothes and had a freedom of action that was normally a male prerogative.

The spirit of God can fall on anyone, since it is impossible to earn it by special behaviors or characteristics. For example, Sioux legend tells of Tailfeather Woman, to whom the Spirit came, revealing to her how to save her people with a special dancing ritual; the legend tells that the Sioux heeded her and flourished as a result. The Kenyan Moraa was a woman in a highly patriarchal society, but her visions gave her the authority to lead resistance to the British colonialists in the early twentieth century. Ellen White (1827–1915), cofounder of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, was able to shape her church into a stable international body because of her status as prophetess. The list could easily be expanded. One should note, though, that female prophets have sometimes found it harder to gain credence than men, or have been criticized when they stepped out of their proper gender roles. For example, the single Jewish female prophet, Miriam, was stricken with leprosy when she chided Moses—although Aaron joined her in the rebuke and was unharmed. Nakayama Miki (1798–1887) proclaimed a new religion in Japan but suffered from much persecution and even imprisonment, to a considerable extent because she was acting very improperly for a woman in the culture of her times. In many cases, though, it is hard to tell whether a prophet failed because she was a woman or because the prophecy was false, as in the case of the prophetesses Priscilla and Maximilla in the early Christian variant of Montanism (second century), which was condemned as heresy and hounded out of existence.

Combining elements of devotionism and prophecy, women can be holy people by right of mystical experience. Hannah Verbermacher (c. 1815–1895), one of the very few Jewish women to attain a religious leadership role before the twentieth century, held authority by right of being a mystic. Again, direct contact with the divine ignores gender divides. This was the case with Rabi’a al-Adawiyyah of Basra (d. 801), one of the few great female saints of Islam. A former slave who added low social status to the disabilities imposed by her gender, she was nonetheless a central mystic of the early sufi tradition, some biographers holding her in such esteem that they even proclaim that she was a prominent scholar. A later commentator specifically says that Rabi’a’s spiritual status allowed her to transcend the limitations of her sex. Especially the later Middle Ages produced a bumper crop of female Christian mystics who were able to take on important public roles as teachers and advisers. Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) even served as the voice of conscience to a pope, thanks to her transcendent status as a mystic. Such figures sometimes had to work carefully around the church’s prohibition against either laypeople or women teaching and preaching, but some mystics, such as Julian of Norwich (c. 1343–after 1419), still inspire people today with accounts of their visions. Indeed, the first female doctors of the Roman Catholic Church were the mystics Teresa of Avila (1515–1582) and Catherine of Siena, proclaimed in 1970.

Except for prophets and to a lesser extent mystics, it was very hard for women to win holy status by right of a leadership role before the twentieth century. In some cases, women have played an active social and political role, only to have that position de-emphasized in accounts of their lives as inappropriate for a woman. Thus the Anglo-Saxon nun-missionary Lioba (d. 780) was very active in administration and politics, but her hagiographer was uncomfortable with this and so focused on her passive, cloistered life while young—much to the regret of later historians. More entertaining is when hagiographers came up with supernatural explanations for otherwise unfeminine behavior, as in the tale that Brigid of Ireland (c. 450–c. 525), thanks to the intervention of the Holy Spirit, enjoyed status as a bishop because the consecrator read the wrong liturgy over her when she was being veiled as a nun. Even the United States still has many people who object strongly to women in leadership roles in religion, despite the pioneering efforts of, for example, the Episcopal Church of America. This is not, however, just an issue in America. A Hindu splinter group founded by Dada Lekhraj (1876–1969) gives women a pre-eminent leadership role. Similarly, the modern Hindu female guru Ammachi (1953–) has broken Hindu tradition by giving women public ritual roles, even as temple priestesses. And sometimes women of exceptional religious status have attempted to take a leadership role only to suffer frequent setbacks. For example, the Kenyan Gaudencia Aoko (c. 1940–) was an important leader of the Legio Maria, only to have the church she helped found decide to bar women from the priesthood. Aoko went on to found a new church in which women can be leaders, although, oddly, still with a ritual purity taboo that forbids female priests from celebrating mass during their menses.

Women religious teachers have been rare and often viewed with repugnance. In part, this is because of female lack of access to education; often it is because throughout the world women who have trespassed into men's public domain have suffered mockery, if not worse. Thus Beruriah, a female Jewish scholar of the second century, according to tradition upset her husband because she argued with him on a rabbinic interpretation. In duddgeon, the unspeakable husband got a disciple of his to seduce Beruriah; although she gave in to his wiles, Beruriah later killed herself in shame. Clearly, the lesson is that women should not argue with men, even if they are right. In Christianity, while the fourth-century legend of the almost certainly fictional Catherine of Alexandria defeating fifty philosophers in public debate was popular, in real life women were ordered not to preach or teach. Sometimes the position of women worsened over time, as in Hinduism: The Upanishads include two female Hindu sages, Gargi and Maitreyi, as worthy of philosophical debate, suggesting that women could study sacred texts in the Vedic period. But in later Hinduism, they no longer had access to this learning. Still, female devotional saints could sometimes teach in Hinduism, such as Mahadeviyakka in the twelfth century, who abandoned her husband because he wouldn't let her worship Shiva, then, after undergoing testing by religious authorities, began to teach, becoming a leading spiritual figure of her time. In her case, like that of the Muslim Rabi'a, it was extreme asceticism and exceptional love of God that won for her a very exceptional status as a teacher.

Nearly the only female saints who have managed to play a leadership role in their religion have been those of royal status. For example, the few female Buddhist saints include Queen Khema of Bimbisara (fifth century B.C.E.), enlightened by the Buddha's teachings to the point that she became a great teacher herself. More spectacularly, Yeshe Tsogyal (757–817) of Tibet was of royal birth but so fought over by suitors that her father expelled her from his palace. She was rescued by the king of Tibet and married him; he allowed her to play an active religious role that would otherwise have been unthinkable. Even then, her public activities, combined with her gender, put her in a position of extreme danger. A gang of thieves once caught her on the road and raped her—although in this case it is pleasant to know that Yeshe Tsogyal was so spiritually enlightened that all of her rapists were instantly converted by the experience. More generally, royal women had a liminal status granted them by their wealth and influence. Like male rulers, they enjoyed considerable patronage over religious life, and they often won holy status as protectors and encouragers of a religion. Sometimes, too, a whole ruling family, both male and female, has been given an important ritual role that confers status as intermediaries to ancestors or divine forces. The Zulu ruling family of southern Africa is an example.

In the past two centuries, an increasing number of strong-willed women have forced the gates of heaven, founding religious orders and even new religions in face of strong opposition from male hierarchies and playing an increasing role in the extreme elite of religions that produces saints. This has sometimes caused outrage and has also provoked in many cases a rethinking of religious traditions. A fine example of this is the case of Tahiri (1817–1852), an early disciple of the Bab. She argued that the time of constraints was over, took off her veil, and appeared in the streets of Iran in men's clothing, mounted and with a sword in her hand, in 1848. This caused such shock that one Babi even tried to commit suicide at the sight of her unveiled. She was divorced by her husband, and after imprisonment was strangled in 1852. But, although she almost caused a schism in the nascent Baha'i faith, Tahiri is probably more responsible than any other individual for the emphasis this religion places on equality of women and men in the sight of God.

Finally, it should be noted that the veneration of holy people is often dominated by female devotees. In Islam, especially, women are often not allowed access to mosques and have turned instead to the shrines of holy people. Throughout India, studies show that especially women—Hindus, Christians, Jains, Sikhs, and Muslims—frequent the tombs of the saints. In general, the cult of saints sidesteps much of the formal ritual of organized religion, ritual that is often inaccessible to women.

Gendun drubpa (Tibetan: dge-'dun-grub-pa; Dalai Lama I)

Buddhist spiritual leader

Gendun drubpa was a major scholar-saint in the Gelukpa (Tib.: dge-lugs-pa) school of Tibetan Buddhism who was a close disciple of Tsong kha pa, founder of Tashilhunpo (bkra-shis lhun-po) monastery. He was posthumously designated as the first dalai lama.

Gendun drubpa was born Pema Dorje (pad-ma rdo-rje) to tenant farmers during the Iron Sheep Year, 1391, in the Tsang region of central Tibet. Legend states that a huge black raven protected him on the night of his birth from a group of bandits who raided his family's tent. The raven was an emanation of Mahakala, a wrathful form of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva (enlightened being) of compassion, and it is this protective divinity that was to act as spiritual guardian to Gendun drubpa and subsequent dalai lamas.

Pema Dorje became a novice monk at age fifteen and was given the name by which he was later to be known to history, Gendun drubpa. His initial monastic studies included a vast array of Buddhist scriptures, together with the great classical commentaries of Indian and Tibetan Buddhist masters. Gendun drubpa took the vows of a fully ordained monk, or bhikṣu, at the age of twenty. In 1415, when Gendun drubpa was in his twenty-fifth year, he met Tsong kha pa (1357–1419), the founder of the Gelukpa school of Tibetan Buddhism. Gendun drubpa spent only four years with the great master, as Tsong kha pa would pass away in 1419. Nevertheless, this was precious time indeed, for although Tsong kha pa had hundreds of students, Gendun drubpa was to be recognized as one of his five chief disciples.

Legend relates that Gendun drubpa received a prophetic sign in his first meeting with Tsong kha pa that indicated he would become instrumental in preserving Buddhist monastic discipline (Skt.: vinaya; Tib.: 'dul ba) in Tibet. Indeed, in the middle part of his life Gendun drubpa composed three extensive commentaries on monastic discipline that have influenced the Tibetans' enthusiastic pursuit of monastic life to this day. Gendun drubpa also wrote several commentaries on epistemology (Tib.: tshad ma) that are also utilized in the curricula of most present-day Gelukpa monasteries.

Gendun drubpa was a great scholar, writer, and meditator, but it was his creation of Tashi Lhunpo (bkra-shis lhun-po) monastery in Shigatse during his fifty-sixth year that has had the greatest impact on Tibetan Buddhist religion and culture. The monastery became one of the most important spiritual institutions of Central Asia, insured the preservation of Gendun drubpa's teachings, and contributed to the solidification of Gelukpa monastic power in Tibet. In 1474, Gendun drubpa died at the age of eighty-four while in meditation at Tashi Lhunpo.

Geneviève

(c. 422–500 C.E.)

Christian nun

Geneviève, patroness of Paris, was born in Nanterre, near Paris, in about 422 to a Gallo-Roman aristocratic family. At an early age she decided to lead a religious life. She was consecrated around 437 and moved to Paris. In 451, she reportedly diverted, through the power of her prayers, Attila the Hun's attack on Paris, saving the city. A few years later, she supplied grain to the besieged city during an attack by the Franks. In her activism and protection, Geneviève was fulfilling the role, usually associated with early medieval bishops, of protector and defender of her city.

Geneviève performed many other miracles. Accounts of her life say she exorcised demons, released prisoners, restored sight to the blind, and resuscitated the dead. She also initiated the construction of the first chapel in honor of St. Denis, the first bishop of Paris, and in 496 collaborated in the conversion of the Frankish king Clovis (r. 481–511) to Christianity. Geneviève then convinced the king to build a basilica dedicated to Sts. Peter and Paul. This basilica evoked the mausoleum that Constantine had built in honor of the two saints in Constantinople, and as such associated the new king with the first Christian emperor. Geneviève died in 500, before the basilica was completed, and was buried in its crypt. Members of the royal family were later buried there, too, and the saint acquired a role as a protector of the royal family.

By the ninth century, the basilica honoring the apostles was renamed after Geneviève, a new Life of the saint was composed, and she was invoked against Norman attacks and successfully defended the city. The kings of the Capetian dynasty (987–1328) established patronage and protection relations with St. Geneviève and her abbey. They enlarged the abbatial privileges, enriched it with lands and properties, and in return affiliated themselves with a powerful patron who was already a popular Parisian saint. The close ties between the royal family and the abbey meant that the abbots of Sainte-Geneviève became virtually second bishops of Paris, which led to bitter struggles between them and the Parisian bishops throughout the Middle Ages.

The abbey of Sainte-Geneviève was a popular pilgrimage site, and many miracles were recorded there. But the saint's public role was first established in 1129/1130, when she was invoked successfully in a large public procession in Paris against an epidemic. This procession established a tradition of dramatic public invocations of Geneviève whenever the city was in danger. Between the twelfth and eighteenth centuries, more than seventy processions with the saint's reliquary marched through the city, and each time the saint's intervention rescued Paris. Geneviève was especially renowned for saving the city from droughts and floods, and she was identified as a nurturing patroness who rescued the Parisians from numerous famines. Public invocations of the saint's reliquary were huge events. Reliquaries from all the churches in Paris would arrive at Geneviève's shrine and there implore the patroness of the city to intercede on behalf of Paris. Then the abbot of Sainte-Geneviève and the bishop of Paris would lead a procession with the two most prestigious sets of relics in the city—Geneviève's and St. Marcel's—back to the cathedral of Notre Dame for an expiatory mass. These processions grew in length, prestige, and pomp during the early modern era, increasing Geneviève's role as the most efficient protector of Paris.

The Bourbon dynasty (1589–1830) renewed the saint's affiliation with the royal family, and hundreds of invocations took place at her shrine for the health of the family members. But by the eighteenth century, this close connection with the Bourbons also led to growing tensions between Parisians and the royal usages of their patron saint. Doubts and skepticism toward the public cult increased, and in 1793 Geneviève's reliquary was dismantled and her bones burned by the revolutionary authorities of Paris.

George

(early 3rd cent. C.E.?)

Christian legendary martyr

George is perhaps the most important soldier-saint in the Christian tradition and has become the patron saint of widely diverse cities, provinces, and countries (including England, Georgia, and Russia). Accounts of his martyrdom are very old, but his well-known fight with the dragon is a much more recent addition to his vita.

Veneration of St. George was well established by 494, when Pope Gelasius condemned far-fetched versions of his legend. George is variously claimed as a native of Cappadocia and of Lydda (Diospolis), near Jaffa in Palestine. He died probably in the early third century, according to early accounts of his passios, during the reign of the non-Christian emperor Decius, who began a persecution of Christians. When George refused to sacrifice to Apollo, he was tortured horribly. God appeared to him in prison, telling him that he would suffer for seven years and would be killed and resurrected three times before his final death and salvation. When poison would not affect him, George was cut to pieces on a wheel and thrown down a well. The archangel Michael gathered the pieces together, and George was resurrected. Even more fantastic tortures, and miracles, commenced. George was sawn in half and placed in a cauldron of pitch, which was buried. Michael once again assembled the pieces. George was then tortured to death again and eaten by birds of prey before being resuscitated. George pretended that he was ready to worship Apollo, but when brought to the temple, he smashed all the idols, whereupon he was finally decapitated. Later written versions are more temperate—the wheel breaks, and George is killed only once—but images of the fantastic early passion continued to be produced centuries after they had disappeared from canonical accounts. This points to a thriving popular cult.

George's body was buried at Lydda. By the fifth or sixth century, a pilgrimage had developed and churches dedicated to St. George had been built throughout Christendom. During the eleventh century, George's military character, both protective and assuring victory, resulted in heightened interest both in Russia and in the Europe of the Crusades. At the sieges of Antioch and Jerusalem in 1098, St. George was seen leading an angelic army, assuring crusader victories, and interest soon spread among the knightly classes, particularly in France and England.

In the ninth or tenth century, accounts of George's battle with the dragon began to circulate, first in the East, later in the West. According to this legend, when a dragon threatened the city of Silene in Libya, the citizens pacified it first with sheep and finally with children, selected by lot. George happened by when the turn had fallen to the only daughter of the king, and he rendered the dragon so harmless that the princess could lead it back to town using her girdle as a leash. George slew it after the citizenry had agreed to convert to Christianity, baptizing 15,000 inhabitants. Numerous variants of the tale appeared.

St. George's particular connection with England is often traced back to Richard the Lion-Hearted's (r. 1189–1199) participation in the Third Crusade. More than 190 medieval churches in England were dedicated to St. George. He became the patron saint of the chivalric Order of the Garter, founded by King Edward III in 1347–1348 (also of the Teutonic order and many others, including the Boy Scouts). St. George's arms, a red cross on a white background, became England's flag. As late as World War I, St. George reputedly appeared to English troops in battle.

George was not solely a protector of soldiers and knights. "Giorgios," meaning "tiller of the soil," had close associations with agriculture and was also numbered among the Fourteen Holy Helpers. George was invoked for the protection of livestock against a number of diseases, including plague, leprosy, and syphilis, and against witches. His cult reached its high point during the late Middle Ages. In the Orthodox Church, George is regarded as a megalomartyr. His feast day, April 23, was reduced to a local celebration by the Roman Catholic Church in 1969 on the ground of its dubious historicity.

Ger Tzedeq

The Hebrew word ger originally meant "stranger" or "sojourner," but it came to indicate one who accepts Judaism; it is translated in the Septuagint as proselytos, or "proselyte" in English. In ancient times, two types of converts were recognized: ger toshav (the settler; sometimes called ger ha-shaar, the proselyte of the gate), and ger tzedeq (the righteous proselyte). Proselytes of the first type accepted monotheism but did not accept the ritual obligations of Judaism. This entitled them to economic and social equality with Jews and gave them equal rights before the courts. This type of proselytism was expedient for people living in regions under Jewish political control or for those who were forcibly converted during biblical times.

Proselytes of the second type, which is the only type recognized today, sincerely desire to become members of the Jewish community, without ulterior motives of expediency or advantage. After a sufficient period of preparation involving extensive study and instruction, men are circumcised (if the male convert has previously been circumcised, he undergoes the ritual drawing of a drop of penile blood to fulfill the Abrahamic covenant); both men and women undergo immersion in a ritual bath (mikve) and pledge themselves to observe Jewish law. Once accepted by the community, converts are considered full Jews and may not be discriminated against on the basis of their non-Jewish past. To the contrary, converts are singled out for special blessing in the Amidah prayer.

Reform Judaism differs from Orthodox and Conservative practice with regard to converts because it does not require circumcision, immersion, or the pledge to observe Jewish law. These omissions have resulted in disagreement within Judaism as to who is a Jew, for many Orthodox and Conservative congregations do not recognize Reform converts as true Jews.

Perhaps the most famous convert is Ruth, the Moabite woman who adopted her mother-in-law Naomi's religion and because of her faithfulness was deemed worthy to become an ancestor of King David (Ruth 4:17–22). However, while conversion is deemed of great value to the individual because it marks that person's inclusion into the community of the chosen, the Talmud specifically states that the righteous of all nations shall have a share in the world to come, whether officially affiliated with Judaism or not.

Gerald of Aurillac

(c. 855–909 C.E.)

Christian layman

Gerald was a Frankish Christian nobleman admired for his virtues of justice and piety and the founder of the abbey of Aurillac in France. His biographer, Odo, abbot of Cluny (879–942), is the sole source for Gerald's life. Indeed, Gerald is historically important as a literary character, a hagiographic model of lay virtue, whose pursuit of worldly good is tempered by piety, justice, compassion, and—a novel suggestion in Odo's day—learning.

Principally a landholder and warrior—thus avaricious by contemporary definition—Gerald was the last person a monastic biographer would think saintly. Yet as monastic founder, he was a good candidate for hagiographic treatment. Among the miracles that punctuate his biography is the cure of a creeping blindness that affected him as a young man, when as a warrior he ought to have been at the height of his powers. Such a cure clearly signifying divine favor, other saintly (read “monastic”) virtues must follow: peace-making, chastity and celibacy, piety and prayer, love of learning, justice and generosity toward the poor, courageous resistance against the rich, and vigorous defense of the interests of the church.

Gerald might well have tried to temper the brutality of a landholder and warrior with the ascetic virtues of a monk, but these might just as well be the product of hagiographic massaging. Odo depicts Gerald's political and military successes as miraculous and his shrewd genius for negotiation in an age of chaos as divinely inspired wisdom. On several occasions, Gerald reportedly released vanquished enemies without killing them, or even, at times, without extracting fines or hostages. Odo reads these tactics, humiliating to his enemies, as acts of mercy.

In the latter decades of his life, Gerald took an interest in ecclesiastical institutions. Odo tells us he cultivated a relationship with the papacy and handed over his lands while reserving the right to administer and defend them. Having no heir, he founded a monastery that could administer the lands after his demise, a pioneering strategy frequently imitated in later years. It is unclear, however, whether this act reflected the self-interested attention of a man approaching death, unselfish piety, or shrewd political gamesmanship.

It is nearly impossible to discern how much of Odo's narrative is literary embellishment. In just this respect, Gerald exemplifies medieval Christian sanctity as a cultural production: the virtues of a narrated life, the intersection of life and literary convention drawn from a deeply rooted theology.

Gerard of Csanád

(c. 980–1046 C.E.)

Christian bishop, missionary, martyr

Gerard of Csanád (Hung.: Gellért) was the first bishop of Csanád in southeastern Hungary (today Cenad, Romania). Born in Venice, he played a crucial role in the Christianization of Hungary and died a martyr in 1046. He was canonized in 1083, and his feast day is September 24.

The main sources regarding the life of Gerard are two legends written after his canonization. The relationship and dating of the Legenda minor (Minor legend) and the Legenda maior (Major legend) are much debated in historiography, but both seem to rely on a lost text from the early twelfth century. There is general consensus that Gerard was born in Venice around 980 to an aristocratic family. As a young boy, he became a Benedictine monk at the monastery of San Giorgio and received his education there. After further studies abroad, he became abbot of the Venetian monastery but then decided to go on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. The route took him through Hungary, and after meeting the Maurus, bishop of Pécs, as well as King Stephen I, probably in 1015, he decided to stay in Hungary and participate in the conversion of the country. Gerard would spend the rest of his life as a missionary there.

Stephen I made Gerard the teacher of his son, Prince Emeric. Gerard later became a hermit in the forest near Bakonybél. After the defeat of Prince Ajtony in 1030, he became the first bishop of the newly founded bishopric of Marosvár (later called Csanád). Gerard erected a cathedral dedicated to St. George there, organized the baptism and education of the people, and propagated the cult of the Virgin Mary. His sermons were highly regarded, and he was greatly respected as a scholar. Of his works, only the Deliberatio (Deliberation), a work on the subject of the Hymn of the Three Young Men in the Old Testament book of Daniel (ch. 3), survived.

When the country suffered an anti-Christian reaction, Gerard suffered martyrdom at the hands of non-Christian rebels when his carriage was pushed off a hill on August 29, 1046. The hill in Budapest where he was killed now bears his name. Gerard was buried at Csanád, which became the center of his cult. He was canonized in 1083 during the reign of King Ladislas I. The church at Csanád and most of his relics were destroyed over the centuries, but he is still venerated as an apostle of Hungary. The center of his cult today is at the southern Hungarian town of Szeged, the successor to the Csanád bishopric.

Germanus of Auxerre

(c. 378–448 C.E.)

Christian bishop

Germanus, one of the late Roman Empire's most illustrious Christian saints, is perhaps best known for his successful combat against the Pelagian heresy (a heresy that denied the concept of original sin and held, among other ideas, that a person's will can, if properly trained, achieve salvation without divine grace). His Life, by Constantius of Lyon, was written in about 480. Germanus was born in about 378 to a noble Gallo-Roman family in Auxerre in what is now France. Like any young man of good birth, he was very well educated and prepared for a career in the Roman civil service, chiefly in law. He practiced law with considerable success for a number of years in Rome. Having made a favorable impression with the Roman court, Germanus married a high-ranking noblewoman and returned to Gaul as governor of Armorica, the northwestern portion of the province of Gaul.

According to one legend, Germanus's habit of hanging his hunting trophies on a tree associated with non-Christian rites upset Amator, bishop of Auxerre. The bishop had the tree cut down but made sure to gain the protection of a prefect to safeguard himself against Germanus. Amator also obtained permission to give Germanus the tonsure (a style of haircut that denoted clergy and carried with it obedience to the church). When Germanus returned, the bishop held him captive and gave him the tonsure. Miraculously, Germanus, once tonsured, changed his ways and became a model Christian. When Amator died, Germanus was made bishop of Auxerre. Germanus governed his flock exceptionally well, his education and legal training providing him the necessary tools to negotiate successfully on behalf of his see with the imperial government. He also founded the monastery of Yonne just across from the cathedral.

At the request of the British, the episcopacy of Gaul sent Germanus and Lupus of Troyes to Britain in about 430 to combat the Pelagian heresy. Their efforts to fight Pelagianism were successful, but Germanus made a second trip about seventeen years later (in 447) when the heresy returned. On his second visit, Germanus handed the Britons a great victory over an army of allied Saxons and Picts, known as the "Alleluia Victory." A year later, he went to Ravenna and successfully pleaded for the Armoricans, who had rebelled against the emperor. Germanus died in 448 while at Ravenna, but his body was transferred to Auxerre, where it remained until the Huguenots sacked the church and his relics were lost.

Germanus of Paris

(c. 496–576 C.E.)

Christian bishop

Germanus (Germain), bishop of Paris, was born in Autun in what is now France in c. 496 and died in Paris on May 28, 576. An anchorite early in life, Germanus was ordained in 530 and became bishop of Paris in 555 or 556. Like other Merovingian saints, Germanus established his reputation performing miracles, among them a healing of King Childebert (r. 511–558). This miracle cemented Germanus's relations with the royal family and strengthened the alliance of bishops and kings that characterized the consolidation of royal power in sixth-century Francia. With the king's patronage, Germanus then (in 543) established what is now the oldest monastery in Paris. It reportedly housed a relic of the Holy Cross and relics of St. Vincent (d. 304), the martyr of Saragossa. The king had appropriated these relics the previous year, following his victory over the Visigoths in Spain. As such, the new monastery commemorated the king's victory.

During Germanus's funeral, while the procession was passing near a prison the saint's coffin became so heavy that the carriers could not proceed until the prisoners were released. This event established Germanus as a patron saint of prisoners. Germanus was first buried in a small chapel in the church, but in 754 or 755 his relics were transferred to the main body of the church. At the same time, Venantius Fortunatus composed a Life of the saint, and the monastery became known as St. Germain-des-Prés (St. Germain in the Fields). In Carolingian times, the monastery of St. Germain prospered. It housed about 200 Benedictine monks and as many servants and was among the wealthiest monasteries in the city, owning vast properties on the left bank of the Seine. Members of the Carolingian royal family served as secular abbots of the monastery, further increasing its wealth and privileges, among them the right to hold an annual commercial fair that was the largest in Paris, and a complete exemption from the jurisdiction of the bishop of Paris.

In the seventeenth century, the monastery became a center of learning. Its monks tried to propagate an image of Germanus as a leading patron saint of France, “the Moses of France.” They organized processions with his relics to compete with the municipal processions dedicated to St. Geneviève, the patroness of the city, and claimed that Germanus, rather than Geneviève, was the one whose interventions had saved the city numerous times in the past. Their attempts, which had a lot to do with their struggles with the bishop of Paris over exemptions and liberties, failed. Germanus never became a leading French patron saint, nor did he replace Geneviève as a patron of Paris. His renown and patronage remained restricted to the monastery and its near surroundings.

Geronimo

Apache mystic, warrior, chief

Geronimo, whose real name was Goyathlay, was born in 1829 in the North American southwest. Until 1858, he lived as a typical Apache man with his wife and three children. In that year, Mexican military forces attacked the Apache villages where he lived and slaughtered women and children, including Geronimo's wife, mother, and children. Out of this tragedy arose Geronimo's fame as a warrior and mystic. Geronimo organized the Apache resistance to the Mexican troops and avenged the deaths of his loved ones. Numerous times he engaged in battle without being wounded while killing several enemy warriors. His Apache kinsmen attributed Geronimo's good fortune in battle to his adept manipulation of spiritual forces; this spiritual power protected Geronimo in battle for the rest of his life as no guns or bullets ever killed him.

Later in the nineteenth century, American settlers, miners, and the U.S. Army moved into the southwest and began disrupting Apache life. After some initial violence between Apaches and the United States in the 1860s, many of the Apache bands agreed to live on reservations, though they detested the conditions and confinement. Geronimo lived on the Chiricahua Reservation, and he became a well-respected chief by resisting American attempts to Christianize the Apaches and change their culture. This situation lasted until 1876, when Geronimo fled with his family and others rather than move to the desolate San Carlos Reservation. American forces captured him and placed him under guard until 1878, when Geronimo again escaped and joined other Apaches in Mexico fighting against the United States. In 1880, Geronimo and these Apaches returned voluntarily to San Carlos until the next year, when he again fled after the U.S. Army violently suppressed a traditional religious ceremony. The army was unable to control Geronimo and his kinsmen completely until Geronimo surrendered to General Nelson A. Miles in 1886.

The United States sent more than 400 Apaches, including Geronimo, into exile in Florida and forced them to work at hard labor, cut their hair, wear American-style clothing, and send their children to Christian boarding schools. In 1887, the surviving Apache prisoners went to Alabama, and then, in 1892, to Fort Sill, Oklahoma. Geronimo became a celebrity, even participating in President Theodore Roosevelt's inaugural parade, but he died in 1909 still a prisoner of war, never having returned to his homeland.

Gertrude of Nivelles

Christian abbess

Born in 626, Gertrude of Nivelles was the younger daughter of Pepin I of Landen, Frankish mayor of the palace of Austrasia, and his wife Itta. Both parents, as well as her sister Begga, are also regarded as saints. After Pepin's death in about 639, and on the advice of Amand of Maastricht, Itta built a Benedictine double monastery at Nivelles in modern-day Belgium. Itta became a nun there herself, and Gertrude, fourteen at the time, was its first abbess. Gertrude became known for her hospitality to pilgrims and generosity to Irish monks—in particular to St. Foillan, brother of St. Fursey, to whom she gave land to found the monastery of Fosses. She assisted St. Ultan as well.

In 656, at the age of thirty, Gertrude resigned her office in favor of her niece, St. Wilfetrudis, because she was weakened by asceticism and wished to devote herself to prayer and study. Like other medieval mystics, Gertrude experienced visions. She died a few years later, in 659, at the age of thirty-three. Her feast day is March 17, the same as St. Patrick, who supposedly guarded her on the day of her death.

Gertrude’s cult was strongest in the Low Countries, but it spread to England and other areas as well. In art she is most often depicted with mice running up her staff. She may also be depicted holding a mouse, spinning or with a distaff, or with a cat. It is unclear why she is associated with mice. She may have absorbed the characteristics of a pre-Christian figure as legendary accounts of her life spread, or it could be because mice represented souls in Purgatory, to whom she was particularly devoted. Whatever the reason, Gertrude is invoked against rats and mice. As late as 1822, offerings at her shrine in Cologne took the form of gold and silver mice. The water from the well at Nivelles is supposed to repel rodents. Perhaps as an offshoot of this, Gertrude is also the patron of cats.

Because of her reputation for hospitality, Gertrude is invoked by travelers and pilgrims. Before setting out on their journey, pilgrims would have a drink in her honor. Connected with this is her patronage of the recently dead, who are travelers of a sort as well. In popular folklore, the dead would make a three-day journey to the afterlife, and the first night was spent in the care of Gertrude. Fair weather on the day of her feast is supposed to signal the start of the planting season, and thus she is also connected with gardeners.

Gertrude “the Great” of Helfta

Christian nun, mystic

Gertrude was born on January 6, 1256, but nothing else of her early life is known other than that she entered the convent at Helfta at the age of five. Helfta, located in Rodarsdorf, Saxony (Germany), was the home of several famous mystics. Though technically a Benedictine convent, it was greatly influenced by the Cistercian movement, and the nuns’ spiritual directors were Dominicans. The first recognition of Gertrude’s talents came at age twenty-six with her “conversion” experience. “Conversion” did not mean that Gertrude became Christian; rather, it signified her entrance into the mystical world.

As was typical of the spirituality at Helfta, Gertrude enjoyed a spousal relationship with Christ, and her writings reflected this special connection. Her interactions with Jesus happened through visions, dialogue, prayer, and contemplation, and the experiences were collected in her writings. The communal life of Helfta was reflected in Gertrude’s works, too. She cowrote the Liber specialae gratiae (Book of special grace) with Mechtild of Hackeborn, and her first major work, Legatus divinae pietatis (The herald of divine love), or Revelations, included collaborative efforts of other anonymous Helfta nuns. The significance of this text lies in Gertrude’s conversion experience, which is supported by witness testimonials, thus providing an example of a call to a life of the spirit. Her second work was Exercitia spiritualis (Spiritual exercises), a group of scriptural meditations written for her fellow nuns. The affective nature of these pieces owes much to the Cistercian influence on the abbey. Finally, she is associated with the Preces Gertrudianae (Prayers of Gertrude), though the work was composed in the seventeenth century. It is a collection of lyrics based on Gertrude’s style. Gertrude’s works stand out for several reasons, including her close ties to the liturgy and the Bible, and her reliance on the theme of light versus darkness, but may be best remembered for the careful recording of one soul’s relationship with God.

Despite her mystical obligations, Gertrude participated in the ordinary life of the monastery. She was purported to be an excellent spinner and served as assistant chantress (choral leader) for many years. During her later years, Gertrude grew sickly and was barely able to receive visitors. She died on November 17, 1302, and though never formally canonized, was added to the Roman Martyrology in 1677 by Pope Innocent XI. Her feast day is celebrated November 16.

Gervasius and Protasius

(2nd cent. C.E.?)

Christian martyrs

The cult of Gervasius and Protasius, two Christian martyrs, emerged in Milan, Italy, beginning in the late fourth century, thanks to the efforts of the famous bishop Ambrose (c. 339–397). Little information about their lives or even the circumstances of their deaths has survived. In a letter to his sister, Ambrose recounts how, in 385, the remains of these two martyrs had been discovered in a shrine dedicated to Sts. Felix and Nabor. Within days, Ambrose had arranged for the remains to be translated to the new basilica that had just been completed, where they were buried beneath the new altar.

Ambrose's timely discovery has become the locus classicus for those, such as the historian Peter Brown, who see the bishops of late antiquity playing a decisive role in channeling the "power" of relics through cathedral altars for the sake of reinforcing the authority of the institutional church. In any case, the cult took root. Reports of miracles were recorded not only by Ambrose's biographer, Paulinus, but also by his friend and protégé Augustine, both of whom were present at the dedication of the new cathedral.

Ghazali, Abu Hamid al-

(1058–1111 C.E.)

Muslim sufi, philosopher

One of the leading Islamic religious scholars of all time, Abu Hamid al-Ghazali contributed in many areas and did much to determine the place that philosophy and sufism would have among Sunni Muslims.

Al-Ghazali was born in Tus, in northeastern Iran, in 1058. As a youth, he studied there and then in Nishapur. In 1085, he joined the camp of the Seljuk vizier, and in 1091 he was appointed professor of the prestigious Nizamiyyah College in Baghdad. During this period, he wrote several works on the philosophy of ibn Sina and others, a major work of Islamic theology (kalam), and a defense of the Abbasid caliphate against its Isma'ili opponents. In 1095, he suffered an emotional breakdown, gave up his teaching position, and left Baghdad to devote himself to sufi exercises. Eventually he established a sufi khanaqah (convent) in Tus. During this time, he wrote Ihya'Ulum al-Din (The revival of the religious sciences), his most comprehensive work, and other books on sufism, especially Mishkat al-Anwar (The niche for lights). In

Modern depiction of sufi philosopher Abu Hamid al-Ghazali. (Art Directors)

1106, he returned to teaching in Nishapur, and soon afterward he penned an autobiographical work entitled Al-Munqidh min al-Dalal (That which delivers from error). He also wrote on fiqh (jurisprudence) and other topics. He retired to Tus shortly before his death in 1111.

Al-Ghazali saw himself as a spiritual physician tailoring his treatment to different needs. For most people, it is sufficient to follow the basics of traditional belief and practice. Those with questions might benefit from kalam, but this is not sufficient for those, like himself, with profound doubts. Philosophy promises help and is successful in many areas, such as logic. Al-Ghazali was in fact instrumental in introducing logic into kalam. In metaphysics, however, philosophy fails to prove its points and even leads one to unbelief. He believed it was the sufis who offered the best way, because even intermittent experiences of ecstasy, such as those he claimed to have had, could convince one of the prophets' authority. Sufi knowledge, he taught, comes by direct experience ("taste") rather than through reason, but its expression must stay within the bounds set by logic and religious doctrine. For example, according to al-Ghazali, ecstatic expressions, such as al-Hallaj's (858–922) "I am the Truth" (that is, God), which appear to violate these bounds, instead describe the mystic's subjective experience, not objective reality. Nevertheless, al-Ghazali has been criticized for inconsistency because in his sufi works he appears to use philosophical concepts he rejected elsewhere. He also states explicitly that the highest teachings are not to be put in books. His main concern, however, was practical moral and spiritual guidance, not theoretical accuracy or consistency.

Ghazali, Ahmad al-

Muslim mystic, writer

Ahmad ibn Muhammad al-Ghazali, the brother of the better-known Abu Hamid al-Ghazali, is an important figure of classical sufism and renowned for his expositions of mystical love in the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries. He was born in the Persian city of Tus in about 1060 and, like his brother, went to Baghdad, where he succeeded him as an instructor at the celebrated Nizamiyyah madrasa. Although Ghazali has been overshadowed by his brother, he is nevertheless an important figure of sufism and made substantial contributions to sufism in Persia and to the development of a distinct mystical vocabulary in the Persian language. He was a member of the Nimatullahi order of sufism founded by the famous sufi master Shah Nimatullah Wali, whose followers are to be found in many parts of the world today.

Ghazali's works address a number of metaphysical issues as well as practical matters. His most celebrated work, Sawanih (Inspirations from the world of spirits), written in Persian, is a masterly analysis of love, a central theme of all sufism, its various degrees and effects on the soul, and the subtle relationship between human and divine love. Many authors both within and outside sufism followed this work and composed treatises on love as the most important mode of relationship between humankind and God. As in other mystical traditions, in sufism poetry plays a key role in expressing God's boundless love and man's quest for the divine. Ghazali contributed to this body of poetic work with clarity of thought, eloquence, and depth. His spiritual psychology contained in the Sawanih is also an important source of love poetry in Islam.

In addition to writing about metaphysical issues, Ghazali also addressed practical aspects of sufism. He authored, for instance, a short treatise in defense of the permissibility of listening to and participating in sama', the spiritual concerts of the sufis combining prayers and invocation with music and rhythmic movements of the body, as performed, for instance, by the whirling dervishes of the Mawlawiyyah order. The aim of sama' is the unity of the soul, the heart, and the body. Many exoterist scholars of the law have rejected it as innovation (bid'ah) and nontraditional. Ghazali's defense is not only indicative of the impact of such criticisms but also shows his attentiveness to defending sufism within the context of the shari'a, the Islamic law.

Ghazi, Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al-

Muslim ruler, revolutionary

Ahmad b. Ibrahim al-Ghazi, also called Muhammad Gagne, Ahmad Guray, and Ahmed Gran, "the left-handed," is of obscure origins. Some scholars have variously referred to him as an Arab, a Somali of the Darod clan, and an Ethiopian. Whatever his family antecedents, he is thought to have been born in about 1506, and in early 1525, he defeated Sultan Abu Bakr Ibn Mohammed and rose to the leadership of the Muslims of Adal, which had recently shifted its capital from Djibouti on the Red Sea inland to Harar. Ahmad found the rule of secular Muslims and Christian kings repulsive. He retired to the countryside, where he preached about the virtues of an Islamic state. He called himself the imam, raised the banner of jihad, or Muslim religious war, and with an army that included Turkish, Albanian, Egyptian, and Somali contingents began to raid the Christian kingdom of central Ethiopia in 1527.

Two years later, Ahmad inflicted a major defeat on the Ethiopian emperor Lebna Dengel (r. 1508–1540) at the battle of Shembra Kure. Between 1531 and 1535, he returned to central Ethiopia with the apparent intention of permanently conquering the Ethiopian kingdom. He inflicted another major defeat on Dengel, whom he never caught, and his armies ravaged the highlands. Churches were burned, cities were sacked, and most of the kingdom's Christians were forced to at least nominally accept Islam.

Though Ahmad's motivation was largely religious, his supporters were unable to follow up on these military successes because they were more interested in looting and slave raiding than in gaining territorial or political control. With continuous raids, however, Ahmad's supremacy in Ethiopia was unchallenged, and his army controlled two-thirds of the empire. Despite these achievements, Ahmad failed to consolidate his victories or establish a permanent headquarters, while his enemies solicited external aid. The tide turned against him in 1541, when Dengel's successor, Galawdewos, combined with a Portuguese expeditionary army under Christopher da Gama to defeat the Muslims. Ahmad scored some further successes but was finally killed in February 1543 in a decisive battle near Lake Tana. Although Ahmad's death spelled the end of serious Muslim threats to Christian Ethiopia, his followers continued to instigate military skirmishes until a peace treaty was signed in 1589. The multiethnic composition of his followers provided the basis for later Turkish and Egyptian claims to the area he ruled and for the migration of some Somali groups from the Gulf of Aden hinterland toward the south.

Gilbert of Sempringham

(c. 1085–1189 C.E.)

Christian monk, founder

Gilbert of Sempringham was the founder of the only medieval English monastic order. The son of a Norman knight and an Englishwoman, Gilbert was born in about 1085 and educated in Lincolnshire and then in France. He became a clerk in the household of Robert Bloet, bishop of Lincoln, sometime before 1123. By 1131, he had declined an archdeaconry and returned to his native Sempringham, where he established a small monastic community for women. In time, this small community expanded to include nuns, canons, lay sisters, and lay brothers; the lay members were not merely servants but integral members of the community. In 1147, Gilbert attended the Cistercian general chapter in hopes of placing his two monasteries under Cistercian control. The Cistercian refusal has traditionally been ascribed to the order's reluctance to undertake the spiritual direction of women, although it is equally likely that the Cistercians saw little gain in acquiring two poor, small, isolated monasteries.

After Gilbert's return from Cîteaux, his two monasteries rapidly became the nucleus of a thriving monastic order.

Nine priories were established between 1148 and 1155. The Gilbertine Rule was approved by Pope Eugenius III in 1148, creating a double monastery with nuns governed by the Rule of St. Benedict and canons by the Rule of St. Augustine; lay brothers were to follow a modified version of the rule for Cistercian lay brothers. Accused of aiding the exiled Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, Gilbert was summoned before Henry II's justices at Westminster, but Henry intervened. In 1170, the lay brothers at Sempringham took advantage of Gilbert's difficulties at the royal court and revolted. Although serving as the order's master, Gilbert himself did not make a religious profession as a Gilbertine canon until he was on his deathbed. Gilbert died in 1189, and he was canonized by Innocent III in 1202. The Book of St Gilbert is one of the first extant canonization dossiers. His feast day is February 16.

Giles

Christian hermit

The colorful legends of the early eighth-century Giles (or Aegidius) contributed to his great popularity throughout the Middle Ages. He first appears in writings of the tenth century that describe him as an Athenian who relocated to France to escape the fame he had attracted in his homeland by his generosity and miracles of healing. He became a hermit, lived in the forest near Nîmes, and later founded a monastery near Arles. While a hermit in the forest, he was nourished by the milk of a deer who visited him daily; later he sheltered the deer and was himself wounded by the arrows of the Visigothic king Wamba (or Flavius, king of the Goths) who was hunting in the forest. This event is often depicted in art.

Another frequently illustrated scene from his life allegedly occurred while Giles was officiating at mass when Charlemagne (or his father, Charles Martel) was present. According to this legend, an odious sin of incest, unconfessed by the ruler, was revealed to the saint by an angel who appeared bearing a scroll or tablet; the writing slowly disappeared while the saint was praying, and the king was absolved of his sin. Giles's legend appears to be an especially rich blend of previous hagiographic motifs (he divides his cloak with a beggar, is assisted by and shelters a miraculous animal, has prophetic powers and is able to forgive unconfessed sins), which also explains the chronological improbability of Giles being a student of the sixth-century Caesarius of Arles and also an acquaintance of the late eighth- and early ninth-century Carolingian rulers, as various accounts claim. He most likely died around 710. The Benedictine abbey of St. Giles, containing his relics, was an important center of pilgrimage during the medieval period. One of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, he is identifiable also in art by his Benedictine garments and is often shown holding an arrow and accompanied by or holding a deer in his arms. His feast day is September 1.

Gisudaraz, Muhammad Bandanawaz

Muslim sufi

Muhammad Bandanawaz Gisudaraz was a sufi of the Chishti order in the Deccan area of India, not far from the city of Hyderabad, in a town called Gulbarga. The name Gisudaraz (He of the long tresses) is said to have been passed down in his family. He is also known as Khwaja Banda Nawaz (Good to humanity). Gisudaraz originally migrated to southern India as a child from Delhi, where he was born in 1321. He was the son of a disciple of Nizamuddin Auliya, Sayyid Yusuf al-Husayni (Raju Qattal) of Khorasan, a descendant of the prophet Muhammad.

As a young man, Gisudaraz returned to Delhi, becoming a disciple of Nasiruddin Chiragh-i Dihli in 1336. He became a khalifa (deputy) of the shaykh at the age of thirty-six and was said to be the most favored among his disciples. At the age of eighty, Gisudaraz left Delhi for Dawlatabad in the Deccan. He was invited to the Bahmani dynasty capital, Gulbarga, in 1400 and given a land grant there by the sultan. His shrine is located in Gulbarga, which is a prominent pilgrimage site for Muslims in the Deccan area of India.

Gisudaraz was a religious scholar and literary figure as well as a saint. He was acquainted with the religious sciences and wrote poetry and prose in both Arabic and Persian. He commented on many works in the classical tradition of sufism, including the writings of Ibn al-‘Arabi (1165–1240), whose thought he criticized in favor of a more dualistic position known as wahdat al-shuhud, the unity of experience. One part of his malfuzat (audiences), the Jawami al-Kalam (Compilations of words), is extant. Sama’, or listening to mystical poetry, was an important practice in his khanaqah (hostel for sufis). In fact, Gisudaraz developed his own theory of musical audition, limiting the musical instrumentation to a small tambourine and instituting a unique practice known as band sama’, “closed audition,” that still is held only once a year during his urs (anniversary of his death).

Giuliani, Veronica (Ursula)

(1660–1727 C.E.)

Roman Catholic nun, mystic

Veronica (Ursula) Giuliani, a Capuchin nun, reputedly one of the most extraordinary stigmatics of the Roman Catholic Church, was born at Mercatello, Urbino, in Italy, on December 27, 1660. She entered the Capuchin convent at Città di Castello, Umbria, in 1677 and made her vows in 1678. A mystic, she began experiencing the pains of Christ’s passion and received the stigmata in 1694. These experiences continued until her death on July 9, 1727. She was beatified in 1804 and canonized in 1839. She is usually represented wearing a crown of thorns and holding a cross, or holding a heart marked with a cross.

As a child, Ursula Giuliani was already feeding and clothing the destitute. When she was four, her dying mother, Benedetta Mancini, dedicated each of her children to one of Christ’s wounds; Ursula received the wound in Jesus’ side. By age eleven, her devotion to the passion was intense. When her father, Francesco, was given a lucrative position of prestige and power in Piacenza, however, she was greatly pleased, a fault for which she reproached herself in later years. She chided those who did not share her religious sentiments and practice, but a vision in which she saw her own heart as made of hard metal cured her of this judgmental attitude.

Francesco Giuliani was determined that his daughter marry and presented her with suitors. Ursula fell ill as a result, and Francesco finally relented and permitted her to enter religious life. In 1677, Ursula entered the Capuchin order and, in accordance with her great devotion to Christ’s passion, took the name Veronica in religion.

Veronica's novitiate was difficult and she was frequently tempted to leave religious life. Her extraordinary piety overcame her doubts, and the bishop who clothed her predicted her eventual sainthood. Her devotion to the passion grew ever more intense and she began to experience intense pain in the area over her heart. In 1693, she had a vision in which Christ's chalice was offered to her and, after much hesitation, she drank from it. In 1694, the first of her visible stigmata made its appearance: the wounds of Christ's crown of thorns. On Good Friday 1697, Christ's five wounds were impressed on her hands, feet, and left side. As a result of this, the bishop had her watched closely and constantly; even the eucharist and community life in her convent were denied her. After the bishop was satisfied that no fraud was involved, he permitted her to return to normal community life.

Veronica suffered physically and emotionally for fifty years but continued to participate fully and vigorously in conventual activity. She was novice mistress for thirty-four years and abbess from 1716 until her death in 1727. Before she died, she told her confessor that the instruments of Christ's passion were imprinted on her heart, an assertion reputedly proven accurate in a postmortem examination and discussed at length in the process of her beatification.

Gobind Singh

Sikh guru

Before his capture and execution in 1675, Sikh Guru Tegh Bahadur nominated his son Gobind Das as guru. Although the first years of his guruship were spent in relative peace at Anandpur, India, soon pressure from surrounding hill chiefs forced him to move to Paunta, a town on the banks of the Yamuna River. At Paunta, the now mature Guru Gobind Singh established a religious and political center, building a gurdwara (house of the guru) that was surrounded by a fortress and protected by a fairly large armed force.

The success of the Sikh community and its growing presence began to threaten the control of the local hill chiefs, however, and Paunta was targeted for battle. Guru Gobind Singh met his enemies at Bhangani, defeated them, and then, with his newfound power, moved back to Anandpur. While there, like many of the other Sikh gurus he faced external threats, mostly from the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb (r. 1658–1707), who had taken notice of the rising power of the Sikh community, and from internal dissension, most notably from the followers of Guru Arjan's brother Prithi Chand and his rival claims to the leadership of the community.

In Anandpur, during the Baisakhi festival in 1699 Guru Gobind Singh declared all Sikhs to be the Khalsa, or the Pure. This declaration was an attempt to unite the core Sikh community in opposition to rival claims of true lineage from the followers of Prithi Chand, Dhir Mal, and Ram Rai and to check the growing control of local Sikh leaders, called masands. The success of this declaration can be measured by the response of other groups vying for power, as two years later the Mughal Empire joined forces with local hill chiefs in an attempt to wrest power from Guru Gobind Singh and his Khalsa. The alliance was successful, and Guru Gobind Singh was forced to leave Punjab. After years of moving around northern India, he finally made peace with the new Mughal emperor, Bahadur Shah, and hoped to return to Anandpur. However, he was stabbed in the Deccan town of Nander, by an Afghan enemy of the Mughal emperor, and died a few days later, on October 7, 1708.

Before his death, Guru Gobind Singh ended the practice of personal nomination to the guruship and instead declared the Adi Granth, the holy scripture of the community, to be the living guru. The sacred scripture became known as the Guru Granth Sahib (Revered book). Thus, the authority of a personal Sikh guru was replaced by the dual authority of the Khalsa and scripture.

Although it is accepted that Guru Gobind Singh did not include any of his hymns or writings in the Guru Granth Sahib, there is much controversy over another book that does contain some of his writings, the Dasam Granth (variously translated as the "The Book of the Tenth Guru" or "The Tenth Book"). Some believe he wrote almost all the compositions in it, others believe he wrote very few of them and that it represents the collected court poetry read out during the Anandpur days, and still other opinions fall between these two extremes. The actual contents of the Dasam Granth are very diverse as it contains retellings of Puranic mythology, many folktales, a section on the "Wiles of Women" (Chitro Pakhyani), and even a letter in Persian written to Aurangzeb, the Mughal emperor responsible for Guru Tegh Bahadur's death and Gobind Singh's own removal from Anandpur, called the Zafarnama. The debate over authorship has yet to reach any satisfactory conclusion.

Guru Gobind Singh is still powerfully alive in the Sikh imagination. He stands second only to Guru Nanak (1469–1539) as the most important model for Sikhs to follow. For example, the daily Sikh liturgy, the morning and evening recitations specifically, includes Guru Nanak's Japji (Meditation of the soul) as well as Guru Gobind Singh's Jap (Meditation) and ten Savayyas. Furthermore, Guru Gobind Singh's emphasis on divine justice and on the rule of the Khalsa has withstood the test of time. His life has been, and still is, a source of inspiration to Sikhs in times of persecution and hardship.

Godeliva

(c. 1052–1070 C.E.)

Christian laywoman, martyr

The Christian saint Godeliva was first and foremost an obedient wife, who, following her murder in 1070, became the only married woman martyr recognized by the medieval papacy. She inspired enthusiastic devotion from a great popular cult.

Godeliva, born in about 1052, grew into a beautiful girl in the Belgian town of Londefort and accrued many suitors. Her parents selected the wealthiest of these, Lord Bertulf of Ghisteltes. Bertulf's mother, however, was furious that the marriage was made without consulting her. Her scorn so changed Bertulf's feelings toward Godeliva that he deserted his bride. Godeliva was kept in a cell and given only scraps of bread and water. When her rations were cut further, Godeliva fled to her parents. They complained first to the count of Flanders and then to the bishop of Tournai, who decreed that Godeliva should return to Bertulf and that he should treat her well. Although Bertulf agreed, he soon became violent, treating Godeliva worse than before. One day, feigning reconciliation, he asked her to see a woman who could help make theirs a loving marriage. Soon thereafter, two of his servants woke Godeliva and told her to come to this woman immediately. Once outside, they choked her and drowned her in a pond. They then returned Godeliva's body to her bed to make it appear a natural death.

Signs that this domestic abuse was really martyrdom soon appeared. The earth around the pond where Godeliva was strangled turned into marble, and the water cured all who drank it. Pilgrims began to visit, taking chips of the marble. The water even cured Bertulf's daughter (from his second marriage) of blindness, causing Bertulf to repent. In 1084, Godeliva's body was enshrined in a church, which established her among the ranks of the saints. Godeliva is not a traditional martyr, since she was not particularly pious and did not die for her faith—she was an ordinary married woman and an innocent murder victim. Her biographer, Drogo of Winoksbergen, praises her for her humility and submissiveness, both to her husband and to the aristocratic and ecclesiastical leaders whose judgment proved so fatal. It was perhaps this combination of normalcy and victimhood at the hands of those in power—traits that many must have identified with—that inspired her devoted following.

Pilgrims continue to visit Godeliva's shrine today, purchasing rings that have touched her relics and drinking the water. Fittingly, she is the patron saint of throat diseases, in-law problems, and difficult marriages.

Godric

(c. 1065–1170 C.E.)

Christian hermit

Godric, who died as a hermit at Finchale, England, in 1170, was never formally canonized; nevertheless, he was recognized as a holy man during his lifetime and venerated as a saint by the local community of Durham from the time of his death until the fifteenth century.

Godric was born in about 1065 into a peasant family in Walpole, Norfolk. From modest beginnings as a local peddler, he expanded his role as a merchant, acquiring partners, buying part interests in several ships, and ultimately achieving success as a merchant-seaman. His commercial interests took him from England to Scotland, Flanders, Denmark, and the Mediterranean; he also visited the most important pilgrimage sites of his time, including Santiago de Compostela, Jerusalem, and Rome. While on pilgrimage to Lindisfarne, Godric was inspired by the example of St. Cuthbert (c.

634–687) to renounce his worldly possessions and live a life of solitude. His adoption of the eremitical life proceeded gradually; he lived for two years with a hermit in Wolsingham, cared for the sick in the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem, and was a sacristan in a village church, where he learned to read with the local schoolboys, before establishing his hermitage on the river Wear, vowing obedience to the prior of Durham.

During his lifetime, Godric was known for his gift of prophecy, his friendships with wild animals, and his visions of saints, angels, and demons. His posthumous miracles center more extensively on miraculous cures. He is also credited with writing the first lyric poems in English, including a song to St. Nicholas, the patron of merchants and mariners who live in the mid-fourth century. Godric's cult was never widespread; in fact, one scholar has noted that "the majority of his pilgrims were local, female, and lower-class" (Finucane 1977, 127). Nevertheless, Godric was held in great esteem by the monks of Durham cathedral priory, who provided him with land, cared for him in his final illness, and recorded his life and miracles.

Gods on Earth

Some religions have envisaged their holy people not just as individuals with a special connection to the divine, but as divine themselves, especially in the form of divine incarnations, emanations, or manifestations on earth. To Western audiences, this presence of gods on earth is best known in the form of Christian belief that Jesus of Nazareth was God incarnate, and in the ancient Egyptian conviction that their rulers were both gods and sons of a god. That gods sometimes walk the earth in human form is also a common theme in folklore. Many of the ancient Greek heroes fit into this category, as does the Peruvian god Cuniraya Huiracocha, who was said to come to earth in the form of a beggar. The oldest, clearest, and most consistent belief in divine appearances among humans, though, comes from India, where theology focuses on the role of the avatara, the god in human form.

Only in the case of Islam is the manifestation of God on earth regarded as impossible—God being completely transcendent in Muslim theology. Even so, Islamic thought has been influenced by the Persian mystic Mevlana Jalaluddin Rumi (1207–1273), who argued that every age has had a "manifestation" (rather than "incarnation") of God, including Adam, Noah, Jesus, and Muhammad. And the Nation of Islam in the United States, an offshoot of traditional Islam, includes the claim that its founder, W. D. Fard (c. 1891–?), was "Allah" (and therefore it is a matter of faith that God is black). Perhaps this belief influenced the African American Christian preacher Father Divine (d. 1965), who proclaimed himself to be God—a theme otherwise limited in Christianity to the figure of Jesus alone. The Baha'i faith, which also grew out of Islam, recognizes numerous founders of religions as manifestations of God, including Jesus, Muhammad, the Buddha, Krishna, Abraham, and Moses as well as the Bab and Baha'u'llah. For Baha'is, the validity of a manifestation of God is proven by six elements: (1) that they transform the lives of people who recognize them, (2) that they reveal divine verses, (3) that they have certain characteristics, including integrity and willingness to suffer for the truth, (4) that they fit into the chain of prophecy, (5) that they are appropriate to the era in which they are born, and (6) that divine judgment will come to their opponents.

Rather different is the Hindu concept of the avatar, a "down-coming" of the divine in human form. It is not clear if this is a physical incarnation. On one hand, at least in some accounts of avatars the holy-person-god can be embraced and takes part in the physical side of human life (for example, Krishna in the Bhagavad Gita, when Arjuna apologizes for holding the god disrespectfully). On the other hand, it is commonly believed that avatars only have apparent bodies and are not really born or subject to death. Still, avatars do take the form of a full human life, from conception to death. The term "avatar" is applied especially to appearances of Vishnu, although sometimes it is used for other gods. Vishnu is believed to have ten avatars—a fish, a tortoise, a boar, a lion, a dwarf, Parasurama, Rama, Krishna, the Buddha, and Kalkin (who has not yet appeared).

The idea of the avatar seems to be a late development in Hinduism, first appearing in the later Upanishads—before that, divine appearances were in the form of "manifestations," which suggests a definition more like that of the Baha'is, rather than a one-on-one equation of a god "in disguise" on earth. That is, the god merely sends out some of his or her essence while remaining, in effect, separate from the manifestation. In both cases, the god, whether manifestation or avatar, has clearly come to earth as a great teacher, to protect the righteous and to blaze a path for people to follow of virtuous behavior and connection to the divine. Thus, both Krishna (the most famous avatar of Vishnu, believed to have lived in about 3000 B.C.E.) and Jesus were born of human parents (although, because of the doctrine of the virgin birth, Christians believe that Jesus had only one human parent) but retained full divinity, appearing on earth for the sake of the world.

The concept of the avatar has been expanded beyond the ten avatars of Vishnu, and several Hindu holy people have been regarded by their followers (or have proclaimed themselves) to be an avatar. Thus, many Hindus think that the ninth-century poet-saint Andal was an avatar of the earth goddess; Krishna Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533) has been regarded by millions as an incarnation of both Krishna and his consort Radha; Sahajananda Swami, who founded a religious movement in India in the early nineteenth century, was regarded as an avatar of Vishnu who took earthly form to bring salvation to his followers; and many Hindus worship Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886) as an avatar. Some great saints of India have even been regarded as avatars of holy objects: Vedanta Deshika (1268–1370) is believed to be an avatar of the temple bell at Tirupati, while the Hindu devotional saint Hit Harivansh (c. 1502–c. 1552) is regarded as an incarnation of Krishna's flute.

Belief that particularly holy people are avatars seems to have increased in recent times, perhaps because of a conviction that the troubles of the world are demanding a divine response in the form of a new avatar who will restore balance to the world. The followers of Sathya Sai Baba (1926–) recognize their guru as an incarnation of several gods and goddesses, especially Shiva and Shakti, believing that he showed signs of divinity from the age of thirteen. The Bengali female guru Anandamayi Ma (1896–1982) was told by an inner voice that she was divine—her disciples saw her as a manifestation of the goddess Kali. Meher Baba (1894–1969), creator of a syncretism movement in modern India, claimed to be the final avatar of God. And today the guru Ammachi (1953–), who achieved personal identification first with Krishna and then with Kali in 1975, reveals her true identity weekly to her followers.

It has been argued by scholars such as Geoffrey Parrinder (1997) that the developed concept of the Hindu avatar was influenced by Jaina and Buddhist beliefs in recurrent jinas and buddhas, great holy people with many divine attributes (although gods play a secondary role in both religions). An important difference between an avatar and a buddha, however, is that, for most Buddhists, Shakyamuni Buddha is the only historic buddha, while Hindu avatars, as we have seen, continue to appear to the present. Bodhisattvas (enlightened beings, in Buddhism), however, have been regarded as manifesting or incarnating themselves on earth at times.

This belief appears for the most part in two regions in which Buddhism has adapted considerably to indigenous belief, Tibet and Japan. Thus, in Japan, the Buddhist monk Gyogi Bosatsu (668–749) was popularly believed to be an incarnation of the bodhisattva Manjushri. In Japan, the daigon (great incarnation), the deity appearing in human form, is a significant theme in Shinto. It also appears in the new religions of Japan—Kotama Okada (1901–1974) was the incarnation of a Shinto god, as was Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), who, in a variant, was regarded as the bodily shrine of “God the Parent.” The idea of the manifest god is particularly central to Tibetan Buddhist belief and governance. Not only have certain holy figures, such as Drom Tonpa (1005–1064) or Gampopa (1079–1153), been regarded as emanations of various bodhisattvas, this belief has been important in establishing lineages of religious leaders. Tsong kha pa (1357–1419), founder of the Gelukpa school, was regarded as an emanation of three bodhisattvas in one body. Even more important, the reincarnating lamas are regarded as emanations of bodhisattvas; for example, since the fifth, the dalai lamas have been held to be incarnations of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of compassion.

This belief also appears in China, in Buddhism as well as in other religions. Thus, the Chinese Buddhist Dushun (557–640) was later believed to be an incarnation of Manjushri (bodhisattva of wisdom). Several Daoist deities have also manifested themselves in human form, some of them many times. For example, the early Daoist deity Huang-lo-chün has reportedly descended to earth to assist humankind many times in the form of various Daoist masters, including Laozi (sixth century B.C.E.). Even the imported holy figure, the Middle Eastern prophet Mani (216–274/277 C.E.), became known in China as the buddha of light and an incarnation of Laozi.

Gopi/The Gopis

Legendary Hindu devotees

The Sanskrit word gopi means “a female cowherder” or “cowherd maiden.” The word in its plural form, Gopis, names the group of married and unmarried cowherd women and girls who were passionately devoted to the god Krishna, an intimate form of the divinity for the majority of Hindus. The word in its singular form, “the Gopi,” can refer to the favored Gopi of Krishna, known as Radha. The Gopis are said to ex-emphify the highest devotion to Krishna and serve as a model of loving service for Vaishnava devotees.

The Gopis appear in the ancient literature of India known as the puranas. It is in the tenth book of the popular Bhagavata Purana (BhP), famed for its stories of Krishna as an infant, child, and youth in the region of Vraja in northern India, that the Gopis receive the greatest attention as passionate lovers of the flute-playing Lord Krishna.

The Gopis make their most prominent appearance in the famous story of the dance known as the Rasa Lila (BhP 10.29–33). One enchanting autumn evening, as the full moon is rising, Krishna produces irresistible flute music that lures the Gopis. They suddenly abandon everything—their household duties, families, homes, even their physical bodies, to run off to the forest to be with Krishna. Several chapters earlier (BhP 10.22), the Gopis had performed special worship practices to gain the favor of the supreme goddess in order to attain Krishna as their husband. It is in the Rasa Lila that the Gopis are said to have had this desire fulfilled. The climactic scene occurs when the Gopis form a great circle around Krishna, who miraculously duplicates himself in order to dance with each and every Gopi at once, though each Gopi feels that Krishna is with her alone.

The Gopis are known for their songs of love and separation. In the “song of the flute” (BhP 10.21), the Gopis yearn to be with Krishna after being mesmerized by his flute music, which captivates all living beings. The middle chapter of the Rasa Lila (BhP 10.31) presents the “song of the Gopis,” in which the Gopis pray for Krishna’s return after he disappears from them. In a later story of the Bhagavata, as Krishna reaches youthful maturity and departs from the rural Vraja area, the Gopis again yearn for his return (BhP 10.47). Within the same chapter, the famed “song of the black bee” is a short soliloquy of a single Gopi who, out of madness caused by her loving passion, speaks to a black bee as if it were a messenger sent by Krishna himself.

Gorakhnath

(late 12th–early 13th cent. C.E.?)

Hindu guru

Gorakhnath (Sanskrit, “Master of the Cowherds”) was a renowned Hindu guru who is said to have originated the confederation of Shaiva yogins known as the Nath Siddhas (Perfected ones who are masters) and to have developed the practices of hatha yoga (forceful yoga). Although recent research has shown that a man named Gorakh probably lived in western India during the late twelfth to early thirteenth centuries, he has been connected to earlier quasi-historical mystics, to semidivine beings called siddhas (perfected beings), and even to a Buddhist deity.

It is probable that the historical Gorakhnath institutionalized earlier Shaivite orders, such as the Kapalikas (Users of the skull), Pasupatas (Followers of the Lord of Beasts), and Kanphatas (Split-eared ones), merging them with others practicing variations of hatha yoga, Indian alchemy, and Tantric yoga. Thus emerged the orders (sampradaya) of Nath Siddhas. After the thirteenth century, there was a virtual “Gorakhization” (White 1996) as many myths and legends, yogic orders, and monasteries were claimed to descend from him. He is frequently claimed as one of the Nine Naths, a shifting list of great masters in which he is usually placed second or third. Stories are told of his magical powers, his miraculous birth, how he battled demons, and how he saved his own master from sexual bondage in a kingdom of women in Assam.

Beyond this trove of myths and legends, Gorakh (also known as Goraksa) is claimed as the author of many vernacular mystical poems and numerous Sanskrit texts on hatha yoga. Foremost among the later are the thirteenth-century Goraksa Sataka (Hundred stanzas of Goraksa) and the Goraksa Samhita (Compendium of Goraksa). The three extant versions of the latter encompass the major teachings of the medieval Nath Siddha traditions: alchemy, hatha yoga, and tantric worship involving the use of sexual fluids.

As one of the most famous holy figures of south Asia, Gorakhnath and his many manifestations provide glimpses into the historical development of yogic practices, monastic orders, and popular devotions and attitudes.

Goretti, Maria

(1890–1902 C.E.)

Roman Catholic laywoman, martyr

In 1902, Maria Goretti, a twelve-year-old, resisted an attempted rape by the son of her dead father’s partner; she subsequently died from wounds inflicted by her assailant, Alessandro Serenelli. The Roman Catholic Church canonized her in 1950 with the official appellation of martyr. During her cause for beatification, Serenelli reported that as she fought him off, she said, “It’s a sin! God does not want it!” These words were interpreted by the church as a willingness to die for the faith, and a willingness to die so that Serenelli would not commit the sin of rape. Shortly before she died, Maria freely forgave Serenelli and expressed a wish that he might someday join her in heaven. Serenelli stated that in the eighth year of his jail sentence he had a conversion experience upon seeing a vision of Maria. Public support of Maria’s courage and sanctity was so vigorously outspoken that her cause for sainthood moved quickly through official channels. Her mother and siblings were present for the canonization ceremony, a first in Catholic history.

Maria, born in 1890, was one of seven children of Luigi and Assunta Goretti, poor and illiterate farming people in Ferriere, Italy. When Luigi died from malaria, Maria took over many domestic chores to free her mother to help in the fields. She was attacked while caring for the baby of the family. Maria has been held up as a model of chastity for young people and a model of courage for poor, illiterate women. She has been presented as a reminder to the church to safeguard children against the dangers and violence of the world. It has been suggested that Maria’s lack of education was a means to holiness and deeper faith in God. Maria’s faith led her to embrace her death in protest against physical violence.

Maria Goretti was a pioneer in the cause against violence toward women. She had a true sense of herself as a precious daughter of God, and she took a stand in defense of her person by choosing not to be victimized by another person’s aggression. In refusing to acquiesce to the demands of her assailant, Maria reaffirmed her right to human respect at every level. In the face of oppression and adversity, she upheld her fundamental right to human dignity. Maria stands out as a woman empowered to speak out on her own behalf and, by extension, on behalf of all women, and men, who are victims of violence.

Graham, Billy

Christian evangelist

William Franklin Graham, universally known as Billy Graham, has been the leading revivalist preacher in the United States since he began his ministry in 1949. He has preached to more people than anyone else in history, adding the modern media of radio and television to a ceaseless series of evangelical “crusades” that took him to 185 countries, during which he preached live to an estimated 210 million people. Graham’s influence, especially in American culture, has been enormous, earning him the nickname “pope of Protestant America,” although he has sometimes also been criticized for his active stance on various political issues, most notably Watergate and the Vietnam War.

Graham, born in 1918, was the son of dairy farmers in Charlotte, North Carolina. At the age of sixteen he made a personal religious conversion during the course of a revival meeting. His experience led him to choose a career in the ministry. He was ordained in the Southern Baptist Church in 1939 and studied at both Florida Bible Institute and Wheaton College in Illinois. At the latter institute, he met his wife Ruth, to whom he has been married for nearly six decades. After college, Graham joined the Youth for Christ ministry, an organization dedicated to serving the youth and servicemen of America.

Graham’s position as a religious leader took an extraordinary turn in 1949, when he was sent to conduct a revival mission in Los Angeles. A three-week revival had been scheduled, but Graham ended up preaching to overflow crowds for eight weeks—and suddenly found himself propelled to international fame. This was the beginning of his mission crusades, which have proved of enduring value to people throughout the world for two generations. Graham does not have a new message. He is not a founder of a church, instead preaching a nondenominational message of the basic teachings of Christianity in a way that appeals to a broad cross-section of the population. The Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA), founded by Graham in 1950, has avoided radicalism and continues to support the causes especially dear to Billy Graham: understanding between religions, children’s welfare, and the improvement of race relations.

Graham, suffering from Parkinson’s disease, retired at age eighty-two from active leadership of the BGEA. He lives with Ruth in North Carolina and still occasionally makes public appearances. He has received many awards, including the Templeton Prize for Progress in Religion in 1982 and the Congressional Gold Medal in 1996. In 2001, he was named an honorary knight commander of the Order of the British Empire. Perhaps a better sense of his true importance in twentieth-century religion can be gained, though, from two facts: Graham's 1977 book, How to Be Born Again, had the largest first printing of any publication in history, 800,000 copies, and Graham has appeared an astonishing forty-four times on the Gallup Poll's annual listing of the ten most admired men in the world.

Greek Philosophers

Greek philosophy encompasses vastly different figures and groups, mostly men but including some women, starting approximately from the pre-Socratics (seventh to fifth centuries B.C.E.) and Thales (fl. 585 B.C.E.), continuing with Seneca (4–65 C.E.), and then moving into the subsequent developments of Platonism, both non-Christian and Christian, from the third to the sixth centuries C.E. Philosophical (philo-sophia, “lover of wisdom”), religious, and scientific thinking and practice during these eras of Greek history were for the most part inseparable aspects of a profound questioning that generally recognized its own limitations in the context of a growing criticism of conventional views of divinity. This questioning was concerned, among many other things, with what we might call the holy, the divine, the transforming presence that human beings may invoke for aid, and by which human beings, too, may become holy, pure, blessed, and god-beloved. It explored these issues in terms both of “the holy things,” or what is owing to the gods, and “the just things,” what is owed to one’s fellow beings, including piety to parents and family. No single technical vocabulary for the holy was developed over this period.

An important element of Greek philosophy was a search for the divine ground of reality in the nature of physical things (including the soul and the self). This view is supported by any cursory glance at early pre-Socratic thought, with various philosophers declaring various elements to be the beginning principle of the cosmos. At the same time, there is more at issue than natural theology; what was at issue was a recognition that overcoming the limitations of human knowing (in accordance with the Delphic maxim,

The Death of Socrates by Jacques-Louis David, 1787. (Bettman/Corbis)

“Know yourself”) requires a new way of seeing, and being in, the world, divine aid to bring this about, and a transformation of one’s way of life. Religious, magical, or mystery elements in Greek thought cannot be artificially separated from philosophy, if philosophy is the path uncovered by the spiritual guide or the group that accompanies or follows this guide (as in the case of Orpheus and Pythagoras, above all), a practical spiritual exercise as an education for the happy life and a token of the freedom of soul.

The spiritual guide, the true philosopher, is thus a holy person, whose training, as Plutarch (c. 50–120 C.E.) puts it, is “a work more holy than any holy observance or temple service” (De Iside et Osiride 351e). Such work then involves an approach or journey to the source of the holy. Parmenides (fl. 470 B.C.E.) might have been the first philosopher to use arguments, but his poem actually describes a journey, by virtue of divine help, to a goddess of no name (in a completely feminine universe) who gives him her teaching. Empedocles (fl. 450 B.C.E.) appears as a divinized, prophetic mediator to mortals (fragment [fr.] 112). He prays to the gods “from holy lips to pour a pure stream,” and to the Muse, that a mortal should only hear what is right by virtue of the chariot that comes “from Piety,” and to say no more than is “holy” (fr. 3).

These are not empty forms, but “the heights of wisdom,” in which controlling the winds, healing, prophecy, overcoming death, having a care for good deeds and strangers (fr. 112), and reasoning, or proportion, emerge together. Proportion is the essence of the holy for human lips. But if this is a path of closeness to the divine, it is not the usual path “traveled by wagons” of perceptual persuasion into the human mind (fr. 133). The later itinerant sophists were also practical guides in this sense, even if the test of their wisdom can sometimes, as in Plato’s (c. 429–347 B.C.E.) Gorgias, reveal their feet of clay. And the fragments of the great founder of atomism, Democritus (fl. 420 B.C.E.), reveal penetrating spiritual insight into the nature of morality and of human relation to divinity.

But if what is holy depends on divinity, and divinity only reflects conventional morality or human forms of mind control (according to some of the sophists in the latter half of the fifth century B.C.E.), then the holy is a question of preference—if not human preference, then the preference of willful or self-willed gods. So in Plato’s Euthyphro the problem of a criterion beyond human convention or divine preference is broached but not solved, since a definition of the holy is not apparently reached in that dialogue. But the question of a definition of the holy is left open: Is it a “commercial art,” that is, we give to the gods so that they give us good things back (effectively criticized at Euthyphro 14c–15a), or do the gods get anything in return?

We get a sense of what it means to be holy in Socrates’ (469–399 B.C.E.) lived experience as described by Plato. For example, the Apology conveys a sense of Socrates’ personal vocation from “the god” at Delphi, the god’s equally personal care for the people of Athens (cf. 31a), and in the context of the therapy of the soul (“I go around doing nothing but persuading you not to care for body or wealth, but as for the best possible state of your soul”). Another important element is the moral balance Socrates exhibits between human ignorance and good faith in the face of death (39e ff.: cf. Crito). The Symposium also expresses a sense of how the constant pursuit of the divinely beautiful has transformed Socrates into the unique and “god-beloved” person he is. In this context, the Platonic ideals of life as a process of “likeness to god” or as the practice of dying, of liberating the soul from the body, is not saintly remoteness from lived experience in favor of abstract universals, but the proper ordering of the body for the sake of the soul and for the divine light beyond the soul itself. And so in the Phaedrus (273e–274a) Socrates calls philosophy “talk with gods.”

In Aristotle’s thought, holiness appears as a component of just living, and becoming a morally and intellectually good person is the essence of realizing human potential in the midst of weakness of will. The process leads to a life beyond the merely human and, in terms of Aristotle’s theology, is a life of love and one in which we experience, if only intermittently, the blessed pleasure of the divine “way of life” (Metaphysics 12, 7). Aristotle’s sage or good person, together with the figure of Socrates, establishes a practical ideal of the spiritual guide for the rest of antiquity (including Christian ascetical thought), that is, a path of piety and holiness to one’s fellow beings, to the cosmos, and to the divine, a path of purgation, purification, and illumination that can be communicated and tested, is open to all, different for each, and yet the exclusive property of no one.

For the Stoics, holiness is “justice in relation to the gods” (Cicero, De Natura Deorum 1, 116) or “thinking rightly about the gods” (Seneca, Epistle 31, 8). For the Epicureans, “Every wise man holds pure and holy beliefs about the gods,” and for Epicurus (341–270 B.C.E.), it is natural for us to pray not because the gods would be angry if we didn’t, but so that we might realize perfection and companionship with the laws in accordance with the understanding of beings surpassing in power and excellence (Philodemus, On Piety 26–27).

Greek philosophy was never a question of academic disciplines, but of spiritual exercises. So for Plotinus (204–270 C.E.), the deepest longing of the human soul is for that which is greater than the soul (Ennead I, 4, 10); his dying words, according to Porphyry (232/233–305 C.E.), were: “Try to bring back the divine in us to the divine in the all.” And so prayer is a proper form of address in such thinking, since the philosophical ascent to the holy does not depend entirely or even primarily upon our own efforts. Neoplatonic texts are, in fact, full of thought experience, prayers, meditational practices, and other forms of concentrating or destroying the mind as methods of getting beyond, or of being taken beyond, the texts themselves. Iamblichus (c. 240–325 C.E.) and Proclus (411–485 C.E.) emphasize a way of salvation not by theology but by ritual, comparing the material universe to a mirror so saturated with the holy presence of invisible powers that each part responds in sympathy, and with correspondence to, every other part because of its dependence and return to that holy majesty upon which its being depends.

Greek Prophets

Greek prophets are a diverse group but fit into four main categories: (1) priests and priestesses at the greater and lesser shrines, such as Dodona in Epirus (an oracle of Zeus), Delphi (the oracle of Apollo), or Asklepios at the healing sanctuary of Epidaurus; (2) legendary seers, prophets, and diviners, such as Melampus (who could understand the speech of animals), Cassandra (doomed by Apollo to prophesy, but not to be believed), Calchas, and Tiresias, and equally legendary musicians, poets, and spiritual guides, such as Orpheus and Pythagoras; (3) those nameless persons circulating prophecies attached to the name of some inspired individual, such as the Sibyl or Orpheus; and (4) others engaging in all the various forms of divination, such as necromancy, iatromancy, augury, weather divination, even rhapsodomancy (the random consultation of divinely inspired books, such as opening Homer randomly for prophetic inspiration).

In general, “prophet” (prophētēs, mantis) is the title of a holy mortal who speaks in the name of a god or interprets divine will, someone who can cross borders between the human and animal realms, and between the divine and the human, life and death, as in the case of many legendary Greek figures. In Empedocles’ case, the prophet claims to be an immortal god already. Prophecy is directly related to poetic inspiration, when it is known as enthousiasmos. This can include ecstatic or frenzied behavior. As Socrates holds, “The greatest blessings come by way of heaven-sent madness” (Phaedrus, 244a).

Blindness, too, traditionally linked with both poetry and prophecy (for example, Homer and Tiresias), connotes superhuman vision, or waking up to a different way of seeing—as, perhaps, in the mysteries, or in the “Orphic” notion, first mentioned in Pindar (c. 518–c. 446 B.C.E.), that what survives death is an image of life that sleeps during normal bodily consciousness but wakes up while the body sleeps and foresees future events in prophetic dreams. This image survived because it alone was from the gods. This notion became the foundation for the Stoic philosophy of divination (and the view that the soul of the prophet is in open contact with different dimensions of the world) and was also a regulating force in normal temple procedure (as at the temple of Asklepios). When in need of healing or initiation, the pilgrim slept within the temple precincts (incubation) and waited for the confirmation of a god-inspired dream. But the practice of incubation and iatromancy (medicine prophecy) was also connected with the mastery of different states of consciousness, of descent into the underworld, and of an animal-like closeness to the divine. At the Oracle of Trophonius at Lebadea, for instance, the pilgrim descended into the bowels of the earth, where he or she experienced a rapid spinning movement, powerful vibrations, and a more powerful form of consciousness. Epimenides (late seventh century B.C.E.) spent decades asleep in the Cave of Zeus on Crete, and Pythagoras (c. 570–497 B.C.E.) returned from long periods in an underground room as a messenger from the gods.

At the major sites where prophetic power took up fixed abode and people came for millennia to pose their questions, different forms of prophecy prevailed. At Dodona, the prophets, the Selli, were early described as “of unwashed feet and sleeping on the ground” (Iliad 16, 233), and later three priestesses, “doves,” interpreted the oracle either through the murmuring of sacred oaks, a spring, or a brazen gong. At Delphi, the Pythia gave responses in a state of divine trance induced by the chewing of bay leaves or by the inhalation of vapors from a chasm (the latter theory is back in favor at this time). Heraclitus (fl. c. 500 B.C.E.) catches the simple, enigmatic, but comprehensive force of prophecy: “The Sibyl with raving mouth uttering unlaughing, unbeautified, uncensored things reaches out over a thousand years with her voice through the god” (fragment [fr.] 92). And again: “The Lord, whose oracle is that at Delphi, neither speaks nor hides, but indicates” (fr. 93).

Plutarch (c. 50–120 C.E.) emphasizes the connection between the inquiry, wonder, and uncertainty of philosophy and the concealment of prophetic riddles that in their turn prompt creative, inquiring response. This connection between philosophy, prophecy, and magic was more pervasive than has generally been supposed, for many early Greek philosophers were also regarded as prophets and saviors who descended from heaven as a help for souls. Such was the case of Empedocles (fl. 450 B.C.E.), who has so often been made into a rationalist after the nineteenth century, but was still regarded in Persian thought of the ninth century as a ghiyath or “help” of souls, and later still was painted in the colors of a sufi by the twelfth-century Persian mystic Shihabuddin Suhrawardi.

Greek Ruler Cult

The idea of contact between rulers, both male and female, and the gods is long-standing in the Greek mythological tradition. The king appears as the principal agent in transmitting the favor of the gods to the subjects of his realm. Thus, Jason on his way to regain his father’s kingdom stopped to help an old woman across the river, losing a sandal in the process. The crone was Hera in disguise. She never forgot his kindness and remained his lifelong ally. Athena acted as protector of Odysseus in the Trojan War and on his long journey home. Lycurgus, king of Sparta, visited Apollo’s temple in Delphi after having penned his code for the regulation of the affairs of Lacedaemon. Apollo addressed him and weighed and examined the reputation Lycurgus enjoyed. At the commencement of his oracle, the god declared that he was puzzled whether to call Lycurgus a god or a man, but as he advanced Apollo decided in favor of the former appellation and assigned it to him as a good man.

The tenth-century Byzantine encyclopedia called the Suda describes kingship in the Hellenistic period as reflecting a combination of military achievement and personal merit. The connection was established between an individual’s ability to perform great services, such as founding cities, removing famine, and winning battles, and the perception of that person as being worthy of the kinds of tributes that humans pay to the gods. Both Philip of Macedon (r. 359–336 B.C.E.) and Alexander (r. 336–323 B.C.E.) took pride in being descendants of Herakles. With the rise of Alexander the Great and the conquest of Egypt and the Persian Empire, new ideas concerning kingship and divine rulership entered the Hellenistic mind. Alexander was deified shortly after his death. His followers and most ambitious generals carved up his empire and connected themselves in some way with him. His general, Ptolemy (367/366–282 B.C.E.), used his successful defense of Egypt against invasion in 306 B.C.E. to support the usurpation of the royal title for Egypt. Coin types of Ptolemy with the eagle and thunderbolt link the dynasty with Zeus. Ptolemy set up his dynasty using much of the previous model the pharaohs had established with some Greek innovations.

Ruler worship was firmly established by Ptolemy II’s (308–246 B.C.E.) inauguration of a festival to honor his father, aiming to encourage loyalty and make the succession official. Hecataeus of Abdera (c. 360–290 B.C.E.), court historian to the Ptolemies, wrote, “The Egyptians perform proskynesis [bowing to the ground] to their kings and honor them as gods, in the belief that they have not obtained supreme power without the help of divine providence and that such as have the will and ability to confer the greatest benefits share in the divine nature” (Aegyptica). Seleucus (c. 358–281 B.C.E.) assumed power in the eastern part of Alexander’s empire centered in Babylon. In return for Apollo’s prophecy of Seleucus’s kingship, perhaps as early as 312 B.C.E., the Seleucids built Apollo a sanctuary at Daphne and commissioned the magnificent Didyma temple. Coins from the reign of Antiochus I (c. 324–261 B.C.E.) show Apollo, in prophet guise, on the reverse side. Later Seleucid inscriptions regularly describe Apollo as the founder of their house. The Seleucid kings set up civic cults to their deceased ancestors and honored them with feasts and festivals during the next hundred years.

As Antiochus III (c. 242–187 B.C.E.) and his wife, Laodice (daughter of king Mithradates of Pontus), assumed the helm of the Seleucid Empire, new institutions were created. At the town of Iasos, Laodice was worshipped with the goddess Aphrodite. In 193 B.C.E., King Antiochus III instituted a centralized “royal state cult” of himself and his former ruling ancestors as well as a state cult of Queen Laodice. Antiochus did not include his offspring in the royal cult but instead made space for them to act as chief priests and priestesses. Chief priests and priestesses were also assigned to the cult centers throughout the empire, chosen from the friends of the king and queen. Crowns and statues, altars, sacrifices, and annual festivals held on the ruler’s birthday or on the anniversary of his benefaction were connected with the cult. Evidence suggests that the ruler cults were patterned after the Greek city hero cults with some borrowing from neighboring countries.

Gregory, Louis

Baha’i Hand of God

Louis George Gregory was a prominent American Baha’i. He worked for race unity and was the first black person to be appointed a “Hand of the Cause of God.” Born the son of slaves in Charleston, South Carolina, shortly after the American Civil War, in 1874, he grew up with the disappointment of seeing the dream of freedom turn into the reality of segregation and the “Jim Crow” laws. His father died when Louis was a child, and the family experienced severe poverty. The turning point came when his mother married George Gregory, a Union Army veteran. This enabled Louis to attend school, and eventually to graduate from Avery Institute in Charleston (1891), from Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee (1896), and from Howard University in Washington, D.C. (1902), where he studied law. He was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court in March 1907.

Gregory first came across the Baha’i faith in 1907 and finally became a Baha’i in 1909. As a Baha’i, he opposed all signs of racial segregation or prejudice in the Baha’i community. This mission was reinforced by ‘Abdu’l-Baha (1844–1921 C.E.) both in letters and later in person during his visit to North America. During this trip, ‘Abdu’l-Baha also introduced Gregory to Louise Mathew, a white British Baha’i, and later encouraged them to marry, which they did. Such a mixed marriage faced severe stresses, but it was the first between a white and a black Baha’i, and the knowledge that ‘Abdu’l-Baha had promoted it was a strong reinforcement of the Baha’i commitment to racial equality and fellowship.

In 1912, Gregory was elected to the Baha’i Temple Unity, the first regional Baha’i council in North America, and he remained on this body when it evolved into the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha’is of the United States and Canada, the first black to serve in this capacity. In 1916, Gregory decided to close his law practice and commit himself full-time to traveling and teaching the Baha’i faith, particularly among the black population in America’s South. He had a deep commitment to racial equality and fellowship, writing on this subject and helping to organize conferences to promote it.

Gregory continued his travels for the Baha’i faith until 1946, when increasing infirmity forced him to retire to the couple’s home in Eliot, Maine, where he died on July 30, 1951. Gregory was greatly loved both by ‘Abdu’l-Baha and Shoghi Effendi. The latter stated that the “rising Baha’i generation in [the] African continent will glory in his memory and emulate his example” (Morrison 1982, 310). Shoghi Effendi also promoted Gregory posthumously to the rank of Hand of the Cause, the highest distinction in the Baha’i faith.

Gregory I (Gregory the Great)

Christian pope, theologian

Gregory I, pope from 590 to 604, worked to invigorate the Christian church and asserted the authority of the Roman see as the church’s representative throughout the territories of the old Roman Empire. He emphasized a program of pastoral and missionary work done by the church’s secular clergy, especially its bishops, as vital to these efforts.

As the son of a patrician family (born in 540), Gregory had a classical Roman education in preparation for an administrative or ecclesiastical career. Instead he sought the contemplative life. He was a monk at St. Andrew's in his family palace in Rome from 574 to 579. In 579, Pelagius II sent him to Constantinople as a papal legate. Six years later, Gregory returned to St. Andrew's and became its abbot. Pelagius II died unexpectedly in 590, and Gregory was immediately elected pope, much to Gregory's dismay.

When Gregory was first deprived of the contemplative life as a papal legate to Constantinople, he maintained his spiritual equilibrium by meditating and teaching on the figure of the long-suffering Job from the Hebrew Bible. His election to the papacy forced Gregory to consider again the work of the Christian church in the temporal world. In the Regula Pastoralis (A rule for pastoral care), c. 591, probably the most influential work of his papacy, Gregory outlines the principles by which spiritual directors among the secular clergy should meet the demands of their office and assure their own spiritual well-being. Here Gregory examines the variations of the human psyche central to pastoral concerns, with the premise that the differences in human personality—in temperament or tendencies to behave habitually in particular ways—can impede one's receptivity to God. He gives detailed examples of differences (presented as a loose taxonomy of oppositional pairs) and suggests pedagogical approaches for exhortation and preaching that clergy could use to make those in their care amenable to spiritual correction.

There is a sense of urgency in Gregory's efforts. He saw the Christian church facing an apocalypse that he felt was imminent. His ascetic life and sometimes stubborn positions on doctrinal issues and matters of papal policy did not always make him a popular pope during his lifetime. Soon after his death, however, he was regarded as a pope who clearly understood the spiritual urgency of the church's work on earth, particularly the need to inspire the human soul to penitence. To do this work in an afflicted world, Gregory became convinced that one could perceive spiritual perfection in the imperfections of the temporal world. This became a guiding principle of pastoral care for those who would occupy the office of bishop.

Finding that the perfect could be visible in the imperfect gave Gregory the flexibility to persuade by gentle means whenever he could. He was willing to trade expediency for accommodation if accommodating human habits and temperaments meant achieving the greater spiritual good. One of the best-known examples of this can be found in one of Gregory's letters recorded in Bede's eighth-century Ecclesiastical History of the English People. Gregory allowed that the sites of pre-Christian temples did not need to be destroyed, revising an earlier position. Christian practices could be introduced there, replacing the original rites. This would avoid escalating the tensions between English Christians and non-Christians. In many of his works, Gregory likewise made virtue fit a human rather than a heroic scale. As a "mediator" of the holy, Gregory taught that one moves toward holiness by building on the faulty foundations of the human soul living in an imperfect world.

Gregory VII

(c. 1020–1085 C.E.)

Christian pope, reformer

One of the leaders of the eleventh-century movement known as the Gregorian reform, Gregory (originally named Hildebrand), a controversial pope, was an implacable opponent of simony (the buying and selling of ecclesiastical offices), clerical marriage, and lay investiture (the practice of a newly consecrated bishop paying homage to a secular lord in exchange for the lands of the bishopric and the symbols of office). His feast day is May 25.

Hildebrand was born in Tuscany in about 1020 but came to Rome as a child and was educated there. He was chaplain to Gregory VI, and when that pope was forced into exile in 1046, Hildebrand accompanied him. Sometime after Gregory VI's death in 1047, Hildebrand entered a Cluniac monastery, perhaps even Cluny itself. In 1049, Pope Leo IX called Hildebrand back to Rome, where he was ordained as a subdeacon and started to make a name for himself in reforming circles. In 1059, he was elevated to the rank of archdeacon and became an important adviser to Pope Nicholas II and then to Pope Alexander III. He was elected pope in April 1073 and took the name Gregory in honor of Gregory the Great.

As pope, Gregory sought to extend and enforce his authority over the entire Western church. Some insight into his understanding of the papacy can be gained from a document called the Dictatus papae (Sayings of the pope), which was inserted into the register of Gregory's letters in March 1075. The Dictatus papae consists of twenty-seven short statements about the papacy and appears to be the outline for an unfinished canon law collection. The statements include assertions that the pope is the supreme authority over all Christians, that the pope can depose kings or emperors, and that the pope cannot be judged by anyone except God.

Gregory soon established himself as a reforming pope. At synods held in Rome in 1074 and 1075, he reissued his predecessor's decrees against clerical marriage and simony. At the 1075 synod, he also issued a general condemnation of lay investiture. This position brought Gregory into conflict with the German king, Henry IV, who regarded investiture not only as his right, but as a way of insuring that the German bishops would remain loyal to the crown. In December 1075, Gregory issued a strong rebuke to Henry, who responded by convening a synod of German bishops that met in Worms in January 1076 to depose the pope. Gregory in turn excommunicated Henry a few months later. Facing a rebellion in Germany, Henry was forced to submit to the pope, who lifted the excommunication in 1077. In 1080, however, Gregory once again excommunicated Henry. Henry called another synod, which deposed Gregory and elected Guibert of Ravenna to the papacy. Guibert, who took the name Clement III, was able to rally considerable support, and thirteen of Gregory's cardinals defected to his side. In March 1084, Henry seized Rome, and Gregory was forced into exile. He died in Salerno in 1085.

Although the conflict with Henry ultimately proved disastrous for Gregory, his papacy did see a number of notable accomplishments. Gregory's legates spread the notion of reform throughout Western Europe, often holding local councils to address matters of clerical discipline. In Spain, Gregory convinced King Alfonso VI of Castile to replace the native Mozarabic liturgy with the Roman rite in his realms. Gregory's letters reveal an interest in events as far afield as Norway, Poland, and Hungary. Gregory's personal rigor and insistence on the sanctity of the clergy helped elevate the moral standing of the papacy, and he is considered one of the most important popes of the Middle Ages.

Gregory of Nazianzus

(c. 329–c. 389/390 C.E.)

Christian bishop, doctor of the church

Born in approximately 329 in central Turkey (Cappadocia), Gregory was the second of three children of Bishop Gregory the Elder of Nazianzus and his wife Nonna. He received an excellent education at Caesarea (Cappadocia), Caesarea (Palestine), Alexandria, and Athens. Gregory dedicated himself completely to God after surviving a fierce storm while en route by ship from Alexandria to Athens. In Athens, he renewed his friendship with Basil, a fellow student. Gregory remained in Athens until about 358, whereupon he returned home to Nazianzus to be baptized by his father and determine the course of his life.

Meanwhile, Basil had started a monastic community in Pontus, and Gregory soon joined him. In 361, however, Gregory was ordained a priest in Nazianzus despite his protests. In 372, again over his objections, Gregory was consecrated bishop of Sasima by Basil, now archbishop of Caesarea. Sasima was a new see founded by Basil in an attempt to consolidate his position as archbishop against the Arians. Gregory, however, never occupied his seat at Sasima, preferring to remain at Nazianzus as adjunct bishop for his father; with that rejection, the close bond of friendship that had connected Basil and Gregory was irrevocably broken. In 374, both Gregory the Elder and his wife Nonna died, whereupon Gregory gave most of his family wealth to the poor. He then retired for three years to the convent of St. Thecla at Seleucia to be spiritual director of the nuns and devote himself to prayer and writing.

In 379, Gregory was called to Constantinople as part of Emperor Theodosius's campaign in favor of Orthodox Christianity. Gregory regarded his move to Constantinople as a missionary act. Very soon the power and eloquence of his preaching attracted large crowds. In his sermons from that time, known as the Five Theological Orations, Gregory confirmed the Orthodox doctrine of the unity of the Trinity based upon the inherent equality among its three persons.

While in Constantinople, Gregory was persecuted by the Arian Christians and even endured dissension among his own flock. By 380, Theodosius had been baptized, and he insisted that the faithful in Constantinople (and all his empire) adhere to the Catholic tradition of Rome; he thereupon cast out from Constantinople the Arian bishop Demophilus and installed Gregory as bishop of Constantinople at St. Sophia. However, the Council of Constantinople in 381 rejected the appointment. Arguments and dissension followed, and Gregory, in ill health and wishing to avoid any more disagreements, returned to Nazianzus, only to be confronted by a diocese awash in heresy and disarray. For the next two years, Gregory worked to reform and restore the church at Nazianzus, and by 383, with his cousin Eulalius installed as bishop, he was able to retire from public life to monastic seclusion.

For the next six or seven years, although in ill health, Gregory worked on his literary corpus, editing his sermons and panegyrics, writing letters, and composing thousands of lines of verse, both religious and personal, of exceedingly high quality (some refer to him as “the poet of Eastern Christendom”). Gregory died in 389 or 390 and was buried in Arianus, but his remains were later removed to Constantinople, and finally, during the Middle Ages, to Rome. Gregory’s feast days in the West are January 2 (with Basil the Great) and January 25 (alone); in the East, his feast day is January 30 (with Basil and John Chrysostom).

Gregory of Nyssa

Christian bishop, monk, theologian

Gregory of Nyssa, born in about 330, was the younger brother of Basil the Great. Consecrated bishop of Nyssa c. 371, Gregory was at first trained as a rhetorician but later entered a monastery founded by Basil in Pontus. He is grouped with the “Cappadocian Fathers” due to his birthplace in Asia Minor and his intellectual affiliation with his brother Basil. A Platonist by nature, Gregory is important both as a Christian philosopher and as a theologian. Perhaps his most important exegetical work, The Life of Moses, continues the mystical and allegorical interpretations set forth by Philo of Alexandria (d. after 40 C.E.) in his extensive writing on Moses. Gregory preached virginity, believing that it would bring the individual closer to Christ. In fact, his earliest written work is the Treatise on Virginity. A strong defender of the dogma of the Trinity as set forth at the Council of Nicaea in 325, Gregory is also noted for his important mystical writing, especially his Commentary on the Song of Songs.

Philosophically, Gregory’s most important contribution is his theory of the expansion (or the Greek epektasis—literally “stretching forward”) of the soul. Used to describe the eternal progress and growth of the soul, the theory is most clearly outlined in The Life of Moses, where the ascension of Mt. Sinai by Moses is linked allegorically to the soul’s growth and union with the divine. Gregory’s sister Macrina also became a model of piety for him; his Life of Macrina is one of the most important works devoted to the spiritual practices of a woman.

Gregory’s life apparently involved a great deal of moving around. After being accused of corruption, he was deposed by a synod at Nyssa in 376. He remained in exile until the death of Emperor Valens in 378, when he regained his position. Gregory died soon after his attendance at the council of Constantinople in 394. His spiritual personality is difficult to appraise given the scant detail about his life. However, his works reflect a quick and complex mind, one strongly devoted to the Trinity and the ascetical life. His feast day is March 9.

Gregory of Sinai

Greek Orthodox monk, theologian, mystic

Gregory of Sinai was born in about 1265 near Klazomenai on the western shores of Asia Minor. As a young man he became a prisoner of the Turks. Soon after being ransomed, he went to Cyprus, where he started his monastic life, making his full monastic profession at Mt. Sinai. After Sinai he went to Crete, where he was initiated into the tradition of inner (Jesus) prayer by a monk called Arsenius. He then went to Mt. Athos, where he stayed for the next twenty-five years. There he practiced a solitary eremitical life. A Turkish invasion in approximately 1325–1328 forced him to leave Athos, although he returned there once more for a very short time during 1330.

Gregory of Sinai was at Athos at the time of a great theological dispute about the status of the Hesychast prayer (a practice of the Greek church which involved physical aids to improve concentration), the Light of Tabor (divine illumination, another Greek concept), and the highly speculative problems concerning the relationship between God’s essence and energy. Gregory (and even his disciples) did not have any real role in this controversy—he was a man who avoided all polemics and controversies—but his own (mostly implicit) theological doctrine and beliefs were in fundamental agreement with the Hesychast doctrine. Gregory of Sinai’s theology was very similar to that of another Gregory—Gregory Palamas (c. 1296–1359). These doctrines played a very important role in the cultural and religious history of the Slavs.

Gregory's written works are: On Commandments and Doctrines, Warnings and Promises, On Thoughts, Passions and Virtues, On Stillness and Prayer: One Hundred and Thirty-Seven Chapters, On the Signs of Grace and Delusion, On Stillness, On Prayer, Alia Capita, and Discourse on the Transformation.

Gregory the Thaumaturge

(c. 213–c. 270/275 C.E.)

Christian bishop

Gregory the Thaumaturge, bishop of Neocaesarea (modern Niksar, in Turkey), led his flock for thirty years and helped establish Christianity in Cappadocia. Indeed, it was said that there were only seventeen Christians in Neocaesarea when he became bishop, but when he died there were only seventeen non-Christians. He also gained a reputation as a performer of miracles, hence the name “Thaumaturge” (Wonder Worker).

Gregory was born in about 213 to a non-Christian family in Neocaesarea and converted to Christianity at the age of fourteen. He studied Latin, rhetoric, and law as a young man. He planned to enter the law school at Beirut with his brother Athenodorus, but instead they both became students of Origen, a Christian philosopher at Caesarea in Palestine, from approximately 233 to 238. After this, the brothers returned to Neocaesarea, where Gregory intended to practice law. Within a few years, however, both brothers were ordained as bishops, Gregory of Neocaesarea and Athenodorus of an unknown city.

Gregory's time as bishop was a difficult one for Christians in Cappadocia. During the Decian persecutions, Gregory and his flock hid in the mountains outside of Neocaesarea. He also had to face invasions by the Goths and Borades between 254 and 258. In response to the latter, Gregory wrote his Canonical Epistle, in which he sought to maintain church discipline and deal with Christians who had apostatized or engaged in looting. Despite these difficulties, Gregory actively worked to convert the local population to Christianity.

To counter traditional festivals, he established feasts in honor of the martyrs. He attended the first synod of Antioch in 264 but did not attend the second and probably died between 270 and 275.

Gregory left behind several important writings. His Panegyric to Origen details his studies in Caesarea and gives an outline of some of Origen's teachings. The Metaphrasis on Ecclesiastes is a paraphrase of that book of the Bible in classical Greek. A text preserved only in Syriac, the Dialogue with Theopompus addresses the question of whether God can suffer change. In his biography of Gregory the Thaumaturge, Gregory of Nyssa preserves a brief trinitarian creed, the Exposition of the Faith. Gregory's authorship of a Letter to Philagrius on Consubstantiality is disputed. His feast day is November 17.

Griffiths, Bede

Roman Catholic monk, ecumenical worker

Bede Griffiths, born in 1907, was an English Benedictine monk and a leading figure in interfaith dialogue and the Christian ashram movement in India during the twentieth century. He received a classical education at Oxford, studying poetry and philosophy under the author and professor C. S. Lewis. Griffiths's intellectual growth was always a penetrating personal search, and he drew upon all available intellectual, poetic, and spiritual resources to cultivate it. This deeply personal process characterized Griffiths's entire life, leading to his conversion to Christianity, his experimentation in lay Christian communities, his conversion to Roman Catholicism, and his decision to join the Benedictine community in 1933.

Learning of monastic developments in India, Griffiths applied to join new Benedictine foundations in Kerala and arrived in India in 1955. He later described his motivation to go to India as an attempt to find the “other half” of his soul, that is, to somehow integrate the intuitive and the rational, the East and the West, the internal and the external. Although his teachings perhaps tend to oversimplify such abstractions as “East,” “West,” and “India,” the mystical import of Griffiths’s life and thought is compelling and undeniable. Operating from the conviction that the surface manifestations of religions belie their profound convergence at heart, he sought to affirm the common aspects of all religions, the most basic of which was an inexpressible divine mystery at the heart of reality.

Donning the saffron robes of a sannyasi (renunciant) in 1958 and assuming the leadership of Shantivanam ashram in the state of Tamil Nadu, Griffiths increasingly adopted Eastern religious forms in the practice, teachings, and ritual of the ashram. The architecture of the ashram is patterned after Hindu temple structures; the ornate gateway, adorned with Christian imagery, recalls the entrance towers of temple complexes. The liturgy included Sanskrit chants and hymns from the south Indian Hindu saints as well as readings from Buddhist, Daoist, and Hindu scriptures. Griffiths’s many books continued his efforts to bear witness to the marriage of East and West (a concept he used for the title of one of his most important books), and later in his life he was intrigued by new developments in physics that seemed to affirm the presence of a unified, inexpressible mystery at the heart of reality, a conviction that fueled his own mystical convictions.

Even as a frail, elderly monk, Griffiths continued his spiritual search. In 1991, he suffered a devastating stroke, and yet this event seemed to permit another breakthrough to the divine, in this case understood and expressed as the feminine. Feeling profound waves of love during his recuperation, he returned to health with a new awareness: the need to surrender to the divine mother. So, after his many years of searching, often showing a kind of inveterate British rationalism, he encountered the divine through a profound health crisis, which in a real sense “short-circuited” his tendency to intellectualism and allowed new depths of feeling and will to emerge. This was a culminating event and in effect became a preparation for his death, which occurred in 1993. Early in his life, Griffiths was moved by the poetry of John of the Cross, who wrote, “I will lead you by a way you did not know to the secret chamber of love”; at the end of Griffiths’s life, he discovered that chamber perhaps more intimately than ever.

Guandi (Kuan-ti)

(3rd cent. C.E.)

Daoist general, god

Guanyu, a Chinese general during the third century, was deified as a Daoist marshal in the twelfth century and ultimately as Guandi, the god of war, in the late sixteenth century.

As a historical personage, Guanyu was a military hero from Guangdong province, in southern China, during China’s turbulent Three Kingdoms period (221–265). After he was killed, he began to be worshipped as a popular god. During the twelfth century, because of his popular and historical importance, Guanyu was appointed to the Daoist pantheon as a Daoist marshal, a yuanshuai, a celestial guardian who protected the Daoist faith. During the late Ming dynasty (1368–1644), the Wanli emperor (r. 1573–1620) changed his title from Marshal Guan to Emperor Guan, or Guandi, the god of war. Guandi was elevated again during the Qing dynasty (1644–1910), becoming the patron saint and protector for the military. In southern China, he is also referred to as Duke Guan (Guangong).

Guandi is considered an important protective deity. Civil officials have worshipped him as a protector, merchants as a god of wealth and fidelity in business contracts, common people as a curer of disease, soldiers as their patron god, and many communities as the chief protector against calamities and destruction. He was and continues to be associated with civic virtues, especially loyalty and courage. His image has been displayed to ward off evil spirits as well as to protect against the ghosts of those killed in battle. Because of his military expertise, he is also considered one of the patron saints of the martial arts.

Guandi is usually depicted with a red face and a long, beautiful beard. He often carries his special weapon, named after him, called a guandao. It is a long-handled halberd with a spear or spike head at one end and a battle-ax on the other. He was made famous in one of China’s best-loved novels, Sanguo zhi yanyi (The romance of the Three Kingdoms), written in the fourteenth century.

Guidance

When holy people interact with other human beings at all, one of their most essential roles throughout the world's religions is to serve as a guide to others. Even in Islam or Protestant Christianity, which emphasize each person's direct access to God, such adamant independence breaks down in practice—people want an expert, somebody with insight into the divine, who can explain and guide. This attitude is exemplified in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch converted by the apostle Philip in Acts 8:30–31: Although clearly a man of education, he proclaims that he cannot understand the scriptures without someone to guide him. The prophet-founder of the Babi religion, Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad Shirazi, (1819–1850), took the title "Bab" ("gate" in Arabic) to emphasize his role as gateway to the core teachings of Islam. Similarly, the Jain tirthankaras, "ford-makers," are by definition guides, people who have created a "ford" that allows other people to make their way across the ocean of existence to liberation, a concept similar to that of Jesus as "the Way." The sufis believe that each generation has a "perfect man" who channels divine guidance to the Muslim community (although there is little agreement about who these holy guides are). Holy people, besides being teachers, often have served as spiritual advisers, giving guidance to individuals who come to profit from their contact with the holy. At times, this role has extended to the political realm as people have accepted the insight of holy people to deal with governmental issues, too.

Guidance has been a dominant thread in the history of Christian, Buddhist, Daoist, and Muslim holy people. A common image is that of the holy guide as the healer of sick souls; the Christian Athanasius (c. 299–373) called Antony of the Desert (fl. 300–340) a physician of all Egypt because he was spiritual adviser to so many. The great sufi Abu Hamid al-Ghazali (1058–1111) also saw himself as a spiritual physician, filling the needs of those not content with traditional belief and practice, helping them to find a deeper spiritual meaning. In general, though, tales of sufi guidance tend to focus on the aid they give to their professed disciples, while Christian holy people who are primarily spiritual guides are usually depicted as open to all comers. This category includes many of the Christian mystics of the later Middle Ages, whose visionary lives were seen to render them channels of divine guidance. It is interesting to note that gender distinctions were leveled in the case of these mystics; some of the most famous spiritual counselors were women, such as Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) or Julian of Norwich (c. 1343–after 1419). Moving into the early modern period, personal counsel became a hallmark of the Catholic Reformation, with saints such as Philip Neri (1515–1595) winning fame for giving individual guidance to everyone in Rome, regardless of rank.

In general, in Christianity the importance of personal guidance has tended to suggest that the rituals of the church are by themselves not enough. A longing for a more "personal" contact with the divine, through a saint's mediation, also helps explain the importance of the sacrament of confession and reconciliation from the eighth century until recent times. When the confessor is also a holy person as an individual, the combination has proven immensely popular, ranging from the early Irish monks and nuns who popularized the practice of auricular confession to the humble "curé of Ars" Jean-Baptiste Marie Vianney (1786–1859), who by the end of his life attracted 20,000 penitents a year. This attraction is by no means limited to Christianity; to cite one recent example, the Hindu Ramana Maharshi (1879–1950) attracted visitors from all over India who were seeking answers to their troubles and hope for the future.

Because of the respect in which they are held as channels to the divine, holy people have also been called upon (or have volunteered) to advise whole communities, advising rulers, organizations, representative bodies, and so on. Several great lawgivers have reputations as holy people, including the Hebrew prophet Moses (thirteenth century B.C.E.), the legendary Lycurgus of Sparta, and Deganawida (c. 1550–c. 1600), founder of the Iroquo League. Innumerable times, men and women of reputed holiness have swayed the conduct of states, settling quarrels, ending wars (and occasionally starting them), and creating codes of conduct. Thus the Christian hermit Nicholas of Flüe (1417–1487) held no formal position of authority but was so famous for his counsel that he was called on to settle a major dispute between the Swiss cantons. This is a particularly strong theme in traditional China, where Daoists, Confucianists, and Buddhists vied for the ear of the emperor. A famous case is that of the Daoist master Tao Hongjing (456–536), a high-ranking minister who retired from court to live in the mountains. But the court, including the emperor, still went to get advice from him, so much so that he became known as the "prime minister from the mountains." Often such advice could encourage patronage of the holy person's own religion. For example, the Buddhist monk Fotucheng (232–348) became adviser to the Chinese general Shi Le and helped him take control of China and found a new dynasty. His good advice (and a propensity to miracles) won imperial support for Buddhism.

A final important point is the widespread belief that holy people do not stop giving good advice just because they die. Much worship of ancestors in many religions involves requests for guidance, on the principle that the spirits of the powerful dead have a greater understanding of the world than is possible for the living. This also appears as a theme in any religion that holds that contact with holy people is possible after their corporeal death. The traditional Christian cult of saints, continued in modern Roman Catholicism, acknowledges the guiding role of saints—indeed, regarding it as more important, at times, after their death than in life. Similarly, as sufism became a popular movement, people gathered around holy people as guides to God. This guidance did not end with death; instead, the dead holy person became a focus of sacredness who could continue to guide from the tomb.

Gumtivate Mata

Hindu manifestation

Gumtivate Mata is a female Hindu cult figure of rural northwestern India. She is regarded by her devotees as an earthly manifestation of the all-pervasive female energy of the universe, shakti. Both human and divine embodiments of shakti are referred to as Sheranvali (“Lion Rider,” after a popular female martial goddess) or mata (mother).

Gumtivate Mata’s renown as a holy figure came to light outside of India only recently, through the scholarly works of Kathleen Erndl (1993, 1996). Born into a well-to-do upper-caste brahmin family in Pakistan in 1937, Gumtivate Mata had little formal education but held the ancient Sanskrit language and Vedic rituals in high regard. From her childhood, she was said to will herself into trances, during which shakti, the feminine principle equated with the Great Goddess and ultimate reality itself, is said to have “played” within her body. Such possessions are not understood as malevolent in Hinduism but instead are recognized as a show of divine grace. They permit spiritual aspirants to receive darshana (a view of the divine) and receive boons and blessings of the Great Goddess through the vehicle of Gumtivate Mata’s physical form. In order to facilitate her possessions and to be a pure vehicle of the goddess, Gumtivate

Mata has remained celibate. This metaphysical inclination was apparently transferred to her from her mother, also considered a mata and as such a vehicle of divine grace; unfortunately, in 1947 Gumtivate Mata’s mother died a premature death.

The Great Goddess in Hindu theology is the sum of all reality, having both wrathful and peaceful manifestations. Gumtivate Mata is regarded as the peaceful manifestation of Sheranvali. Her relatives initially disapproved of her spiritual activities. However, these familial obstacles seem not to have been a great hindrance, as Gumtivate Mata and her niece Choti Mata (Little Mother), also a revered though less experienced mata, were eventually established in an impressive temple complex in Gumti, a rural outpost in northwestern India. Here, on a daily basis, they continue to perform their possessions and rituals in praise of the Great Goddess. Large numbers of devotees visit Gumtivate Mata to commune with the divine, to heal themselves and their families, to hear her foretell their future, and to attain material prosperity. Gumtivate Mata does not discriminate among the various classes and castes of devotees who visit her, accepting all who walk through the gates of her temple.

Gurumayi Swami Chidvilasananda

Hindu, syncretic guru

Gurumayi Swami Chidvilasananda is a contemporary global religious figure whose spiritual origins are rooted in a pan-Indian mix of Hindu tantra (Asian esoteric beliefs and practice). Gurumayi, as she is simply known, is regarded by her devotees as the embodiment of self-realization. Her distinctiveness lies in the shaktipat (transformative experience of initiation) that she gives to all those who approach her. Shaktipat takes place through the guru’s mere presence, touch, glance, or word; consequently, it is said to immerse the recipient in a continuous state of spiritual awakening.

Gurumayi, initially known as Malti Shetty, was born in 1955 and lived an uneventful childhood in Bombay, India, until, at the age of eighteen, she was sent by her deeply religious parents to live with Swami Muktananda (1908–1982), a renunciant who is said to have accomplished spiritual perfection through subtle, esoteric practices known as siddha yoga. As Swami Muktananda's renown among Western disciples increased, Malti, who was by then appreciated for her spiritual maturity, discipline, and experience, worked as his personal translator. Then, in 1982, under the instruction of Swami Muktananda, Malti Shetty took the renunciatory vows of a Hindu monastic and was given the name Chidvilasananda (blissful play of consciousness). That same year, both she and her brother Swami Nityananda, also a renunciant under the tutelage of Swami Muktananda, were catapulted from their protected and privileged upbringing to become, by solemn decree and ceremony, spiritual cosuccessors to Muktananda's siddha yoga lineage. Subsequently, the spiritual siddhis (accomplishments) that Swami Muktananda possessed were transferred to both Gurumayi and Nityananda.

Gurumayi's life is not without controversy. Many of Swami Muktananda's students accused him of sexual improprieties, all of which Gurumayi has steadfastly denied.

As well, compounded by a growing power struggle between Gurumayi and her brother, in 1985 Nityananda abruptly separated from the SYDA Foundation, Gurumayi's New York headquarters. The complexity of such controversies in Gurumayi's life may stem from the incommensurability of the antinomian yet supposedly enlightening sexual practices characteristic of elite tantric practitioners such as Swami Muktananda within the moral strictures of Western society. Nonetheless, countless practitioners claim to benefit from Gurumayi's shaktipat and thrive on a regime of sacred chanting, yoga, meditation, and service led by Gurumayi and her coteachers. In recent years, however, Gurumayi has been absent from public life, spending much of her time in seclusion at SYDA and only appearing to her disciples sporadically.

Gurus

In Indian traditions generally, a guru is a transmitter of authoritative knowledge. In its widest sense, then, the term “guru” may be used honorifically for any respected teacher. In teaching lineages—artisanal, musical, or spiritual—it has the more specific sense of a preceptor standing in a relationship to a disciple that is personalized, significant, and possibly lifelong. In Indic religions, the guru thus becomes a teacher of esoteric wisdom, a spiritual master—someone who in Hindu, Sikh, and tantric Buddhist traditions can be extremely important in both theory and practice. As a Sanskrit adjective, “guru” literally means “heavy” and is etymologically related to the Latin gravis: The guru’s word is weighty and his person manifests grave authority.

In Hindu tradition, seers, sages, and teachers are understood to have revealed the eternal wisdom found in the Vedic texts, and by the last sections of the extended Vedic corpus, the Upanishads, these sages and teachers are often depicted in ways characteristic of the guru of later Hindu traditions. Thus, in the Chhandogya Upanishad (c. 700 B.C.E. or earlier), a teacher (acarya) guards his secrets from the unworthy (3.11.5) and tests his disciple (8.7.3). Most important, the knowledge he gives is seen as essential for salvation: “Only knowledge learned from a teacher leads to real good” (4.1.9). This crucial salvific role of the teacher (by now commonly known as guru) becomes particularly emphasized in tantric traditions (beginning c. 500 C.E.), both Hindu and Buddhist.

Since in tantra, practitioners work with the psychic energies latent in the physical body, a physically embodied guru is normally said to be absolutely necessary for spiritual awakening and healthy psychic growth. Tantric traditions thus commonly put the guru on par with the highest religious object. In the ritual formulas of tantric Buddhism in Tibet, the guru (lama in Tibetan) is regularly taken as a fourth refuge alongside the three traditional ones of the Buddha, dharma (doctrine), and samgha (monastic community). A common Hindu Shaiva saying is even more extreme: “If Shiva is angry, the guru can save; if the guru is angry, there’s no one at all.” In Hindu devotional traditions, the guru—now as an embodiment of a personalized deity such as Krishna—can become the object of a disciple’s affections and be given a similar elevated status.

The role of the guru as an embodiment of divinity may take its most straightforward form in the sant traditions of northern India (c. 1450 on), which contain elements of tantra and devotion but are also aniconic, exalting no traditional deity of Hindu myth. In sant texts, such as those of Kabir (c. 1450–1518), the term “guru” sometimes seems to refer to the living teacher, sometimes to the highest divine principle, and sometimes, mysteriously, to both. The Sikh religion, which developed out of sant tradition, has woven the idea of the guru firmly into its central institutional forms. It began with Guru Nanak (1469–1539) and continued with a chain of his successors (“the ten gurus”); its scriptures are known as the Guru Granth (book). Today’s globalized world gives the charismatic guru an extended field of operation. With authority deriving from their own weighty personages, not from specific cultural institutions, Indian and Tibetan gurus have been able to be influential far beyond their homelands.

Guthlac

Christian hermit

One of the first widely venerated native Anglo-Saxon saints, Guthlac represents the growth of Latin Christian eremitism in early England. Following the path of the early desert saints, he lived for many years in an isolated hermitage at Croyland, Lincolnshire, within the fenlands of the ancient kingdom of East Anglia. He attracted influential patrons, including Aethelbald, initially an exiled prince of the royal house and later king of the powerful realm of Mercia. Guthlac himself was of royal Mercian blood, a member of the same Icling clan as his patron. Purportedly having been marked as a future saint by miraculous signs at his birth in about 674, Guthlac nonetheless spent his youth as a warrior, leading a violent band of raiders; however, according to his early eighth-century biographer Felix of Croyland, Guthlac retained sufficient spiritual sense that he always returned one-third of the plunder to its original owners. Following a sudden spiritual revelation, the young warrior abandoned this warlike way of life, becoming first a monk at the Mercian monastery of Repton and later an isolated hermit.

Guthlac's experiences as a solitary religious included battles against demons bent on turning him aside from his religious vocation, sometimes through temptations but also frequently in the guise of fearsome enemies, both monstrous and human. These struggles, whether to be understood allegorically or literally, reveal the integration of early Anglo-Saxon sainthood with the Old English heroic tradition, although Guthlac's abandonment of physical struggle in favor of spiritual strife against incorporeal enemies also reflects the pacifist strain within Latin Christianity. Guthlac's own patron saint, the apostle Bartholomew, intervened when demons carried the saint to the door of hell, threatening him with the fear of eternal damnation. Guthlac died at his hermitage, having profoundly affected the direction of English spirituality.

In addition to Felix's Latin Life of St. Guthlac, many texts honoring the saint appeared during the years between his death in 714 and the Norman Conquest in 1066; these included two vernacular poems, an Old English version of the Life, and at least one English homily. These works attest to the popular nature of Guthlac's cult before the Norman Conquest. After his death, he continued to receive patronage from the powerful, both secular and religious, but the diffuse vernacular literature devoted to him indicates that his veneration spread into popular culture as well. Despite a brief resurgence during the twelfth century, Guthlac's cult steadily faded during the post-Conquest era.

Guthmundr Arason

Christian bishop

Guthmundr Arason is the only one of three Icelandic holy men who maintained his reputation among the Icelandic populace after the Reformation. He was born in 1161 of a relationship that by the standards of the thirteenth-century church would have been considered irregular, although it may have been perfectly acceptable in the twelfth. When his father died, Guthmundr was left impoverished. One of his uncles provided an ecclesiastical education for him, and he became a popular and charismatic priest. He made a practice of blessing springs and offering relics for veneration. Although the authenticity of the relics he used was questioned by skeptics, water from the springs he blessed was thought to have healing qualities. Guthmundr himself was soon known as "Guthmundr the Good." This designation appears to indicate recognition of his sanctity within his lifetime.

Perhaps for this reason, but certainly also because he wanted to control the diocese of Hólar in northern Iceland, Guthmundr's influential relative, Kolbeinn Tumason, saw to it that Guthmundr became bishop of Hólar in 1203. His plan backfired; Guthmundr wanted to be an active bishop, not a puppet. He was unsuccessful at running the diocese, however, and clashed with secular powers; as a result, he spent several years of his episcopacy in exile.

Guthmundr had helped promote the cult of the Icelandic saint Jón Ögmundarson (d. 1121) c. 1200, but his own cult had to wait until his reputation as a troublemaker could be transformed into that of a martyr for church rights. The fourteenth century saw the composition of a number of vernacular lives (sagas) and poems about Guthmundr, probably related to attempts to canonize him. In these works, he is portrayed not only as one who loved and cared for the poor, but also as a fighter for church rights, an Icelandic Thomas Becket. A Latin vita may also have been composed for the purpose of obtaining his canonization, but it has not survived. Various plans to obtain canonization from Rome during the ensuing centuries also came to nothing.

Springs blessed by Guthmundr, known as Gvendarbrunnar, are still part of the Icelandic landscape. Both medieval sources and later folklore reflect his reputation for dispatching trolls and other monsters believed to haunt the countryside.

Guti, Ezekiel “Handinawangu”

(1923 C.E.–)

Christian visionary, church founder

Ezekiel “Handinawangu” Gutí was born in 1923 among the Ndau tribe in Chipinge, Zimbabwe. The name he was given at birth, Handinawangu, translates to “one who loves everybody and is not discriminatory.” Gutí means “a cloud, producing light rain.” After seeing a vision of himself as a shepherd, he chose the name Ezekiel. A Christian, he is credited with numerous miracles and has reported other visions throughout his life.

Gutí worked near Mutare as a youth and claims that his conversion to Christianity was not through direct preaching of the missionaries. When his mother told him of a missionary who taught that in order to go to heaven they had to repent from sin, or they would go to a burning fire called hell after death, Gutí found himself troubled and went frequently to pray in the bush. There, he encountered angels and acquired a new faith. This turning point caused him to desire an education, and he attended Ngaone School. While praying for forty days and nights in the Vumba mountains, he again encountered angels. Miracles of healing were later reported. When he preached, for example, in Bindura, it is said that people reported seeing angels standing behind him.

Gutí lived in Highfields Harare and married in 1946, but that marriage ended in divorce. As much as Gutí is revered as a man of God, as both prophet and apostle, his life story is that of a mortal, filled with several occasions of deep bouts of depression. He describes his life as filled with visions and encounters with angels, and being led by the Spirit. Still, there are times when he wished God would end his life and let him die.

Gutí studied at the Christ for the Nations Institute in Dallas, Texas, in 1971. Upon returning home, he married his second wife, Eunor, and helped to found Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa (ZAOGA), a Pentecostal church that broke from the Assemblies of God Africa. The cofounders of ZAOGA, including Abel Sande, Caleb Ngorima, Joseph Choto, Gutí, and others, had been expelled from the Apostolic Faith Mission in 1959. Gutí also partnered with the evangelist Nicholas Benghu from South Africa, but that relationship did not last.

Gutí says he is a messenger of Jesus and instructs his followers to pray to the God of Gutí, as the children of Israel pray to the God of Abraham. There are claims that two people were raised from the dead through his prayers, including his son Ezekiel, Jr., who after his birth reportedly did not breathe for several hours.

Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen (Tibetan: rgyal tshab dar ma rin chen)

Buddhist philosopher

Gyeltsap Darma Rinchen was an important philosopher-saint in the Gelukpa (Tib.: dge lugs pa) school of Tibetan Buddhism who was the immediate successor to Tsong kha pa (1357–1419) as throne holder of Ganden Monastery (dga’ ldan khri pa). According to traditional biographical sources, he was born in 1364 and at the age of ten took the vows of a novice monk, receiving the name Darma Rinchen. He studied primary texts on Mahayana Buddhist epistemology (tshad ma), soteriology, and higher knowledge with different masters but particularly with the great Sakyapa (sa skya pa) master Rendawa (red mda’ ba).

Traditional stories stress Gyeltsap’s pride and arrogance in meeting Tsong kha pa for the first time. On one occasion when Tsong kha pa was teaching, Gyeltsap entered the assembly while the discourse was in progress without removing his pandit's hat in the customary way. Tsong kha pa noticed him but continued to teach. Gyeltsap strode up to the throne on which Tsong kha pa was seated and began to mount it. Tsong kha pa, without halting his teaching, simply moved over to make room for him and continued. As he listened, Gyeltsap began to realize that he was in the presence of an enlightened master, and his arrogance began to subside. First, he removed his hat, then he got down from the throne and seated himself among the listeners. Rather than challenge Tsong kha pa, he now aspired to become his student.

When Tsong kha pa was establishing Ganden Monastery, Gyeltsap assumed responsibility for its construction and participated personally in the administrative work. When Tsong kha pa was near death, he gave Gyeltsap his pandit's hat, yellow robes, and cape as a sign that he was to succeed him. Gyeltsap took on this responsibility at the age of fifty-six when Tsong kha pa died. In retrospect, it was said that Gyeltsap's first encounter with Tsong kha pa had been an auspicious indication that he would be the successor as holder of the Ganden throne. Gyeltsap held the position for thirteen years. At the age of sixty-eight, shortly before his death in 1432, he installed Kaydrub Gelek belsangbo (mkhas sgrub dge legs dpal bzang po), Tsong kha pa's other closest disciple, as the next holder of the throne. Gyeltsap was also a great scholar and wrote a number of important commentaries to Buddhist philosophical works that are utilized by scholars in the present-day Gelukpa school of Tibetan Buddhism.

Gyogi Bosatsu

Buddhist preacher, social activist

Gyogi (or Gyoki), a wandering Buddhist preacher, magician, social welfare activist, and overseer of the construction of Todaiji temple, became one of the great popular figures of early Japanese Buddhism. Born in Osaka of Korean immigrants in 668, at age fifteen Gyogi went to study under Master Dosho at Yakushiji temple in Nara. Nara Buddhism at this time was largely a religion of the elite, generally treated as a means for establishing state protection. Gyogi was the first prominent voice of dissent against such a vision of Buddhism. He chose to focus on the universal, compassionate ideals of Buddhism, which he believed were relevant to all sectors of Japanese society. After completing his vows, Gyogi retreated to the mountain forests to meditate, during which time it is said he received divine power and blessings. In 704, he quit his position as a court priest and began to travel widely, preaching his message of compassion, attending to the sick, establishing numerous temples, and engaging in various projects of social welfare, such as building roads, ponds, canals, dikes, bridges, and charity houses. He is said to have attracted more than 1,000 followers, both laity and clergy.

In 717, Gyogi was banished from the capital region for disobeying the imperial decree by which monks were prohibited from preaching to the common people. Yet his popularity was such that the government was eventually forced to repeal the ban. Upon his return to the capital, Gyogi was named overseer of Emperor Shomu's great construction project, Todaiji temple, whose main hall remains to this day the largest wooden building in the world, housing the world's largest bronze statue—the Daibutsu (Great Buddha). Gyogi took up the task in earnest, rallying funds and popular support for the project, which, somewhat ironically, given Gyogi's earlier populist tendencies, became the symbol of state-sponsored Buddhism. In 745, a fully rehabilitated Gyogi was given the title of Great Priest (Daisojo), the first to achieve that honor. Todaiji was finally completed in 749, the year of Gyogi's death.

Not long after his death, Gyogi began to be revered as a Buddhist "saint" or bodhisattva (enlightened being; Jap.: bosatsu), either a manifestation of Manjushri, the bodhisattva of wisdom, or an avatar of the cosmic healing buddha, Yakushi Nyorai. Popular legends of his works and miracles abound. Gyogi is frequently pictured as a wanderer with a chestnut walking stick in his hand. Since the Sino-Japanese characters for "chestnut" literally mean "west" and "tree," this symbol indicates the western paradise of Amitabha.

Hafiz, Muhammad Shamsuddin

(c. 1320–c. 1388 C.E.)

Muslim mystic, poet

Like his poetry, the life of Shamsuddin Muhammad, known as “Hafiz,” is shrouded in mystery. He was born sometime around 1320 in the city of Shiraz in central Iran. His father died early, and Hafiz had to work at menial jobs to support his family. He married when he was in his twenties, but inwardly he may have remained in love with a girl by the name of Shakh-i Nabat (Sugar candy), who later came to symbolize divine beauty on earth for him. To Persian speakers, he is acclaimed as the “supreme mystical poet.”

Hafiz had an amazing memory and memorized the entire Qur’an as well as some of the classical works of Persian literature by listening to his father’s recitations of them. He had a strong ascetic impulse and a longing for mystical love. As a young man, he once kept a long vigil at the tomb of the sufi master Baba Kuhi, fasting for forty days and nights. It was following this period that he became the disciple of Shaykh Mahmud Attar.

Hafiz moved in and out of favor with a number of the rulers of his time. He became a prominent poet of the court of Abu Ishak, but when Mubariz Muzaffar captured Shiraz, he ousted Hafiz from his position. Hafiz’s fate was changed once again when Shah Shuja’ overthrew his tyrant father and restored Hafiz to a high position. His fortune did not last, however, and he fell out of favor with Shah Shuja’ and fled Shiraz for Isfahan. Shah Shuja’ eventually invited him to return. Hafiz ended his exile and returned to Shiraz, where he spent the rest of his life. He died in late 1388 or early 1389 at the age of sixty-nine.

Hafiz expresses his mystical yearning for divine love in a number of flawlessly beautiful poems, including at least 500 ghazals (love poems), 42 ruba’iyyat (quatrains), and a few ghasidah (love poems with a tripartite structure). These poems invariably discuss the subject of divine and spiritual love, the sufi spiritual quest, and the mystical unity that lies at the end of this journey. Several people compiled his poems into a collection known as the Diwan-i Hafiz (Assembly of Hafiz). The first compiler was Hafiz’s young disciple, Sayyid Qasim-i Anvar, who collected 569 ghazals attributed to Hafiz, followed by Muhammad Golandam, who wrote an introduction to his edited work in 1410, only twenty-two years after Hafiz’s death.

The Orthodox clergy found Hafiz’s poetry, which is rich with the symbolism of wine, women, and lovemaking, offensive to Islam and declared him a heretic, thus refusing to allow a proper Islamic burial. The people of Shiraz, however, demanded to bury him with honor. It was decided to use Hafiz’s own poetry to settle the controversy. A young boy was asked to draw a couplet randomly; the message would be accepted as a verdict on the funeral. The poem read: “Neither Hafiz’s corps’ nor his life negate,/With all his misdeeds, heavens for him wait.” Hafiz was given a full Islamic burial, and his tomb, known as Hafiziyyah, is in the Musalla gardens along the banks of the Ruknabad River in Shiraz. To this day, Hafiz’s poems are utilized as oracles.

Hafiz has come to be revered as the supreme saint of Persian mystical poetry not only by his native Iranians, who see him as a grand sufi master and gnostic, but also by figures such as the German poet Goethe (1749–1832), who said, “In his poetry, Hafiz has inscribed undeniable truth indelibly. . . . Hafiz has no peer!” and the American poet and essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), who defined Hafiz as a poet who “defies you to show him or put him in a condition inopportune or ignoble. . . . He fears nothing. He sees too far; he sees through out; such is the only man I wish to see or be.”

Hagiography

The term hagiography literally means “writing about saints.” Tales about most of the world’s holy people circulated at first in oral form, developing rich elements of sometimes implausible legends in folk traditions. Eventually, however, these tales must either be given permanence in writing or the holy person sinks into oblivion. A tragic example of this process in action is the fate of holy people of Africa who represent indigenous religions: Most of their tales were never committed to writing, and the scant remainder preserved in the face of aggressive Christianization and Islamization can only hint at the richness that has been lost. Routine use of writing has given the “civilized,” universalizing religions a serious edge over their regional, nonliterate predecessors in this regard. Christianity, Islam, and Buddhism, and to a lesser extent Hinduism and Judaism, have all been blessed with a long hagiographical tradition based on the premise that the lives of earlier holy people can inspire and teach others. Clearly, that tradition is still alive and well today.

Tales about some holy people existed in oral form for generations before being written down. When oral tradition is embodied in a fixed and venerated “teaching,” especially in poetic form, there is a greater likelihood of accurate transmission. A good example of this is provided by the Gathas, the seventeen short hymns by Zoroaster—the only source for his life—which were composed in a very ancient form of Persian that suggests conscious preservation. Simple stories about holy people can be a different matter because disciples and imitators may often be tempted to make heroes more impressive or reflective of their own values. A matter of crucial concern for many modern Christians is how to understand the gospel accounts of Jesus of Nazareth’s life and death, since the earliest gospel was written at least thirty years after the events it describes. How much is legendary accretion, and how much reflects the development of the early Christian community? How much might be spiritual truth without being literal historical fact?

A similar problem occurs in Buddhism. The Theravadan Mahaparinibbana sutra deals with the last years of the historical Buddha’s life. But in fact it was composed over a long period, parts apparently dating back nearly to his lifetime in perhaps the fifth century B.C.E. but supplemented and altered over subsequent centuries. Legend tells that when the Buddha died, his chief disciple, Kassapa, feared the loss of his teachings, so convened the first Buddhist Council, at which all of the Buddha’s teachings were recited. The sutras as a whole are sermons attributed to the Buddha or his immediate disciples. But a very large number of Mahayana sutras were written down only in the first century B.C.E. or later. Mahayanas claim that before that time they were passed down secretly; Theravadan Buddhists assert that they are forgeries plain and simple. In a parallel situation, Shi’a and Sunni Muslims fight over which of the hadith are actual sayings of Muhammad (570–632) and his followers and which were later invented to give greater authority to theological innovations.

The stakes are not so great for the great majority of holy people, but often legendary accretions can cast the entire life of a saint into doubt. Thus in a great purge in 1969, the Roman Catholic Church deleted a number of early saints from the calendar of holy people to be venerated, doubting, perhaps rightly, that, for example, Margaret of Antioch had been swallowed and disgorged by a dragon in the fourth century. In the process of legend-building and legend-debunking, the historical saint was lost.

Often, disciples have collected the sayings and instructions of revered teachers, or have gone on from transmitting the teaching to write an account of the person’s life for posterity. But, as in the case of Plato (427–347 B.C.E.) commemorating his mentor Socrates (c. 470–399 B.C.E.), there is often some doubt about where the teacher ends and the student begins. Despite such difficulties, such sources are much more likely to be the literal truth about a holy person than accounts written later by people who did not know him or her. In Buddhism, it has been particularly common for students to collect the instructions of great masters. For example, disciples of the Zen master Dogen (1200–1253 C.E.) compiled a major collection that perpetuates his ideas. Similarly, the followers of the Sikh gurus collected especially the hymns of their spiritual leaders, disciples compiled the teachings of the Jewish Hasidic leader Dov Baer (d. 1772), and loyal followers have preserved the songs of some Hindu devotional saints for centuries.

Christianity has left a particularly vigorous paper trail about its saints, perhaps because of the early model of the gospels, which put an emphasis on style of life as well as teaching. Letters of early martyrs, such as Ignatius of Antioch (d. c. 107), were gathered and venerated (and spurious letters were added to the collection); soon Christians also wrote and circulated stories of the deaths of martyrs as inspiration for others. The biographical element flourished by the fourth century and continues to the present. In the Middle Ages, the “Lives” (vitae) of saints were a perennially popular form of devotional literature, read especially on the anniversary of the saint’s death. Such works often presented a highly stylized image of ideal sanctity, however, and can only be used as factual biography with caution. In modern times, the Belgian Society of Bollandists has taken on the task of preserving and studying all of the hagiographical works of Christianity, a task nearing completion after several centuries.

Islam was rather slower to write down stories of holy people, because early Islam for the most part rejected the idea that some human beings can be elevated to a special relationship with God. The thin edge of the wedge was the prophet Muhammad, whom all Muslims acknowledge to be God’s messenger. Biographies of Muhammad developed as a distinct genre in the eighth century. Writing about other holy people became common in the eleventh century, when the sufi tradition reached its first bloom, and at least three Muslim hagiographers wrote biographies of important sufis during that period. One of them, Sulami (936–1021), composed an entire biographical dictionary with accounts of about 100 Muslim holy men, including the great mystical sayings of each.

Compilations of at least partially biographical accounts of saints have been popular in Buddhism, Islam, and Christianity since the latter part of the Middle Ages. One of the most popular European works of that era was The Golden Legend, a massive compilation of saints’ Lives by Jacobus de Voragine (c. 1230–1298). Similarly, an anonymous Korean monk-scholar collected a large number of accounts of great Korean monks in the hope that it would encourage the prosperity of both Buddhism and his native land. Perhaps the greatest feat is that of the Japanese Zen monk Shiban Mangan (d. 1710), whose Empo Dento-roku includes the biographies of thousands of important Zen monks. At the same time, in far-off Russia Demetrius of Rostov (1651–1709) was collecting accounts of the Orthodox saints.

A phenomenon mostly of the modern world is the autobiography of the saint. The Christian Augustine of Hippo (354–430) blazed the way with his Confessions, but the model did not become common until the sixteenth century, when Teresa of Avila (1515–1582) told of her spiritual journey in writing. One can expect to see many more autobiographies of saints and would-be saints in the future, but only time will allow us to separate the two categories.

Haile Selassie

Christian ruler, Rastafarian messiah

Emperor Haile Selassie, the grandnephew of Emperor Menelik II, was born in Ethiopia near Harar in 1892. At birth, he was named Lij Ras (prince or duke) Tafari; Makonnen was his family name. The Selassie dynasty is said to be traceable to the marriage between the Queen of Sheba and King Solomon. Emperor Menelik’s daughter Zauditu succeeded Lij Iyasu, and when she died in 1930, Lij Ras Tafari came to power, assuming the throne under his baptismal name, Haile Selassie, which translates as “Might of the Trinity.” He was also known by other titles, such as “Emperor of Ethiopia,” “King of Kings,” “Lord of Lords,” “Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah,” and “Elect of God.”

Italy invaded Ethiopia in 1935, and in 1936 Selassie was forced to flee the country. He took refuge in London and appealed to the League of Nations for help, but to no avail. With the help of the British, he returned home in 1941 and returned to power. A very influential political leader even beyond Ethiopia, his reforms included the establishment of a constitution, a parliament, and a court system. In addition, he is known for the emancipation of slaves and the 1942 land reforms. Ethiopia was a founding member of both the Organization of African Unity (OAU), established in 1963, and the United Nations. The African Hall, the OAU center, and the United Nations Economic Commission of Africa are located in Ethiopia.

The coronation of Lij Ras Tafari Makonnen in 1930 is seen as the birth of the Rastafarian movement, which started in Kingston, Jamaica. In the year before Selassie’s crowning as emperor, black social activist Marcus Garvey had prophesied the crowning of an emperor in Africa and had said that this emperor would be “Christ returned or God.” Emperor Haile Selassie was then hailed as “God Incarnate.” It is said that not everyone in the movement believes that Selassie is God, but most agree that he was at least a messenger from God. In 1961, Selassie met with a group of Rastafarians to arrange repatriation of black Americans to Africa, to which Selassie was very open, but this never materialized. In 1966, Haile Selassie visited Trinidad-Tobago, Jamaica, and Haiti. He was welcomed by about 2,000 Rastafarians. They asked to be sent back to Ethiopia with Selassie, but the Jamaican prime minister, Sir

Haile Selassie, last emperor of Ethiopia, hailed as a messiah by the Rastafarian movement. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Alexander Bustamante, denied the request. The Rastafarian movement is well known to Americans through the music of such singers as Bob Marley, Jimmy Cliff, Peter Tosh, and Bunny Wailer, all of whom have been involved in the movement. Selassie never accepted that he was a messiah or God, though he ardently studied the scriptures. He died a Christian and encouraged the Rastafarians to study the Bible.

Selassie was overthrown in 1974 and died in Addis Ababa in 1975. There are questions as to whether he was killed or died a natural death. His body is said to have been exhumed near a toilet close to his former palace. He was reburied in the family royal vault in Holy Trinity Cathedral on November 5, 2000.

Hakham

Early Jewish rabbis

Hakham, a Hebrew word meaning “sage,” was the standard title for a rabbi in the first several centuries C.E. “Wisdom” (hokhma) was a very old Near Eastern concept, far older than the oldest biblical texts. Several biblical books (chiefly Proverbs and Ecclesiastes) reflect this tradition by emphasizing the importance of obtaining wisdom and guiding one’s life by its teachings. During the centuries following the Babylonian exile, Jewish thought increasingly linked this already ancient concept with the teachings (torah) of Moses. In a key passage, Joshua ben Sira (c. 200 B.C.E.), author of the apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus, flatly equated the two (24:23). This linkage clearly implied that the true sage, the bearer of wisdom, was one who had mastered the Torah and knew how to live by its teachings.

When rabbinic leadership began to emerge after the destruction of the Jewish Temple (70 C.E.), the rabbis presented themselves as embodiments of this model. The earliest surviving rabbinic text, the Mishnah from about 200 C.E., designates the rabbis collectively as “sages,” while the eventually predominant term “rabbi” seems to have come into use only at a later time. In general, a hakham was someone learned in scripture and in the unwritten traditions of the nation, a man (always!) distinguished by his easygoing temperament, his skill at instruction, and his piety. Many stories about early rabbinic masters or their forerunners (for example, Hillel from the first century B.C.E. and Akiba ben Joseph from the second century C.E.) seem designed to portray them as exemplars of this ideal. The Mishnaic tractate Avot, often known in English as “Ethics of the Fathers,” is essentially a compendium of guidance to disciples and others striving to absorb this discipline.

Over the remaining centuries of antiquity, the concept of the sage broadened beyond its original prudential and intellectual foundation. At first, acquiring the “secrets of Torah” only equipped one with the skills for ethical living or the information needed to fulfill God’s will in one’s daily life; now the sage was also seen as endowed with some measure of the divine powers encoded in the sacred teachings. The Babylonian Talmud (BT) reports (Sanhedrin 67b) that two rabbis were able to create a calf each week and eat it for their Sabbath dinner. Another rabbi (R. Hisda [d. 309]; see BT, Mo’ed Qatan 28a), on account of his dedication to Torah study, was immune to the power of the angel of death; he died only after he was distracted from his studies for a fatal instant. By this point, the concepts hakham (sage) and tzaddiq (saint) had become almost indistinguishable.

Following his own rationalist bent, the great medieval rabbi Moses Maimonides (1135/1138–1204) compiled a long list of desirable habits and patterns of behavior that are to be found in a true sage (Laws of the Temperament, chapter 5). These include rules for a healthy diet, regular bathing, sound sleep, proper sexual activity, suitable apparel, and the like. Maimonides thus returned the tradition of wisdom, already thousands of years old, to its prudential roots.

In more recent times, certain Sephardic communities (for example, in London) developed the custom of calling the local rabbi by the title Hakham.

Hakim, Abu ‘Ali al-Mansur al-

(d. 1021)

Shi’a Muslim imam

Abu ‘Ali al-Mansur al-Hakim bi-amrallah was the sixteenth Isma‘ili Shi’a imam and the sixth Fatimid ruler of Egypt. He was declared heir apparent by his father, al-Aziz, when he was eight years old. When al-Aziz died in 996, al-Hakim became the ruler of a vast empire. He assumed personal rule at age fifteen and appointed Husayn, son of the celebrated general Jawhar, as the new vizier.

Al-Hakim was a liberal patron of learning and culture. He started the Dar al-‘ilm (or Dar al-Hikma), the House of Wisdom, in 1005. This institution contained a major library and taught both religious and secular subjects, ranging from the Qur’an, hadith, and jurisprudence to the secular topics of logic, grammar, philology, astronomy, and mathematics. Al-Hakim encouraged scholars by setting a system of stipends. He also created a waqf (a religious endowment or foundation) to ensure adequate funds. During his reign, a variety of learning sessions were conducted to suit various people, such as the staff of the Fatimid palace, the ordinary people of Cairo, the courtiers, and the special initiates to the Isma‘ili doctrines. There were also special instruction sessions for women at al-Azhar and at the palace. Al-Hakim was involved in the spread of the Fatimid ideas to Iraq and Persia. Much success was gained in these areas, and several prominent administrators, in addition to many in the general population, accepted the Shi’a tradition.

Al-Hakim faced several challenges during his reign. There was a serious insurrection in Alexandria led by Abu Raqwa, an Umayyad prince from Spain aligned with the Zanata tribe of North Africa. This uprising was defeated. However, at the same time as this revolt the Nile waters remained very low, adversely affecting agriculture and leading to food shortages. To add to the difficulties, the Abbasid caliph of Baghdad decided to humiliate the Fatimids and offensively provoked them by publishing a false genealogy. More favorable to al-Hakim is that his reign was also associated with the development of a new group, called the Druze, started by Isma‘il Darazi. This group regarded al-Hakim as divine and eventually formulated sacred texts and rituals.

Al-Hakim was very spartan in his lifestyle and sought to ensure the well-being of his populace. He used to dress plainly and go by himself to observe the common people on the streets. When the realm faced adverse socioeconomic conditions, he required that shops and trading be conducted at night to ensure that the night hours would not be used by unsavory elements to disturb public and private property. Very humble, he did not allow his subjects to prostrate themselves before him, a usual practice with traditional kingship. He shunned the rich robes of royalty and dressed simply, preferring to ride on a donkey rather than the more prestigious horse.

Al-Hakim regularly went to the Muqattam hills for solitude and reflection. On one such occasion, in 1021, he never returned, and it was believed that he had been assassinated. However, the Druze believe that he was raised to heaven and is in concealment until such time as he returns. Al-Hakim was brave, fair, and generous, a strong ruler with blue eyes who was sincerely interested in the welfare of his people.

Hakuin

Zen Buddhist monk, artist, reformer

Hakuin was given credit for revitalizing the Rinzai Zen Buddhist movement in Japan during the eighteenth century. He was a philosopher, an author, a painter, and a poet. Born in about 1685, he was an intellectually gifted child, but he was physically frail and mischievous, torturing and destroying insects and birds. An early exposure to preaching about hell at a Buddhist temple motivated him to become a monk at age fifteen, despite objections from his parents. After a period during which he doubted the validity of Buddhism, he finally gained enlightenment when he heard the sound of a bell while meditating on the mu (nothingness) koan (enigmatic statement). This only increased his pride, however, so his teacher subjected him to even more rigorous training.

Hakuin became famous for a koan that he devised: We all know what the sound of two hands clapping sounds like. But what is the sound of one hand clapping? It was just such a koan that gave rise to the great ball of doubt. He thought that if a person could doubt fully, such a person could become completely enlightened. Hakuin defined the essentials of Buddhism as the precepts, meditation, and wisdom. He often wrote personally of his quest for enlightenment and his identification of what he called Zen sickness, which was akin to a nervous breakdown. He reported that when he experienced this sickness his head became heated and his lower body became cool. He recovered by heating his lower body with deep breathing exercises.

Hakuin lived during a historical period that witnessed the widespread popularity of the devotional emphasis of Pure Land Buddhism. In response to those within devotional Buddhism who believed that it was impossible to achieve enlightenment during this final degenerate age, Hakuin's response was a resounding affirmation of the possibility of achieving liberation. He argued that all Buddhist sects were ultimately one. But this did not mean that a person could practice both Zen and Pure Land at the same time. According to Hakuin, the Pure Land was located within oneself. It was, however, possible to recite the name of the Buddha with enough success to lead a person to salvation, in the sense that it helped a person to concentrate, which is a feature that it possessed in common with the koan.

Halevi, Judah

Jewish physician, poet, apologist

Judah Halevi was a physician, a serious religious thinker, and the last of the four luminaries of the Andalus school of Hebrew poetry in the twelfth century. Born around 1075, he was a native of Tudela, but he immigrated to al-Andalus (Muslim Spain) from Christian Spain as a young man. He also spent a considerable time in Toledo and in other towns along the fluctuating border between Islam and Christendom. Halevi's unsurpassed brilliance as a lyric Hebrew poet won him the acclaim and envy of Jewish literary intellectuals. By midlife, he came to be regarded as a highly respected Jewish communal leader. But after a glorious career as the darling of Jewish courtly society, Halevi spent the last fifteen years of his life in a pious attempt to abandon Iberia for a life of religious devotion in Palestine. After years of hesitation and against the apparent counsel of his circle of friends, Halevi finally set sail for Egypt in 1140 en route to Palestine. He arrived in Palestine in 1141 but died shortly thereafter.

Halevi's contribution to medieval Jewish religious thought is known as Seferha-Kuzari (Book of the Kuzari). The book's subtitle, Kitab al-Hujja wa-al-Dalil fi Nasr al-Din al-Dhalil (The book of refutation and proof on behalf of the despised religion), identifies it as a work of religious apologetics. The Kuzari underwent several revisions before its completion on the eve of Halevi's departure for the East. Written for Jewish doubters (in Arabic and later translated into Hebrew), The Kuzari became the classic medieval defense of rabbinic Judaism against Christianity, Islam, Karaite Judaism, and, in particular, the Aristotelian philosophy that came into vogue in twelfth-century Muslim Spain. Constructed as a series of dialogues between a polytheistic king turned generic monotheist and representatives of philosophy, Christianity, Islam, and Judaism, The Kuzari endeavors to explain the apparent contradiction between the sociopolitical reality of the twelfth century and the claim of Judaism to be the supreme faith.

Early in his career Halevi seemingly perfected the art of translating the worldly values of Andalus society into words of Hebrew poetry. Later on, Hebrew verse became a vehicle for expression of the poet's devotional longings and his religious disdain for the material trappings of Andalus Jewish culture. In particular, Halevi created new genres of Hebrew poetry with his cycles of "sea poems" and "Zion poems." Halevi's turn toward a stricter Jewish piety, The Kuzari's spirited defense of rabbinic Judaism and its unqualified affirmation of the Jews' unique metaphysical status, and the poet's unmistakable voice and unique lyric sensibility endeared him to generations of Jewish pietists.

Hallaj, Husayn b. Mansur al-

(858–922 C.E.)

Muslim sufi, scholar, poet, martyr

Ninth- and tenth-century audiences throughout the Middle East claimed that Husayn b. Mansur al-Hallaj could read their hearts. He was known as the “perfect lover of God” and earned fame for proclaiming “I am the Truth.” The public misunderstood the ecstatic utterance as al-Hallaj’s claim to divinity, though others interpreted it as an expression of complete annihilation in God. Al-Hallaj believed in the worship of one God and in humankind’s recognition of God in the heart—attainable by performing ascetic works in addition to standard Islamic practices. He claimed to have achieved perfect union with God, and “drunk” sufis, those intoxicated on the love of God, sought to follow his lessons. Sober sufis, however, who thought remaining in God was the ultimate goal, were critical of al-Hallaj, rejecting his public claims that he had reached complete annihilation. Fearful that his message might cause unrest, the government imprisoned al-Hallaj in 913 until his execution on March 28, 922.

Born in 858 in Tur, Iran, al-Hallaj moved with his family to Wasit and then Tustar as a student of mystic al-Tustari. In 876, al-Hallaj professed to be a sufi. After marrying the daughter of a sufi, al-Hallaj made three separate pilgrimages to Mecca and preached as he traveled. Upon his return to Baghdad, he urged that mystics should be so entirely attuned with God that there was no distinction between the human and the divine. He proclaimed to all Muslims the necessity of embodying the commands of God with the heart, as the rituals were useless unless the Muslims enacted them in their day-to-day lives. Al-Hallaj is also reported to have performed public miracles, claiming to perform the “immediate acts of God” (Massignon 1982, 1:291).

Subsequently, many sufis rejected al-Hallaj’s attempt to explain the mystical experience to vast audiences. Many sufis did not endorse taking the sufi secrets of love into the public realm because the public often misunderstood teachings on divine love and reacted negatively. Sober sufis continuously criticized al-Hallaj, further alienating him from society. Seen as a threat to governmental stability, al-Hallaj was arrested and put on trial, then sentenced to death by removal of the extremities, hanging on the gibbet, decapitation, and finally the burning of his body. His ashes were sprinkled into the Tigris River.

Al-Hallaj was more famous after his death than during his lifetime. Upon his execution, followers dispersed from Baghdad, but slowly al-Hallaj emerged as a martyr and a saint in Islam. His book Kitab al-tawasin (Tasin of the lamp) is still read today, and other fragments of his work have survived. Al-Hallaj himself is the subject and inspiration of many stories of folklore, poems, and litanies throughout the Arabic world. He is often seen as the archetypal Muslim, for he submitted, suffered, and died for the love of God with no personal gain. Pious Muslims venerate him today because of his sufferings and proclamations of love for God, even if they have not heard or read the teachings of al-Hallaj for themselves.

Handsome Lake

Iroquois prophet, visionary, founder

A Seneca Iroquois religious leader born in 1735, Handsome Lake lived through some of the most tumultuous times in Iroquois history, and his health and will to live suffered as a result. Though on his deathbed in 1799, Handsome Lake regained consciousness and began preaching a new religion of spiritual revitalization. Known as the Code of Handsome Lake, or the Longhouse Religion, his guidelines for a good life remain important among Iroquois people to this day. He went on to live for another sixteen years and died in 1815.

Handsome Lake was an accomplished warrior and related to important chiefs, such as his brother, Cornplanter. The disruptions of the American Revolution in the 1770s and 1780s signaled the end of an old world. As American armies invaded and destroyed Iroquois villages, the venerable Iroquois Confederacy of six nations splintered as tribes divided their allegiances between Britain and the United States. Handsome Lake’s Seneca people resettled in the Allegheny Valley after the war, and Cornplanter became very active in counseling peace between the Senecas and the United States. Meanwhile, like many other Iroquois people who became consumed by alcohol and depression, Handsome Lake gradually fell into despair and constant drunkenness. The Iroquois had lost most of their land base during and after the American Revolution, the traditional male activities of war and hunting were in decline, alcohol flowed freely in the villages, and the Iroquois abandoned many traditional customs and rituals. Nevertheless, a few Iroquois people had begun calling for a return to traditional practices and morality when Handsome Lake passed out and went into a coma in June 1799.

When he awoke, Handsome Lake reported that he had conversed with strangers who instructed him in religion and urged him to atone for his wicked ways. Following subsequent visions, Handsome Lake said he had been led to a fork in a road. One path led to the creator and happiness, the other to eternal damnation, where all drunkards ended up. The creator had chosen him to share this new knowledge with other Indians and show them the way to spiritual rejuvenation. These instructions for righteous living became known as the Code of Handsome Lake. The code stipulated, among other guidelines, that alcohol must be avoided, witchcraft should only be used for healing the sick, and families should stay together to raise children in the proper way.

As was common among American Indian prophets of his time, Handsome Lake adapted certain ideas from Christianity and Euro-American life to form his new syncretic religion. As he called for the reestablishment of certain traditional rituals of thanksgiving, he also urged the Iroquois to send some of their children to American schools to enable them to participate fully in the new post-American Revolution world. He preached against sin and warned against the Evil One who tried to lead Indians astray, condemned vanity, and saw nothing wrong with living in American-style housing or farming as Americans did (agriculture had traditionally been the responsibility of Iroquois women). He also prescribed the confession of sin.

Handsome Lake differed from some other Indian prophets of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in that he did not call for armed resistance to Euro-Americans, but rather, placed all responsibility for the spiritual and cultural well-being of Iroquois people on themselves. Although his preaching emphasized peace with Americans and partial accommodation to their ways, he empowered the Iroquois to seize the initiative and repair their world on their own by reforming their sense of morality. This promotion of spiritual revitalization has a long and rich tradition among Indian peoples and became increasingly important as the Euro-American presence intensified over the next two centuries.

Hanina ben Dosa

(1st cent. C.E.?)

Jewish miracle worker

Ancient rabbinic texts describe Hanina ben Dosa as a miracle worker and healer who flourished around the time of the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 C.E. One surviving report describes his ability to know whether his prayer for the sick had been accepted by his ability to speak the prayer fluently (Mishnah Berakhot 5:5). Another recounts that a poisonous reptile once bit him and promptly died (“Woe to the man who encounters such a reptile, but woe to the reptile that encounters R. Hanina b. Dosa,” Babylonian Talmud [BT], Berakhot 33a). Once Hanina prayed for the sick son of Rabbi Gamaliel II, the rabbinic leader of his generation; observers noted that the boy’s fever left him at the very moment that Hanina had assured the onlookers that the child would recover (BT, Berakhot 34b; cf. John 4:46–53).

Hanina’s prayers could also stop or bring rain (BT, Ta’anit 24b) or change vinegar into oil (BT, Ta’anit 25a). When his family would otherwise have starved, Hanina’s prayer transformed a bit of his heavenly reward into worldly sustenance; however, when his wife saw that his ultimate reward had thus been reduced, she convinced him to pray again and ask that the gift be withdrawn, and “the second miracle was greater than the first” (BT, Ta’anit 25a). One text reports, “When R. Hanina b. Dosa died, people of deed [wonder workers] disappeared” (Mishnah Sotah 9:15).

In other sayings reported in his name (Mishnah Avot 3:9–10), Hanina emphasizes that the fear of sin must precede wisdom and that deeds must outweigh learning. He also said that God cannot be pleased with people when their fellow humans are not pleased with them. The vaguely anti-intellectual tone of such sayings caused ambivalence among some rabbinic masters, and eventually the worker of miracles was displaced by the sage as the ideal of rabbinic piety. Hanina himself was remembered with admiration and reverence, but later rabbis were not entirely unhappy that people like him had “disappeared.”

Hannah and Her Seven Sons

(c. 165 B.C.E.)

Jewish martyrs

Hannah and her seven sons were members of a celebrated family of Jewish martyrs at the time of the persecutions under Antiochus IV (r. 175–163 B.C.E.) of Syria. The oldest version of their story is found in the second book of Maccabees, chapter 7, where a mother and her seven sons, all unnamed, are brought before the king and ordered to eat pork, a forbidden food in Judaism. Each in turn refuses, and each in turn is killed after suffering horrible torture. Before dying, each of the martyrs expresses complete faith in God’s justice and challenges the torturers to do their worst; the king becomes angrier and angrier in the face of their stubborn calm but can do nothing. The dramatic scene of a whole family, including young children, defiantly accepting death rather than abandon the Torah became a model for Jews and Christians of later ages facing oppressors of their own. The event is thought to have taken place in about 165 B.C.E.

The story itself continued to develop. In the fourth book of Maccabees (chapters 8–17), each of the seven sons, and then the mother herself, gives a long speech before dying. These speeches clarify and expand the lessons of the incident for later generations. In the best-known rabbinic version (Babylonian Talmud, Gittin 57b), the time has been moved forward from Hellenistic to Roman times, and the incident is now associated with the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem. The protagonists, however, are still anonymous, or, in certain early versions, the mother is named Miriam.

Among Christians, the “Seven Maccabean Brothers” and their mother were venerated as the prototypes of Christian martyrs, and their relics were later to be found in a church (previously a synagogue) in Antioch. The story of Hannah and her sons continued to attract the attention of Jewish writers, and poetic renderings of the story appeared throughout the Middle Ages.

The name Hannah seems to have entered the story through connection with the prayer spoken by the biblical character Hannah after the birth of her son Samuel (1 Sam. 2:5). Here the earlier Hannah speaks of God’s power to give children to the barren while the mother of many is left to mourn; the later story provided a forceful example of this power, and eventually it provided the protagonist’s name as well. This connection, however, seems no earlier than late medieval times.

Har Rai

Sikh guru

Guru Hargobind nominated his grandson Har Rai as guru at his death in 1644. Guru Har Rai, born in 1630, was only fourteen at the time of nomination, and he was the head of the Sikh community in India for seventeen years. Like his grandfather, he did not compose any hymns or add to Sikh sacred literature, but unlike him, he avoided conflict with the Mughal authorities and retreated to the town of Thapal in the Shivalik hills. This is not to say that he accepted Mughal authority, however. Rather, he continued to recognize only the authority of God and his “just rule,” thus rejecting any Mughal claims to power over the Sikh community.

Har Rai’s elder brother, Dhir Mal, was actively patronized by Shah Jahan (r. 1628–1658), and he was given revenue-free land at Kartarpur, the former center of the Sikh community under Guru Arjan. Once again, however, a change in Mughal rule saw the disruption of Sikh-Mughal relations. During the struggle for power between Aurangzeb and his brother Dara Shikoh, there were rumors that the Sikh Guru Har Rai supported Dara Shikoh. With his accession to the throne, Aurangzeb called Har Rai to Delhi to secure his loyalty. Har Rai sent his eldest son, Ram Rai, instead. Ram Rai seized the opportunity, and subsequently the Mughal emperor patronized him by giving him revenue-free land as well. Guru Har Rai died in 1661 after nominating his younger son, Har Krishan, to the guruship.

During Guru Har Rai’s control of the Sikh community, he was faced with challenges from outside, including the Mughal Empire in the plains and various Hindu rajas in the hills, as well as from within, including both his brother Dhir Mal’s control of Kartarpur and his cousin Ram Rai’s close relationship with the Mughal authorities. These challenges threatened to fragment the Sikh community, but Har Rai was able to keep the center strong enough to maintain the majority of the community’s loyalty.

Hargobind

Sikh guru

Guru Arjan nominated his son Hargobind as guru in 1606. Guru Hargobind, who had been born in 1595, grew up in the court of his father in Ramdaspur, India, and his father’s death at the hands of the Mughal emperor, Jahangir (r. 1605–1627), prompted him to emphasize the military dimension of the Sikh community. He symbolically wore two swords, which represented miri and piri (temporal power and spiritual authority), built a fort to defend Ramdaspur, and created a formal court, the Akhal Takht (Immortal Throne).

These aggressive moves prompted Jahangir to jail Hargobind at a fort in Gwalior, but he was soon released as Jahangir was content that he had adequately asserted his authority over the Sikh community. Thus, Jahangir left Hargobind free to lead the Sikh community for a number of years. However, with Jahangir’s death in 1627, the new Mughal emperor, Shah Jahan (r. 1628–1658), took offense at Guru Hargobind's power and authority and attacked the Sikh center of Ramdaspur. Unable to withstand the Mughal attack, Guru Hargobind moved away from Amritsar for greater safety. This safety was short-lived, as Shah Jahan attacked again, and this time Guru Hargobind fled to the Shivalik hills and established Kiratpur there. He died at Kiratpur in March 1644 after eight years of relative peace in the hills.

Unlike his five predecessors, Guru Hargobind did not compose any hymns, nor did he add to the book created by his father, Guru Arjan. Instead, Guru Hargobind focused on developing the concept of "divine justice." Drawing on the writings of Guru Nanak (1469–1539), Hargobind argued that since the reign of Jahangir was not just in the eyes of God, the Sikh community had no obligation to recognize his authority. Indeed, the only justice the Sikh community would recognize was that which was given by God to the guru. Along with this idea of divine justice went the claim to territory. Thus, Guru Hargobind moved away from the areas that the Mughal Empire controlled and laid claim to a piece of land, declaring that the revenue would go only to the guru acting as God's representative on earth.

Haribhadra

(8th cent. C.E.)

Jain monk, scholar

A medieval Jain scholar and monk, Haribhadra was a pivotal figure in the advancement of the religious and literary culture of the Shvetambara (white-clad) sect in eighth-century India. He was a versatile and erudite thinker, and numerous texts are attributed to him—as many as 1,450. Historically, however, Haribhadra remains an elusive figure. Some scholars have argued that, indeed, there may have been more than one scholar of that name.

Religious biographies of Haribhadra that were written starting around the twelfth century narrate two important events in his life. The first is his conversion from Hindu Brahminism to Jainism due to the influence of the Jain nun Yakini. This account presents Haribhadra as an arrogant Hindu Brahmin who loses when he is challenged to refute Yakini's teachings. He agrees to become her pupil, she directs him to her teacher, and eventually Haribhadra converts to Jainism. The second account narrates Haribhadra's retaliation for the murder of his nephews while they were in clandestine study at a Buddhist monastery. To avenge their deaths, he challenges the Buddhist scholars to a debate, with the defeated party to jump into a vat of boiling oil. Haribhadra, with his erudition, defeats the Buddhists, and this results in the death of many monks. The portrait of an intolerant religious teacher that emerges from these biographies is in contrast to the ecumenical temperament that is characteristic of his writings.

Hagiographies depict Haribhadra as an ascetic monk and an authority on Jain scriptures who served as a spiritual guide for the lay community. In this sense, his interaction with the material world was measured in that he acted only as a teacher and guardian of the Jain faith, typical of a monk. The Jain ascetics were seen as intermediaries in the hierarchy of holiness, with the tirthankaras (ford-makers) and the lay community at either end of the spectrum. Haribhadra's most important contributions are an expanded biography of Mahavira (trad. 599–527 B.C.E.), the twenty-fourth and last ford-maker, and his commentaries on the Avasyaka Sutra, which addresses the obligations of a Jain ascetic and the layman.

Haridas

(early 16th cent. C.E.)

Hindu singer-saint

Svami Haridas was a charismatic Hindu singer-saint of the early sixteenth century. He was devoted to the divine pair Radha and Krishna and founder of a Vaishnava sect called the Haridasi-Sampradaya. Haridas's theological affiliation is hotly disputed between two rival branches of that sect, the Gosvamis (Householders) and the Sadhus (Renunciants). The former claims that he was Vishnusvami, the latter that he was Nimbarki. In any case, Haridas had a predilection for the aesthetic relish (rasa) of the love play of Radha and Krishna. It was an interest that he shared with his two closest companions, Hit Harivansh and Hariram Vyas. The three of them are known as the Hari-trayi (Triumvirate of God) or the Rasika-trayi (Three Connoisseurs).

What all sources agree on is that in his mid-twenties, Haridas renounced the world and moved to Vrindaban in the Braj area of India, the newly discovered center of Krishna devotion, and stayed there until his death. His tomb (samadhi) is still tended there by the Sadhu branch of his disciples in a bowerlike setting called Nidhivana. The image he venerated, Bihari (Banke), is in the custody of the Gosvamis. It is now housed in one of the richest and most popular temples of Vrindaban, where it is worshipped with much pomp according to an elaborate yearly cycle of festivals.

Haridas's devotional songs in the vernacular of Braj have been collected in two anthologies: Kelimala (Garland of play), which contains 108 songs exclusively about the love of Radha and Krishna, and Ashtadas Siddhanta Pada (Eighteen songs of instruction), which is about conversion and devotion to God. These songs are quite difficult; for Haridas, the words seem to have been secondary to the music.

All songs ascribed to Haridas consist of four rhyming lines of unequal length, which is typical for the classical musical genre of dhrupada. One of the most popular legends about Haridas portrays him as a master in that genre, the guru of the famous court singer of Akbar, Tansen. The story goes that Tansen brought his patron to Braj so that he could meet Haridas. The emperor witnessed Haridas's musical talent, which was such that when he sang the tune (raga) characteristic of the monsoon season, in full spring, dark clouds would gather and peacocks would dance. Notwithstanding its popularity, this story is relatively late. It is first found in the mid-eighteenth century in a hagiography by a retired king, Nagridas, and in contemporary miniatures in the style of that king's principality in Rajasthan, Kishangarh.

Harivansh, Hit

(c. 1502–c. 1552 C.E.)

Hindu poet-saint

Hit Harivansh was a charismatic Hindu poet-saint born in 1502 who devoted his life and work to the divine pair Radha and Krishna. He belongs to the devotional movement (bhakti), in which saints are celebrated for their love for God rather than for their wisdom or virtuous life. Thus, in the hagiographies, Harivansh is portrayed as totally absorbed in his devotion, even at the cost of observing the rules of conventional religion (dharma). He is understood to be an incarnation of the flute of Krishna.

Harivansh was one of the pioneers who moved to Vrindaban in the Braj area of northern India in the early sixteenth century. At that time, this bucolic area near the Yamuna River had been newly discovered as the place where Krishna and Radha dwelled on earth. Harivansh came to be regarded as the founder of a separate Vaishnava sect, the Radhavallabha-Sampradaya. His theological affiliation has become the source of vehement debates, partly because he did not compose systematic theological treatises. However, it is clear from his ecstatic poetry that he had a predilection for the aesthetic relish (rasa) of the love play of the divine pair. This he shared with his two closest companions, Svami Haridas and Hariram Vyas, with whom he is often classified as the Rasika-trayi (“Three Connoisseurs” or the Hari-trayi (Triumvirate of God)).

In contrast to the ascetic Haridas, Harivansh was married three times and fathered several children. His descendants still tend his tomb (samadhi) in Vrindaban and maintain the enclosed garden, called Sevakunj, where he meditated on the divine pair. In the late sixteenth century, a gorgeous red sandstone temple was built for the image Harivansh venerated, Radhavallabha. At present, the image is housed in a new temple nearby, where it is worshipped according to an elaborate yearly cycle of festivals.

Two Sanskrit works are attributed to Harivansh: Yamunashtaka (Eight verses for Yamuna) and Radhasudhanidhi (Treasure of Radha's nectar). However, Harivansh is best known for his devotional songs in the vernacular of Braj, collected in two anthologies. The most famous one, called Caurasi Pad (Eighty-four songs), is a collection of powerful poetry nearly exclusively about the erotic love of Radha and Krishna, of which he claimed to be an eyewitness. A second anthology, called Sphut Vani (Miscellaneous inspired sayings), contains songs that urge conversion and devotion to God. Harivansh's songs are performed in daily communal singing sessions (samaja) in Radhavallabhan temples and households throughout northern India.

Harris, William Wade

Christian independent church founder

William Wade Harris, born in Liberia around 1850, claimed to be a prophet and inspired the establishment of several independent churches in the Ivory Coast and Ghana. Following his spiritual anointing, he adorned himself with a white robe, grew a gray beard, and carried a staff topped with a cross, giving the appearance of a biblical prophet. This image, and his persuasive command of the gospel, together contributed to Harris's dynamic ministry. Indeed, according to one historian, "All observers testified to Harris' striking appearance, and personality: 'God made the soul of Harris a soul of fire'" (Isichei 1995, 284). Harris, according to his followers, received his gift of eloquence from God.

As a radical political activist fighting the colonial authorities, Harris was jailed in 1910, accused of leading an attempted coup against Liberian president Arthur Barclay. Upon his release from prison in 1912, Harris was inspired to organize a series of crusades. These events drew thousands, many of whom became baptized believers. The Harris movement, as it was called, started in 1914 and eventually superseded Catholicism in fame in the region. Though a stranger in the Ivory Coast, his performance was unique and he became known as a spirit-filled African missionary in West Africa, establishing churches throughout the region.

Harris preached strict morality, temperance, a good work ethic, and emphasis on select traditional values deemed consistent with the gospel. He denounced such dehumanizing practices as witchcraft, adultery, and lies but allowed polygamous families based on his Old Testament understanding. His mushrooming membership posed a threat to the French colonial powers, who soon destroyed Harris's churches in the Ivory Coast, jailed the prophet, and later deported him to Liberia, his homeland.

By the time of his death in 1929, Harris had paved the way for many other missionary groups to proselytize in the region, leaving a large membership in the independent churches that followed his teachings. In Harris's absence, expatriate missionaries took advantage of the situation and recruited the already evangelized population. Many scholars concur that Harris was a major prophetic African spiritual leader of the twentieth century. According to historian Gwinyai Muzorewa, Harris "started a mass movement on the French Ivory Coast. 'The Church of the Twelve Apostles' and the present Methodist Church in Ivory Coast trace their origins to this Grebo (KRU) prophet William Wade Harris" (1985, 115).

Hasan II

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Hasan II was imam in the Isma'ili mountain state of Alamut in northern Iran in the twelfth century. He was the twenty-third imam following 'Ali b. Abi Talib for the Shi'a Nizari Isma'ili Muslims. His designation was 'ala dhikrihis-salam, "May there be peace on his mention."

With Hasan's succession as imam at age thirty-two, spiritual leaders who were earlier in hiding were now openly identified. He initiated a new era in the practices of the Isma'ilis, transforming the rituals of prayers and other religious ceremonies. He also propounded a new doctrine, using the notion of the Last Day (qiyama) as a spiritual metaphor for the manifestation of spiritual truth, specifically, the identification of the imam of the time. Thus the idea of the qiyama indicated the manifestation of spiritual truth in the person of the Nizari imam. Instead of physical resurrection at the end of time, it was a spiritual resurrection experienced by the adept who accepts and recognizes the true esoteric merits of the imams. This spiritual qiyama as experienced by the adept led from the zahir, or outward, to the batin, or inward, dimension of faith. The spiritual awakening was also declared in terms of the movement from the shari'a, or legal regulations, to the haqiqa, or real truth.

Since the time of Imam Nizar, with the assistance of dai'is (agents) the Isma'ilis had controlled fortresses in Syria as well as in northern Iran. Alamut was the most prominent of these. Hasan II sent the trusted envoy Rashid-al-din Sinan to consolidate and strengthen the community in Syria. Among other reforms, Sinan encouraged the women of the community to work unveiled alongside the men. He also established special volunteers, called fidawi or fidawiyya, corresponding to the Alamut fi da'is, who were assigned special tasks.

In about 1166, five years after he became imam, and approximately a year and a half after his proclamation of the qiyama, Hasan was apparently poisoned by a group of his followers, headed by his brother-in-law Husayni Namawar, in the fortress of Lamasar. This group was opposed to the idea of the qiyama and the intense focus on the inward or batin dimensions of faith. However, the qiyama and the esoteric idiom of the community was continued under the aegis of Hasan II's son and successor 'Ala Muhammad (also called Nur al-din Muhammad). The following successor (Hasan's grandson, Jalal al-din Hasan) altered once again the practices within the context of the idea of qiyama and reverted to the association of various practices with shari'a policy.

Hasan III

Isma'ili Muslim imam

Ala al-Din Muhammad b. Hasan, or Hasan III, was an imam of the Nizari Isma'ili branch of Shi'ite Islam and the penultimate ruler of the Nizari Isma'ili state centered at the fortress of Alamut in northern Iran. Born in 1211, he succeeded his father, Jalal al-Din Hasan, at the age of nine in 1221. Under his leadership, the general policy of rapprochement with the Abbasid caliphs and Sunni Muslims was retained, though his community increasingly came to regard itself openly as Isma'ili Shi'ite.

Hasan III's long reign was a turbulent period for the entire Iranian world, which now experienced a foretaste of the Mongol catastrophe. But the Nizari Isma'ili leadership seems to have reached an understanding with the Mongols, who did not attack their strongholds in Iran for some time. Under the circumstances, these strongholds provided safe havens for an increasing number of Sunni Muslim scholars of central Asia, who fled from the invaders. It was also in his time that the Nizari Isma'ili da'wa (religious missionary activity) was introduced to the Indian subcontinent. In the aftermath of Hasan III's failure to reach a peaceful agreement with the Mongol great khan Güyük in 1246, however, Isma'ili-Mongol relations deteriorated rapidly. By 1253, Güyük's successor, Möngke, had destroyed numerous Nizari Isma'ili towns and fortresses in several regions of Iran.

Hasan III's rule was also a period of intense intellectual and religious activity in the Nizari Isma'ili community. In particular, the Nizari imam and other communal leaders now made a sustained effort to explain to ordinary members of their community the various religious policies of the leaders of the Nizari Isma'ilis at Alamut from the time of Hasan-i Sabbah (c.1050–1124) within a coherent theological framework. The intellectual life of the Nizari Isma'ilis was now particularly invigorated by the influx of outside scholars, who availed themselves of the Nizari libraries and patronage of learning. Foremost among these scholars was Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (1201–1274), the most learned Muslim theologian of the time, who spent three decades in the Nizari Isma'ili fortress communities of Iran until their destruction by Mongols in 1256. Indeed, it is mainly through al-Tusi's Isma'ili writings that scholars have in recent decades studied the Nizari Isma'ili teachings of Hasan III's time.

Mongol campaigns intensified, and Hasan III was found murdered in December 1255. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Rukn al-Din Khurshah, who was to rule for exactly one year as the last lord of Alamut.

Hasan al-'Askari, al-

(c. 846–c. 874 C.E.)

Shi'i imam

Al-Hasan al-'Askari was the eleventh imam, or divinely appointed religious leader, of the Twelver Shi'a, the second-largest denomination in Islam. He was born in about 846 in Medina of a slave woman called Hadith (or Hudayth). When he was about two years of age, his father, the tenth imam 'Ali al-Hadi, was summoned to Samarra by the Abbasid caliph al-Mutawakkil (r. 847–861). Samarra, north of Baghdad, had just been built as the new capital of the Abbasids, and the caliph wanted to keep a close eye on the Shi'i imam. The quarter of the city where al-Hadi was detained was known as al-'Askar (the army) because the Abbasid army was garrisoned there. As a consequence, both the tenth and the eleventh imams acquired the epithet al-'Askari.

The period of al-Hasan's imamate was only about six years long. Like his father before him, he remained under the close supervision of the Abbasid caliph and his spies, who restricted his access to the outside world. He is said to have used special emissaries to communicate with his followers. A slave girl of his, called either Narjis or Saqil, is reported to have given birth to his son Muhammad b. al-Hasan, known as al-Mahdi (the Rightly Guided).

Al-Hasan al-'Askari died in about 874. Shi'i sources claim that like other imams before him, he fell martyr to the Shi'i cause, poisoned by the caliph Mu'tamid. His death was followed by a period of considerable turmoil and confusion for the Shi'a. It was not immediately clear whether he had left behind an heir. Several Shi'i factions emerged at this time; some of the sources mention that there may have been as many as twenty sects. One of them was called the Waqfiyya, some members of which believed that the imamate had ceased with the death of al-Hasan and that he was the mahdi (forerunner of the apocalypse). Other adherents of this sect thought he had not died but had gone into hiding or occultation; yet others thought he had died, but it was not clear who was the successor. Al-Hasan's brother Ja'far is said to have intrigued against him during his lifetime; after al-Hasan's death, Ja'far reportedly claimed that his brother had died without issue and therefore he was the legitimate heir to the imamate. This faction was known as the Ja'fariyya. The majority of the Shi'a eventually went on to accept the existence of al-'Askari's son Muhammad and recognized him as the twelfth and final imam.

Hasan 'Ali Shah

See Aga Khan I

Hasan b. 'Ali

(624/625–669 C.E.)

Shi'i Muslim imam

Grandson of the prophet Muhammad through his daughter Fatima, Hasan b. 'Ali is regarded by the Shi'is as the second divinely appointed imam or leader, having been designated by his father, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, to succeed him. Many anecdotes and traditions that attest to Muhammad's love for his grandsons, Hasan and Husayn, have been preserved. Among these is the statement that "al-Hasan and al-Husayn are the masters of the youth of Paradise." The prophet is also reported to have shown his special affection for Hasan by interrupting one of his sermons and descending from the pulpit in order to pick up Hasan, who had fallen down.

Hasan was born in 624 or 625. Due to his close relationship to Muhammad, he was highly respected by many in the community. He is also reported to have resembled his grandfather very closely. With his father, mother, and brother, Hasan is said to have joined the prophet under a "mantle." According to Shi'i exegetes, these five were declared in the Qur'an to be the "people of the house" and free from all impurity (33:33). The Shi'is have used such sayings to justify the right of the prophet's descendants to the leadership (imamate) of the community. Hasan is also said to have been a pious man with a mild disposition who never lost his composure.

When a Khariji killed 'Ali in Kufa in 661, many of his followers pledged allegiance to Hasan and proclaimed him as the next caliph. Mu'awiya b. Abu Sufyan (r. 661–680), the founder of the Umayyad dynasty, refused to recognize Hasan's leadership and prepared for war instead. Hasan responded by mobilizing his forces, but owing to lack of support and the perceived need to preserve the unity of the community, he contemplated signing a peace treaty with his foe. Many in Hasan's army were unhappy at this. Some of his followers attacked him, and he was wounded in the thigh. Mass desertions from Hasan's army meant that he had to abdicate the leadership of the community in favor of Mu'awiya. Mu'awiya's caliphate did not last for more than eight months.

Sources present conflicting details on Hasan's agreement with Mu'awiya. Most agree that Hasan stipulated that Mu'awiya should compensate him, that his followers were not to be harassed, and that, after Mu'awiya's death, the leadership should be restored to Hasan, or, if he was not alive, to his younger brother, Husayn. Hasan's abdication provoked negative reactions among his followers. Many Shi'is felt humiliated by the peace treaty.

Hasan retreated to Medina, where he lived quietly, avoiding political activity. Hostile sources claim that he married and divorced many times, even suggesting that he had more than sixty different wives. He was pejoratively called mitlak (divorcer). Shi'i sources indicate that at Mu'awiya's instigation, one of Hasan's wives, Ja'da, poisoned him. At any rate, he died in 669. Although Hasan wanted to be buried next to his grandfather's grave in Medina, some members of the community (sources suggest Muhammad's wife 'Aisha was one of them) refused to honor his wishes. To avoid an armed conflict, Husayn decided to have him buried in the common cemetery at al-Baqi.

To affirm his "holy" status, Hasan is credited with many legendary stories and miracles in Shi'i hagiographic literature. For example, when he was born, he reportedly praised God and recited passages from the Qur'an. Gabriel is alleged to have rocked his cradle, showing the divine blessings and favors bestowed on the family of the prophet.

Hasan-i Sabbah

(c. 1050–1124 C.E.)

Isma'ili Muslim ruler

Hasan-i Sabbah was an important link in the preservation and development of the Nizari Isma'ili Muslim community. Born to an Ithna'-Ash'ari Shi'a family in Isfahan, Iran, in about 1050, he accepted the Isma'ili imam (ruler) al-Mustansir in Cairo as spiritual guide around 1071. He set out to meet the imam in 1076 and arrived in Cairo in 1078. He remained there for approximately eighteen months, during which time hostility developed between him and the vizier Badr al-Jamali. According to some accounts, he was even imprisoned but managed to escape. He returned to Isfahan in 1081. By about 1091, he had managed to gain control of the fortress of Alamut south of the Caspian Sea in the area of Rudbar in Daylam, northern Iran.

This small independent state, which subsequently expanded, lasted for 166 years until the Mongols destroyed it in 1256. The narrative of how Hasan procured Alamut by peaceful means, not a military campaign, is surrounded by hagiographical anecdotes. According to one version, he purchased it for 3,000 dinars, in another version he won a wager, and in the third he went there as a teacher and managed to gain strategic control. In order to regain possession of the castle, the Seljuq king Malik Shah, with Nizam al-Mulk as vizier, sent an army that besieged Alamut for four months, but to no avail. The vizier was dismissed from office and was apparently slain shortly afterward, and the king himself soon died. For the next ten years, owing to a succession dispute, the central authority was weak and Hasan-i Sabbah had the opportunity to consolidate his authority in the surrounding regions. At this fortress he also recruited staunch volunteers, called fiida'is, who were willing to protect the incipient state, even at the sacrifice of their own lives.

At his demise in 1124, Hasan was succeeded by Kiya Buzrugh Umid as the next administrator. Hasan had killed both of his own sons, one for drinking wine and the other for an unfounded charge of complicity in the murder of a fellow da'i (missionary). Kiya Buzrugh Umid had been in charge of the fortress of Lamasar that was conquered in about 1096. Under his capable direction, the Isma'ilis continued to acquire strength, and eventually they controlled more than seventy castles.

Meanwhile, in Cairo, at the conclusion of the reign of the Fatimid ruler al-Mustansir there was a succession crisis in 1094. Although the chief minister preferred the designation of the young prince, Musta'li, the ruler himself had earlier nominated his oldest son, Nizar. The hostilities at Cairo forced Nizar to leave. According to Isma'ili tradition, the mountain state of Alamut provided a safe haven to Nizar and his descendants. (According to some sources, Nizar was assassinated in Cairo and it was his son who reached Alamut.) Henceforth the Isma'ili imams were divided into two lines, the Nizari and the Musta'li.

In Alamut, Hasan made Persian rather than Arabic the main language of his small independent mountain state. He also reformulated the central Isma'ili teaching about the need for the imam as the authoritative spiritual teacher. Unassisted human wisdom was considered inadequate for knowing God and understanding spiritual truth, and the imam was the necessary authoritative teacher required for the spiritual guidance of all humanity. The teachings (ta'lim) of the imam were essential for the identification and recognition of true wisdom. The members of the community were to eliminate all hierarchy and were to address each other as rafiq (comrade or friend). As the imam was not available to the public (perhaps for security reasons), Hasan and his two successors came to be regarded as the hujja (evident proof) of the imam and were designated the imam's chief representatives.

Hasan himself lived a spartan life and constantly sought to improve the material situation of the populace under his dominion. Like some of the other men in Alamut, Hasan sent his wife and daughters to the region of Girdkuh (which was considered safer), where they earned a simple living by spinning yarn. Hasan was buried near the fortress of Alamut, but the mausoleum was destroyed by the Mongols in 1256. Isma'ilis have called him Sayyidna (our master), a title expressing respect and admiration.

Hasidei Ashkenaz

(12th–13th cent. C.E.)

Jewish pietist group

The Hasidei Ashkenaz (the German pietists) was an elite group within German Jewry that flourished in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The group's main centers were in Regensburg and the Rhineland communities of Speyer, Worms, and Mainz, and its most prominent members were Samuel b. Kalonymus ha-Hasid (the pious) in the twelfth century, Judah the Pious (c. 1150–1217), and Eleazar of Worms (c. 1165–c. 1230). There are two main types of Hasidei Ashkenaz writings: ethical works intended to influence religious practice and raise the moral level of the Jewish community, and esoteric mystical writings intended for a small group of mystics. The sect's most important ethical work was Sefer Hasidim (The book of the pious) by Judah the Pious.

The Hasidei Ashkenaz distinguished themselves from the rest of the Jewish community by their demand that the members of the group live by a higher religious standard, called the “law of heaven,” instead of the “law of the Torah” expected of ordinary Jews. The rezon ha-bore (will of God) was the basis for all their actions. They also taught the doctrine of commensurate repentance for pietists. That is, as a form of penance one must undergo an amount of physical pain and degradation equal to the pleasure and reward received in committing the sin. In this and some other of their practices, scholars have suggested the influence of contemporary Christian groups and concepts. Their social doctrine assumed that complete equality of resources and social status was the ideal situation and the social reality of inequality was the result of sin.

The ideas of the Hasidei Ashkenaz were not accepted by many members of the larger Jewish community, which led to a certain amount of communal tension and strife. They tried to deal with this rejection by cultivating an attitude of indifference to those who mocked them. “Humility for the sake of heaven” was seen as a great virtue. Though the Hasidei Ashkenaz did not last beyond the thirteenth century as an organized group, many of its concepts continued to influence German and East European Jewry for centuries, particularly through the popularity of Sefer Hasidim.

Hasidism

(1730s C.E.–)

Jewish spiritual movement

Hasidism is a spiritual movement founded by Israel Ba'al Shem Tov (1698/1700–1760) in the 1730s in southeastern

Poland. It derives its name from the Hebrew word hasid, meaning pietist (and thus many groups who were not directly connected to Hasidism—for example, the Hasidei Ashkenaz—also used the term). Ba'al Shem Tov (Master of the Good Name, also known as “the Besht,” an acronym) was a baal shem, that is, a healer who inscribed amulets to cure physical and mental ailments. He was also a spiritual teacher who opposed the ascetic and elitist teachings of the mystical fraternities prevalent at that time. His innovative ideas began to attract disciples who were part of the intellectual elite, and he acquired a reputation as a charismatic holy man and miracle worker among ordinary people. The Besht taught the importance of worship, which was accessible to everyone, in contrast to the emphasis on talmudic study by the rabbinic elite.

The Besht's two most important disciples were Rabbi Jacob Joseph of Polonoye (c. 1710–1784), and Rabbi Dov Baer (d. 1772), the Maggid (preacher) of Mezhirech. The Besht did not leave any significant writings, but his teachings were preserved in the writings of Rabbi Jacob Joseph. The central points of his teachings for the spiritual and intellectual elite was that God can be worshipped with joy and a positive attitude toward the world rather than through the asceticism and self-mortification that were common at the time. He also taught that the elite were responsible for the spiritual welfare of the masses, and that ordinary people could participate in the spiritual path by accepting the leadership and guidance of the spiritual masters. After the Besht's death in 1760, the leadership of the Hasidic movement passed to Dov Baer, the Maggid of Mezhirech.

The Maggid emphasized the training of young scholars who would be the future leaders of the movement. The form of mysticism that he taught, more elitist than the philosophy of the Besht, focused on spiritual concerns such as contemplative prayer and the attainment of devekut (communion with God). The disciples of the Maggid were sent out to all areas of eastern Europe to spread the teachings of Hasidism and create Hasidic fellowships. After the Maggid's death in 1772, these disciples became leaders in their own right and founded the major Hasidic groups that flourished throughout the nineteenth century and into the twentieth. Nahman of Bratslav (1772–1810) was virtually the only significant figure of the third generation who had not been a disciple of the Maggid. Nahman was the great-grandson of the Besht, and his claim to Hasidic leadership was based on ancestry rather than discipleship.

Among the Maggid's disciples were influential figures such as Levi Yizhak of Berdichev; Elimelech of Lyzhansk; Jacob Isaac, the seer of Lublin; and Shneur Zalman of Liadi, the founder of the Habad school. Each of these disciples became a tzaddiq (Hasidic master), and Hasidism never again had one universally recognized leader. Different groups began to emphasize various aspects of Hasidic teachings. At the core of Hasidism was the relationship between the tzaddiq and his hasidim (disciples/followers). Some groups, such as the Habad and Bratslav schools, saw this relationship primarily in spiritual and intellectual terms, while others moved in a more materialistic direction. Indeed, the intellectual and spiritual teachings of Hasidism were not unitary but open to a wide diversity of interpretations. For example, the Habad school emphasized a systematic intellectual approach, while the Bratslav school sought the same goal through simple faith and an emotional outpouring of the soul to God.

In this painting entitled The Rabbi Travels, the Way Is Getting Short, the modern Israeli artist Moshe Bernshtein has caught the esoteric, joyful spirit of Hasidism. (Art Directors)

The year of the Maggid's death, 1772, also saw the beginnings of a backlash against the Hasidic movement and its teachings by parts of the rabbinic elite and others opposed to what they saw as the dangerous innovations of Hasidism. A ban of excommunication was issued in Brody against the followers of Hasidism, who were now prohibited from all contact with those who accepted the ban. Other bans were also issued, and a period of tension ensued between Hasidism and its opponents (mitnagedim) that lasted into the first third of the nineteenth century.

Hasidism was the dominant force in East European Jewish society in the nineteenth century, with the significant exception of Lithuania, where Hasidism never gained a significant foothold. The upheavals of World War I, along with modernization and urbanization, led to a decline in the centrality of Hasidism in East European Jewish life. The majority of Hasidic leaders and followers perished in the Holocaust. A small remnant that survived managed to reconstitute some Hasidic groups, primarily in the United States and Israel.

Hassan, Sayyid Muhammad ‘Abdullah

Muslim sufi, rebel, nationalist

Sayyid Muhammad ‘Abdullah Hassan, a hero of resistance against colonialism, was born in the interior of Somaliland in 1856. As a boy, he had spent some time with his fellow clansmen and their livestock in the interior, but in the 1870s he left for Aden, where he enrolled as a fireman working for one of the steamships. This allowed him to travel to places such as Egypt, where apparently he heard stories about the Sudanese mahdi, Muhammad Ahmad ibn el-Sayed (1844–1885). He performed pilgrimage to Mecca and visited the Holy City many times before joining the “Puritanical” Salihyya order of sufis. He then began to preach in Somalia against the luxury of the age, but he gained few followers in Berbera. He moved to the interior, where he lived in the Nogal Valley. Through his religious and political teaching he established a dervish (sufi-based) movement that sought to expel the British from his country. For a few years he disciplined his followers and attempted to replace clan solidarity and authority of the elders with his own unique authority as an inspired Muslim leader. His military involvements initially had to do with self-defense against Ethiopia, but soon Britain and Italy mobilized forces to deal with his resistance. Early in 1899 he began his jihad (religious struggles) against the British.

Hassan was an orator and a poet. These were much-valued skills and social assets in Somali society and won him followers, especially among the Darood clan. The British had underestimated his following but found out soon enough that he was persistent in his anticolonial struggles. Hassan’s historic resistance to foreign European-Christian intrusion started in the 1890s and continued until 1920, when Hassan died. Hassan became a hero of Somali nationalism. His talents as an epic poet were partly related to his rise to prominence as the leader of a religious-military movement that pitted the dervishes against European powers and Somali collaborators.

In the aftermath of Hassan’s tenacious but disastrous (both in terms of lives and property) anti-imperialist struggles to rid the country of European rulers, the British made every attempt not to antagonize the clan-based pastoral nomads and prohibited Christian missionary activity. This turn of events, however, led to a policy of doing very little for the colony, which remained a neglected backwater.

Hayashi Razan

(1583–1657 C.E.)

Confucian scholar

A Confucian scholar of the early Edo period (1603–1867), Hayashi Razan was one of the most politically and socially influential scholars in early modern Japanese history. Born in Kaga in 1583 and brought to Kyoto by his father Nobutoki at the age of fourteen, Razan studied literature at the Rinzaï sect’s Kenninji Zen temple in Kyoto until 1597. Although encouraged to enter the priesthood, he declined and returned home, where he continued his own study on Kyōgaku. In time, Razan realized he was more inclined to the Neo-Confucian teachings of Zhu Xi (1130–1200), and in 1604, he met the famous Neo-Confucian scholar Fujiwara Seika (1561–1619) and was heavily influenced by him.

In 1606, Razan received the title of doctor (hakase) and became the first secretary of the Tokugawa shogunate. Razan was a fervent Neo-Confucianist and strove to persuade Tokugawa Ieyasu (first shogun of the Edo period) to remove the influence of Buddhist priests from around him. Ieyasu arranged a debate for him with the famous priest Tenkai, but Razan did not perform well and soon after published two books in favor of Shintoism. Razan continued to serve the shogunate, serving as a teacher to the first four shoguns. He established a school and a monastery at Shinobugaoka in Uenō, which later became known as the Shōheikō.

In 1629, Razan received the honorary Buddhist rank of hōin (high priest). He wrote the drafts of the famous Buke shohatto (Laws for the military houses) and Shoshi hatto (Laws for the shogun’s vassals) in 1635 and was instrumental in the development of customs and ceremony and in determining foreign diplomatic relations with Korea.

Hayashi Razan is also known for his anti-Christian (haiyaso) and anti-Buddhist ideas. He attacked Buddhism for its denial of the reality of human relationships and the economic burden it placed on the country. Razan spoke about a Shinto that existed harmoniously with Confucianism in the heart of a person.

Razan's first name was Nobukatsu, his common name was Matasaburō, and his posthumous Buddhist name was Dōshun.

Helena

(c. 250–329 C.E.)

Christian pilgrim, patron

Helena, the mother of Roman emperor Constantine, a pilgrim, patroness, and saint in both the Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches, was a woman of humble origins. She was a concubine of the Roman general Constantius Chlorus, but he abandoned her when he was made caesar in 293 for a marriage to a politically well-connected younger woman. Helena was very close to her son Constantine, and after the death of his father in 306, she joined her son in Britain and later moved with him to Trier. After Constantine's victory over Maxentius in 312, she moved to Rome and lived in the Sessorian palace complex. It is unclear when she converted to Christianity, but Eusebius (c. 260–c. 339) claims that it was at this time. In 324, when her son became the sole Roman emperor, he gave his mother the title Augusta, and shortly thereafter he restored and renamed her hometown in her honor, Helenopolis.

In 326, Helena left Rome for a journey that would cast her as one of the first Christian "pilgrims" to Jerusalem and an exemplar for later pilgrims. Apparently Constantine sent her in order to dispense imperial patronage and supervise the building of the churches ordered by him, including the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem and, in Jerusalem, the Church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives. Eusebius claims that she desired to offer prayers of thanksgiving for her son and grandsons where Jesus had stood. Shortly after her return to Rome, in 329, Helena died. She was buried by her son in a large mausoleum adjoining the basilica of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter, near her own suburban properties and only a few miles away from the Sessorian palace.

Shortly after her death, two rooms of her palace were transformed into a church; at first it was called "Jerusalem" but later it was renamed Santa Croce. In 395, Ambrose attributed the finding of the True Cross, the cross on which Jesus was crucified in Jerusalem, to Helena, and by at least the sixth century a piece of this relic was housed in Santa Croce. Most scholars dismiss any actual connection between Helena and the discovery of this important Christian relic, but the legend flourished beginning in the fifth century and has continued to the present day. Throughout the Middle Ages, depictions of Helena's discovery of the True Cross appear in art. The fresco cycle of Piero della Francesca in Arezzo, Italy, is perhaps the most famous example. In the Middle Ages, a legend developed that Helena was originally born in Britain, leading to many stories and depictions of Helena as an English saint.

Hemacandra

Jain monk, scholar

The Jain scholar-monk Hemacandra was born in 1089 in the town of Dhanduka in Gujarat, India. Hemacandra as a young man became the disciple of a well-known Shvetambara (white-clad) ascetic teacher, Devacandra, whom he succeeded after mastering the various branches of Jain and non-Jain learning. He was given the epithet "The Omniscient One of the Corrupt Age" (the present) for his breadth of knowledge and his literary legacy, which is evident from his treatises on grammar, poetry, ritual, and other branches of Indian learning.

Hemacandra, in addition to his erudition, was instrumental in establishing Jain presence in Gujarat. His hagiographies depict him as closely linked to the dynasty of the Chalukyas who ruled the northwest of India. Particularly, he was the court scholar of the monarch Jayasimha (r. 1094–1143) and later the mentor to the royal patron's nephew and successor, Kumarapala (r. 1143–1172). Under his influence, the Chalukyan kings issued decrees instituting Jain principles such as prohibition of the slaughter of animals, erection of Jain temples, and the general advancement of Jainism.

After a fruitful life furthering the Jain faith, he is said to have attained final liberation, putting an end to all karma by taking up the austerities of voluntary starvation in 1172.

A sampling of his better-known works are The Siddhahemacandra (a treatise on grammar); The Epic Poem with a Dual Purpose, a book on rules of grammar and the history of the Chalukyan dynasty; A Manual of Conduct; The Lives of Sixty-three Illustrious People; and The Deeds of Kumarapala.

Henry II

(973–1024 C.E.)

Christian ruler

Henry II was a Roman emperor, saint, and model Christian ruler (as king of Germany from 1002 to 1024, king of Italy from 1004 to 1024, and Roman emperor from 1014 to 1024). The son of Duke Henry the Quarrelsome of Bavaria and Gisela, daughter of King Conrad of Burgundy, Henry was born in 973 and educated at the cathedral school of Hildesheim in preparation for the church, as his father had rebelled against Otto II and had been temporarily deprived of his duchy. Henry married Kunigunde of Luxembourg in about 998. When Otto III died without heirs in 1002, Henry, the grandson of Otto the Great's younger brother Henry, became king. After defeating the rival claims of Margrave Ekkehard of Meissen and Hermann of Swabia, he was crowned at Mainz on June 7, 1002, with a ceremonial coronation at Aachen that September. His renunciation of Otto III's Renovatio imperii Romanorum (Renewal of the Roman Empire) in favor of Renovatio regni Francorum (Renewal of the Kingdom of the Franks, used on his seals from 1003) probably reflects the reality of his position more than a conscious break with his predecessor's imperial ambitions: Henry was not emperor in 1002 and was in no position to rule from Rome even had he so desired.

Henry II undertook three expeditions into Italy, first against Count Arduin of Ivrea in 1004, who had proclaimed himself king of Italy upon the death of Otto III. Although Henry was elected and acknowledged as king of Italy, Arduin had not submitted and had not yet been defeated. Indeed, Henry's rule in Italy was not fully established until his second expedition in 1013–1014, when Pope Benedict VIII asked him to put down the disturbances in Rome. Henry's reward was the imperial crown he received in Rome on February 14, 1014.

Henry campaigned in southern Italy in 1021–1022 to check the Byzantine influence there. His devout nature and earlier training played important roles in his ecclesiastical policy. He used the church to build up his own power base, appointing bishops and abbots loyal to him—the first bishop of Bamberg, a see which Henry founded and generously endowed, was his chancellor Eberhard. Childless, Henry named God his heir, perhaps demonstrating his sacerdotal characterization of the monarchy. Nevertheless, he was succeeded by Conrad II, the great-grandson of Otto the Great's daughter Liutgard.

Most of the contemporary biography by Bishop Adalbold of Utrecht is lost. Henry was canonized by Pope Eugenius III in 1146. His feast day is July 15.

Herakles

Greek hero, demigod

The demigod who was called Herakles by the Greeks and Hercules by the Romans was among the most popular of all ancient mythological characters. It could be that Herakles was a source of inspiration because, more than any other classical figure, in his myths and cult he challenged the limitations placed upon humanity. Unique among the heroes, he occupied a position simultaneously greater and lesser than any other human being.

This status can readily be seen in Herakles' traditional iconography, in which he wears the pelt of a lion. Like the American frontiersmen Daniel Boone and Davy Crockett, his wearing of animal skins marks him as a figure of the borderline, more at home in the wild, although he is a champion of civilization. As close in spirit to the animal world as Herakles might have been, his pedigree was strictly divine. His mother was the beautiful queen of Tiryns, Alcmene, whom Zeus seduced—over the course of three nights!—in the form of her husband, Amphitryon. In this doubtful paternity, one can easily see a pattern that would emerge later in the questions concerning Jesus' birth as the son of either Joseph or God.

As a newborn, Herakles strangled the two snakes that had been sent into his crib by the chief goddess, Hera, Zeus's jealous wife. This action is an early indication of the tremendous strength he would exhibit later in the labors. These twelve labors, which he had to complete as penance for committing murder in the service of the unworthy King Eurystheus, largely consist of mastering wild animals. But the last labor—the fetching of Cerberus, the three-headed dog of the underworld—takes this theme to a transcendent, metaphorical level. In subduing the beast of Hades, Herakles signals his conquest over death itself.

Indeed, after his self-immolation upon Mount Oeta, there is some doubt in the ancient tradition about the fate of Herakles' soul. During his own descent to the land of the dead, Odysseus notes, "I was aware of powerful Herakles, his image, but he himself among the immortal gods enjoys their festivals" (Homer, Odyssey 11.601–603, trans. Lattimore 1967). The triumphant entry of Herakles into Olympus, riding in a chariot led by the goddess Athena, is a scene frequently depicted on Greek vases, particularly those containing the ashes of the dead. In his struggles through life as well as his overcoming of death, Herakles represents an archetype whose abiding significance can hardly be overstated.

Hereditary Holiness

Some saints are born to holiness. In tribal societies, the role of healer is often hereditary, as is a position as prophet. For example, among the Maasai, the descendants of their first prophet, Kidongoi, form a special subclan with powers of prophecy and healing, serving as intermediaries with God. Their power goes back to a divine genealogy: Kidongoi himself was descended from the divinity Eng'ai. Several other cultures have had lineages of intermediaries who claim descent from a deity (such as the emperors of Japan, who are regarded as holy in their office, if not as individuals, and the pharaohs of Egypt).

Other religions have regarded the kindred of holy people as likely to be holy themselves, especially their direct male descendants. The religions in which this tendency has been weakest are those that emphasize chastity as a central religious characteristic, such as Christianity and Buddhism. Even in Buddhism, however, Rahula, the son of the Buddha, is regarded as one of the "ten great disciples"; he is said to have displayed his holiness at an early age and entered the sangha (monastic community) when only seven years old. The Buddha's cousin Ananda, regarded as the most perfect of monks, also has a special charisma as a relative of the founder. Tibetan Buddhism, atypical in many ways, includes hereditary lineages, most notably the Sa skya lineage of forty-one "throne holders" directly descended from the great teacher Kunga Nyingpo (1092–1158). This is quite similar to the Daoist celestial masters, all descended from Zhang Ling (second century), sometimes called "Daoist popes," who are still leaders of the Daoist School of Right Unity.

Even Jesus, for whom no reports of progeny survive, cast a special luster on his brother James, who took leadership in the early Christian community, apparently because of this kinship. And in a backwards progression, Jesus' spiritual prowess rubbed off onto his mother, the Virgin Mary, and even back to his grandmother St. Anne. The tendency to believe that holiness is a family affair is especially prominent in early medieval Christianity, when it was quite common to regard all members of a family as saints, such as the family of Gertrude of Nivelles (626–659) or, most notably, the Frankish Maubeuge family of the seventh century, which produced eleven saints in three generations. The tendency for several siblings to be acknowledged holy people also appears in Hinduism; for example, the two brothers and one sister of Jnaneshvara (1275–1296) were also famous holy people.

Descent from a founding prophet is not by itself enough to make a person holy, but such descendants seem to be regarded as having a predisposition toward holiness. Thus the descendants of the Muslim prophet Muhammad through Fatima and 'Ali b. Abi Talib (600–661) are regarded with special honor and given the title sayyid (lord)—and many of them have lived up to their heritage with lives of piety. This is particularly strong in Shi'a Islam, which holds that the imams, chosen by God from Muhammad's family, are spiritually perfect and infallible. Indeed, this belief—that there is indeed a "holy lineage" that has authority to interpret Muhammad's revelations, and that these individuals are closer to God than the rest of humanity—marks the essential early divide between Shi'ism and the Sunni majority in Islam. In Isma'ili Shi'ism, the line of imams continues for holders of the office bearing the title "Aga Khan." On a less politically charged level, other Muslim holy people, such as Sayyida

Nafisa (762–824), owed much of their popular esteem to the fact that they were descended from Muhammad; it was considered a blessing that they lived among the people. This belief in an inherited holiness is also true in cases of descent from lesser holy figures. Most important, the heads of sufi orders tend to inherit their positions, rather than winning them based on superior scholarship or personal holiness (though it is assumed that they will be pious, and usually it is the most pious son of the last shaykh who inherits the position).

Belief in the hereditary transmission of holiness has also been important in the history of the two great religions that grew from Islam, the Sikh and Baha'i faiths. The early Sikh gurus passed over their sons, naming as successors particularly devoted disciples. But from the time of the fourth guru, Ramdas (1534–1581), the sons of gurus succeeded their fathers in the religious and political governance of the Sikhs. Unfortunately for the coherence of the Sikh religion, these gurus followed Muslim practice in naming a particularly talented or favored son rather than practicing primogeniture. Thus, each time a guru died, a series of splinter movements arose as the succession was disputed, especially by sons who felt slighted when a nonrelative was designated.

The Baha'i faith, too, passed on religious authority by heredity. The guardianship of the faith was restricted to male descendants of the founding prophet, Baha'u'llah (1817–1892). Again, lack of primogeniture caused a schism when Baha'u'llah appointed his eldest son, 'Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921), as guardian of the faith, a decision rejected by the latter's half brother, along with most of his family. This emphasis on heredity could have caused a major crisis in 1957, when 'Abdu'l-Baha's grandson Shoghi Effendi died, leaving no children. Moreover, he had expelled his brothers and cousins as "covenant breakers." The crisis was weathered by Shoghi Effendi's widow, Rúhíyyih Khánum, who effected the transformation of Baha'i governance to the Universal House of Justice.

Hermetica

Greek revelatory texts

The Hermetica are dialogues or discourses of revelation allegedly transmitted by Hermes Trismegistus, a Greek designation of the Egyptian god Thoth. The eighteen texts that are collected in the Greek Corpus Hermeticum (CH), along with the Latin treatise Asclepius, comprise the majority of the Hermetica. Over the past century, however, other texts have been discovered that belong to the same tradition, such as the Armenian Hermetic Definitions and the Coptic Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth. Some other important hermetic quotes reach us mainly through the fifth-century C.E. Greek anthologist Stobeus.

Hermetic literature should not be regarded as a coherent exposition of a doctrinal system, but rather, as Jean-Pierre Mahé has said, means of spiritual awakening and illumination (Mahé 1978–1982). It includes practical, theoretical, philosophical, and magical materials that combine Egyptian and middle-Platonic as well as Judeo-Christian and Gnostic teachings. Speaking generally, the Hermetic texts assert that humans possess three faculties that allow us to rise to God—namely, knowledge (gnosis, which accompanies the spiritual awakening), word (logos), and the mind (nous).

In CH I, 6, it is God who embodies intellect (nous): "I am Nous, your god, who existed before the watery nature that appeared out of the darkness. As for the luminous Word who comes from Nous, it is the son of God" (Copenhaver 1992). God is called "Nous," or Mind, because he is the cause of mind. Mind illuminates by means of the knowledge it brings, and this knowledge is placed by God in the human soul. This soul, although of divine origin, is exposed to corruption through its association with the body. The logos, by joining with the mind, makes possible the vision of God, which is the way of immortality.

Hermits

Most of the world's religions have recognized as holy at least some people who have been hermits—who have fled to the "desert" (Gk.: eremos) to be alone, at least symbolically, with the divine. This category of holy people includes not only individuals or small groups living "in the wilderness" but also recluses—people who are voluntarily enclosed in a small

Caves for hermits and use as meditation retreats. Near Mucho, Nepal. (Art Directors) cell, of necessity close enough to others so that someone can provide them with food.

Reclusion is the great exception to what is otherwise a mostly masculine category of holiness. Although there are some accounts of female hermits (many of them disguised as men and only discovered after their deaths), it is a simple fact that few world societies have been safe places for women living alone, even when cultural standards allow that level of female independence. The great distinction that appears between religions is that some regard the eremitical state as a temporary time of spiritual training, leading in time to renewed engagement with the wider society, while others believe that the hermit has committed him- or herself to a permanent state. Two of the world religions reject eremitism as an ideal completely: Confucianism and Judaism. For Confucians, the test of being a holy person is the ability to combine knowledge, morality, and action for others in the world. Thus, although in the Yüan period many of the Confucian literati gave up on the life of public service, some becoming recluses or hermits, in general they were condemned as self-indulgent. Similarly, for Jews and some sects of Islam, detachment from the world seems to call into question the worth of God's creation.

For most religions that accept eremitism as a spiritual ideal, the goal has been to retreat from distraction in order to find the self and to forge links with the divine. Solitary ascetics appear in the earliest strata of Indian holy texts, such as the Rig Veda. Throughout history, Hindu ascetics have retreated to the stern beauty of the Himalayas, away from the bustle of towns. Daoists, too, have withdrawn to mountains, where accounts tell of them living on wild herbs, or sometimes just subsisting on breath. In the Daoist case, the goal has been for holy people to integrate themselves with the essence of life around them—Daoists probably have the most positive attitude to “flight from the world,” regarding it as intrinsically valuable. Many early Buddhists became “forest dwellers,” similarly avoiding life in cities or monasteries in favor of a life in which lack of human contact can be compensated with a rich meditational existence.

In both the Buddhist and Hindu cases, however, flight from the world is most normally regarded as a stage of spiritual life, rather than the end product. The holy person (normally a man) withdraws to life in a cave or on a mountain, deepening his enlightenment, training himself in deep meditation, and so on, and in time comes back to the world, or has the world beating a path to his doorstep. An extreme case is the Tibetan Buddhist Milarepa (1052–1123), who lived most of his life after finishing his training in a mountain cave, living on boiled nettles. He lived an extremely ascetic life following an admittedly evil youth. But this is not a case of Christian-style penitential retreat from the world: Milarepa first repented and purified himself, and only then did he retreat to his mountain. And gradually disciples came, eager to reap the benefits of their master's long withdrawal. Similarly, the ninth-century Chan master Ta-sui Fa-chen secluded himself on a mountain, living in a hollow tree trunk for ten years after his enlightenment, before coming down to teach others. This “time-out” for spiritual training also appears among the Muslim sufis, as in the case of Chiragh-i Dihli Nasiruddin (1276/1277–1356) who lived in the wilderness for a long time, subsisting on leaves and lemons, before returning to teach others. The same pattern can be seen in shamans around the world—spiritual training in the desert, then return to the community. The Hindu Prabha Jagadbandhu Sundar (1871–1921) is rather rare for retiring at the age of thirty-three to live as a recluse until his death seventeen years later.

Christianity is the most ambivalent of the world religions in its attitude toward eremitism. There is a tension between belief that secular society is tainted and leads even the virtuous to sin, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the missionary impulse given voice in Jesus' order to the apostles to “go forth to all peoples, spreading the gospel” (Matt. 28:19). Is it selfish to go off and be alone with God, or is it a necessary and desperate spiritual defense? Protestantism, with the exception of the Anglican communion, has indeed dismissed eremitism as self-indulgence. For medieval Christianity and modern Roman Catholicism, the uneasy compromise is that, from at least the third century on, many Christians have withdrawn from secular affairs, many remaining isolated until death, and many drawn back into the world’s business—but the only holy people to do so have been forced by superior authority, the cries of the needy, or divine command. Thus, although many hermits emerged as leaders of Christian communities, the hagiographical topos is that they resisted the call to the utmost of their ability. Even then, there is a general sense that those who stay in the eremitical state are holier than their brethren who have become bishops and so on. As Sulpicius Severus said of his hero, the great holy man Martin of Tours, he worked many more miracles as a hermit than as a bishop.

Many hermits of the Christian tradition chose to retreat to places of great natural beauty, suggesting that at some level their goals were not dissimilar from those of Daoist holy people. But the emphasis in Christianity has in general been more on eremitism as purification. Most accounts of both hermits and recluses emphasize their living in conditions of extreme asceticism, practicing asceticism to the point of shortening their lives. Although Benedict of Nursia (c. 480–c. 547) and later reformers, such as Romuald of Ravenna (c. 951–1027), regarded the hermit’s life as “upper-division” holiness compared to life in a monastery as the course for beginners, hagiography tends to differ, describing people going to the wilderness as the beginning rather than the end of a spiritual quest, in strong contrast to Buddhism and Hinduism. Like the Buddhist Milarepa, the Christian hermits of whom we hear eventually left the hermitage, or had the world come to them; the life of withdrawal is held to create a close tie to God, and therefore disciples through the centuries have come to learn from the “expert,” building monasteries around what used to be a hermitage. This was especially a danger for recluses, who, since they had vowed lifelong permanence in the cell of their enclosure, could not move further away when the crowds began to arrive. If, indeed, they wanted to. Many recluses and hermits seem to have accepted the role given them as spiritual advisers and teachers with good grace—but not with eagerness, which would have suggested that eremitism was merely a means rather than an end.

In general, then, the desert has played a role in most religions, but as a temporary state, a time to spiritually train oneself for service in the world. Perhaps the sentiment can best be summed up by the great Christian writer Gregory the Great (540–604), who had to come to grips with leaving the monastic life when he was drafted as pope in the year 590—there is no holiness without contemplation, but after reaching that goal, one cannot remain there—living eyes cannot bear the light and have to turn away. Pure, ongoing contemplation can only occur in heaven. Thus the ideal holy life balances periods of withdrawal with periods of engagement.

Hernández, José Gregorio

(1864–1919 C.E.)

Roman Catholic physician, caregiver

Doctor José Gregorio Hernández is regarded in Venezuela and Colombia as a particularly faithful and venerable servant of God because of his abilities in the medical field, his spiritual wisdom, his charisma, and his devotion and untiring activity for the sick and poor in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. He has been one of the most venerated figures in the region in recent years. Credited with hundreds of authenticated healings and other miracles, admirers cite his inexplicable powers as proof of his holiness.

Hernández was born on October 26, 1864, in the small town of Isnotú, Trujillo province, Venezuela. He entered the medical school at the Central University of Caracas at the age of seventeen. Due to his exceptional academic achievements, the Venezuelan president at the time, José Andueza Palacios, awarded him with a scholarship to continue his studies at the University of Paris, where he obtained his degree as a medical doctor.

Hernández returned to Caracas and practiced as a physician for a few years in a small town just north of the city. His deep devotion to God drove him to Italy in 1908, where he joined a monastery under the name of Brother Marcelo. Shortly after his arrival, he became ill and was ordered to return to his native Venezuela. He joined the Santa Rosa de Lima Convent in Caracas, but three years later he returned to Italy to study theology. A lung infection forced him to come back to Venezuela once again. Hernández was fully devoted to his labor as a doctor and was always ready to interrupt his theological and scientific studies to assist the poor and deprived.

Hernández was killed in an automobile accident in Caracas on June 29, 1919, on his way to assist a sick, elderly woman. Thousands of devotees attended his funeral. The headlines in local newspapers read: "Our Saint Has Died."

The Roman Catholic Church declared him a blessed servant of God on January 16, 1986. His devotion, mystifying powers, and servitude to God and the poor earned him the title of "The Venerable Doctor José Gregorio Hernández." He is regarded as holy in Venezuela and believers continue to experience miracle healings through his intercession. The Roman Catholic Church is considering his formal beatification.

Hero Cult, Greek

The worship of extraordinary human beings, most often male, usually long-ago dead, and sometimes imaginary, normally at each hero's actual or alleged tomb, was common in ancient Greece. Archaeological finds verify that the hero cult was an important element of Mycenaean religion from at least the fifteenth century B.C.E., and the phenomenon persisted into the fifth century C.E. Several hundred heroes are known to have been worshipped, most of them only by their descendants or the populace of their local region. Certain heroes, such as Herakles and Achilles, achieved much greater prominence than average. Such heroes especially were revered as having superhuman power and courage and for risking their lives in performing great deeds. They were typically regarded as semidivine, commonly through their parentage. Legends of these heroes tend to fit a general pattern valid of heroes across cultures.

The normal tendency of the hero cult to be located at the hero's tomb relates to the belief in the sacred power of bodily remains. Bones were sometimes transported: The Athenians brought the bones of Theseus home from Skyros; the Spartans those of Orestes from Tegea; the Thebans imported the bones of Hektor. The hero did not need to be a native of the locale of the cult; the mere presence of the remains sufficed. Sometimes old graves were discovered and attributed to heroes.

Worship rituals differed notably from those honoring the Olympian gods. The hero cult employed practices associated with the chthonic deities, focusing attention on the dead in the ground. Pits or hearths, rather than high altars, served as receptacles of sacrificial victims and libations. A festive meal was enjoyed in honor of the hero. The rituals were performed in the evening. This distinctive form of worship reflects the Homeric insistence on the separation of immortal from mortal. The heroes, although in ways superhuman and semidivine, remained mortals (with the few exceptions of those who were apotheosized). They needed to be worshipped, but not as one would worship an Olympian god.

The hero cult itself is barely hinted at in Homer. But the legends of the heroes set forth there and in the later literature offer an abundance of details regarding their origins, features, superhuman deeds, and human frailties. As stories of once localized heroes became more widespread through the literature, the desire of particular communities to commemorate their own and thus to reconnect with local traditions naturally increased. In a variety of ways, then, the literature and the cult practices were interconnected.

Commonly the hero was said to be the offspring of a god (usually Zeus) and a mortal princess or queen. Goddesses also gave birth to heroes. Aeneas, for example, was the son of Aphrodite and the Trojan Anchises. In the case of the heroines, very often they themselves were mothers of heroes, or daughters, wives, or sisters. Heroines and heroes alike did not need divine parentage in order to possess superhuman attributes. For instance, Odysseus's powers were enhanced through the favoritism of Athena. The semidivine nature of Achilles was bolstered by his goddess mother Thetis, who dipped him in the River Styx (or, according to another version, held him in fire). In some cases, the semidivine status of the hero led to apotheosis. Most famously, Herakles ascended from his funeral pyre to Olympus. The great majority of heroes did not become fully divine, although often their shades were believed to enjoy a good afterlife in the Elysian Fields or Isles of the Blessed.

The heroes possessed special features and powers that set them apart as extraordinary. Normally they are depicted as being taller, more handsome, and more physically powerful than their fellow men. Herakles and Achilles are notable examples. Other qualities also amounted to heroic stature: Odysseus's resourcefulness, Orpheus's ability as a musician, Asklepios's healing talent, and so on. A hero's special feature or power was commonly emphasized through an epithet; for example, Homer's "swift-footed Achilles" and "Odysseus, man of many wiles."

Heroes also typically showed a very human side. Oedipus, for example, the only man clever enough to solve the riddle of the Sphinx, thereby saving Thebes, was too dependent on his own clever ways to be truly wise. This dual nature of the hero was elaborated upon in the tragedies of the Athenian dramatists.

The heroes' life stories, while quite diverse in details, conform to a general pattern of events that tends to apply to heroes cross-culturally. Joseph Campbell (1968 [1949]) identified a “monomyth” of the hero. Lord Raglan (1956) derived a list of twenty-two events, most of which can be shown to apply to many prominent heroes. For example, as noted here, usually the hero has a divine parent (or at least a divine ancestor). The hero often undergoes an abnormal birth and encounters danger as an infant. According to some accounts, Thetis gave birth to Achilles underwater. Oedipus was exposed as an infant. In youth, the hero typically is separated from his original home and raised by another—the centaur Cheiron in the case of Asklepios, Jason, and Achilles. At some point most heroes either descend literally to the underworld (for example, Orpheus, Herakles, and Odysseus) or else have some intimate encounter with chthonic powers (such as Perseus, who meets the Graeae and then the Gorgons). The hero frequently defeats a monster, often a dragon or serpent. Other tests and trials are also undergone, after which the hero usually becomes king.

Eventually, though, the hero is usually driven from the throne and dies a mysterious or unnatural death. Oedipus dies mysteriously in exile after his glorious defeat of the Sphinx and brief reign over Thebes. Herakles is tragically poisoned once he has accomplished his twelve labors and married the princess Deianeira. Nevertheless, the hero’s deeds and courage continue to inspire worshippers for generations.

Heroes

Are heroes holy? Certainly not in the sense of modern American culture, which tends to label any admired figure a “hero.” But in terms of world mythology, heroes occupy an interesting middle ground between gods and mere mortals. As Joseph Campbell (1972) has analyzed the mythology of heroism, heroes share several important characteristics: They usually have a divine parent, their birth was in some way unusual or abnormal, they were separated from their original home, they must face trials that often include defeating a monster, and they usually end up becoming king. Of particular interest is that, whether they actually had historic existences or not, the people for whom stories of heroes were important believed that heroes were indeed living human beings who in important ways played a liminal role between the mortal realm and the divine. They may have had superhuman power and courage, but especially the heroes of Greek mythology are intensely human, pushing the edge of human limitations but ultimately unable to transcend their assigned fate.

The Greek hero cult became important in the eighth century B.C.E. with the development of the Greek polis. Unlike earlier Mesopotamian heroes, for example Gilgamesh, the heroes of Greece were especially important when dead rather than during their lives. They were the “powerful dead” who could most notably act to protect their native city. Thus they were usually regarded as demigods, with at least a mediatory role in effecting change on earth, if not the power to act independently. People were not regarded as heroes during their lives at all, and most frequently heroes were figures of a distant “heroic age.” Other people whose influence withstood the test of time could also be venerated as heroes, including great writers, philosophers, and especially kings. The Macedonians celebrated hero cults of their dead rulers, a practice expanded in the Hellenistic period to downright deification of figures such as Alexander the Great and his successors.

In other cultures, heroes who might legitimately be regarded as holy people follow much the same pattern: They may have had a human existence (which is uncertain), they are venerated after death, and they have an important liminal position between divine and human spheres. Some gods may have their core in great historic human beings, such as the various avatars of Vishnu in Hindu belief; certainly Krishna and Rama appear in early epics as human heroes. Similarly, many of the orisha, gods of the Yoruba cosmogony of West Africa, appear in an earlier phase of legend to have been regarded as heroes stemming from legends of historic people.

In the Americas and African religions, heroes are even more liminal, bridging the gap not just between divine and human but between human and the rest of the animal world. For example, the Maasai legendary hero Kidongoi, a descendant of the god Eng’ai, was discovered on a mountain as a child. He had special gifts, including prophecy and miracles, and in some legends appears as part wild animal.

In the broader dictionary sense of a hero, as one who shows great courage and wins high admiration in return, all holy people have been heroes. Courage is a particularly noteworthy quality of holy people: They take a moral stand and do not back down from it, even at the risk of disgrace or death.

Heroines, Greek

The ancient Greeks honored extraordinary women, usually of the distant past, who functioned as exemplary figures and were sometimes worshipped because of their elevated status. As a general category, the heroine is found in many cultures (Sita or Draupadi in India, for example). Greek heroines exhibited particular characteristics. In most ways analogous to heroes, heroines surpassed ordinary women in beauty, cleverness, or courage. They were commonly descendants of or otherwise closely associated with divinities. Both nonhistorical and historical, heroines are observed in myth and legend and in evidence of cultic practice. They offered various paradigms: Penelope, the exemplary wife; Iphigeneia, sacrificial victim; Danae, who survived perils in giving birth to the hero Perseus; and so forth. In some cases, the heroine underwent apotheosis; Semele, for example, was rescued from death by her son Dionysos. Divine or not, heroines were widely worshipped, usually at their tombs (real or alleged).

The stories of Greek heroines are told in vase paintings and other artwork, and in most every genre of literature. Homer and Hesiod both catalog heroines in their epic compositions. The Odyssey, Book 11, for example, includes Odysseus's descriptions of famous women as he witnesses their shades in the underworld. The Athenian dramatists' contributions to elaborating upon the stories of heroines can be glimpsed merely by considering the titles of their productions: Elektra, Antigone, Medea, Iphigeneia, Helen, and so on.

Many heroines are mothers of heroes. Alkmene, for example, was the mother of Herakles. Typically their stories are highlighted by the conception and then the birth of the hero, both of which tend to be extraordinary and often dangerous events. Most of the other heroines are virgins who are for some reason denied marriage and normal adult life. Antigone is such, dying young in the wake of her courageous deed. Not all heroines fit so neatly into these categories, however. Ino, daughter of Kadmos and Harmonia, is exceptional in that her life story correlates so closely to that normally reserved for the hero; in fact, there is a notable correspondence between her story and that of Herakles, the paradigmatic hero.

Heroization of Private Individuals

Ancient Greece

Ancient Greek heroes, a class of beings between humans and gods, received their heroic status after death when the indication of their powerful presence required honor. Sometimes the hero's achievements in life suggested divine favor; he may even have experienced direct contact with the divine. Sometimes, however, it came as a surprise to the human community that an individual had a right to heroic honor, and the community then was forced to hasten to establish a cult in response to divine insistence.

Kings and lawgivers are among those whose communion with the divine could afford a heroic status after death. The hero Lycurgus, for example, the traditional founder of Sparta's system of government, was said to have received the laws he gave to Sparta directly from Zeus. Poets, too, could become heroes. Hesiod and Archilochus, both said to have been visited by the Muses, received hero cults, and the tragedian Sophocles was honored as a hero, not because of his poetry, but because he received the god Asklepios in his house. The founders of Greek colonies were regularly honored with hero cults because their position was due to divine choice, as determined by the god at Delphi.

An individual's status or achievement in life was no guarantee of heroic honor, however. The workings of the divine are unpredictable; human standards are irrelevant. There are instances in which valorous death in battle resulted in heroization, but they are rare. In myth, Oedipus became a hero not because of his outstanding leadership, wisdom, or virtue of any kind, but because of his extreme suffering as an outcast from human society; the most cursed became the most blessed. An athlete, punished for killing his opponent in the games, went mad and damaged a schoolhouse, killing sixty boys; when the townspeople stoned him, he escaped, miraculously, and the Delphic oracle proclaimed him a hero. Other dishonored athletes received heroic honors only after their cities suffered a plague or blight and, seeking help from Delphi, were instructed to establish the cult. Heroines, too, received honor in death, in their case after being abused or wrongfully killed. We may think of the need to appease angry spirits, but there was emphasis also on the distance between human and divine judgment.

In the Hellenistic period and later, hero cults proliferated. Some were private cults for family members; sometimes the title “hero” seems to have lost its force to become simply a respectful title for the dead. There were also heroic honors for rulers, even while living, whose power to act as “saviors” was celebrated as divine. The long tradition of hero cult added to the luster of such titles; likening a city’s benefactors to the great heroes of the past was the highest possible honor.

Hilary of Poitiers

(c. 315–c. 367 C.E.)

Christian bishop, theologian, doctor of the church

Hilary, born in about 315, belonged to a distinguished non-Christian Gallo-Roman family and was raised with a firm grounding in the classics and philosophy. He was converted to Christianity through reading in the Bible the many sublime descriptions of God, which contrasted strongly with Greco-Roman mythology and materialism. Hilary was married and had a daughter named Abra. Elected bishop of Poitiers in about 353, he was the strongest opponent of Arianism (which questioned the divinity of the son in the Trinity) in the West during the fourth century and was banished to Phrygia by the Arian emperor Constantius II. During his banishment, he studied Greek theology, wrote extensively, and corresponded with other Western bishops. He was released from exile in 361, after which he allowed Martin of Tours, the soldier-converter, to inaugurate the monastic movement in Gaul. Hilary spent the remainder of his life fighting the doctrine of Arianism and has been called the “Athanasius of the West.” Pius IX declared Hilary a “doctor of the Universal Church” in 1851. His feast day is celebrated on January 14.

Hilary was the first Latin writer to incorporate and acquaint Western Christianity with the writings of the Greek fathers. Both Augustine and Thomas Aquinas cited the importance of Hilary’s writings on the Trinity in their thought and development. Hilary’s writings can be arranged into four categories: scriptural exegesis, hymns, theology, and polemical works. His De Trinitate (On the Trinity) is the first extensive study of the Trinity in Latin.

Jerome indicates that Hilary introduced the singing of hymns into the West after seeing how effective they were in combating Arianism in the East. Only three incomplete hymns ascribed to him survive, and Ambrose would eventually continue Hilary’s influence and bring hymn writing to its full potential in the Western church. Hilary’s primary purpose in his writings was to prove that the son was consubstantial (equal and divine) with the father. He clearly taught that Jesus was only one divine person and that he had both a divine and a human nature (Arianism denied that Jesus was divine). Hilary also clearly conveyed the message of the unity and equality of each person within the Trinity. His writings had a major influence on the early development of Catholic theology during the Middle Ages.

Hilda of Whitby

(614–680 C.E.)

Christian abbess

Hilda, or Hild, was a sainted abbess who played a pivotal role during the period of conversion to Christianity and the organization of the church in Anglo-Saxon England during the seventh century. What we know of Hild can be found in the pages of Bede's eighth-century Ecclesiastical History of the English People. She was born of noble parentage, an important factor in Anglo-Saxon female sanctity. The claim that she lived thirty-three years in the world and another thirty-three years in a monastery enhances her holiness by symbolically linking her life with the life of Christ. Bede never calls her a virgin, a telling omission, as Bede prized virginity highly as a significant factor of female sanctity, but three other elements common to the lives of most Christian saints are found in Bede's Life of Hild: While pregnant with her, her mother had a vision of her greatness; Hild piously and cheerfully endured a long illness and greeted death with joy; and her nuns had visions of her soul ascending to heaven. Wisdom, knowledge, and good counsel, vital characteristics in the construction of an Anglo-Saxon female saint, were Hild's strongest virtues.

Of the three monastic institutions with which Hild was associated, the most famous was Whitby, or Streonaeshalch. As Whitby's abbess, she established a rule that emphasized egalitarianism, good works, devotion, chastity, justice, and knowledge of the scriptures. She taught the monks and nuns in her care so diligently that five Whitby monks became influential bishops. Hild's reputation for wisdom was outstanding, and even kings and princes came to her for advice. It was probably because of this reputation that Whitby was chosen as the site for the famous synod that was to decide between the variant Christian traditions, Roman and Irish, practiced in England at the time. Although Hild did not possess stereotypical saintly attributes, she perfectly embodied the most important Anglo-Saxon female virtues to such an extent that she was considered holy, and she was so well loved that all who knew her called her "mother."

Hildegard of Bingen

(1098–1179 C.E.)

Christian abbess, scholar, mystic

In an age when few women enjoyed an education or a voice in either secular or ecclesiastical affairs, Hildegard of Bin-gen, founder and abbess of two convents near Bingen, Germany, was recognized in her lifetime as a gifted and publicly active individual who exercised considerable influence over kings and popes. Hildegard authored such works as Scivias (May you know, or Know the way) and the first morality play, Ordo Virtutum (The composition of virtue). Acknowledged as a mystic and reputed as a visionary, Hildegard's other talents included those of poet, illuminator, scientist, healer, philosopher, composer, respected and prolific letter writer, and inventor of her own secret language, her lingua ignota, as well.

The tenth and last child born to a lesser noble family in 1098, at the age of seven or eight Hildegard's parents presented her to the Benedictine monastery at Disibodenberg, dedicating her to a religious life. There is some dispute among scholars as to whether she immediately joined the recluse Jutta of Sponheim in an anchorite's cell attached to the monastery. However, she did spend some years of isolation with Jutta as her mentor. Some sources suggest that another young woman lived with them in the cell.

Jutta and the monk Volmar, who later became Hildegard's first secretary and lifelong friend, acted as her teachers, but to what extent she was educated is debated. She says of herself that she had little education, but it is likely that she refers to a formal classical education. There is no doubt that she had some education and that she could write in Latin. By the time Jutta died (c. 1137) and Hildegard was called upon to become abbess of the growing community, she was prepared for the administrative responsibilities of what had by then become a small convent joined with the Benedictine monks, forming a rare double monastery.

In addition to her administrative duties, within a few years of becoming abbess Hildegard felt compelled to write about her visions, which she says she first experienced as a very young child. She writes in the preface of Scivias that in 1141 she received a vision of new understanding along with a command to tell and write about what was revealed to her. At first reluctant to do so, she became ill, an experience common to mystics and visionaries. But with the help of the monk Volmar and permission from the abbot of Disibodenberg, she began to write, and in doing so, she recovered her health.

It took Hildegard ten years to complete Scivias, but during this time she gained acceptance and validation. Eventually, her work came to the attention of Pope Eugenius III, who publicly recognized her work as valid at the synod of Trier in 1147–1148. With his approval, encouragement, and authority, Hildegard finished Scivias. During this time, obeying another command from God, she moved her nuns to Rupertsberg (c. 1151), founding a new convent there. Within the first decade at Rupertsberg, Hildegard composed hymns and the music to accompany them, the scientific work Physica (Natural history), Causae et curae (Causes and cures) on medicine, and Liber vitae meritorum (Book of life's merits), her second major work.

These accomplishments brought Hildegard much attention, and besides her writing, she traveled to tell about her visions and prophecies. The opportunity for a woman to preach in public was rare, but Hildegard is credited with having done so. She is known as well for her correspondence, and some 300 letters purported to have been written by Hildegard survive. Among the powerful and influential with whom she exchanged letters were King Conrad (r. 1138–1152) and Frederick Barbarossa (r. 1152–1190) of Germany and Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine, king and queen of England. Laity and religious alike wrote asking for her prayers and advice.

Hildegard founded a second convent at Eibigen in 1165 and finished her third and final book of visions, Liber divinorum operum (Book of divine works) in 1174. Most of the last year of her life was spent at odds with the clergy at Mainz, who ordered the body of a man they considered an excommunicate removed from the cemetery at Rupertsberg. Hildegard refused the order. She died in 1179, shortly after the clergy withdrew their demand.

Despite the claims of miracles credited to Hildegard by her earliest biographers, both during her life and after her death, there is no record of a formal canonization. Nevertheless, by the fourteenth century her name and feast day appeared in various martyrologies. She was also included in the Roman Martyrology of the sixteenth century. She is honored as a saint, and her feast day is celebrated on September 17.

Hillel

(1st cent. B.C.E.)

Jewish sage

Hillel was a leading Jewish hakham (sage) who flourished about a century before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70

C.E. Later generations of rabbis remembered him as the very model of what a wise man ought to be. Little is known of Hillel's life; it is reported that he suddenly appeared among the sages as an unknown adult from Babylonia (see Babylonian Talmud [BT], Pesahim 66a, Sukkah 20a).

Many stories about Hillel depict the ideal sage's behavior in various situations. A famous example concerns a potential convert who approached Hillel's great rival Shammai and asked to learn the whole Torah while he stood on one foot. Shammai simply chased the man away, but Hillel seized the opportunity to teach the Golden Rule: "Do nothing to your fellow that you would not wish done to you: that is the whole Torah. The rest is commentary: go and study" (BT, Shabbat 31a).

Two different versions survive of Hillel's first encounter with his teachers. In one version (BT, Yoma 35b), he appears as a poor young student whose dedication to the Torah was so great that he listened to lectures through a skylight when he could not afford the admission fee. One night it snowed, and he was found in the morning still huddled on the roof, where he would have frozen to death if those below had not seen his still form darkening the skylight.

In the other version (see Jerusalem Talmud, Pesahim 6:1 33a), Hillel was already a learned man who resolved an issue that the established masters of the law had been unable to settle. This story uses Hillel to illustrate a critical stage in the developing rabbinic tradition: One year, the Passover sacrifice had to be carried out on the Sabbath, and the authorities could not remember whether the festival or the Sabbath took precedence (that is, whether the sacrifice should be offered at all). They consulted Hillel, of whom it seems they had previously only heard reports, and he proved to them that the festival offerings could be brought. The others kept rejecting his proofs, however, until he assured them that he had also learned the correct rule from his teachers Shemaya and Avtalyon. On hearing this appeal to tradition, they appointed Hillel their leader. In fact, he did this so brilliantly that they "immediately seated him at their head. . . ." (In the BT version, there is no resistance to Hillel's proofs and no need to appeal to authoritative tradition; his brilliance is enough to gain his colleagues' respect.)

Certain key legal enactments are attributed to Hillel. Of these, the best known is the so-called prosbul, a device that allowed creditors to avoid the cancellation of all debts in the sabbatical year (Mishnah Shevi'it 10:3).

Hillel is quoted more frequently in the third-century sayings collection Pirke Avot (Ethics of the fathers) than any other rabbinic master. After his death, his disciples, known collectively as Bet Hillel (House of Hillel), increasingly dominated the emerging rabbinic movement. Their legal opinions strongly influenced the Mishnah and later works, and their teachings effectively shaped the rabbinic tradition for all time.

Hilli, ‘Allamah al-

Shi’i Muslim scholar

Abu Mansur Hasan ibn Yusuf, known as ‘Allamah (Very learned one) al-Hilli and Ibn al-Mutahhar, was a prominent Shi’i religious scholar. He was born in 1250 in Hillah in southern Iraq, which was for about 300 years the main center of Shi’i scholarship. He studied under Khwaja Nasir al-Din at-Tusi and under his uncle Muhaqqiq al-Hilli, the leading Shi’i scholar after Tusi’s death in 1274. ‘Allamah also studied under some Sunni scholars.

One of his main contributions was to bring to Shi’i Islam some of the techniques used by Sunnis to evaluate the authenticity of traditions (hadith) by examining the chain of the transmission of the tradition. ‘Allamah is also credited with having established ijtihad (the use of reason in addition to the Qur’an and the traditions to derive rulings on holy law) as the central methodology of Shi’i jurisprudence. He wrote numerous books on these themes, and his work Tahdhib al-Wusul (The rectification of attainment) on the principles of jurisprudence was a much-used text for many years.

During ‘Allamah’s lifetime, the Mongol rulers of Iraq converted to Islam and were favorable to Shi’ism. ‘Allamah and another Shi’i scholar were responsible for converting one of them, Khudabanda (1304–1316), to Shi’ism, and for a time ‘Allamah moved to Baghdad to consolidate the Shi’i position. However, Khudabanda’s successor was a Sunni. ‘Allamah died in Hillah in 1325 and is buried in Najaf.

Hinduism and Holy People

In Hinduism, there are both a relatively large number and a wide array of types of people considered holy. Such people are deemed to be spiritually advanced, having reached the highest levels of spiritual realization, and to have the power to guide others toward that realization. They are thus treated with respect and reverence. A person can be transformed merely by being in their presence through the experience of darshan (both seeing and being seen by a holy person), even as a person can be transformed by being in the presence of deity. Such holy people may be seen to have accrued spiritual power through the practice of meditation, moral purity, devotion, and/or asceticism. They may even be considered incarnations of the Transcendent, conceived in personal terms, or of some earlier holy person who has again taken birth. There is no central authority in Hinduism that would validate the status of such holy people; rather, they are deemed holy by the consensus of communities and individuals who encounter them and experience them as such.

The Diversity of Hinduism

The diversity in types of holy people reflects the diversity of forms of religiosity that fall under the umbrella of Hinduism. The term “Hindu” originally referred simply to the people on the other side of the Indus River, and hence to all those who lived in the geographic region of the Indian subcontinent, and only secondarily to their religious practices. The Hindu religion as it has grown up does not have a single founding figure, as many other religious traditions do, nor does it have a text at its center, as might be said of Judaism and Islam, for example. Even the image of a single tree with multiple branches cannot encompass this diversity, and instead Hinduism has been likened to a banyan tree with multiple trunks, each distinct but part of the larger whole (Lipner 2000). The paths to religious realization are multiple and differ considerably in Hinduism, and correspondingly so do the types of holy people who guide others on those paths. These holy people range from teachers of meditation to renouncers to great lovers of God and ecstatic saints, tantric practitioners, and moral exemplars.

Holiness in Hinduism can be said to be principally grounded in a Hindu understanding of reality, which takes full form in the Upanishads. According to this Hindu worldview, a oneness, or unity, underlies all manifest existence, and it is this Oneness, called Brahman, which is ultimately real. Yet all that we see and experience in this world—and many other worlds as well—is a manifestation of this One. These manifestations may be viewed as maya, or illusion, particularly when we assume that they, and not Brahman, are ultimately real, but they can also be viewed as myriad aspects of the One, which in its abundance takes form. The manifest world is then understood as the lila, or play of the One, both as drama and as an expression of playfulness. This One can be experienced through particular manifestations, and the gods and goddesses of Hinduism are understood to be such particular manifestations.

Hindu swami in Jaipur, Rajasthan, India. (Corel Corp)

This Oneness is sometimes characterized as being fundamentally constituted of sat-chit-ananda (being, consciousness, and bliss), and whether it is finally personal (that is, relational and akin to monotheistic conceptions of God in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam), or is finally impersonal, is debated within Hinduism. Ramanuja (1017–1137) and followers of bhakti (devotional Hinduism) argue the former, and Shankara (seventh and eighth centuries) and nondualist followers of Advaita Vedanta argue the latter. In the former view, human beings, though manifest, have a separate existence, making relationship with and love of the one God possible, while in the latter, the distinction between the human and the One is only finally appearance, with unity and dissolution in the One the goal. In either case, all persons share in this fundamental Oneness, and a relationship of loving devotion with, a transparency to, and/or an ability to lead others to realization of the real is the wellspring of holiness.

Holiness as Part of Human Life

The notion of the holy person is built into the Hindu understanding of the stages of human life. There are four life stages for a man (traditionally excluding men of the fourth and lowest caste level, the shudras), including a final stage of renunciation in which one may choose to become a holy man, or sadhu. In the first of the four stages, a boy becomes a student, traditionally going to study with a guru, or teacher, and living a life of celibacy dedicated to education in both his social responsibilities and duties (his dharma) and spiritual liberation. The next stage of life is that of the householder. Initiated by marriage, this period in a man's life is the appropriate time for love and family, the pursuit of wealth, and service to the community. This stage is to be followed by the forest-dweller stage, during which a man gradually withdraws from involvement in the world to focus on spiritual concerns.

The fourth and final stage, not taken by many but held up as a social ideal, entails complete renunciation of one's previous life to become a sannyasi (renouncer) or sadhu. In doing so, a man ritually carries out his own funeral and dies to all that he was in the past to pursue a life of nonattachment devoted entirely to spiritual pursuit, and sometimes also to selfless service. In this way, holiness is a potentiality in all men (and arguably all people), though many may not choose to enter this final stage. Sannyasis or sadhus are highly respected members of society and supported by those in other stages of life, their holiness elevating the community at large. Men and (to a lesser extent) women may also become renouncers—sadhus or sadhvi, respectively—before reaching this last life stage, taking the much more radical step of renouncing the householder life for a life of religious dedication, generally as a member of a community of other renouncers under the guidance of a guru. These people, too, are considered holy and highly respected, though there is also sometimes an attendant social critique, particularly of young women who choose to take this step.

Holy People in the Development of Hinduism

In the development of Hinduism, holy people have played a key role in the earliest layers of the tradition. The first and most venerated of the texts of Hinduism, the Vedas, it is said, were revealed by holy men or seers, called rishis, some 3,500 years ago. These men were said to have been so spiritually advanced that they were able to know, to hear, the sacred sound of these texts revealing the nature and structure of reality. Indeed, this early literature is referred to as shruti, “that which is heard,” while later religious texts outside the extended Vedic corpus, such as the epics of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, are said to be only smriti, or “remembered.” The hymns of the Rig Veda also include references to other types of holy persons—long-haired ascetics and hermits. Those who carried out the ritual sacrifices of Brahmanic Hinduism, referred to in these early texts and still carried out today, were also considered in some sense more holy than others. This hereditary class of priests, or brahmins, maintained the practices designed to preserve physical purity.

In the texts of the Upanishads (the final texts within the Vedic corpus, which date from the middle of the first millennium B.C.E.), a new type of holy person appears. Here renowned and respected teachers, such as Yajñavalkya (eighth century B.C.E.), expound on the nature of reality and on the nature of the atman, or the self, which in its true form is one with the souls of all and with the One Reality, Brahman. These Upanishadic teachers, too, are considered holy people, having reached true realization through meditative practice and renunciation and being able to teach others to do the same. Within the Upanishads, wise women, such as Gargi, are also mentioned, and it is clear that realization and the attendant holiness were not the province of one gender alone, particularly in light of rebirth across multiple lifetimes.

The time in which these Upanishadic teachers were active is also that of the Buddha (c. fifth century B.C.E.) and of Mahavira (trad. 599–527 B.C.E.), the last of the twenty-four tirthankaras (ford-makers) of the Jain tradition. This period is marked by a preponderance of ascetics (shramanas), studying with a wide array of teachers. What these teachers taught came not simply from intellectual understanding but rather from their own transformative realization during meditative practices, and within the Upanishads the need for the guidance of a guru is stressed—the guidance of a holy person who has already reached this state of realization is essential to achieving liberation from ignorance and the endless cycle of rebirth. The meditative practices that might lead to such realization must also be coupled with practices designed to cultivate moral and physical purity, and Patanjali (third century C.E.) detailed the elements for such a yoga, or path to realization and holiness, in his Yogasutras.

The epics of the Mahabharata and the Ramayana as well as the Upanishads refer frequently to sages inhabiting the forests, carrying out rituals, and working to achieve liberation. Such sages and others who dedicate their lives to the pursuit of spiritual liberation are said to acquire tapas, or heat, through their meditative and ascetic practices. This tapas may manifest itself as magical powers, or siddhas. The person may have psychic knowledge of others' thoughts and feelings or foreknowledge of events, or he may be able to affect the physical world or have power over the minds of others. Nath holy men (belonging to a sect arising around the twelfth century and associated with the god Shiva, who is himself identified with asceticism and yogic practice) are particularly known for having such magical powers and are said even to be able to achieve physical immortality through a combination of hatha yoga and tantric and alchemical practices.

But it is not only the Naths who are said to have such powers arising out of their advanced spiritual state. Prescience is often attributed to ecstatic saintly devotees and gurus, as is the ability to transform physical substances. For example, a number of saintly people are reported to have picked up a handful of dirt in their ecstasy and offered it before a deity. When it was then distributed to worshippers as prasada, imbued with the presence and grace of the divine, what they tasted was the sweet confection normally offered. Others are said to appear in distant places while in meditation elsewhere and to spontaneously give off a perfume of sandalwood when emerging from meditative trance, or samadhi. The power to heal is also sometimes associated with holy persons. Such powers suggest a continuity between the physical and the spiritual and an understanding of holiness as a force that can profoundly affect the physical world.

The Bhagavad Gita (composed in the centuries surrounding the turn of the Common Era) is set in the midst of the epic Mahabharata and records a conversation between the warrior Arjuna and his charioteer, who happens to be Krishna (incarnation of Vishnu). Here Krishna lays out three major paths toward religious realization marking Hindu traditions. The path of knowledge, or jnana yoga, detailed in the Upanishads, is clearly one—a path of meditation and ensuing realization—yet there are also two others: the path of action, or karma yoga, and the path of devotion, or bhakti yoga. Those exemplary of the path of knowledge include the Upanishadic teachers and Shankara but also gurus such as Vivekananda and Sri Aurobindo in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Holy people of the path of action might include Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) and Vinobe Bhave (1895–1982), who lived lives of complete dedication to nonviolence and to actualizing truth, justice, and compassion in the world. Gandhi's movement of nonviolent resistance against British rule is well known. Vinobe Bhave worked to redistribute land to the landless by walking across India and inviting landowners to offer up a portion of their land. Both men acted out of explicitly religious motivations and lived very disciplined lives of self-sacrifice. They and others like them, who are able to work for a more just and compassionate society and to do so simply because it is the right thing to do, without personal egoistic attachment to the success or failure of their enterprise, embody a selflessness and power that also arises out of spiritual discipleship, and this spiritual depth is also recognized and revered within Hinduism.

The Bhagavad Gita also speaks of the path of devotion to the One, conceived of in very personal terms as God, such that one offers up all of one's actions in loving devotion, acting for God rather than self. Beginning in the sixth century of the Common Era, a broader devotional form of Hinduism emerged, first in South India and then sweeping up across the subcontinent. This devotional path is characterized by a personal and loving relationship to the One Lord, experienced in particular forms (“with form,” or saguna) such as Vishnu or Shiva, and later as Vishnu’s incarnations, Krishna and Rama, as Devi or Goddess, or as the Lord who is beyond form (“without form,” nirguna). Religious authority within the emerging devotional religious movements was based on religious experience rather than heredity, and consequently women and men of all levels of caste were recognized as leaders.

Within these communities, particular individuals emerged who composed songs of overwhelming devotion and who could lead others into an ever-deepening relationship with the Lord. They were sometimes called simply bhaktas, or “devotees”—a term also used more widely for all who followed the path of bhakti, or devotion—and sometimes called sants (those who know the truth)—a term used more often for devotees of the nirgun Lord but also more widely for all those who belong to the community of truth, or satsang, of which all devotees are members. Like the saints of Christian tradition, elaborate hagiographic texts developed recording their inspirational life stories, and the term “saint” has been used to describe them, though miracles are not necessarily associated with them, nor are they awarded sainthood by an external authority as is the case in Christianity. Such saints often appear very human in their life struggles and their longing for God, and later devotees come to love and identify with them. Institutionalized religious groups sometimes arise around these figures. The founder of the Sikh tradition, Nanak (1469–1539), was among the fifteenth-century saints devoted to the nirgun Lord in North India. These saints use the language of human love—of parents for children, children for parents, friends, and lovers—to speak of the intimate relationship between human and divine, and particular styles of devotion are associated with each saint. Later devotees have continued to compose songs in their names and have sometimes experienced saints of the past as present, such that these saints continue to serve as gurus.

These figures are considered holy because of their supreme devotion to God and their ability to lead others into similar devotion, and some among their number have even been considered incarnations of the divine. The fifteenth-century saints Chaitanya, whose followers formed the Gaudiya sampraday, or tradition, and Vallabhacharya, whose followers formed the Pushtimarg (the two major strands of Krishna devotion), were both considered incarnations of Krishna. Others, too, have received similar appellations. Today the internationally renowned guru Anandamayi Ma is considered an incarnation of the Goddess by her followers. Holiness can also then reflect divine incarnation or a transparency to the divine so that those who encounter such individuals experience the divine directly.

One final category of holy people within Hinduism are transgressive in their behavior, exhibiting a kind of “madness” that also speaks of holiness and divinity. The Bauls of Bengal are an ideal example of this type of holy person, reflecting the indwelling divine by acting outside of the boundaries of social and religious normative behavior. Individual saints such as Ramakrishna Paramahansa and Yogeshvari Devi were known for being overtaken by madness in the overwhelming experience of the divine. Tantric adepts may also fall within this range of transgressive holiness, transcending notions of purity and impurity in striving to overcome duality through the ritual partaking of impure substances and engaging in ritualized sexual intercourse, transmuting desire into spiritual bliss and power. Tantric practices are a part of the devotional path of the Bauls and the Sahajiya Vaishnava devotees of Krishna, and were undertaken by Naths and Buddhists as well as devotees of the Goddess. Seemingly mad ecstatic saints and tantric adepts, too, are recognized holy persons within the Hindu fold, offering a vision of the holiness of all reality and the wild playfulness of the divine.

Holy people in Hinduism thus take myriad forms, with all people potentially holy, though not all achieving this status. Indeed, holiness is as boundless as the One that underlies all that is, and as diverse as the paths to realization of that One.

Hippolytus of Rome

(d. c. 236 C.E.)

Christian priest, martyr, theologian

According to the inscription that Pope Damasus placed over his tomb on the Via Tiburtina in the fourth century, Hippolytus, a Christian presbyter martyred in about 236, had embraced the Novatian heresy, whose adherents found the Orthodox Christian stance on matters such as baptism and repentance too lenient, but had returned to Orthodox Christianity before his martyrdom. Prudentius (Peristephanon 11, c. 400) reiterated this point and included a description—taken from a narrative painting in the tomb—of Hippolytus's dismemberment by a pair of horses, a death intended to evoke that of his mythological namesake. This element, however, is legendary, not historical. It is more probable, as other ancient testimony indicates, that Hippolytus, along with the Roman bishop Pontianus, was exiled to the island of Sardinia by the emperor Maximianus Thrax in 235, where both men died soon thereafter. The remains of Hippolytus and Pontianus were returned to Rome, and they were venerated as martyrs thereafter. Although it is clear that Hippolytus had abandoned the Novatian schism before his death, it is unclear whether he did so before or during his exile.

Hippolytus was a highly prolific theological writer, though much of his output has survived only in fragmentary form. A statue discovered in 1551 near the site of Hippolytus's tomb on the Via Tiburtina, now at the entrance to the Vatican Library, has carved upon it a list of Hippolytus's works. He was the last major Western theologian to write in Greek, though most of his writings have survived only as translations into other languages. He wrote several biblical commentaries and apologetic works. His major extant work is Philosophumena (commonly translated as "Refutation of all heresies"). His feast day is August 13.

Hiravijayasuri

Jain monk, spiritual leader

Hiravijayasuri was born in 1527 in the city of Palanpur in Gujarat, India. He studied with the religious leader of a Shvetambara (white-clad) Jain sect, Vijayadasuri, and succeeded him as the spiritual leader of the Tapa gaccha monastic lineage. Hearing of his scholarship and wisdom, Akbar (r. 1556–1605) invited him to the Mughal court, where he spent two years instructing the emperor on the fundamentals of Jainism. He was also instrumental in influencing Akbar to issue decrees that would benefit the Jain community. So high was Akbar's esteem for this scholar-monk that he bestowed the title of jagadguru (world teacher) on him.

Much is available on his life's work through imperial records of decrees and also from inscriptions at Jain holy places such as Satrunjaya. All accounts document him as a spiritual guide to the lay community and a guardian of the Jain faith. In 1595, in accordance with Jain dictates, he voluntarily starved himself to death at the age of sixty-nine. Miraculous sights were reported at his cremation ground, which was later consecrated with his footprints. The site now houses a Jain temple, the complex known as Shah Bagh.

Biographies written after Hiravijayasuri's death include the Hiravijayasuri Ras (The play of Hiravijayasuri) by Rishabadas, Hirasaubhagya Kavya (The epic of Hiravijayasuri's auspiciousness) by Pandit Deovimal, and Jagadguru Kavya (The epic of the world teacher) by Padmasagargani.

Holy Innocents

(d. c. 4 B.C.E.)

Christian martyrs

The "Holy Innocents" are the baby boys of Bethlehem who were massacred at the order of King Herod after hearing from the Magi of the birth of a king in that town. Nothing further is known of them. They came, however, to enjoy a very special status as martyrs over the ensuing centuries in Christianity. Although unbaptized and living in a pre-Christian world, they had, in effect, died in place of Jesus, rather than simply for him as other martyrs did. Thus they are entitled to special honor.

The Feast of the Holy Innocents is one of a group of feasts situated around the celebration of the birth of Christ on December 25. This group of feasts (St. Stephen on December 26, St. John the Evangelist on December 27, and the Holy Innocents on December 28) came to be known as the Christmas triduum. The Feast of the Nativity necessitated a memorial for the solemn memory of the Innocents, and this feast first appears in the church calendar of Carthage at the end of the fourth century. Early Christians were expected to fast on this day.

During the Middle Ages, a kind of celebratory practice developed around the Christmas triduum of feasts during which the various members of the clergy were given certain privileges and freedoms. As time went on, however, these celebrations began to take on more secular and, indeed, sacrilegious connotations. St. Stephen's Day for the deacons, St. John's Day for the priests, and Holy Innocents for the choirboys soon developed into outrageous rituals that shocked the Christian church authorities but became highly anticipated holidays for peasants. The Feast of Fools, the Feast of the Ass, and the Feast of the Boy Bishop are some of the traditions that developed. On these days, the clerics were allowed to usurp the traditional church authority and "take over" or "turn upside down" their local church or cathedral. Most of these rituals disappeared or were banished from the church by the time of the Reformation.

Homobonus

(d. 1197 C.E.)

Christian layman, caregiver

A Christian of the "civic saint" type from Cremona, Italy, who died in 1197, Homobonus was one of the very first saints to be elevated to the ranks of sainthood by papal decree. This was a major step in the direction of what would ultimately become a papal monopoly on the making of saints.

According to Innocent III's bull Quia pietas (1199), Homobonus combined an extraordinarily intense devotion to the liturgy with selfless service to the poor. In the words of the bull, "He did as much for the poor—whom he kept with him, caring for and attending to them in his very own house—as he did for the other indigents, diligently carrying out acts of humanity on behalf of the living and devoutly offering burial for the dead." Though the document says nothing about Homobonus's status or occupation, we know from the metrical choral office composed in the saint's honor later in the thirteenth century that he was a merchant or businessman of some sort. The relevant verse reads, "Cutting himself off from the companionship of perverse business, he was summoned to the office of blessed contemplation; . . . deserting the commerce of worldly things, he was transformed into a merchant of the kingdom of heaven."

It is unfortunate that the original Life of Homobonus is no longer extant, because it would have been a useful source of evidence about the conversion and charitable activities of an early civic saint, that is, a layman whose conversion led him to stay in the "world" and assist the poor rather than retire to a monastery. Saints of this type began to appear in Italy in the late twelfth century, increased in number in the thirteenth, but then declined again in the fourteenth.

Honen

(1133–1212 C.E.)

Buddhist monk, founder

Honen, born in 1133, was the founder of the Jodo (Pure Land) sect of Japanese Buddhism. His birth name was Seishi-maru, and his father was a police chief responsible for order in his region. Honen witnessed the assassination of his father in their home when he was nine years old because of an act of disrespect by his father against a government official. Owing to his mother's biological connection to lower-class silkworm workers, Honen experienced social discrimination during his life. Biographical material did not mention the fate of his mother. But it was reported that Honen was sent by an uncle to Mount Hiei to join the Tendai sect when he was thirteen years old. At the age of forty-three, Honen converted to Pure Land teachings after reading a text by the Chinese Pure Land monk Shan-tao (613–681).

Honen never intended to establish an independent sect or alienate any preexisting schools of Buddhism. However, although he conservatively adhered to the basic Buddhist precepts and equated the Pure Land with the paradise of Amida Buddha (Amitabha), he still created a new paradigm in which every believer accepted his or her status as an ordinary person. This ordinariness included male and female, layperson and monastic, commoner and aristocrat. And yet his position represented something radical in the sense that it rejected the Buddhist assumption that the path to salvation must be based on difficult forms of practice. In response to his religious activities, political authorities sentenced Honen, his disciple Shinran, and six others to death in the so-called Ken'ei Persecution of 1205. The sentence was later commuted to exile, however.

Honen's worldview was shaped by the theory of the decline of the law (mappo). The law in this instance referred to the teachings of the Buddha, which theorists believed had been in decline since the first of three eras. During the initial era, there was the time of the true law in which people followed the teachings and could attain enlightenment. The second phase was the period of the counterfeit law, when people practiced the teachings of the Buddha, even though they thought enlightenment was impossible. During the third phase, the only thing left was the teachings, but no one bothered to practice them. This entire scenario evoked a sense of urgency because of the impending arrival of the final days and the imminent end of the world. Honen and others of this school believed that evil had gained a firm grip on the world and that humans were governed by neurotic cravings and desires. There developed in Japan a general belief that the final days had begun in 1052 with the conflagration of the Hasedera temple.

Within this bleak context, Honen distinguished between two paths of religion: a holy path (shodo) and a Pure Land path (jodo). The former was referred to as jiriki (relying on one's own strength), whereas the former was called tarikiki (relying on another's strength). Honen considered relying on one's own power to be the most difficult option, while relying on another was viewed as an easy path and the best choice within the context of the current degenerate age in which individuals could not be expected to achieve salvation by means of their personal efforts. Since the current situation was apparently hopeless for people trying to help themselves, people should recognize their imperfections and simply throw themselves upon the mercy of the bodhisattva (enlightened being) Amida. Thus the only real hope that a person possessed was to be reborn in the Pure Land by means of the grace of Amida. The problem for the individual was finding a way to trigger this grace.

Honen's proposed solution was embodied within the context of the so-called Hozo myth. In this myth, Amida vowed to defer enlightenment when he was a bodhisattva named Hozo in a prior lifetime. In the guise of Hozo, Amida postponed his own liberation until everyone could be saved by the practice of nembutsu (chanting the name of a bodhisattva). The fact that Hozo had actually become Amida was incontrovertible proof that everyone was guaranteed salvation. With this myth as his paradigm, Honen recommended chanting of Amida's name. A person was instructed to chant "name Amida" or "namu Amida Butsu," which could be translated as "I put my faith in Amida Buddha." This type of practice embodied a conviction that the name of the bodhisattva was the mysterious embodiment of its saving power. Honen emphasized fervent devotion and the endless repetition of Amida's name.

Hong Xiuquan (Hung Hsiu-ch'üan)

(1814–1864 C.E.)

Chinese millennial leader

Hong Xiuquan was a Chinese millennial/messianic figure who lived during the nineteenth century. Influenced by missionaries, he claimed to be God's younger son and Jesus Christ's little brother. He founded the "God Worshipping Society" to spread his own heterodox Christianity and led the bloody Taiping Rebellion to establish the theocratic Taiping Tianguo (Heavenly Kingdom of Great Peace).

Born into a poor minority (Hakka) farming family in 1814, Hong was raised to join the educated bureaucratic elite. Despite multiple attempts at the civil service exams, based on the Confucian classics, he failed to qualify. After one such exam in 1837, he suffered a breakdown. He had visions of a noble family who claimed him as a member and encouraged him to destroy evil demons. After reading a missionary tract with biblical selections, he interpreted this noble family as being God, Jesus, and their spouses and children. Refused baptism by his Southern Baptist mentor from Tennessee, he and his followers baptized each other and began zealously to spread their faith.

Although Hong rejected Confucianism, Buddhism, and Daoism, his interpretation of the Bible remained influenced by Chinese millennialism and cultural values such as family piety. In his theology, he and Jesus were not members of a trinity but part of God's patriarchal family with spouses and children. Immoral stories about Hong's divine lineage, including accounts of Noah's drunkenness and the drunken sexual relations between Lot and his daughters, were rewritten for the "Taiping Bible." The movement was deeply puritanical, however, in its attempts to segregate the sexes and abolish drinking, gambling, opium smoking, and prostitution.

Hong's movement began by desecrating temples in order to eradicate "demonic" idolatry. Meeting resistance, Hong rebelled against the Manchu rulers and declared himself king of the Heavenly Kingdom of Great Peace in 1851. The Taiping attempted to realize the kingdom of God through religious conversion, military action, and socialistic redistribution. The "heavenly army" had many successes and captured a number of key cities, including Nanjing, which became the Taiping capital. Hong's moral-political code, based on the Ten Commandments and vigorously enforced with death sentences, was not applied to the polygamous Hong and other leaders.

The Taiping kingdom ultimately failed because it was undermined by power struggles and poor leadership from within, the alienation of the peasants who were its social basis, and the foreign support of Qing troops. Near the end, a withdrawn Hong prepared his son to rule and consoled himself with the book of Revelation. He committed suicide during the fall of Nanjing in 1864. His son was soon caught and executed.

Hongren (Hung-jen; Jap.: Gunin or Konin)
(601–674 C.E.)

Chan Buddhist patriarch

Hongren, the fifth patriarch of Chan/Zen Buddhism in China, was dharma successor to the fourth patriarch, Daoxin (580–651), and master of both Huineng (638–713) of the southern school and Shenxiu (605–706) of the northern school. Born in 601, at an early age (sometime between 607 and 615) he became a disciple of Daoxin thanks to a conversation about a koan (puzzle phrase). He lived on P'ing-jung (East Mountain), and his followers came to be known as the followers of "The Pure (Dharma) Gate of the East Mountain."

Hongren was one of the most influential Chan masters in China. Though records do not show his stature during his own lifetime to be that impressive, he was probably highly sought after as a teacher. His students spread throughout China, exerting an enormous influence on the landscape of Chinese religion. Not only did the sixth patriarch Huineng come from this lineage, but Shenxiu and the later "five houses" stemmed from his teachings as well.

Master Hongren's teachings come out of the Lankavatara schools but were known to also include sutras from the Mahaprajnaparamitas, that is, "the great perfection wisdom literature," especially the Heart and Diamond sutras. He was very innovative, using the currents of Buddhist teachings prevalent at the time and incorporating them into his own instruction. He employed a new form of meditation based on the Flower Garland Sutra that he was known to practice so diligently that he often spent the night in contemplation. The central aim of this practice was to find one's own buddha-nature, not through intellectual pursuit, but through meditation. This solitude of meditation and practice was paradigmatic, constituting the start of a cultural change in Chinese society in which the lay community was incorporated into the life of the temple. Outreach to the locals became the norm, and as a result monastic institutions were established in more rural areas.

Hoover, Willis Collin

(1858–1937 C.E.)

Pentecostal church founder

Willis Collin Hoover was the main founder and first superintendent of the Methodist Pentecostal Church in Chile, the first Pentecostal church in Latin America and the first theologically and financially independent Pentecostal church in the Third World.

Hoover was born in Freeport, Illinois, where his family belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1858. He studied medicine in Chicago and graduated in 1884, but after having felt a divine calling he gave up his career as a doctor and joined the Methodist mission of William Taylor in Chile in 1889, together with his wife, Mary Anne Hilton Hoover. After thirteen years in northern Chile, Hoover was appointed as a pastor in the city of Valparaíso in 1902. Inspired by a series of studies on the Acts of the Apostles, and later by correspondence with churches in other parts of the world that had experienced Pentecostal revivals, Hoover and a group of Chilean lay members started to organize daily prayer groups and all-night watch services, praying for spiritual revival. During these activities, typical Pentecostal spiritual manifestations, such as glossolalia, visions, prophecies, and ecstasies, became a common occurrence. Members also started making incursions to the streets, preaching and screaming “Hallelujah.” Police intervention and critical articles in local newspapers did not discourage Hoover, who believed that revival and true sanctification were only possible if the Holy Spirit was given absolute freedom to manifest itself.

The Methodist authorities strongly disapproved of the revival, which was regarded as antibiblical and anti-Methodist, and in April 1910 it came to a final division when Hoover and 400 Chilean followers left the Methodist Episcopal Church of Valparaíso and together with two congregations in Santiago founded the Methodist Pentecostal Church. Hoover was superintendent until 1934, when he was expelled after internal disagreements. A possible source of conflict was his uncompromising puritanism, which meant that all “worldly” pleasures, such as dances, cinema, sports, and so on, were forbidden for church members. Nevertheless, he was followed by approximately half the members and founded Evangelical Pentecostal Church, which he led until his death in 1937.

Since the division in 1934, both churches have multiplied several times and foreign Pentecostal missionaries have founded other churches in Chile. Today, Pentecostalism accounts for more than 12 percent of the Chilean population (the great majority of Chileans are Catholics), mostly from the lower social strata. Street preaching is still a characteristic feature of Chilean Pentecostalism. Although there is no person cult in the Evangelical Pentecostal Church, Hoover is still respected and admired as an extraordinary servant who was used by God to initiate the Pentecostal revival in Latin America.

Hopkins, Gerard Manley

(1844–1889 C.E.)

Roman Catholic priest, poet

A Jesuit priest and English poet, Gerard Manley Hopkins was born on July 28, 1844, to prosperous parents in Stratford, Essex, who fostered in him a strong Anglican faith and respect for the Bible in addition to artistic and poetic talents. From childhood, Hopkins demonstrated proficiency in composing, and his innovative use of rhythm and meter in spiritual poetry has made him one of the most important Victorian poets.

As a student at Balliol College, Oxford (1863–1867), Hopkins began to establish a reputation as a serious scholar and writer. In 1866, he converted to Roman Catholicism, and the following year he decided to enter the Society of Jesus (Jesuits), destroying the poetry he had written up to that point as a symbol of his decision to start a new life (only a fragment survives). In 1868, he entered the Jesuit novitiate, and he took his perpetual vows in 1870. Hopkins wrote very little during his early years with the Jesuits, but after he became used to his new religious life, he again felt a desire to write, a desire that was encouraged by his rector after Hopkins was deeply moved by a shipwreck that killed five Franciscan nuns.

“The Wreck of the Deutschland” marks the beginning of Hopkins’s return to writing poetry. It strongly draws from themes in The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556). Like “The Wreck,” much of Hopkins’s poetry from this early period (1875–1877) deals with the mystery of God’s relationship to humankind. Poems from the middle period (1877–1883) reflect the parish work that Hopkins was performing at the time. “As Kingfishers” and other poems examine the divine in humans. Finally, the poems from 1883 until Hopkins’s death on June 8, 1889, demonstrate a deepening spirituality and sense of abandonment by God.

Hopkins coined the terms “inscape” and “instress” to explain the relationship between humans and God in his poetry. “Inscape” is the sense data that explains the oneness of an object, and “instress” is the energy of being that supports everything through natural and supernatural force—it is the energy that determines inscape. In addition to their spiritual depth, Hopkins’s poems are significant because of their unique rhythm, called by Hopkins “sprung rhythm,” which builds on the natural rhythm of music rather than the smoothness of iambic pentameter.

Huaca

Inca cultural heroes

For the Inca of Peru, the Quechua word huaca refers to a divinity and his or her permanent location. The divinities and the sacred places they occupy (hills, mountains, stones, rivers, lakes) are considered units. The huacas are not celestial gods, like Inti (the sun), Illapa (lightning), or Wiracocha (the creator of the world), but local or regional divinities present in the natural world. They can be male or female, and spaces are identified according to their gender. For example, male huacas live in the hills and mountains, whereas female divinities live in the rivers and lakes. From their natural union, following a male/female complementarity principle, life on earth is possible.

The translation of the term in Spanish is a controversial issue that has not been resolved. The Spanish chroniclers translated huaca as “local divinity,” but the notion seems to be larger and more complex than this definition implies. Huacas are located permanently in a geographic area, but they can walk, talk, travel, and appear in dreams. Like men and women, they express anger and happiness, passions and emotions, and they struggle among themselves for power. Sometimes, narratives tell of people turned into huacas.

Huangbo Xiyun (Huang-po Hsi-yun)

(d. c. 850 C.E.)

Chan Buddhist master

Huangbo Xiyun was a Chinese Chan/Zen Buddhist master who lived in the ninth century. He was a student of Baizhang (Pai-chang) and the teacher of Linji (Lin-Chi, Rinzai), founder of an eponymous, still active school of Zen Buddhism. Huangbo came from Fuzhou and entered the monastery of Huangbo, after which he is called. He was known for his striking physical appearance. He is said to have stood seven feet in height and to have had a large, protruding forehead.

Huangbo’s influential teachings were important for the development of the Hongzhou lineage of Chan Buddhism, founded by Mazu (709–788), which developed a confrontational and irreverent style of question and answer that has become the core of many gongan (koan) collections. Like other characteristic Chan practices, such as the shout and the blow, the paradoxical questions and responses developed in these short dialogues are intended to expose one to the unfamiliar and strange in order to allow sudden enlightenment to occur through a moment of uncanniness or shock. However, this enlightenment is not something that can be achieved or cultivated, since it is not conceptual or intentional. Rather, buddhahood is without form and activity and is itself to be found in ordinary life; one cannot distinguish between the mind of the Buddha and that of other sentient beings. Samsara (cycle of rebirths) and nirvana (extinction) are thus only modifications of the same condition, what Huangbo called the “one mind.” Huangbo emphasized that the great issue of Buddhism is this one mind, also described as the “boundless void,” that is, the individual self in the present moment. The central questions of Chan are to be answered through radical nondualism, which promotes the openness of nonattachment, or a type of spontaneous responsiveness.

Huangbo’s sayings are developed in a fairly straightforward and systematic manner, despite the use of paradox. Huangbo thus played a crucial role in transmitting the concrete and immanent as well as the responsive and spontaneous approach of the Hongzhou lineage. Huangbo’s writings were purportedly edited and perhaps simplified by Peixiu, a government official in Wan Ling prefecture and a lay disciple who collected some of his discourses. His work was translated into English by John Blofeld in the late 1950s (Huangbo 1959). This was one of the first substantial Chan texts transmitted in English and has played an important role in the reception of Zen in the English-speaking world.

Huangdi

(c. 2000 B.C.E.?)

Confucian sage-emperor

Huangdi (Huang-ti), the Yellow Emperor, is one of archaic China’s sage-emperors of the historically elusive Xia (Hsia) dynasty (2200?–1800? B.C.E.). As a culture hero, he is held to be a mythic hero, a semihistorical personage, a point of geneological or philosophical lineage, and the originator of many elements of civilization.

Huangdi is the third of the sage-emperors, following Fu Xi and Shen Nong, and preceding Yao, Shun, and Yu. These six emperors are all esteemed for their virtuous actions and character and their ability to create ritual and order. They are also the points of origin of clan genealogies. All clans sought to trace themselves back to Huangdi, particularly the Ji clan and the Han emperors (which, given the peasant origins of the first Han ruler, Liu Bang, is intriguing).

Huangdi is mythically credited with the creation of humanity. He did this by making statues in the shape of men and exposing them to the vital breaths of the cosmos. After 300 years, they matured into humans in each of the Five Colors. An epic myth involving Huangdi pits him in a struggle to create order in the face of chaos, personified by the earth monster Chi Yu (this myth is pervasive throughout ancient China, although some territories change the names of the characters). To fight this battle better, Chi Yu invented weapons for himself. Huangdi called upon the forces of nature—armies of animals and a dragon. Chi Yu sought the aid of the wind and the rain, against which Huangdi sent the waters and, ultimately, his daughter Ba, the goddess of drought. Following Chi Yu's defeat, Ba was unable to return to heaven and was sent north.

Beyond the mythical creation of order, Huangdi is credited with creating many aspects of civilization. In the political domain, these include the crown, ritual, ceremonial vestments (which makes him the patron saint of tailors), and land divisions; in the religious domain, temples and the practice of placing effigies on doors to frighten evil spirits; in the broader cultural domain, writing, music, calendars, hair-dressing, and cooked food.

Huangdi is also the putative author of the Huangdi nei-jing, in English called the Inner Classic of the Yellow Emperor. This is a work that was probably compiled around the first century B.C.E. with later additions. Integrating various cosmological theories into medical practice and theory, it takes the form of a dialogue where Huangdi asks a minister to explain medical principles to him. The principles that are delineated strongly associate the body with the larger cycles of the cosmos and explain illness primarily as a problem with the body's flow of energy, qi.

In addition to being upheld as the ancestor of the clans, Huangdi is espoused as the founder of a wide range of scientific and philosophical schools. Chief among these is Daoism. Huangdi is sometimes credited with the composition of the Laozi, with patronizing a hermit in order to attain immortality, and with ascending to heaven on a dragon.

Hubert

(c. 665–727 C.E.)

Legendary Christian bishop

The reputation of Hubert, an eighth-century bishop, changed dramatically during the early fifteenth century when an account of his conversion clearly borrowed from the vita of St. Eustace. Hubert was born c. 665. The legend tells that as a young man, he became an accomplished hunter in the Ardennes, the great forest in southern Belgium. While hunting illicitly one Good Friday, he chased down a stag and, miraculously, like Eustace, saw between its antlers a crucifix, which chastised him for his impiety. This incident converted him to a religious vocation, and upon the death of his wife, he became a priest.

According to the legend, in c. 705, after the death of Bishop Lambert of Maastricht, an angel informed Pope Sergius that he was to choose Hubert as his successor. An angel also provided Hubert with his crosier and vestments, and the Virgin Mary sent him his stole, woven with her own hands. While Hubert was celebrating his consecration mass, St. Peter reportedly appeared to him and gave him a golden key. In about 722, Hubert transferred the episcopal seat from Maastricht to Liège. Before an angel announced his imminent death to him in 727, Hubert evangelized the Ardennes and worked many miracles, the most popular of which was curing a man of rabies. He was recognized as a saint in 743, and in 825 his relics were translated from Liège to the abbey of Andage, which was rededicated to St. Hubert.

Besides his body (desecrated by Protestants in 1568), Hubert's stole, golden key, and hunting horn (now in the Wallace Collection, London) were all considered miraculous and were sought particularly for cures against rabies, until the discovery of a vaccine in 1885. His cult was focused on the Ardennes (sixty-three churches are dedicated to him in the dioceses of Namur and Liège). Because of his association with hunting, he became a popular patron of hunters. He is also included among the Four Holy Marshals, and two orders of chivalry were dedicated to him. Hubert is sometimes represented as a bishop and sometimes as a hunter. His feast is celebrated on November 3.
