The verb which occurs in the phrase lutenn and lefften (see LOU² v.), very frequent in the Ormulum, but not found elsewhere, has been commonly identified with this vb., but neither the form nor the sense favours the identification. d. In scientific use.

The word light has been used in six special senses: (a) the thing (variously conceived as matter or energy) which is communicated from a luminous body to the body illuminated by it; (b) this thing regarded as producing sensation; (c) the sensation produced; (d) the process (variously conceived as rectilinear motion of corpuscles, undulatory motion of the ether, or periodic change of electrical and magnetic states) by which the communication is made; (e) certain characteristics of such processes (rays or waves); (f) physical energies and processes of the same type as those involved in the production of vision, but having possibly a different range of periods (e.g. Röntgen rays). The sense (c) (rare in actual use, though not uncommonly expressed in definitions) agrees with an occasional use of the word in popular language: we should, e.g., usually apply the name light to the sensation experienced when the optic nerve is excited mechanically without the intervention of a luminous body. In the sense (d) the word light is equivalent to the process of transmission of light; in the sense (e) it is equivalent to rays of light or waves of light.

mod.Eng. as Y-LIKE: see also ALIKE a.

The OE. lic* yields normally lich in Southern and lik in Northern ME. The former type did not survive after the 14th c.; the prevalence of the β form may be partly due to the analogy of the comparative, where the k is normal in all dialects, though the forms with ch were not uncommon.

The inflected comparative and superlative are now rare in educated use exc. poet. or rhetorical.]

A. adj.

as some other person or thing; of approximately identical shape, size, colour, character, etc., with something else; similar; resembling;
analogous. (In the negative phrases, there is none
or nothing like —, the adj. assumes a pregnant sense = 'so good or wonderful as'.)

¶ Some phrasal uses of the adj. in this construction have a special idiomatic force. The question What is he (or it) like? means 'What sort of a man is he?', 'What sort of a thing is it?', the expected answer being a description, and not at all the mention of a resembling person or thing. (Cf. WHAT-LIKE.) to look like (occas. to be like) sometimes means 'to have the appearance of being' so and so; e.g. in 'He looks like a clever man'. (Cf. sense 7.) like that, used predicatively (perh. a Gallicism = F. comme cela): of the nature, character, or habit indicated; spec. (usu.
accompanying the crossing of the speaker's fingers) as an indication that two people described are very friendly or intimate; like another [cf. Fr. comme un autre]: that is ordinary or unexceptional; that is only one of a number of similar things, possibilities, etc.

6. Used as conj.: = 'like as', as. Now generally condemned as vulgar or slovenly, though examples may be found in many recent writers of standing.

This use originated partly in an ellipsis of as or an extension of the quasi-prepositional function of the adv. (sense 1) to govern a clause instead of a sb., and partly in an anacoluthic use (somewhat common in the 16th c.) by which the sb. or pronoun which is primarily a dative governed by like is used as the subj. or obj. of a following clause. A good example of this anacoluthon (but with ta instead of simple dative) is the following: 1596 SPENSER F.Q. v. iv. 42 Like to an Eagle, in his kingly pride Soring through his wide Empire of the aire... by chaunce hath spide A Goshauke.

6. a. trans. (The current sense.) To find agreeable or congenial; to feel attracted to or favourably impressed by (a person); to have a taste or fancy for, take pleasure in (a thing, an action, a condition, etc.). In early use often to like well (now arch. in this form, though we say freely to like very, pretty well, and to like better or best), and antithetically to like ill (arch.) = to dislike. Colloq. phrases: I like that!, an ironical expression of surprise or disgust at someone's impudence, conceit, untruthfulness, etc.; (to do, etc., something) and like it, (to endure or perform something unpleasant) with a good grace, without complaint; to like it or lump it, see LUMP *v.*² 2. For to know what one likes see KNOW v. I f.

As used with reference to persons, the vb. is often contrasted (as expressing a weaker sentiment) with love.

The two earliest quots. may belong to sense 1.

f. The neutral sense inferable from the qualified uses, to like well or ill (see above), survives in the interrogative use with how, as in 'How do you like my new gown?', 'How would you like to be called a fool to your face?', etc.

-like, suffix, forming adjs. and advs. In strictness, the words containing this suffix are compounds of LIKE a. and adv., in the senses in which these words govern a dative or are followed by an adj. (see LIKE a. 1 b, LIKE adv. 1, 3). The compounds so formed not unfrequently resemble in sense the derivatives formed with -lik(e), ME. dial. form of -LY¹, -LY², but the two formations are entirely distinct: thus ME. gredilike adv. (= greedily) is not the same word as the mod. Sc. greedy-like.

1. Appended to sbs. a. Forming adjs. with the general sense 'similar to —', 'characteristic of, befitting —'. Early examples are circleyk (a1420), chieftainlike (c1470 Henry Wallace VI. 489), devil-like (c1470), godlike (1513), bishoplike (1544), flesh-like (1552). The suffix may now be appended to almost all sbs., including proper names; in formations intended as nonce-words, or not generally current, the hyphen is ordinarily used.

Some particular writers have shown an extraordinary fondness for words of this formation; e.g. more than 60 occur in Bailey's Festus.

1598 DALLINGTON Meth. Trav. Sijj b, Making Hidalgo-like Rhodomontades. 1603 DEKKER Grissil (Shaks. Soc.) 5 Then can you blame me to be hunter like, When I must get a wife? 1607 R. Med.* II. 578 If the noise... is that of a friction-murmur, soft and bellows-like. 1901 Academy 13 July 29/2 Strong, cudgel-like Anglo-Saxon words.

b. Forming advs. with the sense 'in or after the manner of —', 'so as to resemble —'. Early instances are fellowlike (c1530), gentlemanlike (1542), phraselike (1549), bishoplike (1555). These advs., and the method of formation, are now perh. to be regarded as obsolete or at least archaistic, the apparent examples in recent use being explicable as quasi-advb. uses of the adj.; at least, the advs. or quasi-advs. are now employed only to characterize the subject of the sentence, not, as formerly, to indicate the manner of an action. In accordance with this change of signification, -like in the quasi-adverbial use now takes optionally a second principal stress, and is nearly always hyphenated.

2. Appended to adjs. a. Forming adjs. In Sc. the suffix is added freely to almost any descriptive adj., esp. those relating to mental qualities, conditions of temper, or the like; the general sense of the compounds is 'having the appearance of being —'. In Eng. use the formation is not common, and the sense is usually 'resembling, or characteristic of, one who is —', as in genteel-like, human-like.

c. Used in all versions of the Bible to render Heb. shūshan, shōshan, shōshannāh, LXX and NT. κρίνον.

The Heb. words were prob. used, as the corresponding Arab. sūsan still is in Palestine, for all the conspicuous species of lily, lotus (Nymphaea Lotus), anemone, ranunculus, tulip, etc. In Cant. v. 13 a red flower appears to be meant. The 'lilies of the field' of Matt. vi. 28 have been variously identified with the red Anemone coronaria and with the scarlet Martagon or Turk's Cap lily, both of which are common in Galilee. The herbalists of the 16-17th c. took 'the lily among the thorns' (lilium inter spinas) of Cant. ii. 2 to be the honeysuckle; see Coles Art of Simpling (1656) 7.

The name lily of the valley represents the Vulgate lilium convallium, a literal translation from the Heb. of Cant. ii. 1. The application to this particular plant is app. due to the German herbalists of the early 16th c.

3. a. The alkaline earth which is the chief constituent of mortar; calcium oxide (CaO). It is obtained by submitting limestone (carbonate of lime) to a red heat, by which the carbonic acid is driven off, leaving a brittle white solid, which is pure lime (or QUICK-LIME). It is powerfully caustic and combines readily with water, evolving great heat in the process, and forming hydrate of lime (slaked lime).

The designations carbonate, phosphate etc. of lime are still current in popular use, though in technical language they have given place to the more systematic terms calcium carbonate (or carbonate of calcium), etc. chloride of lime: see CHLORIDE 2.

b. Math. In various applications. (a.) A finite quantity to which the sum of a converging series progressively approximates, but to which it cannot become equal in a finite number of terms. (b.) A fixed value to which a function can be made to approach continually, so as to differ from it by less than any assignable quantity, by making the independent variable approach some assigned value. (c.) Each of the two values of a variable, between which a definite integral is taken. (d.) The ultimate position of the point of intersection of two lines which, by their relative motion, are tending to coalescence.

Doctrine or Method of Limits: a term chiefly used to designate that mode of expounding the principles of the Differential and Integral Calculus, according to which the conception of 'limits' or 'limiting values' forms the basis of the system.

[a 1727 NEWTON Opuscula i. 53 Quibus Terminis, sive Limitibus respondent semicirculi Limites, sive Termini.] 1753 in CHAMBERS Cycl. Supp. 1797 Encycl. Brit. (ed. 3) X. 78/2 Limit, in a restrained sense, is used by mathematicians for a determined quantity to which a variable one continually approaches; in which sense, the circle may be said to be the limit of its circumscribed and inscribed polygons. In algebra the term limit is applied to two quantities, one of which is greater and the other less than another quantity; and in this sense it is used in speaking of the limits of equations, whereby their solution is much facilitated. 1839 Penny Cycl. XIII. 496/2 There are two conditions which must be fulfilled before A can be called the limit of P; first, P must never become equal to A; secondly P must be capable of being made as nearly equal to A as we please. 1842 DE MORGAN *Diff. 1862 H. C. RAWLINSON in Athenæum 19 July 83/1, I am quite ready to abandon this notion if any more suitable explanation can be found of the office of Limu, from which the Assyrians commonly dated; but in the mean time I cannot accept of the unmeaning title of Eponymy, nor can I admit of the etymology which would make the Limu merely the 'seer' of the new moon. 1888 Z. 1893 Geogr. Jnrl. I. 353 He [sc. Friedrich Simony].. became the founder of the special branch of science termed by Forel, Limnology, or the scientific study of lakes. 1895 Athenæum 10 Aug. 195/3 Limnology was dealt with [at the Geographical Congress] by Dr. F. A. Forel. 1899 Pop. Sci. Monthly Sept. 709 The study of microscopic aquatic life and general limnology. 1929 Jnrl. Ecol. XVII. 106 A generation or so ago the general conception of the word limnology was that it covered the subject of the physiography of lakes, and that freshwater biology.. was more or less a separate science... As the biology of fresh waters developed this branch of science was fairly often included within the range of the word limnology, but still the term continued to be frequently used for the physiographical aspect of lake investigations only, and the notion of limnology as a mere branch of physical geography separated from the biological side of the question persisted. That definition must now be entirely abandoned... The subject of limnology, then, is the study of everything connected with fresh waters—both stagnant and running—their geography, physical features, chemistry, biology, geology of the substrata and basins, in short the Natural History of fresh waters in the broadest sense of the word. 1938 Jnrl. Wildlife Managem. II. 94 (heading) Fish biology and limnology of Crater Lake, Oregon. 1946 Nature 21 Sept. 421/1 Up-to-date knowledge and theory of limnology—the freshwater equivalent of oceanography—has been combined with practical experience of waterworks. 1971 New Scientist 4 Feb. 236/1 The professor of limnology at the University of Lund.

Line managers resented this interference with their authority and started to obstruct the accountants in their ordinary accounting function. 1967 COULTHARD & SMITH in Ibid. 206 A good deal of the failure of these techniques stems from the inability of personnel men to convince line management of their own vital role combined with the assumption by line management that the creation of a specialist department covering personnel policies, training, management development, etc., automatically relieves them of responsibility. 1972 Accountant 28 Sept. 391/1 If the internal auditor sees himself as a someone who can review and report upon the functions of line management on matters other than security, then there is one fundamental issue that has to be faced. 1974 Times 25 Mar. 17/4 It was a pity that so few line managers were present as it was their present and future competence that was being discussed.

28. a. A department of activity; a kind or branch of business or occupation.

The sense seems to be largely due to the influence of quot. 1611, where, however, line (= Gr. κάνον, lit. 'measuring rod', R.V. 'province') was prob. meant by the translators in a sense belonging to branch II. The phrase line of things, sometimes used instead of line in the sense above explained, certainly arose from misapprehension of this text, where the words 'in another mans line' are parenthetical.

[1611 BIBLE 2 Cor. x. 16 And not to boast in another mans line of things made ready to our hand.] 1638 ROUSE Heav. Univ. x. ling, variant of LENG v. Obs.

-ling (lɪŋ), suffix¹, appended to sbs., adjs., vb.-stems, and (rarely) advs., to form sbs., is a Com. Teut. formative (OE., OS., OHG. -ling, ON. -ling-r, Goth. -ligg-s in gadiliggs). It doubtless arose from the addition of the suffix -ingo-z -*ING*³ to noun-stems formed with the suffix -ilo- (-EL¹, -LE¹), but in all the historical Teut. langs. it has the character of a simple suffix.

1. In OE., -ling added to sbs. forms sbs. with the general sense 'a person or thing belonging to or concerned with (what is denoted by the primary sb.)', as hýrling hireling, ierðling ploughman (f. ierð ploughing), ræpling prisoner (f. ráp rope). The derivatives from adjs. have the sense 'a person or thing that has the quality denoted by the adj.', e.g. deorling darling, efenling an equal, feorðling quarter, farthing, geongling youngling, gesibling, sibling kinsman; similarly from an adv., underling subordinate.

One or two names of birds have this suffix in OE., as swertling ? some black bird (? f. sweart black), stærling starling; here it may possibly have a diminutive force (see 2 below).

In ME. and mod.E. the suffix continued to be freely employed with the same function as in OE.; examples are atterling, deathling, fatling, firstling, grayling, nestling, nursling, sapling, suckling. The personal designations in -ling are now always used in a contemptuous or unfavourable sense (though this implication was not fully established before the 17th c.), as courtling, earthling, groundling, †popeling (= papist), vainling, worldling. On the analogy of words like nursling, where the grammatical character of the initial element is ambiguous, a few sbs. in -ling have been formed on vb.-stems (taken in passive sense), being personal designations of contemptuous import, such as shaveling, starveling; of similar origin is stripling, though it has lost its primary derisive sense.

The suffix is no longer productive in the uses above explained.

2. In ON. the suffix had a diminutive force, of which there are only slight traces in the other Teut. langs. (cf. OE. stærling mentioned above, and G. sperling sparrow); chiefly in words denoting the young of animals, as gæsling-r gosling, ketling-r kitten, kiðlin-gr young kid, †kidling, but also in a few other words, as bækling-r booklet, vetling-r glove, yrmling-r little worm. In Eng. the earliest certain instance of this use appears to be codling, recorded c1314 (kitling, which appears a 1300, being of dubious formation), in the 15th c. we find gosling (of which the earliest quoted form, gesling, points to adoption from ON.), and duckling. In the 16th c. and subsequently the suffix has been employed in many new diminutive formations, chiefly contemptuous appellations of persons, as godling, lordling, kingling, princeling; in this use it is still a living formative.

In the formation of diminutives expressing merely smallness of size, -ling has never been extensively used; a few writers of the 19th c. have so employed it in nonce-wds.

c1800 LAMB Lett. (1837) I. 147 Gentry dipped in Styx all over, whom no paper javelin-lings can touch. 1815 J. GILCHRIST Labyrinth Demolished 8 Philosophling. Ibid. 22 Thinkling. Ibid. 24 Metaphysicling. 1885 HOWELLS in Century Mag. XXX. 541 'A pity for you!' cried the hunchbackling.

-ling², -lin(g)s, suffix, forming adverbs, most of which survive only dial. The Teut. root ling-*, lang-, lung-, to extend, reach, appears in its three ablaut-forms as the terminal element in certain OE. advs. expressive of direction or extent, as in bæcling BACKLING; andlang (see ALONG, ENDLONG); nihlanges for a night; grundlunga (also grundlinga) to the ground. In certain instances the suffixes -linga, -lunga, were already in OE. substituted for -inga, -unga, advb. terminations originating in some case (? ablative) of sbs. in -ing, -ung (see -*ING*¹); so in néadlunga, niedlinga, whence, with adverbial (genitival) es, the ME. nedlingis NEEDLINGS, of necessity. The original OE. use (in which the suffix is added to sbs. to form advs. of direction) is continued in the later formations grufelyng (GROVELLING), headling(s), sideling(s); more numerous, however, are the words in which the suffix forms advs. of condition or situation from adjs., as blindling(s), darkling(s), firstlings, flatling(s), hidlings, mostlings.

POWELL *Southward's Pract. Distribution is avoided. The matter once used . . is returned to the metal pot and melted ready for fresh work. . . The advantages of the machine are its great speed and the economy effected by melting instead of distributing. A disadvantage is the fact that . . there is no mode of correction other than to reset the whole line. . . Still, . . the machine has decided merits. It is in use in many newspaper offices. Ibid. (Advt.), The result of a contest between four American Composing Machines . . showed that on the Linotype the operator averaged 12,250 Ens an

Gr. λέων (stem λεωντ-, perh. altered from an earlier λεφον-*). The Gr. word was perh. adopted from some foreign lang.; a noteworthy similarity of sound is presented by Heb. lābī lion (pl. l'ba'im), also occurring in the sense 'lioness' with the vocalization l'biyyā; cf. also Egyptian labai, lawai lioness. The synonymous Gr. λῆς (cf. Heb. layish) is not etymologically connected.

Before the adoption of the Fr. word, English possessed forms directly representing the Latin leo, leōnem. The word was used, with difference of gender and inflexion, both for 'lion' and 'lioness', the L. leōna not having been adopted. Owing to the two-fold form of the L. word in the nom. and the oblique case, the declension in OE. is irregular and variable. The recorded forms are: nom. sing. léo (Anglian léa), gen. sing. léon (Northumb. masc. léas), dat. sing. léon, léone, léonan, acc. sing. léon (fem. also léo), nom., acc. pl. léon, gen. pl. léona, dat. pl. léoum, léom, léonum.

The L. word has been adopted into all the Teut. langs.: cf. OFris. lawā, MDu. lewue, lêwe (Du. leeuw), OHG. lewo, lêwo, louwo, lio (MHG. lêwe, leu, mod.G. löwe, leu), ON. léon, lón (MSw. leon, Sw. lejon, Da. løve from Ger.). From Gr. or L., but in some cases through Teut. as the immediate source, are the forms in the Balto-Slavic langs.: Lith lėvas, lėvas, Lettish lauvas, OSl. livŭ, Russ. lev, Polish lew, Czech lev.]

1. a. A large carnivorous quadruped, Felis leo, now found native only in Africa and southern Asia, of a tawny or yellowish brown colour, and having a tufted tail. The male is distinguished by a flowing shaggy mane. (The Maneless Lion of Gujerat is a recognized Asiatic variety with only a slight mane.) It is very powerful, and has a noble and impressive appearance; whence it is sometimes called 'the king of beasts'. In early use the name was applied to both sexes; from the 13th c. the derivative LIONESS has been used for the female.

The young are now commonly called 'lion's cubs'; the older designation 'lion's whelp' survives in rhetorical applications, owing to its use in the Bible.

1. Any of the large group of fats and fat-like compounds which occur in living organisms and are characteristically soluble in certain organic solvents but only sparingly soluble in water; it is generally taken to include esters of higher aliphatic acids, together with various groups of related and derived compounds, and freq. also steroids and carotenoids.

1925 W. R. BLOOR in Chem. Rev. II. 244 Three terms have been suggested for the group, namely, 'Lipins' by Gies and Rosenbloom, 'Lipides' by the International Congress of Applied Chemistry, and the old term 'Lipoids' by the author. The term lipins has been used in a different sense by Leathes, and was later adopted by McLean in his monograph as a name for a subgroup containing the cerebroside and the phosphatides. The term lipoids is understood by many to exclude the fats, although used in the wider sense by many workers on the Continent. For these reasons, and for the sake of uniformity, the author recommends the use of the term Lipides as the general group name. 1927 M. BODANSKY Introd. Physiol. Chem. iii. 49 The term 'lipides' or 'lipids' . . . referring to the fats and fat-like substances. 1937 Nature 6 Nov. 787 'Lipides' may be confused with 'lipins', and both these words together with 'lipoids' generally signify substances of a fat-like nature yielding on hydrolysis fatty acids or derivatives of fatty acids, and containing in their molecule either nitrogen or nitrogen and phosphorus. . . Some confusion may therefore arise since 'lipids' as used by the author signifies not only the above substances but also the simple fats and waxes and even the sterols. 1946 W. R. FEARON Introd. Biochem. (ed. 3) x. 172 The third great family of bio-organic compounds, namely, the lipides. 1954 A. WHITE et al. *Princ. A descriptive name is surely preferable. Ries's name 'Lipochondrien' (Ries, 1935) is convenient, but a Greek ending is more suitable for a word that must be used internationally. Although this designation was originally limited to pigments with yellow or reddish tints, by implication it obviously should include any fat-soluble pigment such as chlorophyll. 1968 Lipochrome [see lipofuscin below]. 1923 *Chem. lipodystrophy (lipəu'distrəfi). Path. Also as mod. L. lipody'strophia. [f. LIPO- + DYSTROPHY.] Any of various disorders of fat metabolism; intestinal lipodystrophy, a rare disease (usu. called Whipple's disease) of uncertain ætiology, chiefly of middle-aged men, presenting with joint pains, steatorrhœa, wasting, and lymph node enlargement; progressive lipodystrophy [tr. mod. L. lipodystrophia progressiva (A. Simons 1911, in Zeitschr. f. d. ges. Neurol. u. Psychiatrie (Orig.) 1907 G. H. WHIPPLE in Bull. Johns Hopkins Hosp. XVIII. 391/1 In searching for a name to designate this condition great difficulties were encountered. It would seem that no suitable name can be applied to it until the etiological factor is determined. The term Intestinal Lipodystrophy is suggested. 1925 *Q. Jrnl. 2. Phonetics. A name applied to the sounds denoted by the letters l, m, n, r, or (by some writers) only to those denoted by l and r.

The name (L. liquidæ, sc. litteræ) is a literal translation of the Gr. ὑπάρ (sc. στοιχεῖα) applied to λ, μ, ν, ρ, on account of their flowing and easy sound as compared with other consonants, or perh. as having an indeterminate or unstable character between consonant and vowel (cf. the application of ὑπάρ to a vowel of variable quantity; also the term ἡμιφωνά 'semi-vowels', applied to the 'liquids' and o). A somewhat analogous term is the F. mouillé lit. 'wet', used to denote the palatalized pronunciation of l and some other consonants.

Lissajous ('lɪsæʒuː). The name of Jules Antoine Lissajous (1822-80), French physicist, used attrib. and in the possessive to designate the plane figures (mostly crossed loops and simple curves) traced by a point executing two independent simple harmonic motions at right angles to one another and with frequencies in a simple numerical ratio (described by Lissajous in Compt. Rend. (1855) XLI. 814).

1877 RAYLEIGH Theory of Sound i. p. vii, Lissajous' Figures. 1902 Encycl. Brit. XXV. 501 If both forks vibrate, an observer looking through the microscope sees the bright point describing Lissajous figures. 1939 Brit. Jnl. Psychol. Oct. 129 The frequency of the tones employed . . is checked by obtaining a Lissajous's figure against a constant frequency source applied to the other deflectors of the cathode-ray tube. 1943 Electronic Engin. XVI. 170 Two measuring techniques for the Lissajous' figures produced on the oscilloscope screen are described. 1973 Sci. Amer. Aug. 76/2 The two tones were next matched precisely on a cathode ray oscilloscope by tuning the generated tone until a clear Lissajous figure with a ratio of 1:1 appeared repeatedly on the screen.

lite, obs. form of LIGHT v.¹

-lite (= F. -lite, G. -lith, -lit), a frequent ending in names of minerals (also in names of certain fossils, as coprolite, and of certain types of mineral structure, as axiolite and of some rocks, as ijolite, phonolite), represents the Gr. λίθος stone; the words in which it occurs are mostly intended to correspond to assumable Gr. formations, so that in actual use the ending is almost always -olite, with the thematic or combining o usual in Gr. compounds; there are a few exceptions, as auerlite, chesterlite. The form -lite, which was used in some original English formations (actynolite, etc.) by Kirwan in 1794, is due to the example of the French geologists, who used -lite instead of the older -lithe, the two spellings representing one and the same pronunciation in Fr. The adoption of the abnormal form was prob. helped by the analogy of CHRYSOLITE, where the t instead of th is due to the fact that the Gr. word came at an early period into Eng. by way of med.L. and OF.
