Copper in sheets is much used for covering the bottoms of ships, for boilers, and other utensils; mixed with tin and zinc, it is used in enamel-painting, dyeing, &c.; and with tin, it forms bell-metal; with a smaller proportion, bronze; and with zinc, it forms brass, pinchbeck, &c. 4. Favor; good-will; kindness. Thou hast made him glad with thy countenance. — Ps. xxi.

Hence, in scriptural language, the light of God's countenance is his smiles or favorable regards, his favor and grace; and to hide his face or countenance is to manifest his displeasure, and withdraw his gracious aids. So the rebuke of his countenance indicates his anger and frowns. Ps. lxxx.

This application of face or countenance, which seems to be of high antiquity, proceeded probably from the practice of turning away the face to express anger, displeasure, and refusal — a practice still common, but probably universal among rude nations. The opposite conduct would, of course, express favor. The grant of a petition is accompanied with a look directed to the petitioner; the refusal or denial, with an averted face. Hence,

That which gives credit; that which gives a title or claim to confidence; the warrant on which belief, credit, or authority, is claimed, among strangers; as the letters of commendation and power given by a government to an ambassador or envoy, which give him credit at a foreign court. So the power of working miracles given to the apostles may be considered as their credentials, authorizing them to propagate the gospel, and entitling them to credit.

CRED-I-BIL-I-TY, n. [Fr. credibilité, from L. credibilis.]

Credibility; the quality or state of a thing which renders it possible to be believed, or which admits belief, on rational principles; the quality or state of a thing which involves no contradiction or absurdity. Credibility is less than certainty, and greater than possibility; indeed, it is less than probability, but is nearly allied to it. [See CREDIBLE.]

CRED-I-BLE, a. [L. credibilis.]

1. That may be believed; worthy of credit. A thing is credible, when it is known to be possible, or when it involves no contradiction or absurdity; if it is more credible, when it is known to come within the ordinary laws or operations of nature. With regard to the divine Being and his operations, every thing is credible which is consistent with his perfections, and supported by evidence or unimpeachable testimony, for his power is unlimited. With regard to human affairs, we do not apply the word to things barely possible, but to things which come within the usual course of human conduct, and the general rules of evidence.

2. Worthy of belief; having a claim to credit; applied to persons. A credible person is one of known veracity and integrity, or whose veracity may be fairly deduced from circumstances. We believe the history of Aristides and Themistocles, on the authority of credible historians.

CRED-I-BLE-NESS, n. Credibility; worthiness of belief, just claim to credit. [See CREDIBILITY.]

CRED-I-BLY, adv. In a manner that deserves belief; with good authority to support belief.

CRED-IT, n. [Fr. credit; It. credito; Sp. id.; L. creditum. See CREDIT.]

1. Belief; faith; a reliance or resting of the mind on the truth of something said or done. We give credit to a man's declaration, when the mind rests on the truth of it, without doubt or suspicion, which is attended with wavering. We give credit to testimony or to a report, when we rely on its truth and certainty.

2. Reputation derived from the confidence of others; esteem; estimation; good opinion founded on a belief of a man's veracity, integrity, abilities, and virtue; as, a physician in high credit with his brethren. Hence,

3. Honor; reputation; estimation; applied to men or things. A man gains no credit by profaneuess; and a poem may lose no credit by criticism. The credit of a man depends on his virtues; and the credit of his writings, on their worth.

4. That which procures or is entitled to belief; testimony; authority derived from one's character, or from the confidence of others. We believe a story on the credit of the narrator. We believe in miracles on the credit of inspired men. We trust to the credit of an assertion made by a man of known veracity.

5. Influence derived from the reputation of veracity or integrity, or from the good opinion or confidence of others; interest; power derived from weight of character, from friendship, fidelity, or other cause. A minister may have great credit with a prince. He may employ his credit to good or evil purposes. A man uses his credit with a friend; a servant, with his master.

6. In commerce, trust; transfer of goods in confidence of future payment. When the merchant gives a credit, he sells his wares on an expressed or implied promise that the purchaser will pay for them at a future time. The seller believes in the solvability and probity of the purchaser, and delivers his goods on that belief or trust; or he delivers them on the credit or reputation of the purchaser. The purchaser takes what is sold, on credit. In like manner, money is loaned on the credit of the borrower.

7. The capacity of being trusted; or the reputation of solvency and probity which entitles a man to be trusted. A customer has good credit or no credit with a merchant.

8. In book-keeping, the side of an account in which payment is entered; opposed to debit. This article is carried to one's credit, and that to his debit. We speak of the credit side of an account.

9. Public credit; the confidence which men entertain in the ability and disposition of a nation, to make good its engagements with its creditors; or the estimation in which individuals hold the public promises of payment, whether such promises are expressed or implied. The term is also applied to the general credit of individuals in a nation; when merchants and others are wealthy, and punctual in fulfilling engagements; or when they transact business with honor and fidelity; or when transfers of property are made with ease for ready payment. So we speak of the credit of a bank, when general confidence is placed in its ability to redeem its notes; and the credit of a mercantile house rests on its supposed ability and probity, which induce men to trust to its engagements. When the public credit is questionable, it raises the premium on loans.

Cherish public credit. [Washington.]

10. The notes or bills which are issued by the public, or by corporations or individuals, which circulate on the confidence of men in the ability and disposition in those who issue them, to redeem them. They are sometimes called bills of credit.

11. The time given for payment for lands or goods sold on trust; as, a long credit, or a short credit.

12. A sum of money due to any person; any thing valuable standing on the creditor side of an account. A has a credit on the books of B. The credits are more than balanced by the debits.

[In this sense, the word has the plural number.] CRED-IT, v. t. [from the noun.] To believe; to confide in the truth of; as, to credit a report, or the man who tells it.

2. To trust; to sell or loan in confidence of future payment; as, to credit goods or money.

See CREDIT.] A person to whom a sum of money or other thing is due, by obligation, promise, or in law; properly, one who gives credit in commerce; but in a general sense, one who has a just claim for money; correlative to debtor. In a figurative sense, one who has a just claim for services. [Addison.]

CRIME, n. [L. crimen; Gr. κρίμα; It. crimi; Port. id.; Sp. crimen; Fr. crime; Arau. crim; Norm. crismo. This word is from the root of Gr. κρίνω, L. crerno, to separate, to judge, to decree, to condemn. But this verb seems to be composed of two distinct roots; for, in Latin, the pret. is crevi, which can not be formed from crerno; and in Greek, the derivatives, κρίθω, κρίσις, κρίσις, can not be regularly formed from κρίνω. The Gr. κρίμα is undoubtedly a contraction; for in Norman the word is crimé. The root, then, of these derivatives is the same as of the It. crithar, a sieve, W. rhidyll, Eng. riddell, W. rhidias, to secrete, to separate. We have screen, a riddle, from the root of κρίνω, and riddle, from the Celtic root of crithis, crithis. To judge is to decide, to separate, or cut off, hence to condemn; a crime is that which is condemned.]

1. An act which violates a law, divine or human; an act which violates a rule of moral duty; an offense against the laws of right, prescribed by God or man, or against any rule of duty plainly implied in those laws. A crime may consist in omission or neglect, as well as in commission, or positive transgression. The commander of a fortress, who suffers the enemy to take possession by neglect, is as really criminal as one who voluntarily opens the gates without resistance.

But, in a more common or restricted sense, a crime denotes an offense, or violation of public law, of a deeper and more atrocious nature; a public wrong; or a violation of the commands of God, and the offenses against the laws made to preserve the public rights; as treason, murder, robbery, theft, arson, &c. The minor wrongs, committed against individuals or private rights, are denominated trespasses; and the minor wrongs against public rights are called misdemeanors. Crimes and misdemeanors are punishable by indictment, information, or public prosecution; trespasses or private injuries, at the suit of the individuals injured. But, in many cases, an act is considered both as a public offense and a trespass, and is punishable both by the public and the individual injured.

D in the English alphabet, is the fourth letter and the third articulation. It holds the same place in the English as in the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, Samaritan, Greek, and Latin alphabets. In the Arabic, it is the eighth; in the Russian, the fifth; and in the Ethiopic, the nineteenth letter.
 D is a dental articulation, formed by placing the end of the tongue against the gum just above the upper teeth. It is nearly allied to T, but is not so close a letter, or rather it does not interrupt the voice so suddenly as T, and in forming the articulation, there is a lingual and nasal sound, which has induced some writers to rank D among the lingual letters. It has but one sound, as in do, din, bad; and is never quiescent in English words, except in a rapid utterance of such words as handkerchief.
 As a numeral, D represents five hundred, and when a dash or stroke is placed over it, thus, \bar{D} , it denotes five thousand.

As an abbreviation, D stands for Doctor; as, M. D. Doctor of Medicine; D. T. Doctor of Theology, or S. T. D. Doctor of Sacred Theology; D. D. Doctor of Divinity, or doctor dedit; D. D. D. dat, dicit, dedit; and D. D. D. D. dignum Deo donum dedit.

The Sw. däre, rash, mad, sottish, dära, to infatuate, Dan. daere, may be of the same family. The Gr. Sappos, and Ar. دَار dāra, to be bold, audacious; to be angry, or averse; to be terrified, to flee. So in Sw. darra, to tremble. Temple. Such was the pronunciation which our ancestors brought from England. The word is in analogy with leaf, sheaf, and the long sound of the vowels naturally precedes the semi-vowel f. Def, from the Danish and Swedish pronunciation, is an anomaly in English of a singular kind, there being not another word like it in the language. The Saxon deadian is evidently a derivative of the participle dead. See Dye.

DRAGON, n. [L. draco; Gr. δρακων; It. dragone; Fr. dragon; D. draak; G. drache; It. draco or dragio; W. draig; Sw. drake; Dan. drage. The origin of this word is not obvious. In fr. drag is fire; in W. dragon is a leader, chief, or sovereign, from dragano, to draw. In Scotch, the word signifies a paper kite, as also in Danish; probably from the notion of flying or shooting along, like a fiery meteor. In Welsh, draig is rendered by Owen a procreator or generating principle, a fiery serpent, a dragon, and the Supreme; and the plural, draegiau, silent lightning, draegiau, to lighten silently. Hence, I infer that the word originally signified a shooting meteor in the atmosphere, a fiery meteor, and hence a fiery or flying serpent, from a root which signified to shoot or draw out.]

E, the second vowel end the fifth letter of the English alphabet, seems to be the ancient Phœnician and Hebrew \aleph inverted, corresponding nearly with the Chaldaic and later Hebrew η . Its long and natural sound in English coincides with the sound of i in the Italian and French languages, and is formed by a narrower opening of the glottis than that of a . It has a long sound, as in here, mere, me; a short sound, as in met, men; and the sound of an open or long, in there, prey, vein. As a final letter, it is generally quiescent; but it serves to lengthen the sound of the preceding vowel, or at least to indicate that the preceding vowel is to have its long sound, as in mane, cane, plume, which, without the final e, would be pronounced man, can, plum. After e and g, the final e serves to indicate that e is to be pronounced as s, and g as j. Thus, without the final e in mace, [mase,] this word would be pronounced mac, [mak,] and rage [raj] would be pronounced rag. In a numerous class of words, — the Greek, — the final e is silent, except a few from the Greek, — the final e is silent, serving no purpose whatever, unless to show from what language we have received the words; and in many cases, it does not answer this purpose. In words ending in ire, as active; in ite, as futile; in ine, as in anguine, examine; in ile, as in definite; e is, for the most part, silent. In some of these words, the use of e is borrowed from the French; in most or all cases, it is not authorized by the Latin originals; it is worse than useless, as it leads to a wrong pronunciation; and the retaining of it in such words is beyond measure absurd.

When two of this vowel occur together, the sound is the same as that of the single e long, as in deem, esteem, need; and it occurs often with an i, as in mean, hear, siege, deceive, in which cases, when one vowel only has a sound, the combination I call a digraph, [double written.] In these combinations, the sound is usually that of e long, but sometimes the short sound of e, as in lead, a metal, read, pret. of read, and sometimes the sound of a long, as in reign, feign, pronounced raen, faen. Irregularities of this kind are not reducible to rules.

As a numeral, E stands for 250. In the calendar, it is the fifth of the dominical letters. As an abbreviation, it stands for East, as in charts; E. N. E., east-north-east; E. S. E., east-south-east; E. by S., east by south.

EACH, (ĕch), a. [Scot. eik. This word is either a contraction of the Sax. ale, etc. D. elk, or the Ir. each, or gach, Basquo gacia, Fr. chaque, with the loss of the first articulation. With the Celtic corresponds the Russ. kajedi, each. I am inclined to believe both the English and Scottish words to be contractions of the Celtic each.]

Every one of any number separately considered or treated. The emperor distributed to each soldier in his army a liberal donative.

To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment. — Gen. xiv.

And the princes of Israel, being twelve men, each one was for the house of his fathers. — Num. I.

EAGLE, (ĕgl), n. [Fr. aigle; Sp. aguila; It. aquila; L. aquila. Qu. from his beak, Ch. Heb. \aleph , to be crooked, (see Bazlorf), or Pers. \aleph .]

1. A rapacious bird of the genus Falco. The beak is crooked, and furnished with a cere at the base, and the tongue is cloven or bifid. There are several species, as the bald or white-headed eagle, the sea eagle or ossifrage, the golden eagle, &c.

The eagle is one of the largest species of birds, has a keen sight, and preys on small animals, fish, &c. He lives to a great age; and it is said that one died at Vienna, after a confinement of a hundred and four years. On account of the elevation and rapidity of his flight, and of his great strength, he is called the king of birds. Hence the figure of an eagle was made the standard of the Romans, and a spread eagle is a principal figure in the arms of the United States of America. Hence, also, in heraldry, it is one of the most noble bearings in armory.

These nodules often embrace at the center a kernel or nucleus, sometimes movable, and always differing from the exterior in color, density, and fracture. To these hollow nodules the ancients gave the name of eagle-stones, from an opinion that the eagle transported them to her nest to facilitate the hatching of her eggs. Cleveland.

EARLY, (er'ly), v. [From Sax. er, er, before in time, Eng. ere, which indicates the root of the word to signify, to advance, to pass along, or shoot up. It is probably connected with the D. er, G. ahre, Sw. äbra, Dan. er, honor, denoting the highest point.]
 1. In advance of something else; prior in time; forward; as, early fruit, that is, fruit that comes to maturity before other fruit; early growth; early manhood; early old age or decrepitude, that is, premature old age. So an early spring; an early harvest.

EARN, (ern), v. t. [Sax. earnian, ernian, gearnian, to earn, to merit. It is connected in origin with EARN-EST and YEARN, which see. The primary sense is to strive or urge, implying an effort to advance or stretch forward.]

 Their earnest eyes were fixed. Milton.

4. Serious; important; that is, really intent or engaged; whence the phrase in earnest. To be in earnest, is to be really urging or stretching toward an object; intent on a pursuit. Hence, from fixed attention, comes the sense of seriousness in the pursuit, as opposed to trifling or jest. Are you in earnest or in jest?

EARN'EST, (ern'est), n. Seriousness; a reality; a real event; as opposed to jesting or feigned appearance.

Take heed that this jest do not one day turn to earnest. Sidney.

The earnest of the Spirit is given to the saints, as the assurance of their future enjoyment of God's favor and presence.

3. A part paid or delivered beforehand, as money or goods, under a contract, as a pledge and security for the whole. Thus, earnest, or earnest-money, is a first payment or deposit, giving promise or assurance of full payment, and serving also to bind the seller to the terms of the agreement. McCulloch.

EARTH, (erth), n. [Sax. eorð, eorþ, yrth; D. aarde; G. erde; Sw. iord, jord; Dan. iord]; Scut. erd, yard, yerth; Turk. jerdä; Tartaric, gyrdä. It coincides with the Heb. ארץ. The Ar. أرض aradh, from which the Arabic and Hebrew words corresponding to the Teutonic above, are derived, signifies to eat, gnaw, or corrode as a worm, or the teredo. It is obvious, then, that the primary sense of earth is fine particles, like mold. The verb may be from yrth, to break or bruise. The Ch. and Syr. ארץ, earth, may be contracted from the same word. See COARDED.]

1. Earth, in its primary sense, signifies the particles which compose the mass of the globe, but more particularly, the particles which form the fine mold on the surface of the globe; or it denotes any indefinite mass or portion of that matter. We throw up earth with a spade or plow; we fill a pit or ditch with earth; we form a rampart with earth. This substance being considered, by ancient philosophers, as simple, was called an element; and, in popular language, we still hear of the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water.

2. In chemistry, the term earth was, till lately, employed to denote a supposed simple elementary body or substance, defined to be tasteless, inodorous, un-inflammable, and infusible. But it has also been applied to substances which have a very sensible alkaline taste, as lime. The primitive earths have been reckoned ten in number; of which five are considered earths proper, namely, alumina, glucina, yttria, zirconia, and thoria; four possess decided alkaline properties, namely, baryta, strontia, lime or calcia, and magnesia; and one, silica, is regarded as an acid, and often called silicic acid. Recent experiments prove that all of them, except silica, are compounds of oxygen with metallic bases.

Davy, Silliman, Phillips, Ure.

3. The terraqueous globe which we inhabit. The earth is nearly spherical, but a little flattened at the poles, and hence its figure is called an oblate spheroid. It is one of the primary planets, revolving round the sun in an orbit which is between those of Venus and Mars. It is nearly eight thousand miles in diameter, and twenty-five thousand miles in circumference. Its mean distance from the sun is about ninety-five millions of miles, and its annual revolution constitutes the year of 365 days, 5 hours, and nearly 49 minutes.

4. The world, as opposed to other scenes of existence. Shak.

E-LEC'TRIC-I-TY, n. [from Gr. ηλεκτρον, amber.] 1. The subtle agent called the electric fluid, usually excited by the friction of glass. It was called electricity from the Greek word for amber, because it was in the friction of this substance that it was first observed. It is convenient to denominate it the electric fluid, although we know very little of its nature, because it has a greater resemblance to an elastic fluid of extreme rarity than to any thing else with which we are acquainted. Some bodies permit the electric fluid to pass freely through them, and are hence called conductors; others hardly permit it to pass through them at all, and are therefore called non-conductors. Metals are the best conductors; next, water and all moist substances; and next, the bodies of animals. Glass, resinous substances, (as amber, varnish, and sealing-wax,) air, silk, wool, cotton, hair, and feathers, are non-conductors. The phenomena of electricity are such as attraction and repulsion, heat and light, shocks of the animal system, and mechanical violence. Olmsted.

EL'E-GANCE, (n.) [L. elegancia; Fr. elegance; It. el'egancia.] el'eganta; probably from L. eligo, to choose, though irregularly formed.]

In its primary sense, this word signifies that which is choice or select, as distinguished from what is common.

1. "The beauty of propriety, not of greatness," says Johnson.

Applied to manners or behavior, elegance is that fine polish, politeness, or grace, which is acquired by a genteel education, and an association with well-bred company.

Applied to language, elegance respects the manner of speaking or of writing. Elegance of speaking, is the propriety of diction and utterance, and the gracefulness of action or gesture; comprehending correct, appropriate, and rich expressions, delivered in an agreeable manner. Elegance of composition, consists in correct, appropriate, and rich expressions, or well-chosen words, arranged in a happy manner. Elegance implies neatness, purity, and correct, perspicuous arrangement, and is calculated to please a delicate taste, rather than to excite admiration or strong feeling. Elegance is applied also to form. Elegance, in architecture, consists in the due symmetry and distribution of the parts of an edifice, or in regular proportions and arrangement. And, in a similar sense, the word is applied to the person or human body. The state of absolute passiveness, in consequence of any sudden percussive motion, is of short duration. The strong impression, or vivid sensation, immediately produces a reaction correspondent to its nature, either to appropriate and enjoy, or avoid and repel, the exciting cause. This reaction is very properly distinguished by the term emotion.

Emotions, therefore, according to the genuine signification of the word, are principally and primarily applicable to the sensible changes and visible effects which particular passions produce on the frame, in consequence of this reaction, or particular agitation of mind. Cogea on the Passions.

EVE, n. The consort of Adam, and mother of the human race; so called by Adam, because she was the mother of all living. In this case, the word would properly belong to the Heb. חַוָּה. But the Hebrew name is חַוָּה, havaah or chavaah, coinciding with the verb to show, to discover, and Parkhurst hence denominates Eve the manifest. In the Septuagint, Eve, in Gen. iii. 20, is rendered Zoa, life; but, in Gen. iv. 1, it is rendered Evan, Evan or Evan. The reason of this variation is not obvious, as the Hebrew is the same in both passages. In Russ. Eve is Evea. In the Chickasaw language of America, a wife is called anah, says Adair.

In strictness, evening commences at the setting of the sun, and continues during twilight; and night commences with total darkness.
