ENGRAVED FOR THE QUARTO EDITION OF WEBSTER'S AMERICAN DICTIONARY

AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY
OF THE
ENGLISH LANGUAGE;

CONTAINING

THE WHOLE VOCABULARY OF THE FIRST EDITION IN TWO VOLUMES QUARTO; THE ENTIRE CORRECTIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS OF THE SECOND EDITION IN TWO VOLUMES ROYAL OCTAVO;

TO WHICH IS PREFIXED

AN INTRODUCTORY DISSERTATION

ON THE

ORIGIN, HISTORY, AND CONNECTION, OF THE LANGUAGES OF WESTERN ASIA AND EUROPE,

WITH AN EXPLANATION

OF THE PRINCIPLES ON WHICH LANGUAGES ARE FORMED.

BY NOAH WEBSTER, LL. D.,

Member of the Michigan Historical Society.*

GENERAL SUBJECTS OF THIS WORK.

- I.—ETYMOLOGIES OF ENGLISH WORDS, DEDUCED FROM AN EXAMINATION AND COMPARISON OF WORDS OF CORRESPONDING ELEMENTS IN TWENTY LANGUAGES OF ASIA AND EUROPE.
- II.—THE TRUE ORTHOGRAPHY OF WORDS, AS CORRECTED BY THEIR ETYMOLOGIES.
- III.—PRONUNCIATION EXHIBITED AND MADE OBVIOUS BY THE DIVISION OF WORDS INTO SYLLABLES, BY ACCENTUATION, BY MARKING THE SOUNDS OF THE ACCENTED VOWELS, WHEN NECESSARY, OR BY GENERAL RULES.
- IV.—ACCURATE AND DISCRIMINATING DEFINITIONS, ILLUSTRATED, WHEN DOUBTFUL OR OBSCURE, BY EXAMPLES OF THEIR USE, SELECTED FROM RESPECTABLE AUTHORS, OR BY FAMILIAR PHRASES OF UNDISPUTED AUTHORITY.

REVISED AND ENLARGED,

PREFACE TO THE REVISED EDITION.

BY THE EDITOR.

THE demand for THE AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE has increased so rapidly within a few years past, that the publishers have felt the necessity of its being stereotyped, for the greater convenience of the public, in a single quarto volume. In deciding upon this measure, they were desirous that the work should be thoroughly revised anew, and that each department which it embraces, should be brought down, as far as possible, to the latest advances of science, literature, and the arts, at the present day. With this view, it was placed in the hands of Rev. CHAUNCEY A. GOODRICH, Professor in Yale College, as one of the members of Dr. WEBSTER's family, in the expectation of his obtaining such additional aid as might be necessary for the accomplishment of this design. The Editor has not acted, however, upon his own personal responsibility in executing this trust. He has, from time to time, laid open the sheets to the inspection of the other members of the family; and no important alterations have been made, especially in any of the leading characteristics of the work, except with the concurrence, or at the request, of Dr. Webster's legal representatives. In laying before the public an edition thus prepared, the fruit of nearly three years of care and attention, the Editor will be expected to make some brief statement of the principles on which he has conducted the revision, and the results of his labors as exhibited in the present volume.

This work was first published, in two quarto volumes, in the year 1828. At the expiration of twelve years, or in the year 1840, a second edition was published by the Author, in two royal octavo volumes. Of this he thus speaks in the Advertisement prefixed: "The improvements in this edition of the AMERICAN DICTIONARY consist chiefly in the addition of several thousand words to the vocabulary, the division of words into syllables, and the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, which are made conformable to recent discoveries and classifications. For the latter improvements, the Author is indebted chiefly to Professor TULLY, of the Medical College in New Haven. To these improvements may be added the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, frequently used by English authors, and in conversation; and also of many foreign terms used in books of music." In conducting this revision, Dr. Webster was aided in some part of his labors by his son, WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, Esq., of New Haven; who, also, at a subsequent period, prepared the revised Addenda, under the direction of his father. The later improvements of the Author, down to the period of his death, are here inserted under their proper heads, from the manuscripts which he left. By these successive revisions, and the one which has now been made, new matter, to the amount of more than three hundred pages, has been added to the work; all of which, by the use of a smaller type, and by careful compression, is now brought within the compass of this volume. Of the course pursued in the revision, it will now be proper briefly to speak.

In respect to the Etymologies, the Editor has not considered it as lying within his province, to make any material alterations. In a very few cases of obvious necessity, some slight change has been made. But the chief labor, in reference to this part of the work, has been bestowed on the difficult task of giving with accuracy the numerous words from Oriental and foreign languages, which are used in tracing the origin of our own.

The chief value of a dictionary consists in its Definitions; — in giving a clear, full, and accurate exhibition of all the various shades of meaning which belong, by established usage, to the words of a language. It is in this respect, especially, that Dr. WEBSTER'S Dictionary has been generally considered superior to every other, both of this country and of England. To this point, therefore, the labors of the Editor have been mainly directed. No efforts have been spared to obtain the most recent and valuable works, not only in lexicography, but in the various departments of science and the arts embraced in the American Dictionary. As these subjects are in a state of continual progress, every important word, in its various applications, has been diligently examined and compared with the statements made on each topic, by the latest and most approved authorities. Smart's English Dictionary, in the edition of 1846, has been carefully collated with this work, and also the unfinished one, in a course of publication, by Gilbert, so far as the numbers have appeared. Reference has likewise constantly been made to Richardson's Dictionary, — although this had been previously examined by Dr. Webster, — and also to the Analytical Dictionary of Booth. Each of the articles in Brande's Encyclopedia of Science, Literature, and Art, has been collated with the corresponding portions of this Dictionary, as the starting-point, when necessary, of investigation in larger treatises. The Penny Cyclopaedia has been consulted at every step, especially in matters of science; and the Encyclopedia Americana (based on the German Conversations-Lexikon) has been relied upon, particularly on subjects of continental literature, philosophy, history, art, &c. In order to secure greater accuracy, numerous special dictionaries, or vocabularies confined to some single department, have also been collated with this work; and the ablest treatises on important branches of science and art have been diligently examined. In architecture, the chief reliance has been placed on the Oxford Glossary of Architecture, (1845,) and the Encyclopedia of Architecture, (1842,) by Gwilt, author of the articles on this subject in Brande's Encyclopedia. In agriculture, Johnson's Farmer's Encyclopedia, (1844,) and Gardner's Farmer's Dictionary, (1846,) have been chiefly used. In general antiquities, the large treatise of Fosbroke has been frequently consulted, while in classical antiquities, the principal reliance has been placed on the recent dictionary of Smith, (1846,) as a work of the highest authority. In respect to the antiquities of the church, the elaborate work of Coleman (1841) has been frequently consulted; and Hook's Church Dictionary (1844) has been collated throughout, with reference to the rites, ceremonies, vestments, &c., of the Church of England, and also of the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. In botany, use has principally been made of the writings of Lindley and Loudon. In natural history, Partington's British Cyclopaedia of Natural History, (1835-7,) and Jardine's Naturalist's Library, (1834-43,) have been much consulted, in connection with the articles on these subjects in the Penny Cyclopaedia and similar works. In geology, mineralogy, and some associated branches of natural history, Humble's Dictionary of terms in these departments (1840) has been compared with this work throughout. In respect to mercantile subjects, banking, coins, weights, measures, &c., McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary (1845) has been collated at every step, as the standard work on these subjects. In manufactures and the arts, Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Manufactures, Arts, and Mines, with its Supplement, (1845,) has been relied upon as of the highest authority. In engineering and mechanical philosophy, Hebert's Engineer's and Mechanic's Cyclopaedia (1842) has been carefully collated, with a constant reference to the more popular and recent dictionaries of Francis, Grier, and Buchanan, in the editions of 1846. In seamanship, the Dictionary of Marine Terms, in Lieutenant Totten's Naval Text-Book, (1841,) has been taken as a guide. In military affairs, the dictionary of Campbell (1844) has been followed, in connection with the more extended articles contained in Brande and the Penny Cyclopaedia, on the kindred topics. In the fine arts, much use has been made of the dictionary of Elmes. In domestic economy, the Encyclopedia of Webster and Parkes on this subject (1844) has furnished many important statements, on a great variety of topics, presented for the first time in a scientific form; and to this has been added Cooley's Cyclopaedia of Practical Receipts, (1846,) as exhibiting much collateral information, in respect to the arts, manufactures, and trades. Such, in general, are the authorities which have been relied on in this revision.

But it is obviously impossible for any one mind to embrace with accuracy all the various departments of knowledge which are now brought within the compass of a dictionary. Hence arise most of the errors and inconsistencies which abound in works of this kind. To avoid these as far as possible, especially in matters of science, the Editor at first made an arrangement with Dr. JAMES G. PERCIVAL, who had rendered important assistance to Dr. Webster in the edition of 1828, to take the entire charge of revising the scientific articles embraced in this work. This revision, however, owing to causes beyond the control of either party, was extended to but little more than two letters of the alphabet; and the Editor then obtained the assistance of his associates in office, and of other gentlemen in various professional employments. To these he would now return his acknowledgments, for the aid they have afforded. The articles on law have been collated with Blackstone and Bouvier's Law Dictionary, by the Hon. ELIZUR GOODRICH, formerly Professor of Law in Yale College, and the errors discovered, which were few in number, have been carefully corrected. The departments of ecclesiastical history and ancient philosophy have been thoroughly revised by the Rev. JAMES MURDOCK, D. D., late Professor in the Andover Theological Seminary, who has furnished, in many instances, new and valuable definitions. The terms in chemistry have been submitted to Professor SILLIMAN, of Yale College; and whatever changes were requisite in the explanations, have been made under his direction. In the departments of botany, anatomy, physiology, medicine, and some branches of natural history, Dr. Webster received assistance, in the revision of 1840, as mentioned above, from Dr. WILLIAM TULLY, late Professor in the Medical Institution of Yale College. Still further aid has been received from the same source in the present revision, and much of the accuracy of this work, in these branches, will be found owing to the valuable assistance he has thus afforded. On topics connected with Oriental literature, aid has frequently been obtained from Professor GIBBS, of Yale College. A part of the articles on astronomy, meteorology, and natural philosophy, in the edition of 1828, passed under the revision of Professor OLMSTED, of Yale College. This revision has now been extended to all the articles on these subjects throughout the work, and new definitions have been furnished in numerous instances. The definitions in mathematics, after having been compared with those given in the dictionaries of Hutton, or Barlow, have been submitted to Professor STANLEY, of Yale College, and the alterations have, in all cases, been made under his direction. In the sciences of geology and mineralogy, a thorough revision of the whole volume has been made by JAMES D. DANA, Esq., Geologist and Mineralogist of the United States Exploring Expedition, and associate editor of the American Journal of Science and Arts, to whom the Editor is likewise indebted for assistance on various other subjects, which has greatly enhanced the value of the work. In practical astronomy and the science of entomology, aid has been frequently received from EDWARD C. HERRICK, Esq., Librarian of Yale College. The articles on painting and the fine arts have, to a great extent, passed under the inspection of NATHANIEL JOCELYN, Esq., Painter, of New Haven, and new definitions have in many cases been furnished.

A correspondence has likewise been carried on with literary friends in England, and especially with one of the contributors to the Penny Cyclopaedia, with a view to obtain information on certain points, in respect to which nothing definite could be learned from any books within the reach of the Editor. Extended lists of words have been transmitted for examination, and returned with ample notes and explanations. Much obscurity has thus been removed in respect to the use of terms which have a peculiar sense in England, especially some of frequent occurrence at the universities, in the circles of trade, and in the familiar intercourse of life. To the friends who have given their assistance in these various departments, the Editor would return his cordial thanks. Whatever improvement the work may have gained from this revision, in respect to clearness, accuracy, and fullness of definition, will be found owing, in a great degree, to the aid which they have thus afforded.

With regard to the insertion of new words, the Editor has felt much hesitation and embarrassment. Some thousands have been added in the course of this revision, and the number might have been swelled to many thousands more, without the slightest difficulty. There is, at the present day, especially in England, a boldness of innovation on this subject, which amounts to absolute licentiousness. A hasty introduction into our dictionaries, of new terms, under such circumstances, is greatly to be deprecated. Our vocabulary is already encumbered with a multitude of words, which have never formed a permanent part of English literature, and it is a serious evil to add to their number. Nothing, on the contrary, is so much needed as a thorough expurgation of our dictionaries in this respect,—the rejection of many thousands of words which may properly find a place in the glossaries of antiquarians, as a curious exhibition of what has been proposed, but never adopted, as a part of our language, but which, for that reason, can have no claim to stand in a dictionary designed for general use. All words, indeed, which are necessary to an understanding of our great writers, such as Bacon, Spenser, Shakspeare, &c., ought, though now obsolete, to be carefully retained; and in the present revision a considerable number of this class have been introduced for the first time. Other words have likewise been admitted to a limited extent, namely, the familiar terms of common life in England, which have been much used of late by popular writers in Great Britain. Many of these need to be explained for the benefit of readers in this country; and, if marked as “familiar,” “colloquial,” or “low,” according to their true character, they may be safely inserted in our dictionaries, and are entitled to a place there, as forming a constituent part of our written and spoken language. One of the most difficult questions on this subject, relates to the introduction of technical and scientific terms. Most of our general dictionaries are, at present, without any plan as to the extent and proportion in which such words should be inserted; nor can they ever be reduced to order until each department is revised by men of science who are intimately acquainted with the subjects, and who are competent to decide what terms ought to be admitted into a general dictionary, and what terms should be reserved for special dictionaries devoted to distinct branches of science. Something of this kind, on a limited scale, has been attempted in the progress of this revision. Lists of words have been obtained from the gentlemen mentioned above, which might properly be inserted in this volume; and very few terms of this class have been admitted except under their direction. In accordance with their advice, a small number have been excluded; but in this respect the Editor has not felt at liberty to carry out his views in their full extent.

In respect to Americanisms, properly so called, it is known to those who are conversant with the subject, that they are less numerous than has been generally supposed. Most of those familiar words, especially of our older states, which have been considered as peculiar to our country, were brought by our ancestors from Great Britain, and are still in constant use there as local terms. The recent investigations of Forby, Holloway, and Halliwell, have thrown much light on this subject; and the names of these authors are, therefore, frequently placed under the words in question, to indicate their origin and their present use in England. Notes have also been added to some words which are peculiar to our country; but their number is comparatively small.

In reference to Orthography, some important alterations have been made, but in strict conformity, it is believed, with the Author's principles on this subject. The changes in our orthography recommended by Dr. Webster, are of two distinct kinds, and rest on very different grounds. These it may be proper for a moment to consider. His main principle was, that the tendencies of our language to greater simplicity and broader analogies, ought to be watched and cherished with the utmost care. He felt, therefore, that whenever a movement toward wider analogies and more general rules, had advanced so far as to leave but few exceptions to impede its progress, those exceptions ought to be set aside at once, and the analogy rendered complete. On this ground, he rejected the u from such words as favour, labour, &c. Of these we have a large number, which came to us, in most cases, from Latin terminations in or, through the Norman French, but encumbered with a silent u, as in emperour, authour, editour, &c. From this entire class, except about twenty words, the u has been gradually dropped; and in respect to these, scarcely any two persons can be found, however strenuous for retaining it, who are in practice consistent with each other, or with themselves, as to the words in which this letter is used. In fact, we have reached a point where, unless we take Webster and the dictionaries which agree with him as our guide, we have no standard on the subject; for Johnson, Walker, and others, retain the u in numerous words, into which no one would think of introducing it at the present day. Public convenience, therefore, demands that we do at once what must ultimately be done. No one can believe that the progress of our language will be arrested on this subject. The u will speedily be omitted in all words of this class, unless, from the sacredness of its associations, it be retained in Saviour, which may stand for a time as a solitary exception. Nor is it Dr. Webster who is the innovator in this case, but the English mind, which has for two centuries been throwing off a useless encumbrance, and moving steadily on toward greater simplicity in the structure of our language. Such, too, is the case with certain terminations in re, pronounced like er; as, centre, metre, &c. We have numerous words of this class derived from the French, all of which originally ended in re; as, cider, (cidre,) chamber, (chambre,) &c. These have been gradually conformed to the English spelling and pronunciation, till the number in re is reduced to not far from twenty words with their derivatives; and in respect to them also the process is still going on. Center is, to a considerable extent, the spelling of the best mathematical writers. Meter is the word given by Walker in his Rhyming Dictionary, from a sense of the gross inconsistency of attaching to this word and its derivative diameter a different termination. Others are gradually undergoing the same change. Dr. Webster proposes, therefore, to complete the analogy at once, and conform the spelling of the few that remain to the general principles of our language. Acre, lucre, and massacre, present the only difficulty, from their liability, if changed, to be mispronounced, and may therefore be suffered to stand as necessary exceptions. Another departure from the principles of English orthography which Dr. Webster has endeavored to correct, is one that was pointed out by Walker, in very emphatic terms, nearly fifty years ago. The principle in question is this, — that, in adding to a word the formatives ing, ed, er, &c., a single consonant (if one precedes) is doubled when the accent falls on the last syllable, as in forgetting, beginning, &c., but is not doubled when the accent falls on any of the preceding syllables, as in benefiting, gardening, &c. Walker, in his fifth Aphorism, says, “Dr. Lowth justly remarks that an error frequently takes place in the words worshipping, counselling, &c., which, having the accent on the first syllable, ought to be written worshiping, counseling. An ignorance of this rule has led many to write bigotted for bigoted; and from this spelling has frequently arisen a false pronunciation. But no letter seems to be more frequently doubled improperly than l. Why we should write libelling, levelling, revelling, and yet offering, suffering, reasoning, I am totally at a loss to determine; and unless l can give a better plea than any other letter of the alphabet for being doubled in this situation, I must, in the style of Lucian in his trial of the letter T, declare for an expulsion." These were the deliberate and latest opinions of Walker. If he had taken the trouble to carry them into his vocabulary, instead of relying on a mere remark of this kind for the correction of the error,—if he had simply stated, under about forty verbs, how the participle should be spelt, (for he did not give participles in his Dictionary,) and had altered six or eight words, as worshipper into worshiper, traveller into traveler, &c., the error would probably, by this time, have been wholly eradicated from our orthography; and Dr. Webster would have escaped much ignorant vituperation, for following in the footsteps of Walker and of Lowth. Walker also says in his Aphorisms, "Why should we not write dullness, fullness, skillful, willful, as well as stiffness and gruffness?" The principles of our language plainly require us to do so; and Dr. Webster felt that the change might easily be made. The words which need to be reduced to this analogy are only about eight in number, including installment and inthrallment, which, if spelt with a single l, are liable to be mispronounced, instālment, &c. Again, the words expense, license, recompense, which formerly had a e in the last syllable, have now taken an s, because the latter consonant is the only one used in the derivatives; as, expensive, &c. A similar change is needed in only three words more to complete the analogy, namely, defense, offense, and pretense; and these Dr. Webster has changed. It is sometimes asked, "Why not change fence also?" For the simple reason, that its derivatives are spelt with a e, as fenced, fencing; and the word therefore stands regularly with others of its own class. Finally, Dr. Webster proposes to drop the u in mould and moult, because it has been dropped from gold, and all other words of the same ending.—Such are the principal changes under this head, introduced by Dr. Webster into his Dictionary. In the present edition, the words are spelt in both ways, for the convenience of the public, except in cases where this seemed to be unnecessary or was found to be inconvenient. These changes, considering the difficulty that always belongs to such a subject, have met with far more favor from the public, than was reasonably to be expected. Most of them have been extensively adopted in our country. They are gaining ground daily, as the reasons by which they are supported are more generally understood; and it is confidently believed that, being founded in established analogies, and intended merely to repress irregularities and remove petty exceptions, they must ultimately prevail.

The other class of changes mentioned above rests on a different basis,—that of Etymology. These will be estimated very differently, according to the acquaintance of different persons with the languages from which the words are derived. When Dr. Webster substituted bridegroom for bridegroom, fether for feather, &c., the German critics highly applauded the change. They predicted its speedy and universal reception, because similar improvements, on a much broader scale, had been easily made in their language. But Dr. Webster found the case to be widely different among us. After an experiment of twelve years, he restored the old orthography to a considerable number of such words. In the present edition, it is restored in respect to nearly all that remain, from the full conviction, that, however desirable these changes may be, in themselves considered, as they do not relate to the general analogies of the language, and can not be duly appreciated by the body of the people, they will never be generally received.*

On the subject of Pronunciation, much labor has been bestowed in the progress of this revision. A careful comparison has been made with the latest authorities, and wherever changes seemed desirable, and could be made in consistency with the Author's principles, they have been here introduced. The key to pronunciation has been somewhat enlarged, and placed at the bottom of each page for greater ease of reference, and the pointed letters have been used to a still greater extent. Many thousand words have been re-spelled, and no efforts have been spared to render the work, in all respects, a complete Pronouncing Dictionary. In the progress of these labors, the Editor has been frequently struck with the wisdom of Dr. Webster in not attempting too much as to marking the pronunciation. Most of the later orthoëpists, as Knowles, Smart, &c., have made their system of notation so extensive and complicated, and have aimed to exhibit so many nice shades of distinction, as in many cases to perplex rather than aid.

The Publishers, being desirous to make this, in all respects, a complete work of reference, have introduced, at the close of the volume, a list of Greek and Latin Proper Names, with their pronunciation, prepared by Professor THACHER, of Yale College; a list of Scripture Proper Names, prepared by Professor PORTER, of Yale College; and a Pronouncing Vocabulary of Modern Geographical Names, prepared also under the superintendence of Professor PORTER. Of these a full account will be found in the several prefaces by which they are accompanied.

In conclusion, the Editor would acknowledge his obligations to the gentlemen who have aided him, for more than two years, in these labors, — Mr. SAMUEL W. BARNUM, M. A., of Yale College, and WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, Esq., of New Haven. The intimate acquaintance of the latter with his father's views, has made his counsel and coöperation of great value in the progress of this revision.

To the overseers of the mechanical execution of this work, at the BOSTON TYPE AND STEREOTYPE FOUNDRY, the Editor would likewise make his acknowledgments for many valuable suggestions during the progress of the revision, and for the watchful care and assiduity with which they have performed the difficult task of giving accuracy to the details of this volume.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

IN the year 1783, just at the close of the Revolution, I published an elementary book for facilitating the acquisition of our vernacular tongue, and for correcting a vicious pronunciation, which prevailed extensively among the common people of this country. Soon after the publication of that work, I believe in the following year, that learned and respectable scholar, the Rev. Dr. GOODRICH, of Durham, one of the trustees of Yale College, suggested to me the propriety and expediency of my compiling a Dictionary, which should complete a system for the instruction of the citizens of this country in the language. At that time, I could not indulge the thought, much less the hope, of undertaking such a work; as I was neither qualified by research, nor had I the means of support, during the execution of the work, had I been disposed to undertake it. For many years, therefore, though I considered such a work as very desirable, yet it appeared to me impracticable; as I was under the necessity of devoting my time to other occupations for obtaining subsistence.

About thirty-five years ago, I began to think of attempting the compilation of a Dictionary. I was induced to this undertaking, not more by the suggestion of friends, than by my own experience of the want of such a work, while reading modern books of science. In this pursuit, I found almost insuperable difficulties, from the want of a dictionary, for explaining many new words, which recent discoveries in the physical sciences had introduced into use. To remedy this defect in part, I published my Compendious Dictionary in 1806; and soon after made preparations for undertaking a larger work.

My original design did not extend to an investigation of the origin and progress of our language, much less of other languages. I limited my views to the correcting of certain errors in the best English dictionaries, and to the supplying of words in which they are deficient. But after writing through two letters of the alphabet, I determined to change my plan. I found myself embarrassed at every step, for want of a knowledge of the origin of words, which JOHNSON, BAILEY, JUNIUS, SKINNER, and some other authors, do not afford the means of obtaining. Then, laying aside my manuscripts, and all books treating of language, except lexicons and dictionaries, I endeavored, by a diligent comparison of words having the same or cognate radical letters, in about twenty languages, to obtain a more correct knowledge of the primary sense of original words, of the affinities between the English and many other languages, and thus to enable myself to trace words to their source.

I had not pursued this course more than three or four years, before I discovered that I had to unlearn a great deal that I had spent years in learning, and that it was necessary for me to go back to the first rudiments of a branch of erudition which I had before cultivated, as I had supposed, with success.

I spent ten years in this comparison of radical words, and in forming a Synopsis of the principal Words in twenty Languages, arranged in Classes under their primary Elements or Letters. The result has been to open what are to me new views of language, and to unfold what appear to be the genuine principles on which these languages are constructed.

After completing this Synopsis, I proceeded to correct what I had written of the Dictionary, and to complete the remaining part of the work. But before I had finished it, I determined on a voyage to Europe, with the view of obtaining some books and some assistance which I wanted; of learning the real state of the pronunciation of our language in England, as well as the general state of philology in that country; and of attempting to bring about some agreement or coincidence of opinions, in regard to unsettled points in pronunciation and grammatical construction. In some of these objects I failed; in others, my designs were answered.

It is not only important, but in a degree necessary, that the people of this country should have an American Dictionary of the English Language; for, although the body of the language is the same as in England, and it is desirable to perpetuate that sameness, yet some differences must exist. Language is the expression of ideas; and if the people of one country can not preserve an identity of ideas, they can not retain an identity of language. Now, an identity of ideas depends materially upon a sameness of things or objects with which the people of the two countries are conversant. But in no two portions of the earth, remote from each other, can such identity be found. Even physical objects must be different. But the principal differences between the people of this country and of all others, arise from different forms of government, different laws, institutions, and customs. Thus the practice of hawking and hunting, the institution of heraldry, and the feudal system of England originated terms which formed, and some of which now form, a necessary part of the language of that country; but, in the United States, many of these terms are no part of our present language, — and they can not be, for the things which they express do not exist in this country. They can be known to us only as obsolete or as foreign words. On the other hand, the institutions in this country which are new and peculiar, give rise to new terms or to new applications of old terms, unknown to the people of England; which can not be explained by them, and which will not be inserted in their dictionaries, unless copied from ours. Thus the terms land-office; land-warrant; location of land; consociation of churches; regent of a university; intendant of a city; plantation, selectmen, senate, congress, court, assembly, escheat, &c., are either words not belonging to the language of England, or they are applied to things in this country which do not exist in that. No person in this country will be satisfied with the English definitions of the words congress, senate, and assembly, court, &c.; for although these are words used in England, yet they are applied in this country to express ideas which they do not express in that country. With our present constitutions of government, escheat can never have its feudal sense in the United States.

But this is not all. In many cases, the nature of our governments, and of our civil institutions, requires an appropriate language in the definition of words, even when the words express the same thing as in England. Thus the English dictionaries inform us that a justice is one deputed by the king to do right by way of judgment — he is a lord by his office — justices of the peace are appointed by the king's commission — language which is inaccurate in respect to this officer in the United States. So constitutionally is defined, by CHALMERS, legally; but in this country the distinction between constitution and law requires a different definition. In the United States, a plantation is a very different thing from what it is in England. The word marshal, in this country, has one important application unknown in England, or in Europe.

A great number of words in our language require to be defined in a phraseology accommodated to the condition and institutions of the people in these States, and the people of England must look to an American Dictionary for a correct understanding of such terms.

The necessity, therefore, of a dictionary suited to the people of the United States is obvious; and I should suppose that, this fact being admitted, there could be no difference of opinion as to the time when such a work ought to be substituted for English dictionaries.

There are many other considerations of a public nature, which serve to justify this attempt to furnish an American work which shall be a guide to the youth of the United States. Most of these are too obvious to require illustration.

One consideration, however, which is dictated by my own feelings, but which, I trust, will meet with approbation in correspondent feelings in my fellow-citizens, ought not to be passed in silence ; it is this :— "The chief glory of a nation," says Dr. Johnson, "arises from its authors." With this opinion deeply impressed on my mind, I have the same ambition which actuated that great man, when he expressed a wish to give celebrity to BACON, to HOOKER, to MILTON, and to BOYLE.

I do not indeed expect to add celebrity to the names of FRANKLIN, WASHINGTON, ADAMS, JAY, MADISON, MARSHALL, RAMSAY, DWIGHT, SMITH, TRUMBULL, HAMILTON, BELKNAP, AMES, MASON, KENT, HARE, SILLIMAN, CLEVELAND, WALSH, IRVING, and many other Americans distinguished by their writings or by their science ; but it is with pride and satisfaction that I can place them, as authorities, on the same page with those of BOYLE, HOOKER, MILTON, DRYDEN, ADDISON, RAY, MILNER, COWPER, DAVY, THOMSON, and JAMESON.

A life devoted to reading and to an investigation of the origin and principles of our vernacular language, and especially a particular examination of the best English writers, with a view to a comparison of their style and phraseology with those of the best American writers, and with our colloquial usage, enables me to affirm, with confidence, that the genuine English idiom is as well preserved by the unmixed English of this country, as it is by the best English writers. Examples to prove this fact will be found in the Introduction to this work. It is true that many of our writers have neglected to cultivate taste, and the embellishments of style ; but even these have written the language in its genuine idiom. In this respect, FRANKLIN and WASHINGTON, whose language is their hereditary mother tongue, unsophisticated by modern grammar, present as pure models of genuine English as ADDISON or SWIFT. But I may go further, and affirm, with truth, that our country has produced some of the best models of composition. The style of President SMITH ; of the authors of the FEDERALIST ; of Mr. AMES ; of Dr. MASON ; of Mr. HARPER ; of Chancellor KENT ; [the prose] of Mr. BARLOW ; of Dr. CHANNING ; of WASHINGTON IRVING ; of the legal decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States ; of the reports of legal decisions in some of the particular states ; and many other writings ; in purity, in elegance, and in technical precision, is equaled only by that of the best British authors, and surpassed by that of no English compositions of a similar kind.

The United States commenced their existence under circumstances wholly novel and unexampled in the history of nations. They commenced with civilization, with learning, with science, with constitutions of free government, and with that best gift of God to man, the Christian religion. Their population is now equal to that of England ; in arts and sciences, our citizens are very little behind the most enlightened people on earth ; in some respects, they have no superiors ; and our language, within two centuries, will be spoken by more people in this country than any other language on earth, except the Chinese, in Asia ; and even that may not be an exception.

It has been my aim in this work, now offered to my fellow-citizens, to ascertain the true principles of the language, in its orthography and structure ; to purify it from some palpable errors, and reduce the number of its anomalies, thus giving it more regularity and consistency in its forms, both of words and sentences ; and in this manner to furnish a standard of our vernacular tongue, which we shall not be ashamed to bequeath to five hundred millions of people, who are destined to occupy, and I hope to adorn, the vast territory within our jurisdiction.

If the language can be improved in regularity, so as to be more easily acquired by our own citizens and by foreigners, and thus be rendered a more useful instrument for the propagation of science, arts, civilization, and Christianity ;— if it can be rescued from the mischievous influence of sciolists, and that dabbling spirit of innovation, which is perpetually disturbing its settled usages and filling it with anomalies ;— if, in short, our vernacular language can be redeemed from corruptions, and our philology and literature from degradation ; it would be a source of great satisfaction to me to be one among the instruments of promoting these valuable objects. If this object can not be effected, and my wishes and hopes are to be frustrated, my labor will be lost, and this work must sink into oblivion.

This Dictionary, like all others of the kind, must be left, in some degree, imperfect ; for what individual is competent to trace to their source, and define in all their various applications, popular, scientific, and technical, seventy or eighty thousand words ! It satisfies my mind that I have done all that my health, my talents, and my pecuniary means, would enable me to accomplish. I present it to my fellow-citizens, not with frigid indifference, but with my ardent wishes for their improvement and their happiness ; and for the continued increase of the wealth, the learning, the moral and religious elevation of character, and the glory, of my country.

To that great and benevolent Being, who, during the preparation of this work, has sustained a feeble constitution, amidst obstacles and toils, disappointments, infirmities, and depression ; who has borne me and my manuscripts in safety across the Atlantic, and given me strength and resolution to bring the work to a close, I would present the tribute of my most grateful acknowledgments. And if the talent which he intrusted to my care, has not been put to the most profitable use in his service, I hope it has not been "kept laid up in a napkin," and that any misapplication of it may be graciously forgiven.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE EDITION OF 1840.

THE improvements in this edition of the AMERICAN DICTIONARY consist chiefly in the addition of several thousand words to the vocabulary, the division of words into syllables, and in the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, which are made conformable to recent discoveries and classifications. For the latter improvements, the author is indebted chiefly to Professor TULLY, of the Medical College in New Haven.

To these improvements may be added the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, frequently used by English authors and in conversation ; and also of many foreign terms used in books of music.

MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR.

BY THE EDITOR.

It is natural for those who make frequent use of a work like this, to desire some knowledge of the author's life, and especially of that long course of intellectual labor, by which he contributed so largely to the literary treasures of our language. To gratify this desire is the object of the present Memoir. A brief outline will be given of the leading occurrences of his life, with particular reference to the occasions which called forth the principal productions of his pen. The materials of this sketch were obtained from Dr. Webster himself, about ten years before his death, and were first used in the preparation of a memoir inserted in the "National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans," in the year 1833. That memoir has been re-written, with large additions, and is now brought down to the period of the author's death.

NOAH WEBSTER was born in Hartford, Connecticut, about three miles from the center of the city, on the 16th of October, 1758. His father was a respectable farmer and justice of the peace, and was a descendant, in the fourth generation, of John Webster, one of the first settlers of Hartford, who was a magistrate, or member of the colonial council from its first formation, and, at a subsequent period, governor of Connecticut. His mother was a descendant of William Bradford, the second governor of the Plymouth colony. The family was remarkable for longevity. His father died at the advanced age of nearly ninety-two. He and one of his brothers lived considerably beyond the age of eighty. His remaining brother died in his eightieth year; and of his two sisters, one was advanced beyond seventy, and the other had nearly reached the same age, at the period of their death.

Mr. Webster commenced the study of the classics, in the year 1772, under the instruction of the clergyman of the parish, the Rev. Nathan Perkins, D. D., and in 1774 was admitted a member of Yale College. The war of the revolution, commencing the next year, interrupted the regular attendance of the students on their usual exercises, and deprived them of no small part of the advantages of a collegiate course of instruction. In his Junior year, when the western part of New England was thrown into confusion by General Burgoyne's expedition from Canada, Mr. Webster volunteered his services under the command of his father, who was captain in the alarm list, a body comprising those of the militia who were above forty-five years of age, and who were called into the field only on pressing emergencies. In that campaign, all the males of the family, four in number, were in the army at the same time. Notwithstanding the interruption of his studies by these causes, Mr. Webster graduated with reputation in 1778.

The class to which he belonged produced an unusual number of men who were afterward distinguished in public life. Among these may be mentioned Joel Barlow, author of the Columbiad, and minister of the United States to the court of France; Oliver Wolcott, secretary of the treasury of the United States under the administration of Washington, and subsequently governor of the State of Connecticut; Uriah Tracy, a distinguished member of the senate of the United States; Stephen Jacob, chief justice, and Noah Smith, associate judge, of the Supreme Court of Vermont; Zephaniah Swift, chief justice, and Ashur Miller, associate judge, of the Supreme Court of Connecticut; besides a number of others who were either members of Congress, or among the leaders of our great political parties, at the commencement of the present century.

The period at which Mr. Webster entered upon life, was an unpropitious one for a young man to be cast upon the world without property. The country was impoverished by the war to a degree of which it is difficult, at the present day, to form any just conception; there was no prospect of peace; the issue of the contest was felt, by the most sanguine, to be extremely doubtful; and the practice of the law, which Mr. Webster intended to pursue, was in a great measure set aside by the general calamity. It was under these circumstances that, on his return from the Commencement when he graduated, his father gave him an eight dollar bill of the Continental currency, (then worth about four dollars in silver,) and told him that he must thenceforth rely on his own exertions for support. As a means of immediate subsistence, he resorted to the instruction of a school, and, during the summer of 1779, resided at Hartford, Connecticut, in the family of Mr., afterward Chief Justice, Ellsworth. An intimate friendship was thus formed between these two gentlemen, which was interrupted only by the death of the chief justice.

Not having the means of obtaining a regular education for the bar, Mr. Webster, at the suggestion of a distinguished counselor of his acquaintance, determined to pursue the study of the law in the intervals of his regular employment, without the aid of an instructor; and, having presented himself for examination, at the expiration of two years, was admitted to practice in the year 1781. As he had no encouragement to open an office, in the existing state of the country, he resumed the business of instruction, and taught a classical school, in 1782, at Goshen, in Orange county, New York. Here, in a desponding state of mind, created by the unsettled condition of things at the close of the war, and the gloomy prospects for business, he undertook an employment which gave a complexion to his whole future life. This was the compilation of books for the instruction of youth in schools. Having prepared the first draught of an elementary treatise of this kind, he made a journey to Philadelphia in the autumn of the same year, and, after exhibiting a specimen of the work to several members of Congress, among whom was Mr. Madison, and to the Rev. S. S. Smith, D. D., at that time a professor, and afterward president, of the college at Princeton, he was encouraged by their approbation to prosecute his design. Accordingly, in the winter following, he revised what he had written, and, leaving Goshen in 1783, he returned to Hartford, where he published his "First Part of a Grammatical Institute of the English Language." The second and third parts were published in the years immediately following. These works, comprising a Spelling Book, an English Grammar, and a compilation for reading, were the first books of the kind published in the United States. They were gradually introduced into most of the schools of our country; and to so great an extent has the Spelling Book been used, that, during the twenty years in which he was employed in compiling his American Dictionary, the entire support of his family was derived from the profits of this work, at a premium for copyright of less than a cent a copy. About twenty-four millions of this book have been published, down to the present year, 1847, in the different forms which it assumed under the revision of the author; and its popularity has gone on continually increasing. The demand for some years past, has averaged about one million copies a year. To its influence, probably, more than to any other cause, are we indebted for that remarkable uniformity of pronunciation in our country, which is so often spoken of with surprise by English travelers.

In entering thus early on his literary career, Mr. Webster did not confine himself to the publication of his own works. At a period when nothing had as yet been done to perpetuate the memorials of our early history, he led the way in this important branch of literary effort, by the publication of that highly valuable and characteristic work, Governor Winthrop's Journal. Having learnt that a manuscript copy was in possession of Governor Trumbull, of Connecticut, he caused it to be transcribed, at his own expense, by the governor's private secretary, and risked more than the amount of his whole property in its publication. The sale never remunerated him for the expenses thus incurred.

At the period of Mr. Webster's return to Hartford, in 1783, the state was agitated by violent dissensions, on the subject of a grant made by Congress to the army, of half pay for life, which was afterward commuted for a grant of full pay for five years beyond their term of service. To this grant it was strongly objected, that, if the army had suffered by the reduced value of the bills in which they were paid, the country at large had sustained an equal loss by the depreciation of the currency, and by other causes. So strong was the excitement on this subject, that public meetings were held throughout the state, to prevent the laws of Congress from being carried into effect; and at length a convention met at Middletown with the same design, at which two thirds of the towns in Connecticut were represented. In this state of things, Mr. Webster, though only twenty-five years of age, came forward to vindicate the measures of Congress, and wrote a series of papers on the subject, under the signature of HONORATUS, which were published in the Connecticut Courant, and read extensively throughout the state. The effect was great. At the next election, in April, 1784, a large majority of the legislature were supporters of Congress in their measures. So highly were Mr. Webster's services appreciated on this occasion, that he received the thanks of Governor Trumbull in person, and was publicly declared, by a member of the council, to have "done more to allay popular discontent, and support the authority of Congress at this crisis, than any other man."

These occurrences in his native state, together with the distress and stagnation of business in the whole country, resulting from the want of power in Congress to carry its measures into effect, and to secure to the people the benefits of a stable government, convinced Mr. Webster, that the old confederation, after the dangers of the war were past, was utterly inadequate to the necessities of the people. He therefore published a pamphlet, in the winter of 1784-5, entitled "Sketches of American Policy," in which, after treating of the general principles of government, he endeavored to prove that it was absolutely necessary, for the welfare and safety of the United States, to establish a new system of government, which should act not on the states, but directly on individuals, and vest in Congress full power to carry its laws into effect. Being on a journey to the Southern States, in May, 1785, he went to Mount Vernon, and presented a copy of this pamphlet to General Washington. It contained, the writer believes, the first distinct proposal, made through the medium of the press, for a new constitution of the United States.

One object of Mr. Webster's journey to the south was, to petition the state legislatures for the enactment of a law securing to authors an exclusive right to the publication of their writings. In this he succeeded to a considerable extent; and the public attention was thus called to a provision for the support of American literature, which was rendered more effectual by a general copyright law, enacted by Congress soon after the formation of our government. At a much later period, (in the years 1830-31,) Mr. Webster passed a winter at Washington, with the single view of endeavoring to procure an alteration of the existing law, which should extend the term of copyright, and thus give a more ample reward to the labors of our artists and literary men. In this design he succeeded; and an act was passed more liberal in its provisions than the former law, though less so than the laws of some European governments on this subject.

On his return from the south, Mr. Webster spent the summer of 1785 at Baltimore, and employed his time in preparing a course of lectures on the English language, which were delivered, during the year 1786, in the principal Atlantic cities, and were published in 1789, in an octavo volume, with the title of "Dissertations on the English Language."

The year 1787 was spent by Mr. Webster at Philadelphia, as superintendent of an Episcopal academy. The convention which framed the present constitution of the United States were in session at Philadelphia during a part of this year; and when their labors were closed, Mr. Webster was solicited by Mr. Fitzsimmons, one of the members, to give the aid of his pen in recommending the new system of government to the people. He accordingly wrote a pamphlet on this subject, entitled an "Examination of the Leading Principles of the Federal Constitution."

In 1788, Mr. Webster attempted to establish a periodical in New York, and for one year published the "American Magazine," which, however, failed of success; as did also an attempt to combine the efforts of other gentlemen in a similar undertaking. The country was not yet prepared for such a work.

In 1789, when the prospects of business became more encouraging, after the adoption of the new constitution, Mr. Webster settled himself at Hartford in the practice of the law. Here he formed or renewed an acquaintance with a number of young men just entering upon life, who were ardently devoted, like himself, to literary pursuits. Among these may be mentioned his two classmates, Barlow and Wolcott; Trumbull, author of McFingal; Richard Alsop; Dr. Lemuel Hopkins; and, though somewhat older, the Rev. Nathan Strong, pastor of the First Congregational Church, who, in common with the three last mentioned, was highly distinguished for the penetration of his intellect and the keenness of his wit. The incessant contact of such minds, at the forming period of their progress, had great influence on the literary habits of them all, in after life. It gave them a solid and manly cast of thought, a simplicity of taste, a directness of statement, a freedom from all affectation and exuberance of imagery or diction, which are often best acquired by the salutary use of ridicule, in the action and reaction on each other of keen and penetrating minds. It had, likewise, a powerful influence on the social circles in which they moved; and the biographer of Governor Wolcott has justly remarked, that at this time "few cities in the Union could boast of a more cultivated or intelligent society than Hartford, whether men or women."

In the autumn of the same year, encouraged by the prospect of increasing business, Mr. Webster married the daughter of William Greenleaf, Esq., of Boston, a lady of a highly cultivated intellect, and of great elegance and grace of manners. His friend Trumbull speaks of this event in one of his letters to Wolcott, who was then at New York, in his characteristic vein of humor. "Webster has returned, and brought with him a very pretty wife. I wish him success; but I doubt, in the present decay of business in our profession, whether his profits will enable him to keep up the style he sets out with. I fear he will breakfast upon Institutes, dine upon Dissertations, and go to bed supperless." The result, however, was more favorable than it appeared in the sportive anticipations of Trumbull. Mr. Webster found his business profitable, and continually increasing, during his residence of some years in the practice of the law at Hartford.

This employment he was induced to relinquish, in 1793, by an interesting crisis in public affairs. General Washington's celebrated proclamation of neutrality, rendered necessary by the efforts of the French minister, Genet, to raise troops in our country for the invasion of Louisiana, and to fit out privateers against nations at peace with the United States, had called forth the most bitter reproaches of the partisans of France; and it was even doubtful, for a time, whether the unbounded popularity of the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY could repress the public effervescence in favor of embarking in the wars of the French revolution. In this state of things, Mr. Webster was strongly solicited to give the support of his pen to the measures of the administration, by establishing a daily paper in the city of New York. Though conscious of the sacrifice of personal ease which he was called upon to make, he was so strongly impressed with the dangers of the crisis, and so entirely devoted to the principles of Washington, that he did not hesitate to accede to the proposal. Removing his family to New York, in November, 1793, he commenced a daily paper, under the title of the Minerva, and afterward a semi-weekly paper, with that of the Herald, names which were subsequently changed to those of the Commercial Advertiser, and New York Spectator. This was the first example of a paper for the country, composed of the columns of a daily paper, without recomposition—a practice which has now become very common. In addition to his labors as sole editor of these papers, Mr. Webster published, in the year 1794, a pamphlet which had a very extensive circulation, entitled "The Revolution in France."

The publication of the treaty negotiated with Great Britain by Mr. Jay, in 1795, aroused an opposition to its ratification of so violent a nature, as to stagger for a time the firmness of Washington, and to threaten civil commotions. Mr. Webster, in common with General Hamilton and some of the ablest men of the country, came out in vindication of the treaty. Under the signature of CURTIUS, he published a series of papers, which were very extensively reprinted throughout the country, and afterward collected by a bookseller of Philadelphia in a pamphlet form. Of these, ten were contributed by himself, and two by Mr., afterward Chancellor, Kent. As an evidence of their effect, it may not be improper to state, that Mr. Rufus King expressed his opinion to Mr. Jay, that the essays of CURTIUS had contributed more than any other papers of the same kind, to allay the discontent and opposition to the treaty; assigning as a reason, that they were peculiarly well adapted to the understanding of the people at large.

When Mr. Webster resided in New York, the yellow fever prevailed at different times in most of our large Atlantic cities; and a controversy arose among the physicians of Philadelphia and New York, on the question whether it was introduced by infection, or generated on the spot. The subject interested Mr. Webster deeply, and led him into a laborious investigation of the history of pestilential diseases at every period of the world. The facts which he collected, with the inferences to which he was led, were embodied in a work of two volumes, octavo, which, in 1799, was published both in this country and in England. This work has always been considered as a valuable repository of facts; and during the prevalence of the Asiatic cholera in the year 1832, the theories of the author seemed to receive so much confirmation, as to excite a more than ordinary interest in the work, both in Europe and America.

During the wars which were excited by the French revolution, the power assumed by the belligerents to blockade their enemies' ports by proclamation, and the multiplied seizures of American vessels bound to such ports, produced various discussions respecting the rights of neutral nations in time of war. These discussions induced Mr. Webster to examine the subject historically; and, in 1802, he published a treatise full of minute information and able reasoning on the subject. A gentleman of competent abilities, who said he had read all that he could find on that subject, in the English, French, German, and Italian languages, declared that he considered this treatise as the best he had seen. The same year, he also published "Historical Notices of the Origin and State of Banking Institutions and Insurance Offices," which was republished in Philadelphia by one Humphrey, without giving credit to the author; and a part of which, taken from this reprint, was incorporated into the Philadelphia edition of Rees's Cyclopaedia.

At this time, Mr. Webster resided at New Haven, to which place he had removed in the spring of 1798. For a short period after his departure from New York, he wrote for the papers mentioned above, which, although placed under the care of another editor, continued for a time to be his property. He very soon succeeded, however, in disposing of his interest in them, and from that time devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits.

In the year 1807, Mr. Webster published "A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language." This was a highly original work, the result of many years of diligent investigation. The author's views may be gathered from the motto on the title page, taken from Lord Bacon's Aphorisms,—"Antiathenes, being asked what learning was most necessary, replied, 'To unlearn that which is naught.'" He considered our English Grammars as objectionable in one important respect, namely, that of being too much conformed to those of the Latin and Greek languages in their nomenclature and classification. True philosophy, he maintained, requires us to arrange things, and give them names, according to their real nature. But our language is rude and irregular, in comparison with those of the ancients. It can not be reduced to the same orderly system. The several parts of it can not be brought under the same names and classifications. We need, therefore, a nomenclature of our own, in some important particulars. Thus the word pronoun properly denotes a substitute for a noun. But, in many cases, words of this class are substitutes for clauses, or parts of sentences, and not for single nouns. There are also other words, not ordinarily ranged among pronouns, which act equally as substitutes, that is, perform the office of pronouns. Mr. Webster, therefore, proposed to lay aside the word pronoun, and apply the term substitute to this whole class, as describing their true office. Other changes were proposed; of the same nature, and for the same reasons. No one, who examines the subject with attention, can doubt the advantages of Mr. Webster's nomenclature, in itself considered. It enabled him to give an analysis of sentences, and to explain constructions, in a manner incomparably superior to that of the ordinary systems. His intimate acquaintance with the sources of our language prepared him to account, in the most satisfactory manner, for many puzzling forms of expression. Still, the prejudice against a change of nomenclature is so great, that this work has been far less known than it ought to be. It contains much valuable matter found in no other work, and is believed to be the most truly philosophical Grammar which we have of the English language.

After publishing his Grammar, Mr. Webster entered, in the same year, (1807,) on the great work of his life, which he had contemplated for a long period, — that of preparing a new and complete Dictionary of the English language. As preliminary to this, he had published, in 1806, a dictionary in the octavo form, containing a large number of words not to be found in any similar work, with the definitions corrected throughout, though necessarily expressed in very brief terms. From this time, his reading was turned more or less directly to this object. A number of years were spent in collecting words which had not been introduced into the English dictionaries; in discriminating with exactness the various senses of all the words in our language, and adding those significations which they had recently received. Some estimate may be formed of the labor bestowed on this part of the work, from the fact that "The American Dictionary of the English Language" contained, in the first edition, twelve thousand words, and between thirty and forty thousand definitions, which are not to be found in any preceding work. The number has been swelled, by subsequent additions, to about thirty thousand new words. Seventy years had elapsed since the first publication of Johnson's Dictionary; and scarcely a single improvement had been attempted in the various editions through which it had passed, or the numerous compilations to which it had given rise, except by the addition of a few words to the vocabulary. Yet in this period the English mind was putting itself forth in every direction, with an accuracy of research and a fertility of invention which are without a parallel in any other stage of its history. A complete revolution had taken place in almost every branch of physical science; new departments had been created, new principles developed, new modes of classification and description adopted. The political changes which so signally marked that period, the excitement of feeling and conflict of opinion resulting from the American and French revolutions, and the numerous modifications which followed in the institutions of society, had also left a deep impress on the language of politics, law, and general literature. Under these circumstances, to make a defining dictionary adapted to the present state of our language, was to produce an entirely new work; and how well Mr. Webster executed the task, will appear from the decision of men best qualified to judge, both in this country and in Europe, who have declared that his improvements upon Johnson, are even greater than Johnson himself made on those who preceded him. Still more labor, however, was bestowed on another part of the work, viz., the etymology of our leading terms. In this subject, Mr. Webster had always felt a lively interest, as presenting one of the most curious exhibitions of the progress of the human mind. But it was not till he had advanced considerably in the work as originally commenced, that he found how indispensable a knowledge of the true derivation of words is, to an exact development of their various meanings. At this point, therefore, he suspended his labors on the defining part of the Dictionary, and devoted a number of years to an inquiry into the origin of our language, and its connection with those of other countries. In the course of these researches, he examined the vocabularies of twenty of the principal languages of the world, and made a synopsis of the most important words in each; arranging them under the same radical letters, with a translation of their significations, and references from one to another, when the senses are the same or similar. He was thus enabled to discover the real or probable affinities between the different languages, and, in many instances, to discover the primary, physical idea of an original word, from which the secondary senses have branched forth. Being thus furnished with a clew to guide him among the numerous, and often apparently inconsistent, significations of our most important words, he resumed his labors on the defining part of the Dictionary, and was able to give order and consistency to much that had before appeared confused and contradictory. The results of his inquiries into the origin and filiation of languages, were embodied in a work, about half the size of the American Dictionary, entitled "A Synopsis of Words in Twenty Languages." This, owing to the expense of the undertaking, has not yet been published; though its principal results, so far as our language is concerned, are briefly given in tracing the etymology of our leading terms.

During the progress of these labors, Mr. Webster, finding his resources inadequate to the support of his family at New Haven, removed, in 1812, to Amherst, a pleasant country town within eight miles of Northampton, Massachusetts. Here he entered, with his characteristic ardor, into the literary and social interests of the people among whom he was placed. His extensive library, which was open to all, and his elevated tone of thought and conversation, had naturally a powerful influence on the habits and feelings of a small and secluded population. It was owing, in part, probably, to his removal to this town, that an academy was there established, which is now among the most flourishing seminaries of our land. A question having soon after arisen respecting the removal of Williams College from a remote part of the state to some more central position, Mr. Webster entered warmly into the design of procuring its establishment at Amherst, as one of the most beautiful and appropriate locations in New England. Though the removal did not take place, so strong an interest on the subject was awakened in Amherst and the neighboring towns, that a new college was soon after founded there, in the establishment of which Mr. Webster, as president of its first board of trustees, had great influence, both by his direct exertions to secure it patronage, and by the impulse which he had given to the cause of education in that part of the state.

In 1822, Mr. Webster returned with his family to New Haven, and, in 1823, received the degree of LL. D. from Yale College.

Having nearly completed his Dictionary, he resolved on a voyage to Europe, with a view to perfect the work by consulting literary men abroad, and by examining some standard authors, to which he could not gain access in this country. He accordingly sailed for France in June, 1824, and spent two months at Paris in consulting several rare works in the Bibliothèque du Roi, and then went to England, where he remained till May, 1825. He spent about eight months at the University of Cambridge, where he had free access to the public libraries; and there he finished "THE AMERICAN DICTIONARY." He afterward visited London, Oxford, and some of the other principal cities of England, and in June returned to this country. This visit to England gave him an opportunity to become acquainted with literary men and literary institutions in that country, and to learn the real state of the English language there.

Soon after Dr. Webster returned to this country, the necessary arrangements were made for the publication of the work. An edition of twenty-five hundred copies was printed in this country, at the close of 1828, which was followed by an edition of three thousand in England, under the superintendence of E. H. Barker, Esq., editor of the Thesaurus Græcæ Linguae of Henry Stephens. With the publication of the American Dictionary, at the age of seventy, Dr. Webster considered the labors of his literary life as brought, in a great measure, to a close. He revised a few of his earlier works for publication, and particularly his "History of the United States," a book designed for the higher classes of schools, for youth who are acquiring a taste for history, and for men of business who have not time to peruse larger treatises.

In 1840, Dr. Webster published a second edition of the American Dictionary, consisting of three thousand copies, in two volumes, royal octavo. The improvements consisted chiefly in the addition of a number of thousand words to the vocabulary, the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, in conformity with later discoveries and classifications, and the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, and of foreign terms used in books of music.

In 1843, he published "A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects," in one volume, octavo. This was composed chiefly of tracts and disquisitions, which had been published at an earlier period of his life, either in the form of pamphlets, or of papers read before literary and philosophical societies, and printed among their Transactions. It contains his "Observations on the French Revolution," his "Essay on the Rights of Neutral Nations," and the papers signed CURTIUS, in vindication of Mr. Jay's treaty with Great Britain. To these is added an elaborate dissertation "On the supposed Change in the Temperature of Winter," which was read before the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, in the year 1799. In this he controverts the opinion which has generally prevailed, that the temperature of the winter season, in northern latitudes, has suffered a material change, and become warmer in modern than it was in ancient times. The subject was one which required very great minuteness and extent of historical research, and this paper contains the result of a series of investigations, which had been carried on, in conjunction with the author's other pursuits, for a period of more than ten years. Many of the facts which it presents are of a very curious and striking nature. There is, probably, no other treatise which exhibits the historical evidence on this subject with so much fullness and accuracy. In addition to this, the volume contains a number of other papers of an interesting character, and the whole collection forms a truly valuable record of the author's earlier labors.

In thus tracing the principal events of Dr. Webster's life, we have reached the commencement of the year in which he died; and it may here be proper to pause for a moment, and consider some of those qualities and habits of mind, which prepared him for this long course of public service and literary labor. The leading traits in the character of Dr. Webster were enterprise, self-reliance, and indomitable perseverance. He was naturally of a sanguine temperament; and the circumstances under which he entered on the active duties of life, were eminently suited to strengthen the original tendencies of his nature. Our country was just struggling into national existence. The public mind was full of ardor, energy, and expectation. His early associates were men of powerful intellect, who were engaged, to a great extent, in laying the foundations of our government, and who have stamped the impress of their genius on the institutions of their country. As the advocate of the Federal Constitution, and a strenuous supporter of Washington's administration, he was brought into habits of the closest intimacy with Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, Oliver Wolcott, Timothy Pickering, and the other great men on whom Washington relied for counsel and aid in organizing the new government. The journal which he established at New York was their organ of communication with the public, in the great commercial emporium of the United States. He was thus placed on terms of constant and confidential intercourse with the leading members of the cabinet, and the prominent supporters of Washington throughout the country. While he had their respect as a ready and energetic writer, he enjoyed their counsel, imparted with the utmost freedom, as to the manner in which he might best conduct the defense of their common principles. The natural result, especially on a mind constituted like his, was the formation of all his habits of thought and action, into a resemblance to theirs. Energy, self-reliance, fearlessness, the resolute defense of whatever he thought right and useful, the strong hope of ultimate success,—these became the great elements of his intellectual character. He carried them with him, at a subsequent period, into all his literary pursuits, and they sustained him under the pressure of difficulties which would have crushed the spirit of almost any other man.

One of the habits which Dr. Webster formed in this early course of training, was that of arranging all his acquired knowledge in the most exact order, and keeping the elements of progressive thought continually within his reach. Although his memory was uncommonly quick and tenacious, he saw, as the editor of a daily journal, how idle and unsafe it is, to rely on mere recollection for the immense mass of materials which a public writer must have ever at command. He learnt, therefore, to preserve documents of all kinds with the utmost care. All that he had ever written, all that had been written against him, every thing that he met with in newspapers or periodicals which seemed likely to be of use at any future period, was carefully laid aside in its appropriate place, and was ready at a moment's warning. He had also a particular mark by which he denoted, in every work he read, all the new words, or new senses of words, which came under his observation. He filled the margin of his books with notes and comments containing corrections of errors, a comparison of dates, or references to corresponding passages in other works, until his whole library became a kind of Index Rerum, to which he could refer at once for every thing he had read.

Another habit which resulted in part from his early pursuits, was that of carrying on numerous and diversified employments at the same time. To men of the present generation, Dr. Webster is known chiefly as a learned philologist; and the natural inference would be, that he spent his whole life among his books, and chiefly in devotion to a single class of studies. The fact, however, was far otherwise. Though he was always a close student,—reading, thinking, and writing at every period of his life,—he never withdrew himself from the active employments of society. After his first removal to New Haven, he was for a number of years one of the aldermen of the city, and judge of one of the state courts. He also frequently represented that town in the legislature of the state. During his residence at Amherst, he was called, in repeated instances, to discharge similar duties, and spent a part of several winters at Boston as a member of the General Court. He entered with zeal into all the interests of the town and county where he lived, its schools and academies, its agriculture and mechanic arts, its advance in taste and refinement. He gave freely of his time, his counsel, and the efforts of his pen, when requested, in public addresses, or through the medium of the press, for the promotion of every kind of social improvement. Equally large and diversified was the range of his intellectual pursuits. There was hardly any department of literature which he had not explored with lively interest, at some period of his life. He wrote on a greater variety of topics than perhaps any other author of the United States;—on the foundations of government, the laws of nations, the rights of neutrals, the science of banking, the history of his country, the progress of diseases, and the variations of climate; on agriculture, commerce, education, morals, religion, and the great means of national advancement, in addition to the principal theme of his life, philology and grammar. Such was the activity of his mind, and the delight he found in new acquisitions, that a change of employment was all the relief he needed from the weariness of protracted study. The refreshment which others seek in journeys, or the entire suspension of intellectual effort, he found, during most of his life, in the stimulus afforded by some new and exciting object of pursuit. Mental exertion was the native element of his soul; and it is not too much to say, that another instance of such long-continued literary toil, such steady, unflinching industry, can hardly be found in the annals of our country.

The last of those mental habits which will now be traced, was that of original investigation, of thorough and penetrating research. The period at which Dr. Webster came forward in public life was one, to an uncommon extent, in which every important subject was discussed in its principles. It was a period when the foundations of our civil polity were laid, and when such men as Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, became “the expounders of the constitution,” and the advocates of the new government. All things conspired to make the discussions of that day masterly exhibitions of reasoning and profound investigation,—the character of the men engaged, the conflict of great principles, and the weighty interests suspended on the issue. Dr. Webster for some years took a large share in these discussions, both in pamphlets and through the journal which he conducted. The habits which he thus formed went with him into all the literary pursuits of his subsequent life. They made him a bold, original thinker,—thorough in all his investigations, and fearless in proclaiming the results. He had no deference for authority, except as sustained by argument. He was no copyist, no mere compiler. Every thing he wrote, from a chapter in “The Prompter,” to his “Introduction to the American Dictionary,” bore the same impress of original thought, personal observation, and independent inquiry.

It is unnecessary to say how perfectly these habits were adapted to prepare Dr. Webster for the leading employment of his life, the production of the American Dictionary. Nothing but his eager pursuit of every kind of knowledge, and his exact system in bringing all that he had ever read completely under his command, could have enabled him to give in his first edition more than twelve thousand words and forty thousand definitions, which could then be found in no other similar work. Nothing but his passion for original investigation prevented him from building, like Todd, on the foundation of Johnson, or arranging Horne Tooke’s etymologies, like Richardson, with some additions and improvements, under their proper heads in a dictionary. But, commencing with the Diversions of Purley as the starting-point of his researches, he was led by the character of his mind to widen continually the field of his inquiries. He passed from the western languages to the eastern, in tracing the affinities of his native tongue. He established some of those great principles which have made etymology a science, and led the way in that brilliant career of investigation, by which the German philologists are throwing so clear a light on the origin and filiation of the principal languages of the globe. But into these studies he would never have entered, nor even thought of attempting such a work as an original dictionary of the English language, except under the impulse of those other traits,—that sanguine temperament, that spirit of self-reliance, that fearless determination to carry out every thing that he thought useful and true, to its utmost limits,—which were spoken of above, as forming the master principle of his character. It is difficult to conceive, at the present day, how rash and hopeless such an undertaking then appeared, on the part of any citizen of the United States. It was much as though we should now hear of a similar design by one of the settlers of New Holland. He was assailed with a storm of ridicule at home and abroad; and even his best friends, while they admired his constancy, and were fully convinced of his erudition, had strong fears that he was engaged in a fruitless effort,—that he would never have justice done him, in bringing his work before the world under such adverse circumstances. Nothing, plainly, but uncommon ardor, boldness, and self-confidence, could have sustained him under the pressure of these difficulties. But such qualities, it must be confessed, notwithstanding all the support they afford, are not without their disadvantages. They often lead to the adoption of hasty opinions, especially in new and intricate inquiries. Of this Dr. Webster was aware. He saw reason to change his views on many points, as he widened the sphere of his knowledge. In such cases, he retracted his former statements with the utmost frankness; for he had not a particle of that pride of opinion which makes men so often ashamed to confess an error, even when they have seen and abandoned it. This ardor of mind is apt, also, to lead men into a strength and confidence of statement which may wear at times the aspect of dogmatism. If Dr. Webster should be thought by any one to have erred in this respect, the error, it should be remembered, was one of temperament,—the almost necessary result of that bold, self-relying spirit, without which no man could have undertaken, much less have carried through, the Herculean task of preparing the American Dictionary. Those, however, who knew him best, can testify, that his strength of statement, however great it might be, was never the result of arrogance or presumption. He spoke from the mere frankness of his nature; he practiced no reserve; he used none of that cautious phraseology with which most men conceal their feelings, or guard against misconstruction. He was an ardent lover of truth, and he spoke of the discoveries which he believed himself to have made, much as he would have spoken of the same discoveries when made by others. He was aware that there must be many things in a book like this, especially on a science so imperfect in its development as etymology, which would not stand the test of time. But he never doubted, even in the darkest seasons of discouragement and obloquy, that he could at last produce such a work, that the world "should not willingly let it die." The decision of the public verified his anticipations, and freed him from the charge of presumption. Three very large editions, at a high price, have already been exhausted in this country and England. The demand is still increasing on both sides of the Atlantic; and the author might well be gratified to learn, that a gentleman who asked, some years since, at one of the principal bookselling establishments of London, for the best English dictionary on their shelves, had this work handed to him, with the remark, "That, sir, is the only real dictionary which we have of our language, though it was prepared by an American."

In his social habits, Dr. Webster was distinguished by dignified ease, affability, and politeness. He was punctilious in his observance of all the nicer proprieties of life. There was nothing that annoyed him more, or on which he remarked with greater keenness, than any violation of the established rules of decorum, any disposition to meddle with the concerns of others, or to encroach on the sanctity of those rights and feelings, which, as they can not be protected by law, must owe their security to delicacy of sentiment in an enlightened community. He had an uncommon degree of refinement in all his thoughts and feelings. Never, in his most sportive or unguarded moments, did any sentiment escape him which was coarse or vulgar. He had, in this respect, almost a feminine purity of mind. It might be truly said of him, as was remarked concerning one of his distinguished cotemporaries in public life, that he was never known to utter an expression which might not have been used with entire freedom in the most refined female society. In his pecuniary transactions, he was acknowledged by all to be not only just, but liberal. It was a principle with him, for life, never to be in debt. Every thing was paid for at the time of purchase. In all his dealings and social intercourse, he was remarkably direct, frank, and open. He had but one character, and that was "known and read of all men." Whatever faults might be imputed to him, no one ever suspected him of double dealing; no one ever thought he was capable of a mean or dishonorable action.

In the discharge of his domestic duties, Dr. Webster was watchful, consistent, and firm. Though immersed in study, he kept in his hands the entire control of his family arrangements, down to the minutest particulars. Every thing was reduced to exact system; all moved on with perfect regularity and order, for method was the presiding principle of his life. In the government of his children there was but one rule, and that was instantaneous and entire obedience. This was insisted upon as right,—as, in the nature of things, due by a child to a parent. He did not rest his claim on any explanations, or on showing that the thing required was reasonable or beneficial. While he endeavored to make it clear to his children that he sought their happiness in whatever he required, he commanded as one having authority, and he enforced his commands to the utmost, as a duty which he owed equally to his children and to God, who had placed them under his control. He felt that, on this subject, there had been a gradual letting down of the tone of public sentiment, which was much to be deplored. Many, in breaking away from the sternness of Puritan discipline, have gone to the opposite extreme. They have virtually abandoned the exercise of parental authority, and endeavored to regulate the conduct of their children by reasoning and persuasion,—by the mere presentation of motives, and not by the enforcement of commands. If such persons succeed, as they rarely do, in preserving any thing like a comfortable state of subordination in their families, they fail at least in the accomplishment of one great end for which their offspring were committed to their care. They send forth their children into life, without any of those habits of submission to lawful authority which are essential to the character of a good citizen and a useful member of society. In the intellectual training of his children, on the other hand, Dr. Webster had much less of system and complicated machinery, than many are disposed to adopt. His great principle was not to overdo,—to let nature have free scope, and to leave the development of the mind, within certain limits, to the operation of awakened curiosity directed to its proper objects. He therefore threw open his extensive library to his children at an early period of their lives, and said, in the words of Cotton Mather, "Read, and you will know." He felt that children should learn to acquire knowledge by severe effort; that the prevailing disposition to make every thing easy is unphilosophical and wrong; that the great object of early training is to form the mind into a capacity of surmounting intellectual difficulties of any and every kind. In his view, also, the young have much to learn in early life, the use of which they can not then comprehend. They must learn it by rote, particularly the spelling of so complicated a language as ours; and all those systems which lead forward children no faster than they can understand and apply every word they spell, he considered as radically erroneous. He wished, on the contrary, at this early period of ready memory and limited comprehension, to store the mind with many things which would afterward be found of indispensable use; things which are learnt with the utmost reluctance, or rather, in most cases, are not learnt at all, in the more advanced stages of intellectual progress. He felt that there must necessarily be much of drudgery in the formation of a thoroughly educated mind. He thought it wise, therefore, to commence those tasks which it involves, from the earliest period at which the youthful intellect can endure them. Upon these principles he constructed his Spelling Book, and other works for the use of children. He designed to make them instructive, and not mere books of amusement. Whether his views were incorrect or unphilosophical, the public will judge.

In respect to religion, Dr. Webster was a firm believer, during a large part of his life, in the great distinctive doctrines of our Puritan ancestors, whose character he always regarded with the highest veneration. There was a period, however, from the time of his leaving college to the age of forty, when he had doubts as to some of those doctrines, and rested in a different system. Soon after he graduated, being uncertain what business to attempt or by what means he could obtain subsistence, he felt his mind greatly perplexed, and almost overwhelmed with gloomy apprehensions. In this state, as he afterward informed a friend, he read Johnson's Rambler with unusual interest; and, in closing the last volume, he made a firm resolution to pursue a course of virtue through life, and to perform every moral and social duty with scrupulous exactness. To this he added a settled belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures and the governing providence of God, connected with highly reverential views of the divine character and perfections. Here he rested, placing his chief reliance for salvation on a faithful discharge of all the relative duties of life, though not to the entire exclusion of dependence on the merits of the Redeemer. In this state of mind he remained, though with some misgiving and frequent fluctuations of feeling, to the winter of 1807-8. At that time, there was a season of general religious interest at New Haven, under the ministry of the Rev. Moses Stuart, now a professor in the Andover Theological Seminary. To this Dr. Webster's attention was first directed, by observing an unusual degree of tenderness and solemnity of feeling in all the adult members of his family. He was thus led to reconsider his former views, and inquire, with an earnestness which he had never felt before, into the nature of personal religion, and the true ground of man's acceptance with God. He had now to decide not for himself only, but, to a certain extent, for others, whose spiritual interests were committed to his charge. Under a sense of this responsibility, he took up the study of the Bible with painful solicitude. As he advanced, the objections which he had formerly entertained against the humbling doctrines of the gospel, were wholly removed. He felt their truth in his own experience. He felt that salvation must be wholly of grace. He felt constrained, as he afterward told a friend, to cast himself down before God, confess his sins, implore pardon through the merits of the Redeemer, and there to make his vows of entire obedience to the commands and devotion to the service of his Maker. With his characteristic promptitude, he instantly made known to his family the feelings which he entertained. He called them together the next morning, and told them, with deep emotion, that, while he had aimed at the faithful discharge of all his duties as their parent and head, he had neglected one of the most important, that of family prayer. After reading the Scriptures, he led them, with deep solemnity, to the throne of grace, and from that time continued the practice, with the liveliest interest, to the period of his death. He made a public profession of religion in April, 1808. His two oldest daughters united with him in the act, and another, only twelve years of age, was soon added to the number.

In his religious feelings, Dr. Webster was remarkably equable and cheerful. He had a very strong sense of the providence of God, as extending to the minutest concerns of life. In this he found a source of continual support and consolation, under the severe labors and numerous trials which he had to endure. To the same divine hand he habitually referred all his enjoyments; and it was known to his family, that he rarely, if ever, took the slightest refreshment, of any kind, even between meals, without a momentary pause, and a silent tribute of thanks to God as the giver. He made the Scriptures his daily study. After the completion of his Dictionary, especially, they were always lying on his table, and he probably read them more than all other books. He felt, from that time, that the labors of his life were ended, and that little else remained but to prepare for death. With a grateful sense of past mercies, a cheering consciousness of present support, and an animating hope of future blessedness, he waited with patience until his appointed change should come.

During the spring of 1843, Dr. Webster revised the Appendix of his Dictionary, and added some hundreds of words. He completed the printing of it about the middle of May. It was the closing act of his life. His hand rested, in its last labors, on the volume which he had commenced thirty-six years before. Within a few days, in calling on a number of friends in different parts of the town, he walked, during one afternoon, between two and three miles. The day was chilly, and immediately after his return, he was seized with faintness and a severe oppression on his lungs. An attack of peripneumony followed, which, though not alarming at first, took a sudden turn after four or five days, with fearful indications of a fatal result. It soon became necessary to inform him that he was in imminent danger. He received the communication with surprise, but with entire composure. His health had been so good, and every bodily function so perfect in its exercise, that he undoubtedly expected to live some years longer. But though suddenly called, he was completely ready. He gave some characteristic directions as to the disposal of his body after death. He spoke of his long life as one of uniform enjoyment, because filled up at every stage with active labors for some valuable end. He expressed his entire resignation to the will of God, and his unshaken trust in the atoning blood of the Redeemer. It was an interesting coincidence, that his former pastor, the Rev. Mr. Stuart, who received him to the church thirty-five years before, had just arrived at New Haven on a visit to his friends. He called immediately; and the interview brought into affecting comparison the beginning and the end of that long period of consecration to the service of Christ. The same hopes which had cheered the vigor of manhood, were now shedding a softened light over the decay and sufferings of age. "I know in whom I have believed,"—such was the solemn and affecting testimony which he gave to his friend, while the hand of death was upon him,—"I know in whom I have believed, and that He is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." Thus, without one doubt, one fear, he resigned his soul into the hands of his Maker, and died on the 28th day of May, 1843, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

In his person, Dr. Webster was tall, and somewhat slender, remarkably erect throughout life, and moving, even in his advanced years, with a light and elastic step.

Dr. Webster's widow survived him more than four years, and died on the 25th day of June, 1847, in the eighty-second year of her age. He had seven children who arrived at maturity,—one son, William G. Webster, Esq., who resides at New Haven, and six daughters. Of these, the oldest is married to the Hon. William W. Ellsworth, of Hartford, late governor, and now judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut; the second to the author of this sketch; the third, now deceased, was first married to Edward Cobb, Esq., of Portland, Maine, and afterward to the Rev. Professor Fowler, of Amherst, Mass.; the fourth, also deceased, was married to Horatio Southgate, Esq., of Portland, Maine, and left at her death a daughter, who was adopted by Dr. Webster, and is now married to Henry Trowbridge, Jun., Esq., of New Haven; the fifth is married to the Rev. Henry Jones, of Bridgeport, Conn.; and the sixth remains unmarried, in the family of her brother.

In conclusion, it may be said that the name of NOAH WEBSTER, from the wide circulation of some of his works, is known familiarly to a greater number of the inhabitants of the United States, than the name, probably, of any other individual except the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY. Whatever influence he thus acquired was used at all times to promote the best interests of his fellow-men. His books, though read by millions, have made no man worse. To multitudes they have been of lasting benefit, nor only by the course of early training they have furnished, but by those precepts of wisdom and virtue with which almost every page is stored.

INTRODUCTION.

DEFINITION OF LANGUAGE.

LANGUAGE or Speech is the utterance of articulate sounds or voices, rendered significant by usage, for the expression and communication of thoughts.

According to this definition, language belongs exclusively to intellectual and intelligent beings, and, among terrestrial beings, to man only; for no animal on earth, except man, can pronounce words. The word language is sometimes used in a more comprehensive sense, and applied to the sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings or affections; as to the neighing of the horse, the lowing of the ox, the barking of the dog, and to the cackling and chirping of fowls; for the sounds uttered by these animals are perfectly understood by the respective species. So also language is figuratively applied to the signs by which deaf and dumb persons manifest their ideas; for these are instruments of communicating thoughts.

But language in its proper sense, as the medium of intercourse between men, or rational beings, endowed with the faculty of uttering articulate sounds, is the subject now to be considered.

Written language is the representation of significant sounds by letters, or characters, single or combined in words, arranged in due order, according to usage.

ORIGIN OF LANGUAGE.

We read in the Scriptures, that God, when he had created man, "blessed them; and said to them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea," &c. God afterward planted a garden, and placed in it the man he had made, with a command to keep it, and to dress it; and he gave him a rule of moral conduct, in permitting him to eat the fruit of every tree in the garden, except one, the eating of which was prohibited. We further read, that God brought to Adam the fowls and beasts he had made, and that Adam gave them names; and that when his female companion was made, he gave her a name. After the eating of the forbidden fruit, it is stated that God addressed Adam and Eve, reproving them for their disobedience, and pronouncing the penalties which they had incurred. In the account of these transactions, it is further related that Adam and Eve both replied to their Maker, and excused their disobedience.

If we admit, what is the literal and obvious interpretation of this narrative, that vocal sounds or words were used in these communications between God and the progenitors of the human race, it results that Adam was not only endowed with intellect for understanding his Maker, or the signification of words, but was furnished both with the faculty of speech and with speech itself, or the knowledge and use of words as signs of ideas, and this before the formation of the woman. Hence we may infer that language was bestowed on Adam, in the same manner as all his other faculties and knowledge, by supernatural power; or, in other words, was of divine origin: for, supposing Adam to have had all the intellectual powers of any adult individual of the species who has since lived, we can not admit as probable, or even possible, that he should have invented and constructed even a barren language, as soon as he was created, without supernatural aid. It may indeed be doubted whether, without such aid, men would ever have learned the use of the organs of speech, so far as to form a language. At any rate, the invention of words and the construction of a language must have been by a slow process, and must have required a much longer time than that which passed between the creation of Adam and of Eve. It is, therefore, probable, that language, as well as the faculty of speech, was the immediate gift of God. We are not, however, to suppose the language of our first parents in paradise to have been copious, like most modern languages; or the identical language they used, to be now in existence. Many of the primitive radical words may and probably do exist in various languages; but observation teaches that languages must improve and undergo great changes as knowledge increases, and be subject to continual alterations, from other causes incident to men in society.

A BRIEF ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF THE PRINCIPAL LANGUAGES, ANCIENT AND MODERN, THAT HAVE BEEN SPOKEN BY NATIONS BETWEEN THE GANGES AND THE ATLANTIC OCEAN.

We learn from the Scriptures that Noah, who, with his family, was preserved from destruction by the Deluge, for the purpose of re-peopling the earth, had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. This fact, a little obscured by tradition, was retained by our rude German ancestors, to the age of Tacitus.*

Japheth was the eldest son; but Shem, the ancestor of the Israelites and of the writers of the Scriptures, is named first in order.

The descendants of Shem and Ham peopled all the great plain situated north and west of the Persian Gulf, between that Gulf and the Indian Ocean on the east, and the Arabic Gulf and the Mediterranean Sea on the west, with the northern coast of Africa; comprehending Assyria, Babylonia or Chaldea, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya. The principal languages or dialects used by these descendants, are known to us under the names of Chaldee, or Chaldaic, which is called also Aramean, Syriac, Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan, and Coptic. Of these, the Chaldee and Hebrew are no longer living languages, but they have come down to us in books; the Samaritan is probably extinct or lost in the modern languages of the country, but the language survives in a copy of the Pentateuch; the Coptic is nearly or quite extinct, and little of it remains; the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic are yet living languages, but they have suffered and are continually suffering alterations, from which no living language is exempt.

These languages, except the Coptic, being used by the descendants of Shem, I call Shemitic, or Assyrian, in distinction from the Japhetic. As the descendants of Japheth peopled Asia Minor, the northern parts of Asia, about the Euxine and Caspian, and all Europe, their languages have, in the long period that has elapsed since their dispersion, become very numerous.

All languages having sprung from one source, the original words from which they have been formed must have been of equal antiquity. That the Celtic and Teutonic languages in Europe are, in this sense, as old as the Chaldee and Hebrew, is a fact not only warranted by history and the common origin of Japheth and Shem, but susceptible of proof from the identity of many words yet existing in both stocks. But there is a marked difference between the Shemitic and Japhetic languages; for even when the radical words are unquestionably the same, the modifications, or inflections and combinations which form the compounds, are, for the most part, different.

As it has been made a question which of the Shemitic languages is the most ancient, and much has been written to prove it to be the Hebrew, I will state briefly my opinion on what appears to me to be one of the plainest questions in the history of nations. We have for our certain guides, in determining this son Mannus, [Man] the origin and founders of their nation. To Mannus they assign three sons."

Noah is here called Man.

* Celebrant, carminibus antiquis, Tuistonem deum terræ editum, et filium Maanum, originem gentis conditoresque. Manno tres filios assignant. — De Mor. Germ. 2.

"In ancient songs they celebrate Tuisto, a god sprung from the earth, and his question—1st, The historical narrative of facts in the Book of Genesis; and 2d, The known and uniform progress of languages, within the period of authentic profane history.

1. The Scripture informs us that, before the dispersion, the whole earth was of one language and of one or the same speech; and that the descendants of Noah journeyed from the east, and settled on the plain of Shinar, or in Chaldea. The language used at that time, by the inhabitants of that plain, must then have been the oldest or the primitive language of man. This must have been the original Chaldee.

2. The Scripture informs us, that in consequence of the impious attempts of the people to build a city, and a tower whose top might reach to heaven, with a view to make themselves a name and prevent their dispersion, God interposed and confounded their language, so that they could not understand each other; in consequence of which, they were dispersed "from thence over the face of all the earth."

3. If the confusio of languages at Babel originated the differences which gave rise to the various languages of the families which separated at the dispersion, then those several languages are all of equal antiquity. Of these the Hebrew, as a distinct language, was not one; for the Hebrew nation was of posterior origin.

4. All the words of the several great races of men, both in Asia and Europe, which are vernacular in their several languages, and unequivocally the same, are of equal antiquity, as they must have been derived from the common Chaldee stock which existed before the dispersion. The words common to the Syrians and Hebrews could not have been borrowed from the Hebrew; for the Hebrews originated from Heber and Abram, several centuries after Syria and Egypt were populous countries. This fact is attested by the Scripture history, which declares that when Abram migrated from Chaldea, and came into Canaan or Palestine, "the Canaanite was then in the land;" and when he returned from Egypt, "the Perizite dwelt in the land." These declarations, and the history of Abimelech, and of the war of four kings or chieftains with five, as also of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, prove Syria to have been at that time well peopled. The language of the inhabitants, then, must have been coeval with the nation, and long anterior to the Hebrew as a distinct dialect. It may be added, that in the early periods of the world, when no books existed, nations, living remote or distinct, never borrowed words from each other. One nation living in the midst of another, as the Hebrews did among the Egyptians, may adopt a single word, or a few words; but a family of words thus adopted, is an occurrence rarely or never known. The borrowing of words, in modern times, is almost wholly from the use of books.

5. It is probable that some differences of language were produced by the confusion; but neither that event nor any supernatural event is necessary to account for the differences of dialect or of languages now existing. The different modern languages of the Gothic or Teutonic stock all originated in the natural course of events; and the differences are as great between them as they are between the languages of the Shemitic stock.

6. Soon after two races of men of a common stock have separated and placed themselves in distant countries, the language of each begins to diverge from that of the other, by various means.—1. One tribe or nation will suffer one word to become obsolete and be forgotten; another will suffer the loss of another; sometimes a whole family of words will be lost; at other times, a part only; at other times, a single word only of a numerous family will be retained by one nation, while another nation will retain the whole. 2. The same word will be differently applied by two distant races of men, and the difference will be so great as to obscure the original affinity. 3. Words will be compounded by two nations in a different manner, the same radical words taking a different prefix or suffix, in different languages. Thus wisdom in English is in German weisheit, [wisehead, wisdom,] from wise, weis. The English mislead is in Danish forleder, from lead, leder. 4. The pronunciation and orthography of words will often be so much changed, that the same word in two languages can not, without difficulty, be recognized as identical. No person, without a considerable attention to the changes which letters have suffered, would at once suspect or believe the English let and the French laisser to be the same word.

7. As Abram migrated from Chaldea, he must have spoken the Chaldee language; and probably, at that time, the Syriac, Arabic, and Egyptian, had not become so different, as to render it impracticable for him to converse with the inhabitants of Palestine and Egypt. But the language of Abram's descendants, and that of the land of Shinar or the Chaldee, must, in the natural course of things, have begun to diverge soon after the separation; and the changes in each language, being different, would, in the course of a few centuries, form somewhat different languages. So in the days of Hezekiah, the Syriac and Hebrew had become, in a degree, distinct languages. 2 Kings xviii. In which of these languages the greatest number of alterations were produced, we do not know; but, from the general observations I have made in my researches, it appears that the Chaldee dialect, in the use of dental letters instead of sibilants, is much the most general in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of Europe. Thus the German only has a sibilant in wasser, when the other Teutonic languages have a dental, water. I think also that there are far more words in the European languages which accord with the Chaldee or Arabic, than there are words which accord with the Hebrew. If this observation is well founded, the Hebrew must have suffered the loss of more primitive words than the other languages of the Shemitic family. This, however, is true, that all of them have lost some words, and in some cases the Hebrew retains what the others have lost.

8. The Hebrew Scriptures are, by many centuries, the most ancient writings extant. Hence probably the strange inference, that the Hebrew is the oldest language; as if the inhabitants of Chaldea and Syria had had no language for ages before the progenitor of the Hebrews was born.

9. The vernacular words in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of modern Europe, which are evidently the same words as still exist in the Shemitic languages, are of the same antiquity; being a part of the common language which was used on the plain of Shinar, before the dispersion.

The descendants of Japheth peopled the northern part of Asia, and all Europe; or, if some colonies from Egypt planted themselves in Greece at an early period, they or their descendants must have been merged in the mass of Japhetic population. Certain it is, that the Greek language is chiefly formed on the same radical words as the Celtic and Teutonic languages.

The Japhetic tribes of men, whose descendants peopled the south and west of Europe, were first established in the country now called Persia, or, by the natives themselves, Iran. Of this fact, the evidence now existing is decisive. The numerous words found in the Greek, Latin, Gaelic, English, and the kindred tongues, which are still used in Persia, prove, beyond all question, that Persia must have been the residence of the people whose descendants introduced into Europe the languages from which the modern languages are derived. The fact proves further, that a great body of the original Persians remained in their own country, and their descendants constitute the mass of the population at this day.

In the early stages of society, men dwelt or migrated in families, tribes, or clans. The family of Abraham and Jacob in Asia, and the clans of the Gaels in Scotland, exhibit to us the manner in which societies and nations were originally formed. The descendants of a man settled around him, and formed a clan, or tribe, of which the government was patriarchal. Such families often migrated in a body, and often the personal characteristics of the progenitor might be distinctly traced in his descendants for many generations. In process of time, some of these families became nations; more generally, by means of wars and migrations, different tribes became blended, and the distinction of families was lost.

In rude ages, the families or tribes of men are named from some characteristic of the people; or, more generally, from the place of their residence. The Greeks gave the name of Scythia to the north of Europe and Asia, but the primitive inhabitants of the west of Europe they called Κελτοι, Kelts, Celts, a word signifying woods men. These were descendants from the same ancestors as the Greeks and Romans themselves, but they had pushed their migrations into Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The first settlers or occupiers of these countries were driven forward by successive hordes, until they were checked by the ocean; there they made their stand, and there we find their descendants at this day. These may be considered as the descendants of the earliest settlers or first inhabitants of the countries where they are found. Among these are the inhabitants of France, south of

* Welsh cellt, a cover or shelter, a Celt; celtiad, sn inhabitant of the covert or wood; celu, to conceal, Lat. celo. In Gaelic the word is coillt or ceilt. The Celts were originally a tribe or nation inhabiting the north of Italy, or the still more northern territory.

the Garonne, and those of the north of Spain, called by the Romans Aquitani and Cantabri, in more modern times Gascoigns, Basques, and Cantabrians, who still retain their native language; and in Great Britain, the Gaels in Scotland, and the natives of the north and west of Ireland, who also retain their primitive language.*

The first inhabitants of the north and west of Europe, known to the Greeks and Romans, to whom we are indebted for our earliest accounts of that region, were the Cimbrî, who inhabited the peninsula of Denmark, now called Jutland, and the tribes which belonged to the Teutonic and Gothic races which were established in Germany and on both sides of the Baltic. Whether tribes of Celtic origin had overspread the latter countries before the arrival of the Gothic and Teutonic races, and all Europe had been inhabited by the Celts even to the borders of Sarmatia, has been a question much disputed by historians and antiquaries. The German and French writers generally contend that the Celts inhabited all the north of Europe, as far at least as Sarmatia; but some respectable English writers are of a different opinion. Now, it is agreed that the Welsh are descendants of the Cimbrî, inhabitants of Jutland; and their language bears a strong affinity to the Celtic languages which still exist—a fact that countenances the opinion of the German and French writers. But the dispute is of little moment; the Celtic, Teutonic and Gothic races being all of the Japhetic stock, migrating from Asia through Asia Minor at different times, and pursuing different courses westward. The first tribes probably sought the warm climates along the north coast of the Mediterranean, and established themselves in Greece and Italy. Others followed the course of the Danube and its subsidiary streams, till they fell upon the rivers that conducted them to the Baltic. The first inhabitants of Greece and Italy were probably of the Celtic race; but if they were, it is very evident that tribes of the Teutonic or Gothic races invaded those countries before they were civilized, and intermingled with the original inhabitants. The Pelasgi may have been among the number. This is an inference which I draw from the affinities of the Greek and Latin languages with those of Teutonic origin. The Teutonic and Gothic races impressed their language upon all the continent of Europe west of the Vistula, and from that river to the Rhine, or rather to the Seine, anterior to the conquest of Gaul by Julius Cesar. The same races, invading and conquering the south of Europe, in the fourth and fifth centuries, on the downfall of the Roman empire, infused a portion of their language into the Italian and Spanish, which is still distinguishable.

The ancient Sarmatia, including Poland and Russia, was probably peopled originally by races of men who passed into Europe by the country north of the Euxine. Their original residence was along the Rivers Kur and Araxes, or on the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian. The name of the Russ or Russians is clearly recognized in the Rozolani of Pliny and Ptolemy, and possibly the ancestors of this race may have entered Europe by Asia Minor. That the Teutonic races, originally from Persia, inhabited Asia Minor, and migrated westward by that course, is evident from the names which they impressed on mountains, rivers, and places. Such are the Cragus of Pliny, the Welsh and English crag; Perga in Pamphylia, now burg or hergen; Thymbreck, the name of a small stream near the site of Troy, a word in which we recognize the English brook; it was contracted by the Greeks into Thymbrius†.

It is admitted by all gentlemen acquainted with Oriental literature, that the Sanscrit, or ancient language of India, the parent of all the dialects of that great peninsula, is radically the same language or from the same stock as the Greek and Latin; the affinities between them being remarkably clear and decisive. If so, the inhabitants of India and the descendants of the Celtic and Teutonic nations are all of one family, and must have all migrated from one country after the separation of the nations of the Shemitic stock from those of the Japhetic race.‡

Whether that country was Persia, or Cashmir, or a country farther east, is a point not easily determined. One important inference results from this fact—that the white men of Europe, and the black or tawny men of India, are direct descendants from a common ancestor.

Of the languages of Europe, the Greek was first improved and refined, and next to that the Latin. The affinity between these languages and those of the west and north of Europe is very striking, and demonstrates their common origin. It is probable, however, that there are some words in the Greek derived from Africa, if Egyptian colonies were established in Greece, as historians inform us.

The modern Italian, Spanish, French, and Portuguese, are composed chiefly of Latin words, much altered, however, both in orthography and inflections. Perhaps nine tenths of all the words now found in those languages are of Latin origin; being introduced by the Romans, who held Gaul in subjection five or six centuries, and Spain much longer; or being borrowed from Latin authors since the revival of letters. All these languages, however, retain many words of Celtic origin; the primitive language not having been entirely extirpated. In some instances, the same word has been transmitted through both channels, the Celtic and the Latin, and is yet retained. Thus in French ceder, and in Italian cedere, is directly from the Latin cedo; while the French congédier and Italian congedare are composed of the same word, with a prefix, derived from the Celtic, and retained in the Welsh gadaw, to quit, to leave, [L. concedo.] And this same verb probably appears also in quit, a word common to the Teutonic and to the Celtic languages.—See Conoz, in the Dictionary.

It must be observed further, that the Spanish language contains some words of African origin, introduced by the Carthaginians before the Roman conquest of Spain, or afterward by the Moors, who for several centuries were masters of that country. It contains also some words of Gothic origin, introduced by the Goths, who conquered that country, at the downfall of the Roman empire. The French also contains some words of Teutonic origin, either from the Belgic tribes, who occupied the country to the Seine at the time of Cesar's invasion, or from the Franks, who established the dynasty of the Merovingian kings in the fifth century, or from the Normans, who obtained possession of the northern part of that kingdom in the tenth century, or from all these sources.

The German, Dutch or Belgic, Anglo-Saxon, Danish, and Swedish languages are of Teutonic or Gothic origin.‖ They are all closely allied; a great part of the words in them all being the same or from the same roots, with different prefixes or affixes. There is, however, a greater difference between the Danish and Swedish, which are of the Gothic stock, and the German and Dutch, which are of Teutonic origin, than between two languages of the same stock, as between the Danish and Swedish. The Norwegian, Icelandic, and some of the languages or dialects of Switzerland, belong to the same stock; but of these I have no particular knowledge.

The Basque or Cantabrian in Spain, the Gaelic in the north of Scotland, and the Hiberno-Celtic or native language of Ireland, are the purest remains of the ancient Celtic. From a comparison of a vocabulary of the Gaelic and Hiberno-Celtic, I find little or no difference between them; and from a long and attentive examination of this language, and of the languages of Teutonic origin, I find less difference between them than most authors have supposed to exist.

The Armoric or language of Brittany, in the north-west angle of France, and the Cornish, in the south-west of England, are also of Celtic origin. The Cornish is now extinct; but the Armoric is a living language.

It is strably certain that the primitive settlers in Greece and Italy belonged to the Celtic races. Thus the Greek βραχίον, Lat brachium, the arm, is formed on the Gaelic braigh, raigh, W. braig, a word not found among the Teutonic nations. So the Welsh mocian, to mock, is found in the Greek μοκαω, and French moquer, to mock, and Jr. mogadh, a mocking; but not in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. Many similar facts prove that the Celtic races were among the earliest inhabitants of Greece.

† Plin. H. N. lib. 5, cap. 27. Strabo, lib. 7. 6, informs us that the Dalmatians had the singular practice of making a division of their fields every eighth year hence perhaps the name, from deal, and math or madh, country.

‡ Clarke's Travels.

§ See the word Cruz, in the Dictionary.

|| In strictness, the Swedish and Danish are of Gothic origin, and the German and Saxon, of Teutonic origin.

* I purposely omit all consideration of the different families, tribes, or nations, which first peopled Greece and Italy. In Greece we read of the Γραικοί or Γραικοί, the Hellenes, the Αχαιοί, the Dorians, the Αιολιοί, the Ionians, the Pelasgi, &c. in Italy, of the Μυρμιρῶνες, the Liburii, the Siculi, the Veneti or Veneti, the Iberi, Ligures, Sicani, Etrusci, Insubres, Sabini, Latini, Samnites, and many others. But as these nations or their descendants gave the name of Celts to the Cimbrî, or nations that dwell in the north, in the less cultivated parts of Europe, and to the inhabitants of Gaul; and as all the tribes, under whatever denomination they were known, were branches of the great Japhetic stock, I shall call them by that general name, Celts; and under the general name of Goths or Teutons, shall comprehend the various tribes that inhabited the north of Germany, and the country north of the Baltic, or Scandinavia.

A late writer seems to consider the Teutonic races as the only ancestors of the Greeks and Romans. But from Celtic words still found in the Greek and Latin, words not belonging to any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages, it is demon-

The English, as now spoken, is a language composed of words from several others. The basis of the language is Anglo-Saxon, or, as I shall, for the sake of brevity, call it, Saxon, by which it is closely allied to the languages of Teutonic and Gothic origin on the continent. But it retains a great number of words from the ancient languages of Britain, the Belgic or Lloegrian, and the Cymraeg or Welsh, particularly from the latter, and some from the Cornish. Cesar informs us, that before he invaded Britain, Belgic colonies had occupied the southern coast of England; and the inhabitants of the interior, northern and western parts, were the ancestors of the present Welsh, who call themselves Cymry, and their country Cymru, a name which indicates their origin from the Cimbric, inhabitants of the modern Denmark, or Cimbric Chersonese, now Jutland.

The modern Welsh contains many Latin words introduced by the Romans, who had possession of Britain for five hundred years. But the body of the language is probably their vernacular tongue. It is more nearly allied to the languages of Celtic origin than to those of the Teutonic and Gothic stock; and of this British language, the Cornish and Armoric are dialects.

It has been commonly supposed that the Britons were nearly exterminated by the Saxons, and that the few that survived escaped into the west of England, now Wales. It is true that many took refuge in Wales, which their descendants still retain; but it can not be true that the other parts of England were entirely depopulated. On the other hand, great numbers must have escaped slaughter, and been intermixed with their Saxon conquerors. The Welsh words, which now form no unimportant part of the English language, afford decisive evidence of this fact. It is probable, however, that these words were for a long time used only by the common people, for few of them appear in the early Saxon writers.

The English contains also many words introduced by the Danes, who were for some time masters of England; which words are not found in the Saxon. These words prevail most in the northern counties of England; but many of them are incorporated into the body of the language.

After the Conquest, the Norman kings endeavored to extirpate the English language, and substitute the Norman. For this purpose, it was ordained that all law proceedings and records should be in the Norman language; and hence the early records and reports of law cases came to be written in Norman. But neither royal authority, nor the influence of courts, could change the vernacular language. After an experiment of three hundred years, the law was repealed; and since that period, the English has been, for the most part, the official, as well as the common language of the nation. A few Norman words, however, remain in the English; most of them in law language.

Since the Conquest, the English has not suffered any shock from the intermixture of conquerors with the natives of England; but the language has undergone great alterations, by the disuse of a large portion of Saxon words, and the introduction of words from the Latin and Greek languages, with some French, Italian, and Spanish words. These words have, in some instances, been borrowed by authors directly from the Latin and Greek; but most of the Latin words have been received through the medium of the French and Italian. For terms in the sciences, authors have generally resorted to the Greek; and from this source, as discoveries in science demand new terms, the vocabulary of the English language is receiving continual augmentation. We have also a few words from the German and Swedish, mostly terms in mineralogy; and commerce has introduced new commodities of foreign growth or manufacture, with their foreign names, which now make a part of our language. Such are camphor, amber, arsenic, and many others.

The English, then, is composed of,

- 1st, Saxon and Danish words of Teutonic and Gothic origin.
- 2d, British or Welsh, Cornish and Armoric, which may be considered as of Celtic origin.
- 3d, Norman, a mixture of French and Gothic.
- 4th, Latin, a language formed on the Celtic and Teutonic.
- 5th, French, chiefly Latin corrupted, but with a mixture of Celtic.
- 6th, Greek, formed on the Celtic and Teutonic, with some Coptic.
- 7th, A few words directly from the Italian, Spanish, German, and other languages of the continent.

8th, A few foreign words, introduced by commerce, or by political and literary intercourse.

AFFINITY OF LANGUAGES.

On comparing the structure of the different languages of the Shemitic and Japhetic stocks, we can not but be struck with the fact, that although a great number of words consisting of the same or of cognate letters, and conveying the same ideas, are found in them all, yet in the inflections, and in the manner of forming compounds and derivatives, there are remarkable differences between the two great families. In the modifications of the verb, for expressing person, time, and mode, very little resemblance is observable between them. If we could prove that the personal terminations of the verb, in the Japhetic languages, were originally pronouns, expressive of the persons, we should prove an affinity between the words of the two races in a most important particular. Some attempts of this kind have been made, but not with very satisfactory results.*

In the formation of nouns, we recognize a resemblance between the English termination th, in birth, truth, drauth, [Saxon drugoth.] warmth, &c., and the Shemitic terminations ן and ת ; and the old plural termination en, retained in oxen, and the Welsh plural ending ion, coincide nearly with the Arabic termination of the dual number ان an, and the regular masculine plural termination ون on, as well as with the Chaldee, Hebrew, and Syriac ין in. And it is justly remarked by Mitford, that in the variety of plural terminations of nouns, there is a striking resemblance between the Arabic and the Welsh. There is one instance, in the modern languages of Teutonic origin, in which we find the Arabic nunnation:—this is the German and Dutch binnen, the Saxon binnan or binnon, signifying within, Hebrew and Chaldee בין , Ar. بين bin, without the mark of nunnation when it signifies within; but when it signifies separation, space, interval, the original sense, it is written بين , and pronounced, with the nunnation, like the Teutonic word binnen.

One mode of forming nouns from verbs in the Shemitic languages is by prefixing m. I know of no instance of this manner of formation in the Japhetic languages, except in some names which are of Oriental origin. Mars is said to be from moris, but if so, the word was undoubtedly formed in the East. So we find Morpheus, the god of sleep, to be probably formed with the prefix m, from the Ethiopic ሰዐል aorf, to rest, to fall asleep; whence we infer that Morpheus is sleep deified.†

But as many words in all the languages of Europe and Asia are formed with prepositions, perhaps it may be found, on examination, that some of these prefixes may be common to the families of both stocks, the Japhetic and the Shemitic. We find in German gemuth, in Dutch gemoed, from muth, maed, mind, mood. We find mad in Saxon is gemaad; polish, the Latin polio, is in Welsh cabali; mail in Italian is both maglia and camaglia; belief in Saxon is geleaf, and in German glaube. We find that in the Shemitic languages, מלא signifies to fill or be full, and we find in the Arabic كامل kamala, has the same signification. In Syriac, גל gal, signifies to remove; and כגל kagal, signifies to wander in mind, to be delirious. In Chaldee and Syriac, דמיר is to wonder, precisely the Latin demiror, which is a compound of de and miror.

We find also that nations differ in the orthography of some initial sounds, where the words are the same. Thus the Spanish has

* According to Dr. Edwards, there is a remarkable resemblance between the Shemitic languages and the Mubhekaneew, or Mubegan, one of the native languages of New England, in the use of the pronouns as prefixes and affixes to verbs.—Observations, &c. p. 13.

† Ludolf, Col. 446, 447.

Clamar, llorar, for the Latin clamo, ploro; and the Welsh has llauer, for the English floor, llabi, a tall, lank person, coinciding with flabby, llac for slack, and the like

As the prepositions and prefixes, in all languages, constitute an important class of words, being used in composition to vary the sense of other parts of speech, to an almost unlimited extent, it may be useful to give them a particular consideration.

The simple prepositions are, for the most part, verbs or participles, or derived from them; when verbs, they are the radical or primary word, sometimes varied in orthography by the addition or alteration of a single vowel, or perhaps, in some cases, by the loss of the initial consonant, or aspirate. Such are the Greek παρα, περι, κατά; the Latin con and per; the English for, which retain their original consonants. The following, of, by, in, on, un; the Latin ab, ob, pro, præ, re; the Greek απο, επι, προ, may have lost the initial or final consonants; of for hof; in for hin; ab for hab; pro for prod. In some words this loss can only be conjectured; in others, it is known or obvious. Thus the English by and be was originally big, as it is in the Saxon; and the Latin re is written also red, evidently a derivative of an Arabic verb still existing; the Latin sub and super are formed probably from the Greek υπο, υπερ, by the change of an aspirate into ς, or the Greek words have lost that letter. The English but in the phrase "They are all here but one," is a participle; the Saxon butan, or buton; Dutch buiten, from buiten, to rove. Among is the Saxon gemang the verb, or the participle of gemengan, to mingle.

In general, the primary sense of the preposition is moving, or moved. Thus to in English, and ad in Latin, primarily denote advancing toward a place or object; as in the sentence, "We are going to town." Fran, of, Lat. ab, Gr. απο, denote motion from a place or object. The French près is from the Italian presso, and this is the Latin participle pressus, pressed; hence it denotes near, close.

In some instances prepositions are compounds, as the English before; that is, be or by fore, by the front; and the French auprès, at or near.

Prepositions, from their frequent use, and from the ease with which their primary signification is modified to express differences of position, motion, or relation, as occasions demand, have, in many instances, a great variety of applications; not, indeed, as many as lexicographers sometimes assign to them, but several different, and sometimes opposite significations; as, for examples, the English for, with, the Latin con, and the Greek παρα. For, which is from the root of the Saxon foran, Greek προσβαιναι, to pass, denotes toward, as in the phrase "A ship bound for Jamaica;" or it denotes in favor of, as, "This measure is for the public benefit;" or, "The present is for a friend." But it denotes also opposition or negation, as in forbear, forgive, forbid.

With is a verb, but has rather the sense of a participle. It is found in the Gothic with a prefix, ga-withan, to join or unite. Its primary sense, then, is joined, close; hence, in company; as in the sentences—"Go with him." "Come with me." It has the sense also of from, against, contrariety, opposition, as in withdraw, withstand, without. In Saxon it had also the sense of toward, as "with corthan," toward the earth; also of for, denoting substitution or equivalent in exchange, as, "sylan with dagges weorce," to give for a day's work; also of opposite, over against, as, "with tha sa," opposite the sea.

Con, in Latin, generally signifies with, toward or to, denoting closeness or union, approach, joint operation, and the like, as in concurro, conjungo, congregor; but it has also the sense of against or opposition, as in contendo.

The Greek παρα is doubtless from the root of the English fare, Saxon foran, to go, to pass. It signifies from, that is, departure—also at, to, Latin ad; near, with, beyond, and against.

To understand the cause of the different and apparently contrary significations, we are to attend to the primary sense. The effect of passing to a place is nearness, at, presso, près, and this may be expressed by the participle, or, in a contracted form, by the verb. The act of passing or moving toward a place, readily gives the sense of such prepositions as to, and the Latin ad, and this advance may be in favor or for the benefit of a person or thing, the primary sense of which may perhaps be best expressed by toward; "A present or a measure is toward him." But when the advance of one thing toward another is in enmity or opposition, we express the sense by against; and this sense is especially expressed when the motion or approach is in front of a person, or intended to meet or counteract another motion. Hence the same word is often used to express both senses, the context determining which signification is intended. Thus for in English, in the sentence, "He that is not for us is against us," denotes in favor of. But in the phrase "for all that," it denotes opposition. "It rains; but for all that, we will take a ride," that is, in opposition to that, or notwithstanding the rain, we will ride.

The Greek παρα, among other senses, signifies beyond, that is, past, and απερ, Hebrew בין.

The prepositions which are used as distinct words, are called separable prepositions, or more generally prepositions:—those which are used only in composition, are called inseparable prepositions. For the sake of brevity, I give to all words or single letters, prefixed to other words in composition, the general name of prefixes.

One of the best modes of ascertaining the true sense of a preposition, is, to examine its various uses in composition, and discover what effect it has in modifying the signification of the word to which it is prefixed.

Prepositions, used in compounds, often suffer the loss or change of a letter, for the sake of euphony, or the ease of pronunciation. Thus ad in Latin becomes af in affero; con becomes col in colligo; the Greek παρα loses a letter in παρεμι, as does αρι in many words.

The following sketch of the principal prepositions and prefixes in several languages of Europe, will exhibit some of the affinities of these languages, and, in a degree, illustrate the uses of this class of words.

SAXON AND GOTHIC.

And, Saxon and Gothic, signifies against, opposite. This is the Greek αρι, and Latin ante, not borrowed from the Greek or Latin, but a native word. Examples, ondstandan, to stand against, to resist; andsworian, answorian, to answer; that is, to speak again, against, or in return.

Amb, emb, ymb, usually cub, Saxon, signifying about, around; coinciding with the Latin amb, and Greek αμφι. Example, emb-faran, to go around, to walk about; embutan, about; emb, about, and butan, without. See But. Ambeht, embeht, ymbeht, office, duty; whence we have embassador. This in Gothic is and-bahtci; and a bailiff, minister, or servant, is andbahts. The Germans have the word contracted in amt, charge, office, Dutch ampt, Danish amt. The Gothic orthography gives rise to the question, whether amb, emb, and αρι, Saxon and Gothic and, are not radically the same word; and it is very certain that the Gothic and Saxon and is radically the same word as the Latin in, Danish ind. So in Gothic, "and wigans," in the ways, into the highways, Luke xiv. 23; "and haimos," per vicus, through the towns, Luke ix. 6.

This preposition, amb, is in Dutch om; in German um; in Swedish and Danish om.

Be, in Saxon, as a preposition and prefix, is always written be, or big, answering to the English by, a preposition, and be in beset. In Gothic, it is written bi, by, and be, being contractions of big. The primary and principal signification is near, close; as, "Stand or sit by me." So in the word bystander. It is a prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish. Its use in denoting instrumentality, may be from the sense of nearness; but more probably it is from passing, like per, through; or it denotes proceeding from, like of; as, "Salvation is of the Lord."

For, in Saxon, as in English, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. In Saxon, for signifies a-going, from foran, to go, to fare. It is radically the same word as fare, in the sense of in front, before. Its primary sense is advancing; hence moving toward; hence the sense of in favor of, and that of opposition, or negation. See the preceding remarks.

This word in German is far, but, with this orthography, the word is little used in composition. Yet the German has firbitte, intercession, or praying for; furwort, intercession, recommendation, and a pronoun, [for-ward]; and far-wahr, forsooth.

In the sense of fore, the German has vor, a word of extensive use as a prefix. Thus in Saxon foreseon, to foresee, is in German vorschen. The identity of these words will not be questioned. But in German, as in Dutch, the preposition ver, which is the English far, and Saxon fyr, is used in composition, in words in which the Saxon and English have for. Thus forgifan, to forgive, is in German vergeben, and in Dutch vergeeven—Saxon, forgitan, to forget; German vergessen; Dutch vergeeten. Hence we see that the Saxon for, fore, fyr, the English for, fore, far, and the German für, vor, and ver, are from the same radix.

In Dutch, for and fore are represented by voor, and ver represents for and far.

The Danish also unites for and fare, as does the Swedish.

The French has this word in pour, and the Spanish and Portuguese in por. The latter signifies not only for, but through, as in Portuguese, "Eu passarei por França," I will pass through France. Here we see the sense of moving. In Spanish and Portuguese, this word is written also para, as if from the Greek. It is evidently the same word, probably received through a different channel from that of por. Now, through is the exact sense of the Latin per; and per is the Italian preposition answering to for and por. But, what is more to the purpose, the Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese word, equivalent to the English forgive, is in Spanish perdonar, in Italian perdonare, and in Portuguese perdoar; and the French is pardonner. Here, then, we have strong if not conclusive evidence, that for, pour, por, per, par, and para, in different languages, are all from one stock, the word being varied in dialect, or by the different families; just as we have far, as well as the Saxon fyr, and the English forth, further, from the same primitive word. We have the same word in pursue and purchase, from the French pours.

The Greek has περα, and παρα, probably from the same root, as well as περιβαινα, περος.

Ge, in Gothic, which is ge in Saxon, is a prefix of very extensive use. In Saxon, it is prefixed to a large portion of all the verbs in the language. According to Lye, it has sometimes the sense of the Latin cum; but in most words I can not discern any effect of this prefix on the signification of the simple verb. It is retained in the Danish and in some German and Dutch words, especially in the participles of verba, and in nouns formed from them. But it is remarkable that, although the Saxon is our mother tongue, we have not remaining in the language a single instance of this prefix, with the original orthography. The only remains of it are in the contraction a, as in awake, adrift, ashamed, &c., from geacian, aeacian; gedrifan, adrisan; gesceccian, ascamian. The letter y prefixed to verbs and participles used by Chaucer, as yberied, yblent, ybore, ydrigt, and a few others, is the remnant of the ge. The words yclod and yelped are the last English words used in which this letter appears.

It is possible that the first syllable of govern, from Latin gubernare, Greek κυβερναω, may be the same prefix; or it may be the Welsh prefix go, which occurs in goberu, to work, which the Romans wrote operor. But I know not whether the first syllable of govern is a prefix or not.

There is another word which retains this prefix corrupted, or its equivalent; this is common, which we have received from the Latin communis. This word in the Teutonic dialects is, Saxon gemane; German gemein; Dutch gemeen; Danish gemecn; Swedish gemen. Now, if this is the Latin communis,—and of the identity of the last component part of the word there can, I think, be no doubt,—then the first part of the word is the Teutonic ge altered to com; or, what is more probable, com is the equivalent of ge, or ge may be a contracted and corrupted form of cum, com. In either case, we arrive at the conclusion that the Teutonic ge and the Latin cum are equivalent in signification.

In is used in the Saxon and Gothic, as in modern English. It is in German ein, Dutch and Swedish in, Danish ind, Greek en, Latin in, French en. This is radically the same word as on and un, the German an, Dutch aan, and Welsh an. In its original sense, it implies moving, advancing toward; and hence its use as a particle of negation or contrariety. "Eunt in urbem," They are going to the city. "Hæc audio in te dici," I hear these things said against you. In modern military usage, on is used in the same sense of advancing; "The army is marching on Liege."

Mid, in Saxon, signifies with. It is the Gothic mith, German mit, Dutch mede or met, and the Greek μετα; but not retained in English. It seems to have the same origin as mid, middle, amidst. In the Gothic it is used as a prefix.

Mis, a prefix, is the verb miss, to deviate. It is used in Saxon, German, Dutch, Swedish, and Danish, in nearly the same sense as in English. Its radical sense is to depart, or wander.

Of is a preposition and prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, as in English. It denotes, primarily, issuing or proceeding from; hence separation, departure, and distance: in the latter sense, it is written off. It is the Latin ab, written by the early Romans af; the Greek απο, the German ab, the Dutch af, Danish and Swedish af. The Saxons often prefixed this word in cases where we use it after the verb as a modifier; as, of-drifan, to drive off; as it is still used by the Germans, Dutch, Swedes, and Danes. We retain it, as a prefix, in offset and offspring, Saxon of-vinge. As it denotes proceeding from, it is the proper sign of the genitive case; the case expressing production.

Ofer, English over, Gothic ufar, German über, Dutch over, Danish over, Swedish öfer, is a preposition and prefix, in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages which I have examined; and in the same or similar senses. This seems to be the Greek επι, from which the Latins formed super by converting the aspirate of the Greek vowel into s. This is probably the Heb. Ch. Syr. Ar. עבר, to pass, a passing, beyond.

On is a Saxon preposition and prefix, of very extensive use. It is obviously a different orthography of in, and it is used for in in the Saxon; as, "on onginn," in the beginning. It has also the sense we now give to on and upon, with other modifications of signification.

In composition, on signifies into, or toward; as, on-blawan, to blow in; onclifan, to adhere, to cleave to; and it is also a particle of negation, like un; as, onbindan, to unbind. This on is only a different spelling of un, in Dutch on, German un, used as a word of negation. The Gothic has un and und, in the like sense, as the Danish has un; the Dutch ont. In this sense, un answers precisely to the Greek αρι, and as this is sometimes written und in Gothic, as in is written ind in Danish, there can be little doubt that in, on, un, ari, are all from one stock. The original word may have been han, hin, or hon; such loss of the first letter is very common; and inn, from the Ch. and Heb. ענת, presents us with an example. See IS and INN, in the Dictionary.

The German has an, and the Dutch aan, in the sense of in and on.

Oth is a Saxon preposition and prefix, sometimes written ath and ed, and answering nearly to the Latin ad and re; as in oth-witan, contracted, to twit, to throw in the teeth. It has also the sense of from, or away, or against, as in othsuerian, to abjure. This preposition is obsolete, but we have the remains of it in twit, and perhaps in a few other words.

Sam, samod, a prefix. See the Danish and Swedish, infra.

To is a preposition and prefix, of extensive use in our mother tongue. It occurs as a prefix in such words as tu-bracean, to break; to-beran, to bring or bear, [ad-ferre.] We retain it in together, Saxon togadere; and in toward, Saxon toward, towardes; and in tomorrow, today, tonight. The Dutch write it tae, and the Germans zu, and both nations use it extensively as a prefix. In Gothic it is written du, as in du-ginnan, to gin, that is, to begin.

It would be gratifying to learn whether the Ethiopic †, which is prefixed to many verbs, is not the remains of the same preposition.

Un is a Saxon prefix, of extensive use as a privative or particle of negation. See On and In.

Under is a Saxon preposition and prefix, of considerable use in the present English sense. The Germans write it unter, and the Dutch onder, and use it in like manner. The Danes and Swedes write it under, and use it in the same sense.

Up, uppe, is a Saxon preposition and prefix, of considerable use in the present English sense. The Gothic has uf, in the sense of the Latin sub. The Germans write it auf, and the Dutch op, the Danes op, and the Swedes up, and all use it as a prefix.

Us, in Gothic, is a preposition and prefix. This is the German aus, and equivalent to the Latin ex. It is the Saxon ut, the English out, Dutch uit, Swedish ut, and Danish ud, dialectically varied. To this answers the Welsh ys, used in composition; but ys seems rather to be a change of the Latin ex, for the Latin expello is written in Welsh yspeliaw, and extendo is estyn.

Wither, in Saxon, from the root of with, denotes against, or opposition. It is a prefix in Saxon, written in German wider, in Dutch weder; Danish and Swedish veder. It is obsolete, but retained in the old law term withernam, a counter-taking or distress.

In the German language, there are some prepositions and prefixes not found in the Saxon; as,

Ent, denoting from, out, away.

Er, without, out or to. Danish er.

Nach, properly nigh, as in nachbar, neighbor; but its most common signification in composition is after; as in nachgehen, to go after. This sense is easily deducible from its primary sense, which is close, near, from urging, pressing, or following. In Dutch, this word is contracted to na, as in nabuur, neighbor; nagaan, to follow. The Russ has na also, a prefix of extensive use, and probably the same word. This fact suggests the question, whether the ancestors of these great families of men had not their residence in the same or an adjoining territory. It deserves also to be considered whether this na is not the Shemitic \aleph ; occurring as a prefix to verbs.

Weg is a prefix used in the German and Dutch. It is the Saxon, German, and Dutch weg, way; in the sense of away, or passing from, from the verb, in Saxon wagan, wegan, to carry, to weigh, English to wag, the sense of which is to move or pass; as German wegfallen, to fall off or away.

Zer, in German, denotes separation.

In the Gothic dialects, Danish and Swedish, fra is used as a prefix. This is the Scottish fra, English from, of which it may be a contraction.

Fram in Swedish, and frem in Danish, is also a prefix. The primary sense is to go, or proceed, and hence it denotes moving to or toward, forth, &c., as in Danish fremfører, to bring forth; fremkalder, to call for. But in Danish, fremmed is strange, foreign, and it is probable that the English from is from the same root, with a different application. It may be from the same stock as the Gothic frum, origin, beginning, Latin primus, signifying to shoot forth, to extend, to pass along.

Gien, igien, in Danish, and iger, in Swedish, is the English gain in again, against. This is a prefix in both these Gothic languages. It has the sense of the Latin re, as in igienkommer, to come back, to return; of against, as in igienkalder, to countermand, or recall; of again, as gienbinder, to bind again. This may be the Latin con.

Mod, in Danish, and mot, emot, in Swedish, is a preposition, signifying to, toward, against, contrary, for, by, upon, out, &c.; as "mod staden," toward the city; modstrider, to resist; modgift, an antidote; modbør, a contrary wind; modvind, the same. This is the English meet, in the Gothic orthography, motuan, to meet, whence to meet.

O, in Swedish, is a negative or privative prefix, as in otidig, immature, in English, not tidy. It is probably a contracted word.

Paa in Danish, på in Swedish, is a preposition and prefix, signifying on, in, upon. Whether this is allied to be, by, and the Russ. po, I shall not undertake to determine with confidence; but it probably is the same, or from the same source.

Samman, signifying together, and from the root of assemble, is a prefix of considerable use in both languages. It answers to the Saxon sam, samod, equivalent to the Latin con or cum. It seems to be allied to same and the Latin similis.

Til, both in Danish and Swedish, is a prefix, and in Danish, of very extensive use. It is equivalent to the English to or toward, and signifies also at, in, on, by, and about, and in composition often has the sense of back or re, as in tilbage, backward, that is, to back; but generally it retains the sense of to or onward; as in tilbyder, to offer, that is, to speak or order to; tildriver, to drive on; tilgiver, to allow, to pardon, that is, to give to, and hence to give back, to remit. This is the English till, which we use in the same sense as the Danaic; but in English it always refers to time, whereas in Danish and Swedish it refers to place. Thus we can not say, "We are going till town;" but we say, "Wait till I come, till my arrival;" literally, "Wait to I come, to my arrival;" that is, to the time of arrival. The difference is not in the sense of the preposition, but in its application.

The Scotch retain the Danish and Swedish use of this word; no alight evidence of their origin.

U in Danish, the Swedish Ö, is a prefix, equivalent to in, and is used as a privative or negative; as in uuar, an unseasonable year; uartig, uncivil.

RUSSIAN.

Vo, or ve, signifies in, at, by, and may possibly be from the same root as the English be, by. But see Po.

Za is a prefix signifying for, on account of, by reason of, after; as in zavidayu, to envy, from vid, visage; viju, to see, Latin video; zadirayu, from deru, to tear; zamirayu, to be astonished or stupefied, from the root of Latin miror, and Russian mir, peace; miryu, to pacify, to reconcile; mirnie, pacific; zamirenje, peace, pacification; zamirayu, to make peace; Arm. miret, to hold, to stop; the radical sense of wonder, astonishment, and of peace.

Ka, a preposition, signifying to, toward, for.

Na, a preposition and prefix, signifying on, upon, at, for, to, seems to be the German nach, Dutch na; as in nagrada, recompense; na, and the root of Latin gratia; nasidayu, to sit down, &c.

Nad, a preposition, signifying above or upon.

O, a preposition, signifying of or from, and for.

Ob, a preposition and prefix, signifying to, on, against, about; as, obnemayu, to surround, to embrace; ob and Saxon neman, to take.

Ot is a preposition, signifying from, and it may be the English out.

Po is a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying in, by, after, from, &c.; as, podayu, to give to; pologayu, to lay, to expend, employ, lay out; to tax or assess; to establish or fix; to believe or suppose; po and lay. This corresponds with English by, and the Latin has it in posideo, and a few other words. [Saxon besittan.] Pomen, remembrance, po and mens, mind.

Rad, a preposition, signifying for, or for the love of.

So, a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying with, of, fram; and as a mark of comparison, it answers nearly to the English so or as.

Ÿ, with the sound of u, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. It signifies near, by, at, with, as uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to cut, to reap, to mow, to dress, French parer, Latin paro; ugoda, satisfaction; ugodnei, good, useful, English good; udol, a dale, from dol.

WELSH.

The prefixes in the Welsh language are numerous. The following are the principal.

Am, about, encompassing; Saxon amb, Greek αμφι.

An. See Saxon In.

Cy, cyd, cyp, cym, implying union, and answering to cum, con, and co in Latin. Indeed cym, written also cyn, seems to be the Latin cum, and cy may be a contraction of it, like co in Latin. Ca seems also to be a prefix, as in caboli, to polish, Latin polio.

Cyn, cynl, former, first, as if allied to begin.

Di, negative and privative.

Dis, negative and precise.

Dy, iterative.

E and ee, adversative.

Ed and eit, denoting repetition, like re, Saxon ed, oth.

Es, separating, like Latin ex. See Ys.

Go, extenuating, inchoative, approaching, going, denotes diminution or a less degree, like the Latin sub; as in gobrid, somewhat dear. This seems to be from the root of English go.

Han, expressive of origination

Lled, partly, half.

Oll, all.

Rhag, before.

Rhy, over, excessive.

Tra, over, beyond; Latin trans.

Try, through.

Ym, mutual, reflective.

Ys, denoting from, out of, separation, proceeding from, answering to the Latin ex; as, yspeliac, to expel. So es, Welsh, estyn, to extend.

Most of these prepositions, when used as prefixes, are so distinct as to be known to be prefixes.

But in some instances, the original preposition is so obscured by a loss or change of letters, as not to be obvious, nor indeed discoverable, without resorting to an ancient orthography. Thus, without the aid of the Saxon orthography, we should probably not be able to detect the component parts of the English teit. But in Saxon it is written cedreitan and othreitan; the preposition or prefix oth, with reitan, to disallow, reproach, or cast in the teeth.

It has been above suggested to be possible, that in the Shemitic languages, the \aleph in trilateral roots may be the same prefix as the Russian na, the Dutch nach, and the German nach. Let the reader attend to the following words.

Hebrew בבב , to look, to behold, to regard. The primary sense of look is, to reach, extend, or throw.

Ch., to look; also to bud or sprout.

Ar. نابا nabata, to spring, or issue as water; to flow out; to devise or strike out; to draw out.

If the first letter is a prefix, the Hebrew word would accord with Latin video; the Chaldee, with video and with bud, Spanish botar, French bouton, bouter, to put, and English to pout, and French bout, end, from shooting, extending.

Ar. نَبَات nabatha, to bud; to germinate. See Ch. supra.

Heb. נָבַל naval, to fall; to sink down; to wither; to fall off, as leaves and flowers; to act foolishly; to disgrace. Derivative, foolish; a fool; נָפַל nafal, Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam., to fall.

Ch. נָבַל nabal, to make foul; to defile; that is, to throw or put on.

Ar. نَبَلَ nabala, to shoot, as an arrow; to drive, as camels; to excel; also to die; that is, probably, to fall.

Can there be any question, that fall, foul, and fool are this very word, without the first consonant? The Arabic, without the first consonant, agrees with Gr. βαίλω, and the sense of falling, then, is to throw one's self down.

Heb. נָשָׂר nator, to keep, guard, preserve, retain, observe.

Ch. to observe; to keep; to lay up.

Syr. and Sam. id.

Eth. ነጠረ natar, to shine.

Ar. نَظَرَ natar, to keep; to see; to look; to attend.

Remove the first letter, and this coincides with the Greek νεπεω.

No person will doubt whether נָמַל namal, to circumcise, is formed on נָבַל mul.

Ch. נָסַר nasar, to cut; to saw. Syr. id. Lat. serra, serro.

Ar. نَفِدَ nafida, to fade, to vanish, to perish, to be empty, to fail.

Heb. נָפַח nafach, to blow, to breathe. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar. id. from פָּחַח puach, to blow.

If the Shemitic נ in these and similar words is a prefix or the remains of a preposition, it coincides very closely with the Russ. and Dutch na, and the latter we know to be a contraction of the German nach. Now, the German nach is the English nigh; for no person can doubt the identity of the German nachbar and the English neighbor.

In the course of my investigations, I very early began to suspect that b, f, p, c, g, and k, before l and r, are either casual letters, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, or the remains of prepositions; most probably the latter. I had advanced far in my Dictionary, with increasing evidence of the truth of this conjecture, before I had received Owen's Dictionary of the Welsh language. An examination of this work has confirmed my suspicions, or rather changed them into certainty.

If we attend to the manner of articulating the letters, and the ease with which bl, br, fl, fr, pl, pr, cl, cr, gl, gr, are pronounced, without an intervening vowel, even without a sheva, we shall not be surprised that a preposition or prefix, like be, pe, pa, po, or ge, should, in a rapid pronunciation, lose its vowel, and the consonant coalesce closely with the first letter of the principal word. Thus blank, prank, might naturally be formed from belank, perank. That these words are thus formed, I do not know; but there is nothing in the composition of the words to render it improbable. Certain it is, that a vast number of words are formed with these prefixes, on other words, or the first consonant is a mere adventitious addition; for they are used with or without the first consonant. Take the following examples:—

Hiberno-Celtic, or Irish, brac or brach, the arm, is written also raigh, Welsh braic, whence βραχιον, brachium. Braigh, the neck, Sax. hraca, Eng. rack, Gr. ῥαχίς. Fraoch, heath, ling, brake, L. erica.

* H before l and r in Saxon corresponds to the Greek κ, and Latin c, before the same letters.

† I do not follow Owen to the last step of his analysis, as I am of opinion that, in making monosyllabic words to be compound, he often errs. For example, he supposes broc, a tumult, to be from rhoc, a broken or rough utterance; a grunt or groan; and this, to be a compound of rhv, excess, what is over or beyond, and oc, a forcible utterance, a groan. I believe rhoc to be a primitive un-compounded word, coinciding with the English rough.

Owen supposes plad, a flat thing, a plate, to be from llad, with py. Llad he explains, what is given, a gift, good things, and py, what is inward or involved. I have no doubt that the first letter is a prefix in plad, but, beyond all question, llad is from the same root as llad, breadth, coinciding with Lat. latus; both from a common root signifying to extend. But I do not believe llad or llud to be compound words.

Dug, a duke, Owen supposes to be formed on ug, over; which can not be

Welsh llawr, Basque lurra, Eng. floor

Lat. floccus, Eng. flock or lock.

Sax. hraccan, Eng. to reach, in vomiting.*

Sax. hracod, Eng. ragged.

Ger. rock, Eng. frock.

Dutch geluk, Ger. gluck, Eng. luck.

Greek, Eolic dialect, ῥοδος, for ῥοδος, a rose.

Latin clunis, Eng. loin, G. lende, W. clun, from llun.

Eng. cream, Ger. rahm, Dutch room.

Sax. hlaf, Polish chlieb, G. leib, Eng. loaf.

Sax. hladan, Eng. to lade or load, Russ. kladu, to lay.

Greek κλίνο, Lat. clino, Sax. hlinian, hlcnonn, Russ. klonyu, Eng. to lean.

Greek λαγνος, Lat. lagena, Eng. flagon.

Sax. hrysan, Eng. to rush.

French frapper, Eng. to rap.

Sax. gerædian, to make ready; in Chaucer, greith, to make ready. Sax. hræd, quick; hrædian, to hasten; hrædnes, Eng. readiness.

Spanish frisar, to curl or frizzle; rizar, the same.

Sax. gerefa, Eng. receve, G. graf, D. graaf.

Lat. glycyrrhiza, from the Greek; Eng. liquorice.

But in no language have we such decisive evidence of the formation of words by prefixes, as in the Welsh.

Take the following instances, from a much greater number that might be produced, from Owen's Welsh Dictionary.

Blanc, a colt, from llanc.

Blith, milk, from lith.

Bliant, fine linen, from lliant.

Plad, a flat piece or plate, from llad.

Pled, a principle of extension, from lled.

Pledren, a bladder, from pledryr, that distends, from lled.

Pleth, a braid, from lleth, Eng. plait

Plicciaio, to pluck, from llig.

Ploc, a block, from lloc; plociaw, to block, to plug.

Phung, a plunge, from llhong, our vulgar lunge.

Gluth, a glutton, from llwth.

Glas, a blue color, verdancy, a green plat, whence Eng. glass, from llas.

Glyd, gluten, glue, from llyd.

Clær, clear, from llaer.

Clav, sick, from llav.

Clcpa, a club, a knob, from llhoc.

Chot, a piece, a clout, from llhod, llhot.

Clamp, a mass, a lump.

Clawd, a thin board, from llawd.

Cledyr, a board or shingle, whence cledrwy, lattice, from lled.

Bran, Eng. bran, from rhan; rhanu, to rend.

Brid, a breaking out, from rhid.

Broc, noise, tumult, a brock, from rhoc.

Broc, froth, foam, anger, broci, to chafe or fret, from brucc, a boiling or ferment, from rhucc, something rough, a grunt, Gr. βρυχω.

Bryd, what moves, impulse, mind, thought, from rhvd.

Brys, quickness, brysiaw, to hasten, to shoot along, from rhys, Eng. to rush and crysiaw, to hasten, from rhys, to rush. [Here is the same word rhys, with different prefixes, forming brysiaw and crysiaw. Hence W. brysg, Eng. brisk.]

Gruz, [pronounced grath.] a step, a degree, from rhaz, Lat. gradus, gradior.

Greg, a cackling, from rhcg.

Grem, a crashing, gnash, a murmur, gremiaw, to crash or gnash, from rhem. Hence Lat. fremo, Gr. βρεμω.†

We have some instances of similar words in our own language; such are flag and lag; slap and lap; clump and lump.

There is another class of words which are probably formed with a prefix of a different kind. I refer to words in which s precedes true, unless the Latin dux, duco, are compounds. Dur, steel, he derives from ur, extreme, over; but doubtless it is from the root of the Latin durus.

So par, signifying what is contiguous, a state of readiness or preparation, a pair, fellow, or match, Owen makes a compound of py, and ar; py, as above explained, and ar, a word of various significations, on, upon, surface, &c. But there can be no doubt that par is from the root of the Latin paro, to prepare, being the Latin par, equal; the root of a numerous family of words not only in the Japhetic languages of Europe, but in the Shemitic languages of Asia. It certainly is not a Welsh compound, nor is there the least evidence to induce a belief that it is not an un-compounded word. Had the learned author of the Welsh Dictionary extended his researches to a variety of other languages, and compared the monosyllabic roots in them with each other, I think he would have formed a very different opinion as to their origin. I am very well convinced that many of the words which he supposes to be primitive or radical, are contractions, such as rhy, lle, lly, the last consonant being lost.

another consonant, as scalp, skull, slip, slide, sluggish, smoke, smooth, speed, spire, spin, stage, steep, stem, swell, spout. We find that tego, to cover, in Latin, is in Greek στέγω; and the Latin fallo is in Greek σάλλω. We find μαργαδος is written also μαραγδος; and it may be inquired whether the English spin is not from the same root as πηνν, web or wool, πηννιου, a spindle, πηννιου, to spin. Sprout in English is in Spanish brotá.

We find the Welsh ysbrig, the English spring, is a compound of ys, a prefix denoting issuing or proceeding from, like the Lat. ex, and brig, top, summit.

Ysgar, a separate part, a share; ysgar, ysgaru, to divide; ysgariaw, to separate, is composed of ys and car, according to Owen; but the real root appears distinctly in the Gr. καίρω. This is the English shear, shire.

Ysgegiaw, to shake, by laying hold of the throat, to shake roughly, is a compound of ys and cegiaw, to choke, from ceg, the mouth, an entrance, a choking. This may be the English shake; Sax. scaecan.

Ysgin, a robe made of skin; ys and ein, a spread or covering.

Ysgodi, to shade; ysgawd, a shade; ys and cawd.

Ysgrab, what is drawn up or puckered, a scrip; ys and crab, what shrinks. See Eng. crab, crabbed.

Ysgrawu, to scrape; ys and crar, claws, from rhaw.

Ysgrec, a scream, a shriek, ysgreciaw, to shriek, from crec, a shriek, crecian, to shriek, from creg, cryg, hoarse, rough, from rhyg, rye, that is, rough; the grain so named from its roughness.

This is the English rough, Lat. raucus. Here we have the whole process of formation, from the root of rough. We retain the Welsh crecian, to shriek, in our common word to creak, and with a formative prefix, we have shriek, and our vulgar sreak. The Latin ruga, a wrinkle, Eng. rug, shrug, are probably from the same source.

Ysgrienu, to write, Lat. scribo, from ysgriw, a writing, from criw, a mark cut, a row of notches; criwiaw, to cut, to grave; from rhw, something that divides. Hence scrizener.

Ysgub, a sheaf or besom, ysgubaw, to sweep, Lat. scopa, from cub, a collection, a heap, a cube.

Ysgud, something that whirls; ysgudaw, to whisk or scud; from cud, celerity, flight; ysguth, ysguthaw, the same.

Ysgwth, a push; ysgwithiaw, to push or thrust; from guth, gwithiaw, the same; probably allied to Eng. shoot. The Welsh has ysgythu, to jet or spout, from the same root.

Yslac, slack, loose; yslaciaw, to slacken; from llac, loose, slack, llaciaw, to slacken, from llag, slack, sluggish; allied to Eng. lag and slow.

Yslapiaw, to slap, to slap, from yslab, what is lengthened or distended, from llab, a flag, a strip, a stroke. Llabi, a tall, lank person, a stripling, a looby, a lubber, is from the same root; llabiaw, to slap.

Ysled, a sled, from lled, says Owen, which denotes breadth; but it is probably from the root of slide, a word probably from the same root as lled, that is, to extend, to stretch along.

Ysmot, a patch, a spot; ysmotiaw, to spot, to dapple, from mod, Eng. note.

Ysmuciaw, ysmygu, to dim with smoke, from meg, smoke. So smooth, from Welsh moyth.

Yspail, spoil, from pail, farina, says Owen. I should say from the root of palea, straw, refuse, that is, from the root of peel, to strip. Yspeliota, to be pilfering.

Yspeliaw, to expel, from pel, a ball, says Owen; but this is the Latin expello, from pello. Ball may be from the same root.

Yspig, a spike, a spine; yspigaw, to spike; from pig, a sharp point, a piko. Hence Eng. spigot.

Yspin, a spine, from pin, pen.

Ysgynn, to ascend, Lat. ascendo, from cyn, first, chief, foremost. The radical sense is to shoot up.

Yslot, a slough, from llicc, a collection of water, a lake.

Yspar, a spear, from pdr, a cause or principle of producing, the germ or seed of a thing, a spear. This consists of the same elements as ber, a spit, and Eng. bar; and in Italian bar is sbarra. The primary sense is to shoot, thrust, drive.

Yspine, a finch, from pinc, gay, fine, brisk; a sprig, a finch.

Ysplan, clear, bright; ysplana, to explain; from plan, that is parted off, a ray, a shoot, a planting, a plane; whence plant, a child; Eng. a plant; plannu, to shoot, as a plant. Hence splendor, W. ysplander.

Ysporti, to support, from porth, a bearing, a port, passage, &c. Lat. porta, porto.

Ystac, a stack, a heap; ystaca, a standard; from tag, a state of being stuffed or clogged.

Ystad, a state; ystadu, to stay; from tad, that spreads, a continuity. The primary sense is to set.

Ystain, that is spread; a stain; tin, Lat. stannum; ystaeniaro, to spread over, to stain; ystaenu, to tin, or cover with tin; from taen, a spread, a layer. Qu. is tin from spreading?

Ystawl, a stool, from twol, a cast or throw. The sense is to set, to throw down. Tawl is the root of deal.

Ystor, a store, that forms a hulk, from tor, a swell, a prominence.

Ystorn, a storm, from torn, that is stretched, but the sense is a rushing.

Ystrym, a stream, from trym, compact, trim, that is, stretched, straight, from extending.

Ystump, a stump, from twmp, a round mass, a tump.

Ysuatiaw, to squat, from yswad, a throw, or falling down, from gwad, a denial; gwadu, to deny or disown. If this deduction is correct, the sense of denial is a throwing or thrusting back, a repelling. It is so in other words.

Yswitiaw, to chirp, twitter, from yswid, that makes a quick turn. Qu. twitter.

In some of the foregoing words, it appears evident that the Welsh prefix ys is an alteration of the Latin ex, and the words in which this is the case were probably borrowed from the Latin, while the Roman armies had possession of England. But there is a vast number of words, with this prefix, which are not of Latin origin; and whether ys is a native prefix in the Welsh, may be a question. One thing is certain, that s before another consonant, and coalescing with it, is, in a great number of words, a prefix.

The modern Italian affords abundant proof of the extensive use of s, as the remains or representative of ex; as, shallare, to un-pack, unbale; sbarbato, beardless; sballere, to abate; sbrancare, to pluck off branches; scaricare, to discharge; scommodare, to incommode; sconcordia, discord; scornare, to break the horns; scrostare, to pull off the crust; and a great number of others.

Now, if the same manner of forming words with this prefix has actually prevailed among the northern nations of Europe, we may rationally suppose that many English words, and perhaps all of this class, are thus formed. Thus scatter may be formed from the root of Ca; shape, from Ca, Cf, or Cp; skill, from the root of Lat. calleo; slip, from the root of Lat. labor; smart, from the root of Lat. amarus, bitter, Heb. מר; smite, from the root of Latin mitto; span, from the root of pan, to stretch; spar, from the root of bar; speed, from the root of Lat. roco; speed, from a root in Pa, perhaps Lat. peto; steal, from the root of Lat. tollo; steep, from the root of deep; stretch, from the root of reach; sweep, from the root of wipe; swan, from wan, white; swell, from the root of well, Sax. wellan, to boil, &c. That many English and other Teutonic and Gothic words are thus formed, appears to be certain.

These facts being admitted, let us examine a little further. In Russ. szadiba is a wedding. Is not this formed on the root of wed, with s for a prefix? Svara is a quarrel. Is not this formed on the root of vary, variance, or of spar? Sverlo is a borer; qu. bore and veru; svertivayu, to roll; qu. Lat. verto; skora, fura, peltry; qu. Fr. cuir; shot, a beast; qu. cattle; skupayu, to purchase in gross; qu. cheap, Dan. kioben, and its root; slabei, weak; qu. Lat. labor, lapsus; slagayu, to fold; qu. lay, and plico; slivayu, to pour out liquors; qu. Lat. libo; slupayu, to peel off bark or skin; qu. Lat. liber; snimayu, to take away; qu. Sax. zeman, to take; snova, new; qu. Lat. novus; snig, sneig, snow, Fr. neige. The Lat. nivis is from this root, with g opened to v. Russ. spletayu, to plait, &c.

The Russ. prefix so occurs in a great number of words; sobirayu, to collect or assemble, precisely the Heb. and Ch. צבר.

It now becomes an interesting question, to determine how far any analogy exists between the languages of the Japhetic and Shemitic families in regard to prefixes. For example, in the Shemitic languages, ב is a prefix of extensive use, corresponding almost exactly with the English and Dutch by, the Saxon be, and German bei. This preposition and prefix has several senses in the Saxon which are now obsolete; but its present prevailing sense occurs in all the Shemitic languages. ברוח קדים עז, by a strong east wind. Ex. xiv. 21. Compare the following definitions of this preposition; the Sax. from Lye, and the Shemitic from Castle.

Sax. de, e, ex, in, secus, ad, juzta, secundum, pro, per, super, propter, circa.

Heb. Ch. Syr. in, e, ex, cum, propter, usque ad, adeo ut, ad, super, per, contra, ante

Eth. in, per, pro, propter, cum, secundum, apud.

Ar. in, cum, propter, per, ad, erga.

In Numbers xiv. 34, it signifies according to, or after; בְּיָמֵי according to the number of days. This signification is now perhaps obsolete in English, but was common in the Saxon; as, "be his magnum," according to his strength; pro viribus suis. So "be tham mastan," by the most, is now expressed by, at the most.

Now, it is remarkable that this word in Hebrew, Arabic, and Persic, is the preposition used in oaths, precisely as it is in English. Gen. xxii. 16, בִּי , By myself have I sworn. Arabic, bal- lah, or by Allah; Persic, بِخُدا bechoda, or begoda, by God, the very words now used in English. The evidence, then, is decisive, that the Shemitic prefix ב is the Teutonic be, by, bei, contracted, and this Teutonic word is certainly a contraction of big, which is used in the Saxon, especially in compound words, as in bigspell, [by-spell,] a fable; bigstandan, to stand by. This prefix, then, was in universal use by the original stock of mankind, before the dispersion; and this word alone is demonstrative proof of the common origin of the Shemitic and Teutonic languages. Now, it is equally certain that this is the prefix b, and probably p, before l and r, in block, braigh, and a multitude of words in all the modern languages; and, probably, the same letter is a prefix in many Shemitic words.

We know that be in the Saxon bedalan, and Dutch bedeelen, is a prefix, as the simple verb is found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages. The Hebrew and Chaldee בָּרַךְ corresponds exactly, in elements and in signification, with the Saxon and Dutch. Whether the first letter is a prefix in the latter languages, let the reader judge. See the word DEAL, which, when traced, terminates in the Welsh tael, a cast off, a throw; separation; taelu, to cast or throw off, to separate.

In Chaldee, בָּדַר badar, signifies to scatter, to disperse. The word has the same signification in the Syriac and Samaritan.

In Ethiopic, the word, with ለ prefixed, signifies to wish, love, desire; and with ተ prefixed, to strive, to endeavor; and without a prefix, strife, course, race. Both these significations are from stretching, straining.

In Arabic, بَدَرَ badara, signifies generally to hasten, to run to; but بَثَرَ bathara, signifies to disperse, to sow or scatter seed.

This verb is written in Hebrew בָּתַר with precisely the same signification. The Arabic, also, has the verb with this orthography, signifying to sow, and also to beat or strike with a stick.

Now, in Syriac, ܕܪ dar, signifies to strive or struggle. * Here we have the simple verb, without the prefix, with the sense of the Ethiopic with a prefix. Supra.

We find also the Arabic ذَر tharra, the simple verb, signifies to sprinkle.

We find in Chaldee דָּרַא , דָּרַה , and דָּרַי , the simple verb, signifies to disperse; in Syriac, the same. In Arabic ذَرَا tharua, signifies to sow, like the foregoing verb, and hence to procreate. Both this and the former verb signify also to whiten, as the hair of the head; as we say, to sprinkle with gray hairs. The Arabic ذَرَا darua, signifies to drive, to impel, to repel, to contend, to strive; to shine, to sparkle. And here we have the literal signification of this whole class of verbs; to drive, urge, throw, send; hence to scatter, to strive, to shoot as rays of light, procreate, &c.

The Hebrew corresponding verb is זָרַח or זָרַע , to scatter, to sow; and the word with the like orthography occurs in Ch. Syr. and Ar. This is the Latin sero. And who can doubt that ז is a prefix in the verb זָרַח above mentioned?

In Welsh, goberu signifies to work, to operate; gaber, work, operation; formed by the prefix go and per; go denoting progress toward, approach; and per rendered by Owen, that pervades, a fruit, a pear; but the real sense is to strain, to bring forth; to drive, thrust, urge, &c.

This word, in the Armoric dialect, is written either gober or ober; in Latin operor, whence Eng. operata. The same word is in the Ethiopic, ገብረ gaber, to make, to do; ገገበረ agabar, to cause to be made; ተገብረ tagabar, to work, operate, negotiate; ገበረ gabar, a maker.

This is the Heb. and Ch. גָּבַר , to be strong, to prevail, to establish; and as a noun, a man; Ar. جَبُو jabara, to make strong, to heal, as a broken bone; to strengthen.

That this Shemitic word and the Welsh and Ethiopic are all radically one, there can not be a question; and the Welsh proves, indisputably, that go is a prefix. This, then, is a word formed on בַּר or בָּרַע . The Heb. בָּרַר , strong, that is, strained, and בָּרַח , a wing, that is, a shoot, are from the same root; and in Arabic أَبُو abara, signifies to prick, to sting, and its derivatives, the extremity of a thing, a point, a needle, corresponding with the Welsh bar, a summit, a tuft, a branch, a bar, and the Welsh ber, a lance, a spit, a spear, Lat. veru; in Welsh, also, pâr, a spear, and per, a spit, are all doubtless of the same origin.

In Syriac, ܕܪܝܢ tsabar, signifies to make, to work or operate.

Is this the same root with a different prefix?

The same word in Arabic, صَبِر tsabara, signifies to be patient, to bear, to sustain.

We observe, that in the Teutonic and Gothic languages, the same word is used with different prefixes. Thus, in our mother tongue, begin is written gynnan, the simple radical word, and aginnan, beginnan, and ongynnan; and in the Gothic, duginnan, which, in English, would be togin.

Should it appear, upon investigation, that verbs in the Assyrian languages have the same prefixes which occur in the European languages, the fact will evidence more affinity between the languages of these two stocks than has yet been known to exist.

Let us now attend to the natural causes which may be supposed to have obscured or destroyed the identity or resemblance of languages which had a common origin.

The affinity of words, in two or more different languages, is known by identity of letters and identity of signification; or by letters of the same organ, and a signification obviously deducible from the same sense. Letters of the same organ, as, for example, b, f, p, and v, are so easily converted, the one into the other, and the change is so frequent, that this circumstance seldom occasions much obscurity. The changes of signification occasion more difficulty, not so much by necessity, as because this branch of philology is less understood.

I. CHANGE OF CONSONANTS WHICH REPRESENT THE ARTICULATIONS OF THE ORGANS OF SPEECH.

Consonants are the stamina of words. They are convertible and frequently converted to their cognates. The English word bear represents the Latin fero and pario, and fero is the Greek φέρω . The Latin ventus is wind in English; and habeo is have. The Latin dens, in Dutch, Danish, and Swedish, is tand; and dance in English is in German tanz.

These changes are too familiar to require a multiplication of examples. But there are others less common and obvious, which are yet equally certain. Thus in the Gaelic or Hiberno-Celtic, m and mb are convertible with v; and in Welsh, m and v are changed, even in different cases of the same word. Thus, in Irish, the name of the hand is written either lamb or lar, and in Welsh maen, a stone, is written also vaen. The Greek β is always pronounced as the English v, as βουλομαι , Lat. volo, English will, German wollen; and the sound of b the Greeks express by $\mu\beta$.

In the Chaldee and Hebrew, one remarkable distinction is the use of a dental letter in the former, where the latter has a sibilant. As כַּת cuth in Chaldee is כֹּשֶׁת ush in Hebrew; כֶּסֶף gold, in Chaldaic is כֶּסֶף in Hebrew. The like change appears in the modern languages; for water, which in most of the northern languages is written with a dental, is in German written wasser and the Latin dens, W. dant, Dutch tand, Swedish and Danish tand, is in German zahn. The like change is frequent in the Greek and Latin. Φαρτω, in one dialect, is φρασσω, in another; and the Latins often changed t of the indicative present, or infinitive, into s in the preterit and participle; as, mitto, mittere, missi, missus.

L and r, though not considered as letters of the same organ, are really such, and changed the one into the other. Thus the Spaniards write blandir for brandish, and escorta for escort. The Portuguese write brando for bland, and branquear, to whiten, for blanch. The Greek has φραγγέλιον for the Latin flagellum. In Europe, however, this change seems to be limited chiefly to two or three nations on the coast of the Mediterranean. L is sometimes commutable with d.

We have a few instances of the change of g or gh into f. Thus rough is pronounced ruf, and trough, trauf.

The Russians often change the d of a noun into the sound of j, or the compound g, in the verb formed from that noun; as, lad, accord, harmony; taju, to accord or agree; bred, damage, loss; breju, to injure.

The Italians and French have also changed a dental into a palatal letter, in many words; as, Italian raggio, a ray, from Lat. radius; and ragione, reason, from ratio; Fr. manger, to eat, from Lat. mando, or manduco.

In the south of Europe, the Greek χ has been changed, in some instances, into the Italian or Spanish z, and then by the French into s. It seems that the Spanish z has, at some former period, been pronounced as a guttural. Thus the Gr. βραχιον, Lat. brachium, the arm, is in Spanish brazo, and the Spaniards have the word from the Latin, or from the same source as the Latin and Greek, the Celtic broic. This word brazo the French changed into bras, and from that we have brace and embrace. A similar change occurs in Durazzo, from Dyrachium, and in the Spanish luz, light.

The Teutonic nations often used h to express the power of the Greek κ, and the Latin c; as, heart for καρδια, horn for cornu. Hence we find that the Saxon hlinian, hlonian, or hlynian, to lean, is the Greek κλινω, Latin clino. The letter h is now dropped, and we write the word lean.

In like manner, the Saxon hlid, which we now write lid, is from the same root as the Latin claudo, cludo, the Greek κλειδω, which is contracted into κλειω. And in this word we may notice another fact, that the word signifies not only to shut, but to praise or celebrate; proving that this word and the Latin plaudo are the same, with different prefixes, as laudo; and that the primary sense is, to strain. This in Saxon appears in hlud, loud, hlydan, to cry out.

In Latin, f and h have been converted; as, hordeum for fardeum; and the Spaniards now write h for f; as, hacer for the Latin facere; hilo for filum; herir for ferire, &c.

The letters r and s are commutable. Thus iron in German is eisen; in D. yzzer.

The letters n and s seem also to be commutable; as in Latin pono, posui.

The letters l and r are convertible; for the English colonel is in Spanish and Portuguese coronel, and in Armoric coronal.

The cause of these differences is in the position of the organs in the articulations; the position being nearly but not exactly the same.

2. CHANGE OF VOWELS.

The change of vowels is so common, as to occasion no difficulty in determining the sameness of words; indeed, little or no regard is to be had to them, in ascertaining the origin and affinity of languages. In this opinion I accord with almost all writers on this subject; but I have to combat the opinion of that elegant scholar, Sir William Jones, who protests against the licentiousness of etymologists, not only in transposing letters, but in totally disregarding the vowels, and who seems to admit the common origin of words only when written with the same letters, and used in a sense precisely the same.*

I am not at all surprised at the common prejudice existing against etymology. As the subject has been treated, it is justly liable to all the objections urged against it. But it is obvious that Sir W. Jones had given very little attention to the subject, and that some of its most common and obvious principles had escaped his observation. His opinion, with regard to both articulations and vowels, is unequivocally erroneous, as will appear from the following list of words, taken from modern languages, and respecting the identity of which, that gentleman himself, if living, could not have the slightest doubt.

English.	Saxon.	Dutch.	German.	Swedish.	Latin.
draw,	dragan,	trekken,	tragen,	draga,	traho.
drag,
give,	gifan,	geeven,	geben,	gifva.
foot,	fot, fet,	voet,	fuss,	fot,	pes,
feet,					Gr. ποῦς.
hook,	haak,	haak,	haken,	hake.
day,	dag, dæg,	dasg,	tag,	dag.
have,	habban,	hebben,	haben,	haifa,	habeo.
		[Fr. avoir;	ai, as, a,	avons, avez,	ont.]
leap,	hleapan,	loopen,	laufen,	löpa.
burn,	byman,	branden,	brennen,	brinna.
will,	willan,	willen,	wollen,	willja, volo, velle.
stone,	stan,	steen,	stein,	sten.
broad,	bred,	breed,	breit,	bred.
earth,	eorth,	aarde,	erde,	jord, Dan. iord.
who,	hwa,	wie,	ho,	Dan. hvo.
seek,	secan,	zoeken,	suchen,	sökia, sequor.
bean,	bean,	boon,	bohne,	böna, Dan. böne.

Here are scarcely two words written with the same letters in two languages; and yet no man ever called in question their identity, on account of the difference of orthography. The diversity is equally great in almost all other words of the same original. So in the same words we often find the vowel changed, as in the Lat. facio, fecit; ngo, egi; sto, steti; vello, vulsi. Nothing is more certain than that the Welsh gweiz and the English wood are the same word, although there is one letter only common to them both. It is pronounced gooyth, that is, g and oyth; as, guard for ward. This prefixing of g to words which in English begin with w, is very common in Spanish and French. The word war in French is guerre; Sp. guerra.

3. CHANGE OR LOSS OF RADICAL LETTERS.

There are some words which, in certain languages, have suffered a change of a radical letter; while in others it is wholly lost. For example, word, in Danish and Swedish, is ord: wort, a plant, is wrt; the Saxon gear, or ger, English year, in Danish is aar, in Swedish is är, in Dutch jaar, and in German jahr.

In the word yoke, and its affinities, we have a clear and decisive example of changes in orthography. Yoke, the Latin jugum, is from the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic yug, to join, to couple; a word not found in the Hebrew. The Greeks retained the original letters in ζυγος, ζυγω; the Latins changed the first letter to j in jugum, and inserted a casual n in jungo. From the Latin the Italians formed giogo, a yoke, and giugnere, to join; the Spaniards, yugo, a yoke, and juntar, to join; the French, joug, a yoke, and joindre, to join. In Saxon, yoke is geoc or ioe; in Dutch, juk; G. joch; Sw. ok.

One of the most general changes that words have undergone, is the entire loss of the palatal letter g, when it is radical and final in verbs, or the opening of that articulation to a vowel or diphthong. We have examples in the English bow, from Saxon bugan, to bend; buy, from bycgan; brow, from breg; lay, from lagan, or leggan; say, from sagan; fuir, from feiger; snail, from the German slugel, Lat. slugellum; French nier, from Lat. nego, negare.

The same or similar changes have taken place in all the modern languages of which I have any knowledge.

The loss and changes of radical letters in many Greek verbs deserve particular notice. We find, in the Lexicons, πραγμα, πραγος, πρακτικος, are referred to πρασσω, πραττω, as the theme or root; ταγμα, to τασσω; δητω, to δω; and φραγμα, to φρασσω. This reference, so far as it operates as a direction to the student where to find the verb to which the word belongs, and its explanation, is useful and necessary. But if the student supposes that these words are formed from the theme, so called, or the first person of the indicative mode, present tense, he is deceived. I am confident no example can be found, in any language, of the palatals γ and κ, formed from the dentals and sibilants τ and σ; nor is δητω, or any similar word, formed by the addition of the dental to a verb ending in a vowel. The truth is, the last radical in δω is lost, in the indicative mode; and in πρασσω, πραττω, it is changed. The radical lost in δω is δ or θ; the original word was δεδω or δεδω, and the derivatives δητω, δητορικη, were formed before the radical letter was dropped in the verb. No sooner is the verb restored to its primitive form, than we recognize its connection with the Irish raidham, to speak; Saxon ræd, speech; rædan, to read; German reden, rede; Dutch raad, &c.

* Asiatic Researches, vol. 3, p. 483.

The original root of πρασσαω was πραγω, πραγω, or πρακω, and from this were formed πραγμα, πρακτικος, before the last radical was changed. No sooner is the original orthography restored, than we see this to be the Teutonic verb, German brauchen, Dutch gebruiken, Danish bruger, Sw. bruka, Sax. brucan, to use, to practice, and hence the English broker.

The same remarks are applicable to ταγμα and τασσω; φραγμα and φρασσω; αλλαγη and αλλισσω; χαρκτηρ and χαρασσω, and many other words of like formation. In all these cases, the last radical letter is to be sought in the derivatives of the verb, and in one of the past tenses, particularly in an aorist. This fact affords no feeble evidence that in Greek, as in the Shemitic languages, the preterit tense or an aorist was the radix of the verb. κρατω, in Greek, is to cry like a crow or rook; but the last radical is changed from γ, as, in the second aorist, it forms ροαγεις. Now, in Danish, crow is krage, in Ger. krähe, in D. kraai, in Sw. kråka; a fact that demonstrates the last radical letter to be a palatal, which in English is opened to o, in crow.

But it is not in the Greek language only that we are to seek for the primitive radical letters, not in what is now called the root of the verb, but in the derivatives. The fact is the same in the Latin and in the English. The Latin fluctus and fluri can not be deduced from flao; but the orthography of these words proves demonstrably that the original root was flugo, or fluco. So, in English, sight can not be deduced from see, for no example can be found of the letter g introduced to form the participles of verbs. Sight, in Saxon gesicht, D. zigt, G. sicht, Dan. sigt, Sw. sickt, is a participle; but the verb in the infinitive, in Saxon is seon, geseon, Ger. sehen, D. zien, Dan. ser, Sw. se; in which no palatal letter is found, from which g or ch can be deduced. The truth, then, is, that the original verb was segun, or in Dutch zegen; the g being lost, as it is in the French nier, from the Lat. nego.

In the change of letters in the Greek verbs before mentioned, the process seems to have been from γ or κ to ξ, and then to σ and τ; πραγω, πρωξω, πρασσω, πρωσιω. This is certainly a process which is natural and common. The Latin brachium thus became in Spanish brazo, and then in French bras; and thus in the Italian, Alexandria has become Alessandria.

When the last radical of a Greek verb is a dental, it may not be certain whether the original letter was d, or th, or t. We find the Greek verb σπασω, to draw, forms its derivatives with σ, σπασμα, σπασις; and this is probably the Armoric spaza, from which we have spay. So φρατω, φρασις, and φραση, are evidently of the same family. It is not improbable that the original letter might have a compound sound, or it might correspond nearly to the Arabic ظ or ض, or the English dh or th, or ds, so as easily to pass into d or into s.

It is equally clear that many Greek words have lost an initial consonant. The letter most generally lost is probably the Oriental π, but obviously the palatals γ and κ have, in many instances, been dropped. There seems to be no question that the Greek ολος is the English whole, and perhaps all. This in Welsh is oll or holl, in Saxon al or geall; and this is undoubtedly the Shemitic אל. So the Greek αλλυσι is the Welsh colli, to lose; and ειλεω may be the English coil, Fr. cucillir.

In like manner the Greek has, in many words, lost a labial initial, answering to the English b, f, or v. The Greek ειδω is undoubtedly the Latin video; εργον is from the same root as work; ιδιος is from the root of vid, in the Latin divido, and individuus, that is, separate, and from the Arabic بدا, badda, to separate.

In many instances, the Latin retained or restored the lost letter; thus hamaza for αμαζα, hairpago for αρηπαγη; harmonia for αρμονια; video for ειδω.

If the marks of breathing, called spiritus asper and spiritus lenis, now prefixed to Greek words, were intended to represent the letters lost, or to stand in the place of them, they answer this purpose very imperfectly. The spiritus asper may stand for a palatal or guttural letter, but it does not designate which letter, the π, or the κ; much less does this or the other spiritus justly represent the labials, b, f, v, or w. Whenever the Latins wrote h in the place of the Greek spiritus, we may conclude that the original letter was π, or a cognate letter; and we may conclude also that the v in video, and in divido, viduus, individuus, stands for the original labial lost in ειδω and ιδιος. But there are many words, I apprehend, in which the lost letter is unknown, and in which the loss can not be recovered by any marks prefixed to the words. We may well suppose that hymnus exhibits the correct written form of εμνος; but what is there in the Greek υψη to lead us to consider this word as the English woof, and υψω to be the same as weave? Both the Greek words have the spiritus asper.

What proportion of Greek words have been contracted by the loss of an initial or final consonant, can not, I apprehend, be determined with any precision; at least, not in the present state of philological knowledge. It is probable the number of contracted words amounts to one fourth of all the verbs, and it may be more.

Similar contractions have taken place in all other languages; a circumstance that embarrasses the philologist and lexicographer at every step of his researches, and which has led to innumerable mistakes in etymology. We know that the Swedish år, and Danish aar, a year, have lost the articulation g, and that the English y in year is the representative of g, as j is in the Dutch jaar, and German jahr: for the g is found in our mother tongue; and in a multitude of words, one language will supply the means of determining the real origin or true orthography, which can not be ascertained by another. But doubtless many changes have taken place, of which the evidence is uncertain; the chain which might conduct us to the original orthography being broken, and no means now remain of repairing the loss.

In no language has the rejection or change of consonants served so effectually to obscure the original words as in the French. So extensive have been the changes of orthography in that language, that, had not the early lexicographers indicated the loss of letters by a mark, it would be impossible now to discover the original orthography, or to trace the connection of words with other languages, in a large portion of them. And it is with regret we observe the influence of the French practice of suppressing consonants extending itself to other countries. It is owing to the most servile obsequiousness of nations, that Basil or Basilea, the elegant name of a town in Switzerland, has been corrupted to Basle, and pronounced most barbarously Bale. The Germans are pursuing a like course in suppressing the palatal letters; a most unfortunate circumstance for the strength of the language.

The Italians also have a disposition to reject letters when they interfere with their habits of pronunciation; and hence we see, in their language, piano, written for plano; fiore for flore; fiocco for flocco; a change that has removed a radical consonant, and thus obscured, or rather destroyed, the affinity between the Italian and the Latin words.

Another difference of writing and pronouncing has been produced by the change of a sibilant letter into an aspirate; or, e converso, by the change of an aspirate into a sibilant. No person doubts whether the Latin super is the Greek υπερ; or υαλος is similis; or υαλς is sal, salt. The latter in Welsh is halen, hal. So helyg, a willow, in Welsh, is in Latin salix. The Greek επτα is the Latin septem, English seven. This in Persic is هفت heft or haft, which approaches the Greek επτα. It has been commonly supposed that, in this case, the aspirate in Greek has been converted into an s. There are, however, strong reasons for believing that the change has been the reverse, and that s has been dropped, and its place supplied by an aspirate. The word seven is, beyond a question, the Shemitic שבוע, whence שבת is Eng. sabbath; and the Gaelic sean, old, whence Latin senex, in Welsh hen, seems clearly to be the Ar. سنا sanna, to be old. It is then clear that in these words s is radical. It is probable, however, that the aspirate, in some cases, has been changed into s.

It deserves to be noticed that the radix of a word is sometimes obscured, in Greek and Latin, by the loss or change of a radical letter in the nominative case. We find in Latin nepos, in the nominative, is nepotis in the genitive; honor, honoris, &c. In these changes, I suppose the letter restored in the oblique cases to be the true radical letter. Thus adamant has been deduced by our etymologists from the Greek α negative and δαμω, to subdue, on the supposition that the stone was named from its hardness. This is a good example of a great part of all etymological deductions; they are mere conjectures. It did not occur to the inquirer that admas, in the nominative, becomes in the genitive adamantis; that n is radical, and that this word can not be regularly deduced from the Greek verb. Any person, by looking into a Welsh dictionary, may see the original word.

In some words, it is not easy to determine whether n before d is casual or radical. In such words as the Latin fun-do, to pour, and tun-do, to beat, there is reason to think the n is casual, for the preterit is formed without it, fudi, tudi. But in other words n before d seems to be radical, and the d casual; as in fun-do, fundare, to found. For this word coincides with the Irish bun, foundation, and with the Shemitic בָּנָה bonah, to build. So the English find is in Swedish finna, and in is in Danish ind.

Another fact, of considerable consequence, is the casual sound of n given to g, which produced the effect of doubling the γ in Greek, and of occasioning the insertion of n before g in the Latin, as also in the Teutonic and Gothic languages. Thus we see the γ is doubled in the Greek αγγελλω, and we know, in this case, how the change originated; for the original word is in the Gaelic and Irish, agalla. So γ is prefixed to another palatal or guttural letter in αγγω, ογγος, εγγιτω.

A similar nasal sound of g probably introduced the n before g in lingo, to lick; linquo, to leave.

We may be confident, in all cases, that n is not radical, when it is dropped in the supine and participle, as in lic-tum, lic-tus, from linquo. When n is retained in the supine and participle, there may be more reason for doubt; but in this case, the question may often be determined by the corresponding word in another language, or by some other word evidently of the same family. Thus we can have little doubt that lingo and the English lick are the same word, or that the Lat. lingua and ligula are of one family.

This casual insertion of n in words of this class must be carefully noticed by the etymologist, or he will overlook the affinity of words which are evidently the same. We have many words in English which are written with n before a g or a k, when the ancient words in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, and some of them in the modern Danish and Swedish, are written without n. Thus sink, in Gothic, is sigcwan; to think, is thangkyan. It is not improbable that the Gothic word was pronounced with the sound of n or ng, as in English. So also in siggwan, to sing; laggs, long. In a few instances we find the Swedes and Danes have the word written in both ways, as tanka, tan-ker, and tycka, tyk-ker, to think. But, in general, the Germans, Danes, Swedes, and Dutch, write words of this sort with ng.

To show how important it is to know the true original orthography, I will mention one instance. In our mother tongue, the word to dye, or color, is written deagan; the elements or radical letters are dg. To determine whether this and the Latin tingo are the same words, we must first know whether n in tingo is radical or casual. This we can not know with certainty, by the form of the word itself, for the n is carried through all the tenses and forms of the verb. But by looking into the Greek, we find the word written with γ, τεγγω; and this clearly proves the alliance of the word with deagan. — See DYE, in the Dictionary.

We have many English words, in which a d has been inserted before g, as in bad-ge, bud-ge, lod-ge, pled-ge, wed-ge. In all words, I believe, of this class, the d is casual, and the g following is the radical letter, as pled-ge, from the French pleige; wed-ge from the Saxon wæcg. The practice of inserting d in words of this sort seems to have originated in the necessity of some mode of preserving the English sound of g, which might otherwise be sounded as the French g before e. And it is for this reason we still retain, and ought to retain, d in jud-ge, abrid-ge. In like manner, the Teutonic c has been changed into the sound of ch, as Sax. wacian, wacian, to wake, to watch; Sax. thac, thatch.

There are some nations which, in many words, pronounce and write g before u or w; as in the French guerre, for war; guede, for wood; guetter, for wait; in Welsh, gwael, for wall; gwain, for vain; gwared, for guard, which in English is ward, Sp. guarda. In some instances, the u or w is dropped in modern writing, as in the French garconne, a warren; garde, for guard. This difference of orthography makes it difficult, in some cases, to ascertain the true radical letters.

CHANGE OF SIGNIFICATION.

Another cause of obscurity in the affinity of languages, and one that seems to have been mostly overlooked, is, the change of the primary sense of the radical verb. In most cases, this change consists in a slight deflection, or difference of application, which has obtained among different families of the same stock. In some cases, the literal sense is lost or obscured, and the figurative only is retained. The first object, in such cases, is to find the primary or literal sense, from which the various particular applications may be easily deduced. Thus we find, in Latin, libeo, libet, or lubeo, lubet, is rendered, to please, to like; lubens, willing, glad, cheerful, pleased; libenter, lubenter, willingly, gladly, readily. What is the primary sense, the visible or physical action, from which the idea of willing is taken? I find, either by knowing the radical sense of willing, ready, in other cases, or by the predominant sense of the elements Lb, as in Lat. labor, to slide, liber, free, &c., that the primary sense is to move, incline or advance toward an object; and hence the sense of willing, ready, prompt. Now, this Latin word is the English love, German lieben, liebe. "Lubet me ire," I love to go; I am inclined to go; I go with cheerfulness; but the affinity between love and lubeo has been obscured by a slight difference of application, among the Romans and the Teutonic nations.

Perhaps no person has suspected that the English words heat, hate, and hest in behest, are all radically the same word. But this is the fact. Sax. hatian, to heat, or be hot, and to hate; hatan, to heat and to call; hatan, to call, to order, to command; ge-hatan or ge-hatan, to grow warm, to promise, to vow; Gothic gahaitan, to call, to promise; Dutch heeten, to heat, to name, to call, bid or command; German heitzen, to heat; heissen, to call; hitzen, to heat, to hoist; Swedish hetsa, to inflame, to provoke; Danish heder, to heat, to be called. Behest we have from the German or Swedish dialect. Heat coincides with the Latin astus, for hastus, which is written with s, like the German. Hote coincides with the Latin odi, osus, so written for hodi, hasus; and as the Teutonic h often represents the Latin c, as in horn, cornu, the Danish orthography, heder, coincides with the Latin cito, to call. Now, what is the radical sense? Most obviously to stir, agitate, rouse, raise, implying a driving or impulse; and hence in Latin astuo, to be hot, and to rage or storm; hence to excite, and hence the sense of the Latin cito, quickly, from stirring, rousing to action. In this case, hatred, as well as heat, is violent excitement. We find also in the Saxon and Gothic the sense of vowing, that is, of driving out the voice, uttering, declaring, a sense allied to calling and commanding; and to this is allied the sense of the Latin recito, to recite.

In English, befall signifies to fall on, to happen to; in German, the same word, befallen, has the like signification. But in Saxon, gefeallon signifies to fall, to rush on; while in German, gefallen signifies to please, that is, to suit, to come to one's mind, to be agreeable. The Danish gefaldet has the same signification as the German.

We find by the Saxon, that the English reck, to care, and reckon, and the Latin rego, to rule, are all the same word, varied in orthography and application. To find the primary sense of reck, to care, we are then to examine the various derivative senses. And we need go no further than to the Latin rectus and English right, the sense of which is straight, for this sense is derived from straining, stretching. Care, then, is a straining of the mind, a stretching toward an object, coinciding with the primary sense of attention. The primary sense of reckon is to strain out sounds, to speak, tell, relate; a sense now disused.

The Saxon carc, care, carcian, to care, to cark, is connected in origin with the Latin carcer, a prison; both from the sense of straining, whence holding or restraint.

To prove how the primary general sense of a word may ramify into different senses, by special appropriation of the word among separate families of men proceeding from the same stock, let us observe the different senses in which leap is used by the English, and by the nations on the continent. In English, to leap is simply to spring; as, to leap a yard; to leap over a fence. But on the continent it signifies to run. Now, it will be seen that this word, as used by the Germans, can not always be translated by itself, that is, by the same word, into English. Take, for illustration, the following passage from Luther's Version of the Scriptures: 1 Sam. xvii. 17. — "Nimm für deine brüder diese epha sängen, und diese zehen brod, und lauf ins heer zu deinen brüderm;" "Take now for thy brethren an epha of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and leap to the camp of thy brethren." Leap, instead of run, is good German, but bad English.* There are two other words in this passage, of which a like remark may be made. The German brad, loaves, is our bread, which admits of no plural; and sangen is our singed, which we can not apply to parched corn.

* "He walks, he leaps, he runs." — Coveper.

So, in some of the Teutonic languages, to wrap kittens or puppies, to tearp eggs, is correct language, though to our ears very odd; but this is only a particular application of the primary sense, to throw. We say, to lay eggs; but to lay is to throw down.

By this comparison of the different uses and applications of a word, we are able, in most cases, to detect its original signification. And it is by this means, I apprehend, that we may arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the same word came to have different and even opposite significations.

It is well known, for example, that the Hebrew word בָּרַךְ barak, is rendered, in our version of the Scriptures, both to bless and to curse. The propriety of the latter rendering is controverted by Parkhurst, who labors to prove, that in Kings and in Job, where it is rendered to curse, it ought to be rendered to bless; and he cites, as authorities, the ancient versions. It is true, that in I Kings xxi. 10, 13, and in Job i. 11, and ii. 5, the Seventy have rendered the word by εὐλογεῖς, to bless; and other ancient versions agree with the Septuagint. But let the word be rendered by bless in the following passages: "Put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone, and his flesh, and he will bless thee to thy face." "Bless God and die." How very absurd does such a translation appear! It shows the immense importance of understanding the true theory of language, and the primary sense of radical words. Let us, then, endeavor to discover, if possible, the source of the difficulty in the case here mentioned. To be enabled to arrive at the primary sense, let us examine the word in the several languages, first of the Shemitic, and then of the Japhetic stock.

Heb. בָּרַךְ, to bless; to salute, or wish a blessing to.

2. To curse; to blaspheme.

3. To couch or bend the knee, to knée.

Deriv. A blessing, and the knee.

Chaldee, בָּרַךְ, to bless; to salute at meeting, and to bid farewell at parting.

2. To bend the knee.

3. To dig; to plow; to set slips of a vine or plant for propagation. — Talm. and Rabbin.

Deriv. The knee; a blessing; a cursing; a cion; the young of fowls.

Syriac, ܒܪܟܬܝܢ, to fall on the knees; to fall or bow down. Jndg. v. 27

2. To issue or proceed from. Matth. xv. 19.

3. To bless.

Samaritan, ܒܪܟܬܝܢ, to bless

Ethiopic, ቤረከ, to bless. Deriv. the knee.

Arabic, بَرَكَ baraka, to bend the knee; to fall on the breast, as a camel.

2. To be firm, or fixed.

3. To rain violently; to pour forth rain, as the clouds. Gr. βραχύνω.

4. To deduct from; to tradsuce; to reproach or pursue with reproaches; to revile.

5. To bless; to pray for a blessing on; to prosper; to be blessed.

6. To hasten; to rush, as on an enemy; to assail.

Deriv. The breast; the basin of a fountain; a fishpond, or receptacle of water, as in Heb. and Ch.; also, increase; abundance; constancy; splendor; a flash of light.

In the latter sense, usually from بَرَكَ boraka, Heb. and Ch. בָּרַךְ barak.

The Arabic word supplies us with the certain means of determining the radical sense; for among other significations, it has the sense of pouring forth rain; and this is precisely the Greek βραχύνω. The primary sense, then, is to send, throw, or drive, in a transitive sense; or in an intransitive sense, to rush, to break forth.

To bless and to curse have the same radical sense, which is, to send or pour out words, to drive or to strain out the voice, precisely as in the Latin appello, from pello, whence peal, as of thunder or of a bell. The two senses spring from the appropriation of loud words to express particular acts. This depends on usage, like all other particular applications of one general signification. The sense in Scripture is to utter words either in a good or bad sense; to bless, to salute; or to rail, to scold, to reproach; and this very word is probably the root of reproach, as it certainly is of the Latin precor, used, like the Shemitic word, in both senses, praying and cursing, or deprecating.* It is also the same word as the English pray, It. pregare, L. precor, the same as preach, D. precken, W. pregethu. To the same family belong the Gr. βραχύνω, βραχύνω, βραχύνωμαι, to bray, to roar, to low, Lat. rugio. Here we see that bray is the same word, applied to the voice of the ass and to breaking in a mortar, and both are radically the same word as break.

The sense of knéeing, if radical, is to throw, and if from the noun, the sense of the noun is a throwing, a bending.

The Chaldee sense of digging, if radical, is from thrusting in an instrument, or breaking the ground; but perhaps it is a sense derived from the name of a shoot or cion, and in reality, to set a shoot, to plant.

The Syriac use of this word in Matth. xv. 19, is intransitive, to issue, to shoot, or break forth. So in Arabic, to rush on, to assault. The sense of firmness in Arabic is from setting, throwing down, as in knéeing; and hence the sense of breast, the fixed, firm part.

That this word has the sense both of blessing and of cursing, or reproaching, we have demonstrative evidence in the Welsh language. Rhég, in Welsh, is בָּרַךְ, without the prefix. It signifies a sending out; utterance; a gift or present; a consigning; a ban, a curse or imprecation. Rhegu, to give; to consign; to curse. From rhég is formed preg, a greeting, or salutation, [the very Hebrew and Chaldee word,] pregeth, a sermon, and pregethu, to preach. Here we have not only the origin of preach, but another important fact, that preg, and of course בָּרַךְ, is a compound word, composed of a prefix, p or b, and rhég. But this is not all; the Welsh greg, a cackling, gregar, to cackle, is formed with the prefix g on this same rhég. [Dan. krage, a crow.]

In Welsh, bregu signifies to break; brég, a breach, a rupture. This Owen deduces from bar, but no doubt erroneously. It is from rhegu; and there is some reason to think that break is from בָּרַךְ, rather than from בָּרַךְ; but probably both are from one radix, with different prefixes.

We observe one prominent sense of the Arabic بَرَكَ baraka, is to rain violently; to pour forth water, as clouds. This is precisely the Greek βραχύνω; a word found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages, but written either with or without its prefix.

Saxon, regn or regn, rain; regnan, to rain.

Dutch, regen, rain; regenen, beregenen, to rain upon.

German, regen, rain; regnen, to rain; beregnen, to rain on.

Swedish, regna, to rain.

Danish, regn, rain; regner, to rain.

Saxon, racu, rain; Cimbric, rakia, id.

Here we find that the English rain is from the same root as the Welsh rhég, rhegu, and the Shemitic בָּרַךְ.

Pursuing the inquiry further, we find that the Saxon recon, or reccan, [W. rhegu,] signifies to speak, to tell, to relate, to reckon, the primary sense of which last is to speak or tell; also to rule, which shows this to be the Latin rego; also to care, which is the English reck. That this is the same word as rain, we know from the Danish, in which language regner signifies both to rain and to reckon, to tell, to count or compute. In the German, the words are written a little differently; rechnen, to reckon, and regnen, to rain. So in Dutch, rekenen and regenen; but this is a fact by no means uncommon.

Here we find that the English reckon and reck, and the Latin rego, are the same word. The primary sense is to strain, to reach, to stretch. Care, is a stretching of the mind, like attention, from the Latin tenda, and restraint is the radical sense of governing. Hence rectus, right, that is, straight, stretched.

Hence we find that rain and the Latin regnum, reign, are radically the same word.

Now, in Saxon, racan, or racan, is the English reach, to stretch or extend, from the same root, and probably reck, Saxon reccan, reocan, to fume or smoke; for this is to send off.

I might have mentioned before, that the Chaldee בְּרִיכָה, a cion or branch, is precisely the Celtic word for arm; Irish, braic, or raigh; Welsh braic; whence the Greek βραχίον, the Latin brachium, whence the Spanish brazo, whence the French bras, whence the English brace. The arm is a shoot, a branch, and branch is from this root or one of the family, n being casual; branch for brack.

* "Improbis urget iratis precibus." — Horace.

On this word let it be further observed, or on פּרַק or בְּרַק, if radically different, are formed, with the prefix s, the German sprechen, to speak, sprache, speech; Dutch spreken, spraak; Swedish språka, sprak; Danish sprag, speech; and Swedish spricka, to break; Danish sprekker. The same word with n casual is seen in spring, the breaking or opening of the winter; and here we see the origin of the marine phrase, to spring a mast, Danish springer, to burst, crack, or spring. This in Swedish is written without n, spricka, to break, burst, split; but a noun of this family has n, springa, a crack, and spring, a spring, a running.

Now let us attend to other Shemitic words consisting of eognate elements.

Chaldee, פָּרַק prak, to rub or scrape; to rub out or tread out, as grain from the ear or sheaf; Latin frico, frio.

2. To collect and bind, as sheaves; perhaps English, to rake.

3. To break or break down.

4. To question; to doubt. In Saxon and Gothic, fragnan, fragan, signifies to ask.

Deriv. Forward; perverse. Prov. ii. 12. So in English refractory.

This verb is not in the Hebrew; but there are two derivatives, one signifying the inner veil of the temple; so called probably from its use in breaking, that is, interrupting access, or separation, like diaphragm in English. The other derivative is rendered rigor, or cruelty; that which atraina, oppresses, breaks down, or rakes, harasses.

With this verb coincides the Irish bracuim, to break, to harrow, that is, to rake.

Syr. פָּרַק, to rub; so rendered, Luke vi. 1. Lat. frico. A derivative signifies to comminute.

Deriv. Distortion; winding; twisting. Let this be noted.

Ar. فَرَكَ faraka, to rub, Lat. frico.

2. To hate, as a husband or wife; to be languid, or relaxed.

Deriv. Laxity; frangibility; friability.

Heb. פָּרַק, to break, burst, or rend; to break off; to separate.

Deriv. A breaking or parting of a road.

Ch. פָּרַק, to break.

2. To redeem; that is, to free, separate, or deliver.

3. To explain, as a doubtful question.

Deriv. One who ransoms or delivers; a rupture; the neck or its juncture; a joint of the fingers, &c.; the ankle; the joint of a reed; a chapter or section of a book; explanation; exposition.

פָּרוּק, a rupture, coinciding with the English brake.

Syr. פָּרַק, to redeem.

2. To depart; to remove; to separate.

Deriv. A recess, or withdrawing; separation; liberation; redemption; safety; vertebra.

Sam. The same as the Syriac verb.

Ar. فَرَّقَ faraka, to separate; to divide; to withdraw; to disperse; [qu. Lat. spargo]; to lay open; to disclose; to cast out; to immerse.

Deriv. Separation; distinction, distance; interval; dispersion; aurora, as we say, the break of day; also, a garment reaching to the middle of the thigh, qu. frock; also breec.

I have placed these two words together, because I am convinced they are both of one family, or formed on the same radical word. The latter coincides exactly with the Latin frango, frangi, fractum; for n in frango is undoubtedly casual. Now, in Welsh, bregu, to break, would seem to be directly connected with בְּרַק, yet doubtless bregu is the English break, the German brechen, the Dutch brecken, &c. In truth, the three words בְּרַק, פָּרַק, and פָּרַק, are probably all from one primitive root, formed with different prefixes, or rather with the same prefix, differently written; the different words bearing appropriate senses, among different tribes of men.

We observe in the Chaldee word the sense of questioning. Perhaps this may be the Gothic fragan, to ask; and if so, it coincides with the Latin rago, the latter without the prefix. In the sense of break, we find, in the Greek, ῥήγνυμι, without a prefix.

Most of the significations of these verbs are too obvious to need illustration. But we find in the Syriac the sense of distortion, a sense which at first appears to be remote from that of breaking or bursting asunder. But this is probably the primary sense, to strain, to stretch; a sense we retain in the phrase, to break upon the wheel; and by dropping the prefix, we have the precise word in the verb, to rack.

Now, if this is the genuine sense, we find it gives the English wreck and wrack, the Danish trag, Sw. trak, a wreck. In Saxon, wrecan, wrecan, is the English wreck; that is, to drive, or throw on; wrace, is an exile, a wretch. In Dan. trager signifies to reject; Sw. vråka, to throw away; all implying a driving force; and that wreck is connected with break, is probable for another reason, that the Latin fractus, frango, forms a constituent part of naufragium, the English shipwreck, which in Danish is simply trag.

Now, if straining, distortion, is one of the senses of this root, the English wring, wrong, Danish wrang, Sw. wrång, may be deduced from it, for undoubtedly n is not radical in these words. The Dutch has wringen; but the German drops the first letter, and has ringen, both to twist or wind, and to ring or sound; the latter sense from straining or throwing, as in other cases. Without n, wring would be wrig, and wrong, wrog; wrang, wrag, Danish wrag.

In Greek, ῥήγος is a blanket or coverlet, and connected with ῥήγνυμι; that is, a spread; from stretching, or throwing over.

We find also among the Chaldee derivatives the sense of a neck, and a joint. Now, we find this word in Irish, braigh, the neck; in Greek, without the prefix, ῥαχίς, the spine of the back; Saxon, hracca; English, the rack, and, from the Greek, the rickets, from distortion.

Coinciding with the Greek ῥήγνυμι, to break, we find in Welsh rhogaw, to rend; and coinciding with ῥαχία, a rock, a crag, Welsh craig; and connected with these, the Saxon hracod, English ragged, that is, broken; evidently the participle of a verb of this family.

Hence we find the senses of distortion and breaking connected in this root, in a great variety of instances.

The Shemitic בְּרַק, to lighten, to shine or flash, is one of this family. The sense is, to shoot or dart, to throw, as in all like cases. And under this root the Arabic has the sense, to adorn, as a female; to make bright or shining; which gives the English prank and prink, D. pragt, G. pracht. Prance is of the same family, from leaping, starting, darting up.

In Greek, ῥαχίς, short, stands in the Lexicons as a primary word or root. But this is from the root of break, which is lost in Greek, unless in ῥήγνυμι, without the prefix. From ῥαχίς, or the root of this word, the French language has abreger, to abridge; and what is less obvious, but equally certain, is, that from the same root the Latin has brevis, by sinking the palatal letter, as we do in bow, from bugan, and in lay, from leegun; so that abridge and abbreviate, brief, are from one root.

It should have been before mentioned that the Latin refractor signifies to resist, to strive against, to deny, whence refractory; a sense that demonstrates the primary sense to be, to strain, urge, press; and refraction, in optics, is a breaking of the direct course of rays of light by turning them; a sense coinciding with that of distortion.

We see, then, that one predominant sense of break, is, to strain, to distort. Let us now examine some of the biliteral roots in rg and rk, which, if b is a prefix, must be the primary elements of all the words above mentioned.

Ch. רָגַג rag, regag, to desire, to long for. This is the Greek ῥαχίς, and English to reach; for desire is expressed by reaching forward, stretching the mind toward the object. So in Latin appeto and expeto, from peto, to move toward. This coincides nearly with the Latin rago, to ask, and the Goth. fragnan, Sax. fragnan.

Syr. רָגַג, to desire; and with olaph prefixed, رَگَگ, to desire, or long; also to wet, or moisten; also رَگَگ, to moisten—Latin rigo, irrigo, to irrigate.

Deriv. Tender, soft, fresh, from moisture or greenness. Qu. Lat. recens, a derivative.

Here desire and irrigation are both from one root; desire is a reaching forward, and irrigation is a spreading of water.

This root, in Hebrew רָגַג, signifies to weave, or connect, as in texture and net-work; but the primary sense is to stretch or strain.

In Arabic, the same verb ^عأرج signifies to emit an agreeable smell; to breathe fragrance; radically, to throw or send out; to eject; a mere modification of the same sense. This is the Latin fragro, whence fragrant, with a prefix; but according exactly with the English reek.

אָרַךְ in Ch. Heb. Syr. and Sam., signifies to prolong, to extend. In Ar. as in Heb. in Hiph. to delay, or retard; that is, to draw out in time.

רָגַע in Heb. has been differently interpreted; indeed, it has been rendered by words of directly contrary signification. The more modern interpreters, says Castell, render it, to split, divide, separate, or break; the ancient interpreters rendered it, to stiffen, to make rigid or rough, to wrinkle or corrugate. Castell and Parkhurst, however, agree in rendering it, in some passages, to quiet, still, allay. Jer. xlvi. 6, l. 31. In Job vii. 5, our translators have rendered it broken, "My skin is broken," [rough, or rigid.] In Job xxvi. 12, it is rendered by divide, "He divideth the sea by his power." In Vanderhooght's Bible it is in this place rendered by commovet, he agitates the sea. The Seventy render it by καταταυσε, he stilled; and this is the sense which Parkhurst gives it.

In Isaiah li. 15, and Jer. xxxi. 35, it is rendered in our version by divide. "But I am the Lord thy God, that divided the sea, whose waves reared."

In Vanderhooght's Bible it is rendered in Isaiah li. 15, "I am Jehovah thy God, qui commovens mare, ut perstrepat fluctus ejus." In Jer. xxxi. 35, "commovens mare, ut tumultuenter fluctus ejus." — agitating or moving the sea, that the waves roar, or may roar. The passage in Isaiah is rendered by the Seventy, ὁ θεὸς ὁ θαλάσσης, ὁ παραταύσων τὴν θαλάσσαν, καὶ ἤχων τὰ κύματα αὐτῆς; "agitating the sea, and causing its waves to roar and resound." In the French translation, the passage in Isaiah is, "qui fend la mer, et ses flots bruient;" [I] who divide the sea, and the waves roar. In Jeremiah the passage is, "qui agit la mer, et les flots en bruient;" who agitates the sea, and therefore the waves roar. In Italian, the passage in Isaiah is rendered, "che nuovo il mare, e le sue onde romoreggiano." In Jeremiah, "che commuove il mare, onde le sue onde romoreggiano:" who moveth the sea, wherefore its waves roar, or become tumultuous.

These different renderings show the importance of understanding the literal or primary sense of words; for whatever may be the real sense in the passages above mentioned, it can not be to divide if we are to give to vau in the following word its usual sense of and, it is difficult to make sense of the word רָגַע, by translating it, he stilleth: He stilleth the sea, and its waves are tumultuous, or He stilleth the sea that the waves may roar or be agitated! This will not answer. The more rational version would be, He roughens the sea, and its waters roar; or he drives, impels it into agitation. In Ethiopic, the same word signifies to coagulate, to freeze, to become rigid; and this is undoubtedly the Latin rigeo, and with a prefix frigeo, and this signification is perhaps allied to the Lat. rugo, to wrinkle; for, as a general rule, the radical sense of wrinkle is to draw, as in contract, contraho, and this seems to be the sense of rigeo. Both these words are allied to rough, which is from breaking or wrinkling. This sense would perhaps well suit the context in these two passages, as it would also that in Job vii. 5: My skin is rough.

Now, in Arabic, the general signification of رَجَعَ is to return, to repeat, to withdraw, which may be from drawing back; a different application of the original sense, to strain, stretch, or extend.

The root רָקַע in Chaldee signifies to spit, and this is probably the Latin ructo, somewhat varied in application. The same verb in Arabic ^عراق, rauka, signifies to drive off, to reject; to shoot or grow long, as teeth; to strain, purify or make clear, as wine; precisely the English to rack; also, to spread, and to pour out. Hebrew רָקַע, to empty, to draw out, to attenuate or make thin; and as a noun, spittle; Syriac, to spit, to draw out, to attenuate; Samaritar., to pour out, to draw out, to extend; Ethiopic, to be fine, slender, or thin; Arabic, to be soft, tender, thin. The verb רָךְ has a like signification, and is perhaps from the same original root; רָכַע, Hebrew, to spread, stretch, extend. But, says Castell, all the ancient interpreters rendered the word, to ordain, establish, make firm; to strike, to beat, as plates of metal. But the sense is to stretch, to spread, and the beating is only the means of extending. Hence רָכַע, the firmament, which agrees well with Lat. regio, an extent; in Hebrew, properly, an expanse. And to reconcile the ancient and modern interpretations of this word, let it be remembered that strength and firmness are usually or always from stretching, tension.

Now let us hear Ainsworth on the word regio. "Regio a rego quod priusquam provinciae fierent, regiones sub regibus erant atque ab his regebantur." How much more natural is it to deduce regio from the primary sense of rego, which is to stretch, to strain, to extend! Regio is an extent, a word of indefinite signification.

In Chaldee and Arabic this verb signifies to mend, to repair, to make whole; from extending, spreading over, or making strong. See the root כָּלַף, infra.

We observe that רָגַע and רָכַע agree, in original signification, with the English reach, on the root of which, or some of its derivatives, was formed stretch. That בָּרַךְ, בָּרַךְ, and פָּרַךְ were formed on any of the foregoing biliteral roots, we may not be able to affirm; but it is certain from the Welsh, that the first consonant of the triliteral root is a prefix, and it is certain from the Shemitic languages, that the primary sense is the same in the biliteral and triliteral roots, or that all the applications or particular significations may readily be deduced from one general signification.

To illustrate this subject more fully, let us attend to the various applications of some other Shemitic words of extensive use.

בָּרָא.

Heb. בָּרָא baro, to create. This, by most lexicographers, is given as the first signification, in all the Shemitic languages. Parkhurst says, to create; to produce into being. Gen. i. 1.

2. To form by accretion or concretion of matter. Gen. i. 21.
3. In Hiph. to make fat; to fatten or batten. 1 Sam. ii. 29.
4. To do or perform something wonderful. Num. xvi. 30.
5. In Niph. to be renewed. In Kal. to renew, in a spiritual sense. Ps. li. 12.

Castell says,
1. To create from nothing, or to produce something new or excellent from another thing. Gen. i. Is. xlii. 5.

2. In Niph. to be renewed or re-created. Is. xlvi. 7. Ps. cii. 19.

3. To cut off; to take away; to bear away, or remove; also, to select; to prepare. Josh. xvii. 15, 18. Ezek. xxiii. 47.

Gesenius says,
1. Strictly, to hew, to hew out. [Ar. to cut, to cut out, to plane.]

2. To form; to make; to produce. Ar. بَرَأَ. The order of significations is, as in the Ar. galaka, to be smooth, to make smooth. 2. To plane. 3. To form, make. Gen. i. 1, 21, 27.

1. Niph. passive of Kal. No. 2. Gen. ii. 4.
2. To be born. Ezek. xxi. 30. Ps. cii. 18.

Pi. בָּרָא, the verb differently pointed; to hew, to cut down. Josh. xvii. 15, 18.

2. To cut down with the sword; to kill. Ezek. xxiii. 47.
3. To make fat. 1 Sam. ii. 29.

Thus far the Hebrew.

Chal. בָּרָא, to create. Gen. i. 1.

2. To cut off. Ia. xl. 20.

3. To make fat; to grow sound or strong. Talm.

Deriv. Fat; whole; sound; strong. Castell.

Syr. بَرَأَ, to create. Gen. i. 1. Mark xiii. 19.

2. To remove to a distance; and Deriv. distance, distant. Castell.

Sam. בָּרָא, to create. Gen. i. 22. Deut. iv. 32. Castell.

Ar. بَرَأَ, to create. Job xxxviii. 7. [qu. 4 and 6.]

2. To be free, or guiltless, not obnoxious to punishment. Num. v. 28, 31; and xxxii. 22. Rom. vii. 6.
3. To free; to absolve from a crime; to liberate; to dismiss; to justify. Ex. xx. 7. Num. xiv. 18.
4. To escape; to forsake.
5. To recover from disease; to be healed; to restore to health. Lev. xiii. 18. Josh. v. 8. Matth. iv. 23.

6. To cleanse; to free from impurities.
7. To abstain from.
Deriv. Creator; free; unobnoxious; clean; empty.

Ar. بَرَأَ, to create.

2. To cut off; to hew or pare.
3. To separate; to distinguish.
4. To make thin.
5. To oppose; to strive; to resist.
6. To provoke; to boast, or make a parade.
7. To distribute; to disperse.

Castell.

According to Gesenius, the primary sense of the verb is to hew, to cut out, and thus to make smooth, and thus to create; and he deduces these senses in the same order as he does those of the Arabic verb, which gives the word like. But there is no ground for this opinion; and doubtless the verb originated before the use of edge tools.

The predominant senses of this word are, to separate, to free, to remove; as we see by the Arabic and Syriac.

Now, heaving is indeed separating, and we have the English word pare from this root; but we must seek for a signification which is more general than that of paring, or we shall not be able to account for the sense of making fat, sound, entire, and strong, nor for that of being born.

The truth undoubtedly is, this word is of the same family with the English bear, the Latin pario, and the radical sense is to throw, to thrust, to send, to drive, to extend; hence to throw out, to produce, as applied to the birth of children or of the world. To throw or drive is the primary sense of separation and division, that is, to drive off. The English word deal, when traced to its root, presents the same fact. See DEAL. To create is to produce or bring forth, the same sense as that of birth, applied to a different object. The sense of heaving and paring is from driving off, separation. In Syriac, we observe the general application, in removal, or departure to a distance. The sense of fattening is derivative, and allied to that of healing or making whole, sound, strong, in the Arabic; that is, preparing, bringing to a good state, or from tension, the usual primary sense of strength and power.

To obtain a more full and satisfactory view of this subject, let us attend to the same word in the modern languages of Europe.

LATIN.

Paro, to prepare, make ready, procure, design, &c. The radical sense of paro is probably the same as in the Shemitic languages; to produce, to bring forward. So also ready implies an advancing, and so does promptness. But the various ways of preparing a thing for use naturally give to the word, in process of time, a variety of particular significations; each of which results in bringing the thing to the state desired. The compounds of paro are apparo, to prepare, to furnish, accouter or set out; comparo, to prepare or procure, to make equal, to compare, to join, to dress or make ready; preparo, to prepare; reparo, to repair, to create anew, to regain, to compensate; separo, to separate. Let the Latin uses of this word be compared with the same Hebrew word in Joshua xvii. 15, where it is rendered cut down. "Ascend to the wood country and cut down for thyself;" Septuagint, ἐκκαθαρον σεαυτον, clear for thyself. This is one mode of preparation for use. In Ezek. xxi. 19, it is rendered choose; Septuagint, διαταξεις, appoint.

ITALIAN.

Parare, to prepare; to garnish; to adorn; to propose an occasion; to parry, or ward off, as a blow; to defend; to cover from or shelter; to repair; to teach a horse to stop, and in horsemanship, to stop; parata, a warding off, a garnishing; parato, prepared, ready, prompt, warded off or parried, shielded, defended.

Apparare, to learn; apparato, learned, prepared; apparato, preparation, garnishment.

Parecchio, a preparation; also equal, even [L. par ;] parecchiare, to prepare; pareggiare, to make equal, to compare; apparecchiare, to prepare, to ornament or garnish, to set in order; appareggiare, to put in competition, to match, to equal.

Comparare, to compare.

Disparare, to forget; disparare, sparare, to unfurnish, disarrange, to make unready, to disbowel, to separate, disjoin, unpair; to discharge, as artillery.

Imparare, to learn.

Riparare, to repair, to restore to the first state; to repair, or resort to, or have access to; to parry, or ward off; riparato, preparation, a fort, a bank, fence, mound, remedy, shelter.

SPANISH.

Parad, a causing; parni, that causes to be.

Parauad, prepared, ready; parodi, to prepare.

That all the foregoing words in the present European languages [and several others might have been added] are formed from one stock or radix, coinciding with the Latin paro, is a fact that admits of no question. The only doubt respecting the correctness of the whole preceding statement, is, whether the Latin paro is radically the same as the Oriental ברא; and with regard to this point, I should suppose the evidence to be convincing. Indeed, there is good reason to believe that the Oriental verba ברא, ברר, והבר, and כבר, are all formed from one primitive radix. Certain it is, that the English bear comprehends both the Latin fero and pario, and the latter corresponds nearly with ערה and Eth. פרי fari, to bear.

But admitting only what is certain, that all the foregoing European words are from one radix, we are then to seek for a primary meaning from which may be deduced the following significations; Lat. to prepare; Ital. to adorn, to parry, to stop, to defend, to repair, to learn; Span. to prepare, to stop, to lay or stake as a wager, a pair or couple; Port. to stop, to confine upon or be contiguous, to drive or aim at, to parry, to pare; Fr. to deck, to parry, to stop, to pare; Arm. to dress, to prepare, to parry; Russ. to adjust, to dress, to mow or reap; Welsh, preparedness, contiguity, a pair, a cause, to continue or endure; and several other significations.

The various significations result from throwing, sending, driving. To separate or remove is to drive or force apart; hence to parry, and hence to defend. Separation implies extension, a drawing out in length or time; hence the Portuguese senses of confining upon, reaching to the limit. This gives the sense of par, equal, that is, of the same extent; and hence coming to, and suiting, as in Latin convenio.

Here let it be observed that, admitting the word par, equal, to belong to this family, as in the Welsh, we have strong reason to believe that the Shemitic והבר to join, or fit together, to associate, whence as a noun, an associate, is formed from the same root, or ברא; for in the Saxon we find not only fera, but gefera, a companion, fellow, or peer; gefera answering precisely to the Oriental word.

The sense of betting is from throwing down, as we say, to lay a wager. The sense of atopping is from setting, fixing, or from parrying. The sense of adorning is from putting on, which is from sending, or from extension, enlargement, as we say, to set off, and hence it is allied to the sense of show, display, parade. Preparation is from producing, bringing forward, or adjusting, making right; and often implies advancing, like ready, prompt; and the latter word, prompt, from promo, to bring forth, affords a good illustration of the words derived from paro.

The senses of cutting off, paring, and the like, require no explanation.

The Italian disparare, and the Spanish and Portuguese disparar, to discharge fire-arms, present the original sense of the root, to send or drive. This sense gives that of the Welsh par, a spear, as well as a cause, or that which impels. A spear is a shoot, from the sense of thrusting; and our word spear is probably formed from the root of bar, and Welsh ber, a spit, a pike, a lance, a spear, Lat. veru. Now, in Chaldee, a bar is כברא, from עבר, to pass; a verb which is probably of the same family with ברא. It is further to be observed that, in Italian, bar is written both barra and sbarra.

It is observed above that ברא is the English bear and the Latin pario; but pario would seem to be the Hebrew פרה parah, to be fruitful, to bear fruit, applied to plants and animals. But this word seems to denote producing in general, rather than the production of children. However this may be, it is certain that bear in English, as well as in Saxon, expresses the sense of both pario and fero in Latin. The Latin fero, and the Greek φερω, signify both to carry and to produce, as young or fruit. Pario does not. So in the Gothic, bairan is to carry, gabairan is to carry and to produce young. In German, führen is to carry, and gebären, to bring forth, to bear a child. In Dutch, beuren is to lift; voeren, to carry; and baeren, to bring forth, as children; to bear, to beget, to cause. Danish, berer, to carry, to support, and to yield or produce. Sw. bära, to carry; barn, a son. Irish beirim, to bear or bring forth, and to tell or relate, like the Latin fero, whence Fr. parler, to speak.

It appears, then, that the English bear, and the Saxon from which we have received it, and the Gothic and the Danish corresponding words unite, in the same orthography, the senses of two words of different orthography in other languages. I have found other examples of a similar kind. There is, therefore, solid ground to believe that all these words are from one primitive root; the different modes of writing the word, and the several appropriations, having originated in different families of the great races of men, before languages were reduced to writing; and when they came to be written, each word was written according to its usual pronunciation, and defined according to its use in each family. And by the intermixture of tribes, two or three derivatives of the same stock might have become a part of the same national language. Unquestionably the Greek φερω, and φερω, are branches of the same stock.

We have, in the modern languages, decisive evidence that different verbs may have, and in fact have, a common radix. Thus, in English, list and lust are different modes of writing the same word; both are united in the other Teutonic dialects. So, in Latin, libet and lubet; and similar instances I have found in almost every language which I have examined.

The Latin pareo, to appear, to come to light, if not a compound word, may be of this family. Paries, a wall, if primarily a partition wall, is of the same stock. Per belongs to this family, as its signification is passing. The Sax. faran, to fare, Gr. πορευομαι, seems to be from one branch of this stock, probably עבר. See the word PASS, in the Dictionary, in the derivative senses of which there are some resemblances to those of ברא.

This verb, says Lowth, means to cover, to cover sin, and so to expiate; and it is never used in the sense of breaking or dissolving a covenant, though that notion occurs so often in the Scriptures; nor can it be forced into this sense, but by a great deal of far-fetched reasoning. See Isaiah xxviii. 18. Lowth on Isaiah, Prelim. Diss.

כפר, says Castell, "textuit, operuit, Anglice, to cover; per metathesin, κρυπτω. κρυφην, peculiariter bitumine, sive glutinosa aliqua materia obduxit; picavit." Gen. vi. 14.

Parkhurst gives to this verb the sense of covering or over-spreading, as primary, and deduces from it the Greek κρυπτω, and English cover and coffer. He, however, admits, that, in Isaiah xxviii. 18, it signifies to annul, as a covenant. He also considers the sense of atonement or expiation to be radically that of covering.

Gesenius agrees with the English lexicographers, in assigning to this verb the primary sense of covering or overlaying, as in Gen. vi. 14. He admits that this word has the sense, in Isaiah xxviii. 18, of blotting out, obliterating. But he gives to it the sense of forgiving, in some passages, in which our version has that of purging away. Ps. lxxv. 3, and lxxix. 9. In these passages, Castell renders the word, to be merciful or propitious.

In all these authors there is, I conceive, a radical mistake, in supposing the primary sense to be to cover, and in the opinion that this Hebrew word is the English verb to cover. A still greater mistake is in the supposition of Castell and Parkhurst, that this, by a metathesis, gives the Greek κρυπτω.

The English word cover comes to us through the French couvrir, from the Italian coprire, a contraction of the Latin co-operio, whence co-opertus, Italian coperto, covered, Eng. covert.* The Latin aperio is to open, and aperio is to cover, both from pario or one of the roots in Br, which has just been explained. The root in these words is per or par, and the sense is varied by prefixæ; perhaps ad-pario or ab-pario and ob-pario. Now, cover can have no connection with כָּפַר, unless this latter word is a compound, with כּ for a prefix. This may be the fact, but the connection, even in that case, is very remote.

* In this deduction of cover from the Latin, I am supported by Lunier, the ablest French etymologist whose works I have seen.

Let us see if we can gain any light upon the subject of the primary sense of כָּפַר from the cognate languages.

Chaldee, כָּפַר, to deny, to reject. Prov. xxx. 9.
2. To wipe; "She eateth and wipeth her mouth." Prov. xxx. 20.

3. To wash or cleanse. Matth. xxvii. 24. Castell.
Syriac, כָּפַר kefar, to deny. Gen. xviii. 15. Luke xii. 9.
2. To wipe, to wipe away, to annul, to abolish. Prov. xxx. 20. Is. xxviii. 18. Castell.

Arabic, كَفَرَ kafara, to deny; to disbelieve; to be an infidel; to be impious; to blaspheme. Acts iii. 13, 14. 2 Pet. ii. 1, 5. Jude 15.

2. To cover; to conceal.
3. To expiate; to make expiation for one, and free him from crime. Castell.

Now, the senses of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, to deny, to reject, to annul, to wipe, wash, or to cleanse by these acts, can not be deduced from covering.

In Hebrew, the word has the sense of covering, as the ark, with bitumen or pitch, in Gen. vi. 14; that is, to smear, or pay over, as our seamen now express it. But it should be considered that the sense of covering is rarely or never primary; it is usually from the sense of putting on, which is from the sense of throwing or pressing, or it is from overspreading, which is a spreading, stretching, or throwing over; hence the derivative senses of covering and hiding. These latter senses are sometimes derived from others; but these are the most general. And in this passage of Genesis, the literal sense is probably to put on, or to rub or spread over, a sense which coincides with that of the Chaldee and Syriac, Prov. xxx. 20, though differently applied; or what is more probable, the verb, in Gen. vi. 14, is from the noun, which is the name of the substance used; as we should say, to pitch with pitch.

The real original sense of this Shemitic verb is to remove, to separate, by thrusting away or driving off. Hence its application, in the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, to denial, the rejection of God or truth. To deny or reject is to thrust away. Hence from the Arabic caffar, an infidel, one who denies and rejects the Mohammedan religion; hence Coffraria, the southern part of Africa, the country of infidels; so called by the followers of Mohammed, just as the Christians gave the name of pagans to the inhabitants of villages [pagus] who rejected the Christian religion.

This signification explains the Hebrew uses of this word. Its literal sense is applied to the cleansing or purification of sacred things, as the altar. Lev. xvi. 18. In a spiritual sense, to the purification of the soul, a type of the purification by the blood of Christ; hence it is rendered atonement, or expiation. Hence, probably, the sense of appeasing, Gen. xxxii. 21, Prov. xvi. 14, though this may be from removing or smoothing.

The sense of forgiveness is from thrusting away or giving back, precisely as in the modern languages; Lat. remitto, to send back or away; forgive, to give back or away; pardon, in French, Spanish, and Italian, has a like sense, which is more clearly exhibited by the Dutch vergeven, German vergeben; ver being the English far, to give far, to give away; hence to reject, and remember no more. The sense of give, and of the French donner, is nearly the same as that of כָּפַר. To give is to send, to cause to pass; and so of donner.

Now, it is a question of some moment, whether the opinion that כָּפַר is the same as the English cover, has not inclined lexicographers and commentators to render it by this word, in several passages, where the true sense is to forgive, or to purify by cleansing from sin.

However this may be, the interpretation given above will fully disprove Lowth's assertion, that this word is never used in the sense of breaking or annulling a covenant. So confident is the learned bishop on this point, that he ventures to call in question the reading, Isaiah xxviii. 18, and to suppose the true word to be כָּפַר, from כָּפַר, to break. With respect to the reading, I shall offer no opinion; but if the present reading is correct, I am confident that no word in the Hebrew language is better fitted to express the sense. Your covenant with death shall be wiped away, abolished, or, as in the version, annulled. And so is the rendering in the Syriac.

If כָּפַר is a compound word, and the first letter a prefix, it may be from the same root as the Arabic غَفَرَ gafara, whose signification is to cover. But the primary sense is, to throw or put on. It signifies, also, to forgive; but to forgive is to send back or away, remitto, and not to cover. And I apprehend that for want of knowing the primary sense of such verbs, the word cover has been often substituted for forgive, in the translating of this verb.

כָּל kal or kol.

No. 1. Heb. כָּל, כָּל, to hold, to contain; Sw. hålla. כָּל, to hold, to sustain, to maintain, to comprehend.

Ch. כָּל, to measure; that is, to ascertain the contents, or to stretch, and comprehend the whole.

Pah. To feed, to nourish. See אָכַל.

Deriv. A measure; also custom, rite, manner; probably from holding or continued practice.

Syr. In Aph. to measure. Deriv. A measure.

Eth. ከጠለ, to follow; to go behind; Gr. ακολουέω; that is, to hold to, or to press after.

Deriv. The hinder part; the poop of a ship; behind. French cul.

No. 2. Heb. כָּל, to finish; to complete; to make perfect. Gr. καλος.

כָּל, all; the whole; Gr. όλος, Eng. all, by the loss of the first letter; but in Welsh holl, or oll; and in Saxon al, el, and geall.

Ch. כָּל, to crown; to adorn.

Pih. To perfect; to complete; to comprehend; to embrace.

Deriv. Comprehending; universality; a general rule, &c.

Syr. כָּל, to crown. Deriv. A crown; all; every one.

Sam. כָּל, as the Chaldee.

Eth. ከጠለ, the same; also, to cover.

Ar. كَالا kalla, to be weary or dull; to be languid; to tire; also, to crown; to shine. Deriv. All; dullness; heaviness.

No. 3. Heb. כָּל, to hold; to restrain; to shut or confine; to check; Gr. καλωω; Sw. hålla.

Deriv. A place of confinement; Lat. caula.

Ch. כָּל, כָּל, כָּל, to hold; to restrain; also, to trust; to confide in, or rely on; to hope. (See No. 6.) Also, to finish; to perfect; also, to consume; to cause to fail.

In Aph. To call; to cry out; to thunder; Gr. καλωω; Lat. calo; W. galw; Eng. call; Lat. gullus, from crowing.

Syr. כָּל, to hold; to restrain; to forbid; to deny.

Deriv. all; a cork, bar, or bolt.

Sam. כָּל, to hold, or restrain.

Eth. ከጠለ, to hold, restrain, or prohibit.

Deriv. Lat. olius; a fellow, or companion.

Ar. كَالا kala, to keep; to preserve; to turn the face toward a thing and look repeatedly. So in English, to behold. Also, to come to the end, as of life; also, to feed, to devour food; also, to abound in pasture; also, to hinder, or detain; also, to look attentively; also, to sprout; also, to take upon a pledge, or upon trust; supra, Chaldee. (See No. 6.)

No. 4. Heb. כָּל, to finish; to consume; to bring to naught; to waste; to fail. (See No. 8.)

No. 5. Ch. כָּל, to eat; to consume; also, to take; to hold; to contain. In Aph. to feed; to give food; also, to call; to thunder; to roar, or bellow; also, to publish; to accuse; to defame.

Heb. to eat; to consume.

Sam. כָּל, to eat.

Syr. כָּל, to publish; to divulge, as a crime; to accuse.

Eth. ከጠለ, to suffice; as we say, it is well, Lat. valere; also, to be or exist; that is, to be held, or to be fixed or permanent, to continue.

Ar. to eat; to devour; to corrode; Lat. helluo.

No. 6. Ar. كَالا wakala, to trust; to commit to another in confidence. (See No. 3.)

Eth. אָכַל akal, with a prefix; to trust, as above.

No. 7. Heb. יָצַח , to be able; to prevail; Lat. calleo; W. gallu; Eng. could.

No. 8. Ch. עָצַב , to digest; to consume. (No. 5.)

Ar. كَلَس , to collect; to tie; to bind; to unite; also, to divide, impel, or compel. This is the primary sense of the word, or rather of this root; to press; to strain; to urge, or impel; also, to extend. These verbs are different modifications of one radix; and hence the English hold, call, hollow, heal, hale; the Latin calo, caulis, calleo, callus; Greek καλλω , καλος , or καλλος ; and a multitude of words in all the modern languages of Europe.

The sense of holding, restraining, forbidding, hindering, and keeping, are too obvious to need any explanation. They are from straining. To this sense is nearly allied the sense of measuring, or ascertaining what is held or contained. That which is contained is all, the whole that is comprehended, from the sense of extension.

The signification of finishing or perfecting seems in a good sense, to be from that of soundness; a sense which is from stretching or strength. Or it may be from coming to the end, like finish and achieve, or from shutting, closing. And the sense of consuming, wasting, failing, may be from bringing to an end. In Latin, to consume is to take all; and possibly this may be the sense of this verb. But the Arabic sense of failure would seem rather to be from holding, stopping, or coming to an end.

The sense of eating may be from consuming, or taking apart; but from some of the derivatives of No. 5, I am inclined to think the primary sense is to feed, to crowd, to stuff; the primary sense of the root applied to this particular act; for under the Chaldee root we find words which signify the nut of a species of oak, the Gr. αγνιος , and a collection or crowd of people, [Gr. οχλος], both of which are from collecting or pressing together.

The sense of seeing and looking is from reaching or casting and striking, or from holding or fixing the eyes on.

The sense of trusting seems also to be that of holding to or resting on. The English hold in behold is from this root.

The sense of calling, roaring, and thunder, is from impelling the voice or sound; a pressing, driving, or straining, applied to sound; like the Latin appello, from pello. Hence the sense of publishing, accusing, and defaming.

The sense of sprouting, in the Arabic, is a shooting or pushing out, as in other cases; Lat. caulis.

The sense of ability, power, strength, in No. 7, is from straining, stretching, or holding, as in other words of the like sense. Hence Lat. calleo, to be skilled, and to be hard, callus.

On this root כָּזַב is probably formed כָּזַבְל , a word differently pointed in the Hebrew and Chaldee. This word signifies, in Hebrew, to pervert, to err, to be foolish or infatuated, to act foolishly.

In Chaldee, to understand, know, or consider; to look or behold; to cause to understand; Rabbinic, to be ignorant; whence its derivatives, knowledge, wisdom, ignorance. These different significations may result from the different effects of the prefix on the original verb.

In Syr. כָּוַן (the same word) signifies to be foolish, or mad; to cause to know, or to give understanding; to observe; to search or know thoroughly; to ask or seek to understand; to discern or distinguish; also to err, to sin, to be foolish or perverse.

In Sam. the same word signifies to look, and to be accustomed. See Castell, col. 2523.

That כָּוַן is formed on the same root with a different prefix, is obvious and certain, from the correspondence of significations. This word in Hebrew signifies to understand, or know; to cause to understand; to be wise, or to act wisely; corresponding with the Ch. כָּוַן above; and being a mere dialectical orthography of the word. It signifies, also, to deprive, strip, bereave; and to waste, scatter, and destroy; also, to east, as fruit or offspring; also, to prosper.

Ch. to understand, and Ch. כָּוַן , to complete, to finish; also, to found, to lay the foundation. This is כָּוַן with ו prefixed. Syr. to found, to finish, to adorn.

Ar. شَكَلَ shakala, to bind under the belly; to gird; to bind the feet; to fetter; to shackle; to form, or fashion; to be dubious, obscure, and intricate; to agree, suit, or answer to; to be like; to have a beautiful form; to know, perceive, or comprehend; to hesitate; to be ignorant. Derivative, a shackle. See Castell, col. 3750.

To this root Castell refers the English skill; and it is certain the words correspond both in elements and in sense. Now, in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, the verbs corresponding to these Shemitic verbs, signify, in Saxon, scylan, to separate, to distinguish; Icelandic and Swedish, skilja, to divide, separate, sever; whence shield, that which separates, and hence defends; D. scheelen, to difler; schillen, to peel, or pare; whence scale and shell. To this root our lexicographers refer skill. The prefix in this word would seem to have the force of a negative, like L. ex. Now, is it possible to suppose that these words can be formed from a common root?

The sense of sin and folly is probably from wandering, deviating, as in delirium; and this is only a modification of the primary sense of כָּוַן , to stretch or extend; that is, departure, separation. Or the ו has, in these senses, the force of a negative.

The sense of knowing, understanding, is usually or always from taking, holding, or extending to; as we say, I take your meaning. In this application, these words would seem to be directly from the Eth. and Ch. כָּוַן , to be able; the Latin calleo, to be hard, and to know or be well skilled. That this word כָּוַן is from the same root as כָּלַף , כָּלַף , כָּלַף , we know by the Samaritan כָּלַף , which signifies all, and which is a mere dialectical spelling of the Heb. and 'Ch. כָּל .

The sense of depriving and wasting, in the Hebrew, is from separation, the sense of the Gothic and Teutonic words; but it is to be noticed that this sense seems to imply throwing, as one mode of parting, and this is also the direct act of founding, laying the foundation.

When we turn our attention to the Arabic, new affinities are disclosed. The first definition is, to bind, to gird, to shackle, and hence the English word. The radical sense of bind is to strain, the sense of hold. And here we arrive at the origin and primary sense of shall, should; Saxon scalan, to be obliged; that is, to be bound or constrained. Hence we see why the words scale, shell, and shall, are all written alike in Saxon, seal; for scale and shell are from peeling, or covering, binding.

From this verb the Saxon has scyld, a crime, or guilt, Lat. scelus, and scyld, a shield. The German has the same word in schuld, guilt, culpability, debt; Dutch, schuld; Danish skulde, should, and scyld, a debt, a fault, a crime; Sw. skuld, the same. This word scyld, skuld, and schuld, is the English should, the preterit of the verb shall; and it is the word used in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Icelandic, and Swiss Lord's Prayer, to express what is rendered in English debts; forgive us our debts. Here we see the primary sense of the word is to be held, or bound; hence, liable. The English word guilt may be from the same root, without a prefix; but whether it is or not, we observe the word expresses more than the English word debt, trespass, or offense; it comprehends the sense of fault, or sin, with that of being held or liable to answer or to punishment. Debt, in the modern use of the word, implies the latter, but not the former; trespass and offense imply the sin, but not the liability to answer. We have no English word that includes both senses except guilt, and this seems to be hardly adequate to express the full sense of scyld.

To account for the various significations of the same word, in different languages, and often in the same language, it is necessary to find the primary action expressed by the root; and in compound words it is necessary to observe or ascertain the different effects produced on the original word by the prefixes. Thus the verb inculpo, in Low Latin, signifies to excuse; but some modern writers use inculcate in a directly different sense; that is, to blame.

In like manner impartible has two different significations; that may be imparted; and in law, not partible, or divisible. Such is the fact also with impassionate. I am persuaded a vast number of instances of similar diversities in the application of prefixes, may be found in the Shemitic languages; and this will account for differences which otherwise seem utterly irreconcilable.

We find in our mother tongue, that the same word signifies to heal and to conceal, Lat. celo; Saxon hel, health; hælan, helan, to heal, to conceal; ge-hælan, and ge-helan, to heal, and to conceal; Old English hele. Hence we see that the English heal and the Latin celo are the same word differently applied, but from a common signification, which is, to make strong or fast, or to hold, from the sense of pressing. Or perhaps the Latin celo may have this sense of holding, restraining; and heal may rather be from making perfect. No. 2, supra.

We may now also see the radical sense of holy; Saxon hal and ge-hal, whole, sound, safe; halig, holy; halgian, to hallow. If this word contains the sense of separation, or driving off, like Latin sacer, as it may, it is from shutting, confining, or restraining intercourse. But I am inclined to believe the primary sense of holy is sound, entire, coinciding with the radical sense of heal.

CLOD, LAUDO, CLAUDO

In Welsh, clod is praise, from llod, a forcible utterance. This is the English loud, and Lat. laudo, which, with a prefix, becomes plaudo. In Welsh, lodi signifies to reach out, to crave, from the radical sense of llod, to thrust out or extend; but according to Owen, lodi is from llwed, which signifies a shooting out, or a going onward, productiveness, a lad; and as an adjective, tending forward, craving, leud; llodig, craving, brimming; llodineb, lewdness. Now, beyond all question, these words are the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, and Samaritan יָלַד, to beget; to bring forth; to cause to be born; and as a noun, a child of either sex, a lad. The Arabians and Ethiopians use tau or tauw, where the Hebrews use yod. The Arabic corresponding word is ya, walada, the Ethiopic ጠለደ walada, to beget, to bring forth.

But this is not all. In Greek, the verb κλειω, a contraction of κλειδωω, signifies to praise, to celebrate. Here we have precisely the Welsh llod above, corresponding with the Latin laudo and plaudo. But the same Greek word κλειω, κλειδωω, signifies to shut or make fast. This is the Latin cludo, claudio. The Saxons used h for the Greek x and the Latin c; and with these words accords the Saxon hlid, a cover; English, a lid; that which shuts or makes fast. That these words are all from one root, is a fact apparent beyond any reasonable doubt; nor is there the least difficulty in ascertaining the affinity, for the radical sense, to reach forward, to thrust, to strain, solves the whole mystery. To thrust, gives the sense of begetting and producing; to strain or throw out the voice, gives the sense of praise; and to thrust or press together, gives the sense of closing and making fast. In this manner, words, which at first view appear to have no connection, will, when pursued through different languages, assimilate and unite, not only without forced analogies, but in defiance of all preconceived opinions; and the reluctant mind is at last compelled to admit their identity.

There is another set of words whose derivation from the same root is very certain, though perhaps less obvious. These are the Danish slutter, to shut, close, conclude, finish, determine; slutter, a key-keeper, a jailer; Swedish sluta, claudere, obserare, to shut, or shut up, or end; slott, a castle; D. steutel, a key; slot, a lock, a castle, a conclusion; sluiten, to shut, lock, close, stop, conclude; G. schloss, a lock; schliessen, to close, conclude, finish, fetter, shackle; schleuse, a sluice; D. sluis, id. Eng. sluice, that is, which shuts or fastens; Low Latin, erelusa. See Spelman's Glossary. These words are unequivocally formed from the root of claudio, clausi, by the prefix s, just as the Welsh yslae, slack, loose, is formed on llae, and yspelliaw on yspail, spoil, and this on the root of peel. We observe all the Teutonic dialects use the dental t, as the final radical, except the German. The Latins use both the dental and a sibilant, claudio, clausi, clausus.

If the Danish lyd, sound, Sw. lyda, to sound, is the same word as English loud, these words belong to this family.

CRADLE.

Another example. The English word cradle, Saxon cradel, is in Welsh cryd, a rocking, a shaking, a cradle. In Welsh, the verbs crydu, crydiaw, crydiann, signify to shake, to tremble. These correspond to the Irish creatham, to shake; Greek κρᾶδιω, to shake, to swing. The Welsh verbs are by Owen deduced from rhyd, which signifies a moving. Now יָרַד in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Ethiopic, signifies to shake or tremble. The same word in Arabic, ras, signifies to thunder; to impress terror; to tremble; to shake. This coincides with the Latin rudo, to roar, to bray; and we know from the voice of the ass, that roughness or shaking is an ingredient in the sense of this word. We know it also from rudis, one of the affinities of rudo. There is also in Arabic, ras, which is rendered to run hither and thither; to move one way and the other; to tremble; to shake. In Hebrew יָרַד signifies to tremble or shake, and to palpitate; in Syriac and Eth. to rub or scrape. This connects the word directly with cradle, through the Hebrew; and through the Syriac, with the Latin rudo. Here again we find the sense of roughness or grating. Then turning to the Welsh, we find crydiaw, which signifies to utter a rough sound; to shout, whoop, or scream; crydwest, a murmur, from cryd, a shout, or whoop, and this from rhyd, the word above mentioned; so that crydu, to shake, whence cradle, is from the same root as crydiaw, to shout, and this is the Italian gridare; Sp. and Port. gritar; Saxon grædan; Swedish gråta; Danish græder; Dutch kryten; German greiten. This word in French is contracted, by the omission of the last radical, into crier for crier; whence, probably, we have cry, W. cri. Hence we find that the sense of cry is to utter a rough sound; and this is connected with the braying of the ass, with shaking, trembling, and with roaring, murmuring, and thunder. The connection, in this example, is so marked as to preclude all hesitation as to the identity of the words.

The Shemitic roots יָרַד, חָרַר, and קָרַד, all, in some of the languages of that stock, coincide in sense and elements with the English grate, French grater; and if the first letter is a prefix, they would seem to unite with the Latin rudo. But this is a point I would not undertake to determine.

One fact more. The Welsh cri, above mentioned, signifies a cry; and as an adjective, rough, raw. Now, this coincides with the Latin crudus, in sense; and crudus with the Welsh cryd, above mentioned.

The Dan. brygger, Eng. to brew, are probably connected with break, with freckle, and with rough. So, under this root, the Welsh grediaw, signifies to heat, scorch, parch; whence gredidyll, a griddle, from groid, that shoots in rays; heat, ardency, from gra, that shoots, or rises, as the nap or frize of cloth. The latter is probably a contracted word, of the same family, but not the root, as Owen supposes. But the radical sense implies a shaking, agitation, and roughness.

MEET, METE, MEASURE.

SAXON. — Matan, to put, to place; Fr. mettre, It. mettere, Sp. and Port. meter, Lat. mitto.

Metan, metan, to find, to meet, or meet with; to paint; to dream; to measure, to mete, Lat. metior, metor, Gr: μετρεω, μετροω, Lat. mensus, with a casual n, that is, mesus, Fr. mesure.

Amelan, gemelan, to meet, to find, to measure.

Gemeting, gemetung, a meeting.

Gemet, gemete, fit, suitable, Eng. meet; also, painted or portrayed.

Gemetegan, gemetian, to moderate; gemetic, moderate, modest. Mete, measure, modic, Lat. modius, modus.

Meter, measure in verse, meter [not metre.]

Meterc, an inventor, a painter.

Mete, middling, [mediocris,] modest, moderate.

Mot, genot, a meeting, a council.

Witena-gemot, a council of wise men.

Motium, to meet, especially for debate. Eng. to moot.

GERMAN. — Motyān, gamotyān, to meet, to find.

Mota, a place for the receipt of toll or customs.

DUTCH. — Ontmoeten, to meet, to encounter.

Meeten, and toemeten, to measure.

Meeter, a measurer.

Gemoeten, to meet; gemoot, a meeting.

GERMAN. — Mass, measure, meter; masse, moderation.

Messen, vermessen, to measure; messer, a measurer.

Gemäss, measure; also, conformable, suitable; Eng. meet, suitable; German gemässigt, temperate, moderate.

SWEDISH. — Möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. [This is the sense of finding.]

Möte, a meeting.

Mot, and emot, toward, against; as in motstå, to stand against, to resist.

Mäta, to measure; mätt, measure, meter, mode.

Mättelig, moderate, middling, frugal, temperate.

Mätta, to be sufficient, to satisfy, to cloy.

DANISH. — Moder, to meet, to convene; mod or mode, a meeting; mod, contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, for, on, by, aside, abreast, as in modsetter, to set against, to oppose; mod-siger, to say against, to contradict; modvind, a contrary wind.

Moed, moden, ripe, mellow, mature. [Qu. Lat. mittis.]

Mode, manner, fashion. [Probably from the Latin.]

Maade, measure, form, style of writing, way, mode, manner, fashion. [This is the native Danish word corresponding to the Lat. modus.]

Maadelig, moderate, temperate.

Mat, enough, sufficient; metter, to satisfy, or sate, to glut.

From the same root are the G. mit, D. met, mede, Sw. and Dan. meta, Gr. meta, signifying with.

By the first signification of the Saxon matan, or metan, we find that this word, which is the English meet, is also the French mettre, and Lat. mitto, the sense of which is to throw or send, to put, to lay. Meet is only a modification of the same sense, to come to, to fall, to reach, hence to find; as we say, to fall on.

The sense of painting or portraying is peculiar to the Saxon. I am not confident that this sense is from finding; but we observe that metere is rendered an inventor and a painter. The sense of paint, then, may be, to find out, to devise or contrive.

The sense of dreaming is also peculiar to the Saxon. The sense may be to devise or imagine, or it may be to roze, as in some other words of like signification. If so, this sense will accord with the Syriac ܡܕܝܢܐ , infra.

The other significations present no difficulty. To meet is to come to, to reach in proceeding or in extending; hence to find. The primary sense of measure is to extend, to stretch to the full length or size of a thing.

Meet, fit, suitable, like par, peer, pair, is from extending or reaching to. So suit is from the Latin sequor, through the French, to follow, to press or reach toward. See par, under ܡܕܝܢܐ supra.

The English meet and mete appear to be from the Saxon dialect, but moot from the Gothic.

Let it be remarked that the Saxon meet and mete are united in the same orthography; and in the Dutch the orthography is not very different; ontmoeten, gemoeten, to meet, and metten, to measure. Not so in the other languages.

In German, mass is measure, and messen, to measure; but the sense of meet does not occur. Yet that mass is the same word as meet, fit, varied only in dialect, appears from this, that gemass, with a prefix, is suitable, answering to the English meet.

The Swedish and Danish words follow the Gothic orthography; Swedish möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. These significations give the sense of finding, and are closely allied to the senses of the Arabic verb ܡܕܝܢܐ madda, infra.

The Danish verb is møder, to meet; but in both the Swedish and Danish, the sense of measure is expressed by a different orthography. Sw. måta, to measure; måt, measure; Dan. maade, measure, mode. In these two languages we find also the sense of sufficiency, and to satisfy. See infra, the Ar. ܡܕܝܢܐ and Heb. ܡܕܝܢܐ .

But in these Gothic dialects, there is one application of meeting, which deserves more particular notice. In Swedish, mot and emot is a preposition of the same signification as the English against. It is rendered toward, against. So in Danish, mod is contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, by, aside, abreast. This preposition is the simple verb, without any addition of letters, prefix or suffix. We hence learn that the sense of such prepositions is a meeting or coming to, which gives the sense of to or toward; but when one meets another in front, it gives the sense of opposition, or contrary direction. This coming to or meeting may be for a friendly purpose, and hence in one's favor, like for in English. Thus in Danish, "Guds godhed mod os," God's goodness or mercy toward us. In other cases, mod signifies against, and implies contransaction or opposition; as modgift, an antidote; modgang, adversity. So for, in English, signifies toward, or in favor of; and also opposition and negation, as in forbid.

In the Danish we find moed, moden, ripe, mature. We shall see this sense in the Chaldee ܡܕܝܢܐ . The sense is, to reach, extend, or come to.

The Latin modus is from this root, and, by its orthography, it seems to have been received from the Gothic race. The sense is measure, limit, from extending, or comprehending. This, then, becomes the radix of many words which express limitation or restraint, as moderate, modest, modify; a sense directly contrary to that of the radical verb.

This leads us a step further. In Saxon, Gothic, and other northern languages, mod, moed, signifies mind, courage, spirit, anger, whence English noody. The primary sense is an advancing or rushing forward, which expresses mind, or intention; that is, a setting or stretching forward, and also spirit, animation, heat, and, lastly, anger. So the Latin animus gives rise to animosity; and the Greek μενος , mind, signifies also strength, force, vehemence, and anger. Mania is from the same radical sense.

Let us now connect this root, or these roots, with the Shemitic languages.

In Hebrew and Chaldee, ܡܕܝܢܐ signifies to measure; ܡܕܝܢܐ , a measure. This coincides with the Latin metior, and Gr. μετροω , as well as with the Saxon, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish, which all write the word with a dental, but the German is mass.

In Syriac, ܡܕܝܢܐ mad, signifies to escape, to get free; that is, to depart, a modification of the sense of extending in the Arabic. A derivative in Syriac signifies a duty, toll, or tribute; and we have seen in the Gothic, that mota is a toll-house. It may be from measuring, that is, a portion, or perhaps income.

This word in Arabic, ܡܕܝܢܐ madda, signifies,

1. To stretch or extend, to draw out, to make or be long, to delay or give time, to forbear, to bring forth. To extend is the radical sense of measure.

2. To separate, or throw off or out; to secrete, secrete, or discharge. Hence to become matter or sanies, to produce pus, to maturate. Here we have the origin of the word matter, in the sense of pus. It is an excretion, from throwing out, separating, freeing, discharging. Here we have the sense of the Latin mitto, emitto.

3. To assist, to supply. This sense is probably from coming to, that is, to approach or visit. "I was sick, and ye visited me. I was in prison, and ye came to me." Matth. xxv.

This application coincides with the English meet, but particularly with the Swedish and Danish sense of the word.

4. To make thin, to attenuate; probably from stretching. Among the Arabic nouns formed under this root, we find a measure, or modius, showing that this verb is the same as the Chaldee and Hebrew; we find also matter, or pus, and lenity. Qu. Lat. mittis.

In Chaldee, ܡܕܝܢܐ or ܡܕܝܢܐ signifies to come to, to happen, to reach, [to meet,] to be ripe or mature, to cause to come, to bring or produce. The first sense gives that of finding, and the latter gives that of maturing, and we observe that matter, or pus, is from the Arabic ܡܕܝܢܐ madda, and the sense of mature, from the Chaldee ܡܕܝܢܐ meta. Yet in the use of maturate, from the Latin maturo, we connect the words; for to maturate is to ripen, and to generate matter.

In Syriac, this verb signifies the same as the Chaldee, to come to; and also to be strong, to prevail; that is, to strain or stretch, the radical sense of power.

In Hebrew, ܡܕܝܢܐ has the sense of the foregoing verb in the Chaldee; to find, to come to, to happen.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to find, and to be strong, to prevail; hence, both in Hebrew and Chaldee, to be sufficient. Here we see the Danish and Swedish matter, and matta, to be sufficient. This is also meet, dialectically varied.

In Syriac, also, this verb signifies to be strong or powerful; also in Pah. to bring or press out, to defeat, which sense unites this word with the Heb. ܡܕܝܢܐ , to press, to squeeze. In Ethiopic, this verb signifies to come, to happen, to cause to come, to bring in, to bring forth. Now, it is evident that ܡܕܝܢܐ , and the Chaldee ܡܕܝܢܐ are dialectical forms of the same word; the former coinciding with the German mass in orthography, but with the other languages in signification.

In Chaldee, ܡܕܝܢܐ signifies the middle, and, as a verb, to set in the middle, to pass the middle; in Syriac, to be divided in the middle. Qu. Is not this a branch of the family of meet?

In Chaldee, ܡܕܝܢܐ amad, to measure, is evidently from ܡܕܝܢܐ with a prefix or formative ܐ . This word, in Syriac, signifies, like the simple verb, to escape, to be liberated. In Pacl, to liberate.

In Arabic, this verb أَمَد amida, signifies to be terminated, to end; whence the noun, an end, limit, termination, Latin meta; which, Ainsworth informs us, signifies, in a metaphorical sense, a limit. The fact is the reverse; this is its primary and literal sense, and that of a pillar and goal are particular appropriations of that sense.

In Hebrew, אָמָד signifies a cubit, a measure of length.

The same in the Rabbinic, from מָד , with a prefix.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to be contracted, to shrink.

Is not this sense from מָד , measure, modus; a limit, or a drawing?

That the Shemitic words, מָדָה , מִטָּה , מִצָּה and אָמָד , are words of the same stock with met, mete, Lat. metior, there can be no doubt; but it is not easy to understand why the different significations of meeting and measuring should be united in one word, in the Saxon language, when they are expressed by very different words in the Shemitic, and in most of the Teutonic languages. We know, indeed, that in German a sibilant letter is often used, in words which are written with a dental in all the other kindred languages. But in this case, the German mass, measure, must coincide with מָד , as must the Swedish mät, and Dan. maade, and the Saxon metan, Dutch gemeeten, Goth. motyan, Sw. möta, Dan. möder, with the Chaldee מָדָה , but not with the word מִטָּה .

It may not be impossible nor improbable that all these words are from one stock or radix, and that the different orthographies and applications are dialectical changes of that root, introduced among different families or races of men, before languages were reduced to writing.

In the Latin mensus, from metior, the n is probably casual, the original being mesus, as in the French mesure. I have reason to think there are many instances of this insertion of n before d and s.

From this exhibition of words and their significations, we may fairly infer the common origin of the following words. Lat. mitto, French mettre, English meet, to come to, meet, fit, and mete, to measure, Lat. metior, metor, Gr. $\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\nu$, $\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\omega$, Lat. mensura, Fr. mesure, Eng. measure. Lat. modus, mode, Sax. and Goth. mod, mind, anger; whence moody, Eng. moot, Lat. maturus, mature, and Eng. matter.

In Welsh, madu signifies to cause to proceed; to send; [Lat. mitto]; to suffer to go off; to render productive; to become beneficial; and mad signifies what proceeds or goes forward, hence what is good; and mad, the adjective, signifies proceeding, advancing, progressive, good or beneficial. This word, then, affords a clear proof of the radical sense of good. We have like evidence in the English better, best, and in prosperity, which is from the Greek $\pi\rho\sigma\phi\rho\sigma\epsilon\tau\omega$, to advance.

In Welsh also we find madrez, matter, pus; madru, to dissolve, to putrefy, to become pus. That these words are from the same root as the Arabic أَمَد supra, I think to be very obvious; and here we observe that the Welsh have one important sense derived from the root, that of good, which occurs in none of the other languages. But the primary sense is the same as that of the other significations, to go forward, to advance; hence to promote interest or happiness. Here we have undeniable evidence that the sense of good, Welsh mad, and the sense of matter, pus, proceed from the same radix.

LEGO.

The Greek $\lambda\epsilon\gamma\omega$ is rendered, to speak or say; to tell, count, or number; to gather, collect, or choose; to discourse; and to lie down. This last definition shows that this word is the English lie and lay; and from this application, doubtless, the Latins had their lectus, a bed; that is, a spread, a lay.

The Latin lego, the same verb, is rendered to gather; to choose; to read; to steal, or collect by stealing; and the phrase legere oram signifies to coast, to sail along a coast; legere vela, is to furl the sails; legere halitum, to take breath; legere litus, to sail close to the shore; legere milites, to enlist or muster soldiers; legere pugno, to strike, perhaps to lay on with the fist.

It would seem, at first view, that such various significations can not proceed from one radix. But the fact that they do is indubitable. The primary sense of the root must be to throw, strain, or extend, which in this, as in almost all cases, gives the sense of speaking. The sense of collecting, choosing, gathering, is from throwing, or drawing out, or separating by some such act; or from throwing together. The sense of lying down is probably from throwing one's self down. The sense of reading, in Latin, is the same as that of speaking, in the Greek, unless it may be from collecting, that is, separating the letters, and uniting them in syllables and words; for in the primitive mode of writing, diacritical points were not used. But probably the sense of reading is the same as in speaking.

The phrases legere oram, legere litus, in Latin, may coincide with that of our seamen, to stretch or lay along the shore or coast, or to hug the land; especially if this word lay, in Sanscrit, signifies to cling, as I have seen it stated in some author, but for which I can not vouch. If this sense is attached to the word, it proves it closely allied to the L. ligo, to bind.

That the sense of throwing, or driving, is contained in this word, is certain from its derivatives. Thus, in Greek, $\alpha\pi\omega\lambda\epsilon\gamma\omega$ signifies to select, to collect; and also to reject, to repudiate, and to forbid; which imply throwing, thrusting away.

Now, if throwing, sending, or driving, is the primary sense, then the Latin lego, to read, and lego, legare, to send, are radically the same word; the inflections of the verb being varied, arbitrarily, to designate the distinct applications, just as in pello, appello, appellere, to drive, and appello, appellare, to call.

And here it may be worth a moment's consideration, whether several words with prefixes, such as slay, flog, and the Latin plico, W. plygu, are not formed on the root of lay, that is, lag or lak. The sense of slay, Sax. slagan, slæan, is properly to strike, to beat; hence, in Saxon, "Hig slogon heora wedd," they slew their league, or contract; that is, they struck a bargain. It signifies also to throw, as to slag one into prison; also, to fall; to set or lay. The sense of killing is derivative from that of striking, a striking down.

Flog, Lat. figo, signifies, primarily, to rush, drive, strike, Eng. to lick; and, if formed on the root of lay, is precisely the popular phrase, to lay on.

If plico is formed with a prefix on lay or its root, it must have been originally pelico, that is, belico, belay. Then, to fold would be to lay on or close; to lay one part to another. Now, this word is the Welsh plygu, to fold, which Owen makes to be a compound of py and lly. The latter word must be a contraction of llyg.

We know that the word reply is from the French repliquer, the Latin replico. Now, to reply is not to fold back, but to send back, to throw back, as words, or an answer; and this gives the precise sense of lay, to throw, to send, which must be the sense of the radical word.

It is no inconsiderable evidence of the truth of my conjecture, that we constantly use the phrase to lay on, or lay to, as synonymous with ply, a word belonging to this family. To pledge, another of this family, is to lay down, to deposit; and the primary sense of play, Saxon plegan, Dan. leger, Sw. leka, is to strike or drive.

In Welsh, lluçiau signifies to throw, fling, cast, or dart; to pelt; to drift; from luc, a darting, a flash, glance, or sudden throw; hence lluçed, lightning. Llug signifies, also, that breaks, or begins to open; a gleam, a breaking out in blotches; the plague. Llwg signifies, also, that is apt to break out, that is bright, a tumor, eruption. These words coincide with English light, Lat. laeco; the primary sense of which is to throw, shoot, or dart; and these words all contain the elements of flag and fling.

The Welsh, llyçu signifies to fall flat, to lie extended, or to squat. This is evidently allied to lay and lie.

These senses agree also with that of luck, to fall, or come suddenly; that is, to rush or drive along.

In Russ. zlagayu is to lay, or put in; equivalent to the German einlegen.

The Latin fluo is contracted from flugo; and the radical sense of fluo is the same as that of light. So the river Sar, in Europe, is doubtless from the same source as the Oriental שָׁר , to shine, whence air. And הָרַר , which, in Hebrew, signifies to flow as water, as well as to shine, chiefly signifies, in Chaldee and Syriac, to shine.

To show the great importance, or rather the absolute necessity, of ascertaining the primary sense of words, in order to obtain clear ideas of the sense of ancient authors, more particularly of difficult passages in dead languages, let the reader attend to the following remarks.

In commenting on certain parts of Isaiah xxviii. Lowth observes, in his Preliminary Dissertation, the difficulty of determining the meaning of רָחַץ, in verse 15th. In our version, as in others, it is rendered agreement; but, says Lowth, "the word means no such thing in any part of the Bible, except in the 18th verse following; nor can the lexicographers give any satisfactory account of the word in this sense." Yet he agrees with Vitringa, that in these passages it must have this signification. The difficulty, it seems, has arisen from not understanding the primary sense of seeing, for the verb generally signifies to see; and as a noun the word signifies sight, vision; and so it is rendered in the Latin version annexed to Vanderhooght's Bible. The Seventy render it by συνθήκη, a covenant or league; and they are followed by the moderns. "Nous avons intelligence avec le sépulchre:" French. "Noi habbiam fatta lega col sepolcro:" Italian of Diodati.

Parkhurst understands the word to signify, to fasten, to settle, and he cites 2 Sam. xx. 9, רָחַץ, "Joab took Amasa by the beard." Here the sense is obvious; and from this and other passages, we may infer with certainty, that the radical sense is to reach to, or to seize, hold, or fix. If the sense is to reach to, then it accords with covenant, conveniens, coming to; if the sense is to fix, or fasten, then it agrees with league, Lat. ligo, and with pact, pactum, from pango, to make fast; all from the sense of extension, stretching, straining. Hence the meaning of רָחַץ, the breast; that is, the firm, fixed, strong part. And if the English gaze is the same word, which is not improbable, this determines the appropriate sense of seeing, in this word, to be to fix, or to look or reach with the eye fixed.

But we have other and decisive evidence of the primary signification of this word in the obvious, undisputed meaning of רָחַץ, the same word with a prefix, which signifies to catch, or lay hold on; to seize; hence behind, following, as if attached to; and hence drawing out in time, to delay.

Now, it is not improbable that the Arabic حاز hauza, may be a word of the same stock; and this signifies, among other senses, to collect, contract, or draw together, to accumulate, to have intercourse or commerce with another. The latter sense would give nearly the signification of the Hebrew word.

Lexicographers are often embarrassed to account for the different signification of words that are evidently derived from the same root. Thus, in Hebrew, שָׁרַר is rendered to sing; to look, behold, or observe; and to rule; and its derivatives, a ruler, a wall, the navel-string, a chain or necklace, &c. How can a word signify to rule, and to sing, and to look? Nothing can be more easy or natural. The sense is, in both cases, to stretch or strain, to reach. To sing is to strain the voice; to rule is to restrain men; and to see is to reach, or to hold in view.

In Latin, sero signifies to sow, to plant, to beget, to spread; consero, to sow, and to close or join; desero, to leave off, to desert; assero, to plant by or near, and to assert, affirm, and pronounce; dissero, to discourse; insero, to insert, to implant; resero, to unlock, to open, to disclose. Desero, to desert, Ainsworth says, is a compound of de and sero, "ut sit desertum quod non seritur nec colitur." And dissero he supposes must be a metaphorical use of the word. Now, on the principles I have unfolded, nothing is easier than an explanation of these words. The sense of sero is to throw, to thrust; its literal sense is applied to sowing and planting; consero is to thrust or drive together; desero is to throw from; assero is to throw in words, or to throw out, as in appello; dissero is to throw words or arguments, with the sense of spreading, expatiating; insero is to throw or thrust in; resero is to throw or drive from, hence to unlock or open.

It is by resorting to the primary idea of words, that we are able to explain applications, apparently, or in fact, diverse and even contrary. A very common example of this contrariety occurs in words which signify to guard or defend. For instance, the Latin arceo signifies to drive off, and to protect, secure, hold, restrain, or keep from departing or escaping; two senses directly opposite. This is extremely natural; for arceo signifies to thrust off, repel, drive back; and this act defends the person or object attacked. Or if we suppose the sense of straining to be anterior to that of repulsion, which is not improbable, then the act of straining or holding produces both effects; to repel or stop what advances to assault, and protect what is inclosed or assaulted. The words guard and warren present a similar application of the primary idea; and all languages which I have examined furnish a multitude of similar examples.

These examples illustrate the utility of extensive researches in language; as all cognate languages throw light on each other; one language often retaining the radical meaning of a word which the others have lost. Who, for instance, that is acquainted only with the English use of the verb to hurt, would suspect that this word and happen are radically one, and that the primary sense is to fall or rush, hence to fall on and seize? Yet nothing is more certain. In the Spanish language the senses of both verbs are retained in haber; and the Welsh hapiaw gives us the true original signification.

In like manner the primary sense of venio, in Latin, can not be certainly determined, without resorting to other words, and to kindred languages. In Latin, the word signifies to come or arrive; but in Spanish, venida, from venir, the Latin venio, signifies not only a coming or arrival, but an attack in fencing. Venio coincides in origin with the English find; Saxon findan; German and Dutch finden, to find, to fall or light on; Danish finder; Swedish, finna, to find, to discover, to meet, to strike against, [affendere.] The primary sense of venio, ven, is not merely to come or arrive, but to rush or move with a driving force; and this sense is applicable to coming or going.

That the primary sense is to fall or rush, we have evidence in the Latin ventus, and English wind, both from the root of this verb. We have still further evidence in the word venom, which in Welsh is gwynwyn; gwyn, white, and gwyn, rage, smart, whence gwynn, wind. Venom is that which frets or excites a raging pain. Hence we may infer that Latin venor, to hunt, to chase, is of the same family; and so is venia, leave, or leave to depart, or a departure, a leaving, coinciding in signification with leave.

The latter word, venia, proves another fact, that the primary sense of venio is, in general, to move in any direction, and that the Latin sense, to come, is a particular appropriation of that sense.

In ascertaining the primary sense of words, it is often useful or necessary to recur to the derivatives. Thus the Latin lædo is rendered to hurt; but, by adverting to allido, elido, and collido, we find that the original signification is to strike, hit, or dash against. Thurt, then, is the secondary sense; the effect of the primary action expressed by the verb.

So the Latin rapio, to seize, does not give the sense of rapidus, rapid; but the sense of the latter proves the primary sense of rapio to be to rush, and in its application, to rush on and seize.

These examples will be sufficient to show how little the affinities of language have been understood. Men have been generally satisfied with a knowledge of the appropriate sense of words, without examining from what visible or physical action, or primary sense, that particular application has been derived. Hence the obscurity that still rests on the theory of language. It has been supposed that each word, particularly each verb, has an original specific sense, or application, distinct from every other verb. We find, however, on a close examination and comparison of the same word in different languages, that the fact is directly the reverse; that a verb expressing some action, in a general sense, gives rise to various appropriate senses, or particular applications. And in the course of my researches, I have been struck with the similarity of manner in which different nations have appropriated derivative and figurative senses. For example, all nations, as far as my researches extend, agree in expressing the sense of justice and right by straightness; and sin, iniquity, wrong, by a deviation from a straight line or course. Equally remarkable is the simplicity of the analogies in language, and the small number of radical significations; so small, indeed, that I am persuaded the primary sense of all the verbs in any language may be expressed by thirty or forty words.

We can not, at this period of the world, determine, in all cases, which words are primitive, and which are derivative; nor whether the verb or the noun is the original word. Mons. Gebelin, in his Monde Primitif, maintains that the noun is the root of all other words. Never was a greater mistake. That some nouns may have been formed before the verbs with which they are connected, is possible; but, as languages are now constructed, it is demonstrably certain, that the verb is the radix or stock from which have sprung most of the nouns, adjectives, and other parts of speech belonging to each family. This is the result of all my researches into the origin of languages. We find, indeed, that many modern verbs are formed on nouns; as, to practice from practic; but the noun is derived from a Greek verb. So we use wrong as a verb, from the adjective wrong; but the latter is primarily a participle of the verb to wring. Indeed, a large part of all nouns were originally particles or adjectives, and the things which they denote were named from their qualities. So pard, pardus, is from בָּרַד barad, hail; and the animal so named from his spots, as if sprinkled with hail, from the sense of separation or scattering. Crape, the Fr. crêpe, is from crêper, to crisp. Sight signifies, primarily, seen; it being the participle of seon, contracted from sgan. Draught is the participle of drow, that which is drawn, or the act of drawing; thought is the participle of think.

As the verb is the principal radix of other words, and as the proper province of this part of speech is to express action, almost all the modifications of the primary sense of the verb may be comprehended in one word, to move.

The principal varieties of motion or action may be expressed by the following verbs.

1. To drive, throw, thrust, send, urge, press.
2. To set, fix, lay. But these are usually from thrusting, or throwing down.
3. To strain, stretch, draw; whence holding, binding, strength, power, and often health.
4. To turn, wind, roll, wander.
5. To flow, to blow, to rush.
6. To open, part, split, separate, remove, scatter. See No. 16.
7. To swell, distend, expand, spread.
8. To stir, shake, agitate, rouse, excite.
9. To shoot, as a plant; to grow; allied to No. 1.
10. To break, or burst; allied sometimes to No. 3.
11. To lift, raise, elevate; allied to No. 9.
12. To flee, withdraw, escape; to fly; often allied to No. 1.
13. To rage; to burn; allied to Nos. 7 and 8.
14. To fall; to fail; whence fading, dying, &c.
15. To approach, come, arrive, extend, reach. This is usually the sense of going. No. 34.
16. To go, walk, pass, advance; allied to No. 6.
17. To seize, take, hold; sometimes allied to No. 31.
18. To strike; to beat; allied to No. 1.
19. To swing; to vibrate. No. 29.
20. To lean; to incline; allied to the sense of wandering, or departing.
21. To rub, scratch, scrape; often connected with driving, and with roughness.
22. To swim; to float.
23. To stop, cease, rest; sometimes, at least, from straining, holding, fastening.
24. To creep; to crowsl; sometimes connected with scraping.
25. To peel, to strip, whence spoiling.
26. To leap, to spring; allied to Nos. 9 and 1.
27. To bring, bear, carry; in some instances connected with producing, throwing out.
28. To sweep.
29. To hang. No. 19.
30. To shrink, or contract; that is, to draw. See No. 3.
31. To run; to rush forward; allied to No. 1.
32. To put on or together; to unite; allied to Nos. 1 and 3.
33. To knit, to weave.
34. To gain, to win, to get. See No. 15.

These and a few more verbs express the literal sense of all the primary roots. But it must be remarked that all the foregoing significations are not distinct. So far from it, that the whole may be brought under the signification of a very few words. The English words to send, thron, thrust, strovein, stretch, draw, drive, urge, press, embrace the primary sense of a great part of all the verbs in every language which I have examined. Indeed, it must be so, for the verb is certainly the root of most words; and the verb expresses motion, which always implies the application of force.

Even the verbs which signify to hold or stop, in most instances at least, if not in all, denote, primarily, to strain or restrain by exertion of force; and to lie is, primarily, to throw down, to lay one's self down. So that intransitive verbs are rarely exceptions to the general remark above made, that all verbs primarily express motion or exertion of force. The substantive verb has more claims to be an exception than any other; for this usually denotes, I think, permanence or continued being; but the primary sense of this verb may perhaps be to set or fix; and verbs having this sense often express extension in time or duration. So τένω, in Greek, is to stretch, but the same word tenco, in Latin, is to hold; hence continuance.

Let us now attend to the radical sense of some of the most common verbs.

Speaking, calling, crying, praying, utterance of sounds, is usually from the sense of driving or straining. Thus, in Latin, appello and compello, though of a different conjugation from pello, depello, impello, are from the same root; and although the Latin repello does not signify to recall, yet the corresponding word in Italian, rappellare, and the French rappeler, signify to recall, and hence the English repeal. Hence also peal, either of a bell or of thunder. This is the Greek βάλω, and probably παλλω is from the same root. The sense of striking is found in the Greek verb, and so it is in the Latin loquor, English clock. But in general, speaking, in all its modifications, is the straining, driving, or impulse of sounds. Sometimes the sense coincides more exactly with that of breaking or bursting.

Singing is a driving or straining of the voice; and we apply strain to a passage of music, and to a course of speaking.

I am not confident that I can refer the sensation of hearing to any visible action. Possibly it may sometimes be from striking, hitting, touching. But we observe that hear is connected in origin with ear, as the Latin audio is with the Greek ouo, wtos, the ear; whence it appears probable that the verb to hear is formed from the name of the ear, and the ear is from some verb which signifies to shoot or extend, for it signifies a limb.

The primary sense of seeing is commonly to extend to, to reach; as it were, to reach with the eye. Hence the use of behold, for the radical sense of hold is to strain; and hence its signification in beholden, held, bound, obligated. See the verb SEE, in the Dictionary.

The sense of look may be somewhat different from that of see. It appears, in some instances, to have for its primary signification, to send, throw, cast; that is, to send or cast the eye or sight.

The primary sense of feeling is to touch, hit, or strike; and probably this is the sense of taste.

Wonder and astonishment are usually expressed by some word that signifies to stop or hold. Hence the Latin miror, to wonder, is the Armoric miret, to stop, hold, hinder; coinciding with the English moor, and Spanish omarrar, to moor, as a ship.

To begin is to come, or fall on; to thrust on. We have a familiar example in the Latin incipio, in and capio; for capio is primarily to fall or rush on and seize. See ΒΕΙΝ, in the Dictionary.

Attempt is expressed by straining, stretching, as in Latin tento. See ASSAY and ESSAY.

Power, strength, and the corresponding verb, to be able, are usually expressed by straining, stretching, and this is the radical sense of ruling or governing. Of this the Latin rego is an example, which gives rectus, right, that is, stretched, straight.

Core, as has been stated, is usually from straining, that is, a tension of the mind.

Thinking is expressed by setting. To think is to set or fix or hold in the mind. It approaches to the sense of suppose, Latin suppono.

And under this word, let us consider the various applications of the Latin puto. The simple verb puto is rendered to prune, lop, or dress, as vines; that is, according to Ainsworth, putum, i. e. purum reddo, purgo, by which I understand him to mean, that putum is either a change of purum, or used for it; a most improbable supposition, for the radical letters t and r are not commutable. Puto is rendered, also, to make even, clear, adjust, or cast up accounts; also to think or consider; to suppose; to debate. Its compounds are amputo, to cut off, prune, amputate, to remove; computo, to compute, to reckon, to think or deem; disputo, to make clear, to adjust or settle, to dispute or debate, to reason; imputo, to impute, to scribe or lay to, to place to account; reputo, to consider, to revolve, to reckon up, to impute. The Latin deputo signifies to think, judge or esteem, to account or reckon, and to prune; but the Italian deputare, Spanish diputar, and French deputer, from the Latin word, all signify to send. How can the sense of think, and that of lop or prune, be deduced from a common root or radical sense? We find the solution of this question in the verb to depute. The primary sense is to throw, thrust, or send, or to set or lay, which is from throwing, driving. To prune is to separate, remove, or drive off; to force off; to think is a setting in the mind; to compute is to throw or put together, either in the mind or in numbers; to dispute is to throw against or apart, like debate, to beat from; to impute is to throw or put to or on; and to repute is to think or throw in the mind repeatedly. To amputate is to separate by cutting round. Puto, then, in Latin, is from the same root, probably, as the English put, or the same word differently applied; and also the Dutch poeten, to plant; poel, a paw, a twig or shoot, Gr. φυτόν, &c.

In attempting to discover the primary sense of words, we are to carry our reflections back to the primitive state of mankind, and consider how rude men would effect their purposes, before the invention or use of the instruments which the moderns employ. The English verb to cut, signifies, ordinarily, to separate with an edged tool; and we are apt to consider this as the chief and original sense. But if so, how can cut, the stroke of a whip, which is a legitimate sense of the word, be deduced from the act of severing by an edged tool? We have, in this popular use of the word, a clew to guide us to the primary sense, which is, to drive, urge, press; and, applied to the arm, to strike. But we have better evidence. In the popular practice of speaking in New England, it is not uncommon to hear one person call to another when running, and say, Cut on, cut on; that is, hurry, run faster, drive, press on; probably from striking a beast which one rides on. This is the original sense of the word. Hence we see that this verb is the Latin caedo, to strike, to cut down, somewhat differently applied and caedo, to fall, is only a modified sense of the same root, and the compounds incido, to cut, and incido, to fall on, are of one family. To cut is, therefore, primarily, to strike, or drive; and to cut off, if applied to the severing of bodies, before edged tools were used, was to force off, or to strike off; hence the sense of separating in the phrase to cut off a retreat or communication.

So the Latin carpo is the English carree, originally to separate by plucking, pulling, seizing and tearing; afterwards, by cutting. Asking is usually expressed by the sense of pressing, urging. We have a clear proof of this in the Latin peto and its compounds. This verb signifies, primarily, to rush, to drive at, to assault; and this sense, in Dictionaries, ought to stand first in the order of definitions. We have the force of the original in the words impetus and impetuous. So the Latin rogo coincides in elements with reach.

The act of understanding is expressed by reaching or taking, holding, sustaining; the sense of comprehend, and of understand. We have a popular phrase which well expresses this sense, "I take your meaning or your idea." So in German, begreifen, to be-grippe, to apprehend.

Knowing seems to have the same radical sense as understanding.

Pain, grief, distress, and the like affections, are usually expressed by pressure or straining. Affliction is from striking.

Joy, mirth, and the like affections, are from the sense of rousing, exciting, lively action.

Covering, and the like actions, are from spreading over or cutting off, interruption.

Hiding is from covering or from withdrawing, departure; or concealment may be from withholding, restraining, suppressing, or making fast, as in the Latin celo.

Heat usually implies excitement; but as the effect of heat, as well as of cold, is sometimes to contract, I think both are sometimes from the same radix. Thus cold and the Lat. calco, to be warm, and callus and calleo, to be hard, have all the same elementary letters, and I suppose them all to be from one root, the sense of which is, to draw, strain, shrink, contract. I am the more inclined to this opinion, for these words coincide with calleo, to be strong or able, to know; a sense that implies straining and holding.

Hope is probably from reaching forward. We express strong desire by longing, reaching toward.

Earnestness, boldness, daring, peril, promptness, readiness, willingness, love, and favor, are expressed by advancing or inclining.

Light is often expressed by opening, or the shooting of rays, radiation; and probably, in many cases, the original word was applied to the dawn of day in the morning. Whiteness is often connected in origin with light. We have an instance of this in the Latin canco, to shine and to be white.

And that the primary sense of this word is to shoot, to radiate, that is, to throw out or off, we have evidence in the verb cano, to sing, whence canto, the sense of which is retained in our popular use of cant; to cant a stone; to cant over a cask; give the thing a cant; for all these words are from one stock.

The Latin virtus, the English worth, is from the root of vireo, to grow, that is, to stretch forward, to shoot; hence the original sense is strength, a sense we retain in its application to the qualities of plants. Hence the Latin sense of virtus is bravery, coinciding with the sense of boldness, a projecting forward.

Pride is from swelling or elevation, the primary sense of some other words nearly allied to it.

Fear is usually from shrinking or from shaking, trembling; or sometimes, perhaps, from striking, a being struck, as with surprise.

Holiness and sacredness are sometimes expressed by separation, as from common things. The Teutonic word holy, however, seems to be from the sense of soundness, entireness.

Faith and belief seem to imply a resting on, or a leaving. It is certain that the English belief is a compound of the prefix be and leaf, leave, permission. To believe one, then, is to leave with him, to rest or suffer to rest with him, and hence not to dispute, contend, or deny.

Color may be from spreading over or putting on; but in some instances the primary sense is to dip. See DYE and TINOE.

Spots are from the sense of separating, or from sprinkling, dispersion.

The radical sense of making is to press, drive, or force. We use make in its true literal sense, in the phrases, Make your horse draw, Make your servant do what you wish.

Feeding is from the sense of pressing, crowding, stuffing; that is, from driving or thrusting. Eating seems to have a somewhat different sense.

Drinking is from drawing, or from wetting, plunging. Drench and drink are radically one word.

Anger, and the like violent passions, imply excitement, or violent action. Hence their connection with burning or inflammation, the usual sense of which is raging or violent commotion.

Agreement, harmony, are usually from meeting or union, or from extending, reaching to.

Dicelling, abiding, are from the sense of throwing or setting down, or resting, or from stretching; as we see by the Latin continuo, from teneo, Gr. τενω, to extend.

Guarding and defending are from roots that signify to stop, or to cut off; or, more generally, from the sense of driving off; a repelling or striking back. In some cases, perhaps, from holding.

Opposition is usually expressed by meeting, and hence the prepositions which express opposition. Thus the Danish preposition mod, Swedish mot or emot, against, contrary, is the English word to meet.

Words which express spirit, denote, primarily, breath, air, wind, the radical sense of which is to flow, move, or rush. Hence the connection between spirit and courage, animus, animosus; hence passion, animosity. So in Greek φρενις, frenzy, is from φρη, the mind, or rather from its primary sense, a moving or rushing.

So in our mother tongue, mod is mind or spirit; whence mood, in English, and Saxon modig, moody, angry. Hence mind is the sense of purpose, its primary signification, is a setting forward, as intention is from intendo, to stretch, to strain, the sense that ought to stand first in a Dictionary.

Reproach, chiding, rebuke, are from the sense of scolding, or throwing out words with violence.

Sin is generally from the sense of deviating, wandering, as is the practice of lewdness.

Right, justice, equity, are from the sense of stretching, making straight, or from laying, making smooth.

Falschood is from falling, failing, or from deviation, wandering, drawing aside.

The primary sense of strange and foreign, is distant, and from some verb signifying to depart. Wild and fierce are from a like sense.

Vain, vanity, vane, sad kindred words, are from exhausting, drawing out, or from departing, withdrawing, falling away.

Paleness is usually from failure, a departure of color.

Glory is from opening, expanding, display, or making clear.

Binding, making fast or close, is from pressure, or straining.

Writing is from scratching, engraving, the sense of all primitive words which express this act.

A crowd, a mass, a wood, &c., are from collecting or pressing, or some allied signification.

Vapor, steam, smoke, are usually from verbs which signify to exhale or throw off.

Stepping seems to be from opening, expanding, stretching. Thus passus in Latin is from pando, to open, but this agrees in origin with pateo, and with the Greek πατω. Gradus, in Latin, coincides with the Welsh rhawd, a way, and this, when traced to its root, terminates in the Oriental רדד, Chaldee, to open, stretch or expand; in Syriac, רדד, to go, to pass. Walking may be sometimes from a like source; but the word walk signifies, primarily, to roll, press, work and full, as a hat, whence walker signifies a fuller.

Softness and weakness are usually named from yielding, bend- ing, withdrawing, as is relaxation. Softness, however, is sometimes connected with smoothness, and perhaps with moisture.

Sweetness seems to have for its primary sense, either softness or smoothness.

Roughness is from sharp points, wrinkling or breaking; and acidity is from sharpness or pungency, and nearly allied to roughness.

Death is expressed by falling or departure; life, by fixedness or continuance, or from animation, excitement.

Selling is, primarily, a passing or transfer. Sellan, in Saxon, signifies to give, as well as to sell.

A coast or border is usually the extreme point, from extending. Law is from setting, establishing.

The primary sense of son, daughter, offspring, is usually a shoot, or, as we say, issue. Hence, in Hebrew, בן ben, signifies both a son, a cion, a branch, and the young of other animals.

A son, says Parkhurst, is from בנה banah, to build; and hence he infers that a son is so called, because he builds up or continues his father's house or family. But if so, how does the word apply to a branch, or an arrow? What do these build up? The mistake of this author, and of others, proceeds from their not understanding the original meaning of the verb, which is not to erect, or elevate, but to throw, to set, to found; and this verb is probably retained in our word found. A son is that which is thrown or shot out; a cion or branch is the same, an offset, one an offset of the human body, the other of a plant, and an arrow is that which is shot or thrown. Hence, probably, the Hebrew עֵבֶן eben or even, a stone, W. maen or vaen, that which is set, so named from its compactness or hardness. And in Arabic اُبْنِ ubana, signifies to think, Lat. opino, that is, to set in the mind.

Few and small are senses often expressed by the same word. Thus, although few in English expresses merely a small number, yet the same word in French, peu, and in the Italian, poco, signifies little in quantity, as well as few in number.

Cause is from the sense of urging, pressing, impelling. Hence it well expresses that which produces an effect; and hence it is peculiarly expressive of that by which a man seeks to obtain a claim in law. A cause in court is properly a pressing for right, like action from ago; and prosecution from the Latin sequor, which is our word seek. Hence the Latin accuso, to accuse, to throw upon, to press, or load with a charge. The Saxon sveca, contention, suit in law, is synonymous with cause, and from the root of seek, sequor. It is the English sake.

The word thing is nearly synonymous with cause and sake. See THING, in the Dictionary.

The primary sense of time, luck, chance, fortune, is to fall, to come, to arrive, to happen. Tide, time, and season, have a like original sense. Tide, in Saxon, is time, not a flow of the sea, the latter being a secondary and modern application of the word. This primary signification of time will unfold to us what I formerly could not understand, and what I could find no person to explain; that is, why the Latin tempora should signify times and the temples. It seems that tempora are the falls of the head. Hence, also, we understand why tempest is naturally deducible from tempus, as the primary sense is to fall, to rush. Hence tempestivus, seasonable, that comes in good time. Season has a like sense.

Hence, also, we are led to understand, what has seemed inexplicable, how the French heureux, lucky, happy, can be regularly deduced from heure, an hour. We find that in Greek and Latin the primary sense of hour is time, and time is a coming, a falling, a happening, like the English luck, and hence the sense of lucky; hence fortunate and happy. The word fortunate is precisely of the same character.

The primary sense of the Shemitic דָּרַר darar, or tharar, corresponds almost precisely with that of cause and thing in English; that is, to strain, urge, drive, fall, or rush. Hence it signifies to speak, and in Ch. and Syr. to lead, to direct, to govern. As a noun, it signifies a word, that which is uttered; a thing, cause, or matter; that is, that which happens or falls, like event from evenio; also a plague, or great calamity; that is, that which falls or comes on man or beast, like plague; a stroke or affliction, from striking. And it may be observed, that if the first letter is a prefix answering to the Gothic du, Saxon and English to, in the Saxon to-drifan, to drive, then the root דָּרַר coincides exactly with the Welsh peri, to command, which is retained in composition in the Lat. impero. Indeed, if the first syllable of guberno is a prefix, the root of this word may be the same. The object, however, for which this word is here mentioned, is chiefly to show the uniformity which men have observed in expressing their ideas; making use of the same visible physical action to represent the operations of the mind and moral ideas.

Silence, deafness, dumbness, are from stopping, holding, or making fast.

War is from the sense of striving, driving, struggling.

Good is generally from enlarging, or advancing, like prosperous.

Evil is from wandering, departing, or sometimes from softness, weakness, flowing or fluxibility, as is the case with the Latin malum, from the Welsh mall.

The primary sense of the names of natural and material objects can not always be ascertained. The reasons are obvious. Some of these names are detached branches of a family of words which no longer form a part of our language; the verb and all the derivatives, except a single name, being extinct, or found only in some remote country. Others of these names have suffered such changes of orthography, that it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the primary or radical letters, and of course the family to which they belong. Numerous examples of such words occur in English, as in every other language.

But from such facts as have occurred to me in my researches, I may venture to affirm with confidence, that most names of natural objects are taken from some obvious quality or action, or some supposed quality of the thing; or from the particular action or operation by which it is produced. Thus tumors are named from pushing, or swelling; and redness, or red, seems, in some instances at least, to be named from eruptions on the body. The human body is named from shaping, that is, setting, fixing, or extending, and hence, sometimes, the general name of the human race. The arm is a shoot, a push, as is the branch of a tree. A board, a table, a floor, is from spreading, or expanding, extending. Skin and bark are from peeling, stripping, &c.

The names of particular animals and plants can not always be traced to their source; but, as far as I have been able to discover their origin, I find animals to be generally named from some striking characteristic of external appearance; from the voice, from habits of life, or from their office. There is reason for believing that the Greek goubov and Latin struthio, or ostrich, is from the same root as the English strut, the strutted; the primary sense of which root is, to stretch, which explains all the senses of the Greek and Latin words of this family. It is certain that the crow is named from its cry, and the leopard from his spots.

Thus plants were named from their qualities; some from their form, others from their color, others from their effects, others from the place of their growth. The English root, Lat. radix, is only a particular application of rod and ray, radius; that is, a shoot. Spurge is, undoubtedly, from the root of the Latin purgo.

There is reason to think that many names of plants were originally adjectives, expressing their qualities; or the name was a compound, used for the same purpose, one part of which has been dropped, and the other remaining as the name of the plant. Thus pine, pinus, is from pin, pinna, penna; for in Welsh pin is a pin and a pen or style for writing, and pinbren is a pine-tree. The tree, then, was named from its leaf.

Fir has a similar origin and signification.

It is probable or rather certain, that some natural objects, as plants and minerals, received their names from their supposed qualities; as, in ages of ignorance and superstition, men might ascribe effects to them, by mistake. The whole history of magic and enchantment leads us to this conclusion.

Minerals are, in many instances, named from their obvious qualities, as gold from its yellowness, and iron from its hardness. The names can, in some cases, be traced to their original, as that of gold and of the Latin ferrum; but many of them are not easily ascertained. Indeed, the greatest part of the specific names of animals, plants, and minerals, appear to be obscure. Some of them appear to have no connection with any family of words in our language, and many of them are derived to us from Asia, and from roots which can be found only, if found at all, in the Asiatic languages.

These observations and explanations will be sufficient to show the importance of developing, as far as possible, the origin of words, and of comparing the different uses of the same word in different languages, in order to understand either the philosophy of speech, or the real force and signification of words in their practical application.

If it should be found to be true, that many of the Shemitic verbs are formed with prefixes, like those of the European languages, this may lead to new illustrations of the original languages of the Scriptures. In order to determine this fact, it will be useful to examine whether the Chaldee and Hebrew \aleph is not often a prefix answering to be in the Teutonic languages; whether \aleph and \beth are not prefixes answering to the ga and ge of the Gothic and Teutonic; whether γ , δ , and τ , and ι , a dialectical form of δ , do not coincide with the Gothic du, the Saxon to, the Dutch toe, and the German zu; whether δ does not answer to the Russ. and Dutch na, the German nach; and whether δ and τ do not answer to s, sh, and sch in the modern English and German.

If many of the Shemitic triliteral verbs are compound, it follows that the primary radix has not been detected. At any rate, I have no hesitation in affirming, that the primary sense of many of the roots in the Shemitic languages, that sense which is almost indispensable to an understanding of many obscure passages in the Scriptures, has been hitherto overlooked or mistaken. In order fully to comprehend many uses of the words, it will be necessary to compare them with the uses of the words of the same family in the modern languages; and this comparison must be far more extensive than any hitherto made, and conducted on principles which have not been before duly appreciated and applied.

I have introduced the foregoing comparative view of the several significations of the same word in different languages, not merely to illustrate the general principles of language, but with a special reference to an explanation of the etymologies which occur in this work. Should my Synopsis ever be published, the learned inquirer might pursue the subject at his pleasure.

The results of the foregoing remarks and illustrations may be thus recapitulated.

1. The nations which now constitute the distinct families or races of Japheth and Shem, are descendants of the common family which inhabited the plain of Shinar before the dispersion.

2. The families at the dispersion retained a large proportion of the words which were in common use before that event, and the same were conveyed to their posterity. In the course of time, some of these words were dropped by one family or tribe, and some by another, till very few of them are retained in their original form and signification, by all the nations which have sprung from the main stock. A few of them, however, are still found in all or nearly all the languages which I have examined, bearing nearly the same signification and easily recognized as identical.

3. Although few of the primitive words can now be recognized as existing in all the languages, yet as we better understand the changes which have been made in the orthography and signification of the same radical words, the more affinities are discovered; and particularly, when we understand the primary sense, we find this to unite words whose appropriate or customary significations appear to have no connection.

4. A great number of the primitive radical words are found in compounds, formed in different languages, with different affixes and prefixes, which obscure the affinity. Thus veritas in Latin, is wahrheit in German; the first syllable in each is the same word, the last different. In other instances, both difference of orthography, of formation, and of application, concur to obscure the affinity of words. Thus the English word strong is in Danish strengh, signifying stern, severe, rigid, strict; and strength [stronghood] is severity, rigor, strictness. Now, n in these words is not radical; remove this letter, and we have strog, streg, which coincide with the Latin stringo, strictus; and these words are found to be from the same radix, which signifies to draw, to strain, to stretch.

5. It appears that b, p and f are often prefixes, either the remains of prepositions, or casual additions to words, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, which prefixes now precede consonants, with which they readily coalesce in pronunciation, as l and r, forming triliteral words on biliteral roots; as in block from loc, or lock; play, Saxon plegon, from leg or lek, Swedish leka, Dan. leger; flow, Lat. fluo, from lug, or luc, which appears in light, lux, lucco, and in lug, a river, retained in Lugdunum.

6. It appears, also, that c or k and g are often prefixes before the same consonants, l and r, as in Lat. clunis, Eng. loin; W. clod, praise, from llocl, Latin laus, laudo; German gluck, English luck; Lat. gratia, W. rhad.

7. It appears, also, that s is a prefix in a vast number of words, as in speed, spoil, swell, swcep; and it is very evident that st are prefixed to many words whose original, radical, initial consonant was r, as in straight, strict, strong, stretch, from the root of right, rectus, reach, and in stride, from the root of the Latin gradior, W. rhaz.

If these inferences are just, as I am persuaded they are, it follows that there is a more near resemblance and a much closer affinity between the languages of Europe and of Western Asia, than has hitherto been supposed to exist. It follows, also, that some of the most important principles or rudiments of language have hitherto escaped observation, and that philology is yet in its infancy. Should this prove, on further examination, to be the state of philology, it is reserved for future investigators to examine the original languages of the Scriptures on new principles, which may serve to illustrate some obscure and difficult passages, not hitherto explained to the general satisfaction of critics and commentators.

If any persons should be disposed to doubt or contradict these facts, let them first consider that my conclusions are not hasty opinions, formed on isolated facts; but that they have been forced upon me, in opposition to all my former habits of thinking, by a series of successive proofs and accumulating evidence, during a long course of investigation, in which I have compared most of the radical words, in more than twenty languages, twice, and some of them three times.

No part of my researches has given me more trouble or solicitude than that of arriving at the precise radical signification of moral ideas; such, for example, as hope, love, favor, faith. Nor has it been with much less labor that I have obtained a clear knowledge of some of our physical actions. It is literally true that I have sometimes had a word under consideration for two or three years, before I could satisfy my own mind as to the primary signification. That I have succeeded at last, in every instance, can hardly be supposed—yet, in most cases, I am perfectly satisfied with the results of my researches.

PROGRESS AND CHANGES OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

It has been already observed that the mother tongue of the English is the Anglo-Saxon. The following are specimens of that language as it was spoken or written in England before the Norman conquest. The first is from the Saxon Chronicle. The original is in one column, and the literal translation in the other. The English words in Italics are Saxon words. The number of these will show how large a proportion of the words is retained in the present English.

An. DCCCXCI. Her for se here east, and Earnulf cyning gefeah with them ræde-here ær tha scipu comon, mid East-Francun, and Seaxum, and Bægerum, and hine geflymde. The following specimen is from the Anglo-Saxon version of Orosius, supposed to be made by King Alfred.

Ohthere sæde his hlaforde, Ælfrede kyninge, that he ealra North-manna north most bude. He cwæth that he bude on thæm lande northweardum with tha west sæ. We order (or instruct) that each Christian man earnestly accustom [wean] his children to Christianity, [Christendom,] and teach him the Pater Noster and Creed.

We lærath that preost ne beo hunta ne hafecere ne tæfere; ac plegge on his bocnm swa his hade gebirath.

We direct that a priest be not a hunter, nor hawkler, nor a gamester; but that he apply to his books, as it becomes his order.

We observe by these extracts that rather more than half the Saxon words have been lost, and now form no part of our language.*

This language, with some words introduced by the Danes, continued to be used by the English till the Norman conquest. After that event, great numbers of Saxon words went into disuse, not suddenly, but gradually, and French and Latin words were continually added to the language, till it began to assume its present form, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Yet the writings of Gower and Chaucer can not now be fully understood without a glossary.

But it was not in the loss of native Saxon words and the accession of French and Latin words alone, that the change of our language consisted. Most important alterations were made in the sounds of the vowels. It is probable, if not certain, that our first vowel a had usually or always the broad sound, as we now pronounce it in full, or in some words perhaps the Italian sound, as it is now called, and as we pronounce it in far. The sound of e was probably nearly the same as it is in French and Italian, and in the northern languages on the continent of Europe; which is nearly that of a in favor. The Saxon sound of i was probably the same as it is still on the Continent, the sound of ee or long e. The sound of u was that of our present oo, French ou, the sound it still has in Italian, and in most countries on the European continent. It is probable that the change of the sound of u happened in consequence of the prevalence of the French pronunciation after the conquest; for the present sound of u may be considered as intermediate, between the full sound of oo, or French ou, and the French sound of u.

These changes, and the various sounds given to the same character, now serve to perplex foreigners, when learning English; and tend, in no small degree, to retard or limit the extension of our language. This is an unfortunate circumstance, not only in obstructing the progress of science, but of Christianity.

The principal changes in the articulations are the use of k for c, as in look for locian; the loss of h before l, as in loaf from hlaef, lot for hlot, lean for hlinian; and the entire loss of the prefix ge or go, as in deal for ge-dalan, deem for ge-deman; and of to as a prefix, as in to-helpen, to help; to-dailan, to deal. In no instance do we feel more sensibly the change of sounds in the vowels, than in that of i, which in French, Spanish, and Italian, is e long; for in consequence of this, persons who are not acquainted with these foreign languages, mispronounce such words as marino, Messina, Lima, giving to i its English sound, when in fact the words are to be pronounced mareeno, Messena, Leema.

In grammatical structure the language has suffered considerable alterations. In our mother tongue, nouns were varied to form cases, somewhat as in Latin. This declension of nouns has entirely ceased, except in the possessive or genitive case, in which an apostrophe before s has been substituted for the regular Saxon termination es. Some of our pronouns retain their declensions, somewhat varied. The plural termination in en has been dropped, in a number of words, and the regular plural termination been substituted, as houses for housen.

In most cases, the Saxon termination of the infinitive mode of verbs has been dropped, and for gifan we now write, to give. The variations of the verb, in the several persons, have been materially changed. Thus for the Saxon—

Ic lufige,	We lufiath,
Thu lufast,	Ge lufiath,
He lufath;	Hi lufiath;

we now write—

I love,	We love,
Thou lovest,	Ye love,
He loveth or loves;	They love.

In the Saxon plural, however, we see the origin of the vulgar practice still retained in some parts of England and of this country. We loves, they loves, which are contractions of lufiath.

In the substantive verb, our common people universally, and most persons of better education, unless they have rejected their traditional language, retain the Gothic dialect, in the past tense.

I was,	We was,
Thou wast,	Ye was,
He was;	They was.

However people may be ridiculed for this language, it is of genuine origin, as old as the Saxon word wære. In Gothic the past tense runs thus—

* Mr. Meidinger of Frankfort, in the Introduction to his Etymological and Comparative Dictionary of the Teuto-Gothic Languages, notices this observation of mine, respecting the proportion of Saxon words which have been lost, and then states the opinion of Mr. Turner, that more than four-fifths of the words in modern English are of Saxon origin. This difference in the two statements proceeds from a circumstance overlooked. My statement refers only to the actual proportion of Saxon words retained in the vocabulary, which is probably less than half of the whole number of words in the language. Mr. Turner's statement refers to the proportion of Saxon words actually used in our common language, which is, doubtless, as great as he represents it. The words of Saxon origin are the more necessary words; such as are wanted in all the common concerns of life; and therefore in use they compose the body of the language.

Ik was,
Thu wast,
Is was;

Weis wesum,
Yus wesuth,
Eis wesun.*

In the present tense of the substantive verb, our common people use án't, as in this phrase: "he án't present." This is evidently a contraction of the Swedish and Danish ar, er, present indicative singular of the substantive verb vara or være—to be, which we retain in are and were. In Swedish, han ar, and in Danish, han er, he is. Hence he er not or ar not, contracted into he án't or en't.

These facts serve to show how far the Gothic dialect has been infused into the English language.

It would be tedious, and to most readers uninteresting, to recite all the changes in the forms of words or the structure of sentences which have taken place since the Norman conquest. Since the invention of printing, changes in the language have been less rapid than before; but no art nor effort can completely arrest alterations in a living language. The distinguished writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth improved the language, but could not give it stability. Many words then in common use are now obsolete, or have suffered a change of signification. In the period between Queen Elizabeth and the beginning of the eighteenth century, the language was improved in grammar, orthography, and style. The writers in the reign of Queen Anne and of George I. brought the language nearly to perfection; and if any improvement has since been made, it is in the style or diction, by a better selection of words, and the use of terms in science and philosophy with more precision.

In regard to grammatical construction, the language, for half a century past, has, in my apprehension, been suffering deterioration, at least as far as regards its written form. This change may be attributed chiefly to the influence of the learned Bishop Lowth, whose Grammar made its appearance nearly seventy years ago. I refer particularly to his form of the verb, which was adjusted to the practice of writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth, instead of the practice of authors in the age of William and Mary, Queen Anne, and George I. Hence he gives for the form of the verb in the subjunctive mode, after the words which express a condition, if, though, &c., I love, thou love, he love, observing in a note, that in the subjunctive mode, the event being spoken of under a condition or supposition, or in the form of a wish, and therefore doubtful and contingent, the verb itself in the present, and the auxiliary both of the present and past imperfect times, often carry with them somewhat of a future sense; as, "If he come to-morrow, I may speak to him"—"If he should come, I should speak to him." This is true; but for that very reason, this form of the verb belongs to the future tense, or should be arranged as such in Grammars. If he come, would be in Latin si venerit, in the subjunctive future.

But the learned author has entirely overlooked the important distinction between an event or fact, of uncertain existence in the present time, and which is mentioned under the condition of present existence, and a future contingent event. "If the mail that has arrived contains a letter for me, I shall soon receive it," is a phrase that refers to the present time, and expresses an uncertainty in my mind, respecting the fact. "If the mail contain a letter for me," refers to a future time, that is, "If the mail of to-morrow contain [shall or should contain] a letter for me." The first event, conditional or hypothetical, should be expressed by the indicative mode, and the latter by the subjunctive future. The Saxon form of the verb, if he slay, if he go, is evidently a contingent future, and is so used in the laws.

This distinction, one of the most important in the language, has been so totally overlooked, that no provision has been made for it in British Grammars; nor is the distinction expressed by the form of the verb, as used by a great part of the best writers. On the other hand, they continually use one form of the verb to express both senses. The fact is the same in the common version of the Scriptures. If he go, if he speak, sometimes express a present conditional tense, and sometimes a contingent future. In general this subjunctive form of the verb, in Scripture, expresses future time. "If he thus say, I have no delight in thee," expresses a future contingent event. 2 Sam. xv. 26. "If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away," expresses a fact, under a condition, in the present time. Job xi. 14.

In many instances the translators have deviated from the original, in using the subjunctive form of the English verb to express what in Greek is expressed in the indicative. Thus Matthew iv. 6. Ei vltos ei ton Θεου, If thou be [art] the son of God.

Ch. v. 29 and 30. Ei δε ο οφθαλμος σου ο δεξις σκανδαλιζει σε, If thy right eye offend [offendeth] thee; Ei η δεξια σου χειρ σκανδαλιζει σε, If thy right hand offend [offendeth] thee.

So also in chapter xviii. 8 and 9.

Ch. xii. 26. Ei ο Σατανας τον Σαταναν εκβαλλει, If Satan cast [casteth] out Satan.

Ch. xix. 10. Ei ovtos εστι η αιτια του ανθρωπου μετα της γυναικος, If the case of the man be [is] so with his wife.

Ch. xxii. 45. Ei ον Δαβιδ καλει αυτον Κυριου, If David then call [calleth] him Lord.

2 Cor. iv. 16. Ei ο εσθι ιμου ανθρωπος διαφθιρειται, Though our outward man perish [perishes, or is perishing].

In all these passages, the English verb, in the subjunctive, properly expresses a conditional, contingent, or hypothetical future tense, contrary to the sense of the original, except in the last passage cited, where the apostle evidently speaks of the perishing of the outward man as a fact admitted, which renders the translation still more improper.

Let us now attend to the following passages.

Matthew vii. 9. Η τις εστι υμων ανθρωπος, ον εαν αιτηση ο υltos αυτου αρον, Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask [shall ask] bread, will he give him a stone?

Και εαν εχθον αιτηση, If he ask [shall ask] a fish, will he give him a serpent?

Here the original tense is varied to express a future or hypothetical event, yet the verb in English is in the same tense as in the first class of examples; and what renders the version more objectionable is, that the verb in the first clause does not correspond with that in the second clause. There is no possible way of making good English of the translation, but by supposing the verb in the first clause, ask, to be in the future tense. So it would be in Latin, and so it is, "si petierit." If thy son shall ask (or should ask) a fish, will he give (or would he give) him a serpent?

This fault runs through the whole English version of the Scriptures, and a distinction of tenses clearly marked in the original languages, is generally neglected in the translation.

Now, the most unlettered man in this country would express the sense in English with the same marked distinction of tenses which appears in the Greek. If thou art the son of God; if thy right eye offends thee; if the case of the man is such; if David calls him Lord; or, if the sense is understood to be future and contingent, if thy son shall ask bread, or if he should ask bread, would be the uniform language of any of the common people of our country. There would not, probably, be a single exception, unless in the use of the substantive verb, which is often used in the subjunctive form. And the most unlettered man would use the corresponding verbs in the two clauses, if he shall ask, will he give; or, if he should ask, would he give. The use of the verb, in all similar phrases, is perfectly well settled in this country, and perfectly uniform among the higher and lower classes of men; unless when the practice has been varied by the influence of Grammars, in which the conjugation of the verb is according to the antiquated practice of the age of Elizabeth.

I Tim. v. 4. Ei δε τις χηρα τεκνα η εγγονα εχει, If any widow have [has] children or nephews.

Verse 8. Ei δε τις τον ιδιον και μαλιστα τον οικειον ου προσοει, If any provide [provideth] not for his own, and especially for those of his own house.

This subjunctive form of the verb, if he be; if he have; if he go; if he say; if thou write; whether thou see; though he fall, which was generally used by the writers of the sixteenth century, was in a great measure discarded before the time of Addison. Whether this change was in consequence of the prevalence of colloquial usage over grammar rules, or because discerning men perceived the impropriety and inconsistency of the language of books, I pretend not to determine. Certain it is, that Locke, Watts, Addison, Pope, and other authors of the first distinction, who adorned the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, generally used the indicative mode to express condition, uncertainty, and hypothesis in the present and past tenses. Thus Locke writes—"If these two propositions are by

* This is probably the Latin esse. The Latins dropped the first articulation v, which answers to our w.
The present tense, indicative mode, of the Latin verb, with the w restored, would be written thus:—

Ego vesum,
Tu ves,
Ille vest;

Nos vesumus, [was,] Vos vestis, [was,] Illi vesunt, [was.]

nature imprinted." "If principles are innate." "If any person hath never examined this notion." "Whether that substance thinks or no." "If the soul doth think in sleep." "If one considers well these men's way of speaking." "If he does not reflect." "Unless that notion produces a constant train of successive ideas." "If your lordship means." Such is the language of Locke.

Now, what is remarkable, the learned Dr. Lowth, the very author who has, by his Grammar, done much to sanction the subjunctive form of the verb, in such cases, often uses the indicative in his own writings. "If he does not carefully attend to this—if this pleasure arises from the shape of the composition—if this is not firmly and well established." These verbs are in contradiction of his own principles. On Isaiah, Prelim. Diss.

Addison. "If the reader has a mind to see a father of the same stamp." "If exercise throws off all superfluities—if it clears the vessels—if it dissipates a growing distemper." Such is the language of Addison, the most elegant writer of the genuine English idiom in the nation.

"If the thief is poor—if it obliges me to be conversant with scenes of wretchedness." Wülfersfoere.

"If America is not to be conquered." Lord Chatham.
 "If we are to be satisfied with assertions." "If it gives blind confidence to any executive government." "If such an opinion has gone forth." "If our conduct has been marked with vigor and wisdom." For.

"If my bodily strength is equal to the task." "A negro, if he works for himself and not for a master, will do double the work." "If there is any aggravation of our guilt." "If their conduct displays no true wisdom." "The honorable gentleman may, if he chooses, have the journals read again." "Whether this is a sufficient tie to unite them." "If this measure comes recommended." "If there exists a country which contains the means of protection." Pitt.

"If the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence." "If an assembly is viciously or feebly composed." "If any persons are to make good deficiencies." "If the King of the French has really deserved these murderous attempts." "If this representation of M. Necker was false." "Whether the system, if it deserves the name." "The politician looks for a power that our workmen call a purchase, and if he finds the power." "If he feels as men commonly feel." Burke.

"If climate has such an effect on mankind." "If the effects of climate are casual." Coxe's Russ.

"If he finds his collection too small." "If he thinks his judgment not sufficiently enlightened." "Whether it leads to truth." "If he warns others against his own failings." This is generally the language of Johnson.

In regard to this distinguished author, I would observe that, except the substantive verb, there is in his Rambler but a single instance of the subjunctive form of the verb in conditional sentences. In all other cases the use of the indicative is uniform.

Such also is the language of the most distinguished men in the United States, particularly of those who wrote their native language as they received it from tradition, and before grammars had made any impression on its genuine construction.

"The prince that acquires new territory, if he finds it vacant." "If we are industrious we shall never starve." "If one has more corn than he can consume, and another has less." Such is the language of Franklin.

"If any persons thus qualified are to be found." "If it is thought proper." "If the Congress does not choose to point out the particular regiment." "If I am rightly informed." "If the army has not removed." "If a proposition has not been made." Such is the language of Washington.

"If any philosopher pretends." "If he has food for the present day." "If a revelation is not impossible." "If the Christian system contains a real communication to mankind." "If the former of these facts opposes our reception of the miraculous history of the gospel." "If the preceding reflections are just." Such is the language of the late President Smith.

"If any government deems the introduction of foreigners or their merchandise injurious." "Unless he violates the law of nations." "If a person has a settlement in a hostile country." "If he resides in a belligerent country." "If a foreign consul carries on trade as a merchant." Such is the language of the ex-Chancellor Kent.

But neither the authors here mentioned, nor most others, even the most distinguished for erudition, are uniform and consistent with themselves in the use of the tenses. In one sentence we find the indicative used, "If it is to be discovered only by the experiment." "If other indications are to be found." In the next sentence, "If to miscarry in an attempt be a proof of having mistaken the direction of genius." Johnson.

"If the former be refined—if those virtues are accompanied with equal abilities." Gibbon.

"If love reward him, or if vengeance strike." Cowper.
 "Or if it does not brand him to the last." Cowper.

"If he is a pagan—if endeavors are used—if the person hath a liberal education—if man be subject to these miseries." Milner.

The following expressions occur in Pope's Preface to Homer's Iliad, in the compass of thirteen lines.

"If he has given a regular catalogue of an army."

"If he has funeral games for Patroclus."

"If Ulysses visit the shades."

"If he be detained from his return."

"If Achilles be absent."

"If he gives his hero a suit of celestial armor."

I recollect one English author only, who has been careful to avoid this inconsistency; this is Gregory, who, in his Economy of Nature, has uniformly used the indicative form of the verb in conditional sentences of this kind.

The like inconsistency occurs in almost all American writings.

"If moral disposition lie here." "If preference necessarily involves the knowledge of obligation." "If the proposition is true." "If the proposition be confirmed." "If he refuses any thing."

In a pamphlet now before me, there are no less than fifty of these inconsistencies in the compass of ninety pages; and three of them in one sentence.

How, in this case, is a foreigner to understand the author? and how can such sentences be translated into another language without a deviation from the original?

The propriety of using the indicative form of the verb to express a present or past event conditionally, does not rest solely on usage; it is most correct upon principle. It is well known that most of the words which are used to introduce a condition or hypothesis, and called, most improperly, conjunctions, are verbs, having not the least affinity to the class of words used to connect sentences. If is the Saxon gif, give, having lost its first letter; if for the ancient gif. Though is also a verb now obsolete, except in the imperative mode. Now let us analyze this conditional tense of the verb. "If the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel." Here is an omission of the word that after if. The true original phrase was, "If that the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel"—that is, give that [admit the fact which is expressed in the following clause,] the man knows his true interest, then the consequence follows, he will avoid a quarrel. That in this sentence is a relative or demonstrative substitute for the following clause. This will more plainly appear by transposing the clauses. "The man knows his true interest; give that [admit that;] he will then avoid a quarrel." Now, let the subjunctive form be used. "The man know his true interest; give that; he will avoid a quarrel."

Here the impropriety of this form of the verb appears in a strong light. It will appear more clearly by the use of other words of equivalent signification. Grant the man know his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel. Allow the man know his true interest. Suppose the man know his true interest. We never use the subjunctive form after the three last verbs which introduce the condition. Though is sometimes followed by the indicative; sometimes by the subjunctive; but it ought always to be followed by the indicative, for it supposes the fact to be given; and so does admit, when used in hypothetical sentences. Admit that the man knows his interest. We have then decisive proof that the use of the indicative form of the verb after if, when it expresses a conditional event in present time, is most correct; indeed, it is the only correct form. This remark is equally applicable to the past tense conditional.

The language of Addison, Johnson, and other distinguished writers of the last century, in the use of the indicative, is, therefore, more correct than the language of the writers in the age of Elizabeth; and their practice is principally the common usage of our country at this day.

* The substantive verb is often used in the subjunctive form by writers who never use that form in any other verb. The reason doubtless is, that be is primarily the indicative as well as the subjunctive mode of that verb. I be, we be, as used in Scripture. So in German, Ich bin.

I have, therefore, constructed a Grammar on this usage; bringing down the standard of writing a century and a half later than Bishop Lowth. I have done this, first, on the authority of strict analogical principles, as above stated; secondly, on the authority of the best usage of that cluster of distinguished writers who adorned the beginning of the last century; and, thirdly, on the authority of universal colloquial practice, which I consider as the real and only genuine language. I repeat this remark, that general and respectable usage in speaking, is the genuine or legitimate language of a country, to which the written language ought to be conformed. Language is that which is uttered by the tongue, and if men do not write the language as it is spoken by the great body of respectable people, they do not write the real language. New, in colloquial usage, the subjunctive form of the verb, in conditional sentences, is rarely used, and perhaps never, except when the substantive verb is employed. Our students are taught in school the subjunctive form, if thou have, if he come, &c., and some of them continue, in after life, to write in that manner; but, in the course of more than forty years, I have not known three men who have ventured to use that form of the verb in conversation. We toil in school to learn a language which we dare not introduce into conversation, but which the force of custom compels us to abandon. In this respect, the present study of grammar is worse than useless.

This colloquial custom accords with other languages. The French say and write s'il est, if he is. The Latins often used the same form, "si quid est in me ingenii, judices;" but the use of the Latin subjunctive depends on certain other words which precede; as, "cum sit civis," as he is a citizen, or, since he is a citizen; and the present tense is often used to express what we express by an auxiliary. That the Greeks used the indicative to express a conditional present tense, we have seen by citations above.

By this arrangement of the verb, the indicative form after if and other verbs introducing a condition or hypothesis, may be used uniformly to express a fact or event under a condition or supposition, either in the present or past tenses; the speaker being uncertain respecting the fact, or representing it as doubtful.

"If the man is honest, he will return what he has borrowed."
"If the ship has arrived, we shall be informed of it to-morrow."
"If the bill was presented, it was doubtless paid." "If the law has been passed, we are precluded from further opposition."

On the other hand, when it is intended to speak of a future contingent event, I would always use the auxiliaries that are proper for the purpose. "If it shall or should rain to-morrow, we shall not ride to town." I would never use the subjunctive form, if it rain, in prose; and in poetry, only from necessity, as an abridged phrase, for if it shall or should rain. In this manner the distinction between the tenses, which are now constantly confounded, may be preserved and made obvious, both to natives and foreigners.

The effect of the study of Lowth's principles, which has been greatly extended by the popularity of Murray's Grammar,* has been to introduce or establish a form of the verb in writing, which is obsolete in colloquial language; to fill our books with a confusion of tenses, and thus to keep the language unsettled. Nothing can be more perplexing to the student, than every where to meet with discrepancies between rules and practice.

There is another erroneous manner of writing, common to the best authors in the language, which seems to have escaped notice. This is, to connect a verb in the past tense with a preceding one in the same tense, when the latter verb is intended to express a very different time from the former. Thus, "Then Manasseh knew that the Lord, he was God." 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13.

The Latins, in this case, would probably have used the infinitive; "Manasseh novit Jehovah Deum esse." In English we ought to write and say, "Manasseh knew Jehovah to be God," or, "Manasseh knew that Jehovah he is God." In most similar cases the use of the infinitive in English is as elegant as in Latin. But there are many cases where the infinitive can not be used. We can not use it after say; "he said him to be a good man," is not English; though "he declared, or affirmed, or believed him to be a good man," is elegant.

In order to understand the impropriety of the common mode of using the latter verb, as in the example above cited, it may be remarked, that the present tense is that which is used to express what exists at all times. Thus we say, God is or exists, whenever we speak of his permanent existence; we say, Gold is yellow or ductile; iron is a most valuable metal; it is not convertible into silver; plants and animals are very distinct living beings. We do not say, Gold was yellow; iron was a valuable metal; for we mean to express permanent qualities. Hence, in the passage cited from Chronicles, the first verb knew, referring to a fact past, is correct; but the last, which is intended to express the permanent being or character of God, should be in the infinitive or the indicative present tense. The following are examples of correct language: "His master had taught him that happiness consists in virtue." Anacharsis, ii. 120.

"Sabellius, who openly taught that there is but one person in the Godhead." Encyclopaedia.

"Our Saviour taught that eternal death is the proper punishment of sin." Emmons.

But very different is the following: "Having believed for many years, that water was [is] an elastic fluid." The following would be still better: "Having believed water to be an elastic fluid."

So the following: "We know not the use of the epidermis of shells. Some authors have supposed that it secured [secures] the shells from being covered with vermes." Edin. Encyc.

"It was just remarked, that marine fossils did not [do not] comprise vegetable remains." Id.

"If my readers will turn their thoughts back on their old friends, they will find it difficult to call a single man to remembrance who appeared to know that life was short, [is short,] till he was about to lose it." Rambler, No. 71.

"They considered the body as a hydraulic machine, and the fluids as passing through a series of chemical changes; forgetting that animation was [is] its essential characteristic." Darwin.

"It was declared by Pompey, that if the Commonwealth was [should be] violated, he could stamp with his foot and raise an army out of the ground." Rambler, No. 10.

In the foregoing sentence, the past tense is used for the future contingent.

"It was affirmed in the last discourse, that much of the honorable practice of the world rested [rests] on the substratum of selfishness; that society was [is] held together, in the exercise of its relative virtues, mainly by the tie of reciprocal advantage; that a man's own interest bound [binds] him to all those average equities which obtained [obtain] in the neighborhood around him; and in which if he prayed [should prove] himself glaringly deficient, he would be abandoned by the respect, and the confidence, and the good-will of the people with whom he had [might have, or should have] to do." Chalmers's Com. Dis. 4.

"In the last discourse, I observed that love constituted [constitutes] the whole moral character of God." Dwight's Theology.

"And he said, Nay, father Abraham; but if one went [shall or should go] to them from the dead, they will repent. And he said to him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose [shall or should rise] from the dead." Luke xvi. 30, 31.

"Independent of parties in the national legislature itself, as often as the period of discussion arrived, the state legislatures, who will always be not only vigilant, but suspicious and jealous guardians of the rights of the citizens, against encroachments from the federal government, will constantly have their attention awake to the conduct of the national rulers, and will be ready enough, if any thing improper appears, to sound the alarm to the people."

Let any man attempt to resolve the foregoing sentence, if he can, or render it into another language.

"Cicero vindicated the truth, and inculcated the value of the precept, that nothing was [is] truly useful which was [is] not honest."

"He undertook to show that justice was [is] of perpetual obligation."

"The author concedes much of his argument, and admits that the sea was [is] susceptible of dominion." [Better still, he admits the sea to be susceptible of dominion.]

* Lindley Murray, in the Introduction to his Grammar, acknowledges, in general terms, that "the authors to whom the grammatical part of this compilation is principally indebted for its materials are, Harris, Johnson, Lowth, Priestley, Beattie, Sheridan, Walker, and Coote." But on examination it appears that the greatest portion of the grammatical part is from Lowth, whose principles form the main structure of Murray's compilation. Some valuable notes and remarks are taken from Priestley's Grammar. I studied grammar in the originals long before Murray's compilation appeared, and, in citing authorities, deem it proper to cite the originals.

"A nation would be condemned by the impartial voice of mankind, if it voluntarily went [should go] to war, on a claim of which it doubted [should doubt] the legality."

"The Supreme Court observed that they were not at liberty to depart from the rule, whatever doubt might have been entertained, if the case was [had been] entirely new."

"He held that the law of nations prohibited [prohibits] the use of poisoned arms."

"He insisted that the laws of war gave [give] no other power over a captive than to keep him safely."

"The general principle on the subject is, that, if a commander makes a compact with the enemy, and it be of such a nature that the power to make it could be reasonably implied from the nature of the trust, it would be valid and binding, though he abused his trust." Let any man translate this sentence into another language, if he can, without reducing the verbs to some consistency.

"Congress have declared by law, that the United States were [are] entitled to priority of payment over private creditors, in cases of insolvency."

"The Supreme Court decided, that the acts of Congress, giving that general priority to the United States, were [are] constitutional."

"It was admitted that the government of the United States was [is] one of enumerated powers."

"From his past designs and administrations, we could never argue at all to those which were future." [This is an odd combination of words.]

"Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and went to God." John xiii. 3.

"Alexander dispatched Eumenes with three hundred horse to two free cities — with assurance that if they submitted and received him [should or would submit and receive] as a friend, no evil should befall them."

"The apostle knew that the present season was [is] the only time allowed for this preparation."

"What would be the real effect of that overpowering evidence which our adversaries required [should require] in a revelation, it is difficult to foretell."

"It could not otherwise have been known that the word had [has] this meaning."

"I told him if he went [should go] to-morrow, I would go with him."

This fault occurs in our hearing every hour in the day.

A like fault prevails in other languages; and indeed, the English may have been led into it by reading foreign authors. "Mais on a remarqué avec raison, que l'espace conchoidal était infini." Lumier. It has been remarked with reason, that the conchoidal space was [is] infinite.

But whatever may be the practice of other nations, there would be no difficulty in correcting such improprieties in our own language, if as much attention were given to the study of its true principles, as is given to other subjects of literature and science. But if, in this particular, there is a British or American author who writes his vernacular language correctly, his writings have not fallen under my inspection.

There is another fault very common among English writers, though it is less frequent in the United States; this is the conversion of an intransitive verb into a passive one. It is surprising that an error of this kind should have gained such an established use, in some foreign languages, as to be incurable. Barbarous nations may indeed form languages; but it should be the business of civilized men to purify their language from barbarisms.

In the transitive verb, there is an agent that performs some action on an object, or in some way affects it. When this verb becomes passive, the agent and the object change places in the sentence. Thus, John loves Peter, is transitive, but Peter is loved by John, is passive. In the intransitive verb the case is different; for the action is limited to the agent; and when it is stated that a thing is done, there is no agent by which it is done. I perish, is intransitive; I am perished, is the passive form; but the latter neither expresses nor implies an agent by which I perish.

This fault occurs frequently in the common version of the Scriptures.

"Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was [had] perished." Job xxx. 2.

"Their memorial is [has] perished with them." Ps. ix. 6.

"The heathen are [have] perished out of this land." Ps. x. 16.

"Israel is [has] fled before the Philistines." 1 Sam. iv. 17.

"David is [has] fled." 2 Sam. xix. 9.

"The days were [had] not expired." 1 Sam. xviii. 26.

"And when the year was [had] expired." 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10.

"I only am [have] escaped alone to tell thee." Job i. 15.

"And it came to pass, when he was [had] returned." Luke xix. 15.

Return is sometimes a transitive verb, and sometimes intransitive. When a sum of borrowed money is returned, the phrase is correct, for this is the passive form of a transitive verb. But when a man is returned, we may ask, who has returned him? In this case, the man returns by his own act, and he can not be said to be returned.

"He found the empress was [had] departed." Coze.

"They were [had] arrived within three days' journey of the spice country." Gibbon, ch. i. note.

"Neither Charles nor Diocletian were [had] arrived at a very advanced period of life." ib. ch. xiii.

"The posterity of so many gods and heroes was [had] fallen into the most abject state." ib. ch. ii.

"Silver was [had] grown more common." ib.

"He was [had] risen from the dead, and was [had] just ascended to heaven." Milner, i. 20.

"Hearing that they were [had] arrived." ib. 211.

"Clandius — vexed because his wife was [had] become a Christian." ib. 274.

"Does not the reader see how much we are [have] already departed from Christian simplicity?" ib. 299.

"My age is [has] departed." Isaiah xxxviii. 12.

"The man out of whom the demons were [had] departed." Luke viii. 35.

"Workmen were [had] arrived to assist them." Mitford.

"A body of Athenian horse was [had] just arrived." ib.

This fault is common in Mitford's History of Greece. In the writings of Roscoe, which are more elegant, it occurs, but less frequently.

"The time limited for the reception of the cardinal was expired." Roscoe, Leo X.

"He inquired whether the report was true, that a legate was arrived." ib. L. Med.

"The nation being [having] once more got into a course of borrowing." Price on Liberty.

"When he was [had] retired to his tent." Coze's Russ.

"He was [had] not yet arrived."* ib.

The intransitive verb grow is constantly used by the English as a transitive verb; as, to grow wheat. This is never used in the Northern States, unless by persons who have adopted it recently from the English.

It seems almost incredible that such errors should continue, to this time, to disfigure the language of the most distinguished writers, and that they should escape animadversion. The practice has evidently been borrowed from the French or Italian; but surely no lover of correctness can excuse such violation of the best established principles in our language.

This fault occurs, in a few instances, in the writings of the best American authors, as in the writings of Ames and Hamilton. It is, however, very rare, either in books or colloquial usage. Even our common people are remarkably accurate in using the auxiliary have with the participles of intransitive verbs. They always, I believe, say, a ship has arrived, a plant has perished, the enemy had fled, the price had fallen, the corn has or had grown, the time has expired, the man has returned, the vessel had departed. Such also is the language of our most eminent writers.

"The Generals Gates and Sullivan have both arrived." Washington's Letters.

"The Indians of the village had fled." B. Trumbull.

"Our Tom has grown a sturdy boy." Progress of Dullness.

"Our patriots have fallen." ib.

"Our commissary had not arrived." Discourse of D. Webster, Aug. 1826.

Ellicott.

The exceptions to this correct practice are chiefly in the use of the participles of come and go. It is very common to hear the expressions, he is come or is gone, in which case the participle seems to take the character of an adjective; although, in most

* On this use of intransitive verbs, as, The ship was departed, it may be asked, Who departed it? — The mail is arrived. Who has arrived it? — The tree is perished. Who has perished it? — The enemy was fled. Who fled them? — The time was expired. Who expired it?

instances, the regular form of expression, he has come, or has gone, is to be preferred. So dead, originally a participle, is used only as an adjective; and deceased and departed are often used in the like manner. We say, a deceased or departed friend; but it should be remarked that the original expression was, our friend has deceased, or has departed this life; and this phraseology, by an easy but heedless transition, became is deceased, or is departed. In general, however, the conversion of an intransitive verb or form of expression into the passive form, is very rare among the people of New England.

There is a grammatical error running through the writings of so respectable a writer as Mitford, which ought not to be passed unnoticed; as it seems to be borrowed from the French language, whose idioms are different from the English, but which the English are too apt to follow. This fault is, in using the preterit or perfect tense, instead of the past tense indefinite, usually called, most improperly, the imperfect. Take the following sentences for examples: "The conduct of Pelepidas toward Arcadia and its minister at the Persian court — has scarcely been the result of mere caprice or resentment." The verb here ought to be was.

"The oration [of Isocrates] has been [was] a favorite of Dionysius of Halicarnassus."

This form of expressing the time would be good in French, but is very bad in English. And it may be here remarked, that the tense he was, he arrived, he wrote, is not properly named imperfect. These verbs, and all verbs of this form, denote actions finished or perfect; as, "In six days God created the heaven and the earth." Imperfect or unfinished action is expressed in English in this manner — he was reading, they were writing. The error of calling the former tense imperfect, has probably proceeded from a servile adoption of the Latin names of the tenses, without considering the difference of application.

There are some errors in all the English Grammars, that have been derived to us from antiquity. Such is the arrangement of that among the conjunctions, like the Greek ὅτι, and the Latin ut. Καὶ μακαρία ἡ περὶ σου, ὅτι ἐστὶ τελειωθῆς τοῖς δούλοῦ σου αὐτῆ παρὰ Κυρίου. And blessed is she who believed that there shall be a performance of the things which were told her from the Lord. Luke i. 45. In our version, ὅτι is rendered for, but most erroneously. The true meaning and character of ὅτι will best appear by a transposition of the clauses of the verse: "There shall be a performance of the things told her from the Lord; blessed or happy is she who believed that." Here ὅτι, that, appears to be what it really is, a relative or substitute for the whole clause in Greek succeeding it. So in Luke xxii. 18. λέγω ὑμῶν ὅτι οὐ μὴ πίνω, &c. I say to you that I will not drink. I will not drink, I say to you that. It is the same in Latin: "Dico enim vobis quod non bibam." Quod is here a relative governed by dico, and referring to the following clause of the sentence.

So also Matthew ix. 28. Πιστεῖτε ὅτι δύναμαι τοῦτο ποιῆσαι; Do ye believe that I am able to do this? I am able to do this: do ye believe that?

This error runs through all Grammars, Greek, Latin, French, English, &c. But how such an obvious fact, that the word that, and its corresponding words in other languages, refer to the clause of a sentence, should escape observation, age after age, it is not easy to explain. How could it be supposed that a word is a conjunction which does not join words or sentences? That is used, in the passages cited, not to unite two sentences, but to continue the same sentence by an additional clause.

The relative, when referring to a sentence or the clause of a sentence, is not varied, for a variation of case is not wanted.

So notwithstanding and provided in English, and pourvu que in French, are called conjunctions, but most improperly, as they are participles; and when called conjunctions, they always form, with a word, clause, or sentence, the case absolute or independent. Thus, "It rains, but notwithstanding that, [it rains,] I must go to town." That fact (it rains) not opposing or preventing me, that is, in opposition to that, I must go to town; hoc non obstantē.

"I will ride, provided you will accompany me." That is, I will ride, the fact, you will accompany me, being provided.

Such is the structure of these sentences. See my Philosophical and Practical Grammar." It is the same in French, pourvu que, that being provided, que referring to the following clause.

There are other points in grammar equally faulty. Not only in English grammar, but in the grammars of other languages, nouns stumble at the threshold, and teach their children to stumble. In no language whatever can there be a part of speech properly called an article. There is no word or class of words that falls within the signification of article, a joint, or that can otherwise than arbitrarily be brought under that denomination. The definitive words called articles, are all adjectives or pronouns. When they are used with nouns, they are adjectives, modifying the signification of the nouns, like other adjectives; for this is their proper office. When they stand alone, they are pronouns, or substitutes for nouns. Thus hic, ille, ipse, in Latin, when used with nouns expressed, are adjectives; hic homo, this man; ille homo, that man. When they stand alone, hic, ille, they stand in the place of nouns. The fact is the same in other languages.

The English the is an adjective, which, for distinction, I call a definitive adjective, and for brevity, a definitive, as it defines the person or thing to which it refers, or rather designates a particular person or thing. But why this should be selected as the only definitive in our language, is very strange; when obviously this and that are more exactly definitive, designating more precisely a particular person or thing than the. These words answer to the Latin hic and ille, which were always used by the Romans, when they had occasion to specify definite persons or things.

As to the English an or a, which is called in grammars the indefinite article, there are two great mistakes. A being considered as the original word, it is said to become an before a vowel. The fact is directly the reverse. An is the original word, and this is contracted to a by dropping the n before a consonant.

But on is merely the Saxon orthography of one, un, unus, an adjective found in nearly all the languages of Europe, and expressing a single person or thing. It is merely a word of number, and no more an article than two, three, four, and every other number in the language. Take the following examples.

Bring me an orange from the basket; that is, any one of the number.

Bring me two oranges from the basket; that is, any two of the number.

Bring me three oranges from the basket; that is, any three of the number; and so on to any number, ad infinitum.

When thus used, an, two, three, are all indefinite; that is, they are used with nouns which are indefinite, or expressing things not particularly designated. But this is not owing to the essential character of the adjectives, an, one, two, three; for any of them may be used with definite nouns; and an is continually thus used.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries."

"The angel stood for an adversary against Balaam.

"Make this fellow return, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us"

"Rezon — was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon."

"And he spake a parable to them to this end."

"And there was a widow in that city."

"And seeing the multitude, he went up into a mountain."

"I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee."

"Thou art a God ready to pardon."

Now, let any of these phrases be tested by the common definition of an or a, "that it is used in a vague sense, to point out one single thing of the kind; in other respects indeterminate."

Louth.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries;" that is, "I will be any adversary, one of the kind, but vague or indeterminate."

"Rezon was an adversary to Israel;" that is, in a vague sense, any adversary, indeterminate.

"And he spake a parable to them;" that is, any parable, indeterminate.

"Thou art a God ready to pardon;" that is, any God, one of the kind, in a vague sense, indeterminate!

If it should be said, the noun is rendered determinate, by other words in the sentence, and not by an or a, this may be and generally is true; but this shows that an does not give to the noun its character of definiteness or indefiniteness; it always retains its proper signification, which is one, and nothing more; and it is used indifferently before nouns definite or indefinite.

This mistake of the character of an is found in other languages; but I was gratified to find a French Grammar in Paris, recommended by the Institute, the author of which had discarded the indefinite article.

In English, an or a is, for the most part, entirely useless. Used with a noun in the singular number, it serves no purpose, except that which the form of the word in the singular number is intended to answer. It expresses unity only, and is not the province of the singular number. Were it not for habit, "Give me orange," would express the sense of "give me an orange," with precision and certainty. In this respect the Latin language has the advantage over the English. But the use of such a short word is not very inconvenient, and the usage can not be changed. Other languages are subject to the same inconvenience; even the definite articles, or definitives, in Greek and in French, are very often useless, and, were it not for usage, would be improper.

ORTHOGRAPHY.

From the period of the first Saxon writings, our language has been suffering changes in orthography. The first writers, having no guide but the ear, followed each his own judgment or fancy; and hence a great portion of Saxon words are written with different letters, by different authors; most of them are written two or three different ways, and some of them fifteen or twenty. To this day the orthography of some classes of words is not entirely settled; and in others it is settled in a manner to confound the learner, and mislead him into a false pronunciation. Nothing can be more disreputable to the literary character of a nation, than the history of English orthography, unless it is that of orthoepy.

1. The Saxon diphthong æ, which probably had a specific and uniform sound or combination of sounds, has been discarded, and ea generally substituted in its place; as, bræth, breath. Now, ea thus united have not a uniform sound, and of course they are no certain guide to pronunciation. In some instances, where the Saxon spelling was not uniform, the modern orthography follows the most anomalous and difficult, instead of that which is regular. Thus the Saxons wrote fæther and fether, more generally the latter, and the moderns write father.

2. The letter g, in Saxon words, has, in many English words, been sunk in pronunciation, and either wholly lost, or it is now represented by y or w. Thus dag, or dug, has become day; gear is year, bugn is bove, and fæger is foir.

3. The Saxons, who adopted the Roman alphabet, with a few alterations, used c with its close sound like that of k. Thus lic, like; locian, to look. But after the Norman conquest, c before e, i, and y, took the sound of s; hence arose the necessity of changing this letter in words and syllables, where it was necessary to retain the sound of k before these vowels. Thus the Saxon liccan, pronounced originally likean, becomes, with our present sound of c before e, liccan; and locian becomes losian. To remedy this evil, our ancestors introduced k from the Greek, writing it generally after c, as in lick, stick, though in some instances omitting c, as in like and look. Hence, in all monosyllables in which a syllable beginning with e or i is added to the word, as in the past time and participles of verba, we use k in the place of the Saxon c, as in licked, licking.

Our early writers attempted to extend this addition to words introduced from the Latin and Greek, in which no such reason exists for the use of k. Thus they wrote publick, musicul, rhetoricul, rhetick. In these and similar words the Latins used c for the Greek κ; as, musicus, for μουσικός; and the early English writers took both letters, the Roman c and Greek κ. This was absurd enough; but they never proceeded so far as to carry the absurdity through the derivatives; never writing publication, musicul, rhetoricul, catholicickism, skeptickism, stoickism. After a long struggle with the force of authority, good sense has nearly banished this pedantic orthography from use; and all words of this kind now appear, in most of our public acts and elegant writings, in their proper simplicity; public, publication, music, musical.

4. In many words, formerly ending in ic, these letters have been discarded from the singular number, and y substituted. Thus remedic, memorie, are now written remedy, memory. But, what is very singular, the plural of these words retains the ic, with the addition of s, as in remedics. This anomaly, however, creates no great inconvenience, except that it has been extended by negligent writers to words ending in ey, as in attornies. But words ending in ey properly make the plural by simply taking s, as in surveys, attorneys. The same rule applies to verbs when an s is added, as in conveys.

5. In a vast number of words the vowel e has been discarded as useless; as in eggs, for egges; certain, for certaine; empress, for empresse; goodness, for goodnesse. This is an improvement, as the e has no sound in modern pronunciation. But here again we meet with a surprising inconsistency; for the same reason which justifies this omission, would justify and require the omission of e final in motive, persire, juvenile, genuine, sanguine, doctrine, examine, determine, and a multitude of others. The introduction of e, in most words of these classes, was at first wrong, as it could not plead any authority in the originals; but the retaining of it is unjustifiable, as the letter is not merely useless, but, in very numerous classes of words it leads to a false pronunciation. Many of the most respectable English authors, a century ago or more, omitted e in such words as examin, determin, famin, ductil, fertil, definit, &c.; but these improvements were afterwards rejected, to the great injury of orthography. In like manner, a final e is inserted in words of modern coinage, as in alumine, salicine, chloride, oxyde, &c., without the least necessity or propriety.

6. A similar fate has attended the attempt to anglicize the orthography of another class of words, which we have received from the French. At a very early period, the words chambre, desastre, desordre, chartrre, monstre, tendre, tigre, entre, fièvre, diametre, arbitre, nombre, and others, were reduced to the English form of spelling; chamber, disuster, disorder, charter, monster, tender, tiger, enter, fever, diameter, arbitr, number. At a later period, Sir Isaac Newton, Camden, Selden, Milton, Whitaker, Prideaux, Hook, Whiston, Brysnt, and other authors of the first character, attempted to carry through this reformation, writing scepter, center, sepulcher. But this improvement was arrested, and a few words of this class retain their French orthography; such are metre, mitre, nitre, spectre, sceptre, theatre, sepulchre, and sometimes centre. It is remarkable that a nation distinguished for erudition should thus reject improvements, and retain anomalies, in opposition to all the convenience of uniformity. I am glad that so respectable a writer as Mitford has discarded this innovation, and uniformly written center, scepter, theater, sepulcher. In the present instance, want of uniformity is not the only evil. The present orthography has introduced an awkward mode of writing the derivatives, for example, centred, sceptred, sepulchred; whereas Milton and Pope wrote these words as regular derivations of center, scepter, sepulcher; thus, "sceptered king." So Coxe, in his Travels, "The principal wealth of the church is centered in the monasteries." This is correct.

7. Soon after the revival of letters in Europe, English writers began to borrow words from the French and Italian; and usually with some little alteration of the orthography. Thus they wrote authour, embassadour, predecessour, ancestour, successour; using our for the Latin termination or, and the French our, and writing similar words in like manner, though not of Latin or French original. What motive could induce them to write these words, and errour, honour, favour, inferiour, &c., in this manner, following neither the Latin nor the French, I can not conceive. But this orthography continued down to the seventeenth century, when the u began to be rejected from certain words of this class, and at the beginning of the last century, many of these words were written, ancestor, author, error, &c., as they are now written. But favour, honor, labor, candor, ordor, terror, vigor, inferior, superior, and a few others, were written with u, and Johnson introduced this orthography into his Dictionary. Nothing in language is more mischievous than the mistakes of a great man. It is not easy to understand why a man, whose professed object was to reduce the language to some regularity, should write author without u, and errour and honour with it! That he should write labour with u, and laborious without it! Vigour with u, and vigorous, inverigate, without it! Inferiour, superiour, with u, but inferiority and superiority without it! Strange as it is, this inconsistency runs through his work, and his authority has been the means of continuing it, among his admirers, to this day.

In this country, most of our best writers have rejected the u from all words of this class, and reduced the whole to uniformity. This is a desirable event; every rejection of an anomaly being a valuable improvement, which sound judgment approves, and the love of regularity will vindicate and maintain.

8. There is another class of words, the orthography of which is not uniform nor fully settled — such as take the termination able to form an adjective. Thus Johnson writes provable with e, but approvable and reprovable without it. So moveable, but immovable and removable; tameable, but blamable, censurable, desirable, excusable; saleable, but ratable.

With like inconsistency Walker and Chalmers write daub with u, and bedaub with w, deviating in this instance from Johnson. Chalmers writes abridgement and judgement with e, but acknowledgment without it. Walker writes these words without e, but adds it to lodgment. I have reduced all words of this kind, as far as possible, to uniformity.

9. Johnson writes octoedrical; Chalmers, octoedral; Sheridan, Walker, and Jones, follow Johnson; but Jones has octuhedron, which is not in the other Dictionaries. The Greek, in words of this kind, is inconsistent, for οκτω is changed, in compound words, to οκτα. I have followed the Greek compounds, and have inserted h, which I consider as almost indispensable in the English orthography; as, octahedron.

10. Johnson introduced instructor, in the place of instructor, in opposition to every authority which he has himself adduced to exemplify his definitions—Denham, Milton, Roscommon, Locke, Addison, Rogers, and the common version of the Scriptures. But what is more singular, this orthography, instructor, is contrary to his own practice; at least, in four editions of his Rambler which I have examined, the word is uniformly written instructor. The fact is the same with visitor.

This is a point of little importance in itself; but when instructor had been from time immemorial the established orthography, why unsettle the practice? I have in this word and in visitor adhered to the old orthography. There is not a particle of reason for altering instructor and visitor, which would not apply to collector, cultivator, objector, projector, and a hundred other words of similar termination.

11. Most of these and some other inconsistencies have been of long continuance. But there are others of more recent date, which admit of no apology, as they are changes from right to wrong. Such is the change of the correct orthography of defence, expense, offence, pretence, and recompense, by substituting c for s, as in defence. This change was probably made or encouraged by printers, for the sake of avoiding the use of the old long s; but since this has been discarded, that reason no longer exists. The orthography defence, &c., is justified, not only by the Latin originals, but by the rule of uniformity; for the derivatives are always written with s—defensive, extensive, offensive, pretension, recompensing.

12. No less improper was the change of sceptic into skeptick. In favor of this innovation, it is alleged that the word is from the Greek σκηπτικός. True; but is not scene derived from the Greek σκηνη, and scepter from σκηπτρον, and ascetic from ασκητικος, and ocean from οκεανος? Are not all these words in exact analogy with each other, in their original orthography? Were they not formerly analogous in the English orthography? Why violate this analogy? Why introduce an anomaly? Such innovations, by dividing opinions and introducing discrepancies in practice, in classes of words of like formation, have a mischievous effect, by keeping the language in perpetual fluctuation. But as usage inclines to the use of k in this class of words, I have adopted it.

13. In like manner, dispatch, which had from time immemorial been written with i, was changed into despatch, on the wonderful discovery that the word is derived from the French dépêcher. But why change one vowel and not the other? If we must follow the French, why not write despech, or depech? And why was this innovation limited to a single word? Why not carry the change through this whole class of words, and give us the benefit of uniformity? Is not disaster from the French desastre? Is not discharge from decharger? Is not disarm from desarmer? Is not disobey from desobeir? Is not disoblige from desobliger? Is not disorder from desordre? The prefix dis is more properly English than de, though both are used with propriety. But dispatch was the established orthography; why, then, disturb the practice? Why select a single word from the whole class, and introduce a change which creates uncertainty where none had existed for ages, without the smallest benefit to indemnify us for the perplexity and discordance occasioned by the innovation? Now, let it be observed that Johnson himself wrote dispatch; for this orthography occurs twice under Send in his Dictionary, and sicc times under Speed.

It is gratifying to observe the stern good sense of the English nation, presenting a firm resistance to such innovations. Blackstone, Paley, Coxe, Milner, Scott, and Mitford, uniformly use the old and genuine orthography of instructor, visitor, and dispatch.

14. The omission of one l in befall, install, installment, recall, inthrall, &c., is by no means to be vindicated; as by custom the two letters ll serve as a guide to the true pronunciation, that of broad a or aw. According to the established rules of English pronunciation, the letter a in instalment would have the sound it has in balance; it is, therefore, expedient to retain both letters in all words of this class.

15. It is an established rule, in the English language, that monosyllabic verbs ending in a single consonant, not preceded by a long vowel, and other verbs ending in a single accented consonant, and of course not preceded by a long vowel, double the final consonant, in all the derivatives, which are formed by a termination beginning with a vowel. Thus, fit, blot, bar, when they take the terminations ed, ch, ing, are written fitted, fitteth, fitting; blotted, blotteth, blotting; barred, barreth, barring. Abet, compel, form the like derivatives; abetted, abetteth, abetting; compelled, compelleth, compelling. The reason of this rule is, that without this duplication of the last consonant, the vowel of the primitive word would, in the derivative, be naturally pronounced wrong, that is, with its long sound; fited, bloting, barred, compelred. Hence we see the reason why verbs, having the long sound of a vowel, do not double the last consonant; as, fearred, repealed, repeated.

The converse of this rule is, that verbs ending in a single consonant, but having the accent on the first syllable, or on a syllable preceding the last, ought not to double the final consonant in the derivatives. Thus, limit, labor, charter, clatter, pardon, deliver, hinder, have for their derivatives limited, laboreth, chartered, clattered, pardoning, delivering, hindereth. But, strange as it may seem, the rule is wholly neglected and violated in numerous words of this class. Thus we observe, in all authors, beevelling, levelled, travelled, cancelled, revelling, revalling, worshipped, worshipper, apparelled, embovelled, libelling, and many others, in which the last consonant is doubled, in opposition to one of the oldest and best established rules in the language. Perry, in his Dictionary, lays down the rule for guidance, but has not been careful, in all cases, to observe it. I have endeavored to reduce these classes of words to a regular and uniform orthography. In like manner, nouns formed from such verbs are written with a single consonant, as jeweler, traveler, worshiper, for the purpose of establishing a general rule, to which there may be no exception. What should we say to a man who should write auditor, alterer, barterer, banterer, gardener, laborer? Yet no good reason can be assigned why the final consonant should not be doubled in these words as well as in jeweller, traveller, enameller. The truth is, the syllable to be added to the original word is the usual termination er or or, and nothing more.

Not less remarkable is the practice of doubling the last consonant in equalled, equalling, but not in the verb equalize. And to add to the inconsistency, the last consonant is sometimes doubled in tranquillize, a word in exact analogy with equalize. [The l, however, is properly doubled in crystallize and metallize, as if derived from κρυσταλλίζω and μεταλλίζω, in which the l is doubled; and for the sake of uniformity the double l is retained in the other derivatives of κρυσταλλίζω and μεταλλίζω. A few other words have the l doubled on the ground of their derivation; as, tranquillity, from tranquillitas; chancellor, from cancellarius, &c.]

A singular instance of inattention to analogy or uniformity, occurs in the formation of certain words from the Greek. Thus, in anatomy, bronchotomy, cacophony, euphony, lithotomy, and others, the final vowel of the Greek original is represented in English by y, which makes a syllable. But in epitome, catastrophe, hyperbole, and many others, the final vowel of the Greek is represented by e, which, in words of English origin, rarely or never makes a syllable at the end of a word. The consequence is, that the last two syllables are liable to be pronounced in one, tome, trophe, bole. Such a departure from analogy is very inconvenient. Besides, if the letter y closed the words in the singular number, the plural would be regularly formed by changing y into ies.

A like fault is observable in the spelling of certain derivatives ending in er. In barometer, hygrometer, thermometer, and all similar derivatives, the Greek μετρον gives meter, in English, while in English books the word is written metre, like the French word. The French are consistent, for they write the word in the same manner, both when single and in composition. Such discrepancies in the English language are little honorable to English philologists.

In the use of the prefixes en, em, in, im, there is not uniformity nor settled usage. The French changed the Latin in into en or em, and English authors have adopted one or the other, without regard to any settled rule. Johnson's Dictionary has done something toward reducing the number of discrepancies of this kind; but some changes have, since his time, been introduced. I have, in most words, followed his orthography; but, in a few instances, have adopted the more modern usage; as, indorse and insure, with their derivatives, according to prevailing mercantile practice.

In the use of the prefix un, many changes have taken place within the last century or two, and the use of in has been substituted for un; as, inaccessible, for unaccessible. The inquirer will observe that I have, under each word, noticed this change.

In the use of the termination ize, the English books are all at variance with each other; and no lexicographer is consistent with himself. Hence we every day see authorise and authorize, apostatise and apostatize, temporise and temporize. As this termination from the Greek or Latin has a definite signification, to make, I have adopted the rule to write it uniformly ize, when it is from either of those languages; as in legalize, to make legal. The French write the termination ise, and this has led to the English discrepancies.

In other cases, when the French ise does not proceed from the Latin ize, I have retained the original orthography of words from the French; as in enterprise, advise, surprise. This is a distinction of some importance.

In many cases, when a false orthography has been long established, I have noticed the fact, without making any alteration in the common spelling.

In a few words I have followed Milton, Dryden, Pope, and other authors of the Augustan age, who were more correct than more modern writers; as they followed the etymology, from which later writers have deviated, sometimes by mistake in taking the word from the French, instead of the Saxon.

In a few instances, I have discarded English innovations, which are evidently mere blunders. Such are comptroller and others, which convert the words into absolute nonsense. The words disannul, unloose, and others, fall under the like condemnation. No lexicographer, knowing the proper origin of these words, can be justified in giving support to such outrageous deviations from etymology. They are a reproach to the literature of the nation.

The negligence of the English in giving currency to such errors, hardly admits of an apology. Philology has indeed been neglected during a century and a half; it is not cultivated, to any extent, in the universities and schools; or it is studied in very superficial writers. Indeed, in etymology there is no accurate scholarship, either in English or French writers. No author, whose works have come under my observation, has explored the wide field of my researches; none has traced words to their primary source, and discovered the radical signification, with the manner in which derivative senses have been drawn from the radical signification, and moral ideas have been expressed by words denoting physical action or properties. The discoveries on this subject constitute an era in philology, and it is hoped that the advantage gained will be pursued.

If men of adult years do not choose to examine the subject of orthography, and correct their own practice, their children, learning the language as corrected, will become familiar with the true orthography, and familiarity and habit will lend support to truth and uniformity.

There are many words in the language containing superfluous letters, especially in the terminating syllable. Thus, one s in the syllables less and ness, at the end of words, is useless; one l in gill, rill, sill, dull, one f in cliff, bluff, are superfluous; but in such words no alteration is made.

The rule for adding two consonants of a sort should be, to add two letters to the original word, when they are both wanted in the derivatives. Thus fil would give the sound of fill; but this being a verb, the two letters are required in the past tense and participles, filled, filling. So in the adjective stiff, the second letter is wanted in stiffen, otherwise a person would be apt to pronounce the word sti-sen.

But in some words the terminating consonant is doubled, not only without necessity or use, but in opposition to propriety. Plaintiff is the French plaintif; pontiff is the French pontife; and no possible reason can be assigned for adding an f to the original word, any more than for adding the same letter to brief and relief. And what is worse, the letter is doubled in pantiff, the original, and then omitted in all the derivatives, pontificat, pontifical, &c. [In such words, however, the alteration has not been insisted on, as the public do not seem prepared to unite in rejecting the second f.]

In like manner, the vowel e is added to a multitude of words, in which it is not pronounced, and is worse than useless, as it often misleads the learner in the pronunciation. If the final e were omitted in juvenil, volatil, the pronunciation could not be mistaken; but as the preceding vowel is sometimes long and sometimes short in the terminating syllables ile, inc, ite, the final e serves only to perplex the learner. In such words, however, no alteration is made.

In the terminating syllable ice, the final e is worse than useless, as the i is always short, ix, and the addition of e contravenes the general rule, that the vowel followed by a consonant, and e final, is generally long, as in mate, mote, mute, dissipate. When I was young, the popular pronunciation of ice was tce, with the i long. The general use of my Spelling Book has nearly banished that pronunciation, and the orthography is not altered.

Our modern writers seem to delight in this useless addition of e final; as they annex it to words without reason or authority. This fault occurs frequently in words borrowed from foreign languages, in which the letter is not found in the original language. One would suppose that good taste alone ought to correct this error.

With regard to words which recent discoveries have introduced into the sciences, there may be some apology for differences of orthography, as writers have not established usage for a guide. Hence we find oxyd is written also oxide and oxyde; oxygen and hydrogen are written also oxigene, oxygene, and hydrogene. Sulphate, nitrate, &c., are written also sulphat, nitrat.

In this case, what course is the lexicographer to pursue? Shall he adopt the method by which Walker attempts to settle pronunciation, and cite authorities in favor of each mode of spelling? Then the result is, so many names appear on one side, and so many on the other. But who, it may be asked, will undertake to graduate the scale by which the weight of authorities is to be determined? Numbers will not always decide questions of this sort to the satisfaction of the public.

In this case I have determined to conform the orthography to established English analogies; the only authority from which there can be no legitimate appeal. Now, no rule in orthography is better established, than that which we have adopted from the Latin language, of representing the Greek upsilon by the letter y. In the orthography of oxygen and hydrogen, from ὄξυς and ῥόδω, this rule has been observed; and why should oxyd be an exception?

With regard to sulphate, nitrate, and other names of that class of compounds, I consider the final e as essential to the words, to prevent a false pronunciation; the vowel a having its first sound as in fate, though slightly pronounced.

The word usually written chemistry has undergone two or three changes, according to fancy or to conjectural etymology. Men have blundered about the plainest thing imaginable; for to determine its true orthography, nothing was necessary but to open an Arabic lexicon. The inhabitants of the south of Europe, who introduced the word, doubtless knew its origin, and wrote it correctly, chimistry, with i, not with y or e; and had the English been contented to take it as they found it, the orthography would have been correct and uniform. [This alteration has not, however, been insisted on, as men of science have not as yet seemed ready to adopt it.]

In introducing words from other languages, it is desirable that the orthography should be conformed, as nearly as may be, to established English analogies. For this reason, I have written manœurer, reconnoiter, as English words; and should prefer to pronounce oiddecamp, as an English word, with English pronunciation and a regular plural termination. So also rendezvous.

The word talc is ill-formed. The original word on the continent of Europe is talk or talq; and the change of k into c is not merely needless, but worse, for it precludes the use of the regular adjective, taley. Hence we see the adjective used is talcose, an awkward compound of a Teutonic word with a Latin termination. This word would more properly be written talk or talek, which admit regular derivatives, talky, talkiness. In like manner, zinc, if written zink, would admit the regular adjective, zinky, as written by Kirwan.

It is with no small regret that I see new terms formed, without a due regard to regular English analogies. New terms are often necessary, or at least very useful; but they ought to be coined according to the settled principles of the language. A neglect of these principles is observable in the word systematize, which, not being borrowed from the Greek, ought to follow the general rule of English formation, in agreement with legalize, modernize, civilize, animalize, and others, and be written systemize. This is the more important, as the derivatives systemizing, systemization, are of more easy utterance than those of systematize, and particularly the noun systematization.

On this head I would subjoin a remark or two on the mode of writing Indian names of rivers, mountains, and places in America, which we have adopted.

The French were the first Europeans who explored the country between the great lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, and, of course, the first to commit to writing the Indian names which occurred to them in their travels. In doing this, they attempted to express the sounds in letters, according to the French manner of pronunciation. Hence it happened that they wrote ch where we should have written sh, had we first reduced those names to writing. Thus we have Chenango, Michigan, and Michillimackinac,* in the French orthography. And as the French have no io in their language, they could not express the proper sound of the first syllable of Wabash, Wisconsin, Wachita, otherwise than by writing them Ouabache, Ouisconsin, Ouachita; and Missouri in French is Missouri. All this is very proper for Frenchmen, for the letters used express the true sounds of the words. But in English, the letters used lead to a false pronunciation, and for this reason should not be used in English compositions. It is to be deeply regretted that our language is thus doomed to be a heterogeneous medley of English and foreign languages; as the same letters representing different sounds, in different languages, serve to embarrass the reader who understands only his own.

The irregularities in the English orthography have always been a subject of deep regret, and several attempts have been made to banish them from the language. The first attempt of this kind was made by Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth; another was made by Dr. Gill, a celebrated master of St. Paul's School, in London; another by Charles Butler; several attempts were made in the reign of Charles I.; an attempt was made by Elphinstone, in the last century; and lastly, another effort was made by Dr. Franklin. The latter gentleman compiled a Dictionary on his scheme of reform, and procured types to be cast, which he offered to me, with a view to engage me to prosecute his design. This offer I declined to accept; for I was then, and am still convinced, that the scheme of introducing new characters into the language, is neither practicable nor expedient. Any attempt of this kind must certainly fail of success.

But that some scheme for expressing the distinct sounds of our letters by visible marks, ought to be adopted, is a point about which there ought to be, and I trust there can be, but one opinion. That such a scheme is practicable as well as expedient, I should presume to be equally evident. Such is the state of our written language, that our own citizens never become masters of orthography, without great difficulty and labor; and a great part of them never learn to spell words with correctness. In addition to this, the present orthography of some classes of words leads to a false pronunciation.

In regard to the acquisition of our language by foreigners, the evil of our irregular orthography is extensive, beyond what is generally known or conceived. While the French and Italians have had the wisdom and the policy to refine and improve their respective languages, and render them almost the common languages of all well-bred people in Europe, the English language, clothed in a barbarous orthography, is never learned by a foreigner but from necessity; and the most copious language in Europe, embodying an uncommon mass of science and erudition, is thus very limited in its usefulness. And to complete the mischief, the progress of arts, science, and Christianity among the heathen, and other rude or unevangelized nations, is most sensibly retarded by the difficulties of mastering an irregular orthography.

The mode of ascertaining the proper pronunciation of words by marks, points, and trifling alterations of the present characters, seems to be the only one which can be reduced to practice. This mode, resembling the use of points in the Hebrew, has been adopted by some of the nations on the Continent; and I have pursued it, to a certain extent, in designating distinctions in the sounds of letters, in this work. The scheme I have invented is not considered as perfect; but it will accomplish some important purposes, by removing the most numerous classes of anomalies. With this scheme, the visible characters of the language will present to the eye of a reader the true sounds of words; and the scheme itself is so simple, that it may be learned in a few moments. To complete a scheme of this kind, a few other alterations would be necessary, but such as would not materially change the orthography, or occasion the least difficulty to the learner or reader.

After these alterations, there would remain a few words whose anomalies may be considered as incorrigible, such as know, graw, rough, &c., which may be collected into tables and easily learned; and all the other irregularities may be so classed under general rules, as to be learned with very little labor.

The adoption of this or any other scheme for removing the obstacles which the English orthography presents to learners of the language, must depend on public opinion. The plan I have adopted for representing the sounds of letters by marks and points, in this work, is intended to answer two purposes. First, to supersede the necessity of writing and printing the words a second time, in an orthography adapted to express their pronunciation. The latter method pursued by the English orthoepists, as applicable to most words, is, I think, not only unnecessary, but very inexpedient. The second purpose is, to exhibit to my fellow-citizens the outline of a scheme for removing the difficulties of our irregular orthography, without the use of new characters; a scheme simple, easy of acquisition, and sufficient to answer all the more important purposes of a regular orthography.†

NOTE.—In the formation of the plural number of nouns ending in ance, ancy; ence, ency; the general rules are to be observed. When the letter e terminates the word, the letter s only is to be added; as in compliance, compliances; but if the letter y terminates the word, this letter is omitted, and ies are added; as in discrepancy, discrepancies; dependency, dependencies. In some cases, the same word is sometimes written with e, and sometimes with y; in which cases the word admits of either form of the plural termination.

PRONUNCIATION.

As our language has been derived from various sources, and little or no systematic effort has been made to reduce the orthography to any regularity, the pronunciation of the language is subject to numerous anomalies. Each of our vowels has several different sounds; and some of the consonants represent very different articulations of the organs. That part of the language which we have received from the Latin, is easily subjected to

* This word is, I believe, customarily pronounced Mackinac, and the original may well be suffered to fall into disuse.

† We hear it said that a lexicographer should adopt or follow the common orthography of words. This is true when the orthography accords with etymology, and is settled or undisputed. But in the English language there are many words whose spelling is not settled; some whose spelling is a deviation from established analogies; some whose spelling presents wrong component syllables or radical letters. In other words, whose origin is known, authors differ in the manner of writing them. Take the following examples.

In Johnson's Dictionary we find blamable, blamably, appeasable, approvable, desirable, ratable, without the final e of the original words; but saleable, lanoable, with e; proceivable, with e; improvable, reprovable, without it; moveable, with e, but immovable, removable, without it. Daniel H. Barnes, in the Red Book, remarks, that in this class of words, Johnson's contradictions (discrepancies), are ten on one side, and nine on the other. We every day see the like discrepancies in books and the public prints.

Johnson has cognisee, cognisour, recognise, recognisee, recognisor, with s, (but cognizable and cognissance, with z), and the terminating syllable sour and sor. Walker has authorize, authorization; but disauthorize. Johnson and Walker have centerize, centerization; but optomize; canonize, familiarize, fertilize, with z, but Johnson, modernize, Walker, modernize; Johnson, syllogize; but Walker, syllogize; both have extemporeize, temporize; but contemporize, equalize; Walker has amortize, but amortization, amortizement. Similar discrepancies are seen in all our books and papers.

We every day see surprise and surprize; merchandize and merchandise; enquire and inquire; entrust and intrust; ensure, assurances, and insure; insurace; endorse, endorsement, and indorse, indorsement; gulf and gulph; partizan and partizah; connection and connexion; chemist and chymist, both wrong; hedge, pledge, but allege, and many others. What then, and where, is the common orthography?

In our language, the unqualified rule of following the common orthography can not have place, for in respect to many words there is no such thing. It is, therefore, wrong in principle, for it would sanction mistakes and tend to perpetuate them; it would preclude correctness and regularity. Such a rule would have been as just in the age of Chaucer as it is now, and had it been observed, what would have been the present state of English orthography?

Many of the anomalies in our language have originated in carelessness, or in mistakes, respecting the origin of words. Philology, for a long series of years, has been most shamefully neglected.

In this condition of our language, I hold it to be the duty of a lexicographer to ascertain, as far as it is practicable, the genuine orthography of words, and introduce that which is correct; particularly when the true orthography serves to illustrate their signification. When this is known, men will be satisfied with it, and fluctuations of spelling will cease. With a full conviction of the value of truth and correctness in language, as in every other department of literature, I have diligently sought for truth, and made it the guide of my decisions. I can not consent to give countenance to errors, which obscure the origin or pervert the signification of words, and be an instrument of corrupting the purity and disfiguring the beauty of the language. A due regard to the purity of the language, to the convenience of learners, whether citizens or foreigners, and to the usefulness of a language which is to be the most extensive on the globe, and the chief instrument of civilizing and christianizing nations, seems to demand, and surely justifies, the labor of correcting the more enormous anomalies which deform it. One would suppose that these considerations, concurring with the honor of our nation, would induce the lovers of literature to make some concessions of private opinions for the accomplishment of these desirable objects.

a few general rules of pronunciation. The same is the fact with most of the derivatives from the Greek. Many words of French origin retain their French orthography, which leads to a very erroneous pronunciation in English; and a large portion of our monosyllabic words of Saxon origin are extremely irregular both in orthography and pronunciation.

If we can judge, with tolerable certainty, from the versification of Chaucer, the pronunciation of words must have been, in many respects, different in his age from that of the present day; particularly in making a distinct syllable of e final, and of the termination ed. But no effort was probably ever made to settle the pronunciation of words till the last century. In England, which was settled by various nations, there are numerous dialects or diversities of language still retained by the great mass of the population.

The first settlers of New England were almost all of English origin, and, coming from different parts of England, they brought with them some diversities of language. But in the infancy of the settlements, the people lived in towns adjacent or near to each other, for mutual aid and protection from the natives; and the male inhabitants of the first generation frequently assembled for the purpose of worship or for government. By the influence of these and other causes, particularly by that of common schools, the differences of language among our citizens have been gradually lost; so that in this part of the United States, there can hardly be said to exist a difference of dialect.

It is to be remarked, further, that the first ministers of the gospel, who migrated to this country, had been educated at the English universities, and brought with them all the learning usually acquired in those institutions, and the English language as it was then spoken. The influence of these men, who were greatly venerated, probably had no small effect in extinguishing differences of speech.

Hence it has happened that the traditional pronunciation of the language of well-educated people has been nearly the same, in both countries, to this day. Among the common people, whose pronunciation in all countries is more or less corrupt, the diversities in this country are far less numerous than in England.

About sixty or seventy years ago, Thomas Sheridan, an Irish gentleman, who had been the pupil of an intimate friend of Dean Swift, attempted to reduce the pronunciation of English words to some system, and to introduce it into popular use. His analysis of the English vowels is very critical, and in this respect, there has been little improvement by later writers, though I think none of them are perfectly correct. But in the application of his principles, he failed of his object. Either he was not well acquainted with the best English pronunciation, or he had a disposition to introduce into use some peculiarities which the English did not relish. The principal objection made to his scheme is, that he gives to s the sound of sh, in sudorific, superb, and other words where s is followed by u long. These he pronounces shoodorific, shooperb, shooperfluity, &c. This pronunciation of s, corresponding to the Shemitic ש , he probably learnt in Ireland, for in the Irish branch of the Celtic, s has often the sound of sh. Thus sean, old, is pronounced shean. This pronunciation was no sooner published, than condemned and rejected by the English.

Another most extraordinary innovation of Sheridan was, his rejection of the Italian sound of a, as in further, calm, ask, from every word in the language. Thus his notation gives to a in bar the same sound as in barren, barrel, bat; to a in further, pass, mass, pant, the same sound as in fat, passion, massacre, pun, fancy. Such a gross deviation from established English usage was of course condemned and rejected.

In his pronunciation of ti and ei, before a vowel, as in partiality, omniscience, Sheridan is more correct than Walker, as he is in some other words; such, for example, as bench, tench, book, took, and others of the same classes.

Sheridan also contributed very much to propagate the change of tu into chu, or tshu; as in natshur, cultshur, virtshue. This innovation was vindicated on the supposed fact, that the letter u has the sound of yu; and natyur, cultyur, virtuye, in a rapid enunciation, become natshur, &c. And to this day, this error respecting the sound of u is received in England as truth. But the fact is otherwise, and if not, it does not justify the practice; for in usage, u is short in nature, culture; so that on the principles of Sheridan himself, this letter can have no effect on the preceding articulation.

This innovation, however, has prevailed to a considerable extent, although Sheridan subjected the change of tu to no rules. He is consistent in applying this change equally to tu, whether the accent follows the t or not. If tu is to be changed to tshu, in future and perpetual, it ought to undergo the same change in future and perpetuity; and Sheridan, in pronouncing tutor, tutelage, tumult, as if written tshootor, tshootelage, tshootult, is certainly consistent, though wrong in fact. In other words, however, Sheridan is inconsistent with himself; for he pronounces multitshood, rectitshood, scrutshood, while habitude, beatitude, cortitude, decrepitude, gratitude, &c., retain the proper sound of t.

Walker's rule for changing tu to chu only when the accent precedes, is entirely arbitrary, and evidently made by him to suit his own practice. It has, however, the good effect of reducing the chus, and removing 'the outrageous anomalies of tshootor, tshootult, &c.

There are many other words which Sheridan has marked for a pronunciation, which is not according to good usage, and which the later orthoepists have corrected. In general, however, it may be asserted that his notation does not warrant a tenth part as many deviations from the present respectable usage in England, as Walker's; yet as his Dictionary was republished in this country, it had no small effect in corrupting the pronunciation of some classes of words, and the effects of its influence are not yet extinct. What the precise effect of Sheridan's scheme of pronunciation was in England, I am not able to determine. But I have had information from the late venerable Dr. Johnson, of Stratford, and from the late Dr. Hubbard, of New Haven, who were in England between the year 1765 and the revolution, that about that period, the change of t into chu had not taken place, to any extent. It began to prevail on the stage and among the younger barristers and members of parliament before Dr. Johnson left England, just before the war with America; and Sheridan's Dictionary, published soon after, undoubtedly contributed to extend the innovation. This change presents a new obstacle to the acquisition of a language, whose anomalies were before frightfully formidable and perplexing. The favorers of innovation seem not to reflect on the immense convenience of a correct notation of sounds in a language, by its proper characters; the utility of uniformity and permanence in that notation; and the extensive evil of destroying or impairing the use of alphabetical writing. The man who perverts or changes the established sound of a single letter, especially of a consonant, does an injury to that language, and to the community using it, which fifty men of the same talents can never repair.

In a few years after the publication of Sheridan's Dictionary, appeared Walker's, the author of which introduces the work to the public with the following remarks on the labors of his predecessors.

"Among those writers who deserve the first praise on this subject, is Mr. Elphinstone, who, in his Principles of the English Language, has reduced the chaos to a system, and laid the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation. But this gentleman, by treating his subject with an affected obscurity, and by absurdly endeavoring to alter the whole orthography of the language, has unfortunately lost his credit with the public, for the part of his labors which entitles him to the highest praise."

"After him, Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement, by his Rhetorical Dictionary; but he has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation; those very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be consulted." Let it be noted, that the same objection lies in full force against Sheridan, Walker, and Jones.

"To him succeeded Mr. Sheridan, who not only divided the words into syllables, and placed figures over the vowels, as Dr. Kenrick had done, but by spelling these syllables as they are pronounced, seemed to complete the idea of a Pronouncing Dictionary, and to leave but little expectation of improvement. It must be confessed that his Dictionary is generally superior to every thing that preceded it, and his method of conveying the sound of words by spelling them as they are pronounced, is highly rational and useful. But here sincerity obliges me to stop. The numerous instances I have given of impropriety, inconsistency, and want of acquaintance with the analogies of the language, sufficiently show how imperfect I think his Dictionary is, upon the whole, and what ample room was left for attempting another, that might better answer the purpose of a guide to pronunciation."

"The last writer on this subject is Mr. Nares, who, in his Elements of Orthoepy, has shown a clearness of method, and an extent of observation, which deserve the highest encomiums.

But he seems, on many occasions,* to have mistaken the best usage, and to have paid too little attention to the first principles of pronunciation."

Soon after the publication of Walker's Dictionary, appeared the Dictionary of Stephen Jones, who undertakes to correct the errors of Sheridan and Walker. This author objects to Sheridan, that he has not introduced the Italian sound of a, [as in father,] in a single instance, and that Walker has been too sparing in the use of it. He objects that Sheridan has not, by any peculiar marks, pointed out the sound of oi or oy, as in noise and clay; and that Walker has given distinct marks of pronunciation to the diphthong ou, which are terrific to the learner, and not well calculated to express the exact sound. He considers it as no trivial error in Walker's system, that he uses the long e in place of the short y, which gives to asperity, for example, the ludicrous sound of aspereteet. He notices also, as a fault in Walker's scheme, that he makes no difference in the sound of oo in tool, tooth, and in look, took.

In all these particulars, except that of oi and oy, I think every man who understands genuine English, will accord with Jones. From careful observation, while in England, I know that Jones's notation is far more correct than that of Sheridan or Walker; and, except in two or three classes of words, his pronunciation is exactly that which I uniformly heard in England, and nearly the same as that of well-educated gentlemen in New England.

A few years after the appearance of Jones's Dictionary, William Perry published a Pronouncing Dictionary, in which an attempt is made to indicate the sounds of the letters by certain arbitrary marks. In this work, the author has rejected most of the peculiarities of Sheridan, Walker, and Jones, and given the language nearly as it was spoken, before those authors undertook to regulate the pronunciation. This author's manner of designating the sounds of the letters is too complex for convenience, but his pronunciation is nearer to the actual usage in England, than that of either of his predecessors before mentioned. His orthography also is more correct, according to present usage, than that of his predecessors.

During the year 1823, appeared the Dictionary of R. S. Jameson, of Lincoln's Inn, intended to combine the merits of the most popular Dictionaries, and to correct the false pronunciation of Walker, whose notation in some classes of words he entirely rejects. He condemns, as a slovenly enunciation, the sound given to d, which, before i and u, Walker directs, in certain words, to be pronounced like j. He rejects also his notation of th, or tsh, in congratulation, flatulent, natural, and all similar words. He rejects also the affected pronunciation of Sheridan and Walker, in such words as guide and kind. Most of the other errors of Walker he copies, as he does his antiquated orthography.

The English orthoepists have analyzed, and in general have well defined or described, the sounds and appropriate uses of the letters of the alphabet. Sheridan's analysis, which appeared a few years before Walker's, is, for the most part, correct; but, in describing the sounds of what may be called the diphthongal vowel i, I think he has erred, in making it to consist of the broad a or aw and e. He admits, indeed, that the voice does not rest on the sound aw, but he contends that the month is opened to the same degree of aperture, and is in the same position, as if it were going to sound aw; but before the voice can get a passage to the lips, the under jaw is drawn up to the position for sounding e. On this it is justly remarked by Walker, that aw and e are precisely the component elements of the diphthong oi and oy. If the aw is pronounced, I would add, then i and oy must be pronounced exactly alike; and if aw is not pronounced, then it is not a component part of the diphthongal vowel i.

Walker contends that this diphthong i is composed of the sound of the Italian a, as in father, and the sound of e. If so, he must have given to a a very different sound from that which we are accustomed to give it. But this is a mistake; that sound of a is no more heard in i, than the sound of aw. The sound of i in fight, mind, tiac, idle, is not faueght, maevend, taevem, avcedle; nor is it faeght, maend, taem, aedle. Let any man utter the aw or the Italian a before the e, and he will instantly perceive the error, and reject both definitions, as leading to a false pronunciation. The truth is, the month, in uttering i, is not opened so wide as in uttering aw or a; the initial sound is not that of aw or a; nor is it possible, by any characters we possess, to express the true sound on paper. The initial sound is not formed so deep in the throat as aw or a; the position of the organs is nearly, yet not exactly the same. The true sound can be learned only by the ear.

Equally inaccurate is the definition of the first sound of u, or long u, which these writers allege to consist of the sounds of e and oo, or you. It has this sound, indeed, in certain words, as in unite, union, and others; but this is a departure from the proper sound of this character, as heard in cube, abuse, durable, human, jury. These words are not pronounced keoob, abeoose, deoorable, heooman, jeoory. The effort to introduce this affected pronunciation is of most mischievous tendency. The sound of e is not heard in the proper enunciation of the English u, and for that reason it should not be so stated on paper, nor named yu; as the error naturally leads to a corrupt pronunciation. Dr. Kenrick remarks, that we might as well prefix y to the other vowels, as to u, and pronounce them ya, ye, yi, yo.

But this is not the whole evil; this analysis of u has led orthoepists to give to our first or long u two distinct sounds, or rather to make a diphthong and a vowel of this single letter. Thus they make it a diphthong in almost all situations, except after r, where they make it a vowel equivalent to oo, or the French ou. They represent u as being equivalent to eo, that is, e and oo, in cube, tube, duty, confusion, endure, pronounced keobe, teobe, deety, confecision, endeore; but in brute, fruit, rude, intrude, ruby, they make u equivalent to oo; thus, broote, froot, roode, introode, rooby.

I know not where this affectation originated; it first appeared in Sheridan's Dictionary, but it is a most unfounded distinction, and a most mischievous error. No such distinction was known to Dr. Johnson; he gives the long u but one sound, as in confusion; and no such distinction is observed among good speakers generally, either in this country or in England. I was particularly attentive to the public speakers in England, in regard to this point, and was happy to find that very few of them made the distinction here mentioned. In that country, as in this, the long u has a uniform sound after all the consonants.

The source of the error in this, as in another case to be mentioned hereafter, may be an inattention to the manner in which the articulations affect the vowels which follow them. To understand this, it will be necessary or useful to examine the anatomical formation of articulate sounds.

"An articulate sound," says Lowth, "is the sound of the human voice, formed by the organs of speech. A vowel is a simple articulate sound."

These definitions seem not to be sufficiently accurate. Articulation, in human speech, is the jointing, juncture, or closing of the organs, which precedes and follows the vowels or open sounds, and which partially or totally intercepts the voice. A vowel or vocal sound is formed simply by opening the mouth. Thus, in sounding a or o, the mouth is opened in a particular manner, but without any articulation or closing of the organs. In strictness, therefore, a simple vowel is not an articulate sound, as Lowth supposes; and it is certain that many irrational animals, without the power of articulation, do utter vowel sounds with great distinctness.

An articulate sound, then, is, properly, a sound preceded or followed, or both, by an articulation or junction of the organs. Thus ba, ab, and bad, are articulate sounds; the vowel being begun or closed, with a junction of the lips, interrupting the voice, in ba and ab; and in bad, the vocal sound being preceded by one articulation and followed by another. The power of articulation constitutes the great difference between men and brutes; the latter, being unable to articulate, can utter only vocal sounds. The imperfect articulations of the parrot and some other animals, form no exception that deserves notice.

I give the name articulation to the act of joining the organs, and to the character or letter which represents the junction. In the latter sense, the word is equivalent to consonant; and articulation may be considered the preferable term, as it expresses the fact of closing the organs.

Human speech, then, consists of vocal sounds separated and modified by articulations of the organs. We open the mouth in a particular manner, to utter a vowel; we then close the organs, interrupt that sound, and open the organs to utter a second vowel; and continue this opening and closing, to the end of the word. This process is carried on with surprising rapidity.

Now, in passing from an articulation, or close position, to an open position for uttering a vowel, it happens often that a very slight sound of e is uttered so as to be perceptible to the ear, either before or after the utterance of the proper vowel. This is remarkably the case with the long vowels preceding r; for such is the nature of that letter, that bare, mire, more, parent, apparent, &c., can not well be pronounced without a slight sound of e between the long vowel and the consonant. Thus the words above named are pronounced nearly büer, mier, moer, päerent, appäerent; and bore, mire, approach toward two syllables drawn very closely together.

* In many instances, I suppose the writer means.

A like case, though less obvious, occurs in uttering u, particularly after the labial and palatal articulations. In passing from the articulations eb, eg, em, ep, or pe, to the sound of u, as in mute and pure, we are apt, insensibly, to utter a slight sound of e; and this utterance, which proceeds from the particular situation of the organs, has been mistaken for the first component sound of the long or open u. The same cause has given rise to the pronunciation of e before the vowel in such words as guide, guard, kind, guise. This is precisely similar to the vulgar pronunciation of cove, given, county, town, &c., that is, keove, geoven, keounty, teown—a pronunciation formerly common in New England, and not yet wholly extinct. This vicious pronunciation, in all words of this kind, whether countenanced by men of low life or of fashionable life, ought to be carefully avoided; as the slender sound of e, in such cases, gives a feebleness to the words utterly inconsistent with that full, open, and manly enunciation which is essential to eloquence.

The genuine sound of u long, detached from the influence of consonants, is the same in all the words above specified; and the reason why it has been made a distinct vowel after r, as in rude, [rood,] is, that the organs are open before the sound commences; whereas, when it follows most of our consonants, the sound is commenced immediately after an articulation, or close position of the organs, as in mutable and infusion. For this reason, u has more distinctly its long or open sound after labials and palatals, than after r; but this accidental circumstance should not be the ground of radical distinctions, equivalent to the sounds of different letters.

There is, in Walker's analysis of the alphabet, an error peculiar to himself. This is, in making a distinction between the short i when it is followed by a consonant, and when it is not; as in ability. In this case, he calls the first i, in abil, short; but the second he calls open, and equivalent to e in equal. (See Principles 107, 544.) He also makes the unaccented y, at the end of a syllable, precisely like the first sound of e in me, meter. Ability, then, written according to his principles, would be abiletee. Never was a grosser mistake. The sound of i and y in unaccented syllables, whether followed by an articulation or not, is always the short sound of e long, that is, e shortened; the same sound in quality or kind, but not in quantity. To prove this fact, nothing is necessary but an attention to the manner in which the words little and tiny are pronounced, when they are made emphatical by utterance. They are then pronounced leelle, teeny; and this we hear every day, not only among children, but often among adults. In this change of pronunciation, there is nothing more than a prolongation of the sound of i, which, in the syllables lit, tin, is short, in leelle, teeny, is long.

In consequence of this mistake, Walker has uniformly made a different notation of i when accented, and followed by a consonant in the same syllable, and when it stands alone in the syllable and unaccented. Thus to the first i in ability he assigns a different sound from that of the second; and in article, he gives to i the sound of e long, arteecle; but in articulor, articulate, he gives it the short sound, tik. It is in consequence of this mistake, that he has throughout his Dictionary assigned to i and y unaccented, and to y unaccented terminating words, the sound of e long; an error, which, it is ascertained by actual enumeration, extends to more than eleven thousand vowels or syllables; an error, which, if carried to the full extent of his principles, would subvert all the rules of English versification. Jones and Perry have corrected this error in their notations, throughout the language.

If it should be said that Walker did not intend to direct y, in this case, to be pronounced as e long, but that his notation is intended only to mark the quality of the sound, it may be replied, be either intended the sound to be that of e long, according to his express direction, or he did not. If he did, his notation is not according to any good practice, either in England or the United States; and by changing a short vowel into a long one, his notation would subvert the rules of metrical composition. If he did not, his notation is adapted to mislead the learner, and it does mislead learners, wherever his book is strictly followed. In truth, this notation is generally condemned in England, and universally rejected in practice.*

In the notation of sounds, there is a mistake and inconsistency in most orthoepists, which deserves notice, not on account of its practical importance so much, as to expose an error in syllabication or the division of words into syllables, which has been maintained by all writers in Great Britain, from time immemorial. The rule is, that "a single consonant between two vowels, must be joined to the latter syllable." According to this rule, habit, baron, tenet, are to be divided thus, ha-bit, ba-ron, te-net.

This rule is wholly arbitrary, and has for ages retarded and rendered difficult the acquisition of the language by children. How is it possible that men of discernment should support a rule, that in thousands of words makes it necessary to break a syllable, detaching one of the letters essential to it, and giving it a place in the next? In the words above mentioned, hab, bar, ten, are distinct syllables, which can not be divided without violence. In many words, as in these, this syllable is the radix of the word; the other syllable being formative or adventitious. But where this is not the case, convenience requires that syllables should, if possible, be kept entire; and in all cases, the division of syllables should, as far as possible, be such as to lead the learner to a just pronunciation.

As in our language the long and short vowels are not distinguished by differences of character, when we see a single consonant between vowels, we can not determine, from the preceding vowel character, whether the sound is long or short. A stranger to the language knows not whether to pronounce habit, ha-bit or hab-it, till he is instructed in the customary pronunciation. It was probably to avoid this inconvenience, that our ancestors wrote two consonants instead of one in a great number of words, as in banner, dinner. In this respect, however, there is no uniformity in English; as we have generally retained the orthography of the languages from which we have received the words, as in tutor, rigor, silent, and the like.

Now, it should be observed that although we often see the consonant doubled, as in banner, yet no more than one articulation, in these cases, is ever used in speaking. We close the organs but once between the first and second syllable, nor is it possible to use both the letters n, without pronouncing ban, then intermitting the voice entirely, opening the organs and closing them a second time. Hence, in all cases, when the same consonant is written twice between vowels, as in banner, dinner, better, one of them only is represented by an articulation of the organs; the other is useless, except that it prevents any mistake as to the sound of the preceding vowel.

In the notation of most orthoepists, there is inconsistency, at least, if not error. If they intend to express the true pronunciation by using the precise letters necessary for the purpose, they all err. For instance, they write bar/run for bar/en, when one articulation only is, or possibly can be, used; so also ballance, biggot, biggamy, melon, mettaphor, melloody. This is not only useless, for the use of the accent after the consonant, as bar/en, ballance, big'ot, mel'on, &c., completely answers the purpose of determining the pronunciation, but it is contradictory to their own practice in a vast number of cases. Thus they write one consonant only in civil, civic, riot; and Walker writes kollonade, doubling l, but kolony, kolonise, with a single l. This want of system is observable in all the books which are offered to the public as standards of orthoepy.

A still greater fault, because it may lead to innumerable practical errors, consists in the notation of unaccented syllables. In this particular, there is error and discrepancy in the schemes of the orthoepists, which shows the utter impossibility of carrying them into effect. The final y unaccented Walker makes to be e long, as I have before observed; while Sheridan, Jones, and Perry, make it equivalent to short i, or, at least, give it a short sound, according to universal practice. Walker pronounces the last vowel in natural and national, as a short; Sheridan, as e short, naturl; Jones, as u short, naturul. Sheridan's notation

* From the fact, which Walker relates of himself, (Prin. 247) that he made a distinction between the sound of ee in see and in meet, until he had consulted good speakers, and particularly Mr. Garrick, who could find no difference in the sound, it might be inferred that his ear was not very accurate. But his mistake evidently arose from not attending to the effect of the articulation in the latter word, which stops the sound suddenly, but does not vary it. It is the same mistake which he made in the sound of i in the second syllable of ability, which he calls short, while the sound of the second i and of y is that of long e. The celebrity of Walker as a teacher of elocution, and his Key to the Pronunciation of Ancient Names, which, with a few exceptions, is a good standard work, have led many persons to put more confidence in his English Orthoepy, than a close examination of its principles will support.

may be a mistake, for he gives to al in national, the sound of ul. In the adjective deliberate, Walker and Jones give a in the last syllable its proper long sound; and Sheridan, the sound of e short, deliberet. Dignitary is pronounced by Sheridan dignitery, and Walker and Jones give to a its short sound, as in at. The terminating syllable ness is pronounced by Walker and Jones nes, by Sheridan nis; ss, blessedness, blessednis. The same difference exists in their notation of less; Sheridan pronouncing it lis, as in blamelis, and Walker and Jones giving e its proper sound. These differences, and many others, run through their works, and appear in a large portion of all the words in the language.

Now, it is probable that all these gentlemen pronounced these words alike, or so nearly alike, that no difference would be noticed by a bystander. The mischief of these notations is, that attempts are made to express minute distinctions or shades of sounds, so to speak, which can not be represented to the eye by characters. A great part of the notations must, necessarily, be inaccurate, and for this reason, the notation of the vowels in unaccented syllables should not be attempted. From a careful attention to this subject, I am persuaded that all such notations are useless, and many of them mischievous, as they lead to a wrong pronunciation. In no case can the true pronunciation of words in a language be accurately and completely expressed on paper; it can be caught only by the ear, and by practice. No attempt has ever been made to mark the pronunciation of all the sounds, in any other language: and in our language it is worse than useless.

As Walker's pronunciation has been represented to the people of this country as the standard, I shall confine my remarks chiefly to his work, with a view to ascertain its merits, and correct any erroneous impressions which have been received from such representations.

1. The first class of words which I shall mention, is that in which a has what is called its Italian sound, as we pronounce it in father, psalm, calm. From a hasty enumeration of words of this class, I find there are two or three hundred in number, in which Walker gives to a its short sound, as in fat, bat, fancy, when, in fact, the most respectable usage in England, as well as in the United States, gives that letter its Italian sound. This error Jones and Perry have corrected. To be correct in this class of words, we have only to retain the customary pronunciation of the Northern States.

2. The notation of the sound of oo by Walker is wrong in most or all the words in which oo are followed by k, and in some others. Notwithstanding the distinction between the long and short sound of oo is clear, and well established in a great number of words, yet he assigns the short sound to eight words only, viz. wool, wood, good, hood, foot, stood, understood, and withstood. (Prin. 307.) It seems inconceivable that a man, bred or resident in London, should assign to oo in book, cook, took, and other like words, the same sound as in cool, boom, boot, food. Jones and Perry have corrected this notation, and given the pronunciation according to good usage, and just according to our customary pronunciation. While in England, I did not hear a single word of this class pronounced according to Walker's notation.

3. To the letters ch in bench, bunch, clinch, drench, inch, tench, scrench, and many other words, Walker gives the French sound, that is, the sound of sh, instead of ch; as, bensch, insh, &c. It would seem by this and other examples of wrong notation, that the author had been accustomed to some local peculiarities, either in London, where all kinds of dialects are heard, or in some other place. In this instance, he gives to these words a pronunciation different from that of other orthoepists, and one which I have never heard, either in England or in this country. His notation is palpably wrong, as our customary pronunciation is universally correct.

4. It has been already remarked, that Walker's notation of the sound of i and y short, in unaccented syllables, which he directs to be pronounced like e long, in me, mete, is contrary to all good usage, and is rejected by every other orthoepist, except Jameson. Walker admits i to be short, when followed by a consonant in the same syllable. Thus the first i in ability is short, but the second i and the y are long e, abilectee. Now, observe the consequence. In the plural, abilities, according to his rule, must be pronounced abilectees; but the word is never thus pronounced; universally it is pronounced abilitiz; the last vowel sound is, in practice, immediately followed by a consonant, and by his own rule, must be short. Then the result is, y in ability is long e, but ie in the plural, is short i. And for this change of sound, no provision is made in Walker's scheme, nor in any other that I have ever seen.

5. In the analysis of the sounds of our letters, Walker alleges the diphthong ou, ow, to consist of the broad a or aw, and the Italian sound of u. According to his scheme, about, abound, round, now, vow, are to be pronounced abarut, abairund, rawund, nawn, vauc. But who ever heard this pronunciation? The fact is not so; the broad sound of a is not the initial sound of this diphthong; it is not commenced as deep in the throat, or with the same aperture, as aw; it is a sound that can be learned only by the ear. The pronunciation of this diphthong is uniform in both countries.

6. In noting the sound of the unaccented vowels, and those which have the secondary accent, there are mistakes without number, in all the schemes which I have seen, and one continued series of differences between the orthoepists. The following is a specimen.

I take no notice of the different letters by which these writers express the same sound, one using e where another uses y, but of the different sounds which they give to the vowels in the second, third, or last syllable. Now, I appeal to any person who has a tolerably correct ear, whether it is the sound of a that is uttered by good speakers, or any speakers, in deliverance and dignitary. Is it the sound of a that we hear in the last syllable of penance, penetrant, and assemblage? Do we hear, in the last syllable of profligate, the short a, as in fat? So far from it, that a public speaker, who should utter the sound of a so that it should be distinctly recognized in any polite audience, would expose himself to ridicule. The sound of the last vowel approaches to that of e or u, and the notation of Sheridan is nearest the truth. But any notation is worse than useless; for without it, there would be no difference in customary pronunciation.

To show the utter impracticability of expressing the unaccented vowels, in all cases, with precision, let the reader observe Walker's notation of a in the word moderate, and its derivatives. In the adjective and verb, the a is long, as in fat; in moderately and moderateness it is short, as in fat. This is certainly incorrect notation; no good speaker ever pronounces these words moderately, moderatness. In addition to this, the a in the verb to moderate, is more distinctly pronounced than it is in the adjective, in which it has rather the sound of e short, moderet; at least the sound is more nearly that of e than of a. And this distinction of sound, between letters in the same word, when an adjective, and when a verb, occurs in a multitude of cases—a distinction for which no provision is made in any system of orthoepy that I have seen, and one which must be left to the cognizance of the ear alone.

There is another class of vowel sounds that comprises too many inaccuracies to be overlooked. This is the class in which the first syllable has an unaccented e, as in debate. In all words of this kind, Walker directs the letter e to have its long sound, as in me, mete. Then, become, bedeck, begin, debate, debar, declare, elect, legitimate, mechanic, medicinal, memorial, necessity, peculiar, petition, rebuke, recant, relate, secure, select, velocity, &c., are to be pronounced become, bedeck, beggin, debate, debar, declare, elect, leegitimate, mecchanic, incedicinal, meemorial, necessity, peculiar, pctition, recbuke, reccant, reelate, seccure, select, veelocity, &c.

According to this notation, the first vowel e in evil, even, and in event, is to have the same sound, being all marked with the same figure. Now, let me ask, where a speaker can be found who pronounces these words in this manner. Who ever heard of such a pronunciation? This notation is erroneous and mischievous, as it is inconsistent with the regular accent, which carries the stress of voice forward to the next syllable, and must, necessarily, leave the first vowel with the feeble sound of short i or y. This short sound, and not the long one, as in even, is that which we always hear in such words.

The like error occurs in Walker's notation of i in direct, diminish, and many other words. Walker himself, under despatch, calls the sound of e the short i; but under rule 107, says this sound of i can not be properly said to be short, as it is not closed by a consonant; yet it has half its diphthongal sound, the sound of e!! This reason, that i or e is not short, because the sound is not closed by a consonant, is entirely groundless, and contradicted by the universal pronunciation of thousands of English words. To direct such words to be pronounced deereet, deeminish, is inexcusable. This error corresponds with that specified under No. 4, supra.

Thus there is neither uniformity nor consistency among the orthoepists, in the notation of the unaccented vowels; and it is hardly possible there should be, for many of the sounds are so slight, in ordinary pronunciation, that it is almost impossible for the ear to recognize the distinctions, and absolutely impossible to express them on paper. In truth, as Dr. Ash remarks, in a dissertation prefixed to his Dictionary, the sounds of the five vowels, in unaccented, short, and insignificant syllables, are nearly coincident; and it must be a nice ear that can distinguish the difference of sound in the concluding syllable of altar, alter, manor, murmur, satyr. It is for this reason that the notation of such vowels at all savors of hypercritical fastidiousness, and, by aiming at too much nicety and exactness, tends only to generate doubts and multiply differences of opinion. If the accent is laid on the proper syllable, and the vowel of that syllable correctly pronounced, the true pronunciation of the word will follow of course; at least the pronunciation is more likely to be right than wrong, and no mistake will occur, which shall be an object of notice.

Nor can I approve the practice of writing all words in different characters, to express their pronunciation, as if their proper letters were so many hieroglyphics, requiring interpretation. A great part of English words have an orthography sufficiently regular, and so well adapted to express the true pronunciation, that a few general rules only are wanted as a guide to the learner.

7. Another error of notation, in most of the English books, is that of the vowel in the first syllable of circle, circumstance, and many other words, the first syllable of which Sheridan first, and afterwards Walker and Jones, directed to be pronounced ser. This pronunciation I have never heard either in England or in this country. Perry's notation makes the syllable sur, according to all the usage with which I am acquainted.

8. Another objection to the books offered as standards of pronunciation, particularly to the Dictionaries of Sheridan and Walker, is, that the rules are inconsistent, or the execution of the work is inconsistent with the rules. Thus Walker lays it down as a rule, (No. 357,) that c after the accent, and followed by ea, ia, ie, io, or ous, takes the sound of sh, as in ocean, social, Phocion, saponaceous, which are pronounced as if written oshun, sosheal, Phosheon, saponasheous. But in the Dictionary, the author departs from the rule, and directs these words to be pronounced as if written oshun, soshal, saponashus. So also in gracious, ancient, especial, provincial, tenacious, rapacious, and I know not how many others, the author departs from his own rule; so that either his rule or his practice must be wrong.

And here it may be proper to notice a mistake of the author, which has led to an erroneous notation in a great number of words. The mistake is, that he assigns to c and t before the vowels ea, ia, ie, co, and io, the sound of sh. Thus in ocean, he considers c as pronounced like sh; and in partial, he considers the sound of sh as proceeding from t only. Now, the truth is, that the sound of sh, in these and in all similar cases, results from the combination of c, t, or s, with the following vowel; that is, from the rapid enunciation and blending of the two letters. Then the sound of the first vowel being blended with c or t, it ought not to be repeated, and form a distinct syllable. To make three syllables of ocean, is to use the vowel e twice. In most cases, all the orthoepists agree in pronouncing these combinations correctly in dissyllables, and primitive words; as, oshun, grashus, tenashus, parshal, substanshal, nashun, relashun, preshus, and the like. But in a number of words that are primitive in our language, Walker and Jones depart from this rule; for although they pronounce conscience in two syllables, conshense, yet they pronounce nescience and prescience in three, neshyense, preshyense. So also when they make tial one syllable in the primitive word, they make two syllables of these letters in the derivatives; partial is parshal, but partiality is parsheality. Thus one error has led to another, and a large part of all words of this kind are mispronounced. Sheridan and Perry, in this respect, are consistent and correct; making one syllable only of cia, cie, cio, tia, tio, both in primitives and derivatives, throughout the language. A single line of poetry ought to settle this point forever.

Expatriate free o'er all this scene of man.

Pope.

9. A remarkable instance of inconsistency occurs in the following words. Armature, aperture, breuiature, feature, &c., Walker pronounces armatshure, apertshure, breuiatshure, featshure; but forfeiture is forfecture, and judicature, ligature, literature, miniature, nunciature, portraiture, prefecture, quadrature, signature, are pronounced as here written. Can any reason be possibly assigned for such inconsistency?

10. Obedience and its family of words Walker pronounces obejeence, obejeent, obejeently; but disobedience, disobedient, as here written. Expedient is either as here written, or expejeent; but expedience without the alternative. Why this inconsistency?

11. Obdurate, obduracy, are marked to be pronounced obdurate or objurate, obduracy or objuracy; but objurately, objurateness, without an alternative. In these last words occurs another error; the a in the third syllable is made short, as if pronounced rat—a deviation from all good usage.

This notation of obdurate is inconsistent, also, with that of indurate, and with that of obdure—an inconsistency which appears to have no plausible pretext.

The conversion of d into j before i is rejected, I believe, in all words, by Jones, Perry, and Jameson, and before u is rejected by Perry and Jameson, and in many words by Jones. It is a departure from orthography wholly inexcusable.

12. Walker (Principles, No. 92) lays it down as a rule, that when a is preceded by the gutturals hard g or c, [he should have said palatals,] it is, in polite pronunciation, softened by the intervention of a sound like e, so that card, cart, guard, regard, are pronounced like keard, heart, ghcard, regheard. Now, it is remarkable that in the vocabulary or dictionary, the author has departed from his rule, for in not one of the foregoing words, except guard, nor in a multitude of other words which fall within the rule, has he directed this sound of e before the following vowel. Had he conformed to his own rule, he must have perverted the pronunciation of car, carbuncle, care, carcass, cardinal, carga, garden, garter, discard, and a long list of other words, too long to be here enumerated. The English orthoepists now confine this prepositive sound of e to guard, guaranty, guardian, gaille, kind, and a few others. The probable origin of this fault has been already assigned, in treating of the letter u. It is an affected pronunciation, which Nares calls "a monster, peculiar to the stage." Indeed, this slender sound of e before another vowel, is wholly incompatible with that manly enunciation which is peculiarly suited to the genius of the language. Perry and Jameson have rejected it.

13. In the first edition of Walker's Dictionary, the author, under the word tripod, observes, that "all words of two syllables, with the accent on the first, and having one consonant between two vowels, ought to have the vowel in the first syllable long." But this was too rash, for such words as comment, desert, preface, present, profuit, relief, tropic, and a multitude of others, stand, in the author's book, in direct opposition to his own rule. In a subsequent edition, the author, or some other person, has qualified the rule by an exception in favor of settled usage. This exception destroys the value of the rule; and indeed there is, and there can be, no rule applicable to words of this class. The pronunciation of the first vowel can be known only by the usage.

14. The derivatives of nation and ratio Walker and Jones pronounce nash'onul, rash'onul. If this should be defended on the ground of the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, then let me ask why we have not nosh'onul from notion, deosh'onul from devotion, probash'onul from probation, stash'onul from station? Why make rules and not apply them? Why indulge such palpable inconsistencies and multiply anomalies?

15. Possess is, by the English orthoepists, pronounced pozess; but why not, then, pronounce assess, assist, assassin, concession, obsession, with the sound of z? Can any good reason be assigned for making possess an exception to the pronunciation of this class of words? This utterance of sounds through the nose is always disagreeable to the ear, and should be restricted to words in which usage is established. Good taste should rather induce a limitation than an extension of this practice. This remark applies also to some words beginning with dis, in which Walker goes beyond other orthoepists in giving to s this nasal sound.

16. Walker lays it down as a fact, that u has the sound of s and oo or yu. This is true in many words, as in union, unite, unanimity, &c. Hence, according to his principle, u in these words is to be pronounced yunion, yunite, without the letter y prefixed. Yet he writes these and similar words with y, yunion, which, upon his principles, would prefix yu to the sound of yu, and the pronunciation would be yuyunite, or cooyunite. But his notation of this sound of u is not uniform; for he writes disunion and disunite without y, though it must be as proper in the compound as in the simple word. The same inconsistency occurs between usc, written yuse, yuzc, and disuse, disuze.

17. There is a fault in Walker's notation of o, when it has the sound of oo, the French ou. In the Key, he marks o, when it has this sound, with the figure 2, and gives more as an example. Then, according to his Key, o alone, when thus marked, sounds as oo. But in the Vocabulary, he thus marks both vowels in book, look, boot, and all similar words. Then, according to his notation, each of the vowels has the sound of oo, and book, look, are to be pronounced boo-ook, loo-ook. He certainly did not intend this; but such is precisely his direction, or the result of his notation; and a foreigner, without counter-direction, must be led into this pronunciation.

The same fault occurs in his notation of ee, as in meet and seek.

18. Volume, Walker and Jones pronounce volyume, but this is not exactly correct. Will it be said that in volums the u is long? This is not the fact; at least I never heard it thus pronounced either in England or America; it is always short in common usage, i. e., has the first sound of u, shortened.

19. Ink, uncle, concord, concourse, concubine, are pronounced by Walker, ingkl, ungkl, kongkord, kongkorse, kongkubine; and these odious vulgarisms are offered for our adoption. There can be no apology for such attempts to corrupt our language.

20. It is known that the word imagery is, by Walker and the other orthoepists, pronounced in four syllables; the final e of the primitive word being detached from it, and uttered with r, as a distinct syllable. Why savagery has escaped the same fate, I do not know. It is obvious that, in negligent practice, these words have often been thus pronounced. But the most correct pronunciation retains the original word entire in the derivative, the slight sound of e before r no more constituting a syllable, than it does in mors and mire. Take the following examples:—

Of marble stone was cut
An altar carv'd with cunning imagery. Spenser.
When in those oratories might you see
Rich carvings, portraitures, and imagery. Dryden.
Your gift shall two large goblets be
Of silver, wrought with curious imagery. Dryden.
What can thy imagery of sorrow mean? Prior.

Pronounced in four syllables, imagery, in these lines, makes a syllable too much, and injures the measure, and in the last example utterly destroys it. The true pronunciation of Spenser, Dryden, and Prior, is the same as it always has been in my elementary books. [Although the same remarks may be applicable to such words as bravery, finery, knavery, secnery, slavery, &c., it has been thought best to make a distinct syllable of the e and r, to avoid misunderstanding as to the sound intended.]

21. Formerly the words puissance, puissant, had the accent on the second syllable; although the poets seem, in some instances, to have blended the four first letters into one syllable. But the modern change of the accent to the first syllable, is not in accordance with English analogies, and it impairs the measure of many lines of poetry, in which these words occur. In the adverb puissantly, it has a very bad effect.

The foregoing observations extend to whole classes of words, in which the genuine pronunciation has been changed, unsettled, and perverted. It would be inconsistent with the limited nature of this Introduction, to enter into an examination of every particular word of disputable pronunciation. It seems to be inexpedient and useless to bestow, as Walker has done, half a page, or a page, on a single word, in attempting to settle some trifling point, or, in many cases, to settle a point that, in this country, has never been disputed.

To give a brief statement of the errors, diversities, and contradictions of the principal schemes of orthoepy which have been offered to the public, within the last half century, two classes of words only will be sufficient as specimens.

The following lists are not complete, but they comprehend the greatest number of words in their respective classes. The dates at the head of the columns, designate the year when the Dictionaries in my possession were published, indicating nearly, but not exactly, the origin of each scheme. In the orthography, I have given the letters used by each author, in the syllable which contains the difference of pronunciation; in the others, I have followed the common orthography.

This table of words may, perhaps, be thought a burlesque on English orthoepy. It certainly presents a phenomenon altogether novel in the history of language.

Of these five authorities, the notation of Perry, with the exception of a few words ending in ure, is most nearly accordant to the present usage in England, as far as my observations, while in that country, extended. That of Walker is by far the most remote from that usage. From an actual enumeration of the syllables in certain classes of words in which the vowel is erroneously pronounced, in Walker's scheme, I have ascertained that the number amounts to more than twelve thousand, without including several classes of unaccented syllables, which would swell the number by some thousands. Of this whole number, I did not, while in England, hear one vowel pronounced according to Walker's notation. The zeal manifested in this country to make his pronunciation a standard, is absolute infatuation, as, if adopted in its full extent, it would introduce many differences in the pronunciation of words in the two countries, in which sameness now exists; and even the attempt, should it not be successful, must multiply discordancies and distract opinions, and thus place the desired uniformity at a greater distance than ever. Fortunately, Walker's pronunciation has never been generally received in England, and where it has been received, we see, by Jameson's Dictionary, that it is becoming unpopular and obsolete. Walker's pronunciation of several classes of words is also condemned by Jones and Knowles.

We observe in the following list, that the three first of these orthoepists have no rule by which their pronunciation is regulated. Hence the want of uniformity in words of like orthography. See bounteous, courteous, duteous, and plenteous. Why should plenteous be reduced to two syllables, when bounteous is pronounced in three? And what reason can be assigned for the different notation of capitulate and recapitulate?

A remarkable instance of inconsistency in Walker's notation, occurs in words of more syllables than two, ending in ture. Thus we find ture converted into chure [tshure] in

In this class of words, Sheridan and Jones are also inconsistent with themselves, though not to the same extent as Walker. Perry and Jameson retain, in all these words, the true orthography and pronunciation. In these words, also, Walker gives to u, in the last syllable, its first or long sound; but this is an inaccurate notation; the sound is that of the long u, shortened, at least so far as my observation extends, either in England or the United States.

In the following classes of words, as pronounced by Walker, there is either error or inconsistency, or both.

Assidjuous.	Objeence.
Commodious or Commojeus.	Objeent.

Modulate or Modjulate.	Sedulous or Sedjulous.
Nidjulation.	Studios or Stujeus.
Nodjule.	Tedious or Tejeun.
Noctidyal or Noctidjeal.

It would seem that, in a large part of these words, we may take our choice, either to retain the proper sound of d, or to convert it into that of j. This choice certainly makes an odd kind of standard. But why mediate should retain the sound of d, while immediacy and medium suffer a change; or why radiate should be given in the alternative, radiate or rajeate, while irradiate and irradiance are not subjected to any change; or why obediencie should be changed into objeence, and disobediencie remain unchanged, I am not able to conjecture.

* Walker's Dictionary has been trumpeted, in this country, as the standard of orthoepy in England. This is so far from the truth, that three later compilers of pronouncing dictionaries, living in London, have expressly condemned his pronunciation in whole classes of words.

Walker's notation of a before s, in such words as lass, last, past, giving a the short sound it has in fan, lack, is condemned by Jones, who calls it a mincing, modern affectation. Walker's giving to oo in look, took, and others, the same sound as in tooth, tool, is condemned by the same author. Walker's giving to the short i and y the sound of ee or long e, in such words as glory, probity, which, by his notation, are to be pronounced glorce, probetee, James pronounces to be judicious. This error extends to more than eleven thousand syllables.

Walker's change of the sound of d into that of j, in certain classes of words,

These classes of words exhibit a specimen of the modern orthoepy, so called, of our language; it is indeed a brief and imperfect specimen, for I have ascertained by actual enumeration, that a catalogue of all the differences of notation in these authors, would comprehend about one third of all the words in their vocabularies. Amidst this mass of errors and contradictions, our consolation is, that the good sense of the English nation, a learned and respectable people, is triumphing over the follies and caprices of fashion, and frowning on this most mischievous spirit of innovation.*

In proportion as the importance of settled usages and of preserving inviolate the proper sounds of letters, as the true and only safe landmarks of pronunciation, shall be appreciated by an enlightened people, just in that proportion will all attempts of affected speakers to innovate upon such established usages, be reprobated and resisted.

The intentions of the men who have undertaken to give a standard of pronunciation, have, unquestionably, been upright and sincere; but facts have proved that instead of good, they have, on the whole, done harm; for instead of reducing the pronunciation of words to uniformity, they have, to a considerable extent, unsettled it, and multiplied differences. The whole process of these attempts, from Sheridan's first publication, is within my memory; and I am confident that, whatever has been the effect of these attempts in Great Britain, the result of them, in the United States, has been to multiply greatly the diversities of pronunciation. And such is the present state of the authorities, offered as standards, that it is impossible, from books, to gain a correct knowledge of what is the general usage. If I had no other means of knowing this general usage, than the English books, I should be utterly unable to ascertain it, and should give up the attempt as hopeless.†

Some of the differences of notation, in the several books, may be rather apparent than real; but with all due allowance for this imperfection of the schemes, I am persuaded that there are ten differences among these orthoepists, where there is one in the actual pronunciation of respectable people in England and the United States; and in most of them the notation, if strictly followed, will lead to ten differences of pronunciation, where one only now exists in the actual practice of the two countries.

This effect of multiplying doubts and diversities has resulted from very obvious causes.

1. The limited acquaintance of orthoepists with the general usage, and their taking the pronunciation of London, or some dialect or local practice in that city, for the best usage. The propagation of such a dialectical or peculiar practice would of course disturb the uniformity of any other practice in other parts of England or in this country.

2. The difficulty, or rather impracticability, of representing sounds, and nice distinctions of sound, on paper; especially in unaccented syllables.

3. The partiality of authors for the practice of particular speakers, either stage players or others, which would lead them to denominate that the best practice which had been adopted by their favorites.

4. A spirit of fastidious hypercriticism, which has led writers to make minute distinctions, that are liable to be disputed, and which tend only to perplex the inquirer, and generate uncertainty or diversity, where no essential difference had previously existed in practice. This spirit is continually producing new books and new schemes of orthoepy, and every additional book serves only to increase the difficulty of uniting opinions and establishing uniformity.

This view of the subject is probably the most favorable that can be presented. The real fact seems to be this: these men have taken for the standard what they were pleased to call the best usage, which, in many cases, is a local usage, or some favorite peculiarity of particular speakers, at least if they have had any authority at all; or they have given the pronunciation which is condemned by Jameson. He remarks that Walker's adjulation for adulation; compenjeun for compendium; ingrejent for ingredient, if spoken with solemnity, would be intolerable. He condemns, also, Walker's change of tu into tsh, in such words as congratshulation, flatshulent, natsshural. This pronunciation, Knowles, a still later compiler, declares to be absolute pedantry and vulgarity.

† The multiplicity of books for instructing us in our vernacular language, is an evil of no small magnitude. Every man has some peculiar notions which he wishes to propagate, and there is scarcely any peculiarity or absurdity for which some authority may not be found. The facility of book-making favors this disposition; and while a chief qualification for authorship is a dextrous use of an inverted pen, and a pair of scissors, we are not to expect relief from the evil.

happened to please their fancy, though not authorized by usage. In this manner they have attempted to bend the common usage to their particular fancies.

It has been in this manner, by presenting to the public local or particular practice, or mere innovation, for a standard, instead of general or national usage, that the authors above mentioned have unsettled the pronunciation of many words, and multiplied diversities of practice. These attempts to obtrude local usage on the public, and bend to it the general or national usage, are the boldest assumptions of authority in language that the history of literature has ever exhibited. In England, however, these pretensions to direct the pronunciation of the nation, have less effect than they have in the United States, for this obvious reason, that in England pronunciation is regulated almost exclusively by the practice of the higher classes of society, and not by books; hence, if books do not exhibit the customary pronunciation, the falsity of notation is easily detected, and the work which offers it is neglected. But in this country, where the people resort chiefly to books for rules of pronunciation, a false notation of sounds operates as a deception, and misleads the inquirer. How long the citizens of this country will submit to these impositions, time only can determine.

The English language, when pronounced according to the genuine composition of its words, is a nervous, masculine language, well adapted to popular eloquence; and it is not improbable that there may be some connection between this manly character of the language and the freedom of the British and American constitutions. They may, perhaps, act and react upon each other mutually, as cause and effect, and each contribute to the preservation of the other. At the same time, the language is by no means incapable of poetical sweetness and melody. The attempts to refine upon the pronunciation, within the last half century, have, in my opinion, added nothing to its smoothness and sweetness, but have very much impaired its strength of expression as well as its regularity. The attempts to banish the Italian sound of a, and to introduce the sound of e before i and z, as in kind, guard, duty, &c., ought to be resisted, as injurious to the manly character of the genuine English pronunciation.*

In order to produce and preserve a tolerable degree of uniformity, and the genuine purity of our language, two things appear to be indispensable, viz.,

1. To reject the practice of noting the sounds of the vowels in the unaccented syllables. Let any man, in genteel society or in public, pronounce the distinct sound of a in the last syllable of important, or the distinct sound of e in the terminations less and ness, as in hopeless, happiness, and he would pass for a most inelegant speaker. Indeed, so different is the slight sound of a great part of the unaccented vowels, in elegant pronunciation, from that which is directed in books of orthoepy, that no man can possibly acquire the nicer distinction of sounds, by means of books; distinctions which no characters yet invented can express. Elegant pronunciation can be learned only by the ear. The French and Italians, whose languages are so popular in Europe, have never attempted to teach the sounds of their letters by a system of notation embracing the finer sounds of the vowels.

2. To preserve purity and uniformity in pronunciation, it is necessary to banish from use all books which change the orthography of words, to adapt the pronunciation to the fashion of the day. The scheme now pursued is the most mischievous project for corrupting the language that human ingenuity ever devised. By removing the landmarks of language, all the fences which can secure the purity and regularity of the language from unlicensed depredations without end are demolished, the chief use and value of alphabetical writing are destroyed, and every thing is given to chance and to caprice.

In determining the pronunciation of words in this work, I have availed myself of the most respectable English authorities, as well as of my own personal observations in both countries, and of the observations of American gentlemen of erudition, who have visited England. In selecting from a mass of contradictory authorities, I may not, in all cases, have adopted the best pronunciation; but I have spared no pains to execute this part of the work with fidelity.

In general, the rules I have prescribed to myself are these.
1. The usage of respectable people in England and the United States, when identical in the two countries, settled and undisputed. This rule comprehends most of the words in the language. 2. When usage is unsettled or uncertain, I have adjusted the pronunciation to the regular, established analogies of the language, as far as these can be definitely ascertained; having, however, in accentuation, some regard to euphony, or the prosaic melody which proceeds from a due succession of accented and unaccented syllables.

There are some words, differently pronounced by respectable people, in which no decisive reasons appear for preferring one mode of pronouncing them to another; either might be adopted, without any injury to melody or analogy. I see no particular reason why pa'tent should have its first vowel short, and ma'tron, pa'tron, and pa'triot, the first vowel long. Much less do I approve the reasons assigned for making the a short in ma'tronal, and not in ma'tronly, or short in pa'tronal, and not in pa'troness. The reasons assigned by Walker appear to me to be absolute trifling. The rule of uniformity is paramount to every other, excepting that of general, undisputed custom; and when the practice is unsettled, it seems to be the duty of the lexicographer to be guided by that rule, for his authority may lead to the uniformity desired.

In a few instances, the common usage of a great and respectable portion of the people of this country accords with the analogies of the language, but not with the modern notation of English orthoepists. In such cases, it seems expedient and proper to retain our own usage. To renounce a practice confessedly regular, for one confessedly anomalous, out of respect to foreign usage, would hardly be consistent with the dignity of lexicography. When we have principle on our side, let us adhere to it. The time can not be distant, when the population of this vast country will throw off their leading-strings, and walk in their own strength; and the more we can raise the credit and authority of principle over the caprices of fashion and innovation, the nearer we approach to uniformity and stability in practice.

It is difficult, if not impracticable, to reconcile the opinions of a nation, in regard to every point, either of orthography or pronunciation. Every attempt that has yet been made in regard to the English language, has served only to increase the difficulty; and as a gentleman remarked to me in London, a convention of learned men could not effect the object, for no two men would think alike on the subject.

The language of a nation is the common property of the people, and no individual has a right to make inroads upon its principles. As it is the medium of communication between men, it is important that the same written words and the same oral sounds to express the same ideas, should be used by the whole nation. When any man, therefore, attempts to change the established orthography or pronunciation, except to correct palpable errors and produce uniformity, by recalling wanderers into the pale of regular analogies, he offers an indignity to the nation. No local practice, however respectable, will justify the attempt. There is great dignity, as well as propriety, in respecting the universal and long-established usages of a nation.

With these views of the subject, I feel myself bound to reject all modern innovations, which violate the established principles and analogies of the language, and destroy or impair the value of alphabetical writing. I have, therefore, endeavored to present to my fellow-citizens the English language in its genuine purity, as we have received the inheritance from our ancestors, without removing a landmark. If the language is fatally destined to be corrupted, I will not be an instrument of the mischief.

ETYMOLOGY.

Irregular as is the orthography of the English language, and unsettled or corrupt as is the pronunciation, there is nothing either in English or in any other language of which I have any knowledge, which exhibits so strikingly the low state of philology, as the etymological deductions of words, or the history of their origin, affinities, and primary signification. To enable the young inquirer to estimate the erudition, correctness, or negligence of writers on this subject, and to awaken more attention to this branch of learning, I will state briefly the results of my researches, and the opinions which I have been compelled to

* The French language, by the loss or imperfect use of articulations, though rendered easy in utterance, has become so feeble in sound as to be unfit for bold, impressive eloquence. From the specimens which I have witnessed in the Chamber of Deputies in Paris, I should suppose the orator must depend almost entirely on his own animation and action for success in popular speaking, with little or no aid from the strength and beauty of language. The language of popular eloquence should be neither the mouthing cant of the stage, nor the mincing affectation of dandies, nor the baby talk of the nursery. Such was not the language of Demosthenes nor of Cicero; and such may never be the language of the British Chatham and of the American Ames.

form on the merits of the principal treatises on this subject. And if these opinions or this statement should be charged to egotism, or my overweening confidence in the success of my own investigations, my apology is, that I have suffered so much myself by a misplaced confidence in the erudition of writers; I have so often embraced errors which it has cost me more labor to unlearn than to learn; that if I can prevent my fellow-citizens, who have a taste for this study, from being subjected to the same evils, I shall think the advantage obtained more than a balance for any unmerited imputation.

The first example of etymology which I shall mention is that of Josephus, the historian of the Jews, who informs his readers that the first man "was called Adam, which, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies one that is red, because he was formed out of red earth compounded together; for of that kind is virgin and true earth." Here is a mistake proceeding from a mere resemblance of words; it being certain that Adam no more signifies red earth, than it does red cedar. This mistake is connected with another, that Adam was the proper name of the first man, an individual; whereas the word is the generic name of the human species, and, like man in English, signifies form, shape, image, expressing distinctively the characteristic eminence or distinction of form of the human race. This fact explains the use of the plural pronoun, in the account of the creation of the species. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea," &c. Gen. i. 26. It is evident, also, that the words used in relation to the species, the image, the likeness of God, have reference, not only to their intellectual and moral faculties, but also to their external form; and so the apostle interprets the words, 1 Cor. xi. 7. Not that God has any bodily shape of which man can be the image, but that man has a superior or super-excellent form, corresponding to his intellectual powers, and distinguishing him from all other animals. Now, the mistake of Josephus has infected the Christian world for eighteen hundred years, and the mistake, with erroneous inferences from it, enters into the most recently published systems of theology.

Among the most celebrated authors of antiquity, who have written on the subject of language, is Varro, who has left a treatise De Lingua Latina. On this author's learning, Cicero, Quintilian, and Augustine have bestowed the most unbounded praises. He is pronounced to have been vir egregius; eruditissimus Romanorum; peritissimus lingue Latinæ et omnium antiquitatis, sine ulla dubitatione, doctissimus.* He was, doubtless, a man of uncommon erudition for the age in which he lived; and his etymological treatise may be consulted with advantage, by persons who have knowledge enough of this subject to separate the certain or probable from the improbable and conjectural. But it is certain, from what remains of his treatise, that his knowledge of the origin of words did not extend beyond the most obvious facts and principles. Thus he deduces initium from ineo; exitus from exeo; victorium from vinco. All this is well; and we have reason to think him correct, in deducing rellus, fleece, from vellere, to pluck, as, doubtless, fleeces were plucked from sheep, before the use of shears. And we have reason to believe him when he informs us that imber was originally written himber; that hircus was written by the Sabines fircus, and hadus, fidus.

Very different must be our opinion of the following etymologies.

Pater, says Varro, is from patefacio; ager cultus is so called

* Of the full value of these encomiums we can hardly judge, as most of Varro's writings have perished, and some of those which survive appear, in a mutilated form. But the greater his erudition, the more striking will appear his ignorance of this subject.

† Thus far had I written, before I had seen this author's HERMES SCYTHICUS. By this work I find the author agrees with me in regard to the identity and common origin of many of the Gothic and Greek prepositions. Indeed, I had supposed that proof of such an obvious fact could hardly be necessary, in the present state of philological knowledge. Some of these prepositions he has illustrated with a good degree of accuracy; although, should this work ever fall into his hands, I think he will be convinced that in one or two important points, his explanations are defective. In regard to other prepositions, I am satisfied the author has ventured upon unsafe ground; at least his opinions appear to me not to be well supported.

In respect to his explanations of the names of the mythological deities, it appears to me the author, like all other authors whose works I have seen, wanders in darkness. From all my researches into the origin of words, I have drawn this conclusion, that the pagan deities are mostly the powers or supposed powers of nature, or imaginary beings supposed to preside over the various parts of creation, or the qualities of men, deified, that is, exalted and celebrated as supernatural agents. There are few of the names of these deities which I pretend to understand; but there are a few of them that seem to be too obvious to be mistaken. No person, I think, can doubt that the Dryads are named from δρυς, an because in it seeds coalesce or unite with the earth; referring ager, perhaps, to the root of agger, or the Greek αγρω. Campus, he says, was so named because fruits were first gathered from the open field, deducing the word from capio. Next to this were the hills, calles, so named colendo, from colo, because these were cultivated next to the open plain. That land or field which appeared to be the foundation of cattle and money, was called fundus, or it was so called because it pours forth [fundat] annual crops. He deduces cogitare from cogendo; concilium from cogitatione; cura from burning cor, the heart; volo from voluntas, and a volatu, a flying, because the mind flies instantly whither it will. How low must have been the state of philology, when such improbable conjectures as these could attract the encomiums before mentioned from Cicero and Quintilian!

The reader will find many things in Isidore and Priscian worthy of his attention, though much of what their works contain is now so familiar to scholars of moderate attainments, as scarcely to repay the labor of perusal. But he who learns that Isidore makes oratio, a compound of oris ratio; nomen, a contraction of notamen; and that he derives verbum from erberata aere, will hardly think it worth his labor to pursue his researches into that author's works. Nor will he be disposed to relish Priscian's deduction of litera from legilitern, because a letter affords the means of reading, or from lituro, to obliterate, because the ancients used to write on wax tables, and afterwards to obliterate what they had written.

Vossius wrote a folio on the etymology of Latin words; but from repeated examinations of his book, I am persuaded that most of his deductions are far-fetched, conjectural, and fanciful; many of them are certainly erroneous.

Menage and Minshew I have not consulted; chiefly because from such extracts as I have seen, from their writings, I am certain that little reliance can be placed on their opinions, except in cases too plain to be mistaken.

Junius and Skinner, the authorities for most of the etymologies of Bailey and Johnson, are sufficiently correct in referring English words to the language from which they are immediately derived, especially when the orthography is too plain to be mistaken. They inform us, that father is from the Saxon fader, that drop is from the Saxon droppan, that pickel is from the French piquet, and the like. So Johnson informs us that accent is from the Latin accentus, and accept from the French accepter, Latin accipio. All this is well, but it can hardly be called etymology, or the deduction of words from their originals.

Whiter, in his ETYMOLOGICON MAGNUM, the first volume only of which I have perused, began his work on a good plan, that of bringing together words of the same or of cognate radical letters, and in pursuance of his plan, he has collected many real affinities. But he has destroyed the value of his work by mistaking the radical sense of many words, and by confounding words of different elements.

Jamieson, in his Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language, has collected the affinities of words in that language, particularly words of Gothic and Teutonic origin, with industry, and probably with judgment, and a good degree of accuracy. In some instances, I think, he has departed from correct principles of etymology, and mistaken facts; and he, as well as Whiter, falls very short of truth in a most important particular, a clear understanding of the primary sense of words. Jamieson's Dictionary, however, contains a valuable addition to our stock of etymological materials.†

oak or tree. Hence I infer that this name was applied to certain imaginary beings inhabiting the forests.

No person can doubt that Nereus, the deity of the sea, and the nereids, nymphs of the sea, are named from the Oriental نهر, a river, from the corresponding verb, to flow. No person doubts that Flora, the goddess of flowers, is merely a flower deified.

Hence I infer that the true method of discovering the origin of the pagan deities, is to find the meaning of their names.

Now, Diana is the goddess of hunting. What quality, then, is most necessary for a hunter? What quality would render him, destitute of the weapons which we possess, most valuable as useful in obtaining subsistence? Doubtless courage and swiftness. Thus we have substantial reasons for believing that Diana is the Celtic dan or dian, which signifies bold, strong, vehement, impetuous, the root of Danube, Dan, and other names of large rivers.

If we examine the name of Minerva, we shall find that the first syllable contains the elements of manus, the hand, and of mind; and the last constituent part of the word corresponds well with the German arbeit, D. arbid, labor, work, the last consonant being lost. Well, what are the characteristics of Minerva? Why, she is the goddess of wisdom and of the arts. The sense of manus, would give one of her characteristics, and that of manus and arbeit, the other; but which is the true word, I do not know.

To Horne Tooke are we indebted for the first explanation of certain indeclinable words, called conjunctions and prepositions; and for this let him have all merited praise. But his researches were very limited, and he has fallen into most material errors, particularly in his second volume. I have made no use of his writings in this work.

The HERMES of Harris, according to Dr. Lowth, "is the most beautiful and perfect example of analysis that has been exhibited since the days of Aristotle." This, in my opinion, is not the character of the work, which, for the most part, consists of passages from the works of Aristotle, Ammonius, Apollonius, Priscian, and other grammarians. It is little more than a collection of the opinions of the ancient writers on philology, whose metaphysical subtleties rather obscure than illustrate the subject. To show how easily men may be misled by metaphysics, when applied to the plainest subject imaginable, take the following example from the Hermes.

"A respects our primary perception, and denotes individuals as unknown; the respects our secondary perception, and denotes individuals as known." [This is nearly a literal translation of a passage in Priscian, lib. 17.]

To illustrate the truth of this observation, the author gives the following example: "There goes a beggar with a long beard;" indicating that the man had not been seen before; and, therefore, a denotes the primary perception. A week after, the man returns, and I say, "There goes the beggar with the long beard;" the article the here indicating the secondary perception, that is, that the man had been seen before. All this is very well. But let us try the rule by other examples, and see whether it is universal, or whether it is the peculiar and proper office of an or a to denote primary perception.

"The article a," says Harris, "leaves the individual unascertained." Let us examine this position.

"But Peter took him, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man." Now, according to Harris, a here denotes the primary perception, and the individual is unascertained. That is, this man is one I have never seen before.

"He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Whether a, in this sentence, denotes first perception, I can not determine; but sure I am the individual is not left unascertained.

A. B. says to me, "I have lately dismissed an old servant, who has lived with me for thirty years." Here an may present a primary perception to the hearer, but not so to the speaker. To both, the individual must be well ascertained.

It appears, then, that this definition of an or a is incorrect; and the pains of these metaphysical writers, who form such perfect analyses of language, is little better than learned trifling. On testing the real character of an or a by usage and facts, we find it is merely the adjective one, in its Saxon orthography, and that its sole use is to denote one, whether the individual is known or unknown, definite or indefinite.

Again, Harris translates and adopts the definition which Aristotle has given of a conjunction. "An articulate sound or part of speech devoid of signification by itself, but so formed as to help signification, by making two or more significant sentences to be one significant sentence."

This is so far from being true, that some of the conjunctions are verbs, equivalent to join, unite, or add, in the imperative mode. In like manner, the prepositions called inseparable, and used as prefixes, are all significant per se, although, by custom, they sometimes lose their appropriate use. For example, re, which denotes repetition, has lost its use in recommend, which is equivalent to commend, without the sense of repetition. But still it has ordinarily an appropriate sense, which is perfectly understood, even when first prefixed to a word. Let any person prefix this word to pronounce for the first time, and direct a boy fourteen years old to repronounce his oration, and he would perfectly well understand the direction.

Bryant, the author of "An Analysis of Ancient Mythology," whose works I should love to read, if I could have confidence in his opinions, has given to the public a history of the Cuthites, or descendants of Ham, a race of bold adventurers, who, as he sup-

The two circumstances which chiefly distinguish Hercules, are his labors and his club. We never hear of Hercules but with these accompaniments. Now, the first syllable of his name is precisely the root of the Greek εργον, εργασι, that is, toy or erk, which would give the sense of work, labor. Whether the last constituent of the name is κλειος, or from that root, I shall not pretend to affirm. Indeed, I offer these explanations rather as probable, than as clearly proved; but they do appear to be probably well founded. Hercules, then, was a name given to any bold, heroic leader of a tribe of rude men, who was distinguished for his achievements as a warrior; and this name must have originated in very early ages, when clubs were the principal weapons of war, and instruments of defense. And hence, probably, the origin of the scepter, as a badge of royalty. Now, it is worthy of remark, that the war club of rude nations, at this day, especially of the savage nations of the South Sea Isles, is of the same shape as the ancient scepter poses, made expeditions by sea and land, introducing arts, founding cities, and corrupting religion by the propagation of Sabianism. For proof of his opinions, he relies very much on etymology and the signification of names. Two or three examples of his deductions will be sufficient to show his manner of proof. Ham, or Cham, signifying heat and the sun, he deduces from חמם, to be hot, to heat. So far he may be correct. But he goes on to deduce from this root, also, as Castell had done before him, the Greek καυμα, heat, not considering that this is from καω, to burn, in which m is not radical; but probably s is the radical consonant, as this occurs in the derivatives. Καυμα has no connection with Ham. From Cam, or Cham, he then deduces the Latin camera, Gr. καμαρα, an arched roof or vault, whence our chamber, though it is not easy to discover the connection between this word and heat; and from the same root he deduces Camillus, Camilla, and many other words, without any support for his opinions but a mere similarity of orthography in the first syllable. In all this he is certainly wrong.

The Greek Θεος, God, he supposes, most unwarrantably, to be formed from the Egyptian Theuth, or Thoth, Mercury.

The sun he supposes to have been styled El-uc; El [ἑλιος] and uc or och, a title of honor among the Babylonians. This word, says Bryant, the Greeks changed into λυκος, [a wolf,] and hence the Latin lux, lucco. A strange conjecture this, not to call it by a harsher name. Now, if Bryant had examined the Teutonic dialects, and the Welsh, he would have seen his mistake; for the Saxon leoht, liht, Dutch and German licht, are from the common root of the Welsh llug, a shooting or gleaming, lluicaw, to throw, lluc, a darting or flashing, the root of lucco; a simple root, that can have no connection with El-uc.

Excepting Faber's work on the Cabiri, I have seen scarcely a book in any language, which exhibits so little etymological knowledge, with such a series of erroneous or fanciful deductions, as Bryant's Analysis. Drummond's Origines abounds with etymological deductions of a similar character.

Gobelin, a French writer, in his Monde Primitif, has bestowed much labor in developing the origin and signification of words; but a large part of his labor has produced no valuable effect. His whole system is founded on a mistake, that the noun is the root of all other words.

Of all the writers on etymology, whose works I have read or consulted, Spelman and Lluyd are almost the only ones in whose deductions much confidence can be placed. I do not name Camden, Hickes, Selden, and Gibson, as their etymological inquiries, though generally judiciously conducted, were very limited. This is true, also, in some degree, of Spelman and Lluyd; but the researches of Spelman into the origin of law terms, and words of the middle ages, have generally produced very satisfactory results. From the limited nature of the designs of Spelman and Lluyd, errors may have occasionally escaped them; but they are few, and very pardonable.

I know of no work in any language, in which words have been generally traced to their original signification, with even tolerable correctness. In a few instances, this signification is too obvious to be mistaken; but in most instances, the ablest etymologist is liable to be misled by first appearances, and the want of extensive investigation. I have been often misled myself, by these means, and have been obliged to change my opinions, as I have advanced in my inquiries. Hence the tendency of my researches has been very much to increase my caution in referring words to their originals; and such, I am persuaded, will be the result of all critical and judicious investigations into the history and affinities of language.

A principal source of mistakes on this subject is a disregard of the identity of the radical consonants, and a licentious blending and confounding of words, whose elementary letters are not commutable. Another source of error is an unwarrantable license in prefixing or inserting letters, for the purpose of producing an identity or resemblance of orthography; a fault very justly opposed by Sir William Jones.

The learned Dr. Good, in his Book of Nature, Lecture IX. of the second series, suggests it to be probable that both papa and father issued from the Hebrew source אבא, אבא, אבא. He then name given to any bold, heroic leader of a tribe of rude men, who was distinguished for his achievements as a warrior; and this name must have originated in very early ages, when clubs were the principal weapons of war, and instruments of defense. Now, it is worthy of remark, that the war club of rude nations, at this day, especially of the savage nations of the South Sea Isles, is of the same shape as the ancient scepter fearlessly ventures to affirm, that there is scarcely a language or dialect in the world, polished or barbarous, in which the same idea is not expressed by the radical of one or the other of these terms. True, the letter k is found in most words of this signification; although our knowledge of languages is too limited to warrant such a broad assertion. But the attempt to deduce all words signifying father from the Hebrew, must certainly fail; for we know from history, that a great part of Asia and of Europe was inhabited before the existence of the Hebrew nation. Besides, a large portion of the European population have no word for father, which can be rationally deduced from אב. The Welsh tad, whence our daddy, the Gothic atn, Irish nithair, Basque aita, and Laponic atki, can not be formed from the Hebrew word, the letter d and t not being commutable with b. One would suppose that a learned physiologist could not fail to assign the true cause of the similarity of words bearing the sense of father and mother, among the nations of the earth. The truth is, the sound of a is very easy, and probably the easiest for children, being formed by simply opening the mouth, without any exertion of the organs to modulate the sound. So, also, the articulations b, m, and d or t, being natural and easy, will generally enter into the first words formed by children. The labials are formed by simply closing the lips, and the dentals, by placing the tongue against the root of the upper teeth; the position which it naturally occupies in a healthy child. From these circumstances, we may fairly infer, a priori, that such words as ab, aba, papa, tad, mamma, must be the first words uttered by children. Indeed, were the whole human race to lose their present names for father, mother, and nurse, similar names would be formed by a great portion of mankind, without any communication between different nations.

The author further observes, that the generic terms for the Deity are chiefly the three following—Alor Allah, Theus or Deus, and Gad. "Besides these, there is scarcely a term of any kind, by which the Deity is designated, in any part of the world, whether among civilized or savage men. Yet these proceed from the same common quarter of the globe." True; men, and of course words, all came from a common quarter of the globe. But it so happens, that these three terms must have originated among different families, or from different sources, for they are all formed with different radicals, and can have had no connection with a common radix. But it happens, also, that not one of these terms, as far as I can learn, exists among the Slavonic nations, who compose a large portion of all the population of Europe, and whose name of God is Bag, a word radically distinct from all which the author has mentioned.

The author proceeds to say, "that the more common etymon for death, among all nations, is mor, mort, or nut." But if either of these terms for death is a native word among the great Gothic, Teutonic, and Slavonic families, which constitute the half or two thirds of all the inhabitants of Europe, I have not been able to find it. Besides, mor and nut are words radically distinct, and thus originated in different families.

"Sir," says the author, "is, in our language, the common title of respect; and the same term is employed in the same sense throughout every quarter of the globe. In the Sanscrit and Persian, it means the organ of the head itself." He finds the word in Arabia, Turkey, in Greek, among the Peruvians in South America, in Germany, Holland, and the contiguous countries. In some of the languages of these countries I have found no such word; but if it exists, the author's inference, that the name of the head gave rise to this term of respect, (for this is what I understand him to mean,) is totally unfounded; and equally fanciful and unfounded is his supposition, that, by the loss of h from sher, the pronoun her, and the German herr, lord, are to be deduced from sir. In all this it is demonstrably certain there is no truth or even semblance of reality.

Man the author deduces from the Hebrew מַנְהֵן to discern or discriminate, a sense I do not find in the Lexicons; and hence he infers that the radical idea of man is that of a thinking or a reasonable being. With this word he connects Mena, Menes, Minos, and μενος, mens, mind; a sweeping inference, made at random, from a similarity of orthography, without a distant conception of the true primary meaning of either of these words. But what is worse, he appears, if I do not mistake his meaning, to connect with these words the tane, tannato, or tangi, of the Sandwich Isles; words which are formed with a radical initial consonant, not convertible with m, and most certainly unconnected with man. See the words FATHER, MAN, and SIR, in the Dictionary.

The author offers some other etymologies and affinities equally remote from truth, and even from probability.

The governing principles of etymology are, first, the identity of radical letters, or a coincidence of cognates, in different languages; no affinity being admissible, except among words whose primary consonants are articulations of the same organs, as B, F, M, P, V, and W; or as D, T, Th, and S; or as G, C close, K, and Q; R, L, and D. Some exceptions to this rule must be admitted, but not without collateral evidence of the change, or some evidence that is too clear to be reasonably rejected.

Second. Words in different languages are not to be considered as proceeding from the same radix, unless they have the same signification, or one closely allied to it, or naturally deducible from it. And on this point, much knowledge of the primary sense of words, and of the manner in which collateral senses have sprung from one radical idea, is necessary to secure the inquirer from mistakes. A competent knowledge of this branch of etymology can not be obtained from any one, or from two or three languages. It is almost literally true, that, in examining more than twenty languages, I have found each language to throw some light on every other.

That the reader may have more clear and distinct ideas of what is intended by commutable letters, and the principles by which etymological deductions are to be regulated, it may be remarked that commutable or interchangeable letters are letters of the same organs; that is, letters or articulations formed by the same parts of the mouth. Thus, b, m, and p, are formed immediately by the lips, the position of which is slightly varied to make the distinction between these letters. f and v are formed by the lips, but with the aid of the upper teeth. Now, the difference of the jointings of the organs to utter these letters is so small, that it is easy for men, in utterance, to slide from one form into another.

The following examples will illustrate this subject.

Labial Letters commuted for other Labials.

English bear, Lat. fero, paria, G. φερω, φορεω, D. voeren, G. fahren.

Here is the same word written in different languages, with five different initial letters.

German wahr, true, L. verus.
Celtic tamh, tu, the hand, Goth. lofa.
L. guberno, Fr. gouverner, Eng. govern.

Dental Letters commuted for other Dentals.

Eng. deu, G. thau.
Eng. good, G. gut.
Eng. dare, Gr. διαρῶω.
Eng. day, G. tag.
Eng. thank, D. danken.
Eng. brother, D. brueder.

Palatal Letters commuted for other Palatals.

Eng. call, W. gallo, Gr. καλεω.
Eng. get, It. collare.
Greek χιμα, L. hiems, winter.

Dentals converted into Sibilants

Eng. water, G. wasser.
Lat. dens, a tooth, G. zahn.
Eng. let, Fr. laisser.
Ch. כרת, Heb. כרת.
Sax. tid, time, G. zeit.

Change of Linguals.

Eng. eseort, Sp. and Port. escolta.
Fr. blanc, white, Port. branco.

Change of F into H.

Sp. habla for Lat. fabula; haz for facies, faec; hacer for facio.

It is believed that n and s are sometimes convertible; as in Latin pono, posui, and also r and s, as in English iron, German isen.

Letters formed by different organs are not commutable; hence we are not to admit a radical word beginning or ending with b, f, or v, to be the same as a word beginning or ending with g, d, t, r, or s; nor a word whose radical letters are m, n, to be the same as one whose elements are r, d, or s, t. If such words are in any case the same, they must have suffered some anomalous strive to retain the resemblance between the written and spoken language.

A considerable part of Johnson's Dictionary is, however, well executed; and when his definitions are correct, and his arrangements judicious, it seems to be expedient to follow him. It would be mere affectation or folly to alter what can not be improved.

The principal faults in Johnson's Dictionary are,

1. The want of a great number of well-authorized words belonging to the language. This defect has been, in part, supplied by Mason, but his supplemental list is still imperfect, even in common words; and still more defective from the omission of terms of science.

2. Another great fault, that remains uncorrected, is the manner of noting the accented syllable; the accent being laid uniformly on the vowel, whether it closes the syllable or not. Thus the accent is laid on e in te'nant as well as in te'acher, and the inquirer can not know from the accent, whether the vowel is long or short. It is surprising that such a notation should still be retained in that work.

3. It is considered as a material fault, that, in some classes of words, Johnson's orthography is either not correct upon principle, or not uniform in the class. Thus he writes heedlessly, with ss, but carelessly, with one s; defence, with c, but defensible, defensive, with s; rigour, inferiour, with u, but rigorous, inferiority, without it; publick, authentick, with k, but publication, authenticate, without it; and so of many other words of the same classes.

4. The omission of the participles, or most of them, is no small defect, as many of them, by use, have become proper adjectives, and require distinct definitions. The additions of this kind in this work are very numerous. It is also useful, both to natives and foreigners, to be able, by opening a dictionary, to know when the final consonant of a verb is doubled in the participle.

5. The want of due discrimination in the definitions of words that are nearly synonymous, or sometimes really synonymous, at other times not, is a fault in all the dictionaries of our language which I have seen. Permeate, says Johnson, signifies to pass through; and Permeable, such as may be passed through. But we pass through a door or gate; although we do not permeate it, or say that it is permeable. Obedience, says Johnson, is obsequiousness; but this is rarely the present sense of the word; so far from it, that obedience is always honorable, and obsequiousness usually implies meanness. Persecution, says Johnson, is robbery of the public, theft of public money. But as robbery and theft are now understood, it is neither. Inaccuracies of this kind are very numerous.

6. There are in Johnson's Dictionary some palpable mistakes in orthography, such as comptroller, redoubt, and some others, there being no such legitimate words in the language. In other instances, the author mistook the true origin of words, and has erred in the orthography, as in chymistry and diocess.

7. The mistakes in etymology are numerous; and the whole scheme of deducing words from their original is extremely imperfect.

8. The manner of defining words in Johnson, as in all other dictionaries, is susceptible of improvement. In a great part of the more important words, and particularly verbs, lexicographers, either from negligence or want of knowledge, have inverted the true order, or have disregarded all order, in the definitions. There is a primary sense of every word, from which all the other have proceeded; and whenever this can be discovered, this sense should stand first in order. Thus the primary sense of make is to force or compel; but this in Johnson's Dictionary is the fifteenth definition; and this sense of facio in Ainsworth, is the nineteenth.

9. One of the most objectionable parts of Johnson's Dictionary, in my opinion, is the great number of passages cited from authors, to exemplify his definitions. Most English words are so familiarly and perfectly understood, and the sense of them so little liable to be called in question, that they may be safely left to rest on the authority of the lexicographer, without examples. Who needs extracts from three authors, Knolles, Milton, and Berkeley, to prove or illustrate the literal meaning of hand? Who needs extracts from Shakspeare, Bacon, South, and Dryden, to prove hammer to be a legitimate English word, and to signify an instrument for driving nails? So, under household, we find seven passages and nearly thirty lines employed to exemplify the plain interpretation, a family living together.

In most cases, one example is sufficient to illustrate the meaning of a word; and this is not absolutely necessary, except in cases where the signification is a deviation from the plain, literal sense, a particular application of the term; or in a case where the sense of the word may be doubtful and of questionable authority. Numerous citations serve to swell the size of a Dictionary, without any adequate advantage. But this is not the only objection to Johnson's exemplifications. Many of the passages are taken from authors new little read, or not at all; whose style is now antiquated, and by no means furnishing proper models for students of the present age.

In the execution of this work, I have pursued a course somewhat different; not, however, without fortifying my own opinion with that of other gentlemen, in whose judgment I have confidence. In many cases, where the sense of a word is plain and indisputable, I have omitted to cite any authority. I have done the same in many instances, where the sense of a word is wholly obsolete, and the definition useful only to the antiquary. In some instances, definitions are given without authority, merely because I had neglected to note the author, or had lost the reference. In such cases, I must stand responsible for the correctness of the definition. In all such cases, however, I have endeavored to be faithful to the duty of a lexicographer; and if, in any instance, a mistake has escaped me, I shall be happy to have it suggested, that it may be corrected.

In general, I have illustrated the significations of words, and proved them to be legitimate, by a short passage from some respectable author, often abridged from the whole passage cited by Johnson. In many cases, I have given brief sentences of my own; using the phrases or sentences in which the word most frequently occurs, and often presenting some important maxim or sentiment in religion, morality, law, or civil policy. Under words which occur in the Scriptures, I have often cited passages from our common version, not only to illustrate the scriptural or theological sense, but even the ordinary significations of the words. These passages are short, plain, appropriate, and familiar to most readers. In a few cases, where the sense of a word is disputed, I have departed from the general plan, and cited a number of authorities.

In the admission of words of recent origin into a Dictionary, a lexicographer has to encounter many difficulties; as it is not easy, in all cases, to determine whether a word is so far authorized as to be considered legitimate. Some writers indulge a licentiousness in coining words, which good sense would wish to repress. At the same time, it would not be judicious to reject all new terms, as these are often necessary to express new ideas; and the progress of improvement in arts and science would be retarded by denying a place in dictionaries to terms given to things newly discovered. But the lexicographer is not answerable for the bad use of the privilege of coining new words. It seems to be his duty to insert and explain all words which are used by respectable writers or speakers, whether the words are destined to be received into general and permanent use or not. The future use must depend on public taste, or the utility of the words — circumstances which are not within the lexicographer's control.

Lexicographers are sometimes censured for inserting in their vocabularies vulgar words, and terms of art, known only to particular artisans. That this practice may be carried too far, is admitted; but it is to be remarked that, in general, vulgar words are the oldest and best authorized words in language; and their use is as necessary to the classes of people who use them, as elegant words are to the statesman and the poet. It may be added, that such words are often particularly useful to the lexicographer, in furnishing him with the primary sense, which is nowhere to be found but in popular use. In this work I have not gone quite so far as Johnson has done, in admitting vulgar words. Some of them are too low to deserve notice.

The catalogue of obsolete words in Johnson has been considerably augmented by Mason. I have, though somewhat reluctantly, inserted nearly the whole catalogue, which, I presume, amounts to seven or eight, and perhaps to ten thousand words. Most of these may be useful to the antiquary; but to the great mass of readers they are useless.*

* There is, among some poets of the present day, an affectation of reviving the use of obsolete words. Some of these may, perhaps, be revived to advantage; but when this practice proceeds so far as to make a glossary necessary to the understanding of a poem, it seems to be a violation of good taste. How different is the simple elegance of Dryden, Pope, Gray, Goldsmith, and Cowper!

I have also inserted many words which are local in England; being retained from the different languages that have been spoken in that country, but which are no more a part of our present language in the United States, than so many Lapland words. These, however, occur in books which treat of agriculture and the arts—books which are occasionally read in this country.

Law terms, which are no part of the proper language of the United States, and never can be, as the things they express do not exist in this country, are, however, retained, as it is necessary that the gentlemen of the bar should understand them; and it will be time to dismiss them from books when they are obsolete in practice.

As to Americanisms, so called, I have not been able to find many words, in respectable use, which can be so denominated. These I have admitted and noted as peculiar to this country. I have fully ascertained that most of the new words charged to the coinage of this country, were first used in England.

In exhibiting the origin and affinities of English words, I have usually placed first in order the corresponding word, in the language from or through which we have received it; then the corresponding words in the languages of the same family or race; then the corresponding word in the languages of other families. Thus, for example, the word break we have from our Saxon ancestors; I therefore give the Saxon word first; then the same word in the other Teutonic and Gothic languages; then the Celtic words; then the Latin; and, lastly, the Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Arabic. This order is not followed in every instance, even of vernacular words, but it is the more general course I have pursued. When there can be no rational doubt respecting the radical identity of words, I have inserted them without any expression of uncertainty. When there appears to be any reason to question that identity, I have mentioned the probability only of an affinity, or inserted a query, to invite further investigation. Yet I am aware that many things, which in my view are not doubtful, will appear so to persons not versed in this subject, and who do not at once see the chain of evidence which has led me to my inferences. For this there is no remedy but further investigation.

In regard to words which have been introduced into the language in modern days, I have generally referred them to the language from which the English immediately received them. A great part of these are from the Latin, through the French; sometimes, probably, through the Italian or Spanish. In some instances, however, the order is reversed; indeed, it can not always be known from which language the words have been received, nor is it a matter of any consequence.

One circumstance, however, deserves to be particularly noticed—that when I refer a vernacular word to the corresponding word in one of the Shemitic languages, I would not have it understood that the English word was derived or borrowed from that Oriental word. For example, I have given the Shemitic פָּרַק as the verb corresponding with the English break, that is, the same word in those languages; not intending by this that our ancestors borrowed or received that word from the Chaldeans, Hebrews, or other Shemitic nation. This is not the fact. It would be just as correct for the compiler of a Chaldee or Hebrew Lexicon to derive פָּרַק from the English break or German brechen. So when I deduce coin, through the French, Spanish, or Italian, from the Arabic, قَانَ, I do not consider the word as borrowed from the Arabic, but as proceeding from a common radix. With regard to vernacular words, in any European language, such deduction is always incorrect. Yet errors of this kind abound in every book I have seen, which treats of this subject. The truth is, all vernacular words in the languages of Europe are as old as the same words in Asia; and when the same words are found in the Shemitic and Japhetic languages, it is almost demonstrably certain that these words were in use before the dispersion; the nations of both families have them from the common stock, and the words, like the families of men which used them, are to be considered as of the same antiquity.

When, therefore, I state the words of another language as corresponding with vernacular words in the English, they are offered as affinities, or the same word varied dialectically, perhaps, in orthography or signification, but words from the same root as the English. Thus, under the word bright, I state the Saxon word, and then the corresponding word in the Ethiopic, the participle of a verb; not that our ancestors borrowed the word from the Ethiopians, but that the verb from which bright was derived, though lost in the Saxon, is still retained in the Ethiopic. This fact proves that the ancestors of the Saxons once used the verb, but suffered it to go into disuse, substituting shine, scinan, in its place.

It is much to be regretted that British authors and travelers admit into their writings foreign words, without conforming them, in orthography, to regular English analogies. It is owing to this disregard of the purity and regular form of orthography in English, that we are perplexed with such words as burlesque, soup, group, tour, corps, depot, suite, pacha, annui, and many others. In this respect, modern writers manifest less taste than the writers of former centuries, who, when they borrowed foreign words wrote them in conformity to English analogies. This practice of blending with the English many words of an orthography which in our language is anomalous, is very embarrassing to readers who know only their vernacular tongue, and often introduces an odious difference between the pronunciation of different classes of people—an evil more sensibly felt in this country than in Great Britain, where differences of rank exist; in short, it multiplies the irregularities of a language, already so deformed by them as to render it nearly impracticable for our own citizens ever to overcome the difficulties of its orthography—irregularities which foreigners deem a reproach to the taste of a literary nation.

Where is the good sense which should dictate a manly firmness in preserving the regular analogies and purity of the language? Where is there a due attachment to UNIFORMITY, which constitutes the principal beauty and excellence of a language, and, beyond all other means, facilitates its acquisition? I would not refuse to admit foreign words into the language, if necessary or useful; but I would treat them as our laws treat aliens; I would compel them to submit to the formalities of naturalization, before they should be admitted to the rights of citizenship; I would convert them into English words, or reject them. Nor would I permit the same word to be written and pronounced in two different ways, one English, the other French. The French suite in English is suit, whether it signifies a set of clothes, or of apartments, or of armor, or of attendants.

In the orthography of certain classes of words I have aimed at uniformity; but I have not proceeded so far in this desirable reformation of the common spelling, as my own wishes and strict propriety might dictate. Thus, if vicious, from the Latin vitium, is written with c, the verb vitiate should regularly be written with the same letter; and we have precedents in the words appreciate and depreciate, from the Latin pretium. In like manner, expatiate should be conformed to the orthography of spacious; exceed, proceed, and succeed, should follow the analogy of concede, intercede, and recede. These are points of minor importance, but far from being unimportant.

In writing the termination of such verbs as civilize, legalize, modernize, there is a diversity which may be corrected without inconvenience. We indeed have some of the verbs of this class from the French, in which language iser is the termination; but most of them we have borrowed directly from the Latin or Greek, or perhaps from the Spanish or Italian, or they are of our own coinage. As the termination ize is conformable to the Greek original, as it has a definite meaning, and as it expresses the true pronunciation in English, it seems expedient to reduce the whole class to a uniformity of orthography.

Enterprise, devise, comprise, revise, compromise, and surprise, belong to a different class, and retain the orthography of their originals.

There is a fact respecting the pronunciation of gn in eognizance and recognizance, which seems to have escaped observation; this is, that g was introduced to express a nasal sound, as in the French gn, or Spanish ñ, but not for the purpose of being pronounced as g. It is probable that the Latins changed con, before nosa, into cog, for this reason; and it may be inferred, from the modern pronunciation of these words, that the Greeks omitted or softened the sound of γ in γινωσκω and γινωσκαι. However this may be, the old pronunciation of the words was undoubtedly conusance, or comizance, recognizance; and hence, in the old writers on law, the letter g was omitted. Indeed, there is a harshness in the pronunciation of g in these words, that offends the organs both of the speaker and hearer, and which well justifies the pronunciation of the old lawyers—a pronunciation which we frequently hear at this day among gentlemen of the bar.

Whether the Latins pronounced the letter g in such words as benignus, condignus, malignus, it is of no moment for us to determine. In our mode of writing benign, condign, malign, the sound of g must be dropped; but it is resumed in the derivatives, benignity, condignity, malignity: so in design, designate; resign, resignation.*

In noting the obsolete words, which amount to some thousands, I may have committed mistakes; for words obsolete in one part of the British dominions, or in some part of the United States, may be words in common use in some other part of such dominions not within my knowledge. The rule I have generally observed, has been to note as obsolete such words as I have not heard in colloquial practice, and which I have not found in any writer of the last century. The notation of such words as are disused, may be of use to our own youth, and still more to foreigners who learn our language.

Under the head of etymology, in brackets, the reader will observe references to another work, for a more full explanation or view of the affinities of the words under which these references occur. These are references to a Synopsis of the principal un-compounded words in twenty languages—a work that is not published, and it is uncertain whether it will ever be published. But if it should be, these references will be useful to the philologist, and I thought it expedient to insert them.

ENGLISH ALPHABET.

LANGUAGE or speech consists of human voices or articulate sounds, intended to communicate thoughts or ideas from one person to another.

Articulate voices are those which are formed by closing and opening the organs of speech—the lips, the tongue, the teeth, &c. An articulation is a joining or closing of the organs, as in pronouncing ab, ed, op, un, at, eth, ag, eng.

Articulate sounds of the human voice are represented by letters or characters written, painted, engraved, or printed. A letter, or letters in combination, form syllables and words, which are the symbols of ideas.

To letters, syllables, and words, are annexed certain sounds, which, being uttered by the organs of speech, communicate ideas, through the instrumentality of the ears. When letters and words are written, painted, engraved, or printed, they communicate thoughts, through the instrumentality of the eyes.

In order to the communication of thoughts or opinions correctly, from one person to another, it is essential that both persons should annex the same sounds to the same letters and words; or that the letters and words used should be symbols of the same thoughts to both persons. This identity of sounds and symbols constitutes a particular language, the instrument of social intercourse in a nation.

In the English language, the letters are twenty-six; representing sounds, simple or compound; or modifying such sounds.

Letters are of two kinds, vowels and consonants.

Vowels are vocal sounds, uttered by opening the mouth or organs of speech, without a contact of the parts of the month. The sound of a perfect vowel may be prolonged at pleasure, without altering the position of the organs. Such is the first or long sound of a, e, o.

The vowels in the English are six—a, e, i, o, u, y. But i and u are not always simple vowels; and y is sometimes used as a consonant. These letters also represent different sounds—a circumstance which creates much difficulty in learning the language.

The broadest or deepest vowel sound is that of a in fall, au in ought, aw in law. This sound requires the largest opening of the mouth. A less opening of the organs gives the sound of the Italian a, as in father, glass. One less deep gives the sound of the short a, as in fat, cat, can. A still smaller opening gives the sound of a in fate, make; and a still smaller, gives the sound of e in mete, feet. The first sound of o, as in note, is made by a circular position of the lips; and with a less circular opening of the lips we utter the sound of oo in tool.

The first or long sound of i is compound, as in pine; so is the first sound of u in due, suit, tribunal. These sounds can not be exactly expressed or described in writing.

The first or long sound of each vowel is exemplified in the following words:—

a in make, name.	o in note, hold.
e in me, mets.	u in duty, true.
i in pine, bind.	y in dry, defy.

The short sound of each vowel may be exemplified in the following words:—

a in mat, ban.	o in not, boss.
e in bet, men.	u in dun, must.
i in bit, pin.	y in pity, duty.

The vowel a has a third sound, called broad, as in ball; all, walk. The same sound is expressed by au in taught, and by aw in saw. This sound is shortened in what, quadrant, quality. Its remaining sound is the Italian one mentioned above, as in father, glass.

The vowel e has the sound of long a in a few words, as in prey, survey, their.

The letter i retains its French sound, that of the English long e, in some words which we have received from the French language, as in pique, marine, machine.

The vowel o, in a few words, has the sound of oo, the French ou, as in move, prove, lose. This sound of oo is shortened in book, look. In a few words, o has the sound of u short, as in dove, love.

The first sound of y, as in dry, is the same as that of i in pine; and its short sound in glory, pity, is the same as that of i in pin, brisk. This short sound of i and y is, properly, the short sound of e long. Hence little, when the first vowel is prolonged, becomes leelle. Hence been is pronounced bin.

The short e in let is nearly, but not precisely, the short sound of a in late.

[Short e before r at the end of a word, and before r followed by any consonant but itself in the middle of a word, verges toward the sound of short u, as in her, fertile, in which e has not exactly the same sound as in herring, ferry. Most persons, indeed, as Smart remarks, run completely into the sound of short u, pronouncing the first syllable of mercy and of murder alike. Those who are more delicate in their pronunciation, endeavor to avoid this in accented syllables, retaining very slightly the sound of short e, though it is difficult to do this, in some cases, without running into the sound of a. These remarks apply also to the sound of short i and y in the same circumstances, as in sir, circle, mirth, &c. Smart remarks that, "even among the more refined classes, sir, dirt, bird, are pronounced sur, durt, burd; and, indeed, in all very common words, it would be somewhat affected to insist on the delicacy referred to."]

The vowel u, in some words, has the sound of oo in book, as in pull, full, put.

The letter u, in some words, is pronounced yu, in which case it is anomalous, representing both a consonant and a vowel. This pronunciation occurs in words which begin with u, forming a syllable by itself; as in unite, union, unanimous; and before r, as in failure, measure, insure, and in a few other cases.

Some English writers allege that the proper sound of u is yu. This is a great mistake; the true sound is nearly eu, but these letters do not express its exact sound.

The letter w has its form and its name from the union of two v's, in old books; v being called yu. This name is ill chosen, and not adapted to express its sound. This letter is, properly, a vowel, with the sound of oo, French ou, but shortened in pronunciation, as in duell, pronounced doel.

That w is a vowel, is proved by the fact, that its sound, oo, may be prolonged at pleasure, with the same position of the organs; and it has the same sound both in the middle and at the beginning of a word; as in duell, well. Yet at the beginning of a word, it is preceded by a, as a wall, a woollen garment, which has led writers to number it among the consonants.

W, before another vowel, forms a diphthongal sound; at least this combination seems to deserve a place among diphthongs. It corresponds exactly with u before a vowel, as in equal, equity, iniquity, antiquity, quote, question, persuade, in which w might be substituted for u, as it is in the Dutch language.

In a few words, w is written before h, but pronounced after it, as in when, white, pronounced hooen, hoaits. This absurdity has proceeded from a change of the order of letters in the Saxon, in which h preceded u; thus, hwoen, hwite.

* The Spanish puño is the Latin pugnus; and our word pawen, the D. paend, is the Latin pignus. So we pronounce impawen, for impugn, French impugner, from the Latin pugno, pugna.* How far these facts tend to show the Latin pronunciation, let the reader judge.

Before r, as in terench, wring, w is not pronounced. Before the diphthong ou, as in wound, w aids in forming a triphthong.

Following o, w forms part of a diphthong, as in now, row; or is mute, as in low, slow, snow.

Two vowels rapidly pronounced in one syllable, constitute a diphthong; as oi in join; oy in joy; ou in sound; and ow in row.

Two vowels in succession, when one only is pronounced, do not form a diphthong. In my books I follow Sheridan, and denominate such vowels a digraph; that is, double written. Such are the following: ai, ay, au, aw, ea, ee, ei, eu, ew, ey, ie, oi, ui.

Consonants are the letters which represent the articulations of the organs. The letters of this sort, in the English language, are the following, in large and small characters: B, b; C, c; D, d; F, f; G, g; H, h; J, j; K, k; L, l; M, m; N, n; P, p; Q, q; R, r; S, s; T, t; V, v; X, x; Z, z.

The articulations or jointings made by these letters, may be learned from the following syllables: ab, ac, ad, af, ag, aj, ak, al, am, an, op, aq, ar, as, at, av, az. Observe the point of contact in the organs which stops the sound.

The letters b, f, p, m, v, represent the articulations of the lips, and are called labials, or lip-letters.

The consonants d, t, l, n, and th, represent the jointings of the tongue and the upper teeth, or gum in which the teeth are inserted. For this reason, they are denominated dentals, or tooth-letters.

The consonants close c, close g, k, and q, represent the articulations of the lower part of the tongue and upper part of the mouth, or palate; hence they are called palatals, or palate-letters.

The consonants s and z represent the position of the end of the tongue near the upper teeth; and when pronounced, the breath issues or is driven out between the tongue and teeth, with a hissing; hence these letters are called sibilants, or hissing-letters. The letter c before e, i, and y, is precisely equivalent to s.

The letter r is uttered with a jar or vibration of the end of the tongue, near the upper teeth.

The letters j and x represent each two sounds; those of j may be expressed by dj, and those of x by ks. The consonant g before e, i, and y, is, in many words, the exact equivalent of j.

The close articulations interrupt all distinct sound; such are k, p, and t, as in ak, ap, at. These are called mutes. B and d are mutes, but less close.

C and g are close articulations at the end of syllables, as in public, rog. At the beginning of syllables, they are close before a, o, and u, as in can, cot, cud; gap, go, gun. But before e, i, and y, c is equivalent to s, as in cedar, city, cycle; and g is sometimes close, as in gift, and sometimes compound, as in general, ginger.

The consonants which represent articulations not close, are f, l, m, n, r, s, v, z; as in the syllables ef, el, em, en, er, es, ev, ez.

H represents breathing, and is denominated aspirate.

There are, in English, four articulations, for which there are no single characters; but they are represented by ch, sh, th, and ng.

The sound of ch, as in church, cheer, may be represented by tsh. The sound of sh occurs in shine, shall. It is precisely equivalent to the French ch.

Th are aspirated in think, throne; but vocal in that, thou.

Walker, in explaining the letters of the alphabet, represents or denominates the consonant b as flat, and p as sharp; v as flat, and f as sharp; d as flat, and t as sharp; th in thee, thou, as flat, and th in think, as sharp. These epithets do not express the powers of these consonants, nor the differences between them. The true representation of them is this: B is a labial, representing a less close articulation than p, which indicates a compression of the lips, that instantly stops all sound. The articulation is the same. D represents a less close articulation of the tongue and upper teeth than t. T represents an articulation of the upper teeth and the lower lip, with a breathing without sound; v represents the same articulation with sound. S represents a near articulation of the end of the tongue and the upper teeth, with a breathing or hissing without sound; z represents the same articulation with a hissing sound. The same distinction exists between the articulation sh as in fresh, and that of zh as in osier, fusion, delusion.

The sound of ng is simple, and occurs in sing, thing, in which the articulation is not close. The same is also true of the participles and verbals, as singing, singer. But there is another class of words, as anger, longer, in which the g goes to the subsequent syllable, while, at the same time, the peculiar sound of ng is retained on the preceding syllable. To indicate this, such words are marked with a double accent, thus, an''ger, lon''ger, denoting that they are not to be pronounced either ang-er, or an-ger, but with the peculiar sound of ng followed by g, as described above.

Yet there are not, in this case, two articulations, as some orthoëpists seem to suppose. The g directly succeeds the peculiar sound of ng without any new position of the organs, so that there is only one articulation or jointing between the syllables, though that is a close one.

Orthoëpists represent, that, in the combination nk, as in ink, bank, n has the sound of ng. This is a mistake. The sound of ng is nasal, the articulation being less close than nk. If the n in such words had the sound of ng, then ink would have a nasal sound, ing, preceding k; but this is not the fact; on the other hand, the close articulation k stops all sound. Walker, then, in representing bank, brink, as being pronounced bangk, bringk, entirely mistakes the fact.

NOTE.—In this work, the diphthongs of foreign words, from which anglicized words are derived, are very often rejected; as in economy, edematous, atheneum, maneuver, pean. The diphthongs æ and æ are of difficult formation in writing, and of no use in English words.

RULES FOR PRONUNCIATION,

AND EXPLANATIONS OF THE MANNER OF DESIGNATING SOUNDS IN THIS WORK.

The first or long sound of the vowels is designated by a horizontal mark over the vowel, thus, a, ê, i, ô, u, y. This mark is not necessary (though it is here used) in words and syllables ending in e, after a single consonant, as in fute, mctc, rite, note, mute, in which the first vowel is long, and the final e is silent. So also it is unnecessary in the last syllables of colonnade, fortitude, antipode, suicide, proselyte, consecrate, and others of similar formation.

The first sound of a vowel is also indicated by the mark of accent immediately after the vowel, as in fa'vor, ce'dar, ri'tal, glo'ry, tru'ly, cy'cle.

The second or short sound of a single vowel is indicated by one or more consonants terminating the word or syllable, as in ban, band, pen, bend, pin, flint, not, plot, sun, must, cyst, withstand, descend, rotund.

The short sound is also indicated by the mark of accent immediately after a single consonant, as in sal'ary, en'ergy, in'famy, bot'an'y, hus'band, symbol.

The third or broad sound of a is designated by two points under the vowel; thus, ba''ll, broa'd. But the necessity of these points is superseded by a general rule, that, in most words in which a is followed by ld, lk, ll, as in bald, balk, fall, the letter a has its broad sound. [Still the a is generally used for greater clearness.]

This broad sound occurs in the digraphs au and aw; as in taught, lavo.

When this broad a is shortened, the sound is indicated by a single point under a; as in what, quadrant.

The fourth or Italian sound of a is designated by two points over the letter; thus, ba''r, ma''st, fa''ther.

The letter e having the sound of a long, has a mark under the letter; as in prey, concey.

The letters i and o, when they have the sound of u short, have a curving mark; thus, btrd, döve.

The vowel o has, in a few words, the sound of oo, French ou, which is indicated by two dots over the letter; thus, möve, löse. This sound, when shortened, is designated by a point under each of the vowels; thus, boökl, looökl; bush, full.

The two letters oo, without points, have the sound of the French ou; as in fool, room.

The digraphs ai, ay, always have the sound of the first or long a, unless otherwise marked.

The digraphs ea, ee, ei, ie, always have the sound of the first or long e, unless otherwise marked.

In all cases, when one vowel of a digraph is marked, that vowel has the sound designated by the mark, and the other is quiescent; thus, upbräid, orräyed, declüt, siège, apptear, cöurse, flöat, broä'd, vein, shöw.

By marking the vowel o, in the digraphs ou and ow, the digraph is distinguished from the diphthong; thus, in source, ou are a digraph; but in sour they are a diphthong; and böw, a weapon, is distinguished from bow, to bend.

Thus ou and ow, without a mark, are always diphthongs.

The digraphs eu, ew, and ui, have the sound of the first u; as in feud, brevé, bruisse. The writers who attempt to give u and eu, after r, the sound of oo, as in rude, brew, [rood, broo,] encourage an affected pronunciation. In all such words, u and ew have the proper sound of u in duty, tumult, lucid, both in this country and in the general usage in England. Some persons affect to pronounce the letters e and o distinctly, e and oo; but this affectation was condemned by Wallis, as early as the reign of Charles II.

The vowel i, in the termination ice, is always short; as in notize, relative, pronounced notiv, relativ.

The peculiar articulation of the letter r renders it necessary to utter a slight sound of e short between a vowel and that letter. Thus, bare, mere, miré, more, mure, are pronounced bæer, mæer, mier, mæer, mæer; so in parent, apparent, pronounced nearly pæerent, appæerent. This necessity makes a slight variation in the sound of a, but too inconsiderable to deserve a particular mark of distinction.

The accented syllable is designated by this mark ' at the end, as in lab'or, gl'o'ry, ten'or, amend', del'riment, withd'raw, avou'r, destroy', renew'.

After syllables having two or more consonants followed by e quiescent, or a diphthong, the accent has no effect upon the vowel, as in dislodge', rejoice'.

In many cases, the mark over the vowel might designate both the sound of the vowel and the accented syllable, as in abrâde, upbrâid, dedâce, besiège; but the accent is uniformly marked.*

The letters ch, in words from the French, are pronounced as sh, and over the letter c is a mark; thus, châise, pronounced shâyze.

The letters cc, ci, and ti, before a vowel, often blend into the sound of sh. Thus, ocean, Phocion, motion, are pronounced o'shun, Pho'shun, mo'shun. Hence, ceous, cious, tious, blend into the syllable shus, as in cetaceous, gracious, factions, pronounced ceta'shus, gra'shus, fac'shus.†

The termination sion, after a consonant, is pronounced shun; concession is pronounced concesh'un. But after a vowel, it is pronounced zhun; diffusion is pronounced diffu'zhun.

The termination tion, in most words, is pronounced shun, after a vowel or consonant; nation, affection, are pronounced na'shun, offec'shun.

In a few words, tian, tion, are pronounced chun; as in Christian, bastion. Egyptian is an exception; Egyptshun.

The termination sier, when not under the accent, is pronounced zhur or zhur, as in o'ssier, bra'ssier; but when under the accent, it has the sound of seer, as in cuirassier'.

When two accents occur after e or i, and before ci and ti, they indicate that the preceding syllable ends with the pronunciation of sh. Thus, pre'ccious, vi'tiate, are pronounced pres'h'ous, rish'ate; the ci and ti blending into the sound of sh.

In such words as pronunciation, euphony seems to require that cia should be uttered in two syllables, pro-nun-ci-a'tion, to prevent the repetition of the sound of sh; pronunshashun.†

Dr. Ash remarks, that the different vowels, in unaccented syllables, are pronounced alike, or nearly so. Thus, in the words altar, alter, manner, manor, murmur, all the vowels of the last syllables have nearly the same sound. Hence it is useless to mark the unaccented vowels, their sounds being too obscure and indistinct to be defined, or to be distinguished by marks. The nice distinctions between them, if any exist, are to be acquired only by usage and good taste.

The letters gh, in most English words, are quiescent. In the following, they are pronounced like f; cough, chough, clough, enough, hough, laugh, rough, slough, tough, trough.

H after r is mute, as in rhétoric.

G and k before n are mute, as in gnaw, knave.

W before r is mute, as in wrest, wrong.

In a few words, h after w is pronounced before it, as in what, whick.

In the termination en, e is usually mute, as in broken, pronounced brokn.

The final e is mute after l, in the following syllables: ble, cle, dle, fle, gle, kle, ple, tle, zle.

B after m is mute, as in dumb.

L is mute before k, as in walk; before m, as in calm; and before f, as in half, calf.

N is mute after m, as in hymn.

Ph are always pronounced like f, as in philosophy; but they are silent in phthisic, pronounced tizzic.

P is mute before s, as in psalm; and before t, as in ptyalism, Ptolemy.

In the terminating syllable of adjectives, ous, the letter o is always silent.

The unaccented y, at the end of words, is short, like i in pin, pit, as in glory, probity. In the plural of such words, ies are pronounced iz, as glories, pronounced gloriz.

But y, in monosyllables, has its first sound, as in dry, my; and in verbs and plurals of nouns the same sound occurs in the inflections, as in fly, flies; try, tries; pronounced fitze, trizze.

In the termination fy, the y has its first sound, as in fortify. So also i in the last syllable of fortifies.

S has its proper sound after f, p, k, t, and th aspirate, as in chiefs, caps, franks, pits, deaths.

S has the sound of z after b, d, g, gh, l, m, n, r, s and ss, z, v, aw, ay, ew, ey, oic, oy, sh, ng, th vocal, ch, oc, ie, and after c followed by e final; as in robs, robes, ruces, rods, rides, rags, rages, toils, dreams, sighs, rains, bars, waves, roses, passes, mazes, laics, days, news, preys, voies, joys, brushes, sings, breathes, churches, foes, flies.

S before m has the sound of z, as in spasm, baptism.

The letter z, in Welsh words, is pronounced as the vocal th in that, thou.

In many cases, a word, the better to express the pronunciation, is written a second time, in the letters most proper for the purpose. In this case, the pronunciation of the radical word is to be observed in the derivatives, unless otherwise noted. Thus, bright is written brite, to show the pronunciation; and this pronunciation is to be observed in its derivatives, brightness, brightly.

The letter u, it has been remarked, has the sound of yu in words in which this letter forms a syllable by itself, as in u-nit, u-nanxious, u-biquity, u-surp, and in some monosyllables, as in use, pronounced yuse.

In extending this sound to u after d, as in gradual, credulous, Walker has changed the sound of d to that of dj; and gradual becomes gradjual or grajual; credulous is changed to credjulous or crejulous. But this pronunciation of Walker is severely condemned by Jameson and Knowles. So also Walker's butsheus for beauteous, plentshus for plenteous, are condemned and discarded. The same fate attends Walker's ingrejent for ingredient, and other words of a like orthography.

The present practice is to give to u the sound of yu, in such words as nature, feature, rapture; which are pronounced nât-yur, feat-yur, rapt-yur. This practice seems to have been adopted to avoid the common corruption of a change of t into tsh, as in nâtshur — a pronunciation condemned by the latest orthoëpists.

But in words of more syllables than two, this pronunciation of u as yu, in the last syllable, as in caricature, literature, judicature, is not to be commended. [Still, as the corruption referred to occurs quite as frequently in words of this class as in those of two syllables, it has been thought best to place them all on the same footing, and to mark with the sound of u as heard in unite, all the terminations in ure, with their derivatives.]

The termination ed, in the past tense and participles of verbs, retains the vowel e, in this vocabulary, for showing the proper orthography, especially to foreigners; but in the customary pronunciation, this vowel is omitted, except after d and t. Thus, abandoned, delivered, charmed, are pronounced abandoned, delivered, charm'd. This rule extends to all cases, except to some formal uses of particular words, or to occasional uses of some words in verse.

After d and t, this termination ed is, from necessity, pronounced as a distinct syllable; as in abraded, hated.

* It is said by some writer, that the accent never falls on a vowel, but always on a consonant. This is a great mistake. The last syllable of foresee has the accent on the last syllable, and on the vowels which end the syllable. In open, the accent is on the first syllable, in which there is no consonant.

† The English orthoëpists allege that the letter c, in such words, has the sound of sh. This is a mistake. The pronunciation of sh, in such words, is the effect of blending the sound of c with the following vowel. This mistake has misled Walker and others into a multitude of errors.

ORTHOGRAPHY OF DR. WEBSTER,

AS EXHIBITED IN THIS VOLUME.

1. Terminations in our changed into or.—Such words as favor, labor, &c., formerly ending in our, drop the u. One word, however, is here given in both ways, viz., Savior, Saviour.

2. Terminations in ck changed into c.—Words of more than one syllable, ending in ic or iac, which formerly ended in k, have dropped the k, as in music, maniac, &c. Add to these almanac, sandarac, limbec (from alembic); also havoc. The k's is retained (1) in a few derivatives, as colicky, trafficker, mimicking, &c., to prevent an erroneous pronunciation; (2) in all monosyllables, as sick, stick, wreck, &c., and hence in their compounds, as brain-sick, candlestick, shipwreck, &c.; (3) in all other terminations except ic and iac, as in arrack, hammock, &c.

3. Terminations in re changed into er.—Such words as centre, metre, theatre, &c., with their compounds, have the re changed into er, as center, meter, theater, &c. Some hundreds of words, like chamber, cider, diameter, &c., have already undergone this change, which is here extended to about twenty more, to complete the analogy. Acre, lucre, and massacre, are necessarily excepted, because the change would lead to an erroneous pronunciation. The above words, however, are here given in both modes of spelling.

4. Words in which the final consonant is not doubled in adding such formatives as ize, ed, er, &c.—It is a rule extending to many hundreds of cases, that, in adding to a word such formatives as ing, ed, er, &c., a single consonant at the end of a word is doubled when the accent falls on the last syllable, as in forgetting, beginning, excelling; but is not doubled when the accent falls on any preceding syllable, as in benefiting, gardener, &c. This rule has been violated in the case of about fifty words ending in l, whose derivatives have had the l doubled, as traveller, &c. These words are here restored to their true analogous spelling, as recommended by Walker, Lowth, Perry, and others, as in traveling, canceled, leveler, counselor, duelist, marvelous, &c. On the same principle, woolen is spelled with a single l. It does not interfere with this rule that chancellor, and the derivatives of metal and crystal, as metalline, metallurgy, crystalline, crystallize, &c., have the l doubled, since they come directly from the Latin cellarius and metallum (Greek μεταλλον), and the Greek χειρωναλος. The above rule is also applied to the derivatives of worship and bias, making them worshipping, worshiped, worshiper, biasing, biased. Bigoted has already taken its true spelling with but one t, and such should be the spelling of carbureted, sulphureted, &c.

5. Distinction between verbs in ize and ise.—Verbs from the Greek ιζω, and others formed in analogy with them, have the termination ize, as baptize, legalize, &c. Catechise and exorcise are exceptions. Verbs, and also some nouns, derived directly from the French, with a few from other sources, end in ise, as advertise, advise, affranchise, amortise, chastise, circumeise, comprise, compromise, criticize, demise, despise, devise, disfranchise, disguise, divertise, emprise, enfranchise, enterprise, exercise, monumise, merchandise, misprise (to mistake), premise, reprise (to take again), revise, supervise, surmise, surprise.

6. Terminations in able.—Able, when incorporated into words ending with silent e, cuts it off, as in blamable, except after c or g, as in noticeable, changeable.

7. Compounds of words ending in ll.—Such compounds as befall, miscall, install, forestall, intrall, enroll, retain the double l, to prevent a false pronunciation, making the last vowel short, as befal, enrol, &c. For the same reason, double l should be retained in the nouns installment, intrallment, thralldom, and enrollment.

8. DEFENSE, OFFENSE, and PRETENSE.—In these words, s is substituted for c, because s is used in the derivatives, as defensive, offensive, pretension. The words expense, recompense, and license, have, on this ground, undergone the same alteration within comparatively a short period, and a change in the three mentioned above would complete the analogy. These words are here given in both forms of spelling.

9. FORETELL, DISTILL, INSTILL, FULFILL.—These words retain the ll of their primitives, for it must be retained in the participles and other derivatives, as foretelling, distiller, instilling, fulfilled, &c. In this case, it is only necessary to remember the rule, that the spelling of the original words tell, still, fill, is retained in all the derivatives.

10. CONNECTION, DEFLECTION, INFLECTION, REFLECTION.—These follow the spelling of their verbs, connect, deflect, inflect, reflect.

11. Derivatives of DULL, SKILL, WILL, and FULL.—These retain the ll, viz. dullness, fullness, skillful, willful, to prevent the inconvenience of exceptions to a general rule. Walker says, there is no reason why we should not write dullness, fullness, skillful, and willful, as well as stiffness, gruffness, and crossness.

12. Derivatives of VILLAIN.—The derivatives of villain ought to retain the i, as in villainous, villainy, &c. This is the case in all similar words when the ain is not under the accent, as mountainous from mountain, captaincy from captain, chieftaincy from chieftain, chaplaincy from chaplain, certainty from certain, &c. Both modes of spelling, however, are given in this volume.

13. MOULD and MOULT.—These words should be written mold and molt, like gold, bold, fold, colt, &c., in which the u has been dropped, or was never introduced; but they are here given in both ways.

14. Terms in chemistry.—The orthography oxyd (from ὀξύς) is considered preferable to oxide, because in all other derivatives the Greek v is represented by the English y, as in oxygen, hydrogen, &c. In such terminations as chlorid, fluorid, ammid, &c., the final e is not used, because they are formed in analogy with acid, and the e is unnecessary, and might lead to the error of giving a long sound to the preceding i. Such words as salicin, cerin, veratrin, &c., also omit the final e in most cases, because it is unnecessary, though it is retained in bramine, chlorine, fluorine, iodine, and a very few others. The spelling of the last class of words has the authority of Brande's Encyclopedia, the Penny Cyclopaedia, and some distinguished chemical works.

15. WOE.—This word takes the final e, like doe, foe, hoe, sloe, zoe, and all similar nouns of one syllable. The termination in o belongs, among monosyllables, to the other parts of speech, as go, so, and to nouns of more than one syllable, as motto, potato, tomato, &c.

16. PRACTICE, as a verb.—This verb should be spelled like the noun, with a c, as in notice, apprentice, and all similar words in which the accent precedes the last syllable. The distinction of spelling between the noun and verb belongs properly to words accented on the last syllable, as device, n., devise (pronounced de-vice), v. To apply the distinction here, and spell the verb practise, tends to give it the same pronunciation (practize) as we often find in uneducated persons; but as this spelling, though in opposition to the regular analogy, is more prevalent, the verb is here given in both ways.

17. DROUEN is given as spelled by Spenser, Bacon, &c., and as still extensively pronounced; and hight as spelled by Milton, and derived from high. They are, however, placed under drought and height, the more ordinary spelling, though, on some accounts, the old spelling is to be preferred.

The Arabic vowels are only three, viz. Fatha, َ a, e; Kesra, ِ e, i; Dhamma, ُ o, u.

The diacritical signs are Jesm ◌ or quiescent Sheva; Teshdid ◌◌ or Dagesh forte; Hamza ◌ placed over Elif when radical.

Nunation or double final vowels, ◌◌◌, showing that they are to be pronounced an, en or in, on or un.

The Persians use the Arabic alphabet, with the addition of Pe, پ; Che, چ; Ghaf, غ; and Zhe, ژ.

NOTE.—In the foregoing alphabets, the order of the Arabic and Ethiopic letters is conformed to that of the Chaldee and Hebrew. The reader will observe two or three defects, which are owing to the imperfection of the fonts of type

DIRECTIONS AND EXPLANATIONS.

. Compound words, which in ordinary writing have the parts separated by a hyphen, are arranged, when numerous, directly after the word which forms their first part. In many cases, however, especially when their number is small, they are arranged in their regular alphabetical order. If, then, a compound word is not found in the first-mentioned place, it should be sought in its strictly alphabetical order.

. At the end of some of the etymologies, there are references, (as, under the word ANATE, "See Class Bd. No. 23, 33,") which point to corresponding parts in the author's "Synopsis of Words in Twenty Languages"—a work which has not yet been published.

REMARKS.

1. Improper Diphthongs.—In these, the vowel which is sounded is alone marked, as in ai, ea, or ei, ou, &c.
 2. Double Accent (").—This is used in two cases: (1) When, in such words as an'ger, (pronounced ang'ger), the g is, as it were, drawn back to the preceding syllable, forming with n the sound of ng, while it is also retained with its proper hard sound in its own syllable. Thus the distinction is marked between such words as lon'ger, of greater length, and long'er, one who longs. (2) When, in the case of e or i followed by ci or ti, the sound of sh is drawn back to the preceding syllable, as in spe'cial, discre'tion, addi'tion, vi'cious, (pronounced spesh'al, diskresh'un, addish'un, vish'us.) The double accent is also used when the sound of zh is drawn back, as in transi'tion, vi'sion, (pronounced transizh'un, vish'un;) but this peculiarity is also indicated either by respelling or by the marked s. When the single accent (') and double accent (") both occur on the same word, the former is to be considered the primary, and the latter the secondary accent, as in cheese'mon'ger.
 3. Vowels in Italics.—Vowels which are italicized are not sounded, as the a in metal; the e in used, hazel, burden; the i in evil, cousin; the o in beckon, &c. Hence, the termination ed in participles and adjectives, when the e is italicized, though separated to the eye, does not to the ear form a distinct syllable. Thus used is pronounced in one syllable.
 4. Accented Syllables.—When an accented syllable ends in a consonant, the vowel which it contains has its regular short or shut sound, unless otherwise denoted according to the key.
 5. Unaccented Syllables.—When an unaccented syllable ends in a vowel other than e mute, this vowel has an obscure or faint sound, unless otherwise marked. The obscure a is usually the short Italian a, as in America. The obscure e, i, and y, have the open sound of e shortened, as in event, labial, duty; and hence, in respelling for pronunciation, the e is used to denote these sounds. The obscure o and u have their regular open sounds, but somewhat shortened, as in monopoly, superfluous. When the unaccented syllable ends in a consonant, the vowel which it contains, if single, has its regular short or shut sound, as in assign, explain, furnish, connective, calumny; but a in such words as monarchy, &c., has the faint sound of the Italian a. In neither of these cases should the sound of the other vowels (a, e, i, o, y) run into that of u in tub.
 6. Terminations in ICE, IGE, &c.—When the i in such terminations as ice, ige, ile, ime, ine, ise, ite, ire, is not marked with any distinctive character, it is to be considered short, as in malice, vestige, hostile, feminine, &c., pronounced mal'is, ves'tij, hos'til, fem'inin, &c.
 7. Long a before r.—The long sound of a before r in the same syllable, as heard in fare, pair, parent, bear, &c., is nearly the same as in fat; or, more exactly, it begins with the latter sound, and ends with the faint sound of e or g. In this case, however, the a should never be made a distinct syllable, fai'er, pay'rent, but fare, &c. So prayer, though spelled in two syllables, should be pronounced in one, as prā're. By many, however, the first part of this compound sound is entirely omitted, and the a in fare, &c., is pronounced like the a in fat, but much lengthened in quantity. This, according to Smart and all the later orthoëpists, as well as Walker, is a departure from true English usage.

 8. Italian a.—The sound of a in far, daunt, &c., and its sound in fast, pant, &c., being radically the same, is represented by the same character, a. Yet, in words like fast, clasp, ask, pass, wait, path, pant, &c., the sound is not so much prolonged as in far; and in such words as dance, advantage, it is shortened still more, and by some is changed into the sound of a in fat.
 9. Broad a.—The distinction between the broad a (a), or aw, and the same sound shortened (a), as in what, is readily perceived. In some words, however, as salt, cobalt, &c., the a is not so broad as in all, nor so short as in what; but, in respect to this nicer distinction, the ear must decide.
 10. Short z before r.—The sound of short e before r at the end of a word, or followed by another consonant than r, as in confer, perform, herd, earth, &c., is nearly the same as that of short u before r; but some, particularly in England, attempt, in this case, to give the e its regular short sound, as heard in hen, hers'd, herring. The same remarks may be made respecting ir, to which some attempt, in such words as virgin, mirth, &c., to give the regular sound of short e and r.
 11. Short o.—The shut sound of o before r in the same syllable, as in nor, being unavoidably the same as that of a, is not marked with any distinctive character. A sound intermediate in length between that of a in all and of o in not is heard in such words as off, soft, song, cloth, loss, frost, &c. Here, however, a drawl is carefully to be avoided.
 12. Long v.—The long or open sound of u has been considered by many as a diphthong composed of e, or y, and oo. Dr. Webster regarded it, in most cases, as a peculiar vowel sound, nearly resembling e and oo, but so much closer as hardly to be diphthongal; and considered the sound as yoo only when it begins a syllable, or when it is heard in certain terminations, as in ure, &c. There is a strong tendency, which ought to be carefully avoided, to change this sound into oo after d, l, n, and s, as dooty for düty, &c.; but in avoiding this, as Smart remarks, the u must be kept very close, and not run into duty or de-uty. Walker sounds u like oo after r; but even here, the best speakers, in Dr. Webster's view, give a slight softening between the vowel and the consonant, pronouncing rude in a less broad and open manner than rood, i. e., giving the u its distinctive sound.
 13. Respelling for Pronunciation.—(1) In respelling the French en, on, &c., the letters ng are designed simply to mark the vowel as nasal, and are not to be pronounced themselves. (2) The respelling of a word, when a number of related words follow, applies to all of them down to some other word which is respelled. (3) Compound words, which are not respelled or otherwise marked, are to be pronounced like the simple words of which they are composed; but of and with at the end of compounds, like hereof, herewith, &c., have their final consonants sounded as in doff, smith.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY

OF

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A

A is the first letter of the alphabet in most of the known languages of the earth; in the Ethiopic, however, it is the thirteenth, and in the Italic, the twelfth. It is naturally the first letter, because it represents the first vocal sound naturally formed by the human organs; being the sound uttered with a mere opening of the mouth without constraint, and without any effort to alter the natural position or configuration of the lips. Hence this letter is found in many words first uttered by infants; which words are the names of the objects with which infants are first concerned, as the breast, and the parents. Hence in Hebrew אָם am, is mother, and אָב ab, is father. In Chaldee and Syriac, abba is father; in Arabic, aba; in Ethiopic, abi; in Malayan and Bengalese, bappa; in Welsh, tad, whence we retain dad; in Old Greek and in Gothic, atta; in Irish, athair; in Cantabrian, aita; in Lapponic, atki; in Abyssinian, abba; in Amharic, aba; in Shillite and Melludane, African dialects, baba; and papa is found in many nations. Hence the Latin mamma, the breast, which is, in popular use, the name of mother; in Swedish, amma is a nurse. This list might be greatly extended; but these examples prove A to be the first natural vocal sound, and entitled to the first place in alphabets. The Hebrew name of this letter, aleph, signifies an ox or a leader.

A has, in English, four sounds; the long or slender, as in place, fate; the broad, as in wall, fall, which is short-ned in squad, what; the open, or Italian, as in father, which is shortened in china; and the short sound, as in fat. Its primitive sound was probably aw. A is also an abbreviation of the Saxon an or one, used before words beginning with an articulation; as, a table, instead of an table, or one table. This is a mod-ri change; for in Saxon an was used before consonants as well as vowels; as, an tid, a time, an gear, a year. [See AN.]

This letter serves as a prefix to many English words, as in asleep, anake, afloat, around, agoing. In some cases, this is a contraction of the Youtonic ge, as in asleep; anere, from the Saxon geslapan, to sleep, gewarisa, to beware; the Dutch gewaar. Sometimes it is a corruption of the Saxon on; as, agains, from on gean; awake, from onwacian, to watch or wake. Before particles, it may be a contraction of the Celtic ag, the sign of the particle of the present tense; as, ag-rath, saying; ag-saying, ag-going. Or this may be a contraction of an, or what is equally probable, it may have proceeded from a mere accidental sound produced by negligent utterance. In some words, a may be a contraction of at, of, in, to, or as. In some words of Greek original, a is privative, giving to them a negative sense, as in anonymous, from a and onymos, name.

Among the ancients, A was a numeral, denoting 500; and with a dash, A, 5000. In the Hebrew, Syr., Ch., Sam., and Ar., it denotes one or unity. In the Julian calendar, A is the first of the seven dominical letters.

Among logicians, A, as an abbreviation, stands for a universal affirmative proposition. A asserts;

E denies. Thus in barbara, a, thrice repeated, denotes so many of the propositions to be universal.

The Roman used A to signify a negative or dissent in giving their votes; A standing for antiquo, I oppose or object to the proposed law. Opposed to this letter were U, R., uti rogas, be it as you desire—the words used to express assent to a proposition. These letters were marked on wooden ballots, and each voter had an affirmative and a negative put into his hands, one of which, at pleasure, he gave as his vote.—In criminal trials, A. stood for absolvo, I acquit; C. for condemno, I condemn; and N. L. for non liquet, it is not evident; and the judges voted by ballots thus marked.—In inscriptions, A. stands for Augustus; or for ager, annus, aurum, argentum, &c.

A. is also used for anno; as in A. D., for anno Domini, the year of our Lord; and A. M., for anno mundi, the year of the world; and also for ante, as in A. M., for ante meridiem, before noon; and for arts, as in A. M., for artium magister, master of arts. With the Romans, A. U. C. stood for anno urbis condite, in the year from the building of the city of Rome.

In algebra, a and the first letters of the alphabet represent known quantities—the last letters are sometimes used to represent unknown quantities.

In music, A is the nominal of the sixth note in the natural diatonic scale—called by Guido la. It is also the name of one of the two natural moods; and it is the open note of the 2d string of the violin, by which the other strings are tuned and regulated.

In pharmacy, ℞ or ℞℞, abbreviations of the Greek ana, signify of each separately, or that the things mentioned should be taken in quantities of the same weight or measure.

In chemistry, A A stand for amalgama, or amalgamation.

In commerce, A. stands for accepted, as in case of a bill of exchange. Merchants also number their books by the letters, A, B, C, instead of figures. Public officers number their exhibits in the same manner; as the document A, or B.

Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, are used in Scripture for the beginning and end—representative of Christ.

In mathematics, letters are used as representatives of numbers, lines, angles, and quantities. In arguments letters are substituted for persons, in cases supposed, or stated for illustration; as, A contracts with B to deliver property to D.—In the English phraseology, “a landlord has a hundred a year,” “the sum amounted to ten dollars a man,” a is merely the adjective one, and this mode of expression is idiomatic; a hundred in a [one] year; ten dollars to a [one] man.

AA, n. [Ch. אָפּה, or אָפּה, a cubit, a measure containing five or six palms.] A measure of liquids among the Dutch, varying in different cities from 37 to 41 English wine gallons.

AA-RON'IC, adj. Pertaining to Aaron, the Jew-AA-RON'IC-AL, adj. Ish high priest, or to the priesthood of which he was the head. Doddridge.

AB, in English names, is an abbreviation of Abbey or Abbot; as Abulam, Abbey-town, or Abbot-town.

AB, a prefix to words of Latin origin, and a Latin preposition, as in abduct, is the Greek apo, and the Eng. of, Ger. ab, D. af, Sw. Jan. af, written, in ancient Latin, af. It denotes from, separating or departure.

AB; the Hebrew name of father. [See AA.]
AB; the eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of the ecclesiastical year, answering to a part of July, and a part of August. In the Syriac calendar, Ab is the name of the last summer month.

AB'A-CA, n. A kind of flax in the Philippine Islands.
AB-A-CIS/CUS, n. In ancient architecture, the square compartments of Mosaic pavements.

AB'A-CIST, n. [from abacus.]
One that casts accounts; a calculator.
A-BACK', adv. [a and back, Sax. on bac; an, or toward the back. See BACK.]
Toward the back; on the back part; backward.

In seamen's language, it signifies the situation of the sails, when pressed back against the mast by the wind.

Taken aback, is when the sails are carried back suddenly by the wind.

Laid aback, is when the sails are purposely placed in that situation to give the ship sternway.

Mariner's Dict.

AB'A-COT, n. The cap of state, formerly used by English kings, wrought into the figure of two crowns.

AB-AC'TOR, n. [Latin, from abigo, ab and ago, to drive.]

In law, one that feloniously drives away or steals a herd or numbers of cattle at once, in distinction from one that steals a sheep or two.

AB'A-CUS, n. [L. abacus, any thing flat, as a cupboard, a bench, a slate, a table or board for games; Gr. abaç. Usually derived from the Oriental, פָּנֵי אַבָּא, pani abak, dust, because the ancients used tables covered with dust for making figures and diagrams.]

1. Among the Romans, a cupboard or buffet.

2. An instrument to facilitate operations in arithmetic. On this are drawn lines; a counter on the lowest line is one; on the next, ten; on the third, a hundred, &c. On the spaces, counters denote half the number of the line above. Other schemes are called by the same name. The name is also given to a table of numbers cast up; as, an abacus of addition; and, by analogy, to the art of numbering, as in Knighton's Chronicon. Eneyc.

3. In architecture, a table constituting the upper member or crowning of a column and its capital. It is square in the Tuscan, Doric, and Ionic orders, but its sides are arched inward in the Corinthian and Composite. The name is also given to a concave molding on the capital of the Tuscan pedestal, and to the plinth above the boustin in the Tuscan and Doric orders. Eneyc.

4. A game among the Romans; so called from its being played on a board, somewhat in the manner of chess. P. Cyc.

AB'A-CUS HXR-MON'IC-US, n. The structure and disposition of the keys of a musical instrument.

AB'A-CUS MA'JOR, n. A trough used in mines to wash ore in. Eneyc.

AB'A-CUS PY-THA-GORIC-US, n. The multiplication-table, invented by Pythagoras.

AB-BAD'DON, n. [Heb. Ch. Syr. abad, to be lost, or destroyed; to perish.] 1. The destroyer, or angel of the bottomless pit. Rev. ix. 2. The bottomless pit. Milton.

AB-BAX'T, adv. or prep. [Sax. eft, or eft, again. Hence after or after, after, subsequent; Sax. eftan, behind in place; in which word be is prefixed—beaftan, behind—and this word is corrupted into abast.]

A sea term, signifying in or at the hinder part of a ship, or the parts which lie toward the stern; opposed to afore. Relatively, it denotes further aft, or toward the stern; as, abast the mainmast. Abast the beam, is in that arch of the horizon which is between a line drawn at right angles with the keel, and the point to which the stern is directed. It is often contracted into aft. Mar. Dict.

AB-BE'FANCE. See OMBEANCE.

AB-BE'LIEN-A-TE, v. t. [See ALIENATE, ALIENE.] To transfer the title of property from one to another; a term of the civil law, rarely or never used in common law proceedings.

AB-BE'LIEN-A-TED, pp. Transferred from one to another.

AB-BE'LIEN-A-TING, ppr. Transferring from one to another.

AB-BE'LIEN-A-TION, n. The transferring of title to property. [See ALIENATION.]

AB-BAN'DON, v. t. [Fr. abandonner; Sp. and Port. abandonar; It. abbandonare; said to be from ban and donner, to give over to the ban or proscription; or from an or ab and bandum, a flag or ensign.]

1. To forsake entirely; as, to abandon a hopeless enterprise.

Woe to that generation by which the testimony of God shall be abandoned. Dr. Mea.

2. To renounce and forsake; to leave with a view never to return; to desert as lost or desperate; as, to abandon a country; to abandon a cause or party.

3. To give up or resign without control, as when a person yields himself, without restraint, to a propensity; as, to abandon one's self to intemperance. Abandoned ever and abandoned are obsolete.

4. To resign; to yield, relinquish, or give over entirely.

Venus abandoned the cares of empire to his wiser colleague. Gibbon.

5. In commerce, to relinquish to insurers all claim to a ship or goods insured, as a preliminary toward recovering for a total loss. Park.

A-BAN'DON, n. One who totally forsakes or deserts. [Obs.]

2. A relinquishment. [Not used.] Kames.

A-BAN'DON-ED, pp. Wholly forsaken or deserted.

2. a. Given up, as to a vice; hence, extremely wicked, or sinning without restraint; irreclaimably wicked.

A-BAN-DON-EE', n. In law, one to whom any thing is abandoned.

A-BAN'DON-ER, n. One who abandons.

A-BAN'DON-ING, ppr. Forsaking or deserting wholly; renouncing; yielding one's self without restraint.

A-BAN'DON-ING, n. A forsaking; total desertion. When this the helm of justice is abandoned, a universal abandoning of all other posts will succeed. Burke.

A-BAN'DON-MENT, n. A total desertion; a state of being forsaken.

2. In commerce, the relinquishing to underwriters all the property saved from loss by shipwreck, capture, or other peril stated in the policy. This abandonment must be made before the insured can demand indemnification for a total loss. Park.

A-BAN'DUM, n. In old law, any thing forfeited or confiscated.

AB-AN-NI'TION, (an-nish'un), n. [Low Lat.]

A banishment for one or two years for manslaughter. [Not much used.] Dict.

AB-AR-TIC-U-LA'TION, n. [See ARTICULATE.]

In anatomy, that species of articulation or structure of joints, which admits of manifest motion; called also diarthrosis and dearticulation.

A-BAS', n. A weight in Persia used in weighing pearls, one eighth less than the European carat. Encyc. Coxe.

A-BASE', v. t. [Fr. abaisser, from bas, low, or the bottom; W. bais; Latin and Gr. basis; Eng. baze; It. abbassare; Sp. bazo, low. See ABASH.]

1. The literal sense of abase is, to lower or depress, to throw or cast down, as used by Bacon, "to abase the eye." But the word is seldom used in reference to material things.

2. To cast down; to reduce low; to depress; to humble; to degrade; applied to the passions, rank, office, and condition in life.

Those that walk in pride he is able to abase. Dan. iv. Whoever exalteth himself shall be abased. Matt. xxiii. Job xi. 2 Cor. xi.

A-BAS'ED, pp. Reduced to a low state, humbled, depressed.

In heraldry, it is used of the wings of eagles, when the tops are turned downward toward the point of the shield; or when the wings are shut, the natural way of bearing them being spread, with the top pointing to the chief of the angle. Bailey. Chambers.

A-BASE'MENT, n. The act of humbling or bringing low; also, a state of depression, degradation, or humiliation.

A-BASH', v. t. [Heb. and Ch. bash, to be confounded, or ashamed.] To make the spirits to fail; to cast down the countenance; to make ashamed; to confuse or confound, as by exciting suddenly a consciousness of guilt, error, inferiority, &c.

They heard and were abashed. Milton.

A-BASH'ED, pp. Confused with shame, confounded; put to silence; followed by al.

A-BASH'ING, ppr. Putting to shame or confusion.

A-BASH'MENT, n. Confusion from shame.

A-BAS'ING, ppr. Humbling, depressing, bringing low.

A-BAS'IS, or A-BAS'SIS, n. A silver coin of Persia, of the value of twenty cents, about ten pence sterling. Encyc.

A-BAT'A-BLE, n. That may or can be abated; as, an abatable writ or nuisance.

A-BATE', v. t. [Fr. abatre, to beat down; battre, to beat, to strike; Sp. battir, abatir; Port. bater, abater; It. battere, abbattere; Heb. Ch. bata, to beat; Sy. bat id. Ar. habata, to beat, and habata, to beat down, to prostrate. The Saxon has the participle gebated, abated. The prefix is sunk to a in abate, and lost in the participle beat. See Class Bd. No. 23, 33.]

1. To beat down; to pull down; to destroy in any manner; as, to abate a nuisance.

2. To lessen; to diminish; to moderate; as, to abate rent; to abate pride; to abate a demand; to abate courage.

3. To lessen; to mitigate; as, to abate pain, sorrow, or misery. Addison.

4. To overthrow; to cause to fail; to frustrate by judicial sentence; as, to abate a writ.

5. To deject; to depress; as, to abate the soul. [Obs.]

6. To deduct. Nothing to add, and nothing to abate. Pope.

7. To cause to fail; to annul. By the English law, a legacy to a charity is abated by a deficiency of assets.

8. To remit; as, to abate a tax.

A-BATE', v. e. To decrease, or become less in strength or violence; as, pain abates; a storm abates.

2. To fail; to be defeated, or come to naught; as, a writ abates. By the civil law, a legacy to a charity does not abate by deficiency of assets.

3. In law, to enter into a freehold after the death of the last possessor, and before the heir or devisee takes possession. Blackstone.

4. In horsemanship, to perform well a downward motion. A horse is said to abate, or take down his curvets, when, working upon curvets, he puts both his hind legs to the ground at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times. Encyc.

A-BAT'ED, pp. or a. Lessened; decreased; destroyed; mitigated; defeated; remitted; overthrown; depressed.

A-BATE'MENT, n. The act of abating; the state of being abated.

2. A reduction, removing, or pulling down, as of a nuisance. Blackstone.

A-BAT'ER, n. The person or thing that abates.

A-BAT'ING, ppr. Pulling down; diminishing; defeating; remitting.

A-BAT'OR, n. A person who enters into a freehold on the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devisee. Blackstone.

AB-A-TIS, } n. [Fr. abatis.] [from battre or pull-
AB-AT-TIS, } ing down. Fr. abattre.] Rubbish.

In fortification, piles of trees, or branches of trees sharpened, and laid with their points outward, in front of ramparts, to prevent assailants from mounting the walls. Encyc.

A-BAT'TOIR, (a-bat-wor'), n. [Fr.] A building for the slaughtering of cattle.

AB-A-TUDE, n. [from abate.] Any thing diminished. Bailey.

AB-A-TURE, n. [from abate.] Grass beaten or trampled down by a stag in passing. Dict.

A-BA'UM', n. A species of red clay. [Not in use.]

AB-AW'ED, pp. Abashed. [Obs.] Chaucer.

ABB, n. [Sax. ab or obb.] Among weavers, yarn for the warp. Hence abb-wool is wool for the abb. Encyc.

AB'BA, n. In the Chaldee and Syriac, a father; and figuratively, a superior. Sans. appen.

In the Syriac, Coptic and Ethiopic churches, it is a title given to the bishops, and the bishops bestow the title, by way of distinction, on the bishop of Alexandria. Hence the title Baba, or Papa, Pope or Great Father, which the bishop of Alexandria bore, before the bishop of Rome.

AB'BA-CY, n. [from abba, Low Lat. abbatis.] The dignity, rights and privileges of an abbot. It comprehends the government and revenues.

AB-BAT'IC-AL, } a. Belonging to an abbey.
AB-BAT'TIAL, }

AB'BE, (ab'by'), n. [Fr. abbé, from abba.] In a monastic sense, the same as an abbot; but more generally, a title in Roman Catholic countries, without any determinate rank, office, or rights.

The abbots are numerous, and generally have some literary attainments; they dress as academics or scholars, and act as instructors, in colleges and private families; or as tutors to young gentlemen on their travels; and many of them become authors.

AB'BESS, n. [from abba.] A female superior or governess of a nunnery, or convent of nuns, having the authority over the nuns which the abbots have over the monks. [See ABBKY.]

AB'BEY, n. pl. ABBEYS, [from abba.] A monastery or society of persons of either sex, secluded from the world and devoted to religion.

The males are called monks, and governed by an abbot; the females are called nuns, and governed by an abbess. These institutions were suppressed in England by Henry VIII; but they still exist in Roman Catholic countries.

AB'BEY-LUB-BER, n. A name given to monks in contempt for their ill-ness.

AB'BOT, n. [formerly ABBAT, from abba, Latinized abbas, -atis, or from Heb. plural abbah, aboth.] The superior or governor of an abbey or monastery. Originally, monasteries were founded in retired places, and the religious had no concern with secular affairs, being entirely subject to the prelates. But the abbots, possessing most of the learning in ages of ignorance, were called from their seclusion to aid the churches in opposing heresies; monasteries were founded in the vicinity of cities; the abbots became ambitious, and set themselves to acquire wealth and honors; some of them assumed the miter, threw off their dependence on the bishops, and obtained seats in parliament. For centuries, princes and noblemen bore the title of abbots. At present, in Roman Catholic countries, abbots are regular, or such as take the vow, and wear the habit of the order; and commendatory, such as are seculars, but obliged, when of suitable age, to take orders. The title is borne also by some persons who have not the government of a monastery; as bishops whose sees were formerly abbeys. Encyc.

AB'BOT-SHIP, n. The state of an abbot.

AB-BRE'VI-ATE, v. t. [It. abbreviare; Sp. abreviar; Port. abreviar; from L. abbreviare, brevis, from brevis, short; contracted from Gr. βραχυς, from the root of break, which see.]

 1. To make void; to annul; to abrogate; applied chiefly and appropriately to established laws, contracts, rites, customs and institutions; as, to abolish laws by a repeal, actual or virtual.
 2. To destroy, or put an end to; as, to abolish idols, Isa. ii.; to abolish death, 2 Tim. i. This sense is not common. To abolish posterity, in the translation of Pausanias, lib. 3, ca. 6, is hardly allowable.
AB-OL'ISH-ABLE, a. That may be annulled, abrogated, or destroyed, as a law, rite, custom, &c.
AB-OL'ISH-ED, pp. Annulled; repealed; abrogated; or destroyed.
AB-OL'ISH-ER, n. One who abolishes.
AB-OL'ISH-ING, pp. Making void; annulling; destroying.
AB-OL'ISH-MENT, n. The act of annulling; abrogation; destruction. Hooker.
AB-O-LI'VATION, (ab-o'lish'un), n. The act of abolishing; or the state of being abolished; an annulling; abrogation; utter destruction; as the abolition of laws, decrees, ordinances, rites, customs, debts, &c.
 2. The putting an end to slavery; emancipation. The application of this word to persons and things, is now unusual or obsolete. To abolish persons and senses, the language of good writers formerly, is no longer legitimate.
AB-OLU'TION-ISM, n. The principles of an abolitionist.
AB-O-LI'VATION-IST, n. A person who favors abolition, or the immediate emancipation of slaves.
AB-OL'IA, n. [Lat.] An ancient military garment, worn by the Greeks and Romans.
AB-O-MA'SUM, n. [L. omasum.]
AB-O-MA'SUS, n. [L. omasum.]
 The fourth stomach of a ruminant animal.
AB-OMIN-ABLE, a. [See ASOMINATE.] Very hateful; detestable; inauspicious.
 2. This word is applicable to whatever is odious to the mind or offensive to the senses. Milton.
 3. Unclean. Levit. vii.
AB-OMIN-ABLE-NESS, n. The quality or state of being very odious; hateful. ss.
AB-OMIN-ABLY, adv. Very odiously; detestably; sinfully. 1 Kings xxi.
 2. In vulgar language, extremely, excessively.
AB-OMIN-ATE, v. t. [L. abominari, supposed to be formed by ab and omen; to deprecate as ominous; May the gods avert the evil!]
 To hate extremely; to abhor; to detest. Southern.
AB-OMIN-ATE-D, pp. Hatred utterly; detested; abhorred.
AB-OMIN-ATE-TING, pp. Abhorring; hating extremely.
AB-OMIN-ATION, n. Extreme hatred; detestation. Swift.

2. The object of detestation, a common signification in Scripture.

The way of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord.—Prov. xv.

3. Hence, defilement, pollution, in a physical sense, or evil doctrines and practices, which are moral defilements, idols and idolatry, are called abominations. The Jews were an abomination to the Egyptians; and the sacred animals of the Egyptians were an abomination to the Jews. The Roman army is called the abomination of desolation. Matt. xxiv. 13. In short, whatever is an object of extreme hatred, is called an abomination.

A-BORD', n. [Fr. See BORDER.] Literally, arrival, but used for first appearance, manner of accosting, or address, but not an English word. Chesterfield.

A-BORD', v. t. To approach; to accost. [Not in use.]

AB-O-RIG'IN-AL, a. [L. ab and origo, origin. See ORIGINE.] First; original; aboriginal people are the first inhabitants of a country.

Aboriginal tribes of America. President Smith.

AB-O-RIG'IN-AL, n. An original inhabitant. The first settlers in a country are called aboriginals; as, the Celts in Europe, and Indians in America.

President Smith.

AB-O-RIG'IN-ES, n. pl. The first inhabitants of a country. [This word is not regularly formed, but has become generally prevalent.] [See ABORIGINAL.]

A-BORSEMENT, (a-borsment), n. [See ABORTION.]

A-BORT', n. An abortion. [Not in use.] Burton.

A-BORTION, n. [L. abortio, a miscarriage; usually deduced from ab and orior.]

1. The act of miscarrying, or producing young before the natural time, or before the fetus is perfectly formed.

2. The fetus brought forth before it is perfectly formed.

3. In a figurative sense, any fruit or produce that does not come to maturity, or any thing which fails in its progress, before it is matured or perfect, as a design or project.

A-BORTIVE, a. Brought forth in an immature state; falling, or coming to naught, before it is complete.

2. Failing in its effect; miscarrying; producing nothing; as, an abortive scheme.

3. Productive of nothing; as, abortive gulf, in Milton, but not legitimate.

4. Pertaining to abortion; as, abortive vellum, made of the skin of an abortive calf. Encyc.

5. In medicine, procuring abortion; as, abortive medicines. Parr.

6. In botany, an abortive flower is one which falls without producing fruit. Martyn.

This term is applied to parts imperfectly formed; as, an abortive stamen, whose filament has no anther; or to such as do not arrive at perfect maturity, as a seed unimpregnated. Brande.

A-BORTIVE, n. That which is brought forth or born prematurely.

A-BORTIVE-LY, adv. Immaturely; in an untimely manner.

A-BORTIVE-NESS, n. The state of being abortive; a falling in the progress to perfection or maturity; a failure of producing the intended effect.

A-BORTMENT, n. An untimely birth. Bacon.

A-BOUND', v. t. [L. abundo; Fr. abonder; L. abundans; Sp. abundar. If this word is from L. unda, a wave, the latter has probably lost its first consonant. Abund may naturally be deduced from the Celtic. Arm. fuan, plenty; fanna, to abound; W. fyniau, to produce, to generate; to abound, from fuan, a source, the root of fynon, L. fons, a fountain. Or it may be connected with L. bonus, in the sense of extending, enlargement.]

1. To have or possess in great quantity; to be copiously supplied; followed by with or in; as, to abound with provisions; to abound in good things.

2. To be in great plenty; to be very prevalent.

AB-STÉ-MI-OUS, a. [L. abstemius, from abs and temētum, an ancient name of strong wine, according to Fabius and Gellius. But Vossius supposes it to be from abstinea, by a change of n to m. It may be from the root of timeo, to fear, that is, to withdraw.]
1. Sparing in diet; refraining from a free use of food and strong drinks.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious.
Arbuthnot.

2. Sparing in the enjoyment of animal pleasures of any kind. [This sense is less common, and perhaps not legitimate.]

3. Sparingly used, or used with temperance; belonging to abstinence; as, an abstemious diet, an abstemious life.

AB-STÉ-MI-OUS-LY, adv. Temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

AB-STÉ-MI-OUS-NESS, n. The quality of being temperate or sparing in the use of food and strong drinks.

This word expresses a greater degree of abstinence than temperance.

AB-STÉN-TI-ON, n. The act of abstaining.

AB-STÉR-GE, (ab-sterj'), v. t. [L. abstergeo, of abs and tergo, to wipe. Tergo may have a common origin with the Sw. torka, G. trocknen, D. droegen, Sax. drygan, to dry; for these Teutonic verbs signify to wipe, as well as to dry.]
To wipe or make clean by wiping; to cleanse by lotions or similar applications. [Used chiefly as a medical term.]

AB-STÉR-GE-NT, a. Wiping; cleansing.

AB-STÉR-GE-NT, n. A medicine which cleanses away foulness, as lotions; but the use of the word is nearly superseded by detergent, which see.

AB-STÉR-SI-ON, n. [from L. abstergeo, abstersus.] The act of wiping clean; or a cleansing by lotions or similar applications. [See DETRAGE, DETERSI-ON.]
Bacon.

AB-STÉR-SI-VE, a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing foulness. [See DETRERSI-VE.]

AB-STI-NENCE, a. [L. abstinencia. See ABSTAIN.]
1. In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from, or forbearing any action.

Abstinence from every thing which can be deemed labor.
Foley's Philos.

More appropriately,

2. The refraining from an indulgence of appetite, or from customary gratifications of animal propensities. It denotes a total forbearance, as in fasting, or a forbearance of the usual quantity. In the latter sense, it may coincide with temperance; but in general, it denotes a more sparing use of enjoyments than temperance. (Besides, abstinence implies previous free indulgence; temperance does not.)

AB-STI-NENT, a. Refraining from indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink.

AB-STI-NENT-LY, adv. With abstinence.

AB-STI-NENTS, n. pl. A sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century, who opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.

AB-STOR-ED, a. Forced away.

AB-STRACT', v. t. [L. abstraho, to draw from or separate; from abs and traho, which is the Eng. draw. See DRAW.]
1. To draw from, or to separate; as, to abstract an action from its evil effects; to abstract spirit from any substance by distillation; but, in this latter sense, extract is now more generally used.

2. To separate ideas by the operation of the mind; to consider one part of a complex object by itself.

3. To select or separate the substance of a book or writing; to epitomize or reduce to a summary.
Watts.

4. To take secretly for one's own use from the property of another, when placed in one's power; to purloin; as, to abstract goods from a parcel, or money from a bank.
Houcl.

5. In chemistry, to separate, as the more volatile parts of a substance by repeated distillation, or at least by distillation.

AB-STRACT, a. [L. abstractus.] Separate; distinct from something else. An abstract idea, in metaphysics, is an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it; as the solidity of marble contemplated apart from its color or figure.
Encyc.

Abstract terms are those which express abstract ideas, as beauty, whiteness, roundness, without regarding any subject in which they exist; or abstract terms are the names of orders, genera, or species of things in which there is a combination of similar qualities.
Stewart.

Abstract numbers are numbers used without application to things, as 6, 8, 10; but when applied to any thing, as 6 feet, 10 men, they become concrete.

Abstract or pure mathematics, is that which treats of magnitude or quantity, without restriction to any species of particular magnitude, as arithmetic and geometry; opposed to which is mixed mathematics, which treats of simple properties, and the relations of quantity, as applied to sensible objects, as hydrostatics, navigation, optics, &c.
Encyc.

2. Separate; existing in the mind only; as, an abstract subject; an abstract question; and hence, difficult, abstruse.

AB-STRACT', n. A summary, or epitome, containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a treatise or writing.
Watts.

2. Formerly, an extract, or a smaller quantity, containing the essence of a larger.

In the abstract, in a state of separation, as a subject considered in the abstract, i. e. without reference to particular persons or things.

AB-STRACT'ED, pp. or a. Separated; purloined; refined; exalted; abstruse; absent in mind.
Milton. Donne.

AB-STRACT'ED-LY, adv. In a separate state, or in contemplation only.

AB-STRACT'ED-NESS, n. The state of being abstracted.

AB-STRACT'ER, n. One who makes an abstract, or summary.

AB-STRACT'ING, ppr. Separating; purloining; making a summary.

AB-STRACTION, n. The act of separating, or state of being separated.

2. The operation of the mind when occupied by abstract ideas; as when we contemplate some particular part or property of a complex object as separate from the rest. Thus, when the mind considers the branch of a tree by itself, or the color of the leaves, as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So, also, when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects.
Encyc.

The power which the understanding has of separating the combinations which are presented to it, is distinguished by logicians by the name of abstraction.
Stewart.

Abstraction is the ground-work of classification, by which things are arranged in orders, genera, and species. We separate in idea the qualities of certain objects which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class, or collected body.

3. A separation from worldly objects; a recluse life; as, a hermit's abstraction.

4. Absence of mind; inattention to present objects.

5. Taking for one's own use part of the property of another when placed in one's power. [Recent usage.]

6. In the process of distillation, the term is used to denote the separation of the volatile parts, which rise, come over, and are condensed in a receiver, from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used, when a fluid is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort, and distilled off, to change its state, or the nature of its composition.
Nicholson.

AB-STRACT'IVE, a. Having the power or quality of abstracting.

AB-STRACT'IVE, a. Abstracted, or drawn AB-STRACT'P-TIOUS, a. from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation.
Cyc.

AB-STRACT-LY, adv. Separately; absolutely; in a state or manner unconnected with any thing else; as, matter abstractly considered.

AB-STRACT-NESS, n. A separate state; a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object.

AB-STRINGE', v. t. To unbind.

AB-STROU'E', v. t. [L. abstruso, from abstrudo, to thrust away, to conceal; abs and trudo.] Ar. طرب tarada; Ch. טרי, to thrust; Syr. Sam. td; Eng. to thrust. llid; concealed; hence, remote from apprehension; difficult to be comprehended or understood; opposed to what is obvious. [Not used of material objects.]

Encyc.

AB-STROU'E-LY, adv. In a concealed manner; obscurely; in a manner not to be easily understood.

AB-STROU'E-NESS, n. Obscurity of meaning; the state or quality of being difficult to be understood.
Boyle.

AB-STROU'ET-Y, n. Abstruseness; that which is abstruse.

AB-SOME', v. t. To bring to an end by a gradual waste; to consume.

AB-SURD', a. [L. absurdus, from abs and surdus, deaf, insensible.] Opposed to manifest truth; inconsistent with reason, or the plain dictates of common sense. An absurd man acts contrary to the clear dictates of reason or sound judgment. An absurd proposition contradicts obvious truth. An absurd practice or opinion is repugnant to the reason or common apprehension of men. It is absurd to say six and six make ten, or that plants will take root in stone.

AB-SURD'ITY, n. The quality of being inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment. Want of judgment, applied to men; want of propriety, applied to things.
Johnson.

2. That which is absurd: in this sense it has a plural; the absurdities of men.

AB-SURD'LY, adv. In a manner inconsistent with reason, or obvious propriety.

AB-SURD'NESS, n. The same as ABSURDITY, and less used.

A-BUND'ANCE, n. [Fr. abundance. See ABOUND.] Great plenty; an overflowing quantity; ample sufficiency: in strictness applicable to quantity only; but sometimes used of number; as, an abundance of peasants.
Addison.

In Scripture,
The abundance of the rich is great wealth. — Eccl. v. Mark xii. Luke xxi.
The abundance of the seas is great plenty of fish. — Deut. xxxiii.

It denotes also fullness, overflowing; as, the abundance of the heart. Matt. xii. Luke vi.

A-BUND'ANT, a. Pledful; in great quantity; fully sufficient; as, an abundant supply. In Scripture, abounding; having in great quantity; overflowing with.

The Lord God is abundant in goodness and truth. — Ex. xxxiv.

Abundant number, in arithmetic, is one, the sum of whose aliquot parts exceeds the number itself. Thus 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, the aliquot parts of 12, make the sum of 16. This is opposed to a deficient number, as 14, whose aliquot parts are 1, 2, 7, the sum of which is 10; and to a perfect number, which is equal to the sum of its aliquot parts, as 6, whose aliquot parts are 1, 2, 3.
Encyc.

A-BUND'ANT-LY, adv. Fully; amply; plentifully; in a sufficient degree.

A-BUS'AGE, n. Abuse. [Not used.]

A-BUSE', v. t. [Fr. abuser; Sp. abusar; It. abusare; L. abutor, abusus, of ab and utor, to use; fr. idi; W. gweth, use; Gr. abuo, to accustom. See USE.]
1. To use ill; to maltreat; to misuse; to use with bad motives or to wrong purposes; as, to abuse rights or privileges.

They that use this world as not abusing it. — 1 Cor. vi.

2. To violate; to defile by improper sexual intercourse.
Spenser.

3. To deceive; to impose on.
Nor be with all these tempting words abused. Pope.

4. To treat rudely, or with reproachful language; to revile.
He mocked and abused them shamefully. Mac.

5. To pervert the meaning of; to misapply; as, to abuse words.

A-BUSE', n. Ill use; improper treatment or employment; application to a wrong purpose; as, an abuse of our natural powers; an abuse of civil rights, or of religious privileges; abuse of advantages, &c.

Liberty may be endangered by the abuses of liberty, as well as by the abuses of power.
Federalist, Madison.

2. A corrupt practice or custom; as, the abuses of government.

3. Rude speech; reproachful language addressed to a person; contumely; reviling words. Milton.

4. Violation of a female.
After the abuse he forsook me. Sidney.

5. Perversion of meaning; improper use or application; as, an abuse of words.

A-BUSE'D, pp. or a. Ill-used; used to a bad purpose; treated with rude language; misemployed; perverted to bad or wrong ends; deceived; defiled; violated.

A-BUSE'FUL, a. Using or practicing abuse; abusive.
Bp. Barlow.

A-BUSE'ER, n. One who abuses, in speech or behavior; one that deceives; a ravisher; a sodomite. 1 Cor. vi.

A-BUSE'ING, ppr. Using ill; employing to bad purposes; deceiving; violating the person; perverting.

A-BUS'ION, (a-bu'zion), n. Abuse; evil or corrupt usage; reproach; deception. [Little used.] Spenser.

A-BUS'IVE, a. Practicing abuse; offering harsh words or ill treatment; as, an abusive author; an abusive fellow.

2. Containing abuse, or that is the instrument of abuse; as, abusive words; rude; reproachful. In the sense of deceitful; as, an abusive treaty. [Little used.] Bacon.

A-BUS'IVE-LY, adv. In an abusive manner; rudely; reproachfully.

A-BUS'IVE-NESS, n. Ill-usage; the quality of being abusive; rudeness of language, or violence to the person. Berlioz.

A-BUT, v. i. [Fr. aboutir, from bout, an end.] To border upon; to be contiguous to; to meet; in strictness, to adjoin to at the end; but this distinction has not always been observed. The word is chiefly used in describing the bounds or situation of land, and, in popular language, is contracted into but; as, butted and bounded.

A-BUTMENT, n. The head or end; that which unites one end of a thing to another; chiefly used to denote the solid pier or mound of earth, stone or timber, which is erected on the bank of a river to support the end of a bridge and connect it with the land.

AC'CENT, n. [L. accentus, from ad and canto, cantum, to sing; W. canu; Corn. kana; Ir. canaim. See ACCENT.] 1. The modulation of the voice in reading or speaking, as practiced by the ancient Greeks, which rendered their rehearsed musical. More strictly, in English,

2. A particular stress or force of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the others. Accent is of two kinds, primary and secondary; as in aspi-ra-tion. In uttering this word, we observe the first and third syllables are distinguished; the third by a full sound, which constitutes the primary accent; the first, by a degree of force in the voice which is less than that of the primary accent, but evidently greater than that which falls on the second and fourth syllables.

When the full accent falls on a vowel, that vowel has its long sound, as in vo'cal; but when it falls on an articulation or consonant, the preceding vowel is short, as in hab'it. Accent alone regulates voice.

3. A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation. Our ancestors borrowed from the Greek language three of these characters, the acute (´), the grave (`), and the circumflex (˘). In the Greek, the first shows when the voice is to be raised; the second, when it is to be depressed; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound.

4. A modulation of the voice expressive of passion or sentiments.

The tender accent of a woman's cry. Prior.

5. Manner of speaking.

A man of plain accent. (Obs.) Shak.

6. Poetically, words, language, or expressions in general.

Winds I on your wings to heaven her accents bear, Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear. Dryden.

7. In music, either the stress laid on the accented parts of the bar, called grammatical accent; or the emphasis dictated by feeling, and giving the music its peculiar expression, called oratorical accent.

8. A peculiar tone or inflection of voice. P. Cyc.

9. In mathematics, accents are used to distinguish magnitudes of the same or similar kind, expressed by the same letter, but differing in value; as, a', a'', &c.

10. An accent at the right hand of a number expresses a minute of a degree, two accents a second, &c. P. Cyc.

AC-CENT', v. t. To express accent; to utter a syllable with a particular stress or modulation of the voice. In poetry, to utter or pronounce in general. Also, to note accents by marks in writing. Locke. Wotton.

AC-CENT'ED, pp. or a. Littered with accent; marked with accent.

Accented parts of a bar, in music, are those parts of the bar on which the stress falls; as the first and third, in common time. P. Cyc.

Our zeal should be according to knowledge. Spenser.

None is the same that is built on candor and ingenuity, according to those beautiful lines of Sir John Denham. Spect.

Here the whole preceding parts of the sentence are to accord, i. e. agree with, correspond with, or be suitable to, what follows. According, here, has its true participial sense, agreeing, and is followed by to. It is never a preposition.

AC-CORD'ING-LY, adv. Agreeably; suitably; in a manner conformable to.

Those who live in faith and good works, will be rewarded accordingly.

AC-CORD'ION, n. [from accord.] A small keyed wind instrument, whose tones are generated by the play of wind upon metallic reeds. It is a small wind-chest, the sides of which are made to fold and expand like a bellows. On the top are apertures in which the reeds are inserted, and upon which the reeds play. Each key playing on two apertures, the reeds of which are furnished with reversed valves, is made to command two successive notes in the scale, according as the wind is drawn in by expanding the chest, or forced out by closing it. In addition to the keys, there is a slide which opens and reeds attuned to the harmonics of the tonic or A dominant, by opening which the air has an armonic accompaniment. The bottom of the chest is furnished with a large key, by which the chest may be opened, and suddenly exhausted or filled, as need requires. This is a melodious portable instrument, commanding two or three octaves in the diatonic scale. Prof. Fitch.

A field said to have lain south of Jerusalem, the same as the potter's field, purchased with the bribe which Judas took for betraying his master, and therefore called the field of blood. It was appropriated to the interment of strangers.

ACEPHALAN, n. [Gr. ἀκεφαλον.] Terms applied to a class of molluscous animals, comprehending those which have no head, as the oyster and muscle. — Bell.

ACEPHALUS, n. pl. [Gr. α and κεφαλη.] A sect of levelers who acknowledged no chief or head.

ACEPHALIST, n. One who acknowledges no head or superior.

ACEPHALOUS, a. [Gr. a priv. and κεφαλη, a head.]

1. Without a head, headless. In history, the term Acephali was given to several sects who refused to follow some noted leader, and to such bishops as were exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch. It was also given to certain levelers who acknowledged no head in the reign of Henry I. It was also applied to the Eblimives, a pretended nation of Africa, and to other tribes in the East, whom ancient naturalists represented as having no head; their eyes and mouth being placed in other parts. Modern discoveries have dissipated these fictions. In English laws, men who held lands of no particular lord, and clergy men who were under no bishop.

2. In botany, applied to ovaries, the style of which springs from their base, instead of their apex. — Brande.

3. In anatomy, applied to a fetus having no head.

ACEPHALUS, n. An obsolete name of the tenia or tape-worm, which was formerly supposed to have no head; an error now exploded. The term is also used to express a verse defective in the beginning.

ACEPOINT, n. The side of a card or die that has but one spot.

ACERAN, n. [Gr. a priv. and κερως, horn.]

ACEREA, n. pl. Terms applied to a family of apterous insects, without antennae; and to a family of gastropod molluscous animals, without tentacles. — Brande.

ACERB, a. [L. acerbus, G. herbe, harsh, sour, tart, bitter, rough, whence herbst, autumn, herbstzeit, harvest time; D. heftig, harvest. See HARVEST.] Sour, bitter, and harsh to the taste; sour, with stringency or roughness; a quality of unripe fruits. — Quincy.

ACERBATE, v. t. To make sour, bitter, or harsh to the taste.

ACERBATING, pp. Making sour.

ACERBITY, n. A sourness with bitterness and astringency.

2. Harshness, bitterness, or severity; applied to persons or things; as, acerbity of temper, acerbity of pain. — Barrow.

ACERIC, a. [L. acer, a maple-tree.] Pertaining to the maple; obtained from the maple; as, aceric acid. — Ure.

ACERIDES, n. pl. [Gr. a priv. and κηρος, wax.] Plasters made without wax. — Parr.

ACEROSE, a. [L. acerosus, chaffy, from acer, resembling chaff.]

2. An acerous or acerose leaf is one which is linear and permanent, in form of a needle, as in pine. — Martyn.

ACERRA, n. [L.] In Roman antiquity, a vessel in which incense was burnt; a censer. — Adam's Ant.

ACERVIAL, a. Pertaining to a heap.

ACERVATE, c. t. To heap up.

ACERVATE, a. In natural history, heaped, or growing in heaps, or in closely compacted clusters.

ACERVOSE, a. Full of heaps. [Obs.]

ACESCENCE, n. [L. acescens, turning sour, a ces, from acesco. See ACTIO.] A turning sour by spontaneous decomposition, and hence a being moderately sour; a tendency to turn sour.

ACESCENT, a. Turning sour; readily becoming tart or acid by spontaneous decomposition. Hence, slightly sour; but the latter sense is usually expressed by acidulous or sub-acid. — Nicholson.

ACESTIS, n. [Gr.] A fictitious sort of chryso-colla, made of Cyprian verdigris, urine, and niter. — Cyc.

ACETABULUM, n. [L. from acetum, vinegar. See ACTIO.] Among the Romans, a vinegar cruse or like vessel, and a measure of about one eighth of a pint.

1. In anatomy, the cavity of a bone for receiving the protuberant end of another bone, and therefore forming the articulation called enarthrosis. It is used especially for the cavity of the os innominatum, which receives the head of the thigh bone.

2. A glandular substance found in the placenta of some animals.

3. In botany, the trivial name of a species of Peziza, the cup peziza; so called from its resemblance to a cup.

4. It is sometimes used in the sense of cotyledon.

5. A species of lichen. — Cyc.

6. In entomology, the socket on the trunk, in which the leg is inserted. — Brande.

7. A sucker of the Septa or cuttle-fish, and of other similar molluscous animals. — Brande.

ACETARIOUS, a. Used in salads; as, acetarius plants. — Brande.

ACTE-TARY, n. [See ACTIO.] An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear, inclosed in a congeries of small calculeous bodies, toward the base of the fruit. — Grew.

ACTATE, n. A salt formed by the union of acetic acid with any salifiable base.

ACTATED, a. Combined with acetic acid.

ACTETIC, a. Relating to acetic acid; as, actetic ether. — Ure.

ACTETIC ACID, n. An acid composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, always in the same uniform and definite proportions. It exists in vinegar in a dilute and impure state.

ACTETIFICATION, n. The act of making acetous or sour; or the operation of making vinegar. — Cyc.

ACTETIFY, v. t. To convert into acid or vinegar. — Actin.

ACTETIFY, v. i. To turn acid. — Encyc. Dom. Econ.

ACTETTER, n. [L. actum, vinegar, and μετρον, measure.]

An instrument for ascertaining the strength of vinegar. — Ure.

ACTETTRY, n. The act or method of ascertaining the strength of vinegar, or the proportion of acetic acid contained in it. — Ure.

ACTETONE, n. A new chemical name for the pyro-acetic spirit. — Ure.

ACTETOUS, a. 1. Sour; acid; as, acteous spirit.

ACTETOSE, n.

2. Causing acetification; as, acteous fermentation.

ACTETOUS ACID, n. A term formerly applied to impure and dilute acetic acid, under the notion that it was composed of carbon and hydrogen in the same proportions as in acetic acid, but with less oxygen. It is now known that no such acid exists, so that this term is not now in use.

ACTETUM, n. [See ACTIO.] Vinegar; a sour liquor, obtained from vegetables dissolved in boiling water, and from fermented and spirituous liquors, by exposing them to heat and air. This process is called the acid or acetous fermentation.

ACHIE, (ake), c. t. [Sax. ace, ee; Gr. αίεω, to ache or be in pain; αχος, pain. The primary sense is, to be pressed. Perhaps the Oriental py, to press.]

Ake would be a better spelling of this word.

1. To suffer pain; to have or be in pain, or in continued pain; as, the head aches.

2. To suffer grief, or extreme grief; to be distressed; as, the heart aches.

ACHIE, (ake), n. Pain, or continued pain, in opposition to sudden twinges, or spasmodic pain. It denotes a more moderate degree of pain than pang, anguish, and torture.

ACHAËAN, a. Pertaining to Achaia in Greece, and to a celebrated league or confederacy established there. This state lay on the Gulf of Corinth, within Peloponnesus.

ACHAËANUM, n. [Gr. αχαιο, poor.] In botany, a small bony fruit, consisting of a single seed, which neither adheres to the pericarp nor opens when ripe.

ACHERNAR, n. A star of the first magnitude in the southern extremity of the constellation Eridanus.

ACHIRON, n. [Gr. αχος, pain, and πιος, a river or stream.] A fabled river of hell or the lower regions. — Ancient Poets.

ACHIRSET, n. An ancient measure of corn, supposed to be about eight bushels. — Encyc.

ACHIEVABLE, a. [See ACHIEVE.] That may be performed. — Barron.

ACHIEVANCE, n. Performance. — Elyot.

ACHIEVE, v. t. [Fr. achever, to finish; Arm. achui; old Fr. chever, to come to the end, from Fr. chef, the head or end; old Eng. cheve; Sp. and Port. acabar, from cabo, end, cape. See CHIEF.]

1. To perform, or execute; to accomplish; to finish, or carry on to a final close. It is appropriately used for the effect of efforts made by the hand or bodily exertion; as, deeds achieved by valor.

2. To gain or obtain, as the result of exertion.

Show all the spoils by valiant kings achieved. — Prior.

ACHIEVED, pp. Performed; obtained; accomplished.

ACHIEVEMENT, n. The performance of an action.

2. A great or heroic deed; something accomplished by valor, or boldness.

3. An obtaining by exertion.

4. An escutcheon or ensigns armorial, granted for the performance of a great or honorable action. — Encyc.

ACHIEVER, n. One who accomplishes a purpose, or obtains an object by his exertions.

ACHIEVING, pp. Performing; executing; gaining.

ACHING, pp. of a. [See ACHIE.] Being in pain; suffering distress.

ACHING, n. Pain; continued pain or distress.

ACHIOLE, n. The anoth, a tree, and a drug used for dyeing red. The bark of the tree makes good cordage, and the wood is used to excite fire by friction. [See ANOTHA.] — Clavigero.

ACH'N-RIE, n. A synonym of DIOPTRAS.
A-CIL-LAM-YD'E-OUS, a. [L. neg. and Gr. χλαμος, a garment.] In botany, naked, having no floral envelope.
A'CHOR, n. [Gr. αχρη, sordes capitis.]
 1. The scald head, a disease forming scaly eruptions, supposed to be a critical evacuation of acrimonious humors; a species of herpes.
Hooper. Quincy.
 2. In mythology, the god of flies, said to have been worshipped by the Cyreneseans, to avoid being vexed by those insects.
ACH-RO-MAT'IC, a. [Gr. a priv. and χρωμα, color.]
 Destitute of color. Achromatic telescopes are formed of a combination of lenses, which separate the variously colored rays of light to equal angles of divergence, at different angles of refraction of the mean ray. In this case, the rays being made to refract toward contrary parts, the whole ray is caused to deviate from its course, without being separated into colors, and the optical aberration arising from the various colors of light, is prevented. This telescope is an invention of Dollond.
Nicholson.
ACH-RO-MA-TIC'I-TY, n. The state of being achromatic.
ACH-RŌ-MA-TISM, n. [Gr. a priv. and χρωμα, color.]
 1. The destruction of the primary colors, which accompany the image of an object seen through a prism or lens.
Brande.
 2. The state of being achromatic; as, the achromatism of a lens.
A-CIC'U-L'E, n. pl. [L. acicula.] The spines or prickles of some animals and plants.
A-CIC'U-LAR, a. [L. acicula, Priscian, a needle, from Gr. αχι, L. acies, a point. See ACIO.]
 In the shape of a needle; having sharp points like needles.
Kirwan. Martyn.
 An acicular prism is when the crystals are slender and straight.
A-CIC'U-LAR-LY, adv. In the manner of needles, or prickles.
A-CIC'U-LATE, a. [L. acicula, a needle.] In the form of a needle.
A-CIC'U-LI-FORM, a. Having the form of needles.
ACID, a. [L. acidus & Sax. aced, vinegar; from the root of acies, edge; Gr. αχι; W. awc, an edge or point. See EOCZ.]
 Sour, sharp or biting to the taste; having the taste of vinegar; as, acid fruits or liquors.
ACID, n. In common language, a sour substance.
 In chemistry, a compound capable of uniting with salifiable bases, and thereby forming salts. An acid may be composed either of a simple or compound acidifiable base united with one or more acidifying principles. These acids which were first recognized were sour to the taste (hence the name) and capable of reddening blue vegetable colors. Many acids are now known which have neither of these properties. An acid is always the electro-negative ingredient of a salt.
ACID-IF-ER-OUS, a. [acid and L. fero.] Containing acids, or an acid.
Acidiferous minerals are such as consist of an acid combined with an acid, as carbonate of lime, aluminate, &c.
ACID-I-FI-A-BLE, a. [from acidify.]
 Capable of being converted into an acid, by union with an acidifying principle.
ACID-I-FI-CAT'ION, n. The act or process of acidifying or changing into an acid.
ACID-I-FI-ED, pp. Made acid; converted into an acid.
ACID-I-FI-ER, n. A simple or compound principle, whose presence is necessary for acidity. The elementary acidifying principles are oxygen, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium, and tellurium. Cyanogen may be named as an example of a compound acidifying principle, and probably there are one or two more. No acid is known which does not contain one of these substances.
ACID-I-FY, v. t. [acid and L. facio.]
 To make acid; but appropriately, to convert into an acid, chemically so called, by combination with any substance.
ACID-I-FY-ING, pp. or a. Making acid; converting into an acid; having power to change into an acid. Oxygen is called an acidifying principle or element.
ACID-IM-P-E-T-ER, n. [acid and Gr. μετρον, measure.]
 An instrument for ascertaining the strength of acids.
ACID-I-TY, n. [Fr. acidité, from acid.]
 The quality of being sour; sourness; tartness; sharpness to the taste.
ACID-NESS, n. The quality of being sour; acidity.
ACID'U-L'E, n. pl. Medicinal springs impregnated with carbonic acid.
ACID'U-LATE, v. t. [L. acidulus, slightly sour; Fr. aciduler, to make slightly sour. See ACIO.]

To tinge with an acid; to make acid in a moderate degree.
ACID'U-LA-TED, pp. or a. Tinged with an acid; made slightly sour.
ACID'U-LA-TING, pp. Tinged with an acid.
ACID'U-LUM, n. In chemistry, a salt, in which ACID'U-LUM, n. the acid is in excess; as, tartaric acidulum, oxalic acidulum.
ACID'U-LOUS, a. [L. acidulus. See ACIO.]
 Slightly sour; sub-acid; as, acidulous sulphate.
Acidulous mineral waters, are such as contain carbonic acid.
ACI-FORM, a. [L. acus, a needle, and forma, form.] Shaped like a needle.
ACI-NA'CEOUS, a. [L.] Full of kernels.
ACI-NAC'I-FORM, a. [L. acinaces, a cineter, Gr. ακινυκος, and L. forma, form.]
 In botany, formed like, or resembling a cineter.
ACIN'FORM, a. [L. acinus, a grape stone, and forma, shape.]
 Having clusters like the stones of grapes; full of small kernels. The uvea or posterior lamina of the iris in the eye, is called the aciniform tunic, from its color resembling that of an unripe grape.
ACIN-ŒSE, a. [From L. acinus. See ACINIFARM.]
ACIN-ŒSUS, n. [L.]
 Consisting of minute granular concretions; used in mineralogy.
ACIN-US, n. [L.]
 1. In botany, one of the small grains which compose the fruit of the blackberry, and other similar plants.
 2. In anatomy, this term is applied to the ultimate discerning follicles of glands, or the granulations composing the structure of some conglomerate glands, as the liver.
AC-I-PEN'SER, n. In ichthyology, a genus of fishes of the order Chondropterygii, having an obtuse head; the mouth under the head, retractile and without teeth. To this genus belong the sturgeon, sterlet, huso, &c.
AC-KNOWL-EDGE, (ak-nol'edge), s. t. [ad and knowledge. See KNOW.]
 1. To own, avow, or admit to be true, by a declaration of assent; as, to acknowledge the being of a God.
 2. To own or notice with particular regard.
 In all thy ways acknowledge God.—Prov. iii. 1. Isa. xxxiii.
 3. To own or confess, as implying a consciousness of guilt.
I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me.—Ps. li. and xxxiii.
 4. To own with assent; to admit or receive with approbation.
 He that acknowledged the Son hath the Father also.—1 John ii. 2 Tit. ii.
 5. To own with gratitude; to own as a benefit; as, to acknowledge a favor, or the receipt of a gift.
 They his gifts acknowledged not.—Nathan.
 6. To own or admit to belong to; as, to acknowledge a son.
 7. To receive with respect.
 All that see them shall acknowledge that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed.—Isa. vi. 1 Cor. xvi.
 8. To own, avow, or assent to an act in a legal form, to give it validity; as, to acknowledge a deed before competent authority.
AC-KNOWL-EDGE-ED, pp. or a. Owned; confessed; noticed with regard or gratitude; received with approbation; owned before authority.
AC-KNOWL-EDGE-ING, pp. Owning; confessing; approving; grateful; but the latter sense is a Gallicism, not to be used.
AC-KNOWL-EDGE-MENT, n. The act of owning; confession; as, the acknowledgment of a fault.
 2. The owning, with approbation, or in the true character; as, the acknowledgment of a God, or of a public minister.
 3. Concession; admission of the truth; as, of a fact, position, or principle.
 4. The owning of a benefit received, accompanied with gratitude; and hence it combines the idea of an expression of thanks. Hence, it is used also for something given or done in return for a favor.
 5. A declaration or avowal of one's own act, to give it legal validity; as, the acknowledgment of a deed before a proper officer.
Acknowledgment-money, in some parts of England, is a sum paid by tenants, on the death of their landlords, as an acknowledgment of their new lords.
AC'ME, (ak'my) n. [Gr. ακμη.]
 The top or highest point; the height or crisis of any thing. It is used to denote the maturity or perfection of an animal. Among physicians, the crisis of a disease, or its utmost violence. Old medical writers divided the progress of a disease into four periods; the arête, or beginning, the anabasis, or increase, the acme, or utmost violence, and the paracme, or decline.
AC'MITE, n. [Gr. ακμη, a point.] A mineral of the augite family, occurring in long, pointed crystals, of a dark brownish color, and a bright and somewhat resinous luster.

AC'NE, (ak'ny), n. [Gr.]
 A small, hard pimple or tubercle on the face.
Quincy.
A-CŒLD', ade. Cold; very cold; as, Tom's a-cold.
Shak.
A-CŒLO-GY, n. [Gr. ακος and λογος.]
 The doctrine of remedies, or the materia medica.
A-CŒLO-THIST', n. [Gr. ακολουθιστω.]
AC'Œ-LYTHI,
 In the ancient church, one of the subordinate officers, who lighted the lamps, brought forward the elements of the sacraments, attended the bishops, &c. An officer of the like character is still employed in the Roman Catholic church.
AC'ON-ITE, n. [L. aconitum; Gr. ακονιτω.]
 The herb wolf's-bane, or monk's-hood, a poisonous plant; and in poetry, used for poison in general.
A-CŒN-TIN, n. A poisonous vegetable principle or alkaloid, extracted from the aconite.
A-CŒN-TI-AS, n. [Gr. ακοντιας & ακοντιον, a dart, from a-ov.]
 1. A species of serpent, called dart-make, or jaculum, by its manner of darting on its prey. This serpent is about three feet in length; of a light gray color, with black spots resembling eyes; the belly perfectly white. It is a native of Africa and the Mediterranean isles; is the swiftest of its kind, and coils itself upon a tree, from which it darts upon its prey.
 2. A cunct or meteor resembling the serpent.
A-CŒP', adv. [a and cope.]
 At the top. [Obs.]
A'CORN, n. [Sax. acern, from ee or ae, oak, and corn, a grain.]

Farr. Blancard.
AC-Œ-TYL-E'DON, n. [Gr. a priv. and ακτυλον, from ακτυλη, a hollow.]
 In botany, a plant in which the seed-lobes, or cotyledons, are not present, or are indistinct. Partington. The acetyledous form a grand division of the vegetable kingdom, including the ferns, lichens, &c., and correspond to the Cryptogamia of Linnaeus.
AC-Œ-TYL-E'DON-ŒS, a. Having either no seed-lobes, or such as are indistinct, like the ferns, lichens, &c.
A-CŒUCH'Y, n. [Fr. acouchi.] A small species of ivory, the olive cavity; sometimes called the Surinam rabbit.
A-CŒUS'TIC, a. [Gr. ακουστικος, from ακουω, to hear.]
 Pertaining to the ears, to the sense of hearing, or to the doctrine of sounds.
Acoustic duct, in anatomy, the meatus auditorius, or external passage of the ear.
Acoustic vessels, in ancient theaters, were brazen tubes or vessels, shaped like a bell, used to propel the voice of the actors, so as to render the music audible to a great distance; in some theaters at the distance of 400 feet.
Acoustic instrument, or auricular tube; called in popular language an ear-trumpet.
Acoustics, or Acoustematics, was a name given to such of the disciples of Pythagoras as had not completed their five years' probation.
A-CŒUSTICS, n. The science of sounds, teaching their cause, nature, and phenomena. This science is, by some writers, divided into diacoustics, which explains the properties of sounds coming directly from the sonorous body to the ear; and catacoustics, which treats of reflected sounds. But the distinction is considered of little real utility.

2. In medicine, this term is sometimes used for remedies for deafness, or imperfect hearing.

AC-QUAINT'Y, v. L. [Old Fr. accointer, to make known, whence accointance, acquaintance. Qu.

Per. كُنْدَا kunda, knowing, intelligent; Ger. kunde, knowledge; kund, known, public; D. kond or kunde, knowledge; Sw. kund, known; Dan. kjende, to know, to be acquainted with. These words seem to have for their primitive root the Goth. and Sax. kunnan, to know, the root of cunning; Ger. kennen; D. kunnen, kān; Eng. can and ken; which see.]

1. To make known; to make fully or intimately known; to make familiar.

A man of sorrow and acquainted with grief. — Isa. liii. 2. To inform; to communicate notice to; as, a friend in the country acquaints me with his success. Of before the object — ns to acquaint a man of this design — has been used, but is obsolete or improper.

2. A person or persons well known; usually persons we have been accustomed to see and converse with, but not standing on the more intimate relation of friendship.

Love and friendship had then put far from me, and my acquaintance into darkness. — Ps. lxxviii. My acquaintance are estranged from me. — Job xix.

Acquaintances, in the plural, is used, as applied to individual persons known; but more generally, acquaintance is used for one or more.

Acquaintant, in like sense, is not used.

AC-QUAINTANCE-SHIP, n. State of being acquainted. Chalmers.

AC-QUAINT'ED, pp. Known; familiarly known; informed; having personal knowledge.

AC-QUAINT'ING, pp. Making known to; giving notice or information to.

AC-QUEST, v. [L. acquisitus, acquirere.]

1. Acquisition; the thing gained. Bacon.

2. Conquest; a place acquired by force. Bacon.

AD-QUI-ESCE' (ak-que-ess') v. i. [L. acquiesco, of ad and quiesco, to be quiet; quies, rest; Fr. acquiescer.]

1. To rest satisfied, or apparently satisfied, or to rest without opposition and discontent, usually implying previous opposition, uneasiness, or dislike, but ultimate compliance, or submission; as, to acquiesce in the dispensations of Providence.

2. To assent to, upon conviction; as, to acquiesce in an opinion; that is, to rest satisfied of its correctness, or propriety.

Acquiesced in; in a passive sense complied with; submitted to, without opposition; as, a measure has been acquiesced in.

AC-QUI-ES'CENT, n. A quiet assent; a silent submission, or submission with apparent content; distinguished from avowed consent on the one hand, and on the other, from opposition or open discontent; as, an acquiescence in the decisions of a court, or in the allotments of Providence.

AC-QUI-ES'CENT, n. Resting satisfied; easy; submitting; disposed to submit. Johnson.

AC-QUI-ES'CENT, pp. Quietly submitting; testing content.

AC-QUIR-A-BIL'I-TY, n. State of being acquirable. Paley.

AC-QUIR-A-BLE, a. That may be acquired.

AC-QUIRE, v. t. [L. acquirere, ad and quero, to seek, that is, to follow, to press, to urge; acquirere signifies to pursue to the end or object; Fr. acquérir; Sp. adquirir; Ar. كَرَا kara; Heb. קָרַח to seek, to make toward, to follow. The L. quæsi, unless contracted, is probably from a different root. See Class Gr. and Gs.]

To gain, by any means, something which is in a degree permanent, or which becomes vested or inherent in the possessor; as, to acquire a title, estate, learning, habits, skill, dominion, &c. Plants acquire a green color from the solar rays. A mere temporary possession is not expressed by acquire, but by gain, obtain, procure; as, to obtain [not acquire] a book on loan.

Descent is the title whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, acquires his estate, by right of representation, as his heir at law. Blackstone.

AC-QUIR'ED, pp. or a. Gained, obtained, or received from art, labor, or other means, in distinction from those things which are bestowed by nature.

Thus we say, abilities, natural and acquired. It implies title, or some permanence of possession.

AC-QUIREMENT, n. The act of acquiring, or that which is acquired; attainment. It is used in opposition to natural gifts; as, eloquence, and skill in music and painting, are acquirements; genius, the gift of nature. It denotes especially personal attainments, in opposition to material or external things gained, which are more usually called acquisitions; but this distinction is not always observed.

AC-QUIRER, n. A person who acquires.

AC-QUIRING, n. Acquisition.

AC-QUIR'Y, n. Acquisition. [Not used.] Barron.

AC-QUIS-ITE, a. Gained. [Not used.] Burton.

AC-QUISITION, n. [L. acquisitio, from acquisitus, acquiriti, which are given as the part. and pret. of quisi; but quisivi is probably from a different root; W. ceisio; Eth. חָשַׁס chasas, chas; Ar. كَسَس kasso, to seek. Class Gs.]

1. The act of acquiring; as, a man takes pleasure in the acquisition of property, as well as in the possession.

2. The thing acquired, or gained; as, learning is an acquisition. It is used for intellectual attainments, as well as for external things, property or dominion; and in a good sense, denoting something estimable.

AC-QUISITIVE, a. That is acquired; acquired; [but improper.] Wolton.

AC-QUISITIVE-LY, adv. Noting acquirement.

A word is said to be used acquisitively, when it is used with to for following. Lilly's Grammar.

AC-QUISITIVE-NESS, n. Desire of possession; propensity to acquire.

AC-QUIST, n. See Acquest. [Not used.] Milton.

AC-QUIT, v. L. [Fr. acquitter; W. gadw, gadaw; L. cedo; Arm. kitat, or quytaat, to leave, or forsake; Fr. quitter, to forsake; Sp. quitar; Port. quitar; It. quitare, to remit, forgive, remove; D. kweten; Ger. quittieren.]

To set free; to release or discharge from an obligation, accusation, guilt, censure, suspicion, or whatever lies upon a person as a charge or duty; as, the jury acquitted the prisoner; we acquit a man of evil intentions. It is followed by of before the object; to acquit from its obligations. In a reciprocal sense as, the soldier acquitted himself well in battle, the word has a like sense, implying the discharge of a duty or obligation. Hence its use in expressing excellence in performance; as, the orator acquitted himself well, that is, in a manner that his situation, and public expectation, demanded.

AC-QUITMENT, n. The act of acquitting, or state of being acquitted. South.

[This word is superseded by ACQUITTAL.]

AC-QUIT'TAL, n. A judicial setting free, or deliverance from the charge of an offense, as by verdict of a jury, or sentence of a court; as, the acquittal of a principal operates as an acquittal of the accessories.

AC-QUIT'TANCE, n. A discharge or release from a debt.

2. The writing, which is evidence of a discharge; a receipt in full, which bars a further demand.

AC-QUIT'TANCE, v. L. To acquit. [Obs.] Shak.

AC-QUIT'TED, pp. Set free, or judicially discharged from an accusation; released from a debt, duty, obligation, charge, or suspicion of guilt.

AC-QUIT'TING, pp. Setting free from accusation; releasing from a charge, obligation, or suspicion of guilt.

ACT, v. i. [Gr. ayuo, L. ago, to urge, drive, lead, bring, do, perform; or in general, to move, to exert force; Cantabrian, eg. force; W. agni, R. agitur, force; R. agere, to act or carry on; cashdam, to do or act; actaim, to ordain; eacht, acht, deed, act, condition; Fr. agir, T. agere, to do or act.]

1. To exert power; as, the stomach acts upon food; the will acts upon the body in producing motion.

2. To be in action or motion; to move. Pope.

It hangs between, in doubt to act or rest.

3. To behave, demean, or conduct, as in morals, private duties, or public offices; as, we know not why a minister has acted in this manner. But in this sense, it is most frequent in popular language; as, how the man acts or has acted.

To act up to, is to equal in action; to fulfill, or perform a correspondent action; as, he has acted up to his engagement or his advantages.

ACT, v. t. To perform; to represent a character on the stage.

Act well your part; there all the honor lies. Pope.

2. To feign or counterfeit. [Obs. or improper.] With acted fear the villain thus pursued. Dryden.

3. To put in motion; to actuate; to regulate movements.

Most people in the world are acted by levity. South. Locke.

[In this latter sense obsolete, and superseded by ACTUATE, which see.]

ACT, n. The exertion of power; the effect, of which power exerted in the cause; as, the act of giving or receiving.

In this sense, it denotes an operation of the mind. Thus, to discern in an act of the understanding; to judge in an act of the will.

2. That which is done; a deed, exploit, or achievement, whether good or ill.

And his miracles and his acts which he did in the midst of Egypt.—Deut.

3. Action; performance; production of effects; as, an act of charity. But this sense is closely allied to the foregoing.

4. A state of reality or real existence, as opposed to a possibility.

The words of plants are not at first in act, but in possibility, what they afterward grow to be. Hooker.

5. In general, act denotes action completed; but preceded by in, it denotes incomplete action.

She was taken in the very act.—John vill.

In act is used also to signify incipient action, or a state of preparation to exert power; as, "In act to strike," a poetical use.

6. A part or division of a play to be performed without interruption; after which the action is suspended to give respite to the performers. Acts are divided into smaller portions, called scenes.

7. The result of public deliberation, or the decision of a prince, legislative body, council, court of justice, or magistrate; a decree, edict, law, judgment, resolve, award, determination; as, an act of parliament, or of congress. The term is also transferred to the book, record, or writing, containing the laws and determinations. Also, any instrument in writing to verify facts.

In the sense of agency, or power to produce effects, as in the passage cited by Johnson from Shakspeare, the use is improper.

To try the vigor of them, and apply Alliments to their act.

Act, in English universities, is a thesis maintained in public, by a candidate for a degree, or to show the proficiency of a student. At Oxford, the time when masters and doctors complete their degrees is also called the act, which is held with great solemnity. At Cambridge, as in the United States, it is called commencement. Encyc.

Act of faith, (auto da fe) in Roman Catholic countries, is a solemn day held by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of accused persons found innocent; or it is the sentence of the Inquisition.

Acts of the Apostles; the title of a book in the New Testament, containing a history of the transactions of the apostles.

Acts of Sederant; in Scots law, statutes made by the lords of session, sitting in judgment, by virtue of a Scottish act of parliament, (1543,) empowering them to make such constitutions or regulations as they may think expedient for ordering the procedure and forms of administering justice. Brande.

Acta Diurna; among the Romans, a sort of gazette, containing an authorized account of transactions in Rome, nearly similar to our newspapers.

Acta Populi, or Acta Publica; the Roman registers of assemblies, trials, executions, buildings, births, marriages, and deaths of illustrious persons, &c.

Acta Sanctorum; the lives and reputed miracles of Romish saints.

Acta Senatus; minutes of what passed in the Roman senate, called also Commentarii, commentaries.

ACT'ED, pp. Done; performed; represented on the stage.

ACT'IAN, a. Relating to Actium, a town and promontory of Epirus; as, Actian games, which were instituted by Augustus, to celebrate his naval victory over Anthony, near that town, Sept. 2, B. C. 31. They were celebrated every five years. Hence, Actian years, reckoned from that era. Encyc.

ACT'INO-LITE, n. [Gr. actis, a ray, and lithe, a stone.] The bright green variety of hornblende, occurring usually in glassy prismatic crystals, and also fibrous. Dana.

ACT'INO-LIT'IC, a. Like or pertaining to actinolite.

ACT'INO-ME-TER, n. [Gr. actis, a ray, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of solar radiation. Daubeny.

ACT'ION, n. [L. actio. See Act.]

1. Literally, a driving; hence, the state of acting or moving; exertion of power or force, as when one body acts on another; or action is the effect of power exerted on one body by another; motion produced. Hence, action is opposed to rest. Action, when produced by one body on another, is mechanical; when produced by the will of a living being, spontaneous or voluntary. [See Def. 3.]

2. An act or thing done; a deed.

The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him are actions weighed.—1 Sam. ii.

3. In mechanics, agency; operation; driving impulse; effort of one body upon another; as, the action of wind upon a ship's sails; also, the effect of such action.

4. In ethics, the external signs or expression of the sentiments of a moral agent; conduct; behavior; demeanor; that is, motion or movement, with respect to a rule or propriety.

5. In poetry, a series of events, called also the subject or fable; this is of two kinds; the principal action, which is more strictly the fable, and the incidental action or episode. Encyc.

6. In oratory, gesture or gesticulation; the external deportment of the speaker, or the accommodation of his attitude, voice, gestures, and countenance, to the subject, or to the thoughts and feelings of the mind. Encyc.

7. In physiology, the motions or functions of the body, vital, animal, and natural; vital and involuntary, as the action of the heart and lungs; animal, as muscular, and all voluntary motions; natural, as mastication, deglutition, and digestion. Encyc.

8. In law, literally, an urging for right; a suit or process, by which a demand is made of a right; a claim made before a tribunal. Actions are real, personal, or mixed; real, or feudal, when the demandant claims a title to real estate; personal, when a man demands a debt, personal duty, or damages in lieu of it, or satisfaction for an injury to person or property; and mixed, when real estate is demanded, with damages for a wrong sustained. Actions are also civil or penal; civil, when instituted solely in behalf of private persons, to recover debts or damages; penal, when instituted to recover a penalty, imposed by way of punishment. The word is also used for a right of action; as, the law gives an action for every claim. Blackstone.

A chase in action, is a right to a thing, in opposition to the possession. A bond or note is a chase in action, [Fr. chose, a thing,] and gives the owner a right to prosecute his claim to the money, as he has an absolute property in a right, as well as in a thing, in possession.

9. In some countries of Europe, especially France, action is a share in the capital stock of a joint-stock company, or in the public funds, equivalent to our term share; and consequently, in a more general sense, in the plural, to stocks. The word is also used for movable effects.

10. In painting and sculpture, the attitude or position of the several parts of the body, by which they seem to be actuated by passions; as, the arm extended, to represent the act of giving or receiving.

11. Battle; fight; engagement between troops in war, whether on land or water, or by a greater or smaller number of combatants. This and the 8th definition exhibit the literal meaning of action, viz. a driving or urging.

Quantity of action; in physics, the product of the mass of a body by the space it runs through and its velocity. Encyc.

In many cases action and act are synonymous; but some distinction between them is observable. Action seems to have more relation to the passer than act, and its operation and process of acting; and act, more relation to the effect or operation complete. Action is also more generally used for ordinary transactions; and act, for such as are remarkable, or dignified; as, all our actions should be regulated by prudence; a prince is distinguished by acts of heroism or humanity. Encyc.

Action-taking, in Shakspeare, is used for litigious.

ACT'ION-A-BLE, a. That will bear a suit, or for which an action at law may be sustained; as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

ACT'ION-A-BLY, adv. In a manner that subjects to legal process.

ACT'ION-A-RY, or ACT'ION-IST, n. In Europe, a proprietor of stock in a joint-stock company; one who owns actions or shares of stock. Bacon.

ACT'IVE, a. [L. activus; Fr. actif.]

1. That has the power or quality of acting; that contains the principle of action, independent of any visible external force; as, attraction is an active power; or it may be defined, that communicates action or motion, opposed to passive, that receives action; as, the active powers of the mind.

2. Having the power of quick motion, or the disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile; as, an active animal. Hence,

3. Busy; constantly engaged in action; pursuing business with vigor and assiduity; opposed to dull, slow, or indolent; as, an active officer. It is also opposed to sedentary; as, an active life.

4. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects; opposed to speculative; as, the active duties of life.

5. In grammar, active verbs are those which not only signify action, but have a noun or name following them, denoting the object of the action or impression; called also transitive, as they imply the passing of the action expressed by the verb to the object; as, a professor instructs his pupils.

6. Active capital, or wealth, is money, or property that may readily be converted into money, and used in commerce or other employment for profit. Hamilton.

7. Active commerce; the commerce in which a nation carries its own productions and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens; as, contradistinguished from passive commerce, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another country.

The commerce of Great Britain and of the United States is active; that of China is passive.

It may be the interest of foreign nations to deprive us, as far as possible, of an active commerce in our own bottoms. Federalist, Hamilton.

ACT'IVE-LY, adv. In an active manner; by action; nimbly; briskly. In grammar, in an active signification; as, a word is used actively.

ACTIVE-NESS, n. The quality of being active; the faculty of acting; nimbleness; quickness of motion. Less used than activity.

7. In botany, ending in an acute angle, as a leaf or perianth. Martyn.

A-COTE'LY, adv. Sharply; keenly; with nice discrimination.

A-COTE'NESS, n. Sharpness; but seldom used in this literal sense, as applied to material things.

2. Figuratively, the faculty of nice discernment or perception; applied to the senses, or the understanding. By an acuteness of feeling, we perceive small objects or slight impressions; by an acuteness of intellect, we discern nice distinctions.

3. Sharpness, or elevation of sound, in rhetoric or music. Boyle.

4. Violence of a disease, which brings it speedily to a crisis.

A-CU-TIA-TOR, n. In the middle ages, a person whose office was to sharpen instruments. Before the invention of fire-arms, such officers attended armies to sharpen their instruments. Faesch.

AD, a Latin preposition, signifying to. It is probably from Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. Eth. אדא, Ar. ادى to come near, to approach; from which root we may also deduce at. In composition, the last letter is usually changed into the first letter of the word to which it is prefixed. Thus for adamo, the Romans wrote oclamo; for adverbius, aggregior; for adfirmus, affirmo; for adlego, allego; for adpono, appono; for adripio, arripio; for adscribo, ascribo; for adtimeo, attineo. The reason of this change is found in the ease of pronunciation, and agreeableness of the sounds.

Ad hominem; to the man; in logic, an argument adapted to touch the prejudices of the person addressed.

Ad inquirendum; in law, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made.

Ad libitum; at pleasure; in music, applied to a part or accompaniment which may be performed or not, without interfering with the composition.

Ad valorem; according to the value; in commerce and finance, terms used to denote duties or charges laid upon goods, at a certain rate per cent. upon their value, as stated in their invoices; in opposition to a specific sum upon a given quantity or number.

A-DAC-TYL, n. [Gr. α priv. and δκτερος, a digit.]

A locomotive extremity without digits. Brande.

AD'AGE, n. [L. adarius, or adagio; It. adagio.] A proverb; an old saying, which has obtained credit by long use; a wise observation handed down from antiquity.

AD-AG'IO, n. [It. adagio, a compound of ad and agio, leisure; Sp. and Port. ocio; L. otium; Fr. aise; Eng. ease.] In music, a slow movement. A piece of music, to be performed in adagio; as, an adagio of Haydn. As an adverb, slowly, leisurely, and with grace. When repeated, adagio, adagio, it directs the movement to be very slow.

AD'AM, n. In Heb. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar. Man; primarily, the name of the human species, mankind; appropriately, the first Man, the progenitor of the human race. The word signifies form, shape, or suitable form; hence, species. As a verb, the word signifies, in Ethiopic, to please or be agreeable; in Arabic, to join, unite, or be accordant, to agree. It is evidently connected with דמה damah, Heb. Ch. Syr., to be like or equal, to form an image, to assimilate; whence the sense of likeness, image, form, shape; Gr. δμωσις, a body, like. [See MAN.]

Adam's apple; a species of citron, [see CITRUS]; also, the prominent part of the throat.

Adam's needle; the popular name of the yucca, a plant of four species, cultivated in gardens. Of the roots, the Indians made a kind of bread. [See Yucca.]

AD-A-MANT, n. [Gr. αδαμς; L. adamas; a word of Celtic origin; W. chedraen, a lodestone, from ched, to fly or move, and raen, or nara, a stone. Chaucer uses adamant for the lodestone. Romanet of the Rose, lin. 1182. Gr. diamant is adamant and diamond; Sp. diamante; Sw. diamant; Fr. aimant, lodestone. See DIAMOND.]

A stone imagined by some to be of impenetrable hardness; a name given to the diamond and other substances of extreme hardness. The name has often been given to the lodestone; as, you draw me, you hard-hearted adamant. Shak. But in modern mineralogy it has no technical signification.

AD-A-MANT-E-AN, a. Hard as adamant. Milton.

AD-A-MANT'INE, a. Made of adamant; having the qualities of adamant; that can not be broken, dissolved, or penetrated; as, adamantine bonds, or chains.

Adamantine spar; a variety of corundum, with gray, brown, or greenish shades. This stone is very hard, and of difficult fusion. Dana.

AD-AM'IC, a. Pertaining to Adam. Adamic earth, is the term given to common red clay, so called by means of a mistaken opinion, that Adam means red earth.

AD-AM-ITES, n. pl. In church history, a sect of visionaries, who pretended to establish a state of Innocence, and, like Adam, went naked. They abhorred marriage, holding it to be the effect of sin. Several attempts have been made to revive this sect; as late as the 15th century. Encyc.

AD-AM-IT'IC, a. Like the Adamites. Taylor.

AD-AN-SO'NI-A, n. Ethiopian sour gourd, monk's bread, or African calash-tree. It is a genus of one species, called baobab, a native of Africa, and one of the largest of the vegetable kingdom. The stem rises not above twelve or fifteen feet, but is from sixty-five to seventy-eight feet in circumference. The branches shoot horizontally to the length of sixty feet, the ends hanging to the ground. The fruit is long, covered at both ends, ten inches in length, and pointed with a greenish down, under which is a hard, ligneous rind. It hangs to the tree by a pedicle two feet long, and contains a white, spongy substance. The leaves and bark, dried and powdered, are used by the negroes as pepper on their food, to promote perspiration. The tree is named from M. Adanson, who has given a description of it. Encyc.

ADA-PIS, n. An animal of the pachydermatous order of mammals, somewhat resembling a hedgehog; now extinct. Buckland.

A-DAP'T, v. t. [Sp. adaptar; It. adattare; L. ad and apto, to fit; Gr. απρω.]

To make suitable; to fit, or suit; as, to adapt an instrument to its uses; we have provision adapted to our wants. It is applied to things material or immaterial.

A-DAPT-A-BIL-I-TY, n. The quality of being

A-DAPT'A-BLE-NESS, capable of adaptation.

A-DAPT'A-BLE, a. That may be adapted.

A-DAPT'ED, pp. Suited; made suitable; fitted.

A-DAPT'ED-NESS, n. State of being adapted; suitability.

A-DAP'TER, n. One who adapts.

2. In chemistry. See ADAPTER.

A-DAP'T'ING, ppr. Suiting; making fit.

A-DAP'T'ION, n. Adaptation; the act of fitting.

[Little used, and hardly legitimate.]

A-DAPT'NESS, n. A state of being fitted. [Not used.] Newton.

AD'AR, n. A Hebrew month, answering to the latter part of February and the beginning of March, the 12th of the sacred and 6th of the civil year; so named from אדר, to become glorious, from the exuberance of vegetation, in that month, in Egypt and Palestine. Parkhurst.

AD AR-BITRUM, [L.] At will or pleasure.

AD-AR'CE, n. [Gr. αδαρς.]

A stilted concretion on reeds and grass in marshy grounds in Galatia. It is lax and porous, like bastard sponge, and used to clear the skin in leprosy, tetters, &c.

A-DXUNT', v. t. To subdue. [Not used.] See DAUNT.

AD-AX'U, v. t. To daunt; to subject. [Not used.] Skelton.

A-DAYS', adv. On or in days; as in the phrase now a-days.

AD CAP-TAN'DUM, [L.] To captivate; ad captandam animum, to please and attract the populace.

AD-COR-POR-ATE, v. t. To unite one body with another.

ADD, v. t. [L. addo, from ad and do, to give.]

1. To set or put together, join, or unite; as, one thing or sum to another, in an aggregate; as, add three to four, the sum is seven.

2. To unite in idea or consideration; in subjoin; as to what has been alleged, let this argument be added.

3. To increase number.
Thou shalt add three cities more of refuge. — Deut. xix.
4. To augment.
Rehoboth said, I will add to your yoke. — 1 Kings xii.
Ye shall not add to the word which I command you. — Deut. iv.
As here used, the verb is intransitive, but there may be an ellipsis.
To add to, is used in Scripture, as equivalent to give, or bestow upon. Gen. xxx. Matt. vi. In Gal. ii. the word is understood to signify instruction; "In conference they added nothing to me." In narration, he or they added, is elliptical; he added words, or what follows, or he continued his discourse.

In general, when used of things, add implies a principal thing, to which a smaller is to be annexed, as a part of the whole sum, mass, or number. AD-DEC'1-MATE, v. t. [L. ad and decimus, tenth.] To take, or to ascertain things.

AD-DEE'VE, pp. Joined in place, in sum, in mass, or aggregate, in number, in idea, or consideration; united; put together.
AD-DEEM'V, v. t. [See DEEM.] To award; to sentence. [Little used.]

AD-DEN'DUM, n.; pl. AD-DEN'DA. [L.] A thing or things to be added; an appendix.
AD'DER, n. [Sax. atter or attor, n serpent and poison; D. adder, Qu. Sax. neadre, n serpent; Goth. nadr; G. natter; W. nider; Corn. naddy; Ir. nathair; L. natrix, a serpent.]

A venomous serpent of several species, belonging to the viper family.

AD'DER-FLY, n. A name of the dragon-fly or Libellula; sometimes called addolt.

AD'DER'S-GRASS, n. A plant about which serpents lurk.

AD'DER'S-TONGUE, n. A genus of ferns, Ophioglossum, whose seeds are produced on a spike resembling a serpent's tongue.

AD'DER'S-WÖRT, n. Snakeweed, so named from its supposed virtue in curing the bite of serpents.

AD-DI-BL'I-TY, n. The possibility of being added. [Locke.]

AD-DI-BLE, a. [See Aoo.] That may be added. [Locke.]

AD'DICE, n. [Obs.] See Aoz.

AD-DICT'1, a. Addicted. [Not much used.]

AD-DICT'V, v. t. [L. adicio, to devote, from ad and dicō, to dedicate.] To apply one's self habitually; to devote time and attention by customary or constant practice. [Sometimes in a good sense.]

They have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. — 1 Cor. xv.

More usually, in a bad sense, to follow customarily, or devote, by habitually practicing that which is ill; as, a man is addicted to intemperance.

To addict one's self to a person — a sense borrowed from the Romans, who used the word for assigning debtors in service to their creditors — is found in Ben Jonson, but is not legitimate in English.

AD-DICT'ED, pp. Devoted by customary practice.

AD-DICT'ED-NESS, n. The quality or state of being addicted.

AD-DICT'ING, pp. Devoting time and attention; practicing customarily.

AD-DICT'ION, n. The act of devoting or giving up in practice; the state of being devoted.

His addiction was to courses vain. [Shak.]

2. Among the Romans, a making over goods to another by sale or legal sentence; also, an assignment of debtors in service to their creditors. [Encyc.]

AD-DING, pp. Joining; putting together; increasing. AD-DING-A-MENT, n. [L. ad ditamentum, from aditus and ment. See Aoo.]

An addition, or rather the thing added, as furniture in a house; any material mixed with the principal ingredients in a compound. Ancient anatomists gave the name to an epiphysis, or junction of bones without articulation. [Little used in either sense.]

AD-DIT'ION, n. [L. additio, from aditō.] 1. The act of adding, opposed to subtraction, or diminution; as, a sum is increased by addition.

2. Any thing added, whether material or immaterial.

3. In arithmetic, the uniting of two or more numbers in one sum; also the rule or branch of arithmetic which treats of adding numbers. Simple addition is the joining of sums of the same denomination, as pounds to pounds, dollars to dollars. Compound addition is the joining of sums of different denominations, as dollars and cents.

4. In law, a title annexed to a man's name, to show his rank, occupation, or place of residence; as, John Doe, Esq.; Richard Roe, Gent.; Robert Dale, Mason; Thomas Way, of New York.

5. In music, a dot at the right side of a note, to lengthen its sound one half.

6. In heraldry, something added to a coat of arms, as a mark of honor, opposed to abatements; as, hordure, quarter, canton, gyron, pile, &c. [Encyc.]

7. In distilling, any thing added to the wash or liquor in a state of fermentation.

8. In popular language, an advantage, ornament, improvement; that is, an addition by way of eminence.

AD-DIT'ION-AL, a. That is added. It is used by Bacon for addition; but improperly.

AD-DIT'ION-AL-I-Y, adv. By way of addition.

AD-DIT'IVE, a. That may be added, or that is to be added.

AD-DIT-TO-RY, a. That adds, or may add.

AD'DLE, a. [W. hadyl, corrupt; hadla, to decay, to purify; Heb. לרר, to fail, Ar. حادلا hadala, to decline, and حاد hadala, to frustrate, to fail, to cease; Sax. adilian, to be empty, or vain.]

Unimpregnated; not fecundated; also, having lost the power of development; in a morbid state; putrid; applied to eggs. Hence, barren, producing nothing.

His brains grow addle. [Dryden.]

AD'DLE, v. t. To make addle; to make corrupt or morbid. [Scott.]

AD'DLED, pp. or a. Morbid, corrupt, putrid, or barren. [Browne.]

AD'DLE-HEAD'ED, a. Having empty brains.

AD'DLE-PA-TED, a. [Dryden.]

AD-DOOM'V, v. t. [See DOOM.] To adjudge. [Spenser.]

AD-DORS'ED, (ad-dorst') a. [L. ad and dorsum, the back.]

In heraldry, having the backs turned to each other, as beasts. [Dryden.]

AD-DRESS'V, v. t. [Fr. adresser; Sp. endercar; It. dirizzare, to direct, to make straight. This is supposed to be from L. dirigo. See Darsas.]

1. To prepare; to make suitable dispositions for; to enter upon; as, he now addressed himself to the business.

Turnus addressed his men to single fight. [Dryden.]

The archangel and the evil spirit addressing themselves for the combat. [Addison.]

[This sense is, I believe, obsolete or little used.]

2. To direct words or discourse; to apply to by words; as, to address a discourse to an assembly; to address the judges.

3. To direct in writing, as a letter; or to direct and transmit; as, he addressed a letter to the Speaker. Sometimes it is used with the reciprocal pronoun; as, he addressed himself to the Speaker, instead of, he addressed his discourse. The phrase is faulty, but less so than the following: To such I would address with this most affectionate petition.

Young Turnus to the beautiful maid addressed. [Dryden.]

The latter is admissible in poetry, as an elliptical phrase.

4. To present an address, as a letter of thanks or congratulation, a petition, or a testimony of respect; as, the legislature addressed the President.

5. To court or make suit as a lover.

6. In commerce, to consign or intrust to the care of another, as agent or factor; as, the ship was addressed to a merchant in Baltimore.

AD-DRESS'V, n. A speaking to; verbal application; a formal manner of speech; as, when introduced, the President made a short address.

2. A written or formal application; a message of respect, congratulation, thanks, petition, &c.; as, an address of thanks; an officer is removable upon the address of both houses of assembly.

3. Manner of speaking to another; as, a man of pleasing address.

4. Courtship; more generally in the plural, addresses; as, he makes or pays his addresses to a lady.

5. Skill; dexterity; skillful management; as, the envoy conducted the negotiation with address.

6. Direction of a letter, &c., including the name, title, and place of residence of the person for whom it is intended. Hence, these particulars are denominated a man's address.

AD-I-T, n. [L. aditus, from adeo, aditum, to approach, ad and eo, to go.]
 An entrance or passage; a term in mining, used to denote the opening by which a mine is entered, or by which water and ores are carried away; called also the drift. It is usually made in the side of a hill. The word is sometimes used for air-shaft, but not with strict propriety. Encyc.
AD-JA-CEN-CY, n. [L. adjacere, to lie contiguous, from ad and jacere, to lie.]
 The state of lying close or contiguous; a bordering upon or lying next to; as, the adjacency of lands or buildings. In the sense of that which is adjacent, as used by Brown, it is not legitimate.
AD-JA-CENT, a. Lying near, close, or contiguous; bordering upon; as, a field adjacent to the highway.
AD-JA-CENT, n. That which is next to or contiguous. [Little used.] Locke.
AD-JA-CENT-LY, adv. So as to be adjacent.
AD-JECT', v. t. [L. adicio, of ad and jacere, to throw.]
 To add or put, as one thing to another. Macknight.

AD-JEC-TION, n. The act of adding, or thing added. [Little used.] Bronen.
AD-JEC-TI-VIOUS, a. Added. Parkhurst, Gram.
AD-JEC-TIVE, n. In grammar, a word used with a noun, to express a quality of the thing named, or something attributed to it, or to limit or define it, or to specify or describe a thing, as distinct from something else. It is called also an attributive or attributive. Thus, in the phrase, a wise ruler, wise is the adjective or attribute, expressing a particular property of ruler.
Adjective color; a color which requires to be fixed by some mordant or base to give it permanency. Ure.
AD-JEC-TIVE-LY, adv. In the manner of an adjective; as, a word is used adjectively.
AD-JOIN', v. t. [Fr. adjointre; L. adjungo, ad and jungo. See JOIN.]
 To join or unite to; to put to, by placing in contact; to unite, by fastening together with a joint, mortise, or knot. But in these transitive senses, it is rarely used. [See JOIN.]
AD-JOIN', v. i. To lie or be next to, or in contact; to be contiguous; as, a farm adjoining to the highway. This is the common use of the word, and to is often omitted; as, adjoining the highway.
AD-JOIN-ANT, a. Contiguous to. [Not used.] Carcic.
AD-JOIN-ED, (ad-join'd), pp. Joined to; united.
AD-JOIN-ING, ppr. Joining to; adjacent; contiguous.

AD-JOURN', (ad-jurn'), v. t. [Fr. ajourner, from journee, a day, or day's work, or journey; It. giorno. See JOURNAL, JOURNAY.]
 Literally, to put off, or defer to another day; but now used to denote a formal intermission of business, a putting off to any future meeting of the same body, and appropriately used of public bodies or private commissioners, intrusted with business; as, the court adjourned the consideration of the question.
AD-JOURN', v. i. To suspend business for a time; as from one day to another, or for a longer period, usually public business, as of legislatures and courts, for repose or refreshment; as, Congress adjourned at four o'clock. It is also used for the act of closing the session of a public body; as, the court adjourned without day.
 It was moved that parliament should adjourn for six weeks. Select Speeches, vol. v. 403.

AD-JOURN-ED, (ad-jurn'd), pp. Put off, delayed, or deferred for a limited time.
 2. As an adjective, existing or held by adjournment; as, an adjourned session of a court, opposed to stated or regular.
AD-JOURN-ING, ppr. Deferring; suspending for a time; closing a session.
AD-JOURN-MENT, n. The act of adjourning; as, in legislatures, the adjournment of one house is not an adjournment of the other.
 2. The putting off till another day or time specified, or without day; that is, the closing of a session of a public or official body.
 3. The time or interval during which a public body defers business; as, during an adjournment. But a suspension of business for refreshment, between the forming of a house and an adjournment, is called a recess. In Great Britain, the close of a session of parliament is called a prorogation; as the close of a parliament is a dissolution. But in Great Britain, as well as in the United States, adjournment is now used for an intermission of business for any indefinite time; as, an adjournment of parliament for six weeks. Select Speeches, vol. v. 404.
AD-JUDGE, v. t. [Fr. adjudge, from judge, judge. See JUDGE.]
 To decide, or determine, in the case of a controverted question; as, the prize was adjudged to the victor; to decree by a judicial opinion; used appropriately of courts of law and equity; as, the case was adjudged in Hilary term; a criminal was adjudged to suffer death.
 It has been used in the sense of to judge; as, he adjudged him unworthy of his friendship. But this sense is unusual.
AD-JUDG-ED, (ad-judg'd), pp. Determined by judicial opinion; decreed; sentenced.
AD-JUDG-ING, ppr. Determining by judicial opinion; sentencing.
AD-JUDG-MENT, n. The act of judging; sentence. Templ.
AD-JU-DI-CATE, v. t. [L. adjudico, to give sentence. See JUDICE.]
 To adjudge; to try and determine, as a court. It has the sense of adjudge.
AD-JU-DI-CATE, v. i. To try and determine upon judicially; as, the court adjudicated upon the case.
AD-JU-DI-CATE-D, pp. Adjudged; tried and decided.
AD-JU-DI-CATING, ppr. Adjudging; trying and determining.
AD-JU-DI-CATION, n. The act of adjudging; the act or process of trying and determining judicially; as, a ship was taken and sent into port for adjudication.
 2. A judicial sentence; judgment or decision of a court.
 Those families were parties to some of the former adjudications. Blackstone.
 3. In Scots law, an action by which a creditor attaches the heritable estate of his debtor, or his debtor's heir, in payment or security of his debt; or an action by which the holder of a heritable right, laboring under a defect in point of form, may supply that defect. Encyc.

AD-JU-MENT, n. [L. adjumentum.]
 Help; support. [Not used.]
AD-JUN-CT, n. [L. adjunctus, joined, from adjungo. See JOIN.]
 1. Something added to another, but not essentially a part of it; as, water absorbed by a cloth or sponge is its adjunct. Also, a person joined to another.
 2. In metaphysics, a quality of the body or the mind, whether natural or acquired; as color, in the body; thinking, in the mind.
 3. In grammar, words added to illustrate or amplify the force of other words; as the history of the American Revolution. The words in Italics are the adjuncts of History.
 4. In music, the word is employed to denominate the relation between the principal notes and the notes of its two fifths. Encyc.
 The adjunct deities, among the Romans, were inferior deities, which were added as assistants to the principal gods; as Bellona to Mars; to Vulcan, the Cabri; to the Good Genius, the Lares; to the Evil, the Lemures. Encyc.
 In the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, the ad-

AD-MEAS'UR-ER, n. One that admeasures.

AD-MEAS'UR-ING, pp. Measuring; apportioning.

AD-MEN-SU-RATION is equivalent to ADMEASUREMENT, but not much used. [See MEASUREMENT.]

AD-MIN'I-CLE, n. [L. adminiculum.] Help; support. [Not used.]

AD-MIN'ICU-LAR, a. Supplying help; helpful.

AD-MIN'IS-TER, v. t. [L. ministro, of ad and ministro, to serve or manage. See MINISTER.]

1. To act as minister or chief agent, in managing public affairs, under laws or a constitution of government, as a king, president, or other supreme officer. It is used also of absolute monarchs, who rule not in subordination; but is more strictly applicable to limited monarchs and other supreme executive officers, and to governors, viceroys, judges, and the like, who are under the authority of laws. A king or a president administers the government or laws when he executes them, or carries them into effect. A judge administers the laws when he applies them to particular cases or persons. In short, to administer is to direct the execution or application of laws.

2. To dispense, as, to administer justice or the sacrament.

3. To afford; to give or furnish; as, to administer relief, that is, to act as the agent. To administer medicine, is to direct and cause it to be taken.

4. To give, as an oath; to cause to swear accordingly to law.

AD-MIN'IS-TER, v. i. To contribute; to bring aid or supplies; to add something; as, a shade administers to our comfort.

2. To perform the office of administrator; as, A minister upon the estate of B.

AD-MIN-IS-TER-I-AL, a. Pertaining to administration, or to the executive part of government.

AD-MIN'IS-TER-ING, pp. Executing; carrying into effect; giving; dispensing.

AD-MIN-IS-TRATE, in the place of ADMINISTER, has been used, but is not well authorized.

AD-MIN-IS-TRATION, n. The act of administering; direction; management; government of public affairs; and the conducting of any office or employment.

2. The executive part of government, consisting in the exercise of the constitutional and legal powers, the general superintendence of national affairs, and the enforcement of laws.

3. The persons collectively, who are intrusted with the execution of laws, and the superintendence of public affairs; the chief magistrate and his council; or the council alone, as in Great Britain.

4. Dispensation; distribution; exhibition; as, the administration of justice, of the sacrament, or of grace. 1 Cor. xii. 2 Cor. ix.

5. The management of the estate of an intestate person, under a commission from the proper authority. This management consists in collecting debts, paying debts and legacies, and distributing the property among the heirs.

6. The power, office, or commission of an administrator.

Surrogates are authorized to grant administration. Laws of New York.

It is more usual to say, letters of administration. Blackstone.

7. This name was given by the Spaniards to the staple magazine or warehouse at Callao, in Peru, where foreign ships must unload. Encyc.

AD-MIN-IS-TRATIVE, a. That administers, or by which one administers.

AD-MIN-IS-TRATOR, n. A man who, by virtue of a commission from the ordinary, surrogate, court of probate, or other proper authority, has the charge of the goods and estate of one dying without a will.

2. One who administers, or who directs, manages, distributes, or dispenses laws and rites, either in civil, judicial, political, or ecclesiastical affairs.

3. In Scots law, a tutor, curator, or guardian, having the care of one who is incapable of acting for himself. This term is usually applied to a father who has power over his children and their estate, during their minority. Encyc.

AD-MIN-IS-TRATOR-SHIP, n. The office of an administrator.

AD-MIN-IS-TRAT'RIX, n. A female who administers upon the estate of an intestate; also, a female who administers government.

AD-MI-RA-BIL'I-TY, [n.] The quality of being admirable. AD-MI-RA-BLE-NESS, {mirable; of the power of exciting admiration.

AD-MI-RA-BLE, a. [L. admirabilis.] To be admired; worthy of admiration; having qualities to excite wonder, with approbation, esteem, or reverence; used of persons or things; as, the admirable structure of the body, or of the universe.

AD-MI-RA-BLY, adv. In a manner to excite wonder, mingled with approbation, esteem, or veneration.

AD-MI-RAL, n. [In the Latin of the middle ages, amira, amiras, admiralis, an emir; Sp. almirante; Port. id.; It. ammiraglio; Fr. amiral; from Ar. amir, commander.]

amara, to command, امير, a commander; Sans. amara; Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam אמר, to speak. The terminating syllable of admiral may be ad's, the sea. This word is said to have been introduced into Europe by the Genese or Venetians, in the 12th or 13th century.]

A marine commander in chief; the commander of a fleet or navy.

1. The lord high admiral, in Great Britain, is an officer who superintends all maritime affairs, and has the government of the navy. He has also jurisdiction over all maritime causes, and commissions the naval officers.

2. The admiral of the fleet, the highest officer under the admiralty. When he embarks on an expedition, the union flag is displayed at the main-top-gallant-mast-head.

3. The vice-admiral, an officer next in rank and command to the admiral, has command of the second squadron. He carries his flag at the fore-top-gallant-mast-head. This name is given also to certain officers who have power to hold courts of vice-admiralty in various parts of the British dominions.

4. The rear admiral, next in rank to the vice-admiral, has command of the third squadron, and carries his flag at the mizen-top-gallant-mast-head.

5. The commander of any single fleet, or in general any flag officer.

6. The ship which carries the admiral; also the most considerable ship of a fleet of merchantmen, or of fishing vessels. Encyc.

7. In zoology, a species of shell-fish. [See VALUTA.]

8. A species of butterfly, which lays her eggs on the great stinging nettle, and delights in brambles. Encyc.

AD-MI-RAL-SHIP, n. The office or power of an admiral. [Little used.]

AD-MI-RAL'TY, n. In Great Britain, the office of lord high admiral. This office is discharged by one person, or by a board of commissioners, called lords of the admiralty; formerly seven, but now six in number.

2. The building where the lords of the admiralty transact business.

The admiralty court, or court of admiralty, is the supreme court for the trial of maritime causes, held before the lord high admiral, or lords of the admiralty. vii.

In general, a court of admiralty is a court for the trial of causes arising on the high seas, as prize causes and the like. In the United States, there is no admiralty court, distinct from others; but the district courts, established in the several states by Congress, are invested with admiralty powers.

AD-MI-RAT'ION, n. Wonder mingled with pleasing emotions, as approbation, esteem, love or veneration; a compound emotion excited by something novel, rare, great, or excellent; applied to persons and their works. It often includes a slight degree of surprise. Thus we view the solar system with admiration.

Very oer to admiration is the wish to admire. Anon.

It has been sometimes used in an ill sense, denoting wonder with disapprobation.

Your boldness I with admiration see. Dryden.

When I saw her, I wondered with great admiration. — Rev.

AD-MIRE, v. t. [L. admiro, ad and miror, to wonder; Sp. and Port. admirar; Fr. admirer; It. ammirare; Fr. mirer, to look, to take aim; Corn. miras, to look, see, or face; Arm. mirat, to stop, hold, keep; W. mir, visage; also, fair, comely; and miror, one that looks after, keeps or guards, a major or half; Russ. samiray, to be astonished or stupefied; ad. miray, and miry, peace; miruy, to pacify; samiray, to make peace. The primary sense is to hold, to stop, or swain. Ch. and Syr. דמר; L. demiror. See MOON and MAN.]

1. To regard with wonder or surprise, mingled with approbation, esteem, reverence, or affection.

When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and be admired in all them that love him. — 2 Thes. 1.

This word has been used in an ill sense, but seems now correctly restricted to the sense here given, and implying something great, rare, or excellent, in the object admired.

2. To regard with affection; a familiar term for to love greatly. [It is an error to follow this verb with an infinitive; as, I admire to see a man consistent in his conduct. Ed.]

AD-MIRE, v. t. To wonder; to be affected with slight surprise; sometimes with at; as, to admire at his own contrivance. Ray.

To admire at sometimes implies disapprobation.

AD-MISSION, n. [L. admissio.]

1. The act or practice of admitting; as, the admission of aliens into our country; also, the state of being admitted.

2. Admittance; power or permission to enter; entrance; access; power to approach; as, our laws give to foreigners easy admittance to the rights of citizens; the admission of a clerk to a benefice.

3. Allowance; grant of an argument or position not fully proved.

AD-MIT', v. t. [L. admitto, from ad and mitto, to send; Fr. mettre.]

1. To suffer to enter; to grant entrance, whether into a place, or an office, or into the mind, or consideration; as, to admit a student into college; to admit a serious thought into the mind.

2. To give right of entrance; as, a ticket admits one into a play-house.

3. To allow; to receive as true; as, the argument or fact is admitted.

4. To permit, grant, or allow, or to be capable of; as, the words do not admit of such a construction. In this sense, of may be used after the verb, or omitted.

AD-MITTA-BLE, a. That may be admitted or allowed.

AD-MIT'TANCE, n. The act of admitting; allowance usually. [ance.]

2. Permission to enter; the power or right of entrance; and hence, actual entrance; as, he gained admittance into the church.

3. Concession; admission; allowance; as, the admittance of an argument. [Not used.]

4. Shakespeare uses the word for the custom or prerogative of being admitted; "Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance;" but the license is unwarrantable.

AD-MIT'TER, n. He that admits.

AD-MIT'TING, ppr. Permitting to enter or approach; allowing; conceding.

AD-MIX', v. t. To mingle with something else. [See MIX.]

AD-MIX'TION, (ad-mix'th'an, n. [L. admixtio, or admixtio, of ad and mixco, to mix. See MIX.]

A mingling of bodies; a union by mixing different substances together. It differs from composition or chemical combination; for admixture does not alter the nature of the substances mixed, but merely blends them together; whereas in composition, the particles unite by affinity, lose their former properties, and form new compounds, with different properties.

AD-MIX'TURE, n. [from admix.]

The substance mingled with another; sometimes the act of mixture, or the state of being mixed. We say, an admixture of sulphur with alum, or the admixture of different bodies.

AD-MONISH, v. t. [L. admonere, ad and monere, to teach, warn, admonish; Fr. admoner; Norm. amonester; Sp. amonestar; Port. amonstar, or admonstar; It. ammovere; G. mahnen, ermahnen; D. maanen, to dun, vermaanen, to admonish; Sw. mana, formana; Dan. mane, formane; Sax. manan, to mean.]

AD-O-NIS, n. In botany, bird's eye or pheasant's eye.

AD-O-NIS'TS, n. pl. [Heb. Ch. and Syr. אֲדוֹן Adon, Lord, a scriptural title of the Supreme Being.]

Among critics, a sect or party who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah, are not the natural points belonging to that word, and that they do not express the true pronunciation of it; but that they are vowel points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the ineffable name Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to utter, and the true pronunciation of which was lost; they were therefore always to pronounce the word Adonai, instead of Jehovah. Encyc.

AD-OPT', v. t. [L. adopto, of ad and opto, to desire or choose. See OPTION.]

1. To take a stranger into one's family, as son and heir; to take one who is not a child, and treat him as one, giving him a title to the privileges and rights of a child.

2. In a spiritual sense, to receive the sinful children of men into the invisible church, and into God's favor and protection, by which they become heirs of salvation by Christ. Brown.

3. To take or receive as one's own that which is not naturally so; as, to adopt the opinions of another; or to receive that which is new; as, to adopt a particular mode of husbandry.

4. To select and take; as, which mode will you adopt?

A-DOPT'ED, pp. or a. Taken as one's own; received as son and heir; selected for use.

A-DOPT'ED-LY, adv. In the manner of something adopted.

A-DOPT'ER, n. One who adopts.

2. In chemistry, a large, round receiver, with two necks, diametrically opposite to each other, one of which admits the neck of a retort, and the other is joined to another receiver. It is used in distillations, to give more space to elastic vapors, or to increase the length of the neck of a retort.

A-DOPT'ING, ppr. Taking a stranger as a son; taking as one's own.

A-DOPT'ION, n. [L. adoptio.]

1. The act of adopting, or the state of being adopted; the taking and treating of a stranger as one's own child.

2. The receiving as one's own what is new or not natural.

3. God's taking the sinful children of men into his favor and protection. Eph. iv.

Adoption by arms; an ancient ceremony of presenting arms to one for his merit or valor, which laid the person under an obligation to defend the giver.

Adoption by baptism, is the spiritual affinity which is contracted by god-fathers and god-children, in the ceremony of baptism. It was introduced into the Greek church, and afterward among the ancient Franks. This affinity was supposed to entitle the god-child to a share of the god-father's estate. Encyc.

Adoption by hair, was performed by cutting off the hair of a person and giving it to the adoptive father. Thus Pope John VIII. adopted Boson, king of Arles.

Adoption by matrimony, is the taking of the children of a wife or husband by a further marriage, into the condition of natural children. This is a practice peculiar to the Germans, but is not so properly adoption as adfiliation. Encyc.

Adoption by testament, is the appointing of a person to be heir, by will, on condition of his taking the name, arms, &c., of the adopter. Encyc.

In Europe, adoption is used for many kinds of admission to a more intimate relation, and is nearly equivalent to reception; as, the admission of persons into hospitals or monasteries, or of one society into another. Encyc.

A-DOR'A-BLE, a. That ought to be adored; worthy of divine honors. In popular use, worthy of the utmost love or respect.

A-DOR'A-BLE-NESS, n. The quality of being adorable, or worthy of adoration.

A-DOR'A-BLY, adv. In a manner worthy of adoration.

AD-O-RA'TION, n. The act of paying honors to a divine being; the worship paid to God; the act of addressing as a God. Adoration consists in external homage, accompanied with the highest reverence. It is used for the act of praying, or preferring requests or thanksgiving to the Supreme Being.

2. Homage paid to one in high esteem; profound reverence.

Adoration, among the Jews, was performed by bowing, kneeling, and prostration. Among the Romans, the devotee, with his head covered or veiled, applied his right hand to his lips, bowing and turning himself from left to right. The Persians fell on the face, striking the forehead against the earth, and kissing the ground. The adoration paid to the Grecian and Roman emperors consisted in bowing and kneeling at the feet of the prince, laying hold of his robe, then withdrawing the hand and clapping it to the lips. In modern times, adoration is paid to the pope by kissing his feet, and to princes by kneeling and kissing the hand. This word was used by the Romans for acclamation or great applause, given to public performers; and the election of a pope is sometimes by adoration, that is, by sudden acclamation without scrutiny. Encyc.

A-DOR'E', v. t. [L. adoro. In Ch. and Heb. שָׁבַח, hader, to honor, reverence, or glorify, to adorn; Heb. אָדַר, to be magnificent or glorious, to magnify, to glorify. This word is usually referred to the Latin ad orare, to carry to one's mouth; ad and ora, as; in order to kiss one's hand, the hand is carried to one's mouth. See Calver, ad verbum, who cites, in confirmation of this opinion, the ancient practice of kissing the hand. See Job xxxi. 1 Kings xix. 18. Gen. xli. Ainsworth supposes the word to be a compound of ad and ora, to pray; and if the word is compound, as I suspect, this opinion is most probably correct.

1. To worship with profound reverence; to address with exalted thoughts, by prayer and thanksgiving; to pay divine honors to; to honor as a god, or as divine. Dryden.

2. To love in the highest degree; to regard with the utmost esteem, affection, and respect; as, the people adore their prince. Taitler.

A-DULT'ER-IOUS-LY, adv. In an adulterous manner.

A-DULT'ER-Y, n. [L. adulterium. See ADULTERATE.]

1. Violation of the marriage bed; a crime, or a civil injury, which introduces or may introduce, into a family, a spurious offspring.

In common usage, adultery means the unfaithfulness of any married person to the marriage bed. In England, Parliament grant absolute divorces for infidelity to the marriage bed in either party; and the spiritual courts divorce a mensa et tora.

By the laws of Connecticut, the sexual intercourse of any man with a married woman, is the crime of adultery in both; such intercourse of a married man with an unmarried woman, is fornication in both, and adultery of the man, within the meaning of the law respecting divorce; but not a felonious adultery in either, or the crime of adultery at common law, or by statute. This latter offense is, in England, preceded with only in the ecclesiastical courts.

2. In a scriptural sense, all manner of lewdness or unchastity, as in the seventh commandment.

☞ The advocate of a church or religious house. Cyc.

AD-VOW'SON, n. [Fr. avouerie, from avouer, to avow; Norm. avoerie, or avoeson. But the word was latinized, advocatio, from advoco, and avow is from advoco.]

In English law, a right of presentation to a vacant benefice; or, in other words, a right of nominating a person to officiate in a vacant church. The name is derived from advocatio, because the right was first obtained by such as were founders, benefactors, or strenuous defenders, advocates, of the church. Those who have this right are styled patrons. Advowsons are of three kinds, presentative, collative, and donative; presentative, when the patron presents his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted; collative, when the bishop is the patron, and institutes or collates his clerk, by a single act; donative, when a church is founded by the king, and assigned to the patron, without being subject to the ordinary, so that the patron confers the benefice on his clerk, without presentation, institution, or induction.

Advowsons are also appendant, that is, annexed to a manor, or in gross, that is, annexed to the person of the patron. Blackstone.

A-GÄN', (a-gen') adv. [Sax. gean, agen, agean, ogean; D. with a different prefix, gegen; G. dagegen, gegen; Sw. igen; Dan. igjen; qu. L. con, whence contra; Ir. conas, opposite; a meeting. Hence Sax. to geanes, to geagans; against; but placed after its object; as, Ähi conas heom togeanes, "they come them against. D. tegens, against; jegens, toward; G. entgegen, dagegen, against; begegen, to meet or encounter. The primary sense is to turn, or to meet in front; or the name of the face, front, or forepart. So, in Dan. and Sw., mod, inod, enot, against, is our word meet.]

1. A second time; once more. Gen. viii.

I will not again curse the ground. — Gen. viii.

2. It notes something further, or additional to one or more particulars.

For to which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee? and again, I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son; and again, Let all the angels of God worship him. — Heb. 1.

All the uses of this word carry in them the ideas of return or repetition; as in these phrases, — give it back again; give him as much again, that is, the same quantity once more or repeated. There is not, in the world again, such a commerce as in London. Who art thou that answerest again? Bring us word again.

Again and again; often; with frequent repetition. A-GAINST', (a-genst') prep. [Sax. to geanes. See AGAIN.]

1. In opposition; noting enmity or disapprobation. His hand will be against every man. — Gen. xvi. I am against your pillows. — Ec. xiii.

2. In opposition, noting contrariety, contradiction, or repugnance; as, a decree against law, reason, or public opinion.

3. In opposition, noting competition, or different sides or parties; as, there are twenty votes in the affirmative against ten in the negative.

4. In an opposite direction; as, to ride against the wind.

5. Opposite in place; abreast; as, a ship is against the mouth of a river. In this sense it is often preceded by over.

Aaron lighted the lamps over against the candlesticks. — Num. viii.

6. In opposition, noting adversity, injury, or contrariety to wishes; as, this change of measure is against us.

7. Bearing upon; as, one leans against a wall.

8. In provision for; in preparation for. Urich made it, against King Ahas came from Damascus. — 2 Kings xvi.

In this sense against is a preposition, with the following part of the sentence for an object. See ATTRA, prep. def. 2.

In short, the sense of this word is opposition, variously modified according to its application to different objects.

AG-NOMI-NATION, n. [L. agnomen, a surname, of ad and nomen. See NAME.]

1. An additional name, or title; a name added to another, as expressive of some act, achievement, &c.; a surname. Encyc.

2. Allusion of one word to another by sound. Camden.

AG'NUS CASTUS, n. [L.] A species of Vitis, so called from the Gr. agnos, chaste, from its imagined virtue of preserving chastity. The Athenian ladies reposed on the leaves of this plant at the feast of Ceres. The Latin castus, chaste, now added to the name, forms a duplication of the sense. Encyc.

AG'NUS DE'I, n. [Lamb of God.]

1. In the Roman Catholic church, a cake of wax stamped with the figure of a lamb, supporting the banner of the cross. It is supposed to possess great virtues in preserving those who carry it, in faith, from accidents, &c. Also, a part of the mass, in which the prayer beginning with these words is repeated by the priest. Encyc.

2. A prayer beginning with these words.

AG'NUS SCYTHI-CUS. [Scythian lamb.] A name applied to the roots of a species of fern, Aspidium Barometz, covered with brown woolly scales, and in shape resembling a lamb; found in Russia and Tartary.

A-GO', adv. or a. [Sax. agan, or geond, the participle of gan, to go; contracted from agone. See GO.] Past; gone; as, a year ago.

A-GOG', adv. [Fr. d gogo; It. agogare, ardently to desire.] In a state of desire; highly excited by eagerness after an object. Dryden.

A-GO'ING. [The participle of go, with the prefix a.] In motion; as, to set a mill agoing; or about to go; ready to go; as, he is agoing immediately. The latter use is vulgar.

A'GON, n. [Gr.] The contest for the prize. [Not used.] Sacerdof.

A-GONE, (a-gawn'), pp. [See AGO and GONE.] Ago; past; since. [Nearly obs.]

AG-ONISM, n. [Gr. agonismos.] Contention for a prize. Dict.

AG-O-NIST, n. One who contends for the prize in public games. Milton has used agonistes in this sense, and so called his tragedy, from the similitude of Sanison's exertions, in slaying the Philistines, to prize-fighting. In church history, the disciples of Donatus are called agonistes.

AG-O-NISTIC, } a. Pertaining to prize-fight- ing, contests of strength, or athletic combats. Enfield.

AG-O-NIST/IC-AL-LY, adv. In an agonistic manner; like prize-fighting.

AG-O-NIZE, v. t. [Gr. agonizō, to strive. See AGONY.]
To writhe with extreme pain; to suffer violent anguish.

To smart and agonize at every pore. Pope.

AG-O-NIZE, v. t. To distress with extreme pain; to torture. Pope.

AG-O-NIZ-ED, ppr. Distressed with excessive pain; tortured.

AG-O-NIZ-ING, ppr. Suffering severe pain; writhing with torture.

AG-O-NIZ-ING, a. Giving extreme pain.

AG-O-NIZ-ING-LY, adv. With extreme anguish.

AG-O-NO-THET/IC, a. Pertaining to the president of the Grecian games.

AG-O-NY, n. [Gr. agon, a contest with bodily exertion; a word used to denote the athletic games in Greece; whence agonia, anguish, solicitude, from agon, L. ago. In fr. agh is a battle, conflict; Gr. agonizō, to strive. See Act.]
1. In strictness, pain so extreme as to cause writhing or contortions of the body, similar to those made in the athletic contests in Greece. Hence,
2. Extreme pain of body or mind; anguish; appropriately, the pangs of death, and the sufferings of our Savior in the garden of Gethsemane. Luke xlii.
3. Violent contest or striving. More.

A-GOOD, adv. In earnest. [Not used.] Shak.

A-GOODTY, } (a-good'ty) n. [Qu. Sp. agudo, sharp; A-GOUDTY, } L. acutus.]
A quadruped of the order Rodentia; arranged by naturalists in the genus Cavia. It is of the size of a rabbit. The upper part of the body is brownish, with a mixture of red and black; the belly yellowish. Three varieties are mentioned, all peculiar to South America and the West Indies. It burrows in the ground, or in hollow trees; lives on vegetables; is voracious like a pig, and makes a similar grunting noise. It holds its food in its fore paws, like a squirrel. When scared or angry, its hair is erect, and it strikes the ground with its hind feet. Its flesh is white and well tasted. Encyc.

A-GRAN/MA-TIST, n. [Gr. a priv. and γρμμα, a letter.]
An illiterate person.

A-GRĀ/RI-AN, a. [L. agrarius, from ager, a field.]
1. Relating to lands. Appropriately, denoting or pertaining to an equal division of lands; as, the agrarian laws of Rome, which distributed the conquered and other public lands equally among all the citizens, limiting the quantity which each might enjoy. Authors sometimes use the word as a noun; an agrarian, for agrarian law. Burke.
An agrarian distribution of land or property would make the rich poor, but would not make the poor rich.
2. Pertaining to agrarianism.

A-GRĀ/RI-AN, n. One in favor of an equal division of property among the inhabitants of a country.

A-GRĀ/RI-AN-ISM, n. An equal division of lands or property, or the principles of those who favor such a division.

A-GREE, v. t. [Fr. agrée, from gré, will, accord. This is contracted from Sp. agrader, Port. id., to please, to gratify, whence agradable, agreeable; from the root of L. gratia, W. rhad, grace, favor, that comes freely. The primary sense is advancing, from the same root as L. gradior; W. rhaz, [rhath]; Syr. [; radah, to go.]
1. To be of one mind; to harmonize in opinion; as, in the expediency of the law, all the parties agree.
2. To live in concord, or without contention; as, parents and children agree well together.
3. To yield assent; to approve or admit; followed by to; as, to agree to an offer, or to an opinion.
4. To settle by stipulation, the minds of parties being agreed as to the terms; as, to agree on articles of partnership.
Dist. thou not agree with me for a penny a day! — Matt. xx.
5. To come to a compromise of differences; to be reconciled.
Agree with thine adversary quickly. — Matt. v.
6. To come to one opinion or mind; to concur; as, to agree on a place of meeting.
This sense differs not essentially from the fourth, and it often implies a resolving to do an act. John ix.
7. To be consistent; to harmonize; not to contradict, or be repugnant; as, this story agrees with what has been related by others.
Their witness agreed not together. — Mark xlv.
8. To resemble; to be similar; as, the picture does not agree with the original.

9. To suit; to be accommodated or adapted to; as, the same food does not agree with every constitution.

A-GREE, v. t. To admit, or come to one mind concerning; as, to agree the fact. Also, to reconcile or make friends; to put an end to variance; but these senses are unusual and hardly legitimate. Let the parties agree the fact, is really elliptical; Let them agree on the fact.

A-GREE-A-BILI-TY, n. Easiness of disposition. [Not used.] Chaucer.

A-GREE/A-BLE, a. Suitable; conformable; correspondent; consistent with; as, the practice of virtue is agreeable to the law of God and our own nature.
2. In pursuance of; in conformity with; as, agreeable to the order of the day, the House took up the report of the committee. It is not correctly followed by with. In this sense, some writers use agreeably for agreeable, but in violation of the true principles of construction; for the word is an adjective or attribute, to agreement with the last clause of the sentence. (The House took up the report of the committee, which taking up was) agreeable to the order of the day. The use of agreeably in this sentence would pervert the sense.
3. Pleasing, either to the mind or senses; as, agreeable manners; fruit agreeable to the taste.
A-GREE/A-BLE-NESS, n. Suitableness; conformity; consistency; as, the agreeableness of virtue to the laws of God.
2. The quality of pleasing; that quality which gives satisfaction or moderate pleasure to the mind or senses; as, an agreeableness of manners; there is an agreeableness in the taste of certain fruits. This is the usual sense of the word.
3. Resemblance; likeness; with to or between.
The agreeableness between man and other parts of creation. Greiv.

A-GREE/ABLY, adv. Pleasingly; in an agreeable manner; in a manner to give pleasure; as, to be agreeably entertained with a discourse.
2. Suitably; consistently; conformably.
The effect of which is, that marriages grow less frequent, agreeably to the maxim above laid down. Paley.
This is a gross error, proceeding from mistake. Agreeably signifies, in an agreeable manner; but this is not the sense, nor does the word modify the verb grow. The sense is, Marriages grow less frequent, which fact, or whole member of the sentence, or proposition is agreeable to the maxim above laid down. This use of agreeably is common, but very erroneous.
3. Alike; in the same manner. Spenser.

A-GREED, pp. Being in concord or harmony of opinion; of one mind.
Can two walk together except they be agreed? — Amos iii.
2. Assented to; admitted; as, a proposition is agreed to.
3. Settled by consent; implying bargain or contract; as, the terms were agreed to, or agreed upon.

A-GREE/ING, ppr. Living in concord; concurring; assenting; settling by consent.

A-GREE/ING-LY, adv. In conformity to. [Little used.]

A-GREEMENT, n. Concord; harmony; conformity.
What a agreement hath the temple of God with idols! — 2 Cor. vi.
2. Union of opinions or sentiments; as, a good agreement subsists among the members of the council.
3. Resemblance; conformity; similitude.
Expansion and duration have this further agreement. Locke.
4. Union of minds in regard to a transfer of interest; bargain; compact; contract; stipulation; as, he made an agreement for the purchase of a house.
Make an agreement with me by a precat. — 2 Kings xviii.
5. In grammar, concord, which see.

A-GRES/TIC, } (a.) [L. agrestis; Fr. agreste; from A-GRES/TIC-AL, } L. ager, a field, or the same root.]

One whose occupation is to till the ground; a farmer; a husbandman; a skilled in husbandry.

AG/RI-CUL/TURE-AL, a. Pertaining to husbandry, tillage, or the culture of the earth.

AG/RI-CUL-TURE, n. [L. ager, a field, and cultura, cultivation. See AGRICULTURE.]
In a general sense, the cultivation of the ground, for the purpose of producing vegetables and fruits, for the use of man and beast; or the art of preparing the soil, sowing and planting seeds, dressing the plants, and removing the crops. In this sense, the word includes gardening, or horticulture, and also the raising and feeding of cattle or stock. But in a more common and appropriate sense, it is used to signify that species of cultivation which is intended to raise grain and other field crops for man and beast. It is equivalent to husbandry.

Agriculture is the most general occupation of man.

AG-RI-CUL/TUR-ISM, n. The art or science of agriculture. [Little used.]

Hor aquish love now glow and burns.

A/G/Ü-ISH-NESS, n. Chilliness; the quality of being aguish.

A-GUI-LA-NEOP, n. [from a, to, gui, misletoe, and Pinus, the new year.]
A form of rejoicing among the ancient Franks, on the first day of the year; derived from the druidical custom of cutting misletoe, which was held sacred by the druids, and, on the first day of the year, consecrating it by crying aguilnewf, the new year to the misletoe. This cry is said to be still observed in some parts of France; and the term came to signify also a begging of New Year's gifts. Encyc.

AIGUL, n. A species of the Hedyssamm.

AI, [Ger. ach.] An exclamation, expressive of surprise, pity, complaint, contempt, dislike, joy, exultation, &c., according to the manner of utterance.

A-IA', an exclamation expressing triumph, contempt, or simple surprise; but the senses are distinguished by very different modes of utterance, and different modifications of features.

AID, v. t. [Fr. aider, to help; It. aiutare, which seems to be contracted from Lu. adjuto. In Ar. ايد or ايد] aid, signifies to assist or strengthen; and ايد ayada, and ايد adove, to help. In Welsh, ced is a benefit, and the word was used to denote the aids of feudal tenants.]

To help; to assist; to support, either by furnishing strength or means to effect a purpose, or to prevent or remove evil.

AID, n. Help; support; aid; assistance. Watts.

1. The person who aids or yields support; a helper; an auxiliary; also, the thing that aids or yields support.

2. In English law, a subsidy or tax granted by parliament, and making a part of the king's revenue.

In France, aids are equivalent to customs or duties on certain consumable commodities, particularly wines and liquors; nearly equivalent to the English excise.

4. In England, a tax paid by a tenant to his lord; originally, a mere gift, which afterward became a right demandable by the lord. The aids of this kind were chiefly three. 1. To ransom the lord when a prisoner. 2. To make the lord's eldest son a knight. 3. To marry the lord's eldest daughter. Blackstone.

5. An aidcamp, so called by abbreviation.

6. To pray in aid, in law, is to call in a person interested in a title, to assist in defending it. To point at, with a missile weapon; to direct the intention or purpose; to attempt to reach, or accomplish; to tend toward; to endeavor; followed by at before the object; as, a man aims at distinction; or aims to be rich.

2. To guess or conjecture. [Obs.] Shak.

AIM, v. t. To direct or point, as a weapon; to direct to a particular object; as, to aim a musket or an arrow, the fist or a blow; to aim a satire or a reflection at some person or vice.

AIM, n. The pointing or direction of a missile weapon; the direction of any thing to a particular point or object, with a view to strike or affect it; as of a spear, a blow, a discourse, or remark.

2. The point intended to be hit, or object intended to be affected; as, a man missed his aim.

3. Figuratively, a purpose; intention; design; scheme; as, men are often disappointed of their aim.

4. Conjecture; guess.

It is impossible, by aim, to tell li. [Not used.] Spenser on Ireland.

AIM'ED, pp. Pointed; directed; intended to strike or affect.

AIM'ER, n. One that aims.

AIM'ING, pp. Pointing a weapon at an object; directing any thing to an object; intending; purposing.

AIM'LESS, a. Without aim.

AIM'LESS-LY, adv. Without aim.

AIR, n. [Fr. air; It. aer; Gr. anp; It. aria; Sp. ayre; Port. ar; Arm. ear, eer; It. ae; W. awyr; Ch. איר, oar; Syr. اير, air; Eth. አየር; Ar. اير, ayrar.

This word, in the Shemitic languages, falls under the root איר Heb. and Ch., to shine. The radical sense is to open, expand; whence clear; or to flow, to shoot, to radiate.]

1. The fluid which we breathe. Air is inodorous, invisible, insipid, colorless, elastic, possessed of gravity, and easily moved, rarefied, and condensed.

Atmospheric air is composed by volume of 20 or 21 oxygen, and 80 or 79 nitrogen; by weight, of 8 oxygen to 28 nitrogen.

The body of air surrounding the earth is called the atmosphere. The specific gravity of air is to that of water nearly as 1 to 828. Air is necessary to life; being inhaled into the lungs, the oxygenous part is separated from the azotic, and is supposed to furnish the body with heat and animation. Air is also the medium of sounds, and, under ordinary circumstances, is necessary to combustion.

2. An aëriform body; a gas; as, oxygen is called vital air.

3. Air in motion; a light breeze.

Let vernal airs through trembling oaks play. Pope.

4. Vent; utterance abroad; publication; publicity; as, a story has taken air.

You gave it air before me. Dryden.

Wind is used in like manner.

5. A tune; a short song or piece of music adapted to words; also, the peculiar modulation of the notes, which gives music its character; as, a soft air.

A song or piece of poetry for singing; also, the leading part of a tune, or that which is intended to exhibit the greatest variety of melody.

6. The peculiar look, appearance, manner or mien of a person; as, a heavy air; the air of a youth; a graceful air; a lofty air. It is applied to manners or gestures, as well as to features.

7. Airs, in the plural, is used to denote an affected manner, show of pride, haughtiness; as when it is said of a person, he puts on airs. The word is used, also, to express the artificial motions or carriage of a horse.

8. In painting, that which expresses the life of action; manner; posture; attitude.

9. Any thing light or uncertain; that is light as air.

Who builds his hope in air of your fair looks. [Qu. Obs.] Shak.

10. Advice; intelligence; information. [Obs.] [Bacon.]

11. Different states of air are characterized by different epithets; as, good air, foul air, morning air, evening air; and sometimes airs may have been used for ill scent or vapor, but the use is not legitimate.

To take the air, is to go abroad; to walk or ride a little distance.

To take air, is to be divulged; to be made public.

AIR, v. t. To expose to the air; to give access to the open air; to ventilate; as, to air clothes; to air a room.

2. To expose to heat; to warm; as, to air liquors.

3. To dry by a fire; to expel dampness; as, to air linen.

AL-BEN'NA, } verized leaves of this plant are much used by the Eastern nations for staining their nails yellow. The powder, being wet, forms a paste, which is bound on the nails for a night, and the color thus given will last several weeks. The same as henna. Encyc.

AL-KERN'ES, n. [Arab. See KERMES.]

In pharmacy, a compound kermel, in the form of a confection, deriving its name from the kermes berries, its principal ingredient. Its other ingredients are said to be pippin-cider, rose-water, sugar, ambergris, musk, cinnamon, cloves-wind, pearls, and leaf-gold. Quincy. Chambers. Encyc.

AL-KER'VA, n. An Arabic name of the Palma Christi. Quincy.

AL-KO-RAN, n. [Arab. al, the, and koran, book. The Book, by way of eminence, as we say the Bible. See KORAN. It is pronounced, I believe, by Orientalists, alkoransen.]

The book which contains the Mohammedan doctrines of faith and practice. It was written by Mohammed, in the dialect of the Koreish, which is the purest Arabic; but the Arabian language has suffered such changes since it was written, that the language of the Koran is not now intelligible to the Arabians themselves, without being learned like other dead languages. Nicbuhr. Encyc.

AL-KO-RAN, { n. In Eastern architecture, the name
AL-CO-RAN, } of high, slender towers, attached to mosques, in which the priests, at stated times, recite aloud prayers from the Koran. Givili.

AL-KO-RAN-IST, n. One who adheres strictly to the letter of the Koran, rejecting all comments. The Persians are generally Alkoranists; the Turks, Arabs, and Tartars, admit a multitude of traditions.

ALL, (awl), a. [Sax. eal; Dan. al; G. all; Sw. all; W. all or holl; Arm. all; Ir. uile; Gr. ἅλος; Shemite al, from al, cadab, to be ended or completed, to perfect. The Welsh retains the first radical letter. This is radically the same word as heel, for in Sw. Ad, and in Dan. helt, signify all, and these words are from the root of heel. See CALL, HEAL, and WHOLE.]

1. Every one, or the whole number of particulars.

2. The whole quantity, extent, duration, amount, quality, or degree; as, all the wheat; all the land; all the year; all the strength. This word signifies, then, the whole or entire thing, or all the parts or particulars which compose it. It always precedes the definitive adjectives my, thy, his, our, yours, their; as, all the cattle; all my labor; all thy goods; all his wealth; all our families; all your citizens; all their property.

This word, not only in popular language, but in the Scriptures, often signifies, indefinitely, a large portion or number, or a great part. Thus, all the cattle in Egypt died, all Judea and all the region round about Jordan, all men held John as a prophet, are not to be understood in a literal sense, but as including a large part or very great numbers.

This word is prefixed to many other words to enlarge their signification; as, already, always, all-prevailing.

ALL, adv. Wholly; completely; entirely; as, all along; all bedewed; all over; my friend is all for amusement; I love my father all. In the ancient phrases, all too dear, all so long, this word retains its appropriate sense; as, "He thought them sixpence all too dear," that is, he thought them too dear by the sum of sixpence. In the sense of although, as, "all were it as the rest," and in the sense of just, or at the moment, as, "all as his straying flock he fed," it is obsolete, or restricted to poetry.

It is all one, is a phrase equivalent to this same thing in effect; that is, it is wholly the same thing.

All the better, is equivalent to wholly the better; that is, better by the whole difference.

ALL, n. The whole number; as, all have not the same disposition; that is, all men.

2. The whole; the entire thing; the aggregate amount; as, our all is at stake.

And Laban said, All that thou seest is mine. — Gen. xxxi.

This adjective is much used as a noun, and applied to persons or things.

All in all, is a phrase which signifies, all things to a person, or every thing desired.

Thou shalt be all in all, and I in thee, Forever. Milton.

When the words and all close an enumeration of particulars, the word all is either intensive, or is added as a general term to express what is not enumerated; as, a tree fell, nest, eagles, and all.

L'Estrange.

At all, is a phrase much used by way of enforcement or emphasis, usually in negative or interrogative sentences. He has no ambition at all; that is, not in the least degree. Has he any property at all?

All and some, in Spenser, Mason interprets, one and all. But from Lye's Saxon Dictionary, it appears that the phrase is a corruption of the Sax. alle at some, alle together, all at once, from some, together, at once. [See LIE, under Some.]

All in the wind, in seamen's language, is a phrase denoting that the sails are parallel with the course of the wind, so as to shake. Mar. Dict.

All is well, is a watchman's phrase, expressing a state of safety.

All, in composition, enlarges the meaning, or adds force to a word; and it is generally more emphatic than most. In some instances, all is incorporated into words, as in almighty, already, always; but in most instances, it is an adjective prefixed to other words, and separated by a hyphen.

 2. To abate, mitigate, abdue, or destroy; as, to ally grief or pain.
 Females, who soften and ally the bitterness of adversity. Rusels.
 3. To obtund or repress, as acrimony; as, to ally the acid qualities of a substance.
 4. Formerly, to reduce the purity of; as, to ally metals. But in this sense ally is now exclusively used. [See ALLOY.]
 ALL-LAY', n. Formerly, a baser metal mixed with a finer; but in this sense it is now written ALLOY, which see.
 2. That which allays, or abates the predominant qualities; as, the ally of colors. Newman.
 Also, abatement; diminution by means of some mixture; as, joy without ally. But ally is now more generally used.
 ALL-LAY-ED, pp. Layed at rest; quieted; tranquilized; abated; [reduced by mixture. Obs.]
 ALL-LAY-ER, n. He or that which allays.
 ALL-LAY-ING, pp. Quieting; reducing to tranquillity; abating; reducing by mixture. [Obs.]
 ALL-LAY-MENT, n. The act of quieting, or a state of tranquillity; a state of rest after disturbance; that which allays; abatement; ease; as, the allayment of grief. Shak.
 ALL-LE, (al'ly), n. The little auk, or black and white diver.
 ALL-LECT-A-TION, n. Enticement; allurement. [Not used.] Coles.
 ALL-LECT-IVE, a. Alluring. [Not used.] Chaucer.
 ALL-LECTIVE, n. Allurement. [Not used.] Eliot.
 ALL-LEDGE'. See ALLEGE. [This spelling, corresponding to abridge, was once the prevailing one, and would still be preferable.]
 ALL-LE-GAN-AN, n. Pertaining to the mountains called Alleghany, or Allegheny.
 ALL-LE-GA-NY, n. The chief ridge of the great chains of mountains which run from N. East to S. West, through the Middle and Southern States of North America; but, more appropriately, the main or unbroken ridge, which casts all the waters on one side to the east, and on the other side to the west. This ridge runs from Pennsylvania to Georgia, and chains extend through the United States.
 This name is given also to the River Ohio, above its confluence with the Monongahela; but improperly, as the Indian name of the river to its source is Ohio.
 ALL-LE-GA-TION, n. Affirmation; positive assertion or declaration.
 2. That which is affirmed or asserted; that which is offered as a plea, excuse, or justification.
 3. In ecclesiastical courts, a formal complaint, or declaration of charges.
 ALL-LEGE', v. t. [L. allego, ad and lego, to send; Fr. alleguer; Sp. alegar; Port. allegor; It. allegare. This is only a modified application of the Eng. lay; L. lo, to set, or throw. See Class Lg.]
 1. To declare; to affirm; to assert; to pronounce with positiveness; as, to allege a fact.
 2. To produce, as an argument, plea, or excuse; to cite or quote; as, to allege the authority of a judge.
 ALL-LEGE/A-BLE, a. That may be alleged or affirmed. Brown.

 ALL-LEGE-R, n. One who affirms or declares.
 ALL-LE-G-ANCE, n. [old Fr., from L. allego, of ad and ligo, to bind. See LIG and LEAGURE.]
 The tie or obligation of a subject to his prince or government; the duty of fidelity to a king, government, or state. Every native or citizen owes allegiance to the government under which he is born. This is called natural or implied allegiance, which arises from the connection of a person with the society in which he is born, and his duty to be a faithful subject, independent of any express promise. Express allegiance, is that obligation which proceeds from an express promise, or oath of fidelity.

Local or temporary allegiance is due from an alien to the government or state in which he resides.

Blackstone.

AL-LE-GI-ANT, a. Loyal. [Not used.] Shak.
AL-LE-GING, ppr. Asserting; averring; declaring.
AL-LE-GOR-IC, a. In the manner of allegory;
AL-LE-GOR-IC-AL, figurative; describing by resemblances.

AL-LE-GOR-IC-AL-LY, adv. In a figurative manner; by way of allegory.
AL-LE-GOR-IC-AL-NESS, n. The quality of being allegorical.

AL-LE-GO-RIST, n. One who allegorizes, or uses allegory, as BUNYAN or SPENSER.

J. Warton. Warburton.

AL-LE-GO-RIZE, v. t. To form an allegory; to turn into allegory; as, to allegorize the history of a people.

Campbell.

2. To understand in an allegorical sense; as, when a passage in a writer may be understood literally or figuratively, he who gives it a figurative sense is said to allegorize it.

AL-LE-GO-RIZE, v. i. To use allegory; as, a man may allegorize to please his fancy.
AL-LE-GO-RIZ-ED, pp. Turned into allegory, or understood allegorically.

AL-LE-GO-RIZ-ER, n. One who allegorizes, or turns things into allegory.

AL-LE-GO-RIZ-ING, ppr. Turning into allegory, or understanding in an allegorical sense; using allegory.

AL-LE-GO-RY, n. [Gr. ἀλληγορία, of ἄλλος, other, and ἄγορεύω, to speak, from ἄγορα, a forum, an oration.]

A figurative sentence or discourse, in which the principal subject is described by another subject resembling it in its properties and circumstances. The principal subject is thus kept out of view, and we are left to collect the intentions of the writer or speaker, by the resemblance of the secondary to the primary subject. Allegory is in words what hieroglyphics are in painting. We have a fine example of an allegory in the eightieth Psalm, in which God's chosen people are represented by a vineyard. The distinction in Scripture between a parable and an allegory, is said to be, that a parable is a supposed history, and an allegory, a figurative description of real facts. An allegory is called a continued metaphor. The following line in Virgil is an example of an allegory.

Claudian Junciviva, pueri; sat prata laborant.

"Stop the currents, young men; the meadows have drunk sufficiently;" that is, Let your music cease, but ears have been sufficiently delighted. Encepe.

AL-LE-GRET-TO [L, diminutive of allegro] denotes, in music, a movement or time quicker than andante, but not so quick as allegro. Roussseau.

AL-LE-GRO, [It, merry, cheerful; It, leggiere; Sp, ligero; Fr, leger, light, nimble. See LIGHT. In this sense it is used in the poem of Milton so named.] A sprightly part or strain; the quickest except presto. Pis allegro is a still quicker movement.

Roussseau.

As a sona, a piece of music to be performed in allegro.

AL-LE-LIC-IAH, n. [Heb. לללה, Praise to Jah.] Praise Jehovah; a word used to denote pious joy and exultation, chiefly in hymns and anthems. The Greeks retained the word in their ἑλληνοίη, Praise to Io; probably a corruption of Jah. The Romans retained the latter word in their Io triumphæ.

AL-LE-MANDE', n. A slow air in common time, or grave, solemn music, with a slow movement. Also, a brisk dance, or a figure in dancing. Dict. of Music.

AL-LE-MAN-NIC, a. Belonging to the Alemanni, ancient Germans, and to Alemannia, their country. The word is generally supposed to be composed of all and manni, all men. Cluver, p. 68. This is probably an error. The word is more probably composed of the Celtic all, other, the root of Latin alium, and man, place; or of another place, a stranger. The Welsh allman is thus rendered, and this seems to be the original word. Owen, Welsh Dict.

The name Alemanni seems to have been first given to the Germans who invaded Gaul in the reign of Augustus. Cluver, Germ. Antiq.

AL-LE-RI-ON, n. In heraldry, an eagle without beak or feet, with expanded wings; denoting Imperialists vanquished and disarmed. Encepe.

AL-LE-VECR', n. A small Swedish coin, value about a cent. Encepe.

AL-LE-VI-ATE, v. t. [Low L. allevis; ad and levo, to raise, lighten; Fr. lever; It. levare, to raise; Sp. llevar, to carry; levantar, to raise, and levante, a rising, and the eastern coasts of the Mediterranean, the east, so called from the rising of the sun, like oriental, from orient, to rise; Sax. lifian, to be eminent. See LIFT.]

1. To make light; but always in a figurative sense, as it is not applied to material objects. To remove in part; to lessen, mitigate, or make easier to be endured; applied to evils; as, to alleviate sorrow, pain, care, punishment, a burden, &c.; opposed to aggravate.

2. To make less by representation; to lessen the magnitude or criminality; to extenuate; to mollify conduct; as, to alleviate an offense. [This sense of the word is rare.]

AL-LE-VI-A-TED, pp. Made lighter; mitigated; eased; extenuated.

AL-LE-VI-A-TING, ppr. Making lighter, or more tolerable; extenuating.

AL-LE-VI-A-TION, n. The act of lightening, allaying, or extenuating; a lessening, or mitigation.

2. That which lessens, mitigates, or makes more tolerable; as, the sympathy of a friend is an alleviation of grief.

I have not wanted such alleviations of life as friendship could supply. (Dr. Johnson's letter to Mr. Hector.) Boswell.

This use of alleviation is hardly legitimate without supplying some word expressing evil, as trouble, sorrow, &c.—Without such alleviations of the cares or troubles of life.

AL-LE-VI-A-TIVE, n. That which mitigates. [Not in use.]

AL-LEY, (al'ly.) n. [Fr. allée, a passage, from aller, to go; It. allada. Literally, a passing or going.]

1. A walk in a garden; a narrow passage.
2. A narrow passage or way in a city, as distinct from a public street.

3. A choice tow, originally made of alabaster, is so called by boys. Hallivell.

4. The Alley, or Change Alley: a place in London where stocks were formerly bought and sold. Asa.

AL-LI-ANCE, n. [Fr. alliance, from allier, lier, to tie or unite, from L. ligo; Gr. ἀλλοῖος; Sp. alianza; Port. aliança; It. alleanza; from the same root as liege, league, allegiance. Class Lz.]

1. The relation or union between families, contracted by marriage. Dryden.

2. The union between nations, contracted by compact, treaty, or league.

3. The treaty, league, or compact, which is the instrument of confederacy; sometimes, perhaps, the act of confederating.

4. Any union or connection of interests between persons, families, states, or corporations; as, an alliance between church and state.

5. The persons or parties allied; as, men or states may secure any alliance in their power. Aldison.

AL-LI-ANT, n. An ally. [Not used.] Wotton.

AL-LI-CIEN-CY, n. [L. allicio, ad and laicio; G. locken; D. locken; Sw. locka; Dan. lokke; L. allecto, elicio. Class Lz.]

The power of attracting any thing; attraction; magnetism. [Little used.] Glanville.

AL-LI-CIENT, n. That which attracts. [Not used.] Robinson.

AL-LI-ED, (al-li'ded,) pp. Connected by marriage, treaty, or similitude. [See ALLY.]

AL-LI-GATE, v. t. [L. aligo, ad and ligo, to bind. See ALLEGIANCE, LIEGE, LEAGUE.]

To tie together; to unite by some tie.

AL-LI-GA-TING, ppr. Tying together; uniting by some tie.

AL-LI-GA-TION, n. The act of tying together; the state of being tied. [Little used.]

2. A rule of arithmetic for finding the price or values of compounds, consisting of ingredients of different values. Thus, if a quantity of sugar, worth eight cents the pound, and another quantity worth ten cents, are mixed, the question to be solved by allegation is, what is the value of the mixture by the pound.

Allegation is of two kinds, medial and alternate; medial, when the rate of a mixture is sought from the rates and quantities of the simples; alternate, when the quantities of the simples are sought from the rates of the simples, and the rate of the mixture.

AL-LI-GA-TOR, n. [properly alagarto, from the Spanish and Portuguese lagarto, a lizard; L. lacerata. The Latin word seems to be connected with laceratus, the arm; and the animal may be named from the resemblance of his legs to arms.]

The American crocodile. This animal has a long, naked body, four feet, with five toes on the fore feet, and four on the hind, armed with claws, and a serrated tail. The mouth is very large, and furnished with sharp teeth; the skin is brown, tough, and, on the sides, covered with tubercles. The largest of these animals grow to the length of seventeen or eighteen feet. They live in and about the rivers in warm climates, eat fish, and sometimes catch hogs on the shore, or dogs which are swimming. In winter, they burrow in the earth, which they enter under water and work upward, lying torpid till spring. The female lays a great number of eggs, which are deposited in the sand, and left to be hatched by the heat of the sun. Encepe.

AL-LI-GA-TOR-PEAR, n. A West Indian fruit, resembling a pear in shape, from one to two pounds in weight, (Laurus Persea, Linn.) It contains within its rind a yellow, butyraceous substance, which, when the fruit is perfectly ripe, constitutes an agreeable food. Encepe.

AL-LI-GA-TURE, n. See LIGATURE, which is the word in use.

AL-LI-SION, (al-liz'ion) n. [L. alido, to dash or strike against, of ad and ledeo, to hurt by striking; It. laesa, a sore; D. leed, a hurt; D. beledigen; Ger. beleidigen, to hurt; Fr. blesser, to hurt. Leado forms its participle laesus. Class Ld, Lz.]

A striking against; as, the allosion of the sea against the shore. Woodward.

AL-LIT-ER-A-TION, n. [L. ad and littera, a letter.]

The repetition of the same letter at the beginning of two or more words immediately succeeding each other, or at short intervals; as f and g in the following line: *F*ields ever fresh, and *G*roves forever green.

AL-LIT-ER-A-TIVE, a. Pertaining to, or consisting in, alliteration.

AL-LÖVLS, a. former mode of adjuration, meaning for the love of all, as of Heaven, earth, &c.; as, Spunk, of all-loves. Shak. Toone.

AL-LO-CATION, n. [L. ad and locatio, a placing, from locus, place. See LOCAL.]

The act of putting one thing to another; hence its usual sense is, the admission of an article of account, or an allowance made upon an account; a term used in the English exchequer. [See ALLOW.]

AL-LO-CATOR, n. [L.] In law, a certificate of allowance of cost by the proper officer.

AL-LO-CIHO-ITE, n. [Gr. ἄλλος and zonia.] A fine-grained, massive garnet, of a dingy reddish-yellow color. Its name is said to be given to it, as expressive of its changes of color before the blow-pipe. Dana.

AL-LO-CUTION, n. [L. allocutio, of ad and loquor, to speak. See ELOQUENCE.]

1. The act or manner of speaking to, or of addressing in words.

2. An address; a formal address, as of a general to his troops; a Roman term, rarely used in English. Aldison. Encepe.

AL-LÖ-DI-AL, a. Pertaining to allodium; freehold; free of rent or service; held independent of a lord paramount; opposed to feudal. Blackstone.

AL-LÖ-DI-AN is sometimes used, but is not well authorized. Concl.

AL-LÖ-DI-UM, n. [Fr. allod, contr. word. According to O'Brien, in his Focalor, or Dictionary of the Irish, this word is the Celtic aliod, ancient. According to Pentopidan, it is composed of all and odh, all-property, or whole estate. In Sw. odal, and in Dan. odel, signify allodial; the word being used as an adjective; Sw. odalgods, that is, odal goods, signifies allodial lands; and odaljord, odal earth, is used as its synonym. Odalmä is one who possesses allodial land; odalbonde is a yeoman or freeholder; odelt sigande undivided; 4, in Swedish, being a prefix, answering to the English in, and giving to words a negative signification. If a in odal is this prefix, and dal from the root of deal, the word signifies undivided. But some obscurity rests on this word. Pentopidan's derivation is most probably the true one.]

Freehold estate; land which is the absolute property of the owner; real estate held in absolute independence, without being subject to any rent, service, or acknowledgment to a superior. It is thus opposed to feud. In England, there is no allodial land, all land being held of the king; but in the United States, most lands are allodial.

AL-LÖNGE', (nl-lun') n. [Fr. allonger, to lengthen, to thrust; alongé, lengthened, of ad and long.]

1. A pass with a sword; a thrust made by stepping forward and extending the arm; a term used in fencing, often contracted into luage.

2. A long rein, when a horse is trotted in the hand. Johnson.

AL-LOO', v. t. or i. To incite dogs by a call. Phillips.

[See the correct word, HALLOO.]

AL-MA'GRA, n. A fine, deep-red ochre, with an admixture of purple, very heavy, dense, but friable, with a rough, dusty surface. It is the al atticus of the ancients. It is austere to the taste, astringent, melting in the mouth, and staining the skin. It is used as a paint and as a medicine. Encyc.

AL-MA-MATER, [L.] Fostering mother; a college or seminary where one is educated. S --

AL-MA-NAC, n. [Ar. al and manach, manack, a calendar, or diary.]
A small book or table, containing a calendar of days, weeks, and months, with the times of the rising and setting of the sun and moon, changes of the moon, eclipses, hours of full tide, stated festivals of churches, stated terms of courts, observations on the weather, &c. for the year. This calendar is sometimes published on one side of a single sheet, and called a sheet-almanac.

The Baltic nations formerly engraved their calendars on pieces of wood, on swords, belves of axes, and various other utensils, and especially on walking-sticks. Many of these are preserved in the cabinets of the curious. They are called, by different nations, rimstocks, primstaries, runstocks, runstoffs, clogs, &c.

The characters used are generally the Runic or Gothic. Janius. Encyc. Tooker's Russia.

AL-MA-NAC-MAK-ER, n. A maker of almanacs.

AL-MAN-DINE, n. [Fr. and It.] In mineralogy, precious garnet, a beautiful mineral of a red color, of various shades, sometimes tinged with yellow or blue. It is commonly translucent, sometimes transparent. It occurs crystallized in the rhombic dodecahedron. Phillips.

AL-MENA, n. A weight of two pounds, used to weigh saffron in several parts of Asia. Sp. Dict.

AL-MIGHT'Y-LY, (awl-mit'e-lee), adv. With almighty power. H. Taylor.

AL-MIGHT'Y-NESS, n. Omnipotence; infinite or boundless power; an attribute of God only.

AL-MIGHTY, a. [all and mighty. See MIGHT.] Possessing all power; omnipotent; being of unlimited might; being of boundless sufficiency; appropriately applied to the Supreme Being.

AL-MIGHTY, n. The Omnipotent God.

AL-MOND, n. [Fr. amande; It. mandola; Sp. almondra; Ger. mandel.]
1. The fruit of the almond-tree; an ovate, compressed nut, perforated with pores. It is either sweet or bitter. (It is popularly pronounced amond.) Nicholson. Encyc.
2. The tonsils, two glands near the basis of the tongue, are called almonds, from their resemblance to that nut; vulgarly, but improperly, called the almonds of the ears, as they belong to the throat. Quincy. Johnson.

3. In Portugal, a measure by which wine is sold, twenty-six of which make a pipe. Encyc.
[But in Portuguese it is written almude.]
4. Among Liquidaries, almonds signify pieces of rock crystal, used in adorning branch candlesticks, so called from their resemblance to this fruit. Encyc.

AL-MOND-PUR-NACE, n. A kind of furnace used in the refining process, to separate the metal from cinders and other foreign matter. Chambers.

AL-MOND-OIL, n. A bland, fixed oil, obtained from almonds by pressure. Ure.

AL-MOND-SHAP-ED, (-shépt), a. Having the form of an almond.

AL-MOND-TREE, n. A species of Amygdalus; the tree which produces the almond. The leaves and flowers resemble those of the peach, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged. Müller.

AL-MOND-WIL'LOW, n. A willow with leaves of a light green on both sides. Mason, from Shenstone.

AL-MON-ER, n. [See ALMS.]
An officer whose duty is to distribute charity or alms. By the ancient canons, every monastery was to dispose of a tenth of its income in alms to the poor, and all bishops were obliged to keep an almoner. This title is sometimes given to a chaplain; as, the almoner of a ship or regiment.
The lori almoner, or lord high almoner, in England, is an ecclesiastical officer, generally a bishop, who has the forfeiture of all benefices, and the goods of self-murderers, which he is to distribute to the poor. The grand almoner, in France, is the first ecclesiastical dignitary, and has the superintendance of hospitals. Encyc.

ALMON-RY, n. [corrupted into ambry, ambry, or ambury.]

The place where the almoner resides, or where the alms are distributed.

ALMOST, adv. [all and most. The Saxon order of writing was thus: "all most who were present." Sax. Chron. p. 225. We now use a duplication, almost all who were present.]

Nearly; well nigh; for the greatest part.

Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. — Acts xvii.

ALMS, (amz), n. pl. [Sax. almes; old Eng. almesse; Norm. almoinnes; Fr. almônes; D. almosen; Sw. almosa; Dan. almisse; G. almosen; L. elemosyna; Gr. ἐλεημοσύνη. The first syllables appear to be from αλεω, to pity.]

Any thing given gratuitously to relieve the poor, as money, food, or clothing, otherwise called charity.

A lame man was laid daily to ask an alm. — Acts iii.

Cornelius gave much alm to the people. — Acts x.

Tenure by free alms, or frank-almoin, in England, is that by which the possessor is bound to pray for the soul of the donor, whether dead or alive; a tenure by which most of the ancient monasteries and religious houses in England held their lands, as do the parochial clergy, and many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary establishments at this day. Land thus held was free from all rent or other service. Blackstone.

ALMS-BASKET, ALMS-BOX, ALMS-CHEST, Vessels appropriated to receive alms.

ALMS-DEED, n. An act of charity; a charitable gift.

ALMS-FOLK, (amz/fôk), n. Persons supported by alms. [Not used.]

ALMS-GIVER, n. One who gives to the poor.

ALMS-GIVING, n. The bestowment of charity.

ALMS-HOUSE, n. A house appropriated for the use of the poor, who are supported by the public.

In England, the term is also applied to houses for supporting the poor on private charitable foundations.

ALMS-MAN, n. A man who lives by alms. Shak.

ALMS-MEN, n. pl. Persons supported by charity.

ALMS-PROVISION, n. or by public provision.

ALMU-CAN-TAR, n. [Arabic.] A term applied to circles of the sphere parallel to the horizon, conceived to pass through every degree of the meridian.

ALMU-CAN-TAR'S STAFF, n. An instrument of box or pear-tree, having an arch of fifteen degrees, formerly used to take observations of the sun, about the time of its rising or setting, to find the amplitude and the variation of the compass. Encyc. Chambers.

AL-MUDE, n. A wine measure in Portugal, of which twenty-six make a pipe. Port. Diet.

ALMUG, n. In Scriptures, a tree or wood about ALGUM, which the learned are not agreed. The latest probable conjecture is, that the word denotes the sandal-wood of the East. Kato.

The Vulgate translates it ligna thymia, and the Septuagint, urozaki-seod; others, ebony, brasil, or pinis; and the Rabbin render it coral. It was used for musical instruments, staircases, &c.

The thymia is the citron-tree, from Mauritania, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty. The almug, almugin, or algunim, or simply gummin, is most probably a gummy wood, and perhaps may be the shittim, often mentioned in Scripture. See 1 Kings x. 11. Calmct. Encyc.

ALNAGE, n. [Fr. alnage, now softened into alnage; L. alna; Gr. άλνινη, an arm, a cubit; W. elis; I. alena, wie, or wilena, an elbow, a nook or corner. See ELL.]

A measuring by the ell.

ALNAGER, n. A measurer by the ell; a sworn ALNAGER, n. officer, whose duty was to inspect and measure woollen cloth, and fix upon it a seal.

This office was abolished by statute 11 and 12 Will. III. No duty or office of this kind exists in the United States.

ALNIGHT, (awl'nite), n. A cake of wax with which the lights in the midst. Bacon.

ALOE, (al'ô), n. [L. aloe; Gr. ἀλόη; Sp. Port. El. Fr. aloé; Heb. pl. ἄλωνα, aloë-trees.]

In botany, a genus of the class order Hexandria Monogynia, of many species; all natives of warm climates, and most of them of the southern part of Africa.

Among the Mohammedans, the aloë is a symbolic plant, especially in Egypt; and every one who returns from a pilgrimage to Mecca hangs it over his street door, as a token that he has performed the journey.

In Africa, the leaves of the Guinea aloë are made into durable ropes. Of one species are made fishing-lines, bow-strings, stockings, and hammocks. The leaves of another species hold rain water.

ALOGES, n. In medicine, the inspissated juice of the aloë. The juice is collected from the leaves, which are cut and put in a tub, and when a large quantity is procured, it is boiled to a suitable consistence; or it is exposed to the sun, till all the fluid part is exhaled. There are several kinds sold in the shops; as, the Socotrine aloës from Socotora, an isle in the Indian Ocean; the hepatic or common Barbadoes aloës; and the fetid or caballine aloës.

Aloës is a stimulating emaciac purgative; when taken in small doses, it is useful for people of a lax habit and sedentary life. Encyc.

ALOGES-WOOD, n. See AGALLOCHUM.

AL-O-ET'IC, n. { a. 1. Pertaining to aloë or aloës; AL-O-ET'IC-AL, } partaking of the qualities of aloës.

2. In seamen's language, in the top; at the mast head; or on the higher yards or rigging. Hence, on the upper part, as of a building.

A-LOGI-ANS, n. pl. [a neg. and λογος, word.]

In church history, a sect of ancient heretics, who denied Jesus Christ to be the Logos, and consequently rejected the Gospel of St. John. Buck. Encyc.

AL-O-GO-TRO-PHY, n. [Gr. ἀλογος, unreasoning, and τροφή, nutrition.]

A disproportioned nutrition of the parts of the body, as when one part receives more or less nourishment and growth than another. Bailey.

AL-O-MAN-CY, n. [Gr. ἀλς, salt, and μαγειν, divination.]

Divination by salt. Morin.

AL-O-GY, n. [Gr. ἀλς and λογος.]

Unreasonableness; absurdity. Brown.

A-LONE, n. [all and one; Germ. allein; D. alleen; Sw. alleen; Dan. alleen.]

1. Single; solitary; without the presence of another; applied to a person or thing.

It is not good that man should be alone. — Gen. ii.

[This adjective follows its noun.]

2. It is applied to two or more persons or things, when separate from others, in a place or condition by themselves; without company.

And when they were alive, he expounded all things to his disciples. — Mark iv.

3. Only.

Those, whose name alone is Jehovah. — Ps. lxxviii.

This sense at first appears to be adverbial, but really is not; whose name, single, solitary, without another, is Jehovah.

To be alone, is to suffer to rest; to forbear molesting or meddling with; to suffer to remain in its present state. Alone, in this phrase, is an adjective, the word to which it refers being omitted; let me alone; let them alone; let it alone; that is, suffer it to be unmolested, or to remain as it is, or let it remain by itself.

A-LONE', adv. Separately; by itself. [Itself.]

A-LONE'LY, adv. Only; merely; singly. [Not used.]

A-LONE'NESS, n. That state which belongs to another. [Not used.]

A-LONG', adv. [Sax. and-lang or od-lang; Fr. en long, le long. See LONG. The Saxons prefixed and or od, and the sense seems to be, by the length, or opposite the length, or in the direction of the length.]

1. By the length; lengthwise; in a line with the length; as, the troops marched along the bank of the river, or along the highway. 1 Sam. vi.

2. Onward; in a line, or with a progressive motion; as, a meteor glides along the sky; let us walk along.

All along, signifies the whole length; through the whole distance; in the whole way or length.

Israhel went forth, weeping all along as he went. — Jer. xli.

1 Sam. xxviii.

Along with, signifies in company; joined with; as, go along with us. Sometimes with is omitted.

Come, then, my friend, my genius, come along. Pope.

Along side, in seamen's language, that is, by the length or in a line with the side, signifies side by side, as by another ship, or by the side of a wharf.

Along shore, is by the shore or coast, lengthwise, and near the shore.

Lying along, is lying on the side, or pressed down by the weight of sail. Mar. Dict.

A-LONGSIP', adv. Along; through or by the length. [Obs.]

A-LOOF', adv. [probably from the root of leave, to depart.]

1. At a distance, but within view, or at a small distance, in a literal sense; as, to stand aloof.

2. In a figurative sense, not concerned in a design; declining to take any share, implying circum-spection; keeping at a distance from the point, or matter in debate.

A-LOOF'NESS, n. The keeping at a distance. Coleridge.

AL-O-PE-CY, n. [Gr. ἀλ-πηξ, a fox, whose urine is said to occasion baldness.]

A disease, called the fox-evil or scurf, which is a falling off of the hair from any part of the body.

Quincy. Encyc. Bailey.

A-LOUD', adv. [a and loud; Sax. gelypd, clamor. See LOUD.] loudly; with a loud voice, or great noise.

Cry aloud, spare not. — Isa. lviii.

A-LOW', adv. In a low place, or a lower part; opposed to aloft. Dryden.

ALPS, n. pl. [Qu. Gr. ἄλπος, white; L. albus. The ALPS, n. pl. { Celts called all high mountains alpes or alpe. Cheer. They did mention a castle, in the territory of Argos, situated on a hill, and called Opas or Olpe. Lib. 3, Ca. 105. Peloutier, Hist. des Celtes, Liv. 1, 15. The derivation of the word from αλπος, white, is therefore doubtful. In Ir. or Gaelic, alp is a huge mass or lump.]

A high mountain. The name, it is supposed, was originally given to mountains whose tops were covered with snow, and hence appropriately applied to the mountains of Switzerland; so that by alps is generally understood the latter mountains. But geographers apply the name to any high mountains. Pinkerton.

AL-PACA, n. An animal of Peru, used as a beast of burden, and more particularly for its wool; is the Camelus Paco of Linnæus, and the Pacos of Pennant.

AL-TERN'A-TING, ppr. Performing or following by turns.

AL-TERN'A-TION, n. The reciprocal succession of things, in time or place; the act of following and being followed in succession; as, we observe the alternation of day and night, cold and heat, summer and winter.

2. The different changes or alterations of orders in numbers. Thus, if it is required to know how many changes can be rung on six bells, multiply the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, continually into one another, and the last product is the number required. This is also called permutation.

3. The answer of the congregation speaking alternately with the minister.

4. Alternate performance, in the choral sense. Mason.

AL-TERN'A-TIVE, a. [Fr. alternatif.]

Offering a choice of two things.

AL-TERN'A-TIVE, n. That which may be chosen or omitted; a choice of two things, so that if one is taken, the other must be left. Thus, when two things offer a choice of one only, the two things are called alternatives. In strictness, then, the word can not be applied to more than two things, and when one thing only is offered for choice, it is said there is no alternative.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. Cranch.

AL-TERN'A-TIVE-LY, adv. In the manner of alternatives; in a manner that admits the choice of one out of two things.

AL-TERN'A-TIVE-NESS, n. The quality or state of being alternative.

AL/U-DEL, n. [a and lutum, without lute. Lunier.]

In chemistry, aludels are earthen pots without bottoms, that they may be exactly fitted into each other, and used in sublimations. At the bottom of the furnace is a pot containing the matter to be sublimed, and at the top a head to receive the volatile matter. Quincy. Encyc.

AL/UM, n. [L. alumen.]

A sulphate of alumina and potassa. This substance is white, transparent, and very astringent; but seldom found pure or crystallized. This salt is usually prepared by roasting and lixiviating certain schists containing pyrites, and to the lye adding a certain quantity of potassa; the salt is then obtained by crystallization. Alum is of great use in medicine and the arts. In medicine, it is used as an astringent; internally, in hemoptoe, diarrhoea, and dysentery; externally, as a styptic applied to bleeding vessels, and as an escharotic. In the arts, it is used in dyeing, to fix colors; in making candles, for hardening the tallow; in tanning, for restoring the cohesion of skins.

Encyc. Fourcroy.

AL'UM, a. l. In dyeing, to impregnate or steep in a solution of alum.

AM-AUS'TE, n. [See PETROSILEX.]

A-MAZE', v. t. [Qu. Ar. اماسا, to perplex or confuse; or from maze.]

To confound with fear, sudden surprise, or wonder; to astonish.

They shall be afraid; they shall be amazed at one another. — Isa. xlii.

They were all amazed, and glorified God. — Mark E. Luke v.

This word implies astonishment or perplexity, arising from something extraordinary, unexpected, unaccountable, or frightful.

A-MAZE', n. Astonishment; confusion; perplexity, arising from fear, surprise, or wonder. It is chiefly used in poetry, and is nearly synonymous with amazement.

A-MAZ'ED, pp. Astonished; confounded with fear, surprise, or wonder.

A-MAZ'ED-LY, adv. With amazement; in a manner to confound. [Little used.]

A-MAZ'ED-NESS, n. The state of being confounded with fear, surprise, or wonder; astonishment; great wonder.

A-MAZE'MENT, n. Astonishment; confusion or perplexity, from a sudden impression of fear, surprise, or wonder. It is sometimes accompanied with fear or terror; sometimes merely extreme wonder or admiration at some great, sudden, or unexpected event, at an unusual sight, or at the narration of extraordinary events.

A-MAZ'ING, ppr. Confounding with fear, surprise, or wonder.

2. a. Very wonderful; exciting astonishment or perplexity.

A-MAZ'ING-LY, adv. In an astonishing degree; in a manner to excite astonishment, or to perplex, confound, or terrify.

AM'A-ZON, n. [This is said to be formed of a neg. and μαζα, breast. History informs us, that the Amazons cut off their right breast, that it might not incommode them in shooting and hurling the javelin. This is doubtless a fable.]

1. The Amazons are said by historians to have been a race of female warriors, who founded an empire on the River Thermodon, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Euxine. They are said to have excluded men from their society, and by their warlike enterprises, to have conquered and alarmed surrounding nations. Some writers treat these accounts as fables.

2. By analogy, a warlike or masculine woman; a virgin.

3. This name has been given to some American females on the banks of the largest river in the world, who joined their husbands in attacking the Spaniards that first visited the country. This trivial occurrence gave the name Amazon to that river, whose real name is Maranon. Garcilasso, p. 606.

AM-A-ZO'NI-AN, a. Pertaining to or resembling an Amazon. Applied to females, bold; of masculine manners; warlike.

2. Belonging to the River Maranon in South America, or to Amazonia, the country lying on that river.

AMB, AM, about; around; used in composition.

Sax. amb, ymb; W. am; Ir. im, um; G. um; D. am; Dan. om; Sw. om; Gr. αμβ; L. om or amb.

AM-BA'GES, n. [L. amb, and ago, to drive.]

1. A circumlocution; a circuit of words to express ideas which may be expressed in fewer words.

2. A winding or turning.

AM-BA'GI-OUS, a. Circumlocutory.

AM-BAS'SA-DOR, n. [This is the more common orthography; but good authors write also ambassador; and as the orthography of ambassy is established, it would be better to write ambassador, as it is written by Blackstone. See EM-BASSADOR.]

AM'BE, n. [Gr. αμβη, a brim; from amb, about.]

AM'BI, n. [Gr. αμβη, a brim; from amb, about.]

Literally, a brim; but in surgery, an instrument for reducing dislocated shoulders; so called from the jutting of its extremity. Also, the mango-tree. Quincy. Encyc. Coze.

 AM'BER, n. [Fr. ambre; Sp. ambar; Port. Id.; It. u] ambra; an Oriental word; Pers. عنب anbar or anbar; bar; Ar. عنب anbarun. In 1 Kings x. 2, 10, the Arabic is rendered spices. The Arabic word is rendered by Castell, amber, a marine fish, a shield made of skins, crocus, and fimsus. In Eth. ዐንባ anbara, is rendered a whale: and the word is used in John ii. 1, and Matt. xii. 40. This word is placed by

 5-5

Castell under عنب annaba, to produce grapes, and عنب signifies grapes, Ch. and Heb. ענב The Chaldee verb signifies to join or connect, and the sense of this word, applied to grapes, is a cluster, like grape in English. It signifies, also, in Ch., a tumor, a pustule, a mountain, the sense of which is a lump or mass collected; and this may be the sense of amber. In German, Dutch, Swedish, and Danish, it has a name corresponding to the English burnstone.

A hard, semi-pellucid substance, tasteless and without smell, except when pounded or heated, when it emits a fragrant odor. It is found in alluvial soils, or on the sea-shore, in many places; particularly on the shores of the Baltic, in Europe, and at Cape Sable, in Maryland, in the United States. The ancient opinion of its vegetable origin seems now to be established, and it is believed or known to be a fossil resin. It yields, by distillation, an empyreumatic oil, and the succinic acid, which sublimes in small, white needles. Its color usually presents some tinge of yellow. It is highly electrical, and is the basis of a varnish.

Journal of Science. Encyc. Chambers.

AM'BER, a. Consisting of or resembling amber.

AM'BER, v. L. To scent with amber.

AM'BER-DRINK, n. A drink resembling amber in color.

Chambers.

AM'BER-TREE, n. The English name of a species of Anthospermum, a shrub, with evergreen leaves, which, when bruised, emit a fragrant odor. Miller.

AM'BER-GRIS, n. [amber, and Fr. gris, gray; gray amber.]

A solid, opaque, ash-colored, inflammable substance, variegated like marble, remarkably light, rugged on its surface, and when heated, it has a fragrant odor. It does not effervesce with acids; it melts easily into a kind of yellow resin, and is soluble, but not readily, in spirit of wine. Various opinions have been entertained respecting its origin; but it is well ascertained that it is a morbid secretion into the intestines of the spermaceti whale, a species of Physeter. It has been found in that species of whale, but usually is found floating on the surface of the ocean, in regions frequented by whales; sometimes in masses of from 60 to 225 lbs. weight. In this substance are found the beads of the cuttle-fish, on which that whale is known to feed. It is highly valued as a material in perfumery. Encyc.

AM-BI-DEX'TER, n. [L. amba, both, and dexter, the right hand.]

1. A person who uses both hands with equal facility.

2. A double dealer; one equally ready to act on either side in party disputes. [This sense is used in ludicrous language.]

3. In law, a juror who takes money from both parties, for giving his verdict. Concl.

AM-BI-DEX'TER-I-TY, n. The faculty of using AM-BI-DEX'TROUS-NESS, using both hands with equal facility; double dealing; the taking of money from both parties for a verdict.

AM-BI-DEX'TROUS, a. Having the faculty of using both hands with equal ease; practicing or siding with both parties.

AM'BIT, n. [L. ambitus, a circuit, from ambio, to go about. See AMBITUS.]

The line that encompasses a thing. In geometry, the perimeter of a figure, or of the surface of a body; the periphery or circumference of a circular body. Johnson. Encyc.

AM-BI'TION, n. [L. ambitio, from ambio, to go about, or to seek by making interest; of amb, about, and eo, to go. [See AMBAGOS.] This word had its origin in the practice of Roman candidates for office, who went about the city to solicit votes.]

A desire of preferment, or of honor; a desire of excellence or superiority. It is thus used in a good sense; as, emulation may spring from a laudable ambition. It denotes more commonly, however, an inordinate desire of power, or eminence, often accompanied with the use of illegal means to obtain the object. It is sometimes followed by of; as, a man has an ambition of wit. Milton has used the word in the Latin sense of going about to solicit or obtain; but this sense is hardly legitimate.

AM-BI'TION, v. L. [Fr. ambitionner.]

Ambitiously to seek after. [Little used.] King.

AM-BI'TION-LESS, a. Devoid of ambition. Pollok.

AM-BI'TIOUS, a. [L. ambitiosus.]

AMELIOR-ATED, pp. Grown better; improved.

AMELIOR-ATING, ppr. Becoming or making better.

AMELIOR-ATION, n. A making or becoming better; improvement; melioration.

AMEN. This word, with slight differences of orthography, is in all the dialects of the Shemitish stock. As a verb, it signifies to confirm, establish, verify, to trust, or give confidence; as a noun, truth, firmness, trust, confidence; as an adjective, firm, stable. In English, after the Oriental manner, it is used at the beginning, but more generally at the end of declarations and prayers, in the sense of, be it firm, be it established.

And let all the people say, Amen.—Ps. cvl.

The word is used also as a noun: "All the promises of God are amen in Christ," that is, firmness, stability, constancy.

AMEN-ABLE-TY, n. The state of being amenable; liable to answer.

AMEN-ABLE-NESS, n. Amenable; liability to answer. Judge Story.

AMEN-ABLE, a. [L. menare; Fr. menar, amenar; Norm. amenar, to lead, to bring; Fr. amenar, it ammainare, in marine language, to strike sail.]

1. In old law, easy to be led; governable; as a woman by her husband. [This sense is obsolete.]
2. Liable to answer; responsible; answerable; liable to be called to account; as, every man is amenable to the laws.

We retain this idiom in the popular phrase, to bring in, to make answerable; as, a man is brought in to pay the debt of another.

AMEN-ABLY, adv. In an amenable manner.

AMEN-AGE, v. t. To manage. [Obs.] Spenser.

AMEN-ANCE, n. Conduct; behavior. [Obs.] Spenser.

AMEND, v. t. [Fr. amender; L. emendo, of a neg. and emenda, mendum, a fault; W. mann, a spot or blemish; Sp. and Port. emendar; It. ammendare. See MEND.]

1. To correct; to rectify by expunging a mistake; as, to amend a writ.
2. To reform, by quitting bad habits; to make better, in a moral sense; as, to amend our ways or our conduct.
3. To correct; to supply a defect; to improve or make better, by some addition of what is wanted, as well as by expunging what is wrong; as, to amend a bill before a legislature. Hence it is applied to the correction of authors, by restoring passages which had been omitted, or restoring the true reading.

AMEND, v. i. To grow or become better, by reformation, or rectifying something wrong in manners or morals. It differs from improve, in this, that to amend implies something previously wrong; to improve, does not.

AMEND-ABLE, a. That may be amended; capable of correction; as, an amendable writ or error.

AMEND-ATORY, a. That amends; supplying amendment; corrective.

AMENDEE, n. [Fr.] A pecuniary punishment, or fine; a reparation or recantation. The amende honorable, in France, is an infamous punishment inflicted on traitors, paricides, and sacrilegious persons. The offender, being led into court with a rope about his neck, and a lighted torch in his hand, begs pardon of his God, the court, &c. These words also denote simply a recantation in open court, or in presence of the injured person. Encyc.

2. In popular language, the phrase denotes a public recantation and reparation to an injured party, for improper language or treatment.

AMEND-ED, pp. Corrected; rectified; reformed; improved, or altered for the better.

AMEND-ER, n. The person that amends.

AMEND-FUL, a. Full of improvement.

AMEND-ING, ppr. Correcting; reforming; altering for the better.

AMEND-MENT, n. An alteration or change for the better; correction of a fault or faults; reformation of life, by quitting vices.

2. In legislative proceedings, any alteration in a bill or motion, by adding, changing, or omitting.

3. In law, the correction of an error in a writ or process.

Shakspeare uses it for the recovery of health, but this sense is unusual.

AMENDS, n. pl. [Fr. amende.]

Compensation for an injury; recompense; satisfaction; equivalent; as, the happiness of a future life will more than make amends for the miseries of this.

AMENITY, n. [L. amenitas; Fr. aménité; L. amœnus; W. metu, good, kind.]

Pleasantness; agreeableness of situation; that which delights the eye; used of places and prospects. Brown.

AMENSAET T'ORO, [L.] From board and bed. A divorce from board and bed is when husband and wife separate, but the husband maintains the wife.

AMENT, n.

AMENTUM, n. [L. amentum, a thong, or strap.]

In botany, a species of inflorescence, consisting of many scales, ranged along a stalk or slender axis, which is the common receptacle; as in birch, oak, chestnut.

A spike, the bracts of which are all of equal size, and closely imbricated, and which is articulated with the stem. Lindley.

AMEN-TACEOUS, a. 1. Growing in an ament; resembling a thong; as, the chestnut has an amentaceous inflorescence. Martyn.

2. Furnished with aments; having flowers arranged in aments; as, amentaceous plants. Brande.

AMERCE, (a-mers'), v. t. [A verb formed from a, for as or at, and Fr. merci, mercy, or from L. merces, reward.]

1. To inflict a penalty at mercy; to punish by a pecuniary penalty, the amount of which is not fixed by law, but left to the discretion or mercy of the court; as, the court amerced the criminal in the sum of one hundred dollars.
2. To inflict a pecuniary penalty; to punish in general. Milton uses of after amerce: "Millions of spirits amerced of heaven;" but this use seems to be a poetic license.

AMERCE-ED, pp. Fined at the discretion of a court.

AMERCE-MENT, (a-mers-ment), n. A pecuniary penalty inflicted on an offender at the discretion of the court. It differs from a fine, in that the latter is, or was originally, a fixed and certain sum prescribed by statute for an offense; but an amercement is arbitrary. Hence the practice of afforcings. [See AFFERE.] But, in America, the word fine is now used for a pecuniary penalty which is uncertain; and it is common, in statutes, to enact that an offender shall be fined, at the discretion of the court. In England, also, finer are now usually discretionary. Thus the word fine has, in a measure, superseded the use of amercement. This word, in old books, is written amercia-ment.

Amercement royal, is a penalty imposed on an officer for a misdemeanor in his office.

AMER-CER, n. One who sets a fine at discretion upon an offender.

AMER-I-CA, n. [from Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine, who pretended to have first discovered the western continent.]

One of the great continents, first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, June 11, O. S., 1498, and by Columbus, or Christoval Colon, Aug. 1, the same year. It extends from the eightieth degree of north, to the fifty-fourth degree of south latitude; and from the thirty-fifth to the one hundred and fifty-sixth degree of longitude west from Greenwich, being about nine thousand miles in length. Its breadth at Darien is narrowed to about forty-five miles, but at the northern extremity is nearly four thousand miles. From Darien to the north, the continent is called North America, and to the south, it is called South America.

AMER-I-CAN, a. Pertaining to America.

AMER-I-CAN, n. A native of America; originally applied to the aboriginals, or copper-colored races, found here by the Europeans; but now applied to the descendants of Europeans born in America, especially to the inhabitants of the United States.

The name American must always exalt the pride of patriotism. Washington.

AMER-I-CAN-ISM, n. An idiom peculiar to America.

2. The love which American citizens have to their own country, or the preference of its interests.

AMER-I-CAN-IZE, v. t. To render American; to naturalize in America.

A-MOUNT', v. i. [Fr. monter, to ascend; Norm. amont, upward; Sp. Port. monrar; It. montare; from L. mons, a mountain, or its root; W. mynd.]
 1. To rise or reach, by an accumulation of particulars, to an aggregate whole; to compose in the whole; as, the interest on the several sums amounts to fifty dollars.
 2. To rise, reach, or extend to, in effect or substance; to result in; by consequence, when all things are considered; as, the testimony of these witnesses amounts to very little. Bacon.
A-MOUNT', n. The sum total of two or more particular sums or quantities; as, the amount of 7 and 9 is 16.
 2. The effect, substance, or result; the sum; as, the amount of the testimony is this.
A-MOUNT'ING, ppr. Rising to, by accumulation or addition; coming or increasing to; resulting, in effect or substance.
A-MOUR', n. [Fr. from L. amor, love.]
 An unlawful connection in love; a love intrigue; an affair of gallantry. Souh.
A-MO'VAL, n. [L. amoveo.]
 Total removal. [Not used.] Evelyn.
A-MOVE', v. t. [L. amoveo, a and moveo, to move.]
 1. To remove. [Not used.] Spenser.
 2. In law, to remove from a post or station. Hale.
A-MOV'ING, a. Moving away.
AM'PE-LITE, n. [Gr. αμπελος, a vine.] The name of an earth abounding in pyrites, used by the ancients to kill insects, &c., on vines; hence the name. The term has also been applied by Brongniart to a compound of alum, and graphic schist.
AM-PHIB'I-AL, n. } [Gr. αμφι, both or about, and AM-PHIB'I-AN, n. } βιος, life.]
AM-PHIB'I-A, n. pl. }
 In zoology, the Amphibia are a class of animals, so formed as to live on land, and for a long time under water. Their heart has but one ventricle; their blood is red and cold; and they have such command of the lungs, as for a considerable time to suspend respiration. This class of animals is divided into two orders, the Reptiles and the Serpents. To the first belong the Testudo or tortoise, the Draco or dragon, the Lacerta or lizard, and the Rana or frog; to the second, the Crotalus, Boa, Coluber, Anguis, Amphibisena, and Cecilia. Linn.
 The term has also been applied by Cuvier to designate a family of marine quadrupeds, including the seal and walrus. Encyc.
 This term is strictly applicable only to such animals as possess both lungs and gills, as the siren, or other equivalent organs, in some of the lower animals. Less strictly, it may be applied to such animals as breathe by gills at one period of their existence, and by lungs at another, as the frog. P. Cyc.
AM-PHIB'I-O-LITE, n. [Gr. αμφιβιος, amphibious, and λιθος, stone.]
 A term denoting the fossil remains of the Amphibia of Linnaeus. Diet. Hist. Nat.

AM-PHIB-I-O-LOG'IC-AL, a. [Infra.]
 Pertaining to amphibology.

AM-PHIB-I-OL'OG-Y, n. [Gr. αμφι, on both sides, βιος, life, and λογος, discourse.]
 A discourse or treatise on amphibious animals, or the history and description of such animals.

AM-PHIB-I-OUS, a. [See AMPHIBIAL.]
 1. Having the power of living in two elements, air and water, as frogs, crocodiles, beavers, and the like.
 2. Of a mixed nature; partaking of two natures; as, an amphibious breed.

AM-PHIB-I-OUS-NESS, n. The quality of being able to live in two elements, or of partaking of two natures.

AM-PHIB-I-UM, n. That which lives in two elements, as in air and water.

AM-PHIB-OLE, n. [Gr. αμφιβολος, equivocal; αμφι and βαλλω.]
 A name given by Hally to a species of minerals, including tremolite, hornblende, and actinolite. Its primitive form is an oblique rhombic prism.

AM-PHIB-BOL'IC, a. Pertaining to amphibology; resembling amphibole, or partaking of its nature and characters.
Amphibolic rocks; such as contain amphibole or hornblende as a leading constituent.

AM-PHIB-O-LITE, n. Trap, or greenstone, a rock with a base of amphibole or hornblende. Dict. Hist. Nat.

AM-PHIB-O-LOG'IC-AL, a. Doubtful; of doubtful meaning.

AM-PHIB-O-LOG'IC-AL-LY, adv. With a doubtful meaning.

AM-PHIB-BOL'OG-Y, n. [Gr. αμφι, βαλλω, and λογος, speech; αμφιβολογια.]
 A phrase or discourse, susceptible of two interpretations; and hence, a phrase or discourse of uncertain meaning. Amphibology arises from the order of the phrase, rather than from the ambiguous meaning of a word, which is called equivocation. We have an example in the answer of the oracle to Pyrrhus: "Αιο te Romanos vincere posse." Here te and Romanos may either of them precede or follow vincere posse, and the sense may be either, you may conquer the Romans, or the Romans may conquer you. The English language seldom admits of amphibology.

AM-PHIB-O-LOID, n. A rock composed of amphibole and feldspar, in which the amphibole predominates; a variety of greenstone. Dict. Hist. Nat.

AM-PHIB-O-LOUS, a. [Gr. αμφιβολος; αμφι and βαλλω, to strike.]
 Tossed from one to another; striking each way, with equal blows. [Little used.]

AM-PHIB-O-LY, n. [Gr. αμφιβολια; αμφι, both ways, and βαλλω, to strike.]
 Ambiguity of meaning. [Rarely used.]

AM-PHIB-BRACH, n. [Gr. αμφι, and βραχυς, short.]
 In poetry, a foot of three syllables, the middle one long, the first and last short; as, ἀδὲρῶ, in Latin. In English verse, it is used as the last foot, when a syllable is added to the usual number forming a double rhyme; as,
 The pick, you think, is incorrect; why, take it.
Pope. Trumbull.

AM-PHIB-OME, n. [Gr. αμφι and ομη, hair.]
 A kind of figured stone, of a round shape, but rugged and beset with eminences; called also Enchelys, on account of its supposed power of exciting love. Anciently, it was used in divination; but it is little known to the moderns. Encyc.

AM-PHIB-TY-ON'IC, a. Pertaining to the august council of Amphictyons.

AM-PHIB-TY-ONS, n. pl. In Grecian history, an assembly or council of deputies from the different states of Greece, supposed to be so called from Amphictyon, the son of Deucalion; but this opinion is probably a fable. Ten or twelve states were represented in this assembly, which sat alternately at Thermopylae and at Delphi. Each city sent two deputies, one called Hieromonemon and the other Pylagoras. The former inspected the sacrifices and ceremonies of religion; the latter had the charge of deciding causes and differences between private persons. The former was elected by lot; the latter by a plurality of voices. They had an equal right to deliberate and vote in all matters relating to the common interests of Greece. Paus. Plin. Strabo. Encyc.

AM-PHIB, n. A term applied to compounds consisting of acids and bases, as distinguished from haloid compounds. Berzelius.

AM-PHIG-A-MOUS, a. [Gr. αμφι and γαιος.]
 A term applied, by Decandolle, to the lowest class of plants, or those whose structure is entirely cellular, and which have no distinct sexual organs.

AM-PHIG-ENE, a. [Gr. αμφι and γενος.]
 In mineralogy, another name of the lencite or Vesuvian.

AM-PHIB-HEX-A-HE'DRAI, a. [Gr. αμφι, and hexa, hexal.]
 In crystallography, when the faces of the crystal, counted in two different directions, give two hexahedral outlines, or are found to be six in number. Cleaveland.

AM-PHIM'A-CER, n. [Gr. αμφιμακρος, long on both sides.]
 In ancient poetry, a foot of three syllables, the middle one short and the others long, as in castitas.

AM-PHIM'NEST, n. [Gr. αμφι and νεστος.] A term applied to a tribe of reptiles, which have both lungs and gills at the same time; comprehending the true amphibia, as the proteus and siren. Branda.

AM-PHIM-POD, n. [Gr. αμφι and πους.]
 One of an order of crustaceous animals, with subnormal, natatory feet, and sessile eyes. Branda.

AM-PHIM'RO-STYLE, n. [Gr. αμφι, προ, before, and στυλος, a column.]
 A double prustyle, or an edifice with columns in front and behind, but not on the sides. Morin.

AM-PHIM-BE'NA, n. [Gr. αμφιβαινα, of αμφι and βαινω, to go; indicating that the animal moves with either end foremost.]
 A genus of serpents, with the head small, smooth, and blunt; the nostrils small, the eyes minute and blackish, and the mouth furnished with small teeth. The body is cylindrical, and divided into numerous annular segments; the tail obtuse, and scarcely to be distinguished from the head, whence the belief that it moved equally well with either end foremost. There are two species, the fuliginosa, black with white spots, found in Africa and America and the alba, or white species, found in both the Indies, and generally in ant-hillocks. They feed on ants and earth-worms, and were formerly deemed poisonous; but this opinion is exploded. Encyc. Cyc.

The aquatic amphibian, Gordius aquaticus, Linn., is an animal resembling a horse-hair, found in water, and moving with either end foremost. The vulgar opinion that this is an animated horse-hair is found to be an error. This hair-worm is generated in the common black beetle, in which the parent worm lays its eggs; and is sometimes found in the earth and on the leaves of trees. Lister, Phil. Trans. No. 83.

AM-PHIM'CI-LI, n. pl. [Gr. αμφι, on both sides, and σκια, shadow.]
 In geography, the inhabitants between the tropics, whose shadows, in one part of the year, are cast to the north, and in the other to the south, according as the sun is south or north of their zenith.

AM-PHIM-TANE, n. A name given by ancient naturalists to a fossil, called by Dr. Hill, Pyriticium. Pliny describes it as of a square figure and a gold color. Qu. Cubic perites. Pliny, 37, 10. Encyc.

AM-PHIM-THE'A-TER, n. [Gr. αμφιθεατρον, of αμφι, and θηατρον, a theatre, from θεαομαι, to see or look.]
 1. An edifice in an oval or circular form, having its area encompassed with rows of seats, rising higher as they recede from the area, on which people used to sit to view the combats of gladiators and of wild beasts, and other sports. The ancient theater was a semicircle, but exceeding it by a fourth part of its diameter; the amphitheater was a double theater, and its longest diameter was to its shortest as 1-2 to 1. Amphitheaters were at first of stone, but in the reign of Augustus, one was erected of wood. The area, being covered with sand, was called arena. Knaest.

2. In gardening, a disposition of shrubs and trees in the form of an amphitheater, on a slope, or forming a slope; by placing the lowest in front. An amphitheater may also be formed of turf only. Encyc.

AM-PHIM-THE'A-TRAL, a. Resembling an amphitheater. Voake.

AM-PHIM-THE-ATRIC-AL, a. Pertaining to or exhibited in an amphitheater.

AM-PHIM-TRITE, n. [Gr. αμφιτριτη, a goddess of the sea.]
 A genus of marine animals, of the Linnæan order Mollusca, arranged by Cuvier in the class Annelida.

AM-PHIO'E-LITE, n. A reddish crystallized mineral from Finland; consisting chiefly of silica, alumina, and lime, with a small portion of iron and manganese. Dana.

AM-PHIO-RA, n. [L. amphora; Gr. αμφορες or αμφιφορες; αμφι and φορεω.]
 Among the Greeks and Romans, a two-handled vessel used for holding wine, oil, &c. The amphora of the Romans contained forty-eight sextaries, equal to about seven gallons and a pint, English wine measure. The Grecian or Attic amphor contained about a third more. This was also, among the Romans, a dry measure of about three bushels. Among the Venetians, it is a liquid measure of sixteen quarts. Encyc.

This name was formerly used in England; but the capacity of the Sax. ambra is not certainly known. L.L. Ina. Cap. 70. Wilkins, Prof. L.L. Æthelstan. Spelman.

AM-PHIO-RAL, a. Pertaining to or resembling an AM-PLE, a. [Fr. ample; L. amplus.] [amphora.]
 1. Large; wide; spacious; extended; as, ample room. This word carries with it the sense of room or space fully sufficient for the use intended.
 2. Great in bulk, or size; as, an ample tear. Shak.

3. Liberal; unrestrained; without parsimony; fully sufficient; as, ample provision for the table; ample justice.

4. Liberal; magnificent; as, ample promises.

5. Diffusive; not brief or contracted; as, an ample narrative. [cluey; abundance.]

AM-PLE-NESS, n. Largeness; spaciousness; sufficiency. [cluey; abundance.]

AM-PLEST, a. superl. Most ample or extended.

AM-PLE-X'IC-AUL, a. [L. amplexor, to embrace, of amb, about, and πλεω, plezus, to fold, and αυλος, caulus, a stem.]
 In botany, nearly surrounding or embracing the stem, as the base of a leaf.

AM-PLI-XTE, v. t. [L. amplio. See AMELE.]
 To enlarge; to make greater; to extend. [Little used.]

AM-PLI-X'TION, n. Enlargement; amplification; diffuseness. [Little used.]

2. In Roman antiquity, a deferring to pass sentence; a postponement of a decision, to obtain further evidence. Encyc.

AM-PLIFI-CATE, v. t. [L. amplifico.] To enlarge; to amplify.

AM-PLIFI-CATION, n. [L. amplificatio.]
 1. Enlargement; extension.
 2. In rhetoric, diffusive description or discussion; exaggerated representation; copious argument, intended to present the subject in every view, or in the strongest light; diffuse narrative, or a diating upon all the particulars of a subject; a description given in more words than are necessary, or an illustration by various examples and proofs. [treated.]

AM-PLI-FI-ED, pp. Enlarged; extended; diffusively.

AM-PLI-FY-ER, n. One who amplifies or enlarges; one who treats a subject diffusively, to exhibit it in the strongest light. Sidney.

AM-PLI-FY, v. t. [Fr. amplifier; L. amplifico; of amplus and facio, to make large.]
 1. To enlarge; to augment; to increase or extend, in a general sense; applied to material or immaterial things.
 2. In rhetoric, to enlarge in discussion or by representation; to treat copiously, so as to present the subject in every view, and in the strongest lights.
 3. To enlarge by addition; to improve or extend; as, to amplify the sense of an author by a paraphrase.

AM-PLI-FY, v. i. To speak largely or copiously; to be diffuse in argument or description; to dilate upon; often followed by on; as, to amplify on the several topics of discourse. Watts.

2. To exaggerate; to enlarge by representation or description; as,
 Honer amplifies, — not invents. Pope.

AM-PLI-FY-ING, ppr. Enlarging; exaggerating; diffusively treating.

AM-PLI-TUDE, n. [L. amplitudo, from amplus, large.]
 1. Largeness; extent, applied to bodies; as, the amplitude of the earth.
 2. Largeness; extent of capacity or intellectual powers; as, amplitude of mind.
 3. Extent of means or power; abundance; sufficiency. Watts.

Amplitude, in astronomy, is an arch of the horizon intercepted between the true east and west points and the center of the sun or a star at its rising or setting. At the rising of a star, the amplitude is eastern or ortive; at the setting, it is western, occiduous, or occasive. It is also northern or southern, when north or south of the equator. Johnson. Encyc.

Amplitude of the range, in projectiles, is the horizontal line subtending the path of a body thrown, or the line which measures the distance it has moved. Johnson. Chambers.

Magnetical amplitude, is the arch of the horizon between the sun or a star, at its rising or setting, and the east or west point of the horizon, by the compass. The difference between this and the true amplitude is the variation of the compass. Encyc.

AM-PLY, adv. Largely; liberally; fully; sufficiently; copiously; in a diffusive manner.

AM-PUL-LA'CEOUS, a. Like a bottle or inflated bladder; swelling. Kirby.

AM-PU-TATE, v. t. [L. amputo, of amb, about, and puto, to prune.]
 1. To prune branches of trees or vines; to cut off.
 2. To cut off a limb or other part of an animal body; a term of surgery.

AM-PU-TA-TED, pp. Cut off; separated from the AM-PU-TA-TING, ppr. Cutting off a limb or part of the body.

AM-PU-TA'TION, n. [L. amputatio.]
 The act or operation of cutting off a limb or other part of the body.

AM-PU-LET, n. [L. amuletum; Fr. amulette; Sp. amuleto; from Lat. amulior, amulitus, to remove.]
 Something worn as a remedy or preservative against evils or mischief, such as diseases and witchcraft. Amulets, in days of ignorance, were common. They consisted of certain stones, metals, or plants; sometimes of words, characters, or sentences, arranged in a particular order. They were appended to the neck or other part of the body. Among some nations they are still in use. Encyc.

AM-ULET'/IC, a. Pertaining to an amulet.
 A-MUR-COS-I-TY, n. The quality of less or eum.
 A-MUSE', v. t. [fr. amuseo, to stun or keep at bay; to detain; from musca, to loiter or trifle; fr. musca, to gaze or stand idle; Ger. müssig, idle. Qu. Gr. μουσῆς, Lat. musso.]
 1. To entertain the mind agreeably; to occupy or attend attention with agreeable objects, whether by singing, conversation, or a show of curiosities. Dr. Johnson remarks, that amuse implies something less lively than divert, and less important than please. Hence it is often said, we are amused with trifles.
 2. To detain; to engage the attention by hope or expectation; as, to amuse one by flattering promises.
 A-MUS'ED, pp. Agreeably entertained; having the mind engaged by something pleasing.
 A-MUSE'MENT, n. That which amuses, detains, or engages the mind; entertainment of the mind; pastime; a pleasurable occupation of the senses, or that which furnishes it, as dancing, sports, or music.
 A-MUS'ER, n. One who amuses, or affords an agreeable entertainment to the mind.

 A-MUS'ING-LY, adv. In an amusing manner.
 A-MUS'IVE, a. That has the power to amuse or entertain the mind.
 A-MUS'IVE-LY, adv. In a manner to give amusement.
 A-MYG'DA-LATE, a. [Lat. amygdalus, an almond.] Made of almonds.
 A-MYG'DA-LATE, n. An emulsion made of almonds; milk of almonds. Bailey. Coze.
 2. A salt whose acid is the amygdalic.
 A-MYG-DAL'IC AC'ID, n. An acid obtained from the bitter almond.
 A-MYG'DA-LINE, a. Pertaining to or resembling the almond.
 A-MYG'DA-LINE, n. A crystalline substance obtained from the kernel of the bitter almond.
 A-MYG'DA-LOID, n. [Gr. ομυγδαλοσ, an almond, and ειδος, form; Ger. mandelstein, almond-stone.] A variety of trap rock, containing small cavities, occupied, wholly or in part, by nodules or globes of different minerals, particularly agates, quartz, calcareous spar, and the zeolites. When the imbedded minerals are detached, it is porous, like lava. Dana.
 A-MYG-DAL-LOID'AL, a. Pertaining to or consisting of amygdaloid.
 AM-Y-LAC'EUS, n. [Lat. amylium, starch, of a priv. and μυλον, a mill, being formerly made without grinding. Plin. 13. 7.] Starchy; pertaining to starch; resembling starch.
 A-MY-LIC AC'ID, n. A volatile acid obtained from starch. Turner.
 AMY-LINE, n. [Lat. amylium; Gr. αμυλον; ομυδος, unground, a, and μυλον, mill.]
 The insoluble portion of starch which constitutes the covering of the spherules. Thomson.
 AMY-RALD-ISM, n. In church history, the doctrine of universal grace, as explained by Amyraldus, or Amyrald, of France, in the seventeenth century. He taught that God desires the happiness of all men, and that none are excluded by a divine decree, but that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to nana the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance to improve this power. Encycy.
 AN, a. [Sax. an, ane, one; D. een; Gr. ειν ε, ω, and Iran. ex; Fr. un, une; Sp. un, uno; It. uno, una; L. unus, una, unum; Gr. ειν ε, ειν, εαν, εον; W. un, yn; Corn. unnyrn; Arm. unan.]
 One; noting an individual, either definitely, known, certain, specified, or understood; or indefinitely, not certain, known, or specified. Definitely; as, "Noah built an ark of Gopher wood;" "Paul was an eminent apostle." Indefinitely; as, "Bring me an orange." Before a consonant the letter n is dropped; as, a man; but our ancestors wrote an nan, or king. This letter represents as definitely, or indefinitely. Definitely; as, "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God." Ex. vi. Indefinitely; as, "The province of a judge is to decide controversies." AN, being the same word as one, should not be used with it; "such an one," is tautology; the true phrase is such one. Although an, a, and one, are the same word, and always have the same sense, yet by custom, an and a are used exclusively as a definite adjective, and one is used in numbering. Where our ancestors wrote an, two, thy, we now use one, two, three. So an and a are never used except with a noun; but one, like other adjectives, is sometimes used without its noun, and as a substitute for it: "One is at a loss to assign a reason for such conduct."
An is to be used before a vowel and before a silent h; as, an hour. It is also used before h when the accent of the word falls on any syllable except the first, as in historians, and historical.
 AN, in old English authors, signifies if; as, "An it please your honor." So in Gr. αν or εαν, Ar. ان,

Sam. and L. an, if or whether; It. an, Ch. 18 or 19 if, whether. It is probably an imperative, like if, εἰ, give. Qu. Sax. anan, or anan, to give.
 AN, a, or a. [Gr. αν.]
 In medical prescriptions, it denotes an equal quantity of the several ingredients; as, wine and honey, ana, ad or a oz. ii, that is, of wine and honey each two ounces.
 AN'A, as a termination, denotes a collection of memorable sayings. Thus, Scaligerana is a book containing the sayings of Scaliger. Similar collections existed among the ancients, as the Dieta Collectanea, or sayings, of Julius Cesar.
 AN-A-BAP'TISM, n. [See ANABAPTIST.]
 The doctrine of the Anabaptists. Ash.
 AN-A-BAP'TIST, n. [Gr. αν, again, and βαπτιστης, a baptist.]
 One who holds the doctrine of the baptism of adults alone, or of the invalidity of infant baptism, and who of course maintains, that those who have been baptized in their infancy ought to be baptized ogoin. With these sentiments is generally united the belief, that baptism ought always to be performed by immersion. Encycy.
 AN-A-BAP-TIST'IC, a. Relating to the Anan-A-BAP-TIST'IC-AL, } baptists, or to their doctrines. Milton. Bull.
 AN-A-BAP-TIST-RY, n. The sect of Anabaptists.
 AN-A-BAP-TIZE, v. t. Te rebaptize. [Not used.]
 AN-A-BRO'SIS, a. A wasting away of the body.
 AN-A-CAMP'TIC, a. [Gr. αν and καμπτιος, to bend.]
 1. Reflecting or reflected a word formerly applied to that part of optics which treats of reflection; the same as what is now called catoptric. [See CATOPTICS.]
 2. Anacampctic sounds, among the Greeks, were sounds produced by reflection, as in echoes; or such as proceeded downward from acute to grave. Bushy.
 AN-A-CAMP'TIC-AL-LY, adv. By reflection; as, echoes are sounds produced anacampctically. Hutton.
 AN-A-CAMP'TICS, n. The doctrine of reflected light. [See CATOPTICS.]
 2. The doctrine of reflected sounds. Hutton.
 AN-A-CAR'DI-UM, n. The name of a genus of plants, a species of which produces the cashew-nut, or marking nut, which furnishes a thickish, red, acid, inflammable liquor, which, when used in marking, turns black, and is very durable. Ure.
 AN-A-CA-THAR'TIC, a. [Gr. αν, upward, and καθαρσις, a purging. See CATHARTIC.]
 Cleansing by exciting discharges from the mouth and nostrils. Quincy.
 AN-A-CA-THAR'TIC, n. A medicine which excites discharges by the mouth, or nose, as expectorants, emetics, sternutories, and masticatories. Quincy.
 AN-A-CEPH-A-LE-O'SIS, n. In rhetoric, a recapitulation of the heads of a discourse. See ANCHORET.
 AN-ACH/O-RET. See ANCHORET.
 AN-ACH'RO-NISM, n. [Gr. αν, and χρονος, time.]
 An error in computing time; any error in chronology, by which events are misplaced in regard to each other.
 AN-ACH-RO-NIS'TIC, a. Erroneous in date; containing an anachronism. Warton.
 AN-A-CLAS'TIC, a. [Gr. αν and κλασις, a breaking, from κλαω, to break.]
 Refracting; breaking the rectilinear course of light. Analeptic glasses; porous glasses or phials, which are flexible, and emit a vehement noise by means of the human breath; called also peeing glasses, from the fright which their resiliency occasions. They are low phials with flat bellies, like inverted trumpets, and with very thin, convex bottoms. By drawing out a little air, the bottom springs into a concave form with a smart crack; and by breathing or blowing into them, the bottom, with a like noise, springs into its former convex form. Encycy.
 AN-A-CLAS'TICS, n. That part of optics which treats of the refraction of light; commonly called dioptrics, which see. Encycy.
 AN-A-COS-MO'SIS, n. [Gr. αν κοινωσις; αν and κοινος, common.]
 A figure of rhetoric by which a speaker applies to his opponents for their opinion on the point in debate. Walker.
 AN-A-CO-LO'THON, n. [Gr. ανακολουθου, not following.]
 A term in grammar, denoting the want of sequence in a sentence, one of whose members does not correspond with the remainder. Brande.
 AN-A-CON'DA, a. A name given in Ceylon to a large snake, a species of Boa, which is said to devour travelers. Its flesh is excellent food. Encycy.
 A-NAC-RE-ON'TIC, a. Pertaining to Anacreon, a Greek poet, whose odes and epigrams are celebrated for their delicate, easy, and graceful air, and for their exact imitation of nature. The Anacreontic verse consists of three feet and a half; the first foot either a spondee or iambus, or an anapaet; the rest usually spondees or iambuses; as,

A-NAC-RE-ON'TIC, n. A poem composed in the manner of Anacreon.
 ANA-DEM, n. [Gr. ανωδημα.]
 A garland or fillet. A chaplet or crown of flowers. W. Browne.
 AN-A-DI-PLO'SIS, n. [Gr. αν, again, and διπλος, double.]
 Duplication, a figure in rhetoric and poetry, consisting in the repetition of the last word or words in a line or clause of a sentence, in the beginning of the next; as, "He retained his virtues amidst all his misfortunes—misfortunes which no prudence could foresee or prevent." Encycy.
 AN'A-DROM, n. [See below.] A fish that ascends rivers. Morin.
 A-NAD'RO-MOUS, a. [Gr. αν, upward, and δρομος, course.]
 Ascending; a word applied to such fish as pass from the sea into fresh waters, at stated seasons. Encycy.
 AN'A-GLYPH, n. [Gr. αν, and γλυφω, to engrave.]
 An ornament made by sculpture.
 AN-A-GLYPH'IC, n. In ancient sculpture, a term applied to chased or embossed work on metal, or to any thing worked in relief. Brande.
 AN-A-GLY'PTIC, a. Relating to the art of carving, engraving, enstiching, or embossing plate. Encycy.
 AN-A-GO-GE, n. [Gr. αν, upward, and γογη, a leading, from γωω.]
 An elevation of mind to things celestial; the spiritual meaning or application of words; also, the application of the types and allegories of the Old Testament to subjects of the New. Encycy.
 AN-A-GO-GET'IC-AL, a. Mysterious.
 AN-A-GOG'IC-AL, a. Mysterious; elevated; spiritual; as, the rest of the Sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven.
 AN-A-GOG'IC-AL-LY, adv. In a mysterious sense; with religious elevation.
 AN-A-GOG'ICS, n. Mysterious considerations. L. Addison.
 AN'A-GRAM, n. [Gr. αν and γραμμα, a letter.]
 A transposition of the letters of a name, by which a new word is formed. Thus Galenus becomes angelus; William Noy (attorney-general to Charles I, a laborious man) may be turned into I may in law.
 AN-A-GRAM-MAT'IC, a. Making an anagram.
 AN-A-GRAM-MAT'IC-AL, a. Caesars's Remains.
 AN-A-GRAM-MAT'IC-AL-LY, adv. In the manner of an anagram.
 AN-A-GRAM'MA-TISM, n. The act or practice of making anagrams. Camden.
 AN-A-GRAM'MA-TIST, n. A maker of anagrams. Herbert.
 AN-A-GRAM'MA-TIZE, v. i. To make anagrams.
 AN'A-GRAPH, n. An inventory; a commentary. Knolton.
 AN-A-GROS, a. A measure of grain in Spain, containing something less than two bushels. Encycy.
 AN'AL, a. [Lat. anus.]
 Pertaining to the anus; situated near the anus; as, the anal fin. Encycy. Pennant.
 AN-NAL'ISM, n. A white or flesh-red mineral, of A-NAL'GITE, the zeolite family, occurring in twenty-four sided (trapezoidal) crystals, and sometimes in cubes. It is common in omygdaloid and some lavas. Dana.
 By friction, it acquires a weak electricity; hence its name, [Gr. αναλεκτις, weak.] Cleveland.
 AN-A-LEC'TIC, a. Collecting or selecting; made up of selections; as, an analectic magazine.
 AN'A-LECTS, n. [Gr. αν and λεκω, to collect.]
 A collection of short pieces, as essays, remarks, &c. Encycy.
 AN'A-LEM-MA, n. [Gr. αναλημμα, nbtitude.]
 1. In geometry, a projection of the sphere on the plane of the meridian, orthographically made by straight lines, circles, and ellipses, the eye being supposed at an infinite distance, and in the east or west points of the horizon. Also,
 2. An instrument of wood or brass, on which this kind of projection is drawn, with a horizon or cursor fitted to it, in which the solstitial course, and all the circles parallel to it, will be concentric circles; and all circles oblique to the eye will be ellipses; and all circles whose planes pass through the eye will be right lines. Encycy. Ash.
 AN-A-LEP'SIS, n. [Gr. αναληψις, from αναλαμβάνω, to receive again.]
 The augmentation or nutrition of an emaciated body; recovery of strength after a disease. Quincy.
 AN-A-LEP'TIC, a. Corroborating; invigorating; giving strength after disease.
 AN-A-LEP'TIC, n. A medicine which gives strength, and aids in restoring a body to health after sickness; a restorative.
 AN-AL'O-GAL, a. Analogous. [Not used.] Hale.
 AN-A-LOG'IC-AL, a. Having analogy; used by way of analogy; bearing some relation. Thus analogical reasoning is reasoning from some similitude which things known bear to things unknown. An analogical please your honor." So in Gr. αν or εαν, Ar. ان,

Ομοίω λέγειν Απειρίδας—
 Μελιτε γλυκε βαλυσαι.

word is one which carries with it some relation to the original idea. Thus the word form primarily denotes solidity or compactness in a material body; and by analogy, when used of the mind, it conveys the idea of qualities having a similitude to the solidity of bodies, that is, fixedness or immovability. Watts.
ANA-LOG'IC-AL-LY, adv. In an analogical manner; by way of similitude, relation, or agreement. Thus, to reason analogically is to deduce inferences from some agreement or relation which things bear to each other.

ANA-LOG'IC-AL-NESS, n. The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy. Johnson.

ANA-LOGO-GISM, n. [Gr. αναλογισμός.]
 1. An argument from the cause to the effect. Johnson.

2. Investigation of things by the analogy they bear to each other. Crabbe.

ANA-LOGO-GIST, n. One who adheres to analogy.
ANA-LOGO-GIZE, v. t. To explain by analogy; to form some resemblance between different things; to consider a thing with regard to its analogy to something else. Cheyne.

ANA-LOGO-GOUS, u. Having analogy; bearing some resemblance or proportion; followed by to; as, there is something in the exercise of the mind analogous to that of body.

ANA-LOGO-GOUS-LY, adv. In an analogical manner.
ANA-LOGUE, (an'a-log), n. [Fr., from Gr. αναλογος.]
 1. A word corresponding with another; an analogical term. Fritchard.

2. An animal or other thing resembling another.
ANA-LOGO-GY, n. [Gr. αναλογία, of ανα and λογος, ratio, proportion.]

1. An agreement or likeness between things in some circumstances or effects, when the things are otherwise entirely different. Learning enlightens the mind, because it is to the mind what light is to the eye, enabling it to discover things before hidden. When both the things which have an analogy follow a preposition, that preposition must be between or between; as, there is an analogy between plants and animals, or between customs. When one of the things precedes a verb, and the other follows, the preposition used must be to or with; as, a plant has some analogy to or with an animal.
 2. With grammarians, analogy is a conformity of words to the genus, structure, or general rules of a language. Thus the general rule in English is, that the plural of a noun ends in s; therefore all nouns which have that plural termination have an analogy, or are formed in analogy with other words of a like kind. Johnson. Encyc.

ANA-LOGY-SIS, n. [Gr. αναλογισις, of ανα and λογος, a loosening, or resolving, from λυω, to loosen. See Loose.]
 1. The factitious separation of a compound body into its constituent parts; a resolving; as, an analysis of water, air, or oil, to discover its elements.
 2. A consideration of any thing in its separate parts; an examination of the different parts of a subject, each separately, as the words which compose a sentence, the notes of a tune, or the simple propositions which enter into an argument. It is opposed to synthesis.
 In mathematics, analysis is the resolving of problems by reducing them to equations. The analysis of finite quantities is otherwise called algebra, or specious arithmetic. The analysis of infinities is the method of fluxions, or the calculus. Encyc.

Ancient analysis; in mathematics, a method of proceeding from the thing sought, as taken for granted, through its consequences, to something really granted or known; opposed to synthesis. This chiefly respected geometrical investigations. Hutton.
 In logic, analysis is the tracing of things to their source, and the resolving of knowledge into its original principles.

3. A syllabus, or table of the principal heads of a continued discourse, disposed in their natural order.
 4. A brief, methodical illustration of the principles of a science. In this sense it is nearly synonymous with synopsis.

ANA-LYST, n. One who analyzes, or is versed in analysis. Krævan.

ANA-LYTIC, a. Pertaining to analysis; that ANA-LYTIC-AL, a. resolves into first principles; that separates into parts or original principles; that resolves a compound body or subject; as, an analytical experiment in chemistry, or an analytical investigation. It is opposed to synthetic.

ANA-LYTIC-ALLY, adv. In the manner of analysis; by way of separating a body into its constituent parts, or a subject into its principles.
ANA-LYTICS, n. The science of analysis [See Analysis.]

ANA-LYZ/A-BLE, a. That can be analyzed.

ANA-LYZ/A-BLE-NESS, n. The state of being analyzable.

ANA-LYZE, v. t. [Gr. αναλυω. See ANALYSIS.]
 To resolve a body into its elements; to separate a compound subject into its parts or propositions; for the purpose of an examination of each separately; as, to analyze a fossil substance; to analyze an action to ascertain its morality.

ANA-LYZ-ED, pp. Resolved into its constituent parts or principles, for examination.

ANA-LYZ-ER, n. One who analyzes; that which analyzes or has the power to analyze.

ANA-LYZ-ING, ppr. Resolving into elements, constituent parts, or first principles.

ANA-NE'SIS, n. [Gr. ανανησις.]
 A figure in rhetoric, which calls to remembrance something omitted. Knaevels.

ANA-NESTIC, n. That side the memory.
ANA-MORPH'O-SIS or ANA-MORPH-O'SIS, n. [Gr. ανα and μορφωσις, formation.]

1. In perspective drawings, a deformed or distorted portrait or figure, which, in one point of view, is confused or unintelligible, and in another, is an exact and regular representation; or confused to the naked eye, but reflected from a plain or curved mirror, appearing regular, and in right proportion. Encyc.

2. In botany, any part of a plant in which there is no unusual degree of cellular development, is said to be in a state of anamorphosis. Lindley.

ANA-NAS, n. The name of a species of Bromelia; the pine-apple.
ANA-N'GU-LAR, n. Without angles.

ANA-PEST, n. [Gr. ανα and πεινω, to strike. Boiley.] In poetry, a foot consisting of three syllables, the first two short, the last long; the reverse of the dactyl; as,

Can it bosom's ad gentile rēum
 Unmoved when her Cerydon sighs? Shenstone

ANA-PESTIC, n. The anapestic measure. Bentley.
ANA-PESTIC, a. Pertaining to an anapest; consisting of anapestic feet.

ANA-PH'O-RA, n. [Gr. from αναφωρεω.]
 1. A figure in rhetoric, when the same word or words are repeated at the beginning of two or more succeeding verses or clauses of a sentence; as, "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?" Johnson.

2. Among physicians, the discharge of blood or purulent matter by the mouth. Encyc. Coxe.

ANA-PLE-ROT'IC, a. [Gr. αναπληρωω, to fill.] Filling up; promoting granulation of wounds or ulcers.

ANA-PLE-ROT'IC, n. A medicine which promotes the granulation or incarcination of wounds or ulcers. Encyc. Farr.

ANARCH, n. [See ANARCHY.] The author of confusion; one who excites revolt. Milton.

ANARCHIC, a. Without rule or government; ANARCHICAL, a. in a state of confusion; applied to a state or society. Fielding uses anarchical, a word of less difficult pronunciation.

ANARCHISM, n. Confusion; anarchy
ANARCHIST, n. An anarchy; one who excites revolt, or promotes disorder in a state. Stephens.

ANARCHY, n. [Gr. αναρχια, of a priv. and αρχη, rule.]

Want of government; a state of society when there is no law or supreme power, or when the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity; political confusion.

ANARCHIAS, n. The sea-wolf; a genus of ravenous fish, of the order of Apodids, found in the northern seas.

ANARCHI'ROUS, a. [Gr. αν priv. and αρθρον, a joint or article.]

ANA-STO-MAT'IC, a. Having the quality of moving obstructions.
ANA-STO-MOSE, v. t. [Gr. ανα and στομα, mouth.]

To inoculate; to communicate with each other; applied to the vessels of the body, as the arteries and veins. Darwin. Encyc.

ANA-STO-MO-SING, ppr. or a. Inoculating; communicating with each other; as, anastomosing vessels.

ANA-STO-MO-SIS, n. The anastomation of vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another, as an artery into another artery, or a vein into a vein. Coxe.

In oliter authors, the supposed opening of the mouths of the extreme vessels, causing a discharge of their contents, as in excretion.
ANA-STO-MOT'IC, a. Pertaining to anastomosis.
ANA-STO-MOT'IC, n. A medicine supposed to have the power of opening the mouths of vessels, and removing obstructions; such as cathartics, deobstruents, and sudorifics. Encyc.

ANA-STRO-PHIE, n. [Gr. αναστροφή, a conversion, or inversion.]

In rhetoric and grammar, an inversion of the natural order of words; as, saxa per et scopulos, for saxa et scopulos. Encyc.

ANA-TASE, n. [Gr. ανατασις, extension, so named from the length of its crystals.]

A native oxide of titanium, also called octahedrite, occurring in brilliant octahedral crystals, of a brown or somewhat bluish color externally, but greenish-yellow by transmitted light. Dana.

ANA-THE'EMA, n. [Gr. αναθεμα, from αvariθμι, to place behind, backward, or at a distance, to separate.]

1. Excommunication with curses. Hence, a curse or denunciation by ecclesiastical authority, accompanying excommunication. This species of excommunication was practiced in the ancient churches against notorious offenders; all churches were warned not to receive them; all magistrates and private persons were admonished not to harbor or maintain them, and priests were enjoined not to converse with them, or attend their funeral.

There are two kinds of anathemas, judiciary and abjuration. The former is pronounced by a council, pope, or bishop; the latter is the act of a convert who anathematizes the heresy which he abjures.

2. In heathen antiquity, an offering or present made to some deity, and hung up in a temple. Whenever a person quitted his employment, he set apart, or dedicated, his tools to his patron deity. Persons who had escaped danger remarkably, or been otherwise very fortunate, testified their gratitude by some offering to their deity. Encyc.

ANA-THE-MAT'IC-AL, a. Pertaining to anathema.
ANA-THE-MAT'IC-AL-LY, adv. In the manner of anathema.

ANA-THE-MA-TISM, n. Excommunication. Hoaker.
ANA-THE-MA-TI-Z'ATION, n. The act of anathematizing. Encyc.

ANA-THE-MA-TIZE, v. t. To excommunicate with a denunciation of curses; to pronounce an anathema against. Hammond.

ANA-THE-MA-TIZ-ED, pp. Excommunicated with curses.

ANA-THE-MA-TIZ-ER, n. One who pronounces an anathema. Hammond.

ANA-THE-MA-TIZ-ING, ppr. Pronouncing an anathema.

Producing ducks. Brown.
ANA-TO-CISM, n. [L. anatomicismus, from Gr. ανα, again, and τομος, to cut.]

Interest upon interest; the taking of compound interest; or the contract by which such interest is secured. [Rarely used.] Johnson. Cicero.

ANA-TOM'IC-AL, a. Belonging to anatomy or dissection; produced by or according to the principles of anatomy, or natural structure of the body; relating to the parts of the body when dissected or separated.

ANA-TOM'IC-AL-LY, adv. In an anatomical manner; by means of dissection; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

ANA-TO-MIST, n. One who dissects bodies; more generally, one who is skilled in the art of dissection.

ANA-TO-MI-Z'ATION, n. The act of anatomizing.
ANA-TO-MIZE, v. t. To dissect; to divide into the constituent parts, for the purpose of examining each by itself; to lay open the interior structure of the parts of a body or subject; as, to anatomize an animal or plant; to anatomize an argument.

ANA-TO-MIZ-ED, pp. Dissected, as an animal body.
ANA-TO-MIZ-ING, ppr. Dissecting.

ANA-TO-MY, n. [Gr. ανατομη, of ανα, through, and τομη, a cutting.]

1. The art of dissecting, or artificially separating the different parts of an animal body, to discover their situation, structure, and economy.

2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection; as, a physician understands anatomy.

3. The act of dividing any thing, corporeal or intellectual, for the purpose of examining its parts; as, the anatomy of a plant, or of a discourse.

4. The body stripped of its integuments and muscles; a skeleton, or the corporeal frame of bones entire, without the skin, flesh, and vessels. [A improper use of the word, and vulgar.]

5. Ironically, a meager person.

ANA-TREP'TIC, a. [Gr. ανατρέπω, to overturn.] Overthrowing; defeating; prostrating; a word applied to those Dialogues of Plato which represent a complete defeat in the gymnastic exercises. Enfield.

ANA-TRON, n. [from Gr. αντρον, niter.]

1. Soda, or mineral fixed alkali.
 2. Spume, or glass-gall; a scum which rises upon melted glass, in the furnace, and, when taken off, dissolves in the air, and then conglutates into common salt.

3. The salt which collects on the walls of vaults. Coxe. Johnson.

ANBU-RY, n. A soft tumor on horses, containing blood.

2. A sort of gall produced by insects on the roots of turnips, cabbages, &c.

ANCESTOR, n. [Fr. ancestres, ancêtres; L. antecessor, of ante, before, and cedo, to go.]
One from whom a person descends, either by the father or mother, at any distance of time, in the tenth or hundredth generation. An ancestor precedes in the order of nature or blood; a predecessor, in the order of office.

ANCESTRAL, a. Ancestral. Pollok.
ANCESTRAL, a. Relating or belonging to ancestors; claimed or descending from ancestors; as, an ancestral treasure. A female ancestor. [Lat. estate.
ANCESTRY, n. A series of ancestors, or progenitors; lineage, or those who compose the line of natural descent. Hence, birth or honorable descent. Addison.
ANCHILOPS, n. [Gr. αγκλωψ, from αγκ, a goat, and ωψ, an eye. Qu.]

The goat's eye; an abscess in the inner angle of the eye; an incipient fistula lachrymalis. Coze.
ANCHOR, n. [L. anchora; Gr. αγκυρα; It. and Port. ancora; Sp. ancora; D. G. Dan. anker; Sw. ankare; Fr. ankaire, ancoir, or ing; Corn. ankar; Ar. ankar; Pers. anghor; Russ. iacor; Fr. ancere; Arm. ancor.]

1. An iron instrument for holding a ship or other vessel at rest in water. It is a strong shank, with a ring at one end, to which a cable may be fastened; and with two arms and flukes at the other end, forming a suitable angle with the shank to enter the ground.

In stramen's language, the anchor comes home, when it is dragged from its bed, so as to drag by the violence of the wind, sea, or current.

Foal anchor, is when the anchor books or is entangled with another anchor, or with a wreck or cable, or when the slack cable is entangled.

The anchor a cock bill, is when it is suspended perpendicularly from the cat-head, ready to be let go.

The anchor a peak, is when it is drawn in so tight as to bring the ship directly over it.

The anchor is a trip, or a weigh, when it is just drawn out of the ground, in a perpendicular direction, either by the cable or the buoy-rope.

To back an anchor, is to lay down a small anchor ahead of that by which the ship rides, with the cable fastened to the crown of the latter to prevent its coming home.

At anchor, is when a ship rides by her anchor. Hence, to lie or ride at anchor.

To cast anchor, or to anchor, is to let go an anchor, to keep a ship at rest.

To weigh anchor, is to heave or raise the anchor out of the ground.

Anchors are of different sizes. The principal, and that on which most dependence is placed, is the sheet anchor. Then come the best bower, the small bower, the spare anchor, the stream anchor, and the loose anchor, which is the smallest. Mar. Dict.

2. In a figurative sense, that which gives stability or security; that on which we place dependence for safety.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. — Heb. vi.

3. In architecture, anchors are carved work, somewhat resembling an anchor. It is commonly a part of the ornaments of the boulders of capitals in the Tuscan, Doric, and Ionic orders, and on the moldings of cornices.

In heraldry, anchors are emblems of hope. Encyc.
ANCHOR, v. t. To place at anchor; as, to anchor a ship. A ship is anchored, but not moored, by a single anchor.

2. To fix or fasten on; to fix in a stable condition.

ANCHOR, v. i. To cast anchor; to come to anchor; as, our ship anchored off the Isle of Wight.

2. To stop; to fix or rest on.

ANCHOR-ABLE, a. Fit for anchorage. Herbert.

ANCHOR-AGE, a. Anchor-ground; a place where a ship can anchor, where the ground is not too rocky, nor the water too deep nor too shallow.

2. The hold of a ship at anchor, or rather the anchor and all the necessary tackle for anchoring.

3. A duty imposed on ships for anchoring in a harbor.

ANCHOR-ED, pp. Lying or riding at anchor; held by an anchor; fixed in safety.

ANCHORESS, n. A female anchoress. Fairfax.

ANCHOR-RET, n. [Gr. αγκυροστροφος, from αγκυρα, anchor, and στροφος, to retire, of ανα and στροφος, to go. Written by some authors anchoret.]

A hermit; a recluse; one who retires from society into a desert or solitary place, to avoid the temptations of the world, and devote himself to religious duties. Also, a monk, who, with the leave of the abbot, retires to a cave or cell, with an allowance from the monastery, to live in solitude. Encyc.

ANCHOR-RET'IC, a. Pertaining to a hermit, or anchorite.

ANCHOR-RET'IC-AL, a. his mode of life.

ANCHOR-GROUND, n. Ground suitable for anchoring.

ANCHOR-HOLD, n. The hold or fastness of an anchor; or security.

ANCHOR-ING, pp. Coming to anchor; casting anchor; mooring.

ANCHOR-SMITH, n. The maker or forger of anchors, or one whose occupation is to make anchors.

ANCHOVY, n. [Port. and Sp. anchova; Fr. anchois; It. acciuga; G. anschova.]

A small fish, about three inches in length, of the genus Clupea or herring, found and caught in vast numbers in the Mediterranean, and pickled for exportation. It is used as a sauce or seasoning.
ANCHOVY-PEAR, n. A fruit of the West Indies, produced by a species of the genus Grins. It resembles the mango in taste, and, like it, is sometimes pickled when green. Encyc. of Dom. Econ.

ANCHY-LOGS-ED, (ank'-lost), a. Immoveably united or fixed, as joints of bones. Mantell.

ANCHY-LOSIS, n. [Gr. αγκυλωσις, from αγκυλος, crooked.]

Stiffness of a joint; immobility of a joint naturally movable.

ANCHY-LOT'IC, a. Pertaining to anchylosis.

ANCH'ENT, a. [Fr. ancien; It. anziano, anzi; from L. ante, antiquus.]

1. Old; that happened or existed in former times, usually, at a great distance of time; as, ancient authors, ancient days. Old, says Johnson, relates to the duration of the thing itself; as, an old coat; and ancient, to time in general; as, an ancient dress. But this distinction is not always observed. We say, in old times, as well as ancient times; old customs, &c. We usually apply both ancient and old to things subject to gradual decay. We say, an old man, an ancient record; but never, the old sun, old stars, an old river or mountain. In general, however, ancient is opposed to modern, and old to new, fresh, or recent. When we speak of a thing that existed formerly, which has ceased to exist, we commonly use ancient; as, ancient republics, ancient heroes; and not, old republics, old heroes. But when the thing which began or existed in former times, is still in existence, we use either ancient or old; as, ancient statues or paintings, or old statues or paintings; ancient authors, or old authors, meaning books. But, in these examples, ancient seems the most correct, or best authorized. Some persons apply ancient to men advanced in years, still living; but this use is not common in modern practice.

2. Old; that has been of long duration; as, an ancient forest; and ancient city.

3. Known from ancient times; as, the ancient continent, opposed to the new continent. Robertson.

ANCH'ENT, n. [Supra.] Generally used in the plural, ancients. Those who lived in former ages, opposed to moderns.

In Scripture, very old men. Also, governors, rulers, political and ecclesiastical.

The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people. — Isa. iii. Jer. xix.

God is called "the Ancient of days," from his eternal existence. Dan. vii.

Hooker uses the word for seniors: "they were his ancients;" but this use is not authorized.

2. Ancient is also used for a flag or streamer, in a ship of war, or the colors of a regiment; and for an ensign or the bearer of a flag, as in Shakspeare. Cowel suppresses the word, which is used for a flag, to be a corruption of end-sheet, a flag at the stern. It is probably the Fr. enseigne. Johnson. Covell. Encyc.

Ancient demesne, in English law, is a tenure by which all manors belonging to the crown, in the reign of William the Conqueror, were held. The numbers, names, &c., of these were all entered in a book called Domes-day Book. Covell. Blackstone.

Council of Ancients, in French history, the higher branch of the legislative body, in the constitution of 1795.

ANCH'ENT-LY, adv. In old times; in times long since past; as, Rome was anciently more populous than at present.

ANCH'ENT-NESS, n. The state of being ancient; antiquity; existence from old times.

ANCH'ENT-RY, n. Dignity of birth; the honor of ancient lineage. Spenser on Ireland. Shak.

ANCH'ENT-Y, n. Age; antiquity. [Not in use.] Marim.

ANCH'ENT-Y, n. In some old English statutes and authors, eldership or seniority. 14 Hen. III.

ANCH'LE, n. [L.] In Roman antiquity, the sacred shield of Mars, said to have fallen from heaven in the reign of Numa. Adams.

ANCH-LA-RY, a. [L. ancilla, a female servant.]
1. Pertaining to a maid-servant, or female service. Blackstone.

2. Subservient or subordinate to; as, a court ancillary to another jurisdiction.

ANCH'IT'AL, a. [L. anops.]
Doubtful, or double; double-faced, or double-formed.

In botany, two-edged; compressed, and forming two opposite angles, as a stem; having two prominent, longitudinal angles, with a convex disc, as a leaf. Barton, Elem. of Botany.

ANCH'OME, a. A small ulcerous swelling, coming suddenly. Boucher.

ANCON, n. [L. ancon; Gr. αγκων, the elbow.]

The olecranon, or elbow; the larger posterior process at the upper end of the ulna.

ANCONES, n. pl. [L. ancon; Gr. αγκων.]

In architecture, the brackets supporting a cornice on the flanks, as in doorways, &c.; also, the corners or quoins of walls, cross-beams, or rafters. Quint.

ANCO-NY, n. [probably from αγκων, the cubit, from its resemblance to the arm.]

In iron works, a piece of half wrought iron, in the shape of a bar in the middle, but rude and unwrought at the ends. A piece of cast iron is melted off and hammered, at a forge, into a mass of two feet long, and of a square shape, which is called a bloom; then carried to a finery, and worked into an ancony; it is then sent to a chafery, where the ends are wrought into the shape of the middle, and the whole is made into a bar. Encyc.

AND, conj. [Sax. and; Ger. und; D. ende or en; and.]

And is a conjunction, connective, or conjoining word. It signifies that a word or part of a sentence is to be added to what precedes. Thus, give me an apple and an orange; that is, give me an apple, and, or give in addition to that, an orange. John and Peter and James rode to New York; that is, John rode to New York, and/or further Peter rode to New York, and James rode to New York.

AN-DAL-LO-SITE, n. A mineral, occurring usually in thick lamellar forms, of a grayish or pale reddish tint, and sometimes in rhombic prisms, and composed chiefly of silica and alumina. Its name is derived from Andalusia, in Spain, where it was first discovered. In a variety called cross-stone, or chiasolite, the crystals, when cut transversely, show a tessellated structure, or appear to consist of four white crystals, placed so as to make a white cross, mid set in a dark ground. Dana.

AN-DAN'TE. [It., from andare, to go; Eng. to wend, to wander.]

In music, a word used to direct to a movement moderately slow, between largo and allegro. Encyc.

As a noun, it denotes a piece of music to be performed in andante.

AN'GEL, n. A fish found on the coast of Carolina, of the Thoracic order, and genus Chetodon. It has a small, projecting mouth; the lamina above the gills are armed with cerulean spines; the body, a foot in length, appears as if cut off, and waved, and covered with large green scales. Pennant, from Cateby.

AN'GEL, n. A gold coin, formerly current in England, bearing the figure of an angel. Skinner says this device was impressed upon it in allusion to an observation of Pope Gregory the Great, who, seeing some beautiful English youths in the market at Rome, asked who they were; being told they were Angli, English, he replied, they ought rather to be called angeli, angels. This coin had different values under different princes; but is now an imaginary sum or money of account, implying ten shillings sterling. Encyc.
AN'GEL, a. Resembling angels; angelic; as, angel whiteness. Shak.
AN'GEL-AGE, n. The existence or state of angels. Beaumont & Fletcher.
AN'GEL-BED, n. An open bed without posts. Knole.
AN'GEL-FISH, n. A species of shark, the Squalus equatus. It is from six to eight feet long, with a large head, teeth broad at the base, but slender and sharp above, disposed in five rows, all around the jaws. The fish takes its name from its pectoral fins, which are very large, and extend horizontally, like wings when spread. This fish connects the genus of Rays with that of Sharks, partaking of the characters of both; but it differs from both in this, that its mouth is placed at the extremity of the head. Encyc.
AN-GE'LIC, a. [L. angelicus.]
AN-GE'LIC-AL, a. Resembling angels; belonging to angels, or partaking of their nature; suiting the nature and dignity of angels.

AN-GI-OL'O-GY, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and λογος, discourse.]
 A treatise or discourse on the vessels of the human body, as the arteries, veins, lymphatics, &c. Bailey. Quincy.
AN-GI-O-MON-O-SPERM'OUS, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, μονος, alone, and σπερμα, seed.]
 Producing one seed only in a seed-pod. Johnson.
AN-GI-O-SCOPE, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and σκοπεω, to view.]
 An instrument for examining the capillary vessels of a body. Morin.
AN-GI-O-SPERM, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and σπερμα, seed.]
 In botany, a plant which has its seeds inclosed in a pericarp.
AN-GI-O-SPERM'OUS, a. Having seeds inclosed in a pod or other pericarp. In Linnæus's system, the second order of plants in the class Didynamia are called Angiospermous. This word is opposed to gymnospermous, or naked-seeded.
AN-GI-OTO-MY, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and τομη, a cutting.]
 1. In medicine, the opening of a vessel, whether a vein or an artery, as in bleeding. It includes both arteriotomy and phlebotomy.
 2. In anatomy, a dissection of the vessels of the body. Parr.
AN'GLE, n. [Fr. angle; L. angulus, a corner; Gr. αγκλος; W. angle; G. and D. angel, a hook, an angle; Dan. angel, a hook, angle, a sting; Sax. angel, a hook; Sp. and Port. angulo; It. angolo. The German has angeln, to angle with a hook; but in D. hangel is the rod, and hangelen, to angle. Qu. kinge and hang.]
 In popular language, the point where two lines meet, or the meeting of two lines in a point; a corner.
 In geometry, the space comprised between two straight lines that meet in a point, or between two straight converging lines, which, if extended, would meet; or the quantity by which two straight lines, departing from a point, diverge from each other. The point of meeting is the vertex of the angle, and the lines containing the angle are its sides or legs.
 In optics, the angle of incidence is the angle which a ray of light makes with a perpendicular to that point of the surface of any medium on which it falls.
 The angle of refraction is the angle which a ray of light refracted makes with a perpendicular to that point of the surface of the refracting medium on which it falls. Encyc.
 A right angle is one formed by a right line falling on another perpendicularly, or an angle of 90 degrees, making the quarter of a circle.
 An obtuse angle is greater than a right angle, or more than 90 degrees.
 An acute angle is less than a right angle, or less than 90 degrees.
 A rectilinear or right-lined angle is formed by two right lines.
 A curvilinear angle is formed by two curved lines.
 A mixed angle is formed by a right line with a curved line.
 Adjacent or contiguous angles are such as have one leg common to both angles, and both together are equal to two right angles.
 External angles are angles of any right-lined figure without it, when the sides are produced or lengthened.
 Internal angles are those which are within any right-lined figure.
 Oblique angles are either acute or obtuse, in opposition to right angles.
 A solid angle is the meeting of three or more plane angles at one point.
 A spherical angle is one made by the meeting of two arches of great circles, which mutually cut one another on the surface of the globe or sphere.

AN/GLE, (ang'gl.) n.

 bling or pertaining to a snake.
AN/GUISH, n. [Fr. angouisse; it. angoscia; Sp. angia; Port. angustia, showing the direct derivation of this word from L. angustia, narrowness, from pressure;
 D. and G. angst; Dan. angest. This and a numerous class of words are from the root ang, denoting narrow, from pressure. See ANGOR.]
 Extreme pain, either of body or mind. As bodily pain, it may differ from agony, which is such distress of the whole body as to cause contortion, whereas anguish may be a local pain, as of an ulcer, or gout. But anguish and agony are nearly synonymous. As pain of the mind, it signifies any keen distress from sorrow, remorse, despair, and the kindred passions.
 And they bemoaned not to Moses, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage. — Ex. vi.

AN/I-MAL, n. [L. animal, from anima, air, breath, soul; mal, anima, breath. The W. has cauil, en, a being, soul, spirit, and mil, a beast; Arm. anceal;
 San. an, aximi. Qu. Dan. caude, Sw. oude, breath.]
 An organized body, endowed with life, sensation, and the power of voluntary motion; a living, sensitive, locomotive body; as, man is an intelligent ani- mal. Animals are essentially distinguished from plants by the property of sensation. The contrite property of some plants, as the Mimosa, has the appearance of the effect of sensation, but it may be merely the effect of irritability.
 The distinction here made between animals and vegetables may not be philosophically accurate; for we can not perhaps ascertain the precise limit between the two kinds of beings; but this is sufficiently correct for common practical purposes.
 The history of animals is called zoology.
 By way of contempt, a dull person is called a stupid animal.
AN/I-MAL, a. That belongs or relates to animals; as, animal functions.
Animal is distinguished from intellectual; as, animal appetites, the appetites of the body, as hunger and thirst.
 The animal functions include sensation and voluntary motion, in distinction from the natural and vital, or the organic functions.
Animal life is opposed to vegetable life.
Animal is opposed also to spiritual or rational, which respects the soul and reasoning faculties; as, animal nature, spiritual nature, rational nature.
Animal food may signify that food which nourishes animals; but it usually denotes food consisting of animal flesh.
Animal economy is the system of laws by which the bodies of animals are governed, and depending on their organic structure.
Animal spirits, in the little, denotes the nervous fluid, and in popular language, life, vigor, energy.
Animal system, denotes the living animal organization.
Animal kingdom, denotes the whole class of beings endowed with animal life. Encyc. Johnson.
AN-I-MAL/CU-LAR, } a. Pertaining to animals.
AN-I-MAL/CU-LINE, } [Jan. Rev.]
AN-I-MAL/CULI, } [L. animalculus, animalculus.]
 A little animal; but, improperly, an animal whose figure can not be discerned without the aid of a magnifying glass; such as are invisible to the naked eye. Animalcula [L. pl.] is also used.
AN-I-MAL/CU-LIST, n. One versed in the knowledge of animalcules. Krith.
AN/I-MAL-FLOW-ER, n. In zoology, a name applied to several species of marine animals, (zoophytes,) but more especially to the Actinias or sea-anemones.
 They are usually fixed to rocks, and appear, when expanded, like a large flower, much resembling an Aster. At the center of the flower is the mouth of the animal, and around it there are one or more circles of slender appendages, called tentacles, corresponding in position to the petals of the Aster. The colors of these animal flowers are often of singular beauty. They are also called polyps, and are identical in structure with a large part of coral animals.
 The other marine animals, to which the term ani- mal-flower is also extended, belong to the Holothu- ria, which, with the Actinias, were ranged under the Mollusca, by Linnaeus; and to the Tubularias, Sertularias, Hydras, and Aegolins, which were classed with the zoophytes. They are all arranged under the zoophytes by Cuvier. Cyc.
AN/I-MAL-ISH, a. Like an animal. Cudworth.
AN/I-MAL-ISM, n. The state of mere animals, motivated by sensual appetites only, without intellectual or moral qualities. Beecher.
AN-I-MAL/I-TY, n. Animal existence.
AN-I-MAL-FZ'A-TION, n. The act of giving animal life, or endowing with the properties of an animal.
Med. Repos.
 2. Conversion into animal matter, by the processes of assimilation.

AN'I-MAL-IZE, v. t. To give animal life to; to endow with the properties of animals.
2. To convert into animal matter.

AN'I-MAL-IZ-ED, pp. Endowed with animal life.
AN'I-MAL-IZ-ING, pp. Giving animal life to.
AN'I-MAL-MAG'NET-ISM, n. A supposed agent of a peculiar and mysterious nature, said to have a powerful influence on the patient when acted upon by contact or voluntary emotion, on the part of the operator. See MESMERISM.

AN'I-MAL-NESS, n. The state of animal existence.
AN'I-MATE, v. t. [L. animare. See ANIMAL.]
1. To give natural life to; to quicken; to make alive; as, the soul animates the body.

2. To give powers to; or to heighten the powers or effect of a thing; as, to animate a lyre.
3. To give spirit or vigor; to infuse courage, joy, or other enlivening passion; to stimulate or incite; as, to animate dispirited troops.

AN'I-MATE, a. Alive; possessing animal life.

Milton.

[This word is used chiefly in poetry for ANIMATEO.]
AN'I-MA-TED, pp. or a. Being endowed with animal life; as the various classes of animated beings.

2. a. Lively; vigorous; full of spirit; indicating animation; as, an animated discourse.

AN'I-MA-TING, pp. Giving life; infusing spirit; enlivening.

AN'I-MA-TING-LY, adv. So as to animate or excite feeling.

AN-I-MAT'ION, n. The act of infusing life; the state of being animated.

2. The state of being lively, brisk, or full of spirit and vigor; as, he recited the story with great animation.

AN'I-MA-TIVE, a. That has the power of giving life or spirit.

Johanson.

AN'I-MA-TOR, n. One that gives life; that which infuses life or spirit.

AN'I-M-E, n. [Fr.] In heraldry, a term denoting that the eyes of a rapacious animal are borne of a different tincture from the animal itself.

AN'I-M-E, n. [Sp.] A resin exuding from the stem of a large American tree, (a species of Hymenaea), called by the natives coarbari; by Piso, jetabida. It is of a transparent amber color, a light, agreeable smell, and of little or no taste. It dissolves entirely, but not readily, in rectified spirit of wine, and is used, like gum copal, as a varnish.

Encyc.

AN-I-MET'FA, n. Among ecclesiastical writers, the cloth which covers the cup of the eucharist.

Encyc.

AN-I-MISM, n. [L. anima.]
The doctrine that the phenomena of the animal economy are produced by the agency of the soul, as taught by Stahl and Sauvages; also, the doctrine that the living phenomena of organized bodies are produced by an actuating or vital principle, distinct from the substance of those bodies.

Cyc. Med.

AN'I-MIST, n. One who maintains the doctrine of animism.

AN'I-MO FU-RAN'DI, [L.] In law, with intent to steal.

AN-I-MOSE, a. [L.] Full of spirit; hot; vehement; resolute.

AN-I-MOSE/NESS, n. Spirit; vehemence of temper.

AN-I-MOS-I-TY, n. [L. animositas; Fr. animosité; from L. animosus, animated, courageous, enraged; from animus, spirit, mind, passion. So in Teutonic, mod, mind, signifies also pride, passion, anger. Animus, spirit, Gr. αἴμα, wind, breath, is from flowing, swelling, rushing, which gives the sense of violent action and passion. See ANIMAL.]

Violent hatred, leading to active opposition; active enmity. Animosity differs from enmity, which may be secret and inactive; and it expresses a less criminal passion than malice. Animosity seeks to gain a cause or destroy an enemy or rival, from hatred or private interest; malice seeks revenge for the sake of giving pain.

AN-NI'GA, n. A root growing in the West Indies, like the China plant, used in refining sugar.

Encyc.

AN'I-ON, n. [Gr. ανα, upward, and ων, going.]
The same as electro-negative element, or the element which, in electro-chemical decompositions, is evolved from its combinations at that surface by which the electric current enters the electrolyte; opposed to cathode.

AN'ISE, (an'nis), n. [L. aniscum; Gr. ανισον, Ar. ainisan. Cast. 1619.]
An annual plant, placed by Linnaeus under the genus Pimpinella. It grows naturally in Egypt, and is cultivated in Spain and Malta, whence the seeds are imported. The stalk rises a foot and a half high, dividing into slender branches, garnished with narrow leaves, cut into three or four narrow segments. The branches terminate in large, loose umbels, composed of smaller umbels or rays, on long footstalks. The flowers are small, and of a yellowish white; the seeds oblong and swelling. Anise-seeds have an aromatic smell, and a pleasant, warm taste; they are useful in warming the stomach and expelling wind.

Encyc. Theop. lib. 7. 3. Plin. 20. 17.

AN'ISE-SEED, n. The seed of anise.

AN-IS-ETTE, n. A cordial flavored with anise-seed.

A measure of wine and spirits, (particularly the latter), formerly used in England, and containing ten wine gallons.

P. Cyc.

ANK'ER-TIE, n. A mineral consisting of the carbonates of lime, magnesia, and iron. It resembles carbonate of lime in color and crystalline structure, but turns brown on exposure, owing to the iron it contains.

ANK'LE, (ank'l), n. [Sax. ancleora; D. ankel.]
The joint which connects the foot with the leg.

ANK'LE-BONE, n. The bone of the ankle; the astragalus.

ANK'LET, n. A little ankle; an ornament for the ankle.

AN'LACE, n. A short dagger shaped like a scyth.

[Obs.]

ANN, {n. In Scotch law, the right of the executor AN'NAT, } of a deceased clergyman to a half-year's revenue of his benefice. Ed. Encyc.

AN'NAL, n. In the Roman Catholic church, a mass said for any person every day during the year, or a mass said on a particular day every year.

P. Cyc.

AN'NAL-IST, n. [See ANNALS.]
A writer of annals.

Encyc.

AN'NAL-IZE, v. t. To record; to write annals.

[Not much used.]

AN'NALS, n. pl. [L. annales, annalis, from annus, a year, the root of which may be the Celtic ain, a great circle. Varro says the word annus signifies a great circle.]
1. A species of history digested in order of time, or a relation of events in chronological order, each event being recorded under the year in which it happened. Annals differ from history, in merely relating events, without observations on the motives, causes, and consequences, which, in history, are more diffusively illustrated.

2. The books containing annals; as, the Annals of Tacitus.

AN'NALS, n. pl. [L. annus.]
A year's income of a spiritual living; the first fruits, originally given to the pope, upon the decease of a bishop, abbot, or parish clerk, and paid by his successor.

In England, they were, at the reformation, vested in the king, and in the reign of Queen Anne, restored to the church, and vested in trustees to form a fund for the augmentation of poor livings, commonly called Queen Anne's bounty.

AN-NEAL, v. t. [Sax. anelan, an-alan, to kindle or inflame; to heat; from anelan, to kindle, to heat, or bake, and to anoint with oil. Sax. an, oil. Hence it may be inferred, that oil is named from inflaming, or burning.]
To heat; to heat and cool slowly, as glass, cast-iron or other metals, for the purpose of rendering them less brittle, vulgarly called nealing. This is done by heating the glass or metal nearly to fluidity, and then suffering it to cool gradually. Metals made hard and brittle by hammering, by a similar process, recover their malleability.

Johanson. The word has also been applied to the heating of glass to fix colors, and to the baking of tiles.

Bailey. Encyc.

AN-NEAL'ED, pp. or a. Heated; tempered; made malleable and less brittle by heat.

AN-NEAL'ING, pp. or a. Heating; tempering by heat.

AN-NEAL'ING, n. The process of applying heat for the purpose of removing brittleness or increasing ductility.

AN-NE-LID, } n. { [L. annellus, a little ring,
AN-NEL-I-DAN, } and Gr. ειδος, form.]
AN-NEL-I-DA, } n. pl. { Terms applied to a division
AN-NEL-LA'TA, } of the articulo, or articulate animals, characterized by an elongated body, formed of numerous rings or annular segments, including the earth-worms and various other animals.

AN-NECT'ANT, a. Connecting; annexing.

AN-NEX', v. t. [L. annecto, annexum; Fr. annexer; of ad and necto, to tie, or connect.]
1. To unite at the end; as, to annex a codicil to a will. To subjoin; to affix.

2. To unite, as a smaller thing to a greater; as, to annex a province to a kingdom.

3. To unite to something preceding, as the main object; to connect with; as, to annex a penalty to a prohibition, or punishment to guilt.

AN-NEX', n. l. To join; to be united.

Tooke.

AN-NEX', n. Something annexed.

AN-NEX'ATION, n. The act of annexing, or uniting at the end; conjunction; addition; the act of connecting; union. In English law, the uniting of lands or reats to the crown.

AN-NEX'ED, (an-nex't), pp. Joined at the end; connected with; affixed.

AN-NEX'ING, pp. Uniting at the end; affixing.

AN-NEX'ION, n. The act of annexing; annexation; addition. [Little used.]

AN-NEX'MENT, n. The act of annexing; the thing annexed.

Shak.

AN-NI-HI-LA-BLE, a. That may be annihilated.

AN-NI-HI-LATE, v. t. [L. ad and nihilum, a trifle.]

1. To reduce to nothing; to destroy the existence of; as, no human power can annihilate matter.

2. To destroy the form or peculiar distinctive properties, so that the specific thing no longer exists; as, to annihilate a forest by cutting and carrying away the trees, though the timber may still exist; to annihilate a house by demolishing the structure.

AN-NI-HI-LATE, a. Annihilated.

AN-NI-HI-LA-TED, pp. Reduced to nothing; destroyed.

AN-NI-HI-LA-TING, pp. Reducing to nothing; destroying the specific form of.

AN-NI-HI-LATION, n. The act of reducing to nothing, or non-existence; or the act of destroying the form or combination of parts under which a thing exists, so that the name can no longer be applied to it; as, the annihilation of a corporation.

2. The state of being reduced to nothing.

AN-NI-VERS'A-RI-LY, adv. Annually.

Hall.

AN-NI-VERS'A-RI-Y, a. [L. anniversarius, of annus, year, and certo, to turn.]
Returning with the year, at a stated time; annual; yearly; as, an anniversary feast.

Anniversary days, in the Roman Catholic church, are the days in which an office is yearly performed for the souls of the deceased, or in which the martyrdom of the saints is yearly celebrated.

P. Cyc.

AN-NI-VERS'A-RY, n. A stated day returning with the revolution of the year. The term is applied to a day on which some remarkable event is annually celebrated, or a day on which an interesting event is commemorated by solemnities of religion, or exhibitions of respect. In the Roman Catholic church, an office yearly performed for the souls of the deceased.

2. The act of celebration; performance in honor of an event.

Dryden.

AN-NI-VERSE, n. Anniversary. [Not used.]

AN'NO DOM'I-NI, [L.] In the year of our Lord, noting the time from our Savior's Incarnation; as, Anno Domini, of A. D. 1800.

This was written Anno Domini 1809, and revised A. D. 1825 and 1877.

AN-NOM-I-NA'TION, n. [L. ad and nominatio, from nominare, to name, from nomen.]
1. A pun; the use of words nearly alike in sound, but of different meanings; a paronomasia.

Encyc.

2. Alliteration, or the use of two or more words successively beginning with the same letter.

Tyrwhitt.

AN'NO MUN'DI, [L.] In the year of the world.

AN-NO'NA, n. [L. annona, from annus, a year.] A year's production or increase; hence, provisions.

2. In the Roman empire, a contribution or tax, payable in coin, imposed on some of the more fertile provinces.

Brandis.

AN-NO-TATE, v. i. [L. annoto.]
To comment; to make remarks on a writing.

Tuller.

AN-NO-TA'TION, n. [L. annotatio, of ad and notatio, a marking, from nota, to mark, or nota, a mark.]
1. A remark, note, or commentary on some passage of a book, intended to illustrate its meaning; generally used in the plural; as, annotations on the Scriptures.

2. The first symptoms of a fever, or attack of a morbus.

Coze.

AN-NO-TA-TOR, n. A writer of notes; a commentator; a scholastic; one who writes notes to illustrate the composition of an author.

AN-NO-TA-TOR-Y, a. Containing annotations.

AN-NOT'TO, See ANNOTA.

AN-NOUNCE', (an-nouns'), v. t. [Fr. annoncer; It. annunciare; L. annuncio, to deliver a message, of ad and nuncio, to tell, from nuncius, a messenger.]
1. To publish; to proclaim; to give notice, or first notice; as, the birth of Christ was announced by an angel.

2. To pronounce; to declare by judicial sentence.

Prior.

AN-NOUN'CED, (an-nounst'), pp. Proclaimed; first published.

AN-NOUNCEMENT, (an-nounsment'), n. The act of giving notice; proclamation; publication.

AN-NOUN'CER, n. One that announces, or first gives notice; a proclaimer.

AN-NOUN'CING, pp. Introducing notice; first publishing; proclaiming.

AN-NOY', v. t. [Norm. annoyer, from neure, nuire, to hurt; Fr. nuire; It. nuocere; from L. noco, to hurt, to be, to strike; Syr. ܢܘܐ, Ar. نوى naka, to strike, to hurt; Heb. and Ch. נזף, to strike. Hence, probably, L. neco, to kill. See NUISANCE and NOYOUS.]
To inconvenience; to injure or disturb by continued or repeated acts; to tease, vex, or molest; as, to annoy an army, by impeding their march, or by a continued cannonade.

AN-NOY', n. Injury or molestation from continued acts or inconvenience.

Shak. Beattie.

AN-NOY'ANCE, n. That which annoys or injures the act of annoying; the state of being annoyed includes something more than inconvenience.

AN-NOY'ED, pp. Incommoded, injured, or molested by something that is continued or repeated.

1. Yearly; that returns every year; coming yearly; as, an annual feast.

2. Lasting or continuing only one year or season; that requires to be renewed every year; as, an annual plant. Leaves that grow in the spring, and perish in the autumn, are called annual, in opposition to pergreen.

3. Performed in a year; as, the annual motion of the earth.

AN-NU-AL, n. A small book published yearly, containing select compositions and elegant engravings.

AN-NU-AL, n. A plant that lives but one year, or rather but one summer. Martyn.

AN-NU-AL-LY, adv. Yearly; returning every year; year by year.

AN-NU-ARY, a. Annual. [Obs.] J. Hall.

AN-NU-TANT, n. [See ANNUIT.]

One who receives, or is entitled to receive, an annuity.

AN-NU-I-TY, n. [Fr. annuité, from annus, a year See ANNUAL.]

A sum of money, payable yearly, to continue for a given number of years, for life or forever; an annual income charged on the person of the grantor; or an annual allowance. Governments often borrow money upon annuities; that is, for a certain sum advanced on loan, the government contracts to pay the lender a specific sum, for life, or for a term of years. The stock created by such loans is transferable.

AN-NU-L, v. t. [Fr. annuler, of L. ad nullum, to nothing.]

1. To make void; to nullify; to abrogate; to abolish; used appropriately of laws, decrees, edicts, decisions of courts, or other established rules, permanent usages, and the like, which are made void by competent authority.

2. To reduce to nothing; to obliterate. [Not in much use.] Milton.

AN-NU-LAR, a. [L. annulus, a ring, from Celtic ain, a circle, and ul, young, small; annulus, a little circle.]

Having the form of a ring; pertaining to a ring.

Annular crystal is when a hexahedral prism has six, or an octahedral prism eight marginal faces, disposed in a ring about each base; or when these prisms are truncated on all their terminal edges.

Annular eclipse, an eclipse of the sun, in which the moon conceals the whole of the sun's disc, except a bright ring around the border. Brande.

AN-NU-LAR-Y, a. Having the form of a ring. Ray.

AN-NU-LATE, a. Furnished with rings, or circled.

AN-NU-LATED, a. cles like rings; having belts; surrounded by rings.

AN-NU-LATION, n. A circular or ring-like formation; a ring of belt.

AN-NU-LET, n. [L. annulus, a ring.]

In architecture, a small square member in the Doric capital, under the quarter round; also, a narrow, flat molding, which is common to many parts of columns, as in the bases or capitals; called also a fillet, a listel or cincture, or a list, timon, eyebrow, or square rabbit. Encyc.

In heraldry, a little circle, borne as a charge in coats of arms; formerly reputed a mark of nobility and jurisdiction; it being the custom of prelates to receive their investiture per baculum et annulum, by staff and ring. It denotes also strength and eternity, by its circular form. Among the Romans, it represented liberty and distinction of rank. It denotes also a difference, or mark of distinction, which the fifth brother of a family ought to bear in his coat of arms. Encyc. Johnson.

AN-NU-LI-ED, pp. Made void; abrogated.

AN-NU-LING, pp. Abrogating; abolishing.

AN-NU-LMENT, n. The act of annulling.

AN-NU-LOSE, a. [L. annulus.] Furnished with rings; composed of rings.

The Annulose animals [L. annulosa] are the same as the articulate animals, or Articulata. Partington.

AN-NU-ME-RATE, v. t. [L. annumerus, of ad and numerus, to number, from numerus, number; W. nuwr; It. nuover or nuומר. See NUMBER.]

To add to a former number; to unite to something before mentioned. Johnson.

AN-NU-ME-RATION, n. Addition to a former number.

AN-NU-N-CI-ATE, v. t. [See ANNOUNCE.]

To bring tidings; to announce. Chaucer.

AN-NU-N-CI-ATION, n. An announcing; the tidings brought by the angel to Mary, of the incarnation of Christ. Also, the day celebrated by the church, in memory of the angel's salutation of the blessed Virgin, which is the 25th of March. The Jews give the title to a part of the ceremony of the passover. Encyc.

2. Proclamation; promulgation.

AN-NU-N-CI-ATOR, n. One who announces; an officer in the church of Constantinople, whose business was to inform the people of the festivals which were to be celebrated. Encyc.

AN-ODE, n. [Gr. ava, upward, and διδος, way.] In electro-chemistry, the way by which the electric current enters substances through which it passes, or the surface at which the electric current enters the electrolyte; opposed to cathode, and equivalent to positive pole.

AN-O-DYNE, n. [Gr. a or av, priv. and odyne, pain.]

Any medicine which always pain, as an opiate, paregoric, or narcotic. Coze.

AN-O-DYNE, a. Assuaging pain.

AN-O-DY-NOUS, a. Having the qualities of an anodyne. Coles.

A-NOINT, v. t. [Fr. oindre, part. oint; Sp. untar, to anoint; L. ungo; Sp. ungir; It. ungere, or ungere.]

1. To pour oil upon; to smear or rub over with oil or unctuous substances; also to spread over, as oil. We say, the man anoints another, or the oil anoints him.

2. To consecrate by unction, or the use of oil. Thou shalt anoint the altar and sanctify it. — Ex. xxix.

3. To smear or daub.

He anointed the eyes of the blind man with clay. — John ix.

4. To prepare, in allusion to the consecrating use of oil.

Anoint the shield. — Isaiah xli.

To anoint the head with oil, Ps. xxiii. seems to signify to communicate the consolations of the Holy Spirit.

The use of oil in consecrations was of high antiquity. Kings, prophets, and priests were set apart or consecrated to their offices by the use of oil. Hence the peculiar application of the term anointed to Jesus Christ.

A-NOINT'ED, pp. or a. Smoared or rubbed with oil; set apart; consecrated with oil.

A-NOINT'ED, n. The Messiah, or Son of God, consecrated to the great office of Redeemer; called the Lord's anointed. Cyrus is also called the Lord's anointed. Isaiah xlv.

A-NOINT'ER, n. One who anoints.

A-NOINT'ING, pp. Smearing with oil; pouring on oil; or other oleaginous substance; consecrating.

A-NOLY'ING, n. The act of smearing with oil; a consecrating.

A-NOINT'MENT, n. The act of anointing, or state of being anointed.

A-NOM'AL-ISM, n. An anomaly; a deviation from rule.

A-NOM-A-LIST'IC, a. Irregular; departing

A-NOM-A-LIST'IC-AL, a. from common or established rules.

In astronomy, the anomalous or periodical year is the time in which the earth passes through its orbit, which is longer than the tropical year on account of the precession of the equinoxes.

A-NOM-A-LOUS, a. Irregular; deviating from a general rule, method, or analogy; applied, in grammar, to words which deviate from the common rules in inflection; and in astronomy, to the seemingly irregular motions of the planets; but applied also generally to whatever is irregular; as, an anomalous character; anomalous pronunciation.

A-NOM-A-LOUS-LY, adv. Irregularly; in a manner different from common rule, method, or analogy.

A-NOM-A-LY, n. [Fr. anomalie; Sp. anomalía; Gr. νενομάλια, inequality, of a priv. and ἴσος, equal, similar; Celtic, W. hama or hacal; Ir. amháil, similar.]

1. Irregularity; deviation from the common rule; thus zen, the plural of ox, is an anomaly in grammar, as the regular plural would be oxes.

2. In astronomy, the angular distance of a planet from its perihelion, as seen from the sun; either true, mean, or eccentric. Encyc.

3. In music, a small deviation from a perfect interval, in tuning instruments with fixed notes; a temperament. Ed. Encyc.

AN-O-ME'ANS, n. pl. [Gr. ασωματος, dissimilar.]

In church history, the pure Arians, as distinguished from the Semi-Arians. They held the Son to be unlike the Father in his essential nature. Encyc.

A-NOM'IA, n. [Gr. ανωμαία a priv. and νομος, rule.]

A genus of bivalve shells, so called from their unequal valves; the beaked cockle.

AN-O-MTE, n. A fossil shell of the genus Anomia. Jameson.

AN-O-MY, n. [Gr. αρωμιν.]

A violation of law. [Rarely used.] Bramhall.

A-NON, adv. [Sax. an an, in one; not, as Junius supposes, in one minute, but in continuation, without intermission; applied originally to extension in measure, and then to time by analogy. "And anon that hi seigon on north-east, fir nicel and brad with thone earne and wenx on lengthe up an on to tham wolcne." Sax. Chron. A. D. 1022. And they said that they saw in the north-east a great fire and broad, near the earth, and it increased in length in continuation to the clouds. See also Ann. Dom. 1127.]

1. Quickly; without intermission; soon; immediately.

The same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it. — Mat. xiii.

2. Sometimes; now and then; at other times; accompanied with ever, ceer and anon.

AN-OTI'ER, (an-ot'her), a. [an, or one, and other.]

1. Not the same; different; as, we have one form of government; France, another.

2. One more, in addition to a former number, indefinitely; as, grant one request, they will ask another favour, another, and another.

3. Any other; any different person, indefinitely; as, "Let another praise thee, and not thy own mouth."

This word is often used without a noun, becoming a substitute for the name of a person or thing; as in the last example. It is also much used in opposition to one, as in the first and second passages cited. It is also frequently used with one, in a reciprocal sense; as, "Love one another;" "Bear one another's burdens;" "That is, love one, or let one love another."

AN-OTI-ER-GAINES, adv. Of another kind. [Obs.] Sidney.

AN-OTI-ER-GATES, adv. Of another sort. [Obs.] Sanderson.

AN-OTI-ER-GUISE, a. [another and Fr. guise, way, manner; Sax. wise. The Saxon manner of writing this word would be another-wise.]

AN'SI-AGHT, n. [See SLAW.] An attack; an affray. [Not in use.]

AN'SWEI'P (an'sur), v. t. [Sax. andswarian, of anti, against, and Sax. swaran or swerian or swerigan, Goth. swaran, in even. The primitive sense of swear was merely to speak or affirm; and hence, originally, oath was used after it, to swear an oath; which is not a pleonasm, as Lye supposes, but the primitive form of expression retained. The sense of answer is an opposite, a returned word or speech. Hence we observe the Saxon has andswyrd, antwörd, an answer; Goth. andswaurd; D. antwoord; Ger. antwort.]

1. To speak in return to a call or question, or to a speech, declaration, or argument of another person; as, "I have called, and ye have not answered;" "He answered the question or the argument." This may be in agreement and confirmation of what was said, or in opposition to it.

3. To comply with, fulfill, pay, or satisfy; as, he answered my order; to answer a debt.

4. To act in return, or opposition; as, the enemy answered our fire by a shower of grape-shot.

5. To bear a due proportion to; to be equal or adequate; to suit; as, a weapon does not answer the size and strength of the man using it; the success does not answer our expectation.

6. To perform what was intended; to accomplish; as, the measure does not answer its end; it does not answer the purpose.

7. To be opposite to; to face; as, fire answers fire.

8. To write in reply; to reply to another writing by way of explanation, refutation, or justification; as, to answer a pamphlet.

9. To solve, as a proposition or problem in mathematics.

This word may be applied to a great variety of objects, expressing the idea of a return; as the notes or sounds of birds, and other animals; an echo, &c.

10. To respond to, or attend upon; as, an attentive servant instantly answers the bell.

AN'SWER, v. i. To reply; to speak by way of return, as, there is none to answer. 1 Kings xviii.

2. To be accountable, liable, or responsible; followed by to before the person, and for before the thing, for which one is liable; as, the man must answer to his employer for the money intrusted to his care; we can not answer to God for our offenses.

3. To vindicate, or give a justificatory account of; followed by for; as, a man can not answer for his friend.

4. To correspond with; to suit with; followed by to.

As in water from answered to fire, so the heart of man to man. — Prov. xxvii.

5. To act reciprocally, as the strings of an instrument to the hand. Dryden.

6. To stand as oppositio or correlative; as, allegiance in the subject answers to protection on the part of the prince or government.

7. To return, as sound reverberated; to echo.

The noise seems to fly away, and answer at a great distance. — Encyc., art. Echo.

8. To succeed; to effect the object intended; to have a good effect; as, gypsum answers as a manure on a dry soil.

AN'SWER, n. A reply; that which is said, in return to a call, a question, an argument, an allegation, or address.

A soft answer turneth away wrath. — Prov. i. called him, but he gave me no answer. — Cant. v.

2. An account to be rendered to justice. He will call you to so hot an answer for it. — Shak.

3. In law, a counter-statement of facts, in a course of pleadings; a confutation of what the other party has alleged.

4. A writing, pamphlet, or book, in reply to another.

5. A reverberated sound; an echo.

6. A return; that which is sent in consequence of some petition; as, a blessing is sent in answer to prayer.

7. A solution, the result of a mathematical operation.

8. The reply of a legislative body or house to an address or message of the supreme magistrate.

AN'SWER-ABLE, a. That may be answered; that to which a reply may be made; usually implying that the answer may be satisfactory; as, an answerable argument.

2. Obligated to give an account, or liable to be called to account; amenable; responsible; as, an agent is answerable to his principal.

3. Obligated or liable to pay, indemnify, or make good; as, to be answerable for a debt or for damages.

AN'SWER-JOB'BER, n. One who makes a business of writing answers. Swift.

AN'SWER-LESS, a. That has no answer, or that can not be answered. Byron.

AN'T, in old authors, is a contraction of an it, that is, if it. [See An.]

AN'T, in our vulgar dialect, as in the phrases I an't, you an't, he an't, we an't, &c., is undoubtedly a contraction of the Danish er, ere, the substantive verb, in the present tense of the Indicative mode, and not; I er-not, we ere-not, he er-not; or of the Swedish er, er, the same verb; infinitive vara, to be. These phrases are doubtless legitimate remains of the Gothic dialect.

XNT, n. [Sax. enmet, emmet, contracted into ant; Ger. ameise.] An emmet; a pismire. Ants constitute a genus of insects of the order Hymenoptera, of which the characteristics are, a small scale between the breast and belly, with a joint so deep that the animal appears as if almost cut in two. The females, and the neuter or working ants, which have no sexual characteristics, are furnished with a hidden sting; and both males and females have wings, but the neuters have none. These insects keep together in companies, and maintain a sort of republic. They raise hillocks of earth, in which they live. In those there are paths, leading to the repositories of their provisions. The large black ants, in the warm climates of America, to avoid the effects of great rains, build large nests on trees, of light earth, roundish, and plastered smooth. Encyc.

XNT'-BEAR, n. Names applied to a species of a XNT'-BEAT-ER, genus of quadrupeds that feed on ants, (Myrmecophaga, ant-eater). These animals have no teeth, but a snout or muzzle, with a long cylindrical tongue. The name ant-bear is applied to the larger species of the genus; that of ant-eater is common to all the species.

XNT'-EGGS, n. pl. Little white balls found in the hillocks of ants, usually supposed to be their eggs, but found, on examination, to be the young brood in their first and second state, particularly the latter. They are vermiform, wrapped in a film, composed of a silky substance spun by themselves, like the cocoons of silk-worms. Encyc.

This, by some writers, is supposed to be composed of anti and Fr. moine, monk, from the fact that certain monks were poisoned by it. This story, reported by Furetiere, is treated by Morin as fabulous, and by him it is said to be composed of Gr. avri, against, and nois, alone, and so named because it is not found alone. The real truth is not ascertained.]
Primarily, a metallic ore consisting of sulphur combined with a metal; the sulphuret of antimony, the stibium of the Romans, and the στίβις of the Greeks. It is a blackish mineral, which stains the hands, hard, brittle, full of long, shining, needle-like striae. It is found in the mines of Bohemia and Hungary, in France and England, and in America. This word is also used for the pure metal or regulus of antimony, a metal of a grayish or silvery white, very brittle, and of a plated or scaly texture, and of moderate specific gravity. By exposure to air, its surface becomes tarnished, but does not rust. It is used as an ingredient in concave mirrors, giving them a finer texture. In bells, it renders the sound more clear; it renders tin more hard, white, and sonorous, and gives to printing types more firmness and smoothness. It is also useful in promoting the fusion of metals, and especially in casting cannon balls. In its crude state, it is harmless to the human constitution; but many of its preparations act violently as emetics and cathartics. Chambers. Encyc. Nicholson.

AN-TI-PATHOUS, a. Adverse; having a natural contrariety. Beaumont & Fl.

AN-TI-PATHY, n. [Gr. avri, against, and παθος, feeling.]
Natural aversion; instinctive contrariety or opposition in feeling; an aversion felt at the presence, real or ideal, of a particular object. This word literally denotes a natural aversion, which may be of different degrees, and in some cases may excite terror or horror at the presence of an object. Such is the aversion of animals for their natural enemies, as the antipathy of a mouse to a cat or a weasel. Sometimes persons have an insuperable constitutional antipathy to certain kinds of food.
The word is applied, also, to aversion contracted by experience or habit; as when a person has suffered an injury from some food, or from an animal, which before was not an object of hatred, or when a particular kind of food or medicine is taken into a sickly stomach, and which nauseates it, the effect is antipathy, which is often of long continuance.
Antipathy, however, is often affected; as when persons pretend a great aversion to things from false delicacy.
2. In ethics, antipathy is hatred, aversion, or repugnancy; hatred to persons; aversion to persons or things; repugnancy to actions. Of these, hatred is most voluntary. Aceasian, and antipathy, (in its true sense,) depend more on the constitution; and repugnancy may depend on reason or education. Encyc.
Inevitable antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments to others, are to be avoided. Washington.

3. In physics, a contrariety in the properties or affections of matter, as of oil and water, which will not mix.
Antipathy is regularly followed by to, sometimes by against, and is opposed to sympathy.

AN'VIL, n. [Sax. anvil, enfil; D. anbeeld; old Eng. anvel.] The first syllable seems to be the preposition on, from the Belgic dialect aan. The last syllable is from the verb build; in Germ. bilden, to form or shape, and build, an image or form, which in Dutch is beeld. To build is to shape, to form, and anvil, that is, an build, is that on which things are shaped.

The Latin word incus, incudis, is formed by a like analogy from in and eudo, to hammer, or shape; and the same ideas are connected in the Celtic; W. eingion; Ir. incoen, aeuil, and incoenium, to strike.]

An iron block with a smooth face, on which smiths hammer and shape their work. Figuratively, any thing on which blows are laid. Shak.

AN'Y, (en'ny), a. [Sax. anig, anig; D. enig; Ger. enig.] This word is a compound of an, one, and ig, which, in the Teutonic dialects, is the ic of the Latins, minus-is-us. Any is unica-us, one-like.

1. One, indefinitely.

Nor knoweth any man the Father, save the Son. — Matt. xi. If a soul shall sin against any of the commandments. — Lev. iv.

2. Some; an indefinite number, plurally; for though the word is formed from one, it often refers to many. Are there any witnesses present? The sense seems to be a small, uncertain number.

3. Some; an indefinite quantity; a small portion. Who will show us any good? — Ps. lv.

4. It is often used as a substitute, the person or thing being understood.

And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any. — Mark xi. If any lack wisdom, let him ask it of God. — James i.

It is used in opposition to none. Have you any wheat to sell? I have none.

AN'V-WISE, is sometimes used adverbially; but the two words may be separated, and used with a preposition, in any wise.

A-ON'NI-AN, a. [from Anonia, a part of Bœotia, in Greece.]

Pertaining to the muses, or to Anonia, in Bœotia. The Anonian fount was Aganippe, at the foot of Mount Helicon, not far from Thebes, and sacred to the muses. Hence the muses were called Anonides. Dryden's Virgil, Eclogue 10. 16. But in truth, Anonia itself is formed from the Celtic an, a spring or fountain, [the fabled son of Neptune,] and this word gave name to Anonia. As the muses were fond of springs, the word was applied to the muses, and to mountains which were their favorite residence, as to Parnassus. Milton.

A-O-RIST, n. [Gr. aoristos, indefinite, of a priv. and opus, limit.]

The name of certain tenses in the grammar of the Greek language, which express an action as completed in past time, but leave it, in other respects, wholly indeterminate.

The great artery, or trunk of the arterial system, proceeding from the left ventricle of the heart, and giving origin to all the arteries, except the pulmmary arteries. It first rises, when it is called the ascending aorta; then makes a great curve, when it gives off branches to the head and upper extremities; then proceeds downward, called the descending aorta, when it gives off branches to the trunk; and finally divides into the two iliacs, which supply the pelvis and lower extremities. Cyc. Parr.

A-OR-TI'AL, a. [Gr. ἀορτή, the aorta, or great artery.] Darwin.

A-PACE, adv. [a and pace.] With a quick pace; quick; fast; speedily; with haste; hastily; applied to things in motion or progression; as, birds fly apace; weeds grow apace.

AP-A-GO-GE, n. [Gr. ἀπαγωγή, to draw aside, of ἀπ-, from, and αγω, to drive.]

1. In logic, abduction; a kind of argument, wherein the greater extreme is evidently contained in the medium, but the medium not so evidently in the lesser extreme, as not to require further proof. Thus, "All whom God absolves are free from sin; but God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin." The first proposition is evident; but the second may require further proof, as that God received full satisfaction for sin by the suffering of Christ.

2. In mathematics, a process or passage from one proposition to another, when the first, having been demonstrated, is employed in proving others.

3. In the Athenian law, the carrying a criminal, taken in the fact, to a magistrate. Encyc.

AP-A-THET'IC, a. Void of feeling; free from passion; insensible. Harris.

AP-A-THIST, n. One destitute of feeling.

AP-A-THIST'IC-AL, a. Apathetic. Seward.

AP-A-THY, n. [Gr. ἀπ priv. and πάθος, passion.] Want of feeling; privation of passion, or insensibility to pain; applied either to the body or the mind. As applied to the mind, it is stoicism, a calmness of mind incapable of being ruffled by pleasure, pain, or passion. In the first ages of the church, the Christians adopted the term to express a contempt of earthly concerns.

Quietism is only apparently disguised under the appearance of devotion. Encyc.

AP-A-TITE, n. [from Gr. ἀπατάω, to deceive; it having been often mistaken for other minerals.] Native phosphate of lime. It occurs usually in six-sided prisms, of a green or greenish color; resembling beryl, but much softer. Its powder phosphoresces on hot coals. The phosphoric of Werner is an earthy variety. Dana.

APE, n. [D. ape; Dan. aps; Sax. ape; Sw. and Fr. ape; Ital. ape; Geru. apfe; W. ab, or epa, so named from the celerity of its motions.]

1. A genus of quadrumana, found in the torrid zone of both continents, containing a great number of species. In common use, the word extends to all the tribe of monkeys and baboons; but in zoology, ape is limited to such of these animals as have no tails; while those with short tails are called baboons, and those with long ones, monkeys. These animals have four cutting teeth in each jaw, and two canine teeth, with obtuse grinders. The feet are formed like hands, with four fingers and a thumb, and flat nails. Apes are lively, full of frolic and chatter, thieving, and mischievous. They inhabit the forests, and live on fruits, leaves, and insects. Encyc.

2. One who imitates servilely, in allusion to the manners of the ape; a silly fellow.

Revelation; discovery; disclosure. The name of a book of the New Testament, containing many discoveries or predictions respecting the future state of Christianity, written by St. John, in Patmos, near the close of the first century.

A-POC-A-LYP/TIC, } a. Containing or pertaining
A-POC-A-LYP/TIC-AL, } to revelation; disclosing.

2. Pertaining to the apocalypse.

A-POC-A-LYP/TIC-AL-LY, adv. By revelation; in the manner of disclosure; in relation to the apocalypse.

APO-CARPOUS, a. [Gr. απο and καρπος, fruit.]

In botany, a term denoting that the carpels of a compound pistil are either entirely or partially distinct.

Lindley.

A-POC/O-PATE, v. t. [See Αποκατ.] To cut off or drop the last letter or syllable of a word.

A-POC/O-PATE, pp. of a. Shortened by the omission of the last letter or syllable.

A-POC/O-PATING, pp. Cutting off or omitting the last letter or syllable.

A-POC/O-PE, n. [Gr. αποκοπη, abscission, of απο and κοπη, to cut.]

The cutting off or omission of the last letter or syllable of a word; as, di for di.

A-POC/RI-SI-ARY, } n. [Gr., from αποκρισις, an-
A-POC/RI-SI-RI-US, } swer; αποκριμαι, to answer.]

1. A term applied to the residents at the imperial city, Constantinople, in the name of a foreign church or bishop, including the pope's legate or nuncio, whose office was to negotiate, as protectors, at the emperor's court, in all ecclesiastical causes in which their principals were concerned. The term was also applied, under the early French kings, to the highest officer in the royal court, nearly corresponding to chancellor.

Encyc. Spelman.

APO-CRUSTIC, a. [Gr. αποκροστικα, from απο and κροστω, to drive.]

APODES, n. pl. [Gr. απο and ποδς, podis, foot.]

A term applied to animals that have no feet; especially to certain fabulous birds which were said to have no legs, and also to some birds which have very short legs.

In zoology, the Apodes are an order of fishes which have no ventral fins; the first order in Linnaeus's system.

Encyc.

APO-DIC/TIC, } a. [Gr. αποδεικτις, evidence, of APO-DIC/TIC-AL, } απο and δεικνυμι, to show.]

Demonstrative; evident beyond contradiction; clearly proving.

Brown. Glanville.

APO-DIC/TIC-AL-LY, adv. So as to be evident beyond contradiction.

APO-DIX/IS, n. [Gr.] Full demonstration. Buck.

APOD/O-SIS, n. [Gr.] In grammar, the principal clause of a conditional sentence, expressing the result; as distinguished from the protasis or subordinate clause, which expresses a condition. Thus, in the sentence, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," the former clause is the protasis, and the latter the apodosis. By some respectable grammarians, this distinction is not confined to conditional sentences, but is extended to others similarly constructed.

APO-GEA, n. [απογειον, apogeum; Gr. απο, from, and γη, the earth.]

In modern astronomy, that point in the orbit of the moon, which is at the greatest distance from the earth.

In ancient astronomy, that point in the orbit of the sun, or of a planet, which is at the greatest distance from the earth. The ancients regarded the earth as fixed in the center of the system, and therefore assigned to the sun, with the planets, an orbit and an apogee; but the moderns, considering the sun as the center, use the terms perihelion and aphelion, to denote the least and greatest distance of the planets from that orb. The sun's apogee, therefore, is, in strictness, the earth's aphelion.

Encyc. Johnson.

A-PO'GON, n. [Gr. απο and γωνιον, beard, because its jaws want the appendages called beard.]

The name of a sub genus of fishes, subordinate to the genus Perca, (perca), one species of which inhabits the Mediterranean.

A-POLL/YON, n. [Gr. απολλωνος, destroying.]

The destroyer; a name used, Rev. ix. 11, for the angel of the bottomless pit, answering to the Hebrew Abaddon.

A-POL-O-GET/IC, } a. [Gr. απολογωμαι, to speak
A-POL-O-GET/IC-AL, } in defense of; απο and λογω, speech.]

Defending by words or arguments; excusing; said or written in defense, or by way of apology; as, an apologetic essay.

Boyle.

A-POL-O-GET/IC-AL-LY, adv. By way of apology or excuse.

A-POL-O-GET/IC-S, n. That branch of theology which defends the Holy Scriptures, and sets forth the evidence of their divine authority.

A-POL/O-GIST, n. [See Απολογ.] One who makes an apology; one who speaks or writes in defense of another.

A-POL/O-GIZE, v. t. To make an apology; to write or speak in favor of, or to make excuse for; followed by for; as, my correspondent apologized for not answering my letter.

A-POL/O-GIZ-ER, n. One who makes an apology or defends.

APO-LOGUE, (ap'o-log,) n. [Gr. απολογος, a long speech, a fable.]

A moral fable; a story or relation of fictitious events, intended to convey useful truths. An apologue differs from a parable in this; the parable is drawn from events which pass among mankind, and therefore requires probability in the narrative; the apologue is founded on supposed actions of brutes or inanimate things, and therefore is not limited by strict rules of probability. Esop's fables are good examples of apologues.

Encyc.

A-POL/O-GY, n. [Gr. απολογία, of απο and λογος, discourse.]

An excuse; something said or written in defense or extenuation of what appears to others wrong or unjustifiable, or of what may be liable to disapprobation. It may be an extenuation of what is not perfectly justifiable, or a vindication of what is or may be disapproved, but which the apologist deems to be right. A man makes an apology for not fulfilling an engagement, or for publishing a pamphlet. An apology, then, is a reason or reasons assigned for what is wrong or may appear to be wrong, and it may be either an extenuation or a justification of something that is or may be censured by those who are not acquainted with the reasons.

APO-ME-COM'E-TRY, n. [Gr. απο, μηκος, distance, and μετρον, measure.]

The art of measuring things distant.

APO-NEU-RO/SIS, n. [Gr. απο, from, and νευρον, a nerve; W. nerth; Arm. nerz. See NERVE.]

An expansion of a tendon in the manner of a membrane; a tendinous expansion in which a muscle terminates, inserted into other relatively fixed parts, or covering and confining other muscles, and forming a fascia.

Encyc. Blancard.

APO-PEMP/TIC, a. [Gr. απο, from, and πεμπω, to send.]

Denoting a song or hymn among the ancients, sung or addressed to a stranger, on his departure from a place to his own country. It may be used as a noun for the hymn.

Encyc.

A-POPPI/A-SIS, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φωσις, firm of speech.]

In rhetoric, a waving or omission of what one, speaking ironically, would plainly insinuate; as, "I will not mention another argument, which, however, if I should, you could not refute." Smith. Johnson.

APO-PHLEG-MAT/IC, a. [Gr. απο, from, and φλεγμων, phlegm.]

Having the quality of exciting discharges of phlegm or mucus from the mouth or nostrils.

APO-PHLEG-MAT/IC, n. A medicine which excites discharges of phlegm or mucus from the mouth or nostrils.

Coxe.

Quincy. Coxe.

APO/PII-THEGM, } (ap'o-them,) n. [Gr. απο, from,
APO-THEGM, } and θεγμα, word.]

It would be eligible to reduce this harsh word to apothem.

A remarkable saying; a short, sententious, instructive remark, uttered on a particular occasion, or by a distinguished character; as that of Cyrus, "He is unworthy to be a magistrate, who is not better than his subjects;" or that of Cato, "Homines, nihil agendo, discunt male agere." Men, by doing nothing, soon learn to do mischief.

A-POPPI/Y-GE, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φυγη, flight.]

In architecture, that part of a column where it springs out of its base; sometimes called the spring of the column.

Chambers.

A concave part or ring of a column, lying above or below the flat member; called by the French, le congé d'en bas, or d'en haut, and by the Italians, il cavò di basso, or di sopra. It was originally a ring or ferule to bind the extremities of wooden columns, and keep them from splitting; afterward imitated in stone pillars.

Encyc.

A-POPPI/Y-LITE, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φωλλω, a leaf; so called from the readiness with which its laminae are separated.]

A zeolitic mineral, occurring in pearly, laminated masses, or crystallized in glassy, square prisms, with pyramidal terminations, which break very readily across, and afford a surface with a pearly luster. It consists of silica, lime, and potash. From its peculiar luster, it is sometimes called ichthyophthalmic, or fish-eye stone.

Dana.

A-POPPI/Y-SIS, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φωσις, growth.]

A process of a bone; a prominent part of a bone, forming, originally, a continuous part of the body of the bone, in distinction from epiphysis.

APO-PLEC/TIC, } a. [See Αποπλεξ.]
APO-PLEC/TIC-AL, } Pertaining to or consisting in apoplexy; as, an apoplectic fit; or predisposed to apoplexy; as, an apoplectic habit of body.

APO-PLEC/TIC, n. A person affected with apoplexy.

Knatchbull.

APO-PLEX-ED, (ap'o-plex,) a. Affected with apoplexy.

Shak.

APO-PLEX-Y, n. [Gr. αποπληξια, of απο, from, and πλησσω, to strike.]

Abolition of sense and voluntary motion, from suspension of the functions of the cerebrum.

Dryden, for the sake of measure, uses apoplex, for apoplexy.

APO-RON, } n. [See Απορον.] A problem difficult
APO-RIME, } to be resolved. Encyc.

A-PO'R-I-A, n. [Gr. απορια, from απορος, inops, consilii, of a and πορος, way or passage.]

1. In rhetoric, a doubting or being at a loss where to begin, or what to say, on account of the variety of matter.

Smith.

2. In the medical art, febrile anxiety; uneasiness; restlessness from obstructed perspiration, or the stoppage of any natural secretion.

Coxe.

A-PO-SEP/E-DIN, n. [Gr. απο, from, and σηπτις, putrefaction.] A peculiar crystallized substance obtained from putrid cheese.

Brande.

A-POS-I/O-P/E/SIS, n. [Gr. αποσιωπησις, of απο and σιωπω, to be silent.]

Reticency or suppression; as when a speaker, for some cause, as fear, sorrow, or anger, suddenly breaks off his discourse, before it is ended; or speaks of a thing when he makes a show as if he would say nothing on the subject; or aggravates what he pretends to conceal, by uttering a part and leaving the remainder to be understood. Smith. Johnson. Encyc.

A-POS/T-A-SIS, n. [Gr. αποστασις.]

1. In ancient medicine, the termination or crisis of a disease by some secretion; in opposition to metastasis, or the termination by transfer to another part. Hence,

2. An abscess; such collection of purulent matter having been considered a critical secretion, and hence called, in Greek, αποστημα, and in Latin, abscessus.

Blancard.

3. The throwing off or separation of exfoliated or fractured bone.

Coxe.

A-POS/TA-SY, n. [Gr. αποστασις, a defection, of αποστραφω to depart, απο and ιστημι.]

1. An abandonment of what one has professed; a total desertion or departure from one's faith or religion.

2. The desertion from a party to which one has A-POSTATE, n. [Gr. αποστατης.] [adhered.]

One who has forsaken the church, sect, or profession to which he before adhered. In its original sense, applied to one who has abandoned his religion; but correctly applied also to one who abandons a political or other party.

In the Roman Catholic church, one who, without a legal dispensation, forsakes a religious order, of which he has made profession. Encyc.

A-POSTATE, a. False; traitorous. Spencer.

APO-STAT'IC-AL, a. After the manner of an apostate. Sandey.

A-POSTA-TIZE, v. i. To abandon one's profession or church; to forsake principles or faith which one has professed, or the party to which one has been attached. Worthington.

A-POSTA-TIZ-ING, pp. Abandoning a church, profession, sect, or party.

A-POSTE-MATE, v. i. To form into an abscess; to swell and fill with pus.

A-POSTE-MATION, n. The formation of an aposteme; the process of gathering into an abscess; written corruptly imposthumation.

APOS-TEMP'A-TOUS, a. Pertaining to an abscess; partaking of the nature of an aposteme. Journ. of Science.

A-POST'LE, (a-pos'l), n. [L. apostolus; Gr. αποστολος, from αποστελλω, to send away, of απο and στέλλω, to send; Germ. stellen, to set.]

A person deputed to execute some important business; but appropriately, a disciple of Christ commissioned to preach the gospel. Twelve persons were selected by Christ for this purpose; and Judas, one of the number, proving an apostate, his place was supplied by Matthias. Acts i.

The title of apostle is applied to Christ himself, Heb. iii. In the primitive ages of the church, other ministers were called apostles, Rom. xvi. as were persons sent to carry alms from one church to another, Philip. ii. This title was also given to persons who first planted the Christian faith. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France; and the Jesuit missionaries are called apostles.

Among the Jews, the title was given to officers who were sent into distant provinces, as visitors or commissioners, to see the laws observed, and to collect money or tribute.

Apostle, in the Greek liturgy, is a book containing the Epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order in which they are to be read in the churches through the year. Encyc.

A-POST'LE-SHIP, n. The office or dignity of an apostle.

A-POSTO-LATE, n. A mission; the dignity or office of an apostle. Ancient writers use it for the office of a bishop; but it is now restricted to the dignity of the pope, whose see is called the apostolic see. Encyc.

AP-OS-TOL'IC, {a. Pertaining or relating to the AP-OS-TOL'IC-AL, } apostles; as, the apostolic age.

2. According to the doctrines of the apostles; delivered or taught by the apostles; as, apostolic faith or practice.

Apostolic constitutions; a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, but generally supposed to be spurious. They appeared in the fourth century, are divided into eight books, and consist of rules and precepts relating to the duty of Christians, and particularly to the ceremonies and discipline of the church.

Apostolic fathers; an appellation given to the Christian writers of the first century.

AP-OS-TOL'IC-AL-LY, adv. In the manner of the apostles.

AP-OS-TOL'IC-AL-NESS, n. The quality of being apostolical, or accordant with the doctrines of the apostles.

AP-OS-TOL'ICES, n. pl. Certain sects, so called from their pretending to imitate the practice of the apostles, abstaining from marriage, from wine, flesh, pecuniary reward, &c., and wandering about clothed in white, with long beards and bare heads. Sagarelli, the founder of one of these sects, was burnt at Parma in 1300. Encyc.

A-POS-TRO-PHIE, n. [Gr. απο, from, and στροφη, a turning.]

1. In rhetoric, a diversion of speech; a digressive address; a changing the course of a speech, and addressing a person who is dead or absent, as if present; or a short address introduced into a discourse, directed to some person different from the party to which the main discourse is directed, as when an advocate, in an argument to the jury, turns and addresses a few remarks to the court. Encyc. Smith.

2. In grammar, the contraction of a word by the omission of a letter or letters, which omission is marked by a comma; as, call'd for called. The comma used for this purpose may also be called an apostrophe.

AP-OS-TROPH'IC, a. Pertaining to an apostrophe; noting the contraction of a word. Murray.

A-POS-TRO-PHIZE, v. t. To address by apostrophe.

To inform; to give notice, verbal or written; followed by of; as, we will apprise the general of an intended attack; he apprised the commander of what he had done. Thomson. Porteus.

AP-PRIS'ED, (ap-priz'd), pp. Informed; having notice or knowledge communicated.

AP-PRIS'ING, ppr. Informing; communicating notice to.

AP-PRIZE', v. t. [This word is usually written appraise, as if deduced from the Italian apprizzare. There is no other word from which it can regularly be formed; the French apprécier being recognized in appraise. But apprize, the word generally used, is regularly formed, with ad, from pris, prize; D. preis; Ger. preis; W. pris; or from the Fr. priser, to prize; and this is the more desirable orthography.]

To value; to set a value, in pursuance of authority. It is generally used for the act of valuing, by men appointed for the purpose, under direction of law, or by agreement of parties; as, to apprize the goods and estate of a deceased person. The private act of valuing is ordinarily expressed by prize.

AP-PRIZ'ED, pp. Valued; having the worth fixed by authorized persons.

AP-PRIZ'EMENT, n. The act of setting a value under some authority or appointment; a valuation.

Statutes of Conn. Blackstone.

2. The rate at which a thing is valued; the value fixed, or valuation; as, he purchased the article at the apprizement.

AP-PRIZ'ING, n. The act of valuing under authority.

AP-PRŌCII', v. i. [Fr. approcher, from proche, near; It. approcchiare. The Latin proximus contains the root, but the word, in the positive degree, is not found in the Latin. It is from a root in Class Irg. signifying to drive, move, or press toward; probably גָּרַח.]

1. To come or go near, in place; to draw near; to advance nearer.

Wherefore approached ye so nigh the city?—2 Sara. xi.

2. To draw near in time.

And so much the more as ye see the day approaching.—Heb. x.

3. To draw near, in a figurative sense; to advance near to a point aimed at, in science, literature, government, morals, &c.; to approximate; as, he approaches to the character of the ablest statesman.

4. To draw near in duty, as in prayer or worship.

They take delight in approaching to God.—1 Isa. li.

AP-PRŌCII', v. t. To come near to; as, Pope approaches Virgil in smoothness of versification. This use of the word is elliptical, to being omitted, so that the verb can hardly be said to be transitive. The old use of the word, as, "Approach the hand to the handle," is not legitimate.

2. To have access carnally. Lev. xviii.

AP-PRŌCII', n. The act of drawing near; a coming or advancing near; as, he was apprised of the enemy's approach.

2. Access; as, the approach to kings. Bacon.

AQUA, n. [L. aqua; Sp. agua; Port. agua; It. acqua, water; Arm. eagui, to water, or steep; Goth. ahwa, water; which in Saxon is reduced to a; G. and D. ei, in island; Fr. eau; W. gwyl or aw; Ir. oig or eicke; Anh. oge.]

A Latin word, signifying water; much used in pharmacy, and the old chemistry, in various significations, determined by the word or words annexed.

Aqua fortis, in the old chemistry, is now called nitric acid.

Aqua marina, or aqua marina; a name which jewelers give to the beryl, on account of its color.

Aqua regia, in the old chemistry, is now called nitro-muriatic acid.

Aqua cile; brandy, or spirit of wine.

AQUARIAN, n. One of a sect of Christians, in the primitive church, who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine; either under a pretense of abstinence, or because they thought it was unlawful to drink wine. Encyc.

AQUARIUM, n. [L.] An artificial pond in gardens for rearing aquatic plants. Brande.

AQUARIUS, n. [L.] The Water-bearer; a sign in the zodiac, which the sun enters about the 21st of January; so called from the rains which prevail, at that season, in Italy and the East. Also, a constellation of the zodiac, containing, according to Flamstead, 108 stars, and, according to the P. Cyc., 152. The sign and the constellation originally coincided; but from its recession, in consequence of the precession of the equinoxes, the sign now begins in the constellation of Capricorn.

AQUATIC, a. [L. aquaticus. See AQUA.]

Pertaining to water; applied to animals which live in water, as fishes; or to such as frequent it, as aquatic fowls. Applied to plants, it denotes such as grow in water. Aquatical is rarely used.

AQUATIC, n. A plant which grows in water, as the flag.

AQUA-TILE, a. That inhabits the water. [Rarely used.] Brown.

AQUA-TINT/A, a. [L. aqua, water, and It. tinta, dye. See TINCTURE.]

A method of engraving by aqua fortis, by which an effect is produced, resembling a drawing in water colors or Indian ink. This peculiar effect is produced by covering the plate, after the outlines of the design have been etched, with a granulated ground, which permits the acid to act only in the interstices of its grain, now formed by pouring over the plate, in an inclined position, a solution of resin in alcohol. Originally, the ground was formed by sifting over the plate a fine powder of resin, or of resin and asphaltum, and then heating the plate; but this method is now obsolete. P. Cyc.

AQUEDUCT, (ak'we-duk't,) n. [L. aqua, water, and ductus, a pipe or canal, from ducere, to lead. See DUCER.]

A conductor or conduit of water, by means of pipes, or a canal or tunnel, or other channel, supported by some structure. More particularly applied to the ancient structures, raised on one or more series of arches, and sustaining one or more channels, conducted on a slightly descending plane. These have been superseded, in a great measure, in modern times, by pipes following the inequalities of the ground, and conveying the water on the principle of hydrostatic pressure. This term is also applied to a structure, similar to the ancient aqueducts, for conveying a canal over a river or hollow; more properly called an aqueduct-bridge.

AQUEOUS, a. Watery; partaking of the nature of water, or abounding with it.

2. Made by means of water; as, an aqueous solution.

Aqueous humor; in anatomy, one of the humors of the eye; a transparent, limpid fluid, occupying the space between the crystalline lens and the cornea, divided into two chambers by the iris. Wistar.

AQUEOUSNESS, n. The quality of being watery; wateriness; wateriness.

AQUIFORM, n. In the form of water.

AQUI-LA, n. [L. whence aquilinus; from the Oriental لقيط to be crooked. This bird is probably named from its curving beak.]

In ornithology, the eagle. Also, a northern constellation, containing, according to the Britannic catalogue, 71 stars. Encyc.

AQUILINE, (-in or line,) a. [L. aquilinus. See AQUILA.]

1. Belonging to the eagle.

The north wind. Shak.

AQUITANI, a. Pertaining to Aquitania, one of the great divisions of Gaul, which, according to Cesar, lay between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the ocean. In modern days, it has been called Gascony. The inhabitants, in Cesar's time, spoke a different dialect from that of the proper Celts, between the Garonne and Seine. This dialect bore an affinity to the Basque, in Biscay, to which they were contiguous; and some remains of it still exist in the Gascon. Aquitania is the country of the Aquii; from the name of the people, with tan, a Celtic word, signifying region or country. The Romans, either from their general usage, or from not understanding the Celtic tan, annexed another termination signifying country, i. e. the Ir. ai or aoi, Heb. נ אר, a settlement or habitation; Gr. ατα, land, country; Iiundo, eye, the same. Cesar, Com. lib. l. i. D'Anville.

A. R. stand for anno regni, the year of the reign; as, A. R. G. R. 20, in the 20th year of the reign of King George.

AR'GO-NAUT, n. [of Αργος, Jason's ship, and ναυτης, a sailor.]

One of the persons who sailed to Colchis with Jason, in the Argo, in quest of the golden fleece. Cicero. Pliny. Sir W. Jones.

AR-GO-NAUT'IC, n. [See ARGO-NAUT.]

A genus of shells, of the class Cephalopoda. The shell consists of one spiral involuted valve. The Argo, with a subdentated carina, is the famous nautilus, which, when it sails, extends two of its arms, spreading a membrane, which serves for a sail, and six other arms are thrown out, for rowing or steering. Encyc. Cuvier.

AR-GO-NAUT'IC, a. Pertaining to the Argonauts, or to their voyage to Colchis; as, the Argonautic story. Sir W. Jones.

AR-GO-NAUT'IC, n. A poem on the subject of Jason's voyage, or the expedition of the Argonauts; as, the Argonautics of Orpheus, of V. Flaccus, and of Apollonius Rhodius. Encyc.

AR'GO-NAVIS, the ship Argo, is a constellation in the southern hemisphere, whose stars, in the Britan- nish catalogue, are sixty-four. Encyc.

AR'GO-SY, n. [Sp. Argos, Jason's ship.] A large merchantman; a carac. Shak.

AR'GUE, v. i. [L. arguo, to show, argue, accuse, or convict; Fr. arguer; Sp. arguir; It. arguire. The radical sense of arguo is to urge, drive, press, or strangle.]

1. To reason; to invent and offer reasons to support or overthrow a proposition, opinion, or measure; as, A argues in favor of a measure; B argues against it.

2. To dispute; to reason with; followed by with; as, you may argue with your friend a week, without convincing him.

AR'GUE, v. t. To debate or discuss; to treat by reasoning; as, the counsel argued the cause before the Supreme Court; the cause was well argued.

2. To prove or evince; to manifest by inferences or deductions, or to show reasons for; as, the order visible in the universe argues a divine cause.

3. To persuade by reasons; as, to argue a man into a different opinion.

4. Formerly, to accuse or charge with; a Latin sense, now obsolete; as, to argue one of profane-ness. Dryden.

AR'GO-ED, pp. Debated; discussed; evinced; persuaded; accused.

AR'GU-ER, n. One who argues; a reasoner; a disputer; a controvertist.

AR'GU-MENT'A-TIVE-NESS, n. State of being argumentative.

AR'GUS, n. A fabulous being of antiquity, said to have had a hundred eyes, who was placed by Juno to guard Io. The origin of this story may perhaps be found in the Teutonic word arg, crafty, cunning, of which the hundred eyes are symbolical.

AR'GUS-SHELL, n. A species of porcelain-shell, beautifully variegated with spots, resembling, in some measure, those in a peacock's tail. Encyc.

AR'GUTE, a. [L. argutus.] Sharp; shrill; subtle; witty. [Little used.]

AR'GUTE-NESS, n. Acuteness; wittiness. [Little used.]

AR'RI-AN, n. [L.] Air; tone.

AR'RI-AN, a. Pertaining to Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, in the fourth century; or to his doctrines.

AR'RI-AN, n. One who adheres to the doctrines of Arius, who held Christ to be a created being, inferior to God the Father in nature and dignity, though the first and noblest of all created beings; and also that the Holy Spirit is not God, but created by the power of the Son. Encyc.

AR'RI-AN-ISM, n. The doctrines of the Arians.

AR'RI-AN-IZE, v. i. To admit the tenets of the Arians. Worthington.

A-RICI-NA, n. A vegetable alkaloid obtained from the bark of a species of Cinchona. It was first brought from Arica, in Peru; whence its name.

AR'ID-AS, n. A kind of taffeta, from the East Indies, made of thread from certain plants. Encyc.

AR'ID-I-TY, n. Dryness; a state of being without AR'ID-NESS, out moisture. Arbuthnot.

2. A dry state of the body; emaciation; the withering of a limb; marasmus. Coxe. Parr.

AR'RI-ES, n. [L., from the Celtic. Ir. reithe, or reacht; Corn. rezt, a ram; W. hwzt, a thrust, a ram.]

The Ram; a constellation of the zodiac, drawn on the globe, in the figure of a ram. Also the first of the twelve signs in the zodiac, which the sun enters about the 21st of March. It originally coincided with the constellation; but, from its recession, owing to the precession of the equinoxes, it now begins in the constellation of Pisces.

2. The battering ram.

AR'IE-TATE, v. i. [L. arieto, from aries.] To butt, as a ram. [Not used.]

AR'IE-TATION, n. The act of butting, as a ram. The act of battering with the aries or battering ram. Bacon.

2. The act of striking or conflicting. [Rarely used.]

AR'IE-TA, n. [It.] A short song; an air, or little air.

A-RIGHT, adv. [a and right. Sax. gericht.] Rightly; in a right form; without mistake or crime.

AR'IL, n. The exterior coat or covering of a A-RIL-LUS, seed, fixed to it at the base only, investing it wholly or partially, and falling off spontaneously; by some former writers called, from the Greek, calyptra. It is either succulent or cartilaginous; colored, elastic, rough, or knotted. Linnaeus. Milne Martyn. Smith.

An expansion of the funiculus, or placenta, about a seed, into a fleshy body, as the mace of a nutmeg. Lindley.

AR'IL-LA-TED, a. Having an exterior covering or AR'IL-LED, aril, as coffee. Encyc. Eaton.

AR'I-MAN, n. [Per. ahriman; Sans. ari, a foe.]

AR'I-MAN, n. The evil genius or demon of the Persians; opposed to zetad, zetad, ormard, or hormitda, the good demon. The ancient magi held, that there are two deities or principles; one the author of all good, eternally absorbed in light; the other, the author of all evil, forever buried in darkness; or the one represented by light, the other by darkness. The latter answers to the loke of the Scandinavians, whose Celtic name, lock, signifies darkness. Originally, the Persians held these demons or principles to be equal, and from all eternity; but the moderns maintain that the evil principle is an inferior being. So the devil is called the prince of darkness. Encyc. Gibbon. As. Researches.

AR-I-O-LA-TION, n. [L. ariolus or ariolus, a HAR-I-O-LA-TION, soothsayer.]

A soothsaying; a foretelling. Brown.

AR'I-ÖSE, a. Characterized by melody, as distinguished from harmony.

Mendelsohn wants the arioso beauty of Handel—vocal melody is not his forte—the interest of his airs is harmonic. Fbr. Qu. Rev.

AR-I-ÖSO, a. [It., from aria, air.] Light; airy. It. Diet.

Literally, in the manner of an air; but in instrumental music, in a sustained vocal style. P. Cyc.

Prefixed to an air, it denotes a sustained, elaborate style, appropriate to the great airs of the opera. Rousseau, Diet. Mus.

A-RISE, v. i. pret. AROSE; pp. ARISEN; (pron. a-rize', a-roze', a-ri-z'n.) [Sax. arisan; D. ryzen; Goth. reisan.]

It may be allied to Ar. (اس) raasa, to be the head or chief; Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. Eth. שׂר head, origin.]

1. To ascend, mount up, or move to a higher place; as, vapors arise from humid places.

2. To emerge from below the horizon; as, the sun or a star arises or rises.

3. To get out of bed; to leave the place or state of rest; or to leave a sitting or lying posture.

The king arose early and went to the den.—Dan. vi.

4. To begin; to spring up; to originate. A persecution arose about Stephen.—Acts xi.

5. To revive from death; to leave the grave. Many bodies of saints arose.—Matt. xxvii.

Figuratively, to awake from a state of sin and stupidity; to repent. Arises from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life.—Eph. v.

6. To begin to act; to exert power; to move from a state of inaction. Let God arise; let his enemies be scattered.—Ps. lxxviii.

7. To appear, or become known; to become visible, sensible, or operative. To you shall the sun of righteousness arise.—Matt. iv. Till the day-star shall arise in your hearts.—3 Pet. i.

8. To be put in motion; to swell or be agitated; as, the waves arise.

9. To be excited or provoked; as, the wrath of the king shall arise.

10. To emerge from poverty, depression, or distress. By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.—Amos ii.

11. To appear in a particular character; to enter upon an office. There arose a new king, who knew not Joseph.—Ex. i.

12. To begin sedition, insurrection, or mutiny; as, the men arose, or rose, upon their officers.

13. To invade, assault, or begin hostility; followed by against. When he arose against me, I caught him by the beard.—1 Sam. xvii.

In this sense, the word against really belongs to the verb, and is necessary to give it this meaning. [See Rise, another form of this verb, which has the same signification, and is more generally used in popular language.]

A-RIS'ING, ppr. Ascending; moving upward; originating, or proceeding from; getting up; springing up; appearing.

A-RIS'TA, n. [L.] In botany, the awn; the pointed beard which issues from the husk or scaly flower-cup of the grasses, called the glume. Milne.

AR-IS-TARCH, n. [from Aristarchus, a critic distinguished for severity among the ancients.] A severe critic. Knowles.

AR-IS-TARCHI-AN, a. Severely critical, like the ancient critic Aristarchus.

AR-IS-TARCH-Y, n. [Gr. apistos, best, and apxv, rule.]

A body of good men in power, or government by excellent men. Harrington.

A-RIS-TATE, a. Awned; having a pointed, beard-like process; as the glumes of wheat.

AR-IS-TO-CRA-CY, n. [Gr. apistos, best, and aristos, to hold or govern.]

1. A form of government, in which the whole supreme power is vested in the principal persons of a state, or in a privileged order. When the supreme power is exercised by a small number, the government is called an oligarchy. The latter word, however, is usually applied to a corrupted form of aristocracy.

2. The nobility or chief persons in a state.

AR-IS-TO-CRAT, or A-RIS'TO-CRAT, n. One who favors an aristocracy in principle or practice; one who is a friend to an aristocratical form of government. Burke.

AR-IS-TO-CRAT'IC, a. Pertaining to aristocracy; consisting in a government of nobles, or principal men; as, an aristocratic constitution.

2. Partaking of aristocracy; as, an aristocratic measure; aristocratic pride or manners.

AR-IS-TO-CRAT'IC-AL-LY, adv. In an aristocratical manner.

AR-IS-TO-CRAT'IC-AL-NESS, n. The quality of being aristocratical.

AR-IS-TO-PHAN'IC, a. Pertaining to Aristophanes. N. A. Rev.

AR-IS-TO-TE-LI-AN, a. Pertaining to Aristotle, a celebrated philosopher, who was born at Stagira, in Macedonia, about 384 years before Christ. The Aristotelian philosophy is otherwise called the peripatetic.

AR-IS-TO-TE-LI-AN, n. A follower of Aristotle, who was a disciple of Plato, and founded the sect of peripatetics. [See PERIPATETIC.]

AR-IS-TO-TE-LI-AN-ISM, n. The philosophy or doctrines of Aristotle.

Divination, or the foretelling of future events by the use or observation of numbers.

A-RITH-ME-TIC, n. [Gr. arithmetos, to number, arithmetikon, the art of numbering, from arithmos, number; from metron, number, rhythm, order, agreement.]

The science of numbers, or the art of computation. The various operations of arithmetic are performed by addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division.

AR-ITH-MET'IC, a. Pertaining to arithmetic.

AR-ITH-MET'IC-AL, a. according to the rules or method of arithmetic.

AR-ITH-MET'IC-AL-LY, adv. According to the rules, principles, or method of arithmetic.

A-RITH-ME-TI'CIAN, n. One skilled in arithmetic, or versed in the science of numbers.

ARK, n. [Fr. arce; L. arca; Sp. Port. It. arca, a chest or coffer; Ir. airg, airk; Sax. erc or erk; G. arke; D. arke; Ch. Arka.]

1. A small, close vessel, chest, or coffer, such as that which was the repository of the tables of the covenant among the Jews. This was about three feet nine inches in length. The lid was the propitiatory, or mercy-seat, over which were the cherubim. The vessel in which Moses was set afloat upon the Nile, was an ark of bulrushes.

2. The large, floating vessel in which Noah and his family were preserved during the deluge.

3. A depository. Arke, O Lord, into thy rest, thou and the ark of thy strength.—Ps. cxxxii.

4. A large boat used on American rivers to transport produce to market.

5. In early English and Scottish writers, a chest or coffer; as, an ark for meal; a bolting ark. Still used, in the north of England, for a chest containing meal. P. Cyc.

ARK'ITE, n. A term used by Bryant to denote one of the persons who were preserved in the ark, or who, according to pagan fables, belonged to the ark.

ARK'TE, a. Belonging to the ark. Bryant. Faber.

ARK'TIZ-TITE, n. A mineral, now called Wernerite; ARCTIZ-TITE, a variety of scapolite.

ARM, n. [Sax. arm, earn; D. G. Sw. Dan. arm; L. armus, an arm, a shoulder, a wing. In lass, a shoulder is rama, which may be the same word as the L. armus. If so, this word belongs to the root Rm, coinciding with L. rotus, a branch, that is, a shoot, like the Celtic braich, L. brachium. But if the L. armus is directly from the Gr. arpos, a joint, it would seem to be formed from Gr. arpo, to fit.]

1. The limb of the human body which extends from the shoulder to the hand.

2. The branch of a tree, or the slender part of a machine, projecting from a trunk or axis. The limbs of animals are also sometimes called arms.

3. An inlet of water from the sea.

4. Figuratively, power, might, strength; as, the secular arm. In this sense the word is often used in the Scriptures.

To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?—Isa. liii.

ARM, v. l. [L. armus; Fr. armér; Sp. armar; It. armare; from L. arma.]

1. To furnish or equip with weapons of offense or defense; as, to arm the militia.

2. To cover with a plate, or with whatever will add strength, force, or security; as, to arm the hill of a sword.

3. To furnish with means of defense; to prepare for resistance; to fortify, in a moral sense.

Arm yourselves with the same mind.—I Pet. iv.

4. To fit up; to furnish with the means of action or effect; as, to arm a hook in angling; to arm a dressing in surgery. To arm a loadstone, is to fit it with an armature.

ARM, v. i. To provide with arms, weapons, or means of attack or resistance; to take arms; as, the nations arm for war.

This verb is not really intransitive in this use, but reflexive, the pronoun being omitted. The nations arm—for, the nations arm themselves.

ARM-MA'DA, n. [Sp., from arma.] A fleet of arm'd ships; a squadron. The term is usually applied to the Spanish fleet called the Invencible Armada, consisting of 130 ships, intended to act against England, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1588.

ARM-MA-DIL'LO, n. [Sp.; so called from being armed with a horse shell.]

A name given by the Spaniards to the different species of quadrupeds, belonging to the Linnaean genus Desypus; peculiar to South America, and called by the Portuguese encuberto, from their peculiar covering, and by the natives of Brazil laton. These animals have only molar teeth, and are covered with a hard, bony shell, divided into movable belts, except on the forehead, shoulders, and haunches, where it is not movable. The belts are connected by a membrane, which enables the animal to roll itself up like a hedgehog. These animals burrow in the earth, where they lie during the daytime, seldom going abroad except at night. They are of different sizes; the largest more than three feet in length, without the tail. They subsist chiefly on fruits, roots, and insects; sometimes on flesh. When attacked, they roll themselves into a ball, presenting their armor on all sides to any assailant; but they are inoffensive, and their flesh is esteemed good food. Encyc.

ARM-A-MENT, n. [L. armamenta, utensils, tackle, from arma.]

1. A body of forces equipped for war; used of a land or naval force. It is more generally used of a naval force.

2. In naval affairs, the guns and other munitions of war with which a ship is armed.

ARM-A-MENT'ARY, n. An armory; a magazine or arsenal. [Rarely used.]

ARMATURE, n. [L. armatura.]

1. Armor; that which defends the body. It comprehends whatever is worn for defense of the body, and has been sometimes used for offensive weapons. Armature, like arms and armor, is used also of the furniture of animals and vegetables, evidently intended for their protection, as prickles, spines, and horns.

2. In ancient military art, an exercise performed with missile weapons, as darts, spears, and arrows. Encyc.

3. The armature of a magnet, is a piece of iron used to connect the two poles, in order to maintain the magnetic power undiminished.

Formerly, the armature or armor of a magnet consisted of two pieces of iron applied to the poles of a parallelepipedal magnet, so as to project, and partly inclose the magnet on one side, and thus give to the poles a direction perpendicular to their original direction. Each of these pieces was called the armature of its respective pole, and the two together the armature of the magnet. In order to preserve the power of a magnet so armed, and to combine the action of the two poles, the latter were connected by a piece of iron, which also served as an armature. Horse-shoe magnets have been substituted for such armed magnets, and the term armature has been thus limited to the piece of iron connecting the poles. Ed. Encyc. Enfield.

ARM-CHAIR, n. A chair with arms to support the elbows.

ARM'ED, (armed) pp. or a.

1. Furnished with weapons of offense or defense; furnished with the means of security; fortified, in a moral sense.

2. In heraldry, armed is when the beaks, talons, horns, or feet of birds and beasts of prey are of a different color from the rest of the body. Chambers.

3. Furnished or fitted with an armature, as a magnet or loadstone.

4. In botany, having prickles or thorns. Encyc.

An armed ship, is one which is taken into the service of government for a particular occasion, and armed like a ship of war.

Armed in flute. A ship is armed in flute, i. e., after the manner of a transport, when part of her guns have been taken out for the sake of making room, and her effective armament is thus reduced below that at which she rates.

ARM'ED-CHAIR, n. See ARM-CHAIR.

AR-MÉ'NI-AN, n. A native of Armenia; or the language of the country. Sir W. Jones.

AR-MÉ'NI-AN, a. Pertaining to Armenia; a country, and formerly a kingdom, in Asia, divided into Armenia Major and Minor.

Armenian bole, is a species of clay from Armenia, and found in other countries. But the term, being of uncertain signification, is rejected in modern mineralogy. [See BOLE.] Cronstedt. Kirron.

Armenian stone is a soft, blue stone, consisting of calcareous earth or gypsum, with the oxyd of copper. It is too soft to give fire with steel, loses its color when heated, and does not admit of a polish. Nicholson.

ARM'HOLE, n. [arm and hole.] The cavity under the shoulder, or the armpit. Bacon.

2. A hole for the arm in a garment.

ARM'U-GER, n. [L. armiger; arma and gero; literally, one that bears arms.]

An esquire; a knight's companion. But in present usage, armiger is a title of dignity next in degree to a knight. In times of chivalry, it signified an attendant on a knight, or other person of rank, who bore his shield, and rendered him other military services. So in antiquity, Abimelech, Saul, &c., had their armor-bearers. Judg. i. I Sam. xvi. As had Hector and Achilles. Homer. This title, under the Norman French princes, in England, was exchanged, in common usage, for esquire, Fr. ecuyer, a word of similar import, from ecu, L. scutum, a shield. Armiger is still retained with us as a title of respect, being the Latin word equivalent to esquire, which see. Spelman.

AR-MIG'ER-OUS, a. Bearing arms.

ARM'IL-LA-RY, a. [L. armilla, a bracelet, from arma, the arm.]

Resembling a bracelet, or ring; consisting of rings or circles. The armillary sphere is an artificial sphere, composed of a number of circles of the mundane sphere, put together in their natural order, to assist in giving a just conception of the constitution of the heavens, and the motions of the celestial bodies. This artificial sphere revolves upon its axis within a horizon, divided into degrees, and movable every way upon a brass support. Encyc.

ARM'IL-LA-TED, a. Furnished with bracelets.

ARM'ING, pp. Equipping with arms; providing with the means of defense or attack, preparing for resistance, in a moral sense; fitting with an armature, as a magnet.

AR-MIN'IAN, a. Pertaining to Arminius, or designating his principles.

AR-MIN'IAN, n. One of a sect or party of Christians, so called from Arminius, or Hermaansen, of Holland, who flourished at the close of the 16th century and beginning of the 17th. The Arminian doctrine are, 1. Conditional election and reprobation, in opposition to absolute predestination. 2. Universal redemption, or that the atonement was made by Christ for all mankind, though none but believers can be partakers of the benefit. 3. That man, in order to exercise true faith, must be regenerated and renewed by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God; but that this grace is not irresistible, and may be lost; so that men may relapse from a state of grace, and die in their sins. Encyc.

AR-MIN'IAN-ISM, n. The peculiar doctrine or tenets of the Arminians.

ARM-IP'O-TENCE, n. [arma and potentia. See POTENCY.] Power in arms. Johnson.

ARM-IP'O-TENT, a. Powerful in arms; mighty in battle. Dryden.

ARM-IS'O-NOUS, a. [arma and sonus. See SONUS.] Sounding or rustling in arms. Johnson.

ARM-IS-TICE, n. [L. arma and sisto, to stand still; Gr. ιστημι; Sp. armistico; It. armistizio; Fr. armistice.]

A cessation of arms, for a short time, by convention; a truce; a temporary suspension of hostilities by agreement of the parties.

ARM'LESS, a. Without an arm; destitute of weapons. Beaumont & Fletcher.

ARM'LET, n. [dim. of arm.] A small arm; as, an armlet of the sea; a piece of armor for the arm; a bracelet. Dryden. Johnson.

ARM'OR, n. [from arm.]

1. Defensive arms; any habit worn to protect the body in battle; formerly called harness. A complete armor formerly consisted of a casque or helmet, a gorget, cuirass, gauntlets, tasses, brassets, coishes, and covers for the legs, to which the spurs were fastened. Encyc.

In English statutes, armor is used for the whole apparatus of war; including offensive as well as defensive arms. The statutes of armor directed that arms every man should provide, 27 Hen. II., and that of Westminster, 13 Edw. I. Hence armor includes all instruments of war.

Blackstone, b. iv. ch. 7; b. i. ch. 13. Hen. Hist. Brit b. iii. ch. 1.

2. In a spiritual sense, a good conscience, faith, and Christian graces are called armor. Rom. xiii. Eph. vi. 2 Cor. vi.

Coat armor, is the escutcheon of a person or family, with its several charges and other furniture, as a mantling, crest, supporters, motto, &c. Encyc.

Armor of a magnet is the same as armature. Ed. Enc.

ARM'OR-BEAR'ER, n. One who carries the armor of another.

ARM'OR-ER, n.

1. A maker of armor or arms; a manufacturer of instruments of war. The armorers of a ship has the charge of the arms, to see that they are in a condition fit for service.

2. One who has care of the arms and armor of another, and who dresses him in armor.

In England, and other European countries, a public establishment where naval or military engines and equipments are manufactured or stored. P. Cyc.

AR-SE-NI-ATE, n. A salt, formed by arsenic acid combined with any base.

AR-SEN-IC, n. [Ar. زرنق zirnaku; Syr. زرنق zarnika; Gr. arsenikon; L. arsenicum; Sp. arsenic; Fr. arsenic.]

Arsenic is a metal of a steel gray color, and brilliant luster, and quite brittle. It forms alloys with most of the metals. Combined with sulphur, it forms orpiment and realgar, which are the yellow and red sulphurets of arsenic. Orpiment is the true arsenicum of the ancients. Plin. 34. 13. Native orpiment appears in yellow, brilliant, and seemingly tawky masses of various sizes; realgar is red, of different shades, and often crystallized in needles. Arsenic is also found as a mineralizer in cobalt, antimony, copper, iron and silver ores. It is brought chiefly from the cobalt works in Saxony, where zaffer is made.

The substance known as arsenic, in the shops, is the arsenious acid, called also oxyd of arsenic and white arsenic. Fourcroy, Nicholson.

AR-SEN-IC ACID, n. An acid composed of two equivalents of arsenic and five of oxygen.

AR-SEN-IC-AL, a. Belonging to arsenic; consisting of or containing arsenic.

AR-SEN-IC-ATE, v. t. To combine with arsenic.

AR-SEN-IC-TED, pp. or a. Combined with arsenic.

AR-SEN-ITE, n. A salt formed by the arsenious acid with a base.

AR-SEN-I-OUS, a. Pertaining to, consisting of, or containing arsenic; as, arsenious powder, or glass. Ure.

AR-SEN-I-OUS ACID, n. An acid composed of two equivalents of arsenic and three of oxygen.

ARSHINE, n. A Russian measure of two feet four inches and 242 decimals. This seems to be the Chinese arschin, of which four make three yards English. Tooke's Russia. Encyc.

AR-SIS, n. [Gr.] In prosody, that point in a measure where the ictus is put, or which is marked by a greater stress or force. Hermann.

That elevation of voice now called metrical accentuation, accompanied by the ictus, or stroke of the foot, marking it. It is uncertain whether the arsis consisted in a higher musical note, greater volume, or longer duration of sound, or in all combined. P. Cyc.

2. In music, the rising of the hand in beating time. P. Cyc.

AR-SON, n. [Norm. Fr. arsinc, arsen; from L. ardeo, arsum, to burn.]

In law, the malicious burning of a dwelling-house or out-house of another man, which by the common law is felony. The definition of this crime is varied by statutes in different countries and states. In Connecticut, the burning not only of a dwelling-house or contiguous building, but of a ship or other vessel, is declared to be arson, if human life is thereby destroyed or put to hazard.

ART; the second person, indicative mode, present tense, of the substantive verb ars; but from ars, Sw. arsa, Dan. ars.

ART, n. [L. ars, artis; probably contracted from the root of V. ars, ir. eard. The radical sense is stretching, from stretching, straining, the primary sense of strength and power, and hence of skill. See an analogy in can.]

1. The disposition or modification of things by human skill, to answer the purpose intended. In this sense art stands opposed to nature. Bacon. Encyc.

2. A system of rules, serving to facilitate the performance of certain actions; opposed to science, or to speculative principles; as, the art of building or engraving. Arts are divided into useful or mechanic, and liberal or polite. The mechanic arts are those in which the hands and body are more concerned than the mind, as in making clothes and utensils. These arts are called trades. The liberal or polite arts are those in which the mind or imagination is chiefly concerned, as poetry, music, and painting.

In America, literature and the elegant arts must grow up side by side with the coarser plants of daily necessity. Irving.

3. Business or employment; as, the various arts of life. Swift.

4. Skill, dexterity, or the power of performing certain actions, acquired by experience, study, or observation; as, a man has the art of managing his business to advantage.

5. Cunning; artifice; as, "Animals practice art when opposed to their superiors in strength." Crabbe.

6. Formerly, in an academical sense, the arts, or the liberal arts, denoted the sciences and philosophy, or the circle of academical education; hence, degrees in the arts; master and bachelor of arts.

Art and part; in Scott's law, a term denoting the charge of contriving a criminal design as well as of participating in the perpetration of the criminal act; said to be an abbreviation of the Latin artifex et particeps.

AR-TE-MIS-TA, n. A genus of plants of numerous species, including the plants called mugwort, south-wood, and wormwood. Of these the A. Absinthium, or common wormwood, is well known.

AR-TE-RI-AL, a. [See ARTERY.] Pertaining to an artery or the arteries; as, arterial action.

2. Contained in an artery; as, arterial blood.

Arterial blood differs from venous blood particularly by its lighter florid red color, and its greater warmth and coagulability—changes produced by the process of respiration.

AR-TE-RI-AL-IZ-A-TION, n. The process of making arterial. Watts.

AR-TE-RI-AL-IZE, v. t. To communicate, as to venous blood, the qualities of arterial blood; to make arterial. Prout.

AR-TE-RI-AL-IZE-ED, pp. or a. Made arterial.

AR-TE-RI-AL-IZ-ING, pp. Rendering arterial.

AR-TE-RI-OL-O-GY, n. [Gr. αρτηρία, artery, and λογος, discourse.]

A treatise or discourse on the arteries. Moria.

AR-TE-RI-O-TOMY, n. [Gr. αρτηρία, an artery, and τομή, a cutting.]

1. The opening of an artery by a lancet, or other instrument for the purpose of letting blood.

2. That part of anatomy which treats of the dissection of the arteries.

AR-TE-RY, n. [Gr. αρτηρία, from αἴρ, air, and τερος, to preserve or contain; so called, from the opinion of the ancients, that the arteries contain only air. The term was also applied to the trachea or windpipe, arteria aspera. In Ger. luft-ader, air-vein, is the name for artery; in Dutch, slag-ader, stroke-vein; in Swed. puls-ader, pulse-vein; Dan. puls-are, pulse-vein; that is, the beating vein.]

A term applied to the vessels or tubes which convey the blood from the heart to all parts of the body. There are two principal arteries; the aorta, which rises from the left ventricle, and ramifies through the whole body; and the pulmonary artery, which conveys the blood from the right ventricle to the lungs, to undergo respiration. An artery is composed of three coats; the outer consists of condensed cellular membrane, and is supplied with numerous blood-vessels and nerves; the middle coat consists of circular fibers, formerly supposed by some to be muscular, but now regarded as a peculiar fibrous tissue; the inner coat, thin, smooth, and dense, confines the blood within its canal, and facilitates its motion. Parr. Cyc.

AR-TE-SIAN, a. [from Artis, in France.]

Artesian wells are those which are made by boring into the earth, till the instrument reaches water, which, from internal pressure, flows spontaneously like a fountain.

AR-TIFUL, a. [See ART.]

1. Performed with art or skill. Dryden.

2. Artificious, as opposed to natural. Johnson.

3. Cunning; practicing art, or stratagem; crafty; as, an artful boy. [This is the most usual sense.]

4. Proceeding from art or craft; as, an artful scheme.

AR-TIFUL-LY, adv. With art, or cunning; skillfully; dextrously.

AR-TIFUL-NESS, n. Art; craft; cunning; address.

AR-THRITIC, a.

1. Pertaining to the joints; affecting the joints.

2. Pertaining to the gout; gouty.

AR-THRITIS, n. [Gr. αρθριτις; from αρθρον, a joint.]

In a general sense, any inflammation of the joints; but more particularly, the gout, an hereditary, intermitting disease, usually affecting the small joints; sometimes the stomach. Coxe. Quincy.

AR-THRO-DIA, n. [from αρθρον, to frame or articulate.]

1. In anatomy, a species of articulation, in which the head of one bone is received into the shallow socket of another; as that of the humerus into the glenoid cavity of the scapula. Encyc.

2. In natural history, a genus of imperfect crystals, found in complex masses, and forming long single pyramids, with very short and slender columns. Encyc.

AR-THROD'IC, a. Relating to arthrodia, which see. ARTIC. This word is erroneously used by some authors for artetic.

AR-TI-CHOKE, n. [Qu. the first syllable of Gr. αρθρον. Fr. artichaut; Arm. artichauden; Sp. alcachofa; Port. alcahofo; It. carciofo, carciofano, or carciofalo. The first syllable is probably the L. carduus, chard, thistle, corrupted. D. artisojok; G. artischoke; Dan. artiskok.]

The Cynara Scolymus, a plant somewhat resembling a thistle, with a dilated, lubricated and prickly calyx. The head is large, rough, and scaly, on an upright stalk. It is composed of numerous oval scales, inclosing the florets, sitting on a broad receptacle, which, with the fleshy base of the scales, is the eatable part of the plant. Encyc. Miller.

The Jerusalem artichoke is a species of sunflower, (Helianthus tuberosus.) This is the plant commonly called artichoke, in America. The term Jerusalem is here a corruption of the Ital. girasole, sunflower. AR-TI-CLE, n. [L. articulus, a joint, from artus; Gr. αρθρον.]

1. A single clause in a contract, account, system of regulations, treaty, or other writing; a particular separate charge or item in an account; a term, condition, or stipulation in a contract. In short, a distinct part of a writing, instrument, or discourse, consisting of two or more particulars; as, articles of agreement; an account consisting of many articles.

2. A point of faith; a doctrinal point or proposition in theology; as, the thirty-nine articles.

3. Comprehension; as, a soul of great article. Shak.

4. A distinct part.

Upon each article of human duty. Paley.

5. A particular commodity, or substance; as, an article of merchandise; salt is a necessary article. In common usage, this word is applied to almost every separate substance or material.

The articles which compose the blood. Darwin.

6. A point of time. [Not in use.] Clarendon.

7. In grammar, an adjective used before nouns, to limit or define their application; as, hic, ille, ipse, in Latin; δ, ὅ, ὅ, το, in Greek; the, this, that, in English; le, la, les, in French; il, la, lo, in Italian. The primary use of these adjectives was to convert an indeterminate name into a determinate one; or to limit the application of a common name to a specific, known, or certain individual. But article being an improper term to express the true signification, I make use of definitive, which see.

In the article of death, [L. in articulo mortis]; literally, in the moment of death; in the last struggle or agony.

Articles of war; the code or regulations for the government of the army in Great Britain, and of the army and navy in the United States.

Articles of the navy the code or regulations for the government of the navy in Great Britain.

Lords of articles in Scottish history, a committee of the parliament, whose business was to prepare and digest all matters that were to be laid before it, including the preparation of all bills for laws; called also lords articulares. Robertson.

AR-TI-CLE, v. t.

2. To accuse or charge by an exhibition of articles. "He shall be articled against in the High Court of Admiralty." Stat. 33 Geo. III.

3. To bind by articles of covenant or stipulation; as, to article an apprentice to a mechanic.

AR-TI-CLE, v. i. [Supra.] To agree by articles; to stipulate. Donne.

AR-TI-CLED, pp. Drawn up in particulars; accused or bound by articles.

AR-TIC'U-LAR, a. [L. articularis.]

Belonging to the joints; as, the gout is an articular disease.

AR-TIC'U-LAR-LY, adv. So as to sound every letter.

AR-TIC'U-LA'TA, n. pl. [L.] The name of a division of the animal kingdom, characterized by a series of annulations or rings, corresponding to the internal skeleton of the vertebrated animals. This division includes the Annelida, or worms; the Crustacea, or crab-like animals; the Arachnida, or spider-like animals; and the Insecta, or proper insects.

AR-TIC'U-LATE, a. [L. articulatus, jointed, distinct.]

1. Formed by jointing or articulation of the organs of speech; applied to sound. An articulate sound is made by closing and opening the organs of speech. The junction or closing of the organs forms a joint or articulation, as in the syllables ab, ad, ap; in passing from one articulation to another, the organs are, or may be, opened, and a vowel is uttered, as in attune; and the different articulations, with the intervening vocal sounds, form what is called articulate sounds; sounds distinct, separate, and modified by articulation or jointing. This articulation constitutes the prominent difference between the human voice and that of brutes. Brutes open the mouth and make vocal sounds, but have either not at all, or very imperfectly, the power of articulation.

2. Clear; distinct; as, articulate pronunciation.

3. Expressed in articles, or in separate particulars. [Not used.] Bacon.

4. In natural history, jointed; formed with joints. AR-TIC'U-LATE, v. t. To utter articulate sounds; to utter distinct syllables or words; as, to articulate distinctly.

AR-TIC'U-LATE, v. t.

1. To form into elementary sounds; to form into distinct syllables, or words; as, to articulate letters or language.

2. To draw up or write in separate particulars. [Not used.] Shak.

3. To treat, stipulate, or make terms. [Not used.] Shak. Smith.

4. To joint.

1. Uttered distinctly in syllables or words.

2. Jointed; having joints; as a plant or animal.

AR-TIC'U-LATE-LY, adv.

1. With distinct utterance of syllables or words.

2. Article by article; in detail. Paley.

AR-TIC'U-LATE-NESS, n. The quality of being articulate.

AR-TIC'U-LA-TING, pp. Uttering in distinct syllables or words.

AR-TIC'U-LA-TION, n.

1. In anatomy, the joining or juncture of the bones. This is of three kinds: 1st, diarthrosis, or a movable connection, including enarthrosis, or the ball and socket joint; arthradia, which is the same, but more superficial; ginglymus, or hinge-like joint; and trochoid, or the wheel and axle; 2d, synarthrosis, immoveable connection, as by suture, or junction by serrated margins; harmony, or union by straight margins; and gomphosis, like a nail driven in a board, as the teeth in their sockets; 3d, symphysis, or union by means of another substance; as synchondrosis, union by a cartilage; syssarcosis, union by muscular fibers; synostosis, union by tendons; syndesmosis, union by ligaments; and synostosis, union by a bony substance. Quincy. Coxe.

2. In botany, a term applied to the connection of the parts of a plant by joints, as in pods; also, to the nodes or joints, as in cane and maize; and to the parts intercepted between the joints. Encyc.

3. The forming of words; a distinct utterance of syllables and words by the human voice, by means of closing and opening the organs.

4. A consonant; a letter noting a jointing or closing of the organs.

AR-TI-FICE, n. [L. artificium, from ars, art, and facio, to make.]

1. Artful contrivance; an artful or ingenious device, in a good or bad sense. In a bad sense, it corresponds with trick, or fraud.

2. Art; trade; skill acquired by science or practice. [Not used.]

AR-TI-FICER, n. [L. artifex, from ars and facio.]

1. An artist; a mechanic or manufacturer; one whose occupation requires skill or knowledge of a particular kind, as a silversmith or saddler.

2. One who makes or contrives; an inventor; as, an artificer of fraud or lies. Milton.

3. A cunning or artful fellow. [Not used.] Ben Jonson.

AR-TI-FI'CIAL, (art-e-fish'al), a. Made or contrived by art, or by human skill and labor, in opposition to natural; as, artificial heat or light; an artificial magnet.

2. Feigned; fictitious; not genuine or natural; as, artificial tears.

3. Contrived with skill or art.

4. Cultivated; not indigenous; not being of spontaneous growth; as, artificial grasses. Gibbon.

Artificial arguments, in rhetoric, are arguments invented by the speaker, in distinction from laws, authorities, and the like, which are called artificial arguments or proofs. Johnson.

Artificial lines, on a sector or scale, are lines so contrived as to represent the logarithmic sines and tangents, which, by the help of the line of numbers, solve, with tolerable exactness, questions in trigonometry, navigation, &c.

Artificial numbers; the same with logarithms. Chambers. Encyc.

AR-TI-FI'CI-AL-I-TY, n. The quality of being artificial; appearance of art. Shenstone.

AR-TI-FI'CI-AL-LY, adv. By art, or human skill and contrivance; hence, with good contrivance; with art or ingenuity.

AR-TI-FI'CI-AL-NESS, n. The quality of being artificial.

AR-TIL'LE-RIST, n. A person skilled in gunnery.

AR-TIL'LE-RY, n. This word has no plural. [Fr. artillerie; It. artiglieria; Sp. artilleria. In Fr. artilleur, artilleur, is a matross; Sp. artillero, to mount cannon. In Armoric, artillery is artihery, and an artist is artiller. In Norm. Fr. artillery is written artiliarie. The Armoric unites this word with art, artist, indicating that the primary sense is, instruments, things formed by art, or rather prepared by art, preparations.]

1. In a general sense, offensive weapons of war. Hence it was formerly used for bows and arrows.

And Jonathan gave his artillery to his lad. — 1 Sam. xx.

But in present usage, appropriately,
2. Cannon; great guns; ordnance, including guns, mortars, howitzers, &c., with their furniture of carriages, balls, bombs, and shot of all kinds, and also rockets and grenades.

3. In a more extended sense, the word includes the powder, cartridges, matches, utensils, machines of all kinds, and horses, that belong to a train of artillery.

4. The men who manage cannon and mortars, including matrosses, gunners, bombardiers, cannoniers, or by whatever name they are called, with the officers and engineers, and the persons who supply the artillery with implements and materials. Eneyc.

5. The science of artillery and gunnery. Campbell's Mil. Dict.

AR-TIL-LE-RY-MAN, n. A man who manages a large gun in firing.

ART-I-SAN, n. [Fr., from L. ars. See ART.]
1. One trained to manual dexterity in any art, mystery, or trade.

2. A handicraftsman; a mechanic.

ART-IST, n. [Fr. artiste; L. artista; from L. ars. See ART.]
1. In a general sense, one who is skilled in the practice of some art. Dryden.

2. Appropriately, in present usage, one who professes and practices one of the liberal arts, in which science and taste preside over the manual execution. It is thus that the artist is distinguished from the artisan, who follows mechanically the rules of his handicraft or art. The term is particularly applied to painters, sculptors, engravers, and architects. Elmes.

AR-TY-STE, (Ar-teest'), n. [Fr.] A term of very extensive application among the French, to denote one who is peculiarly dextrous and tasteful in almost any art, as an opera dancer, and even a hair-dresser or a cook. This term should not be confounded with the English word artist.

ART-IST'IC, {a. [from artist.] Pertaining to an artist; conformable to art; regular.

ART-IST'IC-AL-LY, adv. In an artistic manner.

ART-LESS, a. Unskilful; wanting art, knowledge, or skill. Dryden.

2. Free from guile, art, craft, or stratagem; simple; sincere; unaffected; undesigning; as, an artless mind.

3. Contrived without skill or art; as, an artless tale.

ART-LESS-LY, adv. Without art or skill; in an artless manner.

2. Without guile; naturally; sincerely; unaffectedly. Pope.

ART-LESS-NESS, n. The quality of being void of art or guile; simplicity; sincerity; unaffectedness.

ART-TO-TY-RITE, n. [of Gr. artos, bread, and typos, cheese.]

One of a sect of heretics, in the primitive church, who celebrated the eucharist with bread and cheese, alleging that the first oblations of men were not only of the fruit of the earth, but of their flocks. They admitted females to the priesthood and episcopacy. Eneyc.

ARTS'-MAN, n. A learned man. [Obs.] Shak.

AR-UN-DEL-IAN, a. Pertaining to Arundel; as, Arundelian marbles. The Arundelian marbles are ancient stones, containing a chronological detail of the principal events of Greece, from Cecrops, who lived about 1532 years before Christ, to the archonship of Diognetus, before Christ 264. The engraving was done in Peros, and the chronology is called the Parian Chronicle. These stones are called Arundelian, from the earl of Arundel, who employed William Petty to procure relics of antiquity in the East, in 1624. These, with other curiosities, were purchased, and by the earl's grandson presented to the University of Oxford. Their antiquity and even their authenticity have been questioned. Eneyc.

A-RUN-DIN-A-CEOUS, a. [L. arundo, a reed.]

Pertaining to a reed; resembling the reed or cane.

AR-UN-DIN'-E-OUS, a. Abounding with reeds.

A-R-O'-RA, n. [Gr. arura.] Literally, as authors suppose, a plowed field. According to Herodotus and Suidas, the arura of Egypt was a piece of ground fifty feet square. Others make it a square of 100 cubits; others of 100 feet. The Grecian arura was a square measure of half the plethron. [See AROURA.] Eneyc. Herod., Eutrope.

A-RUS'-PEX, n. [L.] A soothsayer. Dryden.

A-RUS'-PICE, n. Written also Ilaruspice. [L. aruspez, or haruspex, a soothsayer, or diviner, who attempted to foretell events by consulting the entrails of beasts slain in sacrifice. Qu. Teut. orf. yfj; Eth. ἰλϙ aruse, cattle, and L. quico, to view.]

A priest, in ancient Rome, whose business was to inspect the entrails of victims killed in sacrifice, and by them to foretell future events.

A-RUS'-PI-CY, n. The act of prognosticating by inspection of the entrails of beasts slain in sacrifice. Butler. Grose.

AR-VEL, n. A funeral.

AS, (az), adv. [Pers. asa, like, similar, as; Gr. ὡς; Qu. Fr. aussi. But more probably the English word is contracted from als, G. and D. It corresponds in sense with the Persian.]

1. Literally, like; even; similar. "Ye shall be as Gods, knowing good and evil." "As far as we can see," that is, like far, equally far. Hence it may be explained by in like manner; as, do as you are commanded.

2. It was formerly used where we now use that. [Obs.]

The relations are so uncertain as they require a great deal of examination. Bacon.

3. It was formerly used for as if. [Obs.]
He lies, as be his bilis did know. Waller.

4. While; during; at the same time. "He trembled as he spoke." But in most of its uses, it is resolvable into like, equal, even, or equally, in like manner. In some phrases, it must be considered a nominative word, or other words must be supplied. "Appoint to office such men as deserve public confidence." This phrase may be elliptical for "such men as those who deserve public confidence."

As seems, in some cases, to imply the sense of proportion. "In general, men are more happy, as they are less involved in public concerns."

As, in a subsequent part of a sentence, answers to such; give us such things as you please; and in a preceding part of a sentence, has so to answer to it; as with the people, as with the priest.

AS, n. [L.] A Roman weight of twelve ounces, answering to the libra or pound.

2. A Roman coin, originally of a pound weight; but reduced, after the first Punic war, to two ounces; in the second Punic war, to one ounce; and by the Papirian law, to half an ounce. It was originally stamped with the figure of a sheep, sow, or ox; and afterward with a Janus, on one side, and on the reverse, a rostrum or prow of a ship.

3. An integer; a whole or single thing. Hence the English ace. Hence the Romans used the word for the whole inheritance; hæres æs æsse, an heir to the whole estate. Eneyc.

AS'A, a corruption of asar, an ancient name of a gum. Literally, the healer; from the Hebrew asa, a physician or healer. Par. [See OSAZ.] Eneyc.

AS-A-DUL-CIS, the same as BERZON.

AS-A-FET'I-DA, n. [asa, gum, and L. felidus, fetid.] id.
A fetid inspissated sap, from Persia and the East Indies. It is the concrete juice of a large umbelliferous plant, the Perula assafetida, much used in medicine, as an antispasmodic. Eneyc.

AS-A-RIN, n. A crystallized substance, resembling camphor, obtained from the Asarum Europeanum; now called camphor of asarum.

AS-BES-TI-FORM, a. Having the structure of asbestos.

AS-BES-TINE, a. [See ASBESTUS.] Pertaining to asbestos, of partaking of its nature and qualities; incombustible.

AS-BES-TIN-ITE, n. [See ASBESTUS.] The actinolite or strahlstein. Kirwan.

Calciferous asbestinite; a variety of actinolite, partially efflorescing. Kirwan.

AS-BES-TUS, n. [Gr. αβειστος, inextinguishable; AS-BES-TOS, ἄ of a neg. and βειστος, to extinguish.]

A term applied to varieties of hornblende and pyroxene, occurring in long, delicate fibers; usually of a white or gray color, and also in compact fibrous masses and seams, of greenish and reddish shades. The finer varieties have been wrought into gloves and cloth, which are incombustible. The cloth was formerly used as a shroud for dead bodies, and has been recommended for firemen's clothes. Asbestos is also employed in the manufacture of iron safes, and for lamp-wicks. Dana.

Ligniform asbestos is a variety of a brown color, and of a slaty or splintery fracture, and if broken across, presents an irregular, filamentous structure, like wood. Kirwan.

AS-BO-LIN, n. [Gr. αββόλη.] A yellow, oil-like matter, very acrid and bitter, obtained from soot.

AS-CA-RIS, n.; pl. AS-CA-RI-ONS. [Gr.] In zoology, a genus of intestinal worms. The body is cylindrical, and tapering at the ends.

ASC-EN-D', v. i. [L. ascendo, from scando, to mount or climb; W. esgyn, to rise; cyn, first, chief. It has the same elements as begin.]
1. To move upward; to mount; to go up; to rise, whether in air or water, or upon a material object.

2. To rise, in a figurative sense; to proceed from an inferior to a superior degree, from mean to noble objects, from particulars to generals, &c.

3. To proceed from modern to ancient times; to recur to former ages; as, our inquiries ascend to the remotest antiquity.

4. In a corresponding sense, to proceed in a line toward ancestors; as, to ascend to our first progenitors.

5. To rise, as a star; to proceed or come above the horizon.

6. In music, to rise in vocal utterance; to pass from any note to one more acute.

ASC-EN-D', v. t. To go or move upward upon; as, to ascend a hill or ladder; — or to climb; as, to ascend a tree.

ASC-EN-D'A-BLE, a. That may be ascended.

ASC-EN-D'ANT, n. Superiority, or commanding influence; as, one man has the ascendant over another.

2. An ancestor, or one who precedes in genealogy, or degrees of kindred; opposed to descendant.

3. High; elevation. [Little used.] Temple.

4. In astrology, the horoscope, or that degree of the ecliptic which rises above the horizon at the time of one's birth; supposed to have influence on a person's life and fortune. Eneyc.

That one of the twelve houses of heaven, which at any time is about to rise; called also the first house. That point of the ecliptic, included in it, which is just rising, is called the horoscope, and the planet, or other heavenly body, which rules in the house, is called lord of the ascendant. The ascendant is considered the strongest house, and is supposed to exercise an especial influence on the fortune of a person born at the time. P. Cyc.

Hence the phrases to be in the ascendant, denoting, to have commanding power or influence, and lord of the ascendant, denoting one who has possession of such power or influence; as, to rule, for a while, lord of the ascendant. Burke.

ASC-EN-D'ANT, a. Superior; predominant; surpassing.

2. The wood of the ash-tree.

ASH, a. Pertaining to or like the ash; made of ash.

ASH, v. t. To strow or sprinkle with ashes; as, to ash the hair. Honeel.

2. To strow with ashes for the purpose of manure.

A-SHAME', v. t. To shame. [Not used.]

A-SHAM'ED, a. [from Sax. ascamian or ascamian, to be ashamed, to blush, from ascam, shame; originally a participle. See SHAME.]

1. Affected by shame; abashed or confused by guilt, or a conviction of some criminal action or inconsiderate conduct, or by the exposure of some gross error or misconduct, which the person is conscious must be wrong, and which tends to impair his honor or reputation. It is followed by of.

Thou shalt remember thy ways, and be ashamed. — Ex. xvi. Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel. — Hocca xx.

2. Confused by a consciousness of guilt or inferiority, by the mortification of pride, by failure or disappointment.

They shall be greatly ashamed that trust in imagina. — Isa. xlii.

[This adjective always follows its noun.]

A-SHAM'ED-LY, adv. Bashfully. [Not used.]

ASH'Y-PALE, a. Pale as ashes.

AS'IA, n. One of the four quarters of the globe. [A name originally given to Asia Minor or some part of it; perhaps from the Asses, Ases, or Osces, about Mount Taurus. Mallet, North. Ant. i. 60. Pliny.] AS'IAN, a. Pertaining to Asia. Dryden. Mitford.

AS'IA-KEH, (a'she-ark) n. [Asia and αρχος, chief.] A term applied to the chiefs or pontiffs of Proconular Asia, who had the superintendance of the public games. Acts xix.

AS-IA-T'IC, (a-she-at'ik) a. Belonging to Asia; a quarter of the globe which extends from the Strait of Constantinople and the Arabian Gulf to the Pacific Ocean on the east. It is probable the name was originally appropriated to what is now Asia Minor, or rather a part of it.

AS-IA-T'IC, n. A native of Asia.

AS-IA-T'IC-ISM, n. Imitation of the Asiatic manner.

A-SIDE', adv. [a and side. See SIDE.]

1. On or to one side; out of a perpendicular or straight direction.

2. At a little distance from the main part or body. Thou shalt set aside that which is full. — 2 Kings iv.

3. From the body; as, to put or lay aside a garment. John xiii.

4. From the company; at a small distance, or in private; as when speakers utter something by themselves, upon the stage.

5. Separate from the person, mind, or attention; in a state of abandonment.

Let us lay aside every weight. — Heb. xli.

6. Out of the line of rectitude or propriety, in a moral view.

They are all gone aside. — Pa. xiv.

7. In a state of separation to a particular use; as, to set aside a thing for a future day.

To set aside, in judicial proceedings, is to defeat the effect or operation of, by a subsequent decision of a superior tribunal; as, to set aside a verdict or a judgment.

AS-IN'E-GO, n. [Sp. asico, a little ass.] A foolish fellow. Mason.

AS'I-NINE, rarely AS'I-NA-RY, a. [L. asinus; W. asyn, the ass.]

Belonging to the ass; having the qualities of the ass.

ASK, v. t. [Sax. ascian, ascian, or arian; D. cischen; G. heischen; Ir. ascain; Gr. αἰσῶ. Qu. Eth. ἄσῶ, asku, to pray or beseech. In former times, the English word was pronounced az, as in the royal style of assenting to bills in parliament. "Be it as it is azed." In Calmuc, asce signifies to inquire. The sense is to urge or press.]

1. To request; to seek to obtain by words; to petition; with of, in the sense of from, before the person to whom the request is made.

Ask counsel of God. — Judges xvii.

2. To require, expect, or claim.

To whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more. — Luke xli.

3. To interrogate, or inquire; to put a question, with a view to an answer.

He is of age, ask him. — John ix.

4. To require, or make claim.

Ask me never so much dowry. — Gen. xxiv. Dan. ii.

5. To claim, require, or demand, as the price or value of a commodity; to set a price; as, what price do you ask?

6. To require, as physically necessary.

An exigence of state asks a much longer time to conduct a design to maturity. Addison.

This sense is nearly or entirely obsolete; ask being superseded by require and demand.

7. To invite; as, to ask guests to a wedding or entertainment; ask my friend to step into the house.

ASK, v. i. To request or petition, followed by for; as, ask for bread; or without for.

Ask, and it shall be given you. — Matt. vii.

2. To inquire, or seek by request; sometimes followed by after.

Wherefore dost thou ask after my name? — Gen. xxii.

This verb can hardly be considered as strictly intransitive, for some person or object is always understood.

Ask is not equivalent to demand, claim, and require, at least in modern usage; much less is it equivalent to beg and beseech. The first three words, demand, claim, require, imply a right, or supposed right, in the person asking, to the thing requested; and beg and beseech imply more urgency than ask. Ask and request imply no right, but suppose the thing desired to be a favor. The French demandeur is correctly rendered by ask, rather than by demand.

AS-KANCE', adv. [D. schuins, slopingly.] Side-AS-KANT', ways; obliquely; toward one corner of the eye. Milton. Dryden.

ASK'ED, pp. Requested; petitioned; questioned; in-ASK'ER, n. [interrogated.]

 3. The rose-wood, (Lignum Rhodium), a fragrant wood, yielding an essential oil with the odor of roses; furnished by two species of Convolvulus, (C. floridus and C. scoparius), natives of the Canaries. Parr. Cyc.
AS-PAR'A-GIN, n. A crystallized substance, first discovered in the juice of asparagus, the precise nature of which is not settled.
AS-PAR-AG'IN-OUS, a. Properly, allied to the asparagus; but in botany, denoting plants whose tender shoots are eaten, like those of asparagus. Brandt.
AS-PAR'A-GUS, n. [L. and Gr.; probably from σπασσος, to tear, from its lacerated appearance, or from the root of σπίζω, a spire, from its stem.]
 The name of a genus of plants; and also the common name of one of its species, cultivated in gardens, called otherwise spargagus, spargus, and vulgarly spargan-grass. This has an upright, herbaceous stalk, bristly leaves, and equal stipules. The roots have a bitterish, mucilaginous taste; and the stalk is, in some degree, aperient and deobstruent, but not very efficacious.
AS-PAR'TATE, n. Any compound of the aspartic acid with a salifiable base.
AS-PARTIC AC'ID, n. A concrete or crystalline acid, obtained from asparagus, and composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen.
AS-PECT, n. [L. aspectus, from aspicio, to look on, of ad and specio, to see or look.]
 1. Look; view; appearance to the eye or the mind; as, to present an object or a subject in its true aspect, or under a double aspect. So we say, public affairs have a favorable aspect.
 2. Countenance; look, or particular appearance of the face; as, a mild or severe aspect.
 3. Look; glance; act of seeing. [This sense is now unusual.]
 4. Position or situation with regard to seeing, or that position which enables one to look in a particular direction; or, in a more general sense, position in relation to the points of the compass; as, a house has a southern aspect, that is, a position which faces or looks to the south.
 5. In astrology, the situation of one planet with respect to another, or the angle formed by the rays of light proceeding from two planets, and meeting at the eye. The aspects are five; sextile, when the planets are 60° distant; quartile, or quadrante, when their distance is 90°, or the quarter of a circle; trine, when the distance is 120°; opposition, when the distance is 180°, or half a circle; and conjunction, when they are in the same degree. Encyc. Brandt.
AS-PECT', v. t. To behold. [Not used.] Temple.
AS-PECT'A-BLE, a. That may be seen. [Not used.] Raleigh.

 2. To cast upon. Heywood.
AS-PERS'EL, n. One that asperses or vilifies another.
AS-PER'SION, n. A sprinkling, as of water or dust, in a literal sense. Shak.
 2. The spreading of calumnious reports or charges, which tarnish reputation, like the bespattering of a body with foul water; calumny; censure. Ep. Hall.
AS-PERS'O-RY, a. Tending to asperse; defamatory.
AS-PHALT', } n. [G. ασφαλτος.]
AS-PHALT'UM, }
 Bitumen Judaicum, Jew's pitch; a smooth, hard, brittle, black or brown substance, which breaks with a polish, melts easily when heated, and when pure, burns without leaving any ashes. It has little taste, and scarcely any smell, unless heated, when it emits a strong smell of pitch. It is found in a soft or liquid state on the surface of the Dead Sea, which, from this substance, is called Asphaltites, or the Asphaltic Lake. It is found also in the earth, in many parts of Asia, Europe, and America. Formerly, it was used for embalming dead bodies; the solid asphaltum is still employed in Arabia, Egypt, and Persia, instead of pitch, for ships; and the fluid asphaltum is used for varnishing, and for burning in lamps. It is also used for pavement in streets. A species found in Neufchatel is found excellent as a cement for walls and pavements; very durable in air, and not penetrable by water. A composition of asphaltum, lamp-black, and oil of spike, or turpentine, is used for drawing black figures on dial plates. Nicholson.

AS-PHALT'IC, a. Pertaining to asphaltum, or containing it; bituminous. Milton.
AS-PHALT'ITE, a. Pertaining to or containing asphaltum. Bryant. Wilford.
AS-PHALT'US, n. Asphaltum.

ASS-SEMBLY-ROOM, n. A room in which persons assemble, especially for amusement. Cyc.

ASS-SENT', n. [L. assensus, from assentior, to assent, of ad and sentio, to think; Eth. $\alpha\sigma\sigma\epsilon\sigma$ seno or sona, concord, and its derivative, to agree, to harmonize; Sw. sinn, mind, sense; D. zin, mind; zinnen, to feel or mind; G. sinn, sense; sinnen, to think or consider. The Danes preserve the final consonant, sind, mind, sense, inclination; W. syn, sense; syniauc, to perceive.]

1. The act of the mind in admitting, or agreeing to, the truth of a proposition.

Faith is the assent to any proposition, on the credit of the proposer. Locke.

2. Consent; agreement to a proposal, respecting some right or interest; as, the bill before the house has the assent of a great majority of the members.

The distinction between assent and consent seems to be this: assent is the agreement to an abstract proposition. We assent to a statement, but we do not consent to it. Consent is an agreement to some proposal or measure which affects the rights or interests of the consentor. We consent to a proposal of marriage. This distinction, however, is not always observed. [See CONSENT.] Assent is an act of the understanding; consent is an act of the will. So Baxter speaks of justifying faith as the assenting trust of the understanding, and the consenting trust of the will. Short Meditations.

3. Accord; agreement. 2 Chron. xviii. Royal assent; in England, the assent of the sovereign to a bill which has passed both houses of parliament, given in the House of Lords, either in person or by commissioners. P. Cyc.

ASS-SENT', v. i. To admit as true; to agree to, yield, or concede, or rather to express an agreement of the mind to what is alleged or proposed.

The Jews also assented, saying that these things were so. — Acts xviii.

It is sometimes used for consent, or to express an agreement to something affecting the rights or interest of the person assenting. But to assent to the marriage of a daughter, is less correct than to consent.

 AS-SIZE, n. [Fr. assises; L. assideo, to sit by, of ad and sedeo, to sit; It. assaiare, a session. See ASSISES. Note. This word was formerly written, as in French, assize.

1. Originally, an assembly of knights and other substantial men, with a bailiff or justice, in a certain place and at a certain time, for public business. The general council, or Wittenagemote, of England, was called the General Assize. Blackstone. Glanville.

2. In England, the Court of Assize, popularly called the Assizes, is the sessions held, by at least one of the judges of the superior courts, in each of the counties, under commissions of assize for civil cases, and ofoyer and terminer, and jail delivery, for criminal cases. The commission of assize originally directed the judges to take assizes, or the verdicts of a particular jury called the assize, now obsolete. P. Cyc.

3. A jury. In this sense the word was applied to the grand assize, for the trial of property, and to the petty assize, for the trial of possession. In Scotland, the assize consists of fifteen men, selected from a greater number.

4. A writ; as, an assize of novel disseisin, which is given to recover the possession of lands, tenements, rents, common, &c., of which the tenant has been lately disseised; assize of mort d'ancestor, which lies against an abator, who enters upon land after the death of the ancestor, and before the heir enters; assize of darrein presentment, or last presentation, which lies against a stranger who presents a clerk to a benefice, from the person, who himself, or his ancestor, last before presented. Blackstone.

5. A particular species of rents, established and not subject to be varied. Eng. Law.

6. The time or place of holding the Court of Assize; generally in the plural, assizes.

7. In a more general sense, any tribunal or court of justice.

8. A statute, or ordinance, generally; as, the assizes of the realm; the assizes of the forest, rules and regulations for the management of the royal forests; assize of arms, a statute of Hen. II. for arming the kingdom; the assizes of Jerusalem, a code of feudal laws formed by the crusaders for their kingdom of Jerusalem.

9. A statute of regulation; an ordinance regulating the weight, measure, and price of articles sold in market; and hence the word came to signify the weight, measure, or price itself; as, the assize of bread. Spelman. Cowel. Encyc. Blackstone.

10. An ordinance fixing the standard of weights and measures; hence, the standard weights and measures; as, the custody of the assize. Blackstone.

11. Measure; dimension. [In this sense, now corrupted into SIXZ, which see.]

An hundred colts high by just assize. Spenser.

An assortment of paintings. W. Cox.

4. A variety of sorts or kinds adapted to various wants, demands, or purposes; as, an assortment of goods. Mercantile Usage.

ASSOT, v. t. [See SORT.] To infatuate; to besot. [Not used.] Spenser.

ASSUAGE, v. t. [This word appears to be formed on the G. schwach; D. zwak, weak; or on D. zagt, soft, gentle, quiet, which coincides with the Sax. swing, silence; swigan, to be silent; whence geswigan, to be silent; G. schweigen; D. zwygen, id. In Sax. also, geswican is to cease, fall, rest, be quiet. But the Dutch word for assuage is verzagten, to soften.]

To soften, in a figurative sense; to allay, mitigate, ease, or lessen, as pain or grief; to appease or pacify, as passion or tumult. In strictness, it signifies rather to moderate, than to quiet, tranquilize, or reduce to perfect peace or ease.

ASSUAGE, v. i. To abate or subside. The waters assuaged.—Gen. viii.

But I apprehend the sense is,—the waters were checked, Heb. 77.

ASSUMPSIT, n. [pret. tense of L. assumo.]

1. In law, a promise or undertaking, founded on a consideration. This promise may be verbal or written. An assumpsit is express or implied; express, when made in words or writing; implied, when, in consequence of some benefit or consideration accruing to one person from the acts of another, the law presumes that person has promised to make compensation. In this case, the law, upon a principle of justice, implies or raises a promise, on which an action may be brought to recover the compensation. Thus, if A contracts with B to build a house for him, by implication and intendment of law, A promises to pay B for the same, without any express words to that effect.

2. An action founded on a promise. When this action is brought on a debt, it is called indebitatus assumpsit, which is an action on the case to recover damages for the non-payment of a debt. Blackstone.

AS-TROL'A-TRY, n. [Gr. αστήρ and λατροειν.]

The worship of the stars. Cudworth.

AS-TROL'O-GER, n. [L. astrologus, of Gr. αστρον, a star, and λογος, discourse.]

1. One who professes to foretell future events by the aspects and situation of the stars. Astrologian is little used.

2. Formerly, one who understood the motions of the planets, without predicting.

AS-TRO-LOG'IC, a. Pertaining to astrology; AS-TRO-LOG'IC-AL, professing or practicing astrology.

AS-TRO-LOG'IC-AL-LY, adv. In the manner of astrology.

AS-TROL'O-GIZE, v. i. To practice astrology.

AS-TROL'O-GY, n. [Supra.] A science which teaches to judge of the effects and influences of the stars, and to foretell future events by their situation and different aspects; called, also, judicial astrology. This science was formerly in great request, as men ignorantly supposed the heavenly bodies to have a ruling influence over the physical and moral world; but it is now universally exploded by true science and philosophy.

Note. The term astrology was used by the ancients in the sense of astronomy.

AS-TRON'O-MEIK, n. One who is versed in astronomy; one who has a knowledge of the laws of the heavenly orbs, or the principles by which their motions are regulated, with their various phenomena.

AS-TRO-NOM'IC, a. Pertaining to astronomy.

AS-TRO-NOM'IC-AL-LY, adv. In an astronomical manner; by the principles of astronomy.

AS-TRO-NO-MIZE, v. i. To study astronomy. [Lit. the used.]

AS-TRO-NO-MY, n. [Gr. αστρον, a star, and νομος, a law, or rule.]

The science which teaches the knowledge of the celestial bodies, their magnitudes, motions, distances, periods of revolution, eclipses, order, and of the causes of their various phenomena. This science depends on observations made chiefly with instruments, and upon mathematical calculations.

ASTRO-SCOPE, n. [Gr. αστρον, a star, and σκοπος, to view.]

An astronomical instrument, composed of two cones, on whose surface the constellations, with their stars, are delineated, by means of which the stars may be easily known.

The Lord hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked. — Ps. cxxix.

A-SWOON', adv. In a swoon. [Obs.]

A-ST'LUM, n. [L. from Gr. ασταλιν, safe from spoil, a and σταλα, spoil, σταλας, to plunder.]

1. A sanctuary or place of refuge, where criminals and debtors shelter themselves from justice, and from which they can not be taken without sacrilege. Temples and altars were anciently asylums; as were tombs, statues, and monuments. The ancient heathens allowed asylums for the protection of the vilest criminals; and the Jews had their cities of refuge.

2. Any place of retreat and security.

3. An institution for the protection or relief of the unfortunate; as, an asylum for the poor, for the deaf and dumb, or for the insane.

A-SYM-ME-TRAL, a. [See SYMMETRICAL.]

Not having symmetry. [Little used.]

A-SYM-ME-TRY, n. [Gr. a priv. and μετρον, measure, symmetry, of μετρον, with, and μετρον, to measure.]

The want of proportion between the parts of a thing. It is also used in mathematics for incommensurability, when between two quantities there is no common measure.

AS-YMP-TOTE, n. [Gr. a priv. and τροπον, to fall, not meeting.] Sometimes pron. asymploite.

A line which approaches nearer and nearer to some curve, but, though infinitely extended, would never meet it. This may be conceived as a tangent to a curve at an infinite distance.

AS-YMP-TOT'IC-AL, a. Belonging to an asymptote.

Asymptotical curves, are such as continually approach when extended, but never meet.

A-SYN-AR-TETE', a. [Gr. a priv. and συν, and αρτα, laterally, disconnected; not fitted or adjusted.]

Asynartete sentences; those of which the members are not united by connective particles; as, I came, I saw, I conquered.

Asynartete verse; in prosody, a verse consisting of two members, having different rhythms; as when the first consists of iambuses and the second of trochees, or the first of dactyls and the second of iambuses.

A-SYN-DE-TON, n. [Gr. a priv. and συνδεδω, to bind together.] In grammar, a figure which omits the connective; as, veni, vidi, vici. It stands opposed to poly-syndeton, which is a multiplication of connectives.

AT, prep. [Sax. et; Goth. at; L. ad, at, and to, if not radically the same word, often coincide in signification. In W. at is to, and in Danish and Swedish, it is the sign of the infinitive mode; in Amh. od, or yd, is toward. The word at is doubtless the Oriental את, את, Ch. and Heb. to come, to approach. Hence it primarily denotes presence, meeting, nearness, direction toward.]

In general, it denotes nearness or presence; as, at the ninth hour, at the house; but it is less definite than in or on; at the house, may be in or near the house. It denotes also toward, versus; as, to aim an arrow at a mark.

From this original import are derived all the various uses of at. At the sight, is with, present, or coming the sight; at this news, present the news, on or with the approach or arrival of this news. At peace, at war, in a state of peace or war, peace or war existing, being present; at ease, at play, at a loss, &c., convey the like idea. At arms, furnished with arms, bearing arms; at hand, within reach of the hand, and therefore near; at my cost, with my cost; at his suit, by or with his suit; at this declaration, he rose from his seat, that is, present, or coming this declaration; whence results the idea, in consequence of it. At his command, is either under his command, that is, literally, coming or being come his command, in the power of, or in consequence of it. He is good at engraving, at husbandry; that is, in performing that business. He deserves well at our hands, that is, from us. The peculiar phrases in which this word occurs, with appropriate significations, are numerous. At first, at last, at least, at best, at the worst, at the highest or lowest, are phrases in which some noun is implied; as, at the first time or beginning; at the last time, or point of time; at the least or best degree, &c.; all denoting an extreme point or superlative degree. At all, is in any manner or degree. It is sometimes used for to, or toward, noting progression or direction; as, he aims at perfection; he makes or runs at him, or points at him. In this phrase, he longs to be at him, at has its general sense of approaching, or present, or with, in contest or attack.

AT-TACK', v. t. [Fr. attaquer; Arm. attacchi; It. attaccare, to assault, to attack; attacco, a sticking; Sp. atacar, to fasten, to fasten, or make close, to cram; Port. atacar, to attack, to tense, to fasten; Heb. and Ch. ypr, to thrust, to drive, to strike. It seems to be allied to attak; but the latter verb agrees better with the Eth. MOD tok, took, to press, whence AT atook, to press, to make close; and the Ch. H , to accuse, to unite. Class Dg.]

1. To assault; to fall upon with force; to assail, as with force and arms. It is the appropriate word for the commencing act of hostility between armies and navies.

2. To fall upon, with unfriendly words or writing; to begin a controversy with; to attempt to overthrow or bring into disrepute, by satire, calumny, or criticism; as, to attack a man or his opinions in a pamphlet.

AT-TACK', n. An onset; first invasion; a falling on with force or violence, or with calumny, satire, or criticism.

AT-TACK/A-BLE, a. That can be attacked; assailable.

AT-TACK/ED, (at-takt'), pp. Assaulted; invaded; fallen on with force or enmity.

AT-TACK/ER, n. One who assaults or invades.

AT-TACK/ING, pp. Assaulting; invading; falling on with force, calumny, or criticism.

AT-TA-COT/TIC, a. Pertaining to the Attacotti, a tribe of ancient Britons, allies of the Scots. Pinkerton.

AT-TA-GAS, } n. [L.] Names applied, by former AT-TA-GEN, } naturalists, to a variety of the Tetrao bonasia, or hazel grouse, found in the south of Europe. Cuvier.

AT-TA-GHAN. See ATAGHAN.

AT-TAIN', v. i. [Fr. and Norm. atteindre; L. attingo, to reach, come to, or overtake; ad and tingo, to touch, reach, or strike; that is, to thrust, urge, or push to. It has no connection with L. attingo. See Class Dg.]

1. To reach; to come to or arrive at, by motion, bodily exertion, or efforts toward a place or object.

If by any means they might attain to Heaven. — Act. xviii.

2. To reach; to come to or arrive at, by an effort of mind.

Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I can not attain to it. — Ps. cxxxix.

Regularly this verb should be always followed by to; the omission of to, and the use of the verb in a transitive sense, may have originated in mistake, from the opinion that the verb is from the L. attingo, and equivalent to obtain.

AT-TAIN', v. t.

1. To gain; to compass; to achieve or accomplish, that is, to reach by efforts; without following.

Is he wise who hopes to attain the end without the means? Tillotson.

This use of the verb is now established; but in strictness to is here implied; attain to the end. The real sense, as in the intransitive use of the verb, is, to reach or come to the end or purpose in view. This word always implies an effort toward an object. Hence it is not synonymous with obtain and procure, which do not necessarily imply such effort. We obtain or procure a thing by purchase or loan, and we obtain by inheritance, but we do not attain it by such means. An inattention to this distinction has led good authors into great mistakes in the use of this word.

2. To reach or come to a place or object by progression or motion.

But ere such things shall his care attain. Hoole's Tasso. Milton.

3. To reach in excellence or degree; to equal.

AT-TAIN-A-BIL/I-TY, n. Attainableness, Coleridge.

AT-TAIN/A-BLE, a. That may be attained; that may be reached by efforts of the mind or body; that may be compassed or accomplished by efforts directed to the object; as, perfection is not attainable in this life. From an inattention to the true sense of this word, as explained under ATTAIN, authors have very improperly used this word for obtainable, procurable; as in the following passages: "The kind and quality of food and liquor, the species of habitation, furniture and clothing, to which the common people of each country are habituated, must be attainable with ease and certainty." Paley, Philos. b. 6, chap. 11. "Gen. Howe would not permit the purchase of those articles [clothes and blankets] in Philadelphia, and they were not attainable in the country." Marshall's Life of Washington, 3, 437. Each of those words should be obtainable.

AT-TAIN/A-BLE-NESS, n. The quality of being attainable.

AT-TAIN/DER, n. [Nom. Fr. atteindre, to corrupt, attain; also conviction; L. ad and tingo, to stain; Gr. reypo, a staining, corruption, or rendering impure; a corruption of blood. Hence,

1. Literally, a staining, corruption, or rendering impure; a corruption of blood. Hence,

2. By the common law, an immediate and inseparable effect of a judgment of death or outlawry, for treason or felony; the consequences of which to the person attainted are forfeiture of lands, tenements, and hereditaments; corruption of blood, by which he can no longer inherit, or transmit an inheritance, and loss of reputation, and of civil rights generally. A statute of parliament attainting a criminal, is called an act or bill of attainder. By a statute of 3-4 Wm. IV., the consequences of attainder are limited to the life of the person attainted.

Upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt by legal assessor, the feudal covenant is broken. Blackstone.

3. The act of attainting.

An act was made for the attainting of several persons. Eneye.

Note. By the constitution of the United States, no bill of attainder shall be passed; and no attainder of treason (in consequence of a judicial sentence) shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

AT-TAIN/ED, (at-tain'd'), pp. Reached; achieved.

AT-TAIN/ING, pp. Reaching; arriving at; accomplishing.

AT-TAIN/MENT, n.

1. The act of attaining; the act of arriving at or reaching; hence, the act of obtaining by efforts; as, the attainment of excellence.

2. That which is attained to, or obtained by exertion; acquisition; as, a man of great attainments.

AT-TAIN'T, v. t. [See ATTAIN/DER.]

1. To taint or corrupt; to extinguish the pure or inheritable blood of a person found guilty of treason or felony, by confession, battle, or verdict, and consequent sentence of death, or by special act of parliament.

No person shall be attainted of high treason where corruption of blood is incurred, but by the oath of two witnesses, &c. Stat. 7 and 8 Will. III.

2. To taint, as the credit of jurors, convicted of giving a false verdict. This is done by special writ of attain. The conviction of such a crime attains the reputation of jurors, and renders them infamous.

3. To disgrace; to cloud with infamy; to stain.

4. To taint or corrupt. Shak.

AT-TAIN'T, n.

1. A stain, spot, or taint. [See TAIN/T.] Shak.

2. Anything injurious; that which impairs. [Obs.] Shak.

3. In farricry, a blow or wound on the legs or feet of a horse. Eneye.

4. A writ which lies after judgment against a jury for giving a false verdict in any court of record.

AT-TAIN'T/ED, pp. Stained; corrupted; rendered infamous; rendered incapable of inheriting.

AT-TAIN'T/ING, pp. Staining; corrupting; rendering infamous by judicial act; depriving of inheritable blood.

AT-TAIN/TMENT, n. The being attainted.

AT-TAIN/TURE, n. A staining or rendering infamous; reproach; imputation.

AT-TAR OF ROSES, n. A highly fragrant concrete obtained in India from the petals of roses. P. Cyc.

AT-TASK', v. t. To task; to tax. [Not used. See TASK.] Shak.

AT-TASTE', v. t. To taste. [Not used. See TASTE.]

AT-TEMPER, v. t. [L. tempero, of ad and tempero, to temper, mix, or moderate. See TEMPER.]

1. To reduce, modify, or moderate by mixture, as, to temper heat by a cooling mixture, or spirit by diluting it with water.

2. To soften, mollify, or moderate; as, to temper rigid justice with clemency.

3. To mix in just proportion; to regulate; as, a mind well tempered with kindness and justice.

4. To accommodate; to fit or make suitable. Acts — tempered to the lyre. Pope.

AT-TEMPER-ANCE, n. Temperance. [Not used.] Chaucer.

AT-TEMPER-ATE, a. [L. temperatus.] Tempered; proportioned; suited.

Hope must be proportioned and attempted to the premises. Hammond.

AT-TEMPER-ATE, v. t. To temper. [Not in use.] Barrow.

AT-TEMPER-ED, pp. Reduced in quality; moderated; softened; well mixed; suited.

AT-TEMPER-ING, pp. Moderating in quality; softening; mixing in due proportion; making suitable.

AT-TEMPER-LY, adv. In a temperate manner. [Not in use.] Chaucer.

AT-TEMPER-MENT, n. A tempering, or due proportion.

AT-TEMP'T', v. t. [Fr. attenter, from L. attento, to attempt, of ad and tento, to try; Arm. attenti. The L. tento is from the same root as tendo, to strain; Gr. teivo. Hence, the literal sense is to strain, urge, stretch.]

1. To make an effort to effect some object; to make trial or experiment; to try; to endeavor; to use exertion for any purpose; as, to attempt to sing; to attempt a bold flight.

2. To attack; to make an effort upon; as, to attempt the enemy's camp.

This verb is not always followed by an object, and appears to be intransitive; but some object is understood, or a verb in the infinitive follows in the place of an object; as, he attempted to speak.

AT-TEMP'T', n. An essay, trial, or endeavor; an attack; or an effort to gain a point. Bacon.

AT-TEMP'T/A-BLE, a. That may be attempted, tried, or attacked; liable to an attempt, or attack. Shak.

AT-TEMP'T/ED, pp. Essayed; tried; attacked.

AT-TEMP'T/ER, n. One who attempts, or attacks. Milton.

AT-TEMP/TING, pp. Trying; essaying; making an effort to gain a point; attacking.

AT-TEND', v. t. [L. attendo; Fr. attendre, to wait, stay, expect; Sp. atender; It. attendere; L. ad and tendo, to stretch, to tend. See TEND.]

1. To go with, or accompany, as a companion, minister, or servant.

2. To be present; to accompany or be united to; as, a cold attended with fever.

3. To be present for some duty, implying charge or oversight; to wait on; as, the physician or the nurse attends the sick.

4. To be present in business; to be in company from curiosity, or from some connection in affairs; as, lawyers or spectators attend a court.

5. To be consequent to, from connection of cause; as, a measure attended with ill effects.

6. To await; to remain, abide, or be in store for; as, happiness or misery attends us after death. Shak.

7. To wait for; to lie in wait.

8. To wait or stay for. Three days I promised to attend my doom. Dryden.

9. To accompany with solicitude; to regard with interest. Their hunger thus appeared, their care attends the doubtful fortune of their absent friends. Dryden.

10. To regard; to fix the mind upon. The pilot doth not attend the unskillful words of the passenger. Sidney.

This is not now a legitimate sense. To express this idea, we now use the verb intransitively, with to — attend to.

11. To expect. [Not in use.] Raleigh.

AT-TEND', v. i.

1. To listen; to regard with attention; usually followed by to. Attend to the voice of my supplication. — Ps. lxxvii.

Hence much used in the Imperative, attend!

2. To regard with observation, and correspondent practice; as, my son, attend to my words. Hence, to regard with compliance.

He hath attended to the voice of my prayer. — Ps. lxxvi.

3. To fix the attention upon, as an object of pursuit; to be busy or engaged in; as, to attend to the study of the Scriptures.

4. To wait on; to accompany or be present, in pursuance of duty; with on or upon; as, to attend upon a committee; to attend upon business. Hence,

5. To wait on, in service or worship; to serve. That ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction. — 1 Cor. vii.

6. To stay; to delay. [Obs.] For this perfection she must yet attend, Till to her Maker she espoused be. Davies.

7. To wait; to be within call. Spenser.

AT-TEND/ANCE, n. [Fr.]

1. The act of waiting on or serving. For he — pertained to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar. — Heb. vii.

In the feudal law, to turn, or transfer homage and service from one lord to another. This is the act of feudatories, vassals, or tenants, upon the alienation of the estate. Blackstone. Encyc.

AT-TORN'EY, (or turn'y) n.; pl. ATTORNEYS. [Norm. attourn; turne, il; from tour, turn, turn, change. One who takes the turn or place of another. See ATTORN and TURN.]

One who is legally appointed by another to transact any business for him. An attorney is either public or private. A private attorney is a person appointed by another, by a letter or power of attorney, to transact any business for him out of court. A public attorney, or attorney at law, is an officer of a court of law, legally qualified to prosecute and defend actions in such court, on the retainer of clients. The attorney at law answers to the procurator, or proctor, of the civilians and canonists, and to the solicitor, in chancery.

In Great Britain, and some of the United States, attorneys are not admitted to practice in any court until examined, approved, licensed, and sworn by that court, after which they are proper officers of the court; but in Connecticut, an attorney admitted and sworn by one of the county courts, is authorized to practice in all the courts of the State.

In Great Britain, attorneys are not admitted to plead at the bar, or to be advocates or counsel, in the higher courts; this privilege being confined to barristers and serjeants.

In New York, and in Massachusetts, there is a distinction observed between attorneys and counselors at law, but in most of the United States, the two offices are combined, or that of attorney alone retained.

In Virginia, the duties of attorney, counselor, conveyancer, and advocate, are all performed by the same individual. Wirt.

An attorney may have general powers to transact business for another; or his powers may be special, or limited to a particular act or acts.

Attorney general, in Great Britain, is an officer appointed by the crown, with general powers to act in all legal proceedings, in which the crown is a party; particularly, to prosecute in criminal matters affecting the state. In the government of the United States, and in some of the State governments, the attorney general is an officer with corresponding powers.

A power, letter, or warrant of attorney, is a written authority from one person empowering another to transact business for him.

AT-TORN'Y, v. l. To perform by proxy; to employ as a proxy. [Not in use.] Shak.
AT-TORN'Y-SHIP, (at-torn'y-ship), n. The office of an attorney; agency for another. Shak.
AT-TORN'ING, ppr. Acknowledging a new lord, or transferring homage and fealty to the purchaser of an estate.
AT-TORN'MENT, n. The act of a feudatory, vassal, or tenant, by which he consents, upon the alienation of an estate, to receive a new lord or superior, and transfers to him his homage and service. Encyc. Blackstone.

AT-TRACT', v. l. [L. attrahō, attractas, of ad and trahō, to draw. See DRAO and DRAW.]
 1. In physics, to draw to, or cause to tend to; particularly to cause to approach, adhere, or combine; or to cause to resist division, separation, or decomposition.
 2. To draw by influence of a moral kind; to invite or allure; as, to attract admirers.
 3. To engage; as, to attract attention.

AT-TRACT', n. Attraction. [Not in use.]
AT-TRACT-A-BIL'I-TY, n. The quality of being attractable, or of being subject to the law of attraction. Anal. Resonance.
AT-TRACT'ABLE, a. That may be attracted; subject to attraction. Lacourier, by Kerr.
AT-TRACT'ED, pp. Drawn toward; invited; allured; engaged.
AT-TRACT'ING, ppr. Having power to draw to.
AT-TRACT'ING-AL, a. [Not used.] Ray.
AT-TRACT'ILE, n. That has power to attract. Med. Rep.

AT-TRACT'ING, ppr. Drawing to or toward; inviting; alluring; engaging.
AT-TRACT'ING-LY, adv. In an attracting manner.
AT-TRACTION, n.
 1. In physics, the power or force which draws bodies or their particles toward each other, or which causes them to tend toward each other, or to resist a counteracting tendency; or the law by which they tend toward each other, or resist a counteracting tendency.

Attraction is distinguished into that which is manifested between bodies or masses at sensible distances, and that which is manifested between the particles or molecules of bodies at insensible distances. The former includes the attraction of gravity, or gravitation, or the mutual tendency of all bodies to each other, as the tendency of the planets toward the sun, or of a stone, when raised in the air, to fall to the earth; and also, the attraction of magnetism, and that of electricity. The latter takes place either between particles of the same kind, or homogeneous particles, and is then called the attraction of aggregation, or cohesion; or between dissimilar or heterogeneous particles, uniting them into compounds, and is then called chemical attraction, or affinity. The attractions of the first class, however, exist between particles as well as masses; and the surfaces of masses, in contact, or at inappreciable distances, also attract each other, causing adhesion, in heterogeneous as well as homogeneous bodies.

The attraction of gravity is supposed to be the great principle which confines the planets in their orbits. Its power or force is directly as the quantity of matter in a body, and inversely as the squares of the distances of the attracting bodies.

2. The act of attracting; the effect of the principle of attraction.

Attraction may be performed by impulse or some other means. Newton's Optics.

3. The power or act of alluring, drawing to, inviting, or engaging; as, the attraction of beauty or eloquence.

Electric attraction, or elective affinity, in chemistry, is the tendency of those substances in a mixture to combine, which have the strongest attraction.

AT-TRACT'IVE, a. [Fr. attractif.]

1. Having the power or quality of attracting; drawing to; as, the attractive force of bodies.
 2. Drawing to by moral influence; alluring; inviting; engaging; as, the attractive graces.

An attractive undertaking. Roscoe.

AT-TRACT'IVE-LY, adv. With the power of attracting or drawing to.

AU-BAIN', (o-bain'), n. [Fr. aubain, an alien.]

The droit d'aubain, in France, was the right of the king to the succession or inheritance of a foreigner not naturalized, or of a foreigner naturalized, who had left no heirs within the kingdom, and who had not disposed of his property, while living, by donation or testament. Encyc. Meth.

This right was abolished in 1790, by the National Assembly; restored, by Napoleon, in 1804; partially abolished, by the treaty of Paris, in 1814; and finally entirely abolished in 1819. P. Cyc.

AUBIN, n. [Fr.] A broken kind of gait in a horse, between an amble and a gallop, vulgarly called a Canterbury gallop.

AUBURN, a. [This word is evidently formed from Fr. brun, It. bruno, brown, by a transposition of the letters r and n, with a prefix, auburn, for auburn, from brennan bara, denoting the color made by scourching.]

 Reddish brown.

Its auburn locks on either shoulder flowed. Dryden.

AUC'TION, n. [L. auctio, (augere, to incr. use), a public sale; or Eng. to hawk; G. hōken; properly, to cry out. See HAWE.]

1. A public sale of property to the highest bidder, and regularly, by a person licensed and authorized for the purpose; a vendue. Contracts for services, supplies, &c., sometimes, are sold to the lowest bidder. Among the Romans, this species of sale was made by a crier, sub hasta, i. e., under a spear stuck in the earth.

2. The things sold at auction. Pope.
Dutch auction; the public offer of property at a price beyond its value, then gradually lowering the price, till some one accepts it, as purchaser. P. Cyc.

AUC'TION-ARY, a. Belonging to an auction or public sale. Dryden.

AUC'TION-ER, n. [L. auctionarius.]

The person who sells at auction; a person licensed by government to dispose of goods or lands by public sale to the highest bidder.

2. Committed with, or proceeding from, daring effrontery, or contempt of law; as, an audacious crime.

3. Bold; spirited. Milton. B. Johnson.

AUDACIOUSLY, adv. In an impudent manner; with excess of boldness. Shak.

AUDACIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being audacious; impudence; audacity. Sandys.

AUDAC'ITY, n. Boldness; sometimes in a good sense; daring spirit, resolution, or confidence.

2. Audaciousness; impudence; in a bad sense; implying a contempt of law or moral restraint.

AUDEAN-ISM, n. Anthropomorphism; or the doctrine of Audeus, a Syrian of the fourth century, who maintained that God has a human shape; from Gen. i. 26. Encyc.

AUDI-BLE, a. [L. audibilis, from audio, to hear. This word is evidently connected with the name of the ear; Gr. οὐς, ovas; Vulg. Gr. audia. The verb audio is contracted into Sp. oír; Port. ouvir; Fr. oír, to hear. Hence, in law, over ear and from the French oír, hear vs. in English O yes, of our courts.]

1. That may be heard; perceptible by the ear; loud enough to be heard; as, an audible voice or whisper.

AUDI-BLENESS, n. The quality of being audible.

AUDI-BLY, adv. In an audible manner; in a manner so as to be heard.

AUDI-ENCE, n. The act of hearing, or attending to sounds.

His bold discourse had audience. Milton.

2. Admittance to a hearing; reception to an interview, especially with a sovereign or the head of a government, for conference or the transaction of business; as, Mr. Pitt had an audience of the king. The term is also applied to an interview of mere ceremony between the head of a government and the representatives of foreign powers; as when an ambassador requests an audience of leave.

3. An auditory; an assembly of hearers.

4. In Spain, one of the seven supreme courts, to which appeals lie from the inferior courts, and from which no appeal lies, except in the higher civil suite to the two chanceries, and the council of Castile. Ed. Encyc.

In the former Spanish provinces in America, a supreme court of justice, and the district over which its jurisdiction extended. Robertson. Ed. Encyc.

5. The court of audience, or audience court; a court held originally before an archbishop in person; that of the archbishop of Canterbury is now held by the dean of the arches as his official.

AUDI-ENCE-CHAM-BER, n. An apartment for an audience or formal meeting.

AUDI-ENT, n. A hearer. [Not in use.] Shelton.

AUDI'T, n. [L. audit, he hears.]

1. An examination of an account or of accounts, with the hearing of the parties concerned, by proper officers, or persons appointed for that purpose, who compare the charges with the vouchers, examine witnesses, and state the balance.

2. The result of such an examination, or an account as adjusted by auditors; a final account. Shak.

AUDI'T, v. l. To examine and adjust an account or accounts, by proper officers, or by persons legally authorized for the purpose; as, to audit the accounts of a treasurer, or of parties who have a suit depending in court.

AUD'IT-HOUSE, n. An appendage to a cathedral, in which the business belonging to it is transacted.

AUD'ITTA QUERE'LA, [L.] In law, when a defendant or bail, against whom judgment has been recovered, complains that he has already satisfied the demand, or been released from it, an audita querela, is a writ in the nature of a bill in equity, directed to the court, enjoining it to hear the parties, and cause justice to be done them.

AUD'IT-IVE, a. Having the power of hearing.

AUD'IT-OR, [L.] A bearer; one who attends to hear a discourse.

2. A person appointed and authorized to examine an account or accounts, compare the charges with the vouchers, examine the parties and witnesses, allow or reject charges, and state the balance. It is usual with courts to refer accounts, on which an action is brought, to auditors for adjustment, and their report, if received, is the basis of the judgment. In England, there are officers who are auditors of courts, of the revenue, of corporations, &c. In the United States government, and the state governments, there are auditors of the treasury, or of the public accounts.

AUD'IT-OR-SHIP, n. The office of auditor.

AUD'IT-ORY, a. That has the power of hearing; pertaining to the sense or organs of hearing. Auditory nerve; in anatomy, the soft part (portio mollis) of each of the seventh pair of nerves, distributed to different parts of the labyrinth of the internal ear; the seat of the sense of hearing.

3. A bench on which a judge sits to hear causes.

AUD'IT-RESS, n. A female hearer.

AUF, n. A fool; a simpleton. [See OAF.]

AU'FAIT, (8-fa), [Fr.] Literally, to or up to the accomplishment of any thing, i. e. master of it; perfectly able to perform it. As the phrase is followed by de in French, it ought properly to be followed by of in English; as, he is entirely au fait of that matter.

AU'GE'AN, a. The Agean stable, in Grecian mythology, is represented as belonging to Augeas or Augeas, one of the Argonauts, and afterward king of Elis. This prince kept a great number of oxen in a stable which was never cleansed, until Hercules undertook the task; a task which it seemed impracticable to execute. Hence the Agean stable came to represent what is deemed impracticable, or a place which has not, for a long time, been cleansed.

AU'GER, n. [D. aegaar. The Saxon word is safgar or nae-gar, from nafa, the nave of a wheel, and gar, a tool or a borer. It is probable that the real word is nau-gar, corrupted.]

1. An instrument for boring large holes, chiefly used by carpenters, joiners, cabinet makers, wheelwrights, and shipwrights. It consists of an iron blade, ending in a steel bit, with a handle placed at right angles with the blade. Augers, made with a straight channel or groove, in some places, are called padding augers; the modern augers, with spiral channels, are called serew augers.

2. An instrument for boring or perforating soils or rocks, consisting of a handle for working, a rod which may be lengthened as the perforation extends, and a bit, mouth, or cutting piece, resembling the bit of a common auger, for soils or soft rocks, and a chisel for harder rocks.

AU'GER-HOLE, n. A hole made by an auger.

AU'GET, n. A tube filled with powder and extending from the chamber of a mine to the extremity of the gallery, used in exploding mines.

AUGHT, (awt), n. [Sax. awiht, aht, or awiht, ahmit, aht, from wih, wight, a creature, animal, thing, any thing. This wihl seems to be our wight and wihl; and I suspect the L. qui, quae, quod, quid, what, to be the same word varied in orthography. This word should not be written ought.]

1. Any thing, indefinitely.

But go, my son, and see if aught be wanting.

2. Any part, the smallest; a jot or tittle.

There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken.—Job, xxi.

AUG'ITE, a. [Gr. ayw, brightness. Plin. 37, 10.]

A mineral, called by Italy pyrozeo; occurring crystallized in oblique prismatic forms, and also massive, lamellar, granular, and fibrous, and presenting usually some shade of green, but sometimes white or black. It consists chiefly of silica, magnesia, and lime, with oxyd of iron, and sometimes oxyd of manganese. It occurs as a constituent of levas, trap, and basalt, and also of many of the primary rocks. Different varieties have received the names Sahlite, Diopside, Fassaitz, Coccolite, Baikalite, and Omphacite. Common asbestos is often only a fibrous augite.

AUG'ITIC, a.

1. Pertaining to augite; resembling augite, or partaking of its nature and characters.

2. Composed of augite, or containing augite as a principal constituent; as, augitic rocks; augitic porphyry.

AUG-MENT', v. t. [Fr. augmenter; L. augmentum, augmentum, from augere, auxi, to increase; Gr. αυξω, auξω, which seems to be the Eng. to wax, or to eke; Sax. eacan.]

1. To increase; to enlarge in size or extent; to swell; to make bigger; as, to augment an army, by reinforcement; rain augments a stream.

2. Figuratively, to increase or swell the degree, amount, or magnitude; as, impatience augments an evil.

AUG-MENT', v. i. To increase; to grow larger; as, a stream augments by rain.

AUG-MENT', n. Increase; enlargement by addition; state of increase.

2. In philology, a syllable prefixed to a word; or an increase of the quantity of the initial vowel.

3. In medicine, the increase of a disease, or the period intervening between its attack and light.

2. The state of being increased or enlarged.

3. The thing added by which a thing is enlarged.

4. In music, a doubling the value of the notes of the subject of a fugue or canon.

Augmentation Court; in England, a court erected by 27 Hen. VIII., to augment the revenues of the crown by the suppression of monasteries. It was long ago dissolved.

Augmentation, in heraldry, consists in additional charges to a coat-armor, often given as marks of honor, and generally borne on the escutcheon or a canton.

AUG-MENT-A-TIVE, a. Having the quality or power of augmenting.

AUG-MENTER, n. He that augments.

AUG-MENTING, pp. Increasing; enlarging.

AUGUR, n. [L. augur. The first syllable is from avis, a bird; but the meaning and origin of the last syllable are not obvious.]

1. Among the Romans, an officer whose duty was to foretell future events by the singing, chattering, flight, and feeding of birds, or by other signs or omens, derived from celestial phenomena, appearances of quadrupeds, or certain accidents, called dira. There was a college or community of augurs, originally three in number, and afterward nine, four patricians and five plebeians. They bore a staff or wand, and were held in great respect.

2. One who pretends to foretell future events by omens.

We all know that augur can not look at augur without laughing.

AUGUR, v. i. To guess; to conjecture by signs or omens; to prognosticate.

AUGUR, v. t. To predict or foretell; as, to augur ill success.

AUGU-RAL, a. [L. auguralis.] Pertaining to augurs or to augury. The Romans had their augural staff and augural books.

AUGU-RATE, v. i. To judge by augury; to predict.

AUGU-RATION, n. The practice of augury, or the foretelling of events by observing the actions of birds, or certain other phenomena.

AUGUR-ED, pp. Conjectured by omens; prognosticated.

AUGUR-ER, n. An augur. [Not legitimate.]

AUGURI-AL, a. Relating to augurs; or to augury.

AUGUR-ING, pp. or a. Prognosticating; present; as, auguring hope.

AUGUR-IZE, v. t. To augur. [Not in use.]

AUGU-ROUS, a. Predicting; foretelling; foreboding.

AUGU-RY, n. [L. augurium.]

1. The art or practice of foretelling events by observing the actions of birds, or other phenomena.

2. An omen; prediction; prognostication.

AUGU-RSHIP, n. The office, or period of office, of an augur.

AUGUST, n. [L. augustus. The first syllable of this word is probably from the root of augere, or of are.]

Grand; magnificent; majestic; impressing awe; inspiring reverence; as, august in visage. Dryden.

This epithet, as a title of honor, was first conferred by the Roman senate upon Octavius, after confirming him in the sovereign power.

AUGUST, n. The eighth month of the year, containing thirty-one days. The old Roman name was Sextilis, the sixth month from March, the month in which the primitive Romans, as well as Jews, began the year. The name was changed to August in honor of the emperor Octavius Augustus, on account of his victories, and his entering on his first consulate in that month.

AUGUSTAN, a. Pertaining to Augustus; as, the Augustan age.

The Augustan confession, or confession of Augsburg, drawn up at Augusta Fideleorum, or Augsburg, by Luther and Melancthon, in 1530, contains the principles of the Protestants, and their reasons for separating from the Roman Catholic church.

The Augustan history, (historia Augusta) a series of Roman historians, who wrote the lives of the Roman emperors, from Adrian to Carinus inclusive; a period of 167 years.

The Augustan age of any national literature, is the supposed period of its highest state of purity and refinement. So the reign of Louis XIV. has been called the Augustan age of French literature, and that of Queen Anne, the Augustan age of English literature.

AUGUST-IN'ANS, n. pl. Those divines, who, from St. Augustin, maintain that grace is effectual from its nature, absolutely and morally, not relatively and gradually.

AUGUST'INS, n. pl. An order of monks, so called from St. Augustin; popularly called Austia Friars. They originally were hermits, but were congregated into one body by Pope Alexander IV., under Lanfranc, in 1256. They clothe in black, and make one of the four orders of mendicants.

AUGUST'NESS, n. Dignity of mien; grandeur; magnificence.

AUK, n. [Provincially auk. L. alca.] A popular name applied to different species of aquatic birds of the genus Alca, and order Anseres; as, the great auk or northern penguin, the little auk or black and white diver, the Labrador auk or puffin, &c.

AU-LET'IC, a. [Gr. αυλητικος, from αυλος, a pipe.] Pertaining to pipes or to a pipe. [Little used.]

AULIC, a. [L. aulicus, from aula, a hall, court, or palace; Gr. αυλη.]

Pertaining to a royal court.

The Aulic Council, was a supreme court of the former German empire; properly the supreme court of the emperor, as the Imperial Chamber was that of the empire. Its officers were appointed immediately by the emperor, except the vice-chancellor, who was appointed by the archbishop of Mentz. It was composed of a president, who was a Roman Catholic, a vice-chancellor, and eighteen counselors or assessors, nine of whom were Roman Catholics, and nine Protestants; or, according to the statement of others, only six were required to be Protestants, but their vote, when unanimous, was reckoned equal to that of all the rest. Its decisions were without appeal, but subject to the ratification of the emperor. It always followed the emperor's court, the established seat of which was at Vienna. It ceased at the death of each emperor, and was renewed by his successor. It became extinct when the German empire was dissolved in 1806.

The term aulic council, is now applied to a council of the war department of the Austrian empire, and the members of different provincial chanceries of that empire, are called aulic counselors.

The Aulic, in some European universities, is an act maintained by a young divine, on being admitted a doctor of divinity. It begins by an harangue of the chancellor addressed to the young doctor, after which he receives the cap and presides at the Aulic or disputation.

AU-MAIL', v. t. [Fr. email.] To figure or variegate. [Not used.]

AUROCHS, a. [G. urchs, the uro-ox, urus and ox.]

The urus or bison of Poland; considered by some as the common ox in a wild state, but regarded by Cuvier as a distinct species. Bones nearly analogous to those of the urochs, but much larger, have been found fossil in the northern parts of both continents.

AURITID, a. [L. auritus, from auris, the ear.]

Eared; having lobes or appendages, like the ear: a term employed both in zoology and botany.

AURORA, n. [L. aurora; Sans. arua; Ch. and Heb. am, light, and 77 to raise.]

1. The rising light of the morning; the dawn of day, or morning twilight.

2. The goddess of the morning, or twilight deified by fancy. The poets represented her as rising out of the ocean, in a chariot, with rosy fingers dropping gentle dew.

3. A species of crowfoot.

Aurora borealis, or Lumen boreale; northern twilight; popularly called northern lights. This species of light usually appears in streams, ascending toward the zenith from a dusky line a few degrees above the northern horizon. Sometimes it assumes a wavy appearance, as in America, in March, 1782, when it overspread the whole hemisphere. Sometimes it appears in detached places; at other times, it almost covers the hemisphere. As the streams of light have a tremulous motion, they are called, in the Shetland Isles, scurry dancers. They assume all shapes, and a variety of colors, from a pale red or yellow to a deep red or blood color; and in the northern latitudes, serve to illuminate the earth and cheer the gloom of long winter nights.

Aurora australis; a corresponding phenomenon in the southern hemisphere; the streams of light ascending in the same manner from near the southern horizon.

AURORAL, a. Belonging to the aurora, or to the northern lights; resembling the twilight. E. Goodrich.

AURUM, n. [L. See AURATE.] Gold.

Aurum fulminans, (fulminating gold), is a precipitate, obtained by ammonia, from a solution of gold in nitro-muriatic acid. This precipitate is of a brown yellow, or orange color, and when exposed to a moderate heat, detonates with considerable noise. It is a compound of auric acid and the oxyd of ammonia.

Aurum mosaicum, or mosaicum; a sparkling gold-colored substance, obtained by heating a mixture of sulphur and oxyd of tin in a close vessel. The elements of the oxyd unite with separate portions of the sulphur, forming sulphurous acid, and the aurum mosaicum, which last is a deuto-sulphuret (deuto-sulphid) of tin. It is used as a pigment.

AUTER DROIT, (ot'er drwa), [Law Fr.] Another's right.

AUTERFOITS, (ot'er fwa); a word composed of the French auter, another, and foits, fois, time, introduced into law language, under the Norman princes of England. It signifies, at another time, formerly; as, auterfois acquit, auterfois attainé, auterfois convict, formerly acquitted, attained, or convicted, which being specially pleaded, is a bar to a second prosecution for the same offense.

Blackstone.

Auterfois acquit. [Law Fr.] The plea of a former acquittal.

Auterfois attainé. [Law Fr.] The plea of a former attainder.

Auterfois convict. [Law Fr.] The plea of a former conviction.

AUTER VEE, (ot'er vee), [Law Fr.] Another's life.

Tenant pour autre vie; one who holds an estate by the life of another.

Blackstone.

AUTHENTIC, a. [Fr. authentique; It. and Sp. autentica; from Gr. autentikos, from authentikos, an author or maker; one who does any thing by his own right; also, one who kills himself. The first syllable is from auris, which is probably from the root of author, actor; and the sense of self-murderer seems to indicate that the other constituent of the word is from Scavo, Scivo, to kill, but the primary sense of which is, to strike, to drive or thrust with the hand, &c. In the word before us, the sense is to throw, or to set; hence authentic is set, fixed, made or made certain by the author, by one's own self.]

1. Having a genuine original or authority, in opposition to that which is false, fictitious, or counterfeit; being what it purports to be; genuine; true; applied to things; as, an authentic paper or register.

2. Of approved authority; as, an authentic writer.

3. In law, vested with all due formalities, and legally attested.

4. In music, having an immediate relation to the key-note or tonic; in distinction from plagal, having a corresponding relation to the fifth or dominant, in the octave below the key-note.

Authentic melodies; those which have their principal notes between the key-note and its octave; in distinction from plagal melodies, which have their principal notes in the octave below the fifth of the key.

Authentic moods or tones; in the ancient church music, the four moods, introduced by St. Ambrose, in which the principal notes of the melodies are confined within the octave above the key-note; in distinction from the plagal moods or tones, introduced by Gregory the Great, in which the principal notes of the melodies are confined within the octave below the fifth of the key.

Ed. Encyc.

Authentic or perfect cadence; the chord or harmony of the dominant, followed by that of the tonic, or the progression of the dominant to the tonic; in distinction from the plagal cadence, the chord of the fourth or subdominant, followed by that of the tonic, or the progression of the subdominant to the tonic.

Calcott.

AUTHENTICALLY, adv. In an authentic manner; with the requisite or genuine authority.

AUTHENTICITY, n. 1. The quality of being authentic; of established authority for truth and correctness.

2. Genuineness; the quality of being of genuine original. [In later writers, especially those on the evidences of Christianity, this term is restricted in its use to the first of the above meanings, and distinguished from genuineness. "It may be of use," says Bishop Watson, "to state the difference between the genuineness and the authenticity of a book. A genuine book is that which was written by the person whose name it bears. An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact, as they really happened." Apology for the Bible.]

AUTHENTICNESS, n. Authenticity. [Rarely used.]

AUTHOR, n. [L. auctor; Ir. ughdar; W. awdur; Fr. auteur; Sp. autor; It. autore. The Latin word is from the root of augeo, to increase, or cause to enlarge. The primary sense is one who brings or causes to come forth.]

1. One who produces, creates, or brings into being; as, God is the author of the universe.

AUX-ILIARY, (awg-zil-yu-re), n. A helper; an assistant; a confederate in some action, enterprise, or undertaking.

2. In grammar, a verb which helps to form the modes and tenses of other verbs; called, also, an auxiliary verb; as, have, be, may, can, do, must, shall, and will, in English; être and avoir, in French; essere and avere, in Italian; estar and haber, in Spanish.]

A-VALE, v. t. [Fr. valoir, to be worth; L. valeo, to be strong or able, to profit, to be of force or authority; Sp. valer, to be valuable, to avail or prevail, to be binding, to be worth; It. valere, to be worth, to be useful, to profit or avail; Eng. well; Ar. balla.]

The primary sense is, to stretch or extend, whence strength, value.]

1. To profit one's self; to turn to advantage; followed by the pronouns myself, thyself, himself, herself, itself, ourselves, yourselves, themselves, with or before the thing used; as, let him avail himself of his license.

2. To assist or profit; to aid in effecting a design, or bringing it to a successful issue; as, what will avail us against numbers? Artifices will not avail the sinner in the day of judgment.

A-VAIL, v. t. To be of use or advantage; to answer the purpose; as, strength without judgment will rarely avail. Generally, it signifies to have strength, force, or efficacy sufficient to accomplish the object; as, the plea in bar must avail, that is, be sufficient to defeat the suit; this scheme will not avail; medicines will not avail to check the disease; suppositions, without proof, will not avail.

A-VAIL', n. Profit; advantage toward success; benefit; as, labor, without economy, is of little avail. It seems usually to convey the idea of efficacious aid or strength.

A-VAIL-A-BIL-I-TY, n. Availableness.
A-VAIL/A-BLE, a. Profitable; advantageous; having efficacy; as, a measure is more or less available.
 2. Having sufficient power, force, or efficacy, for the object; valid; as, an available plea.

Laws human are available by consent. Hooker.
A-VAIL/A-BLE-NESS, n. Power or efficacy in promoting an end in view.

2. Competent power; legal force; validity; as, the availableness of a title.
A-VAIL/A-BLY, adv. Powerfully; profitably; advantageously; validly; efficaciously.

A-VAIL'ING, pp. Turning to profit; using to advantage or effect; assisting; profiting.

AV-A-RICIOUS-LY, adv. Covetously; with inordinate desire of gaining wealth. Goldsmith.

AV-A-RICIOUS-NESS, n. The quality of being avaricious; insatiable or inordinate passion for property.

AV-A-ROUS, a. Covetous. [Not used.] Gower.
A-VAST', exclam. [It. lasta, enough; literally, it suffices, from bastare, to suffice; Pers. bas, enough; Qu. D. hond vast, hond' vast, huff vast.]

In seaman's language, cease; stop; stay.
AV-A-TAR', or A-VX'TAR, n. A Hindoo word, denoting the descent of a deity in a visible form or incarnation.

A-VAUNT', exclam. [W. doat, begone.]
 Begone; depart; a word of contempt or abhorrence, equivalent to the phrase "Get thee gone."

A'VE, n. An ave-mary.
A'VE-MARY, n. [from the first words of the Roman Catholic prayer to the Virgin Mary; L. ave, Maria, hail, Mary.]

1. A form of devotion in the Roman Catholic church. Their chaplets and rosaries are divided into a certain number of ave-maries and paternosters.

2. A particular time, in Roman Catholic countries, about half an hour after sunset, and also at early dawn, when the bells ring, and the people repeat the ave-mary. P. Cye.

AV-E-N'AGEOUS, a. [L. avenaceus, from avena, oats; Fr. aveine.]
 Belonging to or partaking of the nature of oats.

AV'E-NAGE, n. [Fr.] A certain quantity of oats paid by a tenant to a landlord in lieu of rent or other duty. Encyc.

AV'EN-ER, n. [Norm. Fr.] In English feudal law, AV'EN-OR, } an officer of the king's stables, whose duty was to provide oats.

A-VENGE', (a-venj'), v. t. [Fr. venger; Sp. vengar; Port. vingar; L. vindicare. In Sax. winnan, to contend, to gain, to win.]
 1. To take satisfaction for an injury by punishing the injuring party; to vindicate by inflicting pain or evil on the wrong-doer.

Shall not God avenge his own elect? — Luke xviii.
Avenge me of my adversary. — 1b. ver. 3.

In these examples, avenge implies that the evil inflicted on the injuring party is a satisfaction or justice done to the injured, and the party vindicated is the object of the verb.

2. To take satisfaction for, by pain or punishment inflicted on the injuring party.

He will avenge the blood of his servants. — Deut. xxiii.
 Here, the thing for which satisfaction is taken is the object of the verb.

3. To revenge. To avenge and revenge, radically, are synonyms. But modern usage inclines to make a valuable distinction in the use of these words, restricting avenge to the taking of just punishment, and revenge to the infliction of pain or evil maliciously, in an illegal manner.

4. To punish; as, to avenge a crime. Dryden.

5. In the passive form, this verb signifies to have or receive just satisfaction, by the punishment of the offender.

Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? — Jer. v.
A-VENGE'ANCE, n. Punishment. [Not used. See VENGEANCE.]

A-VENGE'D, pp. Satisfied by the punishment of the offender; vindicated; punished.

A-VENGE'MENT, n. Vengeance; punishment; the act of taking satisfaction for an injury by inflicting pain or evil on the offender; satisfaction taken; revenge.

A-VENGE'R, n. One who avenges or vindicates; a vindicator; a revenger.

A-VENGE'R-ESS, n. A female avenger. Spenser.
A-VENGE'ING, pp. Executing vengeance; taking satisfaction for an injury by the punishment of the offender; vindicating.

AVENS, n. The herb bennet, (Ceum urbanum).
AVENT-AILE, n. The movable part of a helmet in front. Hallivell.

AVENT'INE, a. Pertaining to Mons Aventinus, one of the seven hills on which Rome stood. Bryant.

A-VENT'URE, n. [Fr. aventure, from L. venio, to come.]
 A mischance causing a person's death without felony; as by drowning, or falling from a house. [See ADVENTURE.] Cowley.

A-VENT'URINE, n. [Fr. aventurine.] A variety of translucent quartz, spangled throughout with scales of yellow mica.

AV'E-NOE, n. [Fr., from venir, to come or go; L. venio.]
 1. A passage; a way or opening for entrance into a place; any opening or passage by which a thing is or may be introduced.

2. An alley or walk in a park or garden, planted on each side with trees, and leading to a house, gate, wood, &c., and generally terminated by some distinct object. The trees may be in rows on the sides, or, according to the more modern practice, in clumps at some distance from each other. Encyc.

3. A wide street, as in Washington, Columbia.

A-VER', v. t. [Fr. avérer; it. avere, to aver, or verify; Arn. quirra, from the root of verus, true; Ir. feor or fir; W. gwir; Corn. uir; Ger. wahr; D. waar. See VERIFY.]
 1. To affirm with confidence; to declare in a positive or peremptory manner, as in confidence of asserting the truth. Prior.

2. In law, to offer to verify. [See AVEMENT.]

AV'ER-AGE, n. [Norm. aver, overs, cattle, money, goods, Sp. averio, from aver or haber, Fr. avoir, to have or possess. In ancient law, a duty or service which a tenant was bound to render to his lord, by his beasts and carriages or instruments of husbandry. Spelman. But averagium signifies also the loss of goods in transportation; Sp. averia, damage sustained by goods or ships; Port. averia, an allowance out of freight to the master of a ship, for damage sustained; contribution by insurers, to make good a loss; It. averia; Dan. haverie, damage of a ship or waste of goods, extraordinary charges during a voyage. If averia signifies damage, and is from aver or haber, Spanish, to have, the sense of the word is probably that which happens or falls, a misfortune, for the verb have and happen are radically the same word; Spanish, haber, to have, and to happen or befall; also, fortune, property. This would give the sense of damage, or of proportion, lot, share, that which falls to each of a number. But the primary sense is not very obvious.]

1. In commerce, a contribution to a general loss. When, for the safety of a ship in distress, any destruction of property is incurred, either by cutting away the masts, throwing goods overboard, or other means, all persons who have goods on board, or property in the ship, contribute to the loss according to their average, that is, the goods of each on board. This principle, introduced into the commerce of Europe from the Rhodian laws, and recognized by the regulations of Wisby, is now an established rule in the maritime laws of Europe; for it is most reasonable that, when one man's property is sacrificed to save a ship, all persons whose property is saved, or in like hazard, should bear their proportion of the loss.

Park. Beaves. Spelman.
 2. From the practice of contributing to bear losses in proportion to each man's property, this word has obtained the present popular sense, which is, that of a mean proportion, medial sum or quantity, made out of unequal sums or quantities. Thus, if A loses 5 dollars, B 9, and C 16, the sum is 30, and the average 10.

3. A small duty, payable, by the shippers of goods, to the master of the ship, over and above the freight, for his care of the goods. Hence the expression in bills of lading, "paying so much freight, with prime and average accustomed." Cowley. Encyc.

4. In England, the breaking up of cornfields, eddish, or roughings. Ash.

5. Averages, in the English corn trade, denotes the average amount of prices of the several kinds of grain in the principal corn markets.

Upon or on an average, is taking the mean of unequal numbers or quantities.

AV'ER-AGE, o. Medial; containing a mean proportion. Præc. Beddoes. Kirwan. Edwards's West Indies.

AV'ER-AGE, v. t. To find the mean of unequal sums or quantities; to reduce to a medium; to divide among a number, according to a given proportion; as, to average a loss.

AV'ER-AGE, v. i. To form a mean or medial sum or quantity; as, the losses of the owners will average 25 dollars each. Ch. Obs. x. 522, xl. 302.

These spars average ten feet in length. Belknap.

AV'ER-AG-ED, pp. Reduced or formed into a mean proportion, or into shares proportioned to each man's property. Jefferson.

AV'ER-AG-ING, pp. Forming a mean proportion out of unequal sums or quantities, or reducing to just shares according to each man's property.

A-VER'MENT', n. [See AV'ER.] Affirmation; positive assertion; the act of averring.

2. Verification; establishment by evidence. Bacon.

3. In pleading, an offer of either party to justify or prove what he alleges. In any stage of pleadings, when either party advances new matter, he avers it to be true, by using this form of words, "and this he is ready to verify." This is called an averment.

A-VER'NAT, n. A sort of grape. Blackstone.

A-VER'NI-AN, a. Pertaining to Avernus, a lake of Campania, in Italy, famous for its poisonous qualities, which ancient writers represent as so malignant as to kill fowls flying over. Hence, as authors tell us, its name, averos, without birds. Virgil. Melo. Strabo.

AV'ER-PEN-NY, n. Money paid toward the king's carriages by land, instead of service by the beasts in kind; or money paid in lieu of the service of average. Burn. Spelman.

A-VER'RED, (a-verd'), pp. Affirmed; laid with an avowment.

A-VER'R'ING, pp. Affirming; declaring positively; offering to justify or verify.

A-VER'RO-IST, n. One of a sect of peripatetic philosophers, who appeared in Italy before the restoration of learning; so denominated from Averroes, a celebrated Arabian author. They held the soul to be mortal, though they pretended to submit to the Christian theology. Encyc.

AV'ER-RUN'GATE, v. t. [L. averrunco, of ad and erunco, from runco, to weed, or rake away.]
 1. To root up; to scrape or tear away by the roots. Hudibras.

2. To prune.

AV'ER-RUN'CA'TION, n. The act of tearing up or raking away the roots.

2. The act of pruning, or cutting off superfluous branches. Cyc.

AV'ER-RUN'CA'TOR, n. In arboriculture, an instrument for pruning trees, consisting of two blades fixed on the end of a rod; so constructed as to operate like a pair of shears. Brady.

AV'ER-SA'TION, n. [L. aversio. See AV'ER.]
 A turning from with disgust or dislike; aversion; hatred; disinclination. South.

It is nearly superseded by AVERTION.

A-VERSE', (aver's), a. [See AV'ER.] The literal sense of this word is, turned from, in manifestation of dislike. Hence the real sense is,

1. Disliking; unwilling; having a repugnance of mind. Pope.

2. Unfavorable; indisposed; malign. Dryden.

This word and its derivatives ought to be followed by to, and never by from. This word includes the idea of from; but the literal meaning being lost, the affection of the mind signified by the word, is exerted toward the object of dislike, and, like its kindred terms, hated, dislike, contrary, repugnant, &c., should be followed by to. Indeed, it is absurd to speak of an affection of the mind exerted from an object.

Acere expresses a less degree of opposition in the mind than detesting and abhorring.

Milton often uses acere in its literal sense of turned away, with from; but it is not according to the English idiom.

3. Turned backward; in a direction contrary to progression; as, tracks acere. Dryden.

A-VERSE/LY, (a-vers'/ly), adv. With repugnance; unwillingly.

2. Backward; behind; as, an arm stretched aversely. Duvenant. Brown.

A-VERSE/NESS, (a-vers'/ness), n. Opposition of mind; dislike; unwillingness; backwardness.

Herbert.

A-VER'SION, n. [Fr. aversion, from L. averto.]

1. Opposition or repugnance of mind; dislike; disinclination; reluctance; hatred. Usually this word expresses moderate hatred, or opposition of mind, not amounting to abhorrence or detestation. It ought generally to be followed by to before the object. [See AVERT.] Sometimes it admits of for.

A freesholder is bred with an aversion to subjection. Addison.

2. Opposition or contrariety of nature: applied to inanimate substances.

Magdusa, notwithstanding this aversion to scythos, forms a kind of paste with water. Foucray, Trans.

3. The cause of dislike.

Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire. Pope.

A-VERT', v. t. [L. averto, a, from, and verto, to turn, anciently vertio; hence vertex, vortex; probably allied to L. verto; Eng. veer; Sp. birar; Eth. ΩP barl. Class Br.]

1. To turn from; to turn off or away; as, to avert the eyes from an object. Shak.

2. To keep off, divert, or prevent; as, to avert an approaching calamity. Hooker.

3. To cause to dislike. Hooker. But this sense seems to be improper, except when heart, or some equivalent word, is used; as, to avert the heart or affections, which may signify to alienate the affections. Thomson.

A-VERT', v. i. To turn away. Thomson.

A-VERT'ED, pp. Turned from or away.

A-VERT'ER, n. One that turns away or averts; that which turns away or averts.

A-VERT'ING, ppr. Turning from; turning away; preventing.

A-VI-A-RY, n. [L. aviarium, from avis, a bird.] A house or inclosure for keeping birds confined. Wotton.

A-VI-D'I-OUS, a. [L. avidus.] Eager; greedy. Bale.

A-VI-D'I-OS-LY, adv. [See AVIDITY.] Eagerly; with greediness. Bale.

A-VI-D'I-TY, n. [L. aviditas, from avidus, and this from avo, to desire, to have appetite; Heb. and Ch. וָאָב to desire, or covet.]

1. Greediness; strong appetite: applied to the senses.

2. Eagerness; intenseness of desire: applied to the mind.

AV-I-GA'TO, n. The Persian gratissima [Laurus AV-O-GA'DO, Persica, Linn.] or siliquar pear, a native of the West Indies. The tree has a straight stem, long, oval, pointed leaves, and flowers, each with a six-lobed corolliform calyx, produced in clusters, on the extremities of the branches. The fruit, when fully ripe, is considered a delicacy.

AVIGNON BER-RY, (a-ven'yong'-n) n. The fruit of the Rhamnus infectorius, and of other species of the same genus; so called from the city of Avignon, in France. The berry is less than a pea, of a yellowish-green color, and bitter, astringent taste; used by dyers and painters for coloring yellows. Encyc.

A-VISE', v. t. To consider. [Not in use.] Spenser.

A-VISE'MENT, n. Adviseiment. [See ADVISE and ADVISE.]

AV'O-CAT', (av'o-cá') n. [Fr.] An advocate: a term applied to the higher class of French lawyers, corresponding to the English counselor at law, and the Scotch advocate.

AV'O-CATE, v. t. [L. avoco, from a and voco, to call. See VOICER and VOCAL.] To call off or away. [Not used.] Burrow.

AV'O-CAT'ION, n. [See VOCATION, VOICE, VOCAL.] 1. The act of calling aside, or diverting from some employment; as, an avocation from sin or from business.

2. The business which calls aside. The word is generally used for the smaller affairs of life, or occasional calls which summon a person to leave his ordinary or principal business. The use of this word for avocation is very improper.

A-VOC'A-TIVE, a. Calling off. [Not used.]

A-VOC'A-TIVE, n. That which calls aside; dehortation; disuasion. Todd.

AV'O-CET, n. See AVOCET.

A-VOID', v. t. [Fr. éviter, or vider; vider, or vide, void, empty; Eng. vide, void, vidow; L. vidua.

See VOID. It coincides also with L. vito, evito; Fr. éviter. See CLASS III.]

1. To shun; to keep at a distance from; that is, literally, to void, or be wide from; as, to avoid the company of gaunsters.

2. To endeavor to shun; to shift off; as, to avoid expense.

3. To quit; to evacuate; to shun by leaving; as, to avoid the house. Shak.

4. To escape; as, to avoid a blow.

5. To emit or throw out; as, to avoid excretions. For this, VOID is now generally used.

6. To make void; to annul or vacate. The grant cap not be avoided without injunctio to the grantee. Anon.

7. In pleading, to set up some new matter or distinction, which shall avoid, that is, defeat or evade the allegation of the other party. Thus, in a replication, the plaintiff may deny the defendant's plea, or confess it, and avoid it by stating new matter. Blackstone.

A-VOID', v. i. To retire; to withdraw.

David avoided out of his presence. — 1 Sam. xviii. [Improper.]

2. To become void, vacant, or empty, as a benefice. Aylife.

A-VOID'A-BLE, a. That may be avoided, left at a distance, shunned, or escaped.

2. That may be vacated; liable to be annulled.

A-VOID'ANCE, n. The act of avoiding or shunning.

2. The act of becoming vacant, or the state of being vacant. It is appropriately used for the state of a benefice becoming void, by the death, deprivation, or resignation of the incumbent. Cowel.

3. The act of annulling.

4. The course by which any thing is carried off. Bacon.

A-VOID'ED, pp. Shunned; avaded; made void; ejected.

A-VOID'ER, n. One who avoids, shuns, or escapes.

2. The person who carries any thing away; the vessel in which things are carried away. Johnson.

A-VOID'ING, ppr. Shunning; escaping; keeping at a distance; ejecting; evacuating; making void or vacant.

A-VOID'LESS, a. That can not be avoided; inevitable. Dryden.

AV-OIR-DU-POIS', (av-er-du-pois') [Fr. avoir du poids, to have weight. See POIS.] A weight, of which a pound contains 16 ounces. Its proportion to a pound troy is as 17 to 14. This is the weight for the larger and coarser commodities, as hay, iron, cheese, groceries, &c. Chambers.

AV'O-LATE, v. t. To fly away; to escape; to exhale. Boyle.

B.

B is the second letter, and the first articulation, or consonant, in the English, as in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and most other alphabets. In the Ethiopic, it is the ninth letter, and its shape is that of a b. Perhaps from this or other like figure, it received its Hebrew name, beth, a house. It is a mute and labial, being formed by pressing the whole length of the lips together, as in pronouncing eb. It is less perfectly mute than p, as may be perceived by pronouncing the syllables eb and ep. It is convertible, 1st, with p, as in the Celtic ben or pen, a mountain; in the English beak and peak, beck and peck; 2d, with v, as in the German silver, for silber; and in Spanish, b and v are often used indifferently; 3d, with f, as in English bore, and Latin fero; English beard, Latin fero; in the Celtic bun, banadh, bunail, stock, origin, foundation; English found; Latin fundamentum; with the Greek β, as Bilip, for Φιλίππος; 4th, with v and w; as, Irish fior, Latin verus; fear, vir; Irish buiaic, the wick of a candle.

The Modern Greek B is always pronounced like the English Y, and the Russian B corresponds with it. In composition, the letter B is changed into p before the letter p; as in apprimo, from ob and primo; oppo, from ob and pono; into f, before f, as in offero, from ob and fero; into c before c, as in occido, from ob and cado, and cedo.

As a numeral, B was used by the Hebrews and Greeks, as now by the Arabians, for 2; by the Romans for 300, and with a dash over it, thus, B̄, for 3000. B is used also as an abbreviation; thus B. A. stand for bachelor of arts; B. L. for bachelor of laws; B. D. for bachelor of divinity; B. F., prefixed to the decrees of the old Romans, for bonum factum. In music, B stands for the tone above A; B̄, for B flat, or the semitone major above A; B, also stands for base, and B. C. for basso continuo, or thorough base.

BALSAM, n. [Gr. βάλσαμος; L. balsamum.]

1. An oily, aromatic, resinous substance, flowing spontaneously or by incision from certain plants. A great variety of substances pass under this denomination. But in modern chemistry, the term was once confined to such vegetable juices as are liquid or spontaneously become concrete, and consist of a resinous substance, combined with benzoic acid, or capable of affording it by decoction or sublimation. The balsams are either liquid or solid; of the former are the balm of Gilead and the balsams of copaiva, Peru, and Tolu; of the latter, benzoin, dragon's blood, and storax. Encyc. Nicholson. Ure.

The opinion that balsams contain or necessarily furnish benzoic acid, is not now generally sustained. The substances known as balsams are properly compounds of resin and essential oil, some of which, however, furnish benzoic acid by partial decomposition or distillation.

2. A name of the balsamum, which see.

Balsam apple; an annual Indian plant, included under the genus Momordica.

Balsam of Sulphur, is a solution of sulphur in oil.

Balsam of Tolu, is the produce of the Myrsopernum Toluiferum, or Tolu tree, of South America. It is of a reddish-yellow color, transparent, thick, and tenacious, but growing hard and brittle by age. It is very fragrant, and, like the balsam of Peru, is a stimulant, and used as a pectoral. Encyc. Linn.

BAM, or BEAM, as an initial syllable in names of places, signifies wood; implying that the place took its name from a grove, or forest. [Ger. baum, a tree.]

BAM-ROO', n. A plant of the reed kind, growing in the East Indies, and in some other warm climates, and sometimes attaining to the height of 60 feet; originally placed by Linnaeus in the genus Arundo, but afterward ranked by him in a distinct genus, (Bambusa). From the main root, which is long, thick, and jointed, spring several round, jointed stalks, which, at 10 or 12 feet from the ground, send out from their joints several stalks, which are united at their base. These are armed, at their joints, with one or two sharp, rigid spines, and furnished with oblong, oval leaves, eight or nine inches long, on short footstalks. The flowers grow in large panicles, from the joints of the stalk, placed three in a parcel, close to their receptacles. Old stalks grow to five or six inches in diameter, and are so hard and durable, as to be used for building, and for all sorts of furniture, for water-pipes, and for poles to support palanquins. The smaller stalks are used for walking sticks, flutes, &c. Encyc.

BAN, n. [Sax. bannan, abannan, to proclaim; It. bando, a proclamation; Sp. and Port. banda; Fr. ban; Arm. ban; D. and Ger. ban, bannen; Sw. banna, to revile; Dan. band, ban, outlawry; forbande, to curse. Hence banish. The radical sense is to send, thrust, or drive. Class Bn, No. 3.]

1. A public proclamation or edict; a public order or notice, mandatory or prohibitory.

In a more particular sense,

2. In the plural, the word bans denotes notice of a marriage proposed, or of a matrimonial contract, proclaimed in a church, or other place prescribed by law, that any person may object, if he knows of any kindred between the parties, of any precontract, or other just cause why the marriage should not take place.

3. An edict of interdiction or proscription. Hence, in the former German empire, to put a prince under the ban of the empire, was to divest him of his dignities, and to interdict all intercourse and all offices of humanity with the offender. Sometimes cities were put under the ban of the empire, that is, deprived of their rights and privileges. Encyc. Milton.

4. Interdiction; prohibition.

5. Curse; excommunication; anathema. Raleigh.

6. A pecuniary mulct or penalty laid upon a delinquent for offending against a ban.

7. A mulct paid to the bishop by one guilty of sacrilege and other crimes.

8. In military affairs, a proclamation by heat of drum or sound of trumpet, requiring a strict observance of discipline, either for declaring a new officer, or for punishing an offender.

BANK'BILL, n. In America, the same as BANK NOTE. In England, a note, or a bill of exchange of a bank, payable at some future specified time. Such bills are negotiable, but form, in the strict sense of the term, no part of the currency. London Banker.

BANK'NOTE, a. A promissory note, issued by a banking company, signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier, payable to the bearer in gold or silver at the bank, on demand. Such bills, in England and America, form a large part of the currency.

BANK'ED, (bankt), pp. Raised in a ridge or mound of earth; inclosed or fortified with a bank.

BANK'ER, n. One who keeps a bank; one who traffics in money, receives and remits money, negotiates bills of exchange, &c.

2. A vessel employed in the codfishery on the banks of Newfoundland. Mar. Diet.

BANK'ING, ppr. Raising a mound or bank; inclosing with a bank. When we speak of restraining water, we usually call it banking; when we speak of defending the land, we call it imbanking. Encyc.

BANK'ING, n. The business or employment of a banker; the business of establishing a common fund for lending money, discounting notes, issuing bills, receiving deposits, collecting the money on notes deposited, negotiating bills of exchange, &c.

BANK'ING, a. Pertaining to, or conducted by, a bank; as, banking operations. McCulloch.

BANKRUPT, n. [Fr. banqueroute; Sp. banca rota, bankruptcy, bank and rota, and Port. rota, rota, broken, Eng. rotto, defeat. This may signify bank-broken, or bank-broken, most probably the latter, referring to the fund or stock. The last syllable is the Latin ruptus, contracted; Norm. rupt, rous, broken.]

1. In English law, a trader who secretes himself, or does certain other acts tending to defraud his creditors. Blackstone.

2. In a less technical sense, a trader who fails, or becomes unable to pay his just debts; an insolvent trader. In strictness, no person but a trader can be a bankrupt. Bankruptcy is applied to merchants and traders; insolvency, to other persons.

This distinction is not preserved in the United States, all insolvent debtors being called bankrupts.

BANKRUPT, a. Having committed acts of bankruptcy; unable to pay just debts; insolvent.

BANKRUPT, v. t. To break one in trade; to make insolvent.

BANKRUPT-CY, n. The state of being a bankrupt, or insolvent; inability to pay all debts.

BA'OBAB, n. The African name of the Adansonia digitata, the largest known tree in the world. The trunk is sometimes thirty feet in diameter, but not more than seventy feet high.

BAPTISM, n. [Gr. βαπτισμα, from βαπτίζω, from βαρρο, to baptize; Sp. bautizar; It. battizzare; Port. bautizar or baptizar. These seem to be from the Greek, by contraction. But the Arm. badaca, badam, may be from bata, bad, water.]

1. The application of water to a person, as a sacrament or religious ceremony, by which he is initiated into the visible church of Christ. This is usually performed by sprinkling or immersion.

2. The sufferings of Christ. Mat. xx. 23, 23.

3. So much of the gospel as was preached by John the Baptist. Acts xviii.

Hypothetical baptism, is the name given, in the Episcopal church, to baptism when administered to persons, in respect to whom it is doubtful whether they have or have not been baptized before. The formula in this case is, "If thou art not already baptized, I baptize thee," &c.

BAP-TIS'MAL, a. Pertaining to baptism; as, a baptismal vew.

BAPTIST, n. One who administers baptism. This appellation is appropriately given to John, the forerunner of Christ.

2. As a contraction of Anabaptist, one who denies the doctrine of infant baptism, and maintains that baptism ought to be administered only to adults or believers by immersing the body in water.

BAPTIST-ERY, n. [L. baptisterium.]

A place where the sacrament of baptism is administered. Primatively, baptisteries were in buildings separate from the church; but in the sixth century they were taken into the church-porch, and afterward into the church itself.

BAP-TIST'IC, a. Pertaining to baptism.

BAP-TIST'IC-AL, a. Branhall.

BAP-TIST'IC-AL-LY, adv. In a baptismal manner.

BAP-TIZ-A-BLE, a. That may be baptized.

BAP-TIZE, v. t. [See BAPTISM.] To administer the sacrament of baptism to; to christen. By some denominations of Christians, baptism is performed by ploaging or immersing the whole body in water, and this is done to none but adults. More generally, the ceremony is performed by sprinkling water on the face of a person, whether an infant or an adult, and in the case of an infant, by giving him a name, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which is called Christening.

BAP-TIZ'ED, pp. or a. Having received baptism; christened.

BAP-TIZ'ER, n. One who christens, or administers baptism.

BAP-TIZ'ING, pp. Administering baptism to.

BAR, n. [W. bar; It. barra; Fr. barre; Sp. barra; Port. id.; It. barra, shorra; Arm. barres, spiri; Heb. בָּרִית; Ch. ברית. If these words are the Eng. bar, the sense is, a shoot, that which shoots, passes, or is driven.]

1. A piece of wood, iron, or other solid matter, long in proportion to its diameter, used for various purposes, but especially for a hindrance or obstruction; as, the bars of a fence or gate; the bar of a door or hatchway. Nomb. iii. 36. Ex. xxvi. 26.

2. Any obstacle which obstructs, hinders, or defends; an obstruction; a fortification. Amos i.

3. The shore of the sea, which restrains its waters. Job xxxviii.

4. The railing that encloses the place which counsel occupy in courts of justice. Hence the phrase at the bar of the court, signifies in open court. Hence, also, licensed lawyers are called barristers; and hence the whole body of lawyers licensed in a court, are customarily called the bar. A trial at bar, in England, is a trial in the courts of Westminster, opposed to a trial at Nisi Prius, in the circuits.

5. Figuratively, any tribunal; as, the bar of public opinion. Thus the final trial of men is called the bar of God.

6. The inclosed place of a tavern, inn, or coffee-house, where the landlord or his servant delivers out liquors, and waits upon customers. Addison.

7. A bank of sand, gravel, or earth, forming a shoal at the mouth of a river or harbor, obstructing entrance, or rendering it difficult.

8. A rock in the sea, according to Brown; or any thing by which structure is held together, according to Johnson; used in Jonah ii.

9. Any thing laid across another, as bars in heraldry, stripes in color, and the like.

10. In the menage, the highest part of the place in a horse's mouth between the grinders and tusks, so that the part of the mouth which lies under and at the side of the bars, retains the name of the gum. Encyc. The upper part of the gums, between the tusks and grinders, which bears no teeth, and to which the bit is applied. Johnson.

11. Bars, in music, are lines drawn perpendicularly across the lines of the staff, including between each two a certain quantity of time, or number of beats.

12. In law, a peremptory exception sufficient to destroy the plaintiff's action. It is divided into a bar to common intentment, and bar special; bar temporary, and bar perpetual. Bar to common intentment, is an ordinary or general bar, which disables the declaration of the plaintiff. A special bar, is more than ordinary, as a fine, release, or justification. A temporary bar, is that which is good for a time, but may afterward cease. A perpetual bar, overthrows the action of the plaintiff forever. Blackstone. Covel.

13. A bar of gold or silver, is an ingot, lump, or wedge, from the mines, run in a mold, and unwrought. A bar of iron, is a long piece, wrought in the forge and hammered from a pig.

14. Among printers, the iron with a wooden handle, by which the screw of the press is turned.

15. In the African trade, a denomination of price; payment formerly being made to the Africans in iron bars. Johnson.

BAR, v. t. To fasten with a bar; as, to bar a door or gate.

2. To hinder; to obstruct; to prevent; as, to bar the entrance of evil.

3. To prevent; to exclude; to hinder; to make impracticable; as, the distance between us bars our intercourse. In this sense, the phrase is often varied, thus, the distance bars me from his aid, or bars him from my aid.

4. To prohibit; to restrain or exclude by express or implied prohibition; as, the statute bars my right; the law bars the use of poisoned weapons.

5. To obstruct, prevent, or hinder by any intervening obstacle; as, the right is barred by time; a release bars the plaintiff's recovery.

6. To except; to exclude by exception; as, bar to-night. Shak.

7. To cross with stripes of a different color.

8. To bar a vein, in farriery, is an operation upon the legs of a horse, or other parts, to stop malignant humors. This is done by opening the skin above a vein, disengaging it, and tying it both above and below, and striking between the two ligatures. Johnson.

9. To adorn with trappings; a contraction of barb. [See BAAS.] Drayton. Haywood.

BARB, n. [L. barba; W. baro; Corn. baro; Arm. baro. This is beard, with a different ending. The sense may be, that which shoots out.]

1. Beard, or that which resembles it, or grows in the place of it; as the barb of a fish, the smaller claws of the polypus, &c. Johnson. Coze.

2. Anciently, armor for horses, made of leather set with iron spikes; formerly, barbe or barde. Haywood.

3. A common name of the Barbary pigeon, a bird of a black or dun color. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

4. A horse from Barbary, of which it seems to be a contraction.

5. The points that stand backward in an arrow, fish-hook, or other instrument for piercing, intended to prevent its being extracted.

BAR'GAIN, (bar'gin), n. [Fr. baraigner, to haggle, to hem and haw; Arm. baraignour, a haggle; Ir. baraignare, to cavil, contend, bargain; Ir. braighean, debate. It seems to accord with It. briga, Sp. brega, and Fr. brigue.]

1. An agreement between parties concerning the sale of property; or a contract by which one party binds himself to transfer the right to some property for a consideration, and the other party binds himself to receive the property and pay the consideration.
2. A gainful transaction; as, an excellent bargain. Cowper.
3. Purchase, or the thing purchased. Locke.
4. In popular language, final event; upshot; as, we must make the best of a bad bargain. To sell bargains, is a vulgar phrase. To strike a bargain, is to ratify an agreement, originally by striking or shaking hands. The Latin ferre fœdus, may represent a like ceremony, unless it refers to the practice of killing a victim, at the solemn ratification of oaths. Bargain and sale; in law, a species of conveyance, by which the bargainer contracts to convey the lands to the bargainee, and becomes by such contract a trustee for and seized to the use of the bargainee. The statute then completes the purchase; that is, the bargain vests the use, and the statute vests the possession. Blackstone.

BAR'GAIN, v. l. To make a contract or conclusive agreement for the transfer of property; often with for before the thing purchased; as, to bargain for a house. A bargained with B for his farm.

BAR'GAIN, v. l. To sell; to transfer for a consideration; as, A bargained away his farm: a popular use of the word.

BAR-GAIN-EE', n. The party in a contract who receives or agrees to receive the property sold. Blackstone.

BAR'GAIN-ER, n. The party in a contract who stipulates to sell and convey property to another. Blackstone.

BARGE, (barj), n. [D. bargis; It. and Sp. barca; Ir. barc. Barge, and bark or barque, a ship, are radically one word.]

BAR'RI-ER, n. The manager of a barge.

BAR'RI-A, n. Baryta, which see.

BAR-ILLA, n. [Sp.] A plant cultivated in Spain for its ashes, from which the best kind of carbonate of soda of commerce is obtained. The plant is cut and laid in heaps, and burnt, the salts running into a hole in the ground, where they form a vitrified lump. Encyc.

2. The alkali procured from this plant, an impure carbonate of soda, used in making glass and soap, and in bleaching linen.

BAR-I-RON, (-i-urn), n. Iron wrought into malleable bars. Encyc.

BAR-I-TONE. See BAR-TONE.

BAR-I-UM, n. The metallic basis of baryta or baria, which is an oxyd of barium. Davy.

Barium is susceptible of two degrees of oxyguration: the first, or protoxyd of barium, is called baryta. [Barium is the legitimate word.]

BAR'K, n. [Dan. bark; Sw. barck; G. borke; probably from stripping, separating.]

1. The exterior covering of a tree, corresponding to the skin of an animal. This is composed of the cuticle or epidermis, the outer bark, or cortex, and the inner bark, or liber. The rough, broken matter on bark is, by the common people of New England, called ross.
2. By way of distinction, Peruvian bark.

BAR'K, v. l. To peel; to strip off bark. Also, to cover or inclose with bark.

BAR'K, } n. [Ir. barc; Fr. barque; Russ. barika;
BAR'QUE, } It and Sp. barca.]

A small ship; but appropriately, a ship which carries three masts without a mizzen top-sail. The English mariners in the coal trade apply this name to a broad-sterned ship without a figure-head. Encyc. Mar. Diet.

Water-barks, in Holland, are small vessels for conveying fresh water from place to place, the hold of which is filled with water. Encyc.

BAR'K-ING-I-RONS, n. pl. Instruments used in taking off the bark of trees.

BAR'K-PIT, n. A pit filled with bark and water, in which hides are steeped in tanning. Booth.

BAR'K-STOVE, n. A glazed structure for keeping tropical plants, having a bed of tanner's bark, or other fermentable matter, which produces a moist heat. Brande.

BAR'KY, a. Consisting of bark; containing bark. Shak.

BARLEY, n. [W. barlys; Sax. bere. Qn. L. far, Gr. rypos, Heb. בָּר bar, corn. In the Saxon Chronicle, An. 1124, it is written berlic. Owen renders it bread-corn, from bara, bread.]

A species of valuable grain, of the genus Hordeum, used especially for making malt, from which are prepared liquors of extensive use, as beer, ale, and porter. The kinds of barley principally cultivated in England are the common spring barley, the long-eared barley, the winter or square barley, by some called beer of big, and the sprat or battledore barley. This grain is used in medicine, as possessing emollient, diluent, and expectorant qualities.

Encyc. Miller. Arbuthnot.

BARLEY-BRAKE, n. A rural play; a trial of swiftness. Sidney.

BARLEY-BROTII, n. A low word for strong beer. Shak.

BARLEY-CORN, n. [See COBN.] A gralo of barley, the third part of an inch in length; hence originated our measures of length. Johnson.

BARLEY-MOW, n. A mow of barley, or the place where barley is deposited. Gay.

BARLEY-SUGAR, (barly-shug'ar), n. Sugar boiled till it is brittle, (formerly with a decoction of barley,) and candied with orange or lemon peel. McCulloch.

BARLEY-WATER, n. A decoction of barley, which is reputed soft and lubricating, and much used in medicine.

French barley, and pearl barley, are used for making decoctions. These are made by separating the grain from its husk. The pearl barley is reduced to the size of a small shot.

BARM, n. [Sax. beorn. Qn. L. fermentum, from ferreo; or beer-rakm, beer cream; or W. berwi, to boil.]

Yeast; the scum rising upon beer, or other malt liquors, when fermenting, and used as leaven in bread to make it swell, causing it to be softer, lighter, and more delicate. It may be used in liquors to make them ferment or work. Johnson. Encyc.

BARM'Y, a. Containing barm or yeast. Bacon. Shak.

BARN, n. [Sax. beorn, from bere, barley, and ern, or era, a close place, or repository.]

A covered building for securing grain, hay, flax, and other productions of the earth. In the Northern States of America, the farmers generally use barns also for stabling their horses and cattle; so that, among them, a barn is both a corn-house, or granary, and a stable.

BARN, v. t. To lay up in a barn. [Obs.] Shak.

BARNACLE, n. [Port. bernaca, the Snell goose; Fr. barnacle, or bernaque; L. bernis, a shell-fish.]

1. A shell which is often found on the bottoms of ships, rocks, and timber, below the surface of the sea; the Lepas anatifera of Linnaeus. The name is also applied to other species of the same genus. Cyc.

2. A species of goose, (Anas leucopsis), found in the northern seas, but visiting more southern climates in winter. The forehead and cheeks are white, but the rest of the head and the neck are black; the upper part of the body is grayish, barred with black and white, and the belly white. Formerly, a strange notion prevailed, that these birds grew out of wood, or rather out of the barnacles attached to wood in the sea. Hence the name. It is written also BERNACLE. Pennant.

3. In the plural, an instrument consisting of two branches joined at one end with a hinge, to put upon a horse's nose, to confine him, for shoeing, bleeding, or dressing. Encyc.

BARN-DOOR, n. The door of a barn. Milton.

BARO-LITE, n. [Gr. baros, weight, and λίθος, a stone.]

Carbonate of baryta. Its color is usually a light yellowish-gray; sometimes whitish, or with a tinge of green. It is strongly translucent. It usually occurs in small masses, which have a fibrous structure; sometimes in distinct crystals. This mineral is called also Witherite, from Dr. Withering, the discoverer. Cleveland. Kirwan.

BAROMETEER, n. [Gr. baros, weight, and μετρος, measure.]

An instrument for measuring the weight or pressure of the atmosphere, consisting of a glass tube, hermetically sealed at one end, filled with quicksilver, well defecated and freed from air, and inverted in a basin of quicksilver. A column of quicksilver is then supported in the tube, of equal weight with the incumbent atmosphere. This instrument was invented by Torricelli, of Florence, in 1643. Its uses are to indicate changes of weather, and to determine altitudes, by the falling and rising of the mercury. For this purpose, the tube is fixed to a graduated scale, so that the smallest variation in the column is visible. Encyc. Johnson.

BAROMETRICAL, a. Pertaining or relating to the barometer; made by a barometer; as, barometrical experiments.

BAROMETRICAL-LY, adv. By means of a barometer. Finkerton.

BAROMETZ, n. The Scythian Lamb; a singular vegetable production, consisting of the prostrate hairy stem of the fern Aspidium barometz, which, from its shaggy nature and position, has the appearance of a crouching animal. Brande.

BARON, n. [Fr. baron; Sp. baron or varon; It. barone; Sans. bararu, bharta, a husband. This word, in the middle ages, was written bar, ber, var, baro, paro, viro, riro, ciron. It is the vir of the Latins; Sax. veer; Ir. fir, fear; W. ger, for gair, gevir. See Spelman's Glossary, and Hirt. Pansa de Bell. Alex. 42; Hickes's Sax. Grammar, 113, 116. The Sax. veer, la vir, is doubtless the Sæmotic vir a man, so named from strength.]

1. In Great Britain, a title or degree of nobility; a lord; a peer; one who holds the rank of nobility next below that of a viscount, and above that of a knight or baronet. Originally, the barons, being the feudatories of princes, were the proprietors of land held by honourable service. Hence, in ancient records, the word barons comprehends all the nobility. All such, in England, had, in early times, a right to sit in parliament. As a baron was the proprietor of a manor, and each manor had its court-baron, hence the barons claimed, and to this day enjoy, the right of judging in the last resort; a right pertaining to the house of lords, or peers, as the representatives of the ancient barons, land-holders, manor-holders.

Anciently, barons were greater, or such as held their lands of the king in capite; or lesser, such as held their lands of the greater barons by quilitary service in capite.

The title of baron is no longer attached to the possession of a manor, but given by the king's letters patent, or writ of summons to parliament; that is, the dignity is personal, not territorial.

The radical word vir, fir, a man, is Celtic, as well as Teutonic; but the word baron was not known in the British Isles till introduced from the Continent under the Norman princes.

Spelman. Blackstone. Encyc. Cowel.

2. Baron is a title of certain officers; as, barons of the exchequer, who are the four judges who try cases between the king and his subjects relating to the revenue. Barons of the Cinque Ports were, before the Reform Act, members of the House of Commons, elected by the seven Cinque Ports, two for each port. These ports were Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, Lythe, Winchelsea, and Rye. Blackstone.

3. In law, a husband; as, baron and feme, husband and wife.

4. In cookery, a baron of beef consists of two sirloins not cut asunder. Smart.

BAR-TRAM, n. [L. pyrethrum; Gr. rup, fire.] A plant; pellitory. [Bailey. Johnson.]

BAR-WÖÖD, n. A red dye-wood, from Angola and other parts of Africa. [McCulloch.]

BAR-Y-STRON'TIAN-ITE, n. [Gr. βαρυς, heavy, and strontian.] A mineral, called, also, Stromnite, from Stromness, in Orkney. It has been found in masses of a grayish-white color internally, but externally of a yellowish-white. It is a compound of carbonate of strontian and sulphate of baryta. [Traill. Cleveland. Phillips.]

BAR-Y'TA, n. [Gr. βαρυς, heavy.] The heaviest of the earths, the specific gravity being as high as 4. It is an oxyd, the basis of which is a metallic substance called barytum. It is generally found in combination with the sulphuric and carbonic acids, forming the sulphate and carbonate of baryta, the former of which is called heavy-spar. [Cleveland. Thomson.]

BAR-Y'TES, n. [Gr. βαρυς, weight.] Sulphate of baryta, generally called heavy-spar; which see.

BAR-Y'TIC, a. Pertaining to baryta; formed of baryta, or containing it. [Kirwan.]

BAR-Y'TO-CAL-CITE, n. [baryta and calc. See CALX.] A compound of carbonate of lime and carbonate of baryta, of a dark or light gray color, occurring massive or crystallized.

BAR-Y-TÖNE, a. [Gr. βαρυς, heavy, and τῶνος, tone.] Pertaining to or noting a grave, deep sound, or mule voice. [Walker. Arbuthnot.]

BAR-Y-TÖNE, a. In music, a male voice, the compass of which partakes of the common base and the tenor, but which does not descend so low as the one, nor rise as high as the other.

2. In Greek grammar, a word which has no accent marked on the last syllable, the grave accent being understood.

BAR-Y'TUM, n. A metal, the basis of baryta. [See BARYUM.]

BA-SAL, a. Pertaining to the base; constituting the base. [Say.]

BA-SALT', (ba-zalt') n. [Pliny informs us that the Egyptians found, in Ethiopia, a species of marble, called basaltis, of an iron color and hardness, whence it received its name. Nat. Hist. lib. 36, c. 7. But, according to Da Costa, that stone was not the same which now bears the name of basalt. Hist. of Fossils, p. 263. If named from its color, it may be allied to the Fr. basalte, tawny. Lunier refers it to the Ethiopic basal, iron, a word I can not find.]

A rock, considered of igneous origin, consisting of augite and feldspar, with grains of magnetic or titaniferous iron, and also bottle-green particles of olivine, frequently disseminated. It is usually of a greenish-black color, or of some dull brown shade, or black. It constitutes immense beds in some regions, and also occurs in veins or dikes cutting through other rocks. It has often a prismatic structure, as at the Giant's Causeway, in Ireland, where the columns are as regular as if the work of art. It is a very tough and heavy rock, and is one of the best materials for macadamizing roads. [Dana.]

BA-SALTIC, a. Pertaining to basalt; formed of or containing basalt.

BA-SALTIC-FÖRM, a. In the form of basalt; columnar.

BA-SALTINE, n. A variety of common hornblende, found in basalt and lavas. The term is not now used. [Kirwan. Cleveland.]

2. A column of basalt. [Kirwan.]

BA-SÄ-NTTE, n. [Gr. βασαυτος, the trier. Plin. lib. 36, ca. 92. See BASALT.]

Lydian stone, or black jasper; a variety of siliceous or flinty slate. Its color is a grayish or bluish-black, often interspersed with veins of quartz. It is employed to test the purity of gold. [Cleveland.]

BÄS BLEU, (hä blew), n. [Fr.] A literary lady; a blue-stocking, which see.

BÄSE, a. [Fr. bas, low; W. bas; It. basso; Sp. bajo, low; W. basu, to fall, or lower. See ABASE.]

1. Low in place. [Obs.] [Spenser.]

2. Mean; vile; worthless; that is, low in value or estimation; used of things.

3. Of low station; of mean account; without rank, dignity, or estimation among men; used of persons.

The base shall behave proudly against the honorable. — Is. iii.

4. Of mean spirit; disingenuous; illiberal; low; without dignity of sentiment; as, a base and abject multitude.

5. Of little comparative value; applied to metals, and perhaps to all metals, except gold and silver.

6. Deep; grave; applied to sounds; as, the base sounds of a viol. [Bacon.]

7. Of illegitimate birth; born out of wedlock. [Shak.]

8. Not held by honorable tenure. A base estate is an estate held by services not honorable, nor in capite, or by villeinage. Such a tenure is called base, or low, and the tenant, a base tenant. So writers on the laws of England use the terms a base fee, a base court. [Encyc.]

BÄSE, n. [Gr. βασίς; L. basis; It. base, base; Sp. base; Fr. base; that which is set, the foundation or bottom.]

1. The bottom of any thing, considered as its support, or the part of a thing on which it stands or rests; as, the base of a column, the pedestal of a statue, the foundation of a house, &c.

* In architecture, the base of a pillar, properly, is that part which is between the top of the pedestal and the bottom of the shaft; but when there is no pedestal, it is the part between the bottom of the column and the plinth. Usually it consists of certain spires or circles. The pedestal also has its base. [Encyc.]

2. In fortification, the exterior side of the polygon, or that imaginary line which is drawn from the flanked edge of a bastion to the angle opposite to it.

3. In gunnery, the least sort of ordnance, the diameter of whose bore is $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch. [Encyc.]

4. The part of any ornament which hangs down, as housings. [Sidney.]

5. The broad part of any thing, as the bottom of a conc.

6. In old authors, stockings; armor for the legs. [Hudibras.]

7. The place from which racers or tilers start; the bottom of the field; the career or starting-post. [Dryden.]

8. The lowest or gravest part in music; improperly written bas.

9. A rustic play, called also days or prison bars. [Shak.]

10. In war, a tract of country protected by fortifications, from which the operations of an army proceed.

11. In geometry, the lowest side of the perimeter of a figure. Any side of a triangle may be called its base, but this term most properly belongs to the lowest side, or that which is parallel to the horizon. The base of a solid figure is that on which it stands. The base of a conic section is a right line in the hyperbola and parabola, arising from the common intersection of the secant plane and the base of the cone. [Encyc.]

12. In chemistry, the electro-positive ingredient of a compound, or more specifically the electro-positive ingredient of a salt. Thus any alkaline or earthy substance, combining with an acid, forms a compound or salt, of which it is the base. Such salts are called salts with alkaline or earthy bases.

13. Fundamental base; that part in musical harmony which sustains the chord; in the natural position of the chord, the lowest part.

14. Thorough base; continued base, (basso continuo;) the fundamental base continued through a musical composition. Also, the harmony or accompaniment of a continued base, marked by figures on the base. The term is also used like counterpoint, as synonymous with the science of harmony.

15. Counter base, is a second or double base, when there are several in the same concert. [Encyc.]

16. In botany, the base of the fruit, is the part where it is united with the peduncle; the base of a leaf, is the extremity next the stem, opposed to the apex.

BASE, v. t. To embase; to reduce the value by the admixture of meaner metals. [Little used.]
Bacon.

BASHYLE, n. [See BASHYLE.]

BAS'IC, a. Relating to a base; performing the office of a base in a salt.
2. The term is often applied to a salt in which the base is in excess, or constitutes a large proportion of the neutral salt. Kane.

BAS'IF-ER, n. That which converts into a salifiable base.

BAS'IF-ER, v. t. To convert into a salifiable base.

BAS'IF-ER-ING, pp. Converting into a salifiable base.

BAS'IGYNI-UM, n. [Gr. basia and yon.] The pedicel on which the ovary of certain flowers is situated, as of a chisel or plane; usually of 12 degrees, but for hard wood, 15 degrees. Encyc.

BAS'IL, v. t. To grind or form the edge of a tool in an angle. Mozon.

BAS'IL, n. [Fr. basilic; It. basilico.]
A name common to different species of plants, of the genus Coccyum, all natives of warm climates. They are fragrant aromatic plants, and one species, the sweet basil, is much used in cookery, especially in France.

BAS'IL, n. [Orient. bas to strip.]
The skin of a sheep tanned; written also BASAN.

BAS'IL-AR, n. [See BASILAR.]

BAS'IL-ARY, a. [It. basilarias; basia.]
Relating to the base; situated at the base.

This term, in anatomy, has been applied to the sphenoid bone, and the cuneiform process of the occipital bone, which are situated at the base of the cranium, and to an artery of the brain, resting on the cuneiform process of the occipital bone; also, to the os sacrum, situated at the base of the spine.

BAS'ILIAN MONKS; monks of the order of St. Basil, who founded the order in Pontus. The order still exists, but has less power and celebrity than formerly. Encyc.

BAS'IL'IC, n. [Gr. βασιλικη; L. basilica; Gr. βασίλειον.]
BAS'IL'IC-A, n. [See BASIL.] A king.
Anciently, a public hall or court of judicature, where princes and magistrates sat to administer justice. It was a large hall, with aisles, porticos, tribunes, and tribunals. The bankers also had a part allotted for their residence. These edifices, at first, were the palaces of princes, afterward courts of justice, and finally converted into churches. Hence, basilic now signifies a church, chapel, cathedral, or royal palace. Encyc. Sp. and It. Diet.

BAS'IL'IC, n. [See BASIL.] The middle vein of BAS'IL'IC-A, the arm, or the interior branch of the axillary vein, so called by way of eminence. Encyc. Quincy.

BAS'IL'IC, a. In the manner of a public edifice; fire or cathedral. Forsyth.

BAS'IL'IC-AL, a. Belonging to the middle vein of the arm.

BAS'IL'IC-AL, n. A particular nut, the walnut, basilica nut.

BAS'IL'IC-ON, n. [Gr. βασιλικον, royal.]
An ointment. This name is given to several compositions in ancient medical writers. At present it is confined to three official ointments, distinguished as black, yellow, and green basilicon. Encyc.

BAS'IL'IS-K, n. [Gr. βασιλικος; L. basiliscus; from basileus, king; so named from some prominences on the head, resembling a crown. Morin's Diet.]
1. A fabulous serpent, called a cockatrice, and said to be produced from a cock's egg brooded by a serpent. The ancients alleged that his hissing would drive away all other serpents, and that his breath, and even his look, was fatal. Some writers suppose that a real serpent exists under this name. The name basilisk is now applied to the species of a genus of lizards, (Basiliscus).
2. In military affairs, a large piece of ordnance, so called from its supposed resemblance to the serpent of that name, or from its size. This cannon carried an iron ball of 200 pounds' weight, but is not now used. Modern writers give this name to cannon of a smaller size, which the Dutch make 15 feet long, and the French 10, carrying a 48 pound ball. Encyc.

BAS'IL-WEED, n. Wild basil; a plant of the genus Clinopodium. Muhlenberg.

BAS'IN, (bas'in), n. [Fr. bassin; It. bacin; Arm. bagin; It. bacina, or bacile; Port. bacia. If the last radical is primarily a palatal letter, this is the German becken; D. becken.]
1. A hollow vessel or dish, to hold water for washing, and for various other uses.
2. In hydraulics, any reservoir of water.
3. That which resembles a basin in containing water, as a pond, a dock for ships, a hollow place for liquids, or an inclosed part of water, forming a broad space within a strait or narrow entrance; a little bay.
4. Among glass-grinders, a concave piece of metal by which convex glasses are formed.
5. Among hatlers, a large shell or case, usually of iron, placed over a furnace, in which the hat is molded into due shape.
6. In anatomy, a round cavity between the anterior ventricles of the brain. Johnson.
7. The scale of a balance, when hollow and round.
8. In Jewish antiquities, the laver of the tabernacle.
9. In physical geography, a circular or oval valley, or depression of the surface, the lowest part of which is generally occupied by a lake, or traversed by a river; also, the entire tract of country drained by a river, or to a sea or lake.
10. In geology, an isolated or circumscribed formation, particularly where the strata dip inward, on all sides, toward the center. This term is especially applied to the coal formations, called coal-basins or coal-fields.

BAS'IN-ED, (bas'end), pp. Inclosed in a basin. Young.

BAS'IN-SHAP'ED, (shap'ed), a. Having the form of a basin.

BAS'IS, n.; pl. BASIS. [L. and Gr.] the same as BASE, which see.

1. The foundation of any thing; that on which a thing stands or lies; the bottom or foot of the thing itself, or that on which it rests. See a full explanation under BASE.
2. The groundwork or first principle; that which supports.
3. Foundation; support.
The basis of public credit is good faith. Hamilton.
The basis of all excellence is truth. Johnson.

4. Basis, in chemistry. See BASE, No. 12.

BAS'IST, n. A singer of base.

BASK, v. t. [The origin of this word is not obvious. Qu. It. basquim, to rest or repose.]
To lie in warmth; to be exposed to genial heat; to be at ease and thriving under benign influences; as, to bask in the blaze of day; to bask in the sunshine of royal favor. The word includes the idea of some continuance of exposure.

BASK, v. t. To warm by continued exposure to heat; to warm with genial heat. Dryden.

BASK'ED, (baskt) pp. Exposed to warmth, or genial heat.

BASK'ET, n. [W. bogged, or basgaod; It. bascaid; probably from weaving or texture; W. basg, a netting or plaiting of splinters.]
1. A domestic vessel, made of twigs, rushes, splinters, or other flexible things, interwoven. The forms and sizes of baskets are very various, as well as the uses to which they are applied; as corn-baskets, clothes-baskets, fruit-baskets, and work-baskets.
2. The contents of a basket; as much as a basket will contain; as, a basket of medians is two bushels. But, in general, this quantity is indefinite.
In military affairs, baskets of earth sometimes are used on the parapet of a trench, between which the soldiers fire. They serve for defense against small shot. Encyc.

BASK'ET, v. t. To put in a basket. Conyer.

BASK'ET-FISH, n. A species of sea-star, or star-fish, of the genus Asterias, called also the Magellanic star-fish. It has five rays issuing from an angular body, and dividing into innumerable branches. These, when extended, form a circle of three feet diameter. [See ASTERIAS.] Encyc.

BASK'ET-HILT, n. [See HILT.] The hilt of a sword with a covering wrought like basket-work, to protect the hand. Hudibras.

BASK'ET-HILT'ED, a. Having a bit of basket-work. Warton.

BASK'ET-SALT, n. Salt put up in small baskets, which is purer, whiter, and finer than common brine salt. Encyc.

BASK'ET-WOMAN, n. A woman who carries a basket to and from market.

BASK'ING, pp. Exposing or lying exposed to the continued action of heat or genial warmth.

BASK'ING-SHARK, n. The sun-fish of the Irish; a species of Squalus, or shark, (Squalia maximus). This fish is from three to twelve yards in length, or even longer. The upper jaw is much longer than the lower one; the tail is large, and the upper part much longer than the lower; the skin is rough, of a deep leaden color on the back, and white on the belly. The fish weighs more than a thousand pounds, and affords a great quantity of oil, which is used for lamps, and to cure bruises, burns, and rheumatic complaints. It is viviparous, and frequents the northern seas. [See SQUALUS.] Pennant. Encyc.

BAS'QUISIL, (bas'kish) a. Pertaining to the people or language of Biscay. Bronn.

BAS-RELIEF', (ba-re-lee'f), n. See BASS-RELIEF.

BASS, n. [Base is undoubtedly a corruption of G. bars, D. baars, a perch. See BASE. It has no plural.]
The name of several species of fish. In England, this name is given to a species of perch, called by some the sea-wolf, from its voracity, and resembling, in a degree, the trout in shape, but having a larger head. It weighs about fifteen pounds. In the Northern States of America, this name is given to a striped fish which grows to the weight of 25 or 30 pounds, and which enters the rivers; of the genus Labrax.
A species of striped fish, of a darker color, with a large head, is called sea-bass, as it is never found in fresh water. This fish grows to two or three pounds' weight. Both species are well tasted, but the proper bass is a very white and delicious food. Prince. Belknap.

BASS, n. The American name of the linden, lime, or tree-tree; called also bass-wood. [See BAST.]

2. (pron. bas.) A hassock or thick mat on which persons kneel at church.

BASS, n. In music, the base; the deepest or gravest part of a tune; or the lowest part in the harmony of a musical composition. This word is thus written in imitation of the Italian basso, which is the English bass, low; yet with the pronunciation of base and plural bases; a gross error, that ought to be corrected; as the word used in pronunciation is the English word base.

BASS, v. t. To sound in a deep tone. Shak.

BASS-RE-LIEF', (bas-re-lee'f) n. [from It. basso, low, and relievare, to raise; whence rilievo, raised work. See LIFE and RELIEF.]
Sculpture, whose figures do not stand out far from the ground or plane on which they are formed. When figures do not protrude so as to exhibit the entire body, they are said to be done in relief; and when they are low, flat, or little raised from the plane, the work is said to be in low relief, (basso-relievo.) When the figures are so raised as to be strikingly prominent, they are said to be in bold, strong, or high relief, (alto-relievo.) See RELIEF. Encyc.

BASS-VIOL, n. See BASE-VIOL.

BASS'A, See BASMA.

BASSET, n. [Fr. bassette.]
A game at cards, resembling the modern faro, said to have been invented at Venice, by a nobleman, who was banished for the invention. The game being introduced into France by the Venetian ambassador Justiniani, in 1674, it was prohibited by severe edicts.

BASSET, v. l. [See BASIL.] Among coal-diggers, to incline upward. Thus a vein of coal bassets, when it takes a direction toward the surface of the earth. This is called cropping, and is opposed to dipping.

BASSET, a. Inclined upward; as, the basset edge of a strait.

BASSET-HORN, n. A musical instrument resembling a clarinet, but of much greater compass, embracing nearly four octaves. P. Cyc.

BASSET-ING, ppr. Having a direction upward.

BASSET-ING, n. The upward direction of a vein in a mine.

BASSETTO, n. A tenor or small base-viol.

BASSET, n. A wicker basket with a covering or hood over one end, in which young children are placed as in a cradle. Encyc. Dom. Econ.

BASS-MAT, n. Matting made of the inner bark of trees, particularly the lime-tree.

BASSO-COON-CERT-ANYTE, in music, is the base of the little chorus, or that which plays throughout the whole piece. Bailey.

BASSO-COON-TIN-U-O; thorough base, which see under BASE.

BASSO-RE-LIEVO. See BASE-RELIEF.

BASSO-RE-PIENO is the base of the grand chorus, which plays only occasionally, or in particular parts. Bailey.

BASSO-VI-O-LINO is the base of the base-viol.

BASSOCK, n. The same as BASS, a mat. [Bailey.]

BASSOON, n. [Fr. basson; It. bassone, from basso, low.]

A musical wind instrument, blown with a reed, and furnished with eleven holes, which are stopped, as in other large flutes. Its compass comprehends three octaves. Its diameter at bottom is nine inches, and for convenience of carriage it is divided into two parts; whence it is called also a figot. It serves for the base in a concert of hautboys, flutes, &c.

Johnson. Encyc. Busby.

BASSOONIST, n. A performer on the bassoon. Busby.

BASSORINE, n. A constituent part of a species of gum from Bassora, as also of gum tragacanth, and some gum-resins. Urc.

BAST, n. [Qu. D. and Dan. bast, bark, or from twisting.]

- The inner bark of the lime-tree, and hence matting or cordage made of the bark of the linden or lime-tree.
- A thick mat or hassock for persons to kneel on at church. [See BASS.] Ash.

BASTARD, n. [Arm. bastard; Fr. bastard; Fr. bastard; D. bastard; G. bastard; It. and Sp. bastardo; W. bastard; basu, to fall, whence base, and tarz, growth, issue, a sprout.]

A natural child; a child begotten and born out of wedlock; an illegitimate or spurious child. By the civil and canon laws, a bastard becomes a legitimate child by the intermarriage of the parents at any future time. But by the laws of this country, as by those of England, a child, to be legitimate, must at least be born after the lawful marriage. Blackstone.

Bastard signifieth, or bastard elder, in law, is when a man has a bastard son, and afterward marries the mother, and has a legitimate son, called matris puane, or younger. Blackstone.

BASTARD, n. A kind of sweet wine. [Not in use.] Shak.

BASTARD, a. Begotten and born out of lawful matrimony; illegitimate.

- Spurious; not genuine; false; supposititious; adulterate. In this sense, it is applied to things which resemble those which are genuine, but are really not genuine; as, a bastard hope, bastard honors.

Shak. Temple.

In military affairs, bastard is applied to pieces of artillery which are of an unusual make or proportion, whether longer or shorter, as the double culverin extraordinary, half or quarter culverin extraordinary. Encyc.

Bastard flower-fence; a plant, a species of Adonnanthera.

Bastard hemp; a plant, a species of Datisca, false hemp.

Bastard rocket; dyer's weed, or wild woad, a species of Reseda.

Bastard star of Bethlehem; a plant, a species of Althica.

Bastard scarlet; a red color dyed with bale-madder.

BASTARD, v. l. To make or determine to be a bastard. Bacon.

BASTARDISM, n. The state of a bastard.

BASTARDIZE, v. l. To make or prove to be a bastard; to convict of being a bastard; to declare legally, or decide a person to be illegitimate.

The law is so indulgent as not to bastardize the child, if born, though not legitimized, in lawful wedlock. Blackstone.

- To beget a bastard. Shak.

BASTARD-LY, adv. In the manner of a bastard; spuriously. Donne.

BASTARDS, n. pl. An appellation given to a faction or troop of bandits, who ravaged Guenue in France in the 14th century; supposed to have been headed by the illegitimate sons of noblemen, who were excluded from the rights of inheritance. Mexera.

BASTARDY, n. A state of being a bastard, or begotten and born out of lawful wedlock, which condition disables the person from inheriting an estate. Blackstone.

BASTARD-WING; in ornithology, a term applied to from three to five quill-like feathers, placed on a small joint, rising from the middle part of the wing, and corresponding to the thumb in some mammalia.

BASTARNIC, a. Pertaining to the Bastaræ, ancient inhabitants of the Carpathian Mountains, D'Anville.

Bastarnic Alps; the Carpathian Mountains, between Poland, Hungary, and Transylvania; so called from the ancient inhabitants, the Bastarnæ. D'Anville.

BASTE, v. l. [Arm. baz; Fr. bâton, for bastan; Sp. baston; It. bastone, a stick or club.]

- To heat with a stick.
- To drip butter or fat upon meat, as it turns upon the spit, in roasting; to moisten with fat or other liquid. Saxif.

BASTE, v. t. [Sp. bastear; It. imbastire, to baste; It. baste, a long stitch.]

To sew with long stitches; to sew slightly.

BASTED, pp. Beat with a stick; moistened with fat or other matter in roasting; sewed together with long stitches, or slightly.

BASTILE, (bas'teel), n. [Fr. from bâtir, bas'tir, to build.]

An old castle in Paris, built between 1369 and 1383, used as a state prison, and converted to the purpose of confining men for life, who happened to incur the resentment or jealousy of the French monarchs. It was demolished by the enraged populace in 1789.

BASTI-NADE, n. [Fr. bastonnade; Sp. bastonada; It. bastonata, from bastone, a stick or staff. See BASTE.]

A sound beating with a stick or cudgel; the blows given with a stick or staff. This name is given to a punishment in use among the Turks, of beating an offender on the soles of his feet.

BASTI-NADE, v. l. To beat with a stick or cudgel.

BASTING, ppr. Beating with a stick; moistening with dripping; sewing together with long stitches.

BASTING, n. A beating with a stick; a moistening with dripping; a sewing together slightly with long stitches.

BASTION, (bas'cliau), n. [Fr. and Sp. bastion; It. bastione; probably from bas'tir, bâtir, to build, to set or found.]

A huge mass of earth, usually faced with sods, sometimes with brick or stones, standing out from the angles of a fortified work to protect the wall; formerly called a bulwark. Bastions are solid or hollow. A flat bastion is made in the middle of the curtain, when it is too long to be defended by the bastions at its extremes. A cut bastion has its point cut off, and instead of it, a reëntering angle, or an angle inward, with two points outward. A composed bastion has two sides of the interior polygon unequal, which makes the gorges unequal. A demi bastion is composed of one face only, with one flank and a demi-gorge. A double bastion is one raised on the plane of another.

BASTON, n. The ace of clubs at quadrille. [Encyc.]

BASTON, n. [Sp. See BASTE.]

Architecture, a round molding in the base of a column; called also a torse, [torus.] Encyc.

BASTYLE, n. [Gr. βασις and ἵλιος.]

In chemistry, a term recently employed to denote any electro-positive ingredient of a compound, whether elementary, or if compound, performing the functions of an element. The term radical was before, and is still, employed to denote the same object. [See RADICAL.] Graham.

BAT, n. [Sax. bat; Fr. bat, bata; Ross. bat; allied to beat.]

- A heavy stick or club; a piece of wood with one end thicker or broader than the other, used in the game of cricket.
- Bat*, or bate, a small copper coin of Germany, with a small mixture of silver, worth four cruzers. Also, a coin of Switzerland, worth five livres. Encyc.
- A term given by miners to shale or bituminous shale. Kirwan.
- A sheet of cotton prepared for filling quilts or comfortables.

BAT, v. i. To manage a bat, or play with one. Mason.

BAT, n. [Rab. and Tal. בַּת, בַּת, or בַּת. Buxtorf.] I have not found this word in any European language, except in English.]

A name common to a race of chiropterous mammalia, forming the genus Vespertilio, of the order Primates, in Linnaeus's system, but now considered as a family, in the order Chiroptera, divided into several distinct genera. The fore feet have the toes connected by a membrane, expanded into a kind of wings, by means of which the animals fly. The species are numerous. Of these the vampire or Ternate bat inhabits Africa and the Oriental Isles. These animals fly in flocks from isle to isle, obscuring the air by their numbers. Their wings, when extended, measure five or six feet. They live on fruits, but are said sometimes to draw blood from persons when asleep. The bats of the northern latitudes are small; they are viviparous, and suckle their young. Their skin resembles that of a mouse. They enter houses in pleasant summer evenings, feed upon moths, flies, flesh, and oily substances, and are torpid during the winter. Encyc.

BAT-FOWL-ER, n. One who practices or is pleased with bat-fowling. Barrington.

BAT-FOWL-ING, n. A mode of catching birds at night, by holding a torch or other light, and beating the bush or perch where they roost. The birds, flying to the light, are caught with nets or otherwise. Cowel. Encyc.

BATA-BLE, a. [See BATE and DEBATE.] Disputable. The land between England and Scotland, which, when the kingdoms were distinct, was a subject of contention, was called batable ground. Cowel. Encyc.

BAT-ÂRD-EAU', (bat-ârd-s') n. [Fr. batre, to repel, and eau, water.] A coffee-dam.

BATA-TAS, n. A species of tick or mite, found on the potatoes of Surinam. Also, a name of the sweet potato. Encyc.

BATAVI-AN, a. [from Batavi, the people who inhabited the isle.]

Pertaining to the isle of Betuwe in Holland, between the Rhine and the Waal. But more generally, the word denotes what appertains to Holland in general.

BATAVI-AN, n. A native of Betuwe, or of the Low Countries.

BATCH, n. [D. bakel; G. gebäck; from bake.]

- The quantity of bread baked at one time; a baking of bread.
- Any quantity of a thing made at once, or so united as to have like qualities. B. Junson.

BATE, n. [Sax. bate, contention. It is probably from the root of beat. See DEBATE.]

Strife; contention; retained in make-bate.

BATE, v. t. [Fr. batre, to beat, to batter; but perhaps from abatre, to beat down. The literal sense is, to beat, strike, thrust; to force down. See BEAT.]

To lessen by retrenching, deducting, or reducing; as, to bate the wages of the laborer; to bate good cheer. Locke. Dryden.

[We now use ABATE.]

BATE, v. i. To grow or become less; to remit or re-trench a part; with of.

Bate thy speed, and I will bate of mine. Dryden.

Spenser uses bate in the sense of sinking, driving in, penetrating; a sense regularly deducible from that of beat, to thrust.

Yet there the seal stood not, but fully bate
Deep in the flesh, and opened wide a real flood gate.

BATE-BREED-ING, a. Breeding strife. [Not used.] Shak.

BATEAU, (bat-to') n. [Fr., from L. batellum.]

A light boat, long in proportion to its breadth, and wider in the middle than at the ends.

BATEFUL, a. Contentious; given to strife; exciting contention. Sidney. Shak.

BATELESS, a. Not to be abated.

BATEMENT, n. Abatement; deduction; diminution. [Bate, with its derivatives is, I believe, little used, or wholly obsolete, in the United States.]

BATEN-ITES, n. pl. A sect of apostates from MOBATE-NISTS, humedism, who professed the BATE-NI-ANS' abominable practices of the Ismaelians and Kirmatians. The word signifies esoteric, or persons of inward light. [See ASBASTINUS.]

BATFJL, a. [See BATEN.] Rich, fertile, as land. [Not in use.] Mason.

BATH, n. [Sax. batb, batho, a bath; bathian, to bathe; W. bath, or baz; D. G. Sw. Dan. bat, a bath; Fr. bath, the sea; old Phrygian, bedu, water; Qu. W. bozi, to immerse.]

- A place for bathing; a convenient vat or receptacle of water for persons to plunge or wash their bodies in. Baths are warm or tepid, hot or cold, more generally called warm and cold. They are also natural or artificial. Natural baths are those which consist of spring water, either hot or cold, which is often impregnated with iron, and called chalybeate, or with sulphur, carbonic acid, and other mineral substances. These waters are often very efficacious in scorbutic, bilious, dyspeptic, and other complaints.
- Immersion in a bath; as, to take a bath.
- A place in which heat is applied to a body immersed in some substance. Thus,
 - A dry bath is made of hot sand, ashes, salt, or other matter, for the purpose of applying heat to a body immersed in them.
 - A vapor bath is formed by filling an apartment with hot steam or vapor, in which the body sweats copuously, as in Russia; or the term is used for the application of hot steam to a diseased part of the body.

Encyc. Tooke.

A metalline bath is water impregnated with iron or other metallic substance, and applied to a diseased part.

Encyc.

In chemistry, a wet bath is formed by hot water, in which is placed a vessel containing the matter which requires a softer heat than the naked fire. When sand is used, instead of water, it is called a sand bath.

In medicine, the animal bath is made by wrapping the part affected in a warm skin just taken from an animal.

Shakespeare uses the word for an army.

BAT-TALION-ED, a. Formed into battalions. Barlow.

BAT-TEL, (bat'tel) n. [See BATTLE.]

In law, wager of battle, a species of trial for the decision of causes between parties. This species of trial is of high antiquity, among the rude military people of Europe. It was introduced into England by William the Norman Conqueror, and used in three cases only—in the court martial, or court of chivalry or honor; in appeals of felony; and in issues joined upon a writ of right. The contest was had before the judges, on a piece of ground inclosed, and the combatants were bound to fight till the stars appeared, unless the death of one party or victory sooner decided the contest. It is no longer in use. Blackstone.

BAT-TEL, v. i. To grow fat. [Not in use. See BATTEN.] 2. To stand indebted, on the college books at Oxford, for provisions and drink from the buttery.

BAT-TET-ER, n. One who batters or beats.

BAT-TET-ING, pp. Beating; dashing against; bruising or demolishing by beating.

BAT-TET-ING-RAM, n. In antiquity, a military engine used to beat down the walls of besieged places. It was a large beam, with a head of iron somewhat resembling the head of a ram, whence its name. It was suspended by ropes in the middle to a beam which was supported by posts, and balanced so as to swing backward and forward, and was impelled by men against the wall. It was sometimes mounted on wheels.

BAT-TET-Y, n. [Fr. batterie; Sp. bateria; It. batteria. See BATE.] 1. The act of battering or beating.

2. The instrument of battering.

3. In the military art, a parapet thrown up to cover the gunners, and others employed about them, from the enemy's shot, with the guns employed. Thus, to erect a battery, is to form the parapet and mount the guns. The term is applied, also, to a number of guns ranged in order for battering, and to mortars used for a like purpose.

Cross batteries, are two batteries which play alternately each other, forming an angle upon the object battered.

5. In electrical apparatus and experiments, a number of coated jars placed in such a manner, that they may be charged at the same time, and discharged in the same manner. This is called an electrical battery.

6. Galvanic battery; a pile or series of plates of copper and zinc, or of any substances susceptible of galvanic action.

BAT-TING, n. The management of a bat at play. Mason.

2. Cotton in sheets, prepared for quilts or bed-covers.

BAT-TISH, a. [from bat, an animal.] Resembling a bat; as, a battish humor. Vernon.

BAT-TLE, n. [Fr. batteille; W. batel, a drawing of the bow, a battle; Sp. batalla; It. bataglia, from battere.] See BATE. Owen supposes the Welsh batel to be from tel, tight, stretched, compact, and the word primarily to have expressed the drawing of the bow. This is probably an error. The first battles of men were with clubs, or some weapons used in battering, striking. Hence the club of Hercules. And although the moderns use different weapons, still a battle is some mode of battering or striking.]

1. A fight, or encounter between enemies or opposing armies; an engagement. It is usually applied to armies or large bodies of men; but, in popular language, the word is applied to an encounter between small bodies, between individuals, or inferior animals. It is also more generally applied to the encounters of land forces than of ships, the encounters of the latter being called engagements. But battle is applicable to any combat of enemies.

2. A body of forces, or division of an army. Bacon.

3. The main body, as distinct from the van and rear. [Obs.] Hayward.

To give battle, is to attack an enemy; to join battle, is properly to meet the attack; but perhaps this distinction is not always observed.

A picked battle, is one in which the armies are previously drawn up in form, with a regular disposition of the forces.

A drawn battle, is one in which neither party gains the victory.

To turn the battle to the gate, is to fight valiantly, and drive the enemy, who hath entered the city, back to the gate. Is. xxviii.

Battle royal; a battle with fists or cudgels, in which more than two are engaged; a melée. The term is also applied to a fight of game-cocks, in which more than two are engaged. Grose.

BAY, n. [Fr. baie; Sp. and Port. bahia; It. baia; D. baai; contracted from the root of Sax. byge, an angle, bygan, D. boogen, to bend, whence bow.]

1. An arm of the sea, extending into the land, not of any definite form, but smaller than a gulf, and larger than a creek. The name, however, is not used with much precision, and is often applied to large tracts of water, around which the land forms a curve, as Hudson's Bay. Nor is the name restricted to tracts of water with a narrow entrance, but used for any recess or inlet between capes or head lands, as the Bay of Biscay.

2. A pond-head, or a pond formed by a dam for the purpose of driving mill-wheels. [I believe not used in the United States.]

3. In a barra, a place between the floor and the end of the building, or a low inclosed place for depositing hay.

In England, says Johnson, if a barn consists of a floor and two heads, where they lay corn, they call it a barn of two bays. These bays are from 14 to 20 feet long, and floors from 10 to 12 feet broad, and usually 20 feet long, which is the breadth of the barn. Builder's Dict.

4. Any kind of opening in walls. Chambers.

BAY, n. [Qu. Gr. βαιον, a branch of the palm-tree. In Sp. bayo is a berry, the fruit of the laurel.]

1. The laurel-tree. Hence,

2. Bays, in the plural, an honorary garland or crown, bestowed as a prize for victory or excellence, anciently made or consisting of branches of the laurel.

The patriot's boons, and the poet's bays. Trumbull.

3. In some parts of the United States, a tract of land covered with bay-trees. Drayton, S. Carolina.

BAY, n. [Goth. beidan, to expect; It. badia; "tenere a bada," to keep at bay; "star a bada," to stand trifling; badare, to stand trifling; to amuse one's self, to take care, to watch, to covet; abbadare, to mind; Fr. baeyer, to gape or stand gaping. Qu. aboyer.]

A state of expectation, watching or looking for; as, to keep a man at bay. So a stag at bay, is when he turns his head against the dogs. Whence abeyance, in law, or a state of expectancy.

[Since to bay means to bark as a dog, to keep at bay may refer to the repeated barking or baying of a dog when his prey comes to fly, and faces him; as, when a stag turns upon the dogs, he keeps them at bay, or barking, because they dare not close in and attack him. Hence comes the meaning of the phrase, viz., "to ward off an attack; to keep an enemy from closing in." Rich. Dict.]

BAY, v. i. [Fr. aboyer; It. baare, to bark.]

1. To bark, as a dog at his game.

2. To encompass, or inclose, from bay. We now use embay. Shak.

BAY, v. t. To bark at; to follow with barking. Shak.

BAY-BER-RY, n. The fruit of the bay-tree or Laurus nobilis. This name is applied, in some parts of the United States, to the fruit of Myrica cerifera, (wax myrtle), and also to the plant itself.

BAY-BER-RY-TAL-LOW, n. A waxy substance obtained from the bayberry, or wax-myrtle; called also myrtle-wax.

BAY-L-RUM, n. A spirit obtained by distilling the leaves of the bay-tree.

BAY-SALT is salt which crystallizes or receives its consistence from the heat of the sun or action of the air. It forms in pits or basins, and from this circumstance receives its denomination. It appears first in a slight incrustation upon the surface of the water, which may be sea water, or any other water in which salt is dissolved. This crust thickens and hardens, till the crystallization is perfected, which takes place in eight, ten, or fifteen days. Encyc. Chambers.

BAY-TREE, n. A species of laurel; Laurus nobilis.

BAY-WIN'DOW, n. A window jutting out from the wall, as in shops.

BAY-YARN, n. A denomination sometimes used promiscuously with woolen yarn. Chambers.

BAY'ARD, n. [bay and ard, kind.]

1. A bay horse.

2. An unmanly beholder. Philips.

BAY'ARD-LY, a. Blind; stupid. B. Jonson.

BAY'ED, a. Having bays, as a building. Taylor.

BAYO-NET, n. [Fr. bayonette; Sp. bayoneta; It. bai-onetta; so called, it is said, because the first bayonets were made at Bayonne. Vieyra's Portuguese Dict.]

1. A short, pointed instrument of iron, or broad dagger, formerly with a handle fitted to the hore of a gun, where it was inserted for use, after the soldier had fired; but now made with an iron handle and ring, which go over the muzzle of the piece, so that the soldier fire with his bayonet fixed. Encyc.

2. In machinery, a term applied to pins which play in and out of holes made to receive them, and which thus serve to engage or disengage parts of the machinery. Nicholson.

BAYO-NETT, v. t. To stab with a bayonet. Burke.

2. To compel or drive by the bayonet.

BAY'OU, (bay'oo), n. [Fr. bayou, a gulf.]

In Louisiana, the outlet of a lake; a channel for water. Also, an outlet from the Mississippi, in the delta of that river, to the Gulf of Mexico. The term is also applied to other lateral outlets from the river, apparently its former channel.

BAY'S or BAYZE. [See BAIZE.]

BA-ZAR', (baz'ar), n. [Pers. بازار bazar; Russ. bazar, a market.]

1. In the East, an exchange, market place, or place where goods are exposed to sale. Some bazars are open, others are covered with lofty ceilings or domes, pierced to give light. The bazar at Tauris will contain 30,000 men. Encyc.

2. In Europe, a spacious hall, or suite of rooms, fitted up with counters or stands for the sale of goods. P. Cyc.

BAZ'AT, (baz'at), n. A long, fine-spun cotton, from Jerusalem. Encyc.

BAZ'AR', (baz'ar), n. Encyc.

BDEL'LIUM, (del'yuum), n. [L.; Gr. βδέλλιον; Syr. Ch. and Heb. ܒܕܠܝܘܢ. Bochart and Parkhurst translate it pearl. Gen. ii. But it is doubtful whether the bdellium of the Scripture is that now used.]

A gummy, resinous juice, produced by a tree in the East Indies, of which we have no satisfactory account. It is brought from the East Indies, and from Arabia, in pieces of different sizes and figures, and not unlike to glue. To the taste it is slightly bitterish and pungent; its odor is agreeable. In the mouth, it becomes soft, and sticks to the teeth; on a red-hot iron, it readily catches flame, and burns with a crackling noise. It is used as a perfume and a medicine, being a weak decoction. Encyc.

The Indian bdellium (the kind above referred to) is a product of the Comophora Madagascensis, a native of the East Indies and Madagascar. This is the bdellium of Scripture, and is also called falso myrris. The African bdellium is a product of the Hemolota Africana, a native of Senegal. The Sicilian bdellium is obtained from the Daneus gummifer.

BE, v. i. substantive verb; pp. BEING; pp. BEEN. [Sax. beon, to be. G. bin, bist; D. ben; Pers. بودن bdan, to be. San. bhu; and W. bōd, byzu, bydion. The sense is, to stand, remain, or be fixed; hence, to continue. This verb is defective, and its defects are supplied by verbs from other roots, am, is, was, were, which have no radical connection with be. The case is the same with the substantive verb in most languages.]

1. To be fixed; to exist; to have a real state or existence, for a longer or shorter time.

Let this mind be in you, which was in Christ Jesus. — Phil. ii. To be, contains his natural desire. Pope.

2. To be made to be; to become.

And they twain shall be one flesh. — Matt. xix. Jer. xxxii.

3. To remain. Let the garment be as it was made.

4. To be present in a place. Where was I at the time? When will you be at my house?

5. To have a particular manner of being or happening; as, How is this affair? How was it? What were the circumstances?

This verb is used as an auxiliary in forming the tenses of other verbs, and particularly in giving to them the passive form; as, he has been disturbed. It forms, with the infinitive, a particular future tense, which often expresses duty, necessity, or purpose; as, government is to be supported; we are to pay our just debts.

Let be, is to omit, or leave untouched; to let alone. Dryden.

Let be, mild be, my prey. Dryden.

BE, a prefix, as in because, before, beet, bedeck, is the same word as by; Sax. be, big; Goth. bi. It is common to the English, Saxon, Gothic, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish languages. It occurs probably in the Russian, but is written po, as it is in possideo, and a few other words in the Latin. It denotes nearness, closeness, about, on, at, from some root signifying to pass, or to press. [See BY.]

That this word is the Schematic 2, used as a prefix, is certain, not only from its general applications, which may be seen by comparing the uses of the word, in the Hebrew, for instance, with those in the Saxon; but from its use in particular phrases, particularly in its use before the name of the Supreme Being, in swearing. Hence we find that 2 is not from be nor from by, as Parkhurst supposes, but is an abbreviation of big, which is used in the Saxon, big-pell, a proverb, a by-word; bigstandan, to stand by.

BEACH, n. [Qu. Russ. bok, side.]

The shore of the sea, or of a lake, which is washed by the tide and waves; the strand. It may be sometimes used for the shore of large rivers.

BEACHED, (becht), a. Exposed to the waves; washed by the tide and waves; also, driven on a beach; stranded; as, the ship is beached.

BEACHY, a. Having a beach or beaches. Shak.

BEACON, (be'kon), n. [W. piques, a beacon, cone, or turret, from pis, a point. See PIRE. Sax. beacen, beacen, a signal; D. baak, baeken; Gr. bake.]

1. A signal erected on an eminence, consisting of a pitch barrel, or some combustible matter, to be fired at night, or to cause a smoke by day, to notify the approach of an enemy.

2. A signal erected on rocks or shoals, to warn of danger. Hence a lighthouse is sometimes called a beacon. In general, a beacon may be any light or mark intended for direction and security against danger.

3. Figuratively, that which gives notice of danger.

BEACON, v. t. To afford light as a beacon; to light up. Campbell.

BEACON-AGE, n. Money paid for the maintenance of a beacon. Encyc. Ash.

BEACON-ED, pp. or a. Lighted by a beacon; having a beacon.

BEAD, n. [Ger. beta, a bead; supposed from beten, biddan, to pray, from the use of beads in Roman Catholic countries; Sax. bead, a praying. In Spanish and Portuguese, the word answering to count is used for a bead.]

1. A little perforated ball, to be strung on a thread, and worn about the neck, for ornament. A string of beads is called a necklace. Beads are made of gold, pearl, amber, steel, garnet, coral, diamond, crystal, pastes, glasses, &c. The Roman Catholics use strings of beads in rehearsing their prayers. Hence the phrase, to tell beads, and to be at one's beads, is to be at prayer. Encyc. Johnson.

2. Any small globular body; hence the glass globules, used in traffic with savages, and sold in strings, are called beads; also a bubble on spirit.

3. A small piece of metal on a gun-barrel to take sight by.

4. In architecture, a round molding, commonly made upon the edge of a piece of stuff, in the Corinthian and Roman orders, cut or carved in short embossments, like beads in necklaces. Encyc.

Bidding of beads, is a charge given by a priest to his parishioners, to repeat certain prayers upon their beads for certain objects. Bailey.

BEAD-MAKER, n. One who makes beads. In French, paternostrier is one who makes, strings, and sells beads. In Paris are three companies of paternostriers; one that works in glass or crystal; one, in wood and horn; a third, in amber, coral, &c. Encyc.

BEAD-PROOF, a. Spirit is bead-proof, when, after being shaken, a crown of bubbles will stand, for some time after, on the surface, manifesting a certain standard of strength. Encyc.

BEAD-RÖLL, n. Among Roman Catholics, a catalogue of persons, for the rest of whose souls they are to repeat a certain number of prayers, which they count by their beads. Encyc.

BEAD-TREE, n. The Melia azedarach, a native of the East Indies, growing about 20 feet high, adorned with large pinnated or fringed leaves, and clusters of pentapetalous flowers. Encyc.

BEADS-MAN, n. A man employed in praying, generally in praying for another. Johnson.

BEADS-WOMAN, n. A praying woman; a woman who resides in an almshouse. Ash.

BEADLE, n. [Sax. byddel or bedel; Fr. bedeau; Sp. bedel; It. bidello; Ger. bidel, pedel; Sw. bodel, a beadle, or cleric; from the root of bid, Sax. beodan, to order or command. See BOO.]

1. A messenger or crier of a court; a servitor; one who cites persons to appear and answer; called also an apparitor or summoner. Encyc.

2. An officer in a university, whose chief business is to walk with a mace, before the masters, in a public procession; or, as in America, before the president, trustees, faculty, and students of a college, in a procession, at public commencements. Encyc.

3. A parish officer, whose business is to punish petty offenders. Johnson.

BEADLE-SHIP, n. The office of a beadle. Wood.

BEADLE, n. [Fr. bigle, so named from littleness; W. bae, little; Ir. big; It. piccola.] We have from the same root boy, and the Dances big, a little girl, and probably big is the same word. Qu. Gr. πυμνος, a pigmy.]

A small hound, or hunting dog, formerly used in hunting hares. They are now superseded to a great extent, by harriers. Beagles are of different sorts; as, the southern beagle, shorter and less, but thicker than the deep-mouthed hound; the fleet northern, or cat beagle, smaller, and of a finer shape than the southern. From these species united, is bred a third, still preferable; and a smaller sort is little larger than the lap-dog.

BEAK, n. [D. bek; Ir. peac; Arm. bek; Fr.

bec; Sp. pico; It. becco; Dan. pis, pik; Sw. pigge, pik; Sax. pic; Fr. picque; Eng. peak, pik, &c. The sense is, a shoot, or a point, from thrusting; and this word is connected with a numerous family. See Class Bg.]

1. The bill or nib of a bird, consisting of a horny substance, either straight or curving, and ending in a point.

2. A pointed piece of wood, fortified with brass, resembling a beak, fastened to the end of ancient galleys; intended to pierce the vessels of an enemy. In modern ships, the beak-head is a name given to the fore part of a ship, whose fore-castle is square or oblong; a circumstance common to all ships of war, which have two or more tiers of guns. Mar. Dict.

Beak or beak-head, that part of a ship, before the fore-castle, which is fastened to the stem, and supported by the main knee. Encyc.

3. In farricry, a little shoe, at the toe, about an inch long, turned up and fastened in upon the fore part of the hoof. Farricr's Dict.

4. Any thing ending in a point, like a beak. This in America is more generally pronounced peak.

5. In botany, a process, like the beak of a bird, terminating the fruit in certain plants, as in the Coturnium. [L. rostrum.]

BEAK, v. t. Among cock-fighters, to take hold with the beak. Ash.

BEAK'ED, (beekt), a. Having a beak; ending in a point, like a beak.

2. In botany, rostrate; furnished with a process.

BEAK'ER, n. [Ger. becher.] [like a beak.]

A cap or glass. Johnson.

BEAK-TON, (-tunn), n. A bickern; an iron tool, ending in a point, used by blacksmiths. Ash.

BEAL, n. [See BOU. W. bal, a prominence.]

A pimple; a wheal; a small inflammatory tumor; a pustule. Johnson, Ash.

BEAL, v. i. To gather matter; to swell and come to a head, as a pimple. Johnson, Ash.

BEAM, n. [Goth. bagms, a tree; Sax. beam; G. baum; D. boom, a tree; Dan. bom, a bar or rail; Ir. beim, a beam. We see by the Gothic, that the word belongs to Class Bg. It properly signifies the stock or stem of a tree; that is, the fixed, firm part.]

1. The largest, or a principal piece of timber in a building, that lies across the walls, and serves to support the principal rafters. Encyc.

2. Any large piece of timber, long in proportion to its thickness, and squared or hewed for use.

3. The part of a balance, from the ends of which the scales are suspended; sometimes used for the whole apparatus for weighing. Encyc.

4. The part on the head of a stag, which bears the antlers, royals, and tops.

5. The pole of a carriage, which runs between the horses. Dryden.

6. A cylinder of wood, making part of a loom, on which weavers wind the warp before weaving; and this name is given also to the cylinder on which the cloth is rolled, as it is wove.

7. The straight part or shank of an anchor.

8. In ships, a great main cross timber, which holds the sides of a ship from falling together. The beams support the decks and orlops. The main beam is next the mainmast. Mar. Dict.

9. The main piece of a plow, in which the plow-tails are fixed, and by which it is drawn.

10. Beam compass, an instrument consisting of a square wooden or brass beam, having sliding sockets, that carry steel or pencil points; used for describing large circles, and in large projections for drawing the furniture on wall-dials. Encyc. Johnson.

On the beam, in navigation, signifies any distance from the ship, on a line with the beams, or at right angles with the keel. Mar. Dict.

Before the beam, is an arch of the horizon between a line that crosses the ship at right angles, or the line of the beam, and that point of the compass which she steers. Mar. Dict.

Beam ends. A vessel is said to be on her beam ends, when she inclines so much on one side that her beams approach a vertical position. Mar. Dict.

BEAM-BIRD, n. A small European bird, so called because it often builds its nest on the projecting end of a beam or rafter in a building; also named the spotted fly-catcher. It is the Muscipapa griseola of naturalists. Ed. Encyc. P. Cyc.

BEAM-FEATHER, (-fel'er), n. One of the long feathers in the wing of a hawk. Booth.

BEAM-FILLING, n. The filling in of mason work between beams or joists.

BEAM-TREE, n. A species of wild service, a tree having very tough wood, used for beams, &c.

The Crateagus Aria, Linn. (Pyrus Aria, Decand.)

BEAM, n. [Sax. beam, a ray of the sun; beaman, to shine or send forth beams; Sam. bakuhah, splendor; Ir. beim, a stroke, and solbheim, a thunderbolt.]

A collection of rays emitted from the sun or other luminous body.

BEAM, v. t. To send forth; to emit; followed ordinarily by forth; as, to beam forth light.

BEAM, v. i. To emit rays of light, or beams; to shine.

He beamed, the day star of the rising age. Trumbull.

BEAMED, a. The head of a stag is said to be beamed when it has all its antlers put forth. Booth.

Bean-trefoil; a popular name of the Cytisus Laburnum and Anagyris foetid. Fam. of Plants.

BEAN-TRESSEL, n. A plant.

BEAR, (bäre), v. t. [pret. BORÉ; pp. BORN, BORNE. [Sax. bearan, beran, beoran, byran, geberan, geberan, gebiran, abaran, abaran, to bear, carry, bring, sustain, produce, bring forth; gebirian, gebirigan, to perlain to, to belong to, to happen, to become, or be suitable; answering to the Latin fero, porto, pario, and oporteo. Hence, probably, Sax. barn, barra, a son, coinciding with born. Goth. bairan, to bear, or carry; gabairan, to bear; G. föhren, to carry, and gebären, to bring forth; D. beuren, to lift, voeren, to carry or bear; baeren, to bring forth; Sw. bära, to carry; bära fram, to bring forth; barn, a son; Dan. bere, to carry, bear, produce; L. fero, pario, porto; Gr. φέρω, φορέω; Sp. and Port. parir, to bring forth; portar, to carry; It. portare, to carry; Ir. beoradh, beirim, to bear or bring forth, to tell or relate, whence Fr. parler; Russ. born, to take, to carry; Sans. bharati, to bear. This verb I suppose to be radically the same as the Shemitic בָּרָא to produce; L. pario. The primary sense is to throw out, to bring forth, or in general, to thrust or drive along. It includes the proper significations, both of L. fero and pario;

Shemitic פָּרָא farah, and בָּרָא bari. Hence, probably, Gr. βαρος, βαρως, and a great family of words. See Class Bt. Nos. 15, 22, 33, 35.]

1. To support; to sustain; as, to bear a weight or burden.

2. To carry; to convey; to support and remove from place to place; as, they bear him upon the shoulder; the eagle bearth them on her wings. Isaiah. Deuteronomy.

3. To wear; to bear as a mark of authority or distinction, as, to bear a sword, a badge, a name; to bear arms in a coat.

4. To keep afloat; as, the water bears a ship.

5. To support or sustain without sinking or yielding; to endure; as, a man can bear severe pain or calamity; or to sustain with proportionate strength, and without injury; as, a man may bear stronger food or drink.

6. To entertain; to carry in the mind; as, to bear a great love for a friend; to bear inveterate hatred to a gangling.

7. To suffer; to undergo; as, to bear punishment.
 8. To suffer without resentment, or interference to prevent; to have patience; as, to bear neglect or indignities.
 9. To admit or be capable of; that is, to suffer or sustain without violence, injury, or change; as, to give words the most favorable interpretation they will bear.
 10. To bring forth or produce, as the fruit of plants, or the young of animals; as, to bear apples; to bear children.
 11. To give birth to, or be the native place of.
 Here dwelt the man divine whom Samos bore. Dryden.
 12. To possess and use as power; to exercise; as, to gain or win. [To bear away.]
 Some think to bear it by speaking a great word. Bacon.
 [Not now used. The phrase now used is, to bear away.]
 14. To carry on, or maintain; to have; as, to bear a part in conversation.
 15. To show or exhibit; to relate; as, to bear testimony or witness. This seems to imply utterance, like the Latin ferre, to relate or utter.
 16. To sustain the effect, or be answerable for; as, to bear the blame.
 17. To sustain, as expense; to supply the means of paying; as, to bear the charges, that is, to pay the bill.
 18. To be the object of. [expenses.]
 Let me but bear your love, and I'll bear your cares. [Unusual.]
Shak.
 19. To behave; to act in any character; as, hath he borne himself penitent? [Vol. usual.]
Shak.
 20. To remove, or to endure the effects of; and hence, to give satisfaction for.
 He shall bear their iniquities. — Is. III. Heb. ix.
To bear the infirmities of the weak, to bear one another's burdens, is to be charitable toward their faults, to sympathize with them, and to aid them in distress. Brown.
To bear off, is to restrain; to keep from approach; and in seamanship, to remove to a distance; to keep clear from rubbing against any thing; as, to bear off a blow; to bear off a boat; also, to carry away; as, to bear off stolen goods.
To bear down, is to impel or urge; to overthrow or crush by force; as, to bear down an enemy.
To bear down upon; to press; to overtake; to make all sail to come up with.
To bear hard, is to press or urge.
Coar doth bear me hard. Shak.
To bear on, is to press against; also, to carry forward, to press, incite, or animate.
Confidence hath borne thee on. Milton.
To bear through, is to conduct or manage; as, to bear through the consulship. B. Jonson. Also, to maintain or support to the end; as, religion will bear us through the evils of life.
To bear out, is to maintain and support to the end; to defend to the last.
Company only can bear a man out in an ill thing. South.
To bear up; to support; to keep from falling.
Religious hope bears up the mind under sufferings. Addison.
To bear up; to keep aloft.
To bear a body, a color is said to bear a body in painting, when it is capable of being ground so fine, and mixed so entirely with the oil, as to seem only a very thick oil of the same color. Johnson.
To bear date, is to have the mark of time when written or executed; as, a letter or bond bears date Jan. 6, 1811.
To bear a price, is to have a certain price. In common mercantile language, it often signifies or implies to bear a good or high price.
To bear in hand; to amuse with false pretenses; to deceive. Bacon. South. Shak.
 I believe this phrase is obsolete, or never used in America.
To bear a hand, in seamanship, is to make haste, to bear, v. l. To suffer, as with pain. [quick.]
 But man is born to bear. Pope.
 This is unusual in prose; and though admissible, is rendered intransitive, merely by the omission of pain, or other word expressive of evil.
 2. To be patient; to endure. Dryden.
 This also seems to be elliptical.
 3. To produce, as fruit; to be fruitful, in opposition to barrenness. Dryden.
 This age to blossom, and the next to bear. Dryden.
 Here fruit must be understood.
 4. To press, with upon; as, to bear heavily on one's spirits; to bear hard upon an antagonist.
 5. To take effect; to succeed; as, to bring matters to bear. Guardian.
 6. To act in any character.
 Instruct me how I may bear like a true friar. [Unusual.]
Shak.
 7. To be situated as to the point of compass, with respect to something else; as, the land bore E. N. E. from the ship.

8. To relate or refer to, with on or upon; as, how does this bear on the question?
 9. To have weight on the neck by the yoke, as oxen attached to the neck of a cart.
 10. To convey intelligence; as, the letters bore that stecco was at hand. Sir W. Scott.
 11. To bear away, in navigation, is to change the course of a ship, when close hauled, or sailing with a side wind, and make her run before the wind. To bear up, is used in a like sense, from the act of bearing up the helm to the windward. Mar. Dict.
 Hence, perhaps, in other cases, the expression may be used to denote tending or moving from.
 12. To bear down, is to drive or tend to; to approach with a fair wind; as, the fleet bore down upon the enemy.
 13. To bear in, is to run or tend toward; as, a ship bears in with the land; opposed to bear off; or keeping at a greater distance.
 14. To bear up, is to tend or move toward; as, to bear up to one another; also, to be supported; to have fortitude; to be firm; not to sink; as, to bear up under afflictions.
 15. To bear upon, or against, is to lean upon or against; to act on as weight or force, in any direction, as a column upon its base, or the sides of two inclining objects against each other.
 16. To bear against; to approach for attack or seizure; as, a lion bears against his prey. Dryden.
 17. To bear upon; to act upon; as, the artillery bore upon the center; or to be pointed or situated so as to effect; as, to bring or plant guns so as to bear upon a fort or a ship.
 18. To bear with; to endure what is displeasing; to be indulgent; to forbear to resent, oppose, or punish. Reason would I should bear with you. — Acts xviii.
 Shall not God avenge his elect, though he bear long with them? — Luke xviii.

 BEAR'-ING-CLOTH, } born child is covered when carried to church to be baptized. Shak.
 BEAR, n. [Sax. beara; G. bar; D. beer; Sw. Dan. and Ice. björn; Ir. bear; allied, perhaps, to fierce, L. ferus, fera, or to barbarus.]

1. A wild quadruped, of the genus Ursus. The marks of the genus are, six fore teeth in the upper jaw, alternately hollow on the inside; and six in the under jaw, the two lateral ones lobated; the dog-teeth are solitary and conical; the eyes have a nictitating membrane, and the nose is prominent. The arctos, the brown or black bear of Europe, has his body covered with long, shaggy hair. Some are found, in Tartary, of a pure white color. The polar or white bear, has a long head and neck; short, round ears; the hair long, soft, and white, tinged in some parts with yellow. He grows to a great size, the skins of some being 13 feet long. This bear lives in cold climates only, and frequently swims from one island of ice to another. Encyc.

2. The name of two constellations in the northern hemisphere, called the Greater and Lesser Bear. In the tail of the Lesser Bear is the pole-star.
